has to be dealt with jointly by the management of the Canadian National Railways and by the government. Indeed, the statement of the Minister of Transport, made to me the last time this matter was up on Friday night, April 13, makes it clear that the decision not to do anything to supplement the pensions of Canadian National Railways retired employees in the lower brackets has been made by the government. The minister said quite clearly that thus far the government had not seen fit either to instruct or to direct the Canadian National Railways to make an increase in the basic pension.

I want to come back to that in a few moments, but before I do I must say a few words about Mr. Hutchinson's letter, and about some other letters that I have received since his letter of April 12, which Mr. Gordon put upon the record in the committee. I want to say that I have no desire to take issue with Mr. Hutchinson's letter, nor do I wish to come in between Mr. Hutchinson and other members of the general chairmen's association or other labour leaders interested in this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Neither do I.

Mr. Knowles: Therefore I shall make my remarks as carefully guarded as I can. I must say, however, that though I recognize Mr. Hutchinson's right to write to us the kind of letter that he did, though I have no quarrel with his making to us on his own behalf the suggestions he made, I too was surprised that the president of the Canadian National Railways should produce a copy of the letter which had been sent to him and place it on the record in the railways and shipping committee. Since he did that, attention should be called to the fact that although Mr. Hutchinson preferred that we leave to his committee and to the management of the railway the working out together of changes in the basic Canadian National Railways pension fund, he was anxious that we continue to do our best to get some sort of relief for those now retired, those now having a difficult time to get along on very inadequate allowances. I refer in particular to the paragraph in which he says:

> One of our prime objects is to improve the status of those who are now on pension, and we have reached tentative agreement on what can be done to improve their situation, but our plan is dependent to a great degree on the action of the government in regard to the institution of an old age pension at age seventy without a means test, and we earnestly solicit your continued support of that project.

In other words, despite some of the suggestions contained in Mr. Hutchinson's letter, there is in it his plea that we keep on working to try to get some improvements in the position of those now retired.

I answered Mr. Hutchinson's letter on April 17. I shall not weary the house by reading the whole of the letter, but I should like to put a sentence or two on record, where I said:

> I note your desire that we continue our efforts on behalf of this group already retired. You can count on it that I will do so. I dare to hope that Mr. Chevrier won't use the copy of your letter which you sent to him to try to dissuade me from this effort. That would be unfortunate, but if he does, I can of course point out to him that you have earnestly solicited our support on behalf of this group. Indeed many other letters we receive stress the urgency of our doing so.

As I say, I wrote to Mr. Hutchinson rather fully and in friendly terms. I am pleased to say I have had a further letter from him, written on April 20, the tone of which strikes me as somewhat different from the tone of his letter of April 12. It is a lengthy letter, and I have no intention of reading it all or placing it all on the record. However there are two or three paragraphs I should like to read. This is from Mr. Hutchinson's letter to me on April 20:

> Our most urgent wish is to do something for those who are now in retirement on inadequate pensions and with this in mind we did everything we could to get the C.N.R. to agree to a cost of living bonus for these people.

Then, later on, having indicated to me that their committee is not making much progress with respect to the plight of those already retired, he said:

> Since that time we have been working on other plans to try to arrive at some relief but have not yet been able to get anything satisfactory done.
> We are still working and hoping that we can do something, but the plan we have in mind is dependent on the passage of legislation authorizing a forty dollar per month old age pension at seventy without a means test.
> At the present time we are tied up awaiting that legislation.
> May I suggest that if it were possible to have the government reconsider their position in regard to cost of living bonus payments to civil servants it would open the way for a renewal of our claim.

I sent Mr. Hutchinson copies of Hansard of April 10 and April 13 when these matters were up for discussion. I had drawn his attention particularly to what the Minister of Transport had said as reported at page 2036 of Hansard for April 13, when he indicated to me that the case of retired C.N.R. employees stood on the same plane as that of superannuated civil servants.

And so now I have this further letter from Mr. Hutchinson stressing the plight in which retired C.N.R. pensioners still find themselves, and urging that we do something to relieve their situation. He suggests in particular that we work hard to get rid of the means test from the old age pension, and to get something done for superannuated civil servants so that that road block will be out of the way so far as C.N.R. pensioners are concerned.

In addition to the further letter from Mr. Hutchinson, which, I submit, sets aside any suggestion made by Mr. Gordon on the basis of the previous letter to the effect that we should not press this matter on the floor of parliament, I have had communications and messages from many others interested in this matter. In many instances they have been from ordinary individuals, retired on low C.N.R. pensions. Each one who has written me has urged that we keep up the battle. In addition I have had telephone communications from a brother general chairman of Mr. Hutchinson. He, too, was not quarrelling with what Mr. Hutchinson had done. He felt it was unfortunate Mr. Gordon had placed the letter on record; but he said that, as another member of the committee of which Mr. Hutchinson is a member, his view was that we had to keep fighting this matter out in the open, on the floor of parliament, if we were to get anywhere with it.

In addition, a few days ago I received a letter from Mr. J. E. McGuire, national secretary-treasurer of the Canadian brotherhood of railway employees and other transport workers. It is a lengthy letter, the whole of which I shall not put on Hansard. However, I shall read the closing paragraph, which says:

> So far as we are concerned we are most grateful to you and to the other members of parliament who have taken an active interest in this very important matter, because we believe that the time is long overdue when improvements should have been effected in the pensions now being paid to persons who have been retired from railway service, and I hope that you will continue your efforts along these lines.
> Yours very truly,
> J. E. McGuire,
> National Secretary-Treasurer

So it all adds up to the fact, as I said earlier, that perhaps it is a good thing that the letter to the hon. member for Lake Centre and to me was placed on the record by Mr. Gordon, because now we have this additional plea from Mr. Hutchinson himself, in his further letter to me, and the reaction of others who are interested. They are all backing us up and asking us to try to get this government to do something with respect to C.N.R. pensioners who are now retired.

It comes to my mind at this moment that the hon. member for Lake Centre gave one figure which I believe should be corrected. I realize he was speaking from memory, but he did refer to the number who were receiving only $25 a month. I though I heard him give that number as 1,800.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was 1,700.

Mr. Knowles: No; the figure is 3,256.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am always conservative.

Mr. Knowles: That many are receiving $25 a month. His other figure was correct, when he said that over 7,000 were receiving pensions of less than $40 a month.

On Friday, April 13, when this matter was under discussion, we did at least get a statement from the Minister of Transport, when he said:

> I have to say that the government thus far has not been able to recommend or direct the Canadian National Railways to increase the basic pension upwards until such time as the matter of its own civil servants receives similar or adequate consideration.

And then later he said:

> It appears to me that this question cannot be disposed of piecemeal, and that until such time as it is possible to find a solution for the whole problem the government does not feel disposed thus far to direct the Canadian National Railways to deal with a portion only of the problem.

Later, when I said that I took it from what he said that their case stood on the same plane as that of the superannuated civil servants and others in similar situations, the Minister of Transport replied, "That is right."

In other words, we now have it clear that the government recognizes the problem. It recognizes it in the case of retired Canadian National Railways employees, and recognizes it in the case of other groups to whom the minister referred. Well, that is a step in the right direction. If the problem is being recognized by the government, perhaps one of these times we will get them to do something about it. "But," says the Minister of Transport, "we cannot deal with it piecemeal." Let me point out that the government does deal with problems of this nature in a piecemeal fashion. I cannot discuss it at this time, but there is on the order paper a resolution to amend the Judges Act, and one of the purposes of that amendment, according to the resolution, is to improve the pension of judges and the widows of judges. That is a piecemeal approach to the problem. I have looked through the estimates and I find that the lowest pension paid to any judge or the widow of any judge at the present time is $1,111 a year. But in talking about railway pensioners we are dealing with the plight of over 3,000 persons whose pensions are only $300 a year.

I submit if it is possible for the government to deal piecemeal with the plight of the widows of judges or of judges whose pensions of $1,111 or more a year are too low, it is possible also to deal piecemeal with this problem. I never heard the government announce before such a perfectionist policy—this idea that it cannot touch a part of a problem until it deals with the whole problem. If the government waited in that way to deal with all the problems facing the country it would never make a move of any kind. Surely the way to grapple with the problem is to start somewhere. I submit that here is a deserving group of employees of a government-owned railway, where a start could be made. I go further. I remind the government that it has set a precedent. The fact that there is that precedent is to be found in the terms of the item we are now discussing. The item we are now discussing provides for the payment of a sum of money into the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund. What for? It is done to make it possible to make the minimum pension to retired employees covered by that fund, not $20 per month as the act of 1907 still specifies, but $30. I checked today and I find that figure of $20 per month was in the original act of 1907. Some years ago this practice was started of paying into the fund moneys provided by a special vote which would make sure that no recipient of a pension out of that fund would get less than $30 per month.

In addition to the estimates that deal with this matter, I have before me the annual report for the Department of Transport for the year ending March 31, 1950, and I find on page 101 Appendix 6(f) which sets out receipts and expenditures of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund. Among the receipts is an amount of $15,790.61 which was put in there so as to increase the retirement allowance to all retired employees receiving less than $30 per month to a figure equal to that amount.

This is one of those interesting balance sheets or accounts that starts with receipts nil, and then shows receipts totalling something over $3 million; then the expenditures are the same amount, and at the end of the year the balance to the credit of the fund is nil. In other words, the necessary amounts are put in both by the railways and by the government so that these retired employees will get a certain minimum pension. There is the precedent, although I have not been able to find out in what year this practice started, of putting in a special supplementary amount so as to bring the statutory minimum up from $20 to $30 per month.

But there was a piecemeal attack on the problem. It was an attack on a problem within the realm of retired railway workers. If it was possible to bring in a vote to assist that fund in order to pay the retired employees covered by it, not a minimum of $20 but a minimum of $30 per month, surely it is possible to bring in a similar vote to pay the employees of the Canadian National Railways generally who have a minimum of $25 per month a much higher minimum than that amount—double that figure, in any event.

Perhaps I should let the minister have something to say about this. It is perfectly all right with me if he wants to comment one way or another on the action of Mr. Gordon with regard to that letter.

Mr. Fulton: The minister was there when it was put into the record.

Mr. Knowles: If by any chance a covering letter was sent to the minister by Mr. Hutchinson, that should be put on the record along with the letter itself. I do not know if there was, but if so it is only fair that the covering letter to the minister and the covering letter to the president should also be on the record.

As I said in my opening remarks, the hon. member for Lake Centre and I naturally are concerned about what happened with respect to that letter. But we are not disturbed about it because it is quite clear that we have to fight these matters on the floor of parliament, or nothing is done for these groups of people. We have a request to do so from Mr. Hutchinson, from Mr. McGuire, and from scores of individuals. The important question is the plight of these men and I hope the minister will not get involved in any discussion about this letter and get away from the basic issue itself.

Let him not say that the problem cannot be attacked piecemeal. The government is attacking it piecemeal, and I have referred to two examples in particular, judges' widows and the item that is before us.

I want to say to the government that some time or another the problem of people on fixed pensions will have to be faced and dealt with more realistically than it has been thus far. We seem always to be arguing the plight of people now on pension and some members seem to have the notion, and I think the government has the notion, that it is a temporary problem, that if they can just wait a while these people will die off and the others who come along and go on pension will be on a higher rate as provided by the various pension schemes that have been put in effect in more recent years.

The plain fact of the matter is that when people who are working today in the anticipation of higher pensions in their years of retirement reach those years of retirement their pensions will not be worth as much as they now think they are going to be. In other words, it is a recurring problem. Every generation of pensioners, whether they be Canadian National pensioners, superannuated civil servants or what have you, will face the same problem of the inadequacy of fixed pensions in view of the story across the years of prices continuing to rise. Sometimes prices rise rather violently in a short period, but over the years they rise steadily and the value of a fixed income or fixed pension is forever going down.

I submit to the government that they are not going to sidestep this problem by simply waiting until people whose plight we are now pleading die off because there will be another generation of pensioners. If not immediately when they go on pension, certainly shortly thereafter they will find that what they are getting is hopelessly inadequate. At some point along the way some sort of an adjustable basis will have to be found. In so far as the Minister of Transport is concerned I submit that as these people come under his jurisdiction he can render a real service, not only to those persons retired on C.N.R. pensions but also to all C.N.R. workers whose pension days are ahead, and to people generally, if he would find a formula or establish a precedent for dealing with the plight of these people by providing a cost of living bonus or a supplement to these people. Let it be an amount sufficient to sustain life in decency and dignity.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be allowed two minutes to reply generally to what the two hon. gentlemen have said in connection with this subject matter. First of all, let me tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that I have never seen him so vehement in his attitude toward this question as he is today. Perhaps that is due to the fact that he does not like the letter which was sent to him and which was placed on the record by the president of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Chairman, I stated quite clearly that I had no objection to the letter, but the minister is right when he says that I did not like the action of the president in placing it on the record, especially when the two people to whom it was addressed were not members of the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall deal with that in a moment, but I think I am quite correct in assuming that my friend does not like the letter he received from the chairman of the brotherhood. As I said a moment ago, I have never seen him so exercised. During the course of this discussion he has acted as if he had a chip on his shoulder.

When the motion was moved to appoint the committee on railways and shipping the hon. member said that now we would have the opportunity of discussing pensions to retired employees of the Canadian National Railways and that we would not be stopped from dealing with this matter. The committee is established, discussion takes place, the letter is put on the record; my hon. friend is angry, he does not like the letter, he does not like what has happened and he comes back here to the house and we have a repetition of everything that took place during the earlier debate. So that in essence we have a greater debate on these items as well as consideration in the committee with reference to this subject matter than we have ever had at least since I have been dealing with the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Knowles: That is all to the good.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not say that it is not, but let my hon. friend not complain that he has not had every opportunity, or that the committee was not given an opportunity, to discuss this matter. Let me deal now with the terrible attitude of the president of Canadian National Railways who, without the consent of either the hon. member for Lake Centre or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, dares to put this letter on the record. If my recollection serves me right, the president of Canadian National Railways before putting the letter on the record stated to the chairman of the committee that he had the permission of Mr. Hutchinson to do so, and that Mr. Hutchinson had indicated to him that he would not have the slightest objection if the president saw fit to put the letter on the record. He did put it on the record, and what does it say? I should like to quote some of the things that were not quoted by the two hon. gentlemen. It says this:

> At our annual meeting, held in November, 1950, we had the pleasure of having Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the C.N.R., to address a joint meeting of our association and the representatives of the Canadian brotherhood of railway employees. The combined meeting represented practically all organized labour on the C.N.R. At our request—

I would ask the two hon. gentlemen to listen to this.

> —Mr. Gordon spoke on the subject of pensions and told us that he realized that our present pension plan is inadequate and outdated. He promised to set up a committee of railway officers to meet with a corresponding number of representatives of organized labour to undertake to revise the existing rules. He fulfilled his promise and set up a committee of high ranking officers. We, on our part, selected a committee of labour representatives drawn from the Canadian and international unions.

Negotiations have been carried on by the joint committee in a very co-operative atmosphere and we have now reached the stage where certain concrete proposals are being considered, and the proposals have just been submitted to actuaries for their report and advice as to the cost to employer and employee of the various plans which are now under consideration.

I can see no objection, and I certainly cannot accept the great protests of the two hon. gentlemen in so far as the president of Canadian National Railways is concerned about his putting on the record the parts of the letter which I have read and the rest of it. Certainly there is nothing offensive in that. If there had been I am sure the representatives of the party of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the representatives of the party to which the hon. member for Lake Centre belongs, would have objected to it, because I must say they are able members of the committee. They saw no objection to placing the letter on the record and as a matter of fact it did not stop the discussion a particle. It only encouraged it.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friends who protest that this matter has not been brought to the attention of the responsible authorities certainly are mistaken in that view because that is not so. I am afraid I must disagree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he says that this is a matter for the government and the C.N.R. to decide. This is first and foremost a matter for Canadian National Railways and its employees to decide, and that is exactly what Mr. Hutchinson says. That is exactly as it should be, because parliament has authorized the Canadian National Railways management to deal with problems such as this.

But if it turns out that they are unable to deal with their employees and they make representations to the government with reference to the matters to which my hon. friends have referred, then I think it is not only the duty but the responsibility of the government to decide whether or not it will revise upwards or take no action with reference to this problem. Therefore I say, putting it in its proper light, that this is a matter which is now under discussion between the authorities of the Canadian National Railways and its employees. It is being given careful consideration by a joint committee of the employees and the officers. I think, as the letter states, we should at least give the committee a chance to see what it is possible to do. If they are not successful in dealing with it, then I think it will be the responsibility of the government if Canadian National Railways should decide to recommend to the government a plan upon which both will have agreed, or an alternative plan in case both cannot agree. Beyond what I have already said on a former occasion and what I am saying now I cannot go, and it would strike me that the house has had a full opportunity to deal with the matter.

Mr. Knowles: I want to thank the minister for his compliment in suggesting that I was a bit vehement, and that I was exercised about this matter. I try to maintain composure in this house, but when I feel that anything is being done that might inhibit progress with respect to these retired C.N.R. employees I do get exercised. So far as this letter is concerned, I am afraid the minister did not listen to everything that I said. In my earlier remarks I pointed out that I felt it could turn out to good effect by producing greater discussion of the whole question. It has done that, and so far as I am concerned, the matter of the letter can rest there.

I was disappointed that the minister chose to deal with the letter, but not with the real question. I went to great pains when I first started my remarks to express the hope that we would not get off the track, but the minister took the first opportunity to do just that. Let me try to bring him back. There are two aspects of the pension problem of Canadian National Railways employees. On the one hand there is the question of whether or not changes can be made in the plans now in existence for those employees still at work. It is stated by the minister that in his view it is preferable that any changes in these plans be worked out between the company and the employees. That is one aspect of the matter.

The other aspect of the matter is the case of C.N.R. men who are now retired and on pension. For the purpose of getting the matter clear, let us get some forthright answers from the minister today dealing only with that group. Let us not discuss the other matter today. In other words, let us discuss the case of the 7,000 or more employees now retired on pensions of less than $40 per month, and the 3,000 or more employees now retired on pensions of $25 a month. I should like to know whether the president of Canadian National Railways has asked the government to agree to the paying of a supplement to the pensions paid to those in the lower brackets. Is the minister prepared to answer that question now?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. My recollection is that there have been some discussions between the president of Canadian National Railways and myself, but there were no direct representations in so far as the government was concerned.

Mr. Knowles: Then, Mr. Chairman, may we take it that the minister's answer to the president of Canadian National Railways, when he discussed the matter with the minister, was in effect the same answer he gave us as recorded at page 2036 of Hansard for April 13 when he said that the matter could not be dealt with piecemeal but that the case of retired C.N.R. employees would have to wait until something was done about other groups in a similar situation.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am under any obligation to discuss any conversations I have had with the president of the Canadian National Railways. Neither am I under cross-examination on my estimates. I think all I am called upon to do is to give what information I have. I have said that I have had several discussions with the president of Canadian National Railways in connection with this matter. As a matter of fact, they were with the former president and the present president. Beyond that I am not prepared to go.

Mr. Knowles: There we are. We are getting a pretty clear picture. We have narrowed the discussion to the plight of those now retired. It is now clear that the former president of the Canadian National Railways and the present president have taken up this matter with the government. That means the railway company cannot do anything about these men by themselves; they have to deal with the government. The minister will not tell us what he said to the two presidents, but the minister tells us—and I have already quoted his statement from Hansard—that the government does not feel prepared to instruct or direct the Canadian National Railways to improve the position of these people until something is done about other people in similar circumstances.

The statement of the minister is that this matter cannot be dealt with piecemeal. In other words it is clear that it is the government that has said no to doing anything to improve the position of these people. I am absolutely certain from the correspondence that I have had, some of which I have referred to today—although only in part—that the leaders of the unions who are dealing with the company on this matter know that whatever progress they may be making in getting the general plan overhauled, they are licked so far as the case of the retired men is concerned until we can get the government to do something. It is here in parliament where the battle has to be fought. Even Mr. Hutchinson—although I was not going to mention that letter any more—is asking us to keep up the battle for the retired men on the floor of this house. He knows that until we get the government to do something, nothing is going to be done, that Mr. Donald Gordon is helpless until he gets the green light from this government. If the best answer we can get in public is that their case is on the same plane as that of the superannuated civil servants and other groups, I can only assume that this is what has been told to Mr. Donald Gordon. But I am making my plea, and I will continue to make it session after session, until something is done. I ask that the government make a start on this terrible problem which weighs so heavily in human terms upon so many of our good citizens, this problem of people called upon to exist on pensions or retirement allowances which might have seemed like decent amounts when they were first thought of years ago but which are utterly inadequate today.

Mr. Fulton: Some reference has been made to what took place in the sessional committee on government-owned railways. I should like to refer to one part of the discussion, when the president of the Canadian National Railways was before us. This has particular reference to that part of the field the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre just said he would like to take up specifically; that is, the position of the Canadian National Railways employee who has already retired. The printed record of the proceedings of the committee is not yet available, but my recollection is quite clear because I directed a certain set of questions to Mr. Gordon with a view to establishing whether or not these employees who have already retired are in the position that any adjustment of the Canadian National Railways pension plan is dependent on the working out and eventual implementation of an over-all contributory old age pension at age 70 without a means test. The answer of the president of the Canadian National Railways, in so far as he felt himself able to answer that question at that time, was that this was the case, that no definite decision or program regarding the retired employees receiving less than $40 a month could be worked out by the Canadian National, the employees association and the pensioners association, until there was a general determination of this matter of a national contributory old age pension without a means test.

It did not seem very useful to follow up that matter with close questioning in the committee, because the Minister of National Health and Welfare was not a member or a witness before the committee; obviously Mr. Gordon could not state government policy, and I did not feel it altogether proper at that moment to ask the Minister of Transport to declare government policy in that regard, when he was attending as a member of that sessional committee. However, I do feel it proper to refer to that passage between myself and Mr. Gordon on this occasion, and to ask the minister whether he or any of his colleagues in the cabinet are now in a position to elaborate on that statement. Is he in a position to elaborate on the general question, to let us know how much longer these retired employees receiving less than $40 a month may have to wait before their case is settled, and also let us know whether the whole new pension scheme which the president of the C.N.R. told us the company was trying to work out with its employees will depend on a satisfactory solution of that one particular branch? Is that what is meant when the government now says they cannot deal with this matter piecemeal; do they mean that the whole thing has to wait until the national contributory old age pension plan is worked out and implemented, or do they not? If they do, then how long will it be before the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways will have an adjustment in their pension?

Mr. Chevrier: In reply to the first part of my hon. friend's statement let me say simply that the president of the Canadian National Railways declared that the committee referred to in the letter is dealing with this problem. I have no intention of saying anything as far as that is concerned until I have had some report at least from the president of the Canadian National. As far as the other part of my hon. friend's statement or question is concerned, that is as to the attitude of the government, I put on record the other evening what that was, and I have no intention of adding to or taking away from that statement.

Mr. Fulton: In other words, we are to have no further information; is that it?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not in a position to give my hon. friend any information other than that he already has.

Mr. MacInnis: I have not been in the house for the last hour or so, and consequently I do not know what has been said already on this subject. I have no doubt, however, that the case for the superannuated railway employees has been put forward with considerable force and ability. I have had communications from pensioned C.N.R. employees in every part of this dominion; in Nova Scotia, in central Canada, that is Toronto and Montreal, in the western provinces, and particularly in my own province of British Columbia. There is not the slightest doubt—and I think there is not a member of the house who will not agree—that many of the superannuated employees of the Canadian National Railways are living under deplorable conditions. That is a fact which I am sure no one in this house would challenge. The question that confronts us here as members of parliament is what we are going to do to help those people who are now living in semi-starvation because of conditions over which they have no control. If this government cannot affect the cost of living, it must be apparent to all that the superannuated employees of the Canadian National Railways, retired civil servants, or any other pensioners cannot prevent their pension, small as it was in the beginning, from dwindling to about half what it was ten years ago. Now, that is the question that is confronting us. The question I ask this government is, are we going to do anything about it? Remember we have dealt with pensions in this house, pensions which in comparison to those we are now discussing provide a luxurious standard of living to those who were getting them. We have increased them. There is now a bill on the order paper to increase them again. Will any member of the government say that the employees of Canada's own railway, who have given faithful service not only to the railway but to Canada, should, in their old age, be allowed to starve?

That is the situation now confronting us. What are we going to do about it? I think that every member in this house should state his own position in this matter, because it has reached a stage where it is a scandal, where it is a reproach to us as a nation. I have not any illusion that I have been chosen to be communicated with by those organizations, or that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or the hon. member for Lake Centre have been selected to receive those letters. I am sure I would be surprised if there is a private member in this house representing an urban centre who has not had communications of this kind. I would be interested in knowing how the supporters of the government have replied to those communications.

I have one letter here. I am very careful about replying to letters of this kind. I do not put myself out on a limb as to what I am going to do or what I am going to try to get. I do try to show them the picture as it is. I have a letter which happens to be in my file, which is a reply to a mimeographed letter signed by James Downs, 62 Bristol avenue, Toronto, representing the Canadian National Railways Veterans Association in that city. It is dated April 12, 1951, and I suppose that every member from the city of Toronto received one as well as every member representing an urban constituency. I replied to the letter as follows:

Dear Mr. Downs:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 12, in which you give me an outline of the Canadian National Railways employees' retirement pensions.

I have had similar communications from organizations in several parts of Canada and more particularly of my own city of Vancouver. The situation of the Canadian National railway pensioners has already been discussed in the house, and it will be discussed in the special parliamentary committee on government-owned railways and other transportation systems. I do not know, of course, what action will be taken in the committee, but I am sure that the question will again be discussed during the session.

I can assure you of my full support for increased pensions.

So far as I have any support to give, I am giving that support now. But I can do nothing. Other private members of this house can do nothing until such time as the government will act in this matter. I implore the government to consider the plight of these men who, in their old age when they should have some of the comforts that we boast are the heritage of Canadians, when we assert that we have the highest standard of living in the world, are left with these meagre pensions. It is true some people in this country have a high standard of living, but those people do not include the majority of the pensioners of the Canadian National Railways. I would ask the Minister of Transport, therefore, to again take up this matter with his colleagues, and before the session ends to come before this house with some proposal to alleviate the conditions under which these people have to live.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in support of the previous speaker. I am not going to take much time because the member for Vancouver East has said most of the things I intended to say. Many of these pensioners live in my constituency in St. James and West Kildonan. I know these men because thirty years ago I was working alongside these fellows in the C.N.R. shops. I know their circumstances, and I know their problems. I know how difficult it is for them to make ends meet. We have only to look at the great rise in prices to know that the $25 which some of them are getting is far from being ample.

I recall that this plan came into operation in the depression years when $25 looked like a lot of money. Of course, barley was only fifteen cents a bushel and oats about ten cents, so conditions were quite different. Today $25 is really nothing. All it does is to keep that individual from receiving the old age pension. I do not know to whom I should appeal, but I am going to appeal to the government first, to the Canadian National Railways if need be, and I am going to ask the minister responsible to do his best for these Canadian National pensioners today. They are in great difficulty. Some people in the Canadian National Railways have retired well off, but the majority did not and are really in need of some assistance.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this question, since I was a member of the railway committee. I had no knowledge of that letter which was tabled by Mr. Gordon until I heard it read in the committee. I am not going to go into all the arguments I have heard in this house for ten years concerning the necessity for a pension for the classifications about which we are speaking. I believe that is conceded.

I should like to stress that there are two questions involved in this discussion. The first one is that, at the present time, a committee representing the employees of Canadian National have been meeting with the management over the last couple of months for the purpose of revising the whole pension scheme for the future. In my opinion that is the proper way to do it. It is the first time in the history of the system that management has formed a committee of the employees themselves. Their job is to try to find an actuarial basis upon which they can improve the whole pensions scheme for the future. I am quite prepared to leave it with the people affected, because I think they are in a position to do a better job in working out a suitable scheme than we are here, or people anywhere else in the country.

The second point that I should like to make is this: The other question is the question of the employees of the Canadian National Railways who have retired on pension. Mr. Gordon made it quite clear to the committee that that particular question was not being considered by the committee now set up. No matter what happened to the new scheme, the pensioners now out, the superannuated ones, would not come within the scope of anything that may be done by way of improvement. He did suggest that the only hope he could see for the immediate future was to have the means test taken out of the old age pension. By doing that many of those pensioners who now are limited in their earnings, because of the means test, would get relief. The only hope, and I think the thing that we have to emphasize in immediate relief for the superannuated pensioner, is to get something done in regard to amending the Old Age Pensions Act as soon as it can be done, because management made it quite clear to that committee that nothing would be done in so far as the superannuated pensioners were concerned.

I just wanted to make that clear. Let us not confuse the whole thing. I would leave the matter that is now in the hands of management and the committee to them, because that is the proper place for it; but I would urge the minister, if he has any influence with the rest of the cabinet, to try, before this session prorogues, to do something about the means test in the Old Age Pensions Act, because to the committee it was clearly indicated that that was the only immediate hope for the classification of pensioners who did not come within the scope of the new scheme, if and when management and employees agree to it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to restate or recapitulate anything I said before. It is clear from what the minister has said today that so far as the pensioner is concerned, there is little hope for his receiving any increase over the $25 basic pension, nor indeed for the 7,000 odd receiving any increase in their pensions of $40 and under. As a matter of fact, no matter what this committee of management and labour may do, nothing would be done for the man who is out today. I am not speaking of the man who is 70 years of age; I am speaking of the ones between 65 and 70, to whom the removal of the means test will mean no improvement.

I have in my hand a copy of the record of what took place in the railway committee. It is very interesting to read what the attitude of the president of the Canadian National Railways is in relation to those who are over 65 and who today are on pension. He said this.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend is going to read the evidence of the committee into the record may I say that I understand there is a rule of the house which prohibits it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I beg your pardon.

The Deputy Chairman: If the report of the committee has been tabled there is no objection. It belongs to the house and there is no objection to quoting it. See Beauchesne, third edition, page 204, citations 568 and 569.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The report has already been brought in. I am reading from page EE-7 of the typewritten script:

> Mr. Gordon: We have been considering a plan whereby we can bridge the gap between 65 and 70, until we get into the old age pension bracket.

That was referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I continue:

> In respect of employees to be retired that is fairly easy because we can talk to them while they are our employees and if the government agrees with our plans we would not expect much difficulty there.

After all, that is correct, Mr. Chairman. The responsibility is the responsibility of the government. Mr. Gordon goes on:

> But, before we can make that applicable to employees who have retired they would have to be searched out and give up the existing contract about which they would be suspicious. They would not believe the C.N.R. was going to give them something better. We would find it difficult to break that down, and remember also these men are old men and they are not too competent to judge what is in their own interests, and so on and so forth. So, I cannot give you any assurance whatever that the plan as finally agreed upon will be made applicable to retired employees.

If retired employees are to get an increase over what they are receiving today, however suspicious they might be, and however old they might be, I am sure there would be no aversion on their part to receiving an increase over what they are receiving today. I do not think that any good will come out of repetition, but when I think of the employees from 65 to 70—no matter what the old age pension law may be, no matter whether the pension will be awarded without the means test at 70—who are receiving $25 a month, and probably up to $40 a month, apparently they will receive little or no consideration, because the minister will not go any farther than he went on Friday the 13th, and that left no hope so far as the ex-employees are concerned. Reiteration and repetition do nothing. Finally, I say this: no amount of excuse, no committees that can be set up, no committee that has been set up in any way discharges the government from their responsibility.

When the minister was asked a very simple question as to what conversation he had with Mr. Gordon, the president, and whether Mr. Gordon had suggested to him that something be done for those people, the answer was that he would not be cross-examined. When one receives that answer—

Mr. Chevrier: That is exactly what my hon. friend would have said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course I am not the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Fortunately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not the minister who is responsible to give the fullest information. Judging by his answer, there is no question at all in my mind about these employees who are receiving a pension of from $25 to $40 a month and who are between 65 and 70 years of age, their position is hopeless, as it has been hopeless for four years, and that condition is to be continued. I feel very deeply on this, for I know and all of us know of ex-employees who gave the best years of their lives for a pension which was attractive, as the hon. member for Selkirk says, in 1935, but which today leaves the recipients of that pension destitute.

The wages that these people received over the years did not enable them to provide for themselves. I leave the matter there. I am not going to argue further. So far as the employee between 65 and 70 is concerned, the responsibility rests on the government of the country. No one else can accept that responsibility. Whatever may be done by the committee that has been set up to which Mr. Hutchinson referred, it in no way, as Mr. Gordon said, can determine the rights of those who are today on pension.

Mr. Green: The ground has been thoroughly covered by my deskmate, the hon. member for Lake Centre, as well as by other members who have spoken this afternoon. I should like to associate myself with their remarks. I would point out to the minister in addition, however, that four or five months ago the Canadian Pacific Railway provided an increased pension for its small pensioners.

I have here a press dispatch of December 22, which sets out that fact. The paragraph dealing with employees who had already retired reads as follows:

> The new rules will increase the minimum pension for employees already retired from $30 to $35 monthly in addition to which a supplemental allowance of $5 per month for those under age seventy will be continued.

There may be other factors entering into the action taken by the C.P.R.; but I do wish the minister would explain whether or not that is the case. It seems to me where one railway has provided an increase in the minimum pension, similar action should be taken by the other. I do not understand why the Canadian National should refuse to do what the Canadian Pacific has already done.

Mr. Chevrier: I think if my hon. friend reads the evidence given by the president of the Canadian National Railways he will find that the president was asked that question and proceeded to give an explanation of the difference between the two company plans. One is a compulsory plan while the other is not. I am speaking from memory, but I believe he went on to say that the average pension under the Canadian National plan was as high as if not higher than that under the Canadian Pacific plan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The average pension.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, higher than the Canadian Pacific, even with the increase.

Mr. Green: But what about the minimum pensions?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the point.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend will read the evidence he will find what the president of the Canadian National said on that occasion.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Again.

Mr. Knowles: Someone says "again". The only answer I can make is that the minister did point out that I was exercised about the matter, as indeed I am. In view of what has been said, may I point out in fairness to the Canadian Pacific that the supplement they pay to pensioners in the lower brackets goes not only to those on low pensions, which they earned under the compulsory contributory scheme, but it also goes to those who were in the employ of the company prior to 1937, and therefore were not in any compulsory scheme. So I think the difference between the two systems which Mr. Gordon sought to indicate is not pertinent.

My purpose in rising again was to appeal to the minister to take an objective view of the position in which some time ago he sought to leave this matter. I refer to the time the hon. member for Kamloops was putting a supplementary question to him, and the minister said that the whole matter was being discussed between the employees, through their committee, and the company, and that until such time as those negotiations were concluded one way or another he did not wish to say anything further or to take action in the matter.

That seemed a plausible position, and he was supported in it by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. May I point out to him —and I would ask him to look at this objectively—that that does not include any hope whatsoever for those now retired. The attitude of the president of the railways toward those now retired is indicated by the quotation read into the record by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The hopelessness and helplessness which members of the committee on the employees' side feel about anything being done through their negotiations on behalf of those now retired is revealed by the quotation I placed on record, from my second letter from Mr. Hutchinson. So those men who are now retired, sixty-five to sixty-nine, as well as those seventy and over, are out in the cold. Nothing is going to be done for them by the Canadian National Railways, unless they get a green light from the government. Nothing is going to be achieved for them by negotiations between the committee representing the men and the committee representing management.

The government has laid down a policy with respect to superannuated civil servants. We are still referred back to the statement made in January, 1948, by the Minister of Finance. That policy, which I regard as wrong, stands in the way. The Minister of Transport referred to it the other night. I ask him to give this whole matter further consideration—and when I use the expression "whole matter" I am narrowing it down, so far as our discussion today is concerned, to the case of those who are now retired.

To ask us to wait until the other negotiations are concluded is of no avail; because when those negotiations are concluded they will include nothing for these people, and we will then get the same kind of statement the Minister of Finance makes to retired civil servants—the statement that what they are receiving is what is theirs by virtue of a contractual arrangement. That is as far as he will go.

The problem is a serious one, and I earnestly hope the minister will give it further consideration. Before taking my seat I should say, despite anything we may have said earlier in debate, and despite any attitude the minister may have attributed to me, that I am most grateful to Mr. Donald Gordon, for having placed that letter on the record, and for having created an atmosphere in which it has been possible really to bring this whole matter out in the open.

Look at the time. Did the committee ever think this matter would be discussed at such length today?—not on your life! I certainly did not. But because of the attention that has been drawn to it, and because of the various aspects of the issue we have been able to bring out into the open, the case is now clearly before the minister. I hope, and I am encouraged by the smile I now see on his face, that he will adopt a different attitude toward it, and give full consideration now to the case of those who are at present retired. Do not ask them to wait until the negotiations on the other are completed, because that will not provide any help for those who are now retired.

Before taking my seat may I take the opportunity to ask one or two questions concerning the item before the committee. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that you will be happy to permit questions relating directly to the item. We are now considering item 503, which is in these words:

Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the provision of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1951, to March 31, 1952, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act.

The amount asked is $14,250. As I indicated earlier, I checked back and I found the act was passed in 1907, and that it laid out a formula for pensions for people working for the railways mentioned. However there was a floor in the act, for it said that in no case could a pension be less than $20 a month. I would ask the minister in what year the practice was begun of putting in the estimates an item to supplement the $20 up to the figure of $30 now provided.

I would ask an explanation, further, as to why the amount continues to decline. Before I came to the chamber this afternoon, I checked back for a period of six or seven years, and I found that in each succeeding year the amount required for this purpose has been a little less.

Mr. Chevrier: The increase has been in effect and has been voted in the estimates of the department since 1921. There are now 209 of these former employees affected by the vote. The reduction in the number of pensioners is due to natural causes.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, in due course this plan may be liquidated completely?

Mr. Chevrier: Quite.

Mr. Knowles: When the increase was made in 1921 was it to $30?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, from $20 to $30.

Mr. Knowles: When the increase was made in 1921 was it made to cover employees then retired?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that it did.

Mr. Knowles: What the government did in 1921 in connection with this group of people was in principle exactly what we are asking to be done now for retired Canadian National employees. Here was a group of people in 1921 who by statute were entitled to a minimum pension of $20 per month. Apparently the government of that day realized that $20 was not enough and despite the statute—incidentally, Mr. Watson Sellar calls attention to this in his memorandum; he says the statute should be changed—the government put an item in the estimates to increase the minimum of $20 to a figure of $30. What we are asking now is that the government do the same sort of thing for Canadian National employees who are already retired, more than 3,000 of whom are receiving only $25 a month and more than 7,000 of whom are receiving less than $40 a month. I urge action now.

Item agreed to.

Air services—Telecommunications division—
Airways and airports—radio aviation services—

504. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,707,545.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister a question which applies to all the items under the telecommunications division, and to a degree to other items as well. Take this item 504, the administration item; the vote for this year is $4,707,545, and for last year it is shown as being $4,489,730, or an increase of $217,815. When we turn to the details at page 480 we find that in the last fiscal year the vote was not spent by about $488,000. The result is that for the present year the estimate is up practically $700,000 over the amount actually spent last year. That is true of practically every item on this page.

In the case of vote 505 there is a decrease from last year of $922,900, but when we turn to the details on page 482 we find that last year the difference between what was voted and what was spent amounted to $820,000. In some of these cases where the estimate shows a decrease in amount, actually there is an increase over the amount which was actually spent during the last fiscal year.

It would seem to me that it would be more likely to lead to economy if these estimates were put in at a lower figure. The way it is done now gives one the impression that the figure is put in at a higher amount than it is expected will be spent, which I presume is done to provide what might be called a reserve. Surely that is an invitation to the departmental officials to spend up to the amount estimated, or in any event not to be so economical.

Why is it not possible to cut down these estimates closer to the amounts that are to be spent? For the first time the estimates this year show in the particulars the actual expenditures under each vote for the last two fiscal years. I presume that that is why this picture has never stood out so clearly before. Would it not be possible to cut down the estimates this year to an amount more nearly in line with what will actually be spent? Surely there is not going to be such a great increase over the amount actually spent last year as to bring the total up to what is being voted this year?

Mr. Chevrier: As the hon. gentleman knows, these are but estimates. The departmental officials do the best they can in preparing them. I can assure the hon. member that the estimates are revised by the time they get to the deputy minister, and then they are revised downward again, particularly this year, by the treasury officials. It does happen as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, that money voted last fiscal year has not been spent, but that may be due to the fact that the department has not been able to obtain the materials and supplies required, or the staff that they had in mind to get.

There are some examples that come to mind, not particularly in connection with these two items. There have been cases where an item has been put in the estimates two or three times because it has not been possible to enter into agreements with municipalities or with those who are negotiating for facilities in the department. The best answer I can give is that very often it is impossible to get within the fiscal year the materials and equipment that we expected to get, and therefore the money is not spent.

Mr. Green: This particular item showed a vote in the last fiscal year of nearly $500,000 over the amount actually spent. This covers administration, operation and maintenance; it is not an item for construction or the acquisition of buildings. Surely there is something wrong when in an administration item there is a difference of half a million dollars between the amount voted and the amount spent, out of a total vote of about $4,500,000.

Mr. Chevrier: It is a pretty large vote. It must be remembered that these telecommunications services are scattered all over the country, in the Northwest Territories, in Newfoundland and in areas it is not easy to reach.

Mr. Green: I am questioning what looks like a padding of estimates. I do not say that the Department of Transport is any worse than some of the other departments, and this may be the general government practice. It does seem to me that the estimate could be a great deal closer to the amount spent than is the case with these particular items.

Mr. Gillis: I want to again provoke the minister's thought in connection with a matter of some considerable importance. Two years ago there was considerable agitation from the Halifax area over the fact that there was not an adequate airport in that locality. The minister will remember that the airport at Eastern Passage had deteriorated to the extent that North Star aircraft could not land except in an emergency. During that period the transport department undertook the matter of making a survey of the Halifax area in an endeavour to find a suitable site. I received some information in the railway committee on this matter. One angle that was bothering people in that area was that, when forced landings took place, in many cases the passengers wanted to disembark and go through customs at that point, but they were not permitted to do so. They had to go through to Montreal. According to information we received in the railway committee, that has been corrected. There is an understanding now with the immigration department that people who find themselves in that position can go through customs there. The point on which I should like the minister to bring us up to date is whether the survey for the new site has been completed. If so, can he tell us where it is and what the possibilities are in the near future of starting an airport in that area?

It is something that is very badly needed, particularly today with the uncertain international situation and in view of the importance of that particular city and port in the event of difficulties on this continent. Second, if the site is not ready and cannot be got ready within a reasonable time, what are the possibilities of improving the airport at Eastern Passage? That is a job that could be done quickly. I do not want to enter into a long discussion of this matter. I know the minister wants to get ahead as fast as he can, and I know the Minister of Public Works wants to close at six o'clock tonight. Therefore I am making my statement short. Will the minister bring me up to date on the two matters I have mentioned? The first is what is the condition of the survey made to determine the new site for an airport, and if it is not possible to build a new airport within the foreseeable future, what can be done about improving the facilities at Eastern Passage airport?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I might deal with the matter now, although it should come under the item for airports and airways on the next page. With reference to Dartmouth, let me tell the hon. member that is an airport which is under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. When that department makes representations to us so far as facilities are concerned we build them. I am not aware that they have made any request —they may have—for additional facilities either by way of longer runways or stronger runways to take the larger aircraft. If they do we give it consideration immediately and put it into effect. I have nothing in these estimates to provide for additional facilities at Dartmouth.

With reference to the civilian airport at Halifax, if that is what the hon. member calls it, there is in the department a committee that makes a survey of all available airport and airway facilities in Canada in case of need or in case of emergency. That committee is a standing committee. I have not received a report from it with reference to Halifax, or any other airport for that matter, within recent days.

Mr. Gillis: The reason I ask the question now is that in the railway committee—perhaps the minister was not there?

Mr. Chevrier: No, but I am aware of what was said.

Mr. Gillis: We were definitely told that a survey had been completed that they felt would be suitable to all concerned. I was wondering whether the minister could bring us up to date. The statement we received in the committee is not correct?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not say that. I would simply say that this standing committee, which is composed of other than Department of Transport officials, has not brought to my attention a report recommending or dealing with this particular aspect. When I saw by the press what the position was I gave that information, and I can only repeat it here.

Mr. Gillis: I want to get it on the record. I would consider that the information we obtained in the committee, while coming from a fairly authoritative source, would not be official. I am trying to get the minister to make it official. In effect he has said that the interdepartmental committee has made a survey. He does not know whether or not it is completed, and he does not know if a site has been selected that is suitable to all concerned. It has not been brought to your attention?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right. I do not want to be misunderstood. The survey they have made is a survey of all airports and not of this particular one. I would not want to be misunderstood.

Mr. Gillis: They surveyed that particular one also. Anyway the minister will bring us up to date some time before the house closes. I will see to that by way of a question.

Mr. Balcom: Has Trans-Canada Air Lines asked for that airport at Halifax?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not aware if they have.

Mr. Balcom: I should like to suggest that the statements made in the railway committee, to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South has referred, should not have been made at that time because the information was not available. In order to get it on the record, I should like to say that the Halifax board of trade has been working on this matter for some time, and we have been working quietly towards this end.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister a few general questions with respect to the matter of gearing Canada's civil aviation industry and also airports—

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask the hon. member if he would not ask that now. I would appreciate it if he would agree not to do so. I should like to have the discussion relevant to the items before us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That practice has not been followed, but I am perfectly willing to co-operate.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell the committee how much money has been advanced by the government to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation? As he knows, that corporation was set up a year or two ago, and it was to take over certain assets from two established companies, Cable and Wireless Limited and the Canadian Marconi Company. Can he tell the committee how much has been advanced? The limit was $4,500,000?

Mr. Chevrier: About $500,000 has been advanced to the crown company for the purpose of purchasing some assets of the Canadian Marconi Company.

Mr. Green: How much will be required this year? Is there anything in these votes for that amount?

Mr. Chevrier: No, because the crown company takes it from its own funds. Authority to advance moneys has been granted by parliament under the special act, and amounts are advanced by the Department of Finance to the crown company from time to time as required. Thus far about half a million dollars has been advanced because they have, I am informed, come to a settlement in so far as a portion of the Marconi facilities are concerned. Negotiations with Cable and Wireless Limited are in progress.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Green: About how much more will be required this year?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, over a million dollars, I would think.

Item agreed to.

505. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $1,499,200.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister indicate where it is intended to acquire land and what buildings are to be built during the coming year?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. There are quite a number of them. This vote, as is indicated, is for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works and land and also for the acquisition and building of equipment. I shall refer to the larger items. For instance, for improvement of communication facilities at Gander there is an item of $69,000; construction of an I.L.S. runway at Gander, $40,000; at Sydney, construction of an I.L.S. installation, $40,000; at Goose, improvements to communication facilities, $47,000; at Mecatina, reconstruction of buildings and construction of a navigation beacon, $100,000; Churchill, construction of two apartments, $63,000; Vancouver, construction of a number of projects under $5,000, total $20,000; Vancouver, extension of transmitter building, $20,000. Those are the large items; there are other smaller ones.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are there any in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, at Regina; construction of building for transmitter, $5,000.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there any provision for the lengthening of the runways at the Regina airport?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but that comes under the construction of airports, on the other page.

Item agreed to.

Radio Act and Regulations—

506. Administration, operation and maintenance, including contributions as Canada's share of the administrative costs of various international radio, telegraph and telephone conferences, as detailed in the estimates, $898,836.

Mr. Drew: As a matter of information what are the various international conferences referred to here?

Mr. Chevrier: There is the international telecommunication union at Geneva, the international radio consultative and administrative conference at Geneva, and the inter-American radio office at Havana. Canada's share in the cost of these is $35,000 for the telecommunication union, $16,000 for the radio consultative conference, and $6,000 for the office at Havana.

Item agreed to.

Radio aids to marine navigation—

508. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,819,983.

Mr. Coldwell: What about radar? What supervision does the department exercise over radar equipment on ships; and are ships equipped with radar compelled to carry licensed operators, competent to repair radar sets if they go out of operation? I am not asking this without some grounds. I have been on several ships that had radar equipment, and I have been told that some vessels equipped with radar do not have competent operators; that if the captain is relying on radar for navigation purposes, as they do nowadays when they have that equipment on the ships, if the apparatus should go out of commission there is no one on the ship competent to repair it. That is dangerous, because of the reliance of ships nowadays on radar. I was wondering if anything is done by the department to register the ships equipped with radar, or if there is any compulsion on ships of certain types to instal radar; and if radar is installed, is there a licensed operator who can make the necessary repairs if the equipment breaks down, so the equipment may be of some use?

Mr. Chevrier: Radar is not carried on all ships, and it is not compulsory. Therefore there is no obligation to have personnel able to operate it. When there is radar on one of our ships we have one or more officers who are competent to operate the equipment. As far as repairs are concerned if it breaks down, there is no provision for that.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the minister not think that if a man is licensed to operate a radar set some assurance should be given that he can make minor repairs? I do not suggest he should be able to do major repairs on such a set, but he should be competent to make such repairs as are likely to be needed; and should that not be part of his qualifications?

Mr. Chevrier: I think perhaps the point is well taken, but until we make it compulsory on our ships to have that equipment I think it would be difficult to make it compulsory to have men able to make repairs. I think perhaps we should have somebody capable of making repairs in case of a breakdown. Very often we find that a man proficient in the repair of other kinds of equipment knows little or nothing about radar, unless he has taken a special course. While the officer who operates it has taken a course in its operation, I must say he need not have ability to make repairs as well. That is a point to which I think consideration should be given.

Mr. Coldwell: I have no doubt that sooner or later it will be compulsory to carry radar on certain types of ships, and I raise this point so that when that time comes it will be remembered by the officials of the department even if the minister should not be there himself.

512. Issue of radio receiving licences—(Transport Department only), $719,668.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister give the number of radio receiving licences that have been issued; and would he also say whether television would come under this item?

Mr. Chevrier: This item does not cover television. The number of licences issued for 1949-50 was 2,177,646.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many for the previous year?

Mr. Chevrier: 2,057,943.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is done in order to assure that licences are secured? What is your set-up?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not quite follow the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the set-up in order to see that licences are taken out? What enforcement machinery have you?

Mr. Chevrier: In the first place, as my hon. friend must have noticed, an announcement is broadcast over the radio from time to time after the 10 o'clock news, about the time the licence expires. That announcement is not made every night, but is made on a number of evenings. It is stated that licences for the operation of radios expire on a certain date, and that radio owners would be well advised to obtain new licences for the ensuing year. Then a card goes out under the signature of the deputy minister to every person known to own a radio receiving set. There are also the vendors who make a door to door canvass. Those are the three matters that come to mind at the moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the total amount collected in radio licence fees last year, and what was the cost of collection?

Mr. Chevrier: The total amount collected for 1949-50 was $5,143,054. The commission allowed on sales was $331,653.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many prosecutions took place for failure to take out licences, broken down by provinces?

Mr. Chevrier: The prosecutions for the fiscal year 1950-51 numbered 5,724. Broken down by provinces they were as follows:

British Columbia	215
Alberta	349
Saskatchewan	297
Manitoba	357
Ontario	3,162
Quebec	591
Nova Scotia	531
New Brunswick	159
Newfoundland	63
Prince Edward Island	0

I must say that those are not final because the reports are not in, but so far as can be ascertained that will be the total for the year 1950-51.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What allowance do you give to those who are trying to collect the radio licences? What are the fees paid?

Mr. Chevrier: The fee is $2.50, and the commission to the vendor to whom I referred a moment ago going from house to house is twenty-five cents; five cents is paid to a staff post office; fifteen cents to an accounting post office; fifteen cents to radio dealers and fifteen cents to banks. I believe in certain areas the mounted police also sell licences and they get twenty-five cents.

513. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,440,729.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to draw the minister's attention to a matter about which I wrote to him last year. It concerns the placing of radio communication sets on islands in Newfoundland where it would be too expensive to have communication by telegraph or telephone. I drew his special attention to the case of Colinet island, where there are about ninety families living about three miles from the mainland. The water in between becomes very rough, and in the wintertime there is no communication between the island and the mainland. It would only cost between $600 and $700 to instal a radio transmitter. Everyone has a radio receiving set. I believe the minister referred me to the director of telephone services in Toronto who turned down the idea.

I know that some years ago the Newfoundland government substituted radio transmitters for telephone service in some sections of Newfoundland along the northwest coast and along the east coast. It was found to be much more economical than attempting to maintain long telephone or telegraph lines. I do not know how many such places there are that would require the establishment of radio communication service, but it seems to me it would be of great benefit to the people and could be operated at very little expense. Has the minister had any applications from any other section of the country, or does he know whether there are other islands such as the one to which I referred, where radio transmitters are used for communication with the mainland?

Mr. Chevrier: We have before us for approval an application to establish service to about fifteen communities by means of radio-telephone connections to land lines or wireless telegraph stations. These are applications to the Canadian National Railways who have taken over the telecommunication system of Newfoundland. These applications are being considered at the moment, and I understand will be approved

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Could you name the places?

Mr. Chevrier: They are Penguin Arm, Sops island, North Bay, La Poile, Colinet island—should I stop there?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I should like to hear the rest of them.

Mr. Chevrier: Isle Valen, Pinchard's Island, Richard's Harbour, Fox Island, Coward's Island, Burnt Islands, Croque, Little Harbour Deep, Williamsport, Hooping Harbour, Canada Harbour.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Consideration is being given to that at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and I understand approval will be forthcoming in the near future.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. Fulton: In the detail under this item on page 488 there is the following:

Operation and maintenance of communication lines by commercial companies, $110,000.

Could the minister give us some further information about that? It is the very last item on page 488.

Mr. Chevrier: This amount is to cover charges levied by commercial telephone and telegraph companies in respect of the attachment, maintenance and attendance of departmentally owned telecommunication facilities. The largest single payment of this nature is involved between Prince George and Prince Rupert, B.C., where approximately five thousand miles of telegraph and telephone circuits, four repeater stations and associated equipment are operated and attended on a contractual basis for the department by Canadian National Telegraphs.

Mr. Fulton: Is the position, then, that that is your line but the Canadian National Telegraphs maintain it for you?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: Are there any such lines of a substantial nature?

Mr. Chevrier: There is in a further vote, and I shall draw them to your attention later on.

514. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $450,100.

Mr. Coldwell: Before we pass item 514, there is a matter I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. I had intended to speak on it at some length, but I shall merely put the facts on the record which we have obtained by asking for various sessional papers and by inquiries which will appear in Hansard. I think it is a very strange matter and indicates a very strange procedure. It has to do with the building of a telegraph line in northern Saskatchewan by one L. M. Marion. I find that on September 29, 1948, Mr. Marion wrote the Department of Transport here, and this will be found in sessional paper 119-D, 1950, that he was prepared to start at a moment's notice, subject to the following terms, a telegraph line from Bull's House to Buffalo River. He said that the distance was thirty-five miles, and he also said—I thought this was rather strange—"I would recommend that Mr. Hood, the operator at Beauval, continue, as in the past, to inspect all work for the department."

Then, on April 3, 1949, parliament voted in interim supply a portion of the $14,000 estimated as required for the project. That is reported in Hansard of May 15, 1950. On May 9, 1949, Mr. Marion submitted bids for parts of the project through the Department of Transport at Edmonton. On July 8, 1949, notices inviting tenders for various parts of the project were displayed in several post offices for the first time, the line to be thirty-five miles long. On July 18, 1949, tenders on various parts of the project were received from L. M. Marion, E. E. Benoit, and A. Marion. On July 26, 1949, Mr. A. Marion and Mr. E. E. Benoit assigned their tenders to L. M. Marion.

Then, on August 2, 1949, a new tender came in from Mr. F. Laliberte at a lower rate than was offered by Mr. Marion. On August 9, 1949, Mr. Marion wired Ottawa that the line was completed and to please rush payment and so on. That will be found in sessional paper 119-D, page 10.

Then, there is a post office matter and I am not going to refer to that, but on September 6 the Department of Transport quite properly wrote Mr. Marion in these terms, in part:

> . . . as a result of your action in proceeding without our authorization, a very embarrassing situation has developed particularly as your combined offer for the job complete is not the lowest received.

Then on September 16, 1949, Mr. Marion wrote to Ottawa and explained in part—this is a gem:

> I did not anticipate that anybody that knew the country and conditions would be interested unless it were some irresponsible party who put in a bid simply to cause trouble.

Mr. Argue: Who is Marion?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Marion is a Liberal member of the legislature, but I was not going to raise that. On October 6, 1949, the Department of Transport informed Mr. Marion that his tender was still not the lowest and—I am quoting:

> We are therefore not in a position to proceed until this discrepancy is adjusted.

A week later, on October 14, Mr. Marion submitted a tender at $270 a mile, which was equal to the lowest tender received for 35 miles. The total was $9,924. The line was measured by the government officially and found to be 28 miles long. On October 19, 1949, the line was finally completed. On November 15 a rate of $270 a mile was approved on recommendation of the technical officers of the Department of Transport. Then Mr. Ahenakew wrote to the Department of Transport a warning about the length of the line and underlining his knowledge of the situation by saying that he had typed the letters at Mr. Marion's dictation. He further stated of Mr. Marion:

> He went ahead and built the line without authorization relying on political backing to see him through.

Here is the point that I am coming to. Parliament passed the remaining portion of the $14,000 estimate for this project on December 3, 1949, without being informed, when the matter was before the house, of any of the foregoing matters, and in spite of the fact that the line had been built for less than $10,000. The last word I have—I am going to ask the minister to comment on it in a minute—is that on May 15, 1950, the Minister of Transport informed the house that the payment was now being effected to Mr. Marion. I should like to know what the final payment to Mr. Marion was on this rather peculiar contract or rather peculiar undertaking on Mr. Marion's part. I have just given a bare outline. Of course I could comment here and there as I went along, but I did not propose to do that.

Mr. Chevrier: I of course cannot recall the details of the contract because my hon.

friend asked for the tabling of the correspondence in the course of the last session. I did have the details in my mind fairly well at that time because after the correspondence was tabled the item covering this payment was passed through the house and I fully expected that my hon. friend might bring it up then. I was prepared to deal with it then; I am not now. However, I can be fully prepared by eight o'clock. In any event I should like to bring this to his attention. While on the face of it it would appear that the contract did not go to the lowest tenderer, as a matter of fact the person who did the work did it at the amount of the low tender, and in fact did it for less money than the estimate of the department.

Mr. Coldwell: Only after considerable investigation.

Mr. Chevrier: There is this point to be kept in mind, namely, that this work was done in an isolated part of—

Mr. Coldwell: Saskatchewan.

Mr. Chevrier: —Saskatchewan. I understand no contractors are available there for this particular type of work.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes there are.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no there are not. I would tell my hon. friend this: If he wants to submit this to a committee I am perfectly satisfied that it be done, because I have looked into it very carefully. I am sure that nothing could have been done more than was done to see that the department and the government got value for the money that was spent. The requisite number of poles were put up.

Mr. Coldwell: They were put up with no contract.

Mr. Chevrier: They were put up by the only contractor who was available, and certainly the only contractor the department could get in that area. I would not have the slightest hesitation in referring this whole business to a committee, if there were any doubt in the minds of hon. members.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say to the minister that I am not accusing his department of any wrongdoing whatsoever. As a matter of fact, I think the department did take considerable care in the final settlement, as far as I can see from the records that are on my desk. But what I am pointing out is that here we have a man who is closely connected with a political organization, a member of the legislature of Saskatchewan, who seems to think that he is not required to tender in the ordinary way; that he can begin a job and finish it, wire down to Ottawa and ask for the money almost before the calls for tender are posted in the post offices in the community. I am sorry that when this item came up last year I happened to be out of the house. When I came in I asked about it but was told that the item had passed.

Mr. Chevrier: The first question that my hon. friend asked was what was the amount of the payment. I can speak only from memory. I have not seen the papers for over a year. Speaking from memory I would say that the payment was in the neighbourhood of $10,000, which is $4,000 less than the estimate.

Mr. Coldwell: Which is the amount that the officials of the department said could properly be paid?

Mr. Chevrier: Quite.

Mr. Coldwell: But not the amount that was asked for; and the mileage settled for was different from the mileage alleged to have been covered when the original account was made.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: I congratulate the Department of Transport on having done this, but I am pointing out that in the old days this was not a very unusual sort of procedure in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Chevrier: We do not encourage it in the department, I can assure my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if contracts for the construction of new buildings, works or land are being considered or acquired in British Columbia?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; rebuilding and repoling of existing telephone line at Vanderhoof, Fort St. James, British Columbia, $18,910; for work at Smithers, British Columbia and Burns Lake, Francois Lake, British Columbia, Quesnel, British Columbia —

Mr. Fulton: What work is that?

Mr. Chevrier: To rebuild and modernize existing telephone exchange, $16,100; Dawson Creek, Fort St. John, about $35,000 in those areas; Metallicizing and expanding of existing grounded telephone circuits and replacement of pole lines as required.

Mr. Fulton: Is there anything for the modernization or the improvement of the circuit in the southern portion of the area in the interior of the province?

Mr. Chevrier: There are quite a number of other items: Queen Charlotte islands, British Columbia, $11,680; Quesnel-Barkerville, British Columbia, $18,000; Port Alberni-Ucluelet, British Columbia, $50,800; Port Renfrew-Shawnigan Lake, $7,545; 100 Mile House-Canim Lake, British Columbia, $11,500.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: As a matter of fact I thought we could reach item 519, civil aviation division, on which the hon. member for Lake Centre wanted to ask some questions. There are only two items on meteorological services.

Mr. Fulton: There is a big item of $6 million odd, namely item 517. I think we should call it six o'clock, because I note there is considerable increase over the previous year.

Item stands.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Applewhaite for the second reading of Bill No. 116, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in my previous remarks on this bill I had dealt with the first complaint of the Vancouver city council against the bill, which is that it asks for too large an increase in capital. This evening I propose to deal with their second ground of complaint, that under the company's present charter there is no protection against unreasonable charges being levied against this particular company by its parent and affiliated companies.

The real ownership and control of the British Columbia Telephone Company is in an American corporation known as Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company, which is a Delaware corporation with headquarters at Kansas City. It controls the British Columbia Telephone Company through a company in Montreal known as Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company, which, incidentally, also controls different affiliated companies in British Columbia. Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company, in its annual report, describes itself as an investment company. It controls the British Columbia Telephone Company through the common stock, and now owns 60,000 of the 80,000 common shares issued, these shares having a par value of $100 each. Only the common shares vote; preference and preferred shares have no vote in carrying on the business of the company.

Until November of last year only 60,000 common shares had been issued, and those of course were the ones held by Anglo-Canadian. Since that time there have been issued to the public the other 20,000 common shares. At the present time there are 40,000 more common shares being issued, to a par value of $4 million. Rights to subscribe for these new shares have been issued to the old holders of common shares on a basis whereby for each two shares now held there is the right to purchase one of the new shares.

The result is that Anglo-Canadian now has 60,000 rights with which it can buy 30,000 more shares at $132.50. They are not being offered at par, but rather at $32.50 over par. On April 13 there appeared in the Vancouver press an advertisement offering rights to subscribe for 27,800 ordinary shares. Obviously those must be from the rights issued to Anglo-Canadian, becaue no one else has that number. They are on sale at $4 per right, to the number of 55,600 rights. This means of course that from the sale of those rights Anglo-Canadian can get at least $200,000—which is a nice little melon to cut. In addition they will continue to hold control of the company.

It is through this Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company that unreasonable charges are being levied against the British Columbia Telephone Company, which telephone users in British Columbia are expected to pay. For example there is a licensing contract under which the British Columbia Telephone Company each year must pay one per cent of its gross operating revenue to Anglo-Canadian, which payment, in 1950, amounted to approximately $160,000. As a matter of fact it was only recently that the rate was cut to one per cent; before the application in 1950 to the board of transport commissioners for an increase in telephone rates, the company was paying one and one-half per cent; as I have said, however, before the recent application was made that was reduced to one per cent.

It is claimed that this one per cent is for technical advice and financial assistance rendered by Anglo-Canadian; but I would point out that Anglo-Canadian has no staff. It is only a holding company; and when this contention was advanced by the city and other bodies appearing last year before the board, counsel for the British Columbia Telephone Company claimed that these services would be supplied by Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company, or by some of its other companies. Yet in 1948 Anglo-Canadian paid to Associated Telephone and Telegraph for service of this kind only $3,150, while in the same year they collected from British Columbia Telephone Company $181,051 for these same services. This charge against British Columbia Telephone Company was not allowed by the dominion income tax branch; it was ruled out as an improper expense; yet the board of transport commissioners ruled that it was a proper charge and that the telephone users in British Columbia must make it up.

Here is a good example of the way Anglo-Canadian is milking the British Columbia Telephone Company and, of course, in effect, is milking the telephone users of our province. Then there are other examples. Anglo-Canadian also controls a company known as Dominion Directory Company Limited. This company is supposed to look after the directories for the British Columbia Telephone Company. It gets 35 per cent on all contracts for advertising in the directory. Its office is in the office of British Columbia Telephone Company. I believe Bell Telephone Company, for example, look after their own directory. This appears to be just one more way of getting money out of the British Columbia Telephone Company for Anglo-Canadian and, in turn, for Associated Telephone and Telegraph.

Another instance is that Anglo-Canadian owns a company known as Canadian (B.C.) Telephones and Supplies Limited, which does the purchasing for British Columbia Telephone Company on a basis of 5 per cent. Previous to the application for an increase in rates this charge was 6 per cent. They look after other services for which they are paid by the British Columbia Telephone Company. These matters were all before the board of transport commissioners, and while they allowed the directory charges on the basis that they were merely a matter of management, they would not allow the full amount paid to this supply company. It was that bad. Actually, the British Columbia Telephone Company got 87 per cent of the amount applied for on the application.

You will see that there is nothing to prevent Anglo-Canadian setting up a number of other affiliated companies and charging the British Columbia Telephone Company for the services rendered. If they can do it in one case they can do it in half a dozen. My point is that these various companies are not operating at arm's length and it is unfair for the telephone users to have to pay these amounts which are being milked out of the telephone company. Naturally there is considerable resentment in British Columbia. I have here an editorial from the Vancouver Sun of February 16, 1951, headed, "Where phone rates go." It reads in part:

> If the transport board thinks these contracts—

That is, the contracts with the affiliated companies.

> —are good business, then the city says there's nothing to prevent BCT from splitting up its operations into other parts and contracting with other affiliated companies to run them for similar fees.
> The contention that management hasn't used proper discretion can be aired in parliament by local M.P.'s during debate on BCT's private bill asking for power to raise its authorized capitalization from $25 million to $75 million.

Here is the significant part:

> Vancouver hopes that either the bill will be blocked until BCT promises to change its habits or that parliament will give new guidance as to how the transport board should view intercorporate arrangements when phone rates are next under review.

The city have summed up their position very neatly in a report presented by a committee of the city council. I should like to read one paragraph of that report as follows:

> If the council concurs in the views advanced in the foregoing four paragraphs, your committee would further recommend that the city take all possible steps to endeavour to have presented to parliament the onerous nature of the contracts to which the British Columbia Telephone Company is now subjected, when the private bill of the telephone company is under consideration, in an endeavour to obtain relief or amelioration from the adverse consequences of such contracts.

I submit that there should be an amendment to the company's charter to direct the board of transport commissioners to investigate and take into account these contracts with affiliated companies and allow only those charges which are reasonable in relation to services actually rendered. The people of British Columbia are entitled to this protection and they are entitled also to have the increase in capital kept to a reasonable amount.

I urge upon my fellow members in the house to insist that this bill be changed accordingly.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in connection with this bill. A most exhaustive analysis of the bill has been made already by several British Columbia members, more particularly the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and perhaps others. I think it is significant that although there are seven or eight members of parliament from what is generally called the greater Vancouver area where most of the subscribers of the British Columbia Telephone Company reside, the company had to go outside the greater Vancouver area to get a British Columbia member to sponsor the bill. I want to make it quite clear that I am not finding any fault with the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill. That is his business. Indeed, I compliment him upon making a very fair representation of the purposes of the bill and of the contentions of the company as to the need for further capital.

As far as I am concerned I shall confine myself to what I consider to be the main purpose of the bill, that is, to increase the capital stock from $25 million to $75 million. I think that is too much of an increase to be granted at this time when the government because of defence needs is taking control over the expansion of industry and trying to prevent goods in short supply being used for purposes that are not essential. I think the house should consider very carefully all aspects and implications of this bill before granting the capital increase asked for.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) referred to two reports that were made to the council of the city of Vancouver on this application for an increase in capital. The Vancouver city council set up a committee consisting of Mr. D. E. McTaggart, an outstanding lawyer, who for many years was corporation council for Vancouver, and Mr. Charles Brakenridge, who for 25 or 30 years was chief engineer of the city. I should like to draw your attention to the report prepared by these two gentlemen because I know they are men of ability and integrity, and have been connected with Vancouver's affairs for a long time. They are accustomed to dealing with matters of this kind on the basis of the actual facts and the needs of the city of Vancouver and the welfare of its people. Any report to which they put their names should be carefully considered by this house.

There is one point on which I wish to make my own position absolutely clear. I believe that utilities of this nature should be publicly owned, in this case by the province of British Columbia. But I am firmly convinced that if the people do not take steps to acquire and operate such services then we are bound to grant sufficient means, or allow the companies operating them sufficient means to carry on their business. I think it is important that I make that point clear. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) went into the merits of the bill so fully that it is hardly necessary for me to go over the same ground and perhaps repeat much of what he said. I am sure I could not say it so well or with the same clarity.

There is one point particularly which I wish to draw to the attention of the house. Although this company operates and has almost a complete monopoly on telephone service in the province of British Columbia, there is no control whatsoever over the company except that exercised by the board of transport commissioners with respect to an application for an increase in capital or in tolls. As shown by the report of Messrs. McTaggart and Brakenridge, I am afraid the board of transport commissioners is so far away from British Columbia that its members do not understand the people's needs.

Quite recently there came to my hand a letter which was sent to one of the British Columbia M.L.A.'s by a party on behalf of certain residents in an area in the municipality of Burnaby. The letter drew attention to the fact that in the opinion of the writer the company was discriminating against a certain area in the allocation of telephones. I do not know whether or not there is any merit in the contention, but I want to point out that there is no authority that can investigate such a charge and find out whether or not there is any merit in it. The M.L.A. sent the complaint to the public utilities commission at Victoria, and he received a letter in reply reading:

Dear Sir:

In reply to your letter to the chairman of February 28, I am directed to advise that B.C. Telephone Company is under dominion jurisdiction.

That is all. The public utilities commission could not do anything. After the M.L.A. received that letter, he felt, logically enough, that if there was no authority to supervise the operations of the company in British Columbia there should be in Ottawa where the charter was granted. Therefore he sent me the complaint and I forwarded it to the board of transport commissioners. In due course I received the following letter in reply:

Dear Sir:

I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, enclosing copy of petition from the residents of South Burnaby, B.C. regarding allocation of residential telephones, which is returned herewith.

I would point out for your information that the board has never considered that its powers with respect to telephone companies extend to the matter of furnishing or dealing with telephone service. Such powers as the board possesses are limited to matters affecting the tolls charged for the service. Under the circumstances the board is unable to be of any assistance.

The letter was signed by the acting secretary. I think the reading of these two letters is sufficient reason for not granting to the British Columbia Telephone Company too large an amount of capital at any one time because obviously the only control the people of British Columbia have over the company is when it has to make application here for an extension of capital, or applies to the board of transport commissioners for an increase in tolls. If we at this time authorize the amount of capital that they ask for, $50 million, which according to their way of financing they can increase to $100 million or even more, we are putting all the subscribers of the British Columbia Telephone Company under a severe handicap.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra went over the report made by the committee of investigation appointed by the city council of Vancouver pretty well clause by clause. He pointed out that in the first place the telephone company operates through a licence contract, and that the contract provides for an annual payment by the B.C. Telephone Company of one per cent of its gross operating revenues to the parent company, Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company of Montreal. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra pointed out, it was brought out at the time of the application to the board of transport commissioners to increase the tolls that the Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company did not provide and did not have the staff to provide any sort of service whatsoever to the people of British Columbia who use the services of the B.C. Telephone Company. Yet for the year 1948 the B.C. Telephone Company made a payment of $181,051 to the Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company, and it is not shown that any particular service was given in return for that large sum of money. Perhaps I might as well read the pertinent paragraph in the report. It is as follows:

> Nevertheless the fact remains that while the B.C. Telephone Company paid to the Anglo Company for services under this contract for the year 1948 the sum of $181,051, the amount Anglo in turn paid to its parent, the Associated Company, for such service for the same year only amounted to $3,150.

Mr. Applewhaite: Would the hon. member kindly identify the report from which he has read a quotation?

Mr. MacInnis: I think I mentioned the report. It is a report prepared by Messrs. McTaggart and Brakenridge.

Mr. Applewhaite: A report prepared for the city of Vancouver.

Mr. MacInnis: A report prepared for the city of Vancouver. I do not know whether the hon. member gave the figure in his speech, but I am sure he understands that 75 to 80 per cent of the subscribers to the telephone company's services live in the city of Vancouver. However, when the application to increase tolls was being made to the board of transport commissioners, the British Columbia Telephone Company thought it would look bad to have this 1½ per cent going to the Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company of Montreal, when it could not be shown that this company was providing any worth-while services. So they reduced the figure to 1 per cent; but even at 1 per cent payment amounted to $129,711 in 1949. A sum, let me repeat, that was taken from the subscribers of the British Columbia Telephone Company without any adequate services being rendered in return.

I think the methods adopted by the British Columbia Telephone Company in running its business are a pretty good example of how monopolies of this kind organize to milk the public for all the traffic will bear. A great deal of money is spent on advertising by these companies. Slogans everywhere: "Service with a smile." "Service is our motto." But when you come to investigate you find every possible trick used to take as much as possible out of the people they serve. The British Columbia Telephone Company, like other companies of a similar nature, has several affiliated companies. First there is the British Columbia Telephone Company. Then there is Canadian (B.C.) Telephones and Supplies Limited. This is a company set up by the telephone company from which it buys the supplies it uses in its business. Of course this second company must make a profit, and that profit can only be made by selling goods to the British Columbia Telephone Company, since it does not sell to the public or any other company. Then there is the Dominion Directory Company Limited, with which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) dealt. Then there are Chilliwack Telephones Limited, Mission Telephone Company Limited, and Northwest Telephone Company. All these companies are controlled by the British Columbia Telephone Company. In regard to Canadian (B.C.) Telephones and Supplies Limited I want to quote again from page 2 of the report prepared by Messrs. McTaggart and Brakenridge:

> Evidence at the hearing established that many of the supplies are purchased from other affiliated companies of the group, and in one case purchases pass in turn through two such affiliated companies thus involving three separate commissions or profits.

They are not satisfied with one profit on a transaction; it goes through several companies and each company in turn makes a profit.

I quote again:

> At the hearing opposing counsel forcefully contended that if this supply contract and the directory contract (to be later dealt with) could not be revoked, the British Columbia Telephone Company should not be allowed to charge to operating costs, on account of these two contracts, any more than a reasonable return on the money invested in the respective subsidiary enterprises.
> On the basis of an allowance of 5 per cent return on net invested capital it was shown that the Canadian (B.C.) Telephone and Supplies Limited had made an excess profit of $150,176 for the year 1948.

Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) could find some money for his budget if he looked in that direction. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is necessary in order to make a case to repeat what has been said already much better than I could say it. However, I do impress upon the members of this house that before this bill is approved, before the company is given permission to increase its capital by $50 million, the brief prepared on behalf of the city of Vancouver should be carefully studied, and representatives of that city should be invited to appear before the committee to which this bill will be referred after second reading.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I want to join the two hon. members for Vancouver in discussing this bill. I do so because I agree with what they have said. I think the practice is becoming all too prevalent of having bills brought into this house with very little knowledge of what they involve. They are passed, and then two or three years later we get repercussions. There are two things I do not like in the procedure that has been followed in connection with this bill. In the first place, with all due respect to the sponsor of the bill, I think it should have been sponsored by a member from Vancouver.

Mr. Applewhaite: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in discussing the principle of legislation is it a legitimate argument to mention who happens to introduce the bill in question?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): You must have something else to say.

Mr. Gillis: I will before I am through. That is my first point, and that is why I am speaking tonight. That sort of thing makes me suspicious. If a bill was to be introduced in this house that was in the best interests of the part of the country I represent, I would expect to introduce it. If it is necessary to by-pass me in order to get it before the house, then I think there must be something the matter with it. I am not holding that against the hon. member. He is a very capable member and a good friend of mine, and I would be the last man in this house to suggest that he would sponsor something that was not absolutely legitimate. But I do suspect the motives of those who may be taking advantage of his innocence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the second thing that makes me suspicious, and another reason why I am on my feet, is that this bill came through the back door. It had its origin in another place. That does not reflect on the other place, but if it is necessary for me to visit your home, Mr. Speaker, I will not sneak in the back door; I shall come in the front way, and let you know exactly the purpose of my visit. The procedure is in reverse. Under ordinary circumstances, and for a long time, any bill that came before the House of Commons went through the resolution stage, if it was a money bill, or was introduced by a member of the house. Then, it generally went to a committee of this house which examined it in all its details, and brought it back to this house. I am not in favour of the procedure of having a bill passed through the other place and come in the back door. It is given to the members of this house with very little knowledge of what the implications of that bill are.

It is not as innocent as it sounds, Mr. Speaker. It is merely following up a lot of legislation that is tied up with a great octopus on this North American continent in the telephone business. It has for its purpose, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) suggested, an increase in capital from $25 million to $75 million, an increase of $50 million. Well, that is a lot of money for a little company. It is supposed to be a small company, an innocent little struggling company that is trying to expand its services out into the wilds of British Columbia. It is not so small, and it is not so innocent. It is merely one of the arms of the octopus that stretch out in that particular spot.

I do not want to waste the time of the house, but I have in my hand a chart that sets out exactly what the tie-in is on the North American continent, not in Canada alone, of this innocent, poor little company that has this very innocent, poor little bill before the house. They only want to increase their share capital by $50 million, and in addition to that they want to make a change in the capital structure. They want to break down the value of the shares from $100 to $25; that may not be so innocent as it sounds, either. A lot of widows and orphans, people with a little money, can buy twenty-five dollar shares. After they get enough of these twenty-five dollar shares, someone can buy them all in and own them all overnight, thus squeezing out the little fellow. That has been the history of the development of practically all industries on this continent.

I am not going to read this, but at the top of the chart there is the Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company of the United States, which is tied in with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, which in turn is tied in with the Bell Telephone Company and some twelve other companies which are tied in with the B.C. Telephone Company. In my opinion there is a complete tie-up, a directive tie-up with the large companies in the United States and Canada. This is not as innocent as it appears. Let us take a look, for a moment, at what happens in the development of this type of organization, and the monopoly position that it holds today. There is no one in this house or in this country who can fool me into believing that the Bell Telephone or the B.C. Telephone or any of these other subsidiaries are just little struggling organizations trying to take care of themselves. It is not so. They have a granddaddy somewhere with a lot of power who is taking very good care of the little family. As the member for Vancouver East has suggested, the company is getting a long way into the pocketbook of anyone who is in a position to take advantage of its service.

What happens when the capital of a company is expanded, as is suggested in this bill? You do not have to go far to find out. We have had lesson after lesson during the lifetime of most of the members in this house, all of them in fact, and in the very organization we are talking about tonight. In my hand I hold a little book entitled "What Price Telephones?" by Norman Perelman. It contains a complete history of the development of these companies in the United States like American Telephone and Telegraph, the granddaddy of them all. Back in 1929, 1930 and 1935, what happened to the employees of that particular organization when it made a large capital expansion and invested a lot of money that did not turn out as well as the company expected? It was not the board of directors or the shareholders that suffered, it was the employees of that organization. I am going to read just a few extracts from this booklet so you will not think I am merely expressing my own opinion. These are the facts as contained in this research pamphlet on the development of telephones on the North American continent, with particular reference to the United States. I use the United States because practically all of that type of organization in Canada is merely a subsidiary of a United States company which put up the original capital.

At page 23 of this little booklet you will find this statement. I am reading these extracts because they are relevant to the bill that is before the house at this time requesting a capital expansion. This has to do with what happened in a company that did get a large capital expansion, and did not invest it wisely. It has to do with employees' relations, tying that in with the subject I have just indicated.

> As in so many other respects, Bell's reputation as a model employer does not stand up under close scrutiny. In reality, a Bell employee has little security. Until 1929, with the continued growth of the system, the number of workers steadily increased. The following year, however, although the total revenues exceeded those of 1929 by $37 million, representing the highest peak in Bell's history up to that time, the number of employees was decreased by 60,000. A. T. & T. during 1930 had greatly expanded its capital investment. Business did not increase according to anticipations and, to avoid a reduction in the net income, the workers, not the stockholders, were made to suffer for management's mistake. Throughout the depression A. T. & T. continued to pay $9 dividends per share, while its level of employment constantly declined. Between 1929 and the end of 1935, 184,600 workers were let go in one way or another. When, in 1937 another new high in A. T. & T.'s history was reached, the number of employees was 134,000 less than in 1929.
> This reduced labour force failed to hamper the handling of the A. T. & T.'s increased business. Between 1930-33, a speed-up system had been inaugurated, resulting in the loss of jobs by over 30,000 persons. The introduction of the dial phone accounted for approximately 20,000 more unemployed, while a sharp decline in new construction threw an additional 40,000 out of work.
> In the main, workers least able to afford it were hit by this curtailment of employment, for the lowest wage groups were those from which the discharges were made. Yet, at the same time, "the total dividend payments grew from $116,000,000 in 1929 to $168,000,000 in 1935."
> Thus Bell's contribution to the unemployment of the depression years is obvious. Equally apparent is what could have been done to alleviate it.

I read these extracts into the record merely to show that a request from the company such as we are getting at this time does not necessarily mean that that company is in a prosperous condition, or that it is going to expand its services or create more employment, or that it is going to improve its services. What I read of course took place during the depression years, but it shows that the judgment of the management in making large investments at that time was not justified. That could also be said today.

I do not think that this is the time for the British Columbia Telephone Company to come to this House of Commons and ask for the increase in capital that they are asking for. When you consider that this country is embarking upon a defence program that is going to last for the next three years, as far as government policy at the present time is concerned, and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has told the house time and time again that we are going to have to suffer and tighten our belts as far as civilian requirements are concerned; that there is going to be a shortage of material in everything that goes into ordinary consumption goods; and that at least 25 per cent of plant production, plus the raw materials in this country, are to be used for war purposes: in the light of these statements and in the light of the developing international situation, nobody in this house can rise in his place and justify the granting to this company at this time the right to increase its capital by $50 million in anticipation of increasing and expanding the services, because the government has told us time and time again that the materials are not going to be available.

In view of the fact that there are many implications in the expansion of the capital of this company, and that we have not sufficient information on the subject matter of this bill, I believe that before we adopt the principle of it on second reading the bill should go to a committee of this house for a thorough study, and that it should come back from that committee to the house, and that the sponsors of it should be prepared then to give us all the necessary information in order for us to pass the bill as it is in its present form. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce):

> That Bill No. 116 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

I believe that this action is necessary at this time. I believe that that is the logical and sound thing for hon. members to do. I believe that for two reasons: One, I do not think we have the information we require to grant the request contained in this bill at this time; and, two, if we had the knowledge and the power I still question whether it is good business for hon. members at this time to be granting a lease, as it were, to companies that are going to engage in ordinary civilian activities, to give them the right to go into the market with an expanded capital, such as is suggested in this bill, and bid against the defence departments for the necessary materials that we shall require in order to bring our defence program to the fruition that is envisaged by the government. I think that is putting the company in the field to compete for materials necessary to defence at this time, and I think the house should seriously consider that angle of it. It will not do any harm to have this matter held up for a few weeks, at least, in order for us to get what information we can from the Department of Trade and Commerce, the defence departments and others who are in a position to give us what I consider is necessary at this time in order to make an intelligent decision on the matter.

I see we have about a minute left, Mr. Speaker. I am going to leave enough time for you to read the amendment and give hon. members an opportunity to decide what is what.

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules of the house this bill after second reading is referred to that committee. Not only the subject matter, but the whole bill, is so referred. In these circumstances, is it in order to move that the subject matter only should be referred to the committee, pending the second reading of the bill?

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps between now and the next time this matter comes up you might give further thought to it. I would suggest that you look up the record of the debates on the Bell Telephone Company's bill which took place in this house in 1948. On that occasion several amendments were moved. Some of them were ruled out of order, but an amendment in terms precisely similar to this one was allowed. There are citations in Beauchesne which indicate the difference that there is between the bill itself and the subject matter of the bill. A bill can be referred to a committee only after it has had second reading, but the subject matter can be referred prior to the giving of second reading to the bill, or before the principle has been approved. That course was adopted, as a matter of fact, with respect to a bill of mine some years ago, and the result was that the subject matter was discussed by the committee to which it was referred. Although no action was taken that year, the result of that discussion was that favourable action was taken a year or two later.

I submit that the amendment is perfectly proper; it is a routine motion that perhaps Your Honour will consider between now and eight o'clock the next evening this bill is called.

Mr. Speaker: I will take into consideration what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has had to say.

It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

Mr. Applewhaite: On a question of privilege, Your Honour has indicated that you will take into consideration the point of order that has been raised. I assume that Your Honour will also be willing to hear representations on that.

Mr. Speaker: Following the practice, I shall be glad to hear further representations from any hon. member before I make my ruling.

Meteorological division—

Meteorological services—

517. Administration, operation and maintenance, $6,116,836.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, there is quite a substantial increase in this item over last year, nearly a million dollars. I do not propose to question every item simply because there is an increase, if the reason for the increase is obvious, and is considered to be necessary. However, I wonder if the minister would be good enough to make a few observations as to the reasons for the increase in this instance because, on first inspection, it would appear that the details would show that civil salaries and wages are up to quite a considerable extent. Perhaps that is accounted for by the 10 per cent increase in the wage and salary levels. I notice however that the item for materials and supplies is up to a considerable extent. Then, the same would apply to the item for office stationery, supplies and equipment. Increases in other items as well would seem to indicate that there must be some increase in the service being given. I do not recall any statement to that effect, and I wonder if the minister would give an explanation sufficient to satisfy the committee that the increase is necessary and must be voted.

Mr. Chevrier: The two main items, of course, in which there have been increases are salaries and wages of employees. Those are due to increases which have been given throughout the civil service.

Mr. Fulton: I understand that.

Mr. Chevrier: They amount to almost half a million dollars. The other considerable increase relates to materials and supplies, to the extent of $152,600. It is due to generally higher costs, based on the price index of the dominion bureau of statistics, and to the expanded use of equipment. The breakdown goes on to indicate that the costs of materials and equipment have risen substantially, as the hon. member knows. Then there are a number of smaller items where there have been increases. The two I have mentioned are the main ones, and amount to almost $700,000.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate that materials will have increased in price, as compared with last year. I had thought that price increases might not be sufficient to account for the $150,000, unless there was a considerable increase in volume. If the minister is in a position to say that the increase in prices pretty well accounts for the increase in the amount of the item for materials and supplies, we will have to accept it.

Then there are increases for teletype, amounting to $20,000; office stationery, supplies and equipment amounting to $34,000; and weather observer contracts, $50,000. These items are of a type which would raise the presumption that there must be an expanded service. If that is not so, then I would question seriously the need for this increased expenditure. That is the explanation I should like to have.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to deal with two items to which my hon. friend referred. There is an increase in the teletype item amounting to $21,800. There is included in this estimate a proposed additional circuit installation which will cost $14,844, and the replacement of an old model teletype with a modern high-speed type which accounts for $6,956. The increase in the item for weather observer contracts comes about by an upward revision of contract rates, chiefly in Newfoundland, the extension of certain contracts to a full year basis, and payments on account of new contracts. That accounts for $53,200. Those were not in last year's estimates.

Mr. Wright: What co-operation or co-ordination is there between the meteorological branch in this department and that in the air force? Does the minister's department do part of the meteorological observation work for the air force, or have they their own department? Would it be possible to make a saving through co-operation, if there is a duplication of service?

Mr. Chevrier: No; the airports under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport are operated for the benefit of all groups, including national defence. In those airports we have meteorologists and radio operators, and we have tower operators. But this is not a duplicated service. In other words, the air force or any division of national defence has nothing to do with this particular service.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

519. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $768,060.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I believe some questions might be asked under this item relative to Canada's defence plans. Some time ago the Minister of Transport spoke in Quebec in regard to the general situation respecting civil aviation. My first question would be the extent to which the basic plans already existing, so far as civil aviation is concerned, are geared to the needs of the country, should an emergency arise in any part of the world, particularly as it would affect Canada.

Generally speaking, the situation as I see it is that the whole development in connection with civil aviation, or at least the major portion of it, is to permit of a rapid extension of air facilities should an emergency arise or should a war take place. It is because of the need for development and extension of civil aviation that I bring to the attention of the minister the situation in northern Saskatchewan and in Manitoba. The hon. member for Prince Albert would no doubt make these representations if he were here but, as one of his constituents, I make them, because I know he is unavoidably absent this evening.

Great developments are taking place in northern Saskatchewan. Uranium finds in the last year have possibilities beyond anything that has ever been discovered in our country. The nearest location to those developments is the city of Prince Albert in northern Saskatchewan, and I should like to learn from the minister whether consideration has been given to extending the runways at Prince Albert so as to make them available for all-year-round traffic—in other words, to make permanent runways at that point.

At the same time I would refer to another northern airport, which is located in Manitoba at Flin Flon. Certainly Flin Flon is one airport that is necessary from a defence standpoint, as is also that at Prince Albert. Both should be in a position to provide adequate air facilities and adequate air protection for the sources of vital base metal supplies. I should like to learn from the minister in a general way something of his plans in connection with the expansion of civil aviation so that these two areas, which today do not enjoy proper facilities or proper landing fields, should be provided therewith. I am not one of those who ask for expenditures unless I believe they are necessary and will be self-liquidating. These are the two jumping-off places into the north from Manitoba and Saskatchewan and I feel that they deserve the best air facilities that can be provided by the department.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask with regard to any conferences that have taken place during the year having to do with the development of the doctrine of freedom of the air. This may not come under this vote and I do not know under what item it would come, but I know during the past years there has been considerable discussion about the need of expanding the principle of the freedom of the air to the end that civil aviation may be properly expanded. As it is today, most nations have refused to accept the proposition that freedom of the air in so far as commercial rights are concerned should be accepted as part of the international air law.

I should like to ask the degree to which there has been expansion within the last year by Canadian Pacific Air Lines in their Pacific services. Last November there was some discussion as to whether C.P.A. would provide for calls at New Zealand in its Australia-Vancouver service. I should like the minister to give the committee a picture of the developments that have taken place during the last year and also any plans there are for the expansion of civil aviation.

There is no matter more important to our defence than the widest possible expansion of civil aviation. In making the suggestions that I have in reference to Prince Albert and Flin Flon I do so because I believe that with the development of minerals in northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba something should be done, not only to expand the commercial position of these airports but to make them available as military outposts in the event that our defences are threatened in any way.

Mr. Argue: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the need for expanding the airport facilities at Regina. As I understand it, the North Star planes of the T.C.A. are unable to land at Regina. The capital city of Saskatchewan should have airport facilities sufficient to handle the largest planes. If the runways at Regina were extended perhaps one of the flights of the T.C.A. from Vancouver to Winnipeg could be dropped down at Regina and so improve the air services available to the people of southern Saskatchewan. I ask the minister to give consideration to this matter.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to add a word or two to what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said with regard to the need for a civil aviation development program. The hon. member for Lake Centre has outlined the subject so well that there is probably not much need for me to elaborate. I agree fully with the points he has made, and particularly with reference to the importance of the development of civil aviation.

When the minister replies I should like him to deal with the question of airport development. In my view there is need for an over-all program of airport development as part of a civil aviation expansion program. As the minister well knows, there are a number of airports to which I could refer in detail. However, I have taken these up with the minister by correspondence and I do not think it would be proper for me to repeat the details on this occasion. I feel that the airports in which I am interested, as well as those in which other hon. members are interested, should be handled as part of an over-all program rather than, as I think has been the case in the past, as a sort of hodge-podge development.

Grants have been made in individual cases where it has been felt they were justified, or where sufficient pressure has been put on in support of a local case. If we look at the details of one of the subsequent items we can see where a number of small grants are being made to municipalities, in some cases to assist them in the development of airports. I think this matter goes beyond what might be regarded primarily as a municipal responsibility.

I base this argument on the fact that under government policy Trans-Canada Air Lines is the only air line which is permitted to operate on the main routes in Canada. For that reason T.C.A. are in a preferred position. It is almost a foregone conclusion that there will not be many other air lines, if any, which will be able to undertake a program of airport construction of their own. In the past the railways and transportation companies have had to provide their own terminal facilities, except for those ports which come under the national harbours board where there may be some co-operation. However, generally speaking the transportation companies have had to provide their own transportation facilities, including tracks and buildings.

As we were told in the committee, T.C.A. has virtually no responsibility with respect to providing airport facilities, either runways or buildings. If the government has assumed that responsibility for T.C.A. it means that those municipalities served by T.C.A. are in an extremely fortunate position. For the reasons which I have given, it is hardly likely that private air lines will be able to embark on a program of airport construction which will have the effect of providing first-class airports for those municipalities served by private lines. Therefore the case almost is that if a municipality wishes to have an airport at the present time the responsibility generally speaking is entirely that of the municipality, which is very different indeed from the history with respect to other means of transportation and communication. That is why I say it seems to me that it is essential, as one aspect of a civil aviation development program, that a sound and progressive program of airport development must be designed, laid down and carried through by progressive stages. It is admittedly a very expensive thing. I am not suggesting that we should set ourselves a target of one hundred airports a year or anything of that sort, but I am suggesting we should have a program, which could be followed through consistently, of developing airports at centres other than those served by T.C.A.

I think that the opinions I have expressed here follow logically from the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Lake Centre, with which I have said I agree, that the development of civil aviation is important not only from a commercial, but also from a defence, point of view. Certainly one of the primary necessities of the development of any program of civil aviation is a program of airport expansion. When the minister replies I wish he would make some comments on that. Perhaps I am not the original thinker here. It is likely that the department has already given some thought to this matter, and if so I would be grateful if the minister would tell us what general outline or program they have in mind.

Mr. Green: Before the minister replies, one of the points raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre was dealt with by the Turgeon commission. In chapter 13 of their report under the heading "Air Transportation" we find that the first suggestion made to them as to airports was as follows:

> That additional airstrips should be constructed in northern areas to provide better air transport between mining localities and commercial centres.

When the commission dealt with that matter they had this to say on page 261:

> An interdepartmental committee was established about one year ago for the purpose of studying proposals of financial assistance for the construction of additional airports in northern areas.

Apparently there is a recognized need for the development of further airstrips in northern Canada. When the minister replies I would ask him to deal with this particular point.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that I have been asked by hon. gentlemen opposite to put on Hansard the pattern and the program of the department with reference to aviation developments. It was asked of me last year and the year before, but I will gladly do it again if it is the wish of the members. There is a very definite program with reference to the development of civil airports and civil aviation services together with a program developed in co-operation with officers of national defence. The object of the policy of the department is first of all to see to the progressive development of main line airports such as those which are used by T.C.A. and C.P.A. across Canada, and to permit the utilization of the most modern types of aircraft at the minimum capital outlay.

Next it is the policy to see to the development of a minimum number of international airports, and also to assist and encourage municipalities that are anxious to develop their own airports, to come to their assistance where it seems desirable that such airports should be developed, maintained and operated to standards set out by the dominion government. Then we seek to assist in the establishment of airstrips or bases feeding remote centres, such as have been referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, for the purpose of stimulating the development of Canada's natural resources. As is stated in the report, there has been in existence for some time an interdepartmental committee composed of officers of the Department of Transport, the Department of National Defence and the Department of Finance whose responsibility it is to consider the over-all program and to co-ordinate it with defence if need be, so that we have not only a program for civil development but we also are ready to assist national defence should they require additional strips or additional facilities in airports operated by the Department of National Defence.

The committee has met on a number of occasions and is responsible for the program, part of which will be seen not in this item but in the next item. I think I need hardly tell the committee that the program which can be seen in these estimates is not nearly as ambitious as the officers of the department would have wished it to be, and I speak now exclusively of civil development. Because of the priority which national defence must of necessity take over civil development, we have had to curtail very severely the expanding of civil aviation, civil airports and civil airways in the present fiscal year. Because of that it will be seen that the estimates are not nearly as high as we would have wanted them to be.

We have some items here dealing with airports that have been referred to. I think I can safely say that there are a considerable number of items dealing with radio development, meteorological development and air services development in the Northwest Territories. When we come to those items I will gladly put them on the record if need be. We have an item for Flin Flon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is it?

Mr. Chevrier: It is a grant in aid to the municipality in the amount of $25,000. We are making a survey now of a field for Flin Flon. Nothing definite has been announced but there is this item in the estimates.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that in addition to the $25,000 last year?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is in addition to the grant of $25,000 of last year which, with this amount, makes $50,000. Then we are giving consideration to a field close to Goldfields. Nothing has been decided with reference to it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What consideration is being given to the Goldfields proposition?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not in a position to say. We are considering whether or not we will establish an airstrip there. In so far as Prince Albert is concerned, we have not got it under consideration, and there is no vote in the estimates covering that area. I was asked a question about freedom of the air, the five freedoms. There have been no special international air conferences during the last fiscal term. Of course there is continually in session either at the assembly or through the council the ICAO meetings at Montreal, and matters affecting freedom of the air are brought up regularly at that international organization. I am not able to state that additional agreements have been entered into between Canada and any other countries since the two agreements were completed with the United Kingdom and the United States.

In reference to the question of stop-over rights for C.P.A. in New Zealand, which was raised in the house and which received some attention when the Prime Minister of New Zealand was here, unfortunately that has not been advanced any further. All I can say is that Australia has indicated to us that they would have no objection to traffic movements through New Zealand to their country, but we have not yet been able to get any firm assurance from the government of New Zealand that they are willing to allow stop-over rights in favor of C.P.A.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What seems to be their objection? When we were there last fall they appeared very anxious to have direct connection with Canada. On every hand members of the house of representatives asked us whether something could not be done to assure that Canadian Pacific Air Lines would have a port of call in New Zealand. Certainly it would complete the picture and would draw us still closer to those dominions in which we have a very considerable interest. Canadian Pacific Air Lines has done a magnificent job with its air service between Vancouver and Australia, and I find it difficult to understand why any objection should be raised by the New Zealand government to landing rights there, particularly in view of the fact that, as the minister says, the government of Australia has no objection to that course being followed.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish I could give my hon. friend an answer to that question, but unfortunately I cannot. I do not know the reason. All I can say is that when the prime minister was here, in the discussions he had with our own Prime Minister and with me I think he too went away with the idea that there was no reason why C.P.A. should not have these rights. I understand, however, that there is a division of opinion over there as to the effect it might have on New Zealand trade, though they have been assured that stop-over rights mean exactly that. Stop-over rights mean the right of a through passenger from Vancouver to Australia, let us say, to stop over in New Zealand for the matter of a week, since the trip is a weekly affair, and do not in any way mean taking away New Zealand traffic from the British commonwealth lines operating in those two dominions. Beyond that I cannot add anything. I know personally I have made the strongest representations to the representative of New Zealand in this country. He knows our position and our wishes and desires. I am sure he understands them and has explained them very carefully to his country. But I am not able to say that it has been possible for the government of that commonwealth to grant stop-over rights.

In reference to Regina, there is an item in the next estimate dealing with the development of a strip at that airport.

Mr. Argue: What is the amount?

Mr. Chevrier: $300,000.

Mr. Fulton: I was interested in the statement by the minister on the interdepartmental committee. I observe that on that committee there are representatives of the Department of National Defence, as of course everyone will agree there should be. May I ask the minister whether that committee has referred to it any proposals of the Department of National Defence arising purely within that department for the location and construction of new airports for defence purposes, so that as far as may be possible the defence airport construction program may be integrated with the transport department airport development program?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there is consultation between the officers of national defence and our officers. There is also reference by national defence to the committee for advice on the desirability of extending a strip in an airport belonging to national defence, and the decision of the committee is later referred to the responsible minister, who takes it up with his colleagues.

Mr. Fulton: There was just one other matter I wished to refer to, and it does not concern only new construction. I am referring to the airport and meteorological station—primarily the airport—at Dog Creek in British Columbia, which is situated about fifty miles from nowhere. There is a transport department meteorological station there, and during the war quite an extensive airstrip was constructed. There is also a radio beam station. All these installations have to be maintained at very considerable expense because of the distance from any supply centre. There is a growing need for an airport at one of the other communities in the district to which I have already referred, Williams Lake. I wish the two departments would take up this matter jointly and see whether it would not be in the interests of over-all economy to move the present installation to a point where it could be serviced much more readily, and where it could form part of the eventual over-all development of an airport at Williams Lake, which is a supply and distribution centre for that part of the Cariboo country. It seems to me that might be taken up as a joint civil-defence matter for interdepartmental consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that the matter has already been referred to the committee, which feels that the Dog Creek airport is a good one. While the population in that area is not very dense, still the committee feels it is an excellent airport. They have not the same opinion of Williams Lake, which is not in the same category. It is a poor airport.

Mr. Fulton: At the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; and the Department of National Defence is not interested in the Williams Lake airport. So the committee felt they should not disturb the present position where there is a good airport and particularly where national defence feel that there is no sound reason for moving from one to the other. If an emergency developed greater than the one which exists at the moment it might be possible to again consider Williams Lake, but at the moment that is the position.

Mr. Fulton: On that point I would simply observe that obviously I would not care to disagree offhand with the view of the committee to which the minister has referred, but the fact remains that the Dog Creek installation is fifty miles from anywhere. As far as constructing any installation there is concerned, or expanding any installation, the same considerations I have referred to with respect to the existing installation of course would militate against that. I cannot go further at the moment. It is a matter on which a comparison of figures and costs perhaps should be obtained, and I shall look further into that aspect. This is the first time I have actually heard that the decision of the committee has been given. I will have to look into the matter further and perhaps pursue it at another time.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Would the minister indicate whether there is provision in the estimates for expanding and improving the airport at London, Ontario? I believe the hon. member for London was interested in that matter, and in fact all through western Ontario we are interested.

Mr. Chevrier: That really comes under the next item. I wonder if we could not stick to this one for the time being, and I will give that information when we come to the item.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask about the accommodation for T.C.A. passengers who are forced to spend the night at Gander. Last September I had the misfortune of having to spend the night there, and the accommodation was at the end of a runway. Every five minutes there was a large four-engine plane landing or taking off, so it was impossible to sleep. Has there been any change in the location of the sleeping accommodation for passengers?

Mr. Chevrier: May I deal with that under the other item? There is an item for that later, and it comes under that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It comes under this item.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I thought it did.

Mr. Chevrier: Unfortunately, it does not.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the difference in the regulations applying to planes which fly, for example, into the north country and planes which fly the established routes in the southern part of Canada. I believe that a plane flying passengers into the north must carry a certain type of emergency equipment, but that is not true of ordinary passenger planes flying across the southern portion of Canada.

Shortly before Christmas last year one of the Canadian Pacific planes flying from Vancouver to Calgary crashed near Penticton. In that crash the pilot was killed, and the co-pilot was fatally injured. It took about two days for help to arrive, and in the meantime the co-pilot died. He suffered terribly until his death, as the plane did not carry emergency equipment. It apparently was not required to carry emergency equipment to any extent. I believe it had a compass, papers, chocolate, sugar, aspirins, veronal, a hatchet and matches. There were also some bandages and a few splints, but not even in sufficient quantity for the one injured person. There were also a few blankets, but all of those were required for the co-pilot. Fortunately all the passengers were saved but they suffered a great deal. I believe there should be some regulations brought into effect concerning emergency equipment on these planes. A trans-Canada plane might come down in the mountains of British Columbia or in northern Ontario. I do not understand why such planes are not required to carry some type of emergency equipment. Perhaps the thought is that if the plane crashes everyone is going to be killed anyway, and there is no use carrying anything for an emergency. In this particular case, emergency equipment would have been of great value. It might even have saved the life of the co-pilot, although I do not know that it would. Why is it there is no provision made for this type of equipment to be carried on planes flying across the settled parts of Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I remember that accident quite well. I know owing to the coolness and dexterity of the pilot all of the passengers were saved, which was quite fortunate. I should say to my hon. friend that there is no difference in the airworthiness requirements for planes flying on the international domestic main line route and those flying into the north country. Neither is there any difference in so far as emergency equipment is concerned. The Canadian Pacific plane to which reference has been made was required to carry emergency equipment. There is this difference that in flying into the north country they take rations and so forth, which they would not normally take on main line routes.

In the case to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra refers, there was first-aid equipment on that aircraft. Over and above that, there was a qualified nurse. Canadian Pacific Air Lines, just as T.C.A., are required to carry qualified nurses on the domestic routes across Canada. They also have the first-aid equipment which is compulsory.

Mr. Green: I would suggest that the minister check this a little further. My informant was on the plane and was a qualified nurse. There was not sufficient equipment on that plane to look after the injured co-pilot. I believe there are regulations requiring the carrying of emergency equipment on planes flying into the north, in fact I have seen them myself. I cannot put my finger on them at the moment, but they require a certain amount of food, winter clothing and one thing and another of that type. Apparently there is nothing like that required for these ordinary passenger planes travelling across Canada. Can the minister tell us exactly what equipment has to be carried on the T.C.A. and C.P.A. planes for emergency? Could he give the committee a list of the equipment?

Mr. Chevrier: I will have to get the regulation and table it. I have not a copy of it here, but I am informed that there was this equipment on the plane in question. However, I would be glad, in view of the statement made by the hon. member, to look into the matter further.

Mr. Green: For example, there were no drugs, stretcher, food, water, axes, shovels, spades, rope, tarpaulin, heater or clothing such as socks, boots and mitts which would be required in midwinter in the case of a plane landing in the mountains. None of that material was on the plane. I am not suggesting for a moment that the Canadian Pacific did not comply with all the regulations, because I believe they did. But I would urge upon the minister to check his regulations and see whether there is not something further required for use in an emergency of that kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is just one other matter. In connection with the answers given by the minister, I do not usually express my appreciation of a complete answer, but I do in this case. I think the minister went into considerable detail, and naturally such an effort as that on his part causes those who are questioning him to reciprocate. He has mentioned what is being done at Flin Flon and the additional $25,000 to be voted this year, which will be most helpful and will provide an airport there, necessary not only for the opening of the north country but also for defence should defence become necessary.

He has stated also that, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, there are no plans for Prince Albert. The minister suggests that consideration is being given to an airfield at Goldfields. I presume that is for the purpose of providing facilities in connection with the uranium field that is located not too distant from Goldfields. I feel that I speak for the people of Prince Albert as well as northern Saskatchewan when I say that unless the facilities in Prince Albert are made much better than they are now, anything done at Goldfields will be of little help in opening that uranium country. After all, Prince Albert is the gateway of the north in Saskatchewan. It is the nearest place to Goldfields, and there is going to be a great development there. The uranium find is supposed to be one of the most valuable in North America. Prince Albert has in operation today an airport which permits the Canadian Pacific Air Lines to land there. But it is not an airport in keeping with the responsibility that will fall on it when the northern development takes place, as we believe it will.

This request of mine for reconsideration of the laying of all-weather runways in Prince Albert will result in some expenditure, but it will be self-liquidating, and it is necessary in connection with our defence. Prince Albert is the closest to the uranium fields. The airport in Saskatoon is too far removed to be the gateway into the development that is taking place. I suggest to the minister that this matter be brought to the attention of the interdepartmental committee, and that there be established in that city runways that will permit of the development being expanded into the north, which is now in its infancy, but promises to be one of the greatest developments in our country, so far as uranium is concerned.

Mr. Argue: I was pleased to hear the minister say a few minutes ago that $300,000—

Mr. Chevrier: Could we have that discussion on the next item? This item has to do with regulatory services of civil air transport.

Mr. Argue: I am sorry; I thought it was this item.

Mr. Green: I think this comes under the item. Last fall press dispatches appeared to the effect that plans were being made for a reserve of transport planes in Canada for use in the event of an emergency such as war. This dispatch is dated November 3, and reads:

> Steps are being taken by R.C.A.F. officials and civilian agencies to provide Canada with a reserve of transport aircraft which could be used for airlift work in an emergency.
> A plan by which the government may acquire transport-type planes and turn them over to civilian operators on a loan or lease basis has already been discussed by high government officials, it was learned Thursday. The R.C.A.F. favours the idea.

The dispatch also quotes the minister as having dealt with the subject at a convention at Montebello. Can he tell us whether there are any plans of that kind in mind?

Mr. Chevrier: I can tell the hon. gentleman that representations have been made by the commercial operators for assistance in connection with new equipment. There are no plans; applications have been made, and studies are in progress at this time; but there is no decision on the matter that I can make any statement upon.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—

Operation and maintenance—

520. Civil aviation services, $8,808,885.

Mr. Argue: Is this the item?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. May I deal with the matter that we discussed under the other item. I think the committee will want to know what are the amounts. I am sorry, it is vote 523 and not 520. Item 520 has to do with civil aviation services.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does it comprise?

Mr. Chevrier: It comprises the maintenance and operation of all airways facilities and airports under or controlled by the Department of Transport. There are 112 airports, aerodromes, landing fields and associated facilities. It provides for the salaries and wages of all of the civilian aviation employees of the department in these 112 airports. These salaries run into almost $3,750,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many employees are there?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a total of 2,303 under this vote.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many were there last year?

Mr. Chevrier: There were 2,296 so there is not much difference. This vote also provides for the repair and upkeep of equipment, the materials and supplies which are pretty costly, running into almost $2,500,000. It also provides for assistance toward the operation of seven municipal airports, as well as administration expenses of headquarters and district offices.

Mr. Drew: What are those municipal airports?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, from memory, Vancouver is one and Edmonton is another. These are the two that come to mind at the moment. I can get a complete list for my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: Under this item can the minister tell us the present position with regard to the Vancouver airport? There have been press dispatches to the effect that the government is buying the airport, but as yet nothing definite has been published.

Mr. Chevrier: Could we have that question under vote 523 which is the vote for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, lands and new equipment? In that vote there is a substantial amount of money for the Vancouver airport.

Mr. Drew: What materials and supplies are covered? I mean the general nature of them.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can get that for my hon. friend.

Mr. Drew: Covered by this item of $2,468,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is a substantial amount. This provides for gasoline, oil, grease, fuel oil and parts required for eleven headquarters, and all maintenance equipment at the various airports as well as for district offices; vehicles; also quantities of domestic fuel required for heating, and diesel fuel for lighting plants; all purchases of supplies in connection with the maintenance of airports, which is broken down under eight or nine heads as follows: coal, coke, wood fuel and coal oil, $1 million; gasoline, oil and grease, $203,000; provisions and commissary supplies, $600,000; uniforms and kits, $5,000; electrical supplies, $65,000; aircraft supplies, $95,000.

Mr. Drew: So that I may understand this item, there is for instance a substantial figure for gasoline, and also a figure for aircraft supplies. What I am not clear on is what kind of supplies they would be that would not be paid for by the operating services.

Mr. Chevrier: We operate planes of our own. In each district, I think from memory, seven or eight across Canada, we have certain planes that are required for inspection and investigation purposes. There are motor vehicles, there are snow blowers to keep the runways clear. It has been brought to my attention that there are 72 automobiles under this vote, 80 snow blowers, 451 trucks, 35 graders, 300 tractors, 26 station wagons, 9 rollers and 6 busses, all of which are required in connection with the operation of the various airports.

Mr. Drew: This would be in the airports actually operated and owned by the department?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Drew: As distinct from those operated by the municipalities. Is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to press it, because the information may not be readily available. However, I did ask which airports are actually owned and operated by the government, as distinct from those operated by municipalities.

Mr. Chevrier: There is quite a list of those operated by the government.

Mr. Drew: You mentioned seven.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh no; the seven were municipally owned. There are 112 operated by the department.

Mr. Drew: It may not be easy to break that down, but I am trying to get a picture of the large airports across the country which are part of our heavy transport system. Is it possible to give a picture of those across the country operated by municipalities and those operated by the department?

Mr. Chevrier: I think so. For instance, Gander is operated by the department, and so are Moncton, Sydney, Dorval, Malton, Winnipeg, Ottawa, London, Windsor and Regina. The one at Calgary has been turned over by the department to the municipality. Then, those at Edmonton and Vancouver are municipally operated. Those are the three important ones of the seven mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A few moments ago I referred to the accommodation for passengers who have to stay overnight at Gander, when travelling by T.C.A.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not wish to put off the hon. member continually, so I shall deal with the matter now. Unfortunately there is no provision for the condition to which he referred. I think the only way to meet that situation would be to build a new hotel, and we find we have not the means to do that. The most important thing at Gander is to build the new airstrip which will take the heaviest planes. The next thing is to build an administration building, which is badly needed and figures largely in our plans. Unfortunately however we have not been able to convince treasury officials that it is of such priority that it should be done now. We have convinced them however as to the airstrip. Then there are a number of other developments which must be considered before the matter the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suggest there should be runways so that the heaviest planes could be accommodated because, as he knows, Gander is one of the most important airports in the world, with so many planes landing there. It would be a great mistake to neglect enlarging and straightening the runways so that they could be used by heavy planes. Do I take it that that is going to be done?

Mr. Chevrier: We have definite plans for development, and the largest item in the construction vote in these estimates is for Gander.

Mr. Gibson: I wish to assist the minister and also the hon. member for St. John's West. Gander has become a kind of gateway to Canada. Often it is the only place in Canada that Americans going to New York see. I understand the facilities there are pretty ghastly. I have had some personal knowledge of that within the last couple of days. The way we handle passengers going through there is no credit to Canada.

Mr. Drew: I do think this is a subject which has some importance, and that goes beyond the temporary convenience or otherwise of the passengers who have been compelled to wait over at Gander. Gander itself is some distance away from the larger centres of Newfoundland. Those who actually come down at that point have no facilities other than those provided at the airport.

As has been said by the hon. member who has just spoken, there is a question of public relations involved, as well as that of the comfort of the passengers. I cannot help comparing in my own mind the facilities available at either Gander or Goose with those available at Keflavik. I am not suggesting for one moment—indeed it would be inconsistent if I did so—any extravagant development, in view of certain of the things I have been saying. On the other hand there is a difference between extravagance and employing the expenditures which must be made for other things in a way that they will give some permanent facilities in these places where they are of considerable importance. Without raising this as a criticism of the past—because we all know that during the last war certain things had to be undertaken—we do know that facilities could have been built in particular places, and that such facilities might have been used afterward, if the future expansion of aviation could have been visualized.

Having regard to the expansion that is going to take place in the air services it would seem to me that the wisdom of constructing something of the same type of accommodation as is offered by the hotel at Keflavik, at both Gander and Goose—and at Goose it would need to be on a much smaller scale than at Gander—should be given serious consideration. In the very nature of air transport, and it will be no less true with the introduction of jet aircraft, Gander and Goose will be extremely important stopping-off places under certain weather conditions. The facilities available at those points may to a very considerable extent be the deciding factor as to whether or not aircraft from the United States which constitute the major flow of transatlantic traffic will be satisfied to use those airports, or would be more inclined to expand the airports at the nearest points in the United States.

It is well known that there are now some large airports, and that there is a tendency for United States aircraft to use those airports in the United States instead of the facilities at Gander, for this very reason. Therefore I suggest that both from the practical point of view of service and that of attracting aircraft to use those airports when weather conditions demand a stop-over, consideration should be given to the location of certain defence construction projects at those places, and of a type which would be suitable both for training accommodation now and for hotel accommodation in years ahead.

Item agreed to.

521. Airway and airport traffic control, $1,203,247.

Mr. Gibson: Have any facilities been provided at Cassidy airport just outside Nanaimo to take care of night traffic?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps we could deal with that under item 523.

Item agreed to.

Construction services—

522. Administration, $749,582.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss a matter which comes to my mind now, because I do not believe it could be discussed under item 523. I would hesitate to take up the time of the committee in a discussion of the matter if I felt it was one of purely local interest. I would also hesitate to suggest an expenditure of money to the extent involved in connection with a matter of purely local interest. I am referring at the moment to the necessity for building a strip or airport, whatever one may call it, on which wheeled aircraft could land at Prince Rupert, British Columbia. I have said that this is not a matter of purely local interest, because I am convinced it is important to all traffic on the Pacific coast of British Columbia from Victoria at the south to Alaska at the north. It is of importance to the Pacific air traffic serving the United States and Alaska. It is essential to the east-west service from the Pacific coast in those latitudes connected with Edmonton and other points on the prairies.

Because of its value in connection with defence it is of more than local interest. I am not going to set myself up as an expert on defence matters, but I would leave with the committee the thought that if there is only one place on the mainland of the Pacific coast north of Vancouver where aircraft can be landed so as to give quick connections with the transcontinental railway and highway systems of the continent, then I suggest and submit it is of considerable importance to the country as a whole.

The situation up there is such that we are now on the main line operations of Canadian Pacific Air Lines from Vancouver. In order to get into Prince Rupert and make connections for points on the mainland of British Columbia, north of say Ocean Falls, this Canadian Pacific Air Lines plane has to set down at Sandspit on the Queen Charlotte islands when passengers and other traffic are then transferred to the mainland by a Canso amphibian plane. The nearest point at which any form of wheeled aircraft can set down on the mainland is at Terrace, some 95 miles inland from Prince Rupert which, as I shall mention in a moment, is not regarded as suitable for traffic of this kind. The Canso service by C.P.A. is an amphibious service which lands and takes off from the water at Prince Rupert, because there is no other place at which you can land or take off.

This has been requested and demanded for some time. In so far as the area which it would serve is concerned, the request or demand is greatly aggravated at the present time by the tremendous expansion in civil activities in that part of British Columbia, which has nothing to do with the temporary and perhaps somewhat artificial stimulation that we sometimes get as a result of defence contracts.

As two examples I would mention the fact that eight miles from Prince Rupert there started operation this month the Columbia Cellulose Company which has completed a mill at a cost of some $30 million to $35 million. This also applies—I am sticking strictly to the item—to another development which I take pride in drawing to the attention of the committee. An announcement appeared in the daily press of Canada today that in the Skeena district the Aluminum Company of Canada is to start immediately a development which will involve the expenditure of $160 million in the immediate future and of approximately $500 million before it is completed.

Projects and businesses of this size cannot be served by any but the most modern, up to date and speedy transportation. For these reasons I submit that the department should give the most favourable and sympathetic consideration to the building of this airstrip.

You might say, and with reason, "Well, can't you get by with the Canso service?" I notice by recent reports in the paper that the Canso is having to make three trips a day between the island and the mainland in order to handle the traffic from Vancouver to Prince Rupert via the Queen Charlotte islands. The time will come, and I am afraid it will not be long, when the Canso aircraft in that service will have reached the stage where the Department of Transport will no longer permit them to fly in commercial service.

It is no secret that they were purchased by C.P.A. following the war at considerably less than their cost new would be. The cost of replacement with new aircraft, I say without fear of contradiction, would be so great that it would make the operation of the service prohibitive unless they were going to receive a large subsidy, which I do not think is likely.

I said that the matter was not of local concern. It has received the support of such disinterested bodies as the British Columbia aviation council, which has filed with the department a comprehensive brief on the subject. It has also the support of the associated boards of trade of central British Columbia, of the British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines and of the Vancouver board of trade. It has also the support of practically all the local boards of trade and chambers of commerce in that district.

The site at which the residents there suggest an airport can be built feasibly is on Tugwell island, which is approximately six and a half to seven miles from the wharf at Prince Rupert and which could be served by small boats. This is all entirely protected water. I can assure the committee that I could talk for at least forty minutes outlining the details of this project, but I shall not do that. At this time I am merely going to suggest that it has been reported by engineers and others familiar with the aviation business and employed in the aviation business that runways can be built of 6,000 feet, 6,600 feet, 7,000 feet, or if necessary, 8,000 feet in length.

The 6,000-foot runway can be built at a reasonable cost. The 7,000-foot runway can be built at quite a possible cost. I admit that the last 1,000 feet of runway would be expensive in proportion to the rest. The island provides sea level approaches at both ends, as do all islands. The island itself is of glacial gravel; there is no rock involved.

There is only one other point—what are the alternatives? I know what I am talking about in dealing with these. One alternative is at Sandspit, which is on an island across Hecate strait, some 80 odd miles over some of the roughest waters on the coast of British Columbia. It is considered by the leading air line there to have no value for future commercial aviation and the weather is stated to be less good on the average than at Tugwell island.

The next alternative is at Annette on the Alaskan side of the boundary. The weather there is reported definitely as being turbulent and there are no highways or railway connections.

Terrace and Kitimat are both on the mainland and have been reported by the industry as not being suitable for main line operations.

I suggest that the time has come to give this development favourable consideration, especially in view of the defence possibilities.

Mr. Chevrier: I know the hon. gentleman has a keen interest in this airport because he has brought it to our attention before. Unfortunately there is no item in our estimates providing for an extension there, but in view of the reasons which he has placed on the record I can assure him that the department will be glad to give it further consideration.

Item agreed to.

523. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $6,498,350.

Mr. Argue: I was pleased to hear the minister state earlier this evening that $300,000 is provided in the estimates this year for improvements at the Regina airport. Can the minister state what is involved in this expenditure and whether the runways and other facilities will be extended to the point where North Star aircraft may come down?

Mr. Chevrier: I think the committee would want to know what the main items in this vote are. As I stated a moment ago, there is an expenditure of $1,250,000 provided for additional runways at Gander. There is a substantial amount in this vote for developments at Regina that will provide in due course for the construction of a new runway which is required there. It will cost far more to build the new runway but we are putting in this amount now because it will take some time before the development can be completed.

There is an item of $500,000 for Vancouver where we propose to construct a new runway. The rest of the vote is made up of smaller items such as $272,000 for the completion of the airport at Saint John, New Brunswick. There is also an item for the completion of the program at Dorval which was begun last year, and this particular amount is for the final payment on the runway. There are a number of other items which are small in comparison with these four. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked if there was anything for Cassidy. There is an amount of $16,000 for lights and a substantial amount for a radio range which has been passed already.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is there anything for Torbay? The accommodation at Torbay is very limited. There is not enough accommodation.

Mr. Chevrier: There are several amounts for Torbay, installation of lighting on taxi way, $4,500; lowering of water mains, $6,500; replacing control tower, $8,000; repairs and addition to heating lines, $15,000; recapping of concrete apron with asphalt, $53,000. So far as Toronto is concerned, at Malton airport there is construction of a taxi way, $225,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Speaking about Torbay, I wonder whether it has been brought to the minister's attention that there is not enough accommodation in the waiting room at Torbay for people to sit down. There are only a few seats. The place is generally crowded with people standing around. There is not enough accommodation to sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: It is an airport belonging to the Department of National Defence but operated by us on a caretaker basis. It is not felt, because of its military nature, that there should be a greater expansion of the present facilities in so far as the waiting room is concerned.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is absurd because we do not expect to be at war for the rest of our lives.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend may think it is absurd, but I am telling him there is no provision for it in these estimates.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I ask the minister to take into consideration the matter of providing suitable accommodation for people who have to make use of Torbay in travelling on planes. There is only one room there not more than 15 or 20 feet square. Sometimes there are a lot of passengers there and a lot of their friends with them to see them off or to meet them. I think the least we can expect is accommodation as good as they have at some of the other airports such as Sydney. If the minister is not completely responsible for that airport, at least he has an interest in it, and I think he should take that into consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid it is impossible to look after all the requirements that are necessary in the civilian airports of this country. I tried to indicate a while ago what the position was. We have plans that unfortunately we cannot put into effect because of the higher priority requirements of national defence. Until that position is cleared, much as I should like to tell my hon. friend that it will be done or it will be considered, I am afraid I cannot at this stage.

Mr. Argue: The minister said that the $300,000 for the Regina airport would not be nearly enough to complete the plans of the department. Would the minister give the committee some idea of what these plans are and how long it is anticipated it will take to complete them?

Mr. Chevrier: This item is for the construction of one runway and a taxi strip. It amounts to $300,000, and it is the first stage of the runway which will probably be completed next year.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Will the minister indicate what the plans are for Crumlin airport at London?

Mr. Chevrier: There is nothing in these estimates for London.

Mr. Green: The minister was going to say something about the purchase of the Vancouver airport, but apparently the only item in this vote is for the extension of a runway, or is it for a new runway?

Mr. Chevrier: It is a new runway.

Mr. Green: What is the position now with regard to the dominion taking over the airport? We understood from press dispatches about two weeks ago that an agreement had been reached under which the government would take over the airport entirely. Is that the case, and if so, what are the terms of the agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: No agreement has been reached. I received representations from a city council delegation barely two weeks ago. I listened to their representations in which they asked us to take over the airport, and we are giving the matter consideration. It means the sending of some people out there to talk things over with the city officials, but there is nothing definite at this stage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has given a general outline of some of the larger expenditures. He mentioned Regina, which is certainly necessary. I should like to secure from him a statement indicating what other expenditures are to be made for the construction or acquisition of buildings or lands and new equipment in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. Warren: Before we get away too far—

Mr. Chevrier: May I be allowed to answer the hon. member? At Saskatoon there is provision for repairs to a double hangar amounting to $20,000. There is an additional small item for Saskatoon of $3,500. Then there is an item for Swift Current of $2,500; Moose Jaw, $57,000; two additional items for Saskatoon, installation of new heating unit in garage, $6,000, and construction of vaults for runway lighting transformers, $4,000; two additional items for Swift Current, which I overlooked a moment ago, repairs to hangar roof, $20,000, and repairs to runway, $17,000; North Battleford, $3,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was Moose Jaw?

Mr. Chevrier: Repairs to runway and other facilities, $57,000; Yorkton, installation of lighting system, $4,500; Yorkton, construction of vaults for runway lighting transformers, $3,000. There are several items for Winnipeg, the main ones being improvement of terminal facilities, $75,000; repairs to hangar, $25,000; and repairs to east-west runway and north taxi strip, $38,000. At The Pas there is provision of pumping system and water supply pump house, $5,000; Brandon, $20,000; Dauphin, $30,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are those for, runways?

Mr. Chevrier: Embarras, Alberta, $48,000; Fort McMurray, $10,000; Grande Prairie, $10,000; Grande Prairie, another item, $60,000, reconditioning and extending of field drainage; Lethbridge, $40,000, and a considerable number of items in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask the minister what the plans are for the Ottawa airport and what expenditure is contemplated for this year?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Chevrier: There is a substantial plan for the development of Uplands airport which has been worked out in co-operation with the Department of National Defence, arising out of the committee I mentioned a moment ago. It is a three-stage plan which provides for the construction of runways. The first stage for this year is the construction of two runways. The contract has already been awarded and it amounts roughly to $1,500,000.

Mr. Drew: That is actual construction this year?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right. The contract has been awarded and the contractor is now on the job.

Mr. Drew: Is any part of that to be applied to the improvement of the building used for the accommodation of passengers?

Mr. Chevrier: No; the whole of this amount is for the construction of a new runway.

Mr. Warren: I was wondering if the Minister of Transport could not save a few of these dollars and use them to build us a bridge from Morrison's island to Pembroke.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Warren: I do not think that is out of order. This is something we have needed for fifty years.

Mr. Drew: Are they putting in an air service there? Coming back to the building at the airport here, I think we should have in mind facilities consistent with those ordinarily available at corresponding airports. I do not subscribe to the idea that everything should be done on an elaborate scale simply because Ottawa happens to be the capital of Canada, but it is the centre of a great many activities and particularly those related to the business of government, which uses air transportation to a greater extent each year; and the accommodation at Uplands airport is not in keeping with the importance of that airport. In the first place the building is too small. In the second place a very important consideration at a point where many passengers are meeting and changing planes is some opportunity to get meals and other things passengers require. If it is not considered advisable to actually change the building at the present time to provide proper accommodation, I do believe consideration should be given to a temporary concession of some kind for facilities of that nature. Speaking as a member with a very direct interest in that airport, and also as one who uses it considerably, I must say it is very noticeable that its facilities are really less satisfactory than perhaps at any airport of similar importance elsewhere in this country.

Mr. Chevrier: I agree substantially with what the hon. member has said in connection with the administration building, but I think he will agree with me that it would be foolish to spend large sums of money there when the whole plan provides for a change of site. While this three-stage plan I referred to a moment ago means the construction of air facilities, it also means that a new administration building will have to be provided. How soon it will be possible to do that I do not know, but I can assure my hon. friend that all the buildings put up by national defence will be new buildings, and we propose to set aside a site for a new administration building. Incidentally I am reminded by someone here that most of the new site is in the constituency of my colleague the hon. member for Russell.

Mr. Drew: Yes, the location is changed slightly, but that is quite apart from the point; and the minister will have noticed that I qualified the remark I was making because of my recognition of that fact. But it is an airport of importance to the whole of this community and, I suggest, to the whole of the country. Now that the point has been raised, while I may be simply emphasizing something that has been under discussion may I seek to impress upon the department the tremendous importance of a complete co-ordination of plans between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport in regard to construction of this nature. I have already conceded that with the tremendous expansion during the last war it was not possible to fully anticipate the extension of air service that was going to take place. But recognizing now the increasing rate at which air transportation is becoming part of our general system of transportation in this country I would suggest that every effort be made to construct defence buildings at locations where they will be of subsequent use in the plans for civil aviation in the years ahead.

I am not suggesting that it could have been avoided in many cases, but we all know that many costly buildings were disposed of after the war for comparatively small sums because they had been erected in localities where they could not be used. No doubt that was bound to happen in some cases; nevertheless there were many instances in which airports could have been sited more effectively in relation to future civil aviation development. Right across Canada today plans have been worked out by municipalities for shorter air services, what are described as feeder lines. Those plans should be considered in the construction carried on both by this department and by national defence. Just as one example, I know plans have been carried forward quite far for an airport that would serve the cities of Guelph, Kitchener, Waterloo and Galt. If a new airport is to be built anywhere in that area I would suggest that it be built in complete co-operation and co-ordination between the Department of Transport, the Department of National Defence and the municipalities, so that after its military use has become unnecessary it may be put into civilian service. I would also point out that to a substantial extent it could probably provide civilian service at the same time the military activities were being carried out. I am sure there must be similar examples right across the country, and I do believe this is a time to carry out an integration of plans between the Department of Transport, the Department of National Defence and the municipalities to a greater extent than has been the case in the past.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The minister has made the statement that no provision has been made in these estimates for the airport at London. In view of the fact that supplementary estimates will be presented; in view of the further fact that at the London airport there is a very active reserve air force squadron, and the further fact that this is a thickly populated area, I would urge that consideration be given to including sufficient funds in the supplementary estimates to make provision for the improvement of the airport at that point.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for London has already made representations to me along those lines, and I shall be glad to give them consideration together with the representations just made.

Item agreed to.

524. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $310,000.

Mr. Fulton: My recollection is that a year or two ago a program was announced under which the Department of Transport would pay $100 to civilian flying clubs for each pilot who got his wings as a result of the training he took with that club. Then, I believe there was to be in addition a payment of $100 to every pilot so qualified who would join the reserve air force. Will the minister tell us how many pilots have been qualified through flying clubs under this program?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, last year we spent $148,000 which provided for the payment of $100 to 76 clubs and schools, and $100 to 765 pilots.

Mr. Fulton: Have I got the basis correct? It is $100 per pilot qualified?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and per club.

Mr. Fulton: That means there were 765 pilots who were qualified last year?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: Through flying clubs?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right, and there is a further provision in these estimates for $250,000 which we expect to pay.

Mr. Fulton: I have not the comparative figure at the moment, but would that figure be an increase over the previous year?

Mr. Chevrier: A substantial increase.

Mr. Fulton: This program appears to be producing results?

Mr. Chevrier: It is, very much so.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister know what proportion of the pilots have joined the reserve air force?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed 22 to date.

Mr. Fulton: Out of a total of something over a thousand?

Mr. Chevrier: A total of 1,279 in 1950-51.

Item agreed to.

Air transport board—

528. Salaries and other expenses, including the Canadian delegation to the International Civil Aviation Organization, $247,741.

Mr. Green: On item 528, which is the air transport board, the Turgeon commission recommended that the work of this board should be taken over by the board of transport commissioners. Can the minister tell us whether anything of that nature is to be done during the present fiscal year, or will the air transport board be continuing for the year?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is any doubt but that the air transport board will continue as it is for the present year.

Mr. Green: What about the long-range plan?

Mr. Chevrier: No decision has been made on that yet, as I indicated earlier. There is no change from the statement I have already made.

Mr. Green: This vote includes some funds for representation at the international civil aviation organization. Why does that representation come from the air transport board?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Chevrier: This vote used to be paid by external affairs, and it has been transferred from them to us. It is to provide for the permanent delegation at ICAO in Montreal. There is Mr. Booth, who is the main delegate, with two or three others, and this is a provision for the payment of their salaries.

Item agreed to.

Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—

529. Salaries of commissioners, administration, operation and maintenance, $681,220.

Mr. Argue: I listened with considerable interest the other day to the statement by the Minister of Transport in relation to the box car situation in western Canada. I am pleased that the minister was able to report that some considerable improvement has taken place. I do not need to go into the details he outlined in that statement, but the net balance of Canadian box cars in the United States has been reduced from 18,000 to about 7,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I do not see how he can discuss box cars under the board of transport commissioners item. There was an item under which we could have discussed that, and we did discuss it quite fully. I am asking the chairman to rule that this is not an item under which we could discuss box cars. I hope my hon. friend will assist me, because after all I am anxious, in all fairness to myself and to the committee, to get on with the work. There has been no attempt at curtailing discussion, I am sure.

Mr. Argue: Just on the point of order, I want to point out to the minister that the board of transport commissioners certainly has something to do with the box car situation because I have a clipping—I have not got it with me—which indicates that a few weeks ago this question was discussed by the freight association before the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Chevrier: But that is a different thing altogether. An application was made to the board of transport commissioners asking the board to impose a maximum loading order on box cars. This has nothing to do with the movement of grain, and it is there ways that provide the box cars for the movement of grain, not the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Argue: No, but the maximum loading—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to get into an argument with my hon. friend that will continue for ten or fifteen minutes. If the chairman rules it is in order, I shall sit and listen.

Mr. Knowles: Was there not something in the news tonight, to the effect that the board of transport commissioners have made a ruling with respect to box cars?

The Deputy Chairman: Even though I should like the discussion to be as full as possible, I think that we ought to take into consideration the fact that when the first administration item of this department was put before the committee, this matter of the allocation of box cars throughout the country was fully discussed. Today the minister says that does not come under this item. I think hon. members should refrain from referring to this matter again.

It is also true that matters concerning applications made before the board should not be discussed under this item, which is a provision for the salaries of the commissioners and the employees.

Mr. Wright: But, Mr. Chairman, the board of transport commissioners very definitely has something to do with the allocation of box cars between the various industries in this country, for instance, as to whether they will be used for the pulp and paper industry or whether they will be sent to western Canada to be used for the movement of grain.

Mr. Chevrier: If it will assist my hon. friends, I shall tell them that there will be an opportunity to discuss this at a later date?

Mr. Wright: On what date?

Mr. Chevrier: On the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Wright: If it is in order on the supplementary estimates why is it not in order now?

Mr. Chevrier: Not on this item.

Mr. Wright: Under what item?

Mr. Chevrier: Under the administration item, just as it was discussed under the administration item before.

Mr. Wright: If it can be discussed under the administration item on the supplementary estimates, why can it not be discussed now?

Mr. Chevrier: The board does not deal with box cars.

Mr. Wright: Does the minister mean to say that the board of transport commissioners has nothing to do with the loading and distribution of box cars?

Mr. Chevrier: This is what I wanted to avoid. My friend evidently wants to draw me into a discussion which would take five or ten minutes, and that is what I wanted to avoid. If the chairman had ruled that this item could be discussed under this vote I would have sat and listened, but I submit that the chairman has made his ruling and I think my friend should submit to the ruling.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I may be somewhat out of order too. I did not know under what item I could bring this matter to the attention of the minister. On previous occasions when the transport estimates were up, I asked the minister to give consideration to having a faster passenger train run between Halifax and Montreal. Since then I have learned from railway officials that it is not feasible, owing to the roadbed and other considerations, to run the train any faster. There are three trains that come from Halifax—

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member would consider asking this question on the further supplementary estimates when the administration item for the department comes before the committee. In my opinion what the hon. member is putting forward now does not come under this item.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, do not questions relating to the running of trains, their speed and so on, come under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners?

The Deputy Chairman: It is my view—perhaps I should study the matter further—it is not in order to discuss in this committee, where we study the payments of the salaries and the operation and maintenance of the board of transport commissioners, the matters which are susceptible of being the substance of an application to be made to that board. That is my view; otherwise this item could be discussed for a long time. Probably the hon. member would like to have a certain railway line built between two points which might be the substance of an application before the board. Under the administration item suggestions of that kind could be brought forward, but I do not think on this particular item it is in order to discuss whatever might be the subject matter of an application before the board on which it might render a certain judgment. It may be that I am not exactly right in my interpretation of the rule of strict relevancy. I am quite willing to look it up and think it over further but that at the moment is the way I look at it.

Mr. Balcom: This matter of transportation is of vital importance to the maritime provinces. We are greatly handicapped, as everyone knows, because of the distance we are from the central provinces. Will the minister tell me what steps are being taken at this time to implement the findings of the royal commission?

Mr. Chevrier: I have already indicated that the government have established a committee to deal with amendments to the Railway Act. It has not been found possible to submit them to the cabinet, but I hope it will be possible to do so. I hope it will be possible to implement these recommendations by legislation at this session.

Mr. Knowles: There is a matter that I wish to take up under this item as well, a matter that on many occasions we have taken up at this point in the estimates, and it seems to me that it is in order; but I was waiting until some of the other hon. members had their chance to speak on matters in which they were interested.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is unusual.

The Deputy Chairman: May I point out to the hon. member that I myself recall that matters such as freight rates, and other matters as well, were discussed fully on this item, but that was because when the matter was raised prior to the estimates coming before the committee the minister had said: "Well, there will be opportunities to discuss this matter when my estimates come before the house." And by general agreement it had been understood that it would be discussed let us say on the item concerning the board of transport commissioners; but I do not think any such agreement has been made at this time that we are to discuss for instance freight rates under this item. That is why I say that we cannot consider under this item anything which may be brought up before that board and be in order. I shall study the point, but that is the way I look at it now.

Mr. Knowles: The item is not just providing for salaries and wages. The item specifically says, "administration, operation and maintenance."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Is this a point of order, or what?

Mr. Knowles: Well—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well—

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, let me be quite frank. The question—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You want to talk; that is what you want to do.

Mr. Knowles: —relates to grade crossings.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have been talking all day.

Mr. Knowles: I could have discussed that earlier, but I was sitting in my seat—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Are you willing to sit until twelve o'clock?

[Mr. Balcom.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): He has a cold seat.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to say something about the subject of grade crossings.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is not new.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute; let us maintain our usual good humour.

Mr. Chevrier: Talk till eleven o'clock. Go ahead; you are doing fine.

Mr. Knowles: I could have made my statement on the first item, the one dealing with departmental administration, but I thought it was better to wait for the administration item of the board of transport commissioners, under whose jurisdiction this question comes, and it was under that item that we discussed it year in and year out. Therefore I submit it is in order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The chairman says you are wrong.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to speak on it under this item because without question it comes under the administration of the board of transport commissioners and is surely in order under the item headed "administration" of the board of transport commissioners.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member refers to the railway grade crossing fund, which is included in this item, and if he looks at the detail on page 504, he will see that what is directly relevant to this item when we come to the grade crossing fund is the contribution of $1 million. I do not suppose that he could then discuss that certain railway grade crossings should be built at certain places and not at other places—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You do not know the hon. member; he could.

Mr. Knowles: What was that?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot resist that. The Minister of Public Works said: "You do not know the hon. member; he could".

Mr. Knowles: All I can say to that is, "hear, hear". I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the item to which you have drawn my attention is a statutory item that we do not discuss at all. We are not permitted to discuss it. The item is put in for our information, but part of the information that it gives us is that the administration of the grade crossing fund is one of the items administered by the board of transport commissioners. I would gladly argue the case of the hon. member for Colchester-Hants or the hon. member for Halifax or the hon.

member for Assiniboia, and I would certainly argue my own case. I suggest, sir, that you look up the record of the previous sessions and I think you will find that we have had these discussions on this item year in and year out. But I see it is eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: It looks as if we might be right on a half and half basis. We shall have to consider the matter.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue the debate on—

Some hon. Members: Tomorrow?

Mr. Knowles: The minister and I will be here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not miss you for a lot. On Monday we will continue the debate on the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on the motion to go into supply. When we reach the committee of supply stage we will call four departments as announced when the motion was moved, and also an item of external affairs, because so many members wish to have these estimates referred to the standing committee on external affairs. Then we will proceed with the two resolutions in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) concerning Laurier house and Kingsmere park. I understand these are not contentious. Then we will take up Bills Nos. 191 and 192.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if that means that five departments will be called when we go into committee of supply?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Right.

Mr. Fulton: Is that not rather a lot?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought the hon. gentleman would raise that question.

Mr. Fulton: Why did you not deal with it before, then?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Since the opening of the session on January 30 I have tried, I do not know how many times, to get into supply, but I was successful once on March 12. Ever since then many hon. members have had important questions to discuss, and I have only four departments in, one of which is nearly completed. We expect next week to bring on national defence. Agriculture—I tried to have that, but I did not succeed. Bringing in five departments makes no difference. We cannot go into supply on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday without putting a formal motion at which time any hon. member may stand in his place and air his grievances. So it does not change the procedure.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have no thought of saying anything that will in any way change the pleasant mood in which the Minister of Public Works again finds himself. But I would not wish to leave the impression on Hansard that the reason for more departments not being called at this time is through any failure on the part of members on this side of the house to wish to proceed with the business of the house.

My own opinion is the time has now come for members of the house to face the fact that the business of the house could be handled much more expeditiously than it is if it were done on a more orderly basis, with knowledge in advance as to what we are going to discuss, and with some opportunity, with preparation in advance, to meet the subject we wish to discuss.

That suggestion has been made before, and I am sure many of these debates are unnecessarily lengthened by the fact that they are brought up unexpectedly and then, in the very nature of things, ideas keep occurring and new debates are precipitated through the injection of new considerations. I think that without prolonging the discussion at this time I should very properly say that if the need has now arrived for calling more departments than is customary, it is only because the business of the house is not better organized. When I say that I am not being critical directly of the Minister of Public Works, who directs the affairs of the house, but rather of the fact that we have not thus clearly defined the plans and procedure which make the business at Westminster proceed much more smoothly than it does here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Generally I like to see the leader of the opposition have the last word, but this evening I think I should have it. If I said or implied that the opposition was not doing a good job, then I must apologize immediately. On the other hand I would not want the leader of the opposition to leave the impression in the house or in the country that the government is not doing a good job, too.

We try to announce in advance the work we have ahead of us. If ever the hon. member is seated on this side he will understand the difficulty we have in trying to please the opposition. It is very, very difficult to tell them in advance what we are going to do, because there are not three members on the other side of the house who would agree with us. We have to do the best we can and hope that some time before fall we might complete our work.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

493. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals —to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1951-52 to the Canadian National Railways company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1951, $1,280,000.

495. Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited—to provide for the payment from time to time to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited (hereinafter called "the company") of the amount of the deficit occurring during the year ending December 31, 1951, in the operations of the company and the vessels under the control of the company, as certified by the auditors of the company, and upon applications made by the company to the Minister of Finance and approved by the Minister of Transport, not exceeding $845,000.

501. Maritime Freight Rates Act—for the payment to the railway companies operating in the select territory designated by the act, during the fiscal year 1951-52, of the difference occurring on account of the application of the act, between the tariff tolls and normal tolls under approved tariffs (estimated and certified to the Minister of Transport by the Canadian National Railway Company and approved by auditors of the said company respecting the eastern lines of the Canadian National Railways, and in the case of the other railways by the board of transport commissioners for Canada) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1951 (chap. 19, statutes of 1927, as amended), $9,125,000.

503. Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1951, to March 31, 1952, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $14,250.

Air services—telecommunications division —

Airways and airports—radio aviation services—

504. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,707,545.

505. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $1,499,200.

Radio Act and Regulations—

506. Administration, operation and maintenance, including contributions as Canada's share of the administrative costs of various international radio, telegraph and telephone conferences, as detailed in the estimates, $898,836.

507. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $52,850.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 30, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT TO TORONTO BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I am sure that you and the house will willingly grant to me. You may have noticed that there were a few members absent from this chamber last Friday. The reason for their places being vacant was that the board of trade of the city of Toronto extended an invitation to the entire membership of the House of Commons to be their guests for three days this last week end.

Something over 130 members and their wives, amounting in all to a party of over 200 people, accepted that invitation. This visit to Toronto was one of the best good will trips which it has ever been our privilege to be associated with. It was handled from start to finish in a magnificent manner. On behalf of the members of the House of Commons who made this trip I want immediately to express our warmest appreciation to the board of trade for the arrangements made and the manner in which they were carried out. We spent three full days there, and every moment there was something planned for our enjoyment or something of interest for us to see.

While one would not wish to single out individuals, I do think that special reference should be made to Mr. Gerald Godsoe, president of the board of trade, and Mr. F. D. Tolchard its manager, who were mostly responsible for the arrangements. They were with us continuously, and did everything they could to make our visit both profitable and enjoyable. I think I should also mention the courtesy of the individual members of the board of trade in inviting members to their homes last evening. We from distant places are also indebted to the members of the House of Commons from Toronto who assisted in every way, thus adding to the pleasure of our trip, particularly in meeting their friends.

I think a special reference should be made to the Toronto transportation commission, which placed their buses at our service in the numerous trips we made throughout the city, as well as the Toronto police commission, who saw to it that no one got lost or went astray.

We acknowledge as well the courtesies extended to us by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, the premier and government of Ontario, the mayor and city council of Toronto, the Massey-Harris Company, Canada Packers Limited, A. V. Roe Canada Limited, the Toronto harbour commission, the management of Hart House, the staff of Sunnybrook hospital, and the Maple Leaf Gardens.

Of special interest to the ladies in the party, visits were arranged to the Toronto art gallery, the Sick Children's hospital, Sunnybrook hospital, and the Royal Ontario museum.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, you will appreciate knowing that the programs handed to us on our arrival were printed in both French and English.

This brief acknowledgment does not permit one to say all that should be said. There are, however, two items of sufficient general interest which might properly be mentioned. One is the Regent park housing development, and the other the Toronto rapid transit system. When some of us visited Toronto three years ago these developments were being talked about and planned. Today they are both well under way. The Regent park housing development is one of the first joint undertakings looking towards the removal of slum dwellings and replacing them by fully modern low rental housing units. The rapid transit underground development is the first of its kind to be attempted in the Dominion of Canada, and reflects great credit to the people of Toronto for their faith and foresight in looking to the future.

The city of Toronto, Mr. Speaker, "sold" Toronto to the membership of the House of Commons in a magnificent manner, and in so doing has given the people of other parts of Canada, from the Yukon and Mackenzie territories to our baby sister province of Newfoundland, an opportunity of seeing something of the problems of a large and growing industrial city, and how it attacks them. Toronto has of course long been recognized as the leading industrial and financial centre of Canada, with connections all over the country and in many places outside of Canada. It is recognized as well as the educational and cultural centre, at least for the English-speaking portion of our population. It has kept itself well to the forefront through its two annual exhibitions, its international trade fair, and the numerous conventions which have selected Toronto as their meeting place. It is also recognized as having a very good hockey team, and, as we from Manitoba have found out, an equally good rugby team.

It is just about one year ago, Mr. Speaker, that a large part of the province of Manitoba, including the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, suffered one of the most serious disasters in property destruction that has ever happened in Canada, through the flooding of the Red river. The generous response in material and financial aid from all over Canada, and from many places outside of Canada, was immediate, magnificent and generous. Among those first to offer aid in a very practical and generous manner was the city of Toronto, and as a Manitoban I want to add this as a further word of appreciation.

This acknowledgment is inadequate and far from being complete. We profited by every moment spent in Toronto, and, what is more important, we met and made a lot of new friends.

The board of trade of Toronto and all those associated with our visit are to be complimented, both for promoting the idea in the first place, and, even more so, for the manner in which it was carried out. On behalf of the members of the House of Commons and their ladies who made the trip we say: Thank you, Toronto board of trade.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

Second report of special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 79, respecting Indians.—Mr. Brown (Essex West).

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the resignation of Ralph Maybank, Esquire, as member for the electoral district of Winnipeg South Centre. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

HOCKEY

WINNING OF EASTERN CANADA JUNIOR CHAMPIONSHIP BY BARRIE FLYERS

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege, I do not think that the occasion of the visit of the members of the House of Commons and their wives to Toronto should go by without bringing to the attention of the house the fact that one of the highlights of their visit was one of the greatest hockey spectacles that has ever been provided for the public in the great arena in Toronto. I refer to that outstanding team, the Barrie Flyers. The Barrie Flyers come from my constituency, and I am sure that all who saw the game will agree that they put on a hockey spectacle second to none, and that the young men who made it possible for us to enjoy the game and who won the championship for this part of Canada deserve a great deal of credit. The coach and sponsor of the team and the town from which it comes should be exceedingly proud.

BANK LOANS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Have further statements been issued, or directives sent out since February 22, 1951, to chartered banks regarding the need for restraint in lending activity?

2. If so, on what date or dates, what are the particulars, and what are the suggested measures to be taken by the chartered banks?

3. What was the total amount of bank loans on the security of instalment finance paper (a) on February 22, 1951; (b) at this date?

4. What was the amount of the chartered banks total loans, on each of the above dates?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The monthly return of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks of Canada to the Minister of Finance does not provide for details of the current loans in Canada. Section 115 of the Bank Act requires the banks to transmit once in each year to the minister a return of the aggregate amount of all loans made in Canada outstanding at a date specified by treasury board, classified according to industries and businesses, and the treasury board may make such regulations as may be deemed necessary to give effect to the provisions of section 115. On September 30, 1950, the date of the latest return, loans to instalment finance companies aggregated $96·5 million.

4. The two latest monthly returns of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks show the following:

	February 28 1951	March 31 1951
Current loans and discounts in Canada, not otherwise included, estimated loss provided for	$2,735·5	$2,855·7
Current loans and discounts elsewhere than in Canada, not otherwise included, estimated loss provided for	256·2	252·3
Call and short (not exceeding thirty days) loans in Canada on stocks, debentures, bonds and other securities of a sufficient marketable value to cover	108·9	94·3
Ditto—elsewhere than in Canada	113·7	96·4
Loans to provincial governments	35·6	29·4
Loans to cities, towns, municipalities and school districts	100·8	122·8
Non-current loans, estimated loss provided for	1·3	1·3
	$3,352·0	$3,452·2

UNITED NATIONS ASSOCIATION IN CANADA

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Who are the officers of the United Nations society in Canada?

2. When was this society founded, and by whom?

3. Does this society receive a grant from the government?

4. If so, from what department?

5. What is the annual amount, and for what reason?

Mr. Pearson:

1. The United Nations association in Canada has a national office in Ottawa and, on January 1, 1951, had twenty-two branches from coast to coast. The patron of the association is His Excellency the Governor-General, the Viscount Alexander of Tunis. The following are the national officers of the association:

National president, Vincent Price, K.C.; vice presidents, Brigadier Marcel Noel, C.B.E.; Dr. N. A. M. MacKenzie; George S. Mooney; honorary treasurer, J. Stanley McLean; chairman of the administrative committee, Major General E. L. M. Burns; national secretary, Miss Kathleen E. Bowlby.

2. The United Nations association in Canada was founded in March 1946, as the United Nations society in Canada by: Mr. F. McRae, Senator Cairine Wilson, Judge J. D. Hyndman, Mr. J. A. MacIsaac, Dr. John E. Robbins, Mr. Eric W. Morse, and Mr. Vincent Price. It changed its name in 1947 to the United Nations association of Canada. This association is, in a sense, a continuation of the old league of nations society.

3. Yes.

4. From the Department of External Affairs.

5. The present annual amount granted to the United Nations association in Canada is $10,000. The association was granted $3,000 in 1947; this was raised to $5,000 in 1948, and to $10,000 in 1950. The last increase was recommended by the external affairs committee of the House of Commons in December 1949, and was authorized by the House of Commons as provided under vote 72, main estimates, 1950-51.

The grant is given to assist the association to stimulate interest in Canada in the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and to spread information in Canada on current issues before the United Nations.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What has been the total expenditure made on the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project, month by month, since the 1st of September, 1950, and to date?

Mr. Gardiner:

September	$ 44,774.20
October	53,423.87
November	48,345.93
December	44,958.68

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHILDREN OF PENSIONED WIDOWS, BURIAL GRANTS, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Pension Act to make more adequate provision for children whose mothers are pensioned as widows; to increase the payment in respect of burial grants; to advance the marriage dateline for world war I pensioners and to eliminate the said dateline in certain cases; to provide also for the removal of the means test where the children of a pensioner are continuing their education beyond the statutory age limit; and to provide further for the salaries of the pension commissioners and for certain other administrative purposes with a view to enlarging the scope of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCES TO COMPENSATION BOARDS, ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, to provide authority to make accountable advances to provincial workmen's compensation boards on account of expenses incurred by such boards in the investigation and adjudication of claims undertaken by arrangement with the federal government; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the latest letter from Premier Duplessis with respect to the old age pension question, in which he agrees to the constitutional amendment respecting old age pensions, but suggests that the one concerning the sales tax be dealt with later, if at all, is there any reason why the constitutional amendment respecting old age pensions cannot be proceeded with immediately?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The address with respect to the amendment concerning old age pensions is intended to be introduced separately, without waiting for the amendment on the other matter. I understand the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was in telephonic communication with Mr. Duplessis today, and with Mr. Frost on Saturday, and that not a minute is being lost in endeavouring to get joint agreement on the final text to be included in the address.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

RETIREMENT OF COMMISSIONER WOOD AND APPOINTMENT OF L. H. NICHOLSON AS COMMISSIONER—ENLARGEMENT OF DIRECTORATE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement of certain important changes in the high command of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Commissioner S. T. Wood, C.M.G., has requested his retirement to pension, and will be succeeded by Assistant Commissioner L. H. Nicholson, M.B.E.

Due to the expansion of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, it has been decided to enlarge the directorate of the administration and organization of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police headquarters in Ottawa. The officer selected to fill this important position is Assistant Commissioner Josaphat Brunet, at present the officer commanding "C" Division, R.C.M. Police, Montreal.

The enlarged directorate will deal with the organization of the force and its distribution in the provinces, particularly with the eight provinces with which the dominion government now has agreements. It will also direct the training, apportion strength to meet the ever-changing needs, superintend the organization of staff and similar related matters, apart from actual criminal investigation. Assistant Commissioner Brunet will be replaced in Montreal by Superintendent Noel Courtois, who is at present serving at Edmonton.

Other related changes will be as follows: Superintendent M. F. E. Anthony, the present officer commanding at Toronto, has been selected as the new director of criminal investigation at the Royal Canadian Mounted Police headquarters, and Superintendent J. Howe of Halifax is being transferred to take Superintendent Anthony's place.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express the deep appreciation of the government of Canada for the magnificent service which retiring Commissioner S. T. Wood has rendered to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and to his country in the work which he has done while a member of this famous organization. He was practically born in the force. His father was Assistant Commissioner Zachary Taylor Wood. A graduate of Royal Military College, Commissioner Wood was appointed an inspector on November 1, 1912, and will complete exactly thirty-eight and a half years' service tomorrow.

Commissioner Wood has a wide and varied experience in the force. He was overseas with the R.C.M. Police squadron in the first world war; he has seen service in all parts of the dominion, including five years in the Canadian Arctic. Indeed, his case is a shining example of the fact that the high ranking officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police put in their full share of service in the difficult positions.

Commissioner Wood served five years continuously in the Canadian Arctic with headquarters at Herschel island in the Arctic ocean north of Aklavik, taking his wife with his first-born son as a baby in with him. This son, Donald, later gave his life in the service of his country, being killed in action in the Royal Canadian Air Force in 1944 in Europe. The commissioner's second son, Herschel, was born just after they came out of the Arctic and was named after the island on which they had spent five happy and busy years. I have had the great pleasure of conversing with the commissioner about his experiences in the Arctic. I asked him if he were lonely there, and he said that on the contrary they were five of the most pleasant years of his life, and that far from being lonely he was very active and found himself with scarcely enough time to keep up with the arduous duties of a Royal Canadian Mounted Police representative in the Arctic. On occasion his duties involved taking patrols via dog team in which he would travel with Eskimo guides a distance of as much as 1,000 miles over a period of five to six weeks, sleeping in igloos built by himself and members of his party.

Commissioner Wood's second son, Herschel, was a member of the force when he recently met his death as the result of a motor accident. Commissioner Wood's third son, John, is now a member of the force.

Commissioner Wood had the advantage of studies of police methods in Scotland Yard, France, Belgium and the United States, and has occupied such important positions as director of criminal investigation and deputy commissioner before he became commissioner. In 1937 he had charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachment which was sent from Canada to the coronation of King George VI.

The period since March 6, 1938, that he has been commissioner has been one during which the duties of the force have been unusually arduous. The fact that Commissioner Wood had had first-hand experience in practically every province of Canada, and had had excellent police training, stood him in good stead during his thirteen years of the commissionership.

It is of interest that Commissioner Wood's great-great-grandfather was Zachary Taylor, the twelfth president of the United States. Before he became president, General Taylor, nicknamed "Old Rough and Ready", was famous as an Indian fighter and commander of the army of the Rio Grande. In this latter capacity he brought to an end the war in northern Mexico by an important victory over the Mexican General Santa Anna at the battle of Buena Vista. His victory on this occasion when his forces were outnumbered four to one by those of the enemy was so brilliant as to point to him as a candidate for the presidency of the United States, and he was elected to that great office at the next presidential election. He was president when he died in 1850. The American general and president will rest easily in his grave in view of the career, in one of the famous police forces of the world, of his distinguished descendant, Commissioner Wood.

Since I assumed the duties of my portfolio in November, 1948, it has been a privilege to have Mr. Wood associated with me in his capacity of commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. His work has been of immeasurable assistance, and I am glad to take this occasion of paying my personal tribute. Finally, in expressing appreciation of Commissioner Wood's service to Canada, I know that I speak not only for the government but for every member of this house and for the people of Canada.

A few facts with regard to the new commissioner will, I am sure, be of interest. Mr. L. H. Nicholson, M.B.E., was born in Mount Middleton, New Brunswick, in 1904. He was a constable in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in his native province from 1923 to 1926, inspector in the New Brunswick provincial police from 1928 to 1930, and inspector in the Nova Scotia provincial police from 1930 to 1932. When the Nova Scotia provincial police force was absorbed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on April 1, 1932, Mr. Nicholson was granted a commission as inspector in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which he has held to date. He was promoted to superintendent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in 1940, assistant commissioner in 1946, and is now the senior assistant commissioner in the force. During the period from 1941 to 1946 Mr. Nicholson was on leave of absence with the Canadian army overseas, rising to the rank of colonel. He saw active service and was awarded the M.B.E. From 1932 to 1937 Mr. Nicholson was in charge of the criminal investigation branch in Nova Scotia, and from 1938 to 1941 he was in charge of the same branch in Saskatchewan. From 1946 until the present time he has been director of the criminal investigation branch, with headquarters at Ottawa.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that every member of this house fully subscribes to the statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that he felt he could safely speak for all of them in expressing to Commissioner Wood our admiration of the great service he has done to Canada, and in extending our congratulations and best wishes to the new commissioner who will take his place.

The office of commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is one of the most important appointments at the disposition of the government. It is significant that the commissioner who succeeds Commissioner Wood served for some years in the criminal investigation branch; that seems to be the line of succession to this extremely important office.

I am sure that all hon. members will agree that Canadians have every reason to be proud of the uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Outside of Canada as well as in this country itself I doubt if there is anything that is more significant, both as an expression of something distinctly Canadian and as an expression of the respect in which we all hold those who are charged with the enforcement of law in this country.

As the Minister of Justice has said, Commissioner Wood comes from a family in which service of this nature was a tradition.

It perhaps is significant that Commissioner Wood received a considerable part of his training in the province of Saskatchewan, as has the new commissioner; and that is appropriate, because there is undoubtedly no single province in Canada more intimately associated with the history and tradition of this great force than Saskatchewan. There is in Battleford a museum which carries forward for the years ahead the great traditions and history of that force while it was such a steadying influence in the more primitive days of this country.

In paying our respects to Commissioner Wood for his splendid service in maintaining the efficiency of that force on such a plane as to call for the respect of all Canadians, we also extend to him and to Mrs. Wood our sincere wish that they may enjoy for many long years the retirement which he will now enter. I think it appropriate also that we extend our good wishes to a young member of that family, John Wood, who carries forward this great family tradition.

Commissioner Nicholson takes over an important post. He will occupy an office that will play a large part in the affairs of this country in the years to come. I believe there are a number of things about which Canadians have some reason to boast. I believe we have a right to claim that there is no police force in the world today which commands or justifies greater respect than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. To Commissioner Wood our thanks go for what he has done to maintain its high standard; to Commissioner Nicholson our best wishes go for success in his new responsibility, and, in relation to the force in its expanded form as announced by the Minister of Justice today, for a continuance of the respect and confidence of the people of Canada.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we should like to join in the unusual but fitting tributes that have been paid by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to one who has been an outstanding public servant in this country. Those of us who have known the mounted police in our own provinces—and I refer particularly now to Saskatchewan—know the splendid service which, as the Royal North West Mounted Police, they rendered in the early days, and how that tradition has been carried on up to the present. In the contacts which some of us had from time to time with Commissioner Wood and his officers, we have been received with unfailing courtesy, and to the people of Canada in many respects they have given excellent service. We join in the tribute to Commissioner Wood, and in best wishes for enjoyment of his period of retirement.

We hope and believe that the traditions established by the Royal North West Mounted Police years ago will be carried forward in the days to come. It is significant that eight out of the ten provinces of Canada have decided to place the policing of their respective provinces under this famous police organization, which not only enforces law and order, but as many of us have good reason to know, has acted to relieve distress in cases of emergency, and often, in the early days, in helping stranded and weary travellers along the difficult trails in the Canadian west.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we should like to be associated with the tributes which have been paid to Mr. Wood, and to say that we too have sincerely appreciated the efforts of this fine, outstanding public servant. Under Commissioner Wood's wise and able leadership the Royal Canadian Mounted Police continued to advance under a tradition that has been high throughout the whole world, and that has been the aspiration of a great many people. I join with others in expressing the hope that Commissioner and Mrs. Wood will have many years yet of happy, enjoyable living.

May I also express the hope that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the government generally will try to carry on the improvements which Commissioner Wood attempted to make in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to better the conditions for the men in order to be able to attract into the force men of the highest calibre. That work was ably supported in this house, at least of late years, by the former minister of justice, Mr. Ilsley. I am expressing the hope that nothing will impede the progress of the force; that the government and the house will give to the new commissioner, Mr. Nicholson, every assistance in maintaining the high traditions of the force, and in particular, will help him to build up in this country the special investigation branch, which is more important than ever before in safeguarding the interests of the Canadian people in the face of constant threats of communist agitators and others who might want to cause trouble.

I wish to express my own personal appreciation of the fine way in which Commissioner Wood has always co-operated with us in any efforts we have made to improve the administration of justice throughout the world, and also to express the wish that the incoming commissioner, Mr. Nicholson, will receive every support from the people of Canada in carrying out his arduous duties.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as a private member I wish to join in the tribute that has been paid by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and by the leaders of the various groups on the other side of the house, to the work of Commissioner S. T. Wood, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In my dealings as a member of parliament with Commissioner Wood I have never failed to appreciate his high sense of duty, his patriotism and his tact, and his knowledge of men, which was most helpful to him. He understood that the duty of members of parliament is to co-operate to the fullest possible extent with the commissioner of the mounted police in order to see that no abuse creeps into the dealings of the police with Canadian citizens throughout the country. Commissioner Wood has rendered countless services to the Canadian people in general, and many to my constituents in particular. I should be remiss in my duty if today I failed to rise, as I do, to pay my personal tribute to him on behalf of my constituents.

There is another thing, Mr. Speaker, that Commissioner Wood understood, namely, that men are not infallible. A great many people in the civil service and outside of it would never admit that anyone working under them could make an error or a mistake; everybody is supposedly infallible. They go so far as to give the impression that when a man admits an error or a mistake on the part of himself or of his subordinates, he falls in the esteem of his fellow citizens. Such is not the case. Commissioner Wood, on many occasions, personally redressed wrongs for which he was not personally responsible but for which some of his men were. He did that discreetly. He did not want anyone in this country to suffer any injustice at the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He understood that it was essential for the force to keep the respect of the Canadian people as a whole, and that such respect was in danger of being destroyed should any injustice be committed by any man in the mounted police force.

There was one thing that Commissioner Wood could not support, namely, the practice of a constable telling a person against whom a charge had been laid: You are accused of such and such a thing, plead guilty; do not see any lawyer. You will keep your job. You will be sentenced to a small fine and you will be much better off than if you go to a lawyer who will argue your case. Commissioner Wood understood that such a procedure is contrary to the elementary principles of British justice, and that everyone in Canada has the right to defend himself before the courts when a charge is laid against him. This is one more reason why I rise today to pay tribute to the natural legal sense, the fairness, and the spirit of justice of Commissioner Wood. I hope that his successor will follow in his footsteps and will be worthy of the great tradition of the force.

ANTI-ESPIONAGE BRANCH—PROGRESS OF RECRUITING CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Arising out of the discussion with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there are two questions that I should like to ask the minister. First, under the new arrangement for an enlarged directorate, will one of the assistant commissioners be in charge of the branch on anti-espionage? Second, in regard to the recruiting campaign taking place across the country for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, how is the campaign turning out? Are you getting the necessary recruits, and of the proper standard?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Answering my hon. friend's second question first, the recruiting campaign is getting along very well indeed. The results are most gratifying, and that I think has been due in part to the change in the basis of payment of the members of the force that was recently authorized by the government.

With regard to the first question, I should like to take it as a notice and give an answer later.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

NEWSPRINT INDUSTRY—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT CONTROL ON POWER OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question which was asked of me on Wednesday last by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He asked whether the placing of newsprint under government control, as announced by the Department of Defence Production, would affect in any way the right of the combines investigation commissioner to inquire into that industry if he wishes to do so. The hon. member was referring to the fact that wood pulp and newsprint had been designated as essential materials under the Defence Production Act. I took the question as notice, and this is the first opportunity I have had to reply.

Section 12 of the Combines Investigation Act provides in part that the commissioner may conduct an inquiry whenever he has reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed. Reading the words "if he wishes to do so" in the question, in the sense of "if he has reason to do so under the Combines Investigation Act", the answer to the hon. member's question is no.

FIRES

PETAWAWA CAMP—USE OF FIRE-RESISTING PAINT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Owing to the fire at Petawawa ordnance the other day, which makes three fires in the last few months in defence stores and one thing and another, will the minister say whether anything is being done to prevent these fires? So far there has been a loss of over $300,000.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's information about the size of the last of these three fires is not accurate at all.

Mr. Fraser: Well, then, the newspapers must be wrong.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Claxton: Unfortunately we do have fire losses in the armed forces because we have a very large amount of property across Canada which is in various states of repair, and many of the operations carried on constitute additional hazards. To keep down fire losses we have fighting services, excellent equipment, fire prevention campaigns and inspection by fire marshals. We know of no additional way in which more can be done to prevent fires.

With regard to the suggestion made some time ago by the hon. member that we use fire-resisting paint, which he may have had in mind, that of course has been looked into. We have estimated that we have 146 million square feet of buildings to cover, and it would cost $30 million to cover them with fire-resisting paint. We estimate that the balance of advantage would be not to use fire-resisting paint on existing buildings until we had fire losses in excess of $7 million a year.

Mr. Fraser: Could you not put it on new buildings?

Mr. Claxton: That is done wherever it is considered desirable, but the advantages of that paint are often not nearly as great as are claimed for it.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

COST OF LIVING—AMENDMENT, MR. DREW

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): When this debate was initiated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on April 9, there was much shrugging of shoulders over on the government side, especially among the members of the cabinet. Apparently they thought that the motion was untimely; that it was a little bit unfair that a motion such as this should be introduced in the house just prior to the bringing down of the budget, which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had announced would be brought down on the following day, and which the members of the government had indicated was going to take care of some of the inflation which is abroad in the country. But when we read the budget, when we look over what the budget actually does, I ask hon. members if there is anything in it which will immediately effect a reduction in the present cost of living.

It is indicated at least by papers who are favourable to the government that that is not their opinion, because I see in the April 25 issue of the Regina Leader-Post a large headline which says: "Cost of living index likely to hit the 183 mark." When we are talking about this rise in the cost of living, and about points, you and I, Mr. Speaker, often fail to realize just what it means to the average person in this country.

The other day the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) placed certain figures on Hansard, indicating that in 1935-39 the cost of living index basket was worth $1,453; that is, the articles contained in that basket, purchased at that time, cost $1,453 a year. Since then we have had a rise in the cost of living of 80 points. That means that today we are paying $1,160 more for that same basket of goods than we were paying in 1935-39. That same basket of goods is costing us today $2,613. It may not mean so very much to members of this house who have a salary of $6,000 a year plus anything else we may have coming in; but I am telling you that it means a lot to the man or woman on an old age pension who can have an income of only $1,080. It means a lot to the veteran who is on a fixed pension; it means a lot to retired civil servants who are on fixed pensions.

As I said, there is nothing in the budget which would indicate that the cost of living index is not going to continue to rise. As a matter of fact I think I am quite conservative when I predict that the budget itself will cause a further rise of at least two points in the cost of living index, and when that is written into the price, the cost of living index in all probability will reach the all-time high of 185 points as compared with the 1935-39 average of 100.

Of course we would be in a terrible position had our income not risen to a certain extent during that same period of years. But the rise in income has been more than offset by the rising cost of living. When he was speaking to this motion on April 9, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) placed certain figures on Hansard. It is not my intention to repeat all of those figures, but on page 1739 he indicated that in 1946 the per capita income in Canada was $786. Now, when the cost of living index figure for that year, 126, was taken into account, it reduced that income in terms of 1935-39 purchasing power to $636.

In 1947 our per capita income had increased to $822, but our effective purchasing income had again been reduced to $607. In 1948 our per capita income was $919, but our effective purchasing income was $593. In 1949 our per capita income was $935; effective purchasing income, $578. In 1950 the per capita income was $962; the effective purchasing income, based on the cost of living index, was only $535. In other words, during those years our per capita income had increased by $176, but our effective purchasing income had been reduced by $101. These are startling figures. Just think; in that period of time, five years, effective purchasing income had been reduced, so far as the average citizen in this country was concerned, by $101.

What are we trying to do to offset the reduced purchasing power of our people? What is the result to those who are raising families and who have to go out and buy boots and shoes and the food, milk and other products they must have in order to raise a healthy family? They are entitled to a decent standard of living, but the result of the present high prices is that we produce much today that they are unable to purchase.

As I said before, it is all right for those in the larger income groups. It is all right for private members on the government side to shrug their shoulders and indicate that there is not much occasion for alarm in the rising cost of living. Certainly there is not much for them to be alarmed about personally. There is not much for the person who has invested in stocks and bonds to be alarmed about when he finds that they have increased in value. There is not much for the man in business to be alarmed about when he finds that his business has increased in value. There is not much for a man with a good farm to be alarmed about when it has increased in value. But it is a different proposition for fifty per cent of the people of this country who are not even in the income tax paying group. They are the people who are vitally affected by this increased cost of living.

It is time that the private members in all parts of this house got up and said something on behalf of those people whose standard of living has been so radically reduced. It is time that something was done about it.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has indicated that he hopes to proceed with legislation with respect to old age pensions. I am glad it is the intention of the government to proceed with that legislation. However, I would point out that seventy-three per cent of those who are in receipt of old age pensions today are getting the maximum pension and will not get one cent extra by this legislation. Seventy-three per cent of those on old age pensions will be in exactly the same position as they were before. It is not going to help them, and they are the people who should be helped. It is all right to give $40 per month to everybody, but when we do that we should also be protecting those people whose maximum income is $40 a month. They are the people who are affected by this rising cost of living. It is the people on war veterans allowances and other fixed pensions who are affected. We cannot just shrug them off in this house, because there are too many of them. It is time we were doing something to protect people who need protection, who are not able to protect themselves because of their place in our economic set-up.

We all agree that the only way you can beat the rising cost of living is by increased productivity. What is this rising cost of living doing to the production of goods? I submit that in many cases it is reducing productivity. Take the case of the stock raiser. I know of many farmers who, having reached a certain age, decided to go out of production. They had dispersal sales, but not many young men attended those sales to buy stock. Why? The cost of production is so high that they just do not think it is good business to start a herd of cattle when it costs from $250 to $350 to purchase a breeding animal. The result is that many herds are being disposed of and no new herds are being set up to take their place.

Production is dropping. The same thing is happening in the dairying industry. In 1949 there was a reduction of sixteen per cent in the production of butter in Canada. The government are making plans to import butter next year because we are not going to produce enough for our own needs, in spite of our resources and ability to produce. This condition is brought about by rising costs of production.

Many farmers are saying, "What is the use?" A man decides that he will not build an addition to his barn, nor will he increase his herd at present prices because there is no guarantee for the future. As a result we have a falling rate of production all through our economy today. In many cases this inflationary spiral is reducing production. Normally when prices go up people tend to produce more, but when we reach the point we have reached today, where the increased cost of production is so high, when there is no guarantee for the future, we find production being decreased rather than increased.

This applies as much to labour as it does to the farming population. We find escalator clauses in many of the labour contracts today to enable the worker to meet the increased cost of living. That has an inflationary effect. With a rising cost of living we are bound to have labour trouble. The average labouring man has to pay $1,160 more today for the basic articles included in the cost of living index than he paid in 1935-39, at which time the cost was $1,453. Every point rise in the cost of living means that it costs $14.53 more to buy the same amount of goods. The result will be greater demands for higher wages. We are just in a spiral. It is a case of the dog chasing its tail. Apparently the government are not prepared to step in and make the necessary adjustments or impose the necessary controls to stop this spiral.

I do not know how far they intend to let it go. Will they step in when the cost of living reaches 185? Will they step in when it reaches 200? Nobody knows what the intention of the government is. The result is that many people selling goods today are out to get the most that they can. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) recognized that in the speech he made in the early part of this session, when he said that there was a tendency to get prices up before controls were put into effect.

In my opinion the government should do what was done in Great Britain during the last war; they should have assisted in the production of a line of utility goods. I have seen some of the utility goods produced in Great Britain during the last war—clothing, boots, shoes, furniture and other articles. They were good, sound, reliable goods. They had some value. Today when the head of a family goes out to purchase shoes for his children, unless he is prepared to pay the highest price he will get a shoddy article. The first time the child goes out to play in the mud and water it will be found that the shoes are just paper. There is no substantial material in them at all. If the government were to develop certain utility lines of goods in this country of good quality and would provide that such goods would be exempted from sales or excise taxes, or if these particular lines of goods were subsidized, then at least the people in the lower income groups, those who are not paying income tax, would be able to clothe their families properly and send their children to school.

What is happening to the average man today with a family of four of five children? Even if he is getting $3,000 a year do you think he has an opportunity to give his children a high school education or anything more than that? It simply cannot be done. What is happening in large families today is that the children are having to take a job just as quickly as they can. As soon as they leave public school they have to find a job in order to help support the rest of the family. I do not think that is good enough in this country. I do not think it is necessary. I think that we can afford to give at least a high school education to the children of Canada, and that is more than the average family can do with the present cost of living. I think that action should be taken immediately in this matter.

Another point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) had to do with the question of monopoly control and its effect on the cost of living. If I understood the announcement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) correctly, it was to the effect that even though certain monopolies might be under controls with respect to the sale of their basic materials, they could still be investigated under the Combines Investigation Act. Maybe they can be investigated but I will guarantee that action will never be taken against any of them as long as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) occupies his present position. He made that quite clear in 1946. We have a Combines Investigation Act, but up to date not one major combine has ever been investigated under the act. Certain smaller industries have been investigated. We investigated some of the bakers in western Canada, but when it came to investigating the milling industry that was a different story. They were a little too big, and we did not investigate them.

We investigated the flat glass industry. I ask you: How much do you or I spend on window glass in a lifetime? It is not very much out of our total income. We in western Canada spend a lot more on oil and gas for the operation of our farms but we have never heard of the oil industry being investigated, let alone any action being taken against it. Nevertheless every time there is an increase in the price of gasoline in Canada the increase is right across the board. It does not matter whether you purchase your gas from B.A., Imperial or some other oil company. You will find that the increase is the same right across the board for every company in the different areas into which they have divided Canada.

Mr. Murphy: Is that unusual?

Mr. Wright: I do not know how they get the word around, but it all happens on the same day at the same hour. That is how the increases take place. There has never been one major industry in this country investigated by the government. I have made that statement on more than one platform and I am making it in this house today. Not one major industry will be investigated. The tobacco industry has never been investigated. The other day the minister brought down the budget and increased the tax on cigarettes by 3 cents. Nevertheless people have to pay 4 cents more, 25 per cent more than the increase in the budget. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was presented with the facts he said: I have nothing to do with it. That is the companies' business. We cannot interfere with their business.

Why have we got the Combines Investigation Act if we cannot interfere with some of these things in order to find out whether there is any reason at all for such advances? Certainly it is up to the government to see that the people as a whole get a fair deal. They should see to it that when they impose an excise tax or some other tax people will not have to pay not only the tax but an additional 20 or 25 per cent to some industry which may exercise complete control over that particular industry. We had an investigation of the farm machinery industry before the war. It was proven that a combine existed not only by the investigation which a committee of this house made but also by the investigation made by a committee of the Saskatchewan legislature. It was not a C.C.F. committee either. It was the good Liberal government that was in power there at that time, and which carried on the investigation.

Mr. MacInnis: A Liberal government.

Mr. Wright: A Liberal government. In the report of the committee they indicated that in their opinion there was a combine. There was never any action taken under the Combines Investigation Act to investigate the industry, nor will there ever be any taken as long as we have this government in power at Ottawa. They will investigate the smaller companies whose actions only affect a small part of the total cost of the goods we have to buy. Until there is some control over the inflationary spiral, some control of companies that are taking advantage of the inflationary spiral, our cost of living will continue to rise.

What does this mean to the government? We have a program for the expansion of our armed forces on which we are going to spend $5 billion in the next three years. We are going to spend that $5 billion for goods and services at the inflationary level existing in Canada at this time. What will be the result of that? The result will simply be that we will spend from $2 to $3 to obtain the same amount of goods and services as we were able to get for one dollar in 1944 and 1945 when the war ended. For our $5 billion we will get less than $2,500 million based on the 1945 price index. It will cost us twice what it should cost us to rearm. Yet the government hesitates to pay subsidies to maintain price levels. In 1944 and 1945 it cost us approximately $200 million a year for subsidies. In the next three years it will cost the government $2,500 million more in what it is going to have to pay for goods and services in order to rearm. Surely we could spend a few hundred thousand dollars on subsidies in order to make a saving such as was made in the last war.

According to the then minister of finance, for every dollar we spent on subsidies we saved $12.50 for the people of Canada and for the government in the purchase of the necessities of life and the goods that we had to purchase to carry on the war.

Mr. Laing: Milk was only subsidized to the extent of 2 cents a quart then.

Mr. Wright: Two cents a quart to the consumer and 2 cents a quart to the producer. The producer received a subsidy as well as the consumer. There were two subsidies on milk.

Mr. Laing: It would cost a great deal more today to bring the price back to that level.

Mr. Wright: If we brought it back 4 cents it would be a big saving to a lot of people in this country. It would be the same saving of 4 cents as it was then although it would be on a higher base because the base has risen since 1945.

Mr. Laing: You would have to bring it back 9 cents.

Mr. Wright: I am not suggesting that we can roll back prices to 1945 levels. I am suggesting that it is time for us to step in and stop the inflationary spiral. I am saying there are ways in which it can be stopped. If we were to do today what we did during the last war, if we were to set the margin of mark up that could be made by manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers, we would catch a lot of these people who are all set, and who have boosted their prices so that they are in a position where they can continue to make an unjust profit if prices are fixed at their present levels. Those people who have unreasonably boosted their margin of profit would then have to roll back their own prices, without the government interfering in their business. That is just one method that could be used, fixing the margin of mark-up. Then by subsidies, such as we used in the last war, we could certainly reduce the cost of living and stop the inflationary spiral still going on in this country.

If we do not, I do not know what is going to happen. People are losing confidence. As I said before, they are not increasing their production; they do not know where they are going from here. We find there is not the same initiative as when people felt more secure. That was how we got increased production during the last war; make no mistake about it. People felt some security; they could see they were going to get reasonable prices for what they produced the following year, so they went into the production of those goods and services. That is why during 1944 we were able to export almost 1,000 million pounds of pork and pork products to Great Britain. Today we have nothing to export. We were able to do that because there was a set price; people knew they could go into production on those commodities, and that there would be a sale for them at reasonable prices. We had surpluses of feed in the country at that time, and that was one reason for our increased production. The same situation exists today; we have a surplus of feed in the country following the last crop in western Canada. On the basis of that surplus we could have increased production if people believed they had any security. But as long as we have the present inflationary spiral, as long as this government will take no responsibility, we are not going to get production in agriculture or in many other lines.

What will be the ultimate effect of this inflation? It will be exactly what Stalin likes to see happen. It is a great pleasure to him when in a country such as Canada we refuse to face up to facts, when we refuse to protect our people in the lower income groups, and get into these inflationary spirals. It is a great help to him when the cost of raw materials reaches the point that we cannot be efficient in our re-armament program, and when many nations not so well off as we are are unable to arm at all. They cannot pay for the raw materials, so we have to give them what they need. That is the sort of thing that helps communism. So I say if we are to protect our people, if we are to have an effective rearmament program, and if we are to meet the threat of communism in the world today, this government must do something about the present inflationary spiral.

Mr. Hetland: I wonder if the hon. member would let me ask one question. As a farmer I quite agree with his agricultural program, but how is he going to get the boys back on the farms with the higher wages and shorter hours in the cities?

Mr. Wright: Well, if the boy on the farm feels that he has some security he will stay on the farm. It is when he feels he has no security, when he cannot see what is going to happen tomorrow or next year, that he takes a job in the city. The farm becomes more attractive when there is some security. I can say one thing definitely; the boys will stay on the farms if we have a proper formula under the Agricultural Prices Support Act which will give them a feeling that they have some future security.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, coming from the farm I am very glad that point has been settled. In opening my remarks I should like to compliment a neighbour, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Murray), who made a great contribution to the debates of this house just the other day. I sometimes think we in different parties forget that when all is said and done the other fellow is not so bad after you get to know him. Then I should like to say, and I believe I am expressing the feelings of most hon. members, that I rather liked the idea of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) giving his parliamentary assistant the responsibility of piloting certain resolutions through this house. As one of the older members I must say I believe this sort of thing gives the younger members an opportunity to display their ability. I am quite sure that on both sides of the house there are many younger members who would be equally capable, but who unfortunately do not have the same opportunity.

I should like to say a word or two concerning the tobacco industry; I think it comes within the purview of what we are discussing, since it seems everyone is using tobacco. I do not know any other hon. member who could deal with the matter with quite the same background. I have grown tobacco; I have manufactured it; I have wholesaled it; I have retailed it; I have smoked it, and I have chewed it. I can hardly reconcile the statement the other day by the parliamentary assistant with respect to liquor with the situation we find today in regard to tobacco. My experience goes back to about 1920, and I am going to disagree with the minister on one point. I am sorry he is not here, but his parliamentary assistant is present. If I am not mistaken a Fielding budget in the early twenties gave wholesalers a rebate on the tobacco they had on hand when the excise tax was reduced, I think from $9 to $7.50 and then to $6. That was a precedent which might well have been followed throughout the years; and by not following it I believe this government has lost millions of dollars. I think that was the only time the excise tax on tobacco was first increased and then decreased. The other day the Minister of Finance said that retailers and others had to mark up their products when the excise tax was increased because they had to take a cut when there was a decrease. Well, to my knowledge that decrease in the early twenties was the only one ever made in connection with tobacco.

I am wondering if any of the officials of the department can answer this question. When they are after revenue and put on these taxes, I wonder if they consider only the goods in bond and not the goods in warehouse? If I were a smart manufacturer of tobacco and knew the budget was about to come down—I see some nodding over there as if there might have been some consideration of this point—I would warehouse two, three or four months' supply of tobacco. The members of the house have heard the member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) speak about the little tax stamp on a package of cigarettes which only indicates the number of cigarettes in the package. This is a mistake. This tax is costing the people of this country a great deal of money. As I said a moment ago, I can tell the Minister of Finance that if I were a smart tobacco manufacturer in this country—and these manufacturers are as smart as anyone in this country—I would warehouse as many packages of cigarettes with the tax stamp on them as would enable me to supply my distributors for three or four months. The government has lost millions of dollars by its failure to follow the policy of the early twenties of going into these warehouses. A great deal of revenue would have been collected.

It would not be fair for me, coming from western Ontario as I do, where in the last twenty years we have developed a tobacco growing industry, if I did not bring to the attention of the house a resolution which I received from the flue cured tobacco marketing association of Ontario. I do this because, in the first place, the tobacco growing industry is comparatively new in this country. I shall only recite two or three figures, but in 1930 our production was 36 million pounds; in 1940, 64 million pounds; and in 1950, 139 million pounds. Most of that was produced in western Ontario, but there is a little cigar leaf tobacco grown in three counties in Quebec. I am saying this, too, because of a statement made by the parliamentary assistant (Mr. Sinclair), as recorded on page 2278 of Hansard for April 23. He said:

> We have felt from an examination of our tax records that the point of diminishing returns has almost been reached so far as the liquor tax is concerned.

Then, farther down on the same page:

> It was for these reasons that in this budget liquor was left untouched.

Now, a startling figure to me was the production of smoking tobacco in Canada, and taking that in conjunction with our increased population from 1940 to 1950 we find that we actually produced less in 1950 than we did in 1940. I have in my mind the idea that this excessive tax on cigarettes is going to be rather a heartache. I would not be surprised if it produced less revenue than the minister expects, and even less than it did last year. It does not seem reasonable that the government would leave liquor untaxed, and yet tax cigarettes in this manner, because someone in every household uses tobacco.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me that this matter should be discussed on the budget resolutions in the committee of ways and means. We are considering a motion concerning the increased cost of living.

Mr. Murphy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I may be so venturesome, I would agree, but I would say that out of the 262 members in this house, 255 smoke cigarettes. The increased cost of these cigarettes enters into their cost of living just as it does in the case of 99 per cent of the families in the Dominion of Canada. Today tobacco is not a luxury any more than a motor car is. I am not defending the tobacco industry, and I have not any interest in tobacco.

This association which represents such a large segment of our society in western Ontario has no doubt sent a copy of this resolution to the departmental officials, but I think, Mr. Speaker, it is fair to put it on the record. It is as follows:

> At a meeting of directors of the flue cured tobacco marketing association of Ontario, held in Simcoe on April 12, 1951, the following resolution was passed unanimously. We view with alarm the recent increase in the excise tax on cigarettes . . .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe that matter should be discussed on the budget resolutions.

Mr. Murphy: Thank you; I shall abide by your ruling, of course. I shall be glad to go on at a later date, but I think the subject is of sufficient importance that it should be brought to the attention of the house. I know if you are in the chair that you will permit the discussion at that time. The parliamentary assistant or the minister may be sufficiently aware of what I proposed to say that some further consideration will be given to the matter.

When the Minister of Finance rose in his place on April 10 to give his fiscal accounting to the country, and at the same time counsel his countrymen what the year ahead held for them in terms of costs to be met and taxes to be borne, there were two primary considerations, two clearly defined problems to be weighed and solved. The first of these, of course, was the necessity of raising revenues to underwrite Canada's defence program and to advance this country's role in the North Atlantic alliance. All Canadians understood the threat that international communism presented to their way of life. All Canadians were prepared to assume new burdens of taxation, and all Canadians were prepared to sacrifice for national security, for regional security, and translated to the ultimate degree, for the preservation of democracy. They were willing to fight for liberty.

The second fundamental consideration was a domestic consideration, that of recognizing the extent of inflation in this country and introducing direct and indirect measures not only of arresting inflation but of alleviating its actual and grinding toll on public morale and on the public and private purse. Let us consider the effectiveness of the budget in dealing with these two phases of Canadian national life, Canadian security from wars and threats of wars, and Canadian domestic and economic security against forces and pressures, as scheming, as evil and as disastrous as those threatening physical attack and physical violence. The budgetary proposals of the Minister of Finance doubtless meet the first of these two tests, that of raising revenue. Certainly, in the year ahead, they will provide an unprecedented flow of tax dollars into the national treasury.

Let us now take a look at the second basic requirement of the budget, the need of concrete action to halt and indeed to reverse the pace of galloping prices—in a word, inflation. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of living issue has been dealt with in a previous debate in this house during this session. Because of that, sir, I scrupulously intend to avoid threshing what might be regarded as old straw.

No discussion of the budget, of the cost of living or of taxing proposals can be divorced entirely from a discussion of inflation as it exists in Canada today; and no discussion of inflation, it must follow, can be divorced from the cost of living in Canada, regardless of the subject matter of any previous debates in this house. Because, sir, while the budget and its provisions mean the added revenue necessary to finance Canada's preparedness drive and Canada's program of military co-operation with the NATO powers, by their very nature they aggravate and accentuate the one problem which they should have been designed to ease, if not eradicate.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's Minister of Finance, by his own words, in his budget speech, has indicted himself on a public charge of having uttered a bogus fiscal document, a worthless cheque drawn on the pay envelope and on the pocket of every wage earner and taxpayer in the country. That may seem to be a harsh interpretation, but it is no harsher than the impact of the tax increases announced by the minister, and which affect the cost of living today in Canada.

The evidence in support of the indictment is the minister's own case in justification of increased excise taxes on a whole range of consumer goods.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend; as a matter of fact, I just came in. But are we on the budget debate or are we discussing the amendment to the motion to go into supply? I suggest that it is not desirable that we should have two debates which completely duplicate each other. If my hon. friend is referring generally to causes in the country which relate to the increase in the cost of living, I suppose he is in order; but I do not think he is in order in discussing on this motion the details of my budgetary proposals.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to do so, I should like to say in all fairness to the Minister of Finance that I think he is perfectly justified in what he said; but I think he will also agree with me, that, after all is said and done, the budget, by whatever increases it may have caused in the cost of living, would have a bearing on the debate on the subject we have under consideration, namely the cost of living. I do not want to be out of order, and I hope that I may be allowed to continue.

Cost of Living

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must ask the hon. member to discuss the cost of living and not to discuss the budget or taxes, because if he does so we shall have a duplication of debate. May I read to the hon. member the amendment which is under consideration. It is as follows:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that in view of the announcement made on Wednesday last of the greatest monthly increase in Canadian cost of living during the month of February to the disastrously high level of 179·7 points, immediate consideration should be given to the adoption of appropriate measures to hold down the cost of living and halt inflation."

Mr. Murphy: Then I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite in order, to be quite fair; and I hope that the Minister of Finance will agree. I do not know how you are going to—

Mr. Abbott: I think my hon. friend would be quite in order to discuss the causes of inflation and the economic effects of inflation. But if he is confining his remarks to budgetary measures which can be taken to check inflation, then I suggest that his remarks in that respect should be made in the budget debate. I think he is quite in order in saying that the budgetary measures which have been introduced do not do anything to check inflation but rather aggravate it; perhaps he can say that. Of course I do not agree with him; I disagree. But I really do not think we should have a duplicate budget debate on this motion. We hear a great deal of complaint in this house about wasting time. One of the greatest time wasters is a duplicate debate. This is one case in which I think we might attempt to restrain ourselves.

Mr. Fair: Bring in a good budget, and we will not have any duplication.

Mr. Murphy: I think we shall get along well.

Mr. Abbott: This was the real reason why I felt as I did about this motion. While I had no objection to its being made, I felt it was going to result in just the sort of thing we are getting today.

Mr. Murphy: I think it is fair for me to say, Mr. Speaker, that inflation enters into the cost of living. I will try to curb myself in order to keep within your ruling. I certainly do not want to be unfair.

These tax increases presumably are intended as a deterrent to public spending and hence to inflation. These very increases are calculated to provide a substantial portion of revenue which the government now requires to finance its way. In short, while the government and the minister profess to champion these newest imposts as inflationary curbs, they are fully aware that they will contribute little as a check to the upward sweep of prices. Indeed, should those tax boosts, by some strange chance, actually prove to be effective dampers to public spending, then the government would find itself in a sorry plight. The Minister of Finance, now estimating for a surplus of some $30 million, would find himself far short of balancing the budget, let alone rounding out the fiscal year with a debt-reducing margin.

Mr. Abbott: I give up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member discusses the budget specifically, I think he is out of order.

Mr. Murphy: I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the spending of any public money affects the cost of living with respect to any citizen in Canada today. While it may seem strange to draw a line here, I cannot reconcile the viewpoint of the Minister of Finance by any means when he suggests that it is a budget speech. What else could it be, Mr. Speaker, when we are discussing inflation and the cost of living

We speak about the excise tax. All these taxes affect the cost of living today.

Mr. Abbott: As I said before, my hon. friend, like others, confuses cause and effect.

Mr. Fulton: The original confusion was in the minister's budget.

Mr. Murphy: I am going to have an 80-minute speech, Mr. Speaker, if these people do not stop interrupting me.

Mr. Abbott: Judging from the number of sheets of paper that my hon. friend has, it looks as though it might be good for that.

Mr. Murphy: I am glad to hear the minister say it might be good.

Mr. Abbott: For that, I said.

Mr. Murphy: It would appear that the minister has little faith in what he professes—apart from the interruptions—namely, the effectiveness of the excise tax to stem public buying. I think that has something to do with the cost of living. One could venture the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that if the trend of public spending should surprise the Minister of Finance and his finance department theorists, then members of parliament may anticipate another session this fall and another budget.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must point out that his speech would be in order in the budget debate.

Mr. Gibson: Put it in cold storage for a while.

Mr. Murphy: I think I am perfectly right, Mr. Speaker, in indicating that if the anticipated revenue that the Minister of Finance has in mind is not forthcoming, there will be another baby budget this fall. I think I am perfectly in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That may be all right in another debate, but it is not in order in this debate.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Murphy: I think we are discussing the cost of living here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: I am not so sure.

Mr. Murphy: My point was with respect to inflation and these attempts to curb inflation, and I was saying that the steps that the government have taken might not be as effective as they presume they are going to be. If they are not, then I submit that we may be subject to a fall session and another budget. We have heard discussions in the house this session about the evenness of the taxation; that it applies to the poor as well as those in the higher income brackets. I would rather think that it constitutes inequity as well as iniquity, because those higher taxes and the increased burdens on those in the lower income brackets, as well as on those in the higher income brackets, make no allowance for the different spheres of the different peoples. It needs a little perception to recognize that the principle of a blanket increase works to the detriment of those with less funds, and they are the ones that we in this House of Commons are most concerned about. It bears less heavily upon the rich than it does upon the poor. I think that every member in this house will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, when I say that we are not very much concerned with those in the very high income brackets, but we certainly are concerned with those in the low income brackets.

The person on low or middle income now must assume the same financial burden as his fellow in the upper income brackets on a wide range of consumer durable goods that the government has described as luxuries. The range of goods against which the government has imposed new or higher taxes is open to challenge. I wonder if the electric stove in a modest country cottage or a washing machine in that same little cottage is a frivolous gadget. I am going to suggest to the Minister of Finance that when he goes home tonight he suggest to his good wife that they sell their washing machine for a washboard. I would advise him though to keep the front door open because it will not be the washing machine that will go out the front door.

It seems to me that today we are taxed as a family unit, and the family unit is the very basis of our national society and our national economy. The government, through the Minister of Finance, has placed an excise tax on marriage. Young couples contemplating a home of their own must reckon not only with cupid but with governmental cupidity. In what I am about to say, Mr. Speaker, I mean no personal offence to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He is not in his seat. I know that he has many appointments, but you will recall, sir, that during the last election campaign all the newspapers and all the magazine articles and photographs depicted the Prime Minister of Canada as the great family man, as the benign parent and grandparent. I have no doubt that there was a great deal of truth in those stories and in those pictures. Most men feel the same way about their families, about their children and their grandchildren—I know I do. I know that the leader of my party makes no secret of his affection for his own family. We are proud of that. But I cannot help but wonder, Mr. Speaker, how the Liberal government now reconciles the multimillion dollar publicity campaign it sponsored to build up that portrait of the Prime Minister in the public mind with the Liberal government's budgetary bludgeoning of Canadian families now established, and of young couples intending to establish homes of their own. Indeed, the government, through its taxing methods, tells young couples, intoxicated with romance—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: It is too much for the Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member once more, but he is out of order.

Mr. Gibson: He should have made this speech on the budget; it is a good one.

Mr. Abbott: Intoxicated with love.

Mr. Murphy: Intoxicated with romance. I said it for the minister's ears. If he did not hear it the first time—

Mr. Abbott: I got the gist of it.

Mr. Murphy: The minister got the gist of it; that is the main thing. Indeed the government, through its budget, tells young couples, intoxicated with romance, to stay drunk. It is cheaper. And to this end it taxes stoves, furniture and home appliances. Someone said, not wood stoves. Of course that is one of these little blunders. To console them, it leaves alcoholic beverages free of further imposts. Of course the Minister of Finance will indicate that that has nothing to do with the cost of living. If it is provided free, as it was last Friday night, of course it would not. I hope that the hon. members who went to Toronto will come back and give us some ideas about what at one time used to be a Conservative city.

Mr. Abbott: I am glad you used the past tense.

Mr. Murphy: I am glad you got that. What a travesty. What a cynical, iniquitous thing is this latest Liberal budget, and the various means they have found to increase the cost of living.

In his budget speech the minister emphasized that some of his proposals were to be regarded—I think this will apply to the argument that I propose to make—as an interim policy for the current year only. He said he regarded his tax-on-tax system as an easy and convenient way of raising revenue, a further admission that the government has its eye more on the number of tax dollars that it can amass than upon relieving any of the inflationary pressures now bearing down on the Canadian family. But, Mr. Speaker, to leave aside the government's total disregard of inflation the total lack of budgetary steps to contain and defeat it by various methods, does it not strike you as inconsistent that the Minister of Finance at this late date can do no better than to enunciate an interim financial policy for this country? It is true that people in any walk of life today cannot look very far ahead when they are deciding on business operations, and depend more or less on government long-term policy to make up their minds as to what they should or should not do. That applies equally to those who may have to go out and buy necessary essentials for their homes.

In bringing before this house its military program, the government has set out a three-year program of rearmament and recruitment. It makes no difference whether you have $10 or $10,000 to spend, you are budgeting. In its defence production program the government has brought down legislation not for one year, not for two, three years, but for five years. In a whole range of ministerial speeches the Canadian people have been warned that the price of peace will come high, and that even though war may not come, Canada's defence preparedness will have to be maintained for many years to come. Plainly in the military sphere and in the realm of defence production Canada is being geared for a long-drawn effort to eliminate the threat of soviet imperialism. There can be no room for doubt on that score.

Yet despite all this the Minister of Finance tells the House of Commons and the Canadian people that we must wait for another year before he can determine which way the wind is blowing. If the minister is right in that attitude, then all the rest of the government is out of step with him. Or if government military and production planning for the years ahead is the proper course, and I believe it is, then it would appear that the Minister of Finance is out of step with the rest of the government. In other words, the minister should have placed before parliament and the people a properly reasoned and reasonable fiscal policy, not a twelve-months makeshift that he has been twelve months in the making but which he can shift at will.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but if the hon. member continues along this line I shall have to ask him to discontinue his speech.

Mr. Murphy: There are only two or three more items and I hope I can continue. I would not want to be out of order, but this is a very broad subject and I think I should be given the opportunity to go into many avenues with respect to the effect of the cost of living. I do submit that as the debate continues more latitude must be allowed to those who are endeavouring in their own way to show that the things I have been discussing have some bearing on the cost of living. I hope I can continue and I shall try to keep within the rules. If not, then I shall gladly abide by them.

The government has been dodging the issue of price controls. I am glad to see Your Honour smiling so I imagine I am in order. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and others have said repeatedly that they were convinced that such a system would not work at this time. They have insisted that a program of partial controls was doomed to failure. When I spoke in this house some few weeks ago I not only said that we should have controls but, and I repeat, I said that prices should be rolled back. I did not get much support for that idea from any part of the house.

Mr. Gibson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murphy: I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—why doesn't he get a constituency people can spell?—agrees with me. They have insisted, too, that a program of complete controls would not work because of enforcement. Here again we have another display of Liberal government inconsistency. Harking back once more to the budget address of the minister we find these words, referring to the government:

> We can restrain the expansion of credit; and we can apply direct controls either to particular conditions or, if necessary, more generally.

The government should make up its mind. Either there is inflation, or there is not. Either it can implement price controls to relieve that trend, or it cannot. This is the government that boasted during and after the war of its tried and proved experience and of the success of its price control policy. What do we find now? Out of all its vaunted wealth of experience and great leadership, what do we find? We find the government callously indifferent to the plight of the people, particularly those in the low income and pensioned groups, aggravating inflation, increasing the cost of living by taxation, and capitalizing, again by taxation, on the everyday requirements of Canadian families.

This is experienced Liberal leadership in this time of global travail. This is the steadying hand of the experienced Liberal administration upon the national economy. This is the crystal wisdom of the experienced Liberal administration as it counsels individual thrift and saving.

What an inspiring spectacle it is as this experienced Liberal government splurges the taxpayer's dollars on such things as the removal of the federal printing bureau to a seaside site in swimming Hull, as it controls and buys all the goods and all the materials it requires for defence, but controls and stabilizes the flow and the prices of nothing at all that the public wants. What an inspiring spectacle of experienced leadership when it boasts of effecting a saving of several million dollars in governmental expenditures this past year and yet hands out $65 million on an unexplained basis to the wheat growers of the west.

What a magnificent picture of experienced Liberal leadership it makes as the government calls for more and more production and yet slaps a 20 per cent surcharge on the income tax of the worker who must work harder and longer hours to achieve the production the government deems so necessary. The splendour of that scene grows more dazzling as one looks at agriculture and the leadership that has been afforded in that field. Experienced Liberal leadership has brought the dairy industry in all its branches to the verge of ruin—in the field of cheese production and butter production. The policy of this experienced Liberal government might be summarized in a single phrase, a policy of drift and be—I had better not mention that word.

For the pensioners of Canada and for those on fixed incomes the government has no word of comfort. To them during this inflationary period the government, this experienced government, says there is nothing it can do, that they must shift for themselves and eke out whatever existence they can. But I submit that there is something the government could and should do. For so experienced a government surely it would be no great task to establish the margin of profit mark-up permissible on foods and clothing, two great factors in the cost of living index.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member has exceeded his time.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I presume it will not be out of order to discuss some way by which we may have some hope of dealing with the high cost of living. One thing that is vastly desolating to a person sitting here listening to all the talk we have had thus far is the fact that not a word whatsoever has been offered as to how the government can raise the money to accomplish the objectives which the hon. gentlemen appear to have in mind. If that is the only function of an opposition, then I must confess that I am amazed that the opposition is such a worthless, helpless affair.

Mr. Fulton: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Blackmore: Exactly, I shall do so in a very short time. If we face the situation which confronts us straightforwardly and factually we will realize that there has to be coming into the hands of the government much more money than even now is being contemplated from taxation and other revenue measures which the government has in mind. What are we going to do about it? It would do me a lot of good to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), with the experts who surround him, over on the government side proposing a budget. We could then see how he would do these things which the government is struggling rather earnestly—I would not exactly say desperately—to cope with. What I am going to suggest is something I have already suggested a great many times in the house, but something which in my judgment offers a real solution to the problem.

I do not wish to refer unduly to my C.C.F. friends, but as far as I can gather anything intelligible out of all that they say about financing, they seem to contemplate taxation in addition to what we now have. In other words, we find no evidence of anything but taxation in the minds of hon. members of two opposition parties who attempt to attack this problem. The taxation which these C.C.F. gentlemen appear to contemplate is, in my judgment, a kind of taxation which will discourage the production that we desire so urgently in this country. I think that puts it accurately and simply. I may be quite wrong but I do not think I am. I am trying to put myself in the position of someone who probably might risk a million dollars to establish a plant in an endeavour to produce goods for Canada necessary for the war effort, and who has to contemplate such a threat as C.C.F. ideas seem to pose before any such person in the not too distant future if they ever get into power.

May I bring to the attention of the house once more the question of the possibility of debt-free money created by the state, in accordance with the production of the country and the productive capacity, as a means of obtaining additional revenue which will aid in the financing of the nation's affairs without taking anything away from anybody and without hurting anybody. My general approach to that problem on this occasion is going to be more or less scientific. It is based on a study of financial history over nearly the last two hundred years.

In my judgment there has come into the thinking of men in our day a strange species of fallacious concept with respect to debt-free money created by the state. I believe that if we are going to come through the dangerous times ahead successfully we must remove these fallacies which have come to be lodged so firmly in the minds of so many hon. members of the house and of the people throughout the country.

In order to show that I am not in the most disreputable company in the world when I propose debt-free money, may I quote a passage that appears in the annual report of the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland bank, to the shareholders of the bank as recently as 1936. This passage is to be found in the London Daily Times of January 30, 1936, right here in our library. I invite the leader of the opposition and every other hon. member to consider this quotation with the utmost care as coming from a man who undoubtedly is no crackpot, no matter what anybody tries to say. He said:

> Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers without reference to the central bank's holding of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control. We learnt that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess, though deflation has still a touch of virtue about it in the minds of many people. Nevertheless it is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused. For money to be truly "sound" there must be enough of it to finance an ordinarily growing volume of trade, yet not so much as to give rise to an inflationary movement of prices.

I do not believe there is a man in the Dominion of Canada who can successfully argue, in the face of that solemn statement by Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, that it is not feasible and intelligent to suggest in this country that we at least create some debt-free money through the finance department.

It will be argued that now is not the time to do it because relatively we have scarcity of production. With the information at my disposal, defective as it possibly may be, I am not prepared to admit that we have a deficiency of production over all in most of the essentials of our standard of living. If we have, then I maintain it is the business of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), or some other responsible man in the government, to explain to us exactly to what degree there is deficiency of production in this country.

May I now turn to another man who I think, will be recognized. I think the leader of the opposition will have to recognize this man. I wish to quote this time Mr. A. F. W. Plumptre, who used to be Professor Plumptre, writing in the Financial Post of October 5, 1940, on the topic of "Putting Over The Next War Loan". He said:

> There are some general matters of theory which must be kept in mind in preparing for the next war loan. It must be remembered, primarily and seemingly paradoxically, that the government's object is not to get money but merely to reduce the public's spending. The government can always "get money" because it may, as an alternative to borrowing or even to taxation, create the required funds. This it can easily do nowadays through the leadership of the central bank and the co-operation of the chartered banks. In this way $200 million were created in this fashion last autumn.

I submit that if the opposition are going to be worthy of their salt they will have to ask certain questions and get the answers. One question that needs to be asked and answered is: At what stage of production in a nation is the creation of debt-free money and the circulation thereof justified by the production of that country? In other words, how much production need there be in a country, or how much money can be in a country in relation to the production, before we are justified in creating money and putting it into circulation?

In my judgment that is one of the profoundest questions facing mankind today. What is the use of the leader of the opposition and dozens and dozens of other men in this House of Commons getting up and railing against communism and about the dangers of communism when they never give us the slightest hint of what can be done to improve conditions in Canada to enable us to offset the influence of communism within the country?

May I quote one statement which comes from another man who undoubtedly is worthy of high respect. I refer to Vincent Cartwright Vickers writing in a book called "Economic Tribulation", published in 1941, and which is available in our library. This is what he says:

> Any additional supply of money should be issued as a clear asset to the state; so that money will be spent into existence, and not lent into existence.

That will be found on page 75 of his book. There is no doubt as to the meaning of those words. They are clear. Ten year old children can tell what they mean. I ask the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) if he cannot tell what those words mean. If he can tell what they mean, why does he not put in some study on the matter with which this gentleman was dealing?

Who was Vincent Cartwright Vickers? Perhaps hon. members will be interested to learn. We find this information in a note written by his daughter, Wilma Cawdor, and appearing in the front of the book:

> Vincent Cartwright Vickers was born on 16th January, 1879, and educated at Eton and Magdalen College, Oxford. He was a deputy lieutenant of the city of London, a director of Vickers, Limited, for twenty-two years, and a director of the London Assurance from which he resigned in January, 1939. In 1910 he was made a governor of the Bank of England, and resigned this appointment in 1919. Later, he became president of the Economic Reform Club and Institute.
> He died on 3rd November, 1939, after a long illness during which, against time and with failing strength, he was working and writing on economics.

The book he was seeking to finish was this very book "Economic Tribulation", as being the essence of this man's experience which he was contributing to the well-being of his fellow men. Does not the hon. member for Greenwood imagine this man's words are worth listening to? I am sure he would feel quite honoured if he could attach to his name all the distinguishing features which I have read about this man. So would any member of this house. I do not think the Minister of Finance, with all the jaunty assurance he possesses, would dare cross swords with a man having such a reputation without a great deal of very careful preparation.

Well, then, why do we find so many people who just will not pay attention to the words of men like Mr. Vickers, so well informed and so well able to suggest a means of solving the problems of this generation? This book by Vincent Cartwright Vickers was written in 1939, before the war. Is it to be supposed that he intended his message to be of no value until a long time after the war, or did he intend it to be a valuable contribution during the war and the peace which was to follow?

The trouble is that the moment we make suggestions as to the use of debt-free money like those I have made already, we find people coming out with such words as "inflation". Many of them have not the faintest idea of what constitutes or causes inflation. The fact is that we have an inflation now, probably the worst in our history, after we financed a war with the soundest of sound money according to the most rigid orthodox principles the hon. member for Greenwood or the Department of Finance could imagine. The fact that we have such a terrible inflation now and do not know what to do about it ought to be pretty good evidence that their sound money ideas, according to the doctrines of orthodox finance, may not be quite so sound as they appear.

That is the thing we face. What has caused this inflation? The other day I listened to the leader of the opposition talk about inflation. Some of his remarks the Minister of Finance met with the expression "nonsense". I believe the minister was justified, because I must declare that the leader of the opposition was talking the most simple nonsense I have heard a man talk on inflation in the last fifteen years.

Mr. MacInnis: How would the Minister of Finance know he was talking nonsense?

Mr. Blackmore: He knew it that time, anyway. I wish the leader of the opposition were in his place, but he will be able to defend himself on a later occasion, and I shall be here when he does it. The point is this. Is it not a most alarming state of affairs when the leader of the official opposition in the House of Commons cannot even tell definitely and clearly what inflation is, what it means, and what causes it?

The other day the Minister of Finance said this inflation was a world phenomenon. Well, every one of the countries involved in this world phenomenon is conducting its affairs under orthodox finance, with which the hon. member for Greenwood is so completely enamoured. How in the world, then, has this inflation been brought about?

Cost of Living

Just to emphasize the truth of what I am saying, when the Bank of Canada was organized we were led to believe this would be a measure to protect us against inflation. Well, we fought a war under the Bank of Canada. We have come through the war into the peace under the Bank of Canada. There are corresponding central banks all over the British commonwealth and in other countries, but notwithstanding that fact we have this inflation which is so serious as to alarm the bravest of us in this country. What is the matter? That ought to be enough to warn every member of this house that we just cannot treat these matters too lightly.

On April 19 I put on record a number of questions which were to guide those honestly seeking for truth concerning money, in their studies and thinking. The suggestion was definitely embedded in one of those questions the answer to which—if we would only learn the facts about finance and not the fancies, with which we are being regaled so frequently by the presidents of banks all over this country—would probably furnish the solution to many of our problems and show it to be right in our financial system. The longer hon. members study this matter the more they will realize the truth of what I am saying.

But now when debt-free money is mentioned if they do not call out "inflation" they scream "remember Germany", as though what happened in the inflation in Germany had anything on earth to do with debt-free money. They are referring to the German inflation, about which I shall have a little more to say in a few moments.

Those who have been informed by the deputy minister of finance and the men he has gathered around him as his cohorts and supporters will scream "fiat money", as it was used in the days of the French revolution. Their reference, of course, is to assignats, from the like of which they hope heaven will deliver us. A careful study of the assignat experiment will reveal much that can help us even today. The trouble is that the people who speak about that great experiment do not know the facts, and they will not take the trouble to find them. Instead, they permit themselves to be deluded by the deputy minister of finance. He is not here, but he is perfectly free to have his representatives and minions here in the house—and he has quite a number of them—disprove what I say. I challenge the deputy minister of finance and all his department behind him to contradict what I say.

If hon. members do not cry out one of these things, they will say, "Just think of greenbackery in the United States under Lincoln! Heaven deliver us from that". Well, a careful study of the greenback experiment does not justify anyone in forming such an extravagant adverse conclusion, as I shall indicate shortly.

These four parrot cries, inflation, Germany, assignats and greenbacks, must be disposed of before any progress will be possible in our study of money.

If the hon. members of this house and the people throughout the country are disposed to be imposed upon by these four parrot cries, nothing can be done. But if they are disposed to probe into the problem themselves and get the facts they will not be imposed upon by these four parrot cries. These parrot cries constitute the first hurdle to be scaled before debt-free money proposals will be even listened to. But for any individual with an enlightened mind, free from bias and prejudice, these four parrot cries are easy to dispose of, easy to sweep utterly out of the way. In fact, they constitute no hurdle at all but rather an encouragement to us to probe into the possibilities of debt-free money.

Now, as to inflation; what is inflation? The leader of the opposition the other day evidently had in his mind three definitions of inflation, and they were all wrong, or at least they were only right a number of years ago or right in accordance with the propaganda of the banks. It has been said that an increase of money is inflation. In one sense, we grant that is true, but no hon. member of this house will say the word "inflation" as we use it today means an increase in money. Then, it has been said that any undue increase of money that is unaccompanied by an increase in products is inflation. Well, that is coming somewhere near it. Another definition is any increase in money which is too great for the gold in the country that backs the money. The realistic definition of inflation has been literally hammered into the heads of everybody in Canada and the United States during two terrible wars as being, any rise in price, no matter what the cause or causes may be. Unless you do have a rise in price, any financial process is not inflation. What the leader of the opposition has got to do is to learn what inflation is, or he cannot discuss intelligently the present inflation, and all those who listen to him will just have their time wasted on this most vital matter. I could say a great deal more about inflation, but I do not think I will at the present time because I am busy with certain other things. I shall come back to inflation by and by, whenever hon. members, including the leader of the opposition or the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), will question what I am saying.

The important matter before us now is, what part can money play in causing inflation? The answer to that is simply this: if we get into circulation more money than goods, as the hon. member for Greenwood said the other day, "when you have too many dollars chasing too few goods," that is the only justifiable monetary reason, as I think the hon. member for Greenwood will agree, for an increase in price. My question is: is that what has caused the present increase in price? I just raise one illustration, because I do not wish to go into too much detail. In April of 1946 the steel companies in Canada acting with government consent raised the price of steel by $5 per ton. Would the hon. member for Greenwood or the Minister of Finance or any other hon. member in this house say that was caused by too much money in circulation? Would the hon. member for Greenwood or the Minister of Finance or anyone else in the house tell us that you could make the steel companies take $5 off their price by taxing any amount of money away from the people of Canada?

The next thing that occurred, as all hon. members will recall, was that the steel workers struck for a share of that five dollar increase. The result was that the steel workers received an increase in wages, thereby increasing the cost to everyone employing them just as the increase in steel prices increased the cost to everyone using steel in manufacturing his product, directly or indirectly. Will anyone tell us that steel prices would be reduced or that wages would be reduced or that you can bring down the increased cost of living which resulted from those two factors, by a tax? Why, the very thought of it is preposterous, is it not? If it can be found that all the factors which have resulted in the great inflation we are suffering from are the result of incidents similar to that which occurred in the increased price in steel, will somebody tell me how on earth any amount of taxation in this country can reduce the cost of living? It is an absurdity! It is for that reason that I say the first thing we must do is know what caused this inflation; then we can set about seeing whether or not we can remove the causes or offset them. I shall have more to say about this later on.

May I just give a quotation to the house which will tend to establish the truth of what I have just said, that the thing which governs the amount of money which a country can have in circulation is the goods and services a country has in circulation or available for use in exchanges which people desire to make of these goods and services. Money is a medium of exchange as all people know. What do you need money as a medium of exchange for? To effect exchanges. When can you effect an exchange? When you have for example apples to trade for potatoes, or barber services to trade for railroad services or railroad services to trade for coal. In other words, the amount of money which you can have in the country depends on the goods and services you have in the country, and the disposition of the people in the country to effect exchanges. Now, the very minute you get that point clearly in your mind as a fundamental, you have to look on money altogether differently. The very first thing you will do if you want to find out whether we can create money and put it into circulation today in Canada will be to ascertain how many exchanges we are able and prepared to make in Canada. How many goods and services have we which we could exchange and have to employ money in the process?

I am going to read a quotation from a valuable little work by Sir Norman Angell called "Your Money." This little work is in our library. The article was written when the Social Credit government went into power in Alberta. The Financial Post caused it to be written, and the general object of the dear old Financial Post was to scare people away from Social Credit. As a matter of fact, what Sir Norman Angell said was just the thing to show that Social Credit was completely sound in its attitude towards money. On page 13 members will find the words which I am going to read, so they can read them at their leisure. You will find that I have not taken the quotation from its general context.

> Now, it would make no difference to the value of Law's money—

By the way, Law's money preceded the assignats by a few generations. Law's money was a really wonderful experiment.

> —that it should be "backed" by the resources of the Mississippi valley, or to the French revolutionary money that it should be a mortgage upon the national possessions, if the moneys were issued in too great a quantity in relation to the exchange of goods to be effected. Both of the moneys just mentioned became utterly worthless, although the whole resources of France and the French empire did "stand back of" them. If the quantity had been limited it would not have mattered in the least that nothing stood behind them in the material sense.

How sound those words are. I am sure the member for Greenwood can understand those simple words, too. I shall continue:

> So long as they were legal currency, and their quantity was limited, their value would have been maintained.

Which means that "backing" in the ordinarily accepted sense does not make a bit of difference to the value of the money.

What wrecked them was their excessive quantity.

No member in this house has advocated excessive quantity; certainly no Social Crediter has.

If the effect of putting material wealth "behind" money is to limit the quantity, to cause it to bear some quantitative relation to goods, the device, of course, serves the purpose of limitation. But it is the limitation of quantity which constitutes the guarantee of its value. Ricardo saw this quite clearly when he wrote:

"There is no point more important in issuing paper money than to be fully impressed with the effects that follow from the principle of limitation of quantity. It is not necessary that paper should be payable in specie to secure its value; it is only necessary that its quantity should be regulated."

May I break in here to ask once more: Quantity in relation to what? The exchanges which are to be effected in the country! And where is the man in Canada today who can tell us what is the number of exchanges that can be effected in this wonderful country? And what would be the number of exchanges which could be effected if you could put more money into the hands of consumers? And what would be the number that could be effected in the course of a year if you liberated the productive capacities of this country? These are the matters which in my judgment are matters of great importance and of great promise of hope as we approach the financing of the dangerous days ahead. I continue:

Now this truth, that the value of money depends in the last analysis, not upon the material of which it is made, or upon being "backed" by this or that commodity, but upon its quantity, opens up great possibilities for man.

I am endeavouring, Mr. Speaker, to canvass some of these possibilities before this house this afternoon. I continue:

He is not necessarily in this vital question of money the slave of a circumstance outside his control like the discovery or the failure to make adequate discovery of gold. He can control his money, make it his servant instead of his master, if he can learn the trick, the technique.

And the trick or the technique is learning how to measure or calculate the number of exchanges that can be effected and how to increase the possibility of exchanges and how to cause those exchanges to be made. I submit that just as soon as an effective study of this matter is made by the members of this house, the presidents of banks in this country, the presidents of mortgage companies, and all the other men who think they speak with authority, and are in a position where people listen to them, even if they are telling what is untrue, the better it will be; the important thing for those gentlemen all to do is to begin to examine with the utmost care these pages which I have put on record of the writings of some of the most reputable financial experts to be found probably in the history of the world, in order to see whether or not something cannot be done to help this country and its neighbours, out of the difficulty in which everybody recognizes we now find ourselves. I have a great many things, which I hope to say regarding this matter.

I wish to go on with some more comments which have an important bearing on the whole thesis that I am attempting to develop. I wish to refer to the German inflation. If all goes well, before we leave this session I propose to go into detail with regard to the German inflation and to give authentic information with which everyone will have to agree. Was the German inflation caused by debt-free money? I would advise hon. members to read Paul Einzig's book "World Finance Since 1914"; he is a gentleman who has in all probability known and told the truth; this is what he said. I am reading from page 47 of Paul Einzig's book that we find in our library:

In the case of Germany, inflation was forced upon the government by excessive reparation demands.

Did the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) ever hear of that? I will wager that he never did. I will wager that you could not get Dr. W. C. Clark, the deputy minister of finance, to acknowledge that unless you pounded it into his head. But there is the fact; and in due time, Mr. Speaker, if all goes well, and if the members of the house will permit me to do so, I will adduce evidence to support everything that Paul Einzig has said here. Meanwhile, may I point out these facts concerning the German inflation: Every mark was borrowed from German banks. Do hon. members get that? Every mark that made up the German inflation was borrowed from German banks in most acceptable orthodox fashion, to pay interest on Germany's war debts. Would the Minister of Finance or the hon. member for Greenwood object to that? That was good, sound, orthodox financing. Why did it cause inflation in Germany? Germany owed 147 billion gold marks internally at the close of the war, of which 58 billion was floating debt and 89 billion was funded debt. Would the hon. member for Greenwood advocate that Germany should have repudiated those debts? Or would the Minister of Finance have argued that Germany should have repudiated those debts? I do not think so. Would Dr. W. C. Clark have advocated such a thing? I do not think so. Then the question those gentlemen will have to answer is: How in the world could Germany have managed matters in those times?

To make matters worse for Germany, this also happened: The London conference caused Germans to pay one billion gold marks in August, 1921; 362 million marks in March, 1922; and 254 million marks in August, 1922, to Belgium, a total of 1,622 million marks. I refer hon. members to Sir Norman Angell's "The Story of Money", page 345.

If you want the genuine cause of the German inflation, there is part of it—but just a part of it. At a later time, when I get an opportunity to do so, I will go into detail on the German inflation and I will quote authorities that no man in this house can question or will attempt to question. For men like bankers or anyone else in this country to meet the proposal to issue debt-free money with the cry "Germany" is for them to manifest ignorance, stupidity or downright hypocrisy; and I imagine that all three participate.

May we now turn for a few moments to the assignats experiment, the French republic's state-created, debt-free money? What caused the disastrous rise in price or the fall in the value of the assignat? Here are the general disadvantages under which the assignat functioned: The thing that was behind the assignat was a parcel of land, something like a quarter-section of land only smaller. How long would Canadian money maintain its value today if it had only a parcel of land behind it? That was what was behind the assignat unit of money. The word "assignat" means an assignment of land. Then every assignat was at least about $10 in value—$10 to $20. How long would Canadian money continue to keep up its value if the only denominations were $10 and $20 bills, and if there were no $5, $2 or $1 with which to make change? Then there was an unstable government which dared not tax. The government which issued the assignats was a revolutionary government which had just recently established itself and was not sufficiently stable in its position to enable it to tax. What would happen to Canadian money under conditions like that? And there was a disruption of industry at that time due to civil war which had been very costly. Then again France was under the blockade of Britain at that time, and British blockades in those days were pretty airtight; so that they could not get the goods imports which they had been used to. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, the French people in France were fighting wars on all fronts. May I read a statement from "Monarchy or Money Power" by R. McNair Wilson, in which he is discussing the assignats. Here is a statement which the hon. member for Greenwood and the Minister of Finance, busy as these gentlemen are, will have time to read. Here it is:

> The French had financed fourteen armies on their paper money—

So evidently it had not been worthless all the time. I continue:

> Why should not other nations do the same? Consequently, as has been seen, the money power in every country of Europe exerted its utmost efforts to discredit the French paper money. Success was achieved by frightening the producers of food so that they refused to part with their bread and meat in exchange for assignats, which consequently lost all their value. This is the method invariably made use of to "crash" a paper currency.

Who are behind all the propaganda that is trying to scare us away from using debt-free money? The money power presumably. Who are behind all those banks and trusts that issue their specious talks? The money power no doubt. How many men in the department of the Minister of Finance are under the control of the money power?

Mr. Abbott: None.

Mr. Blackmore: Well I should like the minister to prove that. We will probably find out by this simple little rule: By their fruits ye shall know them. And the fruits of the Department of Finance during the last fifteen years certainly have not indicated that they were free agents to do for Canada what they ought to have done. Just as an example, in 1935 when we Social Crediters first came here, when Canada's warehouses were literally bulging with food and her productive plant was probably only 70 or 75 per cent active, and over a million and a quarter men were unemployed, all of which were means of producing more goods than we produced, we should have had debt-free money. The Minister of Finance told us it would cause inflation. Well, in the light of what has happened since, was he not foolish? Who do you suppose told him that it would cause inflation, if it was not the deputy minister of finance, and who do you suppose deluded him? Is it to be imagined that a man, such as the deputy minister of finance, with the training that he has had, would not have had knowledge and sense enough to know that the creation, we will say, of $300 million, $400 million or $500 million of money in Canada, and putting it into circulation in 1934 and 1935, would have been beneficial completely and could not have caused inflation, when only just a few years later we had hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars liberated in this country, billions of them in fact, and they did not cause inflation. We held them all under control until under the insistence of the foolish remarks of the Conservatives we lessened control in 1946.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Blackmore: In the light of all these facts let us consider the possibility of debt-free money in this country as a means of solving or attempting to solve our difficulties.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall have more to say, Mr. Speaker, the next time that I get a chance.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Speaker, would you call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. members would like to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I did not mean to come into this debate as early as this, but as there is a possibility that it may not last any more than two or three days longer I felt that I should say something, coming as I do from the province that was described this afternoon by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir)—I may be a little wrong in the way I got his description—as the baby sitter province. It may be the baby sitter province, but it has also been described in such terms as the baby bonus province. The promotion to baby sitter province is rather pleasing to hear. The hon. member may have said baby sister province; I am not sure of that.

Mr. Sinnott: Oh, yes you are.

Mr. Higgins: You should know that you are better able to answer it. To me the subject is of such paramount importance, not only to this baby sitter, baby sister, baby bonus, bag of bones province that it may be if this present inflation continues, but to all Canada. Therefore I need no excuse for intervening in this debate for a short time.

I am not going to speak as eloquently as the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), nor am I going to try to become as involved as the hon. member became, and here I mean no disrespect, in trying to explain what inflation is. All I am going to do is to add my small voice to what has been said before so well by so many hon. members, especially those on this side of the house. Even though we have not heard it from hon. members on the other side because they would not like to talk like this, in their heart of hearts I am sure they are bound to agree with all that has been said about the cost of living in Canada. If they are honest, as all hon. members are, they are certainly going to agree that there has been a tremendous increase in the cost of living in Canada.

The hon. member for Lethbridge asked: What is inflation? The hon. member said that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) could not define inflation and then he (the hon. member for Lethbridge) went on to show in various ways just what inflation was. Whether it is right or wrong, to me inflation means that there is more money coming out of my right-hand pocket, to use the vernacular, to pay for the ordinary things of life, the ordinary eating and the ordinary clothing of the people of Canada than there should be. That to me is inflation.

If we have to pay more for what formerly we used to get for cheaper prices, that is inflation. That may not be very descriptive of the real meaning of inflation, but if a great majority of the people of Canada feel that they should not have to pay as much to live in Canada as they have to today, then they must ask what is the cause of that. The cause of that appears to me to be an artificial raising of prices. How those prices were raised is beyond the ordinary mathematics that I know. I cannot possibly give a reason for it, but I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who is a very clever person, who is a very charming person, who is very well versed in these matters, will at some time during this debate come in and explain to hon. members of this house why this situation exists and why the government has done nothing about it. It is strictly a job for the government of this country. Whether we like it or do not like it, the only power in this country to take steps to control what everybody realizes, what everybody appreciates and what everybody is worried about, that is the cost of living all over this country, is the government.

It is all very well to say that the people who make good money need not be worried, that they are not kicking very much; but they have been taxed plenty. But what about these many thousands of people in this country today who must live on fixed incomes? I mean those people in receipt of pensions that were fixed when living was not as it is today; I mean people like those who are retired from the civil service, people who are retired from private companies, people who are retired from public companies.

There are thousands of people of that type whose pensions were fixed back four, five or maybe ten or fifteen years ago.

These people are receiving the same amount of money today as they were when their pensions were fixed. What becomes of these people? They get no relief in the income tax. Comparatively few of them need relief because comparatively few are in the brackets where income tax applies. But there are still quite a large number who have to pay the increased income taxes and who are still on these fixed pensions. It is those particular cases that I refer to now. What is to become of them? What is to become of the man or the woman in the lower income tax brackets, who does not pay any worthwhile tax? What is he or she to do about meeting the higher cost of living?

That is one problem that is absolutely right up the street of this government. Hon. members opposite know that. Let me say to them—I am not speaking words of wisdom about it—I refer to war veterans who are receiving pensions and teachers who are on pension. What is to become of these people? Are we to say to them that this is a war effort and they have to put up with it? But how are they to live? It is all very well for hon. members to say that "it better be live horse till you get grass", but after all, these are human beings and somehow they must live. What is the government doing about it? I have not followed all the past debates. As some hon. members know, I have not been here all the time, and because of the rather irregular mail service we have in my province Hansard has not been delivered as regularly as it might be, and as it has been in other provinces. For that reason I may not have read everything that every hon. member has said, but from what I have read and from the newspapers I have followed, it appears that the cost of living is exercising the minds of all the people of Canada, and indeed of all members of the House of Commons.

Whatever parties we belong to, whether we are on this side of the house or the other, if hon. members want to really speak their minds, one thing on which they have to be in common accord is the question of trying to curb what is happening in Canada today. That is why I call again upon the Minister of Finance, and call on him very deliberately, because it is his job, because he is probably closer to the whole situation than any other member, to speak on behalf of the government and say whether anything is going to be done, and if not, why not. Something definitely must be done. I do not suppose we can rouse the government from their lethargy with respect to this matter. I do not know whether it is lethargy. They feel they have an obligation but they definitely do not feel that they should discharge it at this time, or if they feel they should discharge it there may be many reasons why they will not discharge it. I still say it is for the government to say why that is so. We have had excuses that if they control prices labour will not be satisfied, that labour is not going to play the game, that labour will demand an increase in wages.

That is quite true, Mr. Speaker. Labour is today, and justifiably so, demanding increases all along the line, and who blames them? Who blames the men of the professions today for asking for increased fees? Who blames anybody who is earning money today for asking for an increased amount? They must ask for an increased amount if they wish to live, and that also applies to our fishermen in Newfoundland. It applies to the apple growers of Nova Scotia, the farmers of Ontario and Quebec and the lumbermen all over the country. The government says: We are not going to control prices because if we do labour is not going to agree. To my mind that is a fallacy. I do not know too much about labour although I have been associated with labouring men in various capacities for some years, and again I am only speaking of labour in my own province.

So far as I am concerned, in talking with labour people in Newfoundland and up here —and when I say "up here" I mean the mainland of Canada apart from the island province of Newfoundland—I find that labour is not unreasonable, that labour is prepared to hold the line, provided prices are stabilized. You cannot blame them. How can you expect a man to go out and try to earn his living today, come back with his money at the end of his day, week, month, or whatever it is, and have to pay the greatly increased prices prevailing in this country today? The hon. member for Lethbridge made some remarks this afternoon to the effect that my leader did not know what inflation meant. As I said earlier, I know very little about it either, but there are certain figures that were given to me over the dinner hour that I should like to quote.

These figures have reference to Ottawa only. I am not going to quote too many of them but they are all the prices of essential food products in Ottawa today and as they were on the first of January of the present year. On the first of January butter cost 69 cents per pound, and today it costs 80 cents per pound. On January 1 eggs were 55 cents a dozen and today they are 69 cents a dozen. I wish we could buy them in Newfoundland at even that increased price. Milk rose three cents a quart to 19 cents a quart. Flour was quoted to me as having risen 4 cents for a 7-pound bag to 49 cents. The increase in a loaf of bread has been two cents. Lard has risen from 29 cents to 35 cents a pound; Canadian cheese from 49 cents to 59 cents a pound; tea from $1.15 a pound to $1.18; coffee from $1.08 to $1.18 a pound. Sausages have increased 14 cents per pound. Pork chops have increased 6 cents per pound, and the increase on hamburg has been 20 per cent.

I am not going any further into that list. I think these figures exemplify very well the great increase in the cost of living right in Ottawa. How these increases have been spread all through the country is very easy for hon. members from the various ridings to apportion. Naturally in my province the figures are entirely out of line. The original cost was greater and the proportionate increase has been greater. It may be that my leader does not know what inflation is in Canada, and possibly I do not know what it is, but the hon. member for Lethbridge will have to give other examples for me to be able to understand him. I do not mean any disrespect, but my idea of inflation, as I said before, is merely a rise in the cost of all things from what they were to what they are. That is inflation so far as I know.

I do not plan to be too long, Mr. Speaker, because I am sure other hon. members are vitally interested for themselves and for their constituents and will want to talk long and seriously on this matter. However, I want to reiterate something that has been said before. I am sure it has been said before because it stands to reason, because it is true. The other evil we have in the world today, apart from the rising cost of living, the other big matter that is exercising the minds of people all over the world, is the threat of communism. Like it or lump it, Mr. Speaker, whatever we say or whatever we do, communism flourishes in those countries where what is happening here now has happened before, where the savings of the people have been wiped out overnight, where the moneys that people tried to put away for their old age or for future illness went, as they are beginning to go here in Canada. Such countries were being prepared for communism. Like you, Mr. Speaker, and all other hon. members I do not want to see communism come in here. Quite recently an approximate figure was given us of the number of communists in Canada. I am not going to mention it, because I would be speaking only from memory and I do not want to do that; but we all realize it is a very serious problem, and we all appreciate that communism is nurtured by conditions such as those now existing in Canada.

As I have said, the people of Canada expect this government to tell us why they will not impose controls. They say they will not, but they do not tell us why. The Minister of Finance must explain that; he must show the people why it is not necessary to have price controls at this time. So far I have heard no explanation. I do not suggest that I am a particularly bright person but I am reasonably intelligent, and as yet I have not heard nor have I read in Hansard any explanation by the government as to why controls should not be imposed. And that task belongs to the government. It is not the job of the official opposition or of any other party in this house to explain why that should not be done. We all have our ideas on the course that ought to be followed. I am not going to inflict mine upon hon. members, but it is up to the government to give us a full explanation. The people of Canada are the jury, and they can come to their own decision in the matter.

For a few moments I should like to go back to my own province and detail the situation as I have seen it during the past few weeks. It is quite true that a majority of the working people in my province, chiefly fishermen, do not pay income tax. That is so for the very obvious reason that they do not earn sufficient money to become liable to the tax. But they certainly have to pay through the nose because of the rising cost of living. What is the answer? I came into this house with the other members from Newfoundland with the idea that we would do the best we could for what has been described as the youngest sister province. The bill of goods was sold to us this way in Newfoundland that if we came into confederation with Canada we would have a lower cost of living. Certainly that has not been the case. Today the cost of living in Newfoundland is higher than ever before. Of course I realize that the cost of living has gone up in the rest of Canada as well; but if you tried to tell the people of Newfoundland that they are living more cheaply than ever before they would not understand you.

By and large the economy of our newest province is based on fish. I hope I will still be in order if I discuss this matter very briefly, because it is part of this debate and part of the amendment proposed by my leader. The fishermen do not have to pay income tax, but unless the fishermen earn money they do not eat. If they do not catch fish and sell it, they do not eat. So if our newest province is to exist at all, we must have assistance in connection with our fisheries; we must have a floor price for fish in Newfoundland. Whatever else the government may or may not do, it must do that. I am not going to revive other debates; I am not going to talk about the $65 million that was paid in connection with wheat. I am only going to ask that some small amount be set aside to provide a floor price for Newfoundland fish for this year. At the present time whole settlements in my province say they are not going to fish because they cannot get an undertaking that they will be able to sell their catch at a fair price. What is the good of talking to these people about the cost of living? They cannot even afford to buy the ordinary necessities of life if they cannot sell their fish at a fair price.

We have been told that we were never better off than we are today; that when we came into confederation we had $42 million, and that this was a lot of money, more than we ever had before in our lives. That is quite true, but what is happening now? By the terms of union we are not permitted to use that money to subsidize the fisheries. So even if the provincial government had the money—which they have not, because they have spent it—they would not be able to use it to give the fishermen what they want, that is the promise of a floor price so they may go fishing again.

I am not trying to make any particular plea for Newfoundland as such; I am speaking for all Canada, but instinctively you speak of the only place you really know. That is why I am using Newfoundland as an illustration. This is going to be a very bad year for Canada's youngest province unless something is done about the price of fish. There are members in this house who know much more about it than I do, and I hope they will say the same thing I am saying, because after all they have just as much an obligation to the people of Newfoundland as I have. You know, the youngest sister always needs a little more consideration than the older members of the family. So I hope hon. members opposite and particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who has always taken a deep interest in the new province, will bear these things in mind and see to it that whatever the economic situation this newest province is given a chance to live. We are not asking for money down there; all we want is a chance to sell our fish, a chance to live. That is all we ask. Perhaps I may be pardoned for again referring to Newfoundland, but I am worried about the financial position of that province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking of floor prices for fish, but I would ask him now to confine his remarks to the motion before the house.

Mr. Higgins: You have been more than generous, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate it. I will say no more on that matter at the moment but will let it speak for itself; and I thank you very much for your consideration. So, Mr. Speaker, all I want to say in winding up this matter is this. Like all Canadians, I am extremely worried about this spiralling cost of living. I do not care what any member in this house says today, I do not care what any member of the government says today, controls of some sort have to be instituted; otherwise the people of this country have to accept a much lower standard of living than that to which they are entitled. It is all very well to talk about being unable to do this, but still it should be tried. To me, this inflation is like a balloon. If you like, it is comparable to the Hindenburg which some years ago was filled with helium gas.

An hon. Member: No, hydrogen gas.

Mr. Higgins: All right, hydrogen gas. It was an inflammable gas.

An hon. Member: House of Commons gas.

Mr. Higgins: Perhaps it was House of Commons gas, which is an inflammable gas. Whatever the kind of gas with which it was filled—this cost of living gas, whatever it is, is no joke. I say this as I close, that this balloon that has been inflated is getting more inflated every day, and unless something is done to curb this inflation, then we shall have what happened to the Hindenburg as an example: it will blow up. Because of an accident but a preventable one. Then, what will happen to all of Canada? I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance had better explain what is going to happen when and if that balloon blows up.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, at this time I should like to add my voice to those who are taking part in this debate. I want to assure you that I support this motion in connection with rising prices. I am not going to cover the ground that has been already covered, only I want to inform the government that the constituency of Selkirk is suffering from high prices the same as every other constituency. Prices have now become so high that it is practically impossible for these people to maintain the standard of living that they had some time ago. It is going to be a black mark against Canada if we have to lower our standard of living. People who are receiving pensions today, not only old age pensioners, but those who purchased annuities so that they would have enough to live on during the eventide of their life, are being tremendously hard pressed. I could go over this ground again, but the members in my group and the members of the groups on each side of me have already pointed out these things.

It has been said that high prices are caused by the producer getting too much. I do not agree with that. Beef prices have been blamed for this high cost of living. It has been said that the sending of our cattle to the United States is the cause of high cattle prices. We have the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at page 1759 of Hansard of April 9:

> That is the only practical way I know of of preventing the price of beef in Canada from following the price in the United States.

I have been in the United States recently and I find that prices there are much lower than ours. I made a study of it. I went to different places in New York and other cities and I found that beef and pork prices are lower than ours.

I believe the Winnipeg Tribune, in an editorial on March 6, 1951, hit the nail on the head. I am going to quote from that editorial which is headed "Those American Prices". It reads as follows:

> For many years it has been accepted as an axiom by Canadians that the cost of living in the United States is higher than in the dominion. One of the reasons advanced for the current upsurge in prices by Ottawa spokesmen is that living costs here are simply following those of the United States. Few seem to have questioned these assertions.
> Times have changed. Those familiar with prices of staple foodstuffs in retail stores south of the border claim that living costs in Canada, as far as many items of food are concerned, are substantially higher than in the U.S.
> The following are prices advertised on March 1 for food items of comparable quality and quantities picked at random in Minneapolis and Winnipeg retail stores:

Commodity	Minneapolis	Winnipeg
Sugar, 10 lbs.	$1.01	$1.40
T-bone steak, lb.	.79	.89
Soap (large size) 3 for	.33	.37
Flour—
25-lb. bag	2.15	...
24-lb. bag	...	1.65
Picnic hams, lb.	.43	.55
Pork Tenderloin, lb.	.70	1.05
Milk, 2 qts.	.33	.34
Apples, Delicious—
5 lbs.	.49	...
4 lbs.	...	.50
Granulated soap, large size	.34	.42
Pork sausage	.49	.49
Canned milk, 2 tins	.29	.32
Canned applesauce	.10	.15
Margarine	.41	.45
Brown sugar, 2 lbs.	.25	.31
Eggs, A large	.52	.55
Baby foods, 3 tins	.26	.28
Vegetable shortening, 3 lbs.	1.17	1.45
Grapefruit, half dozen	.25	.46

> The items in the above list are either standard brands distributed both in Canada and the U.S., or items of comparable grade and size. It was to be expected that fresh fruit and vegetables in the U.S. at this time of year should sell more cheaply than in Canada. But there is no apparent reason why many cuts of meat should cost more on this side of the line. Nor is there any apparent reason why margarine and shortening should be dearer here. Nor is there any obvious reason why eggs, milk and soap should be cheaper in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg.
> For many years Canadians accepted as inevitable that motor cars, radios, electrical appliances and all sorts of gadgets were cheaper south of the line. They consoled themselves with the thought that it cost the people in the U.S. much more for food. Apparently Canadians are now deprived even of this consolation, if the above price comparisons mean anything.
> Those who claim that Canadian food prices are simply following United States prices in the current upsurge are apparently talking through their hats—hats that would probably cost less in the States.

I believe that proves the fallacy of what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, that if the consumer wants to have cheaper beef we cannot sell our cattle to the United States. We are selling our cattle to the United States, and beef is cheaper in the United States than it is in Canada. The editorial I have just read proves that, and I have been to the United States and have seen it for myself. I have checked it. I made a special trip on Saturday afternoon to find out just what was going on. The producer is receiving more, but the price to the consumer is lower, as I was able to see when I was there.

I believe that the middleman or the wholesaler, the packer and the people in the middle are afraid that price controls are going to be established and they are making sure that the price is high enough when price control comes on. I am also of the opinion that the people who believe in the private enterprise system, as we have it today, are taking more than the traffic will bear; they are too greedy. For instance, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) put a three-cent tax on a packet of cigarettes; the next day there was four cents added to the price. There is no reason for that procedure so far as I can see. That sort of thing is going on right along the line. I could quote a few more examples where the tax has been put on and then just a little bit more has been added to the tax.

The old days of competition have gone completely, because everything is now run by monopolies. For instance, as to the packing industry in Canada, I think there are only about four firms which control the whole thing. If you go back through the records of the House of Commons you will find described how they meet in the morning in order to agree on the price they will pay that day. If that sort of thing goes on, the days of competition are gone forever. You have monopolies and they are now so powerful that I sometimes think they have quite a strong influence on the government.

I have here in my hand an editorial which appears in tonight's Journal. Even the Ottawa people are seeing the thing as I see it. The editorial is headed "Prices Here and in the U.S.", and it reads as follows:

Washington dispatches tell of further increases in U.S. prices of goods and farm products. The wholesale index now stands at 183·6 per cent of the 1926 average.

But let none of us have belief that living costs in the U.S. are higher than in Canada. U.S. rentals and food prices are higher, but not a whole list of other things that enter into the living costs of an average family. Textiles, clothing of all kinds, cottons, dresses for women, shirts for men, rayons and silks, household appliances, refrigerators, radios, motorcars—all these things are cheaper in the U.S. than they are in Canada. Indeed, since the application of Mr. Abbott's recent taxes, refrigerators, stoves—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should discuss the budget at this time.

Mr. Bryce: If I am wrong, Mr. Speaker, I will stop. But I am only quoting. I am not discussing the thing. I am giving the other fellow's opinion.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should do that at this time.

Mr. Bryce: As I have said already, I do not want to do anything that is wrong. But I have not a university education as have some of these other hon. fellows, and I am trying to show that the cost of living in Canada is higher than it is in the United States, whereas we are being told different by the government. I have only three more lines to read, Mr. Speaker. May I read them?

Mr. Speaker: I suppose I may give the hon. member that latitude; but the point I wanted to make was that we should not discuss the budget resolutions at this time, nor refer to them. Under the circumstances, however, I will allow the hon. member to quote the three more lines.

Mr. Bryce: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your kindness. The editorial continues:

—and other so-called "luxuries" are considerably cheaper in the U.S.

We hear much from time to time of the need of protecting Canada against U.S. inflation. A window-shopping tour in any big U.S. city hardly bears out such need; nor does a glance at the advertisements in U.S. newspapers.

I was bringing this editorial to the attention of the house in order to back up what I myself had seen. I do not think I need to say any more, Mr. Speaker. I have made my point, or at least I have tried to do so. Prices are still rising and the government do not do anything about it. The living standards of the people here and elsewhere are going down. That is a disgraceful thing to happen in this fine country of ours. I am going to appeal to the government to check these rising prices or to do something about the matter. In 1949 the people sent this government back to power, and the least the government can do is to protect them against high prices.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty to my constituents if I did not say a few words in this debate, inasmuch as I represent a part of this country in which there is perhaps a higher percentage than elsewhere of people who suffer from any increase in the cost of living. To Vancouver island many people from the prairies and from other parts of Canada move during their ageing years; hence I find that in the outskirts of Victoria and on the southern portion of the island there is a high percentage of retired civil servants, retired railway workers, pensioners from the services —people who have accumulated small savings and have hoped to live on those in the milder climate. It is that class of people who suffer more than any other class when the cost of living goes up.

I do not feel that the situation is something which can be remedied overnight. The world situation as it developed after world war II does not permit of any easy or clear-cut solution. We are apt to be living in an age in which crisis and tension will follow one after the other, an age of great difficulty, an age in which sacrifices will have to be made by people in every walk of life. But if the Canadian people and those of the other free nations of this world are prepared to live up to the demands of this particular age, I believe that we may be able to avoid another era of blood, sweat and tears. If that be so, then I think we must look at the attitude of the people of Canada as a whole, not necessarily the attitude of those people I represent. Strange as it may seem and, perhaps, strange as it may be for an opposition member to say, I do not believe that the majority of people in this country are concerned about the high cost of living. A great many of them are enjoying high wages. They are living right up to all their earnings. I would say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that it is not the high cost of living that the people are concerned about but rather the cost of high living. Until we can bring it home to the people of this country that they have to go back to the days in which the virtues of thrift and saving were recognized as virtues and not something to sneer at as belonging to an old era, we are never going to get a government that leads. The government are not leaders today. Any government are a flock of sheep. They follow what the people want them to do and they will say to themselves: Well, the people are not asking us to reduce the high cost of living; they are asking us to reduce the cost of high living. So you find that the government quite complacently goes along and says: We do not have to do anything about this. This is the situation which exists in the country. We do not mind very much about that small 10 per cent of the people who are really suffering from the high cost of living. And so perhaps it is wrong, or perhaps it is unusual, shall I say, for a member of the opposition not to take full advantage of pointing out all the errors of the government. I do point the finger of accusation to the people of Canada today and say that they are not really facing up to the situation, and that as soon as there is a demand from the majority of the people of Canada to reduce the high cost of living, and not the cost of high living, then the government, whatever party may be in power, will accede to their wishes and something will be done.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Some hon. members I presume are groaning with pain. I am sorry—

Mr. Abbott: Pleased anticipation.

Mr. Hansell: —if I have to inflict more pain upon them, but if prices do not come down pretty soon we shall all be in pain.

The reason I rise at this moment, Mr. Speaker, as I fancied the debate was going to close, was that I did not see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) rising to his feet, and I do not believe that this debate should close until we have an answer from the minister. Surely, when an amendment of this kind is sponsored by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew), and a debate has gone on for several days on a topic of such paramount importance in Canada today, we have reason to ask the Minister of Finance to answer the various charges and speeches that have been made on the amendment.

I get a little bit tired of this matter of coming down here and assuming that we are simply a debating society desiring to put things on Hansard, hoping that in the process we might perhaps get a little publicity one way or another, and pit one party against another. What we have in Canada today is a situation which is serious. That situation is explained in the amendment, and I do not believe that we should let this debate close without the minister satisfactorily giving us an answer, and an answer that is something more than an ethereal something that simply glosses the thing over or passes the buck. My leader whispers in my ear that the minister should not treat this matter with a conspiracy of silence.

We have a right to know. That is what we are here for. I do not believe that we should vote a dollar to the government until they satisfy us on these things. We know we are not voting money under the present motion, but there is more than one way of getting the minister to give an account of himself. We are trying to get into supply, and if he wants the money he had better come through with the answer. That is about the way in which we have to treat these things.

Surely the man who is responsible for the financial policy of this country, which policy results in the rising or lowering of prices, the amount of money that is in circulation, whether production is high or low, is the Minister of Finance. He is more or less directly responsible for that situation. He has his advisers. There is no reason in the world why he cannot give us an answer. It is not satisfactory to say that his answer is contained in his budget speech, because it is not there. Since he has his advisers, there is no reason why he could not say to this house: Well, now, if you really want to get down to brass tacks, if you really want to know the reason, we shall ask the banking and commerce committee to sit, and you can call in my advisers and they will tell you the reason for the high cost of living. That is, if the minister is not willing to stand before that committee himself, because somebody is behind the scenes pulling the wires, somebody is responsible for financial policy, and I think we should know who it is, and why they have permitted those things to happen.

Surely the minister must realize that he has an obligation to this parliament and to the people of Canada. I know what he says to us. Generally speaking it is: Well we are just one country of many and the situation is a sort of world-wide thing; just as though that excuses us. He reminds me of a song that was quite popular when I was a boy. I have forgotten how it goes, but I used to whistle it. The first line was: "Everybody's doing it."

Mr. Fraser: "Everybody's doing it now."

Mr. Hansell: Everybody's doing it now. Well, simply because everybody is doing it, does not mean that it is right. Because every other nation gets itself into this same sort of mess it does not mean that we have to get ourselves into the same mess.

Mr. Blackmore: Or a worse one.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) spoke this afternoon, and he put some mighty interesting things on the record. There is no reason why the minister should not come through now and explain his position in the light of the authorities that the hon. member for Lethbridge quoted.

We live in an amazing country. We have a population of 12 million people.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is 14 million.

Mr. Hansell: We have a vast rich land and a great agricultural industry. There is no reason in the world why we should have to question whether or not we are going to eat tomorrow. I am not painting the picture too black. That is exactly what some people will be asking themselves if prices go any higher.

During the depression days we had a situation of unemployment. The old bogey was trotted out: Well, it is a universal problem. Just because other countries had an unemployment problem was no reason why we should have had it. But what happened? In those days goods were in abundance but people had no money in their pockets and the financial policy of the government was not able to take care of the situation. What happens today? Today people are employed; they have a bit of money, but prices have sky-rocketed so high that their money cannot reach the prices. So you have the same effect today that you had in the depression days. Surely the minister cannot absolve himself from responsibility in connection with those two features, depression in those days, goods but no money to buy them, and then today with money in our pockets we find prices so high that we cannot buy goods anyway. His financial policy is responsible for it. They did not have a policy in the unemployment days, and they do not have a policy now in the days of high prices.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) interjected to say that he did not have the university education that some other people have. Let me tell him that it does not take a university education to understand that you cannot buy meat at a dollar per pound with 75 cents in your pocket. As a matter of fact you might say that it is the university boys who have got us into this economic teeter-totter. Perhaps if they had a few people on the job who were realists and did not get mixed up with all these intricate things we would not be in the mess we are. We have the modern intellectual: more brains, less wisdom; more education, less knowledge.

That is the situation. Quite often people come along to me and ask me whether I am a Social Crediter. I tell them I am and proud of it. Then they tell me that they cannot understand Social Credit. The first thing I poke back at them is something concerning our present monetary policy and I find that it is the present money system they do not understand. The things behind the scenes are so complicated that people are left in darkness concerning that very vital subject.

I am going to sit down, but first I say to every hon. member: We should demand of the minister that he give us an answer as to why his policy has permitted prices to rise and as to why his policy is not able to take care of the high cost of living. His responsibility demands that he tell this house why. Is the minister going to reply or is he going to sit still and indicate to the house that he has no reply?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take only a very few minutes. As I said the other day, unlike some hon. members of the house I try to avoid repetition. It is three or four weeks since on the invitation of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) I expressed in language as clear and succinct as I could my views as to what caused the current inflation and what the Canadian government was doing about it. I do not propose to repeat those views tonight. During my budget speech I spent considerable time reviewing again some of the causes of the current world-wide inflation which, as I indicated then, so far as Canada was concerned was largely an imported inflation.

I told what the Canadian government was doing in order to counteract these inflationary forces on the domestic scene. I appreciate greatly the deep faith displayed by some members of the house that the Minister of Finance or any minister of finance can cure inflationary forces which exist in Canada or in the rest of the world, but I want to assure them that their faith is completely misplaced if they think that I or any other person in my position or any government can cure those forces.

I was particularly interested this evening in hearing the brief but excellent speech by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). With almost all that he said I am in complete agreement. I could not agree with his criticism of the government, but I was pretty well in agreement with the rest of the speech. One of the main reasons why we are having inflationary forces in Canada today is that every highly organized pressure group in the country is trying to make sure that rising prices are not going to affect them.

Cost of Living

On another occasion I made the statement that inflation is something more than an arithmetical fact, that it is a question of psychology and behaviour. Every time the costs of things rise, the highly organized groups in the country attempt to get higher wages or higher prices for their own particular products. They simply add fuel to the fires which we are trying to put out. I was particularly struck by what the hon. member for Nanaimo said. We cannot expect to superimpose a war effort of the dimensions we are now contemplating on an economy which is already fairly well employed without one of two things happening: either we increase our production or we diminish our standard of living.

It may be that some of the highly organized groups in the country will be able to maintain their position, but it will be at the expense of the people to whom my hon. friend referred, the pensioners, the people living on fixed income, people who are not highly organized. As I said the other day when speaking on the budget, the fundamental cure for this thing is for everybody to work harder and longer. We must do that if we want to maintain our present standard of living.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, there are several things which I should like to say about the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Before doing that I should like to say to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) that when he is congratulated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and applauded by Liberals he should beware.

The minister has asserted, not only tonight but upon previous occasions, that the inflationary trend within our country is a world-wide phenomenon, that it is imported. I am certain that if we were to go to the United States certain officials connected with that government would give the same answer, and the same would be true elsewhere. If that is to be accepted as a justifiable explanation for the conditions which prevail, then I ask: Is there any hope of solving it, or where is the start to be made?

Earlier this evening the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) gave his definition of inflation. I have no particular argument with his definition. All the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) did this afternoon was to elaborate upon certain fallacious beliefs which some persons harbour in connection with inflation. He also elaborated upon certain very real conditions which lead to inflationary trends within a country.

This is the thing which struck me most forcibly tonight. This amendment was moved on April 9. We have had the budget and prices are still going up day by day and hour by hour. The government has made a substantial contribution toward that condition. True, we pick up our newspapers and find demands being made for higher wages. Why? When a man reaches a condition where his wife cannot pay the accumulated accounts at the end of the month then in the absence of a government policy to meet the situation he has no alternative but to demand more in the way of income. We pick up the newspapers and we find the railways, for example, asking for another 14 per cent increase in freight rates, something that could be wholly disastrous to the economy of western Canada and many of those persons in western Canada who today are confronted with the high cost of living in all its hideousness.

We have not only had the budget but I would say to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) if he were here that we have also seen them fire General MacArthur, and that has not stopped the cost of living going up. Everything that has been done since this amendment was moved has had a tendency to force prices up and up and up. The pensioner, the person who finds it utterly impossible to meet the cost of the essentials of life today, is asking where it is going to stop. The same is true of low paid employees, and I dare say there is probably a larger percentage of them in the employ of the government than in the employ of any individual or groups of individuals. Why, Mr. Speaker, we even have to authorize some of them to go and baby sit in their spare hours in order to make enough money to meet the cost of living.

We have the widowed mothers, many of them trying to raise young families on $30, $40, $50 or $60 a month. We have our veterans of world war I and world war II trying to struggle along on pensions and war veterans allowances and their widows on allowances which have been granted to them We have many other groups whom it would not be difficult to mention. When I was back in the west during the Easter recess this was the common subject of discussion. The question most frequently asked me was: What does the government intend to do with respect to the problem of the present cost of living? I told them what the government had indicated as being its policy. I had to pass the comment at the same time that I could not be convinced that their policy would have any immediate favourable effect upon the problem confronting them.

All one has to do is to examine certain available statistics to realize what has occurred since 1946. In that year we find that the cost of living index stood at 123·6; in 1947, 135·5; 1948, 155; 1949, 160·8; 1950, 166·5; and the latest figure we have for 1951 is 179·7. If this debate were prolonged for a few more days it is conceivable that we would have more reason for speaking with greater heat than anyone has spoken upon this occasion because it is my understanding that the cost of living index for the month of March will be issued in a few days. Then we will be able to judge the effects of everything that has been done up to this time to meet the situation.

A person having the average per capita income of $786 in 1946, on the basis of a cost of living index of 100, found himself deprived of $150 in purchasing power as a consequence of the inflationary condition. If he received the average per capita income of $822 in 1947, based on the 100 per cent cost of living index he would find that he had lost $215 as a consequence of the inflationary trend because based on the cost of living index of 1947 his $822 had been reduced to $607 compared with the base period when the cost of living index was 100. In 1948, if his income was the average per capita income of $919, based on the cost of living index of 100, he would find that by the end of that year his $919 had been reduced in effective purchasing power to $593, a loss in purchasing power of $326.

In 1949, with the average per capita income at $935, comparing the base period cost of living index of 100 with the index for that year of 160·8 the $935 would be worth just $582, or a loss of $353 in purchasing power compared with the base period. Then we come to 1950 when the average per capita income was $962. Taking the cost of living index at 100 it would be worth $962, but since the cost of living index was 166·5 the $962 had fallen to $578, or a loss of $384 in purchasing power. Then let us take the figures for 1951 up to the time of our last cost of living index announcement. The average per capita income during that period was $961, but having regard to the fact that the cost of living index was 179·7 the $961 had been reduced to $535, meaning a loss in effective purchasing power of $426.

These figures, Mr. Speaker, can be applied to any income that you may desire to take. I simply took the average per capita income for each of the years from 1946 to 1951. It is when hon. members are prepared to sit down, take these figures and undertake to ascertain their meaning as applied to old age pensioners and pensioners of other types, those trying to live on savings and our low income group of employees, that they will see exactly what effect the perniciously high cost of living has upon these groups of people. We have said before and we repeat that there is every evidence that health is being undermined as a consequence, and every evidence that morale is being undermined as a consequence. Of course the effect of these two things can certainly be adverse so far as any defence effort is concerned.

Recently in a speech in this house I indicated that I had received a great many communications from one dry-goods dealer in a town in my constituency. Since that time I have added a great many letters to the nineteen which I had then received showing the tremendous increases in the retail prices of footwear and clothing since the first of the year. The increases run as high as 25 per cent. I think we all realize that in any family where there are a number of kiddies, clothing becomes a very important item in the family budget.

As things are going today the only apparent solution is to go to the constituency of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and join the Doukhobor sect known as the sons of freedom. If this keeps on I am afraid that is where many Canadians with low incomes will have to go. We know that the index for February showed the cost of foodstuffs running as high as 224·5 points as compared with 100 for the base period. It is my personal conviction that the most substantial item in the family cost of living, particularly where there are kiddies, is this matter of food. Merchants tell me today that their customers are finding it more and more difficult to meet their accounts at the end of the month. Not long ago it was my privilege to attend a dinner which also was attended by a group of twelve men engaged in the hardware, grocery, and other businesses. I asked them to tell me frankly what was their experience, and as I said a moment ago they pointed out that more and more people are unable to pay their accounts at the end of the month. I asked if that appeared to result from the fact that people were buying many things that might be characterized as luxuries. Their reply was that on the contrary there was every evidence that people were cutting down more and more, and purchasing only those things which could properly be regarded as strictly essential. Some of those merchants told me that in many cases there was a falling off of volume, that people were spending the same amount of money but were obtaining substantially less for it.

I asked one of these businessmen whether it was his belief that many prices had been hiked unnecessarily as a consequence of the government's failure to indicate definite action in connection with price control. He told me of an interesting experience he had only a week before. A traveller came into his store and indicated that the price of a certain commodity had been increased by fifteen cents. He asked the traveller if he thought that increase was justified. The reply was that it was not, but since the government had employed a policy of controls if necessary but not necessarily controls they had increased their price by fifteen cents, so that if there was a cut-back of five cents they would still be ten cents ahead of the game. That sort of thing has taken place in many instances. True, there are many business people who have not taken advantage of the situation, but there is ample evidence that a great many have. I feel very much as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) expressed himself. We think we should definitely come to grips with this question and not just pass it off with the opposition voting for an amendment and the government voting against it, then allowing the matter to die. The hon. member for Macleod suggested that it would be a good thing if a matter such as this were referred to the banking and commerce committee of this house. Whatever else may be done I would urge that this course be followed. I am positive that as a result we would obtain some very enlightening and also very surprising facts.

I do not desire to take any more time on this occasion, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion let me emphasize that across this country we have groups of people who are finding it virtually impossible to pay their way. Only the other day I had a letter from an old age pensioner. Both he and his wife receive the maximum pension. He said that up to the present time, by cutting a few corners, they had been just able to pay their way, but that now they had reached the point where that seemed virtually impossible. If that was the case where both were receiving the pension, what must be the situation in the literally thousands of cases where only the husband gets the old age pension? Once again we urge the government to take appropriate action to meet this situation. The effects can be far more serious, as far as our nation is concerned, than some people seem to think.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) outlined his own philosophy and possibly that of the government on this whole question of the increased cost of living which is bothering members of this house and the people of Canada so much today. As I understand his philosophy it amounts to this, that the cost of living will continue to rise as long as various pressure groups within the country continue to try to get more and more for themselves. That is nothing new; that has been going on since the beginning of time. The minister implied that people are pretty well looked after because most of them belong to one or the other of the pressure groups who are getting more and more for themselves.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no, he did not.

Mr. Hees: There is one very important group which many hon. members have pointed out in the last few days is not looked after; that is people on fixed incomes, such as pensioners.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that he has already spoken in this debate, and he may not speak twice. He spoke at page 1757 of Hansard.

Mr. Hees: I think you will find that I spoke during the budget debate, but not during the cost of living debate.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member spoke on April 9 at page 1757 of Hansard.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Perhaps I can say a few of the things which were in the mind of my hon. friend. I listened with interest to the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) because the defence he put up, if it was intended to be a defence, was remarkably poor. The minister said he had not prepared it, and that I can well believe; but if he had prepared it I doubt if it would have been any better. There was no inkling or suggestion of a clue as to what the government was prepared to do about this tremendously vexing problem of higher prices and the rising cost of living.

The minister said there were pressure groups. I do not know what sort of pressure groups he had in mind; perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) could enlighten me. It would be very interesting to hear that the judges of Canada came down here as a pressure group to get an increase in pay or in pensions. I would doubt that such was the case; I rather think that out of the goodness of his heart my hon. friend decided to give the judges of this country a little more money, of course thereby adding to the inflationary trend which the government has deplored. He is willing to do that for a certain group, which perhaps is not a pressure group, but he is not willing to do it for others.

There are two basic pressure groups in this country, of course. There are those who want controls taken off and kept off. That pressure group is made up of members of chambers of commerce, industrialists, managers of industries and entrepreneurs. That is the pressure group that has got the ear of the government, for the simple reason that the government is obviously the political arm of big business. There is another pressure group made up of the working section of this country, organized labour and organized agriculture, who for some time now have been asking that controls be reinstituted; but the government has turned a deaf ear.

There is a small pressure group made up of superannuated civil servants who are hoping to get some relief from the Minister of Finance, but they are not strong enough to be heard. There is a larger pressure group, but very weak, made up of old age pensioners who are hoping that some alleviation may be made of their tragic situation as it exists today, but they are not powerful enough to be heard; they are not powerful enough to be felt. So the pressure group which has the ear of the government is obviously that which wishes to see no controls imposed at all on this country.

It is true that organized labour wishes to see increases in wages when there are increases in prices, but the price increases always come before the demand for wage increases. The worker has to negotiate, to conciliate, to get his increase. On the other hand his employer has a perfect right at any time to raise the price of what he sells to whatever height he thinks the traffic can bear. The Minister of Finance said something else, a song which he is continually giving to us. He talked about the need for an increase in production. If we could get an increase in production, then prices would fall, he argues. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that production has been increasing in Canada.

Mr. Abbott: But very slowly.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): It has been increasing slowly or quickly, but it has been increasing and prices have been increasing. His argument, therefore, falls to the ground. Even though as he says the increase in production has been slow, nevertheless there has been an increase and there has been no corresponding decrease in the cost of living. It has been quite the reverse; the cost of living has gone up.

There is another factor in the government's policy which impresses me; I am sure it has impressed others. People realize today the dollar is becoming worth less and less. They realize that the dollar bill, as such, is losing value. They are determined, therefore, to buy things because in things there will be some value. Therefore, by carrying out this deliberate policy of not imposing controls, the government is merely telling the people of Canada, "We are not going to impose controls; prices will probably rise and the best thing you can do is to buy those things which you need, and spend more". This is adding to the inflationary spiral which exists. There is only one political group in this country which I am satisfied is welcoming the government's decision, other than the Liberal party, and that is the communist party. They realize that inflation will hurt many people, will make them discontented, and it is on conditions such as these that the communists batten. They are amongst those who welcome the government's policy, a policy of inaction which is bringing nothing but misery to the people of this country.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two things which I think still remain to be said on this debate on the cost of living. Some of them arise out of a statement which was made a few moments ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who adopted the attitude that, after all, this high cost of living is not peculiar to Canada; it exists in many other countries. It is, as it were, something which has been imported from outside; something which has descended upon us from the skies. It is universal, and the government really has nothing to do about it, no responsibility for it, and cannot do anything in any way to control it. There is a different attitude, Mr. Speaker, shown by the government with respect to anything for which they think they can claim credit. Then, of course, any good thing which descends upon this country, unlike the epistle according to Saint James, does not come down from on high but is solely and simply the responsibility of the government. All credit for those good things, according to the ministers who run this government, should accrue to them.

It is not good enough for any country, which carries on its affairs under a responsible system of government, for the ministers in charge of policy to say that this is something which is a universal complaint, and for which we have absolutely no responsibility.

Mr. Abbott: No minister has ever said that.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear that, because that is a different impression from the impression given by the minister in his speech a few minutes ago. It is a different impression from that gained from the speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and the Minister of Finance when he presented his budget.

Mr. Abbott: Just the contrary, he pointed out that there were certain things we could do domestically, and certain things we could not.

Mr. Fulton: I am very interested in hearing what the minister says, but if he wants to answer he can make a speech.

Mr. Abbott: I have said that I do not go in for repetition any more than is necessary. Unfortunately, that does not go for my hon. friend.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps it is not worth repeating.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps, as the member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) says, it is not worth repeating.

Mr. Abbott: That may be, and it is certainly true of a good many of my hon. friend's statements.

Mr. Fulton: When the minister knows he has said something which really does not bear analysis and will not stand up under examination, then he says "Well, of course, I do not believe in repeating myself." It is probably just as well that he does not, because then the fact that his remarks do not bear analysis and do not stand up under the searching light of examination would become even more evident than when he first made the statement. He is not the only minister in this government who has said that this inflation is something about which the government of Canada can do nothing, because we have to wait for the United States or some other country—

Mr. Abbott: No minister of the government has ever made any such statement.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Finance should perhaps read his own statement, and he should read the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Abbott: I have.

Mr. Fulton: And he should read the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

Mr. Abbott: I have, and neither of them ever made any such statement.

Mr. Fulton: Well, I recall very distinctly—

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Abbott: Quote Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Finance is never more effective than when he participates in debate from his seat. He is much more effective than when he participates in debate on his feet.

Mr. Abbott: He is good both ways.

Mr. Fulton: Obviously something which has been said here tonight is getting under the skin of the Minister of Finance, or shall I say getting under—well, quite obviously another portion.

Mr. Knowles: Under his skin or under his seat.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said it. I did not like to be personal. I do challenge any hon. member of the government, or any hon. member in any other part of the house, to read a statement on this subject by a minister as to what might or might not be done to control the increased cost of living and prevent inflation, that is to say to take direct action by the government, and to contradict me when I say their attitude has been that one of the requisites that must exist before we can take direct action is for a control policy to be instituted in the United States, and for that policy to take some effect there before we can do anything about it. I challenge any other minister or any other hon. member of the house to deny that the ministers of this government have repeated time without number, by way of excuse, that inflation and the rising cost of living is not confined to Canada alone. It is not something about which we should be distressed because it is a universal phenomenon; that was the word used by the Minister of Finance, and that was the description "universal phenomenon."

Mr. Abbott: World-wide, I think, was the word I used; world-wide phenomenon.

Mr. Fulton: Well, to be accurate, world-wide phenomenon. I am glad the minister corrected me. I am glad he admits to having used that phrase which he sought to deny a moment ago. So that that statement, repeated as it has been by the Minister of Finance, who says he never repeats anything—

Mr. Abbott: I was just correcting my hon. friend. I was not repeating it, I was correcting a wrong quotation.

Mr. Fulton: I am very interested in the minister's distinction between a correction and a repetition. They have made that suggestion, and they have repeated it as though it somehow excused the government of Canada from the necessity of taking any action to protect the people of Canada; as though the people of Canada are to relax and rejoice because they are not alone in their sufferings; as though we should find some consolation in the fact that we are not alone; that although the cost of living is high, and although suffering is caused to our old age pensioners, our retired veterans, retired service personnel and retired individuals who had tried, through their own efforts, to provide for their own retirement, even without government assistance, they should be happy because, after all, they are not the only ones who are distressed.

Mr. Knowles: Better retire the government.

Mr. Blackmore: But then we have a Liberal government. They should take comfort in that.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. As my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has said, the government's attitude—and this is about what it amounts to—is this: Let these people continue to suffer because, after all, there are others suffering in other countries, and those who suffer in Canada can always be consoled by the thought that they have not a socialist government such as the people have in England.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Or that they have not a coalition government such as the people have in Australia.

Mr. Knowles: In British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: Or that they have not the troubles that the people have in New Zealand or that they have not the troubles that the people have in the United States where General MacArthur seems to be taking the centre of the stage. The government attitude seems to be that here our pensioners and our retired people on fixed incomes can relax because, although they are sharing the universal difficulties with other countries, they have that unique, outstanding and unusual blessing, namely, that they enjoy government by the Liberal party here in Ottawa. That is the attitude of this government. That is about all the hope and encouragement they offer to the people of this country who are suffering—and they are not suffering abroad or overseas; they are suffering here in Canada—from the high cost of living.

Mr. Abbott: It is nothing to what we are suffering from now.

Mr. Fulton: I am quite sure the minister is suffering. The government do not like to hear people get up and criticize them. They do not like to hear people suggest that they could do something to ameliorate the situation if they would really put their minds to it and if they would not give us platitudes. This is the government which during the war and during the post-war years said so distinctly and so frequently that controls were the answer, controls were the thing that saved the people from the higher cost of living, controls were the thing which countered inflation in Canada. You remember, Mr. Speaker, as well as I do, and as well as every other hon. member in this house does, how the government took the credit for and boasted about the effects of its control program. No one maintains that controls will cure the basic cause of the evil. No one denies that other things are required to cure the things which cause this rise in the cost of living. But the government, by its own arguments in previous years with respect to controls, is stopped from denying that controls would check the disease, or that controls would prevent the cost of living from going higher. Admittedly, controls are a drastic measure. Controls are a measure which no one welcomes except one group in this house, and I do not wish to get into a political or doctrinaire argument.

An hon. Member: You had better not.

Mr. Abbott: Where is the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)?

Mr. Fulton: But no one, least of all the government that applied them, can deny that they did check the increase, and that during a period of emergency they were applied for that purpose. This government tells us that we are in a period of emergency, and they call upon the people of Canada for efforts which they would not normally be called upon to make in peacetime with respect to economic as well as military and tax measures. That government should not, I say, shrink from its responsibility of taking those measures which would enable the people in turn to put forward their best efforts, secure and protected in the knowledge that while they were doing so—as it were, concentrating all their energies on the task which lay before them, and which the government ask them to accept—this creeping paralysis of inflation, this disease of a constantly-increasing cost of living, would not be attacking them through the back door as it is doing today. This government which talks so much about the universality of the present state of affairs, which says that they can do nothing about it because the United States has not done anything about it, surely must have some answer to the fact that the controller of prices in the United States, Mr. DiSalle, speaking just a few days ago, said that Canada would have no alternative in his opinion but to apply controls when the full impact of the defence buying program hit this country. I should like to ask the government what steps they are taking to prepare a control program. We are supposed to be pumping $5 billion in three years into the stream of purchasing power in this country. Is that amount of money to be pumped in without any steps being taken to protect the people from the enormous inflationary effect that it will have? Are we to go along blithely waiting until some other country does something first? When are we going to reach the point where even the government will admit that the cost of living has risen to the point where something must be done? Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, why are the official figures on the cost of living index for the month of March delayed beyond the point at which they are usually delivered? This is the 30th day of April. To my recollection, the figures on the cost of living index for the previous month have never been delayed beyond the end of the month following.

Mr. Abbott: The sixth or seventh.

Mr. Fulton: Not of recent months.

Mr. Abbott: Last month they were published on the sixth or seventh of April.

Mr. Fulton: On the sixth or seventh of April?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: The fourth.

Mr. Abbott: Was it the fourth?

Mr. Fulton: On the fourth of April?

Mr. Abbott: Usually it is in the first week of the month.

Mr. Fulton: I should imagine that the Minister of Finance—or, if not he, then the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—would have a fairly good indication as to what the official cost of living index for the month of March was. Does the Minister of Finance know that?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Finance does not know. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here. Does the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) know?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Sinclair: Does the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) know?

Mr. Knowles: Did you ever see such an uninformed cabinet?

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is here. I believe the Department of Labour runs a cost of living index of its own. Does the Minister of Labour know what the cost of living index for the month of March was?

Mr. Gregg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if I did know, it would be improper for me, as Minister of Labour, to tell it to the house tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: Go on to the next one. He does not know.

Mr. Fulton: As to the Minister of Labour, I accept his concept of his duty as it applies to him, although I do not accept it as an accurate definition of the duty of a minister of the crown with respect to giving information to the house and to the country. I certainly cannot force the Minister of Labour to give information which he is reluctant to give, but I should still like him to tell me if he knows what the figure is.

Mr. Abbott: Make your speech; we are not in committee now.

Mr. Sinclair: Where do you think you are? In police court?

An hon. Member: Who is on the stand?

Mr. Fulton: The minister will not answer.

Mr. Sinclair: Do you know?

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) knows.

Mr. Gardiner: He does not even know you are talking.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Justice is not interested, Mr. Speaker, so we will pass along to the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley). I wonder if the Secretary of State knows what the official cost of living index is for the month of March.

Mr. Abbott: He has not been paying any more attention than the rest of us.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Fraser: There is one for the book.

Mr. Fulton: No; he has not been paying any more attention than the rest of them; and none of them have been paying any attention to their responsibilities.

Mr. Abbott: I withdraw that remark. I have been following every word.

Mr. Fulton: While they have been sitting there paying no attention to their responsibility over these months, the cost of living has continued to rise and will continue to rise so long as this lethargic—

Mr. Knowles: Uninformed.

Mr. Fulton: —uninformed, and uninterested government continues to sit here, neither interested in what the cost of living is nor concerned nor able to do anything about it, even though they do know—

Mr. Knowles: Try the parliamentary assistants.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: No, I would not try the parliamentary assistants, because they can only speak for their ministers.

Mr. Fraser: They do not know.

Mr. Fulton: If the ministers do not know, obviously the parliamentary assistants would not know either. You know, Mr. Speaker, we can make a joke out of this; at least the government can very easily, as they have just been doing, but it is rather more serious than that. It is serious; it is not a laughing matter nor a joking matter in the eyes of the people of this country. It is a matter on which the people of the country demand some action.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have a Gallup poll on it, anyway.

Mr. Fulton: We have evidence of what the people of this country think about the matter. We have evidence from the Gallup poll as to whether they think any action could be taken; and even if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) neither knows nor is interested in what the cost of living is, he is the head of a department.

Mr. Abbott: Speak more loudly.

An hon. Member: Send him a note.

Mr. Fulton: If he were to take more interest in the department, if he had any concern for the situation through the legislation which is on the statute books to investigate and to prosecute those who make unfair profits, he could do something to reduce the cost of living. The Minister of Justice shows no more interest in that matter than he has shown in this matter, or is shown by the other members of the government; therefore, Mr. Speaker, we can see through the attitude of the government, which they have shown in this debate tonight, that they regard this whole question as one to which they can show a supreme indifference, and one on which, when any member seeks to get information from the government as to what they propose to do, what are the facts upon which some action may be based, they take the attitude: Oh, well, after all, you are only a member of the House of Commons; you are only a member of the opposition, and what you say, speaking for the people of Canada, does not matter very much, because the government, even if they did know what the situation was, would not tell you, and if they told you they still would not do anything about it.

POSTAL SERVICE—CONDITIONS IN VARIOUS DISTRICTS

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair and the motion before us is put, I want to call another matter to the attention of the house, namely, the near chaotic condition of the postal service in the Toronto and district area. We have raised this matter in the house before and have been assured by the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) and the parliamentary assistant that steps were being taken to correct this condition. On my visit to my riding last week I found that conditions are deteriorating more than ever in so far as that department is concerned. I speak whereof I know because there are more than 100 postal employees living within my riding.

Since the once a day delivery was instituted I have been in contact with the majority of these postal employees, and I have received representations during the past week from three associations of postal employees all insisting that matters, instead of improving, are getting worse. What is far worse than the undermining of the morale of the postal employees which has taken place is the disruption of the postal service. I had numerous telephone calls at my home from citizens, most of whom are carrying on their businesses from their places of residence. A number of them told me that they had been going as much as two days in succession without any mail delivery at all. Others have told me that they can have no idea now of the time of the day they are going to get their mail. It may be delivered in the forenoon, and it may not be delivered until after dinner at night.

I was rather surprised to find in the Toronto papers some ten or twelve days ago a series of advertisements calling for mail carriers. When we were discussing this question in the house on an earlier occasion it was understood that the government's problem would be to find employment for those who were going to be relieved of their work by reason of the introduction of the one delivery a day. Instead of that we now find the government advertising for mail carriers. Some of those employed in the post office tell me that the department has been obliged to take men directly off the street without any civil service examination or civil service appointment and put them on the beats as completely untrained and inexperienced men to assist in mail deliveries.

What the mail carriers themselves have said to me is that in the first place they are still required to work more than an eight-hour day or a forty-four hour week. In spite of the longer hours there is no intimation whatever that they are to receive any compensation by way of pay for the extra hours worked. What is still worse, I am informed that the mail carriers are losing all interest in their jobs. I understand that a certain amount of clerical work has to be done by mail carriers in addition to delivering mail. I called some of this work to the minister's attention in a letter a few days ago. There is clerical work such as the re-direction of mail, keeping of records of changes of address and disposal of undelivered mail. I am told that these matters are now falling into arrears. Instead of being done at the time they should be done, sometimes they are left over for days or a week before being attended to.

The attitude the employees are taking is that if those responsible for the Post Office Department take the attitude that they are taking with reference to the employees, then there is just no point whatever in the employees themselves being more concerned about maintaining the service than are those officials responsible for it. Another matter has come to my attention. The one delivery a day is supposed to have been a bright idea that originated with the cabinet and was considered to be an economy measure whereby it would save $2 million or $3 million. I doubt very much whether that idea is the brain child of the cabinet ministers or anyone in the cabinet. In June 1949, the Canadian postal employees association through their national secretary forwarded a brief to the then postmaster general asking for certain reforms, changes and improvements in their conditions of work.

The postmaster general of that day, Mr. Bertrand, was away from Ottawa, and the deputy postmaster, Mr. Turnbull, replied to the Canadian postal employees association in the name of the postmaster general. His letter was written on July 7, 1949, nearly two years before the cabinet conceived the idea of one delivery a day for economy purposes. The deputy postmaster general on that occasion wrote as follows:

> In conclusion, I should again like to refer to the effect which further concessions would have on postal economy and which would inevitably bring in their train drastic revisions of present practices. These may include, for example, the reimposition of one delivery a day with lay-off of the surplus staff . . .

That was in reply to a brief submitted in June, 1949. That is the reply of the deputy postmaster general which to my mind constituted at that time a threat to the postal employees that if they persisted in asking for the forty-hour, five-day week, for permanent appointments for postal personnel, and for time and a half for overtime, they would have imposed upon them one delivery a day with lay-offs. That was the big stick which the deputy postmaster general held over the heads of the postal employees back in 1949. So I think one would be quite right in concluding with the postal employees organization that the application of this new order is simply the attainment of an objective which the deputy postmaster general, at least, had in mind for two or three years before it was introduced by the cabinet as an economy measure, and which was effectively used as a threat to keep postal employees from insisting on better working conditions.

I submit that the postal service as far as my particular riding is concerned has become so chaotic that nothing short of a thorough investigation by some independent committee will remedy it. I do not mind telling the Postmaster General that numerous postal employees in my riding are contemplating the possibility of going on strike and stopping the delivery of mail entirely. I suggest that is the last thing the Postmaster General would want, and the last thing the postal employees would want; but I assure him that the situation is becoming desperate. The minor improvements about which the parliamentary assistant told us the other day just are not meeting the situation. There are postal stations in Toronto where up to a week ago not a single walk had been checked. On many of the walks that were checked the supervisor was on the beat until nine o'clock at night before the delivery was completed. Many of those which were checked remain in exactly the same position as before.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and the house; and I assure the hon. gentleman that something more than the piecemeal efforts of the past few months is needed to remedy the situation.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, the point raised by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has been before this house on previous occasions, and I should like to join in his plea with respect to the whole question of the Post Office Department. But I would not want to confine myself to the one area dealt with by my hon. friend, because I am not sure that the troubles of the department in that area are any worse than they are elsewhere.

I believe the government and the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) must have come to the conclusion by now that all is not well in his department. It may be that the minister will have some explanation to give with respect to certain moves he is making in an effort to rectify some of the conditions that now exist, but I feel that nothing short of a full airing of the department is going to quell the public indignation which has arisen following some of the changes that have been made. When you have rural Canada up in arms over the mail delivery that is being given, when you also find that the urban sections are showing great dissatisfaction, I think surely it is time we had the matter investigated by the special committee that has been suggested so often from this seat. I do not like to think the mind of the government is so adamant in a case like this that it cannot be changed, because I cannot see that from their point of view they have very much to be concerned about in reference to a committee. If the Post Office Department is all right the government need not fear any kind of an investigation by any members of this house. If the department is not all right then every member has a right to find out what is wrong and to suggest a remedy. It seems to me that is a very simple conclusion. I do not want to suggest that the Postmaster General is trying to cover up the troubles of the department by hiding behind the smoke screen so often employed by the government and saying it would not be in the public interest. If ever anything would be in the public interest, in that it would satisfy the public and clear the air, it would be an investigation by a special committee of this house into the operations of the Post Office Department.

I am taking the risk of again treading the ground which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) so carefully delineated today; that is, I am going to risk repetition because sometimes the only way you can drill anything into this government is to repeat and repeat and repeat. Sometimes they turn a deaf ear in the beginning to some of the reforms suggested from over here, and then come to their senses later on. That is the one hope I have for the Postmaster General, and I express it now.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): What I wish to say fits in with what has been said already by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). I think the time has come when a good many matters in connection with our Post Office Department should be carefully considered and reforms instituted.

What I have in mind is that while a good deal can be said about the people who live in cities when they lose one delivery a day, and about the mail carriers who are losing some work as a result, I believe the worst treatment in connection with mail delivery is given those who live in small towns and villages, who have no mail delivery and who not only have to go to the post office to collect their mail but, if they want a box, have to pay box rental in addition. If we give free delivery in the cities, with the mail brought to the door and placed in the letter box, much more could be said for giving the people who live in the rural communities mail boxes without cost to the individuals who take the trouble to walk to the post office to collect their mail. Surely that should be apparent to every hon. member. I know that mail delivery in boxes comes to us from the early days of post office administration. It is something that has remained with us through the years and that we have taken as a matter of course. But I think the time has come when the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) and his officials should consider removing what I regard as an injustice and discrimination against those people who happen to live in the smaller places in Canada. I am making the suggestion to the Postmaster General that this is a matter which should be carefully considered, and this injustice removed.

I could talk about the people who carry the mail, and deliver it in the boxes that are located along the highways, the rural mail carriers, but I am not going to do that because an opportunity will be afforded when the post office estimates are before us. Since the delivery of the mail in the cities was brought before the house tonight, and quite properly, by the hon. member for York South, I am taking advantage of the opportunity of bringing to the attention of the minister the necessity for removing what I consider to be an injustice and a discrimination against the people—after all they are a very large portion of the population—who live in the smaller towns across Canada.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Since this discussion has been opened up in regard to the postal department, I do believe that this would be an appropriate point for me to refer to something which, previously, I have been able to deal with only by asking questions. I do so because it is something that does not apply to any one city, but which does require attention, and which does fit in with the suggestions that are being made for an examination of some of the problems that arise in connection with our postal service.

As many hon. members will recall, I have raised certain questions in regard to a situation which exists here in Ottawa, but which also exists in other cities across Canada. In Ottawa, there are a number of areas which have only been recently annexed to the city. In those areas there is no arrangement as yet in a considerable part for what is known as drop letter delivery. Representations have been made requesting drop letter service, but the answer has been given that in those areas which are not now receiving drop letter service the houses are not of the required density for a service of that kind, or the streets are not marked adequately to carry out that service. I am quite prepared to concede that there may be some difference of opinion as to what should be done in that case, but that does not answer the other part of the problem which seems to me to be utterly unjust and which should be attended to quite independently of the facts relating to the density of population or the marking of streets. In that, I am referring to the fact that in those areas letters require not a three cent stamp but a four cent stamp.

The people who live in those areas must put a four cent stamp on their letters, even if they are going to some other portion of the city of Ottawa. That might appear an injustice in itself, but what is a very real injustice is that in these days of postal advertising there are very few houses that do not receive a large number of circulars sent out to the household address or to people who purchase other things from some of the larger business houses. Quite naturally, those letters come out with a three cent stamp on the assumption that three cents will carry a letter anywhere in the city of Ottawa. I did not know that this point was going to be raised tonight or I could have brought here for this discussion a great number of letters that have been forwarded to me which are almost covered with postage-due stamps.

People who did not know that this was simply advertising material have been called upon to pay large sums of postage due, through the fact that someone sent letters to them thinking that they would be delivered in the ordinary city service. Many people, week by week, are called upon to pay a great deal in this penalty postage for reasons which are completely beyond their control, and representing no attempt, deliberate or otherwise, to disregard the requirement that four cents should be paid.

The answer that I received from the parliamentary assistant when I raised this question on one occasion when the Postmaster General was engaged elsewhere on the business of his department was to the effect that this was a statutory provision and that the Postmaster General could not vary that arrangement. I have pointed out by letter to the Postmaster General that since we are in session it is a simple matter for the government to introduce whatever amendment will deal with a situation of this kind. Other members who have spoken have indicated or have suggested that we have simply carried on from earlier days an arrangement which may have been perfectly satisfactory, but today conditions are much more complex in character. I believe therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General should plan now to make an appropriate amendment so that this subject will be dealt with during the current session.

Mr. Benidickson: All of that was out of order.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): The Speaker is quite capable of handling any situation that is out of order. I have some things to point out pertaining to my own riding, and particularly Haliburton county. For instance, there is only a three-day train service on one branch line going from Kinmount to Bancroft, and there is no railway mail clerk on that train. The mail bags are put on the baggage car, and thrown out at the different stations. From the time a letter is written until an answer is received from Toronto, it takes seven days. This is not very good service for a tourist centre which is developing rapidly. I am not asking the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) to inaugurate something that is going to cost more money, but something which will cost less money. The amount of money the Canadian National asks for hauling this mail now is far more than the cost of hauling it by truck. This would permit a daily mail service for less money, and it certainly would be a great advantage to the people living in that area.

I have a further grievance to take up with the Postmaster General in particular, and not so much with his department. A year ago a vacancy was created in the postmastership in the village of Bobcaygeon. The man who retired was eighty years of age. The day he was retired a young fellow was put in the post office by the department. After some seven or eight months a competition was held by the civil service commission, and the man with the highest marks in that competition—

Mr. Rinfret: But who failed on his written examinations.

Mr. Hodgson: No, he did not fail on his written examinations. The Postmaster General knows better than that, because he and I have talked it over. I have had correspondence on it both with him and the civil service commission. As to this fellow who won the competition, I have the form sent to him by the civil service commission saying that he won it. I will grant you that the marks were close. He won by only 1·1 per cent. But nevertheless, the man who won the competition served six years in the army, five years of them overseas with the artillery, in Africa, in Italy and on the continent. The man who got the job was in the air force for eighteen months, two months in England with the ground crew. Of course neither of them received the pension, according to my understanding; and from the standpoint of the veterans priority, probably the young fellow had as much right to the job as had the other fellow who had the greater service. But nevertheless it was done on the authority of the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret). He told me himself over the phone that his officials had decided on this, that the younger fellow had been put in the post office; although I have a letter from him, signed by him, stating that the fact of the man being put in there on a minute's notice would not carry any weight whatsoever when the competition was held, but that the man who received the highest marks in the competition would receive the job. The man who received the highest marks in the competition received on the 29th day of May—or it was dated on the 29th day of May—a notification that he had received the highest marks in the competition, and that his appointment would be made by the Post Office Department on or about September 30. But that is something which never happened. I was down here on the 29th of September. In fact, I was down on the 28th, and it was two days before I got talking to the Postmaster General about this situation. However, I told him then that his officials had made this arrangement. The deputy postmaster general was not in town and had not been in town, because I inquired. Who made the appointment, I do not know; but that is what was told to me. But I lay the trouble right at the minister's own door. He was head of the department, and I think he should not try to pass the buck on to any official. He told me that under section 24, I think it is—I am not sure of this because I have not the act here—of the Civil Service Act he is right for cause. I should like to know what the cause was.

Mr. Rinfret: Because there was a prior certificate issued by the commission.

Mr. Hodgson: I will show you the certificate issued by the commission. I have it in my office. I did not know that this matter was coming up, or I would have had it here.

Mr. Rinfret: There was a prior certificate issued in favour of the other man.

Mr. Hodgson: Two wrongs never made a right, and the minister should know that. If the civil service commission made a mistake on the first one, they certainly did not make any mistake on the second one; and they knew they sent the first one out when they sent the second one out. More than that, the minister overrode the civil service commission's decision under section 24, subsection (c) of the Civil Service Act. I should like to know what the cause was, because the man who did not get the job was recommended by the Canadian Legion.

Mr. Rinfret: Not from Bobcaygeon.

Mr. Hodgson: That was just three or four fellows who got together afterwards. That was three or four Liberals who got together afterwards.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hodgson: That legion was not formed when this man was chosen by the Canadian Legion. It was the Legion that they all belonged to, maybe ten or twelve miles from that town, but that area was all included. He was recommended by the Legion, by the general commander, by his commanding officer overseas. He was recommended by the reeve of the town or village in which he lived. He was recommended by the mayor of the town and he was also recommended by the defeated Liberal candidate.

Mr. Rinfret: Surely; and he was recommended by you too.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to know what the cause was that he did not get the job. That is what I should like to know. I should like the Postmaster General to declare himself on that point.

[Mr. Hodgson.]

Then I wish to say a word as to the couriers in the town of Lindsay. I think it is the only town in my riding that has mail delivery. These men are heavily loaded with mail. The other day one man's mail bag weighed over sixty pounds. When a man starts out with sixty pounds of mail on his back, going up and down steps from house to house, it means a fairly hard day's labour. Some have been laid off there. I am glad to say they have obtained better jobs, probably at better pay. But if the Postmaster General saw fit to increase the price of second-class and third-class mail, whatever it was, he is probably within his rights. He has to make his department pay. We are not asking first-class service at the expense of the government. I think he was wise to make reductions to make the thing pay but I think it is a big mistake to cut down the couriers to the degree that he did.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Just following the discussion previous to this about the high cost of living, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have had numerous complaints from the riding which I represent stating that the increase in the cost of mail delivery means a tremendous increase in the cost of living.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: This is another instance of a hidden tax and I believe the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret)—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate on the cost of living has been decided by the house.

Mr. Ferguson: I am dealing with the post office. I will admit that you cannot eat mail or make a suit of clothes out of it, but it affects the postal department. My subject affects the postal department, when the rates for delivery are increased by one hundred per cent by the postal department.

Mr. Rinfret: That is not right.

Mr. Ferguson: What does it cost now to deliver the usual weekly notice from the church and what was the cost a year ago, if I am not right?

Mr. Rinfret: The over-all increase was not one hundred per cent.

Mr. Ferguson: If I am not right, are you right in saying that I am wrong when I say that the cost has been increased one hundred per cent? I still contend that I am right. I am not saying that the increase is not justified, but I am saying that people are complaining about that one hundred per cent increase. It is a one hundred per cent increase.

Any time this government takes it upon itself to increase the cost of living by one hundred per cent, through any department, I think the citizens of Canada are entitled to a lengthy and thorough explanation of why this cost is increased by one hundred per cent. That is the question. These people want to know and they should know. If the increased costs are justifiable, I would point out that the public of Canada are long suffering. They have put up with this government for sixteen years, and I know they can take it. Surely in a matter of that magnitude, a one hundred per cent increase in cost of a department on any item is worthy of an explanation to the people. I can get no explanation, because apparently it is not in the public interest or we would have that explanation. I should not have to give it or try to give it, or try to explain it in any way. The explanation should have been given to the public long ago as to why such a drastic increase in the rate was going to be inaugurated or imposed on the citizens of Canada. What is happening to the money? Was it because of terrible inefficiency of the postal department prior to this drastic increase, or why was this drastic increase merited? Is it that there is to be some future terrific expansion that has never been known in that department before? The public should know. The opposition should know. If we knew these things, we would probably not be too critical; but we certainly have every right to criticize the great unknown, when the unknown is an increased cost imposed on thousands of people, to the extent of one hundred per cent on their cost of living.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a grievance that arises out of the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as it applies to the area which I represent in this house. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has been getting off pretty easy today, and I think perhaps this is just as good a time as any to raise this grievance and draw to his attention something that is happening. I think this is a justifiable grievance. I have received during the past three or four weeks scores of letters drawing this thing to my attention, and I have selected just one, which is typical of all that I have received, and I am going to refer briefly to the letter, Mr. Speaker, so as to draw the matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. This letter is from Dimsdale, in the Peace river area, and reads as follows:

> I am writing on behalf of seven persons all tributary to Grovedale post office. These persons, listed below, have been declared ineligible to receive P.F.A.A. benefits under an amendment to the act which declares any farmer ineligible who filed on a homestead after 1940.

The names of the people follow, but that is of no interest to the house. I continue:

> Information furnished to the farmers union of Alberta by the P.F.A. people in Edmonton was to the effect that the amendment was only intended to apply to an area in the southeast corner of the province where people had been once helped by the provincial government to move out of a drought-stricken area to more favourable locations. No doubt you will remember the circumstances.
> It appears that the vacated land there had been re-settled with the advent of more moist seasons. Then came more drought and constant application for P.F.A. benefits. Our information was that the amendment was to discourage settlement of that area. Now the amendment is interpreted to apply to all who entered on homestead leases from 1940 on. That does appear to me monstrously discriminatory.

During the spring session of 1950 an amending bill was passed through this house, and in the course of the discussion of the amendment on June 7 the Minister of Agriculture had these things to say, as reported at page 3310 of Hansard:

> What we say in the bill is that any lands that were not under private ownership at 31st December, 1940, are not to come under the act when they have been taken over from the government by some private person or organization. Lands that were still held by governments on the 31st day of December, 1940, do not come under the act as amended.
> The intention is that any lands still owned by the government after some forty or fifty years of homesteading, and almost as many years when the lands were open for purchase and nobody thought they were sufficiently good either to be homesteaded or purchased during that period of time, are not good enough to be brought under this legislation after it is passed. That is the only principle underlying the bill.

In the Peace river country there are hundreds of tracts of land, still considered as crown lands, that were not opened for homestead purposes or for sale until recent years. As a matter of fact, they were not even opened for agricultural leases by the government of Alberta until the past three, four or five years. The reason that they were not opened for settlement was that the government of Alberta tried to profit from the mistakes that had been made in the earlier years of settlement of the west, during which time settlers went away out in the far-flung areas, many, many miles from cities or from existing services, settled there, built up towns and villages, and settlements and then began to howl for services. That was the kind of haphazard settlement that went on in the days of dominion government administration of the natural resources of the prairie provinces.

To profit by these mistakes the government of Alberta said: We will open only those areas that are contiguous to already existing services, and we will hold in reserve, even though they may be perfectly good lands, any lands which are not contiguous to existing services, and we will hold them closed to settlement until such time as services are near, or until it will be practicable to extend the services to them.

These lands of which I am speaking in various parts of the Peace river country are lands that were so held in reserve by the government of the province of Alberta. They discouraged homesteading and settlement in those particular parts of the country; and it was only when the boys began returning from the services, the army, the navy and the air force after the war that they began to make these pieces of land available for settlement.

Instead of selling the lands outright the government there decided it would be wiser to form agricultural leases and grant these leases to the returning young men and other young men who had not been in the services, but who needed to get land to establish themselves on farms, granting these leases for a period extending over ten years. The terms of the leases include clauses making it possible for the lessee to purchase the land at any time before the ten-year period is up for a specified amount of money. However, it is the scheme under which young men who have not much capital can get started on a farm. A great many agricultural leases have been granted by the province on property there, and in an area where drought rarely strikes.

Let me say this, Mr. Speaker: In the Peace river country, although drought rarely strikes, the people who farm these lands have to pay the rates on every bushel of wheat which they market, and therefore they do qualify for assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, provided that they hold the property under the proper arrangement. When the minister put that amendment through last year I do not think he had in mind excluding from the act such lands as I have described to him. To support my contention I am going to quote further from what he said, as reported at page 3310 of Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Low the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Tomorrow we shall continue this debate, and if it is concluded we will call the five departments which were mentioned by the leader of the house on Friday evening. Then we shall take up the budget resolutions, and if they are concluded, the resolutions standing in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the order paper, followed by Bills Nos. 191 and 192; then the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) having to do with the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act; and then Bill No. 195.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply on April 27]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

523. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $6,498,350.

524. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $310,000.

525. Contributions, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to assist municipalities in the development of and improvement to airports, the sites of which have been provided by such municipalities, $130,000.

526. Contributions, as specified in the details of the estimates, to other governments or international agencies for the operation and maintenance of airports, air navigation and airways facilities, $244,920.

Administrative division—

527. Air services administration, $215,705.

B—General—

Air transport board—

528. Salaries and other expenses, including Canadian delegation to the International Civil Aviation Organization, $247,741.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1951-52

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1952, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this special supplementary estimate is for an item of $2 million to provide assistance to unemployable veterans who are in receipt of disability pensions under the Pension Act. Ordinarily I would make the formal motion that it be referred to the committee of supply, but since this estimate, together with other matters respecting veterans, is to be considered by the veterans affairs committee, I move instead:

That the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the special committee on veterans affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COLLECTION OF MONEY TO PROVIDE HOLIDAY FOR PAGE BOYS

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I want to thank hon. members of the house, members of the press gallery and a number of the elevator operators for the cheerful and generous response to the suggestion that the page boys be given a holiday. I apologize for not having got in touch with everybody yet, but the door is still open.

I will turn over to the Sergeant-at-Arms the list of donors, with what they have given. Your donations of a dollar or more must not prejudice the bonus for the page boys at the end of the session. The mayor of Montreal has telephoned an invitation, and he will show the boys the big things in his city. I suggest that next year the bachelors of the House of Commons should provide a trip for the stenographers.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Fourth report of special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Cleaver.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LEASED BASES AGREEMENT—RECOMMENDATION OF PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Referring again to the question raised last week by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick), I now have a statement relating to the United States leased bases in Newfoundland, about which the permanent joint board on defence has made certain recommendations. I apologize in advance for the length of the statement, but I think it is a matter of general interest to all members of the house.

In March, 1941, as hon. members will recall, the United Kingdom leased to the United States for ninety-nine years land for naval and air bases in several colonies and territories including Newfoundland. This leased bases agreement empowered the United States to establish and operate naval and air bases, and also provided extensive rights and privileges for the United States forces to be stationed at these bases. These rights related to such things as the jurisdiction of courts, customs and excise taxes, income tax, and military postal facilities. Pursuant to this agreement the United States established and still maintains four bases in Newfoundland. These are: Pepperell air force base near St. John's; Harmon air force base near Stephenville; McAndrew air force base at Argentia; the naval operating base at Argentia.

On February 10, 1949, in the course of the debate on union with Newfoundland, I made a reference to these leased bases. It might be useful if I repeated what I said then. It is as follows:

If and when Newfoundland becomes a part of Canada, those leases will still be valid leases affecting the lands described in them. They contain provisions which go beyond the provisions to which the Canadian government has agreed with respect to anything done by the United States government in the territory of Canada, and we hope that it will be possible to get the government of the United States to agree that it will not exercise those rights in a manner that would offend against our rights of sovereignty in Newfoundland. But that is something that will have to be brought about by negotiation and agreement with the government of the United States. The situation is the same as if the hon. member, having a farm, leased a building lot on it for ninety-nine years and then sold his farm. The acquirer would have to take the farm and respect the agreement the hon. member had made with regard to the building lot. But he could go to the man who had the lease on the building lot and try to make a new deal with him. That is what we intend to try to do with the government of the United States. But if they are not disposed to make any change in the arrangement, we shall be obliged to respect the rights that exist there, just as we shall be obliged to respect as a fact the existing situation in the territory of Newfoundland.

Before the union with Newfoundland we informed the United States government that the Canadian government hoped the United States would consider relinquishing some of the extraterritorial rights conferred by the 1941 agreement on United States forces in Newfoundland. The Canadian request said, in part:

In the opinion of the Canadian government the prospective change in the status of Newfoundland justifies a modification of the 1941 bases agreement in respect of the Newfoundland bases in order to bring that agreement into accord with the principles which, for many years, have governed the defence relations between Canada and the United States.

Thus the joint statement issued by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States on February 12, 1947, refers to the "underlying principle" that " all co-operative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory," and the recommendation of November 20, 1946, of the permanent joint board on defence, which has been accepted by both governments, states that defence co-operation projects in either country should be agreed to by both governments, should confer no permanent rights or status upon either country, and should be without prejudice to the sovereignty of either country.

In seeking the modification of provisions of the lease, the Canadian government recognized, as I have indicated, that we were asking the United States to give up legal rights of undoubted validity. As is customary in our discussions with the United States, the request was considered by the United States authorities on a higher plane than the plane of strict legality.

Our two governments decided to ask the permanent joint board on defence to examine and report on the Canadian request. The board undertook an exhaustive study of the complex questions involved, and the United States members, on behalf of their government, co-operated in a spirit of friendship in the search for a solution.

In March 1950 the board formulated a recommendation which has now been officially approved by both governments. This approval, which it is proposed to incorporate in an exchange of notes, will constitute a modification of the leased bases agreement. I am sure that all hon. members will share the appreciation felt by the government of the decision of the United States to give up voluntarily certain rights which were legally conferred for ninety-nine years by the 1941 agreement, before Newfoundland became a province of Canada.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

The recommendation of the joint board is in four parts which relate to income tax, customs and excise, postal privileges and the jurisdiction of the courts. I shall now table the recommendation and give a brief explanation of the effect of each part.

First: Income tax. On June 12, 1950, a new double taxation convention between Canada and the United States was signed. It has been approved by the parliament of Canada but is awaiting ratification in the United States. When it comes into force it will replace certain exemption provisions now in the bases agreement. In addition the board recommends that the United States waive the exemptions given by the bases agreement on contractors' profits, on United States civilian employees of such contractors and on the families of these employees. This part of the recommendation will place income tax exemptions of United States personnel in Newfoundland on the same basis as in the rest of Canada.

Second: Customs and excise. The United States will also waive duty and tax exemptions given by the bases agreement on: (a) contractor-owned equipment; (b) personal belongings and household effects of contractors and their United States employees other than on first arrival, and (c) individual purchases in Canada by United States personnel.

Customs and excise exemptions for post exchanges and service clubs will continue, it being understood that the United States authorities will endeavour to increase purchases for these institutions in Canada and will take special steps to prevent abuse of privileges continued under the agreement.

Third: Postal privileges. Originally Canada asked for replacement of United States military postal facilities by Canadian post offices. Although the United States authorities were not prepared to accede fully to this request, under the board's recommendation the United States will not establish normal civilian postal offices and will limit the use of their army post office system strictly to mail destined to United States territory or to other United States army post offices.

Fourth: Jurisdiction of the courts. This part of the recommendation covers four matters:

(i) The United States waives all rights of jurisdiction, permitted under the bases agreement, over British subjects and over aliens other than United States citizens;

(ii) The United States suspends for five years exercise of rights of jurisdiction over United States civilian personnel and all other rights conferred by article IV of the bases agreement, subject to revival on notice thereafter or in event of war or other emergency;

(iii) The Canadian government will seek to amend the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act to permit of compulsory attendance of witnesses at United States courts-martial;

(iv) The Canadian government will seek legislation to protect security interests of the United States forces in Canada, as required under the bases agreement.

The recommendation that the United States give up or suspend jurisdictional rights under article IV of the bases agreement is conditional upon the Canadian government, with the concurrence of the Newfoundland government, giving to the United States government assurances that the new arrangements will in practice give United States officials in Newfoundland a degree of jurisdiction comparable to that which they have in fact exercised up to now. The attorney general of Newfoundland has been consulted and he advises that there will be no difficulty about giving these assurances because, in fact, the United States officials have exercised in a reasonable manner their jurisdictional rights under the bases agreement. They have not, for example, attempted to exercise the jurisdiction over Canadian citizens which the bases agreement gave them.

What the condition and the assurances mean is that, in practice, members of the United States forces in Newfoundland will generally be dealt with by United States service courts, which is a reasonable and sensible arrangement in the circumstances. Corresponding treatment is in fact given to Canadian forces which may be stationed from time to time in the United States.

The board's recommendation will provide the occasion for the extension of the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act as revised to Newfoundland and remove what is perhaps the most objectionable feature of the bases agreement, namely, the right of jurisdiction by United States courts over Canadian citizens.

Referring to the recommendation as a whole, it meets most of the specific requests which the Canadian government originally put forward. Obviously a negotiation of this kind required a willingness on both sides to give and take. In the view of the Canadian government, the recommendation removes the features, most objectionable to us, of the taxation and jurisdictional rights conferred by the leased bases agreement.

The government will in due course be making to the house five legislative proposals flowing in whole or part from the recommendation.

In connection with the customs tariff it has already been proposed, in the budget speech, that item No. 708 of the customs tariff should be revised. At present it deals with customs privileges for the United Kingdom government only.

In connection with military post offices, an enabling clause will be included in the proposed bill to amend the Post Office Act.

In connection with the recommendation for security legislation, there will be two measures. First, a bill along the lines of the Official Secrets Act is proposed for the protection of allied governments. Second, a new section in the Criminal Code for the protection of property of allied forces is also under consideration.

It is proposed to add to the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act a new section under which the governor in council would have authority to provide by regulation for compulsory attendance of witnesses before United States courts-martial, in the same manner as now applies to courts-martial of the Canadian forces. This amendment will, for convenience, be included in a Canadian forces bill which will deal with a number of other subjects related to defence.

Of the five proposed legislative measures, only one will refer expressly to United States forces, and that is the amendment to the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act. When the time comes to examine the other four it will, I think, be agreed that, quite apart from the recommendation of the permanent joint board on defence, they are useful and possibly necessary measures to enable Canada to discharge obligations under the North Atlantic treaty.

The government believes that on consideration, hon. members will agree that the solution which has been recommended by the board is a reasonable compromise in an admittedly unprecedented situation.

Perhaps it may suit the convenience of the house if these recommendations I am tabling were printed as an appendix to Hansard today, so that hon. members will see the exact text.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the members of the house will echo the hope expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), that on consideration they will find this is a reasonable arrangement in regard to the leased bases which were taken over under agreement by the United States prior to the time that Newfoundland came into confederation. As I was not previously aware of any of the arrangements that had been made, I shall of course require to give that consideration, as will other hon. members. There are, however, one or two observations I should like to make at this point, in view of the comprehensive statement the Prime Minister has made.

I notice that the arrangement with respect to jurisdiction, which the Prime Minister has stated to be the most important subject under consideration, provides that the United States give up or suspend certain jurisdictional rights, but that is conditional upon their being able to exercise in practice, even if not in strict verbal legality, the same authority that they exercised before. This seems to be giving with one hand and taking away with the other. I am interested in why it is necessary to go through such substantial formality if in practice the situation in that respect is to remain the same.

There is one thing about which I am sure all hon. members will be in hearty agreement, and that is that the Canadian government found it easy to deal with the government of the United States on a friendly basis and were not being shoved around. There has been some concern aroused in the minds of the members by things said outside of this house, if not in the house, as to whether we are still operating on a friendly and democratic basis with the government of the United States. This statement by the Prime Minister will reassure the members, and in the proper place, that it is now, as it has been in the past, easy to deal on a friendly and satisfactory basis with the government of the country which geographically is closest to us, and whose destiny in the years to come is inseparably linked with ours. The statement that this required a willingness on both sides to give and take merely indicates the firm foundation on which agreements of this kind are and should be established.

The Prime Minister has pointed out that one of the legislative provisions contemplated as a result of this arrangement is an amendment to the Criminal Code for the purpose of extending a greater measure of security to the forces of the United States. He has indicated that it will likely take the form of a provision which is to give a special measure of protection to the forces of any allied country. In making that announcement he has emphasized the vitally important position that the new province of Newfoundland now occupies, not only in the defence of Canada but in the defence of the whole North American continent, and, as a result in the defence of freedom itself. No matter whether all the details of this agreement may be found entirely satisfactory after examination by those who live in Newfoundland and by other members of this house, certainly every one of us will hope that this agreement, in itself, may be regarded as a symbol of that firm and strong unity of purpose between these two countries, which is not only an advantage to ourselves but an advantage to the people of the whole world in these critical days.

I hope that the very necessity for introducing an amendment to the Criminal Code to increase the security of the allied forces will suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) the advisability of bringing in the long-required amendment to the Criminal Code which will make it possible to deal with any kind of threat to security by communist activities, whether in Newfoundland or any other place in Canada. This agreement in itself suggests the desirability of recognizing the constant threat presented to the defence of this country, and of every other country, by men who are serving a foreign state with the purpose of destroying our democracy by every device available. Most certainly they will seek, if it is within their power, to weaken this strong bastion of defence. Therefore, in view of the fact that there is to be an amendment to the Criminal Code for security of another kind, I once again strongly urge the consideration of that other type of security which would deal with this particular form of crime in a way that it cannot be dealt with under any provision in the Criminal Code which is now on the statute book.

In view of the importance of this announcement, I hope that the Prime Minister will be prepared to answer questions which may be presented by hon. members from Newfoundland, amplifying the information that we have received this afternoon.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, as I raised this question first with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I should like to say to this house that we in Newfoundland have to live with these Americans down there, that we have found them to be fine people to live with, and that our relations with them have been on the most cordial basis. It is a matter of satisfaction to have such a statement as that which has been given by the Prime Minister, showing that the negotiations were carried on in the most cordial and friendly manner. That is a matter of satisfaction to us in Newfoundland, and I should like to thank the Prime Minister for his full and explanatory statement.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) and, if the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) does not mind, I have two questions that I should like to ask at this time in connection with his statement, for purposes of clarification.

The Prime Minister referred to the jurisdiction of the courts. In that connection, I wonder if there is any difference in the position from what it has been in the past few years. In other words, if action is taken against a United States soldier for negligence —we will say, for instance, in connection with driving a motorcar, even when he is on United States forces duty; if judgment is obtained against him, the only recourse open to the individual who suffers the damage is to claim against the soldier himself, and not against the United States government as such. That is one point I should like to ask about. Has there been any clarification in that connection?

The other point is this. What is to be the situation with respect to the use of Goose Bay and Gander airports? They are not within the leased areas, but United States forces are there in great numbers at Goose. Are they to be included in the agreement as well? What is to be the situation at Gander? Then I believe there is to be an amendment to the Income Tax Act. What will be the position of United States nationals at Gander, say, in the employ of the air lines? Will they come within the provisions of this income tax amendment or otherwise, or what is to be the position?

Then the other question is one that was up before: in the event of war, what is to be the position with respect to the commanding of the forces in Newfoundland? Will the commander be a Canadian general or a United States general? Is there any change in the right to the United States forces to acquire other properties in Newfoundland if they require them? As provided in the bases agreement, they can take what properties they want in the event of war. Will that provision still be in force? Has any discussion taken place with respect to the use by Canadian vessels of docking facilities at St. John's and Argentia? I refer to the use of United States army docking facilities by Canadian vessels. Has any discussion taken place—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Higgins: This is the last question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: Order.

Mr. Higgins: I think I am in order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Higgins: This is the last question. Has any discussion taken place about extending to Canadians now working at United States bases the privilege of eating in the American cafeterias?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member said that he had two questions, but as I listened I became confused as to where the dividing line might come between the first one and the second; I am sorry that I am not in a position to give him a positive answer at this moment.

Mr. Higgins: Thank you.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FORMATION OF COMMONWEALTH DIVISION IN KOREA

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the formation of a commonwealth division in Korea.

The 25th Canadian infantry brigade group, now on its way to Korea, will join other commonwealth forces to form a commonwealth division. This was decided after discussion among the commonwealth countries concerned and has been welcomed by the United Nations unified command as simplifying problems of administration and command in the theatre.

The Canadian brigade will make up one-third of the combatant troops. In addition, Canadian officers and men will form part of the staff of the divisional headquarters.

The division will consist of the following units: The 28th and 29th United Kingdom infantry brigades; the 25th Canadian infantry brigade group; the 3rd battalion Royal Australian regiment; the 16th New Zealand field artillery regiment, and the 60th Indian field ambulance unit.

The title of the division will be "The First (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces", and the commander will be a United Kingdom officer, Major General A. J. H. Cassels, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O., late of the Seaforth Highlanders. The division will use the administrative and maintenance facilities now under the Australian commander in chief British commonwealth occupation forces in Japan, Lieutenant General Sir Horace Robertson. The senior Canadian officer on the divisional staff will be the general staff officer, class I; and we have appointed Lieutenant Colonel E. D. Danby, D.S.O., to occupy that post. By a happy coincidence, he is also a Seaforth Highlander —of Canada.

All Canadians, I am sure, will be pleased that our 25th brigade will be joined with formations with which the Princess Patricias have already distinguished themselves, all to form a unit in which forces of commonwealth countries will be fighting shoulder to shoulder to resist aggression in accordance with the aims of the United Nations.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

PROVISION FOR EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO MEMBERS OF SPECIAL FORCE AND OTHERS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I can obtain the unanimous consent of the house, I should like to make a motion to broaden the terms of the resolution which appears as No. 5 on today's order paper, under government orders, and which reads:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to make certain rights, privileges and benefits applicable to persons serving in that part of the armed forces of Canada designated as the special force.

The purpose of the proposed change would be to add the words "and to certain other members of the Canadian forces." The purpose of the amendment is to extend the benefits of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act and of the Unemployment Insurance Act to persons enrolled for service and officers and men of the reserve force who in either case, since July 5, 1950—which was the date of the creation of the special force, I believe—became members of the Canadian forces for a single term not exceeding three years. I understand that my parliamentary assistant has had the opportunity of discussing this matter with some hon. members on the opposite side of the house. If I can get the unanimous consent of the house, I will make this motion now.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lapointe: By leave, I move:

That the proposed resolution respecting certain benefits, etc., applicable to that part of the armed forces of Canada designated as the special force, as it appears in order No. 5 under government orders on today's order paper, be altered to read:

"Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to make certain rights, privileges and benefits applicable to persons serving in that part of the armed forces of Canada designated as the special force and to certain other members of the Canadian forces."

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution as altered, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Jutras be substituted for that of Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf) on the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ENLARGEMENT OF DIRECTORATE—ANTI-ESPIONAGE BRANCH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yesterday, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me, without previous notice, the following question:

Under the new arrangement for an enlarged directorate, will one of the assistant commissioners be in charge of the branch on anti-espionage?

I took the hon. gentleman's question as notice, and would now reply to it as follows:

The enlarged directorate referred to in the hon. member's question and in my statement of yesterday is the directorate of the administration and organization of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and its functions are as set out in my statement. This enlarged directorate will be in charge of assistant commissioner Josaphat Brunet. It, however, will have no direct responsibility with regard to anti-espionage, but will have an indirect bearing upon the work of this branch dealing with anti-espionage in the same degree as upon the work of other branches, since it will be dealing with the over-all administration of the whole force. The anti-espionage work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force is taken care of by the special branch which has to do with internal security in all its phases, including anti-espionage. This special branch since 1947 has been in charge of superintendent George B. McClellan, who is responsible directly to the commissioner.

AGRICULTURE

QUESTION AS TO USE OF LIQUID FERTILIZER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I gave him notice of this question, so he will understand it. Did the Department of Agriculture of Ottawa discourage the agricultural producers in the using of liquid fertilizers? If so, what was the Department of Agriculture's reason for so doing when the company manufacturing these liquid fertilizers had a permit so to do?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Because of the fact that the hon. member was kind enough to send me notice in advance, I have the answer here.

The Department of Agriculture has not discouraged the use of liquid fertilizer. However, there has been some controversy over some of the claims made by the manufacturer regarding its use, such as the treatment of seed grain before sowing. The experimental farms service conducted a large number of tests in 1950 and found that such treatment did not give significant results to the farmer, and this information was made available to the public.

BUTTER

REFERENCE TO STORAGE FIGURES GIVEN IN RETURN TABLED APRIL 12

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): On Thursday last the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked a question with regard to a return, in the following words:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. A return, sessional paper 159-A, having to do with butter held in storage and sold by the government, was tabled in my name on April 12, 1951. In this return it is stated that the total sales for January and February, 1951, amounted to 17,696,793 pounds, whereas total individual sales, according to the figures set out in the return, total 18,653,620 pounds. Will the minister find out why there is that discrepancy between the actual figures and the figures given?

In reply to the question regarding the apparent discrepancy between the amount of butter released from storage during the months of January and February, 1951, and the total individual sales as listed in the return tabled on April 12, I am informed that this is due to differences between the records of allocations of quantities to various dealers across Canada and the posting of the sales at Ottawa.

The figure of 17,696,793 pounds was the amount of butter delivered to those who applied for it, while the figure of 18,653,620 was the total amount of butter which had been allocated to those who had applied for it.

MANPOWER

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL—INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Will the minister say when the next meeting of the manpower advisory committee will be held? How many meetings has that committee held to date?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I understand from the joint chairmen of the national advisory council on manpower that arrangements are being made to hold the second meeting this month. The answer to the second question is that one meeting has already been held.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of labour conditions in the country today, and the great scarcity of adequate labour forces to fulfil the needs of industry, will the minister take under advisement the earlier calling of this committee, and possibly more continuous work?—because industry is suffering from a lack of adequate labour forces.

Mr. Gregg: As I indicated in my reply to the hon. member for Nanaimo, the joint chairmen, to my knowledge, are making arrangements to call the next meeting together at an early day. I cannot say this afternoon the exact day, but it will be during the month of May.

HOUSING

FRASERVIEW PROJECT—REPRESENTATIONS OF VANCOUVER HOUSING ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Has the minister received a communication from the Vancouver housing association urging consideration of the Fraserview veterans housing project? I understood the government had decided not to go ahead with the 500 remaining houses. I regret I did not have time to give the minister notice of this question. If it is not convenient for him to answer it today, he can accept it as notice.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Yes, I shall be glad to accept it as notice.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, April 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): When the house adjourned at eleven o'clock last night I was airing before the house a grievance arising out of the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I had described certain lands in the Peace river country that were adversely affected by the amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which was passed in the spring session of 1950. I stated in my concluding words last night that when the minister put through the amendment last year I did not think he had in mind excluding from the act lands such as I have described to him. I said that in support of that view I would quote from the speech he made in the house on June 7, 1950. These are his words as they are reported at page 3310 of Hansard:

> I want to make it perfectly plain that the bill does not deal with submarginal lands as such. It deals with lands which up to a certain date everybody considered were not good enough either to homestead or to buy. It is true that having set the date at December 31, 1940, there will be a few pieces of land in Saskatchewan particularly that were homesteaded after that date, and there will be a few parcels that were purchased after that date but they are largely in areas where the act would not apply in any case.

Those were the minister's words. I would ask hon. members to note that the minister said the amendment dealt with lands which up to 1940 were not considered by anybody good enough either to homestead or to buy. Those words would not apply, by any stretch of anybody's imagination, to lands in the Peace river country; because long before 1940 a good many applications had been received by the Alberta government for the outright purchase of or for homesteading rights on these parcels in question.

The minister knows, too, that these lands are situated in an area where, in nine years out of ten, there is ample moisture for the production of good crops. It seems to me that that is the very kind of land which the act originally was designed to protect. Even last year there was plenty of moisture; but in late July and early August two heavy hailstorms ripped through the area and riddled the splendid crops in an area fifty or sixty miles long and from one to perhaps fifteen or sixteen miles wide. Later in August, many parts of the country which had not been hit by the hail were visited by heavy frost. I believe it was on August 16, if my memory is correct, when there was one of the earliest and most devastating frosts on record, followed by a snowstorm which flattened many of the crops to the point where they never recovered. The result was that hundreds of farms yielded below the minimum required to qualify under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. There were many, of course, who suffered total failure.

The farmers affected are up against it in the matter of securing seed this spring, and they do not know where to turn for help. Everyone knows that the banks have tightened up on loans, which makes matters worse for these farmers. Another factor that aggravates the situation is that immediate neighbours of these lessee farmers who happened to own their own property, or to have leased the property prior to 1940, are being paid compensation for their losses which resulted from the same storms and frosts.

Again, the veteran farmers in the same block, many of whose farms border the area to which I am directing my remarks, are receiving payment for their losses, despite the fact they are leasing their lands from the Alberta government under contracts entered into since 1940. It appears therefore to those who are being denied the benefits of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, simply because they are on ten-year lease contracts, that they are suffering discrimination; and it is difficult to convince them that they are not.

I believe they are. Every year they pay their one per cent premium when they market their grain, and I know after the tragedy of last fall many of them took some comfort in the thought that they would get enough funds for seed this spring under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I supported the minister's amendment in June, 1950, because I believed that P.F.A.A. benefits should not be paid on lands that were not good enough to be homesteaded, or to be purchased outright, or to be called agricultural lands, and with the minister's assurance at that time that the amendment was to apply only to lands which up to 1940 were considered by everybody not to be good enough for homesteading or to be purchased for agricultural purposes. I had no misgivings about the amendment at all. However, I now appeal to the minister to consider issuing instructions to the P.F.A.A. administration to reconsider the lands I have mentioned, and to give relief to these struggling farmers who fully expected they would be entitled to benefits under the act.

One more point before I conclude: What makes matters even worse for the farmers on the lands I have described is the fact that their lease agreement requires them to stay on those lands and to seed them. That is a serious situation. For example, I have here one letter, out of scores I have received from the area, which I should like to quote in support of what I have said. This letter, from Deer Hill in the Peace river area, states:

> I have to stay on the lease, which means that I can't go out to work. What am I to do for seed and fuel this spring? If I don't seed the place and stay on it, I lose it.

All of the work he has put on the property will have been lost. This man has been operating his lease for some years, and expects in due course to be able to pay the small cash payment and to get title to it. This he can do within the ten-year period from the time he took out the lease. If he has to leave this spring to go out to work so as to earn a grubstake, and cannot seed his place, one can readily see how serious the matter becomes. There are a good many others in the area who are similarly affected. Under the circumstances I am appealing to the minister to reconsider.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question, for purposes of information? The act provides that a man must be on the land in the fall of the year. He must be there until November 1. Then it provides that he must be back by May 1, in order to draw his pay. That permits him between November 1 and May 1 to go out and earn a grubstake. He is supposed to be back farming the land the next year in order to prove his intention of working on the land as a farmer. How is that affected in the instance to which the hon. member referred?

Mr. Low: I am glad the minister has raised the point. I was referring to provincial lease regulations, under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Under those provincial regulations the man to whom I referred is required to stay on the land and to seed it each spring; otherwise he loses his lease.

Mr. Gardiner: Under the act he is required to be on the land and to seed it each spring in order to get his pay for the year before.

Mr. Low: Yes. There is this consideration, too: many of these people were not told finally until recently that they would not receive assistance under the act. This has made it more difficult for them. Most of them were told last fall by inspectors that their lands qualified under the act, and that therefore they could expect some assistance. They expected it, and now when spring is here they cannot get assistance and they do not know what to do about obtaining seed and fuel to be able to carry on their farming operations. I appeal to the minister on behalf of fully 100 or 150 persons in that area who are similarly affected. It becomes a rather serious matter, and I am sure the minister will give his sympathetic consideration to the appeal that has been made.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this matter. Probably the largest part of the area affected in western Canada is in the territory represented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and myself. There was a great deal of sympathy for the minister's amendment last year. Its object was to prevent lands within the Palliser triangle especially, which during the years had come back under municipal and provincial ownership, from again being held under private ownership and becoming eligible for payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Unfortunately that is not the only land affected by the amendment. It did not affect us so much in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan, because generally speaking the men who have taken land there during the last three, four or five years have been returned men, and the amendment did not apply to them.

However, there are now many other people going on land in that area. Last year approximately 200,000 acres were allocated by the provincial government, and many of the men who went on that land were not returned men. Nevertheless they are paying and will pay their one per cent levy as long as the act remains in force, but will never be able to draw anything under the act. An injustice is being worked there, and as more land is opened up the injustice will become more apparent. I believe it is the intention of the government of Saskatchewan to try to withdraw from certain forest areas in that region approximately 200,000 acres a year for the next three or four years. Therefore on approximately a million acres of land this levy will be paid, and it is good land. It is land much the same as that referred to by the hon. member for Peace River. It is land with respect to which payments will have to be made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in all probability only for one year out of ten or one year out of twenty. Only when there is frost or some other extraordinary condition is this land likely to come under payment.

It seems very unfair that the men who have settled on this land should have to pay the levy in perpetuity without ever having the opportunity of drawing any benefits under the act, while their neighbours who happen to have purchased similar land prior to 1941 will receive benefits under the act. The minister would be well advised to introduce an amendment that would limit the provision which was placed in the act last year to the area contained within the Palliser triangle. I think it was his objective to prevent land within the Palliser triangle, where drought is recurring, from again coming under the act when it has once been withdrawn. Everybody sympathized with that objective, but it is working an injustice in other areas.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROVISION OF DEBT-FREE MONEY

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice a grievance against His Majesty's government of Canada. My grievance is that His Majesty's government of Canada has for at least nineteen years dishonoured and continues to dishonour the British North America Act, section 91, classes 14 and 15, greatly to the detriment of Canada. To help make my meaning clear may I read section 91 to the house. It is as follows:

It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms in this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say . . .

I omit the first thirteen classes. Class 14 is "currency and coinage", and class 15 is "banking, incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money".

When the United States proposed to issue greenbacks there was some doubt as to the constitutionality, but in Canada the British North America Act left no doubt whatsoever of the clear constitutional authority of the federal treasury of Canada to issue currency as it saw fit.

In support of my position may I draw to your attention the fact that from at least as far back as 1910 up to and including 1932 the finance department of Canada occasionally employed the powers conferred upon the dominion government through classes 14 and 15 of section 91 of the British North America Act. For instance, the Finance Act of 1914 clearly indicated that the members of the Canadian parliament of those days realized, in a measure at least, the nature and value of the power to create debt-free currency conferred upon them through classes 14 and 15 of section 91. The Finance Act of 1914 also indicated that the parliament of that year appreciated in some small degree the vital potential importance to Canada of the powers inherent in classes 14 and 15 of section 91.

May I read the footnote appearing at the bottom of page 759 of the Canada Year Book for 1932, which pretty well outlines the general nature of the Finance Act of 1914. The footnote reads as follows:

The Finance Act, 1914 (5 Geo. V, c. 3), makes provision in case of war, panic, etc., for the issue of dominion notes against approved securities; this emergency arrangement was made a permanent feature by c. 48 of the statutes of 1923.

I should like to read into the record a passage from the report of the royal commission on banking and currency, published in 1933. I want to refer to paragraph 47 on page 22 to show how the Finance Act of 1914 was employed. My good Conservative friends will be deeply interested in this matter because this was all done under a good Conservative regime with one of the great statesmen of Canada, Mr. R. L. Borden, as prime minister. The paragraph reads as follows:

In the war session of August, 1914, parliament raised the partially covered issue to $50 million. Subsequently an issue of $16 million was made against a deposit of railway securities guaranteed by the dominion government, as well as an uncovered issue of $10 million for governmental purposes.

May I pause a minute or two to comment on "governmental purposes". I was talking the other day with a stalwart Liberal who maintained that the money which was issued between 1914 and 1917 never did go out into circulation, that it all remained hidden. Well, the poor man simply did not know. When he comes to read this, however, he will be able to learn something which will be of value to him. I continue with the quotation:

In 1917 an emergency issue of $50 million of dominion notes was made to finance war purchases in Canada, by the British government. The notes were secured by imperial treasury bills. In due course, this indebtedness was liquidated by payments from the British treasury and all of this issue had been redeemed by 1927.

That was ten years later.

No changes have since been made in the Dominion Notes Act except that by a statute passed on 30th March, 1933, the governor in council was empowered to suspend the redemption in gold of dominion notes, and an order in council to this effect was made on 10th April, 1933.

To Canadians in our situation I consider the incident recorded in the passage I have read into the records to have exceedingly great significance. If in 1914, with our country as immature as it was at that time, and entering into a war, the parliament of Canada thought it could issue $26 million of debt-free money and spend it into circulation, if it could issue $50 million against British treasury certificates that would not be redeemed for at least ten years, thereby putting into circulation in all $76 million of debt-free money, I maintain that event is significant to us in this day of tremendous development in Canada, when we are at a loss to know where to find the money with which to do the things we feel we ought to do. This was done under the Finance Act of 1914.

Now I believe it would be well to read into the record three other paragraphs from this report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, which was made in 1933. The first is paragraph 49:

A proclamation in pursuance of the act was issued on September 3, 1914, and thenceforth, throughout the war and the early post-war period, extensive use was made of the act.

I pause to comment on those words "extensive use was made of the act". We have no details as to how many millions of dollars of debt-free money were created and spent into circulation. We have to rely on the word "extensive" and what it probably meant in the minds of the careful men who drafted this report. Then paragraph 50:

An act passed in 1919 provided for the continuance in force of the proclamation made on September 3, 1914, "until two years after the conclusion of peace on termination of the present war." This explains the continued operation of the act until 1923.

This measure had been adopted as a war measure, but by 1919 it had been found of sufficient value to justify the parliament of that day in continuing its operation for another two years, even in peacetime. Once more we have no account of the amount of money issued debt-free and spent into circulation in that way. Now paragraph 51:

The provision relating to a general moratorium has never been used. The powers relating to payments by the banks in their own notes, the issue of excess circulation and the suspension of the redemption in gold of dominion notes ceased to be exercised at various dates. But extensive use continued to be made of the power to issue dominion notes to the banks against approved securities with the result that it was decided in 1923 to make this part of the Finance Act mechanism a feature of the normal Canadian financial system.

I grant that those notes were issued on the securities of the banks, and consequently were lent into circulation. The question our generation has to ask and to which it must demand an answer is, was there any reason why those notes should not have been issued debt free to finance consumption, just as was done in the case of the $26 million and the $50 million backed by British treasury notes? When we get that answer I believe we shall all be much wiser and much readier to listen to those who advocate the use of debt-free money under suitable circumstances. The paragraph continues:

In introducing the new legislation Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance, made the following brief explanation of its purpose:

"The act (Finance Act) was adopted as a war measure, and no doubt was exceedingly useful in the financial operations during the war. It may be said that the war being over we no longer have any need for the act, but experience has shown that the act is still required; indeed, I am inclined to think that something of the kind will have to become almost a permanent part of our financial system."

The Liberals should become interested here, because this is a great Liberal finance minister, Mr. Fielding, telling what he thought of the Finance Act of 1914 as he introduced the Finance Act of 1923.

Now I draw the attention of the house to a rather remarkable use made of the Finance Act in 1932 by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, while he was in power. This is an account that has been given me by a man who I think knew what he was talking about, because he was a member of the finance department. "In 1932 the dominion government issued $35 million worth of what they called notes. On November 1, 1932, the dominion government turned over these special notes to the chartered banks for two years. The chartered banks let the dominion government have $35 million at 4 per cent, to use as it saw fit. Then the chartered banks took the $35 million bond-like notes to the dominion finance department and pledged them for $35 million of dominion government bills, paying the dominion 3 per cent for the bills. The dominion finance department issued or printed the bills debt-free under the Finance Act of 1923. Thus the dominion government got $35 million for two years at 4 per cent, a very low interest rate for those days. Then the dominion received from the chartered banks 3 per cent on the $35 million it had created under the Finance Act and lent the banks in return for the pledge of $35 million of dominion bond-like notes. The result of the whole transaction was that the dominion obtained from the chartered banks the use of $35 million for two years at a net rate of 1 per cent."

I invite my respected Conservative friends to pay close attention to that operation under the Finance Act of 1923. If they could get $35 million at 1 per cent by that means in 1932, is there any conceivable reason why they could not have obtained $350 million just as easily if the goods and services position in Canada would have justified the issue? What a difference $350 million put into circulation in the right places in 1932 would have made to our country harassed by the depression!

Right at the time, Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was discovering this unique way in which to get money, was discovering and employing this Finance Act of 1923, the Bank of Canada came into being in 1934. Since I came into parliament I have not raised any serious question concerning this institution known as the Bank of Canada. The further I see this nation go under the Bank of Canada however, the more my mind is filled with question marks regarding the development of that institution. I have given some attention to trying to find an answer to the question how it happened the Bank of Canada was formed. Did Canadians demand that a Bank of Canada be formed? Did the Canadian parliament ask that a Bank of Canada be formed? I have wondered considerably about this matter ever since I saw a pamphlet which evidently was published by people with plenty of money at their disposal, and distributed generously throughout western Canada, if not all over Canada, called "A Bank of Canada; Why Not"?

I read this pamphlet with considerable interest, and I must say that the beautiful things that pamphlet would make the people who read it believe were coming as a result of the Bank of Canada have all faded away like mist on a July morning. In other words, someone who had a great interest in the formation of the institution spent a quantity of money endeavouring to popularize the institution with enough of the Canadian people so that there would not be any serious objection when the institution was set up. It is a question which I believe we would find extremely interesting, and which I am simply throwing out for the members to think about.

Was the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett in favour of the establishment of a Bank of Canada, or was this institution forced upon him against his will? I imagine hon. members would be quite interested to hear that I am told there is preserved in a safe place confidential correspondence between the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and certain prominent Canadians, indicating quite clearly that he resisted the imposition of a Bank of Canada with every bit of energy at his disposal. All of that was behind the scenes, of course.

What is the net effect of the Bank of Canada? Hon. members will be able to see immediately that the Bank of Canada shut off from the federal treasury of Canada the authority to issue debt-free money, because in the process of setting up the Bank of Canada the Finance Act of 1914 and the Finance Act of 1923 were repealed. When the Bank of Canada was accepted, the parliament of those days surrendered to an institution of questionable origin one of the most sacred powers conferred upon the dominion government by the British North America Act. If we now want money from the Bank of Canada, we have to borrow it. If we propose that we borrow money extensively from the Bank of Canada, we hear vague hints that we shall probably upset the stability of that bank. In fact I recall the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, while prime minister of this country, making a remark while we were discussing this sort of matter, to the effect that anyone must be completely foolish—these are not his words—to think that we could finance any proposition of the proposed nature through this little institution down on Wellington street.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must confess I have been extremely interested in some of the more recent remarks of the hon. member now speaking, because I had not previously heard the suggestion that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, later Lord Bennett, was unduly subject to compulsion by other people in matters of that kind. I should like also to have an explanation as to what debt-free money is; that is something I do not understand.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall be happy to explain debt-free money if the hon. member is willing to listen for a minute or two. Let us just imagine that the leader of the opposition is in the Canadian mint, and he sees a fifty-cent piece minted. Does the Canadian mint owe anybody for that fifty-cent piece? Is there any conceivable reason why the Department of Finance which minted the fifty-cent piece should not take the fifty-cent piece and spend it as part of an old age pension to relieve suffering in Canada? Is there any reason under the sun why this fifty-cent piece has to go through the banking system and become a debt before it can be used?

Mr. Drew: If the question is really directed to me, I must confess it does seem to suggest some interesting possibilities if those who work at the mint are free to handle the coins produced in that way, just as they see fit.

Mr. Blackmore: I am really sorry that the leader of the opposition made such a flippant remark. That is not what I said. I said the finance department that owns the mint could do so. If the leader of the opposition cannot pay any better attention to what has been said in reply to his question than that—

Mr. Drew: I am not going to enlarge on it. I have been able to follow to a very limited extent some of the suggestions about debt-free bonds or non-interest-bearing bonds. I must confess, however, I am wholly unable to understand debt-free money, and I should like to understand it.

Mr. Blackmore: Suppose we have a one-dollar bill. I really believe the proper place to discuss this is in committee, and if the leader of the opposition will bring the point up when we are discussing this matter, with the consent of the chairman, I shall answer him to the fullest degree. In the meanwhile, let us suppose a one-dollar bill is printed by the Bank of Canada. That one-dollar bill could or should be able to get out into circulation in either of two ways. There is no conceivable reason why the finance department should not take the one-dollar and spend it as part of its revenue. If it did that, the bill would come out into circulation debt-free. On the other hand, if the one-dollar bill goes through the banks, as it now does, it comes out into circulation in the form of a debt. Somebody has borrowed it. Somebody has to pay interest on it, and in due time it will have to be repaid to cancel the debt which was incurred in putting it into circulation. That dollar bill thus lent into circulation would be debt money. There is certainly a distinct difference between the kind of one-dollar bill we have in circulation when it is spent, and the same dollar coming out into circulation after being lent.

Now, we shall just leave that matter until we get into committee, when I shall be able to go into as much detail as the hon. member desires. Meanwhile, I give him one little illustration. Suppose he were travelling and he discovered a gold nugget worth $10. Some men have said that gold is the only money. This ten-dollar gold nugget is money in the sense that gold is money. Is there any debt connected with it? There is not the slightest debt connected with it. It is debt-free.

Mr. Low: If it goes through the banks, there will be.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right. If it is lent into circulation, it is a debt, even although it is gold. It is debt money then.

Mr. Cameron: Let the hon. member try to borrow it from the leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Blackmore: I believe I have given sufficient attention to the timely question asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure that he understands fully. Let us now hear about R. B. Bennett.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not propose to go any further into this matter of the origin of the Bank of Canada at the present time. Personally, I have nothing against the Bank of Canada. I think that the personnel of the Bank of Canada, from Mr. Graham Towers right on down, are admirable and well-qualified people. However, I should just like to have someone take a little time off—and the Minister of Finance would please me best—to show us that we are actually better off in Canada as a result of the establishment of the Bank of Canada than we were before its establishment. Our banking system was just as strong and everything else that I can think of was just as well taken care of under the immediate control and direction of the Department of Finance as ever it has been since the establishment of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Low: And it was a great deal more amenable to control by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) makes a most pertinent remark. I do not propose to go any further into this aspect of the whole question; but I believe that what I have said, together with what I said yesterday, must convince any open-minded person that debt-free money, created by the state, backed by the going-concern, producing and consuming activities of the state, is money that is as sound as any that could possibly be conceived of, and that it is feasible for a state possessing the power which Canada was given by the constitution, to create debt-free money, in so far as there are sufficient exchanges or potential exchanges to support that debt-free money, and to spend it into circulation just as it would spend into circulation money collected by taxes or borrowed from the banks or from anybody else. If that is the case, this device of debt-free money offers us a way out of a financial situation in this world and in this nation today which, without debt-free money, looks utterly impossible. I suggest that we consider debt-free money as one of the means of accomplishing by degrees our financial salvation in Canada, in the British commonwealth and perhaps in the world.

I want to refer to the matter of production before I leave the matter. Of course it is impossible to create debt-free money and to spend it into circulation with safety unless there is in the country sufficient production to absorb the money when it is spent into circulation. In other words, if there is a scarcity of goods and if money is created and put into circulation, then there will be inflationary pressure on prices, tending to make the price of goods rise. But if there is not a scarcity of goods but rather an abundance of goods, tending to make prices normally fall, as in the commencement of depression, then the debt-free money can do no harm whatsoever in the matter of inflation or inflationary pressure.

I should like to examine for a minute or two Canada's supply position. I hope to have an opportunity to question the Minister of Finance and anyone else who ought to know, with some degree of pertinacity in this matter of supply. There is no question that we have plenty of potatoes in Canada. There is not a doubt in the world that we can produce and have on hand plenty of a great many other things. Are we short of enough commodities to make it so that we could not issue debt-free money and spend it into circulation without any serious danger?

All I have to go by are considerations like this. As I recall it, in 1938 or 1937 our national production was worth about $3·8 billion. I am speaking entirely from memory now. Last year, I understand, our production was in the neighbourhood of $16 billion or $18 billion. Our population has not increased in anything like the proportion that production has increased. We will grant that prices have increased, but the actual physical production must be enormously greater than it was in 1938.

Mr. Low: At least three times.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member for Peace River suggests that it has increased at least three times. If that is the case then, in a general sort of way, how can it be argued that we are in a short supply position?

That is one thing. Another thing is that whenever I ask about supply, all the people who ought to know shy clear of the question and seem to be quite hesitant about giving the actual figures concerning our supplies. The only one that I have heard talk with any degree of frankness, and with authority, is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). These are things which he said the other day and which I find greatly encourage me. Speaking on April 9, as reported at page 1762 of Hansard, he said:

> I am sure—
> [Mr. Blackmore.]

Notice the word "sure".

> —that we can get along quite comfortably as consumers and still engage in a substantial defence effort.

He uses the words "quite comfortably". May I say that no old age pensioner in this country is comfortable. None of the superannuated civil servants are comfortable. None of the war veterans in receipt of war veterans allowance are comfortable. Great numbers of our people in the lower income brackets are not comfortable. What does the minister's remark imply? Evidently it implies that we can greatly increase the consumption of a large section of our people without seriously affecting our economy. I can take no other interpretation from those words used by the minister. Knowing the Minister of Trade and Commerce from long experience in this house, I am inclined to believe—in fact, I am sure I can believe—that he has not been reckless in his choice of words.

The next question is what would constitute a substantial defence effort. I wonder if he means the $5 billion defence effort which we propose to make in Canada during the next three years? He must mean that. Does this mean then that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was telling us that we can spend $5 billion in defence effort in the next three years and still live comfortably? If so, there must be a fairly abundant supply of a great many of the essential things of life. If that is the case, we ought to be able to issue a considerable amount of debt-free money and spend it into circulation without taxing a corresponding amount of money out of circulation, and still be safe as to financial considerations.

Shortly after the minister made the statement to which I have referred, he made this statement:

> Unless all-out war comes, Canadians can continue to live well.

What does that "all-out war" mean? I imagine that would be a condition comparable with what we were engaged in at the height of our activities in world war II, when we had something like three-quarters of a million of our finest producers away and a great many others engaged in war industry. We are faced with no such condition today. Then we were straining ourselves to the limit to send abroad goods of all kinds to help to supply the needs of our armed forces and those of our allies, including Britain. We are faced with no such condition as that now. The sum total of the conclusion that I must draw from these two passages is that our supply position, while not as good as we should like to see it in matters like beef, bacon, eggs and dairy products, and in other products in which production is off because of government policy, must be good enough at least to justify the creation and the use of a good many million dollars of debt-free money, as they created them, issued them and used them in 1917.

I propose to go into this whole question still further at a later time, because I feel confident that there is no other way of meeting the exigencies of the time in which we live. The set of taxes which we shall be considering in the budget resolutions I feel does constitute a complete scandal, a complete reflection on our intelligence in legislation. If there is any way in the world of avoiding such things, let us seek it out.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should like to augment the hon. gentleman's speech with just a remark or two, which will not take me more than five or ten minutes, because I was particularly interested to hear the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) in this house ask the hon. gentleman what he meant by debt-free money. The fact that he asked that question is very significant.

The leader of the opposition is an intelligent man. He has been out through the country from time to time bidding for power to run this country; and yet he has to stand up in this house and ask what debt-free money is. I wish the people could know that from coast to coast, because debt-free money, while it may be a term that is not too familiar to the average citizen, is a term that should be at least familiar to men in public life, and particularly men here who are more or less responsible for the country's business.

I also noticed the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair), as he was sitting in his seat, giggled all over when the question was asked. I do not know why he should giggle so heartily. Perhaps that is his nature. He is a great man to giggle. When he giggles he jiggles all over. I can understand his giggling and jiggling at some joke or wisecrack that is made, but when the leader of the opposition asks the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who used to lead this group in the house, a question of that kind, I cannot see much reason for his giggling and jiggling. If he keeps this up he is going to be known as—you know, there is a song that used to be sung about giggling Gertie. We will not be able to call the hon. gentleman giggling Gertie, but if he continues this we shall have to call him jiggling Jimmie.

Mr. Sinclair: The trouble was it was the blind leading the blind.

Mr. Hansell: There is nothing of a lighter vein in the question, what is debt-free money, and the answer that my hon. friend gives. Books have been written about it; economists have explained it; it is not a new thing. And yet the leader of the opposition, the major party in this country that bids for power to run the country, has to ask what the term means.

One further matter: I should like to ask a question, and of course I do not expect it will be answered because we are not in committee. I should like to ask a question of the leader of the opposition and of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Do they believe that the chartered banks lend their depositors' money? The answer to that question will indicate how much they know about the operation of the present monetary policy in Canada.

The fact of the matter is that the chartered banks create new money in the way of financial credit every time they make a loan, and this parliament by statute has given to the chartered banks the authority so to do, and, as my leader says, because they were afraid to take the responsibility of operating the systems themselves. Here is the next point. When the government need money they go to the chartered banks, or they could go to the people; but they go to the chartered banks, to whom they have given authority to issue money, and borrow new money from the chartered banks and pay an interest on it. There is no reason in the world why the government, when it desires to borrow money, cannot go to the Bank of Canada and let the Bank of Canada issue to the government the money they need without any interest at all. But that is not what happens in practice. As a very homely illustration, let me say this. Suppose I had an automobile. It is mine. I have authority to run it, or I have authority to give it to somebody else to run. Suppose I say to a friend of mine: "Here is my car; you can take it. Do what you like with it as long as you do not wreck it." My friend takes my car, and he runs a bit of a taxi service with it. When I want to go for a ride I telephone him and say: "I have to get out into the country. It is a distance of only about five miles." He says: "Well, that is all right, Mr. Hansell; I will come around and pick you up; I will take you out there and I will bring you back." He comes for me. He takes me out in my own car. He brings me back again, and on the way back he says: "I guess, Mr. Hansell, I will have to fill up with gas."

He goes to the gas station. He fills it up, and he looks at me and he says: "You are going to pay for this gas?" So I pay the gas bill.

Mr. Knowles: It's your car.

Mr. Hansell: When I get home he does not say anything; but a day or two later I receive a bill for taxi service. What do you suppose would happen in a transaction like that? You would say, "Well, that is crazy." Yet it is no more crazy than this government's going to the chartered banks and borrowing new money at interest, when the Bank of Canada can put it in their books and issue it without any interest charge at all. That is how crazy the present financial policy of the Liberal government is, and I challenge anyone to dispute that logic. The logic and the facts are to be found in the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee in 1939.

I am not talking social credit now; I am talking actual banking practice as it is conducted today. Then, when an hon. member rises and asks a question such as was asked, and when the assistant to the Minister of Finance sits in his seat and giggles all over —why he should giggle, I do not know—I say to them it is not a giggling matter.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

383. Departmental administration, $381,223.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

309. General administration, $1,936,980.

Item stands.

The Chairman: Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Low: Just a word; I wish to protest against the bringing in of any more departments today. I think that two more than have already been brought in will be quite sufficient to take care of any time the committee may have to deal with estimates, for some days. When we bring in more departments it simply denies to private members the right which is theirs, the constitutional right, to bring before the house and to air any grievances they may have. I say two departments are quite sufficient, and I am strongly opposed to bringing in any more at this time.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, without particular reference to the proceedings of former sessions, it seems to me there are fewer departments in at this stage of this session than at any time in the eleven years I have been here. Under those conditions, and having in mind the fact that we have given notice on every occasion for four weeks that we would call four departments, and having in mind the further fact that I understand it is the desire of hon. members that the estimates for the Department of External Affairs may be called as well, with a view to having those estimates referred to the standing committee, notice was given last Friday that as soon as possible we would call the four departments mentioned, and external affairs.

If the hon. member would be prepared to withdraw his objection at this time, I am sure we shall be back in this position next Monday, at which time he could renew his objection, that the number of departments introduced is more than he feels would be proper and in the public interest.

Mr. Low: I am prepared to support the calling of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, so that they may be referred to the committee. I strongly object however to calling any more at this time. We are living in a most unusual time, and nothing that has been done in the past by way of precedent should be used as an argument today. I emphasize the fact that hon. members should be in a position to bring their grievances before the house at the earliest possible moment. They are denied that right if we bring in departments, in mass form, as we are doing this afternoon. My suggestion is that we introduce the Department of External Affairs, in addition to the two departments now introduced and referred to the committee. But let it stand at that.

Mr. Abbott: I wonder if I might add just a word. As has been so often said, one of the principal functions of the House of Commons is to scrutinize carefully and examine the government's estimates and expenditures. The estimates were tabled about two months ago, or perhaps more than that. As yet we have barely started to examine the details of those estimated expenditures. There are some twenty odd departments, or their equivalent, which have to be opened. I suggest most strongly that, in discharging its proper responsibilities, the committee of supply should have available for discussion at this time at least nine or ten departments.

I have been charged, on occasions, with not bringing my estimates in early enough. There are only two days each week on which we can open departments.

Mr. Knowles: Three.

Mr. Abbott: I do not think it is at all unreasonable to ask, as was intimated last Friday, that we open four departments at this time. I hope my hon. friend, with his usual co-operation in matters of this kind, will appreciate the position of the Minister of Finance at this time in attempting to meet the wishes of the house. Each year we are charged with attempting to rush through the estimates at the end of the session. Let me say at once that there is no desire on the part of the government to do that; but if we are going to examine the estimates with any degree of attention, then I suggest we have to have departments available for discussion reasonably early in the session. I believe we should adhere to the understanding we had last Friday night and to which, as I recall, no serious objection was taken.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object to the introduction of these departments at this time, because of the understanding I had that this was not to establish a precedent but rather was for the purpose of making it possible to have more departments available for consideration at such times as they might be brought forward by the minister in charge.

On the other hand I do not want any impression left that I would concur in the suggestion that any delay to consider the items in the estimates is due to any attempt on the part of members of the opposition to prevent their full consideration.

Mr. Abbott: I did not suggest that.

Mr. Drew: For one, I certainly am most anxious to get ahead and to have an opportunity to consider these estimates. For that reason I am prepared to support the introduction of the departments, but on the clear understanding that it is not to be regarded as a precedent for the rest of the session. Hon. members do regard these occasions as opportunities to introduce for discussion subjects which might not otherwise be discussed.

Mr. Abbott: I think that is quite proper. The only reason it was suggested there should be four departments at this time is that the usual procedure is that two departments open each Monday, when motions of this kind are moved. In this instance, of course, the estimates of the Department of External Affairs might be considered as extra, to be referred to the special committee dealing with that subject. I was proceeding to say that the normal motion made on Mondays has been delayed week by week because of circumstances, for which I am blaming no one, namely the disposition of the amendment to go into supply and the introduction of the budget.

I am glad to note that the leader of the opposition will support the arrangement and, as I say, I would hope that the leader of the Social Credit group might extend his co-operation too.

Mr. Low: I distinctly recall that on a number of former occasions we in this group have asked the Minister of Finance to bring forward his estimates at an early date in the session so that we could have ample opportunity to discuss the whole of the government's financial policy, because we felt that it was in the interests of the country so to do. We have never yet been able to get the finance estimates before the house in time—

Mr. Abbott: I got them down earlier last year as requested, much earlier, as soon as I could get them in.

Mr. Low: It was earlier last year but, Mr. Chairman, we never did have a chance to go into a thorough discussion of the financial policy because it was too late in the session when they did come in. I am suggesting that we want to have a full discussion of the financial policy of this country, and the earlier the finance estimates can be brought before the house the better it will be. I should like to serve notice on the Minister of Finance now that we will expect him to be ready, when the first item of his estimates is called, to go right into a full discussion of the policy. We are not expressing any personal opposition to the minister. We like him, and we like to see him get up and defend his position.

Mr. Abbott: He likes to do that.

Mr. Low: I am sure he likes to do that, but he has not had a chance to do it, and we think now is the most important time for a discussion of that kind.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend would like to add the Department of Finance to the five already suggested I will undertake to bring on my estimates fairly soon.

Mr. Low: If the Minister of Finance will substitute the Department of Finance for one of the five that he wants to bring in I will certainly support him.

Mr. Abbott: My remark was somewhat facetious. As my hon. friend knows, one reason why it is not considered proper to bring on the estimates of the Department of Finance as early as those of some of the other departments is that on the budget debate we have a pretty fair opportunity to discuss financial policy. So far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, he is ready at any time to proceed with his estimates. I cannot be doing two or three things at once. I cannot be putting the budget resolutions through, the budget bills and my estimates at the same time. I have to have a certain amount of time to see delegations in my office and that sort of thing, but subject to the will of the house I can bring them on at any time that they are desired.

Mr. Low: Will the minister just set aside his natural modesty for a few minutes now and say that he will call his own estimates at an early time?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I have said so. I shall be delighted to do that.

Mr. Low: Under the circumstances I would be quite prepared to concede the point, but there is one other thing which I think is very important. The only constitutional weapon in the hands of the opposition in this house, or in any other parliament in the empire for that matter, to enable them to give expression to the will of the people to get something done, is the right to hold up a single dollar of supply until such time as action has been taken by the government to remove the grievances. So far as I am concerned, I think it is high time that the opposition in this house began to make use of that constitutional right. We have pleaded with the government to do something about the high cost of living to relieve the people of the country from the suffering, uncertainty and fear under which they exist today. They have not seen fit to do so except, as the Minister of Finance has said, through some fiscal means he announced in the budget and prior to that. He knows that since those announcements the cost of living has gone up, and the burden is piling up.

I suggest to the opposition that we have within our hands as an opposition a weapon by which we can force the government to do something if we will make use of it, not to give them one single dollar of supply until they correct that situation. That is the feeling I have about this whole business, and I am serious about it. I am not just trying to play a game. I think members of this house know me well enough now after my being here for nearly six years to know that I am not accustomed to playing games. I am deeply serious about what I say. I say that as an opposition we should not grant the government one dollar of supply until they correct the high cost of living situation. It is within their power to do so. That is the reason why I am taking the stand I take today.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure that no member on the government side quarrels with the statement that the opposition groups should have the fullest opportunity to lay before the house and the country any grievances which they feel they should put forward, but I feel sure my hon. friend, the leader of the Social Credit group, would be the first to admit that, having placed those views fully and clearly before the house and the country, the will of the majority must prevail in the final analysis. It is for that reason that I perhaps could not agree one hundred per cent with him that as long as he felt he should be putting grievances forward we should not vote supply. However, we are simply arguing about the means now. So far as my own estimates are concerned, I will bring them on at any time that may be found convenient to the house. I suggest that we try to get enough departments in now so that we can have an orderly consideration of the various departmental estimates.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of information, may I ask what other departments it is intended to put in today?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It is intended to call fisheries, labour and external affairs but in view of the discussion perhaps we could add finance to that list.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, if the government would substitute finance in order to bring the estimates of that department forward more quickly, we might give it consideration.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Fisheries and labour particularly were mentioned quite a long time ago, and the ministers have been ready on every occasion since to take up their estimates. I think the hon. member might agree to those of which notice has been given. In order to accommodate him we could then call finance and get it in. Then the Minister of Finance could take up with the Prime Minister the matter of the best order of business to meet the hon. member's wishes.

Mr. Low: I think it is too much to ask to introduce six departments. I would ask that finance be substituted for one of the others. I am anxious to hear the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Fisheries. I like to hear them go through their estimates because they do a good job, but they are not worrying themselves sick about getting them in right away. If you will substitute finance for one of those departments, and the Minister of Finance on his word will bring forward his department at an early date, I will be prepared to concede.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I must admit it is a most remarkable development to have very strong opposition to the introduction of five departments and then agreement to six.

Mr. Low: I did not agree to six, Mr. Chairman. I want to state the matter clearly. I said, if the government would substitute.

Mr. Abbott: Let us call five and we will move to introduce finance next Monday.

Mr. Low: I simply said if the house leader will agree to substitute finance for one of the others he is seeking to call I will agree, but not until.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to extend the discussion of this matter. I understood from what had been said that it was a case of adding finance. Whether or not that is so, I might point out that if finance is going to be discussed then the calling of the Department of Finance offers that opportunity. Rather than argue as to what should or should not be introduced, although we did oppose calling five departments, I think it would be well at this point to go ahead with the five in view of the fact there has been a general understanding that that was what was to be done.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Department and missions abroad—

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask the house leader at the moment what is proposed with respect to the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. Will there be a separate motion later to refer them to the standing committee on external affairs; and, if so, when is it proposed to move that motion?

Mr. St. Laurent: As soon as possible.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): When the hon. member was not here I pointed out that we would call this item in order to present the motion to send these estimates to the special committee, and we will do that at the earliest convenience of the house.

Mr. Graydon: But not right now?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No.

Mr. Drew: I think it would be desirable to have some indication in advance as to when the motion to present these estimates to the standing committee is going to be moved. In view of the fact that they are to be referred to the committee, I would imagine that there will not be an extended debate at that stage, but nevertheless I am aware that there are some members who have indicated a desire to make certain statements at that time. I was under the impression also that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had indicated to one member that he intended to introduce this motion on Thursday. I do not know whether there was any understanding on the part of the government to that effect.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I should not say anything without knowing what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, but we will let the leader of the opposition know as soon as we can determine it.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps it would be best if there could be some discussion before we adjourn this evening, and if it is to be Thursday it would be well to indicate that tonight.

Item stands.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Dion in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

2. That the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs, that are at present subject to the rate of fifteen per cent be increased to twenty-five per cent.

3. That the excise tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy, be reduced from thirty to fifteen per cent.

4. That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels;

(b) washing machines operated by electric or other power;

(c) electric, gas or kerosene refrigerators and freezing equipment and complete parts therefor including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

5. That the excise tax on cigarette papers and cigarette paper tubes be repealed.

6. That the excise tax on the following goods be increased by the amounts shown:

(a) for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package, three-quarters of one cent;

(b) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of manufactured tobacco, including snuff but not including cigars and cigarettes, contained in any package, three cents;

(c) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption in Canada, three-quarters of one cent.

7. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) cortisone;

(b) adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH).

8. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eleventh day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-one.

Mr. Shaw: The resolution now before us contains eight separate and distinct propositions. When this matter was considered last week an effort was made by certain members of the house which would have made it possible to obtain a decision upon each of these propositions. I was amazed to encounter opposition to that procedure. I have endeavoured to determine to my own satisfaction at least why so many members of this house were so completely opposed to taking these propositions separately. I have come to the conclusion that obviously there are members on the government side who are just about as unhappy as I am about some of the propositions contained in this resolution. I am certain a great many members on the government side had indicated to their constituents that they regarded the sales tax as an iniquitous tax. I am personally convinced, and I base this opinion on a certain amount of knowledge, that there are members on the government side who had assured their people back home that they would oppose any increase in the sales tax. Now in supporting it, if it is their intention to support this resolution, they are going to give this explanation: "Well, in order to have the excise tax removed from cortisone and ACTH, I simply had to support the increase of 25 per cent in the sales tax. Surely you would not want me to penalize the poor arthritics by voting against the removal of the sales tax from ACTH. Therefore I had to support the increased sales tax." Then I can imagine them saying, "Surely you would not want your little children penalized by a 30 per cent excise tax on candy, chocolates and certain confections. I feel the same way about it, so in order to support the 15 per cent reduction in the excise tax on candies and chocolates for your little children I had to vote for the imposition of a tax on washing machines, stoves, hot plates, grills and similar commodities not burning solid fuels. And the sales tax—". Then I can just imagine them saying this, because it has been said before; it has been a beautiful out for some people: "You wanted me to vote to remove the excise tax on cigarette papers and tubes. The only possible way I could do that was by voting at the same time for a hefty increase in the tax on cigarettes and tobacco." If there could be any other reason for certain members of this house voting for a decision which in effect makes us decide upon eight distinct and separate propositions in one vote, I for one would like to know it.

Last week some pretty strong words were used to describe this sales tax, and it is with respect to the sales tax that I have the greatest criticism to offer. Before doing so, however, I am going to make my position perfectly clear. I dislike the sales tax so intensely that I am fully prepared to vote against everything else in this resolution in order to oppose the increase of 25 per cent in that tax. It is a pretty uneven bargain, even for those who may take the position I indicated earlier. The trade is most unequal. In order to obtain those reductions which this resolution offers I am not prepared to heap upon the shoulders of the people I represent an increase of 25 per cent in the sales tax, when I know that the words used in this house last week to describe that tax are the words being used by a good many of the people I represent. Several speakers called it a vicious tax, and I agree with that description. They called it iniquitous, infamous, insidious and pernicious. That is quite a collection of words, but if ever anything required all those words to properly describe it, it is this sales tax. In my opinion this tax is a violation of the basic principle of taxation, namely that we give some consideration to ability to pay. I have always said at least one thing in favour of the income tax; it does recognize the principle of ability to pay. But I realize we are not discussing that tax on this occasion.

The sales tax goes right into the pocket of the poorest man or woman in the land, those who are struggling and in all too many instances finding it utterly impossible to acquire those things which make up at least a half decent standard of living. I dislike the sales tax because it is hidden. I characterize it as a bandit; I say it is the subversive agent in our whole tax structure. Governments have indicated pretty generally that they like such taxes. They are less painful. The pocketbooks of the people are attacked and they are not always conscious of the fact that a substantial portion of the purchase price of a commodity is made up of excise and sales taxes. There is not a certain day in the year upon or before which they must make a sales tax payment. Practically every time an individual walks into a store he is attacked, as it were, by a government through the process of the sales and excise taxes. I am surprised that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) who seems to enjoy going elsewhere to find examples of people who are worse off than we are—he did that so far as the income tax was concerned—has not gone to Russia and told this house, "Look at the heavy sales tax paid by the Russian people; seventy-five per cent on certain clothing; sixty to sixty-five per cent on certain foods." As I say, I am surprised he has not done that. It would, of course, and quite naturally, provide slight comfort to the people of our country who are compelled to pay that tax.

Speaking the other day on this same resolution my leader suggested that this sales tax is a very important factor in the increasing cost of living to those in the low income groups. Is there anyone who can honestly argue that is not a fact? He said that it was pyramiding these prices. I agree, and I do not like it for that among other reasons. It is pyramiding the price of a commodity far beyond the actual amount of the tax itself. I know what the parliamentary assistant said about that question, and he has undertaken to put the member for Moose Jaw in a position where he is to answer the question for the parliamentary assistant. All facts direct us to one conclusion, namely that that sales tax does have a pyramiding effect. Is there anyone, Mr. Chairman, who can argue that this sales tax is not inflationary in its effect? I doubt if a logical argument can be advanced by anyone to the contrary.

Then, as I have pointed out already, and as my leader has pointed out many times, it is a hidden tax which makes it all the more pernicious. I well recall that in his remarks he said that governments seemed to be moving faster and faster towards the state of affairs where most of their taxes are hidden. I do not know that I can blame a government for doing that, but certainly I for one insist that more and more of these taxes be brought out where the Canadian people can see them and know exactly what they are paying. We have already referred to those various groups in the country who are hardest hit by this type of tax. Only yesterday I had occasion to refer to them. It is not necessary to go into detail so far as our 282,000 old age pensioners are concerned; it is not necessary to go into detail about the 10,517 blind pensioners within the country; I should not have to mention the widowed mothers again or the pensioned civil servants or the recipients of war veterans allowance or military pensions. I should not have to refer, although I am going to do so for a moment, to those wives and dependents of the men who today are serving in the armed forces of this country. This sales tax is going to take another bite out of an income which is wholly inadequate for the dependents of these men now on active service. Every day I receive letters from these people. We have no provision, as we had during world war II, to grant special financial assistance in cases of emergency. I do not want to digress and run the risk of the chairman ruling me out of order.

Now, in connection with another tax to which this sales tax is closely related, namely the income tax, the government constantly boasts of the fact that we have within this country thousands of wage earners who are entirely outside the provisions of that act. But let me make this assertion without fear of contradiction, that there is no one in this country who spends anything who escapes income tax, because the sales tax is in essence the poor man's income tax, and incidentally with no exemptions, Mr. Chairman. There are no exemptions in the case of commodities on which the sales tax is imposed. I would grant that the sales tax does not apply to a certain number of commodities, but it does apply to clothing, a commodity which enters into the cost of living of every family in the country. The larger the family the more severe is the effect of that tax upon them. Anyone who examines the last cost of living statistics will agree with me that the cost of clothing has practically doubled since 1939. If that were all, it would not be quite so bad, but anyone knows that the quality of the clothing has deteriorated to the point where it will not last, so far as children's articles are concerned, half as long as it would ten years ago. There was a day when I could buy a pair of overshoes for one of my boys and be reasonably certain that they would last him two winters. If you have boys of ten, eleven or twelve years of age, you realize that you are now lucky if they can get through one winter with a pair of overshoes. I bought more than that during this last winter.

There always seems to be a difference between a Liberal who forms part of the government in power and a Liberal who sits in the opposition. I happened to be browsing through Hansard the other day in reference to the sales tax, and I thought it might be a bit enlightening if I were to go back to the time when the Liberals formed the opposition. The last time that happened was 1930-35. The other day it was stated that by the time the Liberals were defeated in 1930 they had brought the sales tax down to one per cent. By 1934, it was back to six per cent. It is a revelation to read what the Liberals said about that increase of five per cent during that period of time, as it relates to clothing. I happened to find this in Hansard attributed to the late Mr. Ralston who was acting as financial critic for the official opposition in 1934, and it is on page 2424 of Hansard. It reads:

He means that the war has been over that long.

—and the sales tax is still on, but the man who buys a $30 suit of woollen clothes is not paying only 90 cents to the government today; he pays $1.80 under the taxation imposed by my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance. Before the King government went out of power the tax had been reduced to one per cent and the tax on the suit of clothes was only 30 cents, but the sales tax is still here, the iniquitous sales tax which my hon. friend, the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), proposed to have removed. This iniquitous sales tax and the poor man's income tax is still here and has been multiplied by six under the present government.

One reason for this rather violent attack upon the sales tax was the fact that it added $1.80 to the cost of a man's suit of clothes. Thanks to this government, when you go down to buy a suit of clothing today at $50, $60, $70 or $100, and work out your 10 per cent sales tax on that, you can think how justified we would be, feeling as the late Mr. Ralston did toward the sales tax at that time, in just screaming to high heaven today about that $7, $8 or $9 sales tax on one suit of clothing. I only quote that to show you that obviously Liberals in office are a bit different from Liberals in the opposition.

When the Minister of Finance referred to the sales tax in his budget talk, he used two words which I hope every member on the government side of the house will always remember. Then I am going to ask if you believe them. First he said that raising the $100 million additional revenue from the sales tax was "the sound thing to do from an economic point of view." I underline that word "sound." Then he said that it was "the fair thing" to do "at this time", and I underline that word "fair." I hope that the members of this house who support this resolution containing that 25 per cent increase in the sales tax will, when they go back to their constituencies and are talking to their constituents, say to them: I supported the sales tax because I too considered it to be sound and fair.

Mr. MacDougall: Robert Fair?

Mr. Shaw: I doubt if my friend the hon. member for Battle River would be associated with a thing of this kind. I am going to quote once again, Mr. Chairman, just a few words, because there is certainly no sense in going back and reading some of these things if one does not give to hon. members of this chamber the benefit of his research. The late Mr. Ralston was again speaking in the House of Commons—this is in 1931—and, mind you, he was airing the views of the Liberal opposition. He was then their financial critic. As reported at page 2302 of Hansard of that year, he said:

This is a tax, as the Secretary of State has said, which bears heaviest on the man who feels the pinch most at this time;—

I will come back to that phrase "at this time."

—it is a tax which affects most directly the cost of living in this country. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the use of the sales tax at this time is a measure which cannot be defended in view of the other possible sources of revenue which my right hon. friend might have touched.

Someone may quickly say he used the words "at this time", a depression year, although in 1931 the depression had not become as severe as it became two or three years later. But let us never forget that there are in this country today thousands of people who are going through their own depression which to them is just as disastrous as anything they encountered in 1931. In those years, it is true, people had low incomes, but prices also were low. The income of today, as compared with the income of that time, actually leaves a man in a more unfortunate position today than that in which he was left at that time. As I say, the late Mr. Ralston laid great stress upon the fact that the sales tax could not be defended, on the ground that there were other sources of revenue which could have been touched. That is exactly the position I take at this time. The Minister of Finance, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and the officials of the Department of Finance cannot honestly assert that there are not other sources which could be touched at this time. All of this argument which centred around liquor rather made me smile, but I will not go into that matter. Would the government not be justified in touching the amusement tax field rather than a little pair of overalls worn by Johnny Smith?

Mr. Gibson: The provinces have that.

Mr. Shaw: That is all right. During the last war this government jumped into that field.

Mr. Gibson: Shall we take it away from the provinces?

Mr. Shaw: No. I am not suggesting that we take it away from the provinces. I am suggesting that, rather than go down into the pocket of the poor man in this country, the government might impose a bit more taxation upon amusements of one kind and another. I am always rather intrigued by these references to the capital gains tax. I realize that there are arguments against it; but, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that there are many things that I would do, even though I might not like them too much, before I would go down into the pocket of the fellow who today is going through a great deal of misery in an effort to provide for his family.

There was one other matter to which I wished to refer. I should not suggest that I could be out of order, Mr. Chairman; I should not give you any ideas on that score, because when it comes to that, you have plenty of ideas yourself. In the course of the consideration of the sales tax, certain hon. members have asserted that other things could have been done rather than to have increased the sales tax. Some hon. members asserted that the government might have lifted the income tax a little more in order to offset the need of the sales tax. The minister asserted that it would hurt too much if you hit them a little too hard at one time. In 1933 the former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, who had frequently attacked the sales tax during those years the Conservatives were in office and were increasing it, said that instead of imposing an iniquitous tax of this kind the government would be justified in taking a man's entire income from him over and above a certain amount. I will not quote his statement because I hardly think that would be in order; but it may be found at page 3495 of Hansard of March 28, 1933. I only pass on the observation, not that I am advocating that a man's entire income be taken away from him; I did it to show the difference between a Liberal who is a member of the government and a Liberal who finds himself on the opposition side of the house.

An hon. Member: How does that work out?

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, if there are to be interjections, I hope they will be loud enough so that I can at least hear them.

Mr. Laing: What was the total budget at that time?

Mr. Shaw: An hon. member asks what the total budget was. It is not a matter of the total budget; it is the total tax revenue in relation to the national income. It is the relationship between what the government is taking from the pockets of the people and the national income of your country. And if my hon. friend takes the figures in those days and compares them with the figures of today, he will find that the tax hurt proportionately as much at that time.

In conclusion, I am going to re-assert one or two things that I said at the beginning. I dislike the sales tax so intensely that I for one am opposing this resolution; I am not supporting any 25 per cent increase in the sales tax at this time—that is a favourite government expression. I am not supporting the 10 per cent increase in the excise tax, as applied to a long list of commodities. But let me point out that my principal reason for opposing the resolution as such is first of all the sales tax. I know that as long as the present government occupies office we are going to have to contemplate from time to time rather stiff increases in taxation. I am going to be perfectly fair to them and also say that as long as the international situation is such as it is, we are likely to have that inevitable result. I am not going to take such strong opposition with respect to the other commodities listed here and the taxation increases in relation thereto, but I am taking a very firm position as far as this sales tax is concerned. As far as I personally am concerned, I am opposing this resolution which is proposing to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the parliamentary assistant does not want the resolution to carry before he has had a chance to answer some of the questions put to him the other night. He will recall that the hon. member for Lake Centre put a certain question to him, which I elaborated. It had to do with the effect of the tax changes involved in the Excise Tax Act proposals on the cost of living of what might be called the average Canadian family. I do not think I need to go into detail again in the way in which I set it out before the parliamentary assistant the other night, unless he asks me to do so. Perhaps he can answer that question now.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Lake Centre asked that as well as the table that I put on the record from the dominion bureau of statistics showing the percentage of income in various groups which was subject to sales tax, I should also try to obtain from the dominion bureau of statistics what this increase in sales tax and excise tax actually meant in dollars and cents to families in various income groups. We got in touch with the dominion bureau of statistics and they said it was impossible for them statistically to work out such a thing. They could work out the percentage of income which is subject to tax just by using the analysis they had in 1947-1948 of how families in various income tax groups spent their money on the commodities. The mathematical problem of determining what this two per cent increase in the sales tax, the ten per cent increase in the excise tax and the fifteen per cent increase on electrical appliances means in dollars and cents to the individual consumer is tied in, as I indicated when I was answering the hon. member, with the problem of mark-up. Unless the mathematical analysis over in the dominion bureau of statistics gives the mark-up in each of the various commodities there is no real base to submit a mathematical figure. For that reason they said it was impossible to do better than they have done by breaking it into percentages.

The hon. member for Lake Centre seemed to think that I had such figures with me. Probably the reason for his supposition was the fact that one of the members of the press gallery had an article in one of the Toronto papers with his calculations of what this would amount to. I have spoken to him. These are his calculations based actually on the break-down which I put on the record, and which he had obtained previously from the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose we have to take it that the dominion bureau of statistics is unable to answer that type of question. Frankly that does amaze me. I can understand the bureau not knowing in advance what the additional effect of mark-ups might be, but it does seem to me that it should be able to compute what the increases in the cost of the articles included in the cost of living index will be as a result of the tax itself.

As I understand it, there is nothing mysterious about the way in which this cost of living index figure is arrived at. I understand that when the 1935-39 base of 100 was arrived at, it was ascertained on the basis of what it actually cost in that 1935-39 period to purchase a certain total basket of goods and services, which was taken to be the standard of living of an average Canadian family at that time. I understand that the way in which the cost of living index is adjusted is for the dominion bureau of statistics to find out each month what that same original basket of goods and services costs. The original cost in the base period was $1,453 a year. Since the cost of living index now stands at something over 180—we will know the exact figure in a day or two—it means that that basket of goods and services is already well up over $2,000. My colleague, the hon. member for Melfort, put the exact figure on the record yesterday.

Well, now, the dominion bureau of statistics is ascertaining information of this kind every day. They put out releases of one kind and another literally every day, and give a very good service in the statistical field. It seems to me that all they have to do to answer the kind of question that I put to the parliamentary assistant is to go over the goods and services that are included in the original basket, and ascertain how much was added to their price on April 10 by the taxes that were imposed by the minister that night.

As I pointed out when I spoke on this question the other evening, every time the cost of the goods and services in that original basket goes up by $14.53 it means an increase in the cost of living index by one point. Hence I felt it was a perfectly proper question for us to ask as to how many dollars and cents the average Canadian family will have to pay additional on the necessities of life by virtue of the taxes that have been imposed. If the dominion bureau of statistics did the job they would of course do it in relation just to that same original quantity of goods and services. Many Canadian families have rightly a little higher standard of living than was suggested by that 1935-39 basket of goods and services; therefore, to many people the additional cost will be even more than would be the additional cost on that original basket.

I am sure that it is a minimum guess that we make when we suggest that the sales tax and the other taxes in this resolution are going to result in an increase of $40 or $50 in the necessary expenditures of the average Canadian family per year. I may be away out, Mr. Chairman, but if I am, I am away out on the conservative side. It may be twice that amount. But if it means an increase of around $45 in the year, the result will be a rise in the cost of living index of three points.

We were given to understand that this budget was going to deal with the problem of inflation. That was one of the arguments against our starting a certain other debate, which I shall not discuss now. But this is the way, as it strikes some of us, that the budget deals with inflation; it aggravates the problem. We have before us proposals for tax increases on commodities which cannot fail to have the effect of boosting to a higher point the cost of living index. People from coast to coast were shocked with the 4·5 increase on the last occasion the figure was given. We will be receiving another figure in a day or two which will push the figure up from 179·7 to 182 or 183; and in the course of a few months we will have the effects of this budget pushing it up to 185 or 186. The people of Canada will wonder just where this is going to end.

I appreciate that the parliamentary assistant has been in touch with the dominion bureau of statistics, has sought to get the information and has been unsuccessful. But I notice he is discussing the matter—or discussing something, at any rate—with his officials, while I am talking. I would be glad to have his comments on what I have been asking. Does it not seem to be a reasonable conclusion for us to draw on this side of the house that the effect of this eight-point resolution we are now asked to vote upon is likely to be an increase in the cost of living index of two, three or more points?

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I do not see how I can answer more fully than I have done. I have mentioned the factors the dominion bureau of statistics pointed out. The hon. member has said that it should be easy for the dominion bureau of statistics to price today the price of this basket. That is true. They actually have not done it as yet for the month of April, but they will do it.

However, apparently the hon. member intends to go ahead on the assumption that every increase since April 10 is consequent upon the tax increase, and not consequent upon an increased cost of material and an increased cost of labour. That is the problem the bureau of statistics has to contend with —and it is a bureau of statistics, not a guessing bureau.

The second point, so far as the effect upon spending is concerned, is that there is a change in buying methods which the housewife will use, when prices go up. If the price of a frock is increased, she will be content to keep within her budget and to buy a cheaper frock.

I think the figures the hon. member has been quoting are obviously out, when it is remembered that it is the sales tax on commodities which hits the lower income group, rather than the excise tax on luxuries or semi-luxuries. If, as he says, the two per cent increase will cost $45, that means that the whole 10 per cent will cost $225, so that the person paying this $225 tax must be buying $2,250 of commodities subject to sales tax, and no low income family does this. So that the hon. member's increase by reason of sales tax is far out of line.

But the dominion bureau of statistics is not in the guessing business. They deal with facts, the cost of these things. When the April cost of living figure comes down the change may or may not be due—whatever changes there are—to the increase in tax. But there will still be other factors which have increased the cost, such as increased labour costs and increased material costs.

I have done my best to obtain these figures from the bureau. They say the only thing they can give us is statistics based upon actual facts. That is what they have given, and the table I inserted earlier in Hansard gave that information.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the table the parliamentary assistant put on Hansard. I have looked into it, but he will realize it does not deal with the matter we have raised at this time.

I would point out to the parliamentary assistant that the sales tax increase is not the only tax included in the resolution now before us. The eight-paragraph resolution now before us includes the tax on refrigerators, electric stoves, washing machines and the like. I would remind him also that it was he, himself, who said that one of the difficulties of computation would be because these taxes may involve additional mark-ups. So when he looks at my $45 figure he will have to consider not just the effect of the tax itself, but the effect of the tax plus the mark-ups made on it.

I was interested in one of the comments made just now by the parliamentary assistant to the effect that people's buying habits change. He spoke particularly of the housewife. He said that when a housewife goes into a store and finds prices have got out of line she will buy something else, because she cannot afford to buy the article that has gone up to the increased price.

That change in buying habits is not reflected in the cost of living index. The cost of living index is not changed because of change in people's buying habits, whether they raise or lower their standard of living. The parliamentary assistant has said that, so far as the cost of living is concerned, the bureau of statistics does not guess; it gets the actual prices.

Mr. Sinclair: You are talking about how much extra a person was going to pay. Let us separate the two.

Mr. Knowles: I was talking about the effect of the resolution now before us on the cost of living index. We are getting two or three points mixed up. The point I was discussing just now was that the effect of the rise in the cost of living index has changed the habits of many people. Indeed it has; it has lowered their standards.

I suppose in the present instance the people of Canada have no alternative but to wait until bitter experience has shown just what the effect of these proposals is on the cost of living. For my part I cannot see that this section of the budget has grappled with the problem of inflation or the cost of living in any way, except to make it worse.

There are some other points I should like to mention in connection with the sales tax, so perhaps we might call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MERCANTILE AND GENERAL REINSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 177, to incorporate the Mercantile and General Reinsurance Company of Canada Limited—Mr. Cavers—Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Capital stock.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, under this section it is provided that the capital stock of the company shall be $1 million. Would the sponsor explain to me what denominations the shares are to be? Are they to be $100, $500, or what? I understand that the company is to operate in all ten provinces, and I presume the idea would be to have the capital stock distributed as widely as possible among the people of the various provinces. One of my colleagues has suggested to me ten shares of $100,000 each. That is the very reason I should like to say a word on this matter. I understand it is more or less a trend of modern financing—and I know very little about financing—particularly with such companies as this one, to have the capital stock distributed as widely as possible in small denominations in order that the people of the whole dominion will be able to share therein. I presume one reason would be to gain the good will of the people of all the provinces.

Certainly in a company such as this one I would think it would be to their advantage to have the stock issued in small denominations instead of $100,000 shares so the people throughout Canada can purchase the shares. I should like the sponsor to explain to me how it is intended to dispose of the shares. Surely it is not to be, as one of my colleagues has suggested, ten shares of $100,000 each. Possibly it is $50 shares. Would the sponsor explain that point?

Mr. Cavers: Mr. Chairman, I am informed the shares are to sell at a par value of $10 each, and on the matter of the subscription of shares the company must have $250,000 of capital stock subscribed before undertaking any business.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Cruickshank: The answer is partly what I wanted. I was very careful not to mention the figure of $250,000 as that is in the next section, and I was afraid I might be called to order.

The Chairman: That is section 7.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, I am speaking on clause 3.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am afraid the sponsor was out of order in referring to the next section. I was being very careful not to be out of order, not to transgress by saying anything about section 4. I understand his explanation.

Preamble agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Herridge: Before the title carries, if I am in order I want to bring something to the attention of the house. The title of the bill is "An act to incorporate the Mercantile and General Reinsurance Company of Canada Limited." We have no objection to that but I think the government should do something about making certain that companies using the words "Canada limited" are companies that have a federal charter, because that has caused a great deal of misunderstanding among a number of people in my constituency. I refer to the Home Assurance Company of Canada Limited which went into liquidation in 1948. A large number of people in my constituency purchased shares in that company on the understanding that it was a federal company because the words "Canada Limited" were in the title. They thought they were protected by the particular scrutiny of the federal superintendent of insurance, and so on.

These people purchased these shares years ago. There are older people in my riding, just about ready to draw the old age pension, having very few material assets in this life except hope, who bought these shares, a considerable number of which were paid for and some were not paid for. Throughout the years they have had favourable balance sheets indicating that the company was in a wonderful position, and then suddenly it went bankrupt. These people had been under the impression all the time that they were protected by a federal charter. The liquidator of the company is now attempting to collect the balance of the amount payable on certain shares from people over 70 years of age with very little but their homes as assets.

I wish to point that out because I believe that the words "Canada Limited" should not be awarded to any company unless it has a federal charter. I could deal at some length with this matter but I do not want to delay the passage of the bill. I want to bring the matter to the attention of the house because I think it is a point that is worth considering. It involves considerable hardship for a number of very worthy citizens whom I represent who were deluded into investing in what they thought was a company with a federal charter with all the greater security behind that, and who later found that they had invested in a provincial company registered in Alberta and doing business in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. I think that some consideration should be given to the question of the names of these companies so that people who invest in them will know exactly what they are doing and that the name means something when they read it.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to say something about this matter. I am glad that the hon. member for Kootenay West brought it up. I have not had an opportunity to consult with the sponsor of this bill, and I do not know that I would be in order if I were to move an amendment changing the name. I quite agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West that the present name might mislead a small speculator. You know, we are not all from St. James street or Bay street, or whatever the name is of the winding alley in Winnipeg. Some of us come from small country districts, and when we see the word Canada we are impressed.

Perhaps I could explain better this way. Some years ago a former member of this house sent out on our high-class House of Commons stationery a prospectus for an oil company, or perhaps it was a gold mine. I am glad to say he came from the other side of the house, but I am sorry to say he came from my province. There was the crest; there was the name Canada, and people with annuities or perhaps with small amounts of money to invest would buy those shares in good faith as a result. I am not saying for a moment that this is not a genuine company. I have no doubt that in time it will be very successful. In the meantime, however, we should not do anything that might mislead people out in the hinterland, such as those in Comox-Alberni, where very few people have had much experience in finance.

I do not want to take up much time on this bill, but I understand that in this very chamber a great deal of time was taken to discuss the question of whether the word "cola" could be used with the word "Pepsi" in a trade mark. I believe, as the hon. member for Kootenay West says, the people of Canada should be fully protected at least until such time as this company has a dominion charter. Perhaps the company could secure the charter and later have their name changed to the Reinsurance Company of Canada Limited, in order to get it all in; but first they should obtain a dominion charter. I believe we should take a little time to consider such an important matter as this. I am not allowed to refer to the other sections now, but there are sections of this bill which would not mean half as much to the investing public of Canada as the name of the company, particularly those not well advised on finance. I took some advice on stocks from a learned colleague who is well up in finance. He is well up, and now I am well down, having taken his advice. In that case I was acting on his judgment, and in this case small investors may act on the strength of the name.

As I have said already, there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay West. That is usually the case; he comes from a very fine province. So I think the house should pay particular attention to what he says. I do not want to delay this bill or to delay the committee longer, so I will only repeat that I concur entirely in the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Green: May I ask the sponsor in which provinces it is proposed to register this company?

Mr. Cavers: I understand it is proposed to register it in the dominion and in Ontario, but the business of insurance will be carried on in all the provinces.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not know whether or not the matter I have in mind was discussed on second reading. The name of this company is Mercantile and General Reinsurance Company of Canada Limited, but I can see nothing in the bill which would suggest that the business of the company is to be confined to reinsurance. This bill gives the company the right to carry on all kinds of insurance. I believe the general public would consider a reinsurance company to be particularly strong; that is the impression one gets. The weaker companies take out insurance and reinsure with stronger companies. Many companies, for example, reinsure with Lloyd's, and the name of this company conveys the impression that here we have a company somewhat similar to strong companies such as Lloyd's, doing a reinsurance business. When we look at the bill we see that the paid up capital is not very large; yet the impression conveyed is that this is a strong company with great assets, large reserves and large capital, doing a reinsurance business. I do not think that impression should be conveyed by the name of a company which is just starting business, with a limited capital and with the paid up capital only a quarter of the total authorized by this bill.

I suggest that is a point to which the committee might be well advised to give some attention. From time to time over the years we have had difficulties with the names of insurance companies. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill can say something to put my mind at rest in this connection, but as the matter stands at the moment I would be inclined to oppose adoption of the bill until such time as we have some further explanation or even a new name, which would remove what seems to me an objectionable feature of the bill.

Mr. Cavers: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is quite correct in his interpretation of section 6 of the bill, in which the powers of the company are not limited to reinsurance. I am informed, and I can inform the committee, that in the beginning the company intends to conduct a reinsurance business solely, but they do not wish to limit their powers to reinsurance because as time goes on they intend to carry on other types of insurance as well.

Mr. Coldwell: The point I had in mind was exactly what the hon. member says, that this does suggest that the company is going to engage in general insurance. There is nothing in the bill which says its business will be only that of reinsurance, and that is the point I am making. The powers granted in this bill are those which would be granted to a company doing a general insurance business, and there is no mention anywhere of reinsurance, whether the initial business will be in reinsurance or whether it will be in general insurance. On the other hand there is every indication that the company intends to engage in a general insurance business. It is for that reason also, having in mind the amount of capital in the bill, it seems to me there is an objectionable feature in the name, reinsurance.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, as has been pointed out previously, one insurance company went bankrupt and caused a great deal of hardship to a great many people throughout Canada. As has been pointed out by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, in my opinion at least the name is misleading. What protection has an individual, not an investor in the capital of the company, but a policyholder in the insurance company? For instance, before we had such an excellent staff as we have in charge of finance at Ottawa, we had a bank failure. Thousands of people in the Kootenays lost money, and I should like to know what protection there is. As I understand it, this company is going to carry on a general insurance business with a capital of $250,000. There are many individuals in the province of British Columbia who are insured for four or five times that amount. Of course, I will admit that is only one year's profit, but I should like the sponsor of the bill to tell us whether policyholders of this company will have the same protection as policyholders of the operating companies now have?

Mr. Sinclair: Since the Department of Finance has been mentioned, I should say that federal incorporation, of course, does include supervision by the federal superintendent of insurance. That is the very point which the member for Kootenay West wants. I would suggest that the fact this company has "of Canada" in its title is a guarantee to those who are going to invest in the company or buy policies in the company that this is a federal incorporation and so subject to the federal superintendent of insurance. I respectfully submit, sir, that the member for Fraser Valley and the member for Kootenay West are arguing on different sides of the problem.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am glad that assurance is on the record now, because that will be here not for today or tomorrow but for all time, that the parliamentary assistant of the Department of Finance has given the very assurance I wanted. Not only the people of Kootenay West and the people of Fraser Valley, but also the little man in Coast-Capilano will thank us for having secured that assurance from the Department of Finance.

Mr. Green: Will the sponsor explain why the word "reinsurance" is used in the name instead of the word "insurance"?

Mr. Cavers: In answer to that question, I may say that this company is a subsidiary of a company of the same name except for the deletion of the words "of Canada". It is an English company, and the same words were used in the incorporation of the company in Canada, except that the words "of Canada" were used to distinguish it from the parent English company.

Mr. Green: Does the parent company carry on a general insurance business?

Mr. Cavers: I believe they carry on general insurance as well as reinsurance.

Mr. Coldwell: Are the shares of this company to be in the hands of the directors of the parent company? Is this a subsidiary of the company to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. Cavers: I understand that this is a subsidiary of the parent company.

Mr. Coldwell: Where is the parent company registered? Is it an Ontario company?

Mr. Cavers: I am not sure, but I believe they are registered in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Coldwell: It is operating under an Ontario licence, then?

Mr. Cavers: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to point out to the member for Coast-Capilano that the member for Fraser Valley and I were not arguing in opposite directions. We were both going in the same direction, but at different angles. My point is simply this, that I do not believe any company using the words "of Canada Limited" in its title should be allowed to use those three words unless it has a federal charter.

Mr. Adamson: May I ask the sponsor of the bill who the directors of the parent company are? Can he say?

Mr. Cavers: I am able to give the name of only one director of the parent company, and that is a gentleman who I understand is now residing in this country. I am not able to say who the other directors are.

Mr. Adamson: I asked the question, Mr. Chairman, because there have been several United Kingdom and Scottish reinsurance companies that have moved out to do a Canadian business. I was wondering whether this was one of them, which was now seeking incorporation in Canada in order to extend its business in Canada.

Mr. Cavers: That is the general purpose of the bill.

Mr. Coldwell: Can the hon. gentleman give us some idea of the strength of the parent company? Can he tell us what the capital and reserves are of the parent company?

Mr. Cavers: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether that falls within the discussion of this bill. We are now dealing with a company that is to be incorporated in Canada. This bill satisfies the superintendent of insurance who has dealt with the matter. I would say that this company should stand on its own feet in Canada.

Bill reported.

Mr. Cavers moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: Stand.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I adjourned the debate on this Bill No. 118. Am I out of order in going ahead now?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the sponsor of this bill is necessarily absent today, and I know he was relying on the ruling the Speaker made last year to be found on page 570 of the Journals for 1950, which in part reads as follows:

> It has not been the custom in this house to proceed with a bill introduced by a private member unless that private member is here at the time. The procedure is similar to that followed in respect of bills introduced by the government. If the minister sponsoring the bill is not present, the bill stands unless the government indicates otherwise. It has always seemed to me that a private member should have the same right in respect of a bill which he has sponsored. I have given the matter consideration and I would be prepared to give a ruling.
> I have never known of a private bill or of a public bill which has been introduced by a private member being proceeded with in his absence and without his consent.

Mr. Speaker: In view of that ruling—

Mr. Green: May we speak on this point of order? I do submit that this particular bill is not covered by that ruling. In this case the sponsor has moved second reading, and on the last occasion on which the bill was before the house there was an amendment moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). The house is now considering that amendment, and the hon. member for Kootenay West is here this evening. I submit that the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson), who had the adjournment from the last time the bill was considered, should be permitted to proceed. At least we had a similar situation in connection with the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company, which came up for discussion here on April 6. Your Honour will find that, as reported at page 1693 of Hansard, the bill had been reported back from the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and although the sponsor was not here, the bill was proceeded with in committee. There was a good deal of discussion and eventually the chairman reported progress and asked leave to sit again. That was done just last month. I submit that actually the measure is now in the hands of the house and that if the sponsor is not here tonight, that is his own fault. I suggest that a ruling to the effect that we cannot proceed with the debate at this time would not be correct.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on the point of order. I should like to draw to your attention the fact that the language that was used by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) is to be found in citation 323 of Beauchesne, third edition:

> Every member is entitled to make a motion, but once he has moved it it is in the possession of the house . . .

Later on in that same citation there is this sentence:

> When an amendment has been proposed, the original motion cannot be withdrawn until the amendment has first been agreed to, withdrawn or negatived.

In other words, it seems to me that this matter is doubly in the possession of the house. In the first instance, there was a motion for a second reading moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson). Once he made the motion and it was put to the house, it became the property of the house. In addition to that, there has been an amendment by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), which was moved and seconded; and that amendment is now in the possession of the house.

Moreover, as has been pointed out, divorce bills are frequently proceeded with in this house when the sponsor is not present. In fact, we all recall occasions when we have asked questions of the sponsor of a divorce bill only to find that he was not here at all. That has happened with respect to other private bills. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to another one just a short while ago.

I recall the ruling to which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) has just referred. I have not that volume here on my desk, but as I recall it, Your Honour had something a little more to say on that occasion. It seems to me that Your Honour said something to the effect that whatever was done, surely it would not be fair to the original mover of a bill to dispose of it finally; and I think that would be a matter of fairness and of common sense. But on the other hand, is it fair to the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson), who wishes to proceed with his remarks on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West, to deny him that right on this occasion? As I say, if the debate on the whole measure finally came to a conclusion and we reached the point where it was the right of the original sponsor of the bill to close the debate, and Your Honour felt that the house should not finally dispose of it in his absence, I think we should have to support you. But I do not see how Your Honour can prohibit debate along the way when those who wish to speak to it are here and wish to do so.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. I have not my copy of Beauchesne with me. Maybe someone will lend me a copy.

Mr. Fulford: Have you your copy of Knowles?

Mr. Sinnott: Have you Bourinot?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I could bring the Brockville telephone directory here. That is probably all some members would understand. But I can well remember being present when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or someone spoke the other night. I can see the fairness of such a ruling if it was a question of bringing the matter to a conclusion; and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I at least want to see this particular bill to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation brought to a conclusion, as I presume every other hon. member does. But I want it to be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. I well remember that the other night, when the bill to incorporate the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company was under discussion, there was certain information that I particularly wanted to get. But that bill was proceeded with, a circumstance which was most embarrassing to me. I will admit that it is easy to embarrass me; but in this case it was particularly embarrassing for me because it threw me off my trend of thought when I could not get the answers to questions as I went along. Yet that bill was proceeded with, with no objection at all.

In this case, as has been pointed out, not only has the bill been brought before the house and been put into our care, through your gracious office, Mr. Speaker; but on top of that an amendment has been moved. I do not think it is particularly fair to the sponsor of this bill that we do not proceed with it and possibly advance it just to the satisfactory conclusion; then he in closing the debate, for instance, could make any amendments he desired to make; and we hope that he will make amendments. But if we do not advance it so far, I do not think it is fair to him nor do I think it is quite according to Hoyle, judging by what went on the other night with regard to the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company, when the sponsor of that bill was not here to answer the questions that I asked in order to enable me to bring forward further constructive arguments as to why this bill should be passed. If we delay the discussion of this bill tonight, there may be some point brought up tonight that will facilitate the passing of the bill, allowing it to become law.

I am sorry I have not Beauchesne, Lloyd's or any other authority before me; but if I had, Mr. Speaker, I think I could quote you a section that would cover this particular case. Before you give your ruling, I should like to point out that the other night, in connection with a divorce bill, the very same ruling as mentioned by the previous speaker was used as an obstacle to me. I do not think we can have soup in one dish and not in the other. I think that in some cases we must not go entirely by Beauchesne but rather by the rule of common sense. To me it is common sense to proceed when the bill has been debated in this house, first reading having been moved and adopted, and having been doubly adopted by having an amendment moved to the motion for second reading. Mr. Speaker, I think that you should rule that this particular bill be discussed tonight.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief in what I have to say. In dealing with the matter of this motion, I think the particular purpose we should have in view is to protect the right of the sponsor of the bill. I agree that that should be done. But the mover of the adjournment of a former debate on this bill also has rights. What would his position be if, the next time this bill comes up for discussion, the sponsor is here and the mover of the adjournment is not here? Will the bill stand over until he is here? I think we should be careful how we deal with this matter. However, I think the rule provides that if the mover of an adjournment is not here, someone else may proceed in his place.

On April 6 the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company bill was up. The sponsor was not in his place, and there was no one who could answer questions. Along with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) I objected to proceeding with the bill until someone could answer our questions. We had a good deal of difficulty to get the leader of the house that evening to allow progress to be reported and the committee ask leave to sit again. Therefore I think that the rights of the mover of this bill will be amply protected if the debate proceeds tonight, without disposing of the bill, and that he be given an opportunity to reply to anything that is said, and a vote taken when he is present.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members for bringing to my attention these points, which are very pertinent to the point of order. I must admit that this question has given me some concern. I realize that the rights not only of the sponsor of the bill but of the hon. member who moved the amendment, and of all hon. members, must be protected. I did make a ruling on this matter on Friday, June 23, 1950, which was to the effect that when the sponsor of a private bill is not in the house the debate on that bill cannot proceed without his consent.

Tonight we have a case where the sponsor of a bill has requested, through another member, that the bill should stand. Now it has been suggested that because there is an amendment, the debate on the amendment should proceed, and that the mover of the amendment might be injured by not proceeding with the amendment. In this case, in any event, that would not be possible, because I believe the purpose of the amendment is to delay the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, he is not being injured in any way in that respect. Am I wrong? Notwithstanding, I will say that I have always considered that a private member who in sponsoring a bill stands in the same position as a member of the government who introduces a bill in the house. As hon. members know, when a government bill is introduced, it is introduced by a minister. There may be an amendment to that bill introduced by a private member. The discussion either on the bill or on the amendment does not proceed without the consent of the minister who introduced the bill. Why should a private member not stand in the same position? That has been the attitude that I have taken, and although I realize that it might appear that an injustice is being done, nevertheless I feel that I should not change the ruling which I made on Friday, June 23.

It has been said that the bill is now in the possession of the house, and that the amendment is in the possession of the house. That is so, and neither the amendment nor the bill can be withdrawn without the consent of the house. That also would be true of a bill introduced by a member of the government. A member of the government could not without consent withdrawn his bill once it is in the possession of the house. As I say, I have given considerable thought to this. I think the rules of procedure might be amended. Until they are amended I feel I must abide by my ruling which I made on June 23, and allow the bill to stand.

Bill stands.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, April 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Applewhaite for the second reading of Bill No. 116, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Gillis.

Mr. Applewhaite: Speaking to the point of order as to whether the amendment is in order or not, I regret I must inflict on the house another discussion on a point of order. I am not speaking on the amendment or its merits. I would submit, sir, that the practice dealing with the handling in this house of private bills is clearly set out in the standing orders and the citations in that part of Beauchesne, third edition, dealing with private bills; and further that the practice based on these standing orders and these citations is now established in this house by custom as well as by law.

In support of that statement I would refer Your Honour to citation 769, the appropriate part of which reads:

> The expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee.

It is the established practice in this house, according to the rule, that at the second reading the house will consider and pass upon the principle of the bill; that the committee to which the bill is referred under the appropriate standing order will be the judge of the facts upon which the application of the principle will or will not be based; in other words, the bill will or will not be passed. That process is set out in our own standing orders. What this amendment is asking the house to do is to put the cart before the horse, to reverse its own established procedure and to decide upon the facts before coming to a conclusion upon the principle of the bill. That I submit, Mr. Speaker, it cannot do.

It has been said by some hon. member—I regret that I cannot credit him by name because I forget who it was—that the standing orders and the citations are there for our guidance, and that the least we can do is to try to be consistent in living up to them. Citations following citation 769—there are several of them—I put on the record at the time that I introduced the bill for second reading, and I do not intend to inflict them on the house again; but I will submit, sir, that they all carry out definitely the principle that I have tried to outline.

There is in Beauchesne, third edition, which is the last word on parliamentary procedure in so far as we are concerned, a special chapter entitled "Private Bills", and a section of the "Standing Orders" dealing with private bills. That is the chapter, these are the standing orders, these are the citations which must govern us at the moment.

I said, sir, that Beauchesne, third edition, is the last word which we have to refer to in matters of procedure. Beauchesne, in his third edition, quotes on several occasions with reference to private bills—and quotes with approval—Dodd and Wilberforce on "Private Bills Procedure", which says at page 20:

> The house does not profess to decide upon the second reading as to the truth or otherwise of the allegations of fact upon which a proposed bill is based, and in conceding a second reading to a private bill the house is regarded as merely giving its sanction to its general principle on the hypothesis that the committee to which it afterwards is referred finds those allegations proved.

In Beauchesne we find citation 659 which reads in part as follows, after setting out at some length a case which was brought for decision:

> The Speaker ruled this amendment out of order because it did not challenge the principle of the bill and it anticipated the committee stage.

That citation is in the part of Beauchesne which deals with public bills. I submit it is much more impressive when considered in conjunction with standing orders and citations dealing with private bills, as the amendment before the house does not oppose the principle of the bill and does attempt to anticipate the correct committee stage.

On anticipation, at page 273 of the Journals of the house for 1934 Mr. Speaker of that day, in ruling out of order an amendment proposed by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, said:

> The amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition does not challenge the principle of Bill 51 and it anticipates the committee stage.

And then Mr. Speaker at a later point closed his ruling with these words:

> The objections raised in the proposed amendment cannot be looked upon as reasons why Bill 51 should not now be proceeded with and, moreover, they may be considered after the bill has been read a second time.

Under our established practice the matters which the hon. member for Cape Breton

South wishes considered not only can but must be considered after the bill has been read the second time.

I should like to admit that there are in Beauchesne several citations which would indicate that a motion of this sort is entirely in order. But I would point out that those citations are not, any of them, to be found in that chapter or section of the book which deals with private bills, for which an entirely different practice is set out and has been established.

As to this may I read, with respect, from page 235 of the Journals of last year in which Mr. Speaker said:

> Private bills are of a different nature from public bills. I have said that previously in the house. The principle of a private bill is approved conditionally on second reading, subject to confirmation upon satisfactory proof when the bill is before the committee.
> As the Prime Minister has so well pointed out, standing order 104 makes it obligatory to refer a private bill, once it has received second reading, to one of the standing committees.

I submit that as to the practice there can be no question. There remains only the incident brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who said, with perfect truth, that a motion in exactly the same terms as this, on a private bill in 1948, was submitted to the house and was voted upon. The record of this is to be found at page 2831 of Hansard for 1948. What actually occurred was that the hon. member moved his amendment and sat down, and Mr. Speaker took the vote. No question was raised as to whether or not the amendment was in order. Then are we bound by something which occurred in the house when no ruling was made and no point of order was raised? I think that was answered by the decision of Mr. Speaker, from which I quote briefly as it appears at page 215 of the Journals for 1950, where it says:

> One must give the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) full credit for finding an instance in 1891 when two such motions without intermediate proceedings were allowed. I repeat, however, that the Speaker did not make a ruling.

That is the end of the quotation. Therefore Mr. Speaker felt that he was not bound.

It would be unthinkable that we should be bound by the incident of 1948. An irregularity, even with the greatest vigilance, may easily slip through and occur once in the proceedings of this house, without a point of order being raised. I do not think it should be suggested that that would establish a precedent which would have the effect of overruling the standing orders and established practice of the house, as it has been over the years. I submit that the amendment is completely out of order on a private bill.

British Columbia Telephone Company

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with particular interest to the comments of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite). It is a matter of interest to me when someone does some research into a point of order.

The hon. member has drawn to your attention the fact that there is a precedent in 1948 when an amendment similar to the one now before the house was moved and voted upon. He sought to make a point out of the fact that no argument was raised against the propriety of the motion. Nevertheless the fact is that it was not challenged and it is on the record as a precedent; and I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, as well as to the hon. member for Skeena, another precedent.

This time I go back to 1944; and I ask you and the hon. member for Skeena to pay particular attention to the circumstances in 1944. On that occasion there was before the house a private bill moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). This was a bill which sought to incorporate an Alberta provincial bank. On that occasion a similar amendment was moved. Who moved it? It was not a member of the opposition; it was the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who was then minister of finance. His amendment was in precisely the same terms as the amendment now being discussed, namely that the bill of the hon. member for Lethbridge be not then read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to one of the standing committees of the house. Not only was the amendment accepted and voted upon, but it carried. The bill was not then read a second time, but instead the subject matter thereof was referred to the committee mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. Pouliot: Does not the hon. member recall that at that time, in 1944, the only rule was the will of the government?

Mr. Fulton: Is that different from what it is today?

Mr. Pouliot: No, but I am speaking of 1944. You were not here then, but I was. You did not suffer from it, but I did.

Mr. Fulton: I suffer from it now.

Mr. Pouliot: Amen.

Mr. Knowles: I should like also to deal with other matters which have been raised by the hon. member for Skeena. I mention in particular citation 769, only part of which he read. I would draw his attention to the fact that he did not read the whole of it, but that he left out two significant sentences.

Mr. Applewhaite: I put them on the record.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member may have put them on the record some weeks ago when he spoke on second reading, but he did not put them on the record tonight when he was trying to make the point that second reading should not be interfered with in this way. Perhaps I should read those two sentences now.

Some hon. Members: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: It says:

> Where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the house will not consent to the second reading; but otherwise, the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee. This is the first occasion on which the bill is before the house otherwise than pro forma or in connection with the standing orders; and if the bill be opposed, upon its principle, it is the proper time for attempting its defeat.

My point is that right there in that section in Beauchesne which deals with private bills—and my hon. friend from Skeena makes a great deal of the fact that there is a special section dealing with private bills—right there in that section is the admission that even a private bill, which often gets a perfunctory second reading, can be dealt with in a manner designed to defeat it if hon. members so wish. I should like to deal with one other point raised by the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: —but I see it is nine o'clock. I would move the adjournment of the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: If the house prefers, I would be prepared to make my ruling.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: First of all I should like to commend both hon. members for the manner in which they carried on this debate, and for the research they have made into this very interesting point of order. Although I am making my ruling now, I intend to give this matter further consideration, should a similar amendment be made in future.

In view of the two amendments which have been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it would be hardly fair to disallow this amendment without notice. I will not say there has been a practice established, but in two cases this amendment has been allowed to stand. Therefore I am going to allow this amendment to stand. May I also say I feel that when this amendment is debated the whole principle of the second reading of the bill should not be debated but that the debate should be strictly confined to the amendment.

May I refer for a minute to the previous ruling which I made with respect to the standing of private bills when the sponsor is not present. I said at that time that I thought there might be an amendment to the procedure. I was referring to the fact that when hon. members come to the house for private members' hour they do not know what bills are to be debated. I think it would be helpful if hon. members knew in advance what bills were going to be considered during that hour. This would be similar to the practice in connection with government business.

It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

2. That the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs, that are at present subject to the rate of fifteen per cent be increased to twenty-five per cent.

3. That the excise tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy, be reduced from thirty to fifteen per cent.

4. That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels;

(b) washing machines operated by electric or other power;

(c) electric, gas or kerosene refrigerators and freezing equipment and complete parts therefor including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

5. That the excise tax on cigarette papers and cigarette paper tubes be repealed.

6. That the excise tax on the following goods be increased by the amounts shown:

(a) for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package, three-quarters of one cent;

(b) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of manufactured tobacco, including snuff but not including cigars and cigarettes, contained in any package, three cents;

(c) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption in Canada, three-quarters of one cent.

7. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) cortisone;

(b) adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH).

8. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eleventh day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-one.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that, following the discussions and rulings of last Thursday, the discussion now is ranging broadly over the eight sections of the resolution, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant with reference to item No. 3, the proposed reduction in the excise tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery from 30 per cent to 15 per cent. The reasons for this proposed reduction have been indicated by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. It strikes me if these reasons are valid, and I have no reason to think they are not, that the proper course for the government to have followed would have been not simply to propose a reduction in the tax but repeal of the tax. I ask the parliamentary assistant, therefore, particularly in the light of the statement made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of April 10, what justification there can be for continuing this tax even at the 15 per cent rate?

Mr. Pouliot: Before the parliamentary assistant answers, may I suggest to the hon. member for Eglinton that he should visit the plants of manufacturers of candy and chocolate. He would be surprised to see the number of machines that were idle on account of the heavier tax. I took the trouble to visit a big plant in Montreal. I will give the name to my hon. friend if he wants it. I was surprised to see the number of machines that they had to make and wrap chocolate bars. The only thing that was done by hand was the putting of chocolate drops into the boxes. It is a huge plant that has to be enlarged, and I was surprised at the number of machines that were idle. I asked about the personnel, and they told me that the number of personnel was one-quarter of what is was in August of last year. They said that in August of last year they had 600 people working there, and the number had fallen to 200. This was before Easter, the busy season for candy manufacturers.

I had a letter from a candy manufacturer in my constituency who told me that he would have to close his business if the tax was maintained at 30 per cent. The same thing was said by many other candy and chocolate manufacturers, and I am sure that the minister had representations from all over the country to the same effect. When I was in Toronto I would have liked to visit the Neilson plant, but I did not have the time to do so because we were so busy seeing interesting things. I would have made a point to go there and ask them if conditions were the same in their plant as they were in the plant of the Montreal candy manufacturers. When hundreds of people are put out of work precisely on account of the increase in the tax, I find it judicious of the government to decrease the tax in order to give more employment to people.

My hon. friend knows what quantities of chocolate bars are sold to children, and not only to children but to people who travel and eat them on trains, and to people who eat them at picnics, and so on. The consumption is very large in Canada. It is true that they are a good food but that is not my point. What I wanted to tell my hon. friend, and what I want the hon. gentleman to understand, is that it is not a matter of producing more candy. It is not so much that as the idea of keeping people at work who are accustomed to doing that type of work, women who cannot do hard work. Moreover, if my hon. friend takes the time to go to Neilson's in Toronto, a firm that I have not visited, and others in other cities of Canada, he will be surprised to see the machines they use for the manufacture of chocolates and other candy, and I am sure he will appreciate the fact that the tax has been reduced as much as possible in order to provide more work for both men and women.

Mr. Fleming: May I remind the committee that a similar tax was in effect until the spring of 1949. The pre-election budget was distinguished among other things by the entire repeal of this same tax. The repeal lasted only until September, 1950, when the Minister of Finance, even in the face of the reasons which he had given in the spring of 1949 for repeal of this tax, asked the house to reimpose the tax and to levy it at the rate of 30 per cent. In his budget speech on April 10 the minister said, as reported at page 1812 of Hansard:

> In September a tax of 30 per cent was imposed on all candy, confectionery and chewing gum. Experience has shown that this rate has been too severe, and its effects upon the industry have been out of proportion in comparison with other taxed industries. We propose, therefore, to reduce this rate to 15 per cent.

In that brief reference, Mr. Chairman, I think the minister has shown quite conclusively what were the inherent defects of this tax. First of all, it was discriminatory. It singled out the manufacturers of a particular article or articles, which in the eyes of most people are a food, for a special tax. As the hon. member for Temiscouata has pointed out, in that respect it was discriminatory against the persons employed by the companies producing these goods as well as against those who were employers and industrialists. In the second place, the minister has pointed out that the tax had a damaging effect on the industry. He drew attention to the fact that the effects on the industry have been out of all proportion in comparison with other taxed industries. The amount realized from this type of tax, which of course in large measure is paid by youngsters and the parents of youngsters, has been out of all proportion to the damage which has been done to the industry and consumers.

I come back to the question I put to the parliamentary assistant. If the Minister of Finance has given sound reasons for the proposed reduction in the tax, it seems he has given equally sound reasons for its complete repeal, and I ask what justification there can be for continuing to tax even at the rate of 15 per cent.

Mr. MacInnis: This is the first time I have taken part in any of the discussions concerning the budget, but I feel I must say something in opposition to the increase in the sales tax. In his budget speech the minister said, in mentioning this increase—I am not quoting his words but giving their sense or import—that as 95 per cent of the food items were exempt from the sales tax, for that reason this tax would not fall heavily on those in the low income brackets. That seems to me terribly callous reasoning. Surely people whose incomes are already so low that the greater part must be spent on food are sufficiently punished even if they go free of all taxes.

Then on Thursday evening, I think it was, the parliamentary assistant referred to the fact that the number of persons gainfully employed in this country was 5,200,000, but of that number only 2,200,000 paid income tax. I do not know whether he said in effect that the reason for this increase in the sales tax was to catch the other 3,000,000 so that they would contribute to paying for some of the social services they enjoy. Let us examine that reasoning. If the reasoning of the Minister of Finance was callous this is equally callous, if not more so. The exemptions under the Income Tax Act are $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married person.

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, when I tried to expand this argument myself the whip of the C.C.F. was promptly on his feet to call me out of order because the income tax resolution was not being discussed. I suggest in all fairness that the rule be applied to the colleague of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as it was applied to me.

Mr. MacInnis: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Chairman, may I point out the difference between what I am saying now and what the parliamentary assistant said Thursday evening.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Sinclair: I never had a chance to say it.

Mr. MacInnis: I am going to deal with a specific point, that is the income these 3,000,000 people are receiving. The parliamentary assistant was making a speech on the Income Tax Act, comparing it to that in the United Kingdom and the United States. I am not going to do that. I have great respect for your rulings, Mr. Chairman, so I will ask you to watch me carefully and if you check me I shall govern myself accordingly.

Before I go on with the point I want to make, let us remember that the purpose of the increase in this tax is to catch those who do not pay income tax, whose incomes are too low to come under that tax. Having said that, I think I am entitled to say what the incomes are on which taxes are paid. Mind you, I am not arguing whether the income tax is too high or too low; I am merely stating that for single persons the exemption is $1,000 and for married persons it is $2,000. The purchasing value of $1,000 today, in terms of the 1939 dollar, is about $550 or $560. The purchasing value of $2,000 in terms of the 1939 dollar would be twice that, or something under $1,200, so really what is being exempted for income tax purposes today is about $550 and $1,100. Can anyone with an income of only that amount pay taxes at all without sinking himself and his family still lower in the mesh of poverty? When we do tax them let us remember that we cannot get away from the effects of poverty. Government at some level will have to give these people assistance to compensate for what we tax out of them. Government at some level will have to pay for the crime, the sickness and the delinquency that follow in the trail of poverty. Surely with such a clear case before us we are not now going to tax people who at the present time are not getting sufficient income on which to live decently.

This tax is wrong in principle because it gets away from the principle of taxing according to ability to pay. At the same time it is undesirable because it places the same tax on what is bought by the poor as on what is bought by the rich. Today the hon. member for Red Deer referred to the strange phenomenon that people speak differently or take a different attitude when on the government side than when on the opposition side. I have drawn attention to that on various occasions during my time in this house.

I wish tonight to draw attention to what the financial critic for the opposition in 1931 had to say about the sales tax. At that time it was a Liberal opposition, and the financial critic was the late Hon. J. L. Ralston. The government had increased the sales tax in that budget from one per cent to four per cent, and Mr. Ralston said this:

My hon. friends opposite are talking about domestic trade and the desirability of having as many trading transactions as possible in process. Every time that four per cent tax is imposed it is a detriment to trade; it is a brake on the wheels of trade. Yet, as I say, the tax has been increased from one per cent to four per cent, and it is being passed on to and paid by the only people who do pay—the consumers.

I would not say that people are as poverty stricken today as they were in 1931, but I do say that those who are living on low incomes will find it as difficult to live today as those who were living on low incomes in 1931. I am not concerned about the effects of the tax on people who can afford to pay. I am only concerned with the effect of the tax on these three million workers and others like them in Canada who are receiving incomes so low that they do not pay income tax which is levied according to ability to pay. Those people receive certain social services, such as family allowances. If we are going to tax them to pay for the family allowance and other social services, what is the ultimate benefit to them going to be? As a matter of fact, you cannot seriously tax the poor because the poor have nothing to tax. To the extent that you try to tax them you are putting the burden on some other level of government.

Let me read further from what Mr. Ralston said:

It is the ordinary, every-day consumers, the men and women who are hard put to make ends meet, men who are out of work, who are now called upon to pay the extra amount in connection with the sales tax.

So today in the same way it is the men who are hard put to get along without paying taxes whom you are going to make suffer the burden of low wages and high prices by increasing this tax.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to say a few words in reply to the suggestions that have been put forward by the member for Temiscouata. I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance and the government on the reduction in excise tax on candy. This adversely affected a large industry in my riding, the manufacturers of Ganong's chocolates. I believe this measure is appreciated by all who work for them, and by the officials of the company. At the time this thirty per cent tax was imposed, I was advised that the greatest competition Canadian candy manufacturers had was from the importation of chocolates from Great Britain. Apparently the chocolate that was manufactured was made from cocoa that had been subsidized by the government and sugar that had been subsidized by the government. Competition of that kind was very unfair. Companies in Great Britain that had subsidiaries in Canada were able to ship chocolate into this country duty free because the dumping duty was not applied. It was a very unfair thing to the candy manufacturers of this country. I do know that Ganong Brothers were obliged to discharge several men and women who were working for them at the time this tax was applied.

It has been suggested that the tax should be applied also to what we sometimes term nickel articles such as ice cream and potato chips. Today when a child goes into a grocery store or a drug store with a nickel, there are very few things he can buy. He can buy ice cream and potato chips. If one looks back over the record, one finds that the sale of potato chips increased one hundred per cent within a few months after this tax was applied. The candy manufacturers considered this to be very unfair.

I do not want to take any more of the time of the committee, but I do want to congratulate the minister and the government on taking this matter into consideration because the candy manufacturers were at a great disadvantage. I might point out that the cost to Ganong Brothers was considerable. They had 30,000 boxes of eight-cent bars which were selling for eight cents and which had to be sold at a loss of 48 cents a box. The production of the bar department was down from 120,000 pounds per month to 65,000 pounds per month for the first three months after this tax was applied. The production of penny goods ceased completely, and with Ganong Brothers that was a very big seller. This tax prohibited the manufacture of that type of candy. There were over 17,000 boxes of labels that had to be discarded owing to the fact that the size of the bar had to be changed, and those wrappers were a total loss. It is estimated that the tax cost Ganong Brothers in the vicinity of $60,000, and their production was down about one-third. I believe the reduction in the tax was a move in the right direction, and I want to congratulate the minister on the consideration he has shown that industry.

Mr. Shaw: There are a few questions which I should like to direct to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. These questions arise out of a statement the minister made when delivering his budget on April 10 which is to be found on page 1812 of Hansard. He was speaking of the reason for increasing the sales tax, and he said:

My range of choice to secure this remaining $100 million is really limited to more than doubling the increase I have already proposed on the personal income tax, which could only be achieved by a sharp lowering of exemption levels, or an increase in the sales tax.

Now, I am asking the parliamentary assistant if we are to take that just as it reads. Was the Minister of Finance actually limited to a choice as between those two things, and if so would the parliamentary assistant list those factors which limited the minister's choice either to the raising of the sales tax or an increase in the income tax rate?

Mr. Follwell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask—

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, I did not ask my question just to be passing time. The minister asserted he was limited to a choice of either imposing an additional 25 per cent sales tax or increasing the income tax rate. Are we to take that as it reads? If so, will the parliamentary assistant list those factors which limited the minister to a choice between those two things? After all, a budget speech is not delivered extemporaneously. It is a carefully prepared document, and I assume it is carefully thought out. Every word is weighed, and I take it as it reads.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, hon. members who listened to this debate will understand why I perhaps have not paid too much attention to what the hon. member for Red Deer has said. Earlier in the debate he made the observation that he believed the budget had been thrown together overnight. Now he says: Of course I know the budget had very grave and long consideration given to it. Then he says an extraordinary thing, and asks me as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance whether the minister really meant what he said when he said that for reasons which he had already outlined he was limited in raising this last $100 million either to an increase in the sales tax or a still further increase in the income tax. Anyone who studies his analysis of the revenue which we can expect from each of the increases in the major fields of taxation would see the great extent to which such an increase would have to be made to raise a further $100 million.

Mr. Shaw: If applied to one particular thing.

Mr. Sinclair: For example, $125 million is the figure which we are raising by the increase in tax. When the amendment to one of the clauses was before the committee a little earlier, I pointed out, just by a quick examination of the figures put on record by the minister, that this would have necessitated the substitution of an increased liquor tax, which is already a very high one, from $12 a gallon to $36 a gallon, assuming that there was absolutely no diminution in the rate of consumption. It is considerations like that which the minister has detailed in the speech itself, as he examines the revenue he can raise from each of the major fields, which led him to that conclusion. If the minister with his logic cannot persuade the hon. member of the correctness of his case, certainly he cannot expect me to do so. As to the hon. member for Eglinton—

Mr. Shaw: May I just make one observation before the parliamentary assistant leaves his reference to me?

Mr. Sinclair: I should prefer to go through and finish.

Mr. Shaw: That is fine.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I waited until several members had made their points, which I noted. The hon. member for Red Deer insisted that I get to my feet. Now that I have risen, I think that I should at least be allowed to finish my remarks and deal with the other points.

Mr. Shaw: I can make my observations later.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Eglinton referred to the tax on candy. Since we had found that this taxation on candy was too heavy in relation to taxation in competing fields, he asks why we did not remove it completely. Of course, I cannot quite follow his logic. Because the tax is too heavy, that does not imply immediately that the whole tax should be removed. We have reduced it to 15 per cent. We have cut it in half. The candy and chocolate manufacturers naturally would be happy—as would any other manufacturer—to see all taxes on their product totally removed. But as the hon. member for Charlotte has pointed out, their feeling is that this action would put them in a position where they can again compete.

The points put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver East, of course, have been put forward by practically every other opposition member who spoke. The point made by the hon. member for Red Deer this afternoon, to the effect that people in opposition talk differently about the sales tax from people in government, is of course amply borne out by the records which have already been presented in this house. When the Conservatives increased the sales tax 500 per cent, from one per cent to six per cent, of course the Liberals were indignant. Now the Conservatives are equally indignant because, as a result of defence revenue needs, we have been forced to increase it 25 per cent, from eight per cent to ten per cent. The hon. member for Vancouver East of course will recall that the C.C.F. in power feel differently about the sales tax from the C.C.F. not in power, because in Saskatchewan, I understand, despite the promises to remove the sales tax when they were in opposition, the sales tax has been increased by the C.C.F. government from two per cent to three per cent, which is a 50 per cent increase.

Mr. Coldwell: But they removed it from a long list of the necessities of life—from foods, meals, drugs and a long list of other things. As far as the C.C.F. here are concerned, may I say that we have not changed our opinion.

Mr. Sinclair: Of course not. That is the whole point of the little argument I am making. When they are in opposition, of course it is an iniquitous tax. I am amazed that the leader of the C.C.F. should have so little influence on the provincial government in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Coldwell: I have no more to do with the provincial government in Saskatchewan than has the Prime Minister to do with the provincial government, we will say, of Nova Scotia or of Quebec.

Mr. Sinclair: I should think it was important that the one socialist government in Canada would be a model government, and that the leader of the C.C.F. group would take more than a paternal interest in what they were doing.

As to the list of exemptions, our list of exemptions to the sales tax is a far wider one than any provincial list of exemptions in any of the provinces which apply the sales tax.

Since you, Mr. Chairman, permitted the hon. member for Vancouver East to extend his argument on the income tax, may I say that the point I made, by raising the fact that out of 5,200,000 people gainfully employed in Canada only 2,200,000 paid income tax last year, was in order to point out with the tables that in Canada we give the highest income tax exemptions of any country of the western world. It is not that our incomes are too low, but rather that we have seen to it that our income tax exemptions are the highest of any in the western world. When I get to the income tax resolution, I will certainly put on the record the income tax exemptions of other countries and the actual taxes paid by a Canadian earning $3,000 a year.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I heard the parliamentary assistant state that I permitted the hon. member for Vancouver East to speak about the income tax. I did not permit him to do so. He did so because he was in order when he was doing it. He was drawing a parallel or citing an example.

Mr. Sinclair: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, if I used the word "permit". In any case, like the hon. member for Vancouver East, I have now finished that avenue.

One other point raised as to the tax on candies was that it was not only the tax on candy but the large increase in the cost of raw cocoa beans which has also affected our Canadian chocolate manufacturers. That situation of course was mentioned by the hon. member for Charlotte. The other evening the hon. member for St. John's West asked me about the customs tariffs on these various items. I have that information with me tonight and when we are on the customs tariff bill I will give it to him.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just ask one question here? Is it not a fact that imported chocolates also pay the excise tax; that is, they pay the customs tariff and the excise tax?

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite true.

Mr. Coldwell: I understood the hon. member for Charlotte to say that it was unfair competition from the British chocolate candy manufacturers about which they were complaining. Perhaps I misunderstood him.

Mr. Sinclair: No. The hon. member's point was that the chocolate manufacturers in Britain can buy their cocoa beans at a better price than can our Canadian manufacturer. The source of cocoa beans is the Gold Coast of west Africa; and cocoa is subsidized in Britain.

Mr. Shaw: May I pursue this matter, Mr. Chairman? The parliamentary assistant's answer to my question was interesting but not very convincing.

Mr. Hansell: It was not an answer at all.

Mr. Shaw: One could hardly construe it as an answer. When on a previous occasion I referred to my conviction that the budget had been thrown together in a hurry, I was making specific reference to the specific proposals contained in it. But I assumed at least that the minister would be extremely careful with regard to the use of words in trying to deal with a set of proposals which must have been a bit unwholesome even to him in his way of thinking. In the second place, Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that the parliamentary assistant undertook to convey the impression that I was suggesting that if he had not acquired $100 million from an increase in the sales tax, he would have had to procure it from additional taxes on one other commodity, and he mentioned liquor. I suggested earlier in the debate that I was convinced that the minister was not limited to liquor. In fact, I made one or two other suggestions. I would say there are a great many fields open. The effect of my question was to question the propriety of indicating to this house that he was limited to a choice of one of two things. Personally, I am convinced that he was limited to no such field at all. As I see it, I think it was a mere attempt to find an additional argument, if possible, for doing something which the minister knew would be most unpopular with the Canadian people.

I just wish to make one other reference. The parliamentary assistant referred to an observation of mine this afternoon with regard to a Liberal member acting one way when he is a member of the opposition and acting in quite another way when he is a member of the government. I had in mind this: In the late spring and early summer of 1935 when the Liberals were asserting to all who would listen that they were certain to form the next government, they were also damning the sales tax. Yet, when they brought down their first budget on May 1, 1936, one of the first things they did was to increase the sales tax from 6 per cent to 8 per cent, and estimate that they would draw from the pockets of the people $23 million additional tax by that process. It seems rather strange to me that such things could all occur within the space of less than a year. The sales taxes were vicious in principle in the late spring of 1935 and during the summer, and particularly during the election campaign of the fall of 1935. It is an amazing thing that it took on such favourable characteristics almost immediately after the Liberals were elected to office, and more particularly when the minister of finance of that date was drafting his budget. But I do not intend to say anything more, Mr. Chairman, except to reassert that I should have liked to get a list of those factors which limited the minister in his choice between increasing the income tax on the one hand, and imposing a sales tax on the other; but obviously I shall not get a more specific answer tonight, and therefore I will let it ride at that.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to bring up the matter of sales tax on school busses. I know that the Minister of Finance has received representations from the Alberta school trustees association, and I think from a large number of other school associations in connection with the sales tax, requesting that it be removed so far as busses and other vehicles used solely for the purpose of transporting pupils to and from schools are concerned.

We have in this house a considerable number of debates in connection with federal aid to education. Nothing has been done along that line. This is one of the ways in which the federal government could give a certain amount of aid to education without hurting themselves to any extent. It seems an unreasonable thing that the school districts and municipal areas throughout the province should be burdened when they are attempting to raise the money to finance schools; and as for the busses they purchase for that purpose, or busses used for that purpose in the school district—they have to pay it eventually whether they actually own the busses or somebody else does—it seems quite ridiculous that these municipal areas should have to pay the sales tax on busses used for this purpose or other vehicles used solely for this purpose.

Last year I brought this same matter up, and the minister promised to give consideration to it in the following year's budget—that is, the present budget we are considering. Apparently nothing has been included. Why has the sales tax on these school busses not been done away with? Is the parliamentary assistant going to answer?

Mr. Sinclair: I have been answering questions in batches for three or four members at a time. I did that to save time, but if hon. members want me to answer them individually, all right.

Mr. Harkness: Then I have another question that I also submitted to the Minister of Finance some time ago. It is in connection with the sales tax on gasoline-powered vehicles, trucks and so forth, which are used exclusively in the production of coal. There is an anomalous situation in this connection. Any truck, or other vehicle, which is a diesel-powered vehicle and used exclusively in the production of coal does not bear sales tax; but if the motor in the truck—it might be exactly the same truck—is a gasoline-powered motor it is subject to sales tax. It does exactly the same work, and the request that was made to the minister in this connection was that gasoline-powered vehicles used exclusively in the production of coal, chiefly in stripping operations—there are some vehicles also used in mines—be not subject to the sales tax. I have in front of me a letter from the minister in which he says: "I shall be very pleased to consider this request when I am reviewing the sales tax proposals during preparation of the budget." Well, apparently he was pleased to consider it, but there does not seem to have been any action. Why has that change in the sales tax set-up not been made? The amount of money which would be lost to the federal government as a result of repealing this tax would be very small. The number of these vehicles used is not great, but so far as the people in the business are concerned it is quite an important item. In view of the fact that this concession was made so far as diesel-powered trucks are concerned, I can really see no reason, no sense from any point of view, why gasoline-powered trucks should not be put in the same position.

Mr. Follwell: May I also take this opportunity of saying thank you to the department and the minister for reducing the tax from 30 per cent to 15 per cent on candy goods. I should like to bring to the attention of this committee something that was happening in my riding to a small firm that was attempting to carry on business, and the way in which this 30 per cent tax adversely affected not only the business but the income of the government as well. To that end I shall quote from a letter received from the Tweed chamber of commerce:

> At a recent meeting of Tweed chamber of commerce, it was disclosed that the 30 per cent excise tax, recently imposed by the dominion government on certain types of confections, has resulted in a serious blow to one of Tweed's leading industries, the W. T. Hawkins Company, Limited.
> They are manufacturers of caramel-coated popcorn, which is now affected by the tax. Since the tax was imposed, employees are only working part time and as a result a great deal less money from the company's payroll is in circulation in the village.
> If the purpose of the government was toward increased revenues, it is quite clear that the tax has had the exact opposite effect in the case of the Hawkins company, where production has been reduced by 75 per cent.
> Tweed chamber of commerce looks on the tax as a serious threat to business among the merchants in our community. We would greatly appreciate it if you would kindly bring to the attention of the government the damaging effect that the tax has had on business in this little town.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I should like to go further and show by a comparison the effect that this 30 per cent tax has had not only on the business of this company but on the income of the government as well. The average monthly sales for twelve months ended October 30, 1950, before the tax was put on was $22,359. After the tax was imposed the average monthly sales for five months ended February 28, 1951, was $5,724. The average monthly sales tax for twelve months ended September 30, 1950, was $1,788. The average monthly taxes, sales tax and excise tax, for five months ended February 28, 1951, were $2,190. During that time the cost of ingredients and packing materials of course increased as well. This company was faced not only with declining sales but increased cost. The ingredients such as corn increased from October, 1949, to February, 1951, 19·8 per cent; sugar increased in the same period 19·1 per cent; corn syrup, 14·8 per cent; cellophane bags for packing, 17·4 per cent; display boxes, 28·2 per cent and cases for packing, 14·5 per cent.

This product is one known as Caramel Corn Snacks, and I submit the government should consider that this corn should be treated in the same way as other popcorn, should be declared outside the act and be made tax free.

On a résumé of the net sales I would point out the figures from July 1950 to February 1951. In July of 1950 the net sales amounted to $22,555.77, while the total sales and excise taxes amounted to $1,804.07. In August of that year the net sales amounted to $19,508.24, while the total sales and excise taxes amounted to $1,560.66. In September, the net sales amounted to $14,903.68, while the income to the government from sales and excise taxes amounted to $4,374.63. Then when the 30 per cent tax went on, in October the sales dropped to $5,247.66, and the income to the government in sales and excise taxes amounted to $1,994.11. In November the net sales was valued at $9,864.77, whereas the total sales and excise taxes amounted to $3,748.61. In November sales were higher, owing to the sale of a new 25-cent package, in the hope that it would stem the falling off of business. However, most of those 25-cent packages are still in the hands of distributors, and unsold at the present time. In December net sales amounted to $5,019.82, and total sales and excise taxes to $1,907.54. Then, in January of 1951, net sales were valued at $5,539.33 whereas total sales and excise taxes amounted to $2,104.95. In February, total sales amounted in $3,148.60 whereas total sales and excise taxes amounted to $1,196.47. Once again I would impress upon the government the fact that this product is similar to that now being marketed as a candy cereal, on which there is no tax. It is in direct competition with popcorn, which, as I have said, apparently is outside the act and is not subject to tax.

I would ask the parliamentary assistant to take the matter into consideration and to pass on to his minister the request that this caramel product, known as Snacks, be placed on a basis comparable with popcorn, and thus be declared tax free.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask two questions, the first of which has to do with the application of the sales tax on motor cars. Representations have been made to me respecting a person who had paid for his car in Vancouver, and was to take delivery at the factory in the east. He was to pick up his car on April 18. Meantime the tax was announced, and he has been charged the increased percentage.

My second question has to do with a new drug known as chloromycetin, which apparently is subject to the sales tax at the present time. This drug is very expensive, twenty pills costing about $16. I believe it falls into the category of a necessity in connection with the treatment of a certain type of ailment. The parliamentary assistant knows that in many cases people who require these drugs have already suffered greatly from sickness, and are in poor financial circumstances. Is there any possibility of having this drug included among the exceptions? If it were so included the amount of tax lost would be negligible, and I believe a genuine case has been made for those who must use it. The person who wrote to me had to take one of these pills every four hours for at least three days. The parliamentary assistant will see that at a price of $16 for twenty pills this runs into heavy expense. Could this drug be included among those already mentioned in the resolution?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Calgary East asked why the sales tax had not been removed from school busses. Two years ago we removed the excise tax from such busses, and at that time the move was naturally welcomed. School busses in this country fall into two categories. The great bulk of them are not owned by school boards, but are owned rather by men in the transportation business. In my own riding, for example, the busses are privately owned and used for other purposes during the day. The difficulty of establishing a hard and clear line between a bus company which pays not only the sales tax but also the 25 per cent excise tax, and which has not a school bus franchise, and those who have a school bus franchise, would make it a very difficult problem of administration. We have given relief to the extent that school busses do not pay the excise tax on motor cars.

The second point raised by the hon. member was as to why we still levy the sales tax on gasoline-powered equipment used by mines or quarries for off-road work. The exemption of diesel-powered equipment is fairly recent. The mining industry welcomed it as a great step forward. Diesel equipment is, of course, larger, more expensive and heavier than gasoline-powered equipment. It has far less other uses. Most gasoline-powered equipment can be converted quickly to other uses, and in this respect is unlike the diesel-powered equipment. If hon. members will look at the customs tariff schedule they will see that we are again widening very greatly the tariff concessions on mining equipment.

I might add that this distinction between diesel-powered and gasoline-powered equipment is not confined to mining and quarrying. In the same customs tariff amendments it will be found that we exempt diesels used by fishermen, whereas gasoline-powered equipment used by fishermen is still subject to the tariff.

Then the hon. member for Hastings South raised the point he had already raised with the department with respect to the tax on candy-coated popcorn. Once again this raises the problem as to where the borderline in taxation must go. In his mind he can build up good reason as to why this product should be subject only to the tax applicable to nuts and popcorn. Of course the candy people would be the first to complain by saying that here is a candy-coated confection free from tax being sold in competition with candy which is paying 15 per cent. They would ask that since this confection is candy-coated it should be classed as a candy.

The actual budget resolution refers to candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy. I know that the average small child who buys candy-coated popcorn feels that he or she is buying candy, not popcorn. For that reason they are included in that category, and I feel sure that the remission of the excise tax from 30 per cent to 15 per cent will be helpful to the firm the hon. member has mentioned.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has raised the matter as to when the sales tax on cars applies. It has been the ruling of the Department of National Revenue that the sales tax applies on delivery from the manufacturer. Some sales dealers do sell cars ahead of time on contract, that they will sell the car at a certain price, no matter what tax change may take place. In that case the dealer must pay the increased tax, if any.

Then, so far as the special drug the hon. member mentioned is concerned, my answer would be that we have to be pretty well guided by the regulations of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The question of taxation of drugs is a different one because there are many drugs, some very expensive and some cheap, some which of course are well known and very useful and others concerning which doctors have doubts as to their effectiveness despite the enthusiasm with which individuals may use them. If this drug has a widespread use and is as expensive as it is said to be, I have no doubt that the Department of National Health and Welfare will make representations to the department to include it, perhaps not this time but for next year's budget, with the class of drugs under doctors' prescriptions which we now exempt from sales tax.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think the parliamentary assistant rather sought to brush aside what had been said with respect to the inadequacy of the reduction in the tax on candy, chocolate and confectionery. I think the point is not to be so easily avoided, that the Minister of Finance himself has in effect destroyed by his argument any basis in logic for continuing this tax even at the reduced rate. Bear in mind, sir, that this form of product bears a sales tax. What we are dealing with here is an excise tax in addition to the general sales tax which itself is going to be increased by the present budget. Let us not overlook that.

When hon. Liberal members, two of whom have spoken tonight, commend the Minister of Finance for reducing the excise tax on candy, chocolate and confectionery, let us bear in mind at the same time that the increase in the sales tax on the same commodities is going to have the effect of largely neutralizing this inadequate reduction in the excise tax. I am sure I do not need to spend any time in answering the argument that no reduction is required because two government supporters in the house tonight have already given a rather graphic picture of the very harmful effects experienced by the manufacturers of these commodities and their employees as a result of the very drastic excise tax of 30 per cent that was applied last September on those commodities.

I happen to have some figures here indicating the increased costs which have confronted the manufacturers of these commodities. I have the figures of the cost of their raw materials in 1939 and alongside them the figures of the cost of their raw materials in 1950 at the time the minister applied his 30 per cent excise tax. I shall indicate in each case the proportion of increase for each item of raw material that enters into the production of candy, chocolate and confectionery. The first is cocoa beans. The price in 1939 was 7 cents a pound and in 1950 38 cents a pound, an increase of 443 per cent. The price of cocoa butter in 1939 was 14·9 cents a pound, and in 1950 80 cents a pound, an increase of 437 per cent. The price of sugar in 1939 was 5 cents a pound, and in 1950 9·66 cents a pound, an increase of 93 per cent. While I am speaking about sugar, let me remind the committee, Mr. Chairman, that a special excise tax is collected on sugar.

The raw material cost of glucose in 1939 was 3·35 cents a pound, and in 1950 7·07 cents a pound, an increase of 111 per cent. The price of milk powder in 1939 was 13·82 cents a pound, and in 1950 28·42 cents a pound, an increase of 105 per cent. Turning for the moment from raw materials to paper and packaging materials of various kinds, the increase in the period from 1939 to 1950 has been variously from 50 per cent to 75 per cent. As to peanuts, which enter into the production of a good deal of confectionery, in 1939 the price was 5 cents a pound, and in 1950 15 cents a pound, an increase of 300 per cent. Then there is also the increase in labour costs which from 1939 to 1950 show an increase of 65 to 100 per cent depending upon the nature of the particular work.

In the face of these heavy increases in the cost of production, this industry, which has suffered seriously under the handicap imposed by the minister in his 30 per cent tax last fall, is, on the minister's own reasoning as disclosed in the budget speech, entitled to something better than a 15 per cent decrease in the excise tax while at the same time facing an increase from 8 per cent to 10 per cent in the sales tax. Anything that the parliamentary assistant has said on the subject tonight seems to me to fall far short of justifying the inadequacy of this decrease, or in fact any continuance of the excise tax on these commodities at all. So much for the one decrease in taxes offered by the budget.

The rest of the picture is one of increases down the line. As to these increases I wish to make two observations of a general nature. In the first place it seems to me that it is axiomatic in all taxation that taxes ought not to be discriminatory, that they should not favour one group at the expense of another, that they should not penalize manufacturers or producers in one particular line while at the same time benefiting or exempting others in similar lines of production. That has been one of the main grounds of attack on and protest against the impositions in this budget. Let me take your mind back, Mr. Chairman, to last September when the Minister of Finance for no adequate reason chose to select certain commodities as targets for the imposition of what was then a 15 per cent excise tax. There were those who muttered the world "luxuries" under their breath and conjured up memories of the so-called luxury tax that was imposed during the war, a tax, let me remind you, which was not imposed at the producer level but was a tax on the consumer. It was a tax levied at the point where the goods left the retailer to enter the hands of the consumer, a tax that was well known, well advertised, and which the people who were paying it had an opportunity to measure. The Minister of Finance in due time sought to replace that tax by a hidden tax, a more favoured form of taxation because it is thought to be easier to extract money out of people when they are not conscious of paying a tax on the commodities they have to buy. But when some were recalling that so-called luxury tax of war days, I do not recall that anyone in the house had the temerity to stand up in his place when this tax was under debate last September and say that the commodities upon which the minister then proposed to apply a 15 per cent excise tax were in fact luxuries. You have only to look at the list to realize that some of these articles are clearly articles in very common use in hundreds of thousands of households in this country. Articles such as toasters, electric kettles, electric irons, vacuum cleaners and so on were singled out for the imposition of this special 15 per cent excise tax. The unrepentant Minister of Finance is not satisfied with having discriminated against those who produce these articles, whether employers or employees, and against those who sell them and those who buy them; he has chosen to increase the tax from 15 per cent to 25 per cent in addition to the sales tax, which has also been increased by 25 per cent. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no ground whatever for singling out commodities such as those for the application of this discriminatory tax.

Take luggage, for instance. I will concede at once that there are some very expensive types of luggage which in all fairness might well bear their share of necessary taxation, but there is a great deal of luggage that cannot be classified as luxuries by any stretch of the imagination. Therefore there can be no justification for singling out that type of luggage, first of all last September for the imposition of a 15 per cent excise tax, and now for an increase in that tax to 25 per cent accompanied by a 25 per cent increase in the sales tax.

If the minister wants to draw a line between what may be regarded by most people as luxuries on the one hand and on the other hand those commodities, perhaps of a similar nature but less expensive, which most people would regard as reasonable necessities of life, let him do so; but let him not proceed, as he did last September and as he is trying to do now, to select articles without making the slightest attempt to distinguish beween those that are luxuries on the one hand and those that are necessities on the other, and include them all in his discriminatory taxes.

It seems to me that in respect to the taxes under debate in this eight-point resolution the minister has offended that first canon of taxation, that there should be no discrimination, that taxation should be fair in its general incidence.

Another rule or canon of taxation I think the minister has woefully transgressed in this resolution is that when the cost of living is rising rapidly, when the full effects of inflation are bearing oppressively on most of the people, if there must be increased taxation the taxes imposed should not be such as to increase the inflationary pressures on the one hand or to take away from those upon whom these inflationary pressures are bearing most severely the limited means at their disposal to meet the soaring cost of living. In almost every respect this resolution concerning excise and sales taxes has offended in the most flagrant way that simple and obvious canon, though if ever there was a time when it should be observed it is in this year of inflation 1951.

What do we see? I have pointed out that in the sales tax, which applies to so many of the elementary necessities of life, the minister is imposing a 25 per cent increase. That is the most inflationary form of taxation being used as a fiscal weapon in the hands of the Minister of Finance today. Of all the taxes levied by the government the sales tax is the most inflationary; yet the minister has chosen to increase it by 25 per cent. All of a piece with that design is the increase to which I just referred, from 15 per cent to 25 per cent, in the excise tax on a list of commodities many of which could not by any stretch of the imagination be regarded as luxuries.

Then, in a third offence against the simple and obvious rule of fair play with respect to taxation in times like these, the minister has chosen to sweep into the category of articles subject to a 15 per cent excise tax a range of commodities including washing machines, refrigerators and other things. These are not only necessities for great numbers of people; actually they enable many families to conserve food and reduce food costs. They have helped many families reduce the domestic labour of the household, and have permitted more members of the family to engage in gainful employment at a time like this when an increase in the labour force is being demanded from all sides. No one in touch with the realities of Canadian life could possibly justify increases in the taxes on such commodities as I have mentioned.

The suggestion has emanated from government benches during the course of this debate that the scrub board is good enough for people in times such as these.

Mr. Sinclair: Who said that?

Mr. Fleming: It has been mentioned by several hon. members in the course of the debate. If the parliamentary assistant will refresh his memory from Hansard he will see several references to the subject.

Mr. Sinclair: You said it came from the government benches.

Mr. Fleming: The proposal that commodities such as washing machines and so on should now be treated as luxuries and subjected to a 15 per cent tax, if it has any basis in reason or any thinking back of it, must have been prompted by the thought in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that the women in this country could do without those things because they are luxuries. If the government wants to split hairs on that they will have their opportunity. I do not think the people in this country will thank any government for suggesting that washing machines are not to be regarded as one of the household necessities of life in this country. Anyone who wants to advocate and approve the soaking of the housewife with a 15 per cent excise tax on a washing machine on top of a 25 per cent increase in the sales tax on the same commodity will have an opportunity during this debate to stand up and say that he gives his full assent to the shocking proposals that have emanated from the Minister of Finance.

Now, sir, the parliamentary assistant, in connection with the sales tax, and I think this form of reasoning might, if it has anything in it, apply to the excise tax as well, has sought to pass off the attack on this iniquitous increase in the sales tax by saying, "Oh, well, when people are in opposition they ask for a reduction in the sales tax, but when they get into the government they increase it." Since the last Conservative government in this country we have seen this government, in the election campaign in 1935 through the then leader of the opposition and the man who was shortly to become prime minister, denounce the sales tax as an iniquitous form of tax, then turn around as soon as it had power and increase the sales tax from six per cent to eight per cent. We are seeing the same mentality bearing further fruit now. But the parliamentary assistant in his remarks tonight missed something when he was talking about this and passing it off so lightly as being the sort of thing people object to when they are in opposition but support in increased form when they are in the government. He has overlooked the fact that two very eminent ministers of finance, when they were bearing responsibilities greater than those faced by the Minister of Finance today, in seeking revenues to meet the crisis of war deliberately refrained from increasing the sales tax. It was not a case of their being in opposition when they refused to increase the sales tax. They were in power and they deliberately rejected the temptation to increase the sales tax simply because of the ease with which it can be collected.

Mr. Ilsley, in April, 1941, a very dark time during the war, deliberately rejected any proposal for an increase in that tax, and he did so with these words:

> An increase in the sales tax has, I think, been fairly generally expected. At least, there are evidences of a good deal of buying in anticipation of such an increase. This tax, while comparatively easy of administration and collection and extremely productive, has marked defects as a fiscal instrument. After extended consideration, we decided on balance against any increase. In coming to this decision, we were not forgetful of the problems of agriculture, which would have been intensified had the sales tax been raised.

Those are the serious words of Mr. Ilsley in 1941. What would Mr. Ilsley have to say if he were in this house today, faced with the degree of inflation that exists in the country, with the degree of elasticity which has appeared to an increasing extent in the Canadian dollar, the shrivelling of that dollar in the face of mounting costs of the things the housewife has to buy? What would he have had to say about the temptation to increase the sales tax simply because it is productive and easy to collect? Certainly, Mr. Ilsley, faced with a responsibility in 1941 greater than that facing the present minister, rejected all attempts to increase the sales tax.

Then, in February, 1945, the same Mr. Ilsley again deliberately rejected an increase in the sales tax. He referred to the fact that many of these taxes which are imposed far back on the production process increase costs out of proportion to the contributions which they make to the revenue.

In 1940 Mr. Ralston said:

> We realize that increases in indirect taxes disguise the burdens imposed by the war but they are much more likely to distribute these burdens harshly and unfairly.

That is exactly what these proposed new taxes are going to do. They are going to distribute the burden of taxation harshly and unfairly, and they are going to accelerate the inflationary process. They are going to violate every plain rule that common sense would dictate with respect to the raising of revenue at a time of high inflation.

Finally, sir, on this subject of drugs, I am sure the house will welcome the seventh section in this resolution, which proposes to exempt two drugs from the sales tax, cortisone and ACTH. But, as has been pointed out, why stop there? Why, when the unfairness of imposing a sales tax on these two drugs is recognized by the Minister of Finance, would he continue to impose a sales tax, yes an increased sales tax of twenty-five per cent on the other range of drugs to which sales tax now applies? It seems to me the minister has, by the introduction of this item in the first resolution with respect to excise tax, condemned that act in so far as it either continues the present sales tax or increases the sales tax on another very wide range of drugs. In speaking last week on this resolution the member for Greenwood drew attention to at least one other drug about which I also have received some representations, and about which I know the minister has received representations. It is a drug that is known as prostigmin, and it is a necessity in the treatment of myasthenia gravis. That is just one, and there are many others that leap to the mind of each one of us here. Why should the sales tax, an increased sales tax, be imposed upon drugs which have to be purchased in large quantities by people who are chronic sufferers from diseases for which these drugs are prescribed.

Mr. Chairman, if the Minister of Finance withdrew this entire resolution with respect to the Excise Tax Act except for No. 7, he would be doing his bare minimum duty in the face of the hardships that the balance of the resolution will impose upon the Canadian people. The whole resolution, except No. 7, is shot through with discrimination. It will operate most unfairly on those who are least able to bear these heavy increases in taxation. Mr. Chairman, I urge upon all members of the house that it is our duty to resist this resolution, with the exception of No. 7, to the utter limit and to see to it that sufficient opposition from all parts of the house is mustered against this iniquitous proposal for increasing these heavy impositions that the Minister of Finance will see fit to withdraw this resolution, with the exception of item No. 7.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to answer this immediately. I, of course, feel that this last speech has gone very far from the purpose of being in committee on the resolutions. When the general budget speech is made, of course members can speak generally on the principles of the changes which have been announced. It has been my experience in the past that when we go into committee on the resolutions the purpose is to allow members to elicit more information about individual tax changes. Tonight we have heard for about the fourth time the full budget speech of the hon. member, mostly in generalities. He is better when he is indulging in generalities, as I shall show very quickly when I mention the two or three times in which he became specific.

Very early in his speech in connection with the candy tax, he said that we are taking off fifteen per cent excise tax then putting on two per cent sales tax, thus neutralizing the cut. I have a daughter eight years old, and even she knows that if you take fifteen off and put two back on, you are still thirteen to the good. Then he went on to make an even more amazing statement. He said there is still a special excise tax on sugar. As a Conservative, he would remember that there was an excise tax placed on sugar by R. B. Bennett. If there is one subject in recent years on which we have been hearing the hon. member speak at greater length than on this resolution, it is the famous radio budget of 1947. I was under the impression that the hon. member had either heard it or read it, but if he had he would certainly have remembered that on that occasion the Minister of Finance forecast the removal of the excise tax on sugar, which was confirmed the following session.

Then, he went on about discrimination. It was unfair to discriminate against any one industry by special taxation rates. Our whole tax structure since confederation has had varying rates of taxation against various industries. Today, for example, we have a 25 per cent tax on cosmetics. As I pointed out earlier, we have today, jointly with the provinces, an effective rate of about 300 per cent on liquor. Already this session the hon. member's party if not himself—I do not remember whether he was here or not—voted to make this discrimination much more violent, by voting for a motion to add another $125 million to that tax which would have tripled the present rate at least.

He went on at some length with regard to the fact that this whole resolution should be withdrawn, except for the tax relief given for certain drugs. I have listened to him. He wants the sales tax removed, the excise tax of 15 per cent removed, the excise tax of 25 per cent removed. He also wants the excise tax on cigarettes removed. In this house we have heard him urge much bigger personal income tax exemptions which, of course, would lessen our revenue. But I have never heard him suggest that the corporation tax should be increased. I am confident that when we come to it, we shall also find that he is advocating a reduction in the corporation tax or perhaps the abolition of it. In other words, he is against every tax proposal we can make. I want to tell him just one thing. We are in this period of increased expenses because of our needs for defence; and defence costs money. It is not a torrent of words such as he has unleashed on us for the fourth time that will pay for our defence preparations. Those preparations need money, and this is the way the government of Canada has decided to raise the money required. These are the proposals which have been prepared to accomplish that purpose. No doubt the hon. member will give us the same speech he has just delivered when we have before us the excise tax bill, the income tax bill and the customs tariff bill. No doubt he will make part of the same speech when we get into the individual items of each of the bills. But inasmuch as he is so violently opposed to all these tax changes, I should like him somewhere, some place, to indicate where we can get this extra $400 million to pay for the increased defence costs we all support.

Mr. Thatcher: I do not like these commodity taxes in particular, and I am not altogether satisfied that there is not a feasible alternative in the capital gains tax. The minister dealt with that matter last Thursday evening, but I do not think he explained why that tax would not raise the necessary money we could get from these commodity taxes. It seems to me that a capital gains tax is a tax which would affect people who are making money through speculation—for instance, people who bought stocks a few years ago at $3 and $4 and who have sold them for from $50 to $75 to $100. It seems to me to be reasonable that they should have to pay some kind of a tax. It seems to me that about the only way in which any Canadian today can amass great wealth is by capital gains. I do not think any Canadian today can pay his taxes as he goes along and make a fortune, except through capital gains. I therefore respectfully suggest again that the minister or the parliamentary assistant might be well advised to tax this group of people rather than people who are starting out in life and who must buy these appliances.

One of the arguments that he will probably throw back at me in a minute is that if we tax capital gains we have to allow for losses: I do not see that that procedure necessarily would have to follow. If you had a modest tax on those capital gains, of say 10 per cent—and I admit that I do not know what revenue that would bring in—or 15 per cent, I do not see why losses have to come into it at all. If that argument does not make sense, I should be glad if the minister would tell me. But he does not have to be quite as sarcastic as he was with the hon. member for Eglinton a moment or so ago.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member wants soft treatment.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member's request for an expression of the government's attitude was couched in reasonable terms. He did not work himself into a passion. I shall therefore be glad to answer in the same reasonable way. The capital gains tax is of course now in use in the United States. Those administering it find it a very difficult tax to administer; they find it more difficult than the income tax. There is this point to be considered. Once you begin taxing capital gains, you must in turn allow a man to offset capital losses against capital gains. But I think the chief opposition to a capital gains tax in this country is the fact that here, where there is such a great need for development, especially in the pioneer parts of the country, we must give some incentive to the people to put their money into venture capital, in our mines, in our forests, in aluminum plants and things like that. As the hon. member pointed out, there is to be considered the rate of return which you can get back today, with the corporation tax and personal income tax as it is. There is the fact, for example, that the hon. member's leader has already spoken unfavourably on the fact that we are going to permit public utilities to make five per cent. Why should anybody venture capital if that is the best they can ever expect from risking their capital in some new brave enterprise in northern Ontario, in northern Quebec, in northern Saskatchewan or in British Columbia, when they can do better with no risk by putting that money in government bonds or in some safe established business? I think that in this country the fact that we have not had a capital gains tax has been one of the incentive factors which have been responsible—and I said one of the factors—for this large advent in Canada of United States capital which has been extremely helpful in building up this country in the post-war years.

Mr. Thatcher: But if the tax was 10 per cent or 15 per cent, I do not think it would discourage that development about which the parliamentary assistant speaks.

Mr. Sinclair: That is just an offhand suggestion by the hon. member.

Mr. Thatcher: That is correct.

Mr. Sinclair: The Americans felt that if the capital gains tax was to be worth while, it should be of the order of the tax they have, which is 25 per cent. But again, neither the British nor ourselves have ever felt that that was the proper way of making such a tax. If, as you say, some people venture boldly and in the end make considerable money as a reward—and for everyone who makes money, for example in the mines, as I know very well, there are a dozen who lose money—they create work and industry and associated development in this country; and if they make fortunes, we catch up with them eventually through succession duties.

Mr. Gibson: For the benefit of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, it seems to me that it should be pointed out to him that there has been a depreciation in the purchasing value of money. You might easily have put in $10 ten years ago and got $20 back now, but you would not be actually any further ahead. That is the way it seems to work out with nearly everybody.

While I am on my feet, and getting back to this sales tax itself, I wonder if the government gave any consideration to keeping the sales tax at the same eight per cent rate and removing some of the exemptions which they now allow? My own experience with the application of these exemptions which are allowed with regard to certain goods that are put into manufacturing plants for use directly in the manufacture of goods is that it has become a regular menagerie, as I am quite sure the Minister of National Revenue very well knows. There is neither rhyme nor reason with regard to the way the exemptions are applied. I do not think even the minister is always convinced as to whether an exemption should or should not apply. I am wondering just how much revenue could have been derived by the government by the application of the eight per cent sales tax o all goods that are produced in Canada, thus getting away from the anomalies and inequities that are now in effect in the application of the act. For instance, with regard to a logging truck that is brought in and which it is conceded is used directly in the manufacture or production of logs, they will concede that the horn on there that goes "peep, peep" is not subject to sales tax. They will concede that is part of the truck. But if you go ahead and put a radio telephone on the truck in order to expedite and facilitate the use of the truck, in order to get more trips per day and in order to produce logs more cheaply, the authorities say no, that the radio telephone you instal is subject to sales tax. All these things enter into the picture. I know the minister agrees with me in some ways on that matter.

Mr. Sinclair: I must confess that this is the first time I ever heard anybody in the logging industry suggest that the sales tax should go back on logging equipment.

Mr. Gibson: I did not suggest that.

Mr. Sinclair: As I understood him, the hon. member mentioned specifically just logging equipment.

Mr. Gibson: I just said on everything, not on logging equipment in particular.

Mr. Sinclair: You mentioned a logging truck.

Mr. Gibson: Yes. But I was pointing out an anomaly.

Mr. Sinclair: It was because he mentioned logging trucks. I can remember the representations which have been very strongly made by the logging industry in British Columbia, and by other primary industries, that the levelling of sales taxes at that level, on the actual equipment used in the manufacturing process, was inevitably passed on to the consumers, so that there was a real element of double taxation so far as the sales tax is concerned. I think that has been the prime reason behind the removal of the sales tax from machinery and engines used in manufacture and primary production.

To revert to the old system of taxation would in effect be an application of the sales tax twice; on the cost of manufacture and then on the cost of the manufactured product, unless those products were food, fuel or building materials.

Mr. Gibson: Has the parliamentary assistant any idea how much that would represent in revenue? I was wondering how much was exempt; it would be an interesting figure to have.

Mr. Sinclair: Certainly it is not a figure that I have here. If the Department of National Revenue can make an estimate before the bill comes to the house for second reading I will see that it is available.

Mr. Harkness: About an hour ago I brought up the matter of taxes on school busses and another matter. About three-quarters of an hour ago the parliamentary assistant gave an answer, and now I am back on the same subject. Probably in fifteen or twenty minutes, or something like that—it will be less than twenty minutes judging by the clock—I will get another answer to it. First of all, on a point of order I would like to bring up the manner in which these questions are being dealt with. I think it would make for a much more orderly debate, and it would be a much better way to deal with the questions brought up by different members here, if each one was dealt with by the minister or the parliamentary assistant at the time it is brought up, instead of waiting until five or six people have talked on a melange of questions, and then deal with them and then these people get up at varying times extending over an hour and ask more questions. The result is we get a very haphazard and disordered method of dealing with these things, and people forget where they are. The result is the debate is a hit and miss one. I certainly think that we should go back to the system which has been followed up to the present time ever since I have been here, and have the minister or the parliamentary assistant, who is acting for him, answer each question as it is brought up, and as far as possible finishing with it and then get on to another subject. As it is now it is all mixed up in the debate, and it is all over Hansard, and everything else.

To come back to the matter which I brought up so long ago—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member said that his remarks were tantamount to a point of order. I should like to make clear that what he has suggested is not a matter for the chairman to decide. His suggestion, therefore, is made to the minister or to his representative. It is not a matter for the chairman to decide as to how, where and when a minister or his representative introducing a bill or defending a measure is to reply.

Mr. Harkness: If it is not a point for the chairman to decide, then so far as I am concerned I will insist on getting an answer; if I have to keep on asking questions and keep on standing on my feet or shouting or making a lot of noise, I will do it until I get the answer.

Mr. Sinclair: Two years ago I was rebuked by an opposition member for bobbing up and answering every question that was asked. I was told to wait until a series of questions was asked. I am entirely in the hands of hon. members.

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Sinclair: I will mention the hon. member who asked me.

Mr. Gibson: Let us go back to clause 1.

Mr. Harkness: I think the parliamentary assistant is calling on his imagination in that regard, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Macleod was the one who rebuked me for bobbing up and answering every question that was asked.

Mr. Harkness: If we have the matter straightened out, that is all that I am concerned with. I do not care what has happened in the past.

Mr. Knowles: That is one of the joys of being a parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Harkness: To return to the question of busses, the parliamentary assistant gave no reply to the representations which I made. All he said really was what I said myself, namely, that there are two kinds of school busses, those owned by school boards and those owned by individuals who operate them on a contract basis. He went on to say that there would be difficulty as a result because some of these busses or other vehicles are used in other types of business in addition to transporting children to and from school. The representation that was made by the Alberta school trustees association on this matter was that the tax be removed on busses or other vehicles used solely or exclusively for the purpose of transporting children to and from school; and therefore the matter of some vehicle which is used only partly for that purpose does not enter into the question, which was the only thing the parliamentary assistant had to say about it.

Furthermore, even if the parliamentary assistant thinks that there would be difficulty in removing the tax from vehicles which might be used by a contractor for some other purpose, surely there would be no difficulty in removing this tax on busses which are owned and operated by school boards. I should think that the tax on the busses or vehicles of that kind could at least be removed and should be removed. I should like some comments on that. I just did not get an answer; that is what it amounted to.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, as far as I can understand, the hon. member has not even asked a question now. He has given me his opinion on it, and I have said that our policy as to these busses is this. We have removed the excise tax on busses; we are continuing to tax busses.

Mr. Harkness: My question before, Mr. Chairman, and again is: Why has the government not removed the sales tax on these busses, or what reasons have they for not removing the sales tax on these busses used exclusively for the transportation of children to and from school, and thus by that means relieving to some extent the burden on municipal districts so far as education is concerned?

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, at times we seem to get so far from the primary purpose of this budget, which is to raise revenue to meet increased defence costs of the country and to maintain the public services in this country which we provided long before Korea.

Mr. Harkness: If that is the primary purpose of the budget, in the remarks which the parliamentary assistant made just a few moments ago in connection with logging machinery and so forth, he admitted that one of the purposes of the budget also was to take the tax off material used in industry, so that there would be no double taxes, in order to encourage industry. If there is any industry that should be encouraged it is the industry of education. This is one way in which we can encourage that industry. It is much more important to encourage it than to encourage the logging industry or any other industry. Once more I say that not only does the parliamentary assistant's answer fail to meet the argument, but it is not an answer.

The other matter that I brought up was in connection with gasoline trucks used exclusively in the production of coal. The only thing that the parliamentary assistant had to say about that was that diesel trucks used in this way are not subject to sales tax because they are big trucks, and they could not readily be used for any other purpose. Some of these gasoline-powered trucks used for that purpose are just as big as any of the diesel trucks, and I can really see no reason why the gasoline-powered truck should not be put in exactly the same position as the diesel truck. It is true that the diesel truck costs more money, but that is not a matter which should come into it. If we want to bring that argument into it, if the sales tax was put on the diesel truck the government would get more revenue out of it; but they have seen the reasonableness of taking the sales tax off those vehicles which are used exclusively in the production of coal, the purpose being to encourage the coal industry. There seems to be no reason whatever why the same course could not be followed with the gasoline-powered trucks as is followed with diesel trucks.

Mr. Herridge: I want to say a few words in support of what I thought was a very reasonable and intelligent proposal made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, namely, that there is a place in our taxation system for a capital gains tax. The parliamentary assistant denies that, and says that to some extent it would discourage the people who want to invest venture capital. I can see some argument in that point of view, but many capital gains are made at the present time which are not the result of venture capital. For instance, what about sweepstakes, where a person may win a very large sum of money as a result of a sweepstake and pay no tax to this government on the winnings. The same applies to race track gambling.

Then there is another form of gambling. I have in mind particularly an instance in my own constituency of an American concern that has control over some thirty square miles of timber. During that whole period all they have paid is their timber limits tax to the provincial government. They prevented the development of the large area and refused to sell timber. At the same time local people who owned land had to pay taxes to build roads and schools and provide other facilities. This large American concern purchased the property for a song about forty-five years ago, and has arrested the development of a Canadian industry and a Canadian resource in that whole area. The result has been an increased price in lumber. Because of the great demand for lumber these people are in a position to sell timber contracts at five hundred times their original value. As a matter of fact they have been a blight on the Canadian economy ever since they became owners of the property.

I cannot see why people under those circumstances should not be required to pay capital gains tax to the government. And then I would mention one other point in connection with people who have purchased war assets. All of us know of people who have purchased war assets for a song from the government and are now able to resell those assets back to the government at an immense increase in price. Now, is that fixed capital doing anything to increase the production or improve the economy of the country? It is a straight gamble out of which they are reaping a great profit. I do suggest in all seriousness that here is a place where the capital gains tax should be applied so as to procure income, rather than to increase taxes on household necessities.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to answer the hon. member by saying that the capital gains tax, after all, would not be regarded as an excise tax and so is not within this resolution. The hon. member might discuss that matter tomorrow. I will be away, but the minister will continue these and the other two resolutions.

Mr. Herridge: I just offered it as an alternative.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to add a few brief words respecting the tax on artificial limbs and braces. There has been a good deal of talk about the iniquity of the general sales tax, and the taxes of 15 per cent and 25 per cent. If any sales tax could be described as iniquitous, and I think most people will agree there is a certain amount of iniquity in all of them, then certainly the sales tax on artificial limbs and braces is five times as iniquitous as any other sales tax. Why the minister continues to retain this sales tax on artificial limbs and braces, an absolute necessity for crippled people, is more than I can understand.

Mr. Abbott: They are exempt.

Mr. Sinclair: Artificial eyes, artificial limbs and parts thereof, are exempted under schedule III of the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Harkness: Where is that?

Mr. Abbott: Schedule III; it has been exempt for years.

Mr. Harkness: If they are exempt, I should like to know about it. I looked through these, and could not see where they were.

Mr. Low: I believe the minister has been approached, or there has been communication with him in connection with adding to the list set out in paragraph 7 the drug known as vitamin E. What is the attitude of the department respecting this request? I understand that in recent months vitamin E has been used extensively in the treatment of certain types of heart ailments, and it has been used with considerable success.

Mr. McCann: Wheat germ is the cheapest one there is.

Mr. Low: Yes, it may be the cheapest. But this particular one is subject to sales tax, and the tax increases the price to a considerable extent. It puts it outside the reach of many patients.

Mr. McCann: Not at all. You can get all the vitamin E you want in wheat kernels.

Mr. Low: The doctors of the country—

Mr. Abbott: The minister is a doctor.

Mr. Low: —do not agree with that. Unfortunately, physicians prescribe it, and it runs into a good deal of money.

Mr. McCann: You must be acquainted with Dr. Shute.

Mr. Low: I am acquainted with a lot of other doctors who are prescribing vitamin E in a form which is more expensive than that mentioned by the Minister of National Revenue. I could agree with him; but the fact is we are not making that known to the people of Canada. The result is that they go out and pay exorbitant prices to physicians and druggists across the country. It seems to me that the request to repeal the sales tax on that form of treatment for heart ailment should be given favourable consideration.

Mr. Pouliot: What is the difference in price between vitamin E and vitamin B?

Mr. Low: I do not believe I am expert enough to say. There is, I believe, considerable difference. I have bought vitamin B in various forms, and I know pretty well what the price is. I cannot say anything about vitamin E; but the information I have comes from an association which has furnished us with a petition in which it appeals to the House of Commons to repeal the sales tax on vitamin E which is used so extensively in the treatment of heart ailments.

Mr. Pouliot: I shall tell the hon. member something about the circulars we receive from associations. One day I was urged by an association to make representations in the house. I sent them a copy of Hansard in which there was a speech of mine to the same effect. Then they apologized and published my speech—all of which shows that these associations know nothing whatsoever of what goes on in the house. It is precisely because we are not well informed by those people that I expected to get some illumination from the hon. member.

Mr. Coldwell: I am pleased to see these two drugs mentioned in the resolution. I agree that there are others which should be considered. I do not know the names of some of them, but I am familiar with one called B-Plex.

Mr. McCann: That is just a trade name.

Mr. Coldwell: It is prescribed by doctors, and it is very expensive. If patients take such drugs, the bills run up to $30 or $40 a month. It seems to me the list might be considerably lengthened. I should like it to be understood that I am not complaining; the inclusion of these two is a good start, but I should like to see others added. That is my plea to the minister.

Mr. Pouliot: The most exorbitant profit is made on gin, because it costs the producer about 15 or 20 cents and is sold at $5 a bottle.

Mr. Sinclair: I have answered the question as to drugs on two or three occasions already this evening. Drugs which are expensive and which have been shown to be of real value and are accepted and prescribed by the medical profession are considered each year by the department, with the advice of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The Minister of National Revenue is of course a doctor himself. This year we have added these two to our present list. If the use of the drugs mentioned by hon. members becomes widespread by the medical profession, and is recommended in prescriptions, the matter will be considered before the budget is prepared next year.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue this debate, and if it is concluded we will continue with the legislation indicated last evening.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

LEASED BASES AGREEMENT

PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE—RECOMMENDATION OF MARCH 28-30, 1950

The board decided to make the following recommendation:

Taxation

(a) That there be included in the proposed revised United States-Canadian double taxation convention, on a reciprocal basis, the exemption from Canadian income taxation (on income derived from outside Canada) of:

(1) U.S. service personnel serving in Canada,

(2) U.S. civilians employed by the U.S. government in Canada,

(3) The wives and minor children of (1) and (2).

(b) That, by an exchange of diplomatic notes, the provisions of article XVII of the leased bases agreement conferring the exemptions described in (a) above be cancelled as of the date of the coming into force of the proposed revised double taxation convention in a form justifying such cancellation.

(c) That the exemption from Canadian income taxation, under article XVII of the leased bases agreement, of the following categories be discontinued by an exchange of notes:

(1) U.S. contractors, or contractors ordinarily resident in the United States, in respect of their profits arising from work at the leased bases,

(2) U.S. civilians employed by contractors at the leased bases,

(3) The wives and minor children of (2).

(d) That the foregoing be without prejudice to the remaining taxation exemptions conferred by article XVII of the agreement.

Customs and Excise Exemptions

(a) That the customs and excise exemptions accorded to contractor-owned equipment under the terms of article XIV (1) (a) of the leased bases agreement be suspended by an exchange of notes;

(b) That it be agreed by exchange of notes that article XIV (1) (d) does not accord customs and/or excise exemptions in personal belongings and household effects of contractors and their U.S. employees (after first arrival) or customs and/or excise exemption on purchases in Canada, outside the leased areas, by U.S. military or civilian personnel, or their families;

(c) That the U.S. authorities continue to exercise every precaution to prevent abuse of the customs and excise privileges enjoyed under the leased bases agreement.

Post Offices

That it be agreed by exchange of notes that the U.S. military postal system in operation at the Newfoundland bases conform to the following stipulations:

(a) That they provide military postal services only for U.S. military agencies, U.S. military personnel, authorized U.S. civilians, and their dependents,

(b) That they dispatch mail only to the United States, its possessions and territories and its military postal installations,

(c) That geographical locations be not indicated by date stamp or cancellation stamp.

Jurisdiction

(a) That the government of the United States, through an exchange of diplomatic notes, agree to waive its rights of jurisdiction under the leased bases agreement over Canadian citizens, other British subjects, and alien civilians other than those subject to U.S. military law by reason of their accompanying or serving with the U.S. forces.

(b) (1) That the governments of the United States and of Canada, through an exchange of diplomatic notes, agree to suspend the exercise of their rights of jurisdiction under article IV of the leased bases agreement other than those waived by the U.S. government under (a) above, for a period of five years, and thereafter subject to six months' notification of termination, except that in the event of war or other emergency the suspension shall, on notification given by either government, cease to operate;

(2) That the Canadian government, as a condition precedent to the waiver and suspension of the exercise of rights under article IV and to the extension to Newfoundland of an amended Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act, give satisfactory assurances that the U.S. officials in Newfoundland will have a degree of jurisdiction comparable to that which they now in fact exercise. In this connection, the U.S. section would regard the proposed letter from the government of Canada to the government of Newfoundland, with a reply from the Newfoundland government that jurisdictional conditions would remain substantially as now exercised, as the basis for satisfactory assurances to be given by the Canadian government.

(c) That the Canadian government undertake to seek legislation to protect U.S. interests in security offences as envisaged by article V of the leased bases agreement.

(d) That the Canadian government seek amendment to the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act to provide for the compulsory attendance of witnesses required by U.S. service courts.

(e) That either government should be free to raise through appropriate channels the matter of any difficulties arising out of the working of the foregoing jurisdictional arrangements.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Sixth and seventh reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Winkler.

MARITIME MARSHLANDS

FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF ACTIVITIES UNDER REHABILITATION ACT

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): It gives me great pleasure to lay on the table the first annual report of activities under the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, and special provisions for emergency protection and reclamation of maritime dikelands, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1950.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister if these reports are being distributed to hon. members?

Mr. Gardiner: I will have them distributed as soon as enough copies can be made.

CANADA FORESTRY ACT

PROPOSED MEASURES OF CO-OPERATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, hon. members may be interested to learn of certain steps the government proposes to take to co-operate with provincial governments under the Canada Forestry Act, 1949.

With certain exceptions, such as the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, national parks, federal forest experimental stations and Indian lands, the responsibility for forest resources falls within the jurisdiction of provincial governments. However, forests do not stop at provincial boundaries. When dealing with the Canada Forestry Act, parliament recognized the national importance of our forest assets, and through this legislation enabled the federal government to help co-ordinate, where feasible, and otherwise assist the efforts of provincial governments and others in the field.

Accordingly, early last year I wrote to the appropriate ministers of all ten provincial governments, seeking their views and suggestions as to how we might co-operate under the terms of the new act so that the maximum long-term benefits might be derived from our valuable forest assets.

From subsequent conversations it seemed clear that all concerned were of the opinion that the goal must be sustained yield; that is, the rate of depletion—by cutting and by loss from fire and disease—must not exceed the rate of replacement by natural growth and reforestation. I believe it is the general view that federal government participation should be with the understanding that any assistance given would be used to further progress toward the goal of sustained yield.

Most provincial governments, and indeed many private operators, are working toward sustained yield. I have no doubt that in some instances it has been achieved. It may well be, however, that on a national basis annual depletion exceeds regeneration in such of our forest areas as are now accessible for practical exploitation. But in the absence of reliable and complete forest inventories, it has not been possible accurately to assess the true situation. It is most important, then, that a nation-wide forest inventory should be completed at an early date.

Another important step is to encourage greater efforts in reforestation. Many cut-over areas regenerate themselves naturally, but for others steps must be taken to start and stimulate new growth. Forest cover on these areas is necessary, not only for the development of forest products but in the interests of soil conservation, flood control, cover for wildlife, etc.

There are, of course, many other aspects of a successful forestry program. Protection from fire is one of the most important and expensive. By and large, provincial governments are placing on this phase of the problem the emphasis it merits. Research is also of major importance, and in this field the federal government is already carrying out a well-rounded program.

As hon. members know, the defence program must now take priority, both as regards efforts and funds. The government considers, however, that some steps are warranted at this time to stimulate progress toward sustained yield of this resource, which is vital to our economy, both in peace and in war.

Accordingly, I communicated with all provincial governments again recently and informed them that the federal government is prepared to share with them on a fifty-fifty basis the cost of completing their forest inventory. This assistance will apply for this fiscal year and succeeding years until the inventories are completed. It is expected that this can be done within five years.

Moreover, I informed the provincial governments that the federal government will contribute twenty-five per cent of the cost of reasonable programs of reforesting provincial crown lands, providing the amount expended each year by the provincial governments is not less than the average expenditure of the last three years.

Parliament will be requested to vote funds for this purpose in the supplementary estimates.

So that the details of the programs may be discussed, I have invited each provincial minister and/or his representative to come to Ottawa at an early date for a conference.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members will welcome the evidence offered by this statement by the minister of the measure of co-operation that is being established in the conservation of our forest resources. The protection of the forests is something which is particularly suitable for effective co-operation across provincial boundaries. As the minister has emphasized, fire is one of the great dangers. Actually there is greater wastage from fire than from cutting in a year when fires reach any substantial proportion.

In view of the fact that the dominion government is now undertaking to carry out such extensive plans for the supervision of the forests in co-operation with the provinces, I would again make a suggestion which I made on an earlier occasion. In the United States they are meeting with great success in tackling certain types of forest fires by dropping highly trained fire fighters by parachute from aeroplanes. These paratroopers—or, shall I say parafirefighters—have been successful in extinguishing many fires in remote hillside and mountain areas that otherwise could not have been stopped until they reached major proportions.

A large measure of success has been achieved also in fighting incipient fires in remote areas by the use of chemical bombs dropped from helicopters. At a time when air training is being extended as part of our general defence program, part of the training might be devoted to activities of this kind, for the purposes both of defence and of fire protection.

I make this suggestion again, in all earnestness, because a substantial amount of success has been achieved in other jurisdictions in fighting fires by these methods.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): May I suggest to the minister that when these provincial representatives come to Ottawa he try to make arrangements with the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue for a discussion of some of the aspects of the problems that are connected with investment in growing timber. In Canada, as I am sure the minister appreciates, one of the great difficulties has been in inducing private capital to invest money in the planting of trees that will not be used for the next hundred years. Some consideration must be given by the Department of Finance to making it attractive to make such an investment, and I suggest that the minister have that subject on the agenda as well as the other matters. I understand he has a special committee set up which is studying the problem now.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, one is often called upon to criticize government policies from this side of the house, but I believe this is one occasion upon which one can commend the government for the statement just made by the minister. There is nothing more important than the conservation of our natural resources. The manner in which our forests have been denuded and wastefully used in the past is something for which future generations may suffer. This is a policy which should conserve the great forest resources of Canada. Some of the provincial governments are already worried about the manner in which our forest resources are being used up, and, speaking for myself and I am sure those who are with me, the government is to be commended for the policy which is foreshadowed by the minister's announcement to the house.

SALES TAX

BUDGET PROVISIONS—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON MAY 1

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I wonder if I am in order, Mr. Speaker, and if I am not I know you will call my attention to it. On page 2599 of Hansard of May 1 the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) said:

> You must be acquainted with Dr. Shute.

Perhaps the minister could tell us to whom he was referring, and at the same time, explain the reference.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): In order not to take up the time of the house now, I shall make a statement later.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ST. CHARLES DE CAPLAN, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

What was the quantity of lumber and stone purchased in connection with the repairs to the wharf of St. Charles de Caplan, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, during the year 1950?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): (a) 29,761 f.b.m., and 6,945 linear feet of lumber; (b) 175½ yards of stone.

MOTOR VEHICLES—GOVERNMENT PURCHASES IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Stanfield:

1. How many (a) automobiles; (b) motor trucks, have been purchased by each department of government from vendors or dealers in Nova Scotia in each of the years 1949, 1950, inclusive, and in 1951 to date?

2. What was (a) the date of purchase of each of such motor vehicles; (b) the kind and type; (c) the price paid for each; (d) the name of the dealer and vendor, and place of business?

3. Were any purchases of motor vehicles made in Nova Scotia by any department of government for any employee or civil servant on terms requiring the latter to pay the same by instalment payments?

4. If so, how many, and for whom were such purchases made?

Mr. Bradley: The information requested in this question was supplied in the return tabled on April 19 last. Under the circumstances I suggest that the question be dropped.

Mr. Stanfield: I secured the information from an answer to another question, and I ask that the question be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Question dropped.

LOANS UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. Thatcher:

1. How many loans have been approved for house construction in Canada since January 1, 1951, under the National Housing Act?

2. How many were made in the same period last year?

Mr. Winters:

1. 5,764 loans for 7,649 housing units have been approved under the National Housing Act, 1944, during the period January 1, 1951 to March 31, 1951.

2. 5,871 loans for 7,493 housing units were approved under the National Housing Act, 1944, in the same period of 1950.

SAGUENAY RIVER—BUOYS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Who is in charge of placing and removing of buoys in the Saguenay river?

2. What amount is paid for this work, and what is the term of the contract?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Mr. G. H. Lavoie.

2. $2,100 per annum; three years from 2nd July, 1950.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—HISTORY OR SYMPOSIUM

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has anyone been engaged to write a history or symposium on the D.V.A.?

2. If so, who, and what staff is assisting in the task?

Mr. Mutch:

1. Yes.

2. Walter S. Woods, Esq., C.M.G., LL.D., of Vancouver, B.C., formerly deputy minister of veterans affairs. Some stenographic assistance is provided by the staff of the district office of D.V.A. at Vancouver; nobody has been specially engaged for the purpose.

IMMIGRATION—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. How many employees of British, Jewish and French-Canadian origin are there in the department of immigration?

2. What respective positions do they hold?

3. How many immigrants, by nationality, entered the province of Quebec in 1950?

4. Is there a special committee in Quebec to attend to French and Catholic immigrants?

5. What functions are performed by the Ottawa and Quebec governments regarding immigrants?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1. Of immigration branch employees—

(a) 862 are native-born Canadians who gave their racial origin as English, Irish, Scotch or Welsh;

(b) 189 are Canadian citizens born outside Canada who gave their racial origin as English, Irish, Scotch or Welsh;

(c) 52 are not Canadian citizens, but were born in the commonwealth and gave their racial origin as English, Irish, Scotch or Welsh, of whom 46 are locally employed outside Canada;

(d) 282 are native-born Canadians who gave their racial origin as French;

(e) One is a Canadian citizen born in the United Kingdom who gave his racial origin as French;

(f) Five are Canadian citizens born outside Canada and the commonwealth who gave their racial origin as French;

Questions

(g) Eleven are not Canadian citizens who gave their racial origin as French, and are locally employed outside Canada;

(h) Six gave their racial origin as Jewish, of whom five are Canadian citizens—four native-born—employed in Canada. The sixth is employed locally, outside Canada.

4. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration has no committee to serve any particular class of immigrant. It does, however, operate a settlement service in Quebec, and elsewhere, for the reception and assistance of all immigrants. There is a non-departmental committee of the type referred to at Quebec.

5. The Canadian government maintains complete facilities at many points abroad for the medical and civil examinations of prospective immigrants and for the granting of visas. Facilities are also maintained at ports of entry in Canada for the inspection of immigrants, and for the provision of food, shelter, and hospital care in emergency cases. Field staffs, in close co-operation with Canadian employers, arrange for the placement of immigrants in employment, and assist immigrants desirous of establishing themselves in their own enterprises.

Information as to the functions of the Quebec government in the matter of immigration might be obtained from that government.

WHEAT—MOVEMENT TO AND FROM FORT WILLIAM AND CHURCHILL

Mr. Ross (Souris):

1. How many bushels of wheat of the 1950 crop have been transported to (a) Fort William; (b) Churchill, as of April 1, 1951?
2. How many bushels of this wheat are of the various grades?
3. How many bushels of damp wheat of this crop have been dried at (a) Fort William; (b) Churchill?
4. How many bushels of wheat of the 1950 crop have been exported from (a) Fort William; (b) Churchill?
5. What is the estimate of quantity of wheat now in the country elevators for movement to either Fort William or Churchill?
6. What quantity is held on farms for delivery?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Wheat receipts, August 1, 1950 to March 31, 1951, inclusive: (a) Fort William-Port Arthur, 99,583,961 bushels; (b) Churchill, 4,784,227 bushels.

FORT MCMURRAY BITUMINOUS SANDS—SULPHUR CONTENT

Mr. Dechene:

1. Has the federal government carried out any investigation with a view to ascertaining the sulphur content in the bituminous sands deposits in the Fort McMurray area?

2. If so, with what result?

3. Are any steps being taken by the federal government to develop this sulphur?

4. Has the government of Alberta made any representations to the federal government with a view to promoting this valuable development?

Mr. Prudham:

1. Yes.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

2. The bitumen in the bituminous sands has a sulphur content averaging about five per cent.

3. Not directly, but current laboratory research work on refining of the bitumen indicates the possibility that by-product sulphur recovery might result from commercial development.

4. No.

QUESTION AS TO ACTION JOINTLY WITH UNITED STATES OR BY CANADA ALONE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. It is one which I had intended asking earlier this week, but a news item of this morning prompts me to think that perhaps this is an appropriate time to ask it. Will the Prime Minister indicate to the house, on the basis of the information the government has in its possession, what he thinks the chances are of some joint undertaking with respect to the St. Lawrence deep waterway? If that is not going to be possible, will he indicate whether the government has made up its mind to go ahead on its own with this desirable project?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is not in a position to make any accurate forecast at this time about the prospects of an early start internationally on the development of the St. Lawrence; but it has not yet given up hope that it may be an international undertaking and has therefore not yet determined any alternative policy.

INDIA

FOOD SITUATION—INQUIRY AS TO GIFT OF FOOD OR MONEY BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, based on a reported speech of Prime Minister Nehru of India dealing with the famine situation. In view of the urgency of the situation, and the reported willingness of China and Russia to supply food to India, will the government of Canada consider making an immediate outright gift of food, or dollars with which to buy food, in order to assist in alleviating this situation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of his intention to ask this question, and thereby enabled me to check just a few moments ago with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), as I have been doing almost daily in respect of this problem. The government has been and is making use of every available means of securing accurate information about the food situation in India, but it is not yet in a position to make any announcement to the house.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO LOANS UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development, and I am sorry that I was not able to give him sufficient notice of it. Is it true, as reported in the press, that the withdrawal of lending institutions from joint loans under the National Housing Act will make the act inoperative? If that is so, this would be a serious blow to low-income housing in Canada. Will measures be taken to enable the act to continue to be effective?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, under parts I and II of the National Housing Act, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is enabled to enter into arrangements with approved lending institutions to make joint loans to assist in the construction of housing for home ownership or for rental. If lending institutions do not participate in these joint arrangements, the act will become inoperative in so far as parts I and II are concerned.

With respect to the second part of the question, I can only repeat what I have said previously, namely, that the whole matter of housing is under active consideration by the government and any decisions reached will be announced to the house in due course.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked me if I had received a communication from the Vancouver housing association urging consideration of the Fraserview veterans housing project. The answer is that I have received a communication and that it was answered on April 28. In dealing with a question of much the same nature previously, I gave a full answer on Monday, April 9. It can be found at page 1728 of Hansard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGES

CAMPBELLTON, N.B.-CROSS POINT, QUE.—QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. I sent him notice of it shortly before I came into the house; I am sorry I could not give him more notice. My question is based on a report published in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John of May 1 with regard to the construction of an interprovincial bridge between Campbellton, New Brunswick, and Cross Point, Quebec. The report states:

McNair contends Ottawa passing buck—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the hon. member can ask his question without reading the report.

Mr. Brooks: The premier of New Brunswick states that this is entirely a responsibility of the federal government, not a provincial responsibility. My question is this. Is premier McNair correct in saying that the construction of this bridge is entirely the responsibility of the federal government, and if so, has the federal government taken steps to begin the construction of this bridge?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question just before coming into the house, and I wish to thank the hon. gentleman. I have not read that report in the Telegraph-Journal of May 1. I hesitate to believe that the premier of New Brunswick would have used the language that is attributed to him in this article, because he is extremely distinguished in his way of explaining a situation.

In the second place, I must take the hon. gentleman's word that this was said, namely, that the federal government was fully responsible or entirely responsible for the construction of interprovincial bridges. I would not be positive or dogmatic about it. I have not consulted the Department of Justice. On the other hand I know from experience that in the past interprovincial bridges have been built with the co-operation of the provinces. Actually, there is under consideration a project on the Ottawa river at Pembroke. Negotiations are going on between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario. We hope that some day we shall have this joint bridge put up by the people of the two provinces and the federal authority.

As to the Campbellton and Cross Point bridge, the federal government is well disposed. As to the responsibility, I should like to take more time to look into the matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Brooks: I might say that if I could have got the page boy to move a little more quickly, I would have had the copy of the newspaper over to the minister some time ago.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will have plenty of time to read it.

FUEL OIL

INQUIRY AS TO SUPPLY DURING COMING FALL AND WINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Owing to the fact that thousands of Canadians have installed or contemplate installing within the next few months oil stoves or furnaces, can the minister state whether he feels that fuel oil will be in sufficient supply this fall and in the winter of 1952 to take care of the old and new installations?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I know of no situation at this moment that would indicate a shortage of fuel oil for next winter. However, next winter is some months away, and circumstances could intervene. Accordingly, I should not like to have the above statement regarded as a commitment that there will be fuel oil. It has been the desire of the oil companies to instal a pipe line from Montreal to Ottawa and Toronto, and another pipe line from Sarnia to Toronto for the distribution of white products, as they are called; but that has not been possible on account of the shortage of steel. Whether distribution problems will interfere with the local supply situation next winter is uncertain. I expect that there will be sufficient fuel oil in the country, and I am hopeful that it will be properly distributed so that no one will suffer.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON RECENT CONFERENCE AND STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I did not send him notice of it because I know that he can always answer these questions without notice. In view of the fact that he has returned today from attendance at a conference between Canada and the United States with respect to civil defence matters, when will the house have the privilege of hearing his report as to the results of that conference and a statement of government policy on civil defence in Canada generally?

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As my hon. friend likely knows, the estimate providing for civil defence is under the distribution of items in the name of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the transfer of responsibility having taken place after the estimates were arrived at. When the Minister of National Defence brings his estimates to the house I may have an opportunity to say something on the matter.

NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Arising out of the Prime Minister's statement of yesterday on United States bases in Newfoundland, may I ask the Prime Minister when I may have an answer to some of the questions I asked, and will there be an opportunity for further discussion?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would not undertake to answer all the questions the hon. member asked yesterday, but there will be ample opportunity to discuss the matters he has in mind.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

HOTEL AND WATER TRANSPORT WORKERS—AMENDMENT, MR. KNOWLES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair on this motion to go into committee of ways and means there is a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the government. It is a situation which has been brought to their attention outside of this house a number of times, but I refer in particular to the occasion on which the Canadian Congress of Labour waited on the government, on April 11, and submitted their memorandum on matters of concern to organized labour. Included in the brief they presented was a section dealing with the manner in which the railway strike of last fall was settled. More particularly, the point raised by the delegation representing the Canadian Congress of Labour related to the failure of the arbitrator to give to the hotel and water transport workers the same terms that were accorded to the railway employees involved in last fall's dispute.

May I read two or three sentences from the representations made to the government just a short while ago—as I have already said, on April 11—by the Canadian Congress of Labour. Discussing this matter the congress brief says:

> The impression given by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons debate on the railway strike was that all employees would be treated on an equal basis. No other impression could be taken from the remarks made by the Prime Minister with respect to this vital issue, and it was accepted in good faith by the employees.

Later, after referring to the difference in the award as between railway employees on the one hand and hotel and water transport workers on the other, the congress in its brief went on to say:

> In spite of the fact that the government appears to take the position that nothing further can be done in this matter, the railway employees feel that the legislation passed by parliament did not give them the protection which they were led to believe it provided. There has been a distinct loss of morale in the railway service, and the congress urges in the strongest possible manner that the government take whatever action may be necessary to remedy what the railway employees believe was a discriminatory decision on the part of the arbitrator.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it so happens that there is nothing in the legislative program before parliament at this session that relates to this matter. There are no items in the estimates that deal with it, and this is in fact one of the very first opportunities that I have had to raise this question in such a manner as to get from the government the consideration that I believe it deserves. I wish to point out that I raise the question because I believe the good name of this parliament is at stake.

Last fall when we met here in a special session to deal with two main matters, one of them being the railway dispute, we had presented to us a bill known as the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act. That bill had a preamble which, amongst other things, said:

> Whereas the operation of railways and subsidiary services serving the country as a whole has been suspended by reason of a failure of the railway companies and the bargaining agents of non-operating and certain other employees of the companies to reach agreement as to certain terms and conditions of employment . . .

Then later on these words:

> And whereas the railway companies and the bargaining agents of the employees appear to have agreed that existing wage rates should be increased, and the forty-hour week introduced but appear to have been unable to agree as to the amount and effective date of the wage increase or the date at which the forty-hour week would be effective and the terms and conditions upon which it would be introduced . . .

The preamble continues, and eventually as one reads he gets down to the operative sections of the act. The reason I read these two paragraphs from the preamble was to point out that they referred collectively to the whole group of employees who were out on strike. Not only did these two paragraphs refer collectively to all the employees who were out on strike, but they referred to them as being employees of the railway companies and of their subsidiary services. In other words, some of us in this house, and certainly the employees, thought that that bill, on the basis of its preamble, was designed to treat all employees who were involved in that dispute on precisely the same basis, whether they were railway employees or employees of subsidiary services.

When we got to discussion of the clauses of the bill we reached a clause which I felt had a bearing on this matter, and as a matter of fact I had my doubts as to whether the operative provisions of the bill were clearly enough drawn to make sure that the hotel and water transport workers would get as of right the same treatment that was to be accorded to the railway employees. I asked questions along that line, as recorded at pages 71 and 72 of Hansard of August 30, 1950. At this point may I say in fairness to the Prime Minister that he gave an answer which seemed to me to indicate that I was right, namely, that the bill did not give a guarantee that all employees would be treated in the same way. Well, there was not much satisfaction in being right on the point, because I wanted the bill to be worded so as to guarantee that hotel and water transport workers would be treated in the same manner as the railway employees. So I pressed for the section to be properly drawn, and other members, particularly from this group, supported me in that effort. I find that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) pursued the matter, and eventually got a statement from the Prime Minister which certainly was different in tone from the one he had given me, and which seemed to be more satisfactory to the members of this house; indeed it seemed satisfactory to the railway employees affected.

At page 74 of Hansard the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar set the stage for what the Prime Minister had to say in answer to him. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said:

> There is a certain amount of loyalty among these union members who have been working together through their groups. They would have felt, I am sure, that to accept for themselves an agreement which separated in any way the smaller group of workers would have been disloyalty to that group. The government would be well advised to consider this small group of people as coming under any of the decisions that are beneficial to the larger unions.
> I have heard it said that the railway management considered throughout that after all this was a minor matter. In fact on one occasion I heard it described as peanuts. If for the sake of a small part of the negotiating unions we fail to do what is justice to them, and give the larger unions the feeling that this group which has relied on them has been discriminated against, I think it will tend to create bad public relations and bad union relations in the future.

I wish now to quote what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said immediately after these observations of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The Prime Minister is reported on page 75 of Hansard for August 30, 1950, in these words:

> They are not being discriminated against in any way. The government, in the bill which is recommended to parliament, has treated them in the same way as the other unions, namely, as one unit; and everything that binds the arbitrator with respect to any one binds him as much with respect to those two small groups as it does to the others.

This is a long paragraph, so I do not need to read it all. But I draw your attention to another statement by the Prime Minister which he made later, immediately after an interjection of mine. These are his words:

> I would not like to discuss these details, but in the recommendation we made to parliament and in the bill itself we have attempted to treat as one unit all those involved in this dispute.

Later on he says:

> We have endeavoured to treat the whole group who are out, those who have withdrawn from work, as one unit; and our reason for doing so is that we thought it would be unfortunate to ask by legislation that any portion of them should do something which they would regard as disloyal to their comrades.

As was pointed out in the brief presented by the Canadian Congress of Labour on April 11, those words of the Prime Minister were taken in good faith by the employees. They thought that made clear the meaning and the intention of the bill. They thought that the Prime Minister's words were in keeping with the terms of the preamble, particularly the two paragraphs I quoted a while ago. They thought that all the employees on strike, both the railway workers and the hotel and water transport workers, would be treated as one unit; they thought that whatever award was made by the arbitrator under the act would apply equally to the railway employees and to the hotel and water transport workers.

In due course an arbitrator, in the person of Mr. Justice Kellock of the Supreme Court of Canada, was appointed. I must say that on other occasions I have quoted from that report in laudatory terms. In particular I feel Mr. Justice Kellock is to be commended for the way in which he treated the railway employees, giving them the highest increase the act permitted, and giving them, as he did, the forty-hour week at the earliest date the act permitted. His reasons for those two decisions are clearly stated in his award, and I need not take time to go into that matter now.

But with respect to the question as to what to do with the hotel and water transport workers, Mr. Justice Kellock took a different view from the one indicated in the words of the Prime Minister, as I have just quoted. At page 8 of the mimeographed copy of Mr. Justice Kellock's award I find these words—and he is speaking at this point about the position of the hotel and water transport workers:

> On behalf of the union it is contended that the effect of the statute has been to equate the hotel and water transport employees with the other employees here in question, so that if there is to be an adjustment in wages or hours as to the latter group, the same must apply to all. In support of this contention reference is made to certain expressions in the preamble of the statute—

—which I have just read.

Then Mr. Justice Kellock says:

> I was also referred to the discussion in parliament when the bill was under consideration.

I have just referred to that same discussion, which was brought to the attention of Mr. Justice Kellock by the representatives of the employees. Then he goes on to say:

> In my opinion the language in subsection 3 of section 5—

He is referring to the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act.

> —is clear and mandatory. The arbitrator is to decide any particular matter "within the limits of the proposals that he determines were made by the railway companies and the unions in respect of that matter" at the time pointed out by the statute. Accordingly, even if there can be said to be any ambiguity in the preamble, which I do not suggest, the operative provisions must govern.

Well, I am not a lawyer, and sometimes I join in the cracks made about lawyers; but I must confess I think Mr. Justice Kellock is following good legal practice in that interpretation of the statute. We all know it to be perfectly true, that it is the operative provisions of a statute which must govern. In my view therefore the thing that is unfortunate about this is that the operative provisions of the statute failed to reflect the intention of parliament, as indicated by the words of the Prime Minister which I read, and which we in the house were asked to accept as interpreting the intention of the bill, and which the employees accepted in good faith.

The result of this whole situation, namely, a statute the operative provisions of which in the opinion of Mr. Justice Kellock do not carry out the clearly stated intentions of the Prime Minister—

Mr. St. Laurent: He does not say that at all.

Mr. Knowles: I am saying it.

Mr. St. Laurent: You say that in the opinion of Mr. Justice Kellock the operative clause does not conform with the preamble. He did not say that.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry, but I think the Prime Minister misunderstands me. I am not putting words into the mouth of Mr. Justice Kellock, other than the words I quoted from him. Anything else I am saying is my own.

An hon. Member: Mr. Justice Knowles.

Mr. Knowles: What I am saying is this, that the result of a statute which failed to include in its operative sections what we were told was the clearly stated intention of parliament is that Mr. Justice Kellock made an award that was different with respect to the railway employees from what it was with respect to the hotel and water transport workers. It was not his fault, but it was contrary to what parliament expected.

In brief I would point out that the railway employees were awarded an increase of seven cents an hour, whereas the hotel and water transport workers were awarded an increase of four cents an hour, that being the floor provided by the statute. The railway employees were awarded a forty-hour week at the earliest date provided in the statute, namely, June 1, 1951, without any loss of take-home pay, but there was no provision for a forty-hour week for the hotel and water transport employees. Indeed, no change in their working week was made under the provisions of Mr. Justice Kellock's award. Hotel and water transport workers work varying numbers of hours in various parts of the country. It may be forty-four or forty-eight hours or more. Whatever hours they worked before still obtain. Another difference between the two groups is that the hotel and water transport workers were given a one-year contract, while the railway employees were given a two-year contract. The only point of significance about that difference, as I see it, is that these groups are being separated; because the hotel and water transport employees will have to seek a new agreement at a time when the railway employees will not have to do so. The smaller group will be splintered off from the larger group, and will therefore have less bargaining power.

In that connection may I point out that Mr. Justice Kellock states that there were 148,433 railway employees involved in the dispute, but that there were only 9,263 hotel and water transport workers involved. In other words it is for that small group of slightly more than 9,000 employees that I am speaking on this occasion.

When parliament met this year one of the first questions that I put to the Prime Minister was in relation to this matter. My question will be found in Hansard of February 1, 1951, at page 17. I need not quote the question, but it related to the matter of whether or not the government intended to do anything to get that award adjusted. The Prime Minister replied to the effect that representatives of the railroad unions had waited on him prior to that date with regard to this matter and that his answer to them was that the provisions of the statute had been carried out and it was not then the intention of the government to ask parliament to change that matter.

As is clear from letters that have been addressed since that time to the Prime Minister and letters that the rest of us have received, and as is clear from the representations made by the Canadian Congress of Labour on April 11, this is a matter which still exercises those who are affected by it. My purpose in rising at this time is to ask the government, on the floor of this house, to reconsider this whole position. I feel that it is our duty as members of parliament to concern ourselves, particularly when smaller groups are affected.

It is all well and good to say that the award was a fair award so far as the 148,000 railway workers were concerned. I have gone into that on other occasions, and I shall not now repeat my argument that the statute should not have limited the increase to seven cents per hour. But here we are confronted with this smaller group of 9,263 who feel they have been discriminated against. What rankles with them most of all is the feeling that parliament—indeed the government—let them down. They relied on the letter and the spirit of the words of the Prime Minister on August 30 to the effect that the whole group of employees, that all who were out, that all who were involved in the strike were to be treated as one unit. The phrase "one unit" was used by the Prime Minister at least twice. Whatever he may have meant by it, certainly the workers thought that it meant that the same treatment would be accorded to all.

I could go into the merits of the case on the basis of the wages these hotel and water transport workers are receiving and the hours that they work, but I am refraining from doing that on this occasion. I think that whatever may be their due because of their low wages and long hours, because of comparisons with people in other occupations, the main point so far as we are concerned is the good name of parliament.

May I remind you and the house that there have been other occasions on which the government felt that the intention of parliament had not been carried out fully. I have before me references dealing with two such cases. In both of those cases the government either has taken action already or has announced that it will take action to see to it that the intentions of parliament are carried out.

One case came up in this house on February 26 of this year. We were having a debate on a matter which has taken a more favourable turn since then, namely, the question of trade union dues in relation to income tax. I was complaining about the action of the government several years ago in setting aside the provisions of the statute. I refer now to what happened in 1945, 1946 and 1947. I pointed out that just as soon as the Exchequer Court of Canada ruled that the right to deduct trade union dues from income tax was really included in the statute in 1945, 1946 and 1947, in fact just as soon as the matter was referred to the court, the government brought in a bill to amend the act and take away that privilege.

When I was complaining about this the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) argued that I should commend the government for taking action to change the law so as to make it conform with what had been the intention of parliament. The parliamentary assistant was definite about it. The debate took place on February 26 and may be found at page 677 of Hansard. His point was that if the act was as I said it was and as the Exchequer Court said it was, that was not the intention of the government when it presented its original legislation to parliament. As soon as the government discovered that it had made what it regarded as a mistake in the legislation, it amended the legislation so as to carry out its intention, and the parliamentary assistant said to me on that occasion that that was something for which I should commend the government instead of criticizing it.

The other example was brought to our attention in the first instance on February 16 of this year, as reported at page 421 of Hansard, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who got up on the orders of the day to tell us that the government was going to take to the privy council, if you please, the famous Nolan case, in an endeavour to get a change in the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. The Minister of Justice announced on that occasion that if the decision of the privy council was likewise against the government, he was giving notice that the government would bring in legislation to amend the statute so as to carry out what had been the intention of the government and the intention of parliament. I think I should read a few of his words. The minister said that the government:

> —gives notice that it will, in order to carry out the principle of preventing such fortuitous profits, introduce legislation in parliament confirming the settlements with all of the commercial traders in oats and barley, other than Mr. Nolan . . .

This matter came up again later on in the session. As a matter of fact it was raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in such a manner that the Prime Minister felt that he had to reply to it, and he did so as recorded on page 827 of Hansard. Speaking of what the courts had done in connection with the interpretation of the legislation, he said:

> They may be right but if they are right the government made a mistake in the method adopted to carry out the intention of parliament. It did not make any mistake as to what was the intention of parliament. It made a mistake, if that is correct, as to the method it adopted to carry out the intention of parliament.

A little later he described the arrangements the Minister of Justice was making. He said that if the privy council ruled against the government the government would be saying: We did not make any mistake as to what parliament wanted done, and we ask you to confirm the settlements that were made with those who did not institute proceedings. There is a clear case where in the words of the Minister of Justice and of the Prime Minister we are told that the intention of the government and of parliament was clear. The courts having placed a different interpretation on the statute than was the intention of the government and of parliament, the government feels itself obligated to bring in the necessary legislation to change the statute so as to carry out what was the intention.

There is my case. Surely what is fair to do in one instance is fair to do in another. The Prime Minister told us on August 30 of last year that it was the intention of the government to treat all the employees involved in the dispute as one unit. He used that phrase at least twice, and its spirit runs through all his remarks. There was to be no discrimination. There was to be nothing done to make any group feel that they were disloyal to any of their fellow workers. It was so clear that the representatives of the employees who were sitting in the gallery on that occasion felt satisfied, even though they might have had some doubts about the wording of the bill. They were satisfied that if the matter went to arbitration the intention of the government and of parliament would be carried out.

The matter did not go to the courts, but it did come into the hands of a justice of the supreme court. That justice of the supreme court did not interpret the operative provisions of the statute in the way the Prime Minister had indicated to us on August 30, 1950.

It seems to me the course to be followed by the government on behalf of parliament is clear. If when the Nolan case reached the point it did the government felt that its intention had not been carried out and it therefore has the right to bring in legislation to carry out that intention, surely the hotel and water transport workers have a moral claim upon this government to have the same course taken on their behalf. As I say, I have refrained from going into the rate of wages and hours of work; I do not want to complicate the question. If I did go into those matters, from my point of view their case would be even stronger. Here is a small group, and we often find that small groups are discriminated against. But I object to such treatment, and on behalf of these 9,263 hotel and water transport workers I submit that something should now be done to alleviate their situation. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones):

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out, and the following words be substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the government should give consideration to the advisability of taking appropriate steps to secure an alteration in the award which was made under the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act of 1950, so as to extend to the hotel and water transport workers involved in the railway dispute of last fall the same terms awarded to the railway employees involved in the same dispute."

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to defend the award made by Mr. Justice Kellock, nor to defend that hon. gentleman himself; I do not think he requires any defence in this house. I regret that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) does not agree with Mr. Justice Kellock's interpretation of the statute and its preamble, and does not agree with the conclusions at which the hon. justice arrived. But it so happens that it was Mr. Justice Kellock who was selected to preside over this arbitration, and that it is the decision of Mr. Justice Kellock which by statute is binding upon the parties.

I rise merely for the purpose of pointing out to my hon. friend that he can take some phrases from the language I used at that time and interpret them as he has chosen to do this afternoon, but if he reads the whole of what I said—and I said quite a lot on that occasion, as many of us did, because we were very much disturbed over the serious situation which had arisen—he will find that I said the government had come to the conclusion very reluctantly that it should not ask the other unions to abandon any of their fellows with whom they had bound themselves together for a common cause, because it would probably have seemed to them we were asking them to do something disloyal. So I said the government did not recommend that parliament do that, but that the matters in dispute would remain to be determined by the arbitrator. I even pointed out in express terms that if the arbitrator came to the conclusion that a certain group should get a larger increase than another group, that would be something he could include in his award. He was the one to determine what remained in dispute between the employers and the employees, and he was the one to determine how the dispute should end.

At page 13 of Hansard I commenced by pointing out that we found it difficult to ask parliament to declare that it was in the national interest that the services of the Chateau Laurier here in Ottawa should be resumed at once. We found it difficult to come to that conclusion and to ask parliament to come to that conclusion, but we felt there was the overriding consideration that if we did not do it we would be saying to the men that they had to do something which they might consider disloyal to the smaller group included in their number. When the question was raised by the hon. member I gave him the answer to which he has referred, which is at page 71 of Hansard; that we were saying that though the railways in their discussions had not agreed to four cents for everybody, there would be four cents for everybody, but that was all we were determining; and that as far as we were concerned, if there was a continuance of this dispute between the parties in regard to treating water and hotel operatives in a different fashion from the ordinary railway operatives, the arbitrator would have before him the example of what the government was recommending to parliament, and what parliament was doing, but that it would be his responsibility to make the decision.

Now the decision has been made, and I must repeat that it is not the intention of the government to ask parliament to set aside the decision. I would ask the hon. gentleman to read again everything I said on that occasion. I am sure he will come to the conclusion, which is apparent from what I said, that here was the example the government was giving, here was the example parliament was giving, but that was not to be binding upon the arbitrator with respect to any of the matters that might be in dispute; that he would have to settle them, and he did.

The union leaders felt they could not take any other position than to ask for equality of treatment for the hotel and water operatives. I felt that parliament could not take any other position than to determine what it was determining with respect to those who were involved; but that what was left to be determined under the act would be determined by the arbitrator. The arbitrator came to the conclusion—and I am not going to discuss whether or not it was a proper conclusion—that those who happened to be working in railway hotels had no good reason to expect substantially better treatment than operatives in other hotels. When the labour leaders made their representations to the government some time ago, we told them the contract with the hotel operatives would expire shortly and would have to be renewed, and they could make their representations to the management. They said it would make for better public relations between the railways and all their employees if they treated their hotel employees on the same footing. I said, "Well, make that representation to the railway management. I am not going to take the responsibility of asking parliament to intervene and set aside the decision made in this exceptional case." This was regarded and treated as a case of compulsory arbitration. It was very exceptional, and I hope it will long remain so. I hope there may never again be any situation in which parliament will have to exercise its authority to secure the functioning of essential services in this country.

It may be urged upon the railway management that it would make for better personal relations with their employees if they did that, but I do not think it is a matter in which any responsible government could ask parliament to intervene again to change the award that was made at that time. I repeat that I made it abundantly clear that the questions remaining in dispute could be dealt with by the arbitrator. I said, as recorded at page 75 of Hansard for August 30, 1950:

> . . . I would not like to give any opinion as a lawyer as to whether or not in the position taken by the parties at the last moment there would still be room for the arbitrator to say that one group, perhaps the car men, would get one rate, and another group, perhaps the boilermakers, would get another.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

I do not know. We have endeavoured to treat the whole group who are out, those who have withdrawn from work, as one unit; and our reason for doing so is that we thought it would be unfortunate to ask by legislation that any portion of them should do something which they would regard as disloyal to their comrades.

Then the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said:

> Then we can take it that the intention of the legislation is so far as possible to keep the unions as a unit in their negotiations?

I answered:

> I would not put it in that way. The intention was not by legislation to require any of the unions to adopt a course that they would regard as disloyal to their fellows.

That was the position in parliament, that we should not by legislation do something which would have been very embarrassing to the constitution of this country had they refused to comply with it. That was one of the very serious motives which induced us to do this rather illogical thing of including the operations of the Chateau Laurier as something that was essential to the functioning of the Canadian economy. The matters remaining in dispute were left for the arbitrator. I may say I thought that, with our example before him, he might decide to treat them all on the same footing, but it was a matter that had to be determined by him. I believe it would be wrong for the government to ask parliament to vary the decision at which he arrived.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): It is not my intention to speak at any length on this question. The member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has made his case so clear, as he always does, there is nothing much left for anyone else to say. After hearing what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has had to say there is still less left for me to say, because I believe in his concluding words he has upheld the contention of the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Let me point out that, so far as my understanding goes, the member for Winnipeg North Centre did not say that Mr. Justice Kellock misinterpreted the act. What he did say was that the act did not express what parliament intended, that is that all of the groups on strike should be treated alike. The Prime Minister read the part of the debate that I was going to quote, that is part of his own statement which appears at page 75 of Hansard. But let me read it again, for emphasis, and I shall leave my participation in this debate at that. This is what the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 75 of Hansard for August 30, 1950:

> For instance, I would not like to give—

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps you should start four or five lines above that.

Mr. MacInnis: I would be glad to do that.

On all of the points in which we have provided expressly, we have stated the arbitrator cannot undo what we are doing. On the other matters he will have to make a determination as to the extent of the gap and the bridging of the gap.

It is clear that the arbitrator felt there was a gap, and he used the discretion given him in the act.

Then the Prime Minister proceeded:

For instance, I would not like to give any opinion as a lawyer as to whether or not in the position taken by the parties at the last moment there would still be room for the arbitrator to say that one group, perhaps the car men, would get one rate, and another group, perhaps the boilermakers would get another. I do not know. We have endeavoured to treat the whole group who are out, those who have withdrawn from work, as one unit;

I think that is clear. So far as parliament was concerned, the purpose was to treat all the employees, both hotel employees and water transport workers on the same basis as those other railway employees who participated in the strike.

Then the Prime Minister continues:

. . . and our reason for doing so is that we thought it would be unfortunate to ask by legislation that any portion of them should do something which they would regard as disloyal to their comrades.

My understanding of the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I agree with it completely, is that if the act did not express specifically what parliament intended, parliament should now remedy that situation and do justice to these employees that we feel were discriminated against in the arbitrator's findings.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): I should like to briefly outline a little problem we have in the interior of British Columbia, and this has a distinct bearing on it. I feel I would be remiss in my duties as a member of that area if I did not bring it before the house. On Okanagan lake we have barges, tugs and other equipment operated by both the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National. The men operating this equipment are well organized, and are part of the transportation system, so were affected by the strike. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, today they feel that they have been let down by parliament. They were led to believe, rightly or wrongly and I am not going to go into that, that an implicit promise had been made that they were to be treated fairly with all other railroad workers. They took that from the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and from the preamble to the act. They still feel that way today, and believe they have been badly let down.

The men employed on these barges and tugs are of a very high calibre, the masters, general officers and the men themselves. Many of them are former naval men or deep-sea seamen who have turned to lake service in their advancing years. They feel that they are supplying a vital service in the transportation system, because except for this water transportation the railway would end at Kelowna. They feel, therefore, that they are a vital part of the system, and the same situation would apply to Kootenay lake and the other lakes in the interior of British Columbia. It is felt also that no sound reason has been advanced for excluding them from the general recognition of the railroad workers, which naturally produces a divorcing of their group from the general category of railroad workers.

I wish to place on record the reasons they advanced for placing themselves in the same category as ordinary railroad workers. They are very simple. They are as follows:

(1) The earnings from our efforts go into the railroad coffers.

(2) Our pay cheques are issued by the railroad companies.

(3) Our work is governed by rules and regulations issued by the railroad companies.

(4) Should we incur any expense through breakage or waste we have to explain very thoroughly to some office of the railroad company.

(5) From the standpoint of peculiarities of duties our deck crews have to switch and spot freight cars just as do railroad brakemen and conductors. This is additional to the regular ship's duties.

(6) Touching on the hotel employees issue we leave it to you to take notice of your railroad timetable and newspaper advertising wherein no punches are pulled in telling you that hotels owned and operated by the railroad companies offer the finest of service and accommodation to the traveller.

(7) Last but not least—when our agreement expires it has to be renegotiated at the office of the divisional superintendent, these recommendations of which are subject to final ratification by the general head office of the railroad company.

That seems to me to place on record the close touch there is between the water transport workers and the general set-up of the railway transportation system in Canada. They feel that they have the same grievance that the other railway workers have. They went on strike for the same reasons, at the same time, for the same principle, namely, the high cost of living and their inability to meet it. They feel that they should not be segregated from the bodies rendering public service under identical conditions, identical management, subject to identical punishment, merit marks and so on. Of course they have to do something about it. They have a feeling that they may again have to consider strike action. I am not saying that is a general feeling, but they have got to do something to raise their present standards.

May I point out that another thing that seems to me to tie them in with other railroad workers is that before any organized body of workers who contemplate strike action may take such action they must receive the sanction of the government through the Department of Labour. The water transport workers and hotel employees were granted such permission to take part in the railroad strike. To my mind this is a tentative admission by the Department of Labour that both groups were subject to the same governing factors and should be dealt with collectively. Parliament unconsciously acknowledged the unity of the workers by calling the bill not the railroad workers bill or the waterworkers bill, but the maintenance of railway operation bill. I submit that the railway could not be maintained without these vital links in its operation. To my mind the act was intended to cover them.

These men, unfortunately, are still working a 48-hour week and they are still under the 1939 agreement. The company is quite satisfied because that suits them, and they refuse to allow any changes to be made in those working conditions. These men have had no raise in pay since 1948, and we all know how greatly the cost of living has gone up in the meantime. It is on their behalf that I would ask that consideration be given to granting to these men, by negotiation if necessary, the same terms, the same increases in salary and the same lowering of the weekly working hours. I ask that their case be subject to immediate negotiation. I believe that they are as much entitled to a home life that the longer hours there would give them as are their colleagues with whom they work every day. I think that it is unfair, and constitutes an injustice, when one group of a given service is segregated and told, "You shall have nothing" while the others are treated well according to the settlement made.

I feel that the government have a responsibility. Whether what has happened was intentional or unintentional is a matter which I am not going to go into at all. But at any rate, the impression was given that these men would be treated on a basis similar to that which was used in the treatment of all other railroad workers who were on strike. To bring back the good name of parliament, and I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) feels that something should be done on behalf of these men, I appeal to him to use either negotiation or some other instrument—and I do not know what is available—whereby a hearing could be given these men and their case could be dealt with on its merits, in order to give them a decent chance to raise their standard of living to meet the present high cost.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I think my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has made an excellent case. I do not intend to add to it; that is to say, I do not intend to add to it anything in the form of argument. I should merely like to add my endorsation of the words that he has spoken. I am one of those citizens who are fortunate enough to have in their midst a Canadian National Railway hotel, the Bessborough, which I have no doubt has played host to a good many members of this house, including the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I have heard no good reason advanced today as to why there should have been a discrimination and a division as between these two classes of workers or why that other class of workers which was discriminated against should not share the benefits of the award under the recent decision. The employees of the hotels, of course, were disappointed also. There is one fine gentleman who lives close to my house, who was engaged in some humble work, as it is termed, at that place; he came to me when I was at home at Easter and expressed bitter disappointment, not perhaps so much in the matter of the money award as in the fact that some distinction had been made as between the particular class of workers of which he was one and those other classes of workers who had received better treatment. This was something he bitterly resented. I am prepared to accept the interpretation which the Prime Minister has made of his own words, but may I say that the only reason I accept it is that he has so interpreted them. If I am paying the Prime Minister what I think is a well-deserved compliment in that regard, I may remind him that a great many people of this country and those workers of whom we are at the moment speaking, accept the Prime Minister's word in that same spirit. It is therefore unfortunate that they should give to the Prime Minister's word an interpretation which he had not intended; because when he speaks, the people listen and believe. These people listened and they believed; and there are no tricks in plain and simple faith. The Prime Minister said that he is not prepared to recommend to parliament that it should remedy this injustice to these particular workers; he did not call it an injustice, but that is what I call it. Although the Prime Minister is not prepared to submit the matter to this parliament may I say that this matter, like most others, is within the jurisdiction of this parliament and that this parliament could do something about it if the government were to give to it the necessary leadership.

I shall close these few remarks with the fine words that were spoken by our former colleague in this house, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), when he said that, among the things that he had found out, the one which stood out most vividly from his experience in the years he had spent here was this, and he expressed it in the following words:

> I came to a very simple conclusion, a conclusion that I know to be right, namely, that perhaps the chief thing that rests upon us here is that within these four walls and in our hands rest the honour and conscience of the Dominion of Canada.

Let me say that this is one of the things which rest upon the honour and conscience of this house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I really did not intend to say a word, and I have been considering whether I should say it or not; but I think perhaps I owe it to my colleagues in the house as well as to myself to say what I am going to say. I have a vivid recollection of this discussion on August 30. In common with all other members of the house, I was anxious to see the matter settled then and the railways resume their operation immediately. I followed very carefully the course of the debate. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has quoted the question that I put to him as recorded at page 75 of Hansard. That question was put immediately after the paragraph that has been quoted two or three times this afternoon. I will, if the Prime Minister will allow, not quote the first paragraph of the two, because it does not have any bearing on what I am going to say, but I listened very carefully to this:

> For instance, I would not like to give any opinion as a lawyer as to whether or not in the position taken by the parties at the last moment there would still be room for the arbitrator to say that one group, perhaps the car men, would get one rate, and another group, perhaps the boilermakers, would get another. I do not know. We have endeavoured to treat the whole group who are out, those who have withdrawn from work, as one unit; and our reason for doing so is that we thought it would be unfortunate to ask by legislation that any portion of them should do something which they would regard as disloyal to their comrades.

In the sitting that afternoon I considered that to mean, rightly or wrongly, and apparently wrongly now, that we were not going to ask by legislation the segregation of the large group of railway workers from the small group of water and hotel workers. That was my interpretation at the time, and I asked the question to confirm it. When the question was answered I thought that it confirmed the opinion that I had formed during the discussion, namely, that the intention was not by legislation to require any of the unions to adopt a course which could be regarded as disloyal to their fellows.

I may say that immediately I turned to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and said: "I think that is very satisfactory. I do not think we should delay this matter any longer. I suggest that we co-operate to end this discussion and get the railways working." My impression at that time was as I have suggested, and I thought that I owed it to my colleagues, to the Prime Minister and to the house, to say that that was my interpretation. It was on that basis that I so suggested to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who at that time was doubtful, and was not satisfied; but we had a long discussion, and I thought that the statement of the Prime Minister, my question and his reply clarified the situation sufficiently that it was clear that we were going to treat all the employees as a unit in the proposed arbitration, and that no group would be separated from the others. It was upon that basis that I said to my friends who have spoken this afternoon: "I think that that is good. I think that that settles the matter, and we should try to get the railways in operation and not delay this bill any longer." I thought perhaps I should say that. I am sure, as a matter of fact, the representatives of the railway men in the gallery thought the same because I saw them immediately after I left the chamber and they said so.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I will not be two minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Higgins: Thank you. I enter this debate for two very good reasons. One is, the only hotel in Newfoundland owned by the Canadian National Railways is in my riding; the other is, the water transport workers coming within the purview of this amendment I have been associated with professionally for many years, and through an accident was the head of their union for a matter of two or three years.

I do not intend to enter into any legal discussion with the Prime Minister on this matter, Mr. Speaker; it would be an unfair competition so far as I am concerned. But I should like to say that it was my understanding when we left here after the special session that the hotel and water transport employees were to be treated on the same basis exactly as other members of the union. I went home with that understanding, and I told the water transport union men that that was so.

In that connection, as I say, I am certainly not going to enter into any discussion with the Prime Minister, but at page 75 of Hansard he used these words:

> I would not like to discuss those details; but in the recommendation we made to parliament, and in the bill itself we have attempted to treat as one unit, all those involved in this dispute.

I was quite happy, but I did put the question to the Prime Minister as recorded at page 76 of Hansard:

> There is one thing I should like to get a little more clear in my own mind. The Prime Minister defined the position of the water transport workers and I wonder if once again he would make their position clear at least beyond the doubt in my own mind. Are they going to be included with the other railroad workers?

The Prime Minister replied: "They are." Well, as I say, rightly or wrongly—and I am sure the Prime Minister did not mean to mislead me in any way; I do not make that suggestion—that was the opinion that I went home with, and that was the opinion I expressed when I got home. I believe that is the opinion that hon. members who have spoken this afternoon had when they returned from parliament at that time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): There happen to be a number of water transport workers in my constituency who are employed on the inland Canadian Pacific Railway steamers; and it is because I think they have a just cause for grievance that I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am not going to repeat the arguments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; I think he made an excellent case, and there is no need for repetition at this time. But like the hon. member who has just spoken, when I returned home I was under the impression that all groups were going to be treated as a group as a result of the debate in the House of Commons, and I so expressed my opinion to these men. I met their business agent, and I met the crews on the steamers concerned, and they felt at that time that they were going to be treated in that way. The judgment has proven that those 10,000 workers, water transport and hotel workers, have not been included in the group. I feel that they have a just grievance, and I do urge that the Prime Minister give consideration to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and allow this parliament to correct that situation.

Not only do the men actually involved feel they have a grievance, but in presenting on their behalf their case to this house and supporting these men I am also representing the point of view of all the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Kootenay division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I think that this raises a question which should carry us back to the discussion which took place in this house last August and early September. It will be recalled that at that time I opposed very strenuously, as did others associated with me, the introduction of legislation which would establish the principle of compulsory arbitration.

Hansard will show that we warned of the dangers of introducing this principle. It is not enough to say that it was necessary to get the railways back in operation. There is no doubt that it was necessary to get the railways back into operation. I wish to repeat what I said before: I am convinced that, by the way it handled this whole matter, the government was responsible for the railways being out of operation. The government of the country undoubtedly was in a position to speak with some measure of authority, and conveyed the impression not only to the representatives of the union but also to the public that there would be no strike. They left the clear understanding in the minds of the public as well as of the union that they would follow the course they had followed over and over again. There has been a pattern clearly established and, right or wrong, that pattern is one which had led to the conclusion that before the strike actually took place the government itself would become the arbiter and would establish terms which would be regarded as acceptable by both sides.

In view of the fact that the dominion government, through its agency, is the employer of a substantial number of the men affected by the action taken at that time, it was perfectly obvious then and always has been that the government was in a position to make a decision. That continued right up to the last minute.

The strike took place. A strike of that kind, no matter how unsatisfactory it is in every way, is legal under our laws. Therefore we are dealing with legal action, no matter whether one approves of it or not. We are dealing with a situation in which the rights of men have been established by laws passed by parliament. Their rights were rights which required careful recognition.

The strike was under way. The paramount interests of the country, in the minds of members of parliament, were the interests of a group of men and women who have given this country good and useful service throughout the years. There were these balancing interests.

In that situation a bill was placed before the house which introduced for the first time, as something to be dealt with by the parliament of Canada, the principle of compulsory arbitration. I think that today we must examine what it was those men were given a reasonable right to believe. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) used words which have already been quoted, but which must not be disregarded. These are the words that were read into the record today:

> We have endeavoured to treat the whole group who are out, those who have withdrawn from work, as one unit.

No matter whether it was wise or unwise, no matter what the intention of the Prime Minister was—and I feel sure he had no thought of leaving any false impression in the minds of those who relied upon his words —nevertheless it seems to be that those who were affected by the legislation then before the house had reason to believe that all the men and women who were out on strike were going to be dealt with as one unit, and that there would be no exclusion in any decision that might be made.

For that reason I believe there was a natural feeling of surprise and disappointment on the part of those who found themselves excluded, and found that they were not treated as part of one unit. Whatever the merits or otherwise might be in respect of the inclusion of these men and women who, by the report of the commission, have been excluded, I think we must have regard to what they were reasonably led to believe. For that reason I propose to support the amendment which calls for consideration by the government of such steps as would treat all those affected at that time as one unit. In doing so I would repeat every objection I made on that occasion in connection with the introduction of the principle of compulsory arbitration, and say that what has happened has fully confirmed the objections we raised to the introduction of that principle at that time.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take long in discussing this matter, but I believe it is necessary to say a few words. In the discussions we had in the house last fall the conclusions reached were decisive. Legislation was brought down to end the strike, and in that legislation certain concessions were made. As the leader of the opposition has said, the principle of compulsory arbitration was introduced for the first time. In that principle I never did believe: I do not believe in compulsory arbitration.

I believe it is apparent from the statement made by the Prime Minister on that occasion that all hon. members were of the opinion that all parties to the dispute would be treated alike. The Prime Minister's words as recorded in Hansard have already been quoted, so that there is no necessity for my putting them on again. I believe the hotel and water transport workers are justified in believing that they were included in the settlement. When they find now that they are excluded it seems to me they have good grounds for complaint. Without carrying the debate further let me say it is my view that we should support the amendment as proposed.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I too will be brief. This question is one which not only interests but also affects me. I am not particularly concerned about the legal angles in the matter. The justice of a cause always determines its legality, so far as I am concerned, whether statutory provision is made or not.

I disagreed strongly with the settlement of the dispute in the way it was settled. I grew up with the trade union movement. The many lawyers in the house will stand by their principles, but my whole life was spent in the development of the trade union movement. The principles laid down during the course of that development are things I have not forgotten and from which I will not back away very quickly. Those principles were established when there were no high salaried officials in the movement. The men who built up these organizations built them up on the basis of principle, and they fought for them. One of the things that we were always strongly opposed to was compulsory arbitration.

When we were called in in September and faced with a strike of Canadian National Railways employees, a strike that disrupted the whole economy of the country, we had to deal with a most serious matter. In my opinion that is something that should not have been allowed to develop. I think the government had the power to settle a strike of that kind by negotiating in the regular way through collective bargaining. I think the thing was badly bungled when it developed into a stoppage on that transportation system.

When we came to the house and the bill was introduced, as far as I was concerned there was no argument that could be advanced to convince me that it was necessary to settle the strike in that way. It had got into a bad mess, nevertheless there was another way in which it could have been settled. A controller could have been appointed to work out by regular collective bargaining methods an agreement that would be suitable to all. We violated a principle that is deeply rooted in the trade union movement.

But we did something else; we divided the employees who were involved in that dispute. The pattern of bringing together workers in one industry in the largest possible unit for bargaining purposes is a principle that has been developed over the years. That principle was adopted by the organized workers of this country largely because of what management itself had done. In early days industry absorbed smaller companies and formed them into large units. The argument was used that by concentrating industry in larger units, by absorbing local management and placing everything under one head, a more economical way of operating and managing the industry was achieved. It was contended that overlapping and duplication of services was avoided. Industry began to get bigger and bigger with smaller and smaller groups of management. In order to meet and bargain with industry with some degree of power, this principle was adopted by the labour movement and they organized on an industrial basis with all the workers in a given industry in the one unit. Agreements were worked out that were fair to the employees of the whole industry rather than to work them out section by section on a craft basis.

The railroad workers did not get together overnight the 126,000 employees affected by the agreement. It took them years to bring in the railroad and water transport workers and include them in an over-all agreement and work out some degree of uniformity in the wage rates. They accomplished something when that was done. I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) speak and I thought that the bill which he described was going to preserve unity, at least for the workers involved in the agreement, and that they were going to be treated as one unit. I was rather surprised when the justice of the supreme court made the decision that segregated 9,000 workers from the agreement. I was surprised that the organization itself accepted the agreement that put to one side 9,000 workers who had been included in the previous agreement when the strike took place.

I think great injustice was done. We can talk all day about the legality of the thing, but in my opinion the injustice is that 9,000 workers who were under the agreement were discriminated against and the one bargaining unit which had been built up over the years was disrupted. It was a backward step in my opinion for that organization to have that group of workers segregated from their agreement. If there was any doubt in the mind of the arbitrator as to what the government meant when the bill was enacted, there was no doubt in our minds. I think every member of this house interpreted the bill to mean that the railway workers were going to remain intact as one bargaining unit and that whatever agreement was arrived at would be applicable to all the employees involved in the dispute. If hon. members of this house think that that was the intention of the government, then the thing for us to do is to correct matters by accepting this amendment.

The argument that has been advanced over the years by the railroads has been that they were not making any money. Canadian National Railways were able to show definitely that they had deficits of $45 million a year and the taxpayers of this country were paying that bill. I reiterate what I have said many times in this house, that that deficit of the Canadian National Railways was made up largely of interest on bonds with which the system should not be saddled. But despite all that we find that last year Canadian National Railways made a very good showing; they carried the load and wiped out the deficit with the exception of $3 million. There can be no argument on the basis of income as far as either the C.P.R. or the C.N.R. is concerned that they should not include the 9,000 workers who have been kept outside the agreement. They made money last year.

I suggest that the members of this house realize that an injustice was done. The money involved in straightening out that agreement would be quite small. I think we should tell the railroad workers that we feel that there was an error on the part of those who finalized this agreement, that the intentions of parliament under the bill were not carried out, and we are now instructing them to reform the bargaining unit and to make the increases given to one section of employees applicable to the 9,000 workers who were left outside the agreement.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say on this matter. When the house met on August 30 I commended the government very highly for including the hotel and water transport personnel in the bill that they presented to parliament. In keeping them as a unit I thought there had been a very considerable achievement. I was under the impression that they were all going to be treated alike. I was unnaturally surprised when I read the judgment. I cannot add anything more to what has been said already except to quote the words of a middle bencher during the last debate to be found on page 41 of Hansard of August 30, 1950, as follows:

> It is true that compulsion can force the parties to submit to a given procedure. It may even force them to accept unwillingly certain results. But I think this house knows very well that forced obedience generates resistance and hostility. Far from being a cure, it is a source of further conflict and it multiplies strife instead of preventing it. Compulsion never removes the cause of the strife. Forced obedience against the will of those concerned sows the seeds of bitterness and resentment and in the end aggravates the very condition it was sought to cure.

I do not like being in the position where I can stand up and say, "I told you so," but I did tell you so.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there have been perhaps seven or eight members who have spoken in support of the amendment, while on this side of the house we have heard but one voice raised in opposition to the amendment. That was the voice of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and he has given ample reason why this amendment should be voted down by the house.

I do not intend to speak for very long; I do not need to do so, after having listened very carefully to the remarks of the Prime Minister immediately following those of the mover of the amendment. I would like to add this word, however. Much stress is placed upon the similarity of interest that existed at the time of the dispute and still exists between the hotel and water transport workers on the one hand and the railway workers on the other. I could have asked the mover of the amendment whether those two groups have much more in common than the fact that they work for the same management. I could have asked whether it was not true that as far as the hotel workers of the Canadian Pacific Railway were concerned, because of the character of their industry they could not claim to come under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and consequently were not involved in the dispute or in the award later made by Mr. Justice Kellock. To my mind this shows that these two groups belong to basically different industries. They happen to be linked together by the identity of the employer on the one hand and on the other by the identity of the bargaining unit to which they belong. In the mind of the government and of parliament, which approved the proposal of the government last August, the hotel and water transport workers were not really engaged in an industry which it was essential to have resumed at that time by an act of parliament. As the Prime Minister said this afternoon, it was only because of the fact that they belonged to the same bargaining unit that parliament thought it would be preferable not to have anything done that would amount to discrimination, in order not to jeopardize the fulfilment of the provision of the act which had to do with the resumption of operations.

My hon. friend will understand that had we legislated only for the resumption of operations by the railways there would have been grave doubts whether the railway workers would have obeyed such an order, if by so doing they might think they were being disloyal toward their brother workers of the other categories. It was only to discharge the obligation placed upon this parliament by section 91 of the British North America Act that parliament intervened to safeguard the peace, order and good government of this country and restore an essential service.

Personally I am of the opinion that the great mass of railway workers in this country are completely satisfied with the award of Mr. Justice Kellock, judging by the very few grievances that have been sent to the Department of Labour since that time by the local unions, the ordinary workers in the country. The riding I represent has perhaps a majority of railway workers. Judging from the reaction to this award in my own riding, I am quite satisfied that the very great majority of railway workers approved it. So I see no very good reason, based on the merits of the case, why parliament should intervene again in order to modify in any way the award of Mr. Justice Kellock. I do not say the hotel workers would not be justified in trying to bargain for more than they are getting, and they will have the opportunity to do so. When their contract terminates they may follow the usual negotiation procedure; and as the Prime Minister said, there is no reason why they should not try to get better working conditions and rates of pay if they so desire. At this time, however, parliament should not intervene because the reasons which justified the intervention of parliament last fall no longer exist.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has not the right of reply in moving an amendment.

Mr. Knowles: That is correct. I know that the mover of an amendment has no right to reply. But I was asking if I could put a question to the hon. member before he concluded his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Knowles: Whatever may have been the circumstances that threw these two groups together, and whatever may be the size of the smaller group, does not the hon. member think the promise made to them on the floor of parliament last fall should be carried out?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The only interpretation I can place upon the statement which has been quoted several times this afternoon, that both groups would be treated as a unit, is that this was the only basis which would justify parliament in passing an act ordering the resumption of work by both groups. Parliament could have passed an act having to do only with the railway workers; but in order to do away with any excuse the railway workers might have had for not resuming operations because of their fellow workers being left out in the cold, as it were, the groups were joined together and one act of parliament was passed to apply to both. But I say the words of the Prime Minister at that time cannot be interpreted as a direction to Mr. Justice Kellock to treat both groups as a unit. They were intended to show that the groups were being treated as a unit in the formulation of policy by the government, in the bill that was presented, and in the determination of the questions which were to be submitted to the arbitrator, and that was all. From then on the arbitrator was a free man in a free democracy, to find as his conscience and intellect might dictate.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): The hon. member for Verdun-La Salle (Mr. Cote) has said he sees no reason for interfering with this award. I say that if there were nothing else, the very fact that this is a small group would be one paramount reason we should feel that it is up to this parliament to reconsider this matter. Much was said by the hon. member as to the interpretation to be placed upon the words uttered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) last year. At page 75 of Hansard for August 30, 1950, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is recorded as having said, with reference to the treatment of the hotel and water workers:

> They are not being discriminated against in any mended to parliament, has treated them in the same way as the other unions, namely, as one unit; and way. The government, in the bill which it recom- everything that binds the arbitrator with respect to any one binds him as much with respect to those two small groups as it does to the others.

I think it is significant, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) was apparently under the impression that the Prime Minister's words definitely included the hotel and water transport workers.

I have here a newspaper report of the award published after it was made. It deals at some length with the impression that had been abroad that what was said in the commons carried implications that went further than the statute, including the words of the Prime Minister. I quote from the article:

> Explaining the inclusion of the hotel and water employees in the statutory award, Mr. St. Laurent told the house:

This is the quotation in the newspaper report, Mr. Speaker, and although I have not found it in Hansard I do not doubt that it was copied from Hansard. This appears in the Globe and Mail of December 20, 1950.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, these words are in quotes in this article, and I do not doubt but that they were copied faithfully from Hansard.

> It was represented to us that all these unions were banded together for the promotion of a common cause and that it would appear to them that any action that was taken which did not apply to all of them and to which any of them submitted would be regarded as a betrayal of some of those who had banded together for the promotion of a common cause. That was something which it was said would appear to them to be wrong for any parliament to ask them to do. In drawing our legislation, we reluctantly came to the conclusion that that was a feeling which probably existed in the breasts of the men themselves and which it would not be politic to attempt to override.

Mr. Speaker, that was the impression which every member of this house had when those words were spoken. There was a full attendance in this house. We all sat and listened, and that was our impression. We were as surprised and disappointed as the men were when the report of the arbitrator was brought down. There are many groups in this country who have suffered because of this award. I have reference in particular to one group, the international brotherhood of blacksmiths, drop forgers and helpers. Some of the members of this union are working in the dockyards in British Columbia, and they are classed as water workers, while their fellows who do identical work in the railroad yards are classed as rail workers. It is not right. I feel it was not the intention of this house. I honestly do not feel it was the intention of the Prime Minister when he spoke those words in the house at the time the matter was under consideration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment of the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Knowles) which was negatived on the following division:

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

2. That the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs, that are at present subject to the rate of fifteen per cent be increased to twenty-five per cent.

3. That the excise tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy, be reduced from thirty to fifteen per cent.

4. That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels;

(b) washing machines operated by electric or other power;

(c) electric, gas or kerosene refrigerators and freezing equipment and complete parts therefor including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

5. That the excise tax on cigarette papers and cigarette paper tubes be repealed.

6. That the excise tax on the following goods be increased by the amounts shown:

(a) for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package, three-quarters of one cent;

(b) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of manufactured tobacco, including snuff but not including cigars and cigarettes, contained in any package, three cents;

(c) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption in Canada, three-quarters of one cent.

7. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) cortisone;

(b) adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH).

8. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eleventh day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-one.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take the time of the committee going over the ground again with regard to the arguments for and against the sales tax—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —except to say—

Mr. Graydon: You asked for it, and you got it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —that what three weeks ago was in the realm of prediction with regard to what would happen, now is quite clearly in the realm of fact. It has become clear that the effect of this tax is going to be to raise prices, and therefore the argument which was used against it, as I say, already is confirmed by the fact. But what I rise really to do, Mr. Chairman, is before this vote is taken—and here I am really following to some extent what the hon. member for Red Deer said yesterday—to remind the committee of the device which has been used by the government majority to prevent free expression of opinion in this committee on this question. We have here the excise tax items, eight in all. The sensible thing to do, as was pointed out, is to consider them seriatim; but that would have removed from the government one advantage which they saw in dealing with them together.

If they had dealt with them seriatim, if the first one had to be voted on by itself, then, as the hon. member for Red Deer pointed out yesterday, a good many Liberal members would have been in great difficulty.

Mr. Abbott: They can vote on them when they come to the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will come to that. That is the point which the minister made. I noted that point with great interest the other night, and I will do him the honour of referring to it before I am through. I just wanted to say that, as the hon. member for Red Deer made very clear yesterday, I have no doubt that a great many Liberal members of this house are finding exactly what those of us who are not Liberal members are finding, namely, that the voters in our constituencies are very much opposed to this increase in the sales tax. I imagine that voters in other constituencies represented by Liberals have the same kind of stomachs that voters in Conservative or other opposition ridings have. I imagine they have bodies that need the same kind of clothes to warm them, and we may hope that when the next election comes around they will have the same kind of heads.

I just want to point out that I think this device is an unworthy and rather a shabby one, taking away the right of free expression. I think that if somehow it could be vividly brought to the minds of the voters they would disapprove of it very much. I was interested to observe that the Minister of Finance said that when we came to the measure on the sales tax we would then have a certain number of sections which we could vote for or against. That seemed to me a curious argument, because—

Mr. Abbott: When we come to the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes. I thought that was a curious argument because it seemed to me that, whereas at that time we shall be able to have this one item split into several clauses so that we may give our views on each one, now we have quite a lot of other things thrown into one pot so that we may deal with them together. Of course the argument of Liberal members will be perfectly obvious. They will say: What did you want us to do with regard to the reduction of the excise tax on candy? Did you not want us to vote for that? Surely, you did not want us to vote against that. Well, if we did vote for it we had to vote for the whole lot together.

That is really the point that I wish to bring forward. I think that is a shabby and unworthy way of dealing with this thing, as was pointed out the other day. Apart from all other reasons, we really have made ourselves look silly by cruising over the ground backwards and forwards, and now we have to give this vote, which I say is a very unreal vote, because a great many people are going to vote with their hands tied.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps now is as good a time as any to give a further explanation on the question that was raised the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and again today by the hon. member for Greenwood, namely, this matter of considering a resolution of this type seriatim. This question of procedure was settled the other day on the motion moved by the leader of the opposition, which motion was negatived. Some surprise has been expressed as to why, when we study clauses of bills seriatim, the same cannot be done when considering a resolution of this kind. Let me dispose of this one point by quoting standing order 76, which says:

> In proceedings in committee of the whole house upon bills, the preamble is first postponed, and then every clause considered by the committee in its proper order; the preamble and title to be last considered.

Citation 774 in Beauchesne, second edition, at page 222, says:

> The bill is considered clause by clause. The chairman usually calls out the number of each clause, and reads the marginal note but he should give the clause at length when it is demanded by the committee. Each clause is a distinct question and must be separately discussed. When a clause has been agreed to it is irregular to discuss it again on the consideration of another clause.

Therefore it is clear that the reason for proceeding clause by clause in committee on a bill is that it is so set out in standing order 76. Hon. members will agree that this matter of what is referred to as a complicated question is an important one. Since it was raised the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—as a matter of fact, it was on Thursday last—opportunity has been had to study the problem with some care, and I am now prepared to give a further explanation.

In the first place, it is my view that what is before the committee is a single resolution. As hon. members know, under our practice a taxing bill cannot be introduced until a resolution has first been considered in the committee of ways and means. The present motion is a single resolution anticipatory of a number of tax changes to be contained in a bill amending the Excise Tax Act.

To say that the resolution before the committee is a single resolution does not of course dispose of the question. It may be argued that since the resolution is composed of a number of distinct propositions it is open to any member to require that each proposition be put separately. In this connection, reliance has been placed on a passage in Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, at page 298, which seems open to the construction that a difference exists between complicated questions and questions containing two or more distinct propositions. However, the authorities which Bourinot quotes indicate that a so-called "complicated question" is one which contains a number of separate propositions which are capable of being divided, and that, although a member does not have the right to insist that they be so divided, a motion to that effect would be in order.

I think perhaps I should quote at some length from Hatsell, upon whom Bourinot relies. The following appears in his "Precedents", volume 2, at pages 118-121. It is rather lengthy, and I would ask hon. members to remain as silent as possible, so that they may give their attention to this very important quotation, which says:

> When a question is complicated, that is, consists of two or more propositions, it has been often said, that it is the right of any one member to have it divided, in order that he may give his opinion upon each proposition separately. This was a very favourite topic with Mr. George Grenville, and often repeated by him, and at last insisted upon so much, in the question about the Middlesex election, on the 16th of February, 1770, that it was thought necessary to take the sense of the house upon it; which was done by a question, and carried in the negative, on the 19th of February: so that this matter is now at rest. Upon this occasion, every thing was urged that could be said in favour of the doctrine, as laid down by Mr. Grenville; but the truth is, there does not appear the smallest trace, in the history of the proceedings of either house of parliament, of this ever having been the practice; indeed, it would introduce universal confusion; for who is to decide whether a question is complicated or not?—"where" it is complicated?—into how many propositions it may be divided? Perhaps, when the question was formed by the Speaker from the debate, and not moved by a member, it was a very proper objection to the manner of the Speaker's stating a question, that it was complicated, and to desire that he would separate it; and to this and this only, every thing that is said in the case of Ashby and White, and in the other debates, may be referred: But when a question is moved and seconded, and proposed from the chair, however complicated it may be, the only mode of separating it, is by moving amendments to it; and these must be decided by the house, upon a question: unless, which sometimes happens, that the house "order" that it shall be divided, as they did in that very instance of the 19th of February; and on the 2nd of June, 1795; or by "consent" of the house, as on the 25th of January, 1771; the 9th of April, 1772; and in Lord Clive's case, on the 21st of May, 1773. Indeed, the doctrine of any one member having a "right" to insist upon anything, appears to be absurd; for another member may insist upon the contrary; and therefore, in all cases whatever,—

And I insist upon these last few words.

> —the only method of deciding whether anything shall, or shall not, be done, or how it shall be done, must be by moving a question to the house, that question to be seconded, and proposed from the chair, and the sense of the house taken upon it.

Cushing, another author, in his "Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, 1874", at pages 528 and 529, defines a complicated question as one which contains a number of distinct propositions and which is severable by motion but not on demand. And the fifteenth edition of May recites at page 391 that the right of individual members to insist on the division of resolutions in committees of the whole house has never been recognized in England.

In view of the foregoing, it is my ruling that when a single resolution containing several distinct propositions is before the committee of ways and means, it cannot be divided at the instance of any individual member, although a motion to so divide the resolution would be in order. It is for the committee to decide whether any particular resolution should be so divided. In so ruling, I am not unmindful of the fact that very often there is great convenience in proceeding severally with the various propositions embraced within a single resolution. However, as I have said, this is for the committee, and not the chairman, to decide.

I thought I should put this lengthy ruling on the record, because it clears up the question of whether a member as a matter of right has the privilege of asking that a question be divided, and also the point that this matter is not one for the chairman to decide, but that it must be done by a motion moved by a member.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question based upon the ruling just given? Before asking the question, however, perhaps I might be pardoned for expressing the hope that in future discussions on points of order some of the rest of us will not be criticized if we bring forward citations from 1875 or 1800, or even back as far as 1770.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have done it before.

Mr. Abbott: So long as they are good, we like to have them.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, but at times I have produced precedents from much more recent years only to be told that I have had to go a long way back. The question I wish to ask is this: Do you regard the motion of last Thursday, which the house rejected that day, as binding upon all succeeding days; or do you regard that as a motion covering only the procedure of that day? The point is this, that on Thursday last the house decided, by a vote, that it would not deal with this resolution paragraph by paragraph.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Abbott: We said that.

Mr. Knowles: It settled it for that day, but does it settle it for today or does it settle it for succeeding days? Would Your Honour accept a motion now to consider this resolution—today—paragraph by paragraph? It seems to me that at some stage it might be a good idea to find a way in which to make some progress with this matter. I am sure that the government must be rather annoyed that this debate goes on day after day and when the end of the day comes no progress has been made.

Mr. Abbott: Would my hon. friend permit me to ask a question? If this resolution had been drawn, as it might well have been, with no numbered paragraphs but with commas or semicolons between the different items, as resolutions that appear on the order paper often are, how would he have framed his motion?

Mr. Knowles: I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he and I should not talk about commas. Let us leave commas and periods to two of his fellow ministers.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member permit me to reply to his question now? The motion that was moved the other day cannot apply to any other resolution but the one to amend the Excise Tax Act. The vote that was taken is binding as long as the excise tax resolution is before the committee because that was the judgment of the house. Of course, the committee can always change its decision by unanimous consent. This would not prevent an hon. member moving a motion, for instance, that the resolution dealing with the Income Tax Act be divided. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. Knowles: I accept it as your answer. May I make a suggestion? In doing this I hope it will be appreciated that I am really holding out an olive branch. I will not be surprised if other members of the opposition do not agree with the suggestion I intend to make. The majority of the house has decided that we are not to deal with this resolution paragraph by paragraph. Obviously the purpose of that is that we will not vote on it paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. Abbott: No it is not.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute.

Mr. Abbott: It is to follow the correct rules.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute; when I am throwing out an olive branch, it might be a good idea to wait and see what I have to offer. Would it be possible to have unanimous consent that we organize our discussion paragraph by paragraph, even though we do not vote at the end of each section, but only when the whole resolution is concluded?

Mr. Abbott: I think we have taken up a little too much time with this procedural argument. This resolution relates to a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act, which involves various commodity taxes. They are all the same type of tax although on different commodities. I submit that any member of the house should be free at any time when this resolution is under discussion to refer to any of these taxes. One hon. member may be interested in the sales tax and another may be interested in the candy tax and not interested in any other. My suggestion is that it is much more logical and appropriate and fairer that all hon. members should have the right, as long as this resolution is under discussion, to refer to any of the commodity taxes which are involved in it.

That is my suggestion for the consideration of the committee. Other considerations may apply in connection with other resolutions, and I take no position on that. I think it is completely logical, I think it is completely proper, where we are dealing with a resolution which imposes commodity taxes alone, that any hon. member should be free to talk about any item that is included in the resolution.

Mr. Knowles: I am amazed at the position taken by the Minister of Finance. I have never heard that position taken before. I ask him to face this fact. On each day that this resolution has been before the committee, when the end of the day has come it has been impossible to measure whether or not we have made any progress.

Mr. Abbott: May I say that that is not the fault of the minister or his parliamentary assistant.

The Deputy Chairman: May I suggest that perhaps we have discussed this question of procedure at sufficient length and that we should continue with a study of the merits of the resolution.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I think I have about three minutes left and I do not propose to waste those three minutes. I have been giving a lot of consideration to the minister's budget statement and I have also been giving a good deal of consideration to what my constituents are telling me. They say to me, "We are opposed to the commodity taxes that the minister has suggested he will impose as a result of his budget and we want you to oppose those taxes." I realize that some people would oppose anything, but I think the people in the country have good reason for opposing these taxes.

Surely we have to be sensitive to the will of the people. I propose to be sensitive to their demands, especially if they have good cause or if there is something behind them. When the minister was explaining in his budget speech why he had decided to impose certain commodity taxes he said that he wanted to establish as nearly as possible a balance as between income tax, on the one hand, and commodity taxes on the other. He said that was one reason why he had decided to get something like $100 million out of the sales tax, and probably from $15 million to $25 million out of the special excise taxes and so on.

At various times since the budget was brought down either the minister or his parliamentary assistant has said that if we had other ideas about where he might get the revenue we ought to bring them forward. In the short time that I have I propose to place before the minister at least one alternative to which he could have turned to get the revenue he will require this year, and perhaps one or two others.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: With respect to the not too remarkable rate of progress we have been making for the last few days it has occurred to some of us that it might be wise to determine in advance what we propose to do next week, and that by doing that in advance it might be hoped that better results will be achieved. I understand from the representatives of the three groups that it would suit their convenience and the convenience of members of their groups if on Monday we took up as the first order of business a motion by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to refer his estimates to the committee on external affairs. I have no doubt that there may be some general debate on external affairs, but I would hope it can be completed in the course of the day. The estimates of that department could then be referred to the committee on external affairs and the committee could get down to its usual work.

Then on Tuesday we would take up the defence estimates. Tuesday is a day when we have to make a motion to go into supply; but we would make that motion not for the purpose of opening any new departments, but merely for the purpose of getting into committee of supply and discussing the defence estimates on Tuesday and Wednesday. If that met the wishes or feelings of all hon. members, I think it would be desirable to have those two important topics debated during the first days of next week.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue the study of the budget resolutions. If those pass we will take up the resolutions in the name of the Prime Minister concerning Laurier house and Kingsmere park; then bill No. 79, respecting Indians. If we have time left we will take up Bills Nos. 191, 192 and 195.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 3, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DOMINION ARSENALS—LONGUEUIL, QUE.

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Has the government sold or leased all, or any portion of the dominion arsenal at Longueuil, Quebec?
2. Is the government negotiating any such sale or lease?
3. If so, to whom, and under what terms?
4. Has any action been taken to dispose of any other arsenals in Canada?
5. If so, what action?
6. What disposition will be made, if any, of the personnel affected?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No.

2. A lease is being negotiated.

3. Sorel Industries Limited, Sorel, Quebec, to form part of the over-all operations required in the production of guns and gun equipment. The use of the Longueuil plant will form part of the over-all operations required. The terms of the lease have not yet been fully determined.

4. No action has been taken to dispose of any other arsenals in Canada. However, the arsenal at Valleyfield, Quebec, is under a management contract to Defence Industries Limited, a subsidiary of Canadian Industries Limited. This contract was arranged by Canadian Arsenals Limited. A small government-owned chemical plant at Canadian Industries Limited, Shawinigan, Quebec, is also being reactivated under the management of Defence Industries Limited.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. Personnel will not be affected, as the present staff is expected to remain and additional personnel will be needed.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What have been the federal government's revenues from imported and domestic alcoholic beverages in (a) 1950; (b) 1945; (c) 1939?
2. What was the distribution of these beverages, by provinces, in the same years?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Excise revenues, import duties and revenue from licences and fees on alcoholic beverages.

Note.—There are certain additional revenues for which details cannot be shown. Sales tax revenue is not available for separate commodities. As regards income tax, no analysis is made of actual income tax collections as detailed information about the taxpayer is not given at the time payment is made. Income tax returns filed by corporations engaged in the production of alcoholic beverages showed a declared tax liability for the taxation years 1945 and 1949 (latest available) as follows: Taxation year 1945: income tax, $9,644,000; excess profits tax, $27,095,000.

Taxation year 1949: income tax, $19,082,000; excess profits tax, nil.

Similar information for taxation year 1939 is not available.

CIVIL SERVICE—APPOINTMENTS AND RELEASES

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many employees of all classifications, including permanent and temporary civil servants and all other appointments outside the civil service, including also crown companies but excluding service personnel in the defence department have been taken on in the government service from the 1st of May, 1945, to date?

2. What is the total number of releases for all categories covered by question No. 1 during the same period?

Mr. Bradley: I understand the hon. member proposes to amend this question; therefore I suggest that in its present form it should be dropped.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest that it be allowed to stand, and I will try to reword it.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

JAPANESE PROPERTY CLAIMS COMMISSION—EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

What fees, travelling and other expenses were paid to all individuals who represented the government in connection with the Japanese property claims commission?

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION—PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total paid by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?

2. What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of over $25,000 under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total paid by the Department of Justice for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?

2. What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of over $5,000 under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEVEN ISLANDS, QUE.—NEWFOUNDLAND WORKERS ON RAILWAY LINE TO IRON ORE DEPOSITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Is the Minister of Labour aware of labour troubles involving Newfoundland workmen engaged in the construction of the railway line from Seven Islands, Quebec, to the iron ore deposits?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was kind enough to let me have advance notice of this question. I must tell him I am not aware of any circumstances which would have brought dissatisfaction to the Newfoundland workers engaged on the railway line from Seven Islands to the iron ore deposits.

Our national employment service has no local office at Seven Islands as yet. For several months consideration has been given to the opening of an office there. The required authority from the civil service commission has been secured. The Department of Public Works has been requested to provide the necessary accommodations for the staff. The project is being delayed, however, owing to the fact that there is no particular site at Seven Islands which could be rented or purchased for the local office. The possibility of moving in a prefabricated general purpose hut is now being explored.

When our employment service operates at Seven Islands it will be its policy to provide equitable distribution of jobs as between workers from Quebec and workers from the Atlantic region.

EDUCATION

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL AID TO UNIVERSITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement in Saturday Night and elsewhere that all Canadian universities are fully agreed that if federal aid is not forthcoming they cannot maintain the present high level of education, can we expect legislation at this session which would have as its object the provision of such aid?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry that at this time I cannot give a short, positive answer to the hon. member. As hon. members are aware, the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences probably will be dealing with the subject of the needs of the universities and their relationship with the federal government. The government naturally will want to consider the recommendations of the royal commission before reaching any decision on this matter. I might add that in a speech at the university of Toronto on October 27 of last year I referred to this matter in the following words:

> I think many of us recognize increasingly that some means must be found to ensure to our universities the financial capacity to perform the many services which are required in the interest of the whole nation.

I then turned to Mr. Massey, who is the chancellor of the university, and expressed the hope that his commission would "be able to help us to find a proper solution of that difficult problem." I am advised that the commission is doing everything it can to expedite the presentation of its report.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I venture to say to the Prime Minister that, whether he intended it or not by that speech, he aroused high hopes on the part of the Canadian universities.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think that all Canadians would like to see hopes raised as to the possibility of the Canadian universities continuing to fulfil in this country the role that is of such great national importance.

Mr. Blackmore: May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, based on the question of state aid to universities? May I ask the Prime Minister if, in his opinion, it is physically possible for Canada to provide the universities with the needs or requirements which would enable them to carry on?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that question requires any answer.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask another supplementary question? If it is physically possible for Canada to supply the needs of the universities, is there any conceivable reason why it should not be made financially possible?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am surprised to hear that kind of question from an adherent of social credit policies.

Mr. Blackmore: I have one more question.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member to reserve his question for another occasion?

GRAIN

QUESTION AS TO INITIAL PRICES FOR WESTERN WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY FOR 1951 CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. My question arises out of the fact that spring seeding operations are about to start on the prairies and that there is need for the farmers to know in advance the initial prices, in order that they may be able to decide what acreage to seed. My question is this: Can the minister state when an announcement will be made of the initial prices of wheat, oats and barley for the 1951 crop year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Consideration is being given to the initial prices for wheat, oats and barley, and I am hopeful that an announcement can be made within the next two weeks.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES

INQUIRY AS TO RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Is the government giving consideration to the re-establishment of the plant known as Research Enterprises during world war II, or to the establishment of any plant to carry on defence projects similar to those carried on by Research Enterprises?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The work of Research Enterprises has been carried on on the same site by Canadian Arsenals Limited. Production, of course, has been on a smaller scale than that carried on during the last war, but the equipment for radar work and for optical work has been retained. Work in electronics has been carried on but on a much reduced scale. At the moment the operation is being expanded to meet present requirements, and the floor space is being supplemented by a new building, now under construction, especially designed for the assembly of early-warning radar sets.

COST OF LIVING

STATEMENT WITH REGARD TO INDEX AS AT APRIL 2, 1951

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the cost of living index as at April 2, 1951.

Ordinarily this announcement would be made through the newspapers by the dominion bureau of statistics. But in view of the fact that we have just concluded a debate on the cost of living and are still debating the budget resolutions, I thought it appropriate to make this month's announcement in the house.

I shall first read the announcement prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics, and then I shall make a few comments about the price of butter, which accounted for most of the change.

The following is the text of the dominion bureau of statistics official announcement:

The dominion bureau of statistics cost of living index advanced from 179·7 to 181·8 between March 1 and April 2. Nearly one-half of this increase of 1·2 per cent, or 2·1 points, was accounted for by butter which moved to high levels during the latter half of March and the early part of April, and then dropped sharply. The balance of the increase was largely due to other foods, clothing, home furnishings and miscellaneous items. The food index rose from 233·9 to 238·4. There were numerous but slight increases in foods other than butter, although decreases were registered for eggs, pork, and fresh vegetables. The clothing index moved from 196·3 to 198·8 following advances in men's wear and footwear. Increases throughout home furnishings were sufficient to raise the index of home furnishings and services from 188·6 to 190·7. The miscellaneous index advanced from 137·8 to 138·8 as a result of higher indexes for personal care, transportation and theatre admissions. Higher prices in some centres for coke and electricity raised the fuel and light index from 146·5 to 146·7. Rents were not surveyed during April and the rent index remained unchanged at 137·6.

In the course of a speech in this house on April 9 during the debate on the cost of living, I said that "a preliminary survey of March prices indicates that the index will hold about even during March, or at the worst show an increase for that month of not more than one-half of one per cent". Actually the increase was, as I have already announced, a little more than one per cent.

The forecast of a smaller increase in the cost of living index between March 1 and April 2, anticipated a more rapid decrease in the price of butter than occurred. It was expected that butter prices would fall from the high point reached during the latter half of March to an April 2 price which would have been very close to the March 1 price. Actually, while the April 2 price was well below the March high, it was not until the second week of April that prices had again fallen to March 1 levels. If the mid-April price for butter had been established by April 2, the cost of living index for that date would have shown an increase of less than one-half of one per cent.

Thus, this latest cost of living index increase was largely due to an increase in the price of a commodity which is now selling below the level of two months ago.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that hon. members will welcome the fact that this announcement was made in the house, with certain explanations. In view of the fact that it has been made, may I ask the minister if it is his intention to exercise the powers which he sought under the Emergency Powers Act for the specific purpose of dealing with this problem.

Mr. Howe: The specific powers sought and obtained from this house in the defence production bill were related to preventing war buying from interfering with domestic distribution. The power is being applied in all basic war materials: the iron and steel schedules, the non-ferrous metal schedule, the chemical schedules and the pulp and paper schedules. I can assure the house that there has been no price increase to domestic consumers in those fields as a result of war buying. I suggest to the house that the rise in the price of butter was not owing to war buying.

Mr. Drew: It seems to me that the Minister of Trade and Commerce misunderstood the question I asked. I was referring to the reason he gave for the extraordinarily wide powers under the Emergency Powers Act. When he introduced that measure and explained that he had been responsible for its drafting, he also explained that much wider powers were needed in order that, in addition to the control of supplies, he would then have the power to deal with prices as well.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, I must correct the memory of the leader of the opposition. The Emergency Powers Act to which he referred was introduced in the name of the Prime Minister, and was sponsored in this house by the Minister of Justice. I made no statement whatever on the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Obviously the dominion bureau of statistics makes important forecasts. Has it made any forecast of the effect of new taxation on the cost of living in the coming months?

Mr. Howe: No. I might explain that the statement I made in the house on April 9 was a forecast of the April 2 position, and made at my request. I realize now that it was unfair to have asked for that forecast at the time because the bureau of statistics had not collected the data. The bureau gave me a running estimate from the situation as they saw it at the time. I have asked them for a statement of the effect of the new taxation on the cost of living index, and they advise me that they are quite unable to make such an estimate.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the figure given for April 2 includes any adjustment with respect to rents in the month of March?

Mr. Howe: I said in my statement that no study had been made of the price implication of rentals. Such a study will be made in June. They are made every three months.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the rental increase is not reflected in the index except once every three months?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: April does not include any change. Has there been any change in recent months in the basis of computing the rental index?

Mr. Howe: No, there has been no change in the basis of the index.

HOGS

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO ISSUE OF PERMITS FOR EXPORT TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, and because I have been questioned with regard to the matter on a number of occasions during the session, I think I should announce here what will come out within the next few hours, namely, the decision to issue permits for the shipment of live hogs to the United States.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

ROUTE BETWEEN ST. BONIFACE AND ONTARIO BOUNDARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Following the visit of the minister and the deputy minister of public works of Manitoba, has that province submitted for approval the shortest practical route for the construction of the trans-Canada highway in the eastern part of Manitoba between St. Boniface and the Ontario boundary?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): While the hon. member for St. Boniface referred to the visit of the minister and deputy minister of public works of Manitoba, I think I should say that the visit was not to me. I did not see them on the occasion of their visit. I can say, however, that at the time the agreement was signed between the federal government and the government of Manitoba, the route between the Manitoba-Ontario boundary and Winnipeg was left pending until the provincial government had an opportunity to make further surveys. To the best of my knowledge, these surveys have not been completed; at any rate, the government of Manitoba has not communicated their suggested route to us.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Dion in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

2. That the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs, that are at present subject to the rate of fifteen per cent be increased to twenty-five per cent.

3. That the excise tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy, be reduced from thirty to fifteen per cent.

4. That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels;

(b) washing machines operated by electric or other power;

(c) electric, gas or kerosene refrigerators and freezing equipment and complete parts therefor including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

5. That the excise tax on cigarette papers and cigarette paper tubes be repealed.

6. That the excise tax on the following goods be increased by the amounts shown:

(a) for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package, three-quarters of one cent;

(b) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of manufactured tobacco, including snuff but not including cigars and cigarettes, contained in any package, three cents;

(c) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption in Canada, three-quarters of one cent.

7. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) cortisone;

(b) adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH).

8. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eleventh day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-one.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Low: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just made a statement indicating that the cost of living index has gone up during the past month by 2⅒ points. By way of explanation he says that it was because of the unusual advance in the price of butter in March. If I remember correctly, Mr. Chairman, the dominion bureau of statistics figures usually show butter and butter substitutes together. I wondered, although I did not take the trouble to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he made his statement, whether butter and other butter substitutes would not be considered as part of that whole effect which he says butter had on the cost of living. I do know that margarine made quite serious advances in price during that month, and kept quite even with butter in April.

There is one other comment that I should like to make with respect to the things I want to say about the budget resolution. It is this. When the full impact of the budget is made clear, let us say in a period of six weeks or two months, I am satisfied that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have to show a much poorer picture than he was able to show today. From all that has been said here during the time that we have been discussing the budget and the budget resolutions, all that has been said by the minister and his parliamentary assistant, it is clear, to me at any rate, that the government thinks it is essential to increase the sales tax by twenty-five per cent, and to levy a fifteen per cent excise tax on such things as stoves, washing machines, refrigerators and other household electric equipment, in order to get revenue for the defence effort.

These taxes are designed for one purpose only, namely, to get revenue, in spite of the fact that the immediate effect of their imposition is to add to the already serious inflation that devastates the people of Canada, and has been doing so for some time. I shall not waste the time of the committee by repeating the arguments that I and many others have already put forward, and put on the record, concerning the adverse effect of these taxes, especially on young people who are trying to get themselves established, and all those who have to exist on fixed incomes as well as those in the lower income brackets.

We have made known the reasons for our opposition to the sales and excise taxes, and it will not be necessary for me to repeat the arguments now. I do fear, however, that very soon the country will be faced with demands from all organized groups for another round of wage increases. If further wage increases are granted, the cost of living will jump to new extremes. If, on the other hand, the increases are not granted, and especially if no effort is made to curb spiralling costs, along with the denial of further wage increases, the workers and producers of Canada can hardly be expected to feel like working harder and longer, as the minister warns they will have to do.

Let me say right here, Mr. Chairman, that I agree with the minister on that point. There is no way that I can see whereby production can be increased in this country except by all of us working harder and longer; and it is only through greatly increased production that the dangers of inflation can be averted at a time when we have to channel off, for defence purposes, large percentages of the things we do produce.

If Canadians will buckle down to it and will achieve in 1951 and 1952, let us say, as much as a six or eight per cent increase of physical volume of production—that is, of our gross production—it will be the greatest single factor, in my judgment, in bringing down prices and the cost of living. That is, of course, provided that we do not get foolish and allow the materials we do produce to filter away into other countries under foolish policies of one kind and another. But these taxes now, sales and excise, will not contribute in any way, in my judgment, to an all-out production effort. My judgment is that it will result in discouraging production rather than encouraging it, and for that reason they are especially dangerous just now.

Whenever a government requires revenue, it is only good and common sense to go after that revenue where the money is. This government chooses to get the revenue solely by taxing for it. But the budget resolutions now before the committee propose to go after increased sales taxes and excise taxes in places where the money just cannot be obtained, without serious consequences to the people who are already overburdened with living costs, and who just cannot see how in the world they are going to keep their heads above water. The government has already admitted that single persons need not less than $1,000 and married persons not less than $2,000 to keep their heads above water. As a result the personal income tax exemptions are fixed at these levels.

Having admitted that, however, the minister turns around and seeks new revenue to the extent of $116 million from these people who are already overburdened. Then the minister proposes to tax away this year certain profits which corporations throughout the country have made. I have been making a special study of this whole corporation situation, and I should like to present that picture briefly today by way of showing to the minister that there is an alternative to which he can turn, and quite safely, to get his revenue. There is this alternative to which he can turn, if he actually requires it, although I believe the minister will agree—and whether he agrees or not, he knows I am correct—that when this fiscal year is ended he will have more than the necessary $116 million or $120 million by way of a surplus in revenue. I would bet my last shirt on that. He will have sufficient, and perhaps more than sufficient, to make up for what he proposes to get from these two taxes. I do not think there will be any doubt about that, particularly in the light of the fact that we are living in very buoyant times. Revenues are going to keep up.

I have here a table which I believe would be of interest to the people of this country, and, if it is agreeable to hon. members, I should like to have it placed on Hansard, so that what it reveals may be apparent at a glance.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Low: In this table I have prepared I use authentic figures from the Canada Year Book and from the budget papers tabled along with the minister's budgets of last year and this year, as well as information from the dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of National Revenue. This table, which shows the profits made in Canada by corporations after the payment of taxes, is as follows:

Profits Made in Canada by Corporations After Payment of Taxes

Years	Net profits after taxes Amounts	Cash dividends paid abroad and to persons in Canada Amounts	Undistributed profits, including refundable portion of excess profits Amounts

The figures covering years 1949 and 1950 are given on page 12 of budget papers 1950-51.

The above are latest figures available at D.B.S. and the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Blackmore: Pretty rich pickings.

Mr. Low: There are several very interesting things about the statement. The dividends distributed were substantial, and presented a fine picture for the shareholders. Evidently the shareholders were satisfied. But in practically every year, if not indeed every year, the undistributed profits that remained with the companies were greater than the amounts distributed. In the nine-year period the accumulated undistributed profits in the hands of corporations of this country amounted to $4,648 million.

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that the hon. member prepared the table, and got his information from the sources mentioned.

Mr. Low: Yes. The sources of information are set out at the foot of the table. Then, the minister proposes to tax away $116 million of these profits for this year by way of a twenty per cent defence surcharge on all corporation income payments in respect of income earned after January 1, 1951, exempting the fifteen per cent rate that applies to the first $10,000 in profits. The minister calculates that the surcharge will boost the rate of corporation tax on all profits up to 45·6 per cent.

If a further twenty per cent surcharge were imposed, bringing the minister's defence surcharge up to forty per cent instead of twenty per cent, the yield this year would be $232 million, an additional amount quite sufficient to replace the revenue expected from the increased sales tax and the fifteen per cent excise on household electrical equipment.

Even after boosting the surcharge to forty per cent, undistributed corporation profits would still remain at the staggering sum of $500 million, on the basis of last year's figures. I realize that this is on the basis of last year's figures, and I give them because the figures for this year will not be available until a year from now. However, there is no reason to expect that the level of profits during the ensuing year will be lower than for the last year. As a matter of fact, in his budget the minister expects them to be greater. Under the circumstances I believe we are safe in expecting a profit at least equal to that of this year, and perhaps higher. And remember, the $500 million about which I have already spoken would remain to the corporations after all taxes are paid and after substantial dividends are distributed to the shareholders of those corporations. Under the circumstances I cannot see why the minister should not get the revenue he needs right there where the money is.

These undistributed profits constitute a huge potential reservoir of funds for expansion purposes. Along with the minister, I think it is wise that undistributed profits such as I have mentioned should be there for expansion and resources development. Those things should be financed from this source as far as it will go. I agree with the minister when he says also that during the emergency years ahead he will have to put some sort of curb on reinvestment so as to help keep prices under control. If these $500 million of profits were left, even after a forty per cent surcharge, and were poured out into the field of reinvestment for development or expansion purposes, producing nothing while they are being spent for those purposes, the inflationary effect would be terrific. The minister is quite right when he says that he must impose some sort of curb.

I favour the profit motive to induce enterprise and productive effort. I have always said so. I believe that there has never yet been discovered a better motive for enterprise and productive effort than the profit motive. I do not oppose that motive in any way; but when we are faced with a situation like the present one, when we need revenue, I think we should have no qualms of conscience about requisitioning from the very large accumulations of corporation profits another $116 million, especially when it leaves large reserves after the payment of taxes and substantial dividends to the shareholders of these corporations.

These inflated profits, I would remind you, were made possible by the condition of inflation that has existed over these past few years. Government tax policies have contributed to the inflation to a considerable extent, because, as we have already shown, when you increase any of these commodity taxes you are bound to increase the rate of profit, or the amount of profit at any rate, accumulated by the corporations. All these things, while they play into the hands of the corporations of the country, militate seriously against the individual consumer.

I suggest that the consumer would be hit much harder by the proposed tax increases than he would be by the additional corporation tax which I have suggested. It seems to me that the only way that we can give to the taxpayer, the consumer of this country, any sort of relief for the moment is to get revenue from the source I have outlined. Consequently I move:

That clauses 1 and 4 of the proposed resolution be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

"That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for a further defence surcharge on all corporation income tax payments in respect of income earned after January 1, 1951, to the extent necessary to maintain the balance of ways and means."

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, there may be some point of order to be raised as to the propriety of this amendment which relates to a tax on corporations, but I shall not raise it for the moment because Your Honour might want to give some consideration to it. Before you do, there are one or two things I should like to say with respect to the most interesting and thoughtful speech which has been made by the hon. member for Peace River.

I am not going to repeat what I said as to why I think it is undesirable to further increase corporation taxes at this time. The effective corporation tax in eight of the ten provinces, after the present proposals are adopted, will be over fifty per cent, and in the case of the two central provinces of Quebec and Ontario it will be something over fifty-two per cent. For the reasons which I set forth in my budget speech I think that at the present time it would be uneconomical and unsound to push those taxes any higher. It would be an invitation to waste, extravagance and inefficiency. I am sure the committee would not want me to again express the views which I have already put forward in my budget speech.

I should like to say just a word about the suggestion that corporation profits are unduly inflated today. I am making no special brief now for the profits of corporations or of any other group in the community. Like my hon. friend I was doing a little bit of investigating as to the results in pre-war days as compared with the present time. I did not go through the war years, as he did, but I find that corporation profits after taxes in 1949 were $1,171 million. That is the same amount as was mentioned by my hon. friend, so I can see that he prepared his figures carefully. I have a comparison of the total corporation profits before taxes in 1939 and 1949. In 1939 the total corporate profits before taxes was $618 million; in 1949 they were $1,898 million. I think it is better to take them before taxes so that we can see what the profits were.

The interesting thing to me was the percentage of those profits to the gross national product. I found that the corporate profits before taxes, expressed as a percentage of the gross national product, were 11·04 per cent in 1939, and only 11·59 per cent in 1949. In other words, they were approximately the same. I think those percentages are extremely significant.

My hon. friend made the point that a substantial amount of corporate profits have remained undistributed. May I say at once that from an economic point of view I think that is an extremely desirable thing. My friend agreed with me on that. Out of those undistributed corporation profits most of the expansion of our production facilities which has taken place during the last four or five years was derived. The figures I have indicate that in 1949 the undistributed corporation profits were $601 million. I think it is fair to say that virtually all those profits have been reinvested in plant and equipment.

My own personal view is that it is not fair to say that corporation profits are unduly inflated in proportion to the increase in gross national production. My own personal view is that the profits which have remained undistributed and which have been reinvested in plant and equipment are performing a useful economic function at this time. I realize that my friend and I differ as to the economic desirability of imposing additional corporation taxes instead of imposing the spending taxes, the consumption taxes which I have suggested.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister similar figures to show the comparative amounts or the actual percentages of corporation profits going into the hands of shareholders as dividends for pre-war and now?

Mr. Abbott: I have them here, and I am glad my hon. friend asked me that question. The dividends received by Canadians, expressed as percentages of total income in Canada, was 3·03 per cent in 1939 and 2·12 per cent in 1949.

Mr. Wright: The minister indicated that corporation profits in relation to national product—

Mr. Abbott: Gross national product.

Mr. Wright: —gross national product, had not increased to any very great extent.

Mr. Abbott: Not significantly, no.

Mr. Wright: It seems to me that the interesting figure would be one to indicate whether corporation profits had increased compared with capital investment. That is the point. The profits might be in proportion to the gross national product but might be out of proportion to the capital invested.

Mr. Abbott: I have not those figures here. If I may say so, the proportion of profits to capital invested is not a complete criterion, because in a great many enterprises, particularly in service enterprises and other types of endeavour, capital is not the only criterion to determine profits. We recognized that in our Excess Profits Tax Act during the war.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that we should get off into a too detailed discussion of corporation taxes under this resolution. I prefaced my remarks by saying that I have a little doubt whether my hon. friend's amendment is in order, but I do not know that I will press that point. I think I should say at once that I would be obliged to vote against it, because I do not consider that from an economic point of view an additional corporation tax at this time would produce the results which I wish to achieve.

I want to add, as I said in my budget speech, that the tax program which I am presenting has two purposes in view. The first is to raise the necessary revenues, and the second is to endeavour to curtail consumption in certain less essential fields which compete with defence requirements.

Mr. Low: I should like to make a brief reply to one point the Minister of Finance made. He quite properly says that the undistributed profits of the corporations are a reservoir out of which moneys for investment, expansion and development come. I think that is a proper thing, and I am all for it. At page 1809 of Hansard for April 10 the minister said:

> Moreover, we have always relied on undistributed corporation profits to provide a large fraction of the capital required for expansion of our industries. At this juncture in our affairs, with heavy capital investment contributing to inflationary pressure, I shall not be too much concerned if higher tax rates leave less for reinvestment—

How much less?

—but in the long run it is a good thing for the country that business should grow out of reinvested profits.

With that statement before us, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he does not think that $500 million of undistributed profits for this year would not be a fairly substantial reservoir out of which moneys for reinvestment could come, especially in the light of the fact that over the last nine years there have been accumulated in that reservoir $4,600 million of undistributed profits? It seems to me that what we have to weigh most carefully is this: who will have the reserves that can supply the minister's need, the individual consumer throughout the country, or the corporations that have accumulated these reserves of undistributed profits? I would not mind at all seeing the individual taxpayers of Canada contribute a fair share of the moneys needed to run the government and to make a real defence effort if they had these reserves, but they have not got them, especially the people for whom we are expressing this grave concern, the people who have to pay the increased prices that result from the imposition of the two taxes in question. The money is there in the corporation reservoir, undistributed. The government does not want corporations to reinvest these moneys this year.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, some of it, yes.

Mr. Low: Some, but not all.

Mr. Gibson: It is not all their money, either.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will allow me, obviously my view is that, by taking an additional twenty per cent of corporation profits in taxes, the residue will not in my opinion be greater than is fair and just for payment of dividends—

Mr. Knowles: Not twenty per cent of profits.

Mr. Abbott: Twenty per cent increase in the corporation tax—the amount then left will not be beyond what is fair and reasonable for the payment of a return on the shareholders' investment and to remain as undistributed profits forming savings for the increase of capital equipment. Others may differ with me in that view, but that is the view I have taken and the view which I expressed in my budget speech.

Mr. Low: I do not know whether the minister has these figures before him. I was not able to get them, but I am going to continue to try until I do get them. It would be interesting to know how much of the $600 million undistributed profits accumulated by corporations in 1949 was actually reinvested; I wonder if there is not some carry-over. What I am getting at is that even if the surcharge for defence purposes were increased to forty per cent it would still leave not a bit less than $500 million of undistributed profits, assuming that the aggregate profits this year will be the same as last—and I think they will be, or more—and assuming also that the same rate of dividend is distributed as was distributed last year. I am asking the minister if he does not think that $500 million is a pretty fair potential reinvestment fund in the light of the forces that he knows are exerting pressure on prices in this country and on the cost of living.

Mr. Abbott: This has been a most interesting discussion, but I think perhaps we should defer any further discussion of the desirability and the economic effects of an increased corporation tax until we are considering that tax. My hon. friend has moved that certain commodity taxes be struck out of this resolution, and that as an alternative there be an increase in the corporation tax. I am glad he raised the question, because I was interested in what he said. I was glad to put on the record the striking percentages which I gave the committee a moment ago, but I think we should endeavour to dispose of the amendment if, Mr. Chairman, you consider it in order. If we care to pursue further an analysis of corporation profits we shall have ample opportunity to do so when that resolution is before the committee.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the debate, but I wish to state that earlier in the debate I allowed a blanket amendment of this kind to be put, although at that time I stated that I would have appreciated a fuller opportunity to study the matter. It now appears that the question was settled by a chairman's ruling on November 10, 1949, when it was made clear that the tax to be substituted must be specific and must clearly preserve the balance of ways and means. As to the amendment actually before us now, the substituted tax is not specific, but is in general terms. In addition, I have doubts as to the relevancy of the amendment on this particular resolution. Therefore I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, you heard the point raised by the Minister of Finance but you did not give any opportunity to anyone on this side of the house to speak to the point of order.

Mr. Lesage: The ruling is there.

Mr. Abbott: Do you think we could let this procedure point go?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This would be the only time you let something go.

The Chairman: Order. I have ruled that this amendment is out of order.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out with respect—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but the thing to do is to appeal. The chairman's ruling is not debatable.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: These shouts of "no, no" do not expedite matters at all. The Minister of Finance raised a point of order; at least in opening his remarks he expressed some doubt whether the amendment was in order. He then proceeded to speak to the substance of the amendment at considerable length, and none of us quarrelled with that. In concluding he returned to his suggestion that perhaps the amendment was out of order, and you immediately rose to your feet, sir, and gave a ruling, without affording anyone else a chance to speak to the matter. That is not in keeping with the practice—

The Chairman: Order. The point of order having been settled, with the unanimous consent of the committee I am prepared to put the amendment. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Low: What is your ruling?

The Chairman: There is no ruling.

Mr. Knowles: What is it you are asking unanimous consent for?

The Chairman: To put the question on the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Then you are ruling that it is in order?

The Chairman: No, but the committee is always master of its own procedure.

Mr. Low: I think, Mr. Chairman, you would be well advised to rule it in order and put the question; because if you do not, under the circumstances I am going to challenge your ruling.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, the ruling was given, and out of respect to the chairman's position I do not think the hon. member should say what he did. The hon. member may not threaten the chairman of the committee or any other member of the house. That is absolutely out of order.

Mr. Low: I am not threatening the chairman; I am simply saying that if he is prepared to submit the amendment to a vote of the committee it indicates that he is willing to declare it in order.

The Chairman: No. I gave my ruling, but the committee is always master of its own rules. With unanimous consent the question may be put, but my ruling is still there. If there is not unanimous consent the ruling stands.

Mr. Low: Very good; then I must challenge your ruling.

Mr. Blackmore: The steamroller will take care of that.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

In the committee of ways and means I ruled that an amendment in general terms which does not set out a tax of specific amount was out of order in respect of a ways and means resolution.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling given by the chairman of the committee of ways and means. Mr. Dion of the committee of ways and means has reported to me that he ruled that an amendment in general terms which does not set out a specific amount is out of order in respect of a ways and means resolution. From this ruling Mr. Low has appealed.

Those in favour of confirming the chairman's ruling will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And some hon. members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it might be possible to make a comment on the situation that has arisen. I think there is an unusual aspect to this matter in view of the fact that each of these rulings establishes some form of precedent. I believe it should be a matter of record that the Minister of Finance did raise a question in that he said he was not sure whether the proposed amendment was in order or out of order. Then he said he would proceed, and he did proceed.

Mr. Abbott: I raised the point of order, and while the chairman was considering it I proceeded.

Mr. Drew: I am not questioning the propriety of the course followed by the Minister of Finance. He proceeded with his remarks, and then the chairman came to a conclusion. I do suggest that there is more in this vote than simply approval or disapproval of the ruling of the chairman. I think there is the question of approval or disapproval of the way the ruling was presented, because before anyone had an opportunity to express his views, other than the minister, the ruling was given.

Mr. Abbott: I expressed no views on the point of order. I doubted the merits of the amendment.

Mr. Drew: I have said that, and I am pointing out—

Mr. Knowles: And the ruling did not relate to the point of order raised by the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Though this discussion is out of order I must maintain order while it is taking place.

Mr. Drew: I want to point out that if a practice of that kind were followed a procedure could be established under which a minister or anyone else could make a statement and then discussion could be ended, without anyone else having an opportunity to express an opinion. I believe there should have been an indication that a ruling was going to be made so that comments might be heard before the ruling was given. Rather than voting on the question of the ruling itself, therefore, I propose to vote against it on the ground that it was presented without any comments being heard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house still wish to have a recorded vote on the ruling?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee of ways and means:

The Chairman: Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Drew: I wish to deal with a point of privilege before dealing briefly with the remarks of the Minister of Finance in regard to the matter now under consideration. Before the orders of the day were called I had directed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and asked whether it was the intention to exercise powers which the house had been told were provided for expressly by the Emergency Powers Act. Some question was raised as to my interpretation of the explanation given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. For that reason I should like simply to remind the committee that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did explain that, because of his experience, he had assumed responsibility for the drafting of the bill. I would point out that before the bill was actually before the house the Minister of Trade and Commerce had explained why it was that we were having a new emergency bill brought before us to replace the emergency bill adopted last September. I would just recall these words, as reported at page 185 of Hansard of February 8.

Mr. Howe: May I interrupt and ask whether the hon. gentleman is talking about the emergency powers bill?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Howe: There was a second bill—I do not recall the name of it. It was introduced in the name of the Prime Minister, but I piloted it, and it was not the emergency powers bill.

Mr. Drew: It was the emergency powers bill, the bill that superseded the bill passed last September.

Mr. Howe: That bill had a different name, I think.

Mr. Drew: The Emergency Powers Act is what it was called. In referring to that, this is what the minister said in explaining the bill that would be introduced. I am quoting from page 185 of Hansard of February 8:

> At its last session, parliament enacted a measure authorizing the government to control prices of materials where shortage is caused by defence purchases. Up to the present time, defence purchases have not been of sufficient volume to be in themselves responsible for shortages, although prices of steel and other war materials have been kept under close observation. Obviously a more comprehensive price control bill is needed for any effective control of the Canadian economy, and it is such a bill that you will be asked to consider.

That was the statement to which I was referring. What the Minister of Trade and Commerce said was that the bill we would have under consideration would deal with the control of supplies and be drafted wide enough to deal with prices. He said:

> It is such a bill that you will be asked to consider.

We were asked to consider the bill, and it became law. That is an explanation of the remarks that I made earlier, Mr. Chairman, and the reason I raised the question. I would add that just before he gave that explanation on February 8 the Minister of Trade and Commerce had said:

> The upward pressure on prices, both in Canada and abroad, was much less severe in 1941 than it is now.

We have the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the pressures are more severe than they were in 1941. That statement was made on February 8. I do not think anyone needs to be told that since February 8 the pressures have increased very greatly. It was because of that, and because of his explanation of the purpose of the bill, that I asked the question as to whether the minister had yet come to the decision to exercise the powers conferred under that bill.

Now, to deal with a point raised in regard to this motion before us by the Minister of Finance. In speaking about the corporation profits and taxes on these profits, the Minister of Finance explained that he did not believe it was possible to increase those taxes any more, because to do so would be uneconomic and unsound. I am not going to argue whether that is correct or incorrect. It is the explanation given by the minister as to why he does not believe it is advisable at this time to increase the rate of taxes on corporations. In other words what the Minister of Finance says is that he believes in corporation taxes to a point where he has imposed them on a very high level, but that there is some point at which they become uneconomic and unsound. I am raising that because it is a perfect illustration of the point we have been making in regard to the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. The moment the argument is put forward against the increase to the extent of 25 per cent in the sales tax it is said, "Oh, you say now it is unsound to increase this by 25 per cent; but it has been there for some time." The implication is that any argument that this increase is severe or unsound is answered by the fact that there has been a tax there for some time, and it does not make any difference what argument may have been made against it in the past.

If the argument the Minister of Finance has made in regard to the application of corporation taxes is correct, namely that there is some critical point beyond which you cannot go without taxes becoming uneconomic and unsound, then certainly that applies with equal force to every other tax which is on a percentage basis. Certainly it applies with greater force to a tax which has its most direct impact upon those who are the least capable of bearing that tax.

The resolution before us is one embracing eight different paragraphs. An attempt was made to have them taken up separately, but at this time I am not questioning the ruling on that point. I would point out however that we are asked by the resolution to say that it is expedient that the rate of the general sales tax be increased from 8 to 10 per cent. We have stated we do not believe it is expedient, and since the resolution cannot be divided we have no choice but to vote against it—

Mr. Abbott: Quite right.

Mr. Drew: —although, in doing so, we must vote against other parts covered in the same resolution which we admit we cannot possibly deal with individually at this time. Therefore I wish to have it clearly understood that in voting against the resolution we are voting specifically against those taxes which we have said are uneconomic and unsound, and which should not be applied at this time.

In regard to the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax, we say that in all earnestness we are pressing the Minister of Finance to withdraw that tax. We claim the budget speech and the whole of the details in the budget make it perfectly clear that there is going to be another surplus, if the predictions of the Minister of Finance are carried out, and that for this reason the imposition of the tax becomes unnecessary.

In saying that I recognize immediately that the declared surplus in the budget is not adequate to replace this tax. But when the Minister of Finance projects a $20 billion gross national product I say most emphatically that if that prediction is carried out the surplus will be much greater than that now predicted. That being so, there is no necessity for the tax, and therefore it becomes possible to oppose it without bringing forward any alternative measure. We say you can do without it, and we say this is the time to do without it, because you are imposing a highly inflationary tax at the very time when inflation is threatening our whole social structure.

The Minister of Finance has not indicated a recognition of what the imposition of this tax means to the people of this country at the present time. There are a number of reasons why the tax should not be imposed. Granted that most of the arguments against this increase would also apply to the tax of 8 per cent already in existence, we must keep in mind that some of the strongest unreserved criticisms of that tax in the past have been by members of the party to which the Minister of Finance belongs. Some of those criticisms of the tax were expressed in terms so extreme that if I were to use them myself today I would be charged with being irresponsible in the discussion of the tax.

Mr. Low: They could not be printed.

Mr. Drew: Some of those statements could not be more extreme, and they came from the highest authority in the party to which the minister belonged at that time. If those arguments are sound, then undoubtedly it would be well for us to re-examine the whole tax. But at the present time we are asking simply that the increase for which provision is made in this resolution—and that is all we have before us now—be reconsidered. Consideration as to whether there should be a general revision of the sales tax is something we can more properly discuss at some other time.

Our position is that the budget as prepared will more than take care of the expenditures projected for the coming fiscal year, if the gross national product estimated by the Minister of Finance is in fact realized. That being so we say that the increase in the sales tax should not be brought into effect.

I ask the Minister of Finance to recognize that we are putting this argument forward in the earnest belief that the government will indicate its recognition of these pressures—pressures made even more clear by the very announcement made in the house this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce respecting the last cost of living index. Let me anticipate any suggestion that the announcement that there has been an increase of over two points does not in itself increase the pressures. It increases the pressures, and for this reason: it increases them for the very fact that it is made clear to the people of Canada that, according to the latest official record, the cost of living is still on the way up, thus maintaining those pressures for unnecessary buying and other acts of that kind which in themselves are highly inflationary. At the very time when we have had an announcement of a further substantial increase in the cost of living index is the time for the government to recognize that there does come some critical point beyond which it cannot increase this tax without imposing an uneconomic burden. We believe that point is past, and we ask the government not to impose this tax. We believe that can be done without imposing any tax in substitution for it.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, we have all listened with keen interest to what has happened this afternoon. I could not help feeling however that the discussion has strayed somewhat from the excise tax. We have been discussing something else. My impression was that the resolution before the committee was the one dealing with the Excise Tax Act.

I recognize the reason for this tax. I know the money is needed, and I am in agreement with this method of raising money. To my mind the most important feature to be kept in view is the fact that the cost of living has been going up by leaps and bounds, while the pensions of old age pensioners, and payments made to others, seem to remain more or less stagnant. Therefore I am most anxious to see every possible dollar raised, whether it be by way of an excise tax or one on undistributed profits.

I am at a loss to understand why an hon. member from Alberta should be the one who would suggest that undistributed profits is a proper field for further taxation, when we realize that there is no province in Canada which requires more urgently moneys accruing from undivided profits for the development of its industries than does the province from which the hon. member for Peace River comes.

Mr. Blackmore: We need money for our poor people, too.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): In the thirty years I have been here in this House of Commons I have never made a set speech. I rely on the hon. members who are listening to let me state some common sense once in a while. I sometimes wonder whether I am capable of expressing that. It reminds me of many long years ago when I was six years of age and I took the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington by one hand, and the hon. member for York East by the other, and we all toddled off to the little red school house. I was asked to get up to recite a piece after the teacher had drilled us in what we should say. I remember standing on the little platform while a little mouse crept out from a hole in the floor. I remember so well rising and saying:

> I have a little friend who lives in my mouth,
> He's as red as a rose and as warm as the south;
> He has only one leg, but how quickly he goes;
> My little friend tongue, as red as a rose.

I hope I did not have my little friend tongue in my cheek this afternoon when I registered my vote. I do not think I did because I am as satisfied as I stand here that I would sooner vote with the hon. member for a tax on undivided profits or corporation earnings or depreciation reserves than I would vote for an increase in the cost of living brought about by this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. Someone in the chamber has said that this is a tax on the poor man. Mr. Minister of Finance, I am just as sure as I stand here that this is a tax on the poor man. Charge another dollar or two for each bottle of whisky we buy, whether we consume it ourselves or buy it for our friends, and put that into the treasury. Do that by all means.

The hon. member for Peace River was exploring around to find some way to offset the cost of living, and to make sure that pensions would keep some sort of pace with the cost of living. That is what I want to see happen. Not necessarily right up with it, but the compensation to pensioners should drag along with it. Let us have an objective in mind. If the cost of living goes up 50 per cent, 60 per cent or 80 per cent, why cannot this honourable government produce the mechanism and the mechanics within the confines of its organization to follow along?

If butter goes to 80 or 90 cents per pound, we have to buy it just the same. But pensions remain stagnant. To win an election you put out the baby bonus, and I suppose to win another election you can put out this new old age pensions scheme. I do not mind them playing with babies, as I love to play with them myself; but I object strenuously to any government or any individual playing with the finer sensibilities, as far as finance is concerned, of our older people. I think that is something—I am happy the Prime Minister is in his seat—that should receive prompt attention.

I plead with the right hon. Prime Minister to see that this Excise Tax Act which we are considering this afternoon produces immediately sufficient revenue so that the ideas that are in his heart and mind today with regard to looking after the old age pensioners will be accomplished long before he declares we are going to have another election in this country. It was rumoured that the baby bonuses were used to help win an election. God forbid that old age pensions should in any way whatsoever be used for a similar purpose. If they are, that action will react and boomerang against those who use it. I am hoping that that will not be resorted to.

Going back to excise taxes, I say to you, Mr. Minister of Finance—I am glad to see you smiling a little bit, as I like to see you in that mood—that your predecessor, the Hon. Charles Dunning, was not quite so happy when a proposition was made to him when he was sitting where you are now sitting with regard to how he, in common with the United States, could raise millions of dollars for revenue without hurting any particular industry but helping one industry that was native to this country. I refer to the Bailey amendment of 1936 passed in the United States which placed an excise tax of three cents per pound on every pound of vegetable oil imported into the country; as high as four and a half cents per pound and now one and a half cents per pound, with a quarter cent per pound duty. My reference to that indicates to my mind that the Minister of Finance missed an opportunity to raise anywhere from $2 million to $10 million by omitting to place an equivalent excise tax on the tremendous and ever-increasing imports of vegetable oil from Asiatic countries like Sumatra, Nigeria and Ceylon where the little pickaninny runs up a tree and shakes down a fruit which produces from 40 to 50 per cent of fats while the milkmaid in a dairy milks the dear old cow strenuously and gets only four to five per cent of the constituent butter fat, a part of margarine, if you want to call it margarine, which sells for 40 cents per pound, as my deskmate tells me.

What is it worth? Find out for yourself. When I was in Ceylon some time ago I saw what it is worth. I saw 15 pickaninnies, none over 12 years of age or weighing over 60 pounds, feeding into the trunk of a tree dried out coconut which was producing 20 to 30 to 40 per cent of oil. The old mother sat on the veranda with a stick keeping them going and another boy kept the donkeys or burros moving. There were six of them, four being on the end of a pole going around and around while the pickaninnies dropped in dried quarter sections of coconut and the oil was running out of the bottom of the stump into a four gallon discarded can which had originally belonged to the British navy or army or something.

I saw the father going down the road with a two-wheeled cart and a donkey in front dragging that black-as-muck coconut oil to the village. I saw them loading the oil on a ship to be shipped over here. I saw something else a few years ago which should make the members from Montreal stop and give some thought to the matter. I saw a tank steamer so heavily burdened with peanut oil from China at a cost of less than 3 cents per pound that she could not pull alongside the dock to unload. They had to lighter the ship in Montreal harbour. This was some years ago. The price is proportionate since but it is not 90 cent butter although it takes the place of it. They had to lighter the ship in the harbour before they could pull it up to any dock in the city of Montreal to unload it. They unloaded it and the product was sold in Canada around 3 cents per pound. If my friend from Fraser Valley can unload creamery butter to compete with that he is good. It cannot be done.

I say to the Minister of Finance we missed a golden opportunity this year, when he needed excise taxes and money to pay all the current liquid indebtedness, in that we did not put ourselves at least on a parity with the United States and take a cent and a half a pound on every pound that came in. We would never have missed it. It would not have affected the price of butter. You would have had the money in the treasury, and I do not think very many people would have complained much about it. It is all on the record. I see that the well has gone dry. There is no water on my desk. We had better put a $2 tax on whisky and hope it will go dry too, and we will save the minister having to pass these rules.

Some ten or fifteen years ago we were exporting great quantities of bacon to the British market and the British people had control of the bacon situation. We in Canada were a bit worried that they might put some sort of tax on our bacon going into that country. We would have had three to four and a half cents a pound on vegetable oil coming into this country, and when you get above 200 or 300 million pounds a year of a cheap commodity of that kind made by cheap labour you cannot possibly compete against it. Let us be sensible about the matter. The product from which butter is made, milk, at the very maximum only produces 5 per cent butterfat. It is a pretty good cow that will give 5 per cent. I never saw one that would. It is more likely four and a half. When you try to compete against coconuts that produce 40 pounds of fat per hundred you just cannot compete.

The purification process used does not produce a loss of more than one or two per cent in the refining process. It is the simplest thing in the world to refine it. You can hydrogenate it to any consistency you wish from limpid water in the lower grades of the fatty acids up to a consistency as hard as oak by a simple chemical process which does not take anything away from the weight of the product. When you get it to the consistency where you want to use it as a substitute for lard, margarine or butter, then all you have to do is stop your hydrogenation process at that point. I do not like quoting figures, but I was told five minutes ago that margarine is selling at 47 cents a pound. I should like to know whether there is 15 cents worth of vegetable oil in that 47 cents.

I should like to know what portion of the 47 cents is used for the high pressure advertising which comes over the radio and is to be found in every newspaper you pick up. As a chemist, which is my profession, I know that the product is inert and pure. I do not know anything about its vitamin content, but in these modern days vitamins can be added to the product, so they say. I take a vitamin pill once a day myself, although I do not know why. They say they can add vitamins to the product. I know that it is doing a job but I know that you do not grow coconut trees in Canada. I know that you do not have much success raising peanuts in Canada. I know that you do not have much success raising palm nuts or palm fruit in British Columbia. We are not in that particular temperate zone. Let us be sensible about it. Let us be at least half as sensible as our friends in the United States.

Even when we are hard up—and we are not as hard up now as we deserve to be—at least let us make sure that we keep pace with our commitments to deserving pensioners of all kinds. I make a special plea for old age pensioners because I am reaching that category myself. I am particularly anxious that we balance the budget. In considering the Excise Tax Act, I say to the Minister of Finance in as kindly a way as I possibly can that we are very happy that he has had surpluses, but anyone who has had the privilege of preparing a budget, no matter how small the business venture is, deserves to be criticized by his board of directors if he has a far greater surplus than he should have. I level that criticism at the Minister of Finance at this stage. I say to him in the same breath that with the cost of living so high, with the world picture so disturbed, with a background of three or four budgets as a result of which there were surpluses, this is not the time to budget for any very substantial surplus. If we had had deficits for the last four years I would not have made that remark, but I think, with the experience that the Minister of Finance has had, this is not the time to budget for a surplus.

This is a time when he should try to come out more even. This is a time when he should give some consideration to all the elements that go to make up our taxation system. This is a time when he should not disturb those who find themselves encumbered by paying that extraordinary 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. I think the second avenue I mentioned might have been explored, namely, vegetable oil. Perhaps I am guilty for not having brought it to the attention of the Minister of Finance in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Nevertheless we are on the record and two or three of the hon. members opposite me—I can see three of them in one glance—supported that issue right from the drop of the hat. We won our case before the tariff board and, as I said before, the only reason it was not imposed at that time was the fact that we did not want to disturb the British bacon market. I do not propose to move an amendment but at the same time I respectfully draw this matter to the attention of the minister and ask him to give some consideration to it. At the same time I again declare to you, sir, that I am opposed to this further increase in the sales tax for the reasons I have enumerated, and I hope that the minister will be able to see others.

Mr. Thatcher: Last Tuesday evening I expressed opposition to this tax and suggested an alternative which I felt at that time was a reasonable one. I think the announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon that the cost of living index has now gone up to 181·8 makes it all the more important that we do not pass this amendment to the Excise Tax Act. If we do I think it is reasonable to suppose that in the next month the cost of living index will probably rise three or four points instead of two points as it did in the past month. It is pretty obvious from the debate that has gone on that members in all parts of the house do not like this tax, but some of them at least feel it is necessary because of the need for revenue. It is interesting to note that in introducing the tax—I am referring to paragraph 4, which imposes the duty on appliances—the minister said that tax was needed specifically for revenue. I quote from page 1812 of Hansard:

> I regret that we can no longer afford to leave these entirely free of extra tax—

Later he went on to point out that this new tax would yield a revenue of $16 million. Like the leader of the opposition and others who have spoken, I feel that this tax might well be waived without giving us a deficit. I believe there is going to be a surplus sufficiently large that this tax may not be needed. But if we do accept the minister's statement that he must have this revenue I believe there is an alternative in the capital gains tax which would be less harsh on people in the lower income brackets.

I say at once that I do not like the thought of a capital gains tax in Canada. As the parliamentary assistant pointed out the other evening, there are numerous disadvantages in that it would be hard to administer, and it would probably discourage risk capital. But I suggest that even with those disadvantages it would be better for the Canadian people as a whole to have a modest tax of that kind than the very harsh tax contained in paragraph 4 of this resolution. The other tax may be completely undesirable, but still it would be better than the one proposed. The parliamentary assistant suggested that the experience of the United States in connection with the capital gains tax had been very unfortunate. That may be quite true; yet it cannot be completely impracticable because there has been such a tax on their statute books since 1924. Some hon. members may wonder how the tax works there. As I understand, capital gains made by individuals or companies from the sale of any type of property other than normal stock in trade are subject to the tax.

Mr. Abbott: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend but if he will permit me I should like to raise a point of order. I really think a discussion of the capital gains tax would be very much more appropriate under the income tax resolution or bill. My hon. friend has put forward the view, as he is entitled to under this resolution, that we should have a capital gains tax instead of a commodity tax as is suggested here; but I suggest that a discussion of the merits of the capital gains tax or the economic impact of such a tax should be carried on under the other resolution. If we do not proceed in that way I really begin to despair of ever reaching any finality in the discussion of these resolutions.

Mr. Thatcher: I am inclined to largely agree with what the minister has said. However, in a moment or two I am going to move an amendment which would substitute the capital gains tax for paragraph 4 of the resolution. Therefore I feel I have to give a little explanation of what I am trying to do.

I was saying that in the United States short-term gains, those made in six months or less, for income tax purposes are treated exactly as though they were additional income. Long-term gains are taxed at the rate of twenty-five per cent. I say at once I do not think that would be necessary at this time in Canada, but I do suggest that there is a place in our income tax structure for a modest capital gains tax. Therefore I move:

That clause 4 of the proposed resolution be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

"That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose taxation on capital gains to the extent of $16 million so as to maintain the balance of ways and means."

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Mr. Abbott: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that your earlier ruling with respect to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Peace River applies to this amendment as well.

Mr. Thatcher: Oh, no; the amount is mentioned here.

The Chairman: I will put the amendment to the committee.

Mr. Knowles: But no ruling yet.

Mr. Gibson: I was just wondering if the minister was going to reply to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that he actually did not need this extra revenue. The leader of the opposition suggested that the minister was going to have a substantial surplus, and I am rather inclined to think he may be right, going by our experience during the last five years when we had very substantial surpluses that were not anticipated. I wonder, too, about the suggestion I made to the parliamentary assistant the other evening, as to whether any consideration was given to broadening the base for the application of the sales tax, rather than increasing it. It seems to me we have done some very good things in removing the tax. We have taken it off electricity, for instance, but on the other hand it seems to me that electricity used in business signs such as those advertising beer, for instance, might well be made subject to the sales tax. Then I think of building materials, from which the tax was removed. At the same time about half our building materials go into construction used for entertainment.

Mr. Abbott: Most of it is free of sales tax.

Mr. Gibson: That is what I say. After all, a tremendous amount of building material goes into structures which definitely could not be classified as essential. So I was wondering if the minister had given consideration to broadening the base of this tax. As the Minister of National Revenue knows, he has a book about a foot thick listing all the things that are not subject to sales tax.

Mr. Abbott: I am glad to answer my hon. friend's questions, because I have always conceived that the major function of this discussion in committee is to answer questions rather than to make speeches. As to his question whether consideration was given to broadening the base of the sales tax, I have taken the position that with the exception of cortisone and ACTH there would be no further extension of the exemptions. Now to answer the question as to whether I intended to reply to the point raised by the leader of the opposition, that I was raising more money than I needed, I have attempted to reply to that matter on at least a dozen different occasions. I have stated my considered view that I am not trying to raise more than I need. I try as much as I can to avoid repetition. I am willing to sit here and listen to views reiterated time and again, but I really do not feel that I should detain the house by answering those points more than once.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not know whether or not I am in order, but I shall proceed until I am told I am out of order. Strangely enough, I am not going to talk about frigidaires or anything like that. I am going to be very brief, but I should like to say a word or two about the dairy industry, in connection with the excise tax on imported vegetable oils. I would like to move an amendment, but in view of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, apparently I am not entitled to do so.

In my opinion the dairy industry is rapidly being put out of action in Canada. I am surprised that far more interested and more capable speakers than I, coming from Ontario and particularly from Quebec, have not emphasized that matter already. Apparently the government do not fully realize the seriousness of the position of dairymen in Canada. Apparently the Canadian Manufacturers Association and the bankers association do not appreciate that the dairy industry is rapidly being wiped out of existence. It may not sound very important to some people, but in the years to come I think they will find just how important our 550,000 dairymen are to this country. I know I am supposed to be a little hipped on margarine, but in what I have to say I am not going to discuss its merits or demerits except to the extent that it is affecting the dairy industry. Some years ago I endeavoured to the best of my ability to prevent either the sale or importation of margarine in Canada, because representing a constituency with a large dairy industry, and going on the advice of those who had made a study of that industry, I could see the effect it would have. For the life of me I cannot understand why the Department of Finance has not put a tax on imported oils. I well remember when the hon. member for Moose Jaw brought up the matter of restrictions that were put on the importation of small automobiles from England. That was soon brought into effect by the Department of Finance in order to protect the motor industry.

Mr. Thatcher: I was objecting to it.

Mr. Cruickshank: I said the hon. member brought the matter up, as he would know if he would just listen carefully. For all I know, it was necessary that the action be taken that in fact was taken by the government in that connection. My point with regard to it is this. We act quickly when the matter concerns motor manufacturers; and we act quickly when it concerns textile manufacturers.

Mr. Byrne: It was necessary.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am not saying that it was not necessary. I am glad I am going to have some assistance from an hon. member from a mining district who is not as interested as are some other hon. members from Saskatchewan and Ontario in the manufacture of butter. I do not say it was not necessary to the employees or to protect the manufacturers. What I say is that the Department of Finance immediately grasped the subject and took action. The textile producers are well protected and well cared for. But apparently the dairy industry in Canada is to be thrown to the dogs. Is it not worth while protecting? It must not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that these vegetable oils, which are imported and used in the manufacture of a substitute for butter in the form of margarine, can also be used to manufacture ice cream, milk for sale for human consumption over the counter, and other dairy products. The ruling of the privy council was adverse to the welfare of the dairymen of Canada. Apparently the long view has not been taken to protect this industry of over 500,000 actual dairy farmers and, I understand, many thousands of small creameries. But for the benefit of five or six manufacturers of margarine, this cheap oil is allowed to be brought in. For the benefit of one of the New Brunswick members, may I point out that I am not saying whether margarine is good or bad in this case. I am trying to speak purely for the benefit of the dairy farmers and creameries.

Nobody can tell me that we produce coconut oil in Canada. Last year we brought in roughly 10 million pounds of coconut oil—and I am speaking of pounds, now—produced by the class of labour described by the hon. member for Danforth. I wish the government would see fit to send me on one of these trips, so that I might view these things at first hand. I am still hopeful that I shall be sent as an envoy across to Hull or to some place at an equal distance, with all expenses paid.

I have here some figures with regard to the consumption of oils and fats in margarine, January-September, October-December, and total for 1950. These figures are in thousands of pounds, and all figures are on a refined oil basis. This is going to take a little bit of time; but in a limited way and, I will admit, with limited ability, I am trying to say something which I think is of great importance at this time if we are to admit openly, as apparently do those who prepared part of the budget, that we are willing to throw the dairy industry to the wolves in Canada. These figures are of vital importance. As to vegetable oils, from January to September, 1950—and these figures are in thousands of pounds—we put into margarine 5,621,000 pounds of coconut oil; in the fourth quarter, the figure was 2,236,000, making a total of 7,857,000 pounds of coconut oil that went into margarine in the year 1950.

Possibly some of the hon. members who do not believe in protecting the dairy industry know where they can produce that coconut oil in the Dominion of Canada; but I may say that I do not know. Certainly it cannot be produced in the Fraser valley. Then as to cottonseed oil—and I should like to know where that oil is produced in Canada—from January to September, 1950, 32,717,000 pounds were used in the manufacture of margarine, and in the fourth quarter, 9,389,000 pounds, making a total of 42,106,000 pounds.

I now come to soybean oil. A certain amount of soybean oil is produced in Canada. We had better look to the Minister of Finance because he has these experts who know all these things. They must know all these things or how could he not arrive at an excise tax on imported oils? He therefore would have right at his finger tips the figure as to how much soybean oil was produced in Canada. The total amount used in margarine last year, was 18,187,000 pounds; and the total amount of sunflower seed oil so used was 3,178,000 pounds and of other vegetable oils, 965,000 pounds.

As I see it, Mr. Chairman, the matter boils down to this question: Is the dairy industry to be maintained in Canada or is it not to be maintained? There is no other alternative. This has nothing whatever to do—and I again repeat it—with the merits or demerits of margarine. The question simply is whether it is worth while to maintain the dairy industry in Canada or whether it is worth while to build up a vast fortune for some six concerns, as the hon. member for Danforth says. He knows better than any other member of this committee the details of this business. Through experience, he knows the details; I do not. I doubt if any other member in this chamber knows the processing details in connection with that particular line of business. I do not know what the solution is, but I would certainly have an amendment, if it would be in order, to the effect that an excise tax be put on these oils.

Mr. Chairman, when it is said that this is a cheap substitute for natural butter, I would just ask you to bear in mind that when butter went up in price these oils imported in 1950, which went into the manufacture of margarine, went up; and up went your margarine three cents a pound. Just remember that, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Ten cents.

Mr. Cruickshank: Ten cents or whatever it was. I think every hon. member in the chamber will agree with me that it is obvious that this product, which was supposed to supplant butter with those who were unfortunately not able to pay the price that butter had reached, namely margarine, went up in price after that oil was imported; and as I pointed out, some ten million pounds of coconut oil alone from the cheap producing countries was used, with no excise tax whatsoever. It just does not make sense. Either the government, through the Minister of Finance, will have to admit that the dairy industry is to be thrown to the wolves or that it is not.

I am getting a little interruption here. Never since I have been here in the House of Commons have I been as serious about anything as I am with regard to this matter. I regret that I have not the ability to put before the committee what I should like to put before it. I hope that hon. members from Quebec and Ontario particularly will follow me and speak along these lines. I was sent back here to represent dairy farmers in the main. I myself own a dairy farm. I realize that my dairy farm and others in my riding are rapidly losing their value, as such, and will continue to do so if we are going to permit these oils to be imported as they have been. What would have happened if that experiment in west Africa, I think it was, had been successful with regard to peanut oil? Any hon. members who have read the history of that experiment know the quantity of peanut oil that could have been produced, and the cost at which it could have been produced, and the price at which it could have been sold. The hon. member for Danforth mentioned peanut oil. I have not here the figures as to the quantity that has been imported. Is that to be continued? If one of my colleagues were here he would say: I thought you were a free trader. I am still a free trader, but we cannot have free trade just for one class of producer and not for others.

Speaking from memory, I believe we are permitted to bring in hay driers, litter carriers, and one or two other items, from the United States free of duty. In the current year that will not affect more than fifty farmers in my riding, but tens of thousands of farmers will be affected if vegetable oil is permitted to be brought in without a suitable tax being put on it. It is unfair competition. To carry it a little further—I do not like quoting figures, but incidentally these are authentic figures prepared in the bureau of statistics. Some of them were prepared through the courtesy of the dairy council of Canada. Incidentally, the dairy council of Canada represents all the dairymen of Canada, irrespective of where they come from. That council is guided by very responsible men, and they are particularly worried at this time, as they see the situation, as to whether the industry will be able to continue. Do not forget that the dairy industry does not include merely butter. It includes cheese, etc., and the necessary milk for human consumption on the fluid market.

For the year 1949—that is the latest year I have—the ratio of cows to population was as follows: Prince Edward Island, 2·1; Nova Scotia, 6·6; New Brunswick, 5·1; Quebec, 3·5; Ontario, 3·5; Manitoba, 3·2; Saskatchewan, 2·4; Alberta, 2·8; British Columbia, 11·9; average 3·7.

I cannot conceive why such a responsible organization as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which is familiar with all the bank reports published every month by the responsible heads of these banks, have not realized that it is not just a question now of talking about whether we like margarine or not. We are now talking about an industry that affects over 500,000 farm homes alone, as well as additional homes that are concerned in other ways with farm production. I am going to quote what the parliamentary assistant said, as reported at page 2595 of Hansard:

> We must give some incentive to the people to put their money into venture capital, in our mines, in our forests, in aluminum plants and things like that.

Since these words were used by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance in this discussion I presume he was speaking for the Department of Finance. If that is true, it is not unreasonable for the dairy farmers to ask that they be given reasonable protection against the importation of oils which are produced in cheap labour countries on cheap land, with low taxes, and by people on a low standard of living. If the parliamentary assistant was expressing the policy of the Department of Finance in that connection, which he must have been—and I have no quarrel with his statement—surely it should carry forward and protect the dairy farmers of Canada. Always remember that of all the farmers in Canada the dairy farmer works the longest hours 365 days a year. He is—and I think even my wheat-growing farmer friends will agree with me in this—the backbone of agriculture in the country. I am sorry that I cannot move an amendment. More than ever during my term in parliament I regret the fact that I have not the ability to put before the government and before parliament just how serious the matter is in my opinion. Either we maintain the dairy industry in Canada or we do not.

Mr. Abbott: I wonder whether I may say a word. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member for Fraser Valley. He prefaced his remarks by saying he wondered whether he was in order. I do not think he was. I must confess I did not think my good friend the hon. member for Danforth was strictly in order either, but since he had made his remarks—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I want to know at what stage I was not in order. I was very circumspect, very careful to stick to excise taxes, pointing out why they were being raised. I resent the Minister of Finance saying that I was out of order.

Mr. Abbott: In order to explain that, Mr. Chairman, may I say it seemed to me that in suggesting import duties on vegetable oils it would more properly come under the resolution dealing with customs. I do not want to get into any quarrel with my hon. friend.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): On a point of order, if I may; I never for one moment suggested that a quarter of a cent a pound import duty be placed on vegetable oils. I say to the Minister of Finance that I recommended only an excise duty in a like manner as happened in 1936 under the Bailey amendment in the United States, which put an excise duty on vegetable oils going into the United States, but omitted entirely an import duty.

Mr. Abbott: I am not going to argue the point, but I am expressing the hope that we may not have to conduct here a debate as to the position of the dairy industry. Let it be understood at once that I am expressing no views as to the position of the dairy industry. I was born and brought up in one of the best dairy sections of Canada.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I was very careful not to mention the dairy industry at any stage.

Mr. Abbott: I am now referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I am just suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that we should try to restrict our comments to the excise taxes to be imposed—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): That is what the member for Danforth did all the way through.

Mr. Abbott: We will assume he was quite justified. There will be a 10 per cent sales tax on vegetable oils and on margarine of course, because both of these products are subject to sales tax. And if anyone wants to direct his remarks to that phase of it I think he will be strictly in order; but I do express the hope that he will not get into a discussion as to the position of the dairy industry. If the dairy industry is entitled to protection under the customs tariff, then appropriate representations should be made to the government, because it is the government that decides these things. If it seems justified, no doubt a tariff will be put on; but the trend in recent years, as the committee knows, has been not to increase tariffs. I do not very often get much support, even if I were prepared to suggest it myself, for that policy. But nevertheless, that is a matter which comes primarily, I think, under the customs tariff. So far as I know we impose now no special excise taxes as such on any imported products. We have tariffs on a wide variety of them, but there are no special excise taxes on imported products. I would appeal to the committee to try and stick as closely as possible to the excise tax.

Mr. Cruickshank: I would like to ask the minister a question. Am I to understand that the dairy council has not asked the government for any excise tax on imported oil?

Mr. Abbott: I do not recall that we had any representation.

Mr. Cruickshank: You have a very short memory.

Mr. Abbott: In relation to the tariff, there is a varying—I sent out for information as to the tariff. There are tariffs imposed at varying rates on imported vegetable oils, but perhaps it would be better for me to practise what I preach, and that I give that information on the customs tariff.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

[Mr. Abbott.]

The Chairman: Order. Before going any further I should like to know if any other hon. member wants to comment on the point of order raised by the amendment of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Page Mr. Knowles.

Mr. Knowles: When I get an invitation, sir, from yourself, and from the Minister of Public Works, it is pretty hard to resist it.

The Minister of Finance suggested shortly after my colleague from Moose Jaw moved his amendment that your previous ruling, that on the amendment offered earlier today by the hon. member for Peace River, applied in this instance. As I recall, there were two aspects of the ruling you made an hour or so ago. In part that ruling dealt with the question as to whether or not an amendment in ways and means was in order if it proposed to substitute a tax in blanket form. The other aspect of your ruling had to do with the question as to whether or not a proposal for a tax that comes under income tax legislation was relevant when the matter of excise tax was before the committee.

I notice, sir, that you are nodding your head. I shall assume that I am correct that your ruling contained those two parts, and I shall now deal with them, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has suggested that the same ruling should apply to the present amendment.

With respect to the first part I think it is only fair that I be permitted to put on the record the fact that in recent times, to my knowledge, there have been four amendments of this type made in committee of ways and means. There may be others; but there are four, the records of which I have here.

On March 22, 1948, as recorded at page 2490 of Hansard, when the Excise Tax Act resolution was before us, I moved:

> That clause 1 of the proposed resolution as amended and clauses 2, 3 and 4 be deleted therefrom, and that the following be substituted therefor:
> "That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose taxation upon excess profits to the extent necessary to maintain the balance of ways and means."

That amendment was allowed by the then deputy chairman, the present Senator Golding. Then, in 1949, as recorded at pages 1627 and 1628 of Hansard, an amendment was moved by my deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort, dealing with ice cream and similar commodities. That amendment was worded differently from the one in 1948. The 1949 amendment was ruled out of order by the deputy chairman, the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges. That ruling was the one that you, sir, as chairman of the present committee, quoted an hour ago when you were dealing with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River.

The next amendment in the series is the one I moved only a few days ago, on April 26 of this year, as recorded at page 2415 of Hansard. My amendment on that occasion was:

> That clause 1 of the proposed resolution be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:
> "That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose an additional tax on spirituous liquors to the extent necessary to maintain the balance of ways and means."

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance took objection to that amendment on the ground that it should have given a specific amount. But you, sir, being in the chair on that occasion, although you did say you would like to have had time to think it over to a greater extent, nevertheless expressed the opinion that it was in order and you put the question.

Of the three amendments I have just quoted, two were allowed. Those two were in precisely the same language, using the expression, "to the extent necessary to maintain the balance of ways and means." One of those three, namely the middle one, which was ruled out of order, was worded in language different from that of the two allowed. I ask you to note that the one that was disallowed was worded differently from the other two.

The fourth of the amendments in these series is the one moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Peace River. It was worded in the same way as the two that were allowed, namely the one I moved in 1948, which was allowed by Mr. Golding, and the one I moved last Thursday which was allowed by yourself.

You, sir, today chose to reverse your ruling of last week on the basis of the ruling of the deputy chairman on November 10, 1949. But in reversing your ruling you did say that what was wrong with it was that it did not set out a tax specific in amount.

I cannot quarrel with the ruling you made on the amendment of the hon. member for Peace River. I sought to do so, but I was stopped. My suggestion is, however, that the ruling you gave then laid down a point which has been met by my colleague from Moose Jaw. You said that what was wrong with the last amendment was that it did not set out a tax specific in amount. The hon. member for Moose Jaw has now presented an amendment which sets out the specific amount of $16 million, which is the amount which would be lost by dropping the tax on electric refrigerators, stoves and washing machines. Furthermore the amendment of the hon. member for Moose Jaw uses the key words which were held to be in order by Mr. Golding on March 22, 1948, and by yourself only last week, on April 26, 1951, namely the words, "to maintain the balance of ways and means."

I submit therefore that, with respect to the first aspect of the ruling you gave an hour ago, the point has been met and the amendment should be allowed. In this connection I think notice should be taken again of citation 500 in Beauchesne's third edition, which states:

> Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, examples of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as, for instance, a proposal to substitute probate and legacy duty on real property as an alternative for an inhabited house duty, the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the crown.

I think that at some point in our attempt to make an amendment based upon the right set out in that citation we should have the matter settled. If you have ruled that the kind of amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River today is out of order because it does not set out a specific amount, you should therefore rule the present amendment in order because it does what you ask, and does what citation 500 says is in order, namely it proposes to substitute another tax of an equivalent amount for that proposed by the government.

The government proposal is for a tax on electric refrigerators, stoves and washing machines which the Minister of Finance says will raise $16 million. The hon. member for Moose Jaw asks that that tax be dropped, and that there be a tax on capital gains to the extent of $16 million to maintain the balance of ways and means.

I leave that first aspect of your ruling of an hour ago—although by this time, it may be an hour and a quarter ago—and come to the second aspect of it, namely, as to whether it is good practice on a resolution dealing with the Excise Tax Act to move an amendment that seeks to alter both the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. I take it that any tax on capital gains would have to be imposed under the Income Tax Act.

In this connection I am going to rely on another authority, this time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

Mr. Abbott: He is not an authority on procedure. I yield the palm to you there.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Finance has made statements on two occasions which I think are to the point at this time. Last evening when we were discussing procedure —we are spending a lot of time on that in this budget debate, and it could have been avoided so easily—I proposed that we deal with this present resolution in an orderly fashion and discuss it paragraph by paragraph even if we did not take a vote at the end of each paragraph. The Minister of Finance objected and said that the whole resolution was before us and as long as it was before us hon. members ought to be free to jump from a discussion of one tax to a discussion of another, or hon. members who were not here when one tax was up for discussion should be able when they came in to discuss a tax that had been discussed previously.

If the Minister of Finance takes that position I think he should be logical and the committee should be logical and realize that we have before us, not just the one resolution but the whole budget presented by the minister. When the minister finished his speech on the night of April 10 he did not present to the committee just one resolution, he presented several. He presented a resolution having to do with the Income Tax Act, one having to do with the Excise Tax Act—

Mr. Abbott: Three.

Mr. Knowles: And one having to do with the Customs Tariff. That makes three, and three is several, so we are all agreed. There are three resolutions before this committee of ways and means. Furthermore, my same authority, the Minister of Finance, when speaking in the house on the budget on the night of April 10, as reported on page 1812 of Hansard, said:

> If hon. members have succeeded in following my estimates of additional tax yields they will realize that my proposals so far leave me about $100 million short of my necessary objective of $400 million to balance this year's budget. My range of choice to secure this remaining $100 million is really limited to more than doubling the increase I have already proposed in the personal income tax, which could only be achieved by a sharp lowering of exemption levels, or an increase in the sales tax.

I do not agree with the Minister of Finance when he says that he is limited to two alternatives. However, I ask you to note that the Minister of Finance suggested that the point was reached where he had to decide between two forms of taxation to achieve a balance. Something was said the other night by Mr. Speaker about private members having the same rights as ministers. We were discussing another point of order at that time. I submit that, if the Minister of Finance has the right to survey the whole field of taxation and decide whether he is to raise the money that he is short by taxation under the Excise Tax Act or by taxation under the Income Tax Act, the committee has that same right.

We now have before us three proposals, but we are dealing in particular with two resolutions, one with regard to the Income Tax Act and one with regard to the Excise Tax Act. We should have the right to register our decision. The minister has decided to raise what he is short by an increase in the sales tax and in other excise taxes. We suggest that some of the money that the minister proposes to raise under the Excise Tax Act should not be raised in that manner but should be raised by means of a capital gains tax, even though that comes under the other resolution. As a matter of fact, if the resolutions had been taken up in committee of ways and means in the order in which the minister put them on the order paper we would have dealt first with the Income Tax Act resolution. However, the minister proposed that we deal with this resolution first, which was his privilege.

My point is that the whole of the minister's budgetary proposals are before us. If there is any validity in citation 500 in Beauchesne's third edition—a similar citation will be found at page 431 of Bourinot—if there is any substance in the right of the committee of ways and means to propose an alternative so long as the balance of ways and means is maintained, the committee should be able to exercise that right in the form set out in the amendment of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

To recapitulate, because the hon. member for Moose Jaw asks for a tax which is an alternative to the one proposed by the government, he is in order under citation 500. He meets the provisions of citation 500 and he meets the requirement you added this afternoon by naming the specific amount of $16 million. He meets the requirement that the balance of ways and means be maintained; he says so right in his amendment. As to relevancy, I suggest, as I have just been arguing, that we have all the minister's budgetary proposals before us and we should have the right to move a substitute tax as is contended by the authorities on procedure.

The Chairman: I thank the hon. member for his able remarks. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw reads:

> That clause 4 of the proposed resolution be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

"That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose taxation on capital gains to the extent of $16 million so as to maintain the balance of ways and means."

In my opinion this amendment represents no substantial change from the earlier amendment. It is true that the total amount to be raised is stated, but it is necessary to specify the rate of the tax to be imposed. Let me quote again my previous ruling: "This question was settled by a chairman's ruling on November 10, 1949, where it was made clear that the tax to be substituted must be specific and must clearly preserve the balance of ways and means". If the ruling were otherwise, the persons affected would not be aware of the rate of taxes to be applied to them. I think that my present ruling comes within the sense, if not the wording, of my earlier ruling. As a second ground, I rule that this amendment concerning a capital gains tax is not relevant to this Excise Tax Act resolution (see citation 344 of Beauchesne's third edition). The rule of relevancy in amendments applies in committee as in the house, and the amendment is out of order on this ground also.

Mr. Knowles: I appeal from your ruling.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Thatcher moved an amendment to clause 4 of the Excise Tax Act resolution as follows:

"That clause 4 of the proposed resolution be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

'That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose taxation on capital gains to the extent of $16 million so as to maintain the balance of ways and means'."

The chairman ruled that the amendment was out out of order on the ground that the tax to be substituted was not sufficiently specific and was irrelevant to the excise tax resolution. From that decision Mr. Knowles and others appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee of ways and means:

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the Liberal majority in this chamber has decreed that we must take this omnibus excise tax resolution in toto rather than section by section, I find myself in the same position as other hon. members in the committee, namely, that I have no choice but to vote against the resolution in its entirety. I shall do that not because I am opposed to every section of the resolution but because I am so greatly opposed to certain sections, particularly paragraphs 1 and 4, that I cannot support the resolution. I was prepared to support a number of the amendments which you, Mr. Chairman, in your wisdom have decreed to be out of order; and I find that it would probably be difficult to move any amendment or to suggest any changes which will likely be acceptable.

I particularly want to deal with paragraph 1, that pertaining to the sales tax. I am opposed to the sales tax on fairly general principles; and I think those principles were stated very clearly by the executive council of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in a letter forwarded to the Prime Minister on January 17 of this year. It is not always that I find myself in agreement with the chamber of commerce—

Mr. Gibson: They must be wrong.

Mr. Noseworthy: —but in this particular I am. As to the sales tax, they say they are opposed to it on the ground that:

> . . . indirect taxes are hidden taxes and as such are not conducive to public tax-consciousness and hence lead to indifference rather than careful scrutiny of government expenditures.

I think that is one fairly good ground on which to oppose the sales tax and, certainly, the increase in the sales tax which has been proposed in the budget.

I am opposed to the sales tax because I fail to see how that tax can have any other effect upon the cost of living than to increase it. I cannot see how that tax can be increased without, at the same time, adding further to the increased cost of living. Certainly with the cost of living rising, as indicated in the statement this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I suggest that we in this parliament should be taking measures to halt or to reduce that cost rather than measures which, I think we must all admit, can do nothing more than raise that cost still higher.

To the extent that this increased sales tax raises the cost of living, it will give to workers across this country an added incentive to ask for increases in pay and we shall have that deadly spiral continuing. We shall be going on from one increase to another. To the extent that this tax raises the cost of living, it will also raise the cost of government. It will raise the cost price of those things that the government itself must purchase, and that increased cost will be felt in government at every level. It will be felt in increased cost of government at the federal, the provincial and the municipal level. Every municipal council across this country will find itself obliged to increase its mill rate because of this rising cost of living, to which the tax we have proposed in this present resolution will be a contributing factor.

I think economists are agreed that a hidden sales tax has the effect of retarding business. So far as it retards business, the government will lose in other forms of taxation possibly more than it will gain from an increase in the sales tax. I do not know just what consideration the minister has given to the extent to which an increased sales tax will retard business activity; but economists everywhere are agreed that that is the effect of a sales tax upon business. One hundred United States economists, in a signed statement to a former president of the United States, had this to say:

> A sales tax reduces real wages, diminishes purchasing power, and puts a brake on industrial and business activity.

I submit that this is no time for us to consider the application of measures which will reduce real wages and diminish purchasing power of our people, and put a brake on industrial and business development. We have heard a great deal in this house, and particularly from members of the cabinet, concerning the need for increased production. We have heard a great deal to the effect that if we are to stabilize the rising cost of living, if we are to check it, we must do so by increased production. I submit that the increase in the sales tax will retard rather than increase production. It will have the effect of retarding production at a time when production is very essential.

A sales tax adversely affects the small businessman in contrast with larger business concerns. Here again we must agree that larger concerns carrying a much greater variety of goods and at varying high and low prices are in a much better position to pass the tax on in the aggregate than is a small business. The tax favours big business, as do many other measures introduced by this government, and as do many other policies being followed by this government. I shall have more to say on that point later.

A sales tax again bears hardest on the poor, and those less able to bear that tax. Even with no sales tax on most of the essential foods, on certain building materials, and with other exemptions, the poor man who today has to clothe and house a family will find his tax bearing more heavily upon him than will the wealthy bachelor who has no one to clothe or to house but himself.

While certain essential articles are exempt from the sales tax, nevertheless many of the ingredients that are used in some of these finished products which are exempt are themselves taxed, and indirectly the sales tas has an effect upon the price of many of the articles that are supposed to be exempt from the tax.

Clothing, household furniture, children's clothes and shoes, are just about as essential in a country with our climate as is food. It is just as essential to keep a pair of shoes on a child's feet in this country as it is to keep a roof over that child's head. In taxing that clothing and many of the articles that are required in a home, the government is making it more difficult—more difficult than is necessary—for those who are attempting to keep homes together and to raise families in this country to do so.

Mr. John H. Gray, former president of the American Economic Association, has this to say regarding sales tax:

> The sales tax is one more attempt to put the burden of taxes on the poor. It violates every canon of taxation accepted in the civilized world for 150 years.

It is a little surprising to find a Liberal government increasing the sales tax by 25 per cent. So far as I know the two other outstanding countries, except Canada, in the world today, that can boast of a 10 per cent sales tax are Russia and Spain. There is in both of these countries a 10 per cent sales tax. The Liberal government is certainly putting Canada in good company when it puts us in a class with either of those countries. As a matter of fact if the Liberals of this government—if there are any Liberals left in the government—were loyal or true to the professed principles of Liberalism they would have wiped out the sales tax altogether instead of seeking now to increase it. The one party that down through the years of Canadian history has most steadfastly opposed the imposition of sales tax has been the Liberal party. If you follow the history of the sales tax in other countries you will find that in every country and in every age it has been those governments that were farthest removed from the common people and who were most reactionary in their policies that have led the world in the imposition of the sales tax, led the way that this government is following at the present time.

Ways and means have been suggested to the minister from this side of the house whereby the sales tax, as referred to in clause 1, and the tax referred to in clause 4, could be avoided or alternative means of providing the necessary funds be found. The government has steadfastly refused to accept any of those suggestions. They will, in their steamroller style, force this Excise Tax Act through parliament. I do not doubt for a moment that, regardless of what the people of this country may think, those who sit on the Liberal benches will follow the direction of government ministers and vote to support this act.

If hon. members were duly concerned with the critical situation in which the country finds itself today, and gave recognition to the one control which parliament exercises over government, this government would not get a grant of even one dollar from parliament until some satisfactory steps were taken to curb the rising cost of living, instead of adopting measures that can only further increase that cost. If those sitting on the Liberal benches would consider, instead of government policy, the express wishes of the majority of the people in this country, they would line up with the opposition groups and refuse to grant one dollar to the government until steps are taken to check the rising cost of living.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a question about paragraph 5 which deals with the excise tax on cigarette papers and cigarette paper tubes, something about which I do not know as much as perhaps some other hon. members. Representations have been made to me by small grocers concerning the position in which they are left owing to the fact that they had on hand, as of April 10, stocks of these papers on which they had paid the tax.

As the minister knows, when the tax did apply to these cigarette papers the amount of that tax was more than the cost of the papers. It has been represented to me by small grocers that the mark-up on these papers was very slight and the profit very small, and that they are left in a most unfavourable position so far as their stock of cigarette papers is concerned.

By virtue of the minister's announcement on April 10 there can be no refunds in connection with stocks on hand. How long has the practice obtained that was reflected in that announcement? In addition to any formal answer the minister might make, would he add something that shows he appreciates—as I urge him to appreciate it—the position in which these small grocers are placed.

Mr. Abbott: I am aware of the situation. The practice of granting no refunds is one which has existed for many years, virtually from the beginning of the imposition of these taxes. Information which has been reaching me is that in fact the retailers are working off their stocks at the old price, and that they have not reduced the price. Then of course there is some compensating advantage in the fact that their inventories of tobacco would have been tax-paid at the lower price. So that if they followed the usual and legitimate practice of charging for inventory on hand the tax-paid price, thereby providing for possible future reductions in taxes when they would have stocks on hand at the higher prices, as was the case here in connection with cigarette tubes, then I think it is unlikely that there is any real hardship involved in the situation to which my hon. friend referred. I have had complaints that retailers are not reducing the prices on cigarette papers and tubes—and they are not obliged to do so.

Mr. Knowles: Representations made to me indicate real hardship. The amount involved is not great, perhaps, but when one considers the case of the small corner grocery store one must realize that it is not a big business. Any loss he has to take is a loss indeed. It seems to me from the position taken by the minister that if he denies to these people the right to get any refund, as he has just said, he is encouraging them to charge for taxes on stocks on hand in cases where they have not paid the taxes. We have complained about that; but the minister puts people in that position when he says to them, "That is what you have to do in order to make up for your other loss." Surely there is a better way.

Mr. Abbott: That has been the practice for a great many years, as most members of the committee are aware. The question of making refunds, when there are reductions in taxes on stocks in the hands of retailers, is completely impracticable and would leave the door open to grievous kinds of abuses.

In the eight or nine years I have been connected with the department and, I am told, long before that, the practice I announced in the budget, namely that there would be no refund on the cost of tax-paid goods, has been followed.

Mrs. Fairclough: I know for a fact that that has been the practice, but it works a great hardship on people who have goods in transit at the time the tax is lowered. Many times when goods are shipped by freight they are delivered as much as a month after the date of the lowering or the repeal of the tax. Those people must pay the tax, and then they are forced to absorb it. In some cases it involves large amounts.

Mr. Abbott: That is really a slow freight, if it takes a month.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure the minister remembers in particular the case of sugar.

Mr. Quelch: Would the minister explain in detail just what are the taxes on a package of cigarettes? I understand that on a package of twenty cigarettes the price of which is forty cents, around twenty-eight cents is taxation.

Mr. Abbott: The federal tax is now twenty-three cents on a package of twenty cigarettes, plus sales tax.

Mr. Argue: The second paragraph states that there shall be an excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs. What type of furs does this include? Is it all furs, or furs in the raw or finished state?

Mr. Abbott: Dressed and dyed furs.

Mr. Argue: I am not objecting to a tax on some furs, but I think in a country like Canada, where we have temperatures down to forty degrees below zero, a fur coat for a lady is certainly not a luxury. The tax should not be placed on those furs which ordinarily go into the making of one of the cheaper coats. Would the tax apply to the lambskins or sheepskins which go into the production of mouton?

Mr. Abbott: I am not an expert in furs, but I am informed it is not applied on sheepskin shearlings, whatever that may be; but it is on other dressed and dyed furs. I remember two or three years ago we had a sharp discussion as to whether a fur coat in a climate such as we have was a luxury. I was quite prepared to consider that it was not.

Mr. Fair: I believe the sheepskin shearlings would be the taxes the minister is going to collect from the taxpayers when this budget is passed. The Minister of National Revenue will look after gathering up the fleeces. It does not matter whether people have even their shorts on, as was suggested a few nights ago by the hon. member for Macleod, the Minister of National Revenue will get his pound of flesh anyway.

Mr. Abbott: The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggests that it might be described as the golden fleece.

Mr. Fair: I was going to ask the Minister of Finance whether there are any taxes in addition to the 23 cents that he intends to collect, plus the sales tax. Are there any provincial or other taxes levied on raw tobacco that are not included?

Mr. Abbott: I understand that there are in some provinces. I am not too conversant with the provinces other than my own province of Quebec, but I do know that in Quebec there are additional taxes.

Mr. Quelch: The 23 cents is before the minister's tax is applied?

Mr. Abbott: No, that includes the additional tax here.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, when speaking earlier this week on this Excise Tax Act amendment I expressed my unalterable opposition to clause 1. In doing that I was expressing also the unalterable opposition of my colleagues. During the past several days we have made a number of efforts designed to effect a change in this proposed amendment but up to the present time we have not been able to do that nor has the minister, on the other hand, been able to convince us that the revenue which he anticipates from clause 1 of this proposed amendment is justified in the light of the fact that undoubtedly he will have a surplus substantially above the amount which this tax will bring in.

Mr. Abbott: Prophecy is still a very gratuitous form of error.

Mr. Shaw: That is quite possible. Therefore I am going to move one more amendment. I assure you that there is ample precedent for moving an amendment of this character. I suggest that rather than spend a long period of time debating and discussing a point of order we should vote on this amendment. I move:

That clause 1 of the proposed amendment to the Excise Tax Act be deleted and that the remaining clauses be renumbered accordingly.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of convenience I would be delighted to accede to my hon. friend's suggestion and get the vote, but I would not want it to be held as a precedent against me or against any other minister of finance in future years. I think I must take the same point of order that I have had to take on similar occasions over a period of some years and say that this unquestionably affects the balance of ways and means and consequently is out of order.

Mr. Knowles: It could be that I might be getting a little tired of this myself.

Mr. Abbott: You have nothing on us.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I have to get organized a bit, but I am not taken completely at a loss by this amendment because I had thought earlier in the game that an amendment in the terms moved by the hon. member for Red Deer was one that should be moved, and I considered doing so. Hence I am glad that it has been moved.

As a matter of fact, last Thursday, after we had had our little battle over whether or not this resolution could be divided, an hon. member from the other side of the house met me in the hall at suppertime and asked me, "What are you fellows kicking about, why don't you move an amendment to delete any clauses you object to?" My reply was, "I tried that once a few years ago but was ruled out of order". I hope the chairman did not hear that.

Mr. Abbott: It has been done more than once.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You did not invent that.

Mr. Knowles: Nevertheless, I have since done some more research to see whether the ruling against me of a few years ago was in keeping with all the precedents in connection with this matter. As late as this morning I was still working on it. Going from Beauchesne to May I found citations which had footnotes that took me to certain volumes of the British Hansard. They are difficult to find at times. You go into the library and get an attendant to take you into one of those cubbyholes and if you do not want to go too far back you may find the volume. But if the volume is not there he has to take you out of the library and over to a vault underneath the Senate, of all places.

At any rate this morning I found in the British Hansard for 1909 the record of an incident which was quite a surprise to me. The hon. member for Red Deer says that that was the year in which he was born so it is quite appropriate to refer to this 1909 Hansard in support of his amendment. I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, that you will not mind my making the comment that to you this must seem like quite a recent precedent in view of the fact that last night you took us back to 1770.

I discovered in this 1909 British Hansard something that was quite a surprise to me in that it records one precedent which supports the position the Minister of Finance has taken, namely, that his resolution should be considered in its entirety.

Mr. Abbott: Justified at last.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear the minister welcoming my reference to this precedent and I hope he will be logical and continue to welcome the later chapter in the account that I shall give.

Mr. Abbott: I may want to divide your precedent.

Mr. Knowles: This took place on May 10, 1909, when Mr. Lloyd George was Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Asquith.

Mr. Knowles: I'm sorry; Mr. Lloyd George was chancellor of the exchequer. The financial critic appeared to be Mr. Austen Chamberlain. On May 10, 1909, as reported in the British Hansard starting at page 1463, Mr. Lloyd George introduced into the committee of ways and means a lengthy resolution having to do with various taxes on liquor at different stages. This resolution was quite complicated and it filled two full pages of the British Hansard.

After he had moved the resolution in committee the chairman apparently put it to the committee in its entirety and Mr. Austen Chamberlain objected. Mr. Austen Chamberlain suggested that it was a most complicated resolution containing table A, table B, table C, and then a breakdown of table C into two sections which were headed by Roman numerals, which in turn were broken down into sections headed by Arabic numerals and so on down the line. Mr. Austen Chamberlain took the view—

Mr. Abbott: No commas or periods?

Mr. Knowles: It was full of commas and periods.

An hon. Member: All in the right place.

Mr. Knowles: One of your colleagues has a mortgage on commas. As I say, Mr. Austen Chamberlain took the view that as it was so complicated it should be discussed seriatim. Mr. Lloyd George then said:

> May I submit to you, sir, that this resolution is purely a formal stage, with the view to authorizing me to introduce the finance bill, and that therefore I submit that it is proper that the whole of the licences should be included in one resolution, seeing that it is a formal stage to enable me to introduce the bill for licences in general.

Whereupon the chairman, Mr. Emmott, ruled on the point that had been raised by the member for East Worcestershire, Mr. Austen Chamberlain. The chairman said:

> It is quite true, as the right hon. member for East Worcestershire has said, that the time which I have occupied in reading this resolution has been quite an unusual draft on the time of the committee, but with regard to the question put to me as to the form of this resolution, my reply is that the resolution is such that I must take it as it is. I cannot say how far there is a precedent for a resolution of this length, but having regard to the fact that it deals entirely with licences for exciseable liquors, I cannot undertake to alter it.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain had some more to say despite the ruling of the chairman that he had no alternative but to accept it. A little later, however, Sir F. Banbury intervened and said:

> I wish to raise a point of an important character. Would it be in order to move that the resolution be divided into two?
> The Chairman: It would be in order to do so by amendment of course to the resolution, which would have the effect of dividing it into two parts.
> Sir F. Banbury: I beg to move that the resolution be divided into two parts.
> The Chairman: The hon. baronet has misinterpreted my meaning. I said that the hon. baronet might move an amendment which would have the effect of dividing the resolution into two parts . . .

In other words, he could not just move that it be divided into two parts. He had to move a resolution that had that effect. Whereupon another member of the opposition, Mr. James Hope, made a motion. He said:

> I propose to leave out the words "and sale" from the first paragraph headed "Excise liquor licences." That would have the effect of confining the discussions to the manufacturers licences.

If you turn back to the first line of the resolution you will find that it referred to taxes or licences for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor, but by deleting the two words "and sale" all of the taxes in that resolution that referred to the sale of liquor would be removed, and the only taxes left were the taxes relating to the manufacture of liquor. The chairman accepted the motion as in order. It was debated at length and eventually was voted on at pages 1474 and 1475. The amendment was defeated, but my point is that the situation is on all fours with what we have here in the house now. The chancellor of the exchequer, like our Minister of Finance, insisted on the resolution being treated as one resolution. The chairman agreed with the chancellor of the exchequer but thereafter—

Mr. Abbott: Pretty sound.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Finance says "pretty sound". If the chairman, Mr. Emmott, was sound on one point he was sound all the way through.

Mr. Abbott: That does not necessarily follow.

Mr. Knowles: Having taken that position, when a member then asked for the right to move an amendment to that one resolution, which had the effect of deleting a large section of the taxation proposed by the resolution, the chairman allowed that amendment as in order. Please note there was no suggestion of any substitution of another tax. That does not come into the picture at all. The right to move simply the deletion of a portion of the resolution thereby deleting part of the tax was recognized by the chairman and, as I say, it was put to a vote.

The next day, as found at page 1737 of the same volume of the British Hansard, the point came up again. I will not read it all this time.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: There was another motion—

An hon. Member: You are out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —in committee of ways and means. It had to do with land value taxation. Again it was a complicated motion, but it was not nearly as complicated as the one of the day before. It only had three sections, and on this occasion a member by the name of Captain Craig raised a point of order as to whether it had to be taken in its entirety or whether it could be divided. The chairman made the same ruling as he had made the day before—

Mr. Abbott: Sound again.

Mr. Knowles: —that it was one resolution. But then Mr. James Hope, the same fellow who raised the question the day before, said:

> I want to know whether it would be competent for an hon. member to move an amendment in the second line to leave out "duties" and insert "duty."

The result again was to cut the taxation effect of the resolution in half. The member went on to say:

> It would then, of course, be competent for the government to bring up a second resolution . . .

And so on. The chairman said:

> As far as I can see that would certainly be in order if the hon. member moved such an amendment.

I thought I heard the Minister of Finance say "sound again", or was it a voice which came from this side of the house?

Mr. Abbott: People can be right on one thing and wrong on others, you know.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I submit that there was more justification for the position taken in the British house than there is for the position taken here because the case on May 10 was a resolution, while complicated in form, dealing wholly with liquor, and the case on May 11, while complicated in form, dealt wholly with taxes on land values. Nevertheless the ruling was made that the resolution in each case had to be taken in its entirety, but along with that ruling was the ruling that members had the right to move for the deletion of a portion of the tax imposed by those composite or complicated resolutions. Therefore I submit—

Mr. Sinnott: You are out of order.

Mr. Knowles: —that we should have a little change in the monotony of these rulings against our amendments—

Mr. Sinnott: Sit down. You are out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —and that the amendment of the hon. member for Red Deer should be allowed. It is a very simple one and, as a Liberal member said to me in the hall at suppertime last Thursday, it gives us a chance to vote on the question in a very simple way. Surely the British precedent if it is good in the first instance is good in the second case as well.

Mr. Abbott: We must leave this to you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, just before you make a ruling on this point, I want to say that we have had so many amendments moved on different grounds that I should imagine it would be an extremely difficult thing to have clearly established what the pattern is that members of the house themselves have created out of these various rulings. It has, however, been apparent that there has been a clear desire on the part of some hon. members to have these items dealt with in such a way that this first item can be voted on. The decisions which have already been made would suggest that your likely decision now will be that this amendment is out of order.

Mr. Knowles: No, no.

Mr. Drew: I am afraid I must draw that as a likely conclusion, but whether or not that is so I propose if a vote is called in this case to vote in support in effect of the request that this tax be deleted because that is what we have been pressing for. If the vote means nothing more, I hope our vote will be taken as once again expressing our desire that this tax should be deleted.

An hon. Member: You are frustrated.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to thank all hon. members who have participated in the debate on this very important point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre particularly has studied the matter very carefully, and he has given us a lengthy interpretation of what he believes to be the correct procedure to follow. He agrees entirely in what he has quoted with the ruling that I gave the committee yesterday except for the last part where he finds that in the British house an hon. member was allowed to have a complicated question divided on a motion by deleting a portion of that question. We are agreed all along the line except on that one point. If the hon. member will look at citation 500 of Beauchesne, third edition, he will see why it would be very difficult for the chairman in the Canadian house at least to agree with him that a complicated question can be divided by a member moving that a certain portion of the resolution be deleted. Citation 500 says very clearly that it must not affect the balance of ways and means. Certainly the hon. member will admit that if this amendment should carry, deleting the first paragraph which provides that the rate of the general sales tax shall be increased from eight per cent to ten per cent, the balance of ways and means would be altered. Therefore I would have no alternative but to declare the amendment out of order.

On the other hand, the leader of the opposition has indicated that this discussion has revealed that hon. members generally would like to express their opinion on this particular paragraph. I have not the citation under my hand, but I am quite sure there is a citation in Beauchesne, third edition, stating that by unanimous consent the committee may set aside the rule. Should there be unanimous consent we could put the amendment and permit hon. members to express their opinions on this paragraph. I am in the hands of the committee; therefore I ask whether unanimous consent is given so that this vote may be taken.

Mr. Abbott: I have already indicated, Mr. Chairman, that in accordance with the well established rules of the house I shall welcome a vote on the sales tax question when the appropriate section of the Excise Tax Act is before the house. Under existing circumstances that is the only time I would be prepared to give unanimous consent to have the vote taken.

The Deputy Chairman: In the circumstances, then, I must regretfully declare the amendment out of order, for the reasons I have already given.

Mr. Shaw: I very much regret that under the circumstances I shall have to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

A motion by Mr. Shaw was ruled out of order, on the ground that it was not in order to move the deletion of a particular clause in an excise tax resolution because it alters the balance of ways and means.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Beaudoin of the committee of ways and means reports that Mr. Shaw moved an amendment to a resolution which was being considered by the committee. The chairman ruled that the amendment was out of order because it was not in order to move the deletion of a particular clause in an excise tax resolution because it altered the balance of ways and means. From that ruling there was an appeal by Mr. Shaw and others.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to direct your attention—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is rising on a point of order or on a question of privilege, he must wait until the vote is concluded.

Mr. Fulton: A question of privilege can be raised during the division.

Mr. Speaker: No.

After the taking of the vote, and the Clerk proceeding to announce the result of the vote:

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to direct your attention to the fact—

Mr. Boivin: Wait until the vote is recorded.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will hear the hon. member now.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to direct Your Honour's attention to the fact that an hon. member, namely, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), was not in his seat in the house when Your Honour put the question, but entered the house after Your Honour had put the question, and voted with the yeas, which under our rules is not permitted. Under citation—

An hon. Member: Small potatoes.

Mr. Fulton: Furthermore, another hon. member, the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott), left his seat after Your Honour put the question and while the vote was in process of being taken. I wish simply to refer to an earlier remark of Your Honour's. I think I should point out that my understanding is that a question of privilege may be raised during the course of a vote, but not a point of order. I would direct Your Honour's attention to citation 84 in Beauchesne, second edition, which reads as follows:

> The Speaker, when his attention has been called to a breach of order in the course of a division has directed that the division should proceed, and has dealt with the matter when the division was completed.

I believe there is a citation in Beauchesne, third edition, to the effect that a question of privilege can be raised during the course of a vote. It was in order that I might raise it in time before the result was announced that I rose earlier.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin: May I just rise not to answer the question of privilege but to make a comment to assist Your Honour in arriving at what I know will be an acceptable decision, even to the hon. gentleman. I was in the house. I was in the act of discussing a question with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), trying to persuade him about a point on another matter altogether. I moved from his seat to my own and voted—I hope I voted correctly.

Mr. Croll: I only want to confirm what the minister has said—and I was persuaded.

Mr. Speaker: Order. First, with regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), I might say that I shall be glad to receive any representations which he may make to me in the house or privately regarding when a point of order or a question of privilege which has been raised during a division should be considered. I have allowed him to state his question of privilege before the vote was announced. I think at least that is proper procedure. I shall take into consideration whether I should have allowed him to continue with his question of privilege, during the division.

He has referred to the fact that an hon member was not in the house when the question was put. The hon. member says that he was in the house when the question was put. We accept his word for that. However, I should point out that according to standing order No. 12 it is irregular for an hon. member to move from one place to another or to leave the chamber while a vote is being taken or before the vote is announced. May I say that from time to time I have noticed lately that a number of members have moved from their seats during the voting. The occurrence tonight was by no means the first time that it has taken place. I know all members of the house would appreciate it if hon. members would be in their own seats during the vote and would remain in their seats until the result of the vote is announced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

And the result of the vote having been announced, the house resumed in committee:

The Deputy Chairman: The Excise Tax Act resolution; is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Fair: First of all, I want to sympathize with His Honour the Speaker. I notice that he has quite a hoarse voice from disposing of the appeals that have been made against the rulings of the chairman. I feel satisfied that a number of the appeals that have been made would not be made if hon. members had a chance to express their opinion, or had the minister not brought in the iniquitous taxes contained in the resolution.

We have heard many times that Canada is supposed to be a Christian country. I am wondering whether Satan is not in control of the Minister of Finance, his advisers in particular, and those who are supporting him even in the votes here tonight and this afternoon. In this country we have many young men and young women who are working hard and honestly, trying to pay their way, pay their debts, and provide a decent standard of living for themselves and their families. We are told that the taxes are being levied at the present time for the purpose of guarding ourselves against the effects of communism. I am wondering whether the taxes that are to be levied, if the resolutions that are before us are passed, will not help to build up the communist organization in Canada. I have thought about that time after time during the past few days; in fact during the past week, I have thought about rising in my place several times and expressing this opinion. But we do not find any relief from the taxes. We are not even given a chance to vote on individual taxes as they are proposed by the Minister of Finance. I am not satisfied; people throughout the country are not satisfied. And while we are in grave danger, tonight's issue of the Journal gives this warning:

[Mr. Speaker.]

Emergency Keys Drive for Services
Darkening World Situation Makes Action Urgent

This is an article by James McCook, which begins in this way:

Confronted with a darkening world situation, the Canadian government is to start a program to get more men in the forces that will stop just short of conscription.

Then I would comment here that during the early part of the session those of us who were worrying about Canada's safety suggested that something be done to make preparations for what might ultimately come. The government took the stand at that time that it did not feel that was advisable. Apparently however that will soon be changed and, according to this article, the time is close at hand. It goes on to say:

Defence Minister Claxton will make what government sources termed an "important" statement in the Commons, probably tomorrow night.

He will emphasize the need for more men at once.

"When There Is Need."

He will set forth the important role of the reserve army, whose members can be called to active service when the country needs them.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I ask the hon. member if what he is quoting has any relation to the Excise Tax Act resolution?

Mr. Fair: I feel it is related very closely—in fact it is a sister of the resolution under discussion. This resolution is to provide money to protect us against communism. The heading I have read indicates that we are to make preparations for the building up of an army.

Mr. Abbott: There is a slight flaw in my hon. friend's logic.

Mr. Fair: And it will be some of the money raised under the resolution that will be used.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I think I should say a word. If that view were accepted we would be making a joke of the discussion in committee of ways and means. My hon. friend may talk as much as he likes, but he knows as well as I do that the main purpose of consideration of a resolution of this kind in the committee of ways and means is that of obtaining information from the government as to the probable extent and nature of the tax.

The hon. member is a member of long experience in the house, and he knows that as well as I do. To discuss the armed forces under this resolution is I think completely absurd.

The Deputy Chairman: I am inclined to agree with the views expressed by the minister. I think the hon. member should direct his remarks to the resolution under consideration.

Mr. Fair: If this is offensive to the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Abbott: No, go ahead. I just asked the hon. member to observe the rules, that is all.

Mr. Fair: I have read the effective part I wanted to read.

An hon. Member: We can read.

Mr. Fair: I do not have to read my speeches. I can make them without reading.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Fair: And if those silent partners who are sitting opposite me in the Liberal benches want to get up and make a speech, and tell us what they think about this tax, I shall be very glad to sit down, keep quiet and let them express their opinions about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fair: But when I am speaking I want them to keep quiet, as they have done throughout the session on this and many other important matters, up to the present time.

An hon. Member: Silence is golden.

Mr. Fair: I know that before these taxes were levied many of our most honest citizens were not able to earn enough money to give them a decent standard of living. When these taxes are levied, what will be the result? As I said a while ago, the government wants to get more men to join the army. While people are being treated like this, and every encouragement is given by government policy to an adherence to communism, I feel that to cut down the standard of living of our workers is working against the best interests of the country.

I do not know whether I should say more.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Fair: Some say "go ahead." I am protesting in particular against this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. When I first entered politics in 1935 I remember clearly the Liberal candidate going around the country and bawling out the Conservatives for having introduced a 6 per cent sales tax. But one of the first things the Liberal government did in 1936 was to increase that tax by 33⅓ per cent. We have had that 8 per cent tax ever since, along with many other taxes including an increased income tax, which I am not allowed to talk about at the present time. Perhaps there will be another occasion later when I can say something about that.

In the present budget the sales tax is jumped another 25 per cent, up to 10 per cent. Yet the government wants the cooperation of all the people of Canada—this wonderful party on the government's side which came into office with 47 per cent of the votes of the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Forty-nine per cent.

Mr. Fair: They are going to tax us still further. But the people apparently like taxation because some of them were foolish enough when they had the chance only a couple of years ago to continue to support these taxation measures.

An hon. Member: Fifty-four per cent according to the last Gallup poll.

Mr. Fair: Would the silent partner keep quiet, please.

An hon. Member: You can't take it, eh?

Mr. Fair: I can take it, and I can give it, too. This is an indication of the idea of some of the supporters of the government: When I left here at six o'clock I walked along the corridor with a Liberal member who suggested that this appealing against the chairman's ruling was all foolishness—"What have we a chairman for, anyway? We should abide by his ruling." I disagreed with him, entirely. While I have great respect for the Chairman, for Mr. Speaker and for Mr. Deputy Speaker, I still say they are not infallible. I have every respect for the three gentlemen to whom I have referred, but I do not think we should always bow to their rulings. If we do not have the opportunity to express ourselves otherwise then we have to take the only course left open to us.

Mr. Gibson: Hara-kiri.

Mr. Fair: I do not know who that was who spoke about his relatives' methods of doing things, but I am not suggesting anything as drastic as that. However, I would like to have some of these taxes taken care of, particularly the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax, and the increase in the excise tax on many of the items mentioned here in recent days.

I feel the tax on refrigerators, washing machines, electric and gas stoves should not be left on at this time. I would feel strongly, too, that the additional excise tax being imposed in connection with motorcars is not a proper one because, as has been pointed out before, cars are a necessity for a number of our workers who live in the suburbs of the cities. They may have no bus accommodation; it may be too far to walk, and if they cannot buy motorcars at reasonable prices I wonder how they are going to get to work and get home again after their day's work is done.

I am not going to say any more at this time except to suggest that last night I saw a picture showing some of the exploits of Robin Hood. If we had a Robin Hood at this time, instead of what we have over here in the person of the Minister of Finance, perhaps we would have a little better distribution of the goods Canada can produce.

Many of us are not seriously affected by these taxes because we have our indemnities, and some have other means of getting along. But we must think of those who are starting out, and who are doing an honest day's work or an honest week's work in the building up of our economy. There should be some consideration for them.

If we had a Robin Hood who would take from those who have and give to those who have not, but who are making an honest attempt, it would be a good thing for Canada.

Mr. Abbott: I am not too keen a student of history, but my recollection is that Robin Hood took from the rich and gave to the poor.

Mr. Fair: I do not want the poor fellow, who has barely enough to keep him alive, have what he has taken from him and given to the rich fellow because there are still a lot of them around today even if we will not admit it.

Mr. Abbott: I was questioning your reference to Robin Hood.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, just one word before the vote is taken. I know the minister must feel rather disappointed that there has been delay in getting the resolutions through and doubtless the government has felt disappointed, but we have been in earnest in our fight. We have taken into consideration the fact that the government exists today on the support they obtained in 1949 from not more than 47½ per cent of the voters of Canada. That means that over 50 per cent of those people are represented on this side of the house. That is the first important thing. The second important fact is that we can guarantee that not less than 90 per cent of the people of Canada are opposed to the imposition of these sales and excise taxes against which we have been protesting.

An hon. Member: One hundred per cent.

Mr. Low: If you like, 100 per cent. Since it has been shown that there are other sources from which the minister could get revenue if he needs revenue to balance his ways and means, and since we have pointed out that the minister may not need any more revenue than he would get if he did not put on these two extra taxes, in the light of these facts we felt that it was our responsibility to the people of Canada to fight them just as long as it was possible so to do. We are not through yet by any means. We may have to yield on the resolution but there is a bill coming up. I am just serving notice now, and repeating what I said some days ago, that if this opposition which represents more than half the people of Canada will band together and fight for the principle we have been fighting for during the last seven days we can bring this government to the point where they will have to yield. That is all there is to it.

I for one am prepared to stay here until Christmas if that is necessary, to fight this battle for the people of this country. I am only saying that that is the reason we have put up this battle. We put it up because we were convinced in our hearts that these impositions should not be made at this time.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this debate has been too long and I do not question for one moment the bona fides of any hon. members who have opposed the imposition of the sales tax and these excise taxes and the other things to which opposition has been indicated. One of the responsibilities of a minister of finance, and the government of which he is a member, is to take the decision as to the way in which the burden which he and the government feel is necessary to place upon the people of the country must be shared.

That decision was taken and presented to the house. I think the opposition parties have made it abundantly clear that they are opposed to some of the features of these proposals. That is the job of the opposition parties. I do not think the people of the country are under any illusion that the opposition are not opposed to the government's financial proposals. What the opposition would do if they had the responsibility of putting forward the proposals is a different matter and one into which I do not propose to go. I am quite satisfied to have had this discussion and I do not criticize any hon. member for the time he has taken in presenting his point of view.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, just a few words. First, I want to point out that if a vote is taken on this resolution it should be noted that it involves tax increases to the extent of $194 million. It involves also certain tax decreases, but they amount to only $14 million. Since we are denied the right of voting on the sections individually and are faced with the necessity of voting on the resolution as a whole we have to look at it in its entirety. We see it as a resolution that grants relief of only $14 million by way of decreases but imposes $194 million by way of increased taxation. Since we have to take the resolution as a whole, good and bad together, and since there is so little good in it and so much bad, we are opposed to it.

In connection with the way in which the Minister of Finance proposes to raise his additional revenue, may I point out one significant feature. According to the table which he placed on Hansard at page 1814 we are given the amount in dollars which the different increases in taxation will produce. We find that the sales tax will produce an increase of $105 million over what it would have produced had the increase in the rate not been made. We find that the other excise taxes will produce $89 million in revenue more than would have been the case if the taxes had not been raised. We find that the personal income tax will increase by only $85 million, and the corporation income tax by $126 million.

Mr. Abbott: That is for the balance of the current year, not for a full year.

Mr. Knowles: That is right. I am making a comparison between things that are comparable.

Mr. Abbott: I suggest to my hon. friend that the fairer comparison would be for the full year. The excise taxes took effect immediately but there is a lag in the income taxes. I would refer my hon. friend to the second column.

Mr. Knowles: I am referring to the third table on page 1814.

Mr. Abbott: Read $125 million for the full year.

Mr. Knowles: All right.

Mr. Abbott: I think that is a fairer comparison.

Mr. Knowles: For the full year the increase in the sales tax would be $125 million rather than $105 million; in the income tax, $158 million rather than $85 million; in the other excise taxes, $110 million rather than $89 million. It is true that taking these figures the percentages I want to give would be altered. I shall be perfectly fair and say that they would be different, but I have not the time to work out the percentages now that I am on my feet. But I want to give the percentages that apply in this year because after all that is what counts. Before we get to another fiscal year no doubt there will be other changes in the minister's fiscal policy. What we want to deal with now is the tax that applies to the fiscal year 1951-52, and these changes are indicated in the table that I have referred to on page 1814.

Taking the actual number of dollars which the minister proposes to get over and above the number of dollars he would have got if he had not made these increases, the results are that from personal income tax the increase would be 10·8 per cent; from sales tax, 21·2 per cent; and from the other excise taxes an increase of 37·3 per cent. If we were to take these two categories of excise taxes and put them together, namely, the general sales tax and the other excise items such as taxes on refrigerators, stoves, washing machines and so on, the over-all average of the excise taxes has increased the revenue to be taken from the Canadian people by 26·4 per cent. I ask that the committee set these two main figures alongside each other. The increased revenue to be taken by the treasury from the Canadian people on the basis of income tax, the tax that is nearer to being fair, the tax that is based on ability to pay, is only 10·8 per cent. The increase to be taken by taxes on commodities, the kind of taxation which is not based on ability to pay, is in the over-all picture an increase of 26·4 per cent.

It is my contention that even before these changes were made there was too large a proportion of government revenue taken in commodity taxes as opposed to the proportion taken by the fairer method, namely, the income tax. By the changes being made in this resolution along with the other one, that already unfair proportion is being made just that much worse. For this reason, as well as for the reason I gave earlier when I pointed out that the net effect of this resolution is $180 million increased taxation on commodities, we in this group are opposed to this resolution.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, before we vote, I wonder if members of the house yet realize what these imposts mean. There are tens of thousands of people throughout Canada who today are at their absolute wits' end to know how to live. Let it not be forgotten that the bailiff is on the job. He is going around from house to house, from street to street and threatening people with ejection from their homes. He is threatening to seize their furniture and sell it. Taxes in the communities are being increased, many of them will be increased still further by reason of these imposts, and the bailiff is around threatening their homes with seizure if they are unable to pay their taxes.

What is actually happening is that the Minister of Finance is thrusting his mischievous hands in the pockets of the people and taking out from them the very money which people have to have in order to be able to live. This is more serious than words can make it appear. The minister just smiles about it. I would think there is cause for tears. I know in the town in my constituency where I live there are a good many people who have already shed tears by reason of these imposts. If they were absolutely necessary it would be a different thing but they are not necessary, not by any manner of means. If we are managing our country on a financial system that makes measures like these necessary then the sooner we change that financial system the better.

Mr. Fleming: Change the government.

Mr. Blackmore: Surely everyone can see that something has gone radically wrong when a country as wealthy as Canada in every respect, with the type of people Canadians are, has to have imposts of this kind thrust upon the people even before we are at war. That is what we are faced with. I said a few minutes ago that this kind of measure is not necessary. I have already made two speeches on debt-free money during the last few days. A great many people have disregarded the speeches but let me tell them they disregarded those speeches at their peril.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not threatening anybody but if you once get the people in this country to the point where they begin to believe that it is absolutely impossible to elect a government that will rule them decently, then you can imagine what they will do.

An hon. Member: A Social Credit government.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course. There is no question about that. Social Credit will solve the problem. We have a lot of people who know as much about Social Credit as they do about what is on the other side of Mars. Yet they are laughing like silly fools, cackling like jackdaws. We have got to the point now where something must be done other than the imposition of taxation measures like these. There are any number of people who will cackle away about the proposals of Social Credit but they have no arguments to offer against them. They do not dare to try to answer the arguments of Social Credit. The Minister of Finance does not dare to try to answer them. He does not dare to because he knows he cannot refute the arguments of Social Credit.

We are faced now with a situation where we must have money; we will all grant that. But to take money away from people by such a nefarious tax as the sales tax is a scandal to this nation. Let me just show the minister the absurdities that are involved. He has implied, and the bank managers all over the country, bless their dear hearts, have been trying to convey, that you have got to tax more in order to curb inflation. The minister has tried to get us to believe this taxation is an anti-inflationary measure, that one of the reasons for this tax is to oppose inflation. Why oppose inflation? Because he presumes that we have a shortage of goods in Canada, and the dear member for Greenwood supported him. "We have got too many dollars chasing too few goods" they say. He maintains or tries to pretend or establish the idea that we have a shortage of goods and too many dollars chasing the goods. He says that therefore we have got to take the dollars out of circulation so that the prices of goods will come down.

Let me just show you the kind of situation the minister is in, and let him figure his way out of it. At page 1762 of Hansard of April 9 the Minister of Trade and Commerce had certain things to say, and I ask all these people who know so much to listen to what is said here.

An hon. Member: Oh, we hear you.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Blackmore: The important thing is to use your heads for thinking instead of rattling something.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I ask the hon. member to address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, did you ask me to address you? I shall be happy to do so. I love talking to you, Mr. Chairman. Listen to these words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said:

> I am sure that we can get along quite comfortably as consumers and still engage in a substantial defence effort. A few things may in the course of time become unavailable or relatively scarce, but standards of living will remain high. Unless all-out war comes. Canadians can continue to live well.

How many tens of thousands of people will these taxes make unable to live well?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: There are tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, who are not now living well, and I defy the Minister of Finance to say they are. I defy any member on the government side to say they are. Hundreds of thousands of them are not living well now.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Blackmore: In Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary, Saskatoon, Regina, Halifax, Vancouver, Victoria. Name all the cities in the country and you will find them by the thousands.

Mr. McCann: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: The well-fed Minister of National Revenue has quite a lot to say on these matters. It would not take me very long to guide him through Ottawa and show him thousands of people who are suffering right here in the city of Ottawa within a mile or so of this house. They are suffering, and this proposes to make them suffer more, though the Minister of Trade and Commerce has solemnly declared in this house that people in Canada do not need to suffer. How does the Minister of Finance figure his way out of this? That is what we want to know. He cannot do it. Is he prepared to contradict what the Minister of Trade and Commerce says regarding the supply position in Canada? If he is not, if he has to concede that his colleague knows what he is talking about, then the Minister of Finance cannot possibly justify the imposition of such taxation in order to decrease the cost of living.

Very well; one of the main reasons he advances or tries to suggest for imposing these taxes is completely swept away. Surely everyone can see that. His next argument is that we have to raise the money. Well, I am going to state once more, even at the expense of having a good number of shallow people laugh about it, that today this government can create the money the minister proposes to raise, every single dollar of it, with the power of the government conferred upon it by the Canadian constitution, and put that money into circulation without causing the slightest ripple in the price structure. Why do I say that? Because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has pointed out very clearly that we have enough goods so the people can live well; and certainly putting $400 million or $500 million more into circulation among the poor is not going to make them live any more than just fairly well. Those are the fundamental facts which confront us as Canadians.

Now let me raise another point. This budget is laying down a principle; it is pointing the way. It is saying to Canadians that the bigger war effort they want the more of this kind of abomination they will have to take. Never mind if as a result you cannot buy your fuel. Never mind if as a result you cannot pay your rent. Never mind if as a result you cannot wear shoes. You have to pay these taxes and you are going to like it, because you elected a fine Liberal government which is going to see that you do. They have not sense enough to see any other way of doing it, so the people will have to go ahead and like it. That is what it means. The minister has laid this down very definitely. This is going to be a pay-as-you-go war. This means that no matter how much we can produce, no matter how great our resources may be, we cannot expand the war effort of Canada any further than we can get money by stealing it out of the pockets of the people and putting them in misery and poverty. In other words the principle which underlies this budget limits the extent of Canada's participation in defence. Let us see if anyone can answer that.

Some will say that when the war gets a little worse we will begin to borrow. When the war gets a little worse and we have to use more of our goods for the support of our forces abroad it will be harder than ever to continue a pay-as-you-go policy.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. gentleman not to go so far afield from the subject under discussion.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman; but as I see it the whole thing is centred right around this set of pernicious taxes.

Mr. Hansell: Whether we are to tax or not; that is the question.

Mr. Blackmore: And whether we are going to be able to fight a war with our full force, whether we are going to be able to use all our manpower and material resources to fight a war, or whether we are going to be hamstrung and trammelled by finance. It is a certainty that if we get any more taxes like these the people of this country are not going to become prosperous as the war advances, and are not going to become any more able to pay taxes. This is more than serious. We are not faced with the kind of proposition we were faced with at the beginning of world war II or world war I. We are faced with a struggle for our very existence, against the greatest power we ever went up against. For us to sit here calmly and talk about this thing in this way is absolutely preposterous.

Hon. members opposite are feeling quite unhappy because the opposition has put up a puny little struggle. What if they had been up against the kind of opposition William Lyon Mackenzie King put up against R. B. Bennett during the five years that man struggled against a depression which William Lyon Mackenzie King had helped to bring on? If this government had to carry on against an opposition such as William Lyon Mackenzie King and his party put up against the Conservative government in those five depression years they would know what opposition was. Beside that opposition the puny little efforts we have put forth during the last seven days would amount to small change. I happen to know. I do not know how many members now in the house were in parliament at that time; probably there are a few. I was told by one who was here that hardly a day went by when four or five or six Liberals would not ask questions of the government without ever giving notice; and that is just an example. That is the kind of opposition they had, just dirty, sordid opposition; just meanness. It is too bad to say that about men who have passed on, but that is what occurred. Yet the moment a little bit of effective opposition is put up against the Liberals today they begin to whine like babies; they call order, and all the rest of it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. gentleman again to discuss the merits or demerits of the Excise Tax Act resolution.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do not see how a man could discuss this excise tax more specifically and more pertinently than I am doing. That is another serious matter, the question of opposition. What is the responsibility of the opposition? As the hon. member for Peace River has said, one of the responsibilities of the opposition is to help see that the government does not make dangerous blunders.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must rule that the hon. member is out of order in discussing the merits or value of opposition in the house on this Excise Tax Act resolution. I ask him not to refer to that again.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I have said all I want to say on that subject. Now here is the reason we have so sternly opposed this measure. I am only sorry we are not better organized. I am not naming any particular group; I think on the spur of the moment we have organized a pretty good struggle, but if the whole body of the opposition including our Conservative friends had co-operated in this thing we probably could have got something for the Canadian people. But we are going to have to let this thing go through because we are not organized to keep on talking. But when we let it go through—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. gentleman is again violating the rule of strict relevancy. That is a very important rule, and already he has been told twice that he should abide by the ruling I have made.

Mr. Blackmore: It is too bad I cannot hear what you say, Mr. Chairman, but I can pretty well guess what it is.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I ask hon. members to co-operate by remaining as silent as possible. I am now directing the attention of the hon. member for Lethbridge to the rule of this house which calls for a discussion to be strictly relevant to the item before the committee. I believe it is standing order 58; and standing order 40 goes further than that. I will read standing order 58, paragraph 2, to the hon. member. It says:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

At the moment I cannot put my finger on that standing order 40 which says in effect that any hon. member who has just been called to order for not having observed the rule of strict relevancy may be subject to severe measures. I would ask for the hon. member's co-operation. Twice he has spoken about the organization of the opposition and the opposition itself. That certainly does not relate to the resolution that is now before the committee. I will therefore ask him to co-operate, as he usually does, with the chairman and the members of the committee.

Mr. Blackmore: I certainly desire to co-operate with you, Mr. Chairman, but after having been here for seven days and listened to the kind of thing we have had to listen to, and having had to look at the sad countenances of the government, reflecting their feeling of injured dignity, I am inclined to speak just a little bit freely. But I shall defer any such talk as that until a later time. May I commend you, Mr. Chairman, for the way in which you are handling matters.

I will just say this in closing what I have undertaken to say. Here is a set of measures which are pernicious through and through. There is not a commendable feature in any one of these sales taxes; neither is there one in the excise tax. If the desire is to limit the consumption of refrigerators and electrical appliances, rationing can easily be applied. If the desire is to eliminate consumption of any other kind in Canada, rationing can be applied. But there is no need for it at the present time. Rationing can be applied in two ways, either as the article is being offered for sale over the retail counter or as the supply of raw material is being permitted to come to the factory. It is the simplest thing in the world to limit these things and save the use of necessary war materials. No reason at all under the sun can be given for these taxes. As I said, they are pernicious through and through; they are inflationary; and as a means of getting revenue, they are utterly unnecessary. I am opposed to them with all the energy that I have. Since we are probably not strong enough to go any further, I shall have to cease until I get another chance to talk.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Anticlimax.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Maybe so; but it will be a short one, anyway. I have been ready to vote on this resolution more than once, Mr. Chairman. I do not know whether it is the last speech that has inspired me to say a word or two more. I do not find myself fully in agreement with everything that has been said by the hon. member for Lethbridge; but one thing he said I think is perfectly true and I wish to repeat it before this vote is taken. Even yet we have had no evidence, or even no statement offered to us by the Minister of Finance, as to the absolute need for this tax. When we pointed out to the minister the years in which his excess collections of revenue have been not tens of millions or scores of millions but hundreds of millions of dollars, his answer, as I recall it, was that while it was true he had overestimated, nevertheless he had not overestimated much more than had the authorities in Britain, or in Ontario, or where you please. To me that is just the old argument of the pot and the kettle. So far as I can recall, the minister has never yet said a single word to deny the argument which has repeatedly been made here, namely, that if the gross national product is what he himself has estimated it to be, in all probability we shall have a surplus which will be more than enough to take the place of this reduction which we have asked.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the excise tax resolution.

Resolution agreed to: Yeas, 59; nays, 39.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the resolution carried. We shall now consider the income tax resolution.

Mr. Abbott: No, the customs tariff.

Mr. Knowles: Which amendment was it that carried?

The Deputy Chairman: I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. Knowles: I thought you said that you declared the amendment carried. I presume you meant the motion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Abbott: The resolution.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not hear me. I said that I declared the resolution carried.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 216f, 296e, 386(p), 403(e), 409f, 410g, 410h, 410i, 410j, 410l, 410o(i), 410p, 410q, 410r, 410s, 410t, 410u, 410v, 410w, 410x, 410z, 435, 440k, 475, 523g, 682, 705, and 708, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

The Deputy Chairman: We shall now consider the customs tariff resolution. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to ask one or two general questions with regard to the tariff. When the minister spoke in his budget speech he referred to the meetings which had been taking place at Torquay and to the fact that no announcement regarding them could be made until, I think, May 9. The question that I want to ask the minister is this. Will he enlighten us as to the division of what I will call the tariff problem and tariff negotiations. We have had negotiations going on for months at Torquay, following previous negotiations at Annecy two years ago, I think it was, and negotiations at Geneva four years ago. I should like the minister to tell us something of the scope of those negotiations, explaining the relationship which they bear to the operations meanwhile of our own tariff board. I should also like to ask whether some of the proposals which are in the schedule to the resolution are the result merely of negotiations which have taken place with individuals. In other words, my question is really threefold. What is the scope of the negotiations going on at Torquay? I raise this question particularly by reason of whatever tariff changes there are affecting us and the United States. In the second place, what is the relationship of what is going on there to the operations of our own tariff board? I am not quite sure whether it has been in abeyance or what it has been doing. Third, are any of the proposals in the schedule the result neither of what has been going on at Torquay nor of the proceedings before our own tariff board, but merely the decisions of our own department in negotiation with individuals?

Mr. Abbott: To answer the last question first, Mr. Chairman, none of the customs tariff proposals which are before the committee have any relation to the discussions at Torquay. The tariff changes which are made here are of some significance but they are not of wide application. I do not know that I can add much in general terms to what I said in the course of my budget speech. There are a number of items which come within the classification of farm implements, to which free entry is given under the proposed customs tariff resolution. There are new tariff schedules with respect to the plastic items which implement a report of the tariff board which I tabled at the conclusion of my budget speech. As to the discussions at Torquay, as my hon. friend has indicated, a concurrent statement will be issued on May 9, by the various countries interested. As to those negotiations, I can add nothing to the general statement that I made in my budget speech, but a full statement will be issued on the ninth. There will, I expect, be a statement in the house and a rather more complete press release issued at the same time.

As to the functioning of the tariff board, that board has been extremely active. It has been hearing a great many appeals. There have been a great many references. In the absence of the chairman of the board, Mr. Hector McKinnon, at Torquay, the deputy chairman, Mr. Leduc, and the other member of the board, Mr. Buchanan, have been sitting as a board. I do not think I can add anything more than I have said in the general statement on the tariff proposals.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have one supplementary question. There are certain tariff concessions to the United States. I am not questioning these now. They seem to me, as far as my knowledge goes, to be reasonable, but it raises this question in my mind. Did we get any quid pro quo for them? It raises also this question. In our negotiations at Torquay are we, or are we not, in a better position when everybody is seated around a table to get a quid pro quo? A third addition to the question is this: What is the division which results in the fact, as I understand it. that these changes that you have now made are made without quid pro quo? The minister will inform us on that. If without quid pro quo then my question is, are we in a better position to get a quid pro quo at Torquay and further, if that is so, why are these particular matters not the subject of negotiation at Torquay?

Mr. Abbott: First, as to the items in this tariff schedule, they are unilateral changes. There is no quid pro quo, as my hon. friend puts it. They represent items in which we consider it is desirable that the tariff should be changed. In most cases they are reductions in the interests of the Canadian consumer. I should add, in line with what my hon. friend has said, that we have not made reductions in any items which it was considered would be of any value in the trading negotiations at Torquay. We have kept any items which we felt might have a trading value in the Torquay negotiations, for these negotiations; and consequently there are no items here which the government, or its negotiators at Torquay, felt would be of value in these discussions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just one further question. I observe what the minister has said, that this is unilateral, and it was not considered that they were such as would have any weight in negotiations, but on the face of it, that statement does not strike me as being very convincing. I mean, they might not have very much weight and yet it is hard to—

Mr. Abbott: The majority are technical readjustments in those agricultural items and plastic items to which I have referred.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let us take this, because after all something more might be said on that point. I am not questioning this; I am only asking for light as to why those might not have been thrown into the balance along with the things which I presume are being thrown in the balance at Torquay, and where I gather we are very much in need of things to throw into the balance.

Mr. Abbott: At the time we prepared these tariff proposals we knew what we were going to get at Torquay, and we knew what we were going to have to give. I would be glad if I could announce the results of Torquay. I take it the committee realizes that in these discussions it is part of the arrangement that the negotiators report back to the governments and the governments consider the proposed agreements and then concurrent announcement is made after it is approved.

Mr. Green: I have one example on the point which the hon. member for Greenwood has raised. I think sprinkler irrigation systems come under item 409f. We have had some young men establish a plant in Vancouver to manufacture sprinkler irrigation systems. They are just getting nicely into the business and are able to meet the demand when suddenly these sprinkler irrigation systems are deprived of protection. They lose any protection they have, and yet there is no removal of the United States duties; with the result that that firm probably will be put out of business. They cannot get into the United States market because of the high United States tariff, and yet Canada takes her duty off and allows the United States firms to wipe out that business.

I do suggest to the minister that that particular item might have been held until some reciprocal arrangement was made with the United States. There is no reason why we should allow their sprinkler systems in free when they will not allow ours to go into their country. For all the difference it would have made to the users of these systems, I do suggest that a mistake has been made on this particular item. The removal of the duty should be delayed until an attempt at least is made to have the United States take off their duty. Surely to goodness the Canadians should be on the same basis as the people of the United States. Why should we be unable to sell our goods to them? The handicaps are big enough even if the duty is the same on the goods going each way. There I think is a case where there should have been negotiations and an attempt made to get the United States duty taken off.

Mr. Abbott: I am familiar with the situation to which my hon. friend refers. I was aware of it before we arrived at the decision to include the items in question. The United States negotiators were not interested in a tariff concession here, and the decision to remove the tariff on these items was made in line with the basic policy decision taken in 1944 that agricultural implements and articles used in agriculture would be free of duty. My hon. friend will recall that Mr. Ilsley announced that policy. Since that time, it has been urged upon us that various specialty items, such as sprinkler systems, are used, and extensively used, in agriculture—and these irrigation systems come within that category.

I know the firm in British Columbia which has just started. I am sorry that the removal of the tariff should come just at the time when it is getting going, but as the committee knows, I am not one of those who believe in the infant industry theory; and I do not want industries created behind a tariff wall which may create problems in the future. Careful consideration was given to this particular item, and a decision was taken that it should be included in the agricultural group to which I referred.

Mr. Green: What is almost sure to happen is that once the United States firms get this Canadian firm out of business they will be in a position to charge whatever they like to the Canadian farmer.

Mr. Abbott: I think we will recognize that it is unlikely that there will be widespread manufacture of this type of equipment in Canada. There never was, up to a year or so ago. Unfortunately, the United States tariff is, on the average, very much higher than ours. That is one of the great disabilities under which we labour here. We have a relatively low tariff; they have a high tariff; and that is why we have been so anxious in these succeeding discussions at Geneva, Annecy and Torquay to whittle away at the United States tariff; but nevertheless, whatever their tariff may be, in this country we have adopted the policy that so far as agricultural equipment and implements are concerned, they come in free.

Mr. Green: I think one reason the policy has been adopted is that leading Canadian farm implement manufacturers are able to stand on their own feet and ship throughout the world. But, as the minister said, this is a special type of product, and it is not in that category at all.

We are going to have a big aluminum development in central British Columbia within the next two or three years. I believe these sprinkler systems are made of aluminum, and there will be need for a market for that product. I hope the minister will give some further thought to this item because it is unfair that the Canadian producer should be placed in the position where the Americans can come in and wipe him out, but he cannot get into the American market at all.

Mr. Abbott: I am looking at this particular situation again in connection with another matter, to see whether on parts, and so on, any assistance can be given to that industry.

Mr. Herridge: The Americans subsidize the export of apples to Canada and other countries to the extent of $1.25 a box. That artificial competition quite recently caused the British Columbia fruit growers to sell about 100,000 boxes to Ontario and Quebec at about a dollar a box, which is very little more than the cost of packing and of the boxes. Does he consider that a subsidy that creates artificial competition with Canadian fruit is in keeping with the spirit of the Geneva agreement?

Mr. Abbott: I was not aware that such a subsidy existed. However, the hon. member knows more about that business than I do. As he is no doubt aware, the tariff on Canadian apples going into the United States is very much lower than the tariff on American apples entering Canada. That is one of the relatively few cases where the American tariff is lower than our own. However, I have to look at the type of export subsidy to which he refers in order to see how it is affected by the Geneva agreement.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister check that matter?

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question regarding item 409f. While it deals with a wide range of agricultural machinery, I am interested particularly in grain or hay driers. A year ago some farmers in my constituency imported grain and hay driers. When they consulted the department they were told that because the equipment was for agricultural purposes it would be admitted free. Once it was landed in London, however, the duty was charged, and they had to pay it.

I came to Ottawa to protest, and the duty was paid under protest. I see by this item that this equipment is now admitted free. Is there any chance that these people will receive a refund in respect of those articles?

Mr. Abbott: I think not. I gave pretty careful consideration to the driers to which the hon. member has referred. After discussing the matter with my tariff advisers I came to the conclusion that this equipment was pretty much outside the ordinary range of agricultural equipment or implements, and took us into a completely new field. I will add that it was something I felt that in another year I might consider further. But I had to get a great deal more information as to what similar items might be affected before I would be prepared to remove the tariff. Therefore I think I could say clearly that this year I would not be prepared to make a recommendation to eliminate the tariff on those articles.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I note that under item 409f they are now free.

Mr. Abbott: I am not quite sure as to the exact part to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I am referring to tariff item 409f.

Mr. Abbott: I am told that this covers driers except what are described as big bins.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The fans and motors are included?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I might point out that in Iceland there are more hay driers used than in all Canada. With their wet weather they have become almost a necessity.

Mr. Abbott: We will look at it another year, but that has been why we have decided against it.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to support what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West with regard to apples. This was a case where British Columbia had virtually to dump apples in Ontario at a loss, and this I believe was the result of subsidized American exports.

Then I should like to refer briefly to the question of vegetable oils entering this country. This afternoon during the discussion of another resolution the minister said that so far as he was aware he had had no representation from the dairy industry council on—

Mr. Abbott: I believe I had from the dairy council. I thought it was the federation of agriculture to which reference was being made. But I believe I did have representations from the dairy council.

Mr. Fulton: I have had representations from the dairy industry in my own constituency and, although I cannot state it as a fact, it is my understanding that they had written to the minister suggesting either a customs tariff or an excise tax on imported oils. I have no desire to return to the discussion of the excise tax resolution, but I wonder if the minister would tell us the attitude of the government in the matter. I was greatly impressed by the argument put forth this afternoon by the hon. member for Danforth. What he said certainly covered the situation in the dairy industry, and the whole question of this very cheap substitute product coming into the market. I am more particularly concerned because of the argument which, on the face of it, is hard to meet, namely that margarine affords a cheap substitute for butter, and that therefore it is wrong to do anything which would increase the price.

It seems to me that argument is completely removed when we find that the margarine producers put up their price to the extent of about ten cents a pound simply because the price of butter went up, despite the fact that the cost of production of margarine had not increased.

I strongly urge the minister to look into this situation. If he finds that the margarine manufacturers are taking advantage of the consuming public in this way it should influence his decision as to whether or not the national treasury should derive some revenue from their imports.

Mr. Abbott: The whole question will be studied, as to whether further protection should be afforded the dairy industry by substantially increasing the barriers to the importation of margarine or its ingredients from other countries.

I believe I should say however that it was our general feeling we should not take action of that kind while the proceedings at Torquay were under way. I am one who believes that the results achieved at Geneva and at Annecy should have substantial influence and were responsible to a substantial degree for the marked improvement in our balance of trade with the United States. I indicated before that in my opinion we have obtained a very satisfactory trade agreement at Torquay. I hope the house will agree with that when they see the results.

So, speaking generally, I felt and my colleagues felt it would be extremely unfortunate to take any action by imposing any further barriers to a free flow of trade between countries when we were arguing strenuously at Torquay for a lowering of those barriers.

Mr. Fulton: It is not an easy problem.

Mr. Abbott: It is a difficult problem, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Fulton: But the particular thing that irritates me is the fact of their increasing their price without apparently any excuse or any increased cost, just because the price of butter went up as the result of an unexpected development in the supply of butter.

Mr. Fleming: There are several questions I should like to put to the minister. The first has to do with the country or countries from which most of these commodities which are the subject of decreases in tariff come. Will the minister indicate what countries will benefit from the proposed reductions in tariff rates, or those which will principally benefit?

Mr. Abbott: As I think I indicated in my remarks on the budget, the principal reductions are in the agricultural implement field, diesel engines for use in fishing vessels, mining equipment and certain plastic items. Those items in the agricultural implement field will come mostly from the United States. The mining equipment would come principally from the United States with some from the United Kingdom. I think it is fair to say that most of that type of equipment comes from the United States. The diesel engines would come from the United Kingdom and the United States, but I would think the United Kingdom would have a decided edge because of the preferential rate. The plastic items would come principally from the United States, but the United Kingdom would also be able to avail itself of the reduced rates.

Mr. Fleming: It is quite clear that the United States will be the chief beneficiary.

Mr. Abbott: Others will be as well, but the United States is the principal supplier of these things.

Mr. Fleming: We are dealing with them in general terms. I was under the impression, which the minister has now confirmed, that the United States will be the chief beneficiary.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will appreciate that they are not broad reductions.

Mr. Fleming: The United States will be the chief beneficiary of the proposed reductions.

Mr. Abbott: The Canadian consumer will be the chief beneficiary, if I may say so.

Mr. Fleming: There are two sides to this. I was thinking in terms of benefits to the producers. Obviously these benefits will flow chiefly to the United States. For that reason it surprises me to hear the minister say that the United States were not interested in any bargaining at Torquay with respect to any of these items. Knowing how astute the United States businessman is and how ready his government is to further his interests it seems unusual to me that the United States were not prepared to do some bargaining in return for the benefits to the United States producers which these proposed reductions offer.

My second inquiry is as to the estimated loss of revenue to the Canadian treasury from the proposed reductions. The minister may wish to indicate at the same time what increase in revenue is contemplated from such increases in the tariff rates as are involved in the present proposals. Perhaps he could then give the net figure, the overall estimated reduction in revenue.

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid the only increase is, as I indicated before, in the plastic items. I am sorry that no estimates have been made as to the increases in revenue which would result. Similarly it is hard to estimate with any degree of accuracy what decrease in revenue there will be. However, it will be quite small in our picture. Of course, it is important to the people who have to import these articles. The fisherman who has to import a diesel engine for his boat and the farmer who has to import a milking parlour or some of these other things finds that it is quite important, but in the aggregate customs revenue it is pretty insignificant. Perhaps I could have an estimate made and give it to my hon. friend when we are in committee on the bill.

Mr. Fleming: My next question has to do with the application of the Geneva agreements, if at all, to the proposed reductions. What application will the Geneva agreements have to the reduced rates that are proposed?

Mr. Abbott: If any of these rates are below the rates fixed in the Geneva agreements, we are not to be bound. However, we are free to go back to the rates stipulated in the Geneva agreements. We are free under the Geneva agreements or the Annecy agreements, and again under the Torquay agreements, to make reductions in tariff rates without in any way impairing the validity of the agreements, but we are bound not to make increases without complying with whatever the formalities are under the agreements.

Mr. Fleming: To how many commodities on which it is proposed to reduce the tariff rates do the Geneva agreements apply?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that some of them will probably be covered in part, but there are no complete items.

Mr. Fleming: My next inquiry has to do with the timing of the present resolution. In his budget speech, as reported on page 1813 of Hansard of April 10, the minister made reference to the tariff negotiations which had been taking place at Torquay during the past six months and said:

> It has been arranged between the countries represented at Torquay that the details of the agreements resulting from the negotiations will be announced by the participating governments on May 9. Consequently I am not in a position to review the results at this time.

It would only be a matter of speculation until we know more about the results at Torquay as to what effect the Torquay agreements may have on any of these items, or what the result may be to the general picture of trading between one country and another in respect of tariff concessions. I am not proposing to ask the minister to delay the adoption of this resolution, but in order that the matter may have adequate consideration I wonder if he will agree that he will not move second reading of his bill to amend the Customs Tariff until after May 9?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: That is an entirely appropriate suggestion and I shall be happy to do that. I think it will be most helpful if the house could study the bill after the details of the Torquay agreements have been announced. I think that would be an excellent way to proceed.

Mr. Green: They will be announced next Wednesday?

Mr. Abbott: On the ninth; yes, next Wednesday. I doubt if we would get to it before that.

Mr. Fleming: There is one other matter I should like to mention to the minister, and with approval. The minister may wish to send for smelling salts or something else to overcome the effects of surprise. I should like to mention item 705 in which the minister proposes to extend the period within which settlers may bring in their effects and still have them treated as settlers' effects. It seems to me that this is a most praiseworthy move. I cannot think of anybody whom it is going to hurt, and I can think of it bringing considerable assistance to many people who otherwise would suffer grave inconvenience and perhaps loss by reason of the present provision which it is now proposed to change. I do not know how large this item bulks in the total fiscal picture or the total trade picture, but it seems to me it is one to which the house will be glad to give approval.

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friend for his congratulations. I agree with him. I think it is a most desirable item. It was made at the suggestion of my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I have an amendment to the wording of the proviso in item 705 which I shall ask one of my colleagues to move. It broadens its application to include those settlers who have come in during the last three years. We have had it under examination a little more closely than we had been able to at the time the budget resolutions were introduced. I am wrong. It includes those who came in as far back as the end of the last war. I thought it was only three years.

Mr. Fleming: Better still.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. That amendment will be moved when we reach that item. It is merely an amendment to the wording to broaden it to that extent.

Mr. Harkness: Some two or three months ago I brought to the minister's attention the question of the customs duty on ground bagged clays or bentonites which are used in the manufacture of drilling mud, a necessary substance in the drilling of oil and gas wells at the present time. The situation with respect to this substance is that quite a flourishing small industry manufacturing this drilling mud has been built up in Calgary. Its product was much used throughout the province of Alberta. The shipping in of ground bagged clays or bentonites from the United States has now practically put that concern out of business. They have requested that some protection should be afforded. I have looked through these tariff items quite carefully, and I have not been able to find any mention of these bagged clays. I wonder if the minister would tell us what decision he came to and why no action was taken in regard to the matter.

Mr. Abbott: I gave consideration to my hon. friend's representations, but for the same reason that precluded my giving active consideration to increases in the duties on vegetable oils or other items, because the tariff negotiations at Torquay were pending, it was decided that this year no increased duty could be put on.

Mr. Harkness: That means essentially then that consideration is really deferred for another year?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask the minister what will happen with respect to the Torquay agreement. What will be its legal status when it arrives here and is presented to this house? Will it need legislative implementation?

Mr. Abbott: I understand that, as was the case with the Geneva and Annecy agreements, it does not require immediate legislative implementation, but the intention would be that it would eventually receive that. Our attitude has been that we would not hurry our legislative implementation until we saw that formal legislative implementation was being carried through in other jurisdictions, and that is the present status of Geneva and Annecy. It can be put into effect by executive action.

Mr. Green: None of these trade agreements have ever been approved formally by parliament?

Mr. Abbott: I believe that is correct.

Mr. Green: How long ago is it that the Geneva agreement was negotiated?

Mr. Abbott: 1947.

Mr. Green: Four years ago.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Green: Are we in Canada waiting for the United States?

Mr. Abbott: We are waiting to see what they do. In the meantime we have got substantial benefits under the agreements.

Mr. Green: Does the minister expect there will be legislation in the near future on any of these agreements?

Mr. Abbott: Just when I cannot say. I doubt if there would be legislation at this session.

Mr. Fleming: From the minister's answer to the hon. member for Greenwood, I am not quite clear as to what part of the Torquay agreement, if any part, may be brought into operation in Canada apart from parliamentary action.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend knows, tariff reductions can be brought into effect by order in council. That has always been our law. On the other hand, tariff increases have to come to the house.

Mr. Fleming: Are we to assume then that parliament is not going to be afforded an opportunity of passing on the Torquay agreement, save perhaps incidentally in some discussion here, and that, as it may be assumed that it will involve only reductions on Canada's part and no increases in our tariff, the whole agreement so far as Canada is concerned can be brought into immediate effect and operation, or into effect and operation at a later time, simply by executive decision without any expression of approval or otherwise on the part of parliament?

Mr. Abbott: What we are required to do to implement our part of the agreement is to bring into effect such tariff reductions as we may have agreed to in consideration of the tariff reductions received from others. We can make those tariff reductions—and it is done continually—by order in council, and I think the same procedure will be followed here as was followed in the case of Geneva and Annecy. There will of course be, as there was in the case of these other agreements, ample opportunity for discussing the terms and so on in the house.

Mr. Green: When?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot give an undertaking as to when.

Mr. Green: When was there an opportunity for discussing these other agreements?

Mr. Abbott: I suppose I have not really given much thought to that. I know that Geneva and Annecy have both been discussed here in general terms. I suppose they could be discussed on the estimates of the Department of National Revenue. I think it would be proper to discuss their general effect there. However, I would have to give some consideration to that. I am informed—I had forgotten—that the Geneva schedules were referred to committees of both the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. Green: They were never formally approved in the house.

Mr. Abbott: Possibly we might give consideration to referring the new schedules in the same way.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I am glad this subject has arisen because, while it seems to be apparent from what the minister has said that no increases in the Canadian tariff will be called for by the Torquay agreements—

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming: —and only decreases will be required, the minister has indicated that legally these agreements may be brought into effect by executive decision without any formal approval on the part of parliament. I do not think that is a satisfactory state of affairs.

Those of us who sat in the last parliament will well recall that in November, 1947, a great to-do was made by the government about calling parliament in great haste to meet in Ottawa. The reason given at that time by the Prime Minister in a public statement for summoning parliament to meet about the first of December, 1947, a most unusual time, was not, as a matter of fact to give legislative effect to the radio budget introduced by the Minister of Finance, but was to lay before parliament for parliament's decision the agreements reached at Geneva.

We met at that time, and the Geneva agreements were not submitted to parliament for approval. As a matter of fact parliament has never yet been asked to give its sanction to the Geneva agreement. The minister has said that the schedules to the Geneva agreement were referred to a committee. They were referred to the banking and commerce committee but, if my memory serves me correctly as a member of that committee, those schedules were never reported out of the committee. They were allowed to die there in the spring of 1948. So far as debate is concerned, I recall one debate. It was one of those indirect debates. It may have been on a motion to refer to the committee, which did not afford an opportunity of bringing the important question of ratification to a neat issue before the house.

I say to you, sir, that the Geneva agreements have never been submitted to parliament in any fashion that would enable parliament to express its opinion upon them.

Similarly the Annecy agreement has never been submitted to parliament under any conditions which would enable parliament to express its approval or otherwise. It gives me a good deal of disappointment to hear an indication from the Minister of Finance tonight that parliament is not to be afforded an opportunity to deal specifically with the Torquay agreements, which we understand to be important, and express in the only way parliament can really express itself, its approval or disapproval of those agreements, by means of a direct vote on that particular issue.

In reviewing the whole situation, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me far too many of these tariff concessions arising out of international agreements have been carried out simply by executive decision. Parliament has been ignored with regard to them. If those agreements are as important as I think most, if not all, hon. members regard them, then surely the very least that should be required of the government is that those agreements should be submitted to parliament in such form and under such circumstances that a discussion can be held directly on the agreements and parliament may express either its approval or disapproval by a direct vote on that particular issue. If parliament does not have that opportunity then it seems to me parliament must review the whole basis on which tariff negotiations at these multilateral conferences are carried on, and recast the whole basis of their implementation by executive action. In matters so important as these it seems to me a crass neglect of the responsibility and supremacy of parliament that parliament should be by-passed and have no more opportunity to pronounce a direct verdict or judgment upon them than by some incidental, oblique kind of discussion on a motion to go into supply, or something of that nature. That does not offer a sufficiently direct opportunity to review these questions.

I think one might also say that in recent years there never has been enough time spent in parliament in the discussion of trade policies. Usually what little opportunity has been afforded to discuss trade matters has been on bills such as this involving minor, and sometimes quite trivial, amendments to the customs tariff. Trade policies are far too important to be so treated. Looking forward now to the time when these Torquay agreements are to be introduced, and assuming they will have the importance we have been led to attach to them, it seems to me that here is an occasion when the government should afford the house, at the earliest convenient time, an opportunity of discussing those agreements and the whole trade picture in general, which is not free of disturbing factors. At page 1799 of Hansard, in his budget speech, the minister referred to an improved regional trade position in these words:

> As a result of these shifts in trade our regional trade became much better balanced.

I think we are all glad to see the United States purchasing more from Canada. We should like to see a much closer balance between our exports to and imports from that country; but no one can survey the over-all trade picture in the world today without feeling very grave concern about the way our sales to the United Kingdom, to the colonial empire and to many of the countries of Europe have undergone a serious reduction in recent years.

I mention that, Mr. Chairman, by way of urging upon the minister and the government that the introduction in the house of the Torquay agreements at a convenient opportunity be made the occasion of a debate on trade, on a motion by the government calling upon the house to give a direct expression of approval or otherwise to those agreements, so the matter may be brought to an issue.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be very happy to bring my hon. friend's suggestion to the attention of my colleagues, to see whether, if the business of the house permits it, his suggestion can be adopted.

Mr. Quelch: I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton. I recall that the Geneva trade agreements were referred to the banking and commerce committee in 1947. There was quite a long discussion; we ran right through them, but it was finally decided not to put a motion for approval, so the Geneva trade agreements were not approved by that committee. I think the reason was obvious. There was a great deal of criticism of various sections of those agreements.

I recall that there were a number of escape clauses in both the Geneva and Annecy agreements, and I think it is correct to say that many nations have already committed a breach of many of the principles embodied in those agreements. It may be argued, of course, that they are still acting under the escape clauses, but the deadline for those clauses I think in some cases is 1951 and in others 1952. I want to know what will happen after those deadlines, as far as the nations still operating under those escape clauses are concerned. Will those nations be allowed to continue to operate under them even after the deadlines have expired, or will they be called upon to fulfil their obligations under those trade agreements?

I have particularly in mind the whole policy of non-discrimination. We have tried as far as possible to adhere to that general principle, though I think when we put restrictions upon imports from the United States we were really committing a breach of it. We have since removed that prohibition, but some countries in Europe are still continuing the policy of discrimination. What are we going to do in the future? Are we just going to let this situation drift, or are we going, by proclamation, to declare that we are no longer interested in that international trade organization as far as those general agreements are concerned?

I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Eglinton is very good, that there should be a general debate on this matter so we can be informed just what the situation is. At the present time we appear to be just drifting along, operating under trade agreements which have not been agreed to by this house.

Mr. Abbott: I am rather in agreement with my hon. friend; I would be very happy to have such a discussion. I must say I think Canada has derived substantial benefits under these agreements. It is perfectly true, as the hon. member has indicated, that the policy of non-discrimination to which we attach such great importance, for reasons which are familiar to most hon. members, has not yet been possible for a good many countries including most of those in the sterling area. We still hope that result may be achieved. I must confess that I did not come fully prepared or briefed to discuss the Geneva agreements and the various escape clauses on this resolution tonight, but the suggestion that we should try to find some suitable occasion when we can discuss questions of trade policy in general is one to which I could certainly give most sympathetic consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I see it is eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Abbott: I guess we had better let it stand. If we could pass this resolution, of course we have the bill and we have to go through it item by item, but probably it is not appropriate to try to do that tonight.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I feel that what the hon. member for Eglinton has said is fully warranted, and I welcome the minister's attitude. I do think we should discuss this resolution a little longer, however. I believe the minister indicated that he would brief himself a little more fully, and the rest of us may do the same.

Mr. Green: Could the minister get information on any changes that have been made in the preference by executive action?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I will have that information, either when we are back on the resolution or when we are on the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: So I may be clear on the matter of procedure, am I to understand that on this resolution a debate on the Geneva trade agreements is to be in order?

Mr. Abbott: No. I am afraid I am not prepared to discuss the Geneva agreement on this resolution. I do not believe my hon. friends were suggesting that, Mr. Chairman. I think both the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Acadia were urging that an appropriate opportunity should be afforded to discuss this matter generally, and in particular our obligations and rights under the Geneva agreement, but not on this resolution.

Mr. Fleming: That is quite right, Mr. Chairman. What I was suggesting was that we need the Torquay agreement before us before we can undertake intelligently a discussion of that kind.

The Deputy Chairman: What caused me to make that remark was what the hon. member for Greenwood had said previously.

Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Labour and of the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Green: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Right.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 4, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a short statement to make that I feel confident will be welcomed by every member of this house.

By 11.30 this morning the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had received final agreement by all ten provincial governments as to the terms of the proposed amendment to the British North America Act respecting old age pensions.

I have said on more than one occasion in the house that the government did not want to be responsible for any avoidable delays in dealing with this matter, and we have felt that hon. members would wish to have immediately the text of the address to His Majesty the King. Copies have been prepared in English and in French of the form of address which I am asking the Clerk to place on the order paper for Monday. The form is as follows:

That a humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Whereas the Senate and Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows:

1. The British North America Act, 1867, is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section ninety-four thereof, the following heading and section:

"Old Age Pensions

94A. It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law, present or future, of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions."

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1951, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1951.

There are copies available to be distributed to all hon. members so that they may see the exact wording of the amendment which has now been agreed upon with the ten provincial governments.

As hon. members are aware, the business for the first three days of next week has been arranged by all parties, and the government would not wish to disturb that arrangement. In view, however, of the general feeling that this is a matter of urgency, I would be prepared to move the address as the first item of business on Monday, if hon. members felt that it could be disposed of without any protracted discussion, and would be willing to defer debate on this matter of old age pensions until we bring before parliament the legislation to implement the constitutional powers to be conferred by the amendment.

I know that all hon. members would be glad to have an opportunity of expressing satisfaction with this demonstration of the harmonious relations now existing between the provincial governments and the federal government on matters of national interest. But that would take some time, and I think we all realize that it would be advisable to get this address over to London as quickly as possible, and to take no risks that any obstacle might prevent our dealing with this important subject at the present session of parliament. To do this may require us all to forgo an early opportunity of expressing our satisfaction in this regard; but if hon. members felt that the resolution for adoption of the address could be disposed of rapidly on Monday, without interfering substantially with the arrangement made to deal with external affairs, I should be glad to submit the resolution on that day.

I am not saying this for the purpose of avoiding discussion, or anything of the kind; but if it is the general feeling that we should try to get the constitutional amendment as rapidly as possible, and have the debate when it might not have the same possible consequence with respect to delay, I should be glad if hon. gentlemen would consider this address over the week end, and if the whips will let me know on Monday whether it is the desire that we dispose of it quickly on that day, I shall then be prepared to move it. But if there is any feeling that it would be preferable to have the debate at this time—the government does not wish to impose upon the house its views as to procedure—we shall be prepared to do what the whips may suggest to me on Monday, before we meet at three o'clock, as to the desire of hon. members in this regard.

The address has to be adopted both in this house and in the other house. I am informed it is probable that it could be adopted in the other house on Tuesday. We would use the greatest possible dispatch in having it placed before His Majesty, and we would ask the high commissioner in London to use his best efforts to have it dealt with as expeditiously as possible by the parliament of the United Kingdom. Our experience has been that addresses from the houses of the Canadian parliament have always received prompt attention over there.

I shall be glad to discuss the matter with the representatives of the various groups before three o'clock on Monday to see what the feeling is in that regard. If the text which has been agreed to now—it took quite a lot of correspondence to get that agreement—is acceptable to all members—as I hope it will, because it is designed to permit the implementing of the report of the joint committee of both houses of parliament in respect to this matter—it might be a sacrifice we could each of us make to defer for the moment any extended debate.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I take it from the Prime Minister's remarks that there will be conferences over the week end with regard to the procedure on Monday. That will be very satisfactory to the official opposition. We have no desire to delay the passage of the amendments. I would ask the Prime Minister, however, whether he can tell us the position with regard to the other proposed amendment to the British North America Act. I refer of course to the provision under which the provincial governments would be given the power to levy a three per cent indirect sales tax.

Mr. St. Laurent: There has been no agreement upon that as yet. The agreement was upon the text of the constitutional amendment with respect to old age pensions, and upon proceeding with it at once without waiting for agreement on the other matter.

Mr. Green: Is this second proposal to be dropped, or is it the intention to proceed with it?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: The federal government declared at the dominion-provincial conference that if the provinces were agreed that they wanted the other, the federal government would go along with them, and that is still the position.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the announcement made by the Prime Minister is very satisfactory to all members of the house, and I hope that we shall be able to proceed with the address on Monday afternoon. After all, there is some uncertainty about the political situation in Great Britain, and should a general election intervene it might delay us in doing what we want to do in Canada; consequently the quicker this matter can be disposed of by this house the better it will be. So far as we are concerned we shall be glad indeed to co-operate in having this address adopted by the house as quickly as possible on Monday.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Prime Minister a question, Mr. Speaker? Failing dissolution of the parliament at Westminster, is there reasonable assurance that if this address is passed by both houses here within the next few days the amendment can be made at Westminster in ample time for us to proceed with the legislation at this session?

Mr. St. Laurent: Of course one cannot anticipate the effect of unforeseen events, but at the present time there is no reason to apprehend that the amendment could not be adopted at Westminster in time to enable us to deal with the matter at this session.

Mr. Knowles: That is the government's intention?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is the government's intention to lose no time. We had received final agreement from all provinces by half past eleven this morning, and, as the hon. member can see, we have the address before us.

GRAIN

INITIAL PRICES FOR WESTERN WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY FOR 1951 CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Boucher (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister state when an announcement will be made of the initial prices of wheat, oats and barley for the 1951 crop year?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Were you asleep yesterday?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member was good enough to give notice of his question, and I am prepared to make a statement.

I wish to make an announcement to the house in regard to the initial payments for western wheat, oats and barley for the crop year commencing on August 1, 1951. It is customary to make such an announcement at this time of the year so that western producers may know in advance of their seeding operations what the initial payments on new-crop deliveries will be.

During the debate early this session on the bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, I made a full statement covering the developments in the board's marketing of this year's crop. I shall therefore confine my remarks now to the establishment of the initial payments for the 1951-52 crop year.

As for the principle on which the initial payments are based, I refer to my statement to the house on April 5 of last year, as follows:

> In setting the initial payment, the government believes that it is bound to follow sound pooling practice, dictated by experience in pooling operations over the years.

Experience has shown that the only businesslike method of conducting such a pooling operation is to set the initial payment at a reasonably safe level that is well below the current level of selling prices. If sales permit, it is then desirable that an interim payment be made before seeding of the following crop and a final payment after the conclusion of the crop year. That is the policy which the Canadian wheat board is following at the present time—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just before an election.

Mr. Howe: If the hon. member wishes to make a statement on wheat, perhaps he would let me finish first.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am just trying to be helpful.

Mr. Howe: That is about your style of helping. The statement continues:

That is the policy which the Canadian wheat board is following at the present time, and it is a policy which I should like to see continued. It is in fact the only practical way to conduct such an operation, be it government or private. I remind hon. members that when the private pools were being conducted in western Canada in the 1920's that was the procedure which was followed—initial payments, interim payments and final payments.

With these considerations in mind, the government proposes to establish the initial payment for wheat for the crop year 1951-52 at $1.40 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver. This is the same initial payment which prevailed at the beginning of the present crop year.

In the case of oats, the government has decided that the initial payment for 1951-52 shall also be at the same level as at the beginning of the 1950-51 crop year. Accordingly the initial payment effective August 1 next will be 65 cents per bushel for No. 2 Canada western oats in store Fort William-Port Arthur.

With respect to barley, the government proposes to set the initial payment at 96 cents per bushel for No. 3 Canada western six row barley, basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur. This is three cents per bushel higher than the initial payment which was effective for that grade at the beginning of the present crop year. When the grade spreads are announced next August, however, it is not expected that the initial payments for the feeding grades of barley will show any increase. The reason for advancing the initial payment for No. 3 C.W. six row barley is to provide for a more realistic premium for the malting grades over the feeding grades, without necessarily reducing the initial payments for the feeding grades.

Finally I must stress that all the prices which I have mentioned are, of course, only initial payments, and will be followed, I hope, by later returns in the form of interim and final payments. The total price received by producers will depend upon the success of the Canadian wheat board's efforts in selling these grains at the best available prices.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask two supplementary questions. First, has any consideration been given to a floor price on flax for this crop year, as has been done in past years, particularly when flax is so urgently required for preparations in the event of war?

My second question is in connection with the delegation which interviewed the cabinet recently, and the request from the three prairie provinces for a payment of $48 million for two years following the last war. There was a delegation in Ottawa within the last few days, and there have been press reports. Could the minister give us a definite statement in the matter?

Mr. Howe: No consideration has been given to fixing a floor price for flax. We have in flax a condition which my hon. friend praises from time to time in his speeches, where private trading is in charge of the marketing. We think flax is capable of looking after itself.

Inquiries of the Ministry

So far as the delegation from the farm organizations was concerned, the Prime Minister found it necessary to advise the delegation that payment in full had been announced in so far as the marketing of the wheat in the five-year pool is concerned.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further supplementary question. Does the minister think there is any possible danger that the price of wheat may fall so drastically that in order to follow sound business practices the initial price must be set some fifty cents a bushel below the current price?

Mr. Howe: The minister is neither a prophet nor a seer; I do not think he would care to venture an answer. But I may say that the advisers of the government, who are all from the prairie provinces and engaged in agriculture, who recommended entering into the international wheat agreement made provision that the minimum price for wheat for the year 1951-52 would be $1.30 per bushel. So that the government is at least more optimistic than those who framed the international wheat agreement.

Mr. Argue: Farm organizations did ask for a floor of $1.60?

Mr. Gibson: Oh, they ask for a lot.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PRESS REPORT AS TO STATEMENT RESPECTING ADDITIONS TO ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the press report last night and today that the Minister of National Defence intends to make an important statement in the house today with respect to additions to the armed forces, will the Prime Minister say whether the report is correct, and if it is, will he give the approximate hour at which such statement will be made?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Perhaps the hon. member would not mind if the answer to his question were given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, who, I understand, has an answer to give.

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, if the house will give leave it is expected that when the house resumes at eight o'clock this evening the Minister of National Defence will make a statement as to the raising of additional forces.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

185. Departmental administration, $558,397.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the Minister of Labour propose to make a statement at this time?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make any extended statement now. If I did I would be inclined to talk about matters that have particularly interested me in the short time I have been with the department. I would much prefer to listen to hon. members and then perhaps comment on the things in which they indicate they are specially interested. One or two other departments have been opened, yet I do not think there would be any harm in my referring to the changes that have been made this year in the presentation of the estimates.

To illustrate this, if hon. members will turn to pages 216 and 217 they will observe under the heading "Departmental Administration" that there is set out the total number of staff positions, both permanent and temporary, for which provision is made this year in the estimates. There is also shown the total number of such positions under this heading for the previous fiscal year. I am sure that that answers some of the criticism of former years.

Just below those totals is a break-down of the staff positions, giving the number of permanent and temporary positions, and there are also shown the figures for last year. Further down, at the end of the details of departmental administration on page 217, are shown the actual expenditures under the same head for the last fiscal year, to January 31, 1951, and the estimated expenditures for the remainder of the year. I am sure that the work of the officials of the Department of Finance in assembling these details will prove most helpful.

If perchance in speaking on the first item any hon. member should discuss other items which appear later in the estimates, I should like to have the opportunity of commenting on those items when they are reached.

Mr. Green: That is entirely contrary to the practice in committee in dealing with estimates. There has always been a wide discussion on the first item, and the minister in charge answers any questions that are asked during the course of that discussion. I hope the Minister of Labour does not mean that he will decline to answer questions which could be asked on later items.

Mr. Gregg: As my hon. friend knows, the Minister of Labour is responsible for the Department of Labour and for the unemployment insurance commission. There might be points raised which I should like to refer to the officials of the commission and which I might find it difficult to answer if only the officials from the Department of Labour are here. I only wish to reserve the right to postpone answering any question that might come up in the general discussion of the first item, but I shall endeavour to answer all questions that I can.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak to this item I should like first of all to compliment the Minister of Labour upon his first presentation of estimates for a complete year. I believe the announcement which he has made and the attention which he has drawn to the re-arrangement of the estimates will prove to be helpful. As we go along we shall be better able to determine whether or not they completely fill the requirements of this committee in dealing with estimates.

I come from the city of Hamilton, where we all had a soft spot in our heart for Humphrey Mitchell, the minister's predecessor. I am sure the minister will understand how keenly we felt his loss a short time ago. It is not given to man to know how long he has to continue his labours, and I am sure that the minister must benefit greatly by the work done by his predecessor. I know that the house benefited from the sage advice which he gave from time to time.

There may be questions I shall want to ask on the various items, but at this time I should like to make some general remarks on the labour situation in Canada, on the estimates in general, and to some extent on the unemployment insurance commission.

I think it is most important at this time that labour in Canada should have proper and workable industrial relations. I feel that it is more vital now than at any time in our history that there should be harmony among the productive forces of this nation. I do not think it is possible to have harmony unless men are happy and contented, not only with their employment but with their conditions of employment and their status in the community in which they serve.

Coming as I do from the city of Hamilton I am greatly interested in the plans which have been made for workers in our community. When I speak of these plans I am thinking not only of the working conditions of the men but also of the expansion that is taking place in our great industries, an expansion which is sure to give in the days to come employment to many thousands more than are now employed in our city.

With this in mind I was keenly interested a few short weeks ago in receiving the report produced by the Department of Trade and Commerce giving the details of private and public investment in Canada for 1951. According to page 33 of that report it is expected that in the calendar year 1951 there will be spent in Hamilton on construction, machinery and equipment, almost $100 million. The figure given in the report is $98,067,000, but I suppose we would be less than optimistic if we did not think it was going to go higher than that. The natural increase in prices is sure to account for some increase in this amount.

In the iron and steel industry alone there is an expected expenditure of nearly $67 million. Electrical apparatus and supplies comes next; then petroleum products; then chemical products; then food and beverages. There then follow a number of sundry items, and when all are taken together we have the amount of approximately $100 million which I have mentioned already.

Considering the number of men who have gone into our military services and those who probably will go into those services in the near future, it is more important than ever that the men and women who are left to carry the production load in the industries of this nation should feel that their efforts are appreciated and realize that the load which has fallen more heavily upon them by reason of their depleted numbers is one which will be shared by the citizens of this nation as a whole in the days which are to come.

I am sure it was just such a realization that prompted the minister to set up the national advisory council on manpower in February 5 of this year. The first report of that committee, published under date of February 21, contained some very interesting material. It referred to the fact that there had been specific changes in the manpower situation which were indicative of the basic economic and related developments of the past year. It stated that there are 50,000 more persons in the total labour force, 40,000 more workers employed in woods operations, 70,000 more persons employed in manufacturing, and 17,000 more persons in the armed forces.

Of course that situation has changed even in the past three months. Later, the report goes on to say:

> Accurate over-all information on the extent to which individual firms with defence contracts have already taken on more workers to meet their expanded programs is not yet available, but, based on the employment forecast survey of the Department of Labour and other data, it is estimated that employment on various types of defence activities today may be as high as 100,000. As the Minister of Labour indicated on January 30, this total may reach 200,000 by the end of 1951.

Then it goes on to say:

It is important in estimating the extent of these labour requirements to keep in mind the possibility that shortages of essential materials will likely reduce employment in non-defence industries and might limit expansion in plants producing defence equipment and supplies.

In yesterday's Ottawa Journal there was a Canadian Press dispatch headed, "Calls for return to work of retired persons, housewives". The article, which was a report of a meeting in Toronto addressed by the general manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, quotes him as saying that it is necessary that there should be a return to the labour force of retired persons and housewives if Canada is to increase its physical output. In view of these things, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer once more to the question which was asked in the house on Tuesday of this week by the hon. member for Nanaimo, as to when the next meeting of the national advisory council on manpower will be held. The answer given to the house at that time was that it was understood that the meeting would be held this month. I do not recall whether or not a specific statement was made on the subject, but it was my impression at the time the council was created—and I am sure it was the impression of other members of the house—that regular meetings would be held. Somehow I gained the impression that these meetings would be held monthly. It appears now that that is not to be the case. It is almost three months since the last meeting was held, and possibly it will be a full three months before the next meeting is held. I respectfully suggest that quarterly meetings are not frequent enough, that the council cannot be expected to give to the nation the service which was expected of it at its inception unless it is called at regular and short intervals to consider the manpower problems confronting us, and thus have some continuity of program. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I am not at all sure that it should not sit continuously until a workable policy to handle the manpower situation in Canada has been laid down.

Labour itself has made great strides in the past two or three years. One might almost say that labour has come of age. It has disciplined itself, and disciplined itself very severely. The labourer himself is hardest hit if actions of a group of his fellows curtail his own liberties or assail his earning power or the supply of commodities or services which he requires in his daily life. Where excesses occur in either labour or management it is the obvious duty of the organization with which the offenders are affiliated so to discipline its own group as to remove the cause of such offences. If legislation is required then it is the duty of the offending group to request such disciplinary regulation as will enable it to control its own offenders.

We are fortunate in this nation in having in the labour force many men of brilliant capabilities, many able and responsible men who would be only too happy to co-operate with the government of the nation to produce the type of labour legislation which would be in the best interests of the workers of the country and the citizens as a whole. I feel that the government has not faced the problems of labour. We should have at this time workable labour laws, particularly in view of the period of uncertainty through which we are passing. I have no intention at all of reviving any debate on the question of the rail strike of a few months ago, on the steps taken to end that strike, or on the award which was made subsequently and which was the outcome of the action taken by this house. I should like to say, however, that last September for the first time in this house the principle of compulsory arbitration was introduced. That was seven or eight months ago, and so far the government has given no indication that the situation which developed at that time will be rectified.

I think it is wrong that any group of people should be given the idea that it is perfectly legal and altogether natural that the strike procedure should be used to produce results in disputes, and then, when they take action which has been opened up to them as the solution of their difficulties, be accused of having violated some of the confidence which the people of this nation placed in them, and be put into a situation where they are subject to criticism from all sides. If it is wrong that this procedure should be laid open to the workers of the nation, then let us courageously come forward and say it is wrong. If it is not wrong, then let us have no more of this nonsense of compulsory arbitration. If it is believed that the rail services or any other services of this nation are so vitally important to the life of the country that nothing must interfere with their continuous operation, then let us consult with the representatives of labour and evolve a workable alternative which will protect the workmen, provide adequate negotiating machinery, and give to the citizens of this country a guarantee that they can rely on the uninterrupted service of the very lifeline of trade and industry on which we depend, and the very basis of the livelihood of most of the workers of this nation.

It is not a job for government alone; it is a job which must be instigated by the government for the purpose of evolving legislation which will be at one and the same time both acceptable and efficient. It will be necessary to confer at length with the best brains of the labour movement of Canada. It will take time, and it will take patience. Those who represent the railway unions and those who represent industrial workers should be called upon for the advice which they alone can give, and that is the extent to which all workers in this country can be counted upon to assist in the evolution of a labour policy which will be acceptable to all.

There is a situation which has, in the past, contributed to considerable confusion and discontent in labour circles. I am sure that it is a familiar subject in this house, because in reading through Hansard of former sessions I find reference to it in various places. So far, however, no step has been taken to write into the labour code a proper description of the status of a confidential employee. In the industrial life of Canada it is very important, Mr. Chairman, that confusion should be eliminated wherever possible. I ask the minister to take into serious consideration an amendment to the labour code which would include a definite interpretation of a confidential employee, so that there may be no improper demand on the part of labour and no evasion on the part of management. I believe such legislation is long overdue. Like many of those who have spoken on the subject in the past, I again ask the minister to take this into consideration so that an amendment may be brought into this house which will provide such a definition.

I believe, too, that the government would do well to consider the over-all labour situation in this country with a view to reinstituting to some extent the uniformity of labour legislation which obtained during the past war. I suggest that the minister confer with the provinces and discuss with them the extension of measures which were found so satisfactory in times of great national stress. At the moment we are approaching something in the nature of a defence economy. Day by day we see more and more of the production of this country coming under government control. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that as this trend develops we shall find more and more need for uniform labour laws which can be operated across this whole country. I am sure that the various ministers of labour in the provinces would be happy to co-operate in the production of uniform labour laws which would solve some of the problems with which we are faced today.

I should like to suggest also that this government give serious consideration to the enactment of fair employment practices laws. I refer to the act which was brought down in the Ontario house this year, and I shall quote from the preamble to the bill, which I believe is explanation enough of what is required in this case. It reads:

> Whereas it is contrary to public policy in Ontario to discriminate against men and women in respect of their employment because of race, creed, colour, nationality and ancestry or place of order; whereas it is still desirable to enact a measure designed to promote observance of this principle; and whereas to do so is in accord with the universal declaration of human rights as proclaimed by the United Nations . . .

Then the terms of the measure follow. I submit that such an act would add prestige to this house, and would be in the interest of the many people of this nation who come within the various categories which are outlined in the preamble to the Ontario act. I trust that the minister will give the matter consideration, and I should be happy indeed to support such a bill if it could be introduced in this house.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the employees of the Post Office Department are governed by civil service regulations, but I do not think I can discuss labour problems in this country today without mentioning the situation which has developed within the past couple of months because of regulations over which the Minister of Labour has probably very little, if any, control. However, he is a member of the cabinet which must consider these things, and I believe we should have a look at the over-all position of these men. In some provinces, notably in Ontario, the conditions under which they work are directly opposite to those laid down in an Ontario statute. For instance, in the province of Ontario the statute provides that a maximum work week shall be forty-eight hours. The letter carriers of this province are working up to fifty-nine hours a week under the new post office regulations. It is not enough to say that this is a civil service matter. The workers of this country have a right to expect that the government of Canada will set an example to employers. It should not be a case of "do as I say and not as I do". All the high-sounding legislation under the control of the federal authorities comes to naught if that same authority cannot so regulate its affairs as to ensure fair and proper treatment to its employees.

I should like to direct the rest of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, to the Unemployment Insurance Act and some of its regulations.

The primary object of the Unemployment Insurance Act is to provide for the employable person who suffers a period of unemployment. Members of this house will recall what the workers of the nation know, that this responsibility is jointly shared by three different groups. It is the responsibility of the employee to contribute his share to this scheme. It is the duty of the employer to assist by contributing a like amount, and the government has taken the responsibility of making the third side to the triangle by building up a fund which will serve the purpose for which the act was brought into being. With the enactment of the Unemployment Insurance Act, jurisdiction over employable persons left the provinces and was vested in the federal authorities. Yet now, Mr. Chairman, many years later, we have in the civilian labour force of Canada something over 5,200,000 persons. According to the latest report which I have at hand, the total number who are insured is 2,311,000; in other words, considerably less than half of the total labour force is listed as being in insurable employment.

This has been a matter of concern to many groups, and just recently was studied by the public welfare division of the Canadian welfare council. In referring to those who needed some consideration and who were not adequately provided for, it cites the unemployed and the self-employed who are not covered by insurance, and for whom in many communities no provision or inadequate provision is now made. Later in the same report there is a paragraph which reads as follows:

> The group of unemployed who are not covered by insurance, who have not contributed sufficiently long to be eligible for benefits, or who, under the present insurance legislation, have exhausted their benefits, is a group for which the highly fluctuating numbers make planning the most difficult. In "good times," this group is relatively small; in "bad times," it can become so large that it is completely beyond the financial capacities of provincial and local authorities. The unpredictability of its size makes financing from inflexible local revenues impossible. Nor is it just that local authorities should be expected to carry the burden of a group which is indistinguishable from those covered by unemployment insurance except by the fact that its members work in occupations for which insurance presents administrative difficulties, or that they are the victims of employment conditions over which the provincial and local authorities have no control.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

This is a question which caused me grave concern during the time that I was on the city council of Hamilton, when I came into direct contact with this very problem. At that time I devoted a good deal of study to the problem, as I have since. There are many in this class of unemployed employables who never have been insured. Then there are those who are insured and who, when unemployment hits them, find that they have insufficient contributions to benefit. Regardless of the fact that they may have been paying into this fund for years, they will find that within the limits of the act, in the period to which they must have reference, they just happen to have an insufficient number of stamps in their book to enable them to apply for unemployment insurance benefits. There are those who fall upon particularly evil days and who receive unemployment insurance benefits but are forced to accept them for a length of time which eventually exhausts the benefits which are due to them.

Then there are those who are over—and I think I would be safe in saying this—45 years of age who are not particularly acceptable in many industries today, through no fault of their own. As workers they are just as good as, if not better than, some of the younger people. But I am sure hon. members of this committee know full well why they are not acceptable. It is true enough that some of the difficulty is the fault of the workers themselves who have from time to time insisted upon protection; and insurance companies being what they are, being dependent upon actuarial balances and wishing to establish themselves firmly, find that it is impossible to take older men into their insurance schemes.

I do not know where the fault lies, Mr. Chairman. It is a vicious circle. Certainly the men are right in seeking to protect themselves in their older years. But certainly it is also true that those who are financing these schemes and who feel that they must establish this insurance on an actuarially sound basis cannot be criticized for protecting the very contributions of the men who are paying into the fund. That is only right and proper; but it places the older man in a particularly bad position when he is thrown out of one job, probably through no fault of his own, and is forced to seek employment elsewhere. More often than not, that particular man finds that he is a drifter in the productive world. He takes a job where he can get one when workers are so much in demand that employers will take anyone; then when the labour force catches up with the demand, he is out again. Consequently from that time on he has no continuity of employment and no hope of establishing himself for his old age.

There are also many people who work in agriculture in the summer; they drift out to the farms, work on the farms in the summer, come back into town in the wintertime and work in industry through the winter. Construction workers are encouraged to come to the city from other parts of Canada, and even from abroad. These people who come to the city for construction work have been told there is work there for them—I am speaking now in particular of those who come from other countries; they arrive in December and there is no work until March or April. This influx of building trades workers creates for the municipality a problem which is a grave one indeed.

Fortunately unemployment in 1951 was not moment the picture is bright. But in the year 1950 the local authorities in my city of Hamilton were greatly worried. As had been our custom, we had set up in the welfare budget an amount which we thought would be quite sufficient to take care of the unemployed employables for whom we must be responsible. I think I should explain, Mr. Chairman, to some of those who may not be familiar with the welfare regulations, that in Ontario the government accepts fifty per cent of the load of direct relief, and has laid down the rules by which that relief can be administered. It cannot be given to employables. Consequently if people are unemployed who would normally be placed in the employable class, they come immediately to the city for help. When their benefits are exhausted, or when they find that because of illness in the family they are unable to carry on, they come to the city for help. No local authorities will turn down applications for assistance to these people who have illness in the family or where there are small children to be taken care of. Consequently that load descends one hundred per cent upon the municipality.

We were faced with the problem a year ago when we set up an amount which was greater than that which had been set up in 1949, but which we thought would be adequate to take care of those people who came to us for assistance. However, the season was not far advanced when it was found necessary to supplement that amount by fifty per cent of the original figure. It was not a sufficiently serious situation to upset the economy of the city, by any means; but it was sufficiently serious that it pointed to what could easily happen with just a minor amount of unemployment in comparison with the total labour force.

The impact of these welfare costs on the municipality puts a grave burden on real estate and on property. When the property is a home, and when the home owner himself is a wage earner and pays unemployment insurance, he carries a double load. He pays for his own unemployment insurance, and, through his real estate taxes, the taxes on his house, he also pays for relief to those within his own municipality who are unemployed. Since many of these people in the larger centres come from other parts of the dominion, some from rural areas and some from other cities, the home owner is faced with accepting the responsibility for the care of all those who come from other provinces, and even from other countries. I contend, Mr. Chairman, what I have held for a long time, namely, that it is not proper that the total cost should be borne by local real estate.

In studying this matter I went back to 1945, the proposals of the government of Canada to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction, and I found there these words:

> Over the past seven or eight years there have been recommendations by the national employment commission, the Sirois commission and others, that the dominion should assume responsibility for necessary relief to the employable unemployed. It has been generally suggested that the dominion should accept this obligation as part of any general settlement with the provinces.

Then it goes on, quotes unemployment figures, and continues in these words:

> The coverage is incomplete and the duration of payments is limited, so that provincial governments and municipalities may feel that they are still subject to the possibility of heavy relief problems if unemployment on a substantial scale should develop.
> The dominion government in its statement on employment and income announced that the maintenance of a high level of employment and income was "a primary object of policy." The people of Canada and the provincial and municipal governments are thus assured of an active dominion policy to avoid and combat unemployment, but there is no underlying guarantee of payment of unemployment assistance by the dominion government if in fact unemployment should develop as a result of a possible world depression, or as a result of unavoidable dislocations beyond the immediate control of federal authority.
> As a part of the general arrangement with the provincial governments, the dominion government now proposes to establish a practicable and comprehensive system of assistance to able-bodied unemployed persons as soon as possible, rather than waiting until the need for it actually arises.

That was in 1945. Then I went back still further, Mr. Chairman, to the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, which of course was before the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed, and I found these remarks in that report:

> The experience of the past decade is conclusive evidence that unemployment relief should be a dominion function. By unemployment relief we mean relief or aid for unemployed employables as distinct from unemployables.

On the next page there is an item which is headed "Definition of employability and eligibility for unemployment aid"; and, under this heading, it says:

Our proposal is that a clear line should be drawn between employables and unemployables and that the dominion should assume responsibility for employables only. In order to secure uniformity in the definition of employability, and hence equality of benefit for all provinces and municipalities, it would be essential that the definitions of employability and of eligibility for dominion aid be made by the dominion.

Then there is a footnote which elaborates this statement. I quote these excerpts, Mr. Chairman, from these reports to show the extent to which the problem has been recognized on a federal basis for many years, and yet to this day we have no acceptance of responsibility by the federal government for these people. When I make a plea for change in policy I do it on two different points: First of all, for the man himself and his family; and second, for the municipalities that are carrying such an unwieldy load of taxation, and for which there seems to be no immediate relief in sight. Any plan should be set up when there is no apparent urgency so that it may swing into action if and when any claims are made in either small or large volume.

The government has recognized the advisability of legislation of this sort. When I say that I mean introducing legislation at a time when there is no apparent immediate need for it, as is instanced by some of the legislation which has been passed by this house during the session. It should be recognized also in what is basically a non-defence department, although the workers in that department have an important effect on the defence preparations of the nation. It is unfortunate that it takes a war or the threat of a war to give our people full employment. For that specific reason I urge that this matter be considered as quickly as possible, so that the regulations may be geared to a peacetime economy.

As I mentioned earlier, there are in excess of three million workers in this country who are not covered by unemployment insurance, and there are some peculiar situations that develop. I received just this week two letters from men who have small farms, and who live close to the city of Hamilton. One of the men owns eight acres. I am sure everyone will agree that you cannot live on the production of eight acres of land. This land supplements his income by working in industry; or perhaps I should put it the other way round: he supplements the earnings which he makes in industry by what he takes off these eight acres of land. But he finds that although he has paid into the unemployment insurance fund for a number of years, and although he has been on steady employment for a number of years, yet he has been told by the officials that in the event of his being unemployed he could not benefit from unemployment insurance benefits because he is a farmer and owns a farm. Likewise, a friend of his, of whom I also have a record, was working for a construction company. He applied for unemployment insurance benefits and was told that he was not eligible because he had some property all set out in grapes. Although he had received no revenue from them, and the grapes were not yet ripe, and he had not yet been able to sell any, he could not get any unemployment insurance because of the potential revenue. Although he had contributed to the unemployment insurance fund for some time, he was not eligible for the benefits. These are cases that should be recognized because, Mr. Chairman, I find men working in greenhouses are listed as working in horticulture. Accordingly, there is a link-up with agriculture, and they are not insurable. Therefore on the one hand you have people who are not insurable and consequently would not be able to benefit from unemployment insurance in the event of their becoming unemployed. On the other hand, there are men who are paying into the fund and who cannot collect because they have a few acres of land.

There is still, Mr. Chairman, another item in the Unemployment Insurance Act of which I should like to speak at this time. It has to do with clause 5A (1) of the unemployment insurance benefit regulations, 1949. I am sure the minister is aware of this clause, and of some of the injustices which have been created by its enactment; but in order to refresh the memory of hon. members who may not be familiar enough with the act to recognize the clause by its number, I shall read the first subsection:

5A (1) Every married woman shall be disqualified from receiving benefit for the period of two years following her marriage unless she is relieved sooner from any such disqualification as provided in this section.

There are certain circumstances under which that does not obtain but, generally speaking, that is the ruling. I maintain that it is most unfair and, more than that, that it is unworkable. I do not know how it can be established that an individual has been laid off for any specific reason, because there is available only the word of the person concerned. There is only the word of the employee as to the reasons for his remaining at work, and only the word of the employer as to the reasons for dismissal.

As I said before, I maintain this is a most unfair section. Of all the suggestions I have made today I would urge particularly that this section be repealed as quickly as possible. I suggest that the position of women, either married or single, in the labour forces of Canada, and particularly in these times of national stress, is so vital to the economy of the nation that discrimination of this sort is unthinkable.

I would ask that the minister give consideration to all these matters, some of which are current and of great importance, and others of which have been standing for many years. But in each and every one of them there is at this moment a certain element of urgency, and I bespeak his sincere application to their consideration.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer briefly to a few of the points discussed by the hon. member for Hamilton West. First of all I would congratulate her upon her speech, and would thank her for the tribute she paid to my predecessor, Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, in which I join heartily. I join with her, too, in saying that many of the things for which he worked hard, and were instituted by him, are now bearing fruit and operating for the benefit of the people of Canada.

The national advisory council on manpower, which I announced in the house in a statement of some length, met in its first meeting shortly after the announcement was made. The object of creating such a body was to have the benefit of direct advice, alongside the indirect advice given in this chamber, from those who work from day to day as leaders in labour organizations, those who employ labour, the women of the country, the veterans and the farmers. The purpose was to give their representatives an opportunity to sit down together from time to time, on call, as may be required, in company with officials of departments such as the Department of Defence Production, the Department of National Defence, my own department and other departments which, while not so keenly interested as the three I have mentioned, still have an interest in the subject of manpower. I would think particularly of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

The advisory council held a meeting and, as an exploratory first meeting, it was successful; certainly those who attended thought it so. Certain subjects were decided upon for study, and it was arranged that further meetings were to be on call. Following the question the hon. member for Nanaimo asked a few days ago, I learned from Mr. Norman Robertson and Mr. MacNamara that they have sent out notices for a meeting to be held on the 18th and 19th of this month, and longer as may be required.

I can certainly agree with the hon. member in the stress she places on the importance of industrial peace at this time, and the fortunate situation in which Canada has found herself since last September, at any rate, in the way that leaders of labour have been working with management toward industrial peace. So much has this condition obtained that since last September the average number of people on strike in Canada at any given time has been less than 400 workers.

The hon. member said she would not discuss in detail—and indeed she did not—the railway situation which developed last September. However, she did mention the expression "compulsory arbitration", and referred to the fact that that feature of the act which we passed in the short session last fall still remains. If I understood her correctly, that was the meaning of what she said. I believe the real answer is that today that act is as dead as a doornail.

Mrs. Fairclough: I hope it will never live again.

Mr. Gregg: It is as dead as a doornail, because the things for which it was enacted have been accomplished; it is null and void. So that compulsory arbitration, even in so far as that act is concerned, does not exist at the present time.

Mr. Green: Yes, but it would be a precedent.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member's observations as to the definition of confidential employment, and her references to uniform labour laws, anti-discriminatory laws, and other suggestions she made so ably in connection with federal labour laws will be given careful consideration.

When it was said that our labour force numbers about 5,200,000 it will be remembered, I am sure, that that includes all the farmers and a great many of those people who are engaged in businesses of their own.

Many of the hon. member's views as to the extension of the advantages of unemployment insurance, in so far as it is possible to do so, are in accord with government policy, and constitute a goal toward which the commission itself is working. When its operations are being discussed in detail I would be prepared to give my hon. friend some information as to the progress that has been made, arising in some respects from the amendments to the act made a year ago.

I listened attentively to what the hon. member said as to her experience gained from active participation in municipal affairs and municipal government, all of which gave an indication of her close knowledge of that field of public service. I listened, too, to her reference to turning up two reports which only last fall shortly after coming to the department, and in the face of the oncoming federal-provincial convention, I too read with care. I had a notion they might be on the agenda. However, as everyone knows, it seemed desirable at the time to confine the discussion of the conference, with the result that those two subjects were not on the agenda. The matter of the responsibility for unemployment was not discussed—not because there was any doubt as to its importance, but rather because it was desired to limit the discussions of the conference to the two subjects which had priority.

I agree that now, in a period approaching full employment, is the time to give full consideration to a subject of that kind. As I read some of the reports of those commissions, I must say that, looking at them in the light of present-day experience I wondered whether to some extent they were not based upon the experiences of the harder days between 1930 and 1940. I say this with full knowledge that I am probably entering in where angels fear to tread, and talking with people who have had much more experience in the matter than I have.

However, as we stand today, I find it difficult to see how there could be a fixed line of responsibility drawn in respect of the unemployed employables as between Canada, the provinces and municipalities. Supposing the great lakes development is carried out? I am thinking of something that was decided the other day and which will more particularly benefit the people of my province, the suggested co-operation between the federal and provincial authorities in forest conservation work. Federal money is to be supplied and there will be co-operation by the dominion with the provinces. I am wondering whether consideration should not be given to co-operation in connection with projects that are worth while without relation to the responsibility of the men who are to take part in the work on them.

Mrs. Fairclough: Without wishing to interrupt the minister, but just while we are thinking on this subject, the very fact that at present there is a line drawn by reason of the responsibility accepted by the provinces and the responsibility which they refuse to accept would indicate that it is possible to establish a line.

Mr. Gregg: I am not going to develop that any further except to say that it is not being overlooked. If the hon. member will send me particulars of the special cases she has referred to I shall be glad to have them looked into. With regard to married women, the regulations were amended last fall and I should like to make a full statement in connection with this when we are dealing with the unemployment insurance commission. I can assure the hon. member that there was no intention of discriminating against women under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The advisory committee that was studying this matter felt that the regulations could be improved, but if we have made errors in attempting to improve them I assure the hon. member that we will continue our studies to avoid incurring any hardship.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to suggest to the minister with due deference that he is getting off to a bad start in getting his estimates through by answering each hon. member who may bring problems to his attention. We are dealing with the first item and every time the minister speaks he is bound to provoke other hon. members into making a speech. Having watched the previous minister of labour and other ministers work their estimates through the house I think the proper way to handle them—this would be in the minister's own interests—would be to let everybody talk and then sum it all up.

Mr. Gregg: May I say to the hon. member that it is not very often that I am talked to in this house by a lady.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to attempt to analyse the minister's whole department because every single item in his estimates could involve a forty minute speech if it was analysed completely. I am going to confine my remarks to those things to which I think the Department of Labour should be giving priority at this time.

The Department of Labour is going to be the main mobilization centre both for defence production and for the armed services. According to radio and press reports the Minister of National Defence will shortly be before this house to tell us that the manpower requirements for military purposes have greatly increased and that there is also urgency for them. He cannot get that manpower from any other place in this country except the industrial set-up, and that means a possible disruption of industry and a lot of headaches for the Department of Labour.

Regardless of the importance of the other departments of government, the Department of Labour is the most important as far as the mobilization of manpower for defence and industry is concerned. The minister has the greatest responsibility in that regard. Unless that responsibility is understood, unless those in charge are able to do the job and understand the job, the industrial set-up of this country will be badly disrupted and shortages will be created for defence purposes.

The first thing I should like to impress upon the minister is that when he announced the appointment of the 28 members of the manpower council and stated to this house that that council was to have the responsibility of looking after the industrial set-up, of allocating and re-allocating manpower and advising the minister as to where it could be taken from, I disagreed with the government in the appointments. I did not think the personnel selected were in close enough touch with the industrial workers of this country to be able to advise the minister as to what was or was not essential.

I am not particularly interested in whom industry has appointed to represent them, in who was appointed to represent the women of this country, to represent the Legion and so on. That was the prerogative of the government. If they think the appointments were all right, then they accept that responsibility. But I am interested in the people who have been taken in from labour because in the final analysis that is where you are going to get your real advice.

Let me refer for a moment to the representatives of labour whom the government has selected. I am not saying anything about these men personally. They are the executive heads of different organizations and in so far as they know the problem they will do a good job. As I said when I discussed this matter previously, after six years of war and four years of uncertainty the working people of this country are not going to be pushed around by people in ivory towers in Ottawa. I meant that. I know how the working people feel. Percy Bengough, the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, was one appointment. He lives in Ottawa. Another appointment was Pat Conroy, secretary treasurer of the Canadian Congress of Labour, who also lives in Ottawa. Another appointment was Gerard Picard, president of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, who I presume lives in Montreal although I am not sure. Another appointment was James B. Ward, assistant grand chief engineer and dominion legislative representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and secretary, dominion joint legislative committee of the railways transportation brotherhoods, also of Ottawa.

Men who live in Ottawa and do their work in Ottawa have little conception of what kind of disruption is going to take place in an organization in Windsor or on the west coast. I suggested to the minister that these men were all right in an advisory capacity, but at the time I criticized this particular body I did so on the ground that they were too far removed from the scene of action to be able to say definitely what was going to happen in industry when it was being reconverted for war purposes. They are too far removed from the scene of activity to be able to give you a definite opinion. At that time I suggested to the minister the setting up of industrial councils. When I referred to "industrial councils" I meant that representatives from the industry concerned should be members of such a council. For example, one of the first industries affected by the change-over to war is the auto workers industry. The industry has received orders for vehicles, tank engines, and all that kind of thing. There is a shift taking place now in that industry. Men are being displaced, and so far as the manpower council is concerned nothing has been done to find out exactly what is happening. Overnight 3,500 workers in the Ford plant at Windsor are affected. The shift is putting men on the street. Before that happened the matter should have been discussed with the representatives of the automobile workers union, a large organization. Representatives from Ford, Chrysler and General Motors should have been called in.

They should have been told exactly what percentage of their plants was going to be swung over to war purposes, and they should have been told the number of men affected. They were not, they are still in the dark, and that particular type of action is going to continue. In my opinion the auto workers industry is going to be badly disrupted and changed from its peacetime base. When the union representatives visited the government departments for the purpose of finding out what was going to be done with the men laid off they were told that the aircraft industry is going to be expanded. That is quite true. They were told that there will be work in the aircraft industry, but that means that a man living with his family in Windsor is going to have to leave Windsor and go to Toronto or Montreal to work. That will mean maintaining two homes because he is not going to be able to find housing in Toronto or Montreal to which he can move his family. It is going to cost him more to maintain his family and himself apart from them.

Another point is that wages in the aircraft industry are 25 to 30 cents an hour less than in the automobile industry, which is also a very serious problem. These men are highly organized. They have contracts, and they are not going to take kindly to such a move. You can have a disruption there of a type that you will not like unless the problem is settled. If these men are obliged to make a shift they have a right to know where they are going to live, and what is going to happen with respect to the differential in wages. They work under an agreement with the industry. They accept and I accept the necessity for the change, but if we are going to swing over 25 per cent of the plant production of this country to war purposes then organized workers who have contracts will be displaced. They are not unemployed; they are displaced because of the change to war production.

That is an angle that should be discussed with the representatives of the workers affected. In addition, if the manpower council is going to operate as it should, if it is going to seek manpower for military purposes, then it should determine the industries from which it is going to take them. That is not hard to find out because the government has decided to give war orders to certain plants which means they are going to change their assembly lines. Before any decision is made by the manpower council or by the Department of Labour, representatives of the workers involved should be called in, and their contracts should be examined. If you are going to move them you must have places for them to live, and the matter of the differential in wages should be taken care of.

I do not think the quiet manner in which the defence program has been going along will continue for much longer. I do not believe that the developing international situation will permit us to be too complacent much longer, and I believe the tempo of our defence program will have to be stepped up very quickly. As a safeguard against disruption in any plant that is being swung over to defence production, I strongly suggest to the minister that he call in the representatives of the men affected. Instead of the manpower council, what I wanted to see was industrial councils formed, something that I have suggested for the last five or six years, in the basic industries of the country such as the automobile workers, coal, steel and the packing houses. These industries are very essential to the economy of the country. Industrial councils could be formed so that representatives could come here to discuss a particular industry and what its role was going to be in the defence program for which we are preparing. I am going to leave that with the minister because I think it is the most important thing that his department has to handle at the present time.

There are little odds and ends that I shall bring to his attention. The hon. member for Hamilton West spoke this afternoon about unemployment insurance and all those things. We agree with her and support her representations. There is no need to repeat them. There is another problem in the field of labour relations that I should like to bring to the minister's attention. In Canada today practically every industry has come to the conclusion that a man must work every day. Most industries have inserted in their contracts certain penalties for absenteeism, a thing that is pretty hard to define. I challenge anyone in this house or any industrialist in the country to define absenteeism for me. I have my own definitions. I can give a million reasons why a man might be off work in a particular industry, but the trend to working every day has been pretty highly developed.

This matter affects the Department of Justice. The point I am coming to is that after working for five days the average worker likes to go out on Saturday and take a drink of beer. Many of them commit small infractions of the law. A man may be driving a car, get into a bit of difficulty and wind up with a mandatory seven-day jail sentence. He also loses his licence to drive. For these slight infractions involving the loss of work for a few days—and it happens all over the country—he pays the penalty prescribed by law. That should finish the matter but it does not. When he goes back to his employment again he finds that his employer has also penalized him. He has taken his means of livelihood from him. He says: We do not want you in our employ any longer.

The man was fined or jailed, he paid the penalty prescribed by the laws of the country, and then his employer says: I am sentencing you further; you are not going to work any more. When a man is let out in that way by an employer the only thing left for him is to look for unemployment insurance. When he goes to look for unemployment insurance he finds that he is penalized again. They deprive him of any payments for the first three weeks because the employer fired him, and in some cases he is not paid at all. I have taken up this matter with the Department of Labour. I know that the officials of that department with whom I deal are very flexible in their views. They will stretch the law as far as it will go, but there is a limit beyond which they cannot go. I want the Minister of Labour to inquire from the Department of Justice whether an employer, after a man has paid the penalty prescribed by law, can then further penalize him by depriving him of his employment. After a man has paid unemployment insurance since its inception and has never drawn any of it, is it justice to deprive him of it because of a slight infraction of the law? He may have been off work a short time, but should he be penalized in that way? I am not going to elaborate any more upon it, but there are cases of that kind. I have brought them to the attention of the labour department. I should like the Minister of Labour to make some inquiries of the Minister of Justice to ascertain whether an employer has the right, after a man has already served a sentence, to further penalize him. I was always led to believe by the legal minds in my part of the country that it was a statutory offence to deprive a man of his means of livelihood. That is exactly the position the employer is taking in the circumstances I have described.

In connection with this matter of unemployment insurance—

Mr. Goode: I should like to ask the hon. member what the unions' point of view is in that case? I am interested in that.

Mr. Gillis: It was a union that brought it to my attention. The secretary of the union wrote to me giving me the names of several people who were affected in that way. He made representations which I passed on to the Department of Labour. The answer from the Department of Labour was far from satisfactory, and it is for that reason I am bringing it to the minister's attention. As a rule, such matters can be ironed out with the labour department.

With regard to unemployment insurance, I should like to mention the problem of the displaced person in the swing-over to war production. For example, the auto worker is fairly well paid. His wage rate is among the highest in industry. All of a sudden, he is told he is unemployed because they are swinging the assembly line over to vehicle production and it will take some time to retool. He will be off work a month, two months or three months. He finds himself without a pay envelope, so he goes to the unemployment insurance office. Now, that man was earning perhaps $90 a week, and that is not unusual in that industry. He finds himself cut down to $14 or $15 per week, and I do not think that man should be penalized in that way. The employer is not suffering any loss. If the government requisitions a plant for war purposes, clauses are written into the contract protecting the industrialist from loss. New equipment is provided, and special depreciation rates and all that sort of thing protect the industrialist. A man whose income is suddenly cut off because of the swing-over to war production should not lose that income. I believe the Unemployment Insurance Act should be revised to cover that particular case so that the man could be paid approximately what he was earning. I believe he is entitled to that. There is about $647 million in that unemployment insurance fund now. There will be a lot of unemployment of that type. The auto workers are affected now, as are the Massey-Harris people, and all the industries that are going to be swung over to war production will be affected. I do not think it is fair to protect the employer against losses and throw the employee out in the street, then ask him to eke out an existence on unemployment insurance until such time as he is placed in employment somewhere else. I want the minister to consider that matter, because I know the auto industry is beginning to be badly affected by it, and I believe it is going to be much worse before very long.

In my opinion the thing to do is to call in the heads of the auto unions. These are sensible men and the matter could be discussed with them. An understanding having been arrived at, they would be able to go back and properly advise the employees before a lot of resentment and disruption occurred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said I was not going to rehash a lot of things. In conclusion, I should like to say this for the benefit of the member for Hamilton West. She talked about men 45 years of age, but actually it is 40, not being required in industry any longer, and that is correct. She was also right when she said that the reason for that is that industries are providing pensions on a contributory basis, and they did not want to take in men at that age because they would not contribute long enough to make up for what they might draw out; that is absolutely correct. In my opinion, her solution to the problem was not correct.

Mrs. Fairclough:. I did not offer any solution.

Mr. Gillis: You made some suggestions. There is only one solution to that problem, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hatfield: Unemployment insurance.

Mr. Gillis: No, unemployment insurance does not cover it. There should be established in this country a contributory retiring allowance handled by the annuities branch of the Department of Labour. I have said that a good many times in this house. In my opinion, the pensions from industry to industry across this country today are a terrific waste of money. Look at the duplication of administration they have. No two industries in this country can provide the same rate of pension. There are hundreds of thousands employed in small industries who will never receive any pension at all. Those industries have not got that kind of money. There will never be any solution to the problem until the federal authorities—in my opinion it has to be the federal authority—confer with the industrialists and show them where they could save a lot of money by contributing now to a central fund handled by the annuities department. This department has the best actuaries in the country with experience in working out plans of this type. It could be handled effectively by centralizing it in Ottawa. In my opinion, this plan would cost 50 per cent less than we are paying today for these other disjointed haphazard schemes that industry is trying to run. We have to work towards that.

The old age pension is fine. It is a patch on this leaky ship that has been sinking for a long time. It is the best we can do, but we are going forward now into a streamlined age. While we may carry on with it as it is, we should start now, not providing a small pension of $40 per month at 70 or 65, but allowing men who are employed in industry to contribute to a retiring allowance that is going to mean something. It should be approximately $100 or $150 a month, something towards which they could contribute in co-operation with the industrialists of this country. With the brains available in the annuities branch, with the money that has been thrown around in some of these other schemes, a real retiring allowance could be established which would cost the taxpayer of this country practically nothing except the administration of it by the federal government. I should like to stress again that it should be a federal matter, because if you get it back to the ten provinces then you have a lot of duplication in administration. Look at the family allowances branch. The cheques go out regularly every month from the federal government and there are never any complaints about the administration. I believe that a retiring allowance on a contributory basis, directed from Ottawa, would take out of the field of struggle and discussion this old age pension, and all of these things would disappear, at least for the next generation. That is one contribution we should make to them.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, like some of the others, and particularly the member who has just spoken, I do not intend to go into this matter in too much detail at the moment. I think probably we can make better progress as the various items come up for discussion. But there are a few general expressions of opinion that I should like to voice on this occasion. For the length of time that the Minister of Labour has occupied that position, I think that generally speaking he has not done too bad a job. He has a big job on his hands. But one thing that has assisted the Minister of Labour more than anything else, I think, was the outbreak of the Korean war. Much as we hate to admit that some of our problems are solved by wars, nevertheless it becomes a fact, whether we admit it or not.

Hon. members will recall that, just before the outbreak of the Korean war, we had about 423,000 registered unemployed; and that is not counting the unemployed who were not registered. But the government itself was not much concerned about it at that time, because it looked to all of us as though that huge unemployment problem would be taken care of in the near future; and it was taken care of. A great many of those men who were then unemployed joined the armed services, and that solved the problem for the moment. But as soon as that war is over—and we all trust that it will be over as quickly as possible—we are going to return to our unemployment problems again. Now is the time when we must make every effort to improve our labour relations so that those problems will not be so serious when they come up again.

I want to speak for a moment or two, Mr. Chairman, about the manpower council that was set up this year. I said at the time I was speaking with regard to the matter that I thought in general it was a good thing. I think so yet. I think it has great possibilities. But like the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I have had complaints with regard to the allocation of workingmen.

Representatives of organized labour from Windsor, from Oshawa and from western Canada have visited us in our offices. One of the complaints which they are making is that there is not the proper co-ordination which enables men to keep and maintain steady employment. They pointed out to us that there are, both in Windsor and in Oshawa, large numbers of men who are being laid off right now when we are supposed to be at the peak of employment.

They are laid off because the plants have been promised war contracts; and of course the production of commercial vehicles is cut down. But the plants have not yet started the production of military equipment. In fact, the drawings are still on the boards. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, it does not make any difference what plans are being inaugurated, or what plans are still on the drawing boards. If these men are not employed, they are facing an extremely difficult situation; and that situation becomes particularly difficult in view of the increasing prices. That situation points to a certain amount of lack of co-ordination with this manpower committee.

Then we have the same situation with regard to the mining industry of western Canada. This has been drawn to my attention in my own constituency, and it is a serious thing for us out in that part of the country. This year we are losing over half a million tons in coal production. That is something which is due largely to circumstances beyond the control of the Department of Labour, but not beyond the control of the government. We are still importing huge amounts of coal from the United States, thus doing away with our western market. Then we have the discovery and the use of oil and gas, which is causing the displacement of coal. But regardless of that fact, large numbers of people are becoming unemployed in western Canada owing to the curtailment of mining. I do not want to get into a discussion of the coal mines in this debate, but this situation has a material effect on the Department of Labour. I therefore think it would behoove the Department of Labour to use every means they have at their disposal to insist that the government initiate a complete and comprehensive plan for a national fuel policy so that this labour problem, particularly as it applies to miners in western Canada, will not increase but in fact will diminish.

I want to say a word about compulsory arbitration. I think there are few if any hon. members who agree with the principle of compulsory arbitration. A moment ago the minister pointed out that this idea is as dead as a doornail; I think that is what he said. I think he is right in that respect. I do not know what the government's attitude would be if a similar occasion arose. I suppose we would have to settle the matter when we came to it. But from the standpoint of principle, I am strongly against compulsory arbitration; and I could not express the view half so well as it was expressed in the Labour Review a short time ago. I think I should put it on Hansard, particularly because it is the view of some labour leaders. The title of this article is "Compulsory Arbitration, a Totalitarian Concept" by the Hon. L. B. Schwellenbach, then Secretary of Labor of the United States of America. He has this to say about this particular subject:

> The principle of compulsory arbitration does violence to our whole Anglo-Saxon concept of law. Many people say that it is customary under our system when two people have a dispute to take that dispute into court and let the court decide which side is right and which is wrong. So far as contractual relations between parties is concerned, it has never been within the purview of the court's power to write contracts for people.
> Once contracts have been written and agreed upon the courts will interpret and enforce them, but no court has attempted to write contracts. That is what those who advocate compulsory arbitration would have the board of arbitration or a court do for the parties.

May I interject to say that I think that would be exactly the case if we accepted the general principle of compulsory arbitration. The article continues:

> It must also be realized that if an arbitrator writes a contract which, by increase in wages or by any other device, increases the cost to the employer, it will then be necessary for the arbitrator or for some governmental agency to determine what price the employer may charge for the products which he manufactures and sells. Just as sure as night follows the day the second step must follow the first. The government cannot control the industrial-relations side of the problem without controlling all of the other steps and the manufacture, distribution, and sale of the goods produced. Therefore, those who unwittingly believe that there is a simple answer through the medium of compulsory arbitration have not looked further down the road which must be followed if such compulsory arbitration is to be effective.

I think almost everybody will agree that that would be the natural result if we were to extend this principle of compulsory arbitration; that there is just no end to government interference all the way down the line of production.

Let me turn to one other subject which has interested me. It was mentioned by the previous speaker. I refer to industrial pensions. I have never thought that an industrial pension was the solution of our working-class problems. I do not yet. The ones, and the only ones, who can benefit are those who are employed in industry and receive that pension; and it must of necessity increase the price of the goods produced.

I like the idea suggested by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I just forget how he described it, national pensions for all, or something to that effect, retiring pensions. This is not something new, Mr. Chairman. Just refer to family allowances. We were the first ones in the house to mention them back in 1935. We called them by a different name, but that does not make any difference. We called it a national dividend, and everyone in the house without exception laughed at it and the Liberals laughed at it the loudest. Yet, they were the ones who came around and gave us family allowances. And mark you, lo and behold, when the Prime Minister introduced the bill—and I remember it so well—he used the exact terminology, the exact phrases that we had used in advocating a national dividend. To this day not one Liberal has spoken against the national dividend as it is applied to the family allowances.

Now we have the suggestion of a national pension, with which I am in accord. With regard to a national pension to industrial workers, I am not going to say now that it would be improper to give it. When the family allowances were given I did not say that it was improper to give them to the children. I think that was right. It was a start on the thing that we were advocating. National pensions are a step further in that same direction. I do not see how you are going to confine it just to those who are employed in organized labour, because there are many people in this country who deserve pensions and who are not employed by industry, and who have no possible chance of receiving an industrial pension. And yet, all these people contribute to an industrial pension.

I am a hundred per cent behind the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he advocates a national pension. I think the idea is perfectly sound. We are coming to the time when the country will be forced to do something like that, and it is much better for us to progress. We started out by giving family allowances. All right. Let us go another step further and give national pensions to those people of fifty years of age or over. As time goes on, it will be necessary to continue that, and I shall be most happy when everybody in this country receives a national pension, a national dividend, or whatever you wish to call it.

Some mention was made of unemployment insurance. I have a little experience of the way in which this insurance is applied, and certainly it is not beneficial in all cases. On this occasion I am not going to repeat what has already been said, except to say that in principle I think it is definitely wrong to extract unemployment insurance contributions from employees who have no possible chance of benefiting under the legislation. Take people who are employed part time in agriculture—and I have case histories of them in my office. I have taken them up with the department in regard to income tax, and other things of that nature. They have to make contributions to the unemployment insurance fund without any possible hope of ever receiving any benefit therefrom. It seems to me that in principle it is definitely wrong and should be changed.

I do not want to prolong this opening discussion. I shall have something to say on the items as they come along, but I thought I should express a few comments on this occasion.

Mr. Cauchon: On April 17 I called the attention of the house to industry's reluctance to engage employees who had passed the 45-year mark. The problem of the older workers is one facing most democracies of the world today not only in North America but also in many western European countries. Since that time added information has come to my attention and this new information is so interesting that I think it is my duty to make it known to hon. members now. It concerns the practical measures being considered or put into effect in other countries to cope with this problem, which is becoming more acute as the curve of the average age of workers gets steadily higher.

On page 1 of the report, dated April 11, 1951, issued by Mr. Chester W. Hepler, chief of the manpower division of the international labour office in Geneva, we find the following:

> In the first place, many of these countries are faced with the problem of an aging population, which means that the active population includes an increasingly high proportion of workers in the older age groups (over 40 or 45).

When I brought this problem to the attention of the house I enumerated the arguments of some industries and, I believe, in large measure refuted them. In conclusion, as reported in Hansard, pages 2097 to 2103, inclusive, I asked that a committee of the house be set up to study the whole problem.

I am more fully convinced that the matter can be solved only by careful study and research, this research to be carried on by the government with the co-operation of labour and management.

In this respect, let us see what is being done in other countries, namely, Belgium, France, the German federal republic, The Netherlands, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. Of Belgium, the report has this to say:

> The leading article in the "Revue du Travail" of October, 1950, discusses the problem arising out of the aging of the Belgian population. The theme of the conclusions is the need, on behalf of the national economy as well as on behalf of the workers concerned, to change its increasing practice to reject older workers in favour of young workers.

France too is considering legislation for 1951 to deal with the practice of discrimination against its older workers. Again I quote:

Government Action in Respect of Employment of Older Workers

The following give, briefly, proposed legislation being presently considered by the labour and social security committee of the national assembly, 1951 session:

1. Proposed law (No. 11,995) that industries employing more than five wage earners should, in engaging such workers, reserve 25 per cent of such engagements for persons over 50 years of age.

2. Proposed law (No. 11,951) asking private undertakings to draw up a list of occupations which could be satisfactorily fulfilled by women over 50 years of age, and a second list of the occupations they could fulfil after an accelerated apprenticeship course.

3. Proposed law (No. 11,996) that single women of more than 50 years registered in the departmental employment offices should have the right to unemployment benefits.

The committee in its remarks accompanying these proposed laws refers to the difficulty of these workers in finding employment on account of their age and of other associated reasons. It also points out that age statistics of available workers, labour force, indicate that 25 per cent of employment must come from workers between 50 and 65 years.

In the section dealing with the German federal republic under government action, we find:

The Minister of Labour, Saar State, in a statement in January, 1951 offered to pay to enterprises taking on workers over forty-five years, a subsidy out of the unemployment insurance funds to meet the salaries of these workers. This subsidy would be paid during a period of three months to enable the older worker to refresh the vocational skill he lost during a long period of unemployment.

Again, referring to The Netherlands, we find:

The report of the national labour office for the last quarter of 1949 states that, with a view to finding a remedy for unemployment among older workers, the labour office was collaborating with the labour foundation in a campaign to induce employers to employ greater numbers of these workers.

From Switzerland comes the following:

The quarterly bulletin on employment matters, Possibilités de Travail, edited by the special official delegate to the Swiss federal government, stated in July, 1950, that while there had been, recently, little difficulty in placing qualified workers in Switzerland, all parts of the country reported that it was becoming more and more difficult to find employment for unskilled or insufficiently trained workers or for middle-aged workers. The writer stated that this was again evidence of the importance of systematic and well planned vocational training.

The same writer in January, 1951, stated in an article entitled "Too Old at 40" (referring to employees in commerce) that work seekers between 40 and 45 years in search of employment are finding it very difficult to get employment. Employers prefer young workers.

Replies to a questionnaire put by the Alliance de Sociétés Féminines Suisse to several employment placement bureaux, January, 1951, showed that the number of women workers over 40 years unable to get employment had increased markedly during 1950, and that placing them was proving difficult, and very difficult in the case of unskilled women workers.

The employment bureaux stated that they made special efforts to find employment for these older workers. Officials went personally to employers on their behalf.

The United Kingdom too has concerned itself with this practice of rejecting older workers. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour during the adjournment debate in the House of Commons July 19, 1950, stated:

The seriousness of employment among men aged 51-55 and 56 and over can be seen from the fact that the figures of 12 per cent and 23 per cent, compared with 7 per cent and 11 per cent of the working population. It is hardly surprising then, that the older men remain unemployed for longer periods than the younger men.

In the age group under 40, at December, 1949, 25 per cent had been unemployed for periods between eight weeks and one year, and this proportion rose to 33 per cent for the age group 41-50, 36 per cent for the age group 51-55 and 37 per cent for men over 55. For the same age groups, those unemployed for more than one year represented 6 per cent, 16 per cent, 20 per cent, and 28 per cent respectively.

Government Action

The following information relates to action since the war years and in respect of the employment of older workers generally rather than action in respect of the special problem of the continued employment of workers of retiring age. The ministry of labour report for 1947 stated that the ministry took every occasion offered to appeal to employers not to impose unduly low age limits when engaging staff. The ministry sought the assistance of the association of British chambers of commerce and pointed out that age distribution of the working population was changing and that employers must realize that their staffs will have to include a higher proportion of older men. The association have given wide publicity to this problem.

The ministry of labour report for 1948 referred to consideration of the problem being given by local employment committees. Able-bodied unemployed persons as well as the disabled in United Kingdom, are admitted to courses of industrial rehabilitation under the Training and Employment Act of 1948. The parliamentary secretary in his statement to parliament, July, 1950, quoted statistics to demonstrate the opportunities made by the government to allow older men and women to enter the civil service.

The recognition of this problem by the government along the lines indicated in the above references, has on several occasions been re-stated in the House of Commons during its recent session in 1951. The minister has placed the matter before the national joint advisory council. A social survey to ascertain the views of employers about the employment of elderly workers and the attitude of the elderly workers was undertaken, at the request of the department, by the central office of information last year. The survey is completed and the report on it is being drawn up at present.

Certainly the Minister of Labour will agree that he is the logical one to take the lead in seeking a remedy for this social problem. In other countries it has been the department of labour which has undertaken to find a solution. Since Canada has led the way in many social services I should like to see our country assume leadership in this particular field.

The Minister of Labour has at his disposal experts in all matters pertaining to labour. Of course I do not know the superintendents of the employment offices in the other provinces but I do know Mr. Marcel Guay of Montreal, a man in whom I have the utmost confidence and who would, I am sure, be an asset to such a committee. It can be expected that the other provinces are similarly fortunate in their superintendents. The employment offices of this country gave conclusive evidence of their competency during the last war by their direction and handling of the manpower resources of this country to meet the war's tremendous demands for labour. I again ask the Minister of Labour to consider the setting up of a special committee for the following purposes:

1. To approach every superintendent of each employment office in all the provinces of Canada and request him to appear before the committee to submit briefs in connection with the situation in his respective province.

2. To send to each manager of every employment office in Canada an invitation to submit in writing his opinion of this matter of employment of older workers. At a relatively small cost recommendations would thus be received from the men in closest contact with those in this age group who are seeking employment. The committee would then be in position to call before it the managers who seem best able to give information and constructive advice upon the subject.

3. To call upon labour also to submit through its union leaders, or other representatives chosen by the unions, labour's point of view and counsel.

4. To request a representation from industry whose recommendations would receive careful consideration.

5. To solicit the aid of those from our universities who are known specialists in the field of social and industrial relations, or of any other recognized experts in the causes of unemployment, especially experts in the rehabilitation of the unemployed.

Now is the opportune time for the Department of Labour to take action because it appears that industry is more than ever willing to co-operate. Many industrial leaders agree that modern management is not the management of yesterday. Among these is George K. Foster, whom I quoted in my speech during the budget debate and who states:

> Modern management is not just cold industrial efficiency. Modern managers are equally concerned with industry's human relations, with the dignity of man and with the harmonious co-ordination of men and machines.

In addition I am delighted to quote again the encouraging remarks of Mr. F. W. Winspear, president of the Canadian Chambers of Commerce, who surely is in a position to know and reflect labour's attitude. He said:

> As we move further into this period of deepening crisis, I believe that Canadian business is ready and alert to assume its leadership which the country has the right to expect of it.

And again:

> I believe attention should be directed toward the emergence of a fine new national spirit, the sense of enlightened leadership on the part of the businessmen of Canada.

In view of such statements the committee could feel free to call on these and other industrial leaders to advise and assist it in its work. Although in the past a committee has been appointed representing labour, industry and government, never has a committee of the house been set up to consider this and related problems. If such a committee were set up the government would then be in position to advise the house as to what steps could be taken to alleviate the high incidence of unemployment among older workers. Perhaps the minister would be kind enough to give an expression of his views on the subject.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I should like to address a few remarks on the question of the manpower advisory committee. As you will recall, that committee was set up by order in council dated February 1. The Minister of Labour outlined the scope of the work of the committee in a statement to the House of Commons on February 5. He stated at that time, as reported on page 71 of Hansard:

> The duty of the council will be to consider various aspects of manpower questions; to advise on plans under review, and to suggest plans which should be developed so as to make for the most effective utilization in the national interest of the present and potential man and woman working force of Canada.

The intention was to have the working personnel distributed among the armed forces, defence production and civilian activities in the most effective manner possible. By coincidence or by design, I know not which, the Minister of National Defence outlined on the same day the defence requirements which were being instituted in order to meet the government's program made necessary by the international situation as it then was. I will not elaborate on those various requirements, but in summing up the Minister of National Defence said, as reported on page 97 of Hansard of February 5:

> This whole program involves an increase in the number of service and civilian personnel employed full time on defence from the present figure of about 90,000 to a total of about 148,000.
> That is the program, a large one for a country of 14 million people still involved in developing its natural resources and also facing the task of maintaining essential services over an area of 3½ million square miles.

That gives some idea of the problems which face this committee. I have a feeling that perhaps the appointment of this committee was prompted by recommendations which were made at the annual convention of the Canadian Legion held in Winnipeg in the previous fall and contained in a brief submitted to the government under the title of "Operation Preparedness." They had placed as the first requisite the need of a review of the manpower situation in the country. In fact they said that nothing could be done to organize effectively manpower in this country until a full scale review of our manpower resources had been made.

I am quite certain that the returned men of this country were delighted to know that the advisory committee which was to make this review was to act under a minister who had only recently given up the portfolio of veterans affairs. The Canadian Legion stressed also that this review would require time in order to obtain information and to interpret the results which would be arrived at. They emphasized that owing to the seriousness of the situation, and because everything else hinged upon this review being made, no time should be lost in making a start to carry out this work. Since last fall, since the time that the statement was made in the house in February, the manpower situation in this country has deteriorated. It has become more critical. We have learned through the papers in the last twenty-four hours, and from the announcement made by the Prime Minister this afternoon in answer to a question of mine, that the Minister of National Defence will be making an important statement this evening regarding the manpower situation and the further needs of national defence. The headlines all across the country of last night and this morning were that there was an appeal going out for thousands of recruits to be called up to our forces. Unless these recruits are going to be drawn in the same old haphazard way, it is essential that a review should be made of our manpower resources.

One is amazed that this committee, which was set up on the 5th of February with a great flourish of trumpets, should have only held one meeting in the past three months. I am still further amazed that the Minister of Labour should have announced this afternoon, with a certain appearance of satisfaction, that the next meeting would be called two weeks hence. I have much sympathy with the Minister of National Defence who has been earnestly pleading for recruits, and who apparently has been untiring in his efforts to try to raise the forces which he considers necessary. I wonder whether he has struck the same responsive note amongst some of his colleagues, because the surprising procrastination on the part of the Minister of Labour in summoning the advisory committee certainly would not indicate that there is a firm determination in some other departments to get on with the job of raising men, to assess the real problem and assign individuals to their various occupations. Dangerous delays have already occurred, and if the appeal is going to meet a response throughout the country I am afraid that, as I said a moment ago, it will be a rather haphazard response.

Other speakers have mentioned that the manpower committee appears to be rather overloaded with a majority of high government officials. Apart from the chairman there are at least as many of them as there are from the various other groups in this country. They are centralized in Ottawa and, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South pointed out, they may not be in close touch with labour across the country. If these other individuals are only called once every quarter to give advice, the only result will be that they will feel that they are very much of a blind to the government, that no real responsibility is being placed on them, and they themselves will lose heart in the all-important task that they have been assigned.

I appeal to the minister to start immediately to plan for the orderly employment of workers so that there may be the greatest efficiency and the least disruption of industry. I believe that the first step to be taken is a review of the manpower resources of the country. We are told that the advisory committee examined that problem at their first meeting. They may have been examining it in the various parts of the land in which they live, or the examination may have been left entirely to the government officials here; but I suggest that, in view of the seriousness of the situation as it exists today, there is no time to be lost. We are told that industry is scouring the country for trained workers at the present time. I do not know how much the Department of Labour is doing to train tradesmen. There are a few dominion-provincial schools scattered across the country for the training of men in the various trades.

As a very definite extension of the defence preparations now being undertaken I would urge that the dominion-provincial vocational training schools be expanded, and that in some cases excellent facilities in existence in these schools be made available to the armed forces. In the armed forces there is a very high percentage of tradesmen now, and I think that there is a means of encouraging young men to learn a trade which can be of value both to themselves and to their country. I urge the minister to throw off this rather complacent, happy-go-lucky, business-as-usual attitude, and to have the advisory committee sit at frequent intervals. After he has heard the remarks to be made by the Minister of National Defence tonight I hope he will give instructions to convene the advisory committee sooner than two weeks hence.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in the debate that has developed on the administrative item in the Minister of Labour's estimates. First of all I wish to congratulate him on assuming this very important portfolio. I am sure that he will give equal satisfaction in discharging his duties in this department as in the department he previously headed, and where in my opinion he discharged his duties with considerable distinction. I wish to congratulate him also because in the main since he has taken his new office industrial relations in Canada have been fairly good. He came in at a bad time when the railway dispute was brought forcibly to the attention of parliament and the government. Having got that out of the way, I do not think he has been particularly hard pressed since. I would urge him not to think that these good times are going to last forever.

The conditions that we have had during the war years, and since then, have been such that it was fairly easy to maintain good labour relations. We have been passing through a time of high employment and rising prices; when labour made demands, these demands could, generally, be met. Employers have been able to throw any additional cost onto the community in increased prices. As I said, that may not last forever, and I would hope that it would not last forever if the circumstances that have caused it, that is war, the aftermath of war and then the preparation for another war, are the best that we can do in providing full employment.

Over the years governments in Canada, regardless of their political stripe, have been reluctant to put legislation on the statute books to protect labour. Very little, if anything was done to protect labour during the depression years of the 1930's when labour was in a terrible plight. There was a surplus of labour in the market and the employer was in what we might call today a buyer's market. Very little help was given to labour by any government, either Conservative or Liberal, during those years. During the war years when there was a huge demand for labour and there was full employment labour's position improved. War's needs made full employment a necessity and labour could make its power felt by withholding its labour. Then, governments both federal and provincial concluded that labour legislation was necessary.

Compared with the legislation in other countries, the labour legislation we have in Canada today is not too bad. I am not saying that it is good enough or that it is perfect, but in comparison with labour legislation in many parts of the world it is not too bad. I can say that because I had the opportunity last year of attending the international labour conference at Geneva where questions concerning labour legislation were our main agenda. In the matter of conciliation and arbitration legislation, Canada is not too badly off. I made a statement to that effect on my return, and I want to make it again now.

I believe it was the member for Bow River who referred to compulsory arbitration. He was strongly opposed to it. I believe that labour in this country is strongly opposed to compulsory arbitration, but I do not believe we can rule it out altogether unless labour and industry can find a better way of conducting their business.

Although I imagine everyone in this house is opposed to compulsory arbitration, we found when we met here in special session last August that compulsory arbitration legislation was put on the statute books. The disputes between the railways and their employees was referred to an arbitrator, and from his findings there was no appeal. Now, that is compulsory arbitration, but compulsory conciliation is an altogether different matter. It is accepted by both labour and industry in this country, and I think it helps to make for more peaceful settlement of industrial disputes, and for better relations between employers and labour.

I see, Mr. Chairman, that it is about six o'clock, so I shall continue after the recess.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might, with the permission of the house, revert to motions for the purpose of tabling the correspondence, from March 6 up until this afternoon, in both English and French, in connection with the old age pensions constitutional amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this correspondence will be printed as an appendix to Hansard, will it not?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you.

(For text of correspondence see appendix, pages 2726-43.)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT RESPECTING ADDITIONS TO ARMED FORCES

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if I might revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement—

Mr. W. A. Robinson (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is proceeded with, I wonder if I might be permitted to say a word. As the sponsor of one of the private bills which would ordinarily be taken at this time, I do not in any way wish to refuse unanimous consent for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to go ahead with his statement. But if hon. members of the house give unanimous consent to revert to motions at this time, I would hope that later in the session some consideration might be given to the time which we have already lost in private bills hours. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that we gladly gave up an hour a week or so ago in order that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) might present his excellent budget. This evening, if this statement is gone ahead with, we shall lose some more time. I would merely ask at this time that, if hon. members give unanimous consent, later in the session private bills be given some consideration.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, last December the twelve nations who were partners under the North Atlantic treaty decided to set up an integrated force in western Europe to deter communist aggression. General Eisenhower was appointed supreme commander.

As a party to the North Atlantic treaty and in the interest of the defence of Canada, our government indicated in the speech from the throne, that parliament would be asked to authorize Canadian participation in the European integrated force.

In furtherance of this objective, I stated in the house on February 5 that it was proposed, if parliament approved, to place in the integrated force in Europe elements of the Canadian army. The statement went on as reported at page 95 of Hansard:

> The force we propose to send will initially be a brigade group or regimental combat team, and we hope that it may arrive at about the same time as the additional U.S. forces, but this may depend on events in Korea.

Since then developments in Korea resulted in the decision to send the 25th Canadian infantry brigade group to Korea. The situation in Korea does not warrant any assumption that that formation could be released to form part of the integrated force within a reasonable period.

Keeping our force in Korea up to strength will obviously continue to be the No. 1 army priority so long as any of our troops are engaged in actual combat.

We are further expanding the Canadian army to meet that priority and other army tasks, including, subject to the approval of parliament and the completion of firm arrangements in that regard with our north Atlantic associates, the provision of a force for western Europe.

This expansion will include the formation of an additional Canadian army brigade group with supporting units.

The new formation, to be known as 27th Canadian infantry brigade group, will be recruited around the framework of some of our famous reserve army units. It will be part of Canada's regular forces and its officers and men will serve under active force terms of service and conditions and thus will be eligible for service anywhere.

Fifteen reserve force infantry battalions have been selected on a broad geographical basis, each to sponsor the raising of one and later a second company for the new force. Five highland, five rifle and five line battalions will thus be represented in forming a Canadian highland battalion, a Canadian rifle battalion and a Canadian infantry battalion. Companies will be grouped to form battalions of the active force but will retain their own identity and officers and men will continue to wear the insignia of parent reserve force regiments.

The same principle will be applied to the Royal Canadian Artillery, reserve force regiments combining to raise the units forming the field artillery required in the force. Each battery will represent one of the selected reserve force regiments. Other supporting arms and services for the force will be represented in a similar manner.

The armoured squadron with the new force will be equipped with the latest types of tanks and equipment. The Royal Canadian Dragoons will provide initial armoured support for the brigade. However, certain reserve force armoured corps regiments will participate by providing active force elements which will commence training immediately and can look forward to service abroad. In the meantime, they will retain their unit identity and be attached to the armoured corps regiments of the active force.

The reserve force units participating will be named later in a list which I hope I may have the permission of the house to table.

Every effort will continue to be made to ensure that men will serve in the units or corps of their choice. However, the demands of the service may not always make this possible.

The present plan is that the new brigade group would be available to become a Canadian army component of the European integrated force commanded by General Eisenhower. Since, as I have said, the top priority of the Canadian army overseas is the support of our brigade in Korea, no date can be fixed at present for the dispatch of a brigade group to Europe. That decision will depend on circumstances as they develop, including the course of events in the Korean campaign, the speed with which the required troops are raised and trained, as well as developments in North Atlantic treaty organization.

It is also planned that the force to be raised will, in due course, include units to provide for the periodic rotation of officers and men for duty overseas and in Canada. Our intention is that, as far as possible, individual service abroad will be on the basis of one year for married and two years for single personnel. Though the period of enlistment is for three years, if the military situation permits, officers and men who have completed their period of overseas service and who wish to return to civil life may claim their discharge.

These new regular units will be encouraged to maintain the closest association with the reserve force regiments from which they have been formed. The parent units in the reserve force will continue to form part of our defence organization.

In addition to the rotation of individuals, it is intended, as a long-term plan, that complete companies or other formations will be exchanged from time to time, not only from the units named but other units, thus giving every major reserve unit a considerable number of additional fully trained officers and men with the experience of service in the integrated forces of the North Atlantic treaty organization.

In appealing for the special force for Korea I said, "We must meet aggression with trained united strength." Expanding the Canadian army in this way is part of the effort of our country and of our allies to prevent war and preserve peace. Trained united strength is needed to prevent aggression.

The appeal for the special force last August and September received a very good response. Since then the rate of recruiting for all three services has met requirements. To meet our needs we now want additional men. Recruiting will begin Monday. Application should be made to any of the units named or to any of the regular recruiting depots.

Reserve force units participating by raising a company, battery, troop or other sub-unit entirely by voluntary means:

From British Columbia

The British Columbia Regiment (Duke of Connaught's Own), Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, Vancouver, B.C.

The British Columbia Dragoons, Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, Kelowna, B.C.

The Seaforth Highlanders of Canada, Vancouver, B.C.

The Canadian Scottish Regiment (Princess Mary's), Victoria, B.C.

From the Prairie Provinces

The Fort Garry Horse, Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, Winnipeg, Man.

39th Field Regiment, Royal Canadian Artillery, Winnipeg, Man.

6th Field Engineer Regiment, Royal Canadian Engineers, Winnipeg, Man.

33rd Field Park Squadron, Royal Canadian Engineers, Lethbridge, Alta.

The Royal Winnipeg Rifles, Winnipeg, Man.

The Regina Rifle Regiment, Regina, Sask.

The Loyal Edmonton Regiment, Edmonton, Alta.

From Ontario

The Governor General's Horse Guards, Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, Toronto, Ont.

11th Field Regiment, Royal Canadian Artillery, Guelph, Ont.

29th Field Regiment, Royal Canadian Artillery, Toronto, Ont.

48th Highlanders of Canada, Toronto, Ont.

The Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, Toronto, Ont.

The Royal Hamilton Light Infantry (Wentworth Regiment), Hamilton, Ont.

The Hastings and Prince Edward Regiment, Belleville, Ont.

The Algonquin Regiment, Kirkland Lake, Ont.

7th Canadian Field Ambulance, Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Toronto, Ont.

1st Canadian Provost Company, Canadian Provost Corps, London, Ont.

1 Intelligence Training Company, Canadian Intelligence Corps, Montreal, P.Q.

From the Maritimes

The Halifax Rifles, Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, Halifax, N.S.

8th Princess Louise's (New Brunswick) Hussars, Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, Sussex, N.B.

The Prince Edward Island Regiment, Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, Charlottetown, P.E.I.

14th Field Regiment, Royal Canadian Artillery, Yarmouth, N.S.

The North Nova Scotia Highlanders, Amherst, N.S.

The Carleton and York Regiment, Fredericton, N.B.

7th Infantry Division Field Park, Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Halifax, N.S.

From Newfoundland

56th Independent Field Squadron, Royal Canadian Engineers, St. John's, Nfld.

In addition there will be:

Training regiments and squadrons of the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals from all military commands to be assembled for training at Barriefield, Ont.

Technical regiments and squadrons of the Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers from all military commands to be assembled for training at Barriefield, Ont.

Units of the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps from all military commands to be assembled for training at Camp Borden, Ont.

In this way the reserve army will again be taking a great part in strengthening the defence of Canada. They deserve every possible support from every Canadian.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I realize there should be no extended discussion at this stage, but so important has been the statement made by the minister that I would crave the privilege of the house to make a few remarks, and to ask a question. I feel quite certain that the servicemen in the army of Canada will feel relieved to know that this force will be centred around the old historic reserve army units, and that units from all parts of this country will be assigned the task of recruiting component parts of this 27th infantry brigade group.

There has been anxiety during the recent months as to how far the Americanization of the Canadian forces would go. I realize that certain equipment and arms must be based upon American standards. There has been a fear that that Americanization might be extended to the actual organizations; but the statement made by the minister this evening will go a long way to relieve that anxiety in the country.

The minister was not able to indicate the date target, shall we say, when this force would be ready, but I presume from what he has said that recruiting is to start immediately.

Mr. Claxton: Monday.

Mr. Pearkes: On Monday. I am not quite clear, when he said that recruiting would be through the various companies of the designated units, whether men would enlist for this force as a special force, although he did say that they would go into the active army. If a man enlisted into one of the units of the 27th brigade and the situation deteriorated in Korea and reinforcements were required for Korea, could a man be transferred from a unit of the 27th brigade to a unit of the 25th brigade as a reinforcement for Korea? I should like to have an indication as to the extent to which these transfers might be made.

I do not know whether the minister is in a position to say at this stage whether the 27th brigade would also form part of a commonwealth division in Europe, or whether it would be absorbed into the organization of some other formation. That would be a point which we would be interested to hear if the minister is in a position to give that information at the present time.

No doubt there will be opportunities for further discussion when the minister brings down his estimates, which I understand is to be in the very near future. Until that time comes I feel that it is unwise to make any further remarks.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate thoroughly the co-operative attitude of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), who I must say is one of the most gallant soldiers Canada has ever seen. I am not going to say more than a word. In order to do this rather tremendous job of providing the forces required to meet our country's need at this time we are all going to have to get together, and the co-operative support of the members of the opposition will be needed. This is a Canadian job, not a government job.

With regard to the question of the position of the people joining this force, they are joining the Canadian army, just as the people who joined the special force joined the Canadian army. There is only one Canadian army today. Some of them joined for different periods, but they all joined the Canadian army and are available for service anywhere. Our hope is that they will be available to make the best possible defence not only of Canada's cause but of the cause of freedom wherever it may be served.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said this force would consist of a brigade group with supporting units. I wonder what he meant by "supporting units", because the general meaning of a brigade group includes artillery, engineers, army service corps, RCEME, and other personnel ordinarily associated with a brigade group. Would the minister elucidate that point?

Mr. Claxton: The list placed on Hansard makes it clear. It goes on to indicate intelligence, provost corps, RCEME, and so on.

Mr. Green: The minister did not mention the number of men who would be required for the new force, or for the Canadian army generally. Would he give us those figures and also tell us what form the approval of parliament for the dispatch of troops to Europe will take. Will there be a resolution, or in what form will it be?

Mr. Claxton: In answer to the first question, it is not usual to give the establishment or the strength of units overseas. I think everyone knows however that a brigade group of the kind described means from 5,500 to 6,500 men. It is a self-contained unit, about one-third of a division.

Mr. Green: Are there additional men to be raised for the army?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Green: How many?

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the way in which parliament would give its approval to the dedication of this force for overseas, I would say that is a matter for the government and the Prime Minister. It will require some subsequent action by parliament before it is done. Perhaps it will require the tabling of an order in council, as was done in the case of the Korean force, or something like that. But it will not be done before it comes before parliament again.

Mr. Green: I understood the minister to say additional troops would be raised over and above the men to go to Europe. What additional number will he require?

Mr. Claxton: We are going on recruiting steadily—and doing very well, too. We are building up forces, both for reinforcements in Korea, and for the building up of our armed forces in Canada, as well as for this force.

PRIVATE BILLS

PATENT APPLICATION OF GEORGE R. HANKS

The house in committee on Bill No. 131, respecting a certain patent application of George R. Hanks—Mr. Richard (Ottawa East)—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Application deemed to have contained request for extension.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, may we have a copy of the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: I should point out, for the benefit of the hon. member for St. John's West, that this bill was referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, received careful consideration there, and is now reported back to the house. Copies of the bill are available at the table. If the hon. member does not have a copy, someone will see that he is given one.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Look in your file and you will get it.

Mr. Green: Would the sponsor explain why it was necessary to put the applicant for this private bill to all the expense and inconvenience of coming to parliament in a matter of this kind? Was it because of some error made in the patent office, or why do we have this unusual situation of an individual having to come to parliament for a private bill in order to get for himself the full protection of the Patent Act. It does not seem reasonable that that should have been necessary.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): In 1947 parliament passed an amendment, section 28A of the Patent Act, to allow applicants, from foreign countries which afforded similar privileges, to file applications for patents, even though the normal time for filing had expired. The deadline set was November 15, 1947.

As the hon. member will see in the explanatory note to the bill, the section was drawn so that there were some prerequisites, among which was the one that the application should be filed before November 15, 1947, and should be accompanied by a request, in the form of an ordinary letter, saying, in effect, "I want to have the benefit of section 28A".

It is self-evident that the applicant wanted to have the benefit of section 28A, because he knew he was delinquent. He was taking advantage of the new section passed by parliament. But in his letter to the Commissioner of Patents he stated merely that he was filing an application for a patent and did not add the paragraph, "I want to take advantage of section 28A of the Patent Act".

That is the only point in the bill. The Commissioner of Patents held that since that was one of the conditions set out in the section, he had to refuse the application. It seems unfortunate, and certainly it has involved heavy expense to the applicant. However, the commissioner having held that that condition was essential, there was nothing left to do but to come to parliament and ask for a bill to overcome this difficulty.

Mr. Green: The Secretary of State is here this evening. Surely there should be some provisions in the Patent Act giving the Commissioner of Patents, the Secretary of State, or perhaps the governor in council power to deal with a situation of this kind. Here we have an individual who should have had to pay only $25 to have the registration put through; but because he left out a formal statement to the effect that he wanted to have the extension of time, he is put to all this expense of coming to parliament.

I do suggest there is something very wrong either in the act, the regulations under the act, or in the administration, when an individual is put to that expense. I should like to know whether other people have been turned down for similar reasons. There may be others who have been unable to get this protection because their applications have been refused, and who are not in a position financially to incur the great expense of getting a private bill put through parliament. I think this is a case of driving a tack with a pile-driver. I wonder if the Secretary of State could explain why it has been necessary to take this step?

Mr. Bradley: Parliament in its wisdom did not succeed in covering every possible eventuality. This is the first occasion on which this has been brought to my attention and I shall be glad to look into it to see if there have been any who have been prejudiced in any way, and consider the question as to whether we should not look into the matter further.

Mr. Green: If that is the situation some arrangement should be made so that this applicant will not be compelled to pay the fee for getting through a private bill. It does seem to me most unfair that he has been put to all this trouble and expense.

UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF WESTERN CANADA

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 175, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Western Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

The Deputy Chairman: I would point out that this bill has been carefully considered in the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Investment of funds.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There would seem to be something wrong with this section, which reads:

> The corporation may invest its funds, or any portion thereof, either directly in the name of the corporation or indirectly in the name of trustees, in the purchase of such securities as it may deem advisable, and also may lend its funds or any portion thereof on any such securities.

I was appointed a member of the committee on miscellaneous private bills, but after attending the first session I did not attend later sessions of the committee. While I was present in the committee a bill of this kind was being considered and the point was raised that frequently corporations of this kind are given money in trust and that they should not have the right to invest such money in any securities that they wish to. It seems to me that they should be bound by the trust and be permitted to invest only in trustees' securities. I do not know if this matter has since been considered by the committee, but it seems to me that this committee should not overlook the obligation which would be on any corporation given money in trust to invest only in trustees' securities. Could the sponsor explain this?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): The terms of this section are the same as the terms in sections in bills with reference to the incorporation of other religious groups. Being a moral body I feel quite sure that the adherents to this church will give the same consideration to the investment of their funds as do the adherents of any other religious denomination.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That does not answer the point. If the sponsor of this bill should leave $1 million in trust to this corporation to be invested for certain purposes, would the corporation have the right to invest those funds in any securities? They might buy the wildest kind of stock. It seems to me that some explanation should be given by those who are bringing forward this bill as to why they wish such wide powers which would deviate so seriously from the provisions of a trust under which they might receive money.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do you not think that the point is worthy of consideration and that we should have a better explanation than we have had from the sponsor of this bill?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not satisfied.

An hon. Member: We are.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If this and similar organizations are likely to receive large sums of money in trust for certain purposes they should not have the power to invest in any securities they feel like investing in. Surely there must be a reasonable explanation that can be given.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12, 13 and 14 agreed to.

UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF EASTERN CANADA

Mr. H. P. Cavers (for Mr. Ross, Hamilton East) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 176, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Eastern Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

The Deputy Chairman: This bill has been considered carefully by the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not see the sponsor of the bill in the chamber. Last Tuesday evening we had quite a discussion on this point. I was in favour of going on with the bill, but Mr. Speaker ruled that a private bill could not proceed unless the sponsor was present. At that time we were considering one of the pipe line bills and it had to stand. I think we shall have to do the same thing with this bill.

Mr. Cavers: I am substituting as sponsor for the hon. member for Hamilton East.

Mr. Green: The other night the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was substituting for the sponsor of that bill, yet a ruling was made that the debate could not go on because the sponsor was not here. Now we have got exactly the same position tonight.

Mr. Robinson: On the point of order, as I understood the ruling of last Tuesday evening it was that if the sponsor was not in the house the bill could not be proceeded with without his consent. As I understand, the hon. member has indicated that he has the sponsor's consent this evening.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to speak to this point. If you will check you will see that the ruling was most definite. The Speaker made the definite statement this procedure would not be allowed in the future. If you will check you will see that is absolutely correct. The Speaker himself said that.

The Deputy Chairman: I have not before me yet the ruling made by Mr. Speaker. I understand it was made on the motion for second reading of this bill. If my memory serves me right, perhaps not on the occasion referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra but on some other occasion, I think the Speaker indicated that a bill could not be proceeded with if the sponsor was not here. But it would seem to me that as long as a representative of the sponsor is here, we may proceed. The point of order should have been raised when the motion was made for the Speaker to leave the chair on this bill. I now have before me the ruling which was made by Mr. Speaker the other day, and which was referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It is to be found at page 2579 of Hansard. At that time he said:

. . . I will say that I have always considered that a private member who is sponsoring a bill stands in the same position as a member of the government who introduces a bill in the house. As hon. members know, when a government bill is introduced, it is introduced by a minister. There may be an amendment to that bill introduced by a private member. The discussion either on the bill or on the amendment does not proceed without the consent of the minister who introduced the bill. Why should a private member not stand in the same position? That has been the attitude that I have taken, and although I realize that it might appear that an injustice is being done, nevertheless I feel that I should not change the ruling which I made on Friday, June 23. It has been said that the bill is now in the possession of the house, and that the amendment is in the possession of the house. That is so, and neither the amendment nor the bill can be withdrawn without the consent of the house. That also would be true of a bill introduced by a member of the government. A member of the government could not without consent withdraw his bill once it is in the possession of the house. As I say, I have given considerable thought to this. I think the rules of procedure might be amended. Until they are amended I feel I must abide by my ruling which I made on June 23, and allow the bill to stand.

Mr. Green: May I refer Your Honour to Votes and Proceedings for Tuesday the first of May, page 323. There we find the following:

The order being read for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118 (Letter N-1 of the Senate), intituled: "An act to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation," and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Herridge;

A point of order having been raised by Mr. Benidickson to the effect that in the absence of the sponsor of the bill, the order should not be proceeded with.

Mr. Speaker ruled the point of order well taken.

In that case there was actually an amendment and the mover of the amendment was in the house. Nevertheless Mr. Speaker still ruled, as set out in Votes and Proceedings—

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member repeat the page number?

Mr. Green: Page 323. The Speaker's ruling was:

A point of order having been raised by Mr. Benidickson to the effect—

These are the key words:

—that in the absence of the sponsor of the bill, the order should not be proceeded with.

Mr. Speaker ruled the point of order well taken.

That is clearly the case here.

The Deputy Chairman: There is no doubt that in the instance referred to by the hon. member it is a clear case where the ruling of Mr. Speaker applies in the manner which I quoted a moment ago. However, if I remember correctly, in the debate on the second reading of the bill the hon. member was already the representative of the member whose name appears on the bill as the sponsor. He gave replies to hon. members who participated in the debate. Therefore the house has already accepted the hon. member for Lincoln as the acting sponsor of the bill. He was acting in that capacity when second reading of the bill was proposed. If my memory is not correct on that point perhaps the hon. member for Lincoln and others might correct me. If my memory serves me right, however, it was the hon. member for Lincoln who acted on behalf of the hon. member for Hamilton East when the bill was piloted through second reading. Therefore he was accepted by the house at that time. No point of order was raised, and he is here tonight to reply to questions which may be asked in committee. Therefore I would say that this instance is not exactly similar to the one that Mr. Speaker had to deal with the other day.

Mr. Green: Before you make your ruling, may I submit further on the point of order that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was just as much acting for the sponsor of the Border Pipeline Corporation bill as the hon. member is doing tonight on this measure now under consideration. Where one member happens to speak for another member on one day and no objection is raised on that particular day, surely the house is not going to be put in the position that it must, while the bill continues before it, accept the sponsorship of that acting sponsor. There is a very good reason why the sponsor should be here. He is the one man who should be able to explain the terms of the bill.

When this particular bill was before the house the other night it was with the Speaker in the chair, and we could not ask questions. Now we are at the committee stage when questions can be asked, and I suggest that if any member raises a point of order that the sponsor should be present that point of order cannot be simply brushed aside with the statement that a week ago, or two or three weeks ago, there was an acting sponsor, and because the point of order was not raised then it cannot be effectively raised tonight. I submit that Your Honour is bound by the very definite ruling made by the Speaker this week after quite an argument on the point of order, and after the Speaker had taken some time to consider the matter. He made the very definite ruling that unless the sponsor is here a private bill cannot be proceeded with. I suggest if Your Honour makes a contrary ruling tonight it is going directly against the ruling the Speaker made on Tuesday evening.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps at this point I should refer hon. members to the first ruling to which Mr. Speaker alluded in making his ruling the other night. It appears at page 570 of Journals of the house.

Mr. Green: What year?

The Deputy Chairman: June 23, 1950. In the third paragraph hon. members will notice this:

> Presumably, at times bills have been proceeded with when the honourable members who introduced them were not in the chamber, but in such instances some member has stated that he has the approval of the member who introduced the bill to proceed.

If the hon. member for Lincoln states he has the approval of the hon. member for Hamilton East to proceed, I would be within the ruling of Mr. Speaker on that occasion. Furthermore, in my humble view, I would say that the point of order should have been raised on the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair, and not at this stage. I believe hon. members should have brought to the attention of the house then that the sponsor of the bill was not present, and reminded Mr. Speaker of the ruling which was referred to a moment ago by the member for Vancouver East and the member for Vancouver-Quadra. If reliance is to be placed on the sentence which I quoted in the ruling of Mr. Speaker of June 23, 1950, it is clearly in order for the member for Lincoln, provided he assures the house again that he has the authorization of the sponsor to represent him on this bill, to proceed.

Mr. Cavers: When this bill was given first reading I was asked by the member for Hamilton East to appear for him when the matter came before the house. On second reading, I again appeared as acting representative for the member for Hamilton East. At that time I was asked by members of the house to explain the bill, and I endeavoured to do so. It was accepted at that time. Now the matter is in committee stage, and I still appear representing the member for Hamilton East, with his permission and consent.

The Deputy Chairman: Having heard the hon. member for Lincoln state he has the consent and authorization of the sponsor at this time to represent him, I would say that it is in order to proceed with the bill. In order to make sure that there is no difference in the view I express now and the one expressed by Mr. Speaker, I shall quote again his ruling of June 23, 1950, starting with the paragraph I just quoted and then giving his conclusions.

In the third paragraph he says:

> Presumably, at times bills have been proceeded with when the honourable members who introduced them were not in the chamber, but in such instances some member has stated that he has the approval of the member who introduced the bill to proceed. The honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has referred to the Speech from the Throne, but it is assumed in that debate that the mover and the seconder approve of the debate continuing. If for any reason that debate were not to be continued I would think that arrangements would be made and that the house would be informed accordingly.
> I do not think I should depart at this time from practice and allow the debate on this bill to continue in the absence of the honourable member who introduced it and of the minister who moved the amendment. I therefore rule that under our practice an order for resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading of a private member's bill is proceeded with only at the instance of the sponsor of the bill or of a member authorized to act on the sponsor's behalf.

I believe that clearly sets out that we are in order, now that the statement has been made by the hon. member for Lincoln that he is authorized to act on the sponsor's behalf.

Mr. Green: That is on an entirely different point, and I see that on that occasion I was the one who raised the point of order. No one was objecting to the acting sponsor. The whole point of order tonight has been an objection to the acting sponsor, and the ruling of the Speaker on Tuesday last was to the effect that a sponsor must be present. Why should a member be allowed to sponsor a bill, and then stay out of the house while it is being considered, and have some other member act on his behalf? If a member of this house sponsors a private bill he should be here to answer questions about it, and not allow some other member to try to answer the questions for him. I submit that His Honour's ruling on Tuesday was on that particular point, and it is that particular point which is being raised tonight.

Mr. Robinson: I am afraid that the member for Vancouver-Quadra is under a misapprehension as to the ruling the Speaker made on Tuesday evening. I believe that tonight we are faced with an entirely different situation. As I understand, on Tuesday night the member for Kenora-Rainy River, in my absence and on my authorization, asked that the bill which I was sponsoring be allowed to stand. In other words, I had not given my consent to the bill being proceeded with at that time. The Speaker ruled that the bill could not be proceeded with without the consent of the sponsoring member, not because the sponsoring member was absent from the house.

in support of that contention I would direct your attention to a paragraph from the Speaker's ruling of June 23, 1950, in which the Speaker said:

> I have never known of a private bill or of a public bill which has been introduced by a private member being proceeded with in his absence and without his consent.

I think the important words there are "without his consent", and as I understand the ruling of the Speaker on Tuesday evening it was that since I had not given my consent the bill must stand. This evening, therefore, we are faced with a different situation because apparently the sponsoring member does consent to the bill being proceeded with.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask whether the house is bound by the minutes as recorded in Votes and Proceedings or by the statement in Hansard, because they seem to be contradictory.

The Deputy Chairman: The Journals of the house constitute the authority so far as the rulings are concerned. It is getting close to nine o'clock, but my view at the moment certainly leads me to declare that it is in order to proceed with this bill.

Mr. Green: In view of the definite statement in the finding contained in Votes and Proceedings to the effect that in the absence of the sponsor of a bill the order should not be proceeded with, may I ask, Mr. Chairman, that you consult with the Speaker on the point before proceeding.

The Deputy Chairman: By referring to the ruling of Mr. Speaker of June 23, 1950, from which I have quoted the pertinent extracts, it is clear that if an hon. member is authorized by the sponsor of the bill to represent him at any stage of the discussion of the bill, it is in order to proceed.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is nine o'clock, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

185. Departmental administration, $558,397.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to continue the remarks I was making when the committee adjourned for the dinner recess at six o'clock. I had made some reference to compulsory conciliation and compulsory arbitration. I pointed out that compulsory conciliation is a fundamental part of Canada's labour legislation. There is, I think, a feeling in some quarters that the purpose of the provisions of our compulsory conciliation legislation is to allow what is called a cooling-off period so that "rash" trade unionists or perhaps "irresponsible" trade unionists will not do something irresponsible or something rash.

Personally, I prefer to think that there is a better principle than that behind the legislation. I believe that the legislation rests on the principle that industrial disputes are not merely matters that concern labour and employers. I am convinced that industrial disputes concern more than labour and employers and that contention is well demonstrated in the industrial dispute that brought us here last fall.

Industrial disputes today concern the community; and I believe that the compulsory conciliation legislation rests on the principle that the community is involved in any strike or lock-out because such actions affect the community. The government, as spokesman for the people of Canada, says that employers and organized labour cannot be allowed to deal with matters of this kind as if they were the only people concerned; it says that there is a community interest and that it is going to see to it that, as far as possible, the community interest is protected. There are, therefore, various stages which a dispute must go through before a strike or lock-out takes place. When these are finally complied with, and if a settlement has not been arrived at, a strike may take place. These procedures perhaps serve the purpose of providing a cooling-off period; but they also serve the purpose of getting employers and employees together, in a good atmosphere, to talk over their differences. That is a good thing. Not many disputes end in strike action after they have gone through our procedure of conciliation.

There is something else I should like to say. It will be forty-one years this summer —within a month or so—since I first became connected with the trade union movement; and I have been fairly closely associated with it ever since, even although for the last twenty years I have not been engaged in an occupation in which I had to carry a union card. People whose experience with labour matters dates back to, say 1929 or a little earlier—and I imagine there are quite a number of them in this committee—have no realization of the improvements that have taken place in the status of trade unions in Canada during the last forty years, and more particularly during the last ten years. As I mentioned before, the reason that the progress was made during the last ten years is that organized labour was in a position in which it seldom finds itself except in wartime, namely, that of full employment. Consequently, when its services are urgently required by the country, it can improve its position by withholding its labour, which up until now at least, had been its ultimate weapon of defence and offence.

I have seen an employer refusing to deal with a trade union because the trade union had international connections; that is, it was connected with a trade union in the United States. And I have seen the same employer refusing to deal with the trade union because it did not have international connections. Any pretext at all was used to avoid recognizing the trade union movement and entering into collective agreements. When I first became connected with the trade union movement employers, by and large, took the position that they were going to run their businesses in their own way and that they were not going to be interfered with by a bunch of irresponsible trade unionists.

As far as I know, there is only one way of developing responsibility and that is by giving responsibility. If a person has nothing to be responsible about, he can be irresponsible. But the moment that he is put in the position in which certain events hang on his actions, he will be much more careful how he acts. Over the last fifty years we have built up in Canada a trade union movement which is today a great asset to the country. In it are men of experience, understanding and responsibility. I should like to see this government take more advantage of their experience than it has taken heretofore. Every year the organized labour movement through its various sections, makes submissions to the government as to the legislation that it would like to see enacted. It should be noted that nearly all of this legislation refers not to the trade union movement itself but to the community at large. That is, of course, all to the good because it means that the organized labour movement is extending its horizons from its own immediate affairs and is realizing that it cannot prosper unless the whole community prospers.

I mentioned the fact that the national bodies of organized labour each year make submissions to the government. I should like to look forward to the day when the government would not only receive organized labour when it comes to make its submission, but would send for organized labour and ask it to give its views on the important questions of the day. When that day comes, I believe that our democracy will have advanced far beyond what it is today. However, under the conditions that we have today where labour is considered a commodity—if it is not considered that in theory; it is considered so in fact—and where a person has access to the means of life only so long as he can sell his labour, a position in which most of us find ourselves, when he is unemployed, even with unemployment insurance, for any lengthy period of time, his position and the position of his family are difficult indeed.

I think we have come to the time—perhaps we have not heard much about it yet, but there has been some talk about it—when instead of the daily wage, the hourly wage, the weekly wage or the monthly wage, workers will have an annual wage, so that they will know from one year to the next where they stand. Why should a railroad man, a street railway employee or a longshoreman or a lumber worker not have an annual wage as well as a bank manager, a railroad executive, a bank employee, a school teacher, a university professor or any of the numerous people who have annual wages or an annual salary. I think that we have to prepare ourselves for greater advances in that regard than we have seen heretofore.

The matter of unemployment insurance was raised today, and I want to say just a few words about it. One of the things that the government should do in regard to unemployment insurance is to tell the people more about it. They should do a better job of public relations in the matter of unemployment insurance than they are doing. As a matter of fact, in this house where one would expect a higher level of intelligence or understanding on questions of this kind than you may find generally among the community, since it is one of our jobs to deal with the matter, not enough is known about our unemployment insurance. It was mentioned that a person pays into the unemployment insurance fund and never takes anything out of it. Well, if everyone who paid into the unemployment insurance fund took something out, or took out what he paid in, the unemployment insurance contributions would have to be very much larger than they are today.

The principle of insurance is that you take something out provided that what you are insured against happens; and if that does not happen you consider yourself lucky. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says if you take out fire insurance on your house, generally you consider yourself fortunate if you never draw any insurance—that is never have a fire. The same thing is true of automobile accident insurance. You consider yourself fortunate if you never have to call on the insurance company for payments in connection with an accident. Unemployment insurance is insurance for involuntary unemployment. In that regard I believe that the procedure could be considerably improved. May I point out something that may not be known by hon. members, and perhaps some will not believe it, particularly on the government side of the house. Like almost everything else that we get from this government, we got unemployment insurance not because they believed in it as a good thing socially; we got it in 1940 because prices were going up. It was instituted more to stem inflation than as a piece of desirable social legislation. The reason I say that is this. The trade union movement had been advocating unemployment insurance for thirty years before it was put on the statute books. Mind you, there were many, many occasions when unemployment insurance could have been very useful. In the 1930's governments said they could not bring unemployment insurance in because they did not have the money. That applied to the Conservatives as well as to the Liberals. They were like the man who when he was asked why he did not shingle his house said that he did not shingle it because it rained. He was then asked why he did not shingle it when it was not raining, and he said when it did not rain it did not leak. That was the attitude and I am very much afraid it is still the attitude.

I believe that unemployment insurance should be extended to every worker, at least to every worker who is working for an employer. It was said today, and it was said in the house the other evening in another debate, that the labour force in Canada is 5,200,000. May I say that 5,200,000 includes not only what we refer to generally as workers, but it includes employers as well. I hold in my hand the unemployment insurance report for the year ended March 31, 1950. I believe it is the last one that has been distributed, and it gives the labour force as 5,200,000. But, as I said, that includes employers to the number of 226,000; unpaid family workers to the number of 306,000. Also included in that figure are own-account workers to the number of 941,000. That makes a total of 1,473,000. It would be rather difficult to include that million and a half approximately in an unemployment insurance scheme such as ours. But there are wage earners to the number of 1,097,000 who are not insured. I believe that those wage earners should be insured, and that insurance should be paid to everyone who is out of work for reasons beyond his own control and who has fulfilled certain conditions.

I am not going to express an opinion as to whether present conditions are satisfactory or not, but as long as our unemployment insurance is on an actuarial basis we shall have to give consideration to the number of contributions and so on. I do not know that there is anything further I have to say. There are a dozen questions that could be discussed and that, perhaps, if they are raised, I shall have something to say about. But I shall conclude at this time by impressing upon the minister that his department or the unemployment insurance commission should make a better job of public relations with the unemployment insurers, so that those who are insured may know exactly what they are entitled to, and what they are not entitled to. I find there is a great deal of misunderstanding on that point.

It would be well to visit trade union meetings, or to have representatives of the commission go to those meetings, and to have posters in trade union halls and in the offices of trade union organizations; because the more people understand about their affairs—and unemployment insurance is their affair—the better for all, and the more easily those affairs can be administered.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to debate this matter generally, but rather to draw the minister's attention to a few specific items. First and foremost I would speak about unemployment insurance for fishermen. Various classes and categories of workers have been discussed this afternoon and this evening, and I would now direct the minister's attention to the case for the fishermen.

The matter has already been discussed briefly this session by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine, and I should like to read what he said on that occasion, as it appears in the last page of the translation appended to Hansard for April 24:

> Thirdly, fishermen request unemployment insurance benefits. As early as last spring, one year ago, I made representations to the unemployment insurance commission and the Department of Labour in order to bring fishermen under the act. The unemployment insurance commission began a nation-wide survey to secure the necessary information and data before reporting on this request. I understand that the report is in preparation and hope that the government will be able to include fishermen in the benefits of this legislation which has already been extended to lumberjacks.

I wonder if the minister, when he gets around to it—perhaps not right away—would tell us what has happened to what the hon.

member said on that occasion. He will appreciate the difficulty when he understands that while workers in filleting plants come under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the actual producers, the fishermen who bring in the fish so that these people can work, do not. I feel that it is a great injustice. I realize there are difficulties in the way, but I urge a real effort should be made whereby fishermen may be brought within the purview of the act. The minister will, I trust, make some comments in this connection.

I asked the minister a question yesterday to which he was good enough to give an answer. However, so that he will have the background of the difficulty at Seven Islands, I would point out that the original agreement with these companies was passed in 1938 by the then government of Newfoundland, and is set out at page 305 of the Newfoundland Statutes of 1938, No. 41. This was an act taking the place of an agreement between Weaver Minerals Limited and the government of Newfoundland, and substituting the Labrador Mining and Exploration Company Limited for the Weaver Company. Section 45 of the act says:

> Except where it is necessary for the company to employ technical experts the company shall at all times employ Newfoundland workmen provided same shall be available.

I believe the minister saw the news item in the Daily News of Newfoundland of April 27, to which I referred yesterday, and which stated:

> The majority of the Newfoundlanders who went to Seven Islands several weeks ago to work on the construction of the railway line from Seven Islands to the iron ore deposits have since returned home.
> Their story is one of poor living and working conditions. The company, they state, failed to live up to its agreement. There was also friction between the Newfoundlanders and French Canadian workers. The latter outnumbered the Newfoundland workers many times over.
> Mr. Harold Horwood, member of the house of assembly for Labrador who until recently was hiring agent for the syndicate engaged in the construction work, stated yesterday that the companies had "failed entirely to live up to their agreement with Newfoundland."
> Under the agreement it was agreed by both parties that 1,000 men would be hired from Quebec and an equal number from Newfoundland. These men would work side by side in Quebec territory and in Labrador. This it was hoped would speed the project and eliminate the hiring of Quebec men to work only in Quebec and Newfoundlanders to work only in Labrador.
> Many of the men who went to Seven Islands as machine operators were requested to take over other work at a lower rate of pay. They had been promised, at hiring, a specific wage rate. "It seemed," said one of the men, "that the French-Canadian foreman wanted to get rid of the Newfoundlanders and made conditions as tough as possible for us."
> Another told of being billeted in a camp where living conditions were anything but the best, with all French Canadians. The language and customs barrier made it impossible for him to become acquainted with his fellow workers.
> Mr. Horwood feels that such conditions will continue to exist until some arrangements can be made between the Newfoundland government and the operating companies whereby a representative for the Newfoundland workers will be on the spot to look after their interest.
> The syndicate is comprised of four companies, Cartier, McNamara, Mannix and Morrison-Knudsen.

In his reply yesterday the minister said there is no branch of the national employment service set up there yet, and no accommodation whereby it can be set up. I do not expect the minister to name any date, but I urge upon him that something be done at the earliest possible moment, because the iron ore deposit is one of the great things Newfoundland is counting upon to provide work. It is true that only the skimmed milk will be left for the province; in other words it will benefit materially only from the ordinary work given to the workers. The amounts from royalties are small, and it seems that processing is to be done outside the province.

In view of the fact that we do not worry him very often about these matters I would ask that he endeavour at the earliest possible moment to see that at least our skimmed milk is made available to us as quickly as possible.

The other matter to which I should like to refer has already been mentioned this afternoon. I have in mind the question of the national advisory council on manpower. Let me say at once how pleased we are that the minister saw fit to have a Newfoundlander appointed to that council. We consider it a great compliment, and are satisfied that he will do honour to the council as well. I must confess however that I wish to join with the hon. member for Nanaimo in saying that we are all somewhat worried because they have not got down to work more quickly. I have no doubt the minister is also worried.

Only today I noticed an article in the Montreal Gazette, headed "Labour Pinch Seen in Machine Tools". This is a Canadian Press dispatch dated at Toronto May 3, and stating that Walter G. Hubbard, vice president of a machine tool manufacturing firm, said that he is extremely worried about the situation with respect to machine tool manufacturers. The article goes on to say:

> As rearmament accelerated, more and more lathes and precision planes, grinders and drills would be needed. But there were not more and more trained men to make them.
> Thus we will be obliged to cut off deliveries to our normal customers (the manufacturers of non-essential goods) and devote all our time to defence.

As the minister well realizes, that is a serious matter. I presume he will get this committee together as quickly as possible. A rumour seems to be fairly prevalent around this city in the past few days that this committee is to get its information from the census returns. I hope that that is not so. If the people of Canada believe that the information they give in the census is going to be used in that way they may not give the census takers the information they want.

Mr. Gregg: May I say to the hon. member for St. John's East that there is no relation between the advisory committee on manpower and the organization set up to take the census. I make that categorical statement. As I stated on the day I announced the setting up of this advisory committee, we already have throughout the country local advisory committees from which the national body in between its sittings can always get information and pass it on to us.

This recalls something the hon. member for Vancouver East said. First of all I want to express my pleasure at having him give us his philosophy on labour relations as I think that is a most valuable thing to have on the record. The hon. member said that he would like to live to see the day when either the department or the government—I have forgotten which but it does not matter—would consult with leaders of labour as they do with other leaders in connection with matters affecting the welfare of the country. That recalls what the hon. member for Nanaimo and the hon. member for Cape Breton South said this afternoon, that this manpower committee was not meeting often enough. I agree that it may want to meet and may need to meet more often in the future than it has in the past.

However, I would point out that the most effective work is not always done when the members of a committee are sitting around a table. The hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Cape Breton South pointed out just what is happening in Windsor, particularly in the automobile industry. The representative of the parent organization of the automobile workers on the national committee is Mr. Pat Conroy. That situation in Windsor had been brought to our attention and as a result some three weeks ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who represents that area, and I invited Mr. Burt and some eleven of his chief lieutenants to meet with the Minister of Defence Production, the Minister of Resources and Development, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the hon. member for Essex West, myself and a number of officials to discuss this very question.

I admit that no suggestion was made at that meeting that the government would lift the employees who were presently out of work to some other place, but the Minister of Defence Production outlined at great length and with great care what the plans were to see that the time lost in changing over from cars, say to aeroplane parts, would be no more serious in the way of lost time than the change-over from one model of car to another. As hon. members know, in their wage negotiations the automobile industry take into consideration the fact that there is often a period when groups of men are out of work because of change-overs.

I think I can report with some confidence that the situation is improving, but I did want to make the point that it was not just in the conference room that the advice of the national advisory council on manpower was received.

While the hon. member for St. John's East was speaking a moment ago I consulted with the Minister of Public Works and he has agreed with me to leave nothing undone to have an office of the national employment service established on the island as early as possible.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, the number of hon. members who have already referred to the national advisory council on manpower indicates the interest there is at the present time in that body. A year ago, and two years ago, when the minister's estimates were before us we were concerned with the question of unemployment. As has been indicated already, Korea has changed all that and today the country is more concerned with the question of the availability and allocation of manpower that it is with unemployment.

I want to compliment the information branch of the minister's department upon the excellent report they issued on the first meeting of the national advisory council back in February. According to that report the council made excellent progress, on paper at least. I should like to suggest to the minister that he bring us up to date on the work of the council, either tonight or when he has the information available.

According to the report there were six recommendations adopted at the meeting of the council, but the implementation of those recommendations was left on the doorstep of the Department of Labour. Therefore, I presume it will not be difficult for the minister to bring us up to date regarding these recommendations. I am going to enumerate them, not for the minister's benefit but because I think they are excellent recommendations and I am sure the committee will be interested in knowing what has happened in the two and a half months since the council met.

The first recommendation was that the records of technical and scientific personnel, which were first assembled in world war II, should be brought up to date, and added to those records there should be a record of all apprentices in Canada, this information to be brought together and studied for the purpose of increasing apprenticeship enrolment. I wonder if the minister can tell us what progress has been made in gathering that record, and what increase or improvement, if any, has taken place in the matter of apprenticeship enrolment.

The next important resolution was that the Department of Labour, in conjunction with other departments, should provide for priority in the placement of persons who apply for employment at the national employment offices. A priority rating was to be prepared, and those applying at the national employment offices were to be directed to the industries standing highest in that priority. I have not heard anything since with respect to what progress has been made in assembling that priority rating. Possibly the minister can tell us what particular industries now have received or are about to receive a high rating in this respect.

A third recommendation which is a matter of great concern to the people of Canada at the present time pertains to the question of national registration. It was agreed that a comprehensive study should be made of all aspects of this question. I think we are very much concerned with this matter, and possibly the minister will inform us whether sufficient information has been secured to enable the government to decide whether or not we are to have a national registration.

One of the recommendations in which I was particularly interested was that some study should be made of the possibility of training the physically handicapped of Canada and thereby enabling them to undertake work of a self-supporting nature. This was to be undertaken as a result of the very excellent conference that was held a few weeks prior to that in Toronto between the federal and provincial authorities where the question of training physically handicapped people was discussed. I think we should know whether there has been any real progress in that respect in the last two and a half months, or whether we are still at the recommendation stage.

The last of the recommendations that I am going to call to the minister's attention was that some study should be given to the possibility first of moving workers from places where they were out of employment to places where there was employment. It was suggested that something by way of financial assistance would be given, possibly transportation expenses or something of that kind, to enable workers to move to places where jobs were available. There was also the suggestion that there was to be an examination of the possibility of placing industry near sources of available labour. That is rather a new departure. I think it is the first time that we have heard of consideration being given to moving industry to places where labour is available instead of moving labour to places where work is available. Possibly the minister can tell us what study has been made of the subject and whether anything concrete has yet been achieved in that respect.

There is one other matter on which I would ask the minister to give us a statement if he can. It is a question that is a source of worry to some of the trade unions at the present time. I wrote to the minister about it a few days ago, and I am sure he has not had time yet to reply. I refer to the status of the unions in plants which are working on contracts for defence production and where it becomes necessary to introduce certain security measures, where a security officer is appointed. Sometimes men have to be moved from certain secret types of work because of suspicion and so forth. The questions that the trade unions in my riding have asked me are these: First of all is the security officer in such plants appointed by and responsible to any department of the government, or is he appointed by the management of the plant and responsible to them? Do his instructions regarding security measures that are to be taken come from some government department, or do they come from the management of the plant concerned? Out of that arises the status of some groups that are now members of the union, the bargaining party, and in particular the fire protection staffs in these plants. The information which has been given to some of these unions is that fire protection staffs must withdraw from the union. In some of these plants the members of these staffs are members of the union. The understanding has been given to them that they will be required to withdraw from the union because of the nature of the work being done in the plant. Whether these instructions are coming from the government or whether they are devised by some local security officer on his own responsibility, or on the management's responsibility, seems to be uncertain. I would be very pleased if some time during his estimates the minister would give consideration to these points and pass on that information.

Mr. Gregg: In reply to my hon. friend, under terminable services on page 29 I shall be very glad to give a report on the matter affecting the first report of the national advisory council on manpower.

Mr. Noseworthy: There is no information available since the report of their first meeting?

Mr. Gregg: My hon. friend asked for a report on the six items which he mentioned tonight. I shall be glad to give that under "terminable services" because it is under that heading that an amount covering their travelling expenses is listed.

Mr. Green: I wanted to ask the minister one or two questions about the national advisory council, and I hope he can deal with these questions tonight because the item to which he has just referred may not be up for consideration for many weeks. I think it is customary for the minister to answer questions when they are asked on the administration item, especially when time is of considerable importance.

There has been some discussion today about this advisory council not having been called together for a second time. I would point out to the minister that on February 5 he had this to say with regard to the council, and I am quoting from page 71 of Hansard for that date:

> In this search for the maximum utilization of manpower now under the voluntary system, I believe the government should have available a joint clearing house for the prompt study of month to month manpower resources and needs, for the formulation of advice to the Minister of Labour or to the government with respect to these matters, and for the interpretation of resultant plans to workers, to management and indeed to all citizens.

If the minister will recall, at the time that statement was made the whole question of manpower was of the utmost importance. Nothing has happened, either at home or abroad, in the intervening days to diminish that importance. I am quite sure the minister will agree with that statement. On February 5, which will be three months ago tomorrow, he said he was going to have the advantage of consultation with this advisory council from month to month. I think there has been a great mistake in not having these consultations carried out. I would hope that from now on there would be no further such delays.

On February 21, a news release was issued by the minister's department on the subject of the first meeting of the national advisory council on manpower. In that release we find that certain subjects were specifically dealt with, obviously the subjects which were considered the most important by the advisory council when it did have this first meeting. I believe one subject concerned a national registration. In this press release we find the following. It recommends—> —that the departments concerned should make an immediate and comprehensive study of all aspects of the national registration question.

That was the recommendation of this national advisory council on manpower when it met on February 20 and 21 of this year. On that same date press dispatches indicated that work would be started at once on the drafting of a national registration form. I am quoting from the Montreal Gazette of February 21, and the press dispatch states that the draft was to be submitted to the national advisory council on manpower at its next meeting. Unfortunately, of course, there has been no "next meeting". The report goes on:

> The meeting will be held in camera, unlike the inaugural session yesterday which was open to the press. It is understood that steps will be taken to place orders for the paper and other materials necessary to turn out large numbers of the national registration forms, if the draft proves unsatisfactory. Present indications are that national registration plans adopted for use in the present emergency will differ materially from those in use during the second world war.

A great deal of emphasis was placed on the fact that this council recommended an immediate comprehensive study of all the aspects of the national registration question. I would ask the minister to tell the committee tonight what has been done in pursuance of that recommendation from the council on manpower. I believe that the house and the country are entitled to know now whether anything has been done in pursuance of that request, and if so, just what has been done.

As the minister knows, plans for such a registration would be extensive. They would take some time to work out, and if conditions become worse time is going to be so very precious. We are not going to have the time to fool around and delay these things again. Action will have to be taken quickly. I would ask the minister to explain just what has been done with regard to those plans for a national registration.

Then, there is another recommendation outlined in this press release, and it deals with the provision of skilled workers for industry and the armed forces. A study of the subject was recommended, and I believe that in the course of the discussion today other members have raised this point. I would ask the minister to tell us definitely what has been done to provide more skilled workers.

There was one other recommendation—as a matter of fact there were several other recommendations contained in the press release which I shall not repeat because the minister heard them this afternoon. In the report considerable stress was placed on the use of immigrants coming to Canada. On page 5 of the report we find these words:

> Plans have been laid to bring about 150,000 immigrants to Canada during 1951, of whom close to one-half may be workers. Allowances must be made on the other hand for annual emigration which has amounted to between 20,000 and 30,000 during recent years, mostly to the United States.

Will the minister also explain how that plan is progressing; whether we are going to get 150,000 immigrants to Canada during 1951 and whether, as expected, about half of those will be available to help out in industry. Will the minister deal with those questions?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member would not want me to try to give offhand a very good speech—at least I hope it was very good—which I have been looking forward to giving for quite a long time—

Mr. Green: You may have to wait a long time.

Mr. Gregg: I hope I shall have the opportunity of giving that speech with respect to the points he mentioned and those mentioned by the hon. member who took his seat just a minute or so ago. Perhaps he will permit me to answer his question quite briefly. First of all with regard to the general comment today on the delay in calling the second meeting of the council, may I say that I have not at any time since the first meeting asked that the second meeting be delayed. Rather have I suggested, even before my friend the hon. member for Nanaimo jogged my elbow the other day, that I felt it would be a good thing for a meeting to be called as early as possible in view of the work intervening. I want to assure my hon. friend that I thought I made it clear in announcing the creation of the council that it was not in any degree under the orders of the Department of Labour or of the government. Two gentlemen in whom most of us have a great deal of confidence were chosen, because of their special qualifications, to act as joint chairmen.

Mr. Green: Who are they?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Norman A. Robertson, clerk of the privy council, and Mr. Arthur MacNamara, my deputy minister.

Mr. Green: Yes; but some minister must accept responsibility.

Mr. Gregg: I am accepting responsibility for the receipt of the recommendations from that council and the advice coming from that council, carrying out what can be carried out in my department and conveying for the consideration of my colleagues those opinions that demand their attention. As to the recommendations that have been read to me tonight, I should like to deal with them more thoroughly at another time on my estimates. But I can tell my hon. friend that the one on the study of registrations has gone on continually in my department and in association with other departments, referring as necessary to individual members of the council from time to time and I understand that a report on that subject will be made to the next meeting of the council.

As to the training of skilled workers for the armed services and for industry, not only has a study been made but arrangements have already been entered into with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and we are already carrying out training under that federal-provincial plan for the armed forces, the expense being borne totally by the federal government.

On the other side of the picture, as to training for defence industries, we have found in the investigation so far, in discussing it not only with the provinces but with the industries concerned, that the situation is such now that it is difficult to get any large number of unskilled or semi-skilled men away from the plants to undergo theoretical training in a school for a protracted period. In 1939, 1940 and 1941, I understand, it was possible to do that because there was a much larger reserve of manpower seeking employment. So what we are exploring now is how, if we can do it, to carry out some refinement of the federal training on the job and of making it possible for the plant to have facilities for the training of foremen or in other words to train instructors who in turn might be able to instruct on the job. That matter is receiving, on the part of Mr. MacNamara particularly and officials of the department, and the national employment service, very careful study.

Incidentally, of course, there is going on continually the usual federal-provincial vocational training, on a fifty-fifty basis.

Mr. Pearkes: Before the minister leaves that point, may I ask if that dominion-provincial vocational training is not mainly for boys who have just left school, and not for young men trained from the plants?

Mr. Gregg: In the main, it has been; yes. Of course now, for the armed forces, a larger number of more mature men will be going into it, depending on the trades for which they are being trained.

Our role in the Department of Labour with regard to immigration, as my hon. friend knows, is briefly this. We act in association with, and under the policy set out by, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, providing our facilities within the department, in the unemployment insurance commission and in the national employment services, to assist in placing immigrants who come in without any specified place to work. Although I know that the reports on immigrants arriving and applying are extremely favourable, I would prefer that a more complete report on that subject be given by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and I know he would be glad to give a statement under my estimates if my hon. friend so wishes.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask one further question with regard to national registration. How long would it take to complete a registration if one were started say at the end of May? How far have the plans progressed for such a registration, and how long is it estimated the time would be that would be required to complete a registration?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I hope my hon. friend will not cross-examine me and draw me into a discussion of an extremely complex matter when I am here without my notes or anything, and also before there is an opportunity to refer the matter back to the council. But to answer his question in the light of the best information available, with all the preliminary planning, briefing and organization done beforehand, it is estimated that it would take approximately three months.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the minister if any consideration has ever been given to using for this purpose the information which will be collected by the census takers?

I know that the returns they make are quite exhaustive. They have the age, the occupation, the citizenship and all that sort of thing. It would seem to me that it is a duplication of work to have another investigation made when we shall have the census returns in a few months. I should like to know whether any consideration has ever been given to that procedure.

Mr. Gregg: I can say that consideration has been given to it; in response also to another question, I can also state that the use of any existing organization of government, namely the census organization, the unemployment insurance commission which has a vast amount of information with regard to workers or our own department, for this purpose of registration—should it ever be necessary, after careful thought and weighing of the needs of any future situation—is something which should not be done without the matter being referred to the House of Commons and a complete and full outline given as to the form it should take, and it would only be after further study by the national council. It would be interesting to hear how they feel about the study that has gone on. I think I have approached the matter with a reasonably open mind. I was not here from 1939 to 1944; but I have had an opportunity, as the study has been going on, to see what was done. Some of the hon. members who were here probably know the degree of effectiveness in the fruits of that work, but without referring to that, the thing that does strike one is this: If we were able to take a census this week and provide ourselves with a great mass of information at a very great cost by taking on a large number of employees of government, unless a constant and continual follow-up were maintained, six months from now, nine months from now it would not be worth very much.

I am not putting that down on the debit side at all, but it is a point that has impressed itself upon me, and the question therefore has come up for consideration: Would it be better to do something now, or to do the planning, the staff work, the preparations and the arrangements so that when the time appeared to be essential it could be done quickly?

Mr. Green: The minister said that the registration would take about three months. How long will it take to complete the plans preparatory to doing the registration?

Mr. Gregg: I should say within two months.

Mr. Green: That would be five months altogether?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Green: Why would it take three months to do the registration? As I remember the last registration, volunteers helped in every constituency, and it was completed in a very short time. I may be wrong on that, but if my memory serves me that was the position. Everybody helped and the registration was done within a few days. Why would it take three months to complete the registration in 1951?

Mr. Gregg: Again I do not want to be drawn into a discussion. When I speak of three months I am taking the estimate which was given to me by those who have given careful study to this problem. The impression I got was that while the actual business of getting names and information on cards does not take very long, the real time is taken in compiling the information and putting it in a readily useful form.

Mr. Hansell: I do not want this first item in the labour estimates to pass without saying a word or two on matters that have pressed in upon my mind and puzzled me. At the outset I refer particularly to what I have regarded as rather a delinquent, or shall I say, a slow turnover from a wartime productive basis to a peacetime productive basis. I cannot help thinking that our productive resources in labour manpower could have speeded up the production of wanted goods to a much greater extent than has been done since the end of the war.

When the war ended we expected that we were going to launch into one of the biggest eras of prosperity that the nation had ever seen. Our needs for consumer goods were immense. Through the expansion of war industries during the war and the expansion of the credit facilities of the country, money was more or less plentiful. The productive capacity of the country was perhaps the largest or the greatest that the country had ever seen, and yet somehow or other we did not come to that place where we were producing all that we could.

For years many wanted goods have been in short supply. We were told that there was a backlog of orders. You could not buy cars without putting your name down on the list and waiting for months. I believe that the situation has been alleviated somewhat, but even today you cannot go on the floor of the sales room and buy a car as once you could. Other articles have been in short supply, refrigerators and things of that nature.

It does seem to me that our productive machinery could have been speeded up much more quickly than it was in order to supply Canadians with wanted goods, and goods which they had money to buy. It appears to me that what concerned those governments and labour was the possibility of coming into a period and having to face what our government would regard as an unemployment problem. Their attitude, I have reason to believe, was something to this effect: We must not work too hard. Our productive machinery must not be speeded up too fast, or the first thing we know we shall produce too much and we shall have an unemployment problem on our hands.

On that particular point let me say that I regard that view as absolutely fallacious. Instead of looking at the picture and recognizing that unemployment after all is the fruit of a very highly mechanized and power age in which the burden of toil can be lifted from the shoulders of the worker, giving him more time for life. Instead of regarding the situation as a benefit that should accrue to our civilization, we look at that benefit as being a problem, a problem to be faced. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the fallacy of that must be recognized both by government, and particularly by the Department of Labour, and also by labour itself. What must be recognized, I believe, is that in the last analysis it is the production of the country that constitutes the real wealth of the nation. It is not necessarily money. Our government policy should be one where we say to labour, "You produce; produce all you can; do not be afraid of overproduction; if there is a period of overproduction we will call it by another name—we will call it underconsumption. So, get your machinery to work and produce all you can. We, as a government, will pursue a financial policy that will distribute the fruits of your labours."

That should be the attitude of the government. But instead of that, we know it is not the attitude of the government. It seems to me its attitude is: "Work like slaves, in order to produce, so that our financial policy may remain as we think it should remain—sound—and we will interpret the term sound as we wish to interpret it." That seems to be the government's policy.

Only yesterday the hon. member for Lethbridge asked the Prime Minister a pertinent question. His question was as to whether the Prime Minister believed that that which is physically possible should be made financially possible, or words to that effect. What did the Prime Minister of this country say? He rose in his place and evaded the question. He did not answer it at all, but flung it back by saying that he was surprised that a member of the Social Credit group should ask such a question. Why should we not ask a question of that kind, and why should not a straightforward answer have been given?

Under the present financial policy of the government, where do we find labour? We find that labour becomes subject to the government's financial policy. I am sure that if the truth be spoken, and if the whole situation were analysed in its proper perspective, labour as well as the government would be able to determine a financial policy that would accrue to labour and to the rest of the citizens of Canada in such a way that labour could enjoy to the very fullest extent the work of their own hands.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet published by the joint labour unions of Canada. It is a submission on price controls to the government, and is published by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and the dominion joint legislative committee of the railway transportation brotherhoods. I have read this with some care and I believe it is a good pamphlet; it contains much that is true and is extremely well thought out. But before one finishes reading it he comes to one or two passages which are very significant and revealing. We find this at page 11:

> Labour will fight, work and sacrifice to preserve freedom. It will not fight, or work, or sacrifice, to preserve any economic system if that system imperils freedom.

That is quite a statement and, placed in its proper perspective, it should be a true statement. But the fact of the matter is that the present financial policy of the government does the very thing that labour says it will not work and sacrifice to avoid. This indicates to my mind that those who have written the pamphlet, despite the fact that it is well thought out and the arguments are good, show a tremendous lack of one thing. There is no evidence whatsoever that the authors of the pamphlet have any knowledge as to the basic monetary principles upon which the economic system functions. It takes for granted that there is nothing basically wrong—I say basically wrong—with the economic system itself.

According to this pamphlet labour admits that the patient is sick. They admit there is something wrong with the body politic. I am not saying they alone, because I think this is characteristic of many people in many organizations and industries throughout the country, as well as in governments. The authors of the pamphlet admit that the body politic is sick, but they are not able to diagnose the seat of the trouble. They admit that a boil breaks out here or a carbuncle breaks out somewhere else, or a rash begins to appear on the body politic—and of course, Mr. Chairman, I am now speaking figuratively. But it never occurs to them that there is anything wrong with the heart or the bloodstream. So when something pops up to dislocate some branch of the economic system they say, "We are sorry that that boil broke out on the neck. We will prescribe this little bit of salve. If we rub it in we may be able to get rid of the boil."

Mr. Laing: They are giggling.

Mr. Hansell: Or if a carbuncle breaks out on the top of the head so that the body politic cannot wear its hat properly, they say, "Well now, let us prescribe a different kind of salve." So they rub it in again. Someone might even come up with the bright idea of using a scalpel and cutting out the carbuncle. But never do they reach the seat of the trouble.

They may even try an injection, and the body politic rouses itself and appears to take on new strength, only to find that after the injection has worn off the body politic begins to stagger around again. That is the situation. I say, until labour, until industry and until government recognize that the whole economy of the country—labour, wages, prices and all things—is adjusted to a financial policy that will be basically sound, we shall continue to have these troubles with labour and other groups of people, in industry and government alike.

There is another matter too that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I did not intend to criticize the labour laws on the statute books of this country because I think they are fair and just. I think the labour code, perhaps for the time being, is one of the best that exists. As time goes on I trust it will be improved, but I do believe that our labour laws, not only nationally but provincially, should guard the right of the individual worker on every occasion. I am not asking questions to be answered. I am intending rather to be provocative. Does the individual worker have his democratic say with freedom and without impairing his right to all the benefits that accrue to labour by reason of organization? I believe that is a question the government should take to its heart and watch most carefully.

I wonder sometimes how integrally related our labour unions are to the labour movements in the United States. I have no objection particularly to a union which because of its particular character may have an international complex. I realize that there are benefits for labour, and perhaps for industry also because industry in some respects has a certain international character. But I believe that we have reason to guard the rights of our individual labour organizations so that they may be free to ply their course and make independent decisions without any interference or coercion from other countries.

I do not want to see happen in Canada what is happening in the United States. The large labour organizations in the United States are fast becoming what I would term a labour monopoly. There was a time when the lords and barons, the princes and kings were looked upon as terrible ogres who were enslaving the worker, and with some degree of accuracy and reason. But that day seems to be slipping from us. The day is arriving, at least in the United States, when the powerful labour leaders have become the barons, lords and kings of the earth.

Monopoly in labour is just as dangerous as monopoly anywhere else. I rather agree with what the hon. member for Kootenay West said a few days ago when he analysed for us the principle of monopoly and stated that sometimes monopoly may be all right if it serves the national or community interest, but that it becomes a danger when it serves a certain section only, regardless of national interest. I trust the government is watching this most carefully because I believe that in the end a monopolistic labour will destroy the rights and freedom of the individual worker.

I am going to leave those thoughts with the minister. I have not asked him any specific questions but I would like him to comment on the first part of my remarks respecting the change-over from wartime production to peacetime production. I know we are gradually slipping back into wartime production, but I do believe that the solution to many of our problems is to place the proper emphasis where it should be placed, to produce all we can and then have the government say, We will settle our financial policy even though we have to change it in order that Canadians may live and enjoy the fruits of their labours.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be quite brief but I should like to make a few comments on this first item, particularly with respect to the national advisory council on manpower. Before doing that I should like to extend my congratulations to the minister upon assuming this portfolio. I know there were many veterans in Canada who were sorry to see him leave the Department of Veterans Affairs. I am sure that if the minister satisfies labour as he satisfied the veterans of this country when he was Minister of Veterans Affairs he will be a most successful Minister of Labour.

Before proceeding to what I wish to say tonight I must take issue with the hon. member for Macleod who, as I understood, rather criticized the international aspect of our labour unions. I would draw to his attention that Chrysler is international, that Ford is international, that many other organizations are international. I am quite sure that if there is danger to the national interest or to democratic principles in which we all believe and which we all intend to support and defend, it will come from international capitalism rather than from any other source.

Mr. Hansell: I said that.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. Herridge: I am rather intrigued with this national advisory council on manpower. I believe in principle it is a correct approach to the situation which it has been appointed to advise upon. But many hon. members are not quite sure whether this is a purely paper organization or whether it is really intended to function in the national interest and do the job hon. members expect of it. It has great possibilities and great opportunities if it is given the opportunity to function.

This afternoon the hon. member for Cape Breton South mentioned the capable labour leaders we have on the advisory council, men with talent and ability, and the capable civil servants. He also indicated, however, that these men will not be able to serve satisfactorily on the council unless they are given the opportunity to function as this house expects them to, and unless they have the co-operation of advisory or industrial councils all across Canada, the co-operation of those who are in close touch with local conditions and circumstances. This council can very well deal with over-all policy and general programs, but if its decisions are going to be sound, if they are going to be effective, they must be based on advice and information received from people who are in close touch with local industrial, plant and development conditions.

Therefore I heartily support the suggestion that the government must find the means of having this committee extend its influence throughout the country by co-operation and association with some form of local industrial council which includes representatives of government, labour and management. If the situation is as serious in all constituencies in Canada and presents as serious problems as it does in the constituency I have the honour to represent and in the surrounding country, the council faces a very stiff problem indeed. To illustrate the development projects proposed for the coming year and the next year in the riding I represent, and to some extent in the riding represented by the hon. member for Kootenay East, I would bring to the attention of the committee that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company has just issued a program of development that calls for the expenditure of $30 million on a new hydroelectric plant, $12 million on the modernization of the Trail lead smelter, $9 million on the development of a phosphate fertilizer plant at Kimberley, $3,200,000 on the development of the zinc plant at Trail, $2,850,000 on the development of the Kootenay river to Kimberley power transmission line, $3 million on the development of the Bluebell mine, $2,750,000 on the development of the Hudson Bay mine production and preparation.

In addition to the $62,800,000 program proposed by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, we have a large expansion of mining development. Millions will be put into mining development this year and the year following in Kootenay West alone. Then we have a tremendous expansion of the lumber industry. Nearly all operators in the whole district are expanding their mill operations and their woods operations. At the present time surveys are being made and plans are being drafted for the building of a $20 million pulp mill in the upper Arrow lakes area of my constituency.

Mr. Laing: Unparalleled prosperity.

Mr. Herridge: In addition, there is a general private building program in the area involving millions of dollars. In addition, there is the expansion of the telephone service which will involve millions of dollars. There is the extension of the power and light service transmission lines and so on throughout the country in addition to those I have mentioned totalling millions of dollars. In addition, there is the program of the provincial public works department for my area alone totalling something over $6 million, and on top of that there is a federal public works program, including defence production and public works, wharves and so on, totalling close to $1,500,000.

I have drawn to the attention of the committee the enormous development proposed for the constituency I represent and the surrounding country. That development is found pretty well on the same scale throughout the whole of British Columbia. In view of our defence production needs and the tremendous programs that I have mentioned, it is going to take very careful planning and careful assessment of given situations if the two are going to proceed smoothly at the same time. In the building of power dams, in lumber operations and in the development of mining and these large construction projects, large numbers of skilled workmen will be required, men with skills in the particular work being undertaken. In addition a large number of unskilled workers will be required.

Then there is the shifting from one operation to another. You cannot build a huge power plant by suddenly dropping 2,000 men on the job and proceeding with the work. A certain type of people is required for the foundations and the drilling. A certain type is wanted for the concrete work, and then another group for the steel work. The same thing is true with respect to the expansion of the Consolidated plants and the other developments which are going on in my constituency. If we are going to avoid undue travelling about of men while this tremendous development is taking place we shall have to take steps to that end. Men will hear about these things taking place, and not knowing the skills required or the particular type of labour at a particular time they will waste their time and energy travelling to that part of the country seeking work. In some cases when they get there they will find that they are not the type of labourer required at that particular time.

These things pose a tremendous problem. I am quite sure that the national advisory council on manpower, with the best intentions, cannot function efficiently if it is simply going to meet periodically to accept statements of civil servants, figures that have been prepared by the research department, and so on. I believe the council must have in its hands the recommendations of industrial councils or committees composed of representatives of government, labour and management in the areas concerned who are particularly acquainted with the problems involved. Mining problems differ from district to district, from one part of the country to another. Lumbering operations in my constituency are quite different from those carried on at the coast. The building of power plants is a different proposition in the swift waters of the rivers of British Columbia from what it is in the slower flowing waters of eastern Canada. In my opinion the council will have to have the very close co-operation of local committees if it is going to function satisfactorily.

If the minister will see to it that the council has the co-operation of groups all across Canada acquainted with local conditions he will have done something to strengthen the very fibre of democracy because democracy is based upon local and individual responsibility and co-operation no matter whether the development is a provincial or a national program. Before the minister's estimates are concluded, I should like him to explain if he has any plans for such expansion of the services so far as co-ordination and co-operation with the national advisory council on manpower is concerned.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I shall only take a moment on this point. The hon. member for Kootenay West has outlined very clearly in his speech what is intended and what is being carried out in these plans. He outlined the great development in his own constituency. I did not hear from him any observation which would indicate that as yet there is any serious clashing in the sense of providing manpower, but he expressed concern as to the future.

Mr. Herridge: That is right.

Mr. Gregg: I think I am correct in saying that the reason that disruption has not yet occurred has to a great extent been due to the good offices of advisory committees on employment in his area. They have representatives of labour and management serving on these committees, and they are doing an excellent service in advising our regional and local offices of the national employment service. They are very active. When workers are wanted they do not need to go on a wild goose chase, but can find out through these offices where the employment is without spending their money going to various places.

Now, multiply the area in that constituency by all the areas in Canada, Mr. Chairman, and you will see the strength of contact that this national body has available. That was what I meant when I stated in my first announcement in the house that these local employment advisory committees would act in close co-operation with this national body.

There is one other point as to the functions of the council. There seemed to be a suggestion this afternoon that the council was an administrative body in itself, but it is advisory, as the name indicates.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have to speak on this item, because I do not see any other item in the estimates dealing with this subject. I am glad to know there is going to be such a shortage of manpower in British Columbia. It does not show in the statistics that were published in March, because there was an increase in unemployment there over the previous month. Throughout Canada the same conditions seem to apply, and there were 293,000 listed as unemployed on January 20.

I am not going to speak for the rest of Canada; I am going to speak for Newfoundland and I intend to mention the subject discussed by my friend the member for St. John's East earlier this evening. There is the question of the employment of Newfoundlanders in the iron ore mines on the border of Quebec and Labrador. The question of manpower for the Labrador iron ore mines has been the subject of discussion and legislation in Newfoundland since 1938. Newfoundlanders have been looking forward all these years to getting employment there. Actually there is a mystery, to me at any rate, because no one seems to know anything about it down in Newfoundland. It is only occasionally that we meet a person who is employed there.

At the present time, I understand, the companies are building a railroad some three hundred miles from Seven Islands into the place where the mine will be operated. As my friend has pointed out, there has been some dissatisfaction amongst Newfoundlanders who have been employed there. In the employment registry office at St. John's on January 25 there were 5,160 registered as unemployed. That was the highest number for any city in Canada east of Quebec. It does not, by any means, represent the number of people who are unemployed, because many people do not think it is worth while to go to the office and put down their names. They have done that and they have never heard anything more about it. They have no faith in it. In addition to that, there are a lot of people like fishermen who are employed seasonally. They do not go to register at all. This is a special year. Because of the low prices which fishermen received for their fish last year, they do not intend to go fishing. There are going to be a great number looking for work. I imagine they had counted on getting some employment in Labrador, either on the railway or in the mine. I should like to know if the minister or his officials have given any consideration to the question of recruiting men to go to these places, or do the men have to find out for themselves how they are going to get employment there?

I know the government has nothing to do with the employment of men there, but I presume that in such an out of the way place the employment commission might be consulted by the companies who are seeking men. I imagine the type of men they want are probably woodsmen and riggers, men who have been working on railway gangs and that type of construction work. I think you could find a great many of them in Newfoundland. When I was at home a great many people came to see me, and a great many people have been writing to me to ask how they can get work in Labrador. I can only refer them to the employment commission in St. John's. My experience has been that it is a sort of accounting office receiving money from those who are employed, and paying out unemployment insurance to those who are not. It is not doing much in regard to obtaining employment for people looking for it. I know that it is nearly eleven o'clock, but perhaps the minister will have a moment to reply.

Mr. Gregg: I shall be happy to give the hon. member a complete reply under an item in my estimates later, because there are a few aspects of this subject in which I am interested. It applies to my own province as well as his. I shall be glad to outline to him what the feeling of the commission is with regard to the grouping of fishermen under the terms of the act. He will understand at once that there are great difficulties to overcome, but in so far as it is possible to do so we will attempt to carry out the suggestions.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do I understand the minister to say there is an item under which he can reply to my question?

Mr. Gregg: I shall do so under the unemployment insurance item.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knowles: No, it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Do I understand that the first item is not carried?

Mr. Knowles: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I asked hon. members if the first item was carried.

Mr. Green: I understand the minister will answer the hon. member for St. John's West on another item.

Mr. Gregg: And any other question I have not covered tonight, I shall attempt to cover on the appropriate item.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Chairman; it is eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Wednesday last the Prime Minister announced that the resolution in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have priority. That resolution concerns the reference of his estimates to the committee on external affairs.

At three o'clock the Prime Minister announced that, if there were an understanding with all parties of the house that we could get through quickly this address concerning the amendment to the British North America Act on old age pensions, he would undertake to move it. I understand that it would not impair the discussion of external affairs which was announced some days ago. I really hope we can succeed in having this put through the house a little more quickly than the first item of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Green: Can the minister say what other days next week are also filled?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Tuesday we shall move to go into supply, undertaking not to call any new departments, and proceed with the estimates of national defence.

Mr. Green: And Wednesday also?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And Wednesday also; but please do not ask me about any other days.

Mr. Adamson: I understand then that on Monday external affairs is going on as scheduled?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND PREMIERS OF THE PROVINCES WITH RESPECT TO OLD AGE PENSIONS CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Note: We were not supplied by the Hon. Mr. Duplessis with an authorized translation of his letters of March 11, 1951, and April 18, 1951. We desire to emphasize that the unofficial translations which have been prepared here have not been authorized by the Hon. Mr. Duplessis and to that extent are not binding on him.

ALBERTA

Office of the Premier

Edmonton, March 6, 1951

The Honourable Stuart S. Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General
of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 28th ultimo enclosing copies of the submissions made by the premiers of the various provinces in relation to the proposed amendments to the British North America Act.

I am in agreement with your first suggestion that a new section 95a be enacted reading as follows:

"95a. In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to old age pensions within the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions made by a provincial legislature."

While there is no doubt that at the present time the legislature of each province has the power to make laws in relation to old age pensions, nevertheless I can see no objection to repeating the power in section 95a even though redundant, in order that no argument can be raised that it was intended to take this power away.

I have no further suggested amendments to head 2 of section 92.

Yours very truly

(Sgd.) Ernest Manning

Premier

ONTARIO

Office of the Prime Minister and President of the Council

Toronto, Ontario, March 7, 1951

The Honourable Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General
of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Garson:

Your letter of February 28th received.

For reasons which you have very clearly stated, and with which we are in complete agreement, you propose a new section 95A to be in either of the following forms,—

"In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to old age pensions within the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions made by a provincial legislature."

or

"It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

Either one of these forms is satisfactory to us. If, therefore, the government of Canada or any of the provinces have a preference for one of these forms it will be quite satisfactory to us.

We trust that the amendment will be effected as soon as possible and the legislation proceeded with as agreed upon.

Sincerely yours,

(Sgd.) Leslie M. Frost

PROVINCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Office of the Premier

Victoria, March 8, 1951

Honourable Stuart Garson, LL.D.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Mr. Garson:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of February 28, together with enclosures relating to the proposed constitutional amendments dealing with old age pensions and the indirect sales tax.

I have had our attorney-general and his officials examine your correspondence thoroughly and we have come to the view that the draft in respect of old age pensions to be found on page 3 of your communication satisfactorily deals with this question. It is felt that it grants the necessary power to the parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to old age pensions while at the same time fully preserving provincial rights in dealing with the same question.

In relation to the sales tax amendment, we are satisfied that the amendment suggested by you is quite sufficient for all practical purposes. This amendment, as I gather from your correspondence, is as follows:

"2. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by:

(a) direct taxation within the province, and

(b) indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the province and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province."

With kindest personal regards,

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) Byron I. Johnson
Premier

ST JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND
Office of the Premier

March 9, 1951

The Honourable Stuart S. Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

Thank you for your letter of the 28th ult. with reference to constitutional amendments in which you enclose copies of correspondence from the various provincial premiers.

I have discussed this matter with the attorney general and it has come before cabinet. As far as Newfoundland is concerned we are prepared to accept what you refer to as your third draft (on page three of your letter), reading—

"It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

but if the other provinces prefer it we would agree to your new draft section 95A (page two of your letter) reading as follows—

"In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to old age pensions within the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions made by a provincial legislature."

With respect to the proposed amendment of section 92 (2) it seems to me that the point made by Premier Macdonald may be well taken, and that the amendment with reference to indirect taxation might well be included in section 92 as a new enumerated head (2) (a). Newfoundland, however, will accept the ruling of yourself and your advisers in this matter.

Yours faithfully,

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC
Office of the Premier

Quebec, March 11, 1951

The Honourable Stuart Garson, K.C., P.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Garson:

The Quebec legislature resumed its parliamentary work on January 24 last and, for the past couple of weeks we have been at the most active and engrossing stage of our legislative programme.

Your letter dated February 28, respecting the Canadian constitution and old age pensions was delivered at my office March 2 and I was unable to take cognizance of same before yesterday. Thanks for the information your letter imparts to me and for the copy of the correspondence relative to these important problems which accompanied it.

In the course of the Canadian intergovernmental conference held at Ottawa at the beginning of December, 1950, the federal government made statements and proposals to the representatives of the provinces with reference to these constitutional amendments and old age pensions.

The federal authorities wish to assume the full payment of old age pensions from age 70 and this without the 'means test," provided it be possible for it to recoup itself for such outlays by means of a constitutional amendment conferring on Ottawa a jurisdiction which at the present time is exclusively provincial. Furthermore, the federal government undertakes to contribute, with the provinces, in a proportion of 50 per cent, to the payment of an old age pension of $40.00 per month, granted with "means test," to Canadian citizens from age 65.

For the purpose of helping the provinces secure supplementary revenues in order to meet the additional expenses occasioned by the provincial contribution of 50 per cent to payment of pensions starting at age 65 and up to age 70, the federal authorities suggested a constitutional amendment granting the provinces a limited power of indirect taxation.

You forwarded to me with your letter of January 2 last two federal drafts of constitutional amendments, namely: (I indicate with capital letters the amendments in question)

"A" 1. Add a new subsection to section 95 in the following terms:

"(2) Notwithstanding anything in this act, the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions."

"B" 2. Re-enact head 2 of section 92 to read as follows:

"2. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by

(a) direct taxation within the province, and

(b) indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the province and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province."

On January 20, you wrote me to make alterations to the federal draft relative to the 3 per cent indirect tax.

These draft amendments were submitted to the council of ministers and, afterwards, to the Quebec legislature during the session presently being held.

Appendix

We have made known on several occasions the decision of the present government of Quebec to co-operate with the federal authorities in the establishment of an improved old age pensions system that will be as complete as possible in the circumstances. Actually, on many occasions, we have expressed the desire of the government of the province to co-operate with the federal authorities in the establishment of just and proper old age pensions as from age 65.

The government sought and obtained from the legislature the authorization to conclude a friendly agreement with the federal authorities in respect of these matters. We have come to the following conclusions:—

We deem the first draft amendment—amendment "A" unacceptable for numerous reasons, of which there are two special ones: in the first place, because it confers on Ottawa an exclusive power in a field exclusively reserved to the provinces; then, because the terms of section 95 with which this draft amendment would be linked, grant, in certain cases, a federal priority we deem inopportune in the circumstances.

With reference to the second draft amendment which your letter of February 28 brings us, we believe there would be cause to alter it. This new draft reads as follows:—

"C" "It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

It seems to us that in constitutional matters it is necessary to proceed cautiously and in a clear and precise manner. The Canadian constitution is a fundamental document the importance of which by far transcends ordinary conventions and effects of which have repercussions a long time in the future.

We consider that this constitutional amendment should mention expressly that the matter has to do with old age pensions starting at age 65 and over. Besides, this federal draft amendment indicates the federal power to legislate "from time to time" and does not make this important mention in respect of provincial legislation. This difference in the wording could give the unfortunate impression that the provincial powers are limited to the present provincial legislation. In our opinion, it would be proper that the expressions "from time to time" apply to the provincial legislative power.

Do you not think it would be proper, to avoid any possible doubt in the future, to indicate definitely that the matter has to do, in respect of old age pensions starting at age 70, with pensions of at least $40.00 per month, granted without "means test"?

There would also be cause, in our opinion, to consider in this amendment, the fact that the provincial taxpayers and the federal taxpayers are the same persons so as to avoid any possible injustice with regard to the provinces which, each and every one, are vitally interested.

Furthermore, we consider that this constitutional amendment should exist by itself so as to indicate clearly its special character and that, at all events, it should not form part of section 95 which grants certain priorities to the federal body, something we could not reasonably accept.

With reference to the draft amendment respecting the new provincial power of indirect taxation, amendment marked "B" in this letter:—

As you are aware, we have expressed the desire and opinion on many occasions that, the fiscal or financial power being a necessary corollary to the exercise of the administrative and legislative power, the provinces have the right to possess, in a precise, clear and definitive manner, all the sources of revenue indispensable to the performance of their obligations as well as to the exercise of their rights and this, not only with a view to the present but also with a view to the future, for to govern is to foresee.

On the other hand, as this aspect of the problem is one of the very vast scope, and we wish to co-operate in the rapid enactment of appropriate and just old age pension legislation, we shall limit our remarks, at the present time, to the draft submitted.

It follows from the correspondence that the federal is not disposed to acknowledge to the provinces an indirect retail sales tax exceeding 3 per cent.

As a further manifestation of our desire to co-operate and subject to our rights and to our suggestions in respect of the exact delimitation of the provincial and federal fiscal and financial powers, we will make no objection to this constitutional financial amendment provided it is more clear, more effective and more capable of applications. We acknowledge the expediency of forestalling any possible discrimination between the provinces and, in the circumstances, of subordinating the application of this power to the retail trade.

However, it seems to us that the expression "goods", in the suggested amendment, may open the door to multiple conflicts of interpretation and, in short, render illusory a good portion of the new rights conferred by this amendment. We believe it would be proper to grant to the provinces the right to apply an indirect sales tax in the retail sales field, "at the retail sale level". This expression appears to us more clear, more just and better suited than the expression "sale of goods". We understand the expediency of the distinction you make with respect to goods sold at the retail level for consumption or use in one province by a citizen of that province.

It goes without saying that all precautions should be taken so that the new constitutional amendment should not have the effect of calling in question the power of the provinces of imposing sales and education taxes, that are imposed in the province of Quebec, to quote but one example.

In a word, you can rest assured, as we have proven on numerous occasions, that it is the sincere desire of the province to co-operate in a friendly and loyal spirit, with the federal authorities in the expeditious formulation and application of a just and appropriate system of old age pensions, starting at age 65.

On several occasions, yourself and the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, have acknowledged and proclaimed the bilingual character of our country, and that is why in a matter of this importance, we deem proper that the opinion of the province of Quebec be conveyed in the language of the immense majority of the population of our province.

With my sincere regards,

(Sgd.) M. L. Duplessis

NOVA SCOTIA

The Premier, Halifax

March 12, 1951

Hon. Stuart Garson, P.C., M.P.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

Let me thank you for your letter of February 28 and for the proposed amendment to the B.N.A. Act mentioned therein.

So far as Nova Scotia is concerned, I may say that we think that there is agreement between us on the purpose of amendment and generally upon the method of amendment.

The amendment proposed in your letter used the phrase "in Canada" instead of the phrase at present used in section 95 "in all or any of the provinces". I am not sure whether the new phrase is to be taken to mean that any dominion law in relation to old age pensions must be uniform in its application and operation throughout Canada. In fact, the operation of old age pension laws has varied. Thus I think that when Prince Edward Island began to pay old age pensions, they fixed the maximum monthly payment at $15 instead of $20 which was the maximum in all or most of the provinces. However, I believe that a great deal can be done in such matters by regulations agreed to jointly by the dominion and any province, and perhaps the point which I raise in this paragraph is not of great significance.

I doubt whether the concluding clause is essential in order to assure concurrent powers to Canada and the provinces. I refer to the clause which reads: "but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions made by a provincial legislature". I would suggest, therefore, that this clause be deleted, but if the general desire is to have some such clause in the amendment, I should like to suggest the following words be used: "but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall detract from the legislative competence of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions".

As to the amendment with regard to the imposition of indirect taxes by the province, I note that your letter does not suggest any redraft of the original proposal.

I should like, however, to repeat, what I have already said in my memorandum which accompanied my letter of January 19. That was that the amendment constitutes the sole source of the provinces' power to impose an indirect tax. It ought, therefore, to be sufficiently wide in its terms to authorize any tax which it is contemplated the provinces should have a right to impose.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) A. L. Macdonald

THE PREMIER

Hon. Stuart Garson,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:—

I received in due course your letter of February 28 relating to constitutional amendments which have been under study respecting old age pensions and a provincial sales tax.

Appendix

This letter will deal only with the first proposed amendment. I feel this division of the matter is justified inasmuch, as pointed out in my letter of February 2, the two matters are "quite distinct one from the other and capable of separate action".

Some confusion seems to have developed in certain quarters where an opinion or view has developed that the sales tax amendment was part and parcel of the old age pension plan which was under study at the December federal-provincial conference. All governments there represented are fully aware that there is no relation or connection between the two and that the old age pension plan can go forward without any sales tax amendment.

In order, however, to emphasize this point I am referring herein only to the old age pension amendment and shall make the proposals regarding a sales tax amendment the subject of another letter to follow shortly.

Having in my letter to you of February 2 agreed to the proposed amendment relating to old age pensions originally proposed we are quite prepared to accept either of the alternative amendments set out in your letter of February 28. We have no preference in the matter and either of the latest proposals which receives the assent or concurrence of the other provinces will have our approval.

Yours sincerely,

Hon. Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

Yesterday I replied in part to your letter of February 28, relating to amendments to the British North America Act, respecting old age pensions and a provincial sales tax.

For reasons then stated I dealt only with the first mentioned amendment. Herein I shall state our views on the proposed taxation amendment, a matter entirely distinct and separate from the other.

Your letter of February 28 suggests that the federal government is inclined to stand by the principles of the sales tax amendment as previously indicated in your letters of January 2 and January 20.

As pointed out in my letter of February 2, our interest in such a constitutional amendment rests upon the advantage that an indirect sales tax at the retail level is considered to possess over a consumers tax such as is now operating in several of the provinces, which involves a direct levy on the purchaser at the time of the retail sale.

When last year the legislature of this province adopted a consumers' tax much of the opposition to it centred around the features of it connected with its collection. It was to meet the alleged objectionable features of this form of taxation that this government has been supporting the proposal for a change in the constitution under which our present levy could be imposed in another form—that is as an indirect sales tax at the retail level.

In passing it may be observed that some who were then expressing criticism of our present tax because of the bothersome collection methods involved would now appear to be sympathetic to the opposition being voiced against the constitutional amendment which has since been proposed and which if adopted would serve to overcome their former objections.

While we are still interested in an amendment to the constitution which would permit us to abolish our present tax and replace it by an indirect sales tax we see no advantage for this province in the present federal proposal.

To meet the needs of this province and its municipalities the rate of our new tax last year was fixed at four per cent. By adopting this rate the legislature was able to provide extensive exemptions, the most important being the complete exemption of food and fuel. To replace this tax by an indirect sales tax at three per cent, the maximum rate which would be permitted under the amendment, would doubtless mean the elimination of all exemptions.

There is reason to feel that behind this proposal to limit in the amendment the jurisdiction of the provinces to fix the tax rate is the thought that any indirect sales tax imposed by a province under its authority should be applied right across the board to all retail sales without any provision for exemptions, even in matters as vital to the average citizen as food and fuel. The government of this province is not prepared to adopt any such plan. In fact we are definitely opposed to such notions.

It is difficult to regard the attitude of the federal government on this point in any other light than a determination to dictate to the provinces their policy in taxation matters. We fail to see why it should concern the dominion whether a provincial indirect sales tax should be two per cent, three per cent or any other percentage. As a matter of principle it seems to us that if the legislatures are vested with jurisdiction in any field, large or small, they alone should determine how their powers should be exercised.

So on the one hand we are opposed in principle to the amendment in the present form. On the other hand we attach no value to it from the practical point of view. As stated it could have no operation in this province unless the indirect taxation authorized by it were applied without exemptions, a course to which as stated we are opposed. The only other solution would be to have both forms of taxation in use which no one would want.

Notwithstanding what has been written we will be glad to be kept informed of the views of the other provinces on this matter and any developments connected therewith. If all the other provinces agree to the constitutional amendment in the form proposed by you we would feel very strongly constrained to agree thereto in the interest of co-operation and goodwill.

Yours sincerely,

The Honourable Stuart S. Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Garson:

Enclosed please find a copy of the Votes and Proceedings of the legislative assembly of Saskatchewan for Friday, March 16. You will notice that the assembly has given its approval to both of the constitutional amendments which have been under discussion. The wording of both amendments is such that the Lieutenant Governor in Council can give its approval to the constitutional amendments as presently drafted or to any amended wording which may result from further discussions providing, of course, that the basic principles remain unaltered.

A radio broadcast intimated some time ago that you might call a conference of the provincial premiers to discuss the exact wording of the proposed constitutional amendments. If such a conference is in prospect, I would appreciate hearing from you regarding the probable date it is likely to be held.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) T. C. Douglas

The Hon. Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Garson:

In my letter dated February 5, 1951, I stated:

"We are satisfied that the wording which you have suggested for the two proposed constitutional amendments will carry out the spirit and intent of the decisions arrived at during the federal-provincial conference of last December."

As far as the proposed amendment to the British North America Act respecting old age pensions was concerned, we were satisfied with the suggested wording. For this reason we undertook to submit the proposed amendment to the legislature as soon as possible with our complete endorsation and support.

With respect to your comments, we agree with the opinion expressed in your letter of February 28, 1951, that the effect of the amendment originally proposed was not to give the government of Canada sole jurisdiction in the field of old age pensions legislation. While we are of the opinion that the first draft amendment with respect to old age pensions would leave the provinces jurisdiction to deal with old age pensions, we do not see why either of the redrafts set out on pages two and three of your letter would not be satisfactory. Of the two redrafts, the second set out on page three of your letter would be preferable as it makes it clear that the provinces had jurisdiction previously, and will continue to have jurisdiction in the field of old age pensions legislation.

In view of your suggestion that the redrafts of the proposed amendment respecting old age pensions be considered, and in view of the conclusions we arrived at after studying your suggestions, we decided that it would be advisable to redraft the resolution submitted to the legislature on February 8, 1951. The resolution as redrafted appears on page two of the votes and proceedings of the legislative assembly of Saskatchewan, number 32, Friday, March 16, 1951, as follows:

"Moved by the Hon. Mr. Douglas (Weyburn), seconded by the Hon. Mr. Fines:

That this assembly approves in principle the amendment to the British North America Act proposed by the government of Canada following the federal-provincial conference held in December, 1950, designed to provide that while the legislature may make laws in relation to old age pensions within the province, the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, and authorizes the Lieutenant Governor in Council to approve any amendment incorporating such principle or to approve any amended wording suggested by the government of Canada and deemed to embody such principle."

This motion was agreed to unanimously. A copy of the Votes and Proceedings containing this motion and a record of the vote was forwarded to you with my letter of March 20, 1951.

We are of the opinion that both redrafts of the amendment to the British North America Act as proposed in your letter dated February 28, 1951, embody the principle approved in the above resolution and are satisfactory. As indicated above, we prefer the second redraft set out on page three of your letter. In accordance with the wishes of the legislative assembly, we would be prepared at any time to discuss any other amendment incorporating the principle set out in the resolution of the legislative assembly.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) T. C. Douglas

Your letter February twenty-eight concerning constitutional amendments re old age pension and indirect sales tax has been fully considered by Manitoba government. Premier Campbell's letter to you January thirty-one indicated our acceptance of old age pension proposals enclosed with your letter January two failing general approval of alternative proposals set out in his letter. Our alternative proposals not being generally acceptable we confirm approval of your proposals. No objection here to either form of new section 95 A but prefer last alternative in your letter February twenty-eight. Government resolutions of concurrence in constitutional amendments for both old age pensions and three per cent indirect sales tax on today's order paper of Manitoba legislature.

Dear Mr. Frost,—

On February 28, 1951, I wrote to you forwarding two alternative drafts to the first old age pensions amendment draft which I had forwarded to you in my letter of January 2, 1951. In my said letter of February 28, I also dealt with representations which had been made by a number of the provincial premiers concerning the matters referred to in my letter of January 2, 1951.

I now enclose, herewith, the replies to my said letter of February 28, 1951, which I list as follows:

Letter from Premier Jones, dated March 2, 1951;

Letter from Premier Manning, dated March 6, 1951;

Letter from Premier McNair, dated March 13, 1951;
Letter from Premier Douglas, dated March 20, 1951;
Letter from Premier Douglas, dated March 22, 1951;

Telegram from Hon. C. Rhodes Smith, K.C., dated April 2, 1951.

It is to deal with the points which have been raised in these enclosed communications, the last of which I received only yesterday, that my present letter, dated April 3, 1951, is being written.

The enclosed letters show that the governments of Alberta, British Columbia, Ontario, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have accepted either the second or third drafts of the old age pensions amendment. The government of Prince Edward Island prefers either the first or the third draft.

The government of Nova Scotia seems willing to accept either the second or third draft, subject to their being satisfied with regard to the "but" clause in the draft. The Honourable Mr. Macdonald suggested that this should be revised to read:

"But no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall detract from the legislative competence of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions." The purpose of this "but" clause is to make it clear that any federal old age pensions laws would not override any provincial old age pensions laws. We think that if the Nova Scotia wording is adopted and if parliament legislates in a field where the province may also legislate, one of two results may follow: First, parliament may oust the jurisdiction of the province; or, second, in the event of repugnancy, the act of parliament may override a provincial act. Nova Scotia's proposed draft deals with the first possibility, but leaves the second untouched. Thus, if there is a repugnancy, the act passed by parliament will override the provincial act—the very thing that we are seeking to avoid. We therefore would prefer our own original language as follows:

"But no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

The government of Quebec rejects the first draft of the old age pensions amendment and comments only on the third draft. We take it from the Hon. Mr. Duplessis' letter of March 11, 1951, that the third draft is preferable to the Quebec government provided certain changes in the third amendment are made, as follows:

1. The Honourable Mr. Duplessis objects to the fact that parliament is given power to legislate "from time to time" whereas this phrase is not used in the reference to provincial laws. Upon consideration, this point seems to be well taken. We see no objection to striking out the phrase "from time to time" in the third draft. This would leave parliament in the same position as the provincial legislatures in this regard.

2. The Honourable Mr. Duplessis takes the position that the old age pensions constitutional amendment should stand by itself and should not form part of section 95. In this connection it will be noticed that we have numbered the old age pensions constitutional amendment as section 95A, that is, as a section quite distinct and apart from section 95. We would have no objection to emphasizing this distinction still further by having inserted in the British North America Act a heading "Old Age Pensions" just above the proposed new section 95A.

3. The Honourable Mr. Duplessis thinks that the amendment should mention that it concerns old age pensions as from the age of 65 years and over; and that

4. It would be advisable to point out clearly that with regard to the old age pensions from the age of 70, what is intended is a pension of $40.00 per month without a means test.

The views of the other provincial premiers are invited with reference to the Hon. Mr. Duplessis' suggestions Nos. 3 and 4. We think that these are two points upon which there should be consensus of opinion before the wording in the draft constitutional amendment is amended to take care of them.

I would accordingly submit for your approval a redraft of the third draft to read as follows:

"Old Age Pensions

95A It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province".

Re: Sales Tax Amendment

The present draft amendment reads as follows:

"2. Re-enact head 2 of section 92 to read as follows:

"2. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by

(a) direct taxation within the province, and

(b) indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the province and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province, and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods".

The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba have agreed. New Brunswick still continues its objection to the fixing of the rate at 3 per cent and still suggests 4 per cent, but says:

"If all the other provinces agree to the constitutional amendment in the form proposed by you we would feel very strongly constrained to agree thereto in the interest of cooperation and goodwill".

The Honourable Mr. Macdonald of Nova Scotia repeats the observations made earlier. They were to the following effect:

1. That it would be preferable to leave the present 92(2) as it stands and to add a new head for the new taxing power. Provided it meets with the approval of the other provincial governments, we in Ottawa would have no objection to framing the amendment in this way and accordingly would suggest that a new head could be added under section 92 to read as follows:

"2A. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the provinces and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods."

2. That the exemption of goods sold for shipment outside the province should be in the discretion of the provincial legislature, on the ground that if this limitation is included no province would then be in a position to levy a tax in respect of interprovincial transactions. This has been carefully considered but we feel that the exception is necessary in order to confine the taxing power to taxation within the province.

3. That section 121 of the British North America Act might be enough to prevent discrimination against goods produced or manufactured outside the province. It may be that section 121 has this effect but we feel that it would be desirable to put the matter beyond doubt.

4. That services, combinations of services and materials and intangible things such as electricity, are not included in the section, and that there might be difficulty in dealing with products that are sold at retail and then incorporated in a manufactured product that is also sold at retail. These matters were dealt with in my letter of February 28.

The Honourable Mr. Frost of Ontario has made no comment.

The Honourable Mr. Duplessis comments that Quebec would have no objection to this sales tax amendment "provided it be made clearly more effective and more susceptible to application"; and that this could be done by conferring a power to impose an indirect sales tax in the retail sales field at the retail sales level. Perhaps I should say in this connection that in one of our original drafts we did refer to a retail sales tax, but exception was taken by one of our tax experts concerning the use of the expression "retail." The dictionary meaning of "retail" is simply to sell in small quantities, and it was not felt that this was clear enough. We then spelled out more specifically the type of sales to which we were referring, namely, a sale to a buyer for the purpose of consumption or use and not for resale. In doing this we adopted the language which was used in the Quebec Sales Tax Act. That act imposes a tax on a purchaser "at the time of making a purchase at a retail sale" but it does not rest with the dictionary meaning of the term "retail," but goes on to define "retail sale" as meaning "a sale to a purchaser or user for the purpose of consumption or use and not for resale." We still think that the Quebec language which we have adopted is the best suited for the purpose of this constitutional amendment.

In conclusion may I invite your comments upon, and I hope your agreement with

1. the latest draft of the constitutional amendment regarding old age pensions on page 3 of this letter;

2. the latest draft re provincial indirect retail sales tax on page 4 of this letter.

In these two latest drafts we have tried to incorporate the views of all provincial governments in a manner acceptable to all provincial governments.

Appendix

This letter is being sent out at the earliest possible date after I had heard from all of the provincial governments. I am asking all the provincial premiers to give these matters prior attention. The constitutional amendments which may be agreed upon will have to be secured from the parliament of the United Kingdom. There are reasons why it is desirable to secure any wise amendments upon which we may agree as soon as possible.

The Government of the Province

FREDERICTON
The Premier

April 10, 1951

Hon. Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

I received in due course your letter of April 3 respecting the two constitutional amendments which have been under consideration relating respectively to old age pensions and a provincial sales tax.

In listing the replies received to your letter of February 28 you omitted any reference to my letter of March 12. Copy of that letter as well as my letter of March 13 was among the lot of correspondence containing the replies of the provincial premiers to your letter of February 28 which was forwarded to me. I assume therefore that copies of both letters went to all premiers.

My purpose in writing two separate letters dealing with the two proposed amendments was indicated by me therein. For the reasons given I consider it most essential that the two matters be recognized as separate and distinct. While your letter of the third instant did not dissociate the two amendments it is our hope that the federal government regards them as two entirely separate matters and shares our view that the old age pension amendment is not contingent upon the adoption of the other.

I am prompted to emphasize this matter again after reading the correspondence with the provinces forwarded by you in which will be found passages in which the two matters are tied together.

The government of this province would welcome an assurance from you that so far as the federal government is concerned the two amendments are not inseparable; and in particular that the old age pension amendment will not stand or fall with the other.

Whether or not agreement can be reached on the sales tax amendment it seems evident early agreement can be arrived at on the pensions amendment. There can be no doubt that all provinces are one in their desire to see the new old age pension plan in operation at the earliest possible moment.

On the assumption that general agreement is arrived at with the provinces on both proposed amendments we have another suggestion to offer. It is that the matters should be dissociated when laid before parliament. In other words they should, in our view, be made the subject of two separate joint addresses.

Recognizing that opposition to the sales tax amendment has become quite vocal in some quarters and recalling the fate of a similar proposal in the Senate a few years ago we feel that a revised old age pension plan for this country should not be placed in jeopardy by being presented to parliament as part of a joint amending operation involving also the sales tax matter, which may again prove very controversial.

We hope, and urge, that some heed may be paid to this suggestion for separate treatment in the two houses of parliament.

May I now refer to the latest proposals regarding the two amendments as advanced in your letter of April 3?

For the old age pension amendment you suggest a new section in the B.N.A. Act to be numbered 95A with the caption "Old Age Pensions" and to read as follows,—

"It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

The government of this province approves of the amendment in that form and language.

With respect to the sales tax amendment we agree with the suggestion advanced by Nova Scotia that head 2 of section 92 of the B.N.A. Act should remain untouched. Therefore the proposal made by you that any sales tax amendment be the subject matter of a new head, to be numbered 2A, meets with our approval.

From that point we do not view the proposals with the same degree of satisfaction or equanimity. In this connection I would repeat the reasons contained in my letter of March 13.

In our view the matter has become unduly involved and difficult through the insistence of the federal government on placing restrictions on the exercise by the provincial legislatures of the proposed new taxing powers.

I feel constrained to quote here one paragraph in my letter of March 13 which reads as follows:

"It is difficult to regard the attitude of the federal government on this point in any other light than a determination to dictate to the provinces their policy in taxation matters. We fail to see why it should concern the dominion whether a provincial indirect sales tax should be two per cent, three per cent or any other percentage. As a matter of principle it seems to us that if the legislatures are vested with jurisdiction in any field, large or small, they alone should determine how their powers should be exercised."

We are at a loss to understand why the federal government should take such an arbitrary stand. Why should it presume to dictate policy to the provinces? There is a principle at stake here upon which we feel the provinces should be adamant.

As further stated in my said letter this government has no practical interest in the sales tax amendment as proposed by you. To use the powers it would give, in order to replace our present consumers' tax with an indirect sales tax, would require the abandonment of all our exemptions—on food, fuel and everything else—a course which is altogether repugnant to us.

We would be very reluctant to consent to the taxation amendment as proposed. However, we will adhere to the undertaking given in my letter of March 13—"If all the other provinces agree to the constitutional amendment in the form proposed by you we would feel very strongly constrained to agree thereto in the interest of cooperation and goodwill."

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) John B. McNair

SASKATCHEWAN

Premier's Office

Regina, April 13, 1951

Hon. Stuart S. Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Garson:

The government of Saskatchewan is of the opinion that the redraft of the third draft set out on page 3 of your letter, as indicated below, is satisfactory:

"Old Age Pensions"

"95A It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada my make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

As to the suggestion of the premier of Quebec that the amendment should mention that it concerns old age pensions as from the age of 65 years and over, the government of Saskatchewan feels that it would not be advisable to preclude the extension of pensions to those below age 65 without a further amendment to the British North America Act.

While it is agreed that the pension that is paid to the age group 70 and over will be $40 per month without means test, and while it can be appreciated that it is desirable that this pension should at no time be reduced to a level which will not provide at least a minimum standard of subsistence, we are of the opinion that the amendment should be limited to matters of principle respecting the spheres of jurisdiction of the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces with regard to old age pensions.

We trust that there is now sufficient agreement on the proposed old age pensions amendment to enable the government of Canada to prepare the necessary legislation to provide pensions of $40 per month without means test to all aged 70 and over, beginning January 1, 1952, as agreed upon at the federal-provincial economic conference in December last.

Yours sincerely,

The Honourable Stuart S. Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 3rd instant outlining the suggestions made by the premiers of the various provinces of Canada in relation to the proposed amendments to the British North America Act.

The legislature of this province by a unanimous resolution adopted in principle the amendments outlined in your communication, and I therefore am pleased to advise that I approve of the amendment to section 95a as outlined on page 3 of your letter and reading as follows:

"95a. It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

I also agree with the proposed amendment to section 92 by including a new subhead 2a as set out on page 4 of your letter and reading as follows:

"2a. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the provinces and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods."

The Honourable J. B. McNair, K.C.,
Premier of New Brunswick,
Fredericton, N.B.

Dear Mr. McNair:

Thank you for your reply of April 10 to my letter of April 3, 1951.

As you correctly state my said letter omitted any reference to your letter of March 12. This was a clerical mistake that occurred only in the letter to yourself. The letters to all of the other provincial premiers contain this reference; and in all of them, including your own, there was enclosed a copy of your letter of March 12.

So far as the federal government is concerned, you are quite right in regarding the two constitutional amendments dealing with old age pensions and a provincial sales tax as being separate and distinct. The only reason why at each successive stage of my correspondence with the provincial premiers I have dealt with these two amendments in the same letter was to place before the premiers all matters under discussion in the one comprehensive letter and thereby expedite matters by decreasing the number of letters which we have to exchange. We have always taken the position, however, that the adoption of the old age pensions constitutional amendment is not contingent upon the adoption of the sales tax constitutional amendment.

Whether some provincial governments might feel that the extra revenue possibilities which would be made available to them by the passage of the sales tax amendment would affect their attitude towards the old age pensions amendment or the tax agreements, we obviously cannot say.

In line with the thought that these two constitutional amendments are separate and distinct, we are quite agreeable, if the provinces wish it that way, that these two constitutional amendments should be made the subject of two separate joint addresses to be presented to the parliament of Canada requesting respectively that these two constitutional amendments should be passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

With great respect I cannot agree with your complaint that the federal government is seeking to place restrictions upon the exercise by the provincial legislatures of the proposed new retail sales taxing power. The facts, I suggest, are as follows: At the conference the provincial governments asked for a constitutional amendment to enable them to occupy jointly with the dominion government a portion of the field of indirect taxation. For this privilege the provincial governments offered, and the federal government has asked for, no quid pro quo or compensation of any kind; for, as you correctly imply, the granting of this privilege of joint occupation by the provincial governments with the federal government of a part of the field of indirect taxation is not contingent upon any other matter.

By granting to the provincial governments at their request the right to use jointly with the federal government a portion of the field of indirect taxation, the federal government will automatically restrict its own exclusive use of that field. Surely then it is reasonable that the federal government in making such a grant for no consideration, may specify the limits of its grant by imposing this 3 per cent limitation. Within the limitations of the 3 per cent grant the provinces have complete liberty to use these indirect retail sales taxing powers in any way in which they see fit, except that they may not use them to discriminate between goods produced within and goods produced without a taxing province or to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods. This clause against discrimination the provinces themselves have willingly agreed to, and indeed have helped to draft.

If by merely limiting the extent to which its exclusive field may be shared, to a 3 per cent rate, the federal government is to be regarded as dictating policy to the provincial governments, it clearly would be better for the federal government not to share its exclusive field at all, and thus avoid charges or suspicion that it is dictating policy to the provincial governments. If the sales tax amendment were not proceeded with, that fact would not necessarily disturb the old age pensions amendment or the renewal of the dominion-provincial tax agreements.

It is important that there should be a clear understanding that the federal government is not at all anxious to surrender a portion of its own field of taxation in this way. It is doing so because the provinces have made out a strong case that they need and would like to have the joint use of a portion of the indirect tax field, and because the dominion government wishes in this, as in other matters, to co-operate to the fullest extent possible with the provinces. If, however, any of the provinces, upon any grounds whatever, are opposed to the provinces having the power to impose a 3 per cent indirect sales tax, the federal government would be quite glad to retain the whole of the indirect tax field to itself since it obviously would be better off if it did so.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) Stuart S. Garson

P.S. Since dictating the above I have received a letter from Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan enclosing a copy of his letter dated April 13, to yourself in reply to your letter of April 11 to him, in which you enclosed a copy of your letter of April 10 to me. It therefore has occurred to me that it might save time in this matter if I send to all of the provincial premiers a copy of your said letter of April 10 to me and a copy of this letter dated April 16 from me to you. (Translation):

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Prime Minister's Office

Quebec, April 18, 1951

Honourable Stuart Garson, K.C., P.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Garson:

On April 9th last, I received your letter dated April 3rd, in reply to mine of March 11th, in connection with old age pensions and with the proposed amendment concerning an indirect provincial tax. Thank you for sending me the copies of the letters you mention and which my colleagues and I have read and considered with the greatest interest.

This morning, at the meeting of the council of ministers, we have again considered these important problems.

This afternoon, I received your letter dated April 16, together with copies of the letter dated April 10 which you received from Hon. Mr. McNair and of your reply of April 16. I am much obliged to you for this courtesy.

On several occasions, among others during the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa last December, and in my letter to you of March 11 last, we have clearly stated the attitude of the province of Quebec.

We are still in favour of an old age pensions system, which would be fair and appropriate and would apply from 65 years of age and over. We believe such a system should be established as soon as possible.

In our opinion, it would seem appropriate and even necessary to consider as two separate matters the problem concerning old age pensions and the problem concerning the new tax which is proposed. I am happy to hear, from your letter which I have received this afternoon, that the federal authorities are willing to dissociate these two problems and to consider them separately. I wish to thank the federal authorities for I am convinced that, in the circumstances, such a step is imperative.

We consider that the proposed indirect provincial sales tax does not meet the situation and would complicate rather than assist in the settlement of the important problem of old age pensions. Such a result should be avoided.

Serious doubts exist as to the timeliness of this new tax and we feel that clearness and precision are always desirable in constitutional matters.

We still favour the establishment of an old age pension for persons 65 years of age and over, and we are willing to accept a clear and precise constitutional amendment giving the federal government a power it does not possess presently, that is to make laws in this matter, without however infringing upon provincial rights.

The latest amendment suggested by you reads as follows:

"Old Age Pensions

95A It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

As I mentioned in my letter to you dated March 11 last, we would prefer that the age be mentioned in the amendment, but if this condition tends to delay the coming into force of old age pensions for persons aged 65 years and over, we will not press the point. However, we deem it necessary and fair to indicate fully that the new rights granted the federal government in this matter of old age pensions must in no way diminish provincial rights.

Consequently, to our mind, an essential amendment is called for. The words " . . . made by the provincial legislature of such province" refer to the past and the present but they take no account of the future. The wording should be: " . . . made or to be made by the provincial legislature of such province".

Furthermore, do you not think it would be fair and appropriate that the address voted by the federal parliament to be forwarded to the parliament at Westminster should be drafted both in French and in English to mark fully, once more, the bilingual character of our nation? This wish seems to us a legitimate one.

With kindest regards, I beg to remain,

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) M. L. Duplessis

Dear Mr. Garson:

(Sgd.) Byron I. Johnson
Premier

Attorney-General
PROVINCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Victoria, April 19, 1951

Honourable Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Garson:

The premier just handed me a copy of a letter from Premier McNair to yourself dated April 11, in regard to the proposed amendments to the B.N.A. Act, covering old age pensions and provincial sales tax.

We, of course, have passed resolutions in the legislative assembly favouring both these amendments and you no doubt will be advised in due course by the provincial secretary as to the contents of the resolutions.

We dealt with the two matters separately and while there was no opposition to the resolution regarding old age pensions, there was some opposition to the proposal involving indirect taxation power.

It seems to me that the two matters are in no way connected. The provinces need not resort to an indirect sales tax in order to secure funds to pay their share of the proposed pension payable to needy persons between 65 and 69 years of age.

I think there is little doubt of the legality of our tax on the consumer under our sales tax legislation. Certainly there is no doubt of such legality in relation to the tax in its impact on sales at the retail levels over the counter.

Our tax, of course, is wider and applies to heavy machinery purchased by industry, but it is clear on the authorities that a tax on the consumer such as we collect on gasoline and now under the social security and municipal aid tax is within the jurisdiction of a province. Therefore the provinces could, if they saw fit, and require further revenue to meet their share of the pension, introduce similar legislation.

I therefore agree that if there is any doubt whatever that the House of Commons or the Senate might refuse to approve the indirect tax, the two matters should be kept separate.

I do not, however, agree with the argument of Mr. McNair that the power to levy an indirect tax should be without the limitation that it was not to be more than 3 per cent. I would not think that the national government would be agreeable to grant such a power of taxation without limit because it seems obvious to me that a provincial government could, if so minded, upset the whole economy of Canada if there was an unlimited power of taxation in this respect.

Yours very truly,

NOVA SCOTIA
The Premier

Halifax, April 21, 1951

Hon. Stuart S. Garson, P.C., KC.,
Minister of Justice and Attorney
General of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

Thank you for your letter of the 3rd April with which you enclosed copies of replies received from the premiers of the provinces to your letter of the 28th February, last, with reference to the proposed amendments to the British North America Act respecting old age pensions and sales tax.

While I certainly have no desire to prolong unduly discussion of the forms which the amendments should take, I believe that the considerations which prompted the suggestions accompanying my letter to you of the 19th January last, are such as to merit some further consideration.

Old Age Pensions

You are correct in your conclusion that Nova Scotia is willing to accept either the second or third draft of the old age pensions amendment subject to the "but" clause. Having reference to your comments I would suggest that it is not competent to parliament to oust the jurisdiction of a province where that jurisdiction is granted by the British North America Act. Furthermore, I suggest that legislation passed at Ottawa has no supremacy by reason merely of the fact that it is federal legislation. Conflict normally arises between an exercise of federal powers under section 91 and an exercise of provincial powers under section 92 and in such cases, having in mind the express words of the initial and concluding paragraphs of section 91, federal legislation prevails. It does so, however, only because section 91 expressly provides that it shall. I think that section 95 provides the only instance in the British North America Act of concurrent powers and the express words of the concluding clause of that section were necessary to provide for the supremacy of federal legislation in case of repugnancy. Such supremacy might also be inferred from the use of such a phrase as "notwithstanding anything in this act" as used in the original draft of the amendment, or as used in section 101. In the absence of any such words I suggest that there would be no federal supremacy and for this reason we have suggested that the "but" clause be eliminated altogether.

If, notwithstanding what I have said, it is considered that concurrent powers are not assured without an additional clause, I still feel that because of the nature of our old age pensions legislation, both provincial and federal, "the operation" of provincial legislation is necessarily "affected" by changes in federal legislation. I say this because the legislation contemplates agreements between the dominion and a province the terms of which necessarily vary with changes in legislation. For this reason my suggestion was that the clause should be "but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall detract from the legislative competence of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions."

Nova Scotia is in complete agreement with the suggestion that this amendment should take the form of a new section 95A and that that section should be preceded by a heading "Old Age Pensions."

Nova Scotia is also in agreement with the suggestion that the words "from time to time" should either be deleted from the third draft or inserted at the appropriate point in the second draft.

With respect to the suggestions made by the premier of Quebec referred to in your letter as suggestions numbers 3 and 4, we think that it is perhaps unusual to frame a constitutional amendment in this way. We therefore feel that while we would not recommend the proposal, we would not on the other hand offer any opposition to it if the general view is favourable.

Appendix

Sales Tax

With respect to the indirect taxation amendment, Nova Scotia feels very strongly that the exemption of goods sold for shipment outside a province would offer wide scope for evasion. We do not feel that this exemption is necessary in order to confine the taxing power to taxation within a province, as that confinement follows from the normal territorial limits of the province's jurisdiction.

We feel that the use of the words "sale of goods" is likely to create considerable confusion and that, strictly construed, that phrase may limit unnecessarily provincial taxing power. We have no objection to the clauses aimed at the prevention of discrimination and we suggest that the form proposed by Nova Scotia, as set out in the comments accompanying my letter of the 19th January, last, would overcome the difficulties I have outlined and at the same time would confine provincial taxation power within reasonable limits.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) Angus L. Macdonald

The Government of the Province of New Brunswick

FREDERICTON

The Premier

April 24, 1951

Hon. Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 16 instant respecting the two constitutional amendments that have been under discussion.

I appreciate and welcome your assurance that the federal government does not regard the adoption of the old age pensions constitutional amendment as contingent in any way upon the adoption of the sales tax amendment; and that it is quite agreeable that these two proposed constitutional amendments should be made the subject of two separate and distinct joint addresses to be presented to the parliament of Canada.

It was understood at the federal-provincial conference of December last that the old age pension constitutional amendment would be sought at Westminster in ample time to permit the Canadian parliament at its 1951 session to enact the necessary legislation to implement the pension programme proposed by the federal government to the conference to the end that the new pension plans would be in operation by January 1, 1952.

It is hoped that there will be no further delay in obtaining agreement with the provinces on the language and substance of the pension amendment and that the appropriate joint address will shortly be presented to the two houses of parliament for approval.

I have carefully read your observations regarding the proposed sales tax amendment. With all respect I suggest that you have quite ignored the real points at issue.

You state that "at the conference the provincial governments asked for a constitutional amendment to enable them to occupy jointly with the dominion government a portion of the field of indirect taxation."

On a strained legalistic interpretation of the matter your statement might possibly be upheld. From a realistic and practical viewpoint it does not interpret the situation at all.

Appendix

Under their powers of direct taxation given by the B.N.A. Act the provinces can impose taxes on retail transactions involving a sale of goods. Every province in Canada is exercising that jurisdiction through a gasoline tax. Five provinces are exercising the jurisdiction through general taxes variously known as a purchaser's tax or consumer's tax.

Every retail transaction involving the sale of goods has two aspects to it. On one side it is a sale, on the other side a purchase. Because of the limitations imposed by the B.N.A. Act the provinces have to impose their tax in relation to the purchase side of the transaction, in short as a purchaser or consumer tax.

This has been thought to be a bothersome method of collecting such a levy. In consequence the dominion government was asked last December to agree to put the provinces in a position under the constitution whereby their taxation on retail transactions could be collected on the other aspect—the sales side of the transaction. Because this might give the tax the complexion of indirect taxation the amendment was proposed.

So when one analyses the situation it must, I submit, be evident that the provinces are asking from the dominion government nothing more than a courtesy.

In your letter you stated that the federal government has asked for no quid pro quo or compensation of any kind for agreeing to the proposed amendment. Why should it ask or think of asking to be paid for something that amounts to nothing more than a gesture of co-operation and goodwill?

I regret exceedingly the stand that has been taken by the dominion government. These are days when federal-provincial co-operation should be held precious. I doubt however if it can be made to operate effectively over a one way street.

As stated before we will consent to any tax amendment of the nature proposed that the other provinces agree to even although it is quite devoid of interest for us.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) John B. McNair

SASKATCHEWAN

Premier's Office

Regina, April 25, 1951

Hon. Stuart Garson, K.C., M.P., Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Garson:

My colleagues and I have given careful consideration to the latest redraft of the sales tax amendment as set out on page 4 of your letter of April 3, 1951, as follows:

"2A. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the provinces, and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods."

It would appear that the word "provinces" in the tenth line of the redrafted amendment should read "province."

The government of Saskatchewan is prepared to accept the proposed amendment, framed as 2A of section 92 of the British North America Act, as satisfactory.

Our observations on comments that have been made by other provincial governments, as well as yourself, as set out below, are offered as our contribution to the solution of some of the differences which apparently prevent agreement by some provinces.

We are of the opinion that the sales tax amendment, as detailed above, will permit this province to replace its present three per cent direct sales tax with an indirect tax which will provide similar revenue. It can be appreciated, however, that it might not be desirable to limit this indirect tax since it might become necessary in the future, as it is at the present time in the province of New Brunswick, to raise revenue by the imposition of a sales tax at a rate exceeding three per cent. Rising costs of government at the provincial level may compel provinces to seek additional revenue through increasing the indirect sales tax rate in much the same manner as the government of Canada chose to do recently to obtain additional indirect sales tax revenue by increasing the federal sales tax. Under such circumstances, increasing the indirect sales tax rate would be preferable and would avoid undesirable tax duplication by the imposition of a direct sales tax as well as an indirect tax.

We concur in the general principle that the power to levy indirect sales taxes by provincial governments ought to be confined to taxation within the province. Hence, we are prepared to accept the phrase "except goods sold for shipment outside the province" as part of the proposed amendment.

It is suggested, however, that this restriction on the power of the provinces to levy an indirect tax on goods sold for shipment outside the province could be improved by inserting the words "by the seller" immediately after the word "shipment" in the exception appearing in parentheses. Such a change would eliminate any argument which might arise by making it clear that the shipment of goods, to be excluded from the tax, must be by the seller in order to come within the exclusion, as otherwise the buyer might contend that he is making a purchase for shipment outside the province, and it would be difficult to check such statements of intention.

With reference to the principle contained in the exemption, it is clear that there would result a discrimination in favour of businesses such as mail order concerns, which ship goods sold at retail to customers outside the province since such goods would be wholly exempt from taxation by any province.

We recognize, therefore, that there is some advantage in having the exemptions on goods sold for shipment outside the province in the discretion of the provincial legislatures, as advocated by the government of Nova Scotia. On the other hand, it might be desirable to permit the province to levy an indirect tax on mail order businesses located in another province which sell goods at retail to persons normally resident in the province. This could be accomplished by the addition of either one of the following provisos to the redraft of the proposed amendment:

"Provided that a tax may be levied on a person outside the province with respect to a sale of goods to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use within the province, and such tax may be recovered as a debt in the courts of the province where the vendor ordinarily resides."

or

"Provided that the tax may be levied on a person outside the province with respect to a sale to a person ordinarily resident within the province for consumption or use within the province or for shipment to such person within the province and such tax may be recovered as a debt in the courts of the province where such person is ordinarily resident."

It is suggested that such a proviso would meet the problem raised by the government of the province of Nova Scotia.

Summary:

(1) The government of Saskatchewan is prepared to accept the redrafted sales tax amendment as set out on page 4 of your letter of April 3, 1951.

(2) The framing of the amendment as 2A under section 92 of the British North America Act meets with our approval.

(3) The government of Saskatchewan is of the opinion that a sales tax limited to a rate not exceeding three per cent would be satisfactory for a tax that might replace the present Saskatchewan education and hospitalization tax, but we would be prepared to agree to an increase in or the elimination of the limit in the amendment.

(4) The addition of the words "by the seller" after the word "shipment" in the exception appearing in parentheses is suggested as an improvement to the amendment.

(5) The addition of a proviso as set out above providing for taxation of persons outside the province is suggested as a technique which might resolve some of the difficulties that have prevented some provinces from accepting your proposals.

The government of Saskatchewan has always viewed the proposed sales tax amendment as quite separate and distinct from the proposed amendment respecting old age pensions. We would urge that these amendments should be treated individually and that they should be made the subject of separate joint addresses of the Senate and House of Commons to His Majesty requesting respectively that these two constitutional amendments be passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom. We would also urge that any difference of opinion that might delay general agreement on the proposed sales tax amendment should neither interfere with the amendment to the British North America Act respecting old age pensions nor prevent the implementation of the old age pension program beginning January 1, 1952.

Yours sincerely,

PROVINCE OF MANITOBA
Office of the Premier

April 26, 1951

The Honourable Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

This will acknowledge your letter of April 3 in connection with the two proposed constitutional amendments respecting old age pensions and retail sales taxes.

Your letter discusses at some length the comments made by the different provinces upon the various drafts which have been submitted, but for purposes of this letter it does not seem necessary to comment upon each of the points you have raised.

In my letter to you dated April 7 I forwarded to you a copy of the two resolutions passed by the Manitoba legislature in connection with the proposed constitutional amendments. By these resolutions the legislature approved the principle of the two amendments and authorized a member of the Manitoba government to negotiate with the federal government as to the most appropriate form.

In accordance with those resolutions, I hereby notify you that we are prepared to concur in the two proposed amendments as submitted in your letter of April 3. These are:

(1) The proposed amendment with respect to old age pensions as contained on page three of your letter which reads as follows,—

"95A. It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law in relation to old age pensions within any province made by the provincial legislature of such province."

(2) The proposed amendment with respect to a provincial sales tax, as suggested on pages 4 and 5 of your letter, which would add a new head under section 92 reading as follows,—

"2A. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the provinces and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods"

In our opinion these new wordings are consistent with those which we approved in the telegram sent to you by our attorney-general, the Honourable C. Rhodes Smith, on April 2. We are therefore prepared to concur in the wordings approved in our telegram or the wordings quoted above.

Yours very truly,

Dear Premier Macdonald:

This will confirm my telephone call to you tonight in which I stated that I had secured the approval of Premier Duplessis to the wording of the proposed amendment to the British North America Act to empower the parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada. The wording so approved is as follows:

"Old Age Pensions

94A. It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions."

Following my telephone interviews with the Honourable Mr. Duplessis I put in calls for the other provincial premiers and was able to reach all of them, culminating with the call that was put through to you late this evening after you had returned from your meeting. Each of the other provincial premiers has agreed that this wording is satisfactory to him and his government, with the exception of Premier Campbell of Manitoba who is not in Winnipeg but whose attorney general, the Honourable C. Rhodes Smith, agreed on behalf of the government of Manitoba.

If it is possible for you to concur with this wording I would appreciate very much your wiring me to this effect at your earliest convenience so that we may communicate with all of the provincial premiers confirming this arrangement and can then proceed with the preparation and presentation to the House of Commons of the necessary joint address.

Yours very truly,

2. What future activities are planned for this laboratory?

Mr. Martin:

1. The newly acquired mobile unit of the laboratory of hygiene is conducting a comprehensive bacteriological survey of sanitary conditions in the dairy industry and in restaurants in Prince Edward Island. This investigation is being conducted at the request of and in close co-operation with the provincial department of Health and welfare. The purpose of this investigation is to aid in the establishment by the provincial authorities of practical standards for the control of sanitation in dairies and restaurants.

2. A study of hospital sanitation in Prince Edward Island will follow the completion of the survey mentioned above.

From June to October the mobile laboratory will conduct bacteriological surveys in shellfish producing areas in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to determine which areas are safe for the taking of shellfish for human consumption.

Other sanitation studies are also being planned.

The mobile laboratory will be available throughout the entire year to assist provincial departments of health in the investigation of public health problems of immediate concern.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:
To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Whereas the Senate and Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows:

1. The British North America Act, 1867, is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section ninety-four thereof, the following heading and section:

"Old Age Pensions

94A. It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law, present or future, of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions."

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1951, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1951.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Geroge A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure every hon. member will welcome the announcement that there has been unanimous agreement on the form of the submission to Westminster. Ordinarily the subject matter of this motion would call for some discussion, even though there might be no difference of opinion as to the wording of the address itself. Knowing, however, that addresses of this kind are dealt with promptly in London, and particularly as in this instance, where there is complete agreement between the federal government and all the provincial governments, and recognizing that there are certain reasons why this address should be available for consideration in London as soon as possible, I think it would be appropriate to defer any discussion of the subject matter of the address until a later occasion. I propose to follow that procedure.

In view of the confidence we have that this matter will be dealt with shortly, I trust that appropriate legislation to carry this matter forward in the house will be prepared at the earliest possible date. I recognize there might be a question of procedure as to the appearance of the legislation on the order paper before the British North America Act has in fact been amended, but it might facilitate consideration of the legislation if it could be prepared and distributed, so that hon. members would be able to proceed with it expeditiously when it does come before the house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing I wish to add at this time, except to say that we are pleased indeed to co-operate with the government in getting this address across to the United Kingdom as rapidly as possible, in the hope that the legislation will be introduced and proceeded with at this session.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish merely to express gratification, I think I can say on behalf of all members, that this matter is being dealt with so expeditiously, in the hope that in order to implement the powers being sought, legislation can be brought before the house during the present session of parliament.

In that connection, and while I am on my feet, perhaps I might announce that at the end of the dominion-provincial conference it was stated, in summarizing the agreements that had been reached, that a continuing committee should be set up to consider the kind of legislation which would be appropriate respecting persons between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine, and to what groups thereof and under what conditions it should be made applicable in each province; and that the continuing committee should be under the chairmanship of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and should be brought together as soon as provincial agreements had been reached on the constitutional amendment.

[Mr. Drew.]

The Minister of National Health and Welfare proposes to send out, today or tomorrow, invitations to representatives of the provincial governments to meet here on May 21 to consider what legislation would be appropriate as enabling legislation to deal with the group of people between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine years.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That votes No. 84 to No. 111 inclusive, and vote 566, of the main estimates 1951-52, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in view of a report which I heard over the radio, and which may have been carried also in the press, to the effect that it is the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs not to speak at this time but to defer any statement until other remarks had been made, I should like to say that I hope that that is not correct, and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will introduce this discussion by a statement, in keeping with the understanding that this was to be in the nature of a debate on external affairs.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to speak in this discussion, although not—I do not know how this got into the press and the radio reports—to initiate the debate by a general statement on behalf of the government. It is true that I made such a statement last year on a resolution of this kind, but I thought it would be better on this occasion if I postponed my statement until later in the discussion. For one thing that would give more hon. members an opportunity to speak, because in the normal course of events I would be winding up the debate. I think I might make my general statement at that time and deal also with questions which might arise in the course of the discussion.

I was confirmed in this opinion by recalling that I made a general statement on international affairs to the house last February. In that statement, which was an exhaustive one, I gave the policy of the government in respect to matters which were brought up by it. There have been developments in international relations since February, but nothing has happened which has altered the policy of the government in respect to those matters.

I thought, therefore, it would probably meet the convenience of the house if I reserved my statement until later in the discussion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I suggest that it would be appropriate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should open the debate, for a number of reasons. It has been indicated for some days that there would be a debate today on external affairs, and a debate tomorrow on national defence. That seemed a particularly appropriate association of departments, because those two departments are closely associated in all that they do.

I do not wish to interject any unduly controversial remarks at this point, but a number of statements have been made outside this house which suggest reasons why the house should be informed of the policy of the Department of External Affairs, and of this government in external affairs, before we proceed with the debate. At the time the minister of external affairs made his earlier statement in the house he gave no indication that there had been a profound change in our relationship with the United States. I for one cannot regard that as a matter to be treated lightly. The minister of external affairs has seen fit to convey the impression that our ordinary easy and automatic relationships with the United States are not continuing on that basis. No matter what one may think of that statement, it is a most important one and has been so regarded by the press of this country and of the United States as well. Before the house is called upon to discuss external affairs I think the members should be informed as to the way in which there has been a profound change in our dealings with our most important neighbour, a nation that today is the most powerful partner in the task of preserving our freedom and our very civilization.

I cannot think of any subject that is more important, and before any other hon. member is called upon to discuss external affairs the minister should explain fully what he meant when he made that statement outside the house.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I think when the Secretary of State for External Affairs is referring his estimates to a committee of this house he should make a statement to open the debate. Incidentally that was the understanding that I had of the course of this debate—that the minister would first make a statement. If he does not make such a statement now, he will close the debate when he speaks, and if he makes some pronouncements then which the house might wish to discuss, the house will be precluded from discussing them. In view of the general international situation I urge upon the minister that he make his statement now and give a lead to the discussion.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while I have no strong views on this matter one way or the other, if it seems to be the wish of the house that I make a statement now I shall be glad to do so. Then when I close the debate I may be able to deal with questions which have been brought up. That will mean that the house will have to listen to me twice.

Before beginning my statement, I should like to say a word or two about the point which has been raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that in some form and in some way, by a statement made outside this house, I have declared a new policy in regard to our relations with the United States. That does not seem to me to be accurate. If the leader of the opposition will do me the honour of reading the statements that I have made in the house and indeed outside the house, in recent years, I think he will come to the conclusion, as I have, that what I said in Toronto did not in any way, shape or form initiate any new policy in regard to our relations with our great neighbour to the south.

I am not going to go over the whole ground that I tried to go over last February. In my statement this afternoon I shall not touch on many important developments in regard to international affairs. These may arise in the course of the debate, and if so, I shall do my best to deal with them when I wind up the discussion. There are two or three important matters, however, of a somewhat general character, upon which I wish to touch at this time. They affect more particularly our relations with the United States and our relations with other countries in the United Nations in respect of Far Eastern developments which weigh so heavily on our minds today.

One of the cardinal facts in the world today is the emergence of the United States to a position of unquestioned leadership in the free world. A great shift of power and influence has occurred within the last few years, with the result that the United States now stands pre-eminent. By any test it is not only the most powerful of the free states of the world; it is immensely the most powerful. We in Canada know the United States so well that we can view this great and historic development without apprehension, and feel indeed relief and satisfaction that power is in the hands of a nation which has such a deeply rooted democratic tradition, whose people have no desire to dominate other countries, and which has shown its good will towards less fortunate peoples on so many occasions by acts of magnanimity and generosity.

This feeling, I think, is increased by a consideration of what our position would be today if the United States had not decided to assume the responsibilities throughout the world which its new position has thrust upon it. We have good reason to believe that it will discharge those responsibilities with conscience, courage, and respect for the interests of others. The predominance of the United States, however, is bound to raise new problems for all those countries which share its values, and which are associated with it, and proud to be associated with it, in the defence of freedom. These new problems must be understood and must be solved if friction is to be kept to a minimum and the forces of freedom are to be strong and united.

In considering, for instance, Canada's relations with the United States it is not enough to take refuge in thought or in words, as I see it, in the usual clichés of 135 years of peace or the unguarded boundary. Certainly in my view any spokesman for the Canadian government or the Canadian people on external affairs has a duty to go deeper than this in the examination of this important question. Such an examination can also lead to a clarification of issues only if it is made within the wider framework of the position of the United States as the leader of our free alliance against the dangers which threaten us. The maintenance, let alone the strengthening, of an alliance of free nations is never easy, and requires tolerance, patience and great understanding. It is not easy in war; it is not easy in times of normal peace. It is especially difficult, I think, in a period such as the present of part war and part peace, with all its frustrations, tensions and anxieties.

Therefore I am sure we all agree that this imposes on the peoples of all free states a special obligation to face the problems of their mutual relationships with candour and frankness, but also with a firm resolve to understand each other's points of view. It seems to me that the unity of the free world would be in real jeopardy if there were no free discussion of our common objectives and of the possibly different means by which they can best be reached. Much of that discussion will and should be carried on confidentially between governments, but the people have a right to be kept informed of the problems involved and the principles of action which the government may think to be necessary for their solution. Therefore honest discussion of the issues before us, so long as it is conducted in cool and reasonable terms, will not weaken the free world. I am convinced on the contrary that it is an indispensable part of the process of developing our united strength, although of course in this kind of discussion one always runs the risk of misinterpretation and the placing of a wrong emphasis on what may have been said.

In all these relations between the governments in our alliance of free countries, no single government can of course surrender its judgment into the keeping of any other government, however close and friendly that government may be. It may at times, however —and I have said this before, although it is sometimes forgotten—have to yield to the collective judgment of the group reached after discussion and consultation. That is the only way that democracy can be carried on within our own country. It is the only way that democracy can be carried on internationally. The decision when to hold out and when to yield is often a terribly difficult one to make. Yet it is on that decision that the unity and close co-operation among members of our alliance will so often depend; and on that so much else depends. Oversensitiveness and obstinacy, on the one hand, over the maintenance of national rights and national sovereignty, and arrogance or carelessness, on the other, in overriding them, might in either case produce serious and even dangerous division among the countries of the world.

That division, which would lead possibly to disunity and even disruption, gives the foe that threatens us his greatest comfort and his greatest opportunity. Particularly during these times—I am sure we all agree with this—must the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada maintain and strengthen their special ties of friendship within the larger group. It would be folly to think that any one of us can go it alone. It would also be a fatal error, made previously by two dictators, for any potential enemy to think that we intend to take that course, folly also for him to draw wrong conclusions from that mistaken interpretation of our democratic differences of opinion. On the big issues we stand together within our countries as well as between our countries, even though we may sometimes seem verbally separated. It is, I think, as much the responsibility of public and press opinion as of governments to keep these differing voices from resulting in different policies. Policy for the free world must be forged not on a shifting basis of emotion but on the hard anvil of facts. Only in that way can it be well-tempered and strong.

One of the most important of these facts is that of persistent Soviet communist hostility. Another is, as I have said, the new position of power and responsibility of the United States as the leader of the free world. This latter fact, as I see it, means that our own relations with the United States have entered upon a new phase within the last few years. It does not mean that they should not be or cannot be as close and friendly as they have been in the past. Canadians, with very few exceptions, indeed—and those exceptions mostly of the communist persuasion—all hope this will be the case and want to do what they can to make it possible and even easy. Certainly that is the policy of this government, as it has been throughout the years.

Well, what is the nature of this change I have been talking about, and not only inside the house? Hitherto questions which from time to time we have had to discuss and decide with the United States were largely bilateral matters between neighbours. They arose from such things as border disputes, differences over the diversion of water and so on, or had to do with commerce back and forth across the boundary. Of course they were often complicated and difficult enough. Now, however, we are not only neighbours but allies. I think perhaps that is the simplest way to indicate the change that has come over the nature of our relations with the United States. We have always been good neighbours, accustomed to settling our differences in a neighbourly spirit. Now we are good allies, and as allies we must do our best to settle, in our customary friendly way, such differences as may exist between us from time to time. But the questions we shall have to discuss in this way will often be of a new character arising from our senior and junior partnership in a common association. They will often deal with the policies to be followed by that association in the North Atlantic pact or within the United Nations, very often indeed within the United Nations.

It is perhaps not unnatural that many people in Canada and the United States have not yet realized this change. It has come about rather suddenly, and I doubt if in either country we have yet completely adjusted ourselves to it. On Tuesday of last week, I believe, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave an illustration of one of the new categories of subjects under discussion between Canada and the United States when he announced in this house the recommendations of the permanent joint board on defence, which had been accepted by both governments, for the revision of the lease under which the United States holds certain bases in Newfoundland. The discussions on this subject between Canada and the United States were carried on in a friendly and co-operative spirit, as is our habit, and they have resulted in a compromise which I think will commend itself to the house as reasonable in the circumstances. The problem itself arises out of the defence requirements of the United States on Canadian soil, requirements not merely for its own security but for the security of the free world. It also arises, however, out of the necessity of the United States meeting these legitimate requirements in a way which recognizes Canadian jurisdiction and, even more important, Canadian self-respect.

In an age of atomic weapons and long-range bombers Canada is obviously now of far greater importance to the defence of North America and the north Atlantic area than ever before. For that reason, and because we are now joined as allies in the North Atlantic treaty, inevitably from time to time there will be other defence questions of very great importance to both countries which must be discussed. I have no doubt that we shall be able to find satisfactory solutions to those questions as well, but it will be easier to find them if we in Canada continue to remember the very heavy responsibility the United States has shouldered for the common defence, and if the United States continue to appreciate that the alliance in which we are joined with them will not be as strong as it should be unless the various defence arrangements which may be necessary on our soil are worked out in such a way that they will commend themselves wholeheartedly to Canadian public opinion.

Another—and I suppose at the moment the most pressing—problem we face with the United States, because it is indeed a phase of United States-Canadian relations though it is also of far wider and deeper significance, involving as it does the whole question of global war or global peace, is the policy to be adopted at the present time in Korea. For the time being I think the role of diplomacy in Korea is secondary, because the scene there is now dominated by the heavy fighting which has been going on for the past few weeks. The first wave of the new Chinese attack has been checked and broken by United Nations forces, but the attack is not yet spent—far from it. This is probably just a lull before another storm. So it seems to me that for some time to come, while this heavy fighting is going on, the task of upholding the purpose and will of the United Nations in Korea must rest upon the fighting men who have withstood so courageously the attacks made upon them by much more numerous enemy forces. One Canadian battalion, as we know, has had an important part in the recent fighting. Additional Canadian troops have now arrived in Korea, and before many more days have passed a full Canadian brigade group will be in action. These men, along with those of the other United Nations forces, and particularly the forces of the United States, will have more effect upon the course of events in Korea over the next few weeks than any diplomatic moves; and I know the thoughts of every one of us will be with them, and perhaps especially with those of our own men who are going into action for the first time.

In those circumstances perhaps it would not be appropriate for me to say too much about the actual situation in Korea, but there are a few things I should like to say. The present Chinese attack must be broken before we can again begin to entertain any hope of a peaceful and honourable settlement there. When it has been broken, as we hope it will be, and with heavy losses to the enemy, the Chinese communists may be in a mood to negotiate an honourable settlement—the only kind of settlement we have ever contemplated—or at least to desist from further attacks. While I think it would be quite unrealistic to hold out hope of an early settlement in Korea, or even of an early end to the fighting, nevertheless we should always remember that the United Nations stands ready to negotiate, though not to betray its trust or yield to blackmail. The statement of principles adopted by the general assembly by an overwhelming majority on January 13 last, which would provide for a cease-fire to be followed by a Korean settlement and by the negotiation of a wide range of Far Eastern problems, still represents the considered opinion of the United Nations. If the Chinese government and the North Korean government wish to take advantage of the offer contained in that statement, it is open to them to do so. Of their willingness to do so, however, there is no sign whatever. The approaches made to Peking by the good offices committee established by the United Nations assembly have all been rebuffed. The North Korean government, in a broadcast message as late as April 18, has repeated its determination to drive the United Nations forces from the peninsula. We can only hope that the heavy losses which the aggressors are now suffering and will suffer in Korea may produce a more accommodating frame of mind.

In the meantime, the United Nations forces are heroically and skilfully fulfilling the task which has been given to them, which is the defeat of armed aggression in Korea. This is—and it should not be forgotten—the sole military objective of the forces of the United Nations in Korea, the defeat of aggression so that a free, democratic and united Korea can be established. It is also worthy of note, I believe, that, as Mr. Warren Austin, the United States delegate to the security council, said on May 1—I quote from his statement:

> The United Nations has not declared, nor has it ever been asked to declare, that the political objectives—

That is, a democratic, free and unified Korea.

> —must be achieved by military means. In fact, the emphasis has been quite the contrary.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is not an aim or objective of the United Nations in its Korean policy to interfere in the internal affairs of any Asian country, to replace one regime by another. Its aim, as I said, is to defeat aggression and so prevent other acts of aggression by proving that aggression does not pay. To some that may seem to be too limited an objective. On this point the well known columnist Mr. Walter Lippmann had this to say the other day—and I quote from his article:

> Only a limited objective can be obtained by a war which is limited. The question now is whether the country—

He was referring to his own country, the United States.

> —will agree with reasonable unity that our military objective in Korea is the limited one of repelling aggression south of the 38th parallel and restoring the South Korean republic. We can, and we should, still hold it as a political and diplomatic objective that Korea should eventually be united by democratic means. But we cannot unify Korea by a war confined to the Korean peninsula, and we shall get nowhere in this controversy until we make the choice of limited objectives out of a limited war or unlimited objectives out of an unlimited war.

It is also sometimes loosely said that the United Nations forces are fighting in Korea to defeat communism. There is perhaps some colour for this mistake, since the aggression perpetrated is by communist states, and has its roots in the totalitarian communist nature of those states. Free men everywhere must be determined to resist communism. But it is a confusion, I think, of categories to think that communism as a doctrine or form of government must be fought by armed forces, or that such is the purpose of the United Nations military action in Korea. When communism, or indeed fascism, results in acts of military aggression, that aggression should be met by any form of collective action, including military collective action, which can be made effective. But the purpose of such action is to defeat aggression. Communism itself, as a reactionary and debasing doctrine, must be fought on other planes and in different ways; by the use of economic, social, political and moral weapons. As Sir Norman Angell put it in a letter to the New York Times the other day:

> The vital distinctions in this matter are not difficult or very obscure. We can overcome, and still better, deter, military aggression with military force . . . But if we use military power to dictate or to appear to dictate to other nations, Asiatic or European, what social or political or economic system they may adopt for themselves, we shall awaken a nationalism which in the end will defeat us.

Since the United Nations objective in Korea, then, is to defeat aggression, it follows, I think, that the methods used should be designed to limit and localize the conflict and not to spread it. As long ago as August 31, 1950, I said in this house that it was not the purpose of this government to support any course of policy which would extend the scope of the present conflict in Korea, a conflict which should be confined and localized if it is in our power to do that; also that United Nations policy should be to avoid giving anyone else an excuse for extending the conflict. Mr. Speaker, that is still our view.

One way by which the conflict could be spread would be by authorizing the United Nations commander in Korea to conduct aerial bombing of China. As I said on April 26 last in the house, it is possible to visualize a situation in which immediate retaliatory action without prior consultation might be unavoidable in pursuing enemy bombers back to, and in attempting to destroy, the Manchurian air bases from which they came. It is our view, however, that the bombing, as well as the blockading, of China should, if at all possible, be avoided, since such action would involve grave risk of extending the fighting without, as we see it, any corresponding assurance that such extension would end the war. The history, the position, the social and economic organization, and the political situation in China would not seem to give much hope for any such decisive result from such limited action. Indeed, it may be felt, on the contrary, that this limited action which has been suggested would inevitably develop into unlimited action against China, about the possible result of which the Japanese perhaps are best fitted to give testimony. One result we can, however, expect with some certainty, and that is great satisfaction in Moscow over such a development. It may be that the Chinese communists, by indulging in massive air activity over Korea, will make some kind of retaliation necessary. They have, however, not yet taken such action, and in that sense have not yet conducted an all-out war against the United Nations forces in Korea. As General Bradley put it in an address in Chicago on April 17:

> Communist air intervention has not been a factor in the ground action to date. Neither has it been any serious threat to our air force.

If the Chinese communists change that situation, the responsibility for the consequence would rest entirely with them and not with the United Nations forces.

I am, of course, Mr. Speaker, aware that this policy of restraint in which all the governments who have forces in Korea concur to the best of my knowledge, may complicate the problems facing the United Nations commanders in Korea. These problems, however, in the opinion of many, would be immensely more complicated if the fighting were extended to China.

The question, I think, above all other questions at the moment, is, in short, whether aerial bombardment of points in China, together with a naval blockade and the removal of all restrictions from Chinese forces in Formosa, would be sufficient to bring China's participation in the war in Korea to an end without bringing about intervention by the forces of the Soviet union. It was felt by many last November that if United Nations forces advanced to the very borders of Manchuria and cleared north Korea of the enemy, the war would then end; that there would be little risk of communist China intervening, or, that, if it did, the intervention could be contained and defeated. As we know, and as I said last February in the house, it did not work out that way, for one reason or another. In the light of that experience, we should, I think, before we take any new decisions which will extend the war, be reasonably sure that this extension will have compensating military and political advantages. Let us not forget we would be playing for the highest stakes in history.

Another way in which the conflict could be extended, in the hope that it would be ended sooner, would be by facilitating and assisting the return to the mainland of China of the forces at present in Formosa under the command of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. We should remember, of course, that these forces, or forces under the same command, have been driven from China by their own countrymen. The question to be answered, therefore, is this: Is there any reason to believe that these Chinese nationalist forces now in Formosa would have greater success in China than they had previously, unless they were supported by troops and equipment from other countries which could ill be spared for such a hazardous venture, with all its possible long-drawn-out consequences?

The desire to localize the conflict and prevent it from spreading remains, then, our policy, though we must recognize that while it takes only one to start a fight, it takes two to limit, as well as two to settle, a fight.

May I now say just a word in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, about our views—I have been asked about this in previous statements in the house—on the situation in Formosa. I believe that this island should be neutralized while fighting is going on in Korea. I have expressed that view previously. Certainly the United States of America cannot be expected to permit the Peking government to take over Formosa while that government is defying, and fighting against, the United Nations. It does not follow, however, that if and when the Korean conflict can be ended satisfactorily, we should refuse to discuss the future of Formosa within the context of international agreements that have already been reached concerning it, and indeed within the context of the United Nations charter. Any other course would, I think, result in implacable hostility between the United Nations and whatever government was in control of China at the time the war ended.

Until that war ends, however, and China abandons her attack against the United Nations in Korea, there can be, I think, no question of even discussing whether Formosa should be handed over to the Peking regime; at least that is our view. The same, I think, applies to recognition of that regime in Peking. There can be no question even of considering it while the Chinese defy the United Nations in Korea and fight against our forces there.

Nor do we think it realistic or right, while communist China is fighting in Korea, to include the Peking government in the current discussions of a Japanese peace treaty. In this regard, as in the case of the disposition of Formosa, the decision as to who shall talk and sign for China might well, I think—and even any discussion of this matter—be postponed until the Korean war is ended.

[Mr. Pearson.]

These are two questions which I know are uppermost in our minds these days. What is going on in the Far East? What is the policy of the alliance which has been built up, and which is getting stronger every day, to meet the dangers ahead, and within that alliance what is the relationship of a junior partner like Canada to its neighbour and its very senior partner in this association, the United States of America? It is not easy these days to be too optimistic about the course of events; but time is going on, and while time is going on we are getting stronger. In that sense, but only in that sense, time may be said to be on our side if we take advantage of it. If we do take advantage of it, and if we grow stronger militarily, economically and in every other way, then I think, as I have said before, that we have no reason to regard the future with panic or despair. But the remedy, Mr. Speaker, rests with us.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to refer the estimates of his department to the standing committee, I desire first of all to make reference to the work of the committee itself. In some respects the standing committee on external affairs stands alone so far as house committees are concerned. It was formed in 1945 and has functioned, we think successfully, ever since. In that committee the estimates of the Department of External Affairs have been considered session by session, and in a cool and dispassionate way the work of the committee has proceeded from time to time.

Few committees have found hon. members more satisfied with their work and the way in which it is carried on. In saying that I want to pay a special tribute to the hon. member who since the inception of that committee has been its chairman. I refer to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), who has our confidence, and who has done a magnificent job in that capacity. Because of his temperament, his ability and his capacity, to say nothing of the industry that he has displayed in connection with the work of the committee, he is eminently suited for the post.

Particularly in view of the increasing complexity of international affairs, I am sure hon. members appreciate the fact that the work of the Department of National Defence is inextricably linked with that of external affairs. Time after time hon. members on this side of the house have made the urgent plea that the estimates and the activities of the Department of National Defence be subjected to the same kind of comprehensive review as is directed toward those of the Department of External Affairs. While I have not made the plea before, although it has been offered by other members of this group and, I suggest, more effectively and more eloquently than I shall be able to do it, I now express the hope that, having in mind the success of the committee dealing with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, the government will now see fit to take the further and the obvious step of setting up a special committee to study the estimates and operations of the Department of National Defence. This, I suggest, is a department the activities of which are akin to and closely tied up with those of the Department of External Affairs. When the committee begins its deliberations, and proceeds to deal with the estimates at hand, I shall have some suggestions to make.

I would hope that this year the committee would take the time to give careful consideration to the report of Canada in relationship to the United Nations because, for the last five or six years, not only has this country legislated in its domestic parliament here in Ottawa, but it has been legislating as well in what might be described as a world parliament. Too frequently hon. members in the house, and members of the public, are apt to take the deliberations in the United Nations too much for granted. In the committee on external affairs I should like to see made an intense study of the Canada-United Nations report for 1950. It contains the proceedings of United Nations sittings during the last year.

Further than that, I should like to see called to the committee those who were parliamentary representatives as well as departmental representatives, of whom there were quite a number. These representatives would be in a position to give a report on their stewardship rendered so effectively in New York. I should hope that in the committee we would have the opportunity to examine and to discuss in detail the work these members of parliament and civil servants did, in their efforts to put Canada's best foot forward at those important meetings.

We spend about $2,500,000 for representation on various conferences. Of this sum about $1,500,000 is allocated to expenditures in connection with the United Nations organization, assessment being made on a prescribed basis. These are facts the public ought to know. The budget in this respect ought to be scrutinized carefully, and a careful analysis made. As in connection with other estimates, hon. members have the right to know exactly what is being done in the various branches of United Nations activities.

May I add one personal comment. Last year at meetings of the United Nations we were privileged and honoured to have R. Gerald Riddell, who has since been called to his reward, as our permanent representative. His name has been mentioned before in debates in the house, but this is the first opportunity I have had to refer to him. Gerry Riddell's death was a great loss to the United Nations and to the parliament and people of Canada. I knew of no more industrious, competent or capable member in any delegation than was Gerry Riddell, and I know he was so regarded by representatives from every nation in the world. Canada always had a worthy advocate to speak on its behalf, and one who commanded the respect and confidence of the representatives of all countries with whom he came in contact.

Perhaps it would be of interest to add that I have another special reason for referring to Gerry Riddell because at the end of a line drawn for sixteen or seventeen miles straight through the county of Peel, which it is my honour to represent, one finds the paternal homestead of the late Gerry Riddell. Another three or four miles farther down that line we come to the maternal homestead of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). At the end of the line, still farther down, at the boundary between Halton and Peel, is the homestead of Mr. John Watkins, our chargé d'affaires in Moscow. In between and also in the same line, is the homestead of the member for Peel. I mention this because it may be of interest to others who are not as close to that county as we are.

In passing may I refer to two important figures with whom through the years many of us came in contact, in a greater or lesser degree. I mention first the Right Hon. Ernest Bevin, whom we met originally at the first general assembly meeting in London. The late Mr. Bevin was a dogged advocate for peace in his time, and so expressed himself at every meeting of the United Nations he attended. I have always felt that his unifying influence in politics in Britain during the war, and that same influence which was carried into the days of peace through his great work in the United Nations, is something for which the world is greatly indebted. It owed that debt to a great statesman and a champion of those things that are best in our public life.

I should like also to refer to another eminent world statesman who has passed to his reward only within the last few days, the late Senator Arthur Vandenberg. I remember so well witnessing at San Francisco the splendid work he did, and realizing the unifying influence he had in the policies and programs put forward by the United States government. In what is written about the late Senator Vandenberg there will be no more glorious page than that describing his valiant struggle to maintain a united voice among the different political groups in the great republic he represented.

These two men were powerful factors in world peace. As I listened to two world figures who spoke from the rostrum at Lake Success last fall within a few days of each other, I could not help thinking how democracy has enabled people from the lower levels of society to reach important positions of leadership because there on the rostrum were the representatives of two of the most powerful nations in the world. The first of these was a man who had begun his business career as a haberdasher's clerk in a small store in Independence, Missouri. Here was a man who, through democratic processes, had risen to a position where he could speak for perhaps the most important and powerful nation in the world.

Following him on the rostrum was a man who in his early days had been a hired man on a farm. He then became a bottle collector in Bristol, but through our democratic processes had risen to be the champion and spokesman for a great power. I was proud of President Truman and the Right Hon. Ernest Bevin. I thought that it all gave the lie to those who say that democracy gives privileges only to the few, to those who have power and influence, when in fact it gives opportunity for the little man to come to the top and speak for his country about world affairs at world gatherings. I liked that because I thought it was an indication and instance of just how our democracy works in contrast to some other countries about which so much has been said in their favour just along that line.

This afternoon I should like to make reference to our relations with other countries. I realize, and I think everyone who has some responsibility and who wants to look at these things in a responsible way, realizes that Canada's diplomatic position has become much more difficult, and perhaps much more trying, by virtue of the fact that we are always perhaps in a more favourable position when the United Kingdom and the United States are seeing eye to eye on every single subject that arises in international affairs.

But that has not always been so. I quite realize that that brings problems to the government of Canada and to the Department of External Affairs that perhaps are new and particularly peculiar and difficult in times like these. In addition to that, of course, our position in the commonwealth has I think become relatively more important as time has gone on. That, together with the world leadership which the United States has now shouldered, has made these problems increasingly important and vital to us.

I think one of the things that we Canadians ought to guard against in international matters is discussion of singularly delicate and explosive world problems when perhaps we should be dealing with them on some kind of more confidential and diplomatic basis. I think Canada above all else ought to take a careful, cool, common sense and calm approach especially in these times. Silence is golden, especially with some of the more acute and burning issues that sometimes arise. There should be an armistice on irresponsible and wild talk between the two major powers in the free world, in so far as certain discussions are concerned as well.

Moreover, I think we ought to consider that one of our problems seems to hinge upon the fact that we have not yet among the free powers developed to the point where we have the proper kind of clearing-house for political decisions that we ought to have. I know that these things are very difficult to work out and perhaps have to be done by trial and error, but I think when there are such major political decisions to be made today there ought to be a more effective clearing-house for these among the major powers of freedom. I have no doubt that some of these problems which have come up and which have failed to be cleared between the United Kingdom and the United States have been affected and sometimes aggravated, not because they are not desirous of coming together but because machinery has not been provided in an efficient fashion for them to do so.

On that point I should like to make reference to one thing in connection with our North Atlantic treaty organization and the clearance of our political problems and issues. I think a word ought to be said in this house for the very effective job which has been done by General Dwight Eisenhower in that field. I think he has the qualifications and I feel sure he has the confidence and respect of people generally. We have been most fortunate in having General Eisenhower at this time, not only because of his great military and strategic skill but because of his political understanding of the problems which led him to such a successful position of leadership during the last war.

During the speech I made in February in connection with external affairs I referred to our relations with other countries. I think

I should repeat one or two sentences which I said on that occasion and which are as follows:

> I have no doubt that some Canadians hold strong views as to how they think the Americans could improve their conduct in the field of world politics. Some Americans may not see eye to eye with the way Canadians handle themselves in their international relations as well. It seems to me, however, that any widespread surrender on either side of the border to enter the field of wholesale criticism of each other at the moment could only result in the fouling of our own nest and giving comfort to an enemy whose cleverness in laying false emphasis has become a feature of its enslaved propaganda.

I want to add just a few words to that on this occasion. I think Canadians and Americans ought to hold their horses when their patience wears thin and they are tempted to devalue the contribution of each other to the common cause of stopping Soviet imperialism in its tracks. In more tranquil days perhaps a few pointed lectures on both sides of the border designed to improve things on the opposite side of the 49th parallel might be useful, but at the moment both countries have their hands full elsewhere and will be well advised to close their ranks and arrange a cease-fire so far as our respective national shortcomings on this continent are concerned. These two great nations and neighbours need to apply their full time and energy toward the goal of compelling certain reluctant world rulers to keep the peace.

In my opinion, this is not the proper time to wash our continental linen in full view of those spying eyes who are ready to draw apart the iron curtain long enough to secure a choice morsel of anti-democratic gossip for distribution in places where it would harm our cause the most.

I should like also to further refer to our Canadian-United States relations and in particular to one other matter which has been mentioned in the house on a previous occasion recently. We in our part of Canada are particularly and keenly concerned in seeing the St. Lawrence deep waterway proceeded with with the least possible delay. I mention this because it affects our Canadian-United States relations. It is not the business of Canada to tell the United States congress what it ought to do about the St. Lawrence power and navigation project. The Canadian point of view, however, at this critical juncture of the development should be advanced in unmistakably clear terms in the hope that it may have an influence on the decisions which are under review at the moment in Washington. First, Canada wants the waterway commenced at once. Second, Canada wants it to be a joint undertaking and is prepared to enter into such a plan forthwith. Third, the hydroelectric power needs of Ontario have reached such an acute stage that, failing joint action, the project will have to be proceeded with by Canada alone or alternative means of generating power devised and commenced. Time counts. Fourth, the Canadian industrial program for defence is but in its infancy, and the full impact of the demand for power is only now beginning to be felt. Power shortages have no place in an effective defence plan. Fifth, as an active participating member of the North Atlantic treaty organization, Canada wants to leave no stone unturned to build up every factor in our defence in accordance with our undertakings.

That being accepted, the rich and strategic iron ore findings in Labrador and Quebec point up a feature of the St. Lawrence proposals which assumes giant proportions. Canadians feel that they have a good case for a joint development of the new seaway on the further ground that if these essentially strategic materials of war in their raw state are to be made available to processors in the United States, Canadian taxpayers should not be obliged to foot the entire bill for the creation of transportation facilities to get the ore from the mines to the mills across the line. On the basis of defence needs alone, Canadians regard the development as an urgent must.

The Canadian government has made no decision yet upon the practicability of building the seaway installations alone. If the United States congress turns down the proposals for international collaboration in the project and Canada proceeds on her own to complete it, I suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that he examine all existing treaties or agreements entered into prior to or since confederation, and which may still be enforceable, to ascertain whether or not the shipping of any other nation enjoys treaty privileges entitling it to free passage through the deepened St. Lawrence and the great lakes. I leave Canadian-American relations at that.

I want to mention a problem which I think is of interest to members of the house and to the public of Canada as well. We are spending on defence this year $1,600 million. It is a necessary expenditure. The Canadian people will be glad to make that expenditure because after all it is the only guarantee they have of peace and security. In the spending of that money we are of course naturally and very properly laying our emphasis, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said a few moments ago, on force, strength, might and power in these very difficult days. I think it will be understood and agreed, however, by most members in the house that force, strength, might and power alone are not the only weapons that this nation and free powers everywhere must consider in stopping imperialist communist aggression. I think that perhaps brings up this point, that this year we are spending on the other arm of our attack on communism, shall we say, $25 million on the Colombo plan for economic development in southeast Asia.

I realize, and I think the house will realize, that this is not the time to be making unnecessary contrasts between expenditures. Actually expenditures on military matters and defence generally are perhaps only in their infancy because the problem of preparedness still remains a very serious one for all of us on this continent. It is a serious one particularly when one reads the remarks made in the United States congress only last week by a senator who was a member of the United States delegation to the United Nations this year, and a man whose responsibility and competence are beyond question. Indicating the difficulties and the acute position in which this continent finds itself, I should like to refer to the startling words of Senator Lodge. In Time magazine for May 7, 1951, I find the following:

> Best estimates credit Russia with a tactical air force of 16,000 to 20,000 planes, said Lodge, of which about 9,000 are free for an attack in the west. To assure air superiority to the proposed North Atlantic army, Lodge calculated that the U.S. and its allies need 18,000 tactical aircraft ready for battle. How do those figures stack up against U.S. strength, present and planned? At the moment, the air force has little better than nine fighter bomber wings—some 675 aircraft—available for support of U.S. ground forces overseas . . . "That," said Senator Lodge, "gives you some idea of the jam we are in."

When I call upon the government to give serious consideration to increasing the other arm, I do not want it to be understood that it is to be done at the expense of the critical military position in which this continent finds itself today. I do want to point out, however, that we must not neglect our economic defences because such countries as our sister units of our own commonwealth, India and Pakistan, are directly in the pathway of imperial communism. They are fertile grounds for would-be world dominators. I think a word ought to be said for the Indian and Pakistani people who have gone as far as they have in attempting to be bulwarks of democracy in the Far East. True, on certain occasions we are unable to go along with them on some world issues, but nevertheless they are sisters in the commonwealth. They are in the midst of a giant revolution in Asia where a great melting pot exists, and today any widening of the breach between the east and the west would in my opinion not only be immediately fatal but would be fatal also in the very important days that lie ahead.

I have always felt that Canada and India are the two key nations in any close liaison between the Orient and the Occident. From the standpoint of our position in world affairs generally it seems to me that these two nations should do everything possible to maintain a close liaison, and in doing so to maintain a closer knit relationship between the east and the west. I admit that something has been done in connection with the Truman point four program of economic assistance to south and southeast Asia. I know there are plans on foot and on paper with respect to the Colombo commonwealth plan, but one thing that has always concerned me is that there has not been a close enough co-ordinated over-all plan for help from this part of the world for those underprivileged and underdeveloped countries.

As far back as last summer I suggested to the government and the Canadian people that we ought to have some kind of scheme, something in the nature of a Pacific economic pact, under which any assistance from this country would be properly co-ordinated and become much more effective than the hit-or-miss arrangements that have been put into effect from time to time. It seems to me that we in Canada have a grand chance to do something worth while not only from the point of view of the Canadian people but from the point of view of our sister dominions in the Orient, which in addition would show the world that we have a generosity and benevolence equal to that of any other country in the world. In setting up any such scheme, however, we must be careful not to put any of these people under the means test. I should like to see any policy we might adopt in this connection one which would integrate our economic progress with theirs in such a way that they might be brought up to the economic levels we enjoy in this part of the world.

Perhaps not every hon. member realizes just what conditions are in some of the lands to which I have been referring. In India, to take that one country as an example, according to research made by those in charge of the point four program, conditions are startling; and I think they should be made known to the Canadian people. I should like to quote just one paragraph from this report:

> For example, in underdeveloped, overpopulated countries such as India, China, and Egypt, where the average expectation of life at birth is in the neighbourhood of 30 years, only 54 out of every 100 children born ever reach the age of 15 and enter the ages of maximum economic productivity. Of those who reach young adulthood all but 15 die or are incapacitated long before completing the normal span of working life to the age of 60. In contrast, in the more highly developed areas 92 of every 100 children born reach the age of 15 and 70 live a productive life span to the age of 60. Reduction of the death rate in the underdeveloped areas will mean an increase in the human resources available for production in proportion to population.

At the same time improvements in health and physique will bring about greater capacity on the part of the individual worker. It is not surprising, for example, that the undernourished eastern peasant, afflicted with chronic malaria and host to a rich assortment of internal and external parasites, should commonly be a weak and lethargic worker.

The figures with respect to income are equally startling when compared with those of the western world. According to the last compilation of these figures the annual per capita income in the United States, covering men, women and children, was $554, while the figure for Canada for the same year was $389. The figure for India, however, was only $34. There is also the question of illiteracy. Back in 1930, which seem to be the last figures compiled for this purpose, 91 of every 100 people in India could not either read or write. That may give some idea of the problem facing the Orient which constitutes a challenge to all of us. Where we have something like 800,000 farms in Canada, there are 800,000 villages in India. It is interesting to note that four of every five people in the British commonwealth live in Asia.

I believe something ought to be done to speed up both the point four and Colombo plans, because there is nothing in which time is of greater importance. In my opinion aid to Asia is one of the most important of all the weapons we may use today to provide a bastion for democracy in that part of this power-drunk, war-torn world. But apart altogether from the point four program and the commonwealth Colombo plan for assistance to certain free nations for development purposes, the plight of the famine-stricken people of India and Pakistan calls for a supplementary short-range policy of immediate help. Starvation does not delay its paralysing work or wait for legislators to act. The western powers, including our own, must not be found asleep at the switch at a time when the train of golden opportunity is arriving. We should be doing something now to relieve the intense suffering of our sister commonwealth nations in Asia. It is in time of grief, need and acute distress that nations, as well as people, are most sensitive to the reaction of their friends. We should be demonstrating to those in the great subcontinent of India our practical generosity and our sympathetic understanding. Red China has done it. For the second time since the famine reached its most devastating stage she has made available food supplies when her own larders are relatively empty. Russia, too, has made a political gesture of help. Other countries have given of their substance as well, but southeast Asians know where the most abundant wealth and resources are to be found, and for that reason the challenge to this continent becomes the greater. I believe the Canadian people as a whole want to help India and Pakistan, and I am offering the suggestion that if the government is reluctant to give a lead as a government to an emergency program for relief in these stricken areas, they should at least open the door and give Canadian citizens the opportunity of making their own individual contributions of food, clothing, medical supplies and the like and provide for the collection, transportation and effective distribution of same to the Indian and Pakistani people. We should show these friends on the other side of the world that Canada cares.

In conclusion I should like to refer to one matter which has to do more particularly with the domestic field. The problems being faced by democratic nations in attempting to put on a wartime footing countries which are at peace cannot be overestimated. One of the things that concern many of us is the fact that there is an ebb and flow of interest and concern which flares up and then perhaps subsides into a period almost of complacency. That has happened before in this country; it may happen again. I feel it is the job of the government to give leadership. After all, the government has been given the job of leading the Canadian people, at the behest of the people as expressed at the polls some two years ago. I think it is important that the people be told in no uncertain terms exactly what is required of them, and just what our position is in connection with this struggle for peace. It should be indicated to the people across Canada in unmistakable language the patience, tenacity and perseverance that is going to be required in order to carry forward the great program of preparedness prior to the settlement of this impasse. They will want to know what is expected of them. They will want to know it in the terms that they understand. After all if we have, from time to time, the ebb and flow of concern and complacency, it will interfere with our preparedness program; it will interfere with whatever long pull there may be in connection with our preparedness plan. I see that this very important matter has been referred to by the Hon. Herbert Morrison, foreign secretary of Great Britain. While perhaps many of us would not be prepared to agree with him that there will probably be a fifteen or twenty-year long pull, there will at least be a pull of some length of time. I believe that we have to steel ourselves to the emergency which faces us in the future. I believe that can best be done if the government will give the leadership that really leads in a case where leadership is urgently required.

During that period while we are preparing for such eventualities as may come, we must remember that at home we have our responsibilities and our challenges. While we are fighting for democracy, we must always remember that the democracy for which we are fighting is worth applying in our ordinary life in Canada.

I close my remarks this afternoon by repeating a quotation which is credited to René Grousset, and which I think perhaps covers the point I have made with respect to our own position in Canada much more clearly than any words I could have used. This is what he says:

> In general, no civilization is destroyed from the outside unless it has already decayed from within; no empire is conquered from abroad, unless it has first destroyed itself. We are still the masters of our own destiny, and not mere spectators of our own downfall.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I first want to say that I think the house was very glad indeed that the minister of external affairs made a statement in opening this debate. The statement which he made, so far as I am concerned, to some extent has narrowed down the debate and made it unnecessary for me to say some of the things I intended to say. I quite agree with him that at this stage of our history it is essential that we shall maintain unity among democratic nations. No nation must dominate, and a decision once taken by the group must be supported by all the members of that group. I believe that is real democracy in action. Sometimes democratically adopted decisions do disturb minorities, but nonetheless under such grave circumstances minorities must fall in with the views of the majority unless the decisions do violence to their principles.

I quite agree with him, too, that aggression must be met by military force, but that communism, as we call it, cannot be met by force but must be met on the economic and social field. Many years ago someone said that if you would understand the external policies of a nation, you must first of all understand its domestic conditions and its internal policies. I think that has been brought home to thinking people in our own country and elsewhere in recent years more than ever before. Where there is dictatorship and oppression at home, there is constant provocation and unrest with the threat of war abroad. It is in this respect that the economic situation in some areas and the international situation which arises out of economic conditions is, in my view, to be emphasized in a debate of this description.

When the United Nations was set up at San Francisco, member nations dedicated themselves to the advancement of freedom, of economic standards of living, as a means of preventing international misunderstanding and future wars. Yet today, in countries which adhere to the charter, millions of wretched people are the victims of despotic rulers, while millions of others are imprisoned in concentration camps because of their refusal to accept complete domination of their minds and thoughts by powerful and intolerant dictatorships. Nor must we forget that in other countries, including Canada, with democratic political institutions and ways of life, freedom for some, and at times indeed for many, has too often meant freedom to live in misery, want and despair. It is against this background of arbitrary rulers, despotic dictatorships and incomplete democracy that I wish to consider the world situation in this discussion.

We believe that the struggle in which we are now engaged, and which incidentally may last for many years, is for the liberation of the human spirit as well as for the economic advancement of individuals everywhere. Yet the real freedom of body and mind depends to a very large extent on economic liberation. We in this house, of course, all adhere to the conception of political freedom and democracy. There is no difference between us in this respect. But if we are to achieve the liberty of mind and thought which must be a positive aim of democratic peoples, Canada itself must move forward steadily towards the achievement of more economic and industrial democracy to accompany the political freedom which we all cherish. Hitler attempted to destroy political freedom over a large part of Europe, and he was in turn destroyed. But a large part of the world today is controlled by dictators who have rejected political and religious freedom as a principle of human progress, and who preach that social justice and economic stability must be purchased by the acceptance of their control and their tyranny over both the minds and bodies of the population to whom they dictate.

Their success, in large part, has been due to the failure of democracy as we know it to meet the vital needs of mankind. They know that wherever there is starvation, want and despair, their propaganda will fall on fertile ground. In saying that, I am not either underestimating or decrying both the urgency and seriousness of the task of organizing the defence of the democracies in a military sense. What I am saying is that there is danger to the democratic world if nearly all our energies and resources are used up in building our military defences. This, of course, is one purpose of the Atlantic alliance. But one must realize that this alliance, based on co-operative effort in the military field, has been made difficult because the basic principle of the economic program is not co-operation but competition. Thus we see the efforts of the European nations to rebuild their economic and military strength made exceedingly difficult because of the competitive scramble for raw materials. That has been demonstrated by the resultant high prices and threats of serious stoppages in production in the United Kingdom and in western Europe, because of the lack of vital chemicals, scarce metals and other supplies. In the last war we found that competitive industry would not suffice. Now it seems that again we have to learn exactly the same lesson. Thus, among the members of the Atlantic alliance co-operation must replace cutthroat competition in those respects.

Neither can we afford to omit or restrain the equally important task of assisting in the improvement of the economic circumstances both of our own people and of the rest of the world, and we believe that means world-wide co-operative enterprise, too.

This party has I think endeavoured to emphasize this point of view both in parliament and across the country. We have supported, and we will support all the necessary undertakings and defence preparations essential to the protection of what we call the free world. We recognize of course that even among the so-called free nations there are varying degrees of freedom, and that it is not wholly free. Yet the limited freedoms which part of the free world enjoys are worth protecting, because they provide the foundations of the greater freedoms at which we all must aim.

Our external policy must take into account the fact that in parts of the world, and particularly in Asia, the rising tide of nationalism, of dire poverty of countless millions present us with both an opportunity and a threat. Because democracy has failed in the past to meet the desires and needs of such depressed peoples, totalitarian communist propaganda therefore has fallen on fertile ground. The success of the communist party in such areas indicates that they have seized on those desires, the desires of the distressed masses, both in Europe and in Asia. It is, for example, not without significance, I think, that in the early stages of communist revolution in Russia itself, in Poland, in Hungary and now in Asia, they have made use of the peasants' need for land as a principal means of securing the support of exploited landless peasants. Whatever their future aims may have been, they have invariably placed the peasantry in possession of the land, even if subsequently they substituted collective state farms, thus eliminating both individual and co-operative ownership of the soil.

I do not think that in our dealings with backward areas we have paid sufficient attention to such basic needs of exploited populations. Indeed, no less a person than Kagawa, the famous Japanese Christian and democratic leader, has said that the resistance of South Koreans against North Korean aggression would have been stronger if land reform had been instituted to a greater extent than it was in the republic of South Korea.

Because of our failures in similar respects in the past, Soviet communism has become an immediate menace to the world. What I am trying to say is that an essential part of democratic world strategy should be the placing of greater emphasis on economic and humanitarian policies. We cannot win the struggle against totalitarian communism by military means alone. Indeed ultimate victory will lie with those who can do most to end poverty, misery and want wherever they may be found. Recent publications dealing with the Colombo plan have emphasized the dark picture of conditions in southeast Asia. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) this afternoon placed before the house some of the conditions that exist in that great subcontinent of India. In southeast Asia one-quarter of the world's population lives. Eighty per cent of the nearly 600 million people are directly dependent on the land.

The basic problem is food. We are told that in an area six times the acreage tilled in the United States, India, for example, uses only one-sixtieth of the amount of fertilizer used in the area under cultivation in the United States. Yet the land is old and has been cultivated for centuries. Its production is pitifully low. The instruments used are primitive. Again we are told, for example, that the United States has nearly 2½ million tractors, while in India there are only 10,000. If I may quote from the Colombo report:

> There is the application of modern tools and techniques which enables the farm worker in the United States to produce so much more per acre than the peasant in Asia. Power and machines are the key to plenty on the land—factories to make fertilizer and instruments; machines to till the soil; drains to provide water for irrigation and to control the floods (and, incidentally, to provide electric power for the development of industry).

It is because in these countries, whose borders are not far removed from the borders of Soviet Russia, many of their people have seen technical assistance, machines, fertilizer and irrigation applied to some of the land in the Soviet union, that communism offers an enticement. Yet, with our technical knowledge, our industrial potential, we could assist the governments of southeast Asia to transform the economies of their countries in a comparatively short space of time and with a guarantee of ever-widening political as well as economic freedom. These are some of the considerations that we need to emphasize more clearly in our external relations and our defence of democracy.

I would like to see Canada give a very definite lead at the pending meetings of the economic and social council, and at the general assembly, for the immediate enlargement of technical assistance to the underdeveloped countries of the world. I am certain that public support would be forthcoming. This is a field at least where we should not wait for decisions in Washington. Indeed I believe that if we gave a lead now, public opinion in the United States would be encouraged to demand congressional support for the immediate advancement of technical and economic assistance to the underdeveloped and undernourished people of the world.

It would encourage the commonwealth nations, too, who are associated with Canada in the Colombo proposals, and indicate clearly that Canada believes communism cannot be defeated or contained by military means alone. Indeed in my opinion we should be placing emphasis where it really belongs, and Canada might in this respect at least give a lead both to our great and friendly neighbour and to the world generally.

So if I may refer again to conditions which make this a pressing problem: studies made by the United Nations have shown that the average food consumption in India, for example, works out at only sixteen hundred calories a day—or about half the amount which we consider to be necessary to enable a North American to do a day's work in comfort.

This situation has been aggravated by crop failure and by famine. It has been a disappointment to us that the government has failed to take any effective step to provide grain to relieve the famine conditions in India. The offer of low grade wheat, which was accompanied by a proviso that it should be sold and the financial return used for technical improvements and so on, apparently could not be accepted by India. It seems to us that if we lacked sufficient milling quality wheat to meet India's needs, and provide quantities for export, we might have spared some of our own good wheat and accepted a Canadian loaf made from flour with more shorts and bran, a loaf of darker colour but one probably with a higher nutritional value for the Canadian people.

If it is true that Russia as well as China has offered substantial quantities of wheat and rice to India, it means that both Russia and China have made gestures which may have very favourable results for them in the days to come. The daily Indiagram, as it is called, issued by the Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa last Friday, May 4, recorded the fact that the British government had used its good offices to obtain ships for the transportation of grain and rice which India has purchased in China. Thus China seized an opportunity which both Canada and the United States failed to grasp at once, but which obviously the United Kingdom saw and did her best to take, so far as she could do so, in the field of transportation.

However the failure of both the United States and Canada to give immediate aid when it was requested makes it more difficult for us to retain the friendship and support we require from this important Asiatic country. And what is true of India is equally true of southeast Asia generally where, at best, food supplies are normally, almost permanently, inadequate. We must not overlook the fact that while production of basic food such as rice in southeast Asia is rising, and has risen—and indeed reached pre-war levels—the population has increased by 10 per cent since the war. So that the pressure is intensified to that extent.

The significant fact of which we must take heed is that the demand for national independence has been accompanied by a determination to improve low living standards in these areas. This desire must be met if governments like that of Nehru, which share our western ideals and belief in democracy, are to be maintained. It is a question of survival for these regimes to provide the masses of their countries with food and improved conditions. If they fail, they may give way to revolutionary movements promoted and controlled by the Soviet union.

This in my opinion is the lesson Canada should learn, and the lesson the world should learn from recent events in China. There, of course, a corrupt regime was in power and therefore the task of the communist forces was much more easily and readily accomplished. Nevertheless a basic factor leading to their success was the deplorably low living standards of millions of Chinese peasants and workers. Poverty, low production, inflation, and corruption led there to the institution of a communist dictatorship.

There are now enlightened regimes in India, Pakistan, Ceylon, and other places in southeast Asia. Perhaps the survival of human freedom in these areas—yes, indeed, across the world—depends upon our ability now to assist immediately in the raising of the standards of production and of living among the teeming millions of southeast Asia and other parts of the world where similar conditions are to be found.

And so it is that we of the C.C.F. wish in this discussion of our external affairs to emphasize that the only real cure for misery and want over wide areas of the world is the provision of more food and the means of producing it; and to emphasize also that this is the only way in which ultimately—ultimately, I say—Soviet imperialism can be defeated.

Of course, all this we must do under very difficult circumstances. We must do it at the same time as we are building our defences against totalitarian aggression in the military sense. The task is, of course, enormous; but we must face it or we shall ultimately lose the ideological struggle.

Primarily of course the problem is one which only we in North America can undertake. The strains on the only other country from which great aid could come, namely the United Kingdom, have become almost unbearable. She has already made a tremendous contribution to improved conditions in Africa, Egypt, India, Pakistan and elsewhere, in large part by the release of what are known as the sterling balances. Her lack of raw materials and her heavy rearmament commitments limit her ability to continue the flow of machines and other aid she has been sending to southeast Asia.

Indeed, as I have already said, the competitive grab for vital raw materials, and world inflation induced by competitive bidding, have reduced her ability to render the assistance she might otherwise have given. North America, through the Marshall and mutual-aid plans, has been largely responsible for having rehabilitated and given hope to the war-torn countries of Europe. We know that the Colombo plan, too, cannot be fully effective without a substantial contribution from both the United States and Canada. But, if we have to, we ourselves must go ahead and do what we can as a commonwealth. As I said, Canada should take the lead if necessary, both as a member of the commonwealth and as a member of the United Nations.

So far it would seem that we have been inclined to place reliance upon the building up of our military forces, and this brings me to discuss perhaps more specifically Canada's own part in the solution of this great problem. I am not minimizing anything we have done in the past—because we have done a great deal in many respects—when I say that as a nation we have not done much more for southeast Asia than taken part in the United Nations and Colombo conferences, and made plans for some technical assistance to backward countries.

For United Nations' plans parliament has appropriated less than $1 million, and we are now making an appropriation of $25 million as a contribution to the Colombo plan. These appropriations have always been accompanied by statements recognizing the tremendous importance of south and southeast Asia to the democratic world, but at the same time emphasizing the limited nature of Canada's contribution because of our commitments under the north Atlantic defence proposals. Such statements were made several times before the Korean war, but we have been able since that time to find many more millions of dollars to expand our military and related expenditures.

This would seem to indicate that the government lacked both the vision and the courage a year ago to face the needs of depressed peoples as well as the will to combat communist propaganda among a quarter of the world's population, when we probably had a better opportunity so to do. Even a billion dollars spent in technical assistance and in the provision of food over the three ensuing years would have been only one-fifth of the money we appropriated for military expenditures and defence.

What I am saying is that our contribution to economic aid, to technical assistance and the Colombo plan should have borne some proportionate relationship in the past, and indeed now, to the amount we are now prepared to spend for the military defence of the democratic world. And in spite of our heavy commitments to the Atlantic alliance we believe we should be doing more in economic aid to depressed peoples than the government proposes at this time.

All this may seem idealistic to some people; but in my opinion it is the most practical method of preventing the onward march of Soviet imperialism—and that, after all, must be a main preoccupation of liberty-loving nations. The sooner we can assist underdeveloped areas to provide more adequately for their populations, the sooner shall we be relieved of the necessity of economic aid, and be relieved, too, of enormous expenditures for defence against potential aggressors.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the hon. member know what in fact we have done under the Colombo plan? I do not know.

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact the Colombo plan is still in a rather nebulous condition. Except for expressing a willingness to a limited participation under certain circumstances, as far as I know we have done no more up to the present time. Of course we sent a delegation to discuss the Colombo proposals.

As I have said already, we can play our part in the struggle against the substitution of a new and sinister communist imperialism for the old capitalist imperialism which is withering away if we follow economic policies in the aid of underdeveloped and depressed areas. In the past number of years we, of the C.C.F., have advocated social and economic policies which in early discussions across the country were called impractical and idealistic and even unnecessary. Today a large part of them constitute a major portion of our social security and welfare legislation, both nationally and provincially. As an example, earlier this very afternoon the house approved a motion which brings very near, we hope, an old age pension reform we have long proposed and which a few short years ago was criticized as both impractical and undesirable.

I believe that what I have said expresses the viewpoint of many thousands of serious-minded and thoughtful Canadians. Indeed such a policy conforms to the aims outlined in article 55 of the United Nations charter, which pledges Canada to respect the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples and pledges us to assist in promoting, and I quote from the charter:

> A. Higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;
> B. Solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems; and international cultural and educational co-operation; and
> C. Universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

We not only pledged ourselves in article 56 to take joint action in co-operation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in article 55; we pledged ourselves also to take separate action when it was possible to do so. Our external policy must ever keep in mind all the obligations we undertook in connection with the United Nations charter.

In spite of all the criticisms of the United Nations and the fact that it has failed to achieve all that was hoped for, it is still true that the United Nations is the one and only instrument available for the creation of a new and better world order. The very existence of the United Nations assembly and the security council at least makes military aggression more difficult than it otherwise would be. Possible causes of war are brought under the scrutiny of world opinion and the danger of world war is reduced to that extent. Nor must we overlook the fact that in spite of the criticisms I have made of our inadequate aid to southeast Asia, the economic achievements of the United Nations through UNRRA, the Marshall plan, mutual aid, the international refugee organization, the children's fund and so on have been most encouraging, though we hear much less about them.

It is because democratic socialists have always recognized that the building of a just peace and a better world are dependent upon the effectiveness of international economic action that I have placed great emphasis on this phase of our international relationships today. Another member of our party speaking after me will say something about the other side of our defence problem. My time is not unlimited.

However, I would say again that we realize the necessity of maintaining the unity of the democratic world and defending it in every way against totalitarian threats of every sort. We recognize that while we blame, and properly blame, Russian communist aggression for the division that exists in the world, we are not unmindful that we on our side have made serious mistakes.

Much of the present world-wide unrest arises from agreements that were made during the war years by leaders of the western democracies in their attempt to maintain unity with the Soviet union. Today millions of people in the Baltic states—Bessarabia, Poland, parts of Finland—and indeed elsewhere—have every reason to remember the agreements reached at Teheran and particularly at Yalta. Nor must we forget that in days gone by our democratic countries indulged in the exploitation of many subject peoples. Even today we hear requests, particularly from some United States sources, for support for Chiang Kai-shek, for the retention of Formosa by the United States and for the extension of the war to China.

Along that path lies, we believe, another and more terrible world war. We think that now the United Nations forces are strong in Korea a new attempt should be made to secure a cease-fire and a negotiated settlement of the Korean war and related problems with the new government of China. After all, as Churchill said, it does control the mainland of China and is in fact the government for several hundred million people in that country. If we could achieve a satisfactory settlement, then much of the effort we are spending now in war and preparations for further eventualities could be diverted to peaceful progress and world-wide improvement in social and economic conditions. As I have said already, along such a path lies the possibility of peace and freedom. Canada should continue, then, to make every effort and use all her influence with the United States and our United Nations allies to achieve these ends.

Our suggestions, then, if I may summarize them, for laying the basis of permanent peace may be summarized in this form:

1. Let us urge immediate and strenuous efforts on the part of all free nations to use all the organs of the United Nations for the removal of the dire poverty, misery, want and exploitation which provide the fertile field for communist or fascist propaganda.

2. Let us ensure Canada's participation and leadership to a greater extent in economic and technical aid to depressed peoples and underdeveloped areas.

3. There should be a reconsideration of Canada's commitments to the United Nations organization for technical aid and as a contribution thereto, because it may form part, the Colombo plan.

4. We should make positive proposals for the elimination of competition among the democratic nations for raw materials and essential supplies. If I may make the suggestion, this might be done by establishing a common or co-operative pool of such materials to enable a proper distribution of supplies among nations who can make an effort in this great defensive program.

5. We should continue to explore every possibility of a cease-fire in Korea and a negotiated settlement of the Korean and all problems related to the present difficulties with China.

6. Meantime, we should maintain our effort to make our proper contribution to the defensive forces of the democratic world.

7. I bring this once again to the attention of the government. I made the suggestion last year and I make it again today. We should make an appraisal of our material, industrial and human resources so that our economic and military plans can be made and carried out to the best advantage to Canada and to the world.

These are some of the views that we wish to place before the government and the house concerning the policy of the government in relation to external affairs. As one of the nations able to give some economic aid, we urge that Canada should place emphasis upon that phase of the world problem at the present time and try to give some leadership so that we may begin a really comprehensive program to prevent the spread of communism, and to remove the possibilities of its growth among the underprivileged peoples of the world.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be a reference to the passing of our friend, Mr. Gerry Riddell. I am expressing the feelings of all my group when I say that we regret very much the untimely passing of this promising young diplomat, a young man who in his few years of life made, I think, a very enviable mark in the field of diplomacy and international affairs. We shall miss his report to the standing committee, a report that was always full of facts and good things to think about.

I hesitate to launch on a lengthy speech at this time because I approach international affairs today with some diffidence. The reason I do so is that the world situation is so confused that it is hard to get at the facts. The minister emphasized the necessity of getting down to the hard anvil of facts rather than dwelling upon the shifting sands of emotion. That is true. That is why I feel somewhat diffident at this time about discussing such vast and important matters of policy. The world just does not have the facts, or at least I have not been able to ascertain them as yet.

The very controversy that is going on in the country to the south of us today over a matter of policy is one of the best evidences that it is hard to get at the facts. I do not intend to take sides in that controversy, but one is certainly led to ask just where the truth lies. I am afraid that in his statement this afternoon the minister did not shed very much light on the facts so that we can get right at them. I should like to mention briefly, however, the matter of our relations with our neighbour and ally to the south, the United States of America. I know that we all appreciate the many peaceful years we have had with the United States, the fact that for so many years our more than 3,000 miles of boundary have remained unguarded by military forces, and that we have been able to get along so well with the people of that country.

I was not unduly worried when I read the report of the minister's speech in which he appealed to the United States to pay just a little more attention to a member of the family that had grown up a little. I was a member of a big family, and one of the youngest. I recall with what frustration I faced this interesting fact, that no matter how many whiskers appeared on my chin nobody in the family would admit that I had begun to grow up. That is a frustrating situation in any family. I am quite satisfied that what the minister had in his mind was a gentle reminder to the older members of this Anglo-American family that Jack Canuck had begun to grow up and get some whiskers on his chin. That does not hurt at all, and I think at the same time it is a gentle reminder to our neighbours that as we begin to grow up our voice changes a little bit and takes on a little more of the nature of an adult voice.

I can quite appreciate what the minister was trying to do and I commend him for it. I do not think it has hurt Canadian-American relations in any respect at all. In fact I am satisfied it is going to be of considerable help, particularly when the minister and others from the government have to sit down with representatives from the United States of America to discuss the very important problems that will have to be discussed between us in the years ahead. I have in mind such things as the sharing of international waters. That in itself is a most important thing. I do not intend to deal with it now. It is a matter that is under consideration at the moment, and I am hoping, together with many others, that a sound and equitable solution can be found to the whole problem of the division of these waters.

Another important matter which we will have to discuss, and as to which we will have to use a grown-up voice, is this whole matter of Canadian resources. The minister very aptly said today that Canada now occupies a very important position with respect to north Atlantic defence. That is quite true. As a matter of fact I think if any person will take the trouble to look into the situation he will come to the conclusion that today Canada is the bulwark of American security. All one has to do is to look at the resources that Canada has, and to calculate their vast importance in the light of diminishing United States resources. It is almost a godsend, an act of Providence, that our resources have been held in reserve for such an important and dangerous time.

What I have in mind, Mr. Speaker, is that in time we will have to sit down with our friends in the United States and discuss just how far they are going to be able to draw upon Canadian resources. We will have to be very careful because we do not want our resources depleted in the wanton way that resources have been depleted in some other countries. We should be prepared to exercise the most careful vigilance to see to it that we conserve and develop Canadian resources largely in the interests of the Canadian people, and keep in mind particularly the needs and the rights of generations of Canadians yet unborn. Unless we do that we are not going to be fair to ourselves nor to our children and their children. It seems to me that, when we discuss with our friends across the line the contribution we shall make from Canada, those important things must be kept in mind.

In lending ourselves—and when I speak of ourselves I mean Canada—to the common effort to defeat aggression and to contribute to the germination and growth of that seed which they tell us is within communism and which if germinated and grown will destroy communism, let us use every effort to conserve our resources, and let us take every intelligent means of preventing their waste and deterioration. I am sure the United States realizes the growing industrial might of Canada, her neighbour. I am sure she must realize that she will need some of the things we will be able to contribute to the common effort in the future, and those certainly should be used wisely to get a fair deal from the older and bigger member of the family.

Now I should like to say a few words about policy in Korea. I am afraid the minister did not shed much light on the tragically confused situation in that unfortunate country. I was hopeful that he would expand on the policy there, and perhaps help us understand a little more clearly where we are going. The minister did say we must uphold the purpose and will of the United Nations in Korea, but he did not tell us what that purpose and will really were. He indicated that the task assigned to the United Nations forces in Korea was to defeat armed aggression there, but what so many people in this country are asking today is this. How can the armies of the United Nations in Korea possibly perform the task and achieve the objective that has been set for them without some clear-cut plan and policy which will make that possible? There is no such plan or policy in existence now so far as we know. The ousted commander of the United Nations forces, General MacArthur, complained for months because of the failure to provide him with such a policy.

Just look at the impossible situation in which the United Nations has placed its commander and its gallant fighters. They can very well be compared with a champion who has been placed in the boxing ring with a challenger. The referee, in this case the United Nations, draws a line across the ring. Then he instructs the champion that he must whip the challenger before he can get out of the ring, but that he must not hit his opponent with everything he has, and he must not cross that line no matter how many thugs come to the support of the challenger in the other half of the ring. Moreover, no matter how often the challenger leaves the ring for refreshments, or rest, or to get more horseshoes in his boxing gloves, the champion must not leave his half of the ring for any reason whatever. He must take what is passed up to him by his seconds and do the best he can with that alone. "Stay right there until you win the fight." Those are the instructions he gets. There you have the situation. What kind of policy is that? How in the world can you expect your champion to get anywhere under such conditions? With his knowledge of organized sport and human nature I think the minister must admit that a champion needs a better plan and policy than that.

Mr. Pearson: If I may ask a question, would the hon. gentleman prefer to fight one challenger in half the ring, or two challengers in the whole ring?

Mr. Low: That is not the question. The question is whether you are going to fight one in your half of the ring plus a million coming in from the other half. The champion certainly needs a better plan than I have outlined. I believe a good many Canadians are beginning to object to Canadian boys having to fight against such odds as I have outlined. A good many Canadians are asking what hope these boys have when they go into the Korean battlefield today. It seems to me that such a fuzzy policy will have to be changed. My own forecast is that we will not win the struggle against aggression in Korea until the United Nations adopts a clear-cut, sharply focused policy which will give our armies at least a Chinaman's chance of winning a victory.

There is much confusion abroad, and I do not want to add to it, but I should like to ask this question. What about Korea herself? That has been in my mind for some time. I have wondered what effect the terrible devastation of that country is going to have upon the prestige of the United Nations and the democratic countries of the world, the countries that are supposed to be guided by the interests of human beings. What are those countries going to say in the years to come? Almost a year ago South Korea appealed to the United Nations for help against North Korean aggression. The United Nations stepped in. The armies have rolled back and forth until the country is a shambles, its people homeless, hungry, disease-ridden, suffering and hopeless, a people on the move. The question we have to face is this. In the years ahead how many small nations, the victims of aggression, will feel like appealing to the United Nations for support if they think about Korea and what has happened there since the South Koreans appealed for assistance. There has to be some answer to that question, and a more definite policy must be laid down to prevent that sort of devastation in any small country that may suffer aggression in future.

I have not seen any sign of such a policy yet. China stepped in. It was hard to follow everything the minister said, and I am trying to keep as closely as possible to what he did say in his address this afternoon, but I think he stated that China probably would not have intervened in the Korean affair if the United Nations forces had not threatened the Manchurian border. Is that correct?

Mr. Pearson: No, I did not say that. I said there were those at that time who were worried lest the rush to the Manchurian border might result in Chinese intervention and there were others who thought that would not happen, or words to that effect.

Mr. Low: Well, there are those who claim that China would not have intervened had the Manchurian border not been threatened by United Nations forces last fall. I take issue with that statement. I do not think there is any evidence in the world to prove that it is so. The weight of evidence, it seems to me, is on the other side, because for months and months the Chinese must have been accumulating vast reserves of supplies and men in a rather isolated part of their country. They were able to launch a quick and powerful offensive when they did start. I cannot believe for one moment that they waited until the Manchurian border was threatened to accumulate those forces to launch aggression themselves. After the 38th parallel was crossed there was a fast movement towards the north border; we have to keep that in mind. I cannot possibly believe that was not a matter of long consideration by the Chinese, perhaps at the instigation of Moscow who must have been needling the Chinese along for a good many months trying to get them to do the dirty work that Moscow was not prepared to try to do herself. So, I cannot go along with those who make the claim I have just mentioned.

I see it is getting along towards six o'clock, and I do not want to prolong what I have to say. Let me just conclude with this, that I certainly find myself in agreement with the minister when he says that communism, as a debasing doctrine, must be fought on other than military bases. I agree with that. I do not think there is any questioning of the fact that the battle of ideas which envelops the world today cannot be settled by armed conflict. But, Mr. Speaker, what I think we will have to do is to set up a new concept of democracy, a different one from what we have had in the past. If we are going to win the battle of ideas, the free world will have to begin now—and it is late to start—revitalizing and rehabilitating democracy. They are going to have to go not less than the whole distance of translating the entire Christian concept into a policy of government, and see that that is applied in the interests solely of human beings. When that is done, then I think we will be ready to start the war of ideas.

There are those people who scoff at any appeal that some of us make for the need of divine guidance. I know that I have been called "corny" time and time again by the fellows in the press gallery for suggesting any such preposterous thing. I am now going to suggest again that we rehabilitate our democracy and revitalize it, and then having given it that new shot in the arm we are going to have to remove the confusion that envelops us by constantly appealing for divine guidance. Men just cannot see their way through the fog. We are lost in the fog. We have got to be prepared to appeal unitedly for divine guidance; and then, when we do get the answer, we must have the courage to go forward under that guidance and achieve our objective, which is of course world peace.

Let me end on this note, Mr. Speaker. Let us not forget that the greatest force for human well-being and peace in this world today is the commonwealth of nations. I do not hesitate to call it the British commonwealth, as I like to think of it in that way. It seems to me that we ought to be resisting with a whole lot more strenuous exertion the forces that are attempting to destroy that commonwealth. There are those forces, and they have been working for years. Sometimes, unconsciously perhaps, we have lent our aid and assistance to those forces that have been trying to tear down and destroy this great force for peace and well-being in this world. If that commonwealth is rejuvenated, rebuilt and revitalized along the democratic lines which I have suggested, I cannot help but feel that what the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) appealed for, aid and assistance to the needy people of other nations, especially southeastern Asia, could well be met. This assistance would bring them closer to a feeling of kinship with the people of the western nations. But you cannot do it unless you develop and apply policies that are different from those we are following today; we are following now policies that are diametrically opposed to the welfare of human beings.

Mr. Speaker, I may have something more to say when the estimates are brought back into the house after the committee has discussed them. I am looking forward to the meetings of the external affairs committee where we usually consider the estimates. I am hoping that we will be able to bring before us the various key people of the department to give us more information concerning the things that have been done with the moneys appropriated. I hope we shall have a full report of Canada's participation in the United Nations, and I feel certain we shall get that. I believe, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall reserve any further remarks I may have until such time as the estimates come back into the house.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in a debate on external affairs one is naturally conscious of not having all the information that the government possesses. I have no fault to find with this, because I recognize that much of this information is of a highly confidential nature and cannot possibly be made public. We have, however, enough information to speak generally on the foreign policy of Canada. I think that policy can be summed up in a very few words: one, the maintenance of peace throughout the world; two, peace through collective security by means of the United Nations; three, peace through strength. We are all concerned with maintaining peace. It is the overriding question in the minds of all decent people throughout the world. The great question is how to bring this about. It is on this question that many minds differ.

In basing our policy on peace through collective security through the United Nations we do well to examine this organization. To do this it is necessary to go back to modern history, to examine how this organization was first founded and how it works.

After the first world war, or during the latter part of that war, the idea was born in the minds of men to form a union of nations to preserve peace. It was called the league of nations and met regularly at Geneva, Switzerland. It was chiefly sponsored by the late president of the United States, President Wilson, who became the leader of the movement. Unfortunately, when the late president tried to persuade the people of the United States to support the league, the idea was bitterly fought by the then leader of the Republican party, the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge. How well he succeeded lies in the fact that the United States adopted a policy of isolation and did not enter the league.

Great Britain and the other members of the commonwealth did join, and supported the league wholeheartedly. Great Britain based her whole foreign policy on the league, indeed to such an extent that she disarmed to the point of national weakness. At this time the British commonwealth of nations was the greatest power on earth. It had the strongest navy, army and air force and there was no power to challenge it. By scrapping all this the commonwealth demonstrated its faith in peace and in the league to enforce it.

Whatever our opinion may now be of this action, history will record it as the greatest gesture for peace taken by any nation up to that time. Great efforts were made to strengthen the league; but unfortunately Japan, realizing she must expand to keep her place in the sun, marched into Manchuria to supply herself with what she needed to feed her growing industry and take care of her rapidly increasing population. This was the first great test of the league's ability to keep and maintain peace. It failed, and this episode of Japan's was soon followed by Italy's conquest of Ethiopia. Germany smarting from her defeat in world war I and suffering from inflation and the lack of employment turned to Hitler and his national socialist party as a way out. Under the driving force of Hitler, rearmament began to take place by leaps and bounds. The German army marched to the Rhine in defiance of the treaty of Versailles. Again nothing was done to stop this challenge to peace. The march to the Rhine was soon followed by the march into Austria, the Sudetenland and Poland. The league by this time having become impotent to preserve the peace, the second world war began.

It is fair to say that although the league failed to keep the peace it had many successes in minor matters; but as an instrument of peace it failed. The second world war was fought with such brutality and savagery as the world had never before experienced; whole peoples were almost destroyed or uprooted, the loss of life and property was colossal. When the war ended, people, weary and sick of war, once again began to cast about for a way to end war and usher in an era of peace. For the second time we saw the attempt to bring this about when the principal nations of the world met at San Francisco to find ways and means to bring about peace to a stricken world and form an organization to this end. Thus began the United Nations. This time the United States played a prominent part in the formation of this organization and it can be said she was the principal sponsor and backer. The peoples of the world breathed a sigh of relief, and hope for a peaceful world once more occupied the minds of men. How effective has the United Nations been in preserving peace, and what are its future prospects in this regard, is the burning question of the day. We can only judge by events which have thus far taken place. Out of the welter of the many voices raised for the future welfare of mankind, two predominant ideas have emerged: First, the communist idea that man exists for the welfare of the state; and, second, the democratic idea that the state exists for the welfare of man. Those are the basic ideas of life which occupy the minds of whole peoples today and for which the battle for the control of the human mind is now raging.

Whatever our idea may be of the Soviet tactics in the United Nations, there can be no doubt that if they wished they could have peace on terms very favourable to them; instead they have been doing everything possible to create trouble, hoping to discredit the democratic idea of life and sow dissension amongst those nations who believe in this free way of lfe. This is only understandable when we realize that the whole background of Soviet foreign policy is based on the belief that democracy and communism cannot live side by side and one or the other must collapse. Collapse means defeat with all the consequences that that entails. As Canada's foreign policy is partly based on collective security through the United Nations, it is necessary that we examine this organization and what its prospects are for enforcing peace. There has never been an international force to punish an aggressor and to provide the means by which resolutions adopted by the United Nations may be enforced.

The history of the United Nations during its last plenary session does not encourage the idea that this association of nations can or will enforce peace. Rather, it has been one of dissension, name-calling and all that goes to make for disunity. Russia's coming back to the league was for no other purpose than to spread disunity among free democratic peoples of the world. How well she succeeded in this is all too evident. When the Korean situation broke, all the world with the exception of Russia and her satellites united in the effort to put down aggression, and a front in Korea was quickly attained. Now we have the democratic bloc in the United Nations that supported putting down of aggression in Korea haggling over how this struggle should be carried on, and instituting a peace measure when the military situation was going against us in Korea.

The greatest example of this has been the part played by India and its very able representative at the United Nations in the person of Sir Benegal Rau. This movement led by India, supported by other Asian nations, was well timed, and although I give them credit for the highest motives, namely the cause of peace, it was instituted at a time of weakness, and a just and lasting peace through weakness has never yet succeeded. It is difficult for the western mind to understand the motives of this peace movement. I endeavoured last year in speaking about this to try to portray how the oriental mind works. I do not wish to cover the same ground again, but I think it is necessary to state some facts as briefly as possible bearing on this subject.

Mr. Nehru in a broadcast on January 12 stated as follows:

> Asia is essentially peaceful, but it is also proud and sensitive and very conscious of its newly-won freedom. It has mighty problems of its own and wishes to live at peace with the rest of the world, but it is no longer prepared to tolerate any domination—or any behaviour after the old pattern of colonialism. Nor should we forget the millions of people who are still under colonial status in Africa and elsewhere.

The National and English Review of February 1951 has the following comment:

> Mr. Nehru is admittedly Prime Minister of India; but he is not prime minister of Asia or Africa, and he has no right whatever to pontificate on those subjects. If he means to imply that the Americans, Australians, British and others, who are dying in Korea at the hands of "peaceful" Asiatics, are behaving "after the old pattern of colonialism" —whatever that may mean—he needs to be reminded that his own country is spending about half its budget on military preparations against its neighbour, and that he is therefore in no position to lecture others on the inherent peacefulness of Asia.
> The three nations of the Indian subcontinent are fully fledged members of the commonwealth and no good can come of the pandering to them or treating them like hypersensitive neurotics. They are obviously quite willing to tell us what they think of us, and we should not hesitate to return the compliment.
> India and Pakistan, more especially, are not only the leading Asiatic nations of the commonwealth; they are also, as regards population, the two largest nations of the commonwealth. Yet their whole strength is at present turned inward and, while they are preaching peace to the rest of the world, they are preparing for war with each other over Kashmir.
> We do not suggest that either side is intent on war; their preparations may be purely defensive. We understand the religious principle which Pakistan is striving for, and the secular principle for which India stands. We appreciate, too, the economic importance of Kashmir, and the wider problem of minorities, with its inflammatory effect upon public opinion in both countries. Nevertheless we deplore their failure to reach an agreement, or at least some form of modus vivendi, which would enable them to co-operate actively with their partners in the commonwealth and other friendly powers in resisting the lawless use of force and creating a fairer balance of power in the world.

This quotation which I have just read is the west's analysis of Mr. Nehru and his motives, and although it is true in fact, it yet does not give us the background for Mr. Nehru's actions, or the motives that lie behind those actions. In this regard I further quote a page from a book called "A Prince of the Captivity" written by John Buchan, the late Lord Tweedsmuir, and former Governor General of Canada. I know of no other words so well written and put in such concise form to explain the oriental mind and its attitude to life in general.

In this book the author is describing an interview by a young man being trained for the intelligence service and who is sent to interview a character known as Mr. Scrope who is supposed to be a sage of the East. The import of those words to my mind is the secret of what is influencing the thinking of Mr. Nehru and the peoples of India at this time.

> Mr. Scrope seemed to have a genius for the discursive, but his reminiscences were directed to one point especially, the everlasting differences of east and west. His chief instance was the virtue of courage. The east he said, which did not fear the hereafter, was apathetic toward the mere fact of death, but it had not the same fortitude about life.
> It was capable of infinite sacrifice, but not of infinite effort, it was apt to fling in its hand too soon and relapse upon passivity. On the other hand the west when it had conquered the fear of death demanded a full price for any sacrifice. Rightly, said the old man, since man's first duty was toward life.

With all the good will in the world toward Mr. Nehru and the peoples of India and Pakistan, who are very lovable people, I regret to state that their actions to bring about peace thus far in Korea are not based on peace through strength. To me they are based on peace by appeasement or peace at any price. To follow the leader of the East in this regard would be a fatal step for the West to take. It would be interpreted throughout the Orient as a sign of our weakness, and the Orient has always followed those who are strong and can enforce their strength. Furthermore it is a denial of our policy of peace through strength; and we in the West, however much we desire peace, cannot bring ourselves to believe that a just and lasting peace can be brought about by such means. The weakness of the United Nations lies in the fact that it has no official international force to maintain peace. It was the recognition of this fact that brought about the Atlantic treaty which we did so much to institute and which we are doing so much to maintain. For the first time in history we have today a United Nations force fighting to stop aggression. What happens in Korea could very well mean the dawn of a new era or the downfall of the United Nations. The issue is now joined for good or ill.

Ever since the world was created and man came to inhabit this earth two forces have been working to which all peoples are subject. They are commonly called the force for good and the force for evil. Man has been given a free choice in this matter. The struggle which we are now engaged in is a struggle for men's minds, and we as individuals and as a nation must make our choice as to what course we will pursue. We as a people and as a nation with long centuries of Christian tradition behind us cannot accept the idea of a communistic state whereby man is reduced to the status of a slave to the state. We must at all cost adhere to the Christian belief whereby we should treat our neighbour as we would have him treat us. If we are to resist the evil influence of communistic doctrine this nation must be united as never before. Already there are signs by the enemy in our midst to try and sow the seeds of dissension among us on religious and racial grounds. Whatever our honest differences may be in this regard it must never be allowed to divide us in this fight for peace in which we are engaged. This fight is nothing more or less than a fight for our very life, and it can only be fought successfully by closing our ranks and by a unity of purpose which should transcend all other considerations. We can win this fight only if we are united as never before.

There can be no real peace without freedom, neither can there be peace without honour. The freedom of Canada is involved in this struggle, it is a glorious heritage of our past; in this respect there can be no compromise. Our honour is involved also; there must be no question of where we stand on honour.

This is your country, it is my country, it is our country, it is Canada. Together then as Canadians let us go forward and win, faithful to the proud heritage which is ours, faithful to the principles of truth on which we take our stand, and above all our belief in the justice of our cause. I know of no better words than those of Kipling, who said:

> Teach us to look in all our ends,
> On Thee for judge, and not our friends;
> That we, with Thee, may walk uncowed
> By fear or favour of the crowd.
> Teach us the strength that cannot seek,
> By deed or thought, to hurt the weak;
> That, under Thee, we may possess
> Man's strength to comfort man's distress.
> Teach us delight in simple things,
> And mirth that has no bitter springs;
> Forgiveness free of evil done,
> And love to all men 'neath the sun!

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention on entering this debate to stress the fact that Canada has now come of age internationally. No longer are we to be permitted to hide under the policies of no commitments of the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King. We are now a full partner, and whether we like it or not other nations expect us to act our age. External affairs are now our most pressing problem. The problem of inflation, our military production, our manpower problems, our burden of taxation and the expenditure of priceless lives of our best citizens, all are due to forces which originate outside Canada. What I say about events which are taking place externally has an immediate effect on our national life.

It has been my privilege to have lived for the past three and a half months in central Europe, a considerable part of the time being spent in Russian controlled territory, behind the iron curtain. I believe this has given me an opportunity to view the present situation objectively and, to a degree at least, from the European point of view as I had not seen a Canadian newspaper or heard a Canadian political opinion from the second of January until my return recently.

The opinions I have are not likely to be popular. No conclusions are which must stress the danger of imminent war. We in Canada are fond, so fond, of talking about what we want and shunning discussion of what we may get. What I propose to talk about is what we may get and the military consequences of our political wishfulness.

Up to the present the offensive from the military and political point of view has been taken by the Russians. The Korean war, the Viet Minh attacks in Indo-China, the bloodshed in the oil fields of Persia, and the rearming of eastern Germany are all part of the same offensive. From the debauching of the security council of the United Nations to the mockery of the meetings of the foreign ministers' deputies at the Palais Rose in Paris, the Soviets have been, and still are, the wreckers of unity. The western powers are still thinking defensively. We still believe we can deal through diplomatic channels with Stalin, just as we wishfully hoped to be able to do with Hitler. People who think this way furiously resent being called appeasers, yet their actions have the effect of appeasement, just as much as did Runciman's visit to Prague or Chamberlain's trip to Godesberg.

The first aim of Russia is to cause trouble, chiefly political trouble between the western powers. In this she has had a marvellous ally in the anti-American British press. In January when the first onslaught of the communist Chinese hordes all but drove the United Nations forces, including a United Kingdom and commonwealth brigade, out of Korea, the British press did nothing but cast doubts on the effective direction of the war. English papers were full of opinions about the folly of crossing the 38th parallel, despite the fact that most of them had said nothing when the forces under General MacArthur were approaching the Yalu river and the Manchurian boundary. When reverses took place, the British hatchet brigade in Fleet street was mobilized to a man.

Questions were raised about the fighting qualities of the United States troops. Even the Times, whose power to thunder has now degenerated, until it has merely the status of a pompous squeaker, with little worm words of petulance and pontifical editorials of corroding doubt joined the fray. If the United Kingdom press had no salacious sexual abnormality to report, they concentrated on some anti-social behaviour in the United States and treated American news generally either with derision or scorn. So obnoxious did this become that I, as a Canadian who was educated in England and regarded her as a spiritual home, turned away in disgust. I happen to know that my feelings were shared by many Americans in London. I say this here in the House of Commons in the hope that some notice will be taken of my protest. This campaign of derision and scorn carried on by the British press is in very truth playing Stalin's game.

In this connection this anti-American feeling which has been generated is referred to quite clearly in an editorial in the Daily Mail of April 26 where it is mentioned as being one of the most dangerous things we have to contend with in our fight for freedom.

Mr. Croll: Has the hon. gentleman never read the Chicago Tribune?

Mr. Adamson: Because there happens to be evil on one side is no reason to condone evil on the other. Two wrongs do not make a right.

On the continent it is apparent that there is a distinct rebirth of nationalism which I shall call neo-nazism. This has grown quite quickly in the past year and the causes for it are exactly the same as those which brought about the national socialism of Hitler. One of the reasons is that today, in both Austria and Germany, there is a degree of unemployment, varying in intensity in different sections, but everywhere serious enough to cause insecurity. This is intensified by the economic pressure on the labour market of many thousands of displaced persons from parts of Germany now ceded to Poland, and Volksdeutsch from Czechoslovakia and eastern Europe, as well as by refugees from communism who have escaped from behind the iron curtain. These latter people are stateless and are living on temporary permits as visitors more or less on sufferance. Their presence naturally undermines the wage structure. Under Hitler everyone had work and was paid in money that had real purchasing power. Today we must not ignore the fact that democratic principles are a poor substitute for security and a full stomach.

I would emphasize also the void left in the minds and souls of the Hitler generation by the defeat of nazism. These people had no other gods but Hitler and they are now suspended in a vacuum, finding little to cling to in democracy, which they do not understand. Fortunately, the older people are not affected and the youngsters of high school age are not contaminated. Having spent a day with a high school group, I found no trace of the old arrogance which would have certainly shown itself in 1938 or 1939.

The political significance of the surplus population problem was demonstrated recently in the provincial elections in Schleswig-Holstein. There a political party representing the voice of the displaced German national has, I believe, actually elected the largest group in the legislature. The firm stand Chancellor Adenauer has taken against the Socialist Reich's partei, the neo-nazis led by men like General Heinz Remer, who frustrated the plot against Hitler, and Dr. Franz Richter, a fiery schoolteacher orator, is to be commended, but the coming elections may show Socialist Reich partei gains in the provinces of Rhineland-Pfalz and Lower Saxony.

The rest of the free world, but particularly Canada, has a responsibility to see to it that an effort be made to remove this surplus population and provide these people with productive work. I am inclined to disagree with statements that these people do not desire to emigrate, and from personal observation I would say that many thousands would come immediately if a real campaign was put on to get them. I will discuss immigration later, but just let me say in passing that we can be extremely proud of our immigration missions in Europe. They are doing a tremendous job under great pressure, and are in many cases seriously overworked.

The economic problems of central Europe are, apart from the hideous cost of an army of occupation, almost exactly the same as those which brought about the expansion of the Third Reich under Hitler. Austria, with a third of her population in the city of Vienna, cannot exist unless she becomes part of a Danubian block or unites again with Germany. With the Danube now a Russian river, the formation of a Danubian block seems impossible for many years. The economic urge for union with Germany will become inexorable, despite the statements of the present Austrian Chancellor, Dr. Figl, and the no doubt genuine feelings of other Austrian leaders. Austria is not and cannot be made into another Switzerland. Geography alone prevents it.

Coming now to Russian occupation of both Austria and Germany, it is my opinion that the Soviet power intends to continue this forever. The inescapable conclusion which must be reached is that the Soviet armies will remain in central and western Europe until they are driven out by superior force. The conference table is, as is being made abundantly clear at the Palais Rose in Paris, a symbol of futility, and the western diplomats who go to conferences with the Russians should be armed with automatic record players so at least they would be able to listen to music rather than the harsh, explosive invective of the Russians. They should also be awarded the "Order of Job".

The rearmament by the Russians of east Germany is now so obvious that it can no longer be disguised. The creation of an east zone "luft politzei", which in other words means an east German air force, has been observed by so many competent observers that its existence, size and composition have become generally known. Up to now it appears that the east German army is organized up to battalion formations. To train brigades or divisions, the German troops now under arms will have to be moved into Russian training areas in Germany. If this occurs this spring, as seems likely, it is an unmistakable sign that action, possibly similar in form to the outbreak in Korea, has been transferred from the realm of the possible to that of the probable. Here, Mr. Speaker, it has been reported that Russia has added in the last week to her thirty divisions already in east Germany.

The place to stop the Soviets is where they are now, not on the Rhine, and certainly not at the English channel. It is defensive thinking to talk about stopping the Russians on the Rhine; it is defeatist thinking to talk about stopping them at the channel. If we are to have allies in Europe, we must prevent their countries from being overrun, their industries either destroyed or working for the enemy, and their manpower aiding him, even though unwillingly. No European country wants to be liberated. They may be wrong in this, but nevertheless this is how they feel and this sentiment is very strong both in France and Italy. Never again must the free world allow the continent of Europe to be overrun. If we do, I say with all the emphasis at my command that our cause is lost.

Conditions behind the iron curtain in Germany and Austria have been reported on so often in the press that they have become generally known. Nevertheless, to actually see the devastation and wreckage caused by the Russians comes as a shock. The Russian has a character similar to the wolverine; for what he cannot use he spoils. I have seen such towns as Wiener-Neustadt where not only has the machinery been removed from the factories but the very buildings have been levelled until not a wall is left standing.

The difference in the attitude of the people in the western and Russian zones, both in Austria and in Germany, is immediately apparent. In the cities there is an ominous feeling of tenseness. In the country there is a sense of desolation. As one approaches the Russian zone, two things become apparent. The first is the tremendous courage of the people, and the second is the respect for the judgment of Winston Churchill and the tragedy of the naïve idealism of President Roosevelt.

The Russian occupying forces are treated by their own authorities with great suspicion.

Not only are they never allowed out of barracks on duty singly, but when not on duty they are constantly and continuously confined to barracks. The fear that they will become contaminated by the free world, particularly in Vienna, is very great. Even at the opera quite senior Russian officers never appear except in groups of three or more, and I never saw any other ranks at the theatre. The Russian on duty is invariably armed with an automatic weapon slung over his back. Checks and searches are frequently made in public places, on street cars, and in restaurants in the Russian zone, and any irregularity in one's papers or identification inevitably means a trip to the commandatur and at least questioning for several hours.

The number of people in Vienna who just simply disappear is enormous. This constant threat naturally keeps the people in the Russian zone in a perpetual state of fear. What the Russians are doing in the territory under their control gives us an idea of their intentions. Industries whose products cannot be used by the Soviet are either destroyed or their operation severely hampered. On the other hand, factories, mines, oil wells or any other productive enterprise whose products are of use to the Soviets are working at full speed, and all the goods produced are sent into Russia or used to aid the Soviet economy elsewhere. No payment of course is made for any natural product used.

Soviet propaganda is to be seen everywhere. Outside the Russian headquarters large glass-covered notice boards describe the joys of life in the Soviet union, and on all the public billboards Soviet propaganda of the most violent type, generally directed against the Americans, is displayed. To counter this the free world, with the assistance of the Marshall plan, has used some very effective measures, particularly at the recent trade fair in Vienna. In the east zone of Berlin, notices were displayed of the Rosenbergs, who were called martyrs for peace; and I was informed, although I did not see it, that there is a monument to Fuchs, also classified as a martyr for peace.

Nowhere in Europe was I so impressed with the courage and the fierce determination to resist as I was in Berlin. A visit to Berlin is a tonic, and one is reminded of the words of Schiller:

> The dignity of mankind is entrusted to you, guard it; it is you who degrades it; it is you who elates it.

Not only have the west Berliners set about the job of rebuilding their city from the greatest pile of rubble in history, but they have fiercely fought for their freedom. At the university several of the professors have been warned that their continued teaching of the evils of communism has marked them as enemies of the Soviet union, and therefore subject to instant liquidation if captured or kidnapped. Nevertheless they continue to preach freedom. The student body, instead of seeking sympathy and being filled with self-pity, is full of fight and working to rebuild Berlin culturally as well as physically. It would do a lot of good to a great many Canadian students who are today complaining of their life to spend a few months at this university. I would also like to see a number of our Canadian professors who are toying intellectually with the merits of communism and socialism to take a refresher course in courage and the dignity of man at the university of Berlin.

One would wish that the spirit of Berlin could be duplicated in all western Germany, but unfortunately this is not so and the old German trait of self-pity is again being practised. It must be said, unfortunately, that to a large degree the German today is unreformed and unrepentant. Nevertheless, and despite this, the western powers are forced to come to a decision in Germany almost immediately. As I have said, the place to stop Russia is where she is now, and to do this we must have the help of the western German. Therefore we are directly faced with the problem of rearming the Germans. It is my belief that this step must be taken and it must be taken at once. We cannot expect to get much support from Germany unless in the war we are now fighting we treat her as a full partner and give her full national status. The Germans cannot be treated as mercenaries, and they cannot successfully be formed into small units in a European army under non-German command. They will resent this and the feeling of neutralism which exists today will become more powerful. The German, despite what we may think of him, is a human being and has the same love for his country that any other national has. He cannot be persuaded to fight for some nebulous concept of democracy, but he can be persuaded to fight for the defence of his own country. Therefore it is necessary to face this difficult problem squarely and realistically. The free world must either be prepared to enormously enlarge its armies in Europe or we must recognize Germany as a full partner in the fight for freedom; otherwise we run the danger of losing Europe and, if we do, the cause of freedom may be lost forever.

I would like to pay tribute to the excellence of the work being done by the ECA. I feel it would not be too much to say that had we not had this farsighted program, Europe today would be largely under communist domination. The work done by Paul Hoffman and his associates may prove to have been the turning point in our fight for freedom.

It is easy to get an impression of despondency and defeatism in the cities of Italy and France. Particularly is this true of Paris. As an example of this, I cite an experience I had in the early part of last month when there was a transportation strike and neither the busses nor the metro was working. The French army put on a number of trucks which helped to get the people to and from work. In each truck I rode in there was a notice to the effect that this service was being given to Parisians by their army. It seemed to me to be working quite satisfactorily, under the circumstances. However, I heard this remark made by Parisians several times during the strike: "Oh, the army this time has its transport ready so they will be able to escape and not be caught as they were in the Maginot line in 1940". To hear remarks like this and to see the horrible defeatism of the French intellectual is certainly disconcerting, and one would think that French pride was a thing of the past.

I do not, however, believe this to be the case because there has been a tremendous resurgence in rural France. Agricultural production has increased to a point where France is reported to have food for export; the electrical system on the Rhone is probably the greatest in Europe; French industry is producing in terms of goods 30 per cent more than it was in pre-war years; the birth rate has increased to the highest since the turn of the century; rolling stock on the railways has been improved, and the harbours rebuilt; communism, even in the worst unions, has declined by as much as 30 per cent, and I feel sure that if—and unfortunately it is a big if—the new electoral reform bill becomes law the number of communist members in the next chamber of deputies will be more than cut in half. Nearly 30 per cent of the 1951 French budget is to be spent for defence and even the collection of taxes has improved, until today the tax revenue of France expressed as a percentage of the gross national product is higher than that in the United States. All this, however, will be lost to the free world if France is overrun again.

Coming to the United Kingdom, I feel that there are certain forces at work here which are, to say the least, unfortunate. I speak of the efforts being made, consciously or unconsciously, to create trouble and cause friction between England and America. There is a growing feeling of what is called "bloody-mindedness" today in England. I certainly do not intend to discuss British politics, but I had the privilege of being in the House of Commons at Westminster when the question of the policy pursued by General MacArthur and his dismissal by President Truman was discussed, and the anti-American sentiment was very apparent.

There has been no time in history when Anglo-American solidarity was so important, and there has never been a time when North American unity has been so vital. Therefore anything which gives the communist party and the leftist press of Europe any opportunity to show dissension between England and the United States or Canada and the United States is most dangerous. In this regard I regret to state that the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in Toronto provided the enemies of freedom with an excellent opening. I do not say that the minister should not have spoken as he did, although I think his timing was bad. And I do not say that any cabinet minister or any member of this house should be prevented from criticizing any action of the United States government or any individual in that government, or any individual American, with the utmost freedom. I myself in the past have severely criticized the actions of the United States treasury and its domination over the international monetary fund, and I propose to do so again during this session.

The speech of the minister was regarded by the forces now busily at work in Europe sowing Anglo-American discord as a wonderful opportunity to say that Canada too resented Yankee imperialism. The headlines in the English papers certainly intensified this feeling. I shall quote a few of them:

Manchester Guardian: April 11:—"Take more notice of Canada, Mr. Pearson warns U.S. . . . "

Daily Express, April 11:—"Canadian External Affairs Minister L. B. Pearson plainly told the U.S. Canada is not willing to be her echo." "He declared that both countries would get along better if the U.S. realized that Canada was not willing to be merely an echo and took more notice of what Canada did and said." "Not always easy. But these relations would not always be easy and smooth. There would be difficulties and frictions." Daily Telegraph, April 11:—"Canadian minister warns U.S. dominion will not be echo. Plea to settle friction." "A warning to the United States that Canada was not willing to be echo." "Mr. Pearson described Canadian-American relations as one of the most difficult and delicate problems of foreign policy that has yet faced Canada."

"Most Canadians resent being called a reluctant friend." Glasgow Herald:—"Delicate Canada-United States relations." The Scotsman:—"Canadian minister on relations with U.S. difficult and delicate problems."

Paris Presse L'Intransigeant: "M. Pearson laisse prévoir des frictions entre le Canada et les U.S.A."

These statements are not the statements of the minister, but they are the headlines showing the interpretation placed on his speech. Most of the papers are Conservative, but one can well imagine the field day the communist and leftist press had with this statement.

We are today in an acutely dangerous situation. No decisions which we can make are ideal; all involve compromise. I am convinced, however, that we must show the utmost courage and resolve. We face a ruthless enemy who understands nothing but force. The only way to treat communism is by quickly giving it a bloody nose wherever it attacks. Any nation or any form of government which has to lock up its troops lest they become contaminated by freedom is not a strong nation nor a strong government, despite the tyranny it practises and the number of divisions it has at its command.

There are abundant signs of great restlessness in the satellite countries. These signs may not lead to open revolt but, Mr. Speaker, man was not made to be a slave. Any individual, any regime or any country which tried to enslave mankind has always been destroyed. It may take time, it will certainly cost lives; but, Mr. Speaker, the time it takes and the lives it will cost can be lessened only by the western powers standing together in the fight for the freedom and dignity of man.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, for the first time in several years, I attended a baseball game between the Ottawa Giants and the Montreal Royals at Lansdowne park. While observing the game, and the large, intent and at least temporarily happy crowd, I thought, what a typically Canadian scene! There one saw Canada's highest ranking diplomat and some of his officials responding to a good throw or an exciting double play with the same mercurial manner as the school boy of tender years and smudgy face. Mr. Speaker, that and similar scenes across this country are of daily occurrence, and are constant reminders of the deep-seated foundations of our developing democracy. All we ask in the conduct of international affairs is that the tolerance and fairmindedness and the sportsmanship of the playing field be exemplified in the observance of international rules. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is all that Canada asks.

[Mr. Adamson.]

For the first time in human history, rules for the conduct of international affairs have been drafted by mankind, and those rules are now found in the charter of the United Nations which the Canadian people wholeheartedly accept and support. We cannot at this time expect complete agreement and understanding between nations. Deep-seated national interests and rivalries, varying traditions and experiences will, without doubt, for some years engender misunderstandings and disagreements. In my opinion these disagreements will not threaten the peace of the world if the nations of the world obey the rules laid down by agreement and found in the United Nations charter.

However, as people given to observing the rules, Canadians cannot stand idly by and witness strikes called against them when the ball does not pass over the plate. I believe, Mr. Speaker, the centre of interest and main anxiety in Canada at this time is Korea. After ten months, the military and political situations are no nearer solution. The group of which I am a member has given serious consideration to these most important questions, and the proposals I wish to make in this connection represent the consensus of the C.C.F. group in this house.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon. Before proceeding I believe it is only fair to say that we all recognize the very heavy responsibility he carries during these very difficult and trying times. Mr. Speaker, we admit that the minister has represented Canada in a splendid way at the United Nations. I am quite sure it is safe to say that the great majority of the Canadian people recognize his ability, his sincerity and his capacity. Mr. Speaker, we agree with the statement made by the minister when he indicated that the government supported the policy of localizing the conflict in Korea as far as possible. On an assessment of all the circumstances and conditions, we believe that is a sane and sound policy at this time. We also agree with the statement that the government considered that the position with respect to Formosa should come within the scope of the United Nations. I believe that is the only practical and sound way to approach that question.

However, Mr. Speaker, we cannot agree with the minister's statement that, for the present, the role of diplomacy must come second to military operations. At that point we differ with the minister in his statement of policy this afternoon. We in this group believe the time is opportune for another attempt to settle the Korean question by negotiation. I shall quote an excerpt from a broadcast speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs over the trans-Canada network on December 5, 1950, in which he said:

I know that the policy I suggest will be called "appeasement" by some. "Warmonger," "fascist," "appeaser," "red," "peace," "democracy," such words are now used so loosely and irresponsibly that their coinage has become debased. So let us not be frightened by words. The action which was taken at Munich in 1938 and which has made "appeasement" a byword, was open to two charges: That it was shortsighted because it was based on illusions about the nature of the government which was the aggressor at that time, and that it was shameful because it sacrificed the freedom of one country in the interests of the security of others. Neither of those accusations can be brought against the policy I have outlined. It is not appeasement. It is an attempt through diplomacy to reach a modus vivendi with the Asian communist world.

The United Nations commander in Korea himself has remitted to diplomacy the task of deciding what to do in Korea in this new situation created by Chinese intervention. It is the function of diplomacy to seek accommodation which can be the basis for stable relations between differing countries and systems. We have agreed in the past that some such accommodation with the Soviet union and its satellites is necessary. In the present circumstances, I believe it is our duty to make every effort to reach such a settlement.

After listening to the minister's remarks this afternoon in this connection, we believe there is a certain shift in emphasis since he made that speech last December 5. We believe that the conditions at the present time do present once more a favourable opportunity for negotiations. Negotiations have been stalled since the adoption by the United Nations of the United States resolution declaring China the aggressor. The C.C.F. believe that conditions have changed considerably since that time as the result of new factors that may favourably influence the political climate in which negotiations can be undertaken. In our opinion these two new and important factors are: First, that as the result of recent military events the United Nations would now be negotiating from a position of strength entirely different from the position that prevailed when the last negotiations were attempted. I want to quote in this connection from the statement by Mr. Chou En-lai, minister for foreign affairs of the Peiping government, December 14, 1950. This is what he said on that occasion:

This being the case, why does the United States delegate, Mr. Austin, now favour an immediate cease-fire in Korea, and why does President Truman also express willingness to conduct negotiations to settle the hostilities in Korea? It is not difficult to understand that, when the United States invading troops were landing at Inchon, crossing the 38th parallel or pressing toward the Yalu river, they did not favour an immediate cease-fire and were not willing to conduct negotiations. It is only when the United States invading troops have sustained defeat, that they favour an immediate cease-fire and the conducting of negotiations after the cease-fire. Very obviously, they opposed peace yesterday, so that the United States might continue to extend her aggression; and they favour a cease-fire today, so that the United States may gain a breathing space and prepare to attack again, or at least hold their present aggressive position in preparation for further advance.

We claim the situation has entirely changed today; that the United Nations can negotiate from a position of strength, and that the locale of fighting and the situation of the troops involved are more favourable for negotiations at the present time than they were last December. In our opinion this improved situation offers possibilities for a change of attitude on the part of the Peiping government. Further, we believe the second favourable factor is the removal of General MacArthur by President Truman. Without entering into this controversy, we in the C.C.F. are of the opinion that his removal means the removal of a dominant and provocative personality who is without doubt viewed by the Chinese people with intense bitterness and resentment. Governments, like individuals, are affected and influenced by personalities. History is replete with illustrations of how the removal of a statesman, an ambassador, or a general, has improved the relationship between nations, of how the removal of one personality from the stage of public affairs had made the writing of a treaty or the conclusion of negotiations a fairly simple matter.

To illustrate the validity of our argument, I need only refer to our own recent Canadian experiences. We all know that, without a change in conditions or circumstances, the change of a premier of a province has made possible the resumption of successful negotiations with the federal government that had previously been discontinued in despair. I use that as an illustration of what the removal of a personality in a certain situation could mean. In addition, we believe that the last reply of the Peiping government held out some hope that negotiations could be resumed under changed circumstances, and I quote from the statement of Chou En-lai:

The central peoples government of the peoples republic of China solemnly declares that the Chinese people eagerly hope that the hostilities in Korea can be settled peacefully.

Therefore, we propose that the initiative in this matter should be taken by our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We recognize his ability to undertake delicate negotiations and to approach a problem of this complicated nature in the right spirit and in the right capacity. We further suggest that he might propose to the Indian representative that his government contact the Peiping government, while he approaches the United States government on the following specific proposals: first, that a conference be called of the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R., China, France, India and Egypt, and second, that this conference consider as its first order of business the arrangement of a cease-fire and armistice, with a demilitarized zone ten miles on either side of the 38th parallel. On the 15th of December, 1950, the group on the cease-fire committee recommended a demilitarized area across Korea of approximately twenty miles in depth, with the southern limit following generally the line of the 38th parallel. We suggest ten miles each side of the 38th parallel, because we firmly believe we should use every opportunity we can to demonstrate our desire to commence the negotiations on a basis acceptable to the people of the governments concerned. We further suggest that this zone should be supervised by a commission composed of representatives of nations not engaged in military operations in Korea. Third, we propose that negotiations should be commenced with a view to the progressive withdrawal of non-Korean forces from both sides, as the circumstances permit, and that this withdrawal be supervised by the commission I have mentioned, appointed to supervise the demilitarized zone. Fourth, we further propose that this conference should then give consideration to the establishment of a unified democratic government for all Korea, and the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Korean economy. Fifth, finally, consideration must then be given to other outstanding far eastern issues, including the admission of the Peiping government to the United Nations. In that respect I want to quote Mr. Kenneth Younger, secretary of state in the British government, as reported in the Montreal Standard of May 5:

> Northampton, England, May 5 (Reuters). —Kenneth Younger, Britain's minister of state, said today Britain still hopes for an eventual peaceful settlement with communist China. "We believe . . . that the new China is entitled to take her place in the world," he told his constituents in an address.

We believe if the proposals we have outlined here can be attained in the order mentioned—there is no question of appeasement—then you will have attained a cease-fire, and if successful an armistice; you will have conducted satisfactory negotiations and you will have reached a stage where the Chinese government will have given some demonstration of its desire for a peaceful settlement of this most difficult question.

We believe that this conference should consider the Japanese peace treaty and also the question of Formosa, as mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Mr. Herridge.]

I do not wish to take the time of the house at great length. I have outlined briefly the proposals which are the consensus of this group with respect to this particular problem at this time. As representatives of the Canadian people we believe it is our responsibility and duty to leave no stone unturned in our search for an honourable and lasting settlement of this very unusual problem. Approaching this question with a genuine desire for a peaceful solution, we must recognize the fact that mutual understanding is to some extent handicapped by several factors that do not enter into negotiations between nations of the western world. We must recognize the fact that the Chinese harbour some traditional resentment as the result of a century or more of exploitation by the nations of the western world. In addition we must appreciate the difficulties caused by language and our different ways of thinking—difficulties that can prevent an identical and mutual understanding of even a single written paragraph.

In connection with the understanding of the oriental mind, and the different thinking processes of the oriental as compared with the occidental, I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of recent date. The editorial, which is headed "What Makes Orientals Act The Way They Do," is as follows:

> Arthur W. Hummel, Director of Orientalia, Library of Congress, addressed the annual gathering last week of the American Philosophical Society, offspring of Ben Franklin's "Junta" that met in Philadelphia during the eighteenth century to discuss the promotion of useful knowledge. He singled out certain aspects of Chinese culture regarded as characteristic and pertaining to the survival of the traditional Chinese world view, now menaced by an overpowering alien philosophy.
> If we are to maintain durable peace and if the people of Asia are to be helped by the Point Four program, it seems time for the western world to learn a bit about the traditions of the Orient and understand the Oriental viewpoint. Absorbed as we are in intellectual and moral values derived from Greece, Rome, Palestine, and Egypt, we forget that half the people of the world have mental and moral treasures equally as old as ours that came to them through other channels.
>
> As Mr. Hummel pointed out, while the philosophies of Confucianism, Taoism and Buddhism are not wholly unrelated to ours, they stress aspects of thought and conduct that we have not explored. In a rapidly shrinking world it is highly important for us to understand them, even though we are by no means obliged to accept them.
> The unwavering Oriental insistence, for example, that the means are as important as the ends, that tact and good taste are necessary ingredients in every act, are matters of considerable moment in world affairs.
> Today surely it is plain that for a well-rounded education some thought should be given to Oriental history, traditions, and moral values in western institutions of higher learning.

On a sphere such as our planet there can be no favoured spot or favoured people if harmony is to prevail.

Mr. Speaker, there must be great allowance made for the difference in the thinking processes of the oriental and occidental minds. On our part we must not allow any personal pique or prejudice to influence our willingness to negotiate. We must not only view the events of yesterday or of recent years, but must understand the background provided by a century of western exploitation. Any student of history knows that the western nations have dripped some large and dark blots on the pages of history in their dealing with Asian people. Without a doubt, in China particularly the Boxer settlement, extraterritorial concessions, the customs imposts and the history of the opium trade make it necessary, if we are to approach this question with understanding, to do so with a total perspective of all the factors involved. The stakes are too high for anyone to indulge in acrimony or bitterness.

Therefore the C.C.F. urges the government to give consideration to the proposals I have just outlined. We believe sincerely that if these proposals are accepted they will further indicate the high purpose of Canadian policy as already demonstrated by the work of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) at the United Nations, and in his relations with other countries. We sincerely believe that the present circumstances do provide an opportunity for all concerned to conclude this matter to the advantage of all mankind. In that respect we differ from the minister's statement of this afternoon. Should we fail, the record will bear witness to our good intentions, and our desire for the building of peace between the Chinese and Canadian people on the basis of justice, equity and mutual respect.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, as a member from one of the west coast constituencies of Canada I should like to make a few remarks in the debate, more particularly because of the statements made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I did not agree with several of those statements, and I think they should be discussed thoroughly in the house and in the committee on external affairs in the hope that it will be possible for Canada to arrive at a policy which will be more in line with the best interests of the country.

Before going on to place my thoughts before the house, may I say simply to my very good friend, who has just delivered an eloquent speech, that I believe sincerely if the policy he has advocated were carried out it would not have the effect he and I and all members of the house hope for, which is world peace, but would probably have just the opposite effect, and be the cause of a third world war.

Today the great problem facing all the free nations is the threat of communism. That threat of course is world-wide, including threats right here in our own homeland of Canada. The threat must be met on all fronts. We cannot let Asia go and concentrate on Europe. And of course the reverse is true, that we cannot let Europe go and concentrate on Asia. I believe it is a great mistake when people line up behind a policy either of "Europe First" or of "Asia First."

I can understand why European countries would play down the Pacific, and why Asian and Australian countries would play down the Atlantic. But for our nation of Canada both of these areas are of vital importance. After all, we are a North American country facing on both the Atlantic and the Pacific. Furthermore we lie between the United States and Russia and certainly in the event of a third world war Canada would be under attack. So I suggest we must look on this problem as a global rather than an Atlantic problem or a Pacific problem.

For nearly a year the greatest threat has been in Korea. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) expressed that clearly in a statement he made to the federal-provincial conference on December 4, 1950, when he used these words:

At the moment, the focus of our hopes and fears is Korea. We must strive to find a solution to the grave and menacing problem that has arisen there.

That is still the situation. Korea is still the centre we must watch. Here in this house we should consider what Canada's attitude should be on Korea. I would point out to hon. members that what is going on in Korea is a United Nations show. North Korea attacked South Korea and all in due order the United Nations branded North Korea as an aggressor and for the first time took collective action against aggression. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe they decided not only to take action against aggression but to unify Korea.

As we all know, our forces were successful at first. The war against North Korea was practically won by the United Nations forces. Then communist China joined in the aggression and in spite of the fact that such action had been taken the members of the United Nations went to every possible length to bring about conciliation. I do not believe that there was one stone left unturned in an attempt to work out a peace settlement. Many of us wondered whether the United Nations were not going too far in the efforts that were being made to bring about such a settlement. When one remembers that, it is hard to understand that a party in Canada would get up here and demand that conciliation steps should be taken under the present circumstances.

The communist Chinese have never shown any sign of regret or any sign that they felt they were in the wrong. In due course they were branded by the United Nations as aggressors, just as North Korea had been some months earlier. Yet they continued, and have continued right up to tonight, their barefaced aggression. They have continued to try to drive the United Nations forces into the sea. That is their objective. They have announced it time and again and their actions in the last week or two have proved up to the hilt that that is what they aim to do. They are not sacrificing thousands and thousands of men for nothing; they aim to drive the United Nations forces into the sea.

That should make every member of the United Nations not with the communists pause and consider what attitude should be adopted. I suggest to the minister that the aim of all members of the United Nations who are with us, certainly the aim of Canada, should be to gain victory in Korea just as quickly as possible. The whole future of the United Nations is at stake. It must be shown that that organization is able to stop aggression in Korea. If the United Nations forces are defeated in Korea, the United Nations is dead as an effective world organization. Our hopes of world peace will be gone. I believe that the situation would not be very much better if the United Nations now offered to make a settlement with the communist Chinese before they have been beaten. That too might very well mean the end of the United Nations.

Canada should consider and advocate steps to win this United Nations war. This is a United Nations war that we are fighting and it must be won. I cannot understand what would be wrong with placing a strategic embargo against communist China. The minister said this afternoon that Canada and all other nations were against any such action.

Mr. Pearson: I used the expression "naval blockade", which is quite different from a strategic embargo. We already have an embargo on armaments and such things to communist China.

Mr. Green: We have not the kind of embargo the United States is asking for. I have here a press dispatch from Lake Success dated May 4 as follows:

> United States urges "strategic embargo" against red China.
> The United States pressed today for a United Nations "strategic embargo" against communist China in the face of British commonwealth objections to the timing of such a move.
> In outlining the arms embargo plan to reporters last night, American delegate Ernest A. Gross said: "I don't think that any nation backing the UN action in Korea could object to a program ensuring that no soldier in Korea should be the target of a bullet manufactured in the free world."

In today's evening papers we find an article headed, "Britain limits shipments to red China." The British are now taking steps to stop this trade with China. I suggest that Canada should be endorsing this request of the United States right up to the hilt.

Mr. Pearson: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend's speech, but I can clear up that point right now. The proposal which he has read from the newspaper is one which the Canadian delegation to the United Nations has supported. That proposal does not go as far as the steps we have already taken in the control of strategic goods going from Canada to communist China.

Mr. Green: That may be, but there have been goods going to China from other United Nations, as witness the statement made today in the British house.

Mr. Pearson: I am talking for Canada.

Mr. Green: Canada should be advocating an embargo against communist China. I do not see any reason why there should not also be a naval blockade. It is all very well to be idealistic and theoretical, but we must remember that tonight in Korea young Canadians are being killed by Chinese. The Chinese have been killing them for some weeks and with the next few days hundreds more may be killed.

Just about thirteen or fourteen years ago we saw this same policy being carried out in Vancouver. Under the bridge over which I travelled each day by street car to go to work I could see the Canadian destroyer Vancouver, which I believe was on loan from Great Britain, being broken up into scrap which was to be sent to Japan to make steel. We protested in this house about scrap metal being sent to Japan, and the longshoremen on the coast refused to load those ships. The answer we got in parliament was, "Oh, well, if we try to stop that we will make Japan angry, and she is apt to fight." Now we are getting exactly the same argument from the government, that we cannot do this or we cannot do that, because if we do the Chinese communists may get angry.

If the Chinese communists do not get angry then the Soviets might get angry and we might get into a war. Yet all the time the Chinese are killing our men just as fast and in just as large numbers as they are able to. This sort of thing is ridiculous. The Canadian government should make up its mind that Canada is in a United Nations war which has got to be won, and that our one objective should be to win that war.

The minister also said this afternoon that he was against the bombing of Manchurian bases unless the Chinese air force began to get nasty and to do too much fighting over Korea. He said that perhaps it would then be all right for General Ridgway to send his planes to bomb the Manchurian bases. Surely when you are in a war your objective is to win it just as quickly as possible. I do not think it has been fair throughout for the politicians at Lake Success to put all these wraps on the generals who have been trying to win the war. Not only are there air bases in Manchuria from which planes can come but there are also military bases. From these military bases the communists have been coming in their hundreds of thousands. They are being equipped and supplied from these military bases. I suggest that we should not tie General Ridgway's hands in dealing with these bases. If it is necessary for him to bomb them in order to win the war, then let him bomb them.

Then there is another thing. Why should Chinese nationalist troops not be used in Korea? Why must Canadian and American troops, and troops of other members of the United Nations, do all the fighting and Chinese nationalist troops not be used? Nationalist China is a member of the United Nations. She holds one of the permanent seats on the security council. According to the little booklet of documents on the Korean crisis tabled earlier in the session, nationalist China offered on July 3, a little over a week after aggression started in Korea, three infantry divisions and twenty C-47's. The offer was turned down.

Last Friday or Saturday General MacArthur in his statement to the United States committee told them that last November, when his troops had their backs to the wall and when battle conditions were so tragic, he asked permission to use 30,000 or more Chinese nationalists troops to help stem the red Chinese onslaught, and that that request was refused because, for one reason at least, some of the other nations, which presumably included Canada for the commonwealth countries were mentioned, objected to it. The result was that the United States did not feel she could use those troops. No one is advocating sending United Nations troops to the mainland of China. General MacArthur has been very careful to say that he had not and would not advocate that, but surely those troops could have been used in Korea to help repel the aggressors.

We talk about the Americans going to extremes but we are apt to do the same thing ourselves. Look at the attitude we adopt towards the two groups of Chinese. A few years ago Madame Chiang Kai-shek spoke to us in this chamber. Members who were here at the time will recall how we thought she was perfect. We could not do enough for China. We were full of sympathy for the Chinese nationalists; I have never seen any stronger reaction than there was right in this chamber at that time. Today the attitude, as expressed by both C.C.F. speakers, is that nothing could be worse than the nationalist Chinese. Apparently they are just the last people on earth that we should think of helping.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Green: That is the attitude, and on the other hand the communist Chinese seem to be all right. They should be offered peace. We should go out of our way to try to negotiate with them. Yet just about a week ago we read in the press of the kangaroo trials in Canton broadcast over the radio to Hong Kong; people were being tried by the citizens court and rushed off to be shot. People are being murdered probably by the hundreds of thousands by these same Chinese communists. Let us not lose our sense of proportion. I cannot see why nationalist Chinese troops are not good enough to fight against communist Chinese troops if that can be arranged, and apparently it can.

There is one other step that Canada should take to help win the war in Korea. I believe that Canada should demand in the United Nations that all members of that organization who were in favour of fighting aggression in Korea get in and do some fighting. Why should there only be fourteen countries doing any fighting? If there are many cases of that kind the United Nations cannot survive. This is a joint effort. We are in a United Nations war, and every member of the United Nations which voted for the war should be supplying troops. I hope that the Canadian representatives will have the courage to take that stand in the debates in the United Nations.

A lingering war such as is going on in Korea at the present time can only bring damage. What is taking place there now is what is going on in Indo-China and Malaya only on a much larger scale. The Chinese communists are not likely to stop fighting and apologize for what they have done. They have to be defeated, and Canada and the other members of the United Nations might just as well face that fact. Remember that in Asia the stakes are high. Several hundred million people of Asia are standing on the sidelines watching to see which way this fight is going to go. The situation is quite different from that in Europe, where practically every nation is committed. In Asia there are several hundred million people just watching to see which side wins.

The United Nations must decide whether or not it wants the Korean war won. I believe that decision must be made by the United Nations at this time. I do not believe that the attitude of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon was very helpful. If his attitude is general among the statesmen representing all the nations there is little hope of the United Nations winning the war in Korea. There must be less emphasis put on trying to keep from offending the communists and far more put on victory. The emphasis should be laid on victory and not on appeasing these aggressors.

You see, the minister's stand today in effect meant this: that if the Chinese communists go back above the 38th parallel and then say they are not going to fight any more, that they are sorry they killed so many Americans, Canadians and others, then Canada would be in favour of negotiating over Formosa; Canada would be inclined to give them Formosa; and Canada would be willing to discuss allowing communist China to become a member of the United Nations and take the permanent seat on the security council. I am afraid there is too much homburg hat direction in the fighting of the war in Korea. I think we would get ahead a great deal faster and get the war over a great deal sooner if we let the generals do the managing.

Mr. Pearson: Brass hats, not black hats.

Mr. Green: For example, when the minister was speaking today about the folly of an economic blockade of the China coast, I thought he was stepping into the military sphere, and that he would have done far better to confine himself to diplomacy. This affair has now reached the stage where the lives of young Canadians are at stake; and this war must be won. If the war is not won, if the aggressors are not defeated, in my judgment those lives will have been given in vain.

So much for Korea. As I have pointed out, it is a United Nations show, the only one; and it is the only one we are likely to have for a long time. We were only able to get into it by reason of the fact that the Soviet was sulking and not attending meetings of the security council at the time the aggression arose. She is now back in the council, and would veto any action should a similar situation arise in future.

Canada's foreign policy has been defined from time to time by the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as being primarily to support the United Nations; and we all agree with that as a first policy. The second policy has been announced as reliance upon regional arrangements, of which the North Atlantic treaty organization is an example. Of course the troops who go to Europe will not go as United Nations troops, as was the case with those who went to Korea. Those going to Europe will go as troops of the North Atlantic treaty organization. That treaty seems to be working out fairly well, and I think everyone in this house supports the actions that have been taken under it. Mention was made of the treaty in the report of the external affairs committee which sat last session, where you will find this reference:

> Your committee approves of the action taken by Canada under the provisions of the North Atlantic treaty in the interests of preserving world peace and security.

Then the committee went on to add:

> Your committee recommends that increasing attention be given to the Asiatic zone.

You see, Mr. Speaker, in the Pacific area there is no such regional arrangement.

Mr. Croll: Does the hon. gentleman know that Australia and New Zealand have entered into a regional arrangement with the United States without regard to the rest of the commonwealth, and without discussions with Great Britain?

Mr. Green: I am coming to that in a moment. As a matter of fact that arrangement has not been completed.

Mr. Croll: The British papers say it has. Mr. Morrison said so in his speech.

Mr. Green: I believe there is no such regional arrangement in the Pacific completed as yet. I suggest that Canada's policy for the Pacific area should be to be ready to combine with the other nations to provide security in that area, and to encourage economic collaboration. Of course under the North Atlantic treaty provision was made for economic collaboration as well as for security measures, and the same thing would be true of a treaty for the Pacific. The United States, Australia and New Zealand are making a start. For her own safety Canada should join with those nations. Personally I cannot understand why Canada has not joined with the United States, Australia and New Zealand to set up a regional pact in the Pacific. I believe we will be losing a great opportunity not only for the present but for all time if we do not take steps to join such an organization. Perhaps the United Kingdom and France could also be members. I have here a press dispatch of April 25 headed "Britain now hopeful of being included in Pacific pact". Apparently the British feel they were left out. The dispatch is from London, and reads:

> The Labour government, under fire in the House of Commons for failing to get in on the proposed Pacific pact between the United States, Australia and New Zealand, hopes to be included when wider security arrangements for the area are made, a spokesman said.

I see no reason why the Philippines should not be a member, and the other Pacific nations as they become stable once more. So for the Pacific area I urge upon the minister once more that Canada should promote the establishment of a Pacific defence pact.

Then I believe we should insist that Formosa must not be turned over to the Chinese communists. It is vital to Canadians on the west coast as a defence measure that Formosa should not be in the hands of our enemies. Those who heard General MacArthur speak a few days ago will remember how he pointed out that before the last war the western strategic frontier of the United States was on the littoral line of the American continent, with what he described as an exposed island salient running out to Hawaii, Midway and Guam to the Philippines. He went on to say that this salient proved to be a great menace in time of war, that the Japanese had attacked by coming along the salient. He then explained that as a result of the victory in the Pacific a strategic frontier had now been established along the line of islands just off the Asiatic coast including Japan, Formosa and the Philippines. He pointed out very clearly that this line was not for offensive action but for defending this North American continent, and that if any part of that line were to go—if for example Formosa were to be given over to an enemy—then the whole line could be broken down from Formosa. Japan could not be held, probably the Philippines could not be held; and he concluded with these words:

> Such an eventuality would at once threaten the freedom of the Philippines and the loss of Japan, and might well force our western frontier back to the coast of California, Oregon and Washington.

He did not mention British Columbia, but the frontier of Canada in the Pacific area would then be forced back to the coast of British Columbia. I believe that those Canadians who live on the Pacific slope are entitled to ask of this government that Canada take the stand that Formosa must not be turned over to the Chinese communists. Let us maintain our line of defence on the far side of the Pacific, and not on our own front doorstep.

Thirdly, in the Pacific, I agree that Canada should give openhearted support to such plans as the Colombo plan, or any plan under the United Nations that will help the underdeveloped countries of Asia. I believe that a worth-while step has already been taken in that direction, and that Canada has in those parts of Asia a great store of potential good will and great possibilities for trade in the future. Certainly, so far as I am concerned, I heartily endorse everything that can be done to help those countries of southeast Asia.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the British commonwealth. I suggest that Canadians, in these days of a two-power world, a world with the United States on one side and Russia on the other and with everyone caught in between, are getting a clearer realization of the value of the commonwealth. Thoughtful Canadians are wishing the commonwealth stood today, as it did in the recent war, as a third great world power. The value of the commonwealth in the world today is tremendous for many reasons, some of which are that the commonwealth must, of necessity, be for peace. It is so scattered about the world that it must stand for peace. Then, the component parts have shown that they can work together as equals in a manner that has never been accomplished by free nations in the world before. It links countries of Europe, Asia, Australia, Africa and North America; links the east and the west, the north and the south, and links diverse races. It has had great experience and has great patience in world affairs. These are all facts which today give the British commonwealth great value in the world.

Canada, because of her geographic position, because of her friendliness with all the members of the commonwealth, her understanding of the United States and her increasing strength, occupies a position of great responsibility and great opportunity among the nations of the commonwealth. I hope that the policy of this government, and the policy of Canada for all time, will be to maintain and strengthen the British commonwealth.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when one gets towards the latter hours of a debate like this and undertakes to detain the house further, one is reminded of something I once quoted in this house, that devastating comment which Churchill once made about a speech, and one fears one may fall into the criticism he made. He said of a speech that parts of it were true and parts of it were trite; the parts that were true were trite, and the parts that were not trite were not true. I hope I shall not fall wholly into this criticism, but if I do at any rate it will probably be brief. I do not propose to comment at length, or indeed at all, on the minister's policy in Korea. My colleague the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and more lately the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) have spoken on that.

What I want to ask the house is, in the light of these serious things which we have been hearing today, in the light of the discussion which we are assured, and which we indeed believe, affects our very survival as a nation, how many people in this country by their day to day actions show that they have the slightest realization of this? I would think that a very, very small fraction of the people of Canada would fall into this category. The only ones I can think of who by their day to day life show they have the slightest personal realization of it would be the relatives of those who are already in the fighting line, and those whose work has been dislocated by the changeover from peace to defence activities. I doubt very much if anyone sitting in the gallery of this house today would have got the slightest feeling that there was any sense of urgency. The last thing in the world he would have thought was that we were here representing a nation of people who were troubled about their very survival. I am not foolish enough to suggest that we should get excited and look as if the end of the world were coming. I do suggest that it is a matter for very serious questioning as to why these facts are facts, if I am right in stating them as I do. Why is it?

I suppose that I would say, first of all, there has been no real sense of urgency. I will not say it has never been indicated by the government, because I have no doubt the words have been used. There has been, however, no real putting of it across. When the labour estimates were being considered a day or two ago there was a reference to an advisory committee which was appointed with a great flourish of trumpets last February, I believe, after an address by a leading industrialist which was supposed to shake us all up and nearly make us all over again. As I understand it, that committee had an inaugural meeting, and I presume a dinner or something of the kind. Then they separated to their various places of abode, and so far as I know they have never been back. They are not going to come back, either, for some little time. There is no chance of finding any sense of urgency there.

Then, there is the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made or which was attributed to him—I do not want to be unfair about it—the fifty to one shot. All I want to say about that is that it did its damage. Whether or not he said it or whether he should have said it, I am not going to comment upon that, but so far as I know there has never been any effective action to counteract it. I gather that people who have the responsibility of office, and the infallibility which comes from that, find it impossible to ever say directly they are wrong. Sometimes, by indirection, we feel that they have been wrong; sometimes we think it is possible they may even know themselves they have been wrong, but we know they will never say they have been wrong. However, there are ways, indirect ways, of countering that unfortunate statement, but they have never been attempted. I suggest very earnestly that the feeling still remains that all this talk about danger and the need for a defence program—all it has meant has been full employment and the high cost of living. Of course, we shall hear more about that, but it has not been with us long enough to really sear people's souls as it will later.

I want to turn to another aspect of this important situation. I suppose everyone will agree that, in the circumstances in which we find ourselves today, the relationship between ourselves and the United States is a matter of overwhelming importance. The other day I was speaking with a group of school boys, and I wanted to see how this thing appealed to them. They were boys who, I imagine, in the United States would have been subject to conscription, so I was interested in ascertaining whether it ever occurred to them to wonder why we were so free from anything of that kind; why they were not only free from conscription but they were even free from any sense of duty towards their country. I asked them about it, and so far as I could discover their feeling was: after all this is a United States affair and we are out of it, and that is lucky, and we can have things that they cannot have in the United States; and they just let it go at that. In these circumstances I propose to refer to what has already been referred to, namely, the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on April 10. It seems to me so out of line with the other things that he has said, nevertheless I do not think it can be set aside and regarded just as a little jeu d'esprit which perhaps might better not have taken place, but which is over and done. It raised of course in my mind the question of the multiplicity of speeches which are being made on festive occasions by ministers in these times; and the Secretary of State for External Affairs I think probably is more subject to that kind of thing, because after all he is the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I have no doubt he gets many requests of this kind. It would be a very bold person indeed who would say that none of these should be accepted. After all, it is a recognized thing on the 9th of November, if I have the date right, usually to have a statement on external affairs made in Britain. I am not sure whether it is the prime minister or the minister for foreign affairs who makes the statement. But there is always a certain danger in these speeches to outside audiences. There is a certain desire to be entertaining and fresh, and to say something exciting to make them feel they have got on the inside; and of course if the things said are things which have not been said anywhere else it is even more diverting to them. Whereas when speeches are made in this house you have the chilly glare of members, if they happen to be in the house listening to you, you have the chilly fact of looking at them, and you are much more likely, I think, to weigh your words.

Perhaps we might say that that is the reason that the minister stepped aside a little on that day. At any rate, it seems to me unfortunate, and it seems to some other people unfortunate, because I think he has left rather widespread the impression that we in Canada have in fact a lot of grievances and that we really feel very edgy towards the United States. Speaking for myself, I have no such feeling, but a very contrary feeling. As a matter of fact I am going to quote from the minister, things which show that he also usually has a very contrary feeling, and that is what makes me more than ever surprised, how we ran into all this, how he said all these things on that particular day.

But first of all, I wish to read just a short passage from the Hamilton Spectator, a fairly independent paper of course. It says:

> It is regrettable that Mr. Pearson (or some behind-the-scenes prompters) should have directed a taunting lecture to a people who are now facing an intense domestic storm while they fight a disturbingly difficult war ordered by the United Nations. It does nothing for unity.

Then I propose to quote just a short extract from the Montreal Gazette of April 12, which expresses exactly my own feeling: I do not think there is any feeling throughout Canada of grievance, or that we have been pushed around. The article is entitled: "Are they pushing you around?" And it begins:

> Most ordinary Canadians, it would seem, don't harbour any sense of smoldering grievance against the United States. They are more likely to thank God that we are as near as we are, and as inwardly close as we are. For this reason anyone who attempts, in however subtle a manner, to cultivate a sense of grievance where none really exists is doing both nations a very poor service.
> For some time certain Canadians have been writing articles (many of them in American magazines) in which they have pointed out that Canadians are pretty well fed up with the treatment the United States is giving them. They are sending public memos to Uncle Sam to tell him so.

Later the article says:

> Possibly those who move at diplomatic levels have special occasion to feel slights and pricks that fortunately do not torment those who lead a more normal Canadian life. This may explain why many Canadians may not quite understand the sources of Mr. Pearson's evident annoyance.

I want now to quote from the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself; I want to quote first of all what he said in his speech on April 27, and which indicates what I would imagine to be the minister's normal feeling toward the United States, and certainly what I would hope is his normal feeling. Speaking of the United States, he said:

> We in Canada know this country and its people well. We know them as good neighbours who respect the rights of others, who don't ask for or get automatic support from smaller countries through pressure or threats or promises. We know that they accept the fact that co-operation between large and smaller countries can only exist on a basis of mutual confidence and mutual respect.

This speech came after the other one on April 10, and I think perhaps the minister was to some extent softening up what he had said before. This afternoon I took down two or three of the things which the minister said, and which are very much along the same line. He spoke of the United States as having "unquestioned leadership of the free world". He said that we "can view this historic development without apprehension", and he spoke of the United States, "whose people have no desire to dominate other countries"; and again he said, "we have good reason to believe that they will discharge their responsibilities with courage and respect for the rights of others". These seem to me to be eminently proper sentiments. I am sure they are very sincere, and they make me wonder more than ever why we had the speech of April 10 at all.

The seriousness of it I think was indicated this evening by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). He had told me before of his feeling that the speech of the minister, freely quoted evidently in Europe, had been used by all these people unfriendly to the United States as showing that we, who are ordinarily considered to be so friendly to them, through our Secretary of State for External Affairs, were virtually accusing them of what other people had been accusing them, namely, pushing people around, and all the unpleasant things which certain leftist elements in Europe are constantly attributing to them. Perhaps the evidence of the hon. member for York West had made me feel much more deeply than I had before how unfortunate this was and how desirable it is that whatever can be done to set it right should be done. This afternoon's Journal has an indication which seems to me very strong that the idea of pushing around was remote. It gives an account of what General Marshall said today before the committee in Washington. I read the summary:

> Defence secretary Marshall disclosed today that 13 United Nations allies last December vetoed an urgent United States recommendation for "hot pursuit" of Chinese red warplanes for a stated distance over the Yalu river in Manchuria.
> The "hot pursuit" plan was approved by President Truman and secretary of state Acheson. But the 13 other United Nations involved in Korea—

That included Canada, no doubt—of course it included Canada. I continue:

> But the 13 other United Nations involved in Korea, "voted solidly against it."
> "So for the time being," Marshall said, "we had to drop that."

Now, Mr. Speaker, there you have as clear an indication as you can have that in that particular instance far from being pushed about it was anything but being pushed about anywhere. Our views and the views of others, no more important than ours, were given full effect to. In the light of that I am going to read not at length but nevertheless I propose to read something from what the minister said in his speech of April 10, which I am objecting to.

He said:

> Most of us resent being called, by certain people in the United States, a reluctant friend because Canada, a smaller power with special problems of her own, ten years at war out of the last thirty, on the threshold of a great war and essential pioneer development, and with half a continent to administer, was not able to match, even proportionately, the steps taken by the United States last June and subsequently, which were required by United Nations decisions about Korea.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

And then later the minister said what surprised me very much:

> Canada, in my view at least, in not making the adjustment more quickly, should surely not be criticized more than, say Argentina or Egypt, or Sweden.

I must say that seemed to me terribly out of line with the rather proud things that we have said about ourselves, and our sense of responsibility, and so on. Now we are asking to be considered on no higher basis than Argentina. It is surprising that the United States should wish to treat us on a somewhat higher basis.

Then the minister said:

> The days of relatively easy and automatic political relations with our neighbour are, I think, over. They are over, because, on our side, we are more important in the continental and international scheme of things, and we loom more largely now as an important element in United States and in free world plans for defence and development.

And I might quote at greater length. However I do not think I shall because I have indicated enough to show the line the minister took. I have indicated also that, so far as I am concerned, and so far as I can discover from talking with other people, this temper of the minister, this attitude the minister showed in making his speech, is not typical of others and, as I said earlier, I hope it is not typical of the minister either. But responsible people have to be responsible for the things they say.

One other thing I wish to bring to the attention of the house, and that is that there is a practical aspect to this. We have not only diplomatic relations with the United States, but we have business relations. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) not so long ago, in another of these speeches delivered outside the House of Commons—and a very interesting speech—delivered this time in the United States, and speaking to the American Arbitration Association, referred to the problem of defence and the difficulties connected therewith. He mentioned the question of American orders in Canada for materials of war, and Canadian orders in the United States. These figures are of particular interest to us now, when it looks as though we are suffering or in danger of suffering from an adverse balance of trade. In part the Minister of National Defence said:

> We would make in Canada for ourselves and for the use of other North Atlantic treaty nations equipment which, with orders from you,—

That is, from the United States:

—would be produced in Canada as economically and rapidly as anywhere else.

And then later in the speech he said:

This sort of balanced arrangement is beginning, but just beginning, to work out. During the last nine months—

And this speech was made a month ago, on March 30:

—of 1950, you had placed firm orders with us for a total amount of about $17 million. We placed firm orders with you for a total of about $159 million, but there was a lot more under consideration. We expect that our expenditures in the United States on defence equipment of $65 million in 1950-51 will reach something like $300 million in 1951-52.

Here is a very important consideration. Here is the Minister of National Defence going to the United States, speaking to a very important audience and making a plea to them. Really, he is acting as a kind of high-class sales agent—and very properly, too. But certainly I doubt very much if the best way to make Americans well disposed to buy from us is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be banging the United States on the nose at the very moment the Minister of National Defence is trying to get them to buy more goods from us.

In the diplomatic world of course there may be ways of doing things that the rest of us, who have had experience only in the lower spheres, do not understand. But the ordinary businessman would say that that is not the best manner in which to make sales. It is like giving a cigarette to the man you are going to hang.

I undertook not to speak at length, and I am going to keep my undertaking. I have pointed out what I thought was unfortunate in what was said. I have said I am quite unable to understand why the minister did say it, because it seemed so out of keeping with a lot of other things he said. It must be the evil influence of Toronto. He went up to Toronto to speak to a combined meeting of the Canadian club and the Empire club. We all know that when people go to Toronto various things happen to them from time to time. It may be that he was carried away and perhaps said these things which he now repents. At any rate I suggest they are an unfortunate blot on the record. As I said earlier, while I know it is not possible for him to say he was wrong, he might indicate in an indirect way that he thinks he was just a little bit wrong; and possibly tonight, or when he speaks in closing the debate, he might explain to us that it was really Mr. Hyde who was up in Toronto and that Dr. Jekyll is really a very nice fellow who, in future, will always behave in a pleasant way.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the position of the C.C.F. ever since the outbreak of the trouble in Korea has been exceedingly clear. Here in the House of Commons last June, later at our C.C.F. national convention at Vancouver, and since then on other occasions, we have taken the position that decisions as to what should be done in or about Korea must be United Nations decisions collectively arrived at and collectively supported by all the members of the United Nations, including Canada.

During the course of the debate today my colleague from Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) put forward proposals which we believe the government should now urge upon the United Nations as a means of achieving a cease-fire in Korea, rather than that the situation should go on from bad to worse, rather than that war in that area should linger indefinitely.

In addition, in that very important speech made by the leader of this group this afternoon, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) put forward our view that very positive steps must be taken by the nations in the fortunate position in which Canada is placed, to help improve the living standards of the more backward areas of the world. In other words, despite our understandable preoccupation with the immediate situation on the fighting fronts in Korea, we must not forget that our problem is a long-range one, and that at some stage in the piece we must achieve a different kind of world than we have at the present time. All parties in this house, all members of this house, are strong in support of the United Nations. I am sure that if we stop to think of it, however, we mean by that support not just that we are prepared to go from one police action to another, from one small scale war in the name of collective security to another, and on and on, but that we hope the day will come when under the aegis of the United Nations we may achieve those high ideals for mankind which are set out in the preamble to the charter of the United Nations.

That indeed is the reason why I felt that I wanted to get to my feet during the course of this debate and put forward a viewpoint which while held by a great many people is not too frequently put forward in these times. That viewpoint is that despite our preoccupation with the military necessities that are forced upon us, we must remember that somewhere along the road we must find a way in which to build a peaceful world or we will have no world at all.

It is most unfortunate that a certain group of people in the world—we have some of their number in our country—have made it difficult to talk about peace without running the risk of being misunderstood. I refer to a group of people who have a great deal to say about peace but whose aims are not in keeping with the meaning of that word. Nevertheless, that surely does not preclude the rest of us from keeping before our minds, even when we are concerned with the immediate necessity of stopping aggression in Korea, the fact that what we want and must yet win is a world of peace and human accord for all mankind.

My leader pointed out this afternoon that a year ago when it was being suggested that money might be appropriated to help to build up the backward areas of the world it was felt that the amount required was too great to make such a suggestion practical. A few months later when the necessity of military expenditures was forced upon us we found the ways and means to raise the necessary money. We have made it clear that we support the necessary defence measures that are being taken and the necessary defence expenditures, but I do hope that it is not a voice crying in the wilderness to suggest that in and through all of this we keep before us the realization that unless at some point in our struggle we achieve a world of peace there will be, as I have said already, no world at all.

A short time ago I picked up a rather interesting book dealing with semantics, the meaning of words, by Wendell Johnson. It contains a few paragraphs which express the thoughts that I have tonight much better than I could express them myself. I do not often indulge in quotations of any length, but there are two or three portions of Mr. Johnson's book that I should like to draw to the attention of the house. These are taken from the last chapter which is entitled—I find these words very intriguing—"The urgency of paradise". There is a bit of philosophy in this, but even when we are dealing with so-called practicalities it is a good idea to be guided by sound philosophy. Mr. Johnson says:

> The race against destruction has now become a sprint. Prejudices and other semantic blockages that gum up the communication process will evidently have to be dissolved if the great majority of us are to escape the fleeting and thoroughly unrewarding experience of sudden death. In the past when words failed, men resorted to communication by means of hot steel, but most of us never got in the way of it. The next time words fail, millions of us will die, having discovered a second or two beforehand, if at all, how extremely advantageous it would have been had we learned how to talk to other people and how to listen to them.

Obviously Mr. Johnson is basing his point and the point of his whole book on the premise that it would be a good idea, in all our relationships, if we knew the meaning of words a little better and were thus able to understand each other. Having gone on to discuss the advances that have taken place in the world of science, with particular reference to the tremendous world that has been opened up by the discovery of atomic energy, the author goes on to say:

> We can no longer afford serious conflict, aggression, contempt, and hate. We can no longer tolerate studied confusion, cultivated distrust, and verbal irresponsibility. It is neither an academic nor a moral issue. It is a practical, down-to-earth question of survival. Uranium hangs heavy over our heads so long as we strive to preserve beliefs, loyalties, and institutions that disunite us—so long as we cherish the old superstitions, prides and prejudices with which we have muddled through to the crumbling edge of blinding disintegration.

After saying something more about what science can do for mankind, either for good or evil, he says:

> Atomic power promises abundance as readily as desolation—but only on the condition, of course, that we welcome the abundance. It provides the effective basis for a world state as readily as it provides the means for nationalistic groups to fight each other to the death—but only provided we not decline the opportunity to create a world state. It contains the germ of an economy so efficient that freedom from want and from drudgery might be realized in fact, quite as clearly as it contains the seeds of economic ruin—again provided, of course, we do not too fondly cherish want and drudgery.

Then Mr. Johnson closes his book with a short paragraph of one sentence. Like the title of his last chapter I find this paragraph, this last sentence, most intriguing. This is what he says:

> We have arrived, that is, at the strange circumstance of having to accept a virtual paradise if we are not to perish: only in our more stately mansions may refuge still be found.

We in this group recognize the need at this stage of world events for the defence preparations that we are making. We recognize and assert the need for United Nations collective action to stop aggression. But we also urge, as was so well put this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that we approach external affairs with the realization that it is the long view that counts. If I may have the privilege of paraphrasing what Mr. Johnson has said along with what my leader said this afternoon, I would say that only in the more stately mansions of the kind of world pictured this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, a world wherein we of North America help to raise the standard of living of the peoples of southeast Asia, a world wherein we help wherever help is needed, may refuge still be found. But I believe that it can be found, and I believe that our job in supporting the United Nations is not simply to go from one police action to another, perchance from police action into wholesale war, but rather our task is even yet to achieve the high purposes set out in the preamble to the charter of the United Nations, and to win the kind of world in which there is peace and human accord for all mankind.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, tonight I should like to deal briefly with the famine in India and the international implications which that famine has raised. I should also like to discuss briefly the part which I believe this country can play in helping to alleviate that famine and thereby helping to win a very important economic campaign. In order to better describe what is going on in India today I should like to quote from the issue of April 21 of The Economist, which is a recognized authority on world affairs. The passage reads as follows:

> Traditionally, India has at least one bad crop year in five; but this year the prospect of extreme famine in many different parts of the sub-continent constitutes a unique and desperate challenge. For the people, the suffering which is only just beginning, will certainly match the horror of five million deaths in the Bengal famine of 1943, and may considerably exceed it . . . Although the full extent of the famine cannot yet be known and may not really come to light until well after the monsoon breaks in June, the measure of India's present crisis is already clear. The only areas where the harvest has been at all satisfactory are East Punjab, Rajasthan and Madhya Bharat . . . The result is that in some districts there are no grain stocks at all, and in others only a fraction of what is needed to keep the population barely alive . . . The United States is debating whether to give 2 million tons of wheat. China has recently offered 1 million and Russia has proposed a barter deal for 500,000 tons. Even if these various offers were implemented, and the first shipments were made at once, it is questionable whether sufficient food could arrive and be distributed soon enough to prevent disaster.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that that outlines very clearly the gravity of the situation. I also feel sure that there is no member of the house who would not agree that from the humanitarian aspect Canada, and any other country which produces a surplus of food over and above what is actually required to feed its people, should do whatever it possibly can to try to help alleviate this frightful disaster.

I should like to deal with the political aspect of the situation, and again I should like to quote from The Economist. The extract reads as follows:

> Apart therefore from internal propaganda playing upon the unpopularity which the famine is inevitably bringing on the Indian government, the communist world is making a determined bid to capture the hearts and loyalties of millions of Indians by offering to step in where America can be made out to have failed. The delay in passing legislation through Congress to send the two million—or even one million—tons of grain proposed by President Truman, is unquestionably beginning to have a worse effect on Indian opinion than if the offer had never been made. Perhaps the Indians could increase their own purchases of American wheat, but even the most lavish expenditure of dollars would still leave a tragic gap. Both the Chinese and Russians have therefore made a concerted and deliberate political move in choosing this moment to announce their own offers of "aid." Hitherto America has at least had the international field to itself in providing economic assistance. The Chinese could not, of course, actually provide a million tons without starving their own people—though the Russians would no doubt release some stocks through Manchuria to be classed as Chinese deliveries. Nor could they ship it without Russian help. Equally, the Russian offer to barter jute, tea and cotton is insincere. Moscow's original offer was to provide 50,000 tons of grain, but when the Russians discovered that India had no surplus of the commodities they wanted, they pushed their offer up to 500,000 tons for its propaganda effort . . . The apparent fact that Mao Tse-tung should be willing and able to come to India's rescue, in spite of China's poverty, can be dressed up as a powerful argument for communism.

I think it is obvious that the situation is now developing into a conflict between the communist and non-communist countries for the friendship of India. I believe it is very unfortunate indeed that the United States is still withholding its offer of two million tons of wheat for political reasons, but this gives us a golden opportunity to show the way. As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) pointed out this afternoon, we cannot defeat the forces of communism by military campaigns alone. Economic campaigns are every bit as important. We now have a wonderful chance to help to win an economic campaign where the stakes are a subcontinent.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has offered No. 5 wheat but the Indians have been unable to accept that offer because that wheat, which is normally used for cattle feed in this country, cannot be milled into atta, the Indian flour, by the primitive methods which are the only methods available to the Indian people for milling wheat. Therefore I believe it is up to us to make available wheat which the Indians can use and which they can mill into flour. If we do not and if the United States does not make wheat available which the Indians can use, then they will have no alternative but to accept the offers of Russia and China, even though those offers have strings attached to them. If we fail and the communists' offers are accepted, then there is absolutely no doubt that India will move a great deal closer to Russia and China and a great deal farther away from the western democracies. I believe the chances are very great that we would never get India back because it is hardly likely that you would accept a former friend who had refused you food when you were starving.

I know that there are no stocks of wheat higher than No. 5 grade available at the present time in the normal trading sense of availability. However, I believe the situation is so vital that we in this country must give up stocks which we have at the present time, and that we must do everything we possibly can to persuade our customers, who also are members of the North Atlantic treaty organization, to temporarily forgo shipments which are earmarked for them for immediate delivery. I believe that this contest for the friendship of India is as vital as any military campaign that has ever been waged. If we and the United States fail to make available wheat which the Indians can accept and use immediately we will lose that campaign. This, I believe we will all agree, we cannot afford to do. Therefore the government must act immediately.

In conclusion I would request the minister when he sums up to advise this house what action the government plans in connection with supplying in the immediate future wheat which the government of India can accept.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I am sorry to disappoint so many hon. members opposite who expected the minister to reply, but I have a few observations I should like to make before he does so.

I have followed the debate today very carefully, listening to all the speakers; and I am sure all those who have done so will realize that there is a sharp divergence of opinion in this house on the way the United Nations is conducting the war in Korea, and a great deal of doubt as to Canadian policy in regard to that war. I realize that this is a very difficult subject, upon which a person should not enter without some preparation. There is an extensive background behind the war in Korea, and unless we have some knowledge of the background it is very difficult to get a true appreciation of the picture there. I do not for the moment suggest that I possess such knowledge to any great extent, but I have attempted to learn something about it.

It seems to me the party to my left is very sympathetic to the communist government in China. On every occasion members of that party have spoken on the subject in this house they have either advocated the recognition of communist China by the Canadian government, or the seating of communist China at the United Nations, or the handing over of Formosa to communist China, or the removal of General MacArthur from his United Nations command. On the very eve of his removal we witnessed an exhibition here by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) during which in my opinion he used outrageous epithets in referring to that distinguished soldier. Whatever may be the faults of General MacArthur I believe the majority of members of this house will recognize his capabilities, his sincerity, and his distinguished career of fifty-two years in the service of his country as a military man. I think it ill behooves the member for Moose Jaw to use the terms he did in his speech, which was entirely inappropriate and out of order.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the Asiatic situation is just as important as the European situation. I believe that if communism wins in the Asiatic area it will be strengthened to carry on its activities in other parts of the world. For the life of me I cannot understand why no one seems to regard the conquest of Japan as something likely to be carried out by the communist governments of Russia and China. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) does not seem to regard that as a possibility; but if it should occur I contend that it would be a greater disaster to the free world than the conquest of western Germany at the present time.

The party to my left show no sympathy whatever to Chiang Kai-shek, who was defeated. In his address today the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked whether, if Chiang Kai-shek were assisted, there was any likelihood that he would be able to defeat the army which had driven him out of China. Let us look back on the history of China during the past few years and see what Chiang Kai-shek had to contend with; then perhaps we may get a better appreciation of his difficulties and have some sympathy with his present position. Chiang Kai-shek first became known as a military commander over twenty-five years ago. Later he had to contend with Russian communism, then with Chinese communism, and then with the Japanese invasion. He almost succeeded in wiping out communism in China, driving the communists back to one small province in the northwest and reducing the number of their soldiers to less than 100,000. It was at the time of the Japanese invasion that Chiang Kai-shek was held prisoner by a young Christian general, whose name I cannot remember. He was in the hands of his enemies and would have been executed but for the intervention of the government of communist Russia, who felt that it would be better for Chiang Kai-shek to be fighting the Japanese than the few thousand communist soldiers who could get no support from the great mass of the Chinese people. So Chiang Kai-shek was released and waged war against Japan for many years.

But he made the mistake of recognizing the communists in China, who were assisted by Russia to greatly expand their forces. When Russia intervened almost at the close of the war against Japan, she captured the industrial and military power of Japan in Manchuria and passed over to the communists the ammunition and equipment there obtained. So in a short time the communists became more powerful than Chiang Kai-shek himself. It was because of the great assistance, moral and material, given the Chinese communists by Russia that they were able to defeat Chiang Kai-shek and eventually drive him from the mainland to take refuge on the island of Formosa.

As yet the United Nations has not granted recognition to the communists in China. It is true that the government of the United Kingdom granted that regime recognition very quickly; but as the minister has himself pointed out, communist China has not been quick to grant recognition to the United Kingdom or to exchange representatives. Something more is involved here than mere courtesy. The communist government in China seems to be actuated by the same hatred of the western nations as communist Russia. I believe my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party are inclined to think that communist China is not directed by the same spirit that directs the government of communist Russia. It should not be hard for hon. members to believe that communism is the same all over the world. We have ample evidence in this country of the secret intrigues that were going on, even conducted by a member of this house, to assist Russia in securing world domination. The United States, the United Kingdom, every country outside of Russia has been the scene of these intrigues. It is undoubtedly the outspoken intent of communist Russia to get world domination.

I was astonished this afternoon to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) make one statement which I believe he could not uphold. He makes a statement, but he does not justify it and I challenge him to justify it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I shall make the statement. He said that the defeat of armed aggression in Korea was the sole military aim of the United Nations. Then he went on to quote with approval a statement by Warren Austin, and he said that it had been said "the United Nations forces were fighting to defeat communism," but that was not correct. If that is not correct, what is the correct position? Does anyone in this house consider for a moment that the attack of the North Koreans on the South Koreans was not inspired by Russia? Does the minister himself believe that? Does he not consider that there was agreement beforehand between the communists of North Korea, the communists of China and the communists of Russia to win over South Korea, and get a base for the attack on Japan? I shall go so far as to say that. If that attack was inspired by communism, and especially by the communists in the Kremlin, what are we fighting in North Korea? Is it not communism we are fighting? Was that not a stage in the communist plan for world domination?

Whatever we might say about General MacArthur, there is no one who can deny that he is the best authority on events in Asia. He has been there for the last fourteen years without a break, and he has encountered all these difficulties. He has brought Japan, a defeated nation, to a stage of prosperity which must be the envy of all the other nations in the east today. In his opinion, we are fighting communism in Korea. Certainly, we are fighting it there more than we are fighting it in Europe. We are fighting not a cold war in Asia, but a hot war.

Now, sir, if we are not fighting communism in Korea, how does the United Nations propose to fight it? The minister speaks of limited objectives. What are the limited objectives now? It was all right for the United Nations forces to pursue the enemy when it consisted only of North Koreans as far as the boundary of Manchuria, but that does not appear to be the objective any longer. My hon. friends to the left recommend that there should be a zone of ten miles each side of the 38th parallel, a sort of no man's land. The forces from South Korea should not advance beyond that area. Is it true, and I hope the minister in his reply will give us some idea of United Nations policy in that respect, that the United Nations do not intend to do what they did before, and try to drive the enemy to the Manchurian boundary? Perhaps there is some truth in the statement of General MacArthur, and I believe of General

Ridgway too, that the war in Korea is now likely to end in a stalemate; that it is not possible for the United Nations forces, with the equipment and men that they have at the present time, to do much more than fight a defensive action. Certainly, they do not appear to have any intention of carrying the war to the Manchurian boundary at the present time.

As the minister has said, we are now on the defensive. One wave of the attack has passed, and we are now awaiting the second wave. No one knows what might happen as a result of that. The United Nations commander has confidence that he can repel the attack, and not allow himself to be driven into the sea. The other night I asked, and I ask again now, what is the United Nations policy in regard to Korea? We were told they went there as a police action. We are told again today that we are there to defeat armed aggression. What about compensation? What about those people from South Korea who have trudged mile upon mile through winter slush, frost and snow, spring muds and torrents, back and forth, men, women and children by the hundreds of thousands, like some great sea of suffering humanity. Our people here have hearts to feel and minds to think about the suffering of these people in South Korea. My hon. friends on my left, and the minister himself, tell us that we cannot defeat communism by military means alone. Neither can we defeat communism by economic means alone. Something more than talk about long-range plans and economic rehabilitation of these countries is necessary. There is a vital problem in front of us. There is a question of justice. We know what it means when a person is injured in his person, in his reputation or in his property. What about a nation when it is injured in its person and in its property? What about the houses destroyed, the thousands of people killed and perhaps the millions injured, families separated? What about all the suffering that has been caused? Is there to be any punishment for these aggressors? I hear no talk of punishment in the councils of the United Nations. In this house I have heard no mention of punishment of North Korea or communist China. On the other hand, I hear talk of appeasement.

Mr. Speaker, it is eleven o'clock, and I would move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Browne (St. John's West) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, last week the Prime Minister announced that tomorrow, Tuesday, we would move to go into supply and take up the estimates of national defence, without calling any new departments. From eight o'clock until nine, there will be private and public bills. At nine o'clock the Minister of Trade and Commerce will ask to revert to motions to make a statement on the results of the trade conference at Torquay. I understand that the participating nations have agreed to make this statement at the same time on the ninth, but owing to the difference in time, if we do not have this statement in the house tomorrow night, the members would get it by press from the outside. Then, after this statement, we shall resume consideration of the estimates of national defence.

Mr. Drew: Could there not be an agreement that the Minister of Trade and Commerce make his announcement at eight o'clock instead of nine o'clock?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am quite embarrassed by that suggestion, because since the beginning of the session we have taken away two hours allocated to private bills. In all fairness to those that are before the house, I think we should give them the hour.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 8, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

FISHERIES

QUESTION AS TO REOPENING BRAZILIAN MARKET FOR SALT CODFISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. Is the Brazilian market for salt codfish to be reopened?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member was good enough to give notice of his question. In reply I would point out that the reopening of the Brazilian market to Canadian codfish is of course a question for the Brazilian government itself. However, negotiations have been going on since November, 1949, between the Brazilian government and the Canadian government for the opening up of this market, and will continue.

EDUCATION

AVAILABILITY OF MATERIALS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOL BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production or his parliamentary assistant, arising out of press reports in my riding. Has the federal government requested the provincial governments to curtail necessary school building in the interests of the national defence program?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no. To explain the position further, there is no prohibition against obtaining steel or any other material for the construction of schools. Obviously, however, the federal government cannot become responsible for the allocation of steel for the construction of schools. Usually steel can be obtained for that purpose.

Mr. Cruickshank: Thank you.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REPLACEMENT OF GLASS IN WINDOWS OF LIBRARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I have not informed him of my intention to ask this question; therefore he may wish to take it as notice. Just a year ago today, as a result of a violent windstorm, panes of glass in the dome of the library of parliament were broken. Later they were replaced by boards or plywood and they have remained that way ever since. The lighting and the appearance of the library are affected by the lack of window glass. Would the minister consider the desirability of repairing the damage by the replacement of the panes, so that the lighting and the appearance would be restored to normal?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I certainly will take into consideration the request made by the hon. member.

LIGHTING ON THE EAST SIDE OF THE EAST BLOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works concerning the lighting on the east side of the east block. I find that while there are twenty-seven light fixtures, there are only three lamps in them that show light.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I shall be pleased to look into the matter, but I thought the hon. member did not need so much light.

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGES

CAMPBELLTON, N.B.-CROSS POINT, QUE.—QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works, based upon a question I asked on May 2 in connection with the responsibility for the construction of a bridge between Campbellton, New Brunswick, and Cross Point, Quebec. The minister said he would consult the Minister of Justice. Has he done so and, if so, what has been the result?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to appear discourteous by giving a short answer, but the way the question is put is this: "Has the minister consulted the Department of Justice?" The answer is no. The second part of the question is: "Is he prepared to let us know the results?" I have not any results.

Mr. Brooks: Will the minister consult the Department of Justice and then give us an answer?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): With pleasure.

GOOSE BAY AIRPORT

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO DEATH OF CANADIAN CIVILIAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was the recent death of a Canadian civilian at Goose Bay airport caused by his being fired at by a United States sentry?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have not the file on this case, as the intimation that the hon. gentleman was to ask the question reached me only a few minutes before I came into the house. My recollection of the events is that on April 27, at about eleven p.m., two civilian employees of a contractor were driving in a jeep and had an altercation with some United States army men at one of the mess halls occupied by them. In the course of driving the jeep, the civilians were alleged to have driven to the danger of a United States policeman, who shot at the jeep with his revolver with, as he said, the intention of stopping but not hitting the men. They drove on at a high rate of speed and he pursued them. In the course of the pursuit the civilian jeep was overturned and the passenger killed, although the driver was not injured. Neither was hit by the revolver fire of the United States policeman.

The accident was at once investigated on the spot by Canadian and United States officials, including the R.C.M.P. acting for the Newfoundland provincial government. A charge of drunken driving was laid against the civilian driver. We sent from headquarters an R.C.A.F. officer from the judge advocate general's branch to make an investigation. The matter is now pending before the courts. So far as can be seen, it is largely a matter which should be handled by the authorities of the government of Newfoundland.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN ARMY SPECIAL FORCE—CLOTHING AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ON DISCHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. There is some concern among the veterans of the Korean campaign who have returned to Canada with respect to the absence of a clothing allowance and unemployment insurance upon discharge. It seems that a number of Korean veterans, who are mostly wounded personnel declared unfit for further military duty, have paraded at the Pacific coast in protest against what they consider to be unfair treatment. Would the minister care to make a statement at this time?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond for bringing this matter to my attention. The officers of the department investigated the news item to which the hon. member refers, and found that no such parade was organized in Vancouver. With regard to the complaint that no provision for unemployment insurance benefits has been made for veterans discharged from the Korean forces, may I say that that is not according to the facts. By virtue of the authority granted under the special forces act passed last session, an order in council was passed on November 8 which gave unemployment insurance benefits to all veterans who have served for three months. Any veteran of the Canadian Army special force in Korea must have served a minimum of three months.

With regard to the clothing allowance, the hon. member will recall that at the end of the last war this was paid by the Department of National Defence and was included with the last pay cheque given to the man on discharge. This is one of the questions under study by the interdepartmental committee which is now looking into the question of veterans benefits.

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

PAYMENTS BY DEPARTMENT FOR PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Will the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys be kind enough to check the answer given on May 7 to a question I had asked as to what was the total paid by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51? The answer given is $2,742.15. I would point out that the second part of my question asked for certain particulars with regard to payments over a certain amount, and that is answered in the negative. According to the table provided by the Minister of Finance with this year's estimates, this department is shown to have spent $1,533,392 under that heading, and I was inquiring as to the particulars of payments over a certain amount. The answer that they spent only $2,742.15 certainly does not coincide with the table provided by the Minister of Finance.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): So far as I know, the answer is correct. However, I will have another look at it.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of the session a number of statements have been made on matters relating to defence, and for the convenience of hon. members I should like to give references to them. The statements were announced by me except in the cases noted. They were made on February 5, as reported at page 90 of Hansard, on the defence program; there was a statement by the Minister of Defence Production on February 8, at page 179 of Hansard; another statement by myself on February 21, 1951, at page 563 of Hansard, on the brigade group joining the Princess Patricias; a statement by the Prime Minister on March 9, 1951, at page 1077 of Hansard, on the Defence Production Act; by myself on March 21, 1951, at page 1485 of Hansard, on the air training plan; by myself on April 19, 1951, at page 2173 of Hansard, on the bombing and gunnery range; by myself on April 24, 1951, at page 2317 of Hansard, on the recruiting of women; by the Prime Minister on May 1, 1951, at page 2549 of Hansard, on the arrangements in connection with the Newfoundland bases; by me on May 1, 1951, at page 2553 of Hansard, on the formation of the commonwealth division; by the Minister of Veterans Affairs on May 1, 1951, at page 2554 of Hansard, on the extension of benefits to veterans; on May 4, 1951, at page 2703 of Hansard, on the formation of the 27th Canadian infantry brigade.

In addition, yesterday we tabled the white paper, "Canada's Defence Program," incorporating a good deal of this material and giving other information about defence in very considerable detail. Consequently I do not feel that it is necessary or desirable for me to make a very comprehensive and detailed statement at this time. However, there are some matters of great importance about which I feel hon. members would wish me to say something at the outset, and also some matters which have come up since the white paper was prepared.

The object of all defence policy, Mr. Chairman, is to preserve the security of our country. It is better to prevent a war than to have to fight a war to victory. Our primary responsibility is the defence of our country against direct attack. All Canadians realize, I believe, that the best place to defend Canada is as far away from our shores as possible; but they also recognize that we cannot do it alone, that we must have allies with whom we plan and work, and, if need be, fight in close co-operation shoulder to shoulder; that the only possible aggressor would be imperialist communism working under one guise or another; that the object of our defence activities is to prevent war by providing the force to deter aggression or, if necessary, to stop aggression should it occur; that our defence activities do not constitute an end in themselves but a means toward providing the strength which will prevent aggression and prevent war so that the human and material resources of our nation, and of all other nations, can be used to extend the areas of human freedom and increase the level of family and individual prosperity and happiness.

So far as we can, during this period we must continue to strengthen the democracy which is the object as well as one of the main bulwarks of our defence. We must also continue to do everything we can to improve the level of our society, raise the standard of living and enlarge freedom and opportunity throughout our country. We must not lose either our democratic methods or our democratic objectives without fighting a battle. In this the record of Canada and of other countries has shown that we can do a good job, and that victory will be ours with peace, or, if it should come, with war; but the greater victory will be without war.

Developments in international affairs, particularly over the last two years, have reinforced the concept that in the defence of Canada we must work with other countries. In this connection I should like to refer to the developments in Korea, our part in the operations there, and to the organization established under the North Atlantic treaty.

On June 25, 1950, the North Korean forces crossed the 38th parallel. The following day, on the initiative of the United States government, the security council of the United Nations adopted a declaration condemning this as an act of unprovoked aggression and calling on members of the United Nations to suppress this aggressive action by sea and air action. From its forces in the Far East the United States put into action several naval vessels and a squadron of the air force two days later.

It became apparent that the aggressors would not be stopped by sea and air forces alone, and on July 2 the United States put in ground forces. On July 7 the security council recommended that other nations make military forces and other assistance available to the unified command under the United States, and requested the United States to designate the commander. General MacArthur was designated as commander. Other nations having forces in the Far East were the United Kingdom and Australia. On July 26, 1950, the United Kingdom made available one brigade, while Australia sent a regiment from Japan, later reinforced with other troops. Other nations which have taken part are Belgium, France, Greece, India, New Zealand, the Netherlands, the Philippines, Turkey, Thailand and Colombia.

We sent three destroyers on July 5, made available a heavy air transport squadron on July 19, and the same day arranged for additional air transport through Canadian Pacific Air Lines. On July 20 we announced a greatly expanded defence program. On August 7 we announced the formation, and two days later began the recruiting of a special force which, with elements of the regular forces, was to be made available to the unified command. Recruiting was speeded and training pressed on so that the 25th Canadian infantry brigade Group had completed basic and advanced individual training and special unit training by the time it arrived at Fort Lewis in the state of Washington between November 16 and November 23. It made a fine impression on its first parade which I was privileged to witness.

At this stage the manner of employing our brigade group was entirely dependent on the development of events. On November 4, 1950, it had been announced that the Princess Patricias would proceed to Korea, and they left on November 25. The rest of the brigade group continued to complete its training at Fort Lewis. On March 28 an advance party of the brigade proceeded to Korea, and Brigadier Rockingham, its commander, also went out to see conditions in Korea, and to make arrangements for the arrival of the brigade.

Returning to events in Korea, by August 1, 1950, the North Korean forces had succeeded in driving back the United Nations forces to a limited beachhead in the Pusan area. During the next six weeks the United Nations forces achieved a build-up which enabled them on September 15, 1950, to launch a counter-offensive. This offensive resulted in the virtual destruction of the North Korean army, and by October 28, 1950, the United Nations forces had driven to within forty miles of the Manchurian border. On November 30 the Chinese communist forces intervened and the United Nations advance was halted. The enemy's offensive operations had by January 1, 1951, forced the withdrawal of the United Nations forces to the vicinity of the 37th parallel. Then the communist attack lost its momentum due to extended lines of communication, inadequate air support, large casualties, particularly those due to sickness, and their inability to cope with cold weather conditions, as well as the increased fighting strength of the United Nations.

On January 25, 1951, the United Nations forces resumed the offensive and advanced steadily through February and March until by April 21, 1951, they had reached a general line immediately north of the 38th parallel. Meanwhile the enemy had succeeded in concentrating a mass of manpower and material in the immediate battle area. On April 22 the present enemy counter-offensive was launched with an estimated 350,000 men representing about half the total enemy forces in Korea. At present the United Nations forces in western Korea are occupying defensive positions along a general line approximately five miles north of Seoul, and at the moment the position has been stabilized. Total United Nations forces in Korea, apart from the South Koreans, are estimated to be approximately 260,000. We have 6,100 in the brigade group and 1,100 reinforcements in Korea in addition to those in Canada. Altogether we have trained reinforcements estimated to be sufficient for six months, with more being added day by day from current recruiting.

Turning to the question of casualties, estimates of enemy casualties are apt to be very far off the mark and usually exaggerated. One estimate is that over 800,000 casualties have been inflicted on the combined forces of the Chinese communists and North Koreans. During the same period United States casualties are reported to be 62,000, including 10,400 killed, 40,600 wounded and 11,000 missing. We have not the figures of the casualties suffered by the other United Nations forces. Our own Princess Patricias entered into action on February 22. Up to May 3 they had suffered 33 killed and 85 wounded. We mourn their loss, just as we deplore and regret that it should be necessary. All three services, navy, army and air force, are now making a substantial contribution to defeat aggression in North Korea. There I believe the magnitude of our effort is third among the United Nations co-operating in this work.

In the navy, army and air force we have a total of 8,337 officers and men involved in our operations in the Far East. This is in addition to men in the replacement group, supply lines, training establishments, and others. Of these 2,567 are in the active forces, and there are 5,770 who joined the Canadian Army special force.

The chief of the naval staff has handed me a letter he received from the officer commanding the forces with which our ships are serving in the Far East, which I think the house might be interested in hearing. It is dated March 29, 1951, and reads:

Dear Grant:

Now that HMCS Cayuga has left us, I wish to take the opportunity of her departure to tell you how extremely well the Canadian ships have done out here.

I sent you a copy of a letter I wrote to Taylor of the Sioux, and I find it hard to choose between any of the three we know so well, Sioux, Athabaskan or Cayuga. The new arrivals, Nootka and Huron, will, I know, soon get worked in and play as big a part as their predecessors—they can't do more.

I should interpolate that since this letter was written the Sioux has arrived to replace the Athabaskan.

As for Brock—

That is Captain Brock.

—he has handled his own ship and all your three ships (and for that matter any others that from time to time have been under him) very well. He has shown courage and common sense. His well-judged night entry into Chinnampo in early December was a fine bit of work.

I feel that he deserves my praise, and so do all the ships that you have sent us. They have set a high standard, and I am sure you have every reason to be proud of them and satisfied with their work.

This letter is signed by Vice Admiral William Andrewes, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O.

The Princess Patricias have lived up to the splendid record of that fine regiment. I have seen the brigade twice, once when it first arrived at Fort Lewis and then just before they left. The views expressed by His Excellency the Governor General, who took the salute and inspected them that day, and by other distinguished soldiers with wide experience and great records, confirm my impression that this brigade is one of which we may well be proud—tough, well trained, and well led.

The United States air force officers in command of McChord field, from which 426 squadron is operating its airlift, gave me exactly the same report about the R.C.A.F. I do not suppose it is generally recognized that on a round trip these twelve North Stars, flying west on the great circle route past the Aleutians, east by way of Honolulu, in order to take advantage of the weather and also to provide more comfortable service for the wounded they frequently carry back, travelling through most difficult weather and over some of the longest legs in the world, fly over 13,000 miles on each trip.

This is a fight, Mr. Speaker, in which international police action is working to stop communist aggression, communist gangsters. The forces of the United Nations for the first time are working and fighting shoulder to shoulder to stop aggression in Korea, and to show that aggression does not pay there or anywhere else. It is a magnificent thing that young Canadians should have volunteered to serve in such a cause. In taking the action we have, in co-operating in this way, I believe the great bulk of the Canadian people feel that we have done right. I believe they also feel that the government, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been right in doing everything possible to reduce the risks of a general war. The object of the effort in which we are participating is to show that aggression does not pay, to restore peaceful conditions in Korea and, by preventing aggression there, to preserve peace everywhere.

In this connection I should like to make it just as plain as I can that I profoundly disagree with the views expressed on this subject in the house last evening by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I am glad to say that they are not the views of this government. Moreover I do not believe any government holding those views would continue to have the support of the Canadian people. Certainly they do not express the objectives for which we are asking our young Canadians to serve gallantly a great cause far from home. Moreover, I believe—and I think all fifteen governments participating in the Far East have the same view—that were the views expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to be adopted they would increase the risks of a general war, without increasing the opportunity for bringing about a successful termination of hostilities in Korea upon terms which would be acceptable to those nations.

Mr. Green: You had better read it again.

Mr. Claxton: It would be interesting to learn whether the views expressed by this senior member of the Conservative opposition correctly express the views of that party or of any other considerable number of the members in this house.

Now, sir, may I turn to the North Atlantic treaty organization. References have been made before to our substantial contributions of equipment to the North Atlantic treaty nations. It is not expected we shall be making further deliveries of existing equipment until deliveries of substantial quantities of replacement equipment are forthcoming from the United States, or being produced here. We are also getting on with the training of aircrew for the countries participating. The first wings parade of navigators took place at Summerside last Friday, and it was a thrilling sight to see the young men coming up to take their wings behind the colours of the countries for which they are working, and the countries which are also working with us. In this case it was Belgium, Italy and Norway. Next week it will be France, and so on with all the countries that are taking advantage of our air training plan. It was a thrill for Canadians to see these men, called to receive the R.C.A.F. wing, proud because of the high standard of achievement our airmen have won for the wings of the R.C.A.F. in every corner of the world.

Reference has been made to the reopening of the airfields, and the acquisition of aircraft to look after this flow which we expect will build up to a total of about 3,300 R.C.A.F.

and NATO student fliers this year. A good many hon. members saw the F-86E fly at Toronto two weeks ago last Friday. This is the first Sabre to be equipped with our Canadian designed and made Orenda engine, with power perhaps greater than any jet engine being made. This increased the performance of the aircraft even over that which had previously made it the fastest fighter yet known. That afternoon this plane had completed a flight from Minneapolis to Toronto, a distance of 715 miles, in one hour and five minutes, or about 700 miles per hour, and that must be a record of some kind.

Yesterday we began to raise the 27th infantry brigade on the basis of the reserve force units. The reserve army units designated have taken hold of the job in a most creditable fashion. In Winnipeg yesterday I visited one of the depots and found that the procedure was working well. Shortly after ten o'clock the first recruit was completely examined, documented and in uniform. The reports which were received by defence headquarters this morning, which are still incomplete, indicate that a total of approximately 1,200 applications were received yesterday. This is regarded as a good response on the first day. It indicates that with the strong support of the reserve forces, and of the people of Canada, we should raise a force of considerable size which will be useful in meeting the responsibility ahead of us.

Many of the reserve units which have not been designated, while expressing proper and creditable regret, offered their hearty support in canvassing their men to join up during the plan. As seems to be almost inevitable in an operation of this kind, there were reports in the press which were entirely without foundation. One was to the effect that we were going light on Ottawa so as to keep the civil servants in their positions. There is absolutely no foundation whatever for that statement. Moreover, it was not made by any responsible officer at national defence headquarters. Then, there was another report, heard over the regional news in Ontario this morning, that while recruiting was going well in Montreal the response was largely from French-speaking applicants. This is the reverse of the usual suggestion, and on that account perhaps we should welcome it. But I venture to say that when the figures are checked it will be found that the English-speaking people of Montreal have responded to this as to every other appeal as well or better than their English-speaking friends in other parts of Canada.

Personally I deprecate beyond words these efforts to put one race against another in this or any other country. For this reason among others we have not kept figures showing the racial origins of Canadians joining the armed forces. We regard them all as Canadians. When questions of that type are asked or assertions made, they are not made for the purpose of maintaining national unity but for the very opposite.

However, in this connection I am going to break my own rule, a rule which has been observed by my predecessors and welcomed by the house. I do that because of two charges against French-speaking Canadians which are utterly and completely without foundation. I do that because they have been made in important publications in other countries. I refer first to an article on Canada's foreign policy in the Contemporary Review of February, 1951, published in England, by J. A. Stevenson, who said:

> . . the comparatively small contingent of French Canadians, who have volunteered for the special UN force, indicates that the isolationist spirit still has a firm grip on the French-Canadian people.

In a similar article in Foreign Affairs published in the United States for April, 1951, the same author said:

> The recruiting returns for the special United Nations forces showed a smaller proportion of volunteers from Quebec than from any other province.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the interests of unity and justice, it is necessary to deny emphatically these unfortunate and inaccurate statements. It happens that we do keep figures of enlistments by districts and areas which generally correspond to the provincial boundaries. The total number of men enlisting in the special force was 10,587. Of those, 3,134 came from the province of Quebec, or thirty per cent. The inhabitants of the province of Quebec represent twenty-nine per cent of the population. In other words, far from the province of Quebec doing worse than the rest of the country, it did just about the same as the rest of the country, or a little better.

Moreover, I have had a special survey carried out. It meant looking at every file, but I thought in the interests of national unity and justice we should do it. It was found that the proportion of Canadians in all parts of the country who joined the special force and whose mother tongue was reported to be French corresponds almost exactly to the Canadians of French origin in the total population. I must say that when I was out there I saw the 22nd, the Princess Patricias and the Royal Canadian Regiment working as a single team. They had the utmost confidence in each other, as well they may have. They got on well. I believe that, just as in Italy and in western Europe, the forces of the two main streams of our culture and of our country will be united in battle as in peace, more than ever before in the history of our country.

Now I should like to make it plain how the sixteen battalions were selected to form part of this brigade. There are over sixty infantry regiments in Canada. When we wanted to raise three battalions to constitute the 27th infantry brigade, plus some more to act as replacements or to rotate later, we were faced with the task either of choosing three battalions within the more than sixty or of dividing up the job and choosing, say, six or fifteen or some other number. We arrived at the fifteen in order to give a broad basis of geographical distribution and representation through all parts of the country.

Five companies are required for each battalion, and we wanted to have each of those five companies have something in common on which they would begin to build on the traditions of their particular type of unit; so we designated one battalion as a Canadian highland battalion, and to make up that battalion we asked five reserve Scottish regiments, from different parts of the country, each to send a company first and then another one later. Then we asked five rifle regiments and five line regiments to do the same thing. In this way it seemed to us that we were arriving at the double purpose of gaining the greatest possible support through tying in with the greatest number of units, and yet making the most of existing tradition, and thus form a battalion out of which a good commanding officer could fairly soon make a fine unit.

This plan was put up to the general officers commanding districts and then to the representatives of the defence associations representing the fourteen corps of reserve army units of non-regular soldiers. No objection was made to it. The G.O.C.'s, knowing the units in the districts, felt that this was the best way to do it. The reserve army representatives felt that this was a good thing to do, and they had no comment to make on the selection that had been made. I may say that it was made by the chief of the general staff and by the officers advising him; but it was discussed in detail by myself and approved by myself.

In selecting localities we had also to consider not only geographical distribution, not only the division into Scottish, line and infantry regiments but also the other types of regiments and units that we wanted to raise in each locality—artillery, engineers, army service, intelligence corps, provost corps and so on. If, for instance, London, Ontario, had a good reserve army provost corps—and there are few of them in the reserve forces—it was designated as the place to raise the provost corps; and so on with the artillery and engineers, each contributing a battery or a troop, whatever might be appropriate, to form the unit. In the case of the armour—because this force is to be equipped with the latest type of tanks on which only, so far, officers and men of the permanent force have been fully trained—we decided to send the R.C.D.'s to supply replacements for a number of armoured regiments. The way in which it has been received seems to indicate that this plan, announced on Friday, put into effect over the week end and begun yesterday will do the job we set out to do provided it has strong and sustained support.

Further, it is the kind of thing that the reserve forces are designed to do. It is no part of the role of the reserve forces to have forces in being, trained, equipped and ready to fight an equally trained and equipped enemy in instant battle. That is not their job and never has been; and it is a total misconception to consider it as their job.

I must say that the way in which the reserve forces have responded to this appeal reflects the utmost credit on them and on their ability to do a job, and indicates that, just as they did such superb work in raising the nucleus of our forces in the first great war of 1914-18 and in the second world war, they are ready now and will be ready in the future to do the tasks for which they are chosen.

I hope we shall have the strong support not only of the members of the House of Commons but also of the press and of citizens everywhere. This story about keeping the civil servants free from exposure to the dangers of enlistment cannot be calculated to help recruiting or to strengthen the effort to build up Canada's defence forces. I have no doubt that the reporter who obtained the story got it from somebody; but no effort was made to check it with my office, with the chief of the general staff, with the director of public relations, or with the adjutant general; and they are, I think, the only officers qualified to speak authoritatively on a matter of this kind.

The fact that these other reserve army units have not been chosen at this stage does not indicate that they will not have their chance. Our hope is that as this plan develops, each of the reserve force units will make a similar contribution, so that in a period of two or three years all the reserve force units may have experienced and trained officers and men, who have had recent experience abroad, available to the extent of a company or its equivalent, so that in that way, together with the veterans and the other trained soldiers available, it will greatly shorten the time within which our reserve force will be able to mobilize the force we shall need.

In this plan our intention is to have married men who serve for twelve months overseas and single men who serve for twenty-four months overseas entitled to receive their discharge, although the terms of their military enlistment may not have elapsed. But that of course will depend on the military situation, and we cannot foresee that.

To turn to the question of manpower, while the figures for April are not yet available, estimates show an intake for that month of 2,452 and an outgo of 518, making a net increase of 1,934, which maintains the very good record we have been having, bringing the strength of the three active forces to the figure of 70,361. At this rate, or at anything like it, taken together with the added impetus which we believe will be given by raising the 27th Canadian infantry brigade, it should be possible to see the target for our armed forces and full-time civilian employees of something like 150,000 at March 31, 1954, is likely to be achieved in one-half that time. This target is something which we set down for planning purposes. But we aim to go ahead with our plans and with our programs as fast as the money voted by parliament will permit.

We have had a large number of inquiries from women wishing to join the regular air force or the reserve forces of the three services, in accordance with the announcement I made. As I said then, recruiting for these will not start until the summer, when there will be public announcements. It was not my intention to make this announcement until later. However, a leak occurred, though not through military sources. The article in the R.C.A.F. publication The Roundel, which was said to be the basis for the story referring to W.D.'s in the logistic organization of the armed forces, was actually written more than two years ago, more than two years before the cabinet authorized the recruitment of women. Recruiting will be begun this summer.

We shall have a limited number of places for officers. We mean to have as little overhead as possible, no special establishment and few officers outside of those engaged directly in planning at headquarters, either here or in commands. Women are to be recruited to do particularly work now being done by men, but which can be done as well or better by women, such as radar planning and plotting, radio-teletype communications, clerical duties and the like. Women who believe they have officer qualifications may write to defence headquarters now describing their qualifications either in the services or in civilian life. Their applications will be received and we can process them. Writing in now will not give them a favoured place over those who do not write, or over those whom we may select later.

The white paper and statements made by the Minister of Defence Production deal with the subject of equipment and I have very little to add at this time. However, I have some new figures which the house has not heard yet, and which may be interesting. Defence orders placed during the year 1949-50 may be compared with those placed in 1950-51 in the following table, which involves totals of more than $25 million:

	1949-50	1950-51
Aircraft	$88,517,449	$328,937,126
Ships	4,188,196	79,171,485
Tank-automotive	12,383,629	64,581,959
Weapons, ammunition and explosives	3,084,334	41,933,146
Electronics and communication equipment	16,779,462	89,209,218
Clothing and equipage	16,710,614	20,127,614
Building construction, maintenance, supplies and equipment	41,851,524	90,550,503

Other items bring the total for the two years to $244,709,352 for 1949-50 and $800,816,068 for 1950-51.

In the field of construction, during the period September 30, 1950, to April 30, 1951, there were thirty contracts awarded for construction projects involving amounts of over $500,000 each. During the last six months the Department of Defence Production and Defence Construction Limited have let contracts totalling $520,266,137. During the first six months of the second world war the corresponding figure was $136,120,288.

The appropriation sought for the current fiscal year 1951-52 of $1,600 million, or the amount available for defence purposes from all sources, $1,879 million, may be compared with the expenditures on defence amounting to $195,999,201 in 1947-48; $268,804,813 in 1948-49; $384,879,008 in 1949-50; and $587 million for 1950-51.

At this time last year the appropriation sought was $425 million. The present figure is a little more than four times as much. The appropriation for last year of $425 million was increased by a supplementary vote of $145,200,000 passed at the special session in August, bringing the total up to $567,200,000.

To this there should be added a final supplementary adopted in March of $21,575,166, making a total appropriation for 1951 of $588,775,366. Out of this we estimate that we shall spend $587 million, or $1,700,000 less than appropriated.

The table appearing in the white paper at page 29 shows that the figure of $1,879 million is 47·5 per cent of the national budget, 11·67 per cent of the estimated national income for 1951-52, 9·4 per cent of the gross national product for the same year and $134.27 per capita.

This year the official estimates of the federal government amount to $3,586,915,657. Of this a total of no less than $1,365 million are payments fixed by parliament for debt services, subsidies to the provinces, social security payments, or covered by post office revenues and miscellaneous refunds and consequently not subject to government control. The amount of federal government expenditure within the control of the government for all operations of government, apart from defence, is therefore $516,600,000.

In the white paper there are charts showing the distribution of the defence program, measured in dollars and in percentages as between the navy, army and air force, and also between the main objects of expenditure. The percentage of the defence program allotted to the air force shows a steady increase from 25·6 per cent in 1946-47 to 47·8 per cent in the present program. This change in emphasis follows the change in policy adopted by most of our allies; but we by all odds are spending the greatest proportion on air defence of any country in the world. The reasons for that are obvious. We have great facilities for aircraft production and air training. Our record in the air is very definitely a fine one. We have shown that we have the skills not only to fly but to administer, and to train aircrew and groundcrew. We have the skills to keep aircraft flying in the air, and the skills required to make them. And in these respects, with the production of the F-86E, which is moving on well, and production of the CF-100 Canuck, as well as the Orenda engine, and the Beaver, as well as a reconversion program of over 200 aircraft still to be completed, we shall be spending very large sums indeed on the air force for the next three years. During that time we shall acquire or produce a total of no less than 3,300 aircraft.

As I have indicated, this is a three year program. I have seen some criticism on the score that this term is too long, that it should be completed more rapidly. For that matter, one week may be too long. We have no means of telling. But if today we had all the forces we would like to have at this time we would not be spending $1,879 million on building them up. The same is true of any other country. It is necessary to plan for a period longer than a single year so as to provide for a build-up of personnel, equipment and accommodation that is steady, in balance, co-ordinated and consequently as efficient as possible. This period of three years is being used by a number of the North Atlantic treaty nations. It is the period used in the program of the United Kingdom.

But that is the target. As I have said, we will press on just as fast as we can to do the job, given the resources made available by parliament. As I have said also, it may be estimated that with anything like the current rate of recruitment we will reach the objective as at present planned of having something over 150,000 service personnel and civilians in the armed forces in a year and a half rather than in three years.

May I summarize once again what this program is intended, and what I believe it will enable us, to do. First, to provide for the defence of Canada against direct attack and the protection of our coast and shipping lanes. Second, maintain and reinforce the 25th Canadian infantry brigade in Korea, as well as naval vessels and air force, as long as they are needed in that theatre. Third, build up a brigade group and eleven squadrons for the integrated force in Europe. Fourth, provide for replacements and rotation. Fifth, provide suitable equipment, ships, tanks, aircraft of the latest types for our forces.

It provides also for the build-up of mobilization stores and equipment and a considerable part of the accommodation that might be needed by the forces we would expect to employ in the first year of general war, should there be one. I am sure that that program has the support of every hon. member of the house.

It is possible for us to carry out this substantial program and still balance the budget by reason of the buoyant condition of our economy today. This was made clear by the very comprehensive budget report on the situation presented in this house by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I assure you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee that we and the armed forces appreciate what it has meant to my colleagues and their departments to make substantial cuts in what in normal times would be a reasonable level of activity for them, in order to make possible a greater national defence effort without upsetting the economy.

This places an even further responsibility on the minister and the Department of National Defence to observe the utmost in economy. Despite further substantial increases in the size of the armed forces, we plan to have very little increase in the administrative personnel. While we will maintain every effort to effect every possible economy, I should like to say in fairness to our armed forces that our overhead is, I believe, proportionately less than in other comparable countries.

A quantitative test of the extent to which the navy is operational is the proportion of men at sea. In Canada that proportion is about 40 per cent, which is even higher than it was during the war. Members will observe from an answer tabled in the house last Monday that the 15 ships of the Canadian navy in commission during the year 1950 spent a total of 1,724 days at sea as compared with 1,287 days at sea for the 13 ships in 1949 and 1,186 days at sea for the 10 ships in 1948.

Today we have in numbers, although not in formations of men trained and ready to fit into their places in a division, the equivalent of more than a division. If that is taken as the way in which to count the divisional slice, and I suggest that any counting of a divisional slice is a very arbitrary operation and one would have to probe very carefully into any figures given, such as those by the Alsop brothers or any other writers, to make sure of the basis on which they are given, we have a divisional slice which is about half of what we had during the war and considerably less than the reported divisional slice for either the United Kingdom or the United States.

For air forces the test is the number of hours flown per aircraft per month, and in this respect the performance of the R.C.A.F. compares favourably with that of other countries.

This does not mean that we will rest where we are, that this money will be wasted. All the measures of economy that the government, the Department of Finance, the treasury board, the Department of National Defence and the services can bring to bear will be brought to bear and we will see to it that the best possible use is made of this money.

In order that we may have the discussion of these estimates in the order most convenient to members, I would suggest that we follow the practice of recent years. This is entirely a matter for the committee and there is no thought of binding it, but it would be a desirable thing and I am sure one that would meet the views of all quarters of the house if hon. members wishing to make statements about defence generally should do so at the outset. We could then follow with a detailed consideration of the estimates beginning at page 269, taking the main heads in the following order: administration, inspection services, civil defence—I would point out that, since the responsibility for civil defence was transferred to the Minister of National Health and Welfare by an order in council dated February 23, this branch of activity falls under that minister and I expect he will be here to make a short statement and to answer any questions—imperial war graves commission, navy, army, air force, defence research, mutual aid, grants, et cetera, pensions.

I repeat that the aim of all this is not war, but peace, peace through the prevention of aggression. With the great efforts being put forth in other countries as well as in Canada, it is our hope, yes, our belief, that we will be able to achieve our objective and preserve peace. With our freedom in the balance, this great effort must be taken and must succeed.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, the method of examining these estimates suggested by the minister will, I feel sure, be acceptable to members on this side of the house. Before passing on to the detailed examination of the estimates, I should like to make a few general remarks on the question of defence. In doing so I cannot help but recall the fact that today is the 8th day of May, and the 8th day of May is generally known as V-E day. It is a strange coincidence that on the anniversary of the day when in northwest Europe the cease fire was sounded there will again be Canadian troops landing on foreign soil with many of their former allies in pursuit of those same high ideals.

It has been my privilege, and perhaps my misfortune, to follow the minister immediately after he has completed his statement on the presentation of his annual estimates for the past five or six years. Over this period of time the world situation has demanded a progressively greater proportion of our national budget to be allocated to national defence. Conscious of the deteriorating international situation, the official opposition has never placed any obstacle in the way of the government in raising the funds which the minister has considered necessary to provide this country with reasonable measures of defence. On the contrary, the opposition has frequently taken a lead in urging more effective defence measures and asking for more adequate forces than were being provided in the minister's forecasts in previous years.

We have felt all too frequently in the past that the government has failed to take a realistic view of the state of our armed forces, and that it also failed to relate the state of those forces in true perspective to the dangers which were facing this and other free nations. I am inclined to think that if more heed had been paid to our warnings the development of our forces would have been further advanced today than it is. I am perfectly conscious that I shall be told that the development of such inventions as modern radar, the F-86E and the CF-100 could not have proceeded any faster than it has. I admit quite freely that two years ago I criticized the then F-86, but the F-86 of two years ago and the F-86E of today are quite different aircraft. The F-86E of today has far more thrust and ability to climb, and greater manœuvrability than the original F-86 ever had.

Perhaps if we had gone ahead and developed the F-86 two years ago we should not have had the same efficient machine that is now being developed, but there are many other fields of activity in which it would have been safe to have gone ahead. We could have increased the number of men and generally raised the state of our armed forces to a much higher degree of efficiency than they have at the present time if the government had listened more to the warnings of the opposition. If that had been done, as the minister has said this afternoon, it would not have been necessary to allocate such a large sum of money for defence as is to be spent this year, the sum of $1,879 million.

Parliament is asked to provide that sum of money to be expended during the present year. If that amount of money had been spread more evenly over the past three years, shall we say, the inflationary tendencies which are so evident today would have been curbed, and also much of the material which we are now purchasing in competition with a booming civilian market could have been purchased at cheaper prices. Thus by delaying war preparedness until this time the government has tended to increase inflation and thereby has placed an additional burden on the taxpayers by increasing the cost of living. I feel that essential materials could have been purchased two, three or four years ago at much reduced prices to those now being paid.

However, I do not intend to engage in what might be called the not unattractive pastime of "I told you so". The recorded debates of this house bear ample evidence of my claim that the opposition has applied the spur to the minister more frequently than the curb.

It has never been an easy task to follow the minister's carefully prepared statement. We have no indication of what is going to be disclosed before the minister makes his statement. The opposition's difficulties are aggravated by a lack of information, and any suggestions which have been advanced to try to make the task of constructive criticism easier for the opposition have been frowned upon by the minister as is the case whenever it has been suggested that a defence committee would assist in that manner.

Today we are perhaps in a little better position than we have been in previous years because the government's program for defence preparedness was announced early in February. Later statements have amplified the general program, and even the white paper issued last night is in the main an amplification of the previous announcements. The minister's speech today, towards the end, most certainly gave us additional information. A good deal of time, not unnaturally, was spent on a historical review of what has been happening in Korea, although at one period in his remarks I thought that we had perhaps wandered into the public accounts committee as he went into considerable detail of how the money had been spent over the last two or three years.

However, he did not follow up that discussion to its logical conclusion by telling us how much of the appropriations is to be allotted for tanks and other equipment out of this year's program. He contented himself by telling us how much had been spent on those particular articles in years gone by. I hope that when we get into the detailed discussion of the various items the minister will then be able to enlighten us and will give us a break-down in corresponding detail, if that is possible.

Recognizing these limitations upon the opposition, Mr. Chairman, we shall do our best to offer some comments on the government's defence program and the manner in which it is proposed to allot the moneys parliament is now being asked to provide in order to implement that program. Before reviewing the program itself, however, I should like to join with the minister and pay my tribute and the tribute of the opposition members to the gallant men of the Royal Canadian Navy now serving in far eastern waters with the various Canadian destroyers; to the men of the 25th brigade now in Korea; and to the men of 426 transport squadron of the R.C.A.F. It goes without saying that in the past months these men have lived up to the highest traditions of Canadians who in previous wars have fought for the freedom of this land, and that they will continue to do so in future.

As in previous wars, all parts of Canada are represented. I was pleased to hear the minister refer to the contribution being made by the province of Quebec and our French-speaking Canadians. When I went to Fort Lewis in January I was impressed by the efficiency of the Royal 22nd Regiment, both the second and third battalions, and by French-speaking soldiers serving with other units, who did not come solely from the province of Quebec. I endorse what the minister has said, and add that I believe all sections of this country have responded to the call equally in proportion to the population of the various racial divisions of our country. While at Fort Lewis I was impressed by the similarity of outlook in all units, and by the spirit of true comradeship which existed not only within the units themselves but between the various units of the brigade. There was a common desire to do the job at hand, with little or no unhealthy rivalry as between the various units. Nor would I like this occasion to pass without making reference to the sacrifices being made by our allies whose forces are fighting in Korea under the flag of the United Nations. It was with particular interest that we read a few days ago of the magnificent stand made by the Gloucestershire Regiment. I single out that regiment because for many years the Gloucestershire has been allied with the senior infantry regiment in the Canadian army, the Royal Canadian Regiment. It is of interest to note that once again the Gloucestershire Regiment and the Royal Canadian Regiment will be fighting side by side.

The estimates we are now to consider are designed to implement the program first announced by the minister on February 5 and repeated on several occasions since. The international background which has necessitated these expanded defence measures was explained in the house yesterday. It is a confused and complex situation, which has forced many nations to abandon their traditional foreign policies. There is an indication that for many years we shall have to live in an atmosphere of high tension. There can be no peace with the rulers in the Kremlin, because there is no basis of understanding with men whose superiority complex and sense of omnipotence would mould all the peoples of this planet into their way of thinking. Yet there must be no war, in spite of an understandable desire to cut short this period of tension. Thus we have the paradoxical situation of no peace and no war. To that end the free nations must be strong enough to thwart communist designs for world-wide aggression, and at the same time must exercise sufficient restraint to make the enemy realize that we will not easily be provoked into open warfare.

The blueprint of the government's program to meet this ambiguous situation was announced on February 5, when it received the general support of the opposition. In very brief outline the blueprint, if I may call it such, indicates that there will be 100 ships in the Royal Canadian Navy, with many small craft, either new or refitted or newly armed. As far as the army is concerned there will be the airborne striking force, anti-aircraft artillery and other units for the defence of Canada against direct attack. There will be the part of the army with General Eisenhower's force. The extent of that contribution was announced just a couple of days ago; we are to raise, train and equip the 27th brigade. Part of the Canadian force will still be serving in the Far East, and steps are to be taken to rotate the personnel who are there. In addition we are to maintain administrative staff, training establishments, depots, stores, clothing and equipment to provide for rapid mobilization should a total war effort be required. When we turn to the Royal Canadian Air Force, we are to have forty regular and reserve squadrons with more than 3,000 aircraft in addition to those we now have. There is to be an extension of the radar system, which is to be fully manned. In Europe we are to have an air division of some eleven fighter squadrons, and airfields, men and equipment to train large numbers of aircrew for ourselves and other countries.

That, in brief, is the blueprint of the program. We are told that in order to carry out these commitments the strength of the service is to be increased to about 115,000 full-time, active service personnel, and the minister repeated that figure today. That, I fear, is an understatement of the manpower requirement. I feel it is a miscalculation which may throw out of gear the whole concept of our plan. I do not believe 115,000 men will be sufficient to meet all those commitments which were announced on February 5 and repeated today.

Mr. Claxton: Later I said it would be over 115,000.

Mr. Pearkes: The figure previously announced was 115,000, and I do not feel that this would meet all the commitments that have been indicated. The minister has stressed the accelerated recruitment. In previous discussions during this session I said, and I meant it, that we should endeavour to assist the minister to obtain the men that are required. I believe that many members on all sides of the house have already lent their aid and influence in the recruiting of the personnel required.

During the first three months of this year there has been a steady increase, though I do not think it is a spectacular increase. For the navy, at the end of 1950, there were 10,184, all ranks; by the end of March, according to the figures published in this white paper, there were 11,082. The increase from the end of the year for the army was from 32,456 to 34,986; for the R.C.A.F., from 18,436 to 22,359. From the figures which were given by the minister a few minutes ago it would seem that the same rate of increase was maintained during the month of April, roughly speaking about 2,000 for all three services every month. We must face up to the fact that the early months of any year is the period of time when there is more unemployment in the land. I believe one would be optimistic to believe that for the next three months we shall be able to maintain that same rate of increase. I hope we can, but it may require renewed and more vigorous efforts on the part of the government.

There is a point regarding this recruitment which I believe should be brought to the committee's attention. These men have been recruited, may I say, in the haphazard manner in which Canada has always mobilized her manpower for war. Little, if any, consideration has been given to the needs of industry, agriculture or war industry. Lessons that might have been learned, I fear, have not been heeded. Even when this government at the beginning of this session, prompted by outside sources, set up a manpower advisory council, we find that that council has been submerged in a morass of procrastination. The council was authorized on February 1, and since that date has held but one meeting. Thus we drift along in the same old way, leaving it entirely to chance whether a recruit volunteers for service in the particular section of the armed forces for which he is best suited, if indeed he is better suited for the armed forces than for defence production, industry or agriculture. The decision is left entirely to the recruit who, having very little knowledge of the requirements, must decide between the appeals of the minister for defence and the minister for defence production. The delay in calling a second meeting of this manpower advisory council is, in my opinion, unforgivable.

I hope that the same haste will not be displayed in the recruiting of the 27th brigade that was seen during the period of the recruitment of the Korean force. I am rather suspicious of the figures which were announced by the minister today, 1,200 applications having been received during the first day of recruiting for the 27th brigade. The result of that hasty recruiting for the Korean force was that over 700 men were discharged as being medically unfit, and others were discharged within a few months for other reasons. There is not the same haste today to recruit the 27th brigade as there was to recruit the 25th brigade. Whether or not there is a need for speed, I do stress the importance of a thorough medical examination before anyone is enlisted into the force. Time will be saved in the long run, and a great deal of expense will be saved the Canadian taxpayers.

The minister stated that the recruiting drive to mobilize the 27th brigade commenced yesterday. The difficulties and petty annoyances that arose in connection with the organization of the 25th brigade or the special Korean force will, I hope, be avoided. On the fourth of May the minister stated that there is only one Canadian army today, and that is a most desirable condition. I hope that ideal will be maintained. We came very close to having a two-army system last fall as a result of the manner in which the special force was raised. Figures have been given concerning the supply of officers for the services. While it may be comforting to know —these figures were given in the white paper —that there is available a pool of some 57,000 veteran officers from world war II, we must not overlook the fact that advancing years will disqualify, if they have not already done so, many of these veteran officers. Young leaders are required. I was rather surprised at the very small quotas which had been allotted to the officers' training establishment in the various universities. According to figures which were given to me in reply to a question I asked a few days ago to all intents and purposes the universities across the country reached the quotas which were allocated to them. This is an indication that the universities and the university students are prepared to do, and are doing, their full share in this respect.

Mr. Claxton: The quotas were virtually adjusted to what the universities could do. We hope they are going to do more.

Mr. Pearkes: As I say, practically every university fulfilled the quota which had been given to it. I believe that is very commendable, but I am going to ask you to increase those quotas in the future.

Mr. Claxton: We shall ask them to do everything they can.

Mr. Pearkes: There is no obligation upon these university students who go through officer training classes to join one or the other of the services. At the same time, that is a method which has created an available pool of young leaders, and I have sufficient confidence in young Canada to believe a large proportion of them will respond to the call.

In view of the expansion contemplated for the forces, and the officer requirement, I am wondering whether we are getting full value from the two service colleges. I am inclined to think that the four-year course, without the obligation of joining the active forces at the conclusion of those four years, may be a luxury which we can hardly afforded to maintain in the present crisis. It may therefore be necessary at this time to introduce some modification of the terms for admittance to those colleges and the length of the various courses; because the output from those colleges at the present time is almost negligible in relation to the demand.

I have just one other observation to make with regard to state-assisted education. It does not always seem to produce the results that are expected. Many veterans of world war II were given college educations at the conclusion of hostilities, in accordance with the rehabilitation plan. I sincerely hope that the other professions have responded more readily than has the medical profession; because I was greatly surprised to find that only two medical officers with the Korean force were medical men who were not in the active army. I do not think that fact reflects high credit on the medical profession as a whole and I cannot help wondering—and I should like the minister to be able to tell me—what percentage of the technical officers trained under our rehabilitation plan after the last war are now serving in the forces at the present time.

I now turn to another point. I cannot help expressing some regret at the indifferent results which have been achieved in the sphere of standardization of arms among the forces of the north Atlantic powers. That Canada should be in the process of exchanging United Kingdom types for United States types can hardly be called standardization. If we have sent to the United Kingdom equipment for three divisions for Europe, it has not yet been replaced by United States types. I would have hoped that we should have reached a stage by now when European countries and American countries could use far more of the same type of arms and equipment than they are apparently using today. Standardization has hardly begun. I hope that the government will use every effort to further the desirable objective of standardization which is required. There is still uncertainty even as to the type of rifle that the troops are to carry. When that decision is made as to what rifle we in Canada are to have, I hope that we shall at least see the three services carrying the same rifle.

The same uncertainty exists in regard to the light machine gun. Is it still to be the Bren gun? If so, it should be remodelled to conform either with the British .280 or with the United States .300. If we are to keep it, a decision must be reached to remodel the Bren gun along one of those lines; or, if we are going to discard it altogether, then the sooner we know what is to replace it, the better. You cannot go into action with a small unit having many different calibres of ammunition.

Another point on the same matter of arms is this. We note that some 400 3·7″ ack-ack guns have been sent to Europe. These are to be replaced by United States 90 millimetre guns.

Mr. Claxton: Excuse me, they have not been sent; they will be sent if arrangements can be made.

Mr. Pearkes: Oh, they will be sent? The wording I have here is that they have been sent, but apparently that is an error. I hope that no time will be lost between the date when these 3·7's go and the date when the 90 millimetre guns replace them.

To come to the question of armament within the services, in previous years the minister has made much of the unification among the three services. We find that this policy in some respects does not appear to be continuing; in fact, it appears to be discontinued at least in so far as the operation, maintenance and repair of motor transport is concerned because each of the armed services—the navy, the army and the air force—has now reverted to its own methods of maintenance and has assumed the responsibility for the repair of its own vehicles.

Surely the maintenance of motor vehicles of a similar type should have been co-ordinated and should remain co-ordinated and uniform if the principle of unification is to hold. Has that principle of unification failed? Or is the desire to work together lacking amongst some of the forces? A co-ordinated or unified policy, though the various services may at times have to go through a slimming process, is far more likely to produce economical and effective results than is a system under which each of the services is working on its own. I cannot help feeling that the reversal of this policy with respect to the care, maintenance, operation and repair of motor vehicles is detrimental. I have never known an admiral, a general or an air marshal who did not begin by asking for more than his share of anything. With social security expenditures as they are today, it becomes all the more necessary that the department should place orders only for military stores which are absolutely essential.

I have a few remarks I wish to make with regard to the navy. The role of the navy has, I think, been described in this way: The primary responsibility of the Royal Canadian Navy is that of anti-submarine activities. It is interesting to note that with the outbreak of world war I German submarine attacks struck a serious blow at the Royal Navy by sinking three British cruisers in home waters. This success was followed, both in world war I and in world war II, by submarine attacks on warships, merchant vessels and upon the life line of the nations then at war. Between 1914 and 1918, 4,837 merchant ships were sunk. In world war II 2,775 merchant ships were sunk. During those two wars the submarine came nearer than any other weapon to causing our defeat. Since the cessation of hostilities in world war II great developments have taken place, so far as submarine warfare is concerned. According to the semi-official publication, Jane's Fighting Ships, the Russians have some 750 modern submarines at the present time. Anti-submarine defence demands closely co-ordinated teams to search out and to destroy hostile submerged craft. Obviously the inclusion of aircraft in these anti-submarine teams is indicated. It may be assumed that landbased aircraft would be useful within certain specific distances, provided suitable airfields are available on each coast. But for mid-ocean operations it is still I believe the opinion of naval authorities that the air component of these teams can best be supplied by a carrier.

The experience of the last war indicated that carrier-borne aircraft could keep submarine sinkings down. Fighter aircraft, as well as reconnaissance aircraft, must be included in our anti-submarine teams. For years the minister has been calling attention to the development of our new anti-submarine vessels. I do not know how much longer we are to wait for the commissioning of these vessels. I hope every effort will be made to speed up the construction of these new anti-submarine vessels, so that we may not have to rely solely upon the reconverting of the older types.

Today Canada really has no effective anti-submarine teams. During the past year Magnificent, accompanied by destroyers, carried out training cruises in anti-submarine warfare. If those tests proved anything, they showed the ineffectiveness and vulnerability of the combination. Magnificent is out of date, and the 16 Sea Furies and 20 Firefly aircraft of the skeleton air groups are totally inadequate for the protection of our two oceans.

Nor can Magnificent take on her landing decks modern aircraft of the jet-propelled type used in submarine searches. It will be necessary in a very short time either to remodel Magnificent or to exchange her for another more up-to-date vessel.

I repeat the statement I made a year ago, that if it is considered desirable for an aircraft carrier to be maintained on the Atlantic, with some four naval aviation squadrons, then some protection of a similar nature should be provided for the Pacific, where the ocean spaces are wider and the facilities for land-based aircraft are less, because the coastal airfields on the Pacific coast have not been maintained adequately since the war.

Reference was made a year ago to the division of the Royal Canadian Navy into operational and training groups. To what extent has that policy been developed? I understand that our second cruiser is being recommissioned. When I first suggested this to the minister he advised me that this was not desirable because the cruiser strength of the United Nations was considered more than adequate. What is the reason for this change in policy in less than twelve months? Is the cruiser Uganda, now renamed Quebec, to be used purely as a training ship, like Ontario? I presume that is the reason.

That brings me to the point as to whether or not these cruisers are really the best type of ship to provide the opportunities we require for the training of navy personnel to meet the role envisaged for the Royal Canadian Navy, namely that of anti-submarine warfare. Cruisers are expensive ships to maintain. Official figures indicate that it cost over $10,000 a day to operate and maintain Ontario at sea. Of course it costs nothing like that amount to operate and maintain a destroyer. Consideration should be given to the point of whether we can afford to maintain ships of the Ontario type purely for training purposes when, as I say, it costs over $10,000 a day while they are at sea.

The minister indicated that nearly one hundred ships and many small craft, either new or refitted, will be commissioned during the next three years. This will provide a very considerable force, but I suggest that far more information is required on the subject, which I hope the minister will be able to give when we are dealing with details. Numbers may be grossly misleading. It is obviously a waste of money, though, to keep obsolete ships in reserve. Of course it would be a waste of the lives of young Canadians to man old outworn ships for another shooting war; but we cannot or should not keep in reserve obsolete ships in our yards.

In reply to an official request I was informed that it costs $133 a day to keep a destroyer in reserve, and $83 to keep a frigate. One can see that these figures quickly mount up. If we are to obtain no value from keeping these ships in reserve, then I suggest it would be much better to send them to the scrap pile and have them broken up for steel.

I should like to say this regarding the army. Now is the time to consider providing winter quarters for such troops as will be in training next winter. We cannot afford the luxury of sending troops out of the country, with additional pay, because we do not have winter training quarters. I would ask the minister, when he replies, to tell us how much it is costing the country in additional pay to send the troops to Fort Lewis. I do not know whether the United States asked rental for their buildings, but I suggest we should have information on that point.

Mr. Claxton: I should be glad to give it. They made a very fair arrangement.

Mr. Pearkes: I have only one or two remarks to make concerning the Royal Canadian Air Force. I should like to sound a warning about the multiplicity of types. I hope we will concentrate on those essential types which will fit in with our particular role. I was not impressed with the marine reconnaissance aircraft being converted from the Lancaster that I saw recently. I question very much whether that would be a suitable type.

I know it will take another year before the full results can be seen from the construction of our new aircraft. We should not delay in getting crews ready so that as soon as these plants go into full production the crews will be ready and available to man the aircraft.

I hope that the minister will give the minister who is responsible for civilian defence an opportunity to make a statement before we go into a detailed consideration of the various items. There might be some general remarks we should like to have. As far as this government considers it necessary to raise troops for the defence of Canada, to repress aggression and for the maintenance of those ideals and principles which all three nations have, they will never find the opposition putting obstacles in the way of any well thought out plan.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, this discussion today on defence estimates follows logically the discussion we had yesterday on external affairs. After all, the necessity for defence arises out of the international situation. I think if the people of Canada understand the international situation they will be glad indeed to do what the hon. member for Nanaimo has just suggested, act in unity to prevent aggression against this country and the overthrow of the institutions of democracy which mankind possesses.

In his introductory remarks this afternoon the minister recognized that defence involves more than military preparedness. As I would have expected him to do, he remarked that if we are going to maintain unity in our country and across the world for the defence of democratic institutions we must embark on plans to raise the standards of living and to safeguard and even extend the freedoms that we have. With that sentiment I agree thoroughly.

I want also to join with the hon. member for Nanaimo and the minister in paying a brief tribute to our armed forces fighting in Korea, the army in the field, the navy in the adjacent waters and the R.C.A.F. squadron which is participating in that remarkable airlift from North America to Japan. I think Canada can be proud of those men. In expressing pride in their achievements one also would like to express deep sympathy with those who mourn the loss of the young men who have fallen already in Korea.

It was indeed satisfactory that the minister was able to place before the committee evidence that the appeal by the armed forces has met with response from all parts of Canada, that no part has fallen down in providing its quota of young men for the forces of Canada. I remember the occasion in late September 1944 when I, along with the hon. member for Melfort and the hon. member for Cape Breton South, made up the first civilian party from Canada to visit the cemetery at Dieppe. At that time not all the crosses had been erected, but I remember so well walking down the rows of crosses and noting the names, largely those of the men in whom I was interested, those of the South Saskatchewan Regiment. I noted that these names indicated various religious and racial backgrounds, French, Ukrainian, Jewish, Scandinavian, English, Polish, even German and so on. There they were lying together in the cemetery representing the diverse peoples who are helping to build this Canada of ours.

I am going to ask the minister if anything is being done similar to that which was done in the last war to inform the young men who are fighting in the Korean war as to what they are fighting for. I remember I asked this question last September. It was prompted by the fact that on a previous Sunday evening I had heard a broadcast of a discussion between a Toronto newspaperman and United States reporters in Tokyo. The newspaperman was J. B. McGeachy and he was asking what had been done to inform the young men who were fighting as to what they were fighting for. I remember that the United States correspondents in Tokyo could not answer that question; indeed they did not seem to understand what the question involved.

About a week or ten days ago I was visited by a Canadian lady and gentleman who have a son, a lieutenant, in the United States air forces. That son is back in the United States having suffered injuries in Korea. They had visited him and his comrades in hospital. They told me that that lad and the young men with him were puzzled as to why they had been in Korea and for what they were fighting in that country. When hon. members get the Ottawa Citizen a little later this evening, if they will turn to the editorial page they will find some questions asked by a Canadian journalist and answers by another Canadian journalist, who is also apparently an editor of Maclean's magazine and recently returned from Korea. The first question was whether our boys overseas know what they are fighting for and what it is all about. The answer given is that most of the officers know, but almost invariably the men cannot answer the question as to why they are there and what they are fighting for.

Since we were so successful in the last war in informing the young men in the armed forces of Canada and in the allied forces as to what the war was all about, I think steps should be taken again to inform the young men engaged in the struggle in Korea as to why they are there and what they are fighting for. I believe that they are there because an act of aggression was committed by North Korean forces last June. They are fighting to prevent further communist aggression in other places in the future. That is one point the department might keep in mind.

Last autumn and again yesterday I said that in building up our defence forces I think the first step should be, and it may still be advisable to do it, to make a thorough appraisal of our resources. I noted that the hon. member for Nanaimo in the excellent speech he made a few minutes ago spoke of present recruiting and the necessity of considering the interests of industry and agriculture, both vital to our defence effort. It seems to me that in order to do that efficiently we need to have an appraisal of our manpower resources to a greater extent than is being made by the manpower committee. Further, that appraisal should also involve an appraisal of the industrial possibilities of Canada, of agriculture and of our natural resources because should war come I think that Canada's principal contribution may still be not in the realm of armed forces but rather, remote as we hope to be although we may not be altogether as remote as the last time from the threat of bombing, that we may be called upon to contribute very heavily to the equipment of such armed forces as there may be and for the production of vast quantities of food and raw materials. Therefore we need to adopt a policy of defence which involves more than merely the provision of armed forces, although that must be a vital part of any defence effort that we make.

In that connection we have to consider the relationship of several fields of defence in which we may be called upon to operate. First there is Canada's own defence, including of course civilian defence against the effects of spasmodic bombing. Then there is our continental defence, our contribution to the defence of the northern part of North America, because perchance this time there may be sporadic raids across the pole, across Siberia, over Alaska, and attempts made indeed to land raiding parties from the air to dislocate our industrial life through the northern reaches of our country. Third, we have of course the obligations we have assumed under the North Atlantic alliance. Lastly, there are our obligations under the United Nations. The obligations that we have thus assumed are very great, very wide. They will demand a great expenditure of effort and of money on the part of Canada.

One of the first things that could have been done, I think, in placing the problem of defence before the house was for the minister, and indeed other members of the government, to have made very comprehensive statements regarding our obligations, and what we are expected to do in the respective fields in which we have made most substantial commitments. You know, from listening to the ministers, and from reading the transcripts of the discussions in the public accounts committee, I think the position of Canada seems to be that which was stated in yesterday's issue of Time magazine with relation to Washington. Hon. members who have read it will probably remember that the article contained the following:

> What could a nation make of a leadership whose top military men discoursed confidently of their forces, not the forces of today, but what they plan to have two years from now?

It seems to me that one of the weaknesses in our discussions of defence is that we are talking about the equipment, men and so on that we expect to have two years from now, and we are not paying sufficient attention as a parliament to what we already have. I say to the minister that I think some opportunity should be given hon. members to understand more precisely what the government is doing. I think there would be much more confidence in the department if hon. members were better informed as to what the department is actually doing. I remember that during the last war we had a war expenditures committee. That committee met in camera quite often. Officials of the department came before the committee, and we were often given quite vital and confidential information regarding equipment, supplies, and new methods of war.

I remember very distinctly that some quite secret and confidential explosives were shown to us long before they were used. Their use was explained and the reason why we had appropriated sums of money in order that the experiments leading up to the production of the explosives might be made. In parliament we have no means of knowing exactly what the government is doing in many respects. Obviously, there are some questions that hon. members are reluctant to ask on the floor of the house or in a committee of this description, but they are questions which should be answered. As I said, I think that a committee like the war expenditures committee, before which departmental officials could appear, and to which information could be given which in the interests of security could not be given in committee of supply or in a public session of the house, should be set up in order that those members of the house who would be members of the committee would be able to reassure their colleagues in the same confidential manner.

In the second world war I do not remember a single instance during the existence of the war expenditures committee when anything of a secret or confidential nature was divulged improperly. I think it would be well if something of that sort could be done again in the interests of unity in the house, and in order to give the house confidence in the defence administration and the country confidence in its parliament. Someone has said that the public accounts committee can make inquiries, but the public accounts committee is limited to the fiscal year ending on the 31st of March, 1950, the last public accounts available.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Fourteen months ago.

Mr. Coldwell: Fourteen months ago, precisely. We want to know what has transpired during the fourteen months that have elapsed. When the house adopted Bill No. 133 last year we surrendered a good many of our rights to the government and to the Department of National Defence. The measure gave the cabinet power to decide the number and extent of the armed forces, for example, something which prior to that time always had to be approved by parliament. We gave the minister great powers under that measure. I think the house agreed to the bill rather reluctantly because we believed that there was tremendous urgency to get certain things done, and we were very uncertain as to what was going to happen in the immediate future. But what progress has been made during the past year in obtaining the equipment for which large sums have been appropriated? This afternoon the minister mentioned many millions of dollars of equipment authorized through defence production, but how much of that equipment has been obtained? To what extent has defence production placed orders for that equipment with the industrial groups which can provide it? In February the hon. member for Moose Jaw asked some questions and on February 23 this year a return was brought down. The questions were these:

> Since June, 1950, have any defence contracts been placed with (a) Ford Motor Company; (b) General Motors; (c) Chrysler Motor Corporation; (d) Studebaker of Canada?

The answers were:

> (a) Yes; (b) yes; (c) yes; (d) no.

Then there was this further question:

> If so, what was the dollar value of contracts placed with each company?

The answer was:

> (a) $606,229; (b) $939,546; (c) $939,437; (d) nil.

The next question was:

> Has any of the equipment been actually turned over to the defence forces?

The answer was yes; but as of that date in February, defence contracts for transportation equipment and so on had been let to the extent of only two and a half million dollars, and apparently the situation is not very much better now. I have a Canadian Press dispatch dated Windsor, April 30, 1951, containing a report of the annual statement of the president of the Ford Motor Company to his shareholders, and I think perhaps I had better read it in case the minister should want to comment on it:

In his annual report to shareholders here today, Rhys M. Sale, president of Ford of Canada, said he wanted to "clear the air" of misleading and conflicting stories about the defence production role of his company by saying that "up to this moment" Ford has not been called upon to participate in the national preparedness program.

After reporting that 800 workers had been laid off because necessary steel parts were not available from the United States, Mr. Sale said it would be wasteful for any part of the Ford plant or any number of its workers to stand idle when Canada needs to strengthen its defensive power.

Mr. Sale announced that a major expansion in manufacturing facilities will get under way at the giant Windsor plant "as soon as circumstances permit." He added the company is not yet ready to announce the nature of the project.

The Ford president said, however, that work on a large central parts depot here, as well as similar depots at Montreal and Regina has been held up indefinitely because the company has been unable to obtain construction permits from Ottawa Mr. Sale said "almost daily increases in material costs and a further demand for substantial wage increases" may leave the company with no alternative but to raise prices on its products.

Mr. Sale said the company has had an inquiry from the government about producing a special military jeep. If the company got the contract, he remarked, it would not "provide an answer, in any sense, to the possible unemployment problem that may result from material shortages or reduced sales."

To me that statement is very disturbing, first because it indicates a failure to grant the necessary permits—though this does not concern the minister—for the expansion of the industry when material becomes available; and that in the face of the needs the minister outlined this afternoon. It is disturbing in the second place because it indicates a lack of co-operation between the United States and Canada in the matter of certain parts and supplies; and the third reason it is disturbing, of course, is because of the prospect of unemployment in the industry. It further indicates, of course, that rising prices may once again reduce the value of our defence dollar.

These are matters of the type into which more careful inquiry should be made than is possible in this committee, or during a formal house debate. A special committee of parliament, similar to the committee on war expenditures which we had during the last war and which functioned so well, I think would be useful and would be warranted. Then we are told there is some difficulty due to the hesitation of the United States in placing substantial orders in Canada in order that we may get the necessary United States dollars with which to buy parts in that country. I noticed that early last month the Minister of National Defence made a speech in New York in which he said the Canadian government had placed $159 million in firm orders in the United States for various defence materials, as against only $9 million of firm United States orders placed in Canada; and I believe he also said we expected to place something like $300 million of orders in the United States in the current financial year. Is our production being retarded through lack of co-operation by the United States in the provision of vital parts? If so, I think publicity should be given the matter, and every effort should be made to remedy the situation. I have no doubt that has been done already.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Certainly, though I may not be able to answer it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member read Mr. Sale's speech, in which he said work was being held up because of the failure to grant permits. What permits were those; from our own government departments?

Mr. Coldwell: I presume they would be from another government department—defence production.

Mr. Hellyer: If the hon. member would permit me, I understood those permits were for the construction of warehouse facilities for Ford parts in different locations in Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: It does not say that. The president said:

—work on a large central parts depot here, as well as similar depots at Montreal and Regina has been held up indefinitely because the company has been unable to obtain construction permits from Ottawa.

Mr. Croll: But they are not doing war work.

Mr. Coldwell: My interpretation would be that these warehouses or depots would be needed in part for the storage of parts required by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no; we have our own.

Mr. Coldwell: If Mr. Sale has conveyed a wrong impression, the minister can clear it up in the house. I cannot clear it up because I am not aware of what was in Mr. Sale's mind when he made the statement. The figures I have put on record, however, are not those of Mr. Sale; they are official figures brought down by the government and placed on the records of this house something less than three months ago.

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. member will permit me, I think in fairness to all concerned it should be said that between questions and answers, assertions outside the house and comments inside the house, the situation has become far from clear. Either my colleague the Minister of Defence Production, under whose jurisdiction these matters come, or I should make an effort later on to clear it up. It should not be allowed to remain as it appears in the record now.

Mr. Coldwell: That is one of the indications about which I am complaining; that this house is not well informed on a good many things—

Mr. Claxton: There is very good reason for that here.

Mr. Coldwell: —as to what the government is doing or what the policy is. As a member of this house I am not well informed on such matters because we do not get the information that we require. There is no facility for getting it at the present time. Let us have a committee like the war expenditures committee in which we can get the information, and get matters straightened out.

Another question I am going to ask is this. To what extent do customs duties and red tape interfere with the exchange of supplies and commodities amongst the north Atlantic nations? I understand that there is free entry, on a reciprocal basis, of war equipment and the personal belongings of people who are engaged in active service, but that that does not apply to component parts which are purchased by firms engaged on defence contracts. That may be one of the answers to the minister's complaint that only $9 million worth of orders have been placed in Canada by the United States. It may be that the United States tariff wall makes it difficult for United States manufacturers to buy in Canada. If that is so, we should know something about it when we are discussing agreements like the Geneva agreement and, as we shall be soon, the Torquay agreement. We should know about these matters instead of having to glean them from press reports, which I admit I have been doing in trying to understand what we are doing in relation to war equipment.

What is the state of our equipment? This morning my colleague the hon. member for Moose Jaw who is on the public accounts committee, in reply to a question, was told that on March 31, 1950, we did not possess a single modern tank. He was told that in the public accounts committee this morning. In reply to a subsequent question, I understand he was told we had a few now. In other words, it is unlikely that we had a single modern tank to send to Korea last autumn.

Mr. Claxton: We sent self-propelled guns from our own stock that were as good for the purpose as any.

Mr. Coldwell: I am talking about the information that was given in the public accounts committee this morning. I have no doubt that the minister will have a very good reply to what I am saying. What I am complaining about is that this parliament does not know. I am not attacking the minister or his department. I am urging that in the interests of national unity, and our effort in this defence field, this parliament should know what is being done in order that we can assure our constituents that everything is in good shape. As a matter of fact, I have no doubt that some of the questions the members would like to ask would elicit confidential information. Again I say that is one of the reasons I said, at the very outset of my remarks, we should have a committee of the house to which information could be given that could not perhaps be spread all across the pages of Hansard.

The member for Nanaimo mentioned jeeps. I want to ask the minister if the manufacture of jeeps in this country has been held up because of difficulties with patents. Is that so? If it is so, then efforts should be made to overcome that difficulty. I was a member of the house in May 1940, and I recall that when calamity faced us at Dunkirk the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was the minister of munitions and supply, came before the house and told us we could not proceed with the manufacture of certain vital materials in this country because we could not get the blueprints. We had not control of the patents either, and yet we were all ready to produce the equipment that the allies needed in the worst possible way. Let us see there is no repetition of that. I should like the minister to tell me if that is the situation now, and if so what we are doing about it.

There is the question of standardization. I am not going particularly into this this afternoon because the hon. member for Nanaimo dealt with it. But I have wondered if we are integrating our forces, as we are in Korea, with British formations—apparently that will be the case in western Europe—whether we are wise in adopting United States equipment. I believe that every attempt should be made, as the hon. member suggested a few moments ago, to have standardized equipment amongst all the Atlantic alliance nations. I believe that should be done, but at least we should standardize our equipment with the formations with which our soldiers may have to work in Europe or anywhere else.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In the commonwealth division.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, if we are integrated in the commonwealth formation we should have common commonwealth equipment.

The minister also mentioned aircraft. According to the record we apparently spent $30 million in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950, yet I cannot see in the record that any plane was produced. Immediately I say that, I know the difficulty of getting the tools and all the rest of it for new types of planes. But that was in the year 1950. For 1951 we have been told the expenditure was greater than $30 million, how much greater I do not know because we have not the record before us. Is it correct that only two CF-100 planes were produced during that year, one of which was subsequently lost? This afternoon the minister said we would be getting some F-86's. Have we any yet? Have any been turned out on the assembly line? We do not know. The government is responsible to this house, but we members of the house are responsible to our constituents. We are responsible to the people who expect this department to defend them. We are responsible to the people whose taxes will provide the money to purchase that equipment, and there is not one of us who can answer the two questions that I have just asked. The minister may answer them or he may not answer them. It may not be advisable to answer them. Again, that is an answer that could be given to a confidential committee or a committee sitting in camera.

Of course, these questions are asked in the public accounts committee, a public meeting. I can understand the reluctance to answer these questions, and I am not pressing that such questions should be answered.

Mr. Claxton: Both those questions have already been answered.

Mr. Coldwell: Have they been answered?

Mr. Claxton: The information is quite widely known publicly.

Mr. Coldwell: Then I have not seen it in the record or in the press, so I must have missed something.

The hon. member for Nanaimo touched on the question of co-ordinating the forces of Canada. According to the records of the last war the lack of co-ordination created some difficulties. I suppose in order to bring about some co-ordination the government recently appointed a chairman of the staff committee, Lieutenant General Foulkes. I do not know what his authority is or what his powers are. Does it mean that, in effect, we now have a supreme commander of our Canadian forces, and that this has not only been done to co-ordinate the forces of Canada but to eliminate the kind of rivalry one is bound to find when you have three organizations under three separate heads more or less independent except that they are answerable to the minister? I believe some mention should be made of the fact that there is considerable duplication of effort in these three services. As far as I know only one service of great importance to the three forces is unified; I refer to the dental service. We have three medical corps, three nursing services and three hospital services. It seems to me, as it has always seemed, that there is no reason in the world why we could not have one medical, nursing and hospital service in the armed forces of Canada and thus prevent the duplication and apparent waste of medical personnel that has occurred. I know of course that where you have a hospital in an area under control of one of the forces, members of the other armed forces are admitted to it. But in the interests of economy and efficiency in administration, I think that one over-all medical, nursing and hospital plan would eliminate a good deal of waste and a good deal of duplication in the armed services.

The same thing applies, of course, to many of the supplies. I have even read that there is not a common attestation form for the three forces, and that each force has its own types of stationery, forms and all that kind of thing, when many of them might be common to them all.

Let me say just one other word—I will try to conclude now—and that has to do with the reserve forces. I noted what the minister said some time ago, namely that after all the reserve force must be the foundation of the armed forces of Canada. When we look at the record in the report of the Minister of National Defence for the year ending March 31, 1950, we note this in appendix 3 on page 88. If we look at the reserve force, making a comparison with the years 1937-38 or 1935-36 and coming right down to 1949-50, which is the best year since 1945-46, we find 43,047 in the reserve force in 1949-50. In 1939-40 we had 46,855; in 1938-39 we had 51,418; and in 1937-38 we had 45,631 and so on back to 1925-26 when we had 49,075. In other words, the numbers in the reserve force at the moment are low in comparison with the number prior to the second world war.

The minister this afternoon perhaps gave a partial explanation of that fact when he said that they had called on the reserve force to provide companies or groups to join some of the famous regiments of Canada. That may in part account for this fact. But at the same time I think that all of us in the House of Commons should endeavour to assist the minister and the department in getting young men in the country to train in the reserve force. I think many hon. members have done so. At the same time I think that the department should consider ways and means of offering to young men more inducements than now exist to join the reserve force. I know a suggestion has been made that any pay they receive in connection with the reserve force should be exempt from income tax. Another suggestion that has been made is that they should be allowed something for transportation when they have to travel to the armouries, that better facilities should be provided for training and so on. I think that anything within reason the department can do to make the reserve force more attractive should be done.

All parties in this chamber want to avoid anything in the nature of compulsion. Therefore, because we believe that we should have recruiting for all our armed forces on a voluntary basis, we should co-operate with the department as closely as we can in order to get the results that are necessary. I think the minister is quite right in stating that in the past the reserve forces have been the basis upon which the active forces, when they were needed, were formed and from which recruits were obtained.

There were several other matters about which I intended to say something, but another opportunity will be provided in the discussion on the estimates. I want to assure the minister that the points I have raised this afternoon have been raised in order that members of the House of Commons, and myself as a member, may be informed more completely of what the situation is in the realm of national defence and of what the department and the government are doing to see that the moneys we are appropriating are well spent.

Mr. Claxton: That is one of the purposes of the committee of supply.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

RUTHENIAN GREEK CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 174, respecting the Ruthenian Greek Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Canada—Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East)—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Name changed.

The Deputy Chairman: This bill has been considered carefully by the committee on miscellaneous private bills, and is now before the committee of the whole.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member for Edmonton East or the hon. member for Comox-Alberni explain the purpose of the bill?

The Deputy Chairman: The purpose of the bill was explained on first reading. Then it went through second reading and was referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills. It is now to be studied clause by clause. Clause 1 is before the committee.

Mr. Green: Apparently the bill was reported back with an amendment. What is the amendment?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That can be explained when we reach the amended section.

The Deputy Chairman: Section 1 was amended, and also section 5. In both sections the words "Central Canada" were replaced by the word "Manitoba". If hon. members will look at the fourth line of the first section they will see that the words "Central Canada" have been replaced by the word "Manitoba". The same obtains in the tenth line of section 5.

DIVORCE BILLS FOR CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider orders 29 to 98 inclusive, being Bills Nos. 103 to 114, 119 to 129, 132 to 146, 149 to 168, 170, 171 and 178 to 187.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand it is proper under standing order 110 for one motion to be made to cover all these bills, so far as referring them to the committee of the whole is concerned, but am I correct in understanding that when we get into committee of the whole it is our right to ask that they be called one at a time?

Mr. Speaker: I would not like to take upon myself the duties of the chairman of committees. I suggest the question will have to be raised there, in committee. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; house in committee of the whole on divorce bills. Shall clause 1 of these bills carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I submit it is the right of members of the committee to ask that these bills be called separately, and each bill clause by clause, in keeping with the provisions of standing order 76 and citation 669 in Beauchesne, third edition. I would so request, that they be called one at a time.

The Deputy Chairman: I agree with the hon. member that it is his right to ask that these bills be considered individually. However, if he has particular objection to one or two of the bills, perhaps we might proceed to consider the others as a group, and then the bills to which he objects could be considered separately.

Mr. Knowles: No; I wish to ask questions of the sponsor with respect to each of the bills.

The Deputy Chairman: In which case we will now call Bill No. 103, an act for the relief of Eileen McDermott McRandall.

EILEEN MCDERMOTT MCRANDALL

The house in committee on Bill No. 103 for the relief of Eileen McDermott McRandall —Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 1.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee understands my feelings, that if parliament insists that we are going to deal with these divorce bills here, then we should deal with them in a responsible manner. I do not think we should just pass them en masse without getting certain information, and making sure that we are competent in each case to pass the bill. I would ask the hon. member for Lisgar, who is responsible for the bill, if there are any children in this family?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Winkler: Perhaps I might be permitted to say at this point—and this will probably answer a number of other questions the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might ask—that these bills may be sponsored by any member of the House of Commons. In recent years it has been the practice to send bills to the chairman of the committee for signature.

I have done some research work, although possibly not in any amount comparable with that done by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in an effort to find out the responsibilities of a member sponsoring these bills, and particularly the responsibilities of the chairman of the committee. I found in the fourth edition of Bourinot that divorces were granted as early as 1835, which was long before confederation, and that at the time of confederation parliament was given jurisdiction over divorce. Therefore it has been more or less an accomplished proceeding. Looking at the Votes and Proceedings for May 1, I find, as indicated at page 326, that a long list of divorce bills was presented to the house. These bills have been sent to us from the other house, which recommends that the marriages be dissolved and asks that we give consideration to their adoption. I am sorry I cannot locate the exact words. In view of that, when these bills are sent to my office from the office of the Clerk I sign them without any hesitation. I do not even look at the name on the bill. I take it for granted that the thing has been gone into thoroughly in the other house and that is sufficient for me.

I have satisfied myself that the other house is quite competent in every respect to deal with these things. When they send bills to this house asking for our approval, I am quite satisfied to sign them. I do not think it is my duty to do research work on all these bills and find out particulars such as those asked for by the hon. member in regard to children and dependents. That matter is considered most carefully in every divorce petition.

I do not see why I should be compelled to make statistics which any hon. member can make for himself. He can have his stenographer study the reports which are sent to every member of parliament and make any statistics he wishes. I would be permanently busy making statistics in regard to divorce bills if I were so inclined. Until I have some positive instructions in that regard I do not intend to do anything about it. Consequently I cannot give the hon. member the information he asks for. I have looked into some of these proceedings, but unless I am given other instructions in that regard I do not intend to make up statistics in regard to the details of these bills.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lisgar knows full well that when I speak on this matter I am not speaking against him personally in any way whatsoever. He and I are good friends. But it does seem to me that what he has said just now makes the practice through which we go in this House of Commons even more ridiculous than it seemed before. The hon. member permits his name to appear on the order paper two or three hundred times a year as the sponsor of these bills and he now tells us that he signs his name to these bills as chairman of the committee on miscellaneous private bills without even looking to see what names are involved in the divorces he sponsors.

He may be signing his name some day to a bill which will break up one of the happy families around this house. I suggest that he should be more careful. The hon. member has suggested that if I want the information I started to ask for I could ask my stenographer to read these reports that come to our desks and compile the information. I have more respect for my stenographer than to ask her to undertake that kind of chore. As a matter of fact I do not think that any of us were sent here by our constituents to do the kind of research work that is suggested. The hon. member is suggesting that we should go through these cases individually in order to get any information that we may want.

I do not know the parties involved in this first bill. As is her right, Mrs. McRandall has come to parliament to ask for a divorce, and no doubt she is entitled to it. But surely this House of Commons should not be asked to approve of this bill without our being able to get information along the lines I have suggested. It seems to me that we should know whether the McRandalls had any children and, if so, what arrangements have been made for them or what arrangements are contemplated.

My understanding is that an act of parliament dissolving a marriage does not deal with the children at all. I understand that if there are children, proceedings must be taken before an appropriate court. I think we should know the circumstances in that connection before we are asked to approve of this divorce. We should know whether the sponsor of this bill is satisfied that Mrs. McRandall is the innocent party. We should know whether there has been proof that there was no collusion leading up to the petition for divorce. In view of the fact that parliament has decided that we are not going to transfer this business somewhere else, we as responsible members of parliament should undertake this job in a responsible way and find out whether we are competent to grant the divorce set out in Bill No. 103.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is making an appropriate and effective protest against this method of dealing with divorce. There are over 100 bills in this list and we are asked to give approval without having any knowledge of what is involved. It is all very well to say that a committee in the other place does go into each case separately. I am free to confess that after having seen what is done there on one or two occasions the inquiry is not as perfunctory as it appeared to be at one time. But none the less I think it is time that this House of Commons objected to this manner of dealing with the solemn matter of the dissolution of marriage.

I do not think divorce should be encouraged; indeed I believe quite the opposite, but none the less if divorce is requested by an aggrieved person, that divorce should be granted only after a proper judicial inquiry. I know that two provinces object to the establishment of courts for the granting of divorce and hence these divorce bills are before us tonight. None the less I do not think anyone could object if some facilities were provided in one of our federal courts for an aggrieved person to plead his or her case for divorce. We have got to recognize that we have the divorce problem with us, that we have these bills coming before parliament regularly at every session, and therefore that there is divorce. If we are going to have divorce let us have it done after a proper and decent investigation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I interject that we are on clause 1, and we should not be discussing the principle of divorce nor the methods which are provided for the passage of these divorce bills. What we are discussing now is clause 1 of Bill No. 103, to dissolve the marriage between Eileen McDermott McRandall and Henry McRandall.

Mr. Coldwell: I think perhaps your point is well taken, Mr. Chairman, and I am not objecting to it. If we cannot discuss the principle, however, then the only thing for us to do is to rise and ask for particulars of every one of these divorce bills as they are called.

Private Bills—Divorce

LAURICE MARY MICHEL SHATILLA

The house in committee on Bill No. 104, for the relief of Laurice Mary Michel Shatilla —Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Does the sponsor of this bill or anyone else know any of the particulars in connection with this case? Are there any children?

Mr. McIlraith: Did you read the evidence?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If you want to know something why do you not read the evidence?

Mr. Knowles: Members opposite are asking me if I have read the evidence. I have the evidence in my office. It is a pile more than a foot high.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then why not read it if you are that curious?

Mr. Knowles: Because there are other things more important to the people of Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The evidence is quite often a racket.

Mr. Knowles: There are things of more importance to the people of Winnipeg North Centre, and I am sure they do not expect me to spend my time reading the pile of evidence that we receive in connection with these divorce cases. My point is that we should not be dealing with these matters, but we are. If we have accepted the job, if a majority of the house says we should do the job, then let us do it properly.

An hon. Member: Go ahead. Read it.

Mr. Knowles: Therefore I ask whether in this case the couple had any children? If so, what arrangements are being made for the children? Which of the parties was the guilty one? Is this committee satisfied that it is competent to pass the bill and dissolve this marriage?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, may I preface my remarks by saying that I am against all these bills. I would go further than the hon. gentleman. I am against divorce, and I would vote against every one. We have the printed evidence in each of these cases.

Mr. Knowles: Have you read it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, because I am against divorce and I do not want to read these things; but if you are so curious about the details, whether or not they have children and so on, read the evidence. You will find it there. If you want to know who is at fault you will find it there, and the evidence is taken under oath. The matter was before a committee of the other place where they have experienced men. If you are still not satisfied with that evidence why do you not stand up and vote against them? That is what I would do. I would stand up and vote against them. I am against these things. I do not like them, but while parliament is charged under our constitution with this work why not do it?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak on these bills, but I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite in order in speaking on them and asking for information if he wants it. What amazes me is to find members of this house who are opposed to divorce and yet are in favour of facilitating the passage of these bills through the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, I know that I cannot speak on the principle of divorce, but what the hon. gentleman has said brings me into the debate again. I have never done anything to facilitate the passing of any divorce bills. I object at every session to the passing of them, and I have cried "on division" nearly every time they have come up. I understand that if parliament does not want to deal with these bills the only way to show that they do not want to do so is to throw them out.

Mr. Gibson: That is unfair.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When you try to discuss them and tell us—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Public Works rose on a point of order. Surely he is getting beyond his point of order. He should not make a speech.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On the point of order, I want the hon. gentleman to withdraw the remark that I have helped to facilitate the passing of these bills. I have never done anything of the kind.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not going to withdraw anything of the kind.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think there is a misunderstanding. The hon. member for Vancouver East did say that some hon. members who are opposed to divorce were facilitating the passage of these bills. The Minister of Public Works explained—and apparently he was one of those to whom the hon. member referred—that he had never done anything to facilitate the passage of these bills. I possibly should have told the Minister of Public Works that his point was not perhaps a point of order but a personal explanation of what his attitude is. Therefore the hon. member does not have to withdraw anything, but he has to accept the statement of the minister as to his attitude.

Mr. MacInnis: I will be very glad to accept his statement. Now may I put my own construction on the statement? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was asking for information with respect to each of these bills.

Mr. Hellyer: Why?

Mr. MacInnis: You ask him why. He was asking for information with regard to these bills because he wanted to know.

An hon. Member: Usually he can read.

Mr. MacInnis: Every bit of information, every question that he asked would hold up this and other divorce bills and make it more difficult to get them through the house. Yet my hon. friend gets up and finds fault with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He says: Why ask for your information here? Why don't you read the evidence that is placed in your mailbox every day?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: He does not have to do that. He can ask for the information here. Others who take the same position as the minister jeer when a statement like that is made. We should be consistent about these things. We should not make a virtue of getting up and saying we are opposed to divorce and then object when somebody is really opposing it.

Mr. Fair: The Minister of Public Works has said that those who do not approve of these bills should get up and vote against them. He tells us at the same time that he is opposed to them, that he votes against them and calls "on division". I suggest to the members of the house including the Minister of Public Works, that they should vote for or against every bill that is brought in here. We will see then where the Minister of Public Works stands, whether he means what he has told us.

Mr. Gibson: Let us waste everybody's time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will vote right now. I am against each and every one of them.

Mr. Fair: That is the one way that we will get rid of divorce bills which we have been talking against for the past fifteen years.

Mr. Chevrier: Get rid of a lot of tripe.

Mr. Fair: Do not make a joke of parliament any more. Let us accept the invitation of the Minister of Public Works and vote against these bills. It will be the proper way to get rid of them.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On division.

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Chairman. The longer this goes on the more ridiculous it becomes. The Minister of Public Works says —and I know that it is perfectly true—that he is against divorce lock, stock and barrel, and that he will vote against every divorce bill on which a vote is called. Yet he objects to my asking questions about the case of Mrs. Laurice Mary Michel Shatilla which is before us at the present time. My views are not the same as those of the Minister of Public Works. I do not like divorce. I deplore it just as much as anyone in this house. But, as has been said so well by the hon. member for Vancouver East on other occasions, I do not see that we enhance the sanctity of marriage by forcing people to remain together when love has gone. It may be that under the laws of this country Mrs. Shatilla has every right to claim a divorce. As the laws of Canada now stand the only way she can get that divorce is by coming to this parliament. If a vote is called without the sponsor giving us any information, I do not think she should suffer and be denied that right, and I would vote for the bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Without the information?

Mr. Knowles: Absolutely; even though it may seem a ridiculous position.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The ridiculous position in which you are putting yourself.

Mr. Knowles: It is the ridiculous position in which parliament is putting itself. Those who are opposed to divorce want to get the bills through. Some of the rest of us who admit there are occasions when divorces have to be granted do not like this way of dealing with it. But if we are forced to say yes or no as to whether Mrs. Shatilla should get her divorce, in the absence of anything to show it should not be granted I would say parliament should give it to her. But I submit that parliament is being completely irresponsible in just putting these bills through without getting the information. This is only the second bill tonight. The chairman will confirm that I asked questions on both of them, directly on the bill, refraining from discussing the whole matter of the practice. The discussion has gone into that matter, because we cannot get from the sponsor of these bills the answer to even such a simple question as whether or not any children are involved in the marriage.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not going to prolong the debate, but in case there should be a vote on any of these bills I want to make my position clear. I am going to vote in favour of every bill that comes here after being passed through the other place and receiving the endorsation of the committee to which it has been referred, until such time as this parliament provides another court for these people to apply for their divorces. As long as we refuse to give these people what they are entitled to by the laws of this country, I am going to vote for every divorce bill that comes properly to this house.

MIHALY KOVACS

The house in committee on Bill No. 105, for the relief of Mihaly Kovacs—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member for Lisgar know anything about this couple?

Mr. Winkler: I have looked into a great number of these bills. I have made a long list of answers, having to do with the children and all that sort of thing. But I thought it would be useless to bring it here, because after those simple questions had been answered I could think of a dozen more the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and many others could ask. They could keep us here indefinitely, so I do not intend to bring that list here unless I am instructed to do so by the committee.

REBECCA GLICOFSKY BROWN

The house in committee on Bill No. 106, for the relief of Rebecca Glicofsky Brown—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Can the sponsor of this bill tell us where Mrs. Brown lives?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think it would expedite the business of the committee if hon. members would refrain from interjecting remarks. Instead they should stand up and take part in the debate in an orderly manner, if they so wish.

Mr. Winkler: In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I do not know where Mrs. Brown lives. If I did he would probably ask for her telephone number.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not think that would be like him. The sponsor of the bill apparently does not know any more about the circumstances surrounding this matter than we do. Apparently he does not pay any more attention to the transcripts of evidence than we do or the Minister of Public Works does. If these bills are voted upon separately I would divide with my colleagues and vote against them, because I do not believe we should vote for bills of this description without knowing something of the circumstances. Even if it is rather annoying to hon. members I would hope we might get the information. Failing that, I would hope hon. members might decide that some representations should be made so we can amend this method of granting divorces in this country, which is obnoxious to so many in this house.

Mr. Hansell: I have spoken on a good many of these bills throughout the years. I find myself in the same position as others, that parliament is required to do something it does not want to do because of the method by which these matters are dealt with. That is why I often speak on these divorce bills. I am not against divorce when the reason for it has been absolutely proved. Sometimes I rise to oppose a bill when the reason has not been proven. I am afraid you are going to call me to order pretty soon, Mr. Chairman; but in connection with the questions asked the sponsor of these bills may I suggest the fact that he is the sponsor of all these bills—

Mr. Sinclair: Not all.

Mr. Hansell: Well, pretty nearly all the divorce bills. This indicates that the whole thing is a formality, and I do not think that should be so. Other bills brought into this house are sent to other committees. Suppose the same situation should arise in the discussion of one of those other bills; the sponsor of the bill, who might be a cabinet minister, would rise to say, "I am sorry; I have not read the committee's report. I have not read the evidence to see why the bill should be passed. I am not in possession of the facts." We would say, "Well, you had better obtain all the facts." I am not suggesting that the hon. member for Lisgar should become familiar with all the facts concerning such a tremendous number of cases, but there is something he could do. It is not necessary for him as chairman of that committee to sponsor all these bills. They could be sponsored by thirty or forty or fifty members who could familiarize themselves with the facts and be able to tell this committee that the reason for which divorce is granted has been absolutely and soundly proven. For that reason, I protest the bills going through in this fashion. I might say that I am a member of the private bills committee. We do discuss some of these bills that go through. If we have any protest to make, we can make that protest in committee. I have no criticism of the hon. member for Lisgar in the way he conducts that committee. I believe he does a good job of it. If any of us do not want any of the bills to go through, he is quite willing to hear our reasons when we are in committee. But it does seem to me that a committee of this house should divide its work up in such a fashion that, if we are going to deal with these things, we could deal with them properly.

There is another matter, Mr. Chairman. There is a note of levity sounded when we deal with these bills. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that these bills are all very serious. They are serious for the reason that they have to do with one of the most valuable heritages any nation has, and that is the heritage of the home. Every one of these bills means that a home is being broken. Perhaps it is already broken. I do not know. I believe that we should be very careful about them, and should conduct these matters in a serious manner.

Mr. Winkler: I just want to say one thing in reply to the hon. member who was good enough to say some kind words about our committee, and the way it is conducted. He brought up one matter, and I understood him to say the sponsor of the bill should be familiar with the facts. I believe that is the essence of the whole matter. I have gone to the Senate divorce committee and listened to several of the cases. I have come to the conclusion that a mere reading of the evidence is not sufficient. Unless one is there to hear the witnesses and listen to the evidence, he is not really in possession of the facts. For that reason I am satisfied, as chairman of the committee, to sponsor any bills that are sent to me from the Senate committee.

Mr. Coldwell: There is the very point. We are acting as a court without seeing the witnesses. No judge would give a verdict on merely reading written evidence.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Except perhaps on appeal cases. I am not sufficiently familiar with law courts, since I am not a lawyer, but I would say that in cases which affect human relations judges want to see the witnesses and hear the evidence. These bills affect human relations. I do not think there is any question about that. My reading of law and procedure—I am rather fond of legal biography incidentally and I read it occasionally—is that the judge often comes to a conclusion in directing the jury and the jury comes to a conclusion on seeing the behaviour of the witnesses in the box. I have every respect for the hon. member for Lisgar and have no criticism of him. I am sure he would always try to be fair. I believe, however, that we have to protest this procedure.

SELMA ROKOWSKY KIRZNER

The house in committee on Bill No. 107, for the relief of Selma Rokowsky Kirzner—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: May I join in the tribute paid by the hon. member for Macleod to the hon. member for Lisgar?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I suggest that from now on we proceed strictly in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Knowles: Very well. May I ask the hon. member for Lisgar to take my compliment for granted, and I shall ask whether or not these parties had been married previous to this marriage?

Mr. Winkler: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, is there no question about these bills to which we can get an answer? I do not blame the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Read the evidence.

Mr. Knowles: I submit that the house is asking the hon. member to do something that is completely unfair, to sponsor a bill about which he has no information at all. I should like to know whether these two people are Canadian citizens; and where they came from, if they came from outside of Canada. I should like to know if there are any children, and what arrangements have been made with respect to those children. I should like to know if we are competent to decide that this person is the innocent party, and that she should be granted the divorce. I may say that I discovered on some former occasions, when bills of this character were before the house, amendments have been moved seeking to deny to the guilty party the right to marry again; that is my reason for asking my last question. I think we should know whether the party to whom we are asked to give relief is really the innocent party.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, standing order No. 76 requires that clauses be called one at a time in the committee stage. I thought I heard you ask if the bill carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Since the committee started on these bills no questions have been asked on section 2, and I thought it would save time if I asked whether the bill carried. I shall now call section 2.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, could we have a copy of the bill? If we are to deal with a particular clause, it is rather difficult when we have not a copy of the bill here. I think this is a disgraceful performance myself.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand the bills have been distributed, and perhaps the hon. member will find them underneath his desk. I am informed by the clerk that these bills are put in the mail boxes.

Mr. Knowles: There would not be room for them under our desks.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have not said anything at all on this subject yet, Mr. Chairman. I sympathize with the chairman of this committee for having to go through this ordeal so often. He has pointed out that a reading of the evidence is not sufficient, and that if one does not see the witnesses he is greatly handicapped.

[Mr. Winkler.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We have had a lengthy debate on the principle of divorce and this procedure. I believe everyone will agree that in this instance the chairman has been most lenient. A moment ago I asked the members to proceed strictly in accordance with the rules. I ask that the remarks being made be strictly relevant to the section.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I believe we should have a vote on the principle of this bill right now.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. Ross (Souris): No.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill if section 2 of Bill No. 107 is in the same form as is generally the case for these bills?

Mr. Winkler: I have not a copy of the bill before me, but I understand they are all identical.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe we should be certain they are identical before we pass the section. Could we have section 2 read?

The Deputy Chairman: Section 2 reads:

The said Selma Rokowsky may at any time hereafter marry any man whom she might lawfully marry if the said marriage with the said Elijahu Kirzner had not been solemnized.

Shall section 2 carry?

FERDINAND LANGLOIS

The house in committee on Bill No. 108, for the relief of Ferdinand Langlois—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I was just going to ask whether the sponsor knows in what province this case originated, and whether the language of the bill is the same as the language of the other bills from which section 2 was read a moment ago. Perhaps he could tell me if there are any children involved in this case.

Mr. Winkler: The same answer applies; no information, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Coldwell: No information, the sponsor says. I wonder what we are going to do about it, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Vote against it.

Mr. Coldwell: There are other members of the standing committee here. I can quite sympathize with the chairman, in his inability to read all these bills. But there are other members of the standing committee here. Perhaps some other hon. member of that committee can answer the question that I have just asked. I should like to know if there is anybody in the committee who knows the circumstances of this divorce action.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Ross (Souris): No, Mr. Chairman. We wish to protest this bill right now. There is no evidence and there is nothing else—

The Deputy Chairman: I suppose that I should point out to the hon. member for Souris that what is before the committee now is clause 1. He said that he protests the bill. What is before the committee now is clause 1. Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: Clause 1 is the operative clause, is it not, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: That does not matter. There could be a vote on clause 1; there could be a vote on clause 2; there could be a vote when I ask if the preamble carries; there could be a vote when I ask if the bill carries. If some hon. members say no, then the next question is: Those in favour of clause 1 will please say yea.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

The Deputy Chairman: We are on clause 1 now. Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of clause 1 will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Deputy Chairman: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

Mr. Knowles: Before section 1, which is the one that would dissolve this marriage, is carried, may I ask if the sponsor has been able to collect any information since the last time I put a question to him?

Mr. Fulton: Repeat the question.

Mr. Knowles: I asked the sponsor of this bill if he had been able to collect any information concerning the parties whose marriage is dissolved by clause 1.

Mr. Winkler: I have the same information that the hon. member has.

Mr. Knowles: That, Mr. Chairman, is no information at all. I may have the information concerning this couple piled up in my room, but I certainly do not have it here.

An hon. Member: Why ask for it?

Mr. Knowles: I take it that some hon. members have come in since we started. If we are going to deal with Bill No. 109, letter Z-3 of the Senate, it is a bill going through parliament on the same basis as that on which other bills go through parliament and my view is that we should deal with it in a responsible manner. We should have some of the information—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member is discussing procedure again. I do not think it is in order to discuss procedure.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO RESULTS OF TORQUAY CONFERENCE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if we may revert to motions, I should like to make a statement on the tariff negotiations at Torquay.

The tariff negotiations in which Canada participated at Torquay were concluded on April 21, and the results will be made public tomorrow by the countries which were involved. This was the third round of negotiations under the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The first round took place in Geneva in 1947, and the second in Annecy in 1949. At Geneva, twenty-three countries entered into tariff negotiations and drew up the general agreement on tariffs and trade governing the conduct of their trade relations with one another. At Annecy a further group of countries acceded to the general agreement. My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), has just released the detailed results of Torquay to the press for publication.

For Canada, these negotiations have been a marked success. The sixteen new trade agreements which we have made at Torquay will add strength to Canada's commercial position. As a result of Torquay, producers and manufacturers in many of our export industries across the country will benefit from improved access to foreign markets.

Important products are included from each of the major regions across the country. To illustrate, and to use examples, among the tariff reductions received by Canada from other countries will be found fisheries products, of interest to Newfoundland and the maritimes; dairy products, forestry products and manufactured goods of interest to the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec; livestock, wheat and coarse grains of interest to the prairie provinces; and canned salmon, plywood and base metals, of interest to British Columbia. A variety of farm products, of interest to all farming regions, are represented among the concessions which have been received.

For the immediate future, we have few worries about the marketing of our produce in other countries. Indeed, we are faced with the necessity of curbing Canadian exports of certain materials of strategic importance, in the interest of the defence production program and military preparedness. The government's policy, however, has been to keep our long-run need for markets to the forefront, at all times. Our participation in the Torquay conference is concrete evidence of the importance we attach to the development of trade.

Trade Agreements

The most important single agreement at Torquay was made by Canada with the United States. The policy of fostering joint trade between Canada and the United States was initiated by the trade treaties of 1935 and 1938, and greatly extended in 1947 at Geneva. Torquay is now added, as a further and constructive milestone. The United States schedule of new tariff concessions resulting from Torquay contains 400 items of interest to Canadian exporters. Exports to the United States from Canada of goods in these categories amounted to $120 million in 1949.

United States legislation provides that their tariffs may be reduced, by negotiation, to fifty per cent of the levels which prevailed on January 1, 1945. At Geneva, in 1947, Canada had received from the United States a large proportion of the tariff concessions which were negotiable under the powers of the president. These had included important concessions on agricultural products. The United States administration still had power, nevertheless, to make a number of additional concessions of value to Canada. From our point of view, the Torquay negotiations were undertaken with the aim of obtaining for Canadian exporters as many of these additional concessions as possible. I am now in a position to inform hon. members that in this aim we have been eminently successful. We have, on our part, granted concessions in return, as my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), will announce and we have thereby increased the possibilities of joint trade. The new tariff rates negotiated with the United States will come into effect on both sides on June 6.

Among the concessions we have received from the United States are:

Cheddar cheese, which is now reduced from 3½ cents per pound but not less than 17½ per cent to 3 cents per pound but not less than 15 per cent;

Canned salmon, which is now reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent;

Aluminum and alloys, which are now reduced from 2 cents to 1½ cents per pound;

Lead, which is now reduced from 2⅛ cents to 1 1/16 cents per pound;

Zinc ores, which are now reduced from ¾ cent to ⅝ cent per pound;

Zinc blocks and pigs, which are now reduced from ⅞ cent to 7/10 cent per pound;

Douglas fir plywood, which is now reduced from 40 per cent to 20 per cent;

Birch plywood, which is now reduced from 20 to 15 per cent, supplementing the 5 per cent reduction made by the United States in 1949.

The United States, in addition, has granted numerous important cuts on its entire schedule of tariffs which apply to chemicals, and related products. These include important by-products of the pulp and paper industry, and a number of other products in which our chemical producers are interested. A list of farm products, of definite interest to Canada, has now been added by the United States to the extensive concessions it made in this field at Geneva. Besides Cheddar cheese, the new tariff reductions affect sheep and lambs, frozen blueberries, grapes, hybrid seed corn and mustard seed, amongst others. A substantial reduction was made in the tariff on Canadian whisky. For our coastal fisheries, the concession on canned salmon is accompanied by other concessions which include sardines, fresh mackerel, smoked or kippered herring, clams, fish oil, seal oil and whale oil.

Under the heading of wood and wood products, the important concessions received from the United States on plywoods are supplemented by reduced tariffs on packing boxes and shooks, for which the rate is now to be $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, and a variety of products manufactured of wood, such as paint brush handles, broom handles and hockey sticks.

Concessions from the United States on metals, and on a wide range of manufactured goods, will be of interest to Canadian manufacturers, who will find that increased opportunities have thus been provided for them to enter the United States market.

Of the sixteen trade agreements concluded by Canada at Torquay, seven were negotiated with important countries of western Europe. Our trade relations with France should be strengthened by the new agreement, which will lead to improved trade for both countries. The negotiations with France were conducted in a most cordial spirit and with the desire on both sides to accomplish the utmost in our common interests. The accession of western Germany has now strengthened the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Her concessions to Canada include farm products, fish, and a number of other commodities. The agreement with Germany is a good omen, that, once the economy of the federal German republic can be stabilized, there will be real opportunities for complementary trade with Canada. In addition, we have now renewed and extended our trade agreements with Italy, with each of the three Scandinavian countries, Norway, Sweden and Denmark, and we have made our first post-war trade agreement with Austria. Belgium remains, from our point of view, one of the best centres of trade on the continent of Europe. Her absence and the absence of Holland from the list of our new agreements is evidence mainly of the fact that our earlier agreements with the Benelux union left little scope for further improvement at Torquay.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has been unsparing in its efforts to expand and diversify our external markets. This group of new agreements made with important trading countries of western Europe, is illustrative of government policy in regard to exports. Turkey also became a signatory to the general agreement on tariffs and trade and, in addition, we are pleased to have been successful in concluding a tariff agreement with Turkey. Because of currency difficulties in recent years, all of the countries have been unable to buy our goods to the extent that, in other circumstances, they would have wished. Some of their difficulties are being overcome, however, and our trade relations are being strengthened for the future. As a North American country and a dollar country, Canada is anxious to trade with continental Europe, both to buy and to sell. As a member of the North Atlantic treaty organization, and as a country associated with the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, we are aware of the added strength which is given to common aims, by this closer cementing of our commercial ties with continental Europe.

Amongst the Asiatic countries, we concluded four new trade agreements at Torquay, one of these with our commonwealth partner India, and others with the Philippines, Indonesia and Korea. With war existing as a threat, and as a fact, in various parts of the Far East, we have welcomed the efforts made by these countries to participate constructively in the trade and tariffs agreements of the free world. With widespread aspirations for capital investment and development existing as a strong force throughout Asia, we have given our assistance wherever possible and have contributed to the development of reciprocal trade. In our tariff negotiations with the Philippines, we achieved a reduction in the preferential margins granted there to United States goods on a number of items, this being a step forward in overcoming part at least of the discrimination which has existed against Canadian goods. Reduction of preferential margins was obtained on wheat flour, agricultural implements, canned salmon, and a number of other items.

Amongst the Latin American countries, new agreements were concluded with the Dominican republic, Haiti, and Peru. An excellent agreement was made with the Dominican republic which granted Canada a number of concessions to supplement those we received at Annecy, including fisheries products and a variety of manufactured goods. Our agreement with Haiti is important, from our point of view, in overcoming a disadvantage which has been suffered in that market in the past by our exporters of fish in brine. At Torquay, Canada received most-favoured-nation treatment from Peru for the first time, an important objective which we have had in mind for a number of years. In addition, we received tariff concessions from Peru on smoked herring, apples, processed milk, canned fruits and vegetables, amongst others. These agreements, added to the ones which have been concluded during the past year with Venezuela, Costa Rica and Ecuador, go far to complete our structure of trade treaties with Latin American countries. Canadian exporters in a number of fields have wanted to expand their connections with Latin American markets and our trade promotion policy has been a vigorous one in that direction. This policy will be continued to the fullest extent possible, even during this period of defence preparations.

In the case of Cuba, I wish to make an announcement of considerable importance. The government of Canada has ensured the purchase on that market, by Canadian refineries or otherwise, of 75,000 short tons of Cuban raw sugar, within each of the calendar years 1951, 1952 and 1953, out of supplies made available by Cuba to the world market. The sugar purchased under this undertaking is to be shipped from Cuban ports, imported into, and not to be re-exported, from Canada. It is to be noted in this connection that purchases under this commitment will normally be made through the agency of private sugar refineries in Canada, and that no subsidization will be involved on the part of the government. A portion, however, of the most-favoured-nation duty will be remitted to the manufacturers, sufficient in amount to equalize the laid-down cost of Cuban sugar with the laid-down cost of preferential sugars from empire countries.

The sale of non-preferential sugars has reached very low levels in the Canadian market in the recent past. It was never intended that the effect of the preference, extended by Canada on sugar of empire origin, should be to exclude completely non-preferential sugars from our market. We have undertaken this new arrangement to ensure that at least some part of our total imports of sugar will be purchased from Cuba during the next three years. We are prepared, furthermore, to enter into similar arrangements with other traditional suppliers of non-preferential sugar to the Canadian market, it being understood that the total imports under all such arrangements will not be in excess of 150,000 short tons of raw sugar per year during each of the next three years. Under present supply conditions, it is not thought that producers of non-preferential sugars, other than Cuba, will be in a position to take full advantage of this arrangement for some time to come.

We have avoided, for the present, any impairment in the sugar preference which has traditionally been extended to the British West Indies and other suppliers of sugar within the commonwealth and empire. Canadian exporters, in recent years in particular, have been in search of external markets beyond those which are encompassed in the British preferential tariff system. The production of our export industries has grown enormously during this period since the second world war, while rigorous import restrictions have been enforced against Canadian goods throughout the British preferential area. These two factors in combination have created the necessity for Canadian exporters to extend their efforts beyond their traditional markets. In recent years, the difficulties we have encountered in the British West Indies have been extreme and have been remedied only in part by the recent relaxations of import controls effected there. It is natural, therefore, that there has been a growing interest in the Cuban market on the part of Canadian exporters, who have, at the same time, retained their traditional desire to trade with the British West Indies to the fullest extent possible.

The Cuban government has now undertaken to revalidate until January 1, 1954, important tariff concessions which were originally granted to Canada at Geneva, including amongst others, codfish, wheat flour and potatoes. This will be of definite interest to our maritime provinces. Cuba has withdrawn four detailed concessions from us which she made at Geneva. None of them has accounted for much trade, and Canada is being compensated by a small reduction in the Cuban duty on codfish.

While the new agreements made at Torquay provide a signal contribution to Canada's external trade policy, by far the most important accomplishment was the prolongation of the Geneva and Annecy schedules of tariff concessions. This has now been arranged for a firm period of three years, until January 1, 1954. Tariff concessions originally made by other countries at Geneva and Annecy were contractually bound only until January 1, 1951, after which they could be withdrawn upon due notice. When it is remembered that the twenty-three countries which participated at Geneva account for three-quarters of total world exports, it is clear how important is this matter of prolongation of the Geneva agreements, both for Canadian trade and for the stability of world trade. Concessions made to Canada at Geneva by the United States alone, covered in some fashion almost ninety-five per cent of total dutiable imports by the United States from Canada. Now these gains have been safeguarded for Canadian exporters for at least the next three years.

An opportunity was provided at Torquay for countries to exercise their right, under article XXVIII of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, to withdraw or modify items in their schedules of tariff concessions, in advance of prolonging these schedules for the next three years. Canada and the United States, and a number of major trading countries, undertook not to withdraw any concessions from one another, in the interest of maintaining their present agreements intact. As it turned out, we have succeeded in keeping to an absolute minimum the number of concessions withdrawn from Canada by other countries and compensation was received in every case. They are described in the information which is being made available to the press.

A good deal of attention has already been given to the fact that new agreements were not concluded at Torquay between the United States on the one side and the other commonwealth countries on the other. From the Canadian point of view, it is a matter of regret that these countries failed, at Torquay, to add to the substantial body of tariff concession which they made to one another at the earlier negotiations. It is to be emphasized at the same time, however, that all these countries still continue as full members of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Their trade agreements with one another, which have existed under the general agreement on tariffs and trade since 1947, are now carried forward virtually intact. I do not wish to intervene in any way in a matter for which the public explanation must come from the governments directly concerned. At the same time, it should be explained, for the benefit of hon. members, that the existing agreements between the United States and the commonwealth countries, other than ourselves, have not been impaired. What these countries have failed to gain is nothing more than the benefits which might otherwise have accrued from Torquay by reason of additions to their present agreements.

Before concluding this statement I should like to pay tribute to the team of officials which conducted the tariff negotiations on behalf of the Canadian government at Torquay. Small in number, the Canadian delegation carried on exacting and complicated discussions over a long period of months. I should like to pay special tribute to Mr. Hector McKinnon, who headed the group which carried on the tariff negotiations. The other members were:

C. M. Isbister, Department of Trade and Commerce; W. J. Callaghan, Department of Finance; A. E. Richards, Department of Agriculture; J. P. C. Gauthier, Department of Trade and Commerce; A. L. Neal, Department of Trade and Commerce; B. G. Barrow, Department of Trade and Commerce; H. V. Jarrett, Department of Trade and Commerce; S. S. Reisman, Department of Finance; and H. H. Wright, Department of External Affairs. From the Canadian point of view, Torquay succeeded in deepening and widening the channels of our export trade. The benefits of the new agreements will begin to accrue in the near future and their long-run importance is even greater. Taking into account the new countries which joined in the general agreement on tariffs and trade at Torquay, the total trade of GATT countries now accounts for about eighty-five per cent of the trade of the free world. This has been a great accomplishment of international organization during the past five years, and Canada has had a leading part in it. Whatever the future is to be, Canada and Canadian exporters have been well served by what has now been accomplished at Torquay.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to the remarks of my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), particularly as to the effect of the Torquay agreements on the Canadian customs tariff. In this connection I shall table at the conclusion of my statement the Canadian tariff schedule V which contains all the tariff reductions and bindings which were granted by Canada in the course of the Torquay conference. Copies will be available to all members of parliament tomorrow morning.

I do not have to remind members of the house that tariff negotiations are essentially a matter of bargaining, of give and take, in which countries agree to reduce their tariffs on some products in return for concessions on products in the other countries' tariff so that trade may expand to the mutual advantage of all concerned. In this broad international effort to reduce barriers to trade in the interests of our common prosperity, Canada has continued to play a leading role which is appropriate to our position as the third largest trading nation in the world.

I would like to take a moment to explain schedule V of the Torquay agreement, the significance of the tariff items and the rates expressed in it. The first and most important stage in the Torquay negotiations was the conclusion of separate agreements among pairs of participating countries. Altogether 147 such two-sided agreements were reached between the countries participating. Canada completed successful agreements with sixteen of these countries. As my colleague has already said, in these agreements Canada undertook not to raise for a period of three years its customs duties on the items specified in schedule V beyond the maximum rates stated therein. In return, of course, other countries gave corresponding undertakings in their tariff as explained by my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In some cases the rates shown in schedule V involve reductions from existing duties, while in other cases they represent bindings of existing rates against increase. There is a similar schedule of maximum rates of duty for each of the countries which took part in the negotiations, bound for a similar period of three years. Under the most-favoured-nation principle, all the concessions which Canada made are automatically extended to all the members of the group regardless of whether or not they negotiated directly with Canada. Similarly, the concessions of the other countries are automatically extended to Canada.

The Canadian schedule V is divided into two parts. Part I includes all the undertakings with respect to those countries to whom we grant most-favoured-nation treatment, and part II covers the undertakings made to those countries to whom we grant the preferential tariff. The concessions made in the most-favoured-nations part cover 397 items or subitems, of which 261 are reductions and 136 are bindings of existing rates. Canada's total imports from all countries under the 261 items or subitems on which the most-favoured-nations rate was reduced at Torquay amounted to about $390 million in 1949.

Part II of the Canadian schedule contains some seventy-five items or subitems on which reductions were made in the preferential tariff. These reductions should mean increased opportunities for the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries to export to the Canadian market.

I feel I should say a further word about the effect of Torquay on Canada's position with respect to the commonwealth preferential system, because I am afraid there has been some misunderstanding about this matter. To begin with, I would like to make quite clear to members of the house the conditions under which the Torquay negotiations were undertaken and conducted.

Under the rules governing the tariff conference at Torquay, as well as the previous conferences at Geneva and Annecy, it was provided that the reduction of preferences was to be one of the matters subject to negotiation. These rules state clearly that "prior international obligations shall not be invoked to frustrate negotiations with respect to preferences, it being understood that agreements which result from such negotiations and which conflict with such obligations shall not require the modification or termination of such obligations except with the consent of the parties to such obligations".

The rules go on to say that "no participating government shall be required to grant unilateral concessions or to grant concessions to other governments without receiving adequate concessions in return". It was clearly understood that no preferences need be reduced nor any tariff concessions granted except in return for reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions, and it was up to each country to decide what constituted a satisfactory agreement from its own point of view.

These rules governing the conduct of the Torquay negotiations with respect to preferences were accepted by all the participating countries, including all the commonwealth countries. Indeed, as a practical matter, it would be quite impossible for Canada or the other commonwealth countries to negotiate successful and mutually advantageous agreements with countries outside the preferential system unless they were prepared to negotiate on this basis. This is so because the Canadian tariff and the tariffs of the other commonwealth countries provide for a preferential treatment over pretty well the whole range of their tariffs.

This government has never taken a rigid or doctrinaire position on the matter of preferences either with respect to their retention or modification. For that matter, as members of the house will recall, Canada took the lead many years ago in granting preferential treatment to commonwealth countries. As hon. members know, we have used the device of commonwealth preferences as a device for expanding trade. We have never regarded it as a device for restricting trade.

Our objective has always been to expand trade on as wide a basis as possible. Indeed, this is the only way in which we can find adequate outlets for the products of our expanding economy. For this reason, while the government continues to attach a high importance to the development of intercommonwealth trade, it has never allowed our preferential arrangements to prevent us from taking advantage of new opportunities for expanding Canada's trade. In order to find adequate outlets for the products of the different regions and industries of this country, we must take advantage of such opportunities.

In the course of the Torquay tariff negotiations, as was the case at Geneva and Annecy, in order to obtain valuable concessions from the United States, western Europe and other non-commonwealth countries, we agreed to the modification and in some cases to the elimination of certain margins of preference. Having said this, I want to make it clear that Canada has not abandoned commonwealth preferences. These preferences have been modified in successive negotiations of trade agreements since 1935, but they are still an important part of our tariff structure.

I do not intend to take the time at this late hour to go into detail on the several hundred items contained in schedule V. This is being done in the information being released to the press this evening. I would like to say, however, that in making tariff reductions we have in many instances selected products which would, in these times of inflation and high prices, help to ease the burden for the Canadian consumer. In that connection, Canadian housewives will be interested in the reduction of the customs duty on such items as grapefruit juice, bananas, salt pork and beef, cocoa beans, walnuts, canned fish, and household matches. Of benefit to the consumer generally are the reductions on rubber tires, rubber hose, household furniture, hand tools, certain electrical appliances, and cutlery.

We have also tried to keep in mind the needs of Canadian industry and have made a number of important reductions in equipment, parts, and raw materials, which should contribute in a real way to lower costs of production—machinery of all kinds and parts thereof, motor vehicle parts, off-highway trucks, rayon yarn and rayon fabric, just to mention a few of the important products affected.

Of special interest to agriculture are the reductions on insecticides, baling wire, seed and grain cleaning machines, and electric motors for attachment to farm implements.

I know that members will be interested in knowing how soon the tariff reductions made by Canada will come into force. The concessions exchanged among Canada, the United States, France and a number of other countries will come into effect on June 6. These, I believe, cover by far the largest part of schedule V. The exact date on which Canada will extend concessions negotiated with the other countries depends on when they are in a position to take similar action. It is expected that all the Torquay concessions will be in force not later than November 20.

As in the case of the previous agreements, the tariff changes contained in schedule V will be brought into effect under the authority of section 11 of the customs tariff.

Mr. Speaker: It being after nine o'clock the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, it was very comforting and reassuring to hear the minister say, in closing his address this afternoon, that Canada is not at war. I am sorry he did not have the opportunity of seeing the five o'clock edition of this afternoon's Journal before making that remark. I have it before me, and these are the headlines: "Big force of Russian planes massed near Korea—Marshall." And directly underneath that: "Atomic fire rain no dream, says Martin, pleading for fighting Canadian spirit. 'Whip up fury against Soviet threat'." Another headline: "Red Japs not far from Japan." Then on the other side of the page: "British unit honoured on epic stand."

It seems to me the time has come to do away with these soft speeches, to let the people of Canada know we are in a very precarious position at the present time, and to give the people a little better knowledge of the enemy we are fighting. We may not be at war, but we are in a war, and in it right up to our necks. The last sentence in the white paper tabled by the minister has this to say:

> We must be prepared to meet either the challenge of general war or the continuation of effort over a generation.

That does not sound very much as though we were not at war. Probably we do not realize just how true that statement is. There can be no peace for any free country until the scourge of communism is wiped off the face of the earth. Let us not forget that at any time. We have been warned time and again by the various communist leaders that they intend to conquer the world and will let nothing stop them. In 1847 Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, in drawing up their communist manifesto, had this to say:

> The communists declare that their ends can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions.

In 1920 Lenin had this to say:

> It is necessary to use any ruse, evasion, cunning, unlawful methods, concealment of the truth. As long as capitalism and socialism exist we cannot live in peace.

That is the enemy we are fighting today, not only on the field of battle but in the cold war. The only way we can overcome communism is either by defeating it in an all-out war or by keeping our forces built up to such an extent that the communist forces will not dare attack the western powers, and keeping them that way until some internal revolution upsets the communist government in Russia. Those are the only two alternatives.

We cannot win this war by arms alone. We have to fight by means of propaganda and by feeding and clothing the undernourished peoples of the world. The Colombo plan as it is drafted is very commendable, but it is about twenty years too late. Now we have lost most of the Orient, because the only policy we had there in the early days was to get out of it everything we could and put back as little as we could get away with.

As far as the arms race is concerned, if we can believe press reports that we see from day to day Russia is far ahead, so far that it is going to take us a long time to catch up at the rate we are going, and maybe we will not have that time. I believe it was the hon. member for Acadia who on February 15 of this year placed on Hansard a quotation from the June, 1950, issue of United Nations World, which said Russia had 30 million trained men at her disposal. That was a year ago; we can draw our own conclusions as to what she may have today. On February 14 I placed on Hansard a quotation which said Russia was producing 400 jet planes a month. That same quotation said that the United States was only producing 250 planes per month of all types. Speaking of plane production, Mr. Chairman, only recently a number of members visited the Canadair plant in Montreal, and saw the possibility of producing numerous planes there. At that time some of us were told that the company was producing something like ten F-86 Sabres per month. If they were given the materials and manpower, they could produce ten per day. On page 6 of this white paper the minister says:

> The reason that radar and fighter defence is not already fully operational is that the radar, the type of communications selected and the aircraft—the F-86E Sabre and the CF-100 Canuck—have only been recently developed and have not yet been produced in the numbers required. As fast as aircraft can be produced, regular and auxiliary fighter squadrons will be manned and equipped to war strength. In the interim, the R.C.A.F. has mobile radar sets and Vampire and Mustang fighters.

If it is only a case of waiting for production of these types of planes, let us give them the men and materials and let them produce the planes. Then we can bring our forces up to strength. In a time like this nothing should stand in the way of defence production. We saw an exhibition put on by the CF-100 over a year ago. If all the prophecies and statements made regarding that particular aircraft are true, we certainly should have more than one in the air at this time. I believe we had two, but one of them crashed. After a year we have exactly one of the type of aircraft that Canada claims is the best of its kind in the world. We cannot spend all of our time experimenting. We have to make a start somewhere. We have these two types of planes, we have the means to produce them, so let us go ahead and produce them.

Over a year and a half ago. I asked the minister about anti-submarine vessels. He said there was a new type under consideration, and construction would start shortly. I believe the keel was laid in January, 1950—the minister can correct me if I am wrong. These ships, as well as these planes, have to be produced as quickly as possible. We cannot waste time, so let us get at it. This is a matter which concerns our very existence. It is not a game. It cannot be a game, because the other fellows will not play fair. If we are going to lick them, we will have to get to work and get into production. Korea is only the opening battle in this war. We have no reason to believe it will not spread until it is a global conflict. We must build up our forces and our armaments now. Canada has a three-year program under way, and that is fine. The program should have been started three years ago, because we do not know whether it will be a matter of weeks before we are actually engaged in battle either here or in Europe or some place else.

Speaking of being engaged in a battle, I do not believe the minister or anyone else in this house could convince those boys in the fox-holes in Korea that we are not in a war. If they are willing to give us all they have, surely the least we can do is to gear ourselves to maximum production to give them everything we can to help them along. We have no reason to believe that this war, when and if it breaks out, is going to be in Europe or in Asia or in Africa, the middle east or anywhere else. It may be right here. We also have no reason to believe that the Russians have not at this time, somewhere in the north, set up camouflaged rocket installations. It is not entirely beyond the realm of possibility.

Mr. Claxton: Where, in Canada?

Mr. Thomas: I said in the northern part of the country.

Mr. Claxton: There is no evidence whatever of that.

Mr. Thomas: That is right; there is no evidence whatever of it. You would not expect to have any evidence of it. Things will get hot enough around here if they are up there setting up those installations.

Mr. Claxton: They are not.

Mr. Thomas: We do not know. The minister says there is no evidence that they are. However, the north is quite a large territory, and I do not believe the minister or anybody else has covered it all foot by foot.

Mr. Claxton: We are doing it by air, and nobody else is, so far as we know.

Mr. Thomas: That is what I said, Mr. Chairman, so far as we know; that is the point I am making. We have no reason to believe they could not send suicide bombing missions, and if they did central Canada would make a beautiful target. Practically nine-tenths of our industry is consolidated in that one little spot. We need a further decentralization of our defence industries, so that if the one area should be knocked out we could still carry on. We have all the power—coal, water and gas that is needed in the province of Alberta. I am inviting those industries to come out there. Speaking for my own constituency, they could move in next door to the Leduc oil field any time they wish, and they will be welcome.

According to the minister's statement the reserves are going to be used as the basis for recruiting for the 27th brigade. I would suggest that the minister start looking around now for ways and means of recruiting men in the reserve forces to bring them up to strength. A strong reserve force in Canada could well mean life or death to Canadian civilization.

One more point, Mr. Chairman, and that is the paying of income tax by the members of the special force. No man who volunteers to face death to fight for the things we believe are right should be asked to pay taxes to help equip himself. It should be enough that these men are willing to fight our battle for us, suffer untold misery and sometimes death. They should not be asked to dig into that pittance which is their pay to give some of it back to the government. We are fighting a war, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the most important war that has ever been fought in history. Let us not go about it haphazardly. Let us fight this war with every ounce of our resources and every means at our disposal. But let us fight this war according to the highest ideals inherent in the Christian democracy that we represent.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, in speaking of defence, one is mindful of the problem facing this country, with its large area and scattered population. We cannot by any stretch of the imagination adequately defend all parts of this country. Our defence is therefore interwoven with the United States in defending the North American continent, and that policy is sound common sense.

We have heard something of invasion by Russia by way of Alaska, and by paratroopers in our northwest and British Columbia. While nothing is impossible in modern war, my opinion, for what it is worth, is that this natural fear by those who live in that part of Canada is not fully justified.

The main principles of war never change; the methods by which war is conducted do change and change rapidly in modern times. One of the first principles of waging successful war is to destroy the war-making potential of the enemy. The second principle is to concentrate overwhelming power at the correct time and place, and to strike with all the force at one's command to gain a favourable decision. To carry these principles out by invading Alaska or our Northwest Territories would in no way destroy our war-making potential nor would it have any decisive effect on winning a war on this continent by invasion.

You have only to look at this vast territory, thinly populated, with its tough terrain and climate, readily to see how formidable such a task is. Besides, the enemy would be fighting at the end of a long line of communications. To feed and maintain troops with all the equipment a modern army requires to wage successful war under such circumstances would be hazardous in the extreme. Especially is this so in the face of two of the most powerful military countries in the world, Canada and the United States, who could concentrate their great power much quicker and on shorter lines of communication. In the last war, Japan tried something of the sort when she landed troops in the Aleutian islands, but as soon as we concentrated against her, and after some small-scale fighting, she cleared out. Nuisance raids on a small or somewhat larger scale could be attempted, but they would have little or no effect on winning a war and their value to an enemy would be only to draw our attention away from the main threat and to force us to concentrate more troops than necessary for the defence of this territory.

A third world war means a global war. In such an event our main danger would be on the Atlantic. During the last two world wars we won the battle of the Atlantic by only a very small margin; and many times it was touch and go with us. The history of this struggle during the last war clearly shows that we won only just in time. If the new modern German submarine with the schnorkel device had made its appearance sooner and in quantity, it would have gone very hard with us indeed.

This is the menace we face today. From the best available information we find that Russia has large numbers of those modern submarines in commission; and if our countermeasures are not equal to the task of dealing with them, we can look forward with great anxiety to our shipping on the Atlantic. I do not wish to say more about this matter at this time, nor do I think it advisable. However, I do think the attention of the committee should be drawn to it.

We have been obliged to learn, abruptly and rather brutally, that one cannot beat something with nothing. Noble gestures, honest purposes and good resolutions will not of themselves stop a military invasion. Planes and tanks are required to stop planes and tanks.

In that connection, we have also had forced upon us the realization that appropriations in parliament do not equal arms in the field. We may eventually learn to speak of "arms aid" not in terms of so many millions appropriated, but in terms of so many weapons put in the hands of troops and of so many men trained and ready to act.

We also have learned that we have been and are being faced by an implacable and entirely unscrupulous enemy. The free people of the world will be attacked when and how that enemy chooses. There is no reliance to be placed upon honeyed words or "peace petitions." There is no peace and there is no chance of achieving it except by matching strength with strength.

General Eisenhower speaking on this subject last fall stated to the American people as follows: "Get tough with yourselves to assure victory in this bitter, and probably prolonged struggle."

All lesser considerations must wait, he said; we cannot tolerate politics as usual any more than we can tolerate business as usual.

"The die is cast in Asia, but we are in no limited conflict. Free Europe . . . is a tempting target for predatory military force." And he warned that Soviet planners contemplate the same fate for all the world, including the United States of America and Canada, as Russia has imposed on its satellite countries.

We in Newfoundland are the cornerstone of North Atlantic defence. That is the reason for so many United States naval, land and air bases in our province. One look at the map of North America can demonstrate this. I find that at present only one ship of the Royal Canadian Navy is permanently stationed in Newfoundland, and that is used chiefly for training purposes. I really think this is not sufficient at this time and would suggest for the consideration of the naval authorities that at least one additional ship, either a destroyer or frigate, should be permanently based in Newfoundland waters. This, I believe, is necessary and would stimulate recruiting and training for our naval forces. The Royal Navy had such a ship stationed at St. John's for many years with excellent results. I am convinced we can do likewise with even better results.

I should like at this time to speak briefly about our forces in Korea. This parliament called them to the colours; this House of Commons sent them overseas. During this session very little has been said about our boys fighting in this distant land. Very little has been published lately by the press of this country about how our forces are faring. Without in any way criticizing anybody, I do think everybody has been somewhat negligent in this matter. We have a duty to those men of ours, namely to see to it that they are ever in our thoughts, that we take a great interest in their welfare and that we are solidly behind them in all they do. They are fighting as much for freedom and democracy in Korea as if they were fighting on the soil of Canada. There are fighting for each and every one of us and they must be made to feel that the members of this parliament feel that way about them. In no sense must they even think that they are a long way from home and out of our thoughts. We can and must do all that is possible to stimulate their fighting spirit and to help to maintain their morale which is so essential.

In this respect I suggest for the consideration of the minister that a small party of members of the house in the not too distant future proceed to Korea and visit all our forces there, conveying our interest and good wishes to all ranks. They are the flower of our youth and the pride of the nation. To us they represent Canada; to us they are Canada.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, Canada's defence policy or defence program, perhaps I should say, for the next three years, was put before parliament by the minister on February 5; and the white paper which we received yesterday is to a large extent a reiteration of what he said at that time. I welcome the minister's statement for several reasons. To begin with, I welcome it because it was the first statement of defence policy worthy of the name which we have had in the past several years. As to the program, the main emphasis in it is on the development of air power. With that emphasis I think the majority of the members of this committee and of the people of Canada will agree, particularly at this time. There are several reasons for that. This country is particularly well adapted to the development of an air force, and the development of a force of that sort takes a considerable length of time. For that reason alone I was glad to see that the government had decided this year to put a very considerable amount of money into new aircraft, the building of new fields and things of that kind.

With the objectives of our national defence policy which were stated by the minister on February 5, and set out at page 91 of Hansard, I think most of us are in full agreement. I should like to read them again. They are as follows:

(1) The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack;

(2) The implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations, or under the North Atlantic treaty or other agreement for collective security;

(3) The organization to build up our strength in a total war.

The mere statement of these objectives, Mr. Chairman, immediately raises the question of how and when they are to be met.

[Mr. Stick.]

The minister proceeded to tell us about that, and to examine each of these objectives in turn, to some extent.

First, the defence of Canada against direct attack is, of course, and must be our primary concern in any discussion on defence matters. From the point of view of the air, we are under a program to counter the threat of Russian bombing, through the use of a radar screen, backed up by fighter squadrons. I think there is no doubt such a project should be our first line of defence; but I wonder how effective a defence of this kind we are to have.

The over-all plan for the air force, as stated by the minister, calls for forty squadrons. Of these, eleven fighter squadrons are to be in Europe. A considerable number of the remaining twenty-nine squadrons will be transport, reconnaissance and other aircraft of different types along that line. The question, then, is how many fighter squadrons that will leave for the direct defence of this country against enemy bombing. Furthermore, how many of these fighter squadrons will be regular squadrons which will presumably be ready to go into immediate action, and how many will be auxiliary squadrons which from the very nature of things, cannot be immediately operational at anything like full strength?

These questions of course are on the basis of the three-year plan; and the biggest question of all is this: What have we got at the present time? One hon. member this afternoon brought up this point, and said that a great deal of the talk in connection with defence was based upon what we were going to have two years from now or three years from now when this program is completed. He thought there should be more emphasis on what we have at the present time. I think that is extremely true, and that the minister should give us more information of that kind.

I think there is no question that a large number of people in Canada are very much afraid that at the moment we are almost defenceless against an enemy bombing attack, if it should come next week or the week after. These people are very anxious that such a situation will not continue, and particularly that it will not continue for anything like a year or two years longer.

Then, turning to the army, the minister said:

To supplement these air defences the army has a large stock of heavy anti-aircraft guns to be manned by active and reserve force personnel.

Leaving aside what is meant by "a large stock", I know we have not the trained personnel to man these guns, in either the regular or the reserve army. I have heard nothing from the minister as to how the men required are to be raised and trained. The anti-aircraft defences of this city of Ottawa are typical. It is the responsibility of a reserve anti-aircraft regiment, and I doubt very much whether that regiment could turn out a complete troop of four guns; and if it did turn out that troop of four guns, such a troop would be insufficiently trained to put up an effective defence.

Statements of this kind, which I think are meant to be soothing, actually in my opinion are dangerous. It is no use for the minister to say we have a large number of anti-aircraft guns if we have not the personnel trained to man those guns—and I think there is no question that we have not.

The next paragraph in the minister's speech, as it appears at the bottom of page 91, says this:

> In addition to attack by air, it might be possible for an enemy to land airborne troops by a surprise attack on an airfield or by parachute. To meet this possibility the Canadian army has a specially-trained airborne brigade group.

I believe the three infantry battalions of this brigade are now fairly well up to strength. What the exact state of their airborne training is, I do not know. I should hope it would be up to scratch also. Certainly, however, the three battalions have not trained together as a brigade. So far as I know there is no headquarters in being, certainly not one which has trained with the three battalions; and therefore it is not quite correct to speak of this as an airborne brigade. It is not trained as such and as a result it could not operate as such. What we have, actually, is three airborne battalions, and certain other airborne troops. As I say, they are not ready to operate together as an airborne brigade and, more important, from their airborne role point of view, we have not the transport aircraft to carry them. And until we have that brigade trained as a brigade, and particularly until we have the transport aircraft which will make them operative in an airborne role, it is quite misleading to talk of them as a well-trained airborne brigade.

The two matters upon which I have just made comment, from the minister's speech, indicate that apparently reassuring facts quoted by the minister may not be so reassuring when more closely examined.

The reserve army is a very important part of the defence of Canada against direct attack. The minister said very little about it in his speech. In fact, I think there is only one sentence which refers to it when, as reported at the top of page 92, he said:

> In support of the regular forces and to take action to prevent sabotage are the reserve forces as well as the R.C.M.P. and other police.

Of course in the event of war breaking out, apart from the police, the reserve army would be the chief means of dealing with saboteurs. That would probably keep them fairly well occupied for some considerable time. However, on the shoulders of the reserve army, too, would rest the major portion of the burden of the immediate defence of this country, so far as the army is concerned. And, along with that, as a third role it must undertake, is the provision of the framework for mobilization.

The question is: Is the reserve army strong enough to carry out these tasks? The minister during the past three years has given us optimistic reports on recruiting and training in the reserves, and has tried to give the impression that all was well in that regard. The report of the conference of defence associations held in the early part of January in this year effectively disposed of all such arguments and stories on the part of the minister. I should like to quote a few excerpts from that to indicate what the men who command the reserve forces, who run the reserve forces, think of their effectiveness. I quote:

> The delegates to the conference of defence associations are all civilians, representing a cross section of Canadians from every part of the country. They, and the men they represent, are in large measure responsible for the effectiveness and efficiency of the reserve force. It is to the reserve force that Canada must look for the creation of a national army in time of war.
> Year after year, by formal resolution, the conference has brought to the attention of higher authority the need for some action, if the reserve force is to function as it should, and meet the expectations of the Canadian people that the money spent upon it will produce results when the need arises.

And again:

> Large sums have been spent on advertising and in other ways to induce men to join the reserve force. To a large extent, such moneys have been wasted. The men have not been and are not coming forward.
> The men represented through the conference have exhausted every effort to improve these conditions and have sacrificed time and their own money in such efforts.
> The delegates to the conference feel that, since the effectiveness and efficiency of the reserve forces is largely their responsibility, and that of the men they represent, they would be derelict in their duty to the government and to their fellow countrymen if they did not put before that government and the people of Canada their views as to the present state of the reserve force.
> It is obvious that the vastly increased expenditure on military matters now contemplated will call for sharply increased taxes to be paid by Canadians. We feel Canadians are prepared to pay such taxes in view of the issues involved but we do not feel that Canadians are prepared to see moneys wasted. It is our considered and unanimous opinion that proper value is not being received for much of the public moneys now being spent on the reserve force.

In spite of the existing shortages of facilities for the reserve force, in many places the strength of units does not absorb present facilities for training by a substantial margin. Far more men could be trained in the reserve force than are presently coming forward.

The turnover of other ranks is such that the vast majority of men who appear from time to time on the nominal rolls of reserve force units receive no training worthy of the name. They do not stay with the unit long enough. To say that the reserve force is 40,000 strong, and to give the Canadian people the idea that it has 40,000 men who could quickly be ready for action, is a travesty of the facts. There are few, if any, reserve units in Canada that could be ready to function in action under a minimum period of six months. This includes AA and other such units which should be ready for immediate action. The Canadian public, in spite of the moneys spent, cannot look to effective and efficient protection from internal sabotage or external aggression from its reserve force for a considerable period after war breaks out, and the active force is far too small to undertake the full burden of such duties.

I think that is fairly conclusive as to what the situation in the reserve force has been. Since that report was made some three or four months ago there has been no material change in the situation. The question then arises: What does the minister propose to do to make our reserve army efficient and effective? The trouble does not lie with the men in the reserve. They devote a good deal of time and effort to the defence of this country, time that might otherwise be spent in leisurely pursuits. Their devotion to duty deserves the highest praise and I know they have made the greatest possible efforts to make their units efficient and effective.

The trouble is that they have not been able to get the necessary men with whom to build units. The average young man in Canada has not felt that there is any real need for him in the reserve. This lack of any sense of urgency is the responsibility of this government. At any rate, until quite recently, the government itself has shown no sense of urgency whatever in defence matters. On the contrary, we have had soothing assurances of the adequacy of our defence measures. We have had an attitude of no war in our time and business as usual.

I think that attitude has passed away to some extent and considerably more urgency is being shown by the government at the moment than was the case previously. However, it has not so far carried over to the general public from anything that I can see. The government needs to adopt much more strenuous measures than it has so far in order to get this over to the young men of this country.

The necessity of a strong reserve and the reliance on it to raise men for the regular forces was indicated quite clearly by the minister's announcement of Friday last that the brigade for Europe is to be raised from the reserve units. In my opinion that is probably the only way in which it could be raised rapidly by voluntary methods. However, what does not seem to be realized and what has not been indicated by anything the minister has said is that this move will weaken the reserve and weaken it quite considerably by draining away a large number of the most active and enthusiastic officers and men.

The regular army and the special brigade for Korea have already done a certain amount of draining away. If, as seems likely, a large proportion of the 27th brigade now being raised comes from the reserve units which have the responsibility for raising companies in that brigade, it will mean that those units will be much weaker than they were before, and we all know they were weak to begin with. This will be a very serious blow to the reserve army from which it will take considerable time to recover.

The reserve army has been weakened further in some cases by the withdrawing of equipment. I do not know what has been done with that equipment, but probably some went to the regular force units and probably some was sent to Europe. I should like the minister to indicate when that withdrawn equipment will be replaced.

There has been a considerable amount of talk today with regard to standardization, and during the past year or more we have had a number of statements in regard to this. The hope has been expressed on many occasions that all the North Atlantic treaty nations would adopt the same weapons and we would have a standardization of arms for that entire confederacy. I think that has now become what might be called merely a pious hope and there is no real expectation that a North Atlantic treaty standardization of weapons will take place. There certainly has been little progress, if any, in that regard.

The Canadian government has decided to adopt the United States type of weapons. At this point I am not going to go into the wisdom or unwisdom of that course. The thing is that because of that policy the British type equipment we have is being disposed of. Equipment for two divisions has been sent already to Holland and Belgium and I believe equipment for a third division is on the way to Italy, or will shortly be going there. We have had no information in this house, nor has the country had any information as far as I know, that this equipment has been replaced with United States style weapons.

The situation seems to be that we are in a much worse position now as far as weapons for the army are concerned than we were a year ago. A further pertinent question that the minister should answer is: What is the equipment that has been disposed of to be replaced with, and when is that replacement to be made? We cannot be left in a situation where we have got rid of the major portion of our army equipment and have not received or made anything to replace it. As an example of what has happened, our anti-tank units have had their self-propelled guns taken away from them, and so far as I know they have had nothing to replace them. Perhaps they have been given a drawn gun of some sort with which to carry on a little gun drill. They should be told immediately what they will get to replace the self-propelled equipment they have lost and when they will get it. Without their own weapons with which to train, the interest and morale of such units is naturally going to suffer. It is bound to decline.

While standardization of Canadian arms with those of the United States has been decided upon, again very little has been done towards producing such arms in Canada. I was shocked to learn in the public accounts committee that the only standard weapon being produced in Canada so far is the 3-inch naval gun. So far as I have been able to determine no tooling up has been done for the production of other American type weapons in this country. The minister has made no statement as to how much United States equipment we have bought, if any. It is a very serious situation for us to be in to have got rid of more than half of our army equipment without anything to replace it, if indeed that is the situation, as I fear it is.

There is another phase of this matter on which I should like to comment briefly. Some of the United States equipment is not as good as the British type we have had. A case in point, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Nanaimo this afternoon, is the Bren gun. So far as I can learn, it is a much more effective and flexible weapon than its nearest American counterpart. I understand that the Bren gun can be modified to use ·30 American type ammunition, and I should think it would be wise for us to adopt that course. It would be wise both from the point of view of efficiency and from the point of view of economy to convert our Bren guns to American type ammunition rather than scrap them.

The same question arises with respect to field artillery weapons. My experience during the last war was that the 25 pounder was a much better weapon than its counterpart, the United States 105. I do not know whether it would be satisfactory to modify our 25 pounders to use 105 ammunition, but in any event it seems to be the reverse of progress to be getting rid of superior weapons and replacing them with inferior ones. It is one of the phases of defence rearmament on which I think we should have some information.

The cost of our rearmament effort is also a very important consideration. In his speech in New York on March 30 the minister emphasized the matter of economy. At that time he said:

> We must decrease the unit cost of defence equipment. Unless you actually see it, it is hard to imagine how defence costs have soared.

He went on to say that this was partly due to the increase in prices and partly due to the extreme complexity of much of our modern equipment. He quoted prices as of February 5. He gave the cost of a radar station, the cost of a jet aircraft, and so on. The minister went on to point out that the attempt to secure perfection militates against producing the merely good. He made other remarks along that line. As a matter of fact I think that has been one of the greatest weaknesses and difficulties in producing large amounts of equipment and getting comparatively large forces together either rapidly or cheaply. I think we have always paid a great deal of attention to the matter of trying to produce what we think are extremely superior weapons, and as a result have not produced those weapons in quantity rapidly. There are many examples of that. Russian artillery compared with our own and that of the United States is a case in point. I believe it is produced for about a quarter of the cost or less. It is lighter and more mobile and is only slightly less accurate.

The Thompson sub-machine gun and the Sten gun, both of which were used by our forces in the last war, are another example. I do not know what the figures are, but the Sten gun would certainly cost very much less than the Thompson sub-machine gun, probably a quarter as much. It was not nearly as nice looking a weapon. People did not like carrying it around, but when it came to a fight the difference between them so far as effectiveness was concerned was negligible. I certainly think that a great deal of time can be saved in re-equipping our forces by equipping them with weapons such as those of which I have given examples rather than attempting at a very slow rate to turn out something which may be very slightly better, and may in some cases not even be better at all.

Somewhat the same thing applies with respect to the amount of equipment with which troops are supplied that they are forced to carry, and so forth. There have been a considerable number of accounts in United States magazines and newspapers of late months concerning how the efficiency of their forces was actually cut down by too much and too heavy equipment as a result of which lives were lost which should not have been lost. Along with that, it was pointed out that there are far too many men in service units of all kinds compared with the number actually fighting. The same thing applies to our own army and other forces.

I have spoken on this general line many times in the house in the past with respect to our own forces. One of my chief criticisms during the past three years has been that our set-up is top-heavy, that the great majority of our personnel were in headquarters and performing administrative jobs, and very few were in fighting units. During the last few months the percentage of people in administrative jobs compared with the percentage in fighting units has of course decreased considerably because of the formation of the special brigade in Korea, and now because of the formation of the new brigade for European service, and also because of recruitment up to strength of the units in our airborne brigade.

The same thing applies to the air force and the navy. However, I think we still have too many men at headquarters and in administrative jobs. I think we are still much more top-heavy than we should be. At the last session the minister said that efforts were constantly being made to improve this situation. I should like him to tell us what has been done. It is no use for him to quote to us what the percentage of improvement has been. I should like to have some definite information as to how many men have been transferred from administrative jobs to fighting units, and things of that sort. As a matter of fact I have seen some evidence that the situation is worse. I do not mean from a percentage point of view, but there are more people in administrative jobs at headquarters than there were before, and that number is increasing all the time. That impression may be incorrect, but it is certainly true in some places. While I am on the subject of the cost of defence, we know that during the past four years we have voted large sums in this house for defence, and a very greatly increased amount is being asked for in this year's estimates. At no time has there been any reluctance to provide the money asked for; nor will there be on this occasion, either in this house or, I think, on the part of the people as a whole. There has been, however, and there is very great concern that the money so voted should be well spent, and that value in fighting ability should be obtained for it.

Past experience in this regard has not been good. In the past three years we have not had very much in the way of fighting units in return for the large amounts that have been spent. Part of our job as members of parliament is to see that the money voted is well spent and that efficient and effective fighting forces are produced. We cannot do that sitting in committee of supply as we are at the moment. I think the only way we can do it at all reasonably is by means of a committee on defence. We have asked for such a committee every session during the past several years, and every session the minister has produced a number of what I would call excuses as to why such a committee should not be set up. I think there is no question but that this is the only way a real scrutiny of defence estimates and expenditures can be made by this House of Commons, and I would again urge the minister to set up such a committee.

Manpower still remains the basic problem in our defence effort. The scheme announced by the minister the other day for raising a brigade for service in Europe is more likely to obtain the number of men needed than any other method which could be devised under the voluntary system. If it does not provide the men needed rapidly, then I think we must face the fact that voluntary recruiting has failed. I sincerely hope the number of men required is raised, and I should hope that would be done within two weeks. In any event I am quite sure all Canadians will wait with great interest to see the results of that scheme.

I should like to offer a few more comments in connection with that matter. I have gone over the list of units each of which is to raise a company, battery, squadron or other sub-unit, and I am puzzled by an analysis of this list. The fifteen infantry battalions to raise a company each are perfectly logical. As the minister said this afternoon, that will give us three battalions of five companies each. However, there are six artillery regiments listed, each to raise a battery. That, of course, would give two regiments of artillery. A brigade group only calls for one regiment of artillery, and I wonder if the minister will tell us what the second regiment that would be provided is to be used for. Most surprising of all, however, is the ten armoured regiments listed. Does this mean it is intended to raise two or three armoured regiments, or what does it mean? It is not even clear whether the brigade group will have an armoured regiment, though the numbers would seem to indicate not. Therefore just reading over the list it is rather hard to understand just why each of the ten armoured regiments is being called upon to produce a unit or sub-unit for this force.

In the minister's speech of February 5 he said the general defence plan for Canada called for the equivalent of one division in the army. Later announcements seemed to add up to considerably more. We will have one brigade group in Korea and one in Europe, with the airborne brigade at home. It has been announced that the overseas brigades are to be rotated with ones from Canada, which would indicate that we would require at least one more brigade unless the airborne brigade is to be used for this rotation job, which would be directly contrary to all statements of policy that have been made in connection with the employment of that brigade. In addition we need the equivalent of another brigade to provide reinforcements for the troops fighting in Korea. The provision of these reinforcements must have first priority in the allocation of army manpower. At one time there was some talk that the third battalions of the regular infantry regiments, which according to the newspapers today are now on their way to Wainwright from Fort Lewis, would be used as the basis of the brigade for Europe. I am very glad that idea has been given up, if it was ever entertained. I sincerely trust that these third battalions will be brought up to strength and kept as reinforcements for our brigade in Korea. The normal wastage there, apart from battle casualties, is likely to be high; and of course we never know what the battle casualties will be.

The number of men to be raised under the scheme just announced, if it is successful, will amount to 250 per company. That will give us quite a few more men than will be required for the European brigade. A normal infantry rifle company is just a little more than half that number. So if the scheme is completely successful it will mean that we will raise nearly twice as many men as will be required for the brigade group in Europe. I would like the minister to tell us what it is proposed to do with these men. Are they to go into a general reinforcement pool for the whole army? Are they to be held as reinforcements for the European brigade? Or are they really to form the major part of another brigade group for rotation purposes? Certainly in view of the greater number of men involved it is now apparent that the target of 115,000 men for the forces, which was laid down in connection with this program, must be increased. It struck me from the beginning that 115,000 men in the forces was much too small a number for the jobs envisaged for those forces. I think the number should have been at least 150,000 in order to do those jobs effectively. I do not believe the program could be carried on with fewer than that. So I say there seems to be no doubt that the number required under the program, if the minister can get them, will be much more than 115,000, because of the large increase already shown in the army.

The whole question of manpower was mentioned this afternoon in connection with the manpower council. When that council was set up at the beginning of this session many of us expressed the hope that it would be used to make a survey of our manpower resources. It has not met since the initial meeting, and apparently has done nothing along that line. A survey such as it could make would be valuable. However, I think it would be insufficient for our needs in allocating men and women for the services, for industry and so on. I think we need a scheme of national registration in this country immediately. At the beginning of this session, about three months ago, I urged that such a step be taken and the need is just that much more urgent now. Three months have been lost during which that registration could have been conducted.

I believe one of the chief difficulties as far as our defence effort is concerned has been the absence of any sense of urgency on the part of the government in regard to defence preparations or any other matters. They seem to feel no urgency in regard to the matter of inflation, any more than they have shown any feeling of urgency as far as defence matters are concerned. As a result of the fact that the government has shown no sense of urgency, no sense of emergency, the general public has been lulled into a false sense of security. I do not think there is any question but that you cannot have a rearmament effort, you cannot have a war effort or a semi-war effort, without a spirit of willingness to meet it on the part of your people. The only action on the part of any members of the government I have ever seen to arouse such a spirit was this action on the part of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to which reference is made in tonight's Journal. I should like to commend him for trying to put some pep into this thing, for trying to arouse some spirit in the people of this country. It quotes the minister as saying we should whip up fury against the Soviet threat.

Mr. Martin: I should like to point out to the hon. member that I have not read the full dispatch, but it has been called to my attention. I would say it is a good example of a sentence being removed from its context.

Mr. Harkness: There is quite a bit of the minister's speech quoted, and here is the last part:

> Mr. Martin repeatedly underlined with heavy emphasis the need for "fighting spirit" in contrast to "defence mindedness."
>
> "Canadians must be encouraged to whip up their fighting spirit. All our preparations must give top priority to requirements of our army, navy and air force."

Mr. Claxton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, hear, hear. I quote this, as I have already indicated, for the purpose of commending the minister as the first one in the government who has made any real attempt so far as I know to stir up any fighting spirit in this country, to give any sense of urgency to our defence preparations or any real encouragement to the young men of this country to believe they are needed in our defence forces.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to hear the previous speaker speak so highly of the reserve forces. In my opinion he correctly emphasized the neglect of this force as a potential defence force. I feel that they are neglected and discouraged as civilian soldiers. They lack funds. I happen to have served with them during the last war, and I found that funds were lacking to an extent that the officers always chipped in their pay in order to buy equipment, some comforts and entertainment for the troops. The reserve forces also lack social life because of this lack of funds. I find these troops are usually cramped in old barracks or old drill halls that have not been altered for many years. I believe that is because they are not taken seriously by the Department of National Defence, but are merely treated as a reserve police force.

I mention this because one of the units that has been selected to form the 27th brigade is the unit with which I served during the war, the British Columbia Dragoons. This regiment served overseas with distinction in the last war. I am not going to dwell on this subject at any length, but the regiment has been housed in an old school building transformed to serve as a drill hall. Seven years ago the promise was made that new plans would be drawn, and the plans were actually drawn, to enlarge the hall to accommodate the modern unit that now occupies it. So far nothing has been done. The lands are available, and the plans are available. I presume out of the $5 billion money could be made available. If this unit is to be properly housed that hall should be enlarged, and modern equipment installed such as toilets, bathrooms and so on. In my opinion it is only fair to give these things to the troops that you expect to volunteer in a hurry. I know they will, and you will get your quota out there. Then, the government should do its share by providing proper quarters for training.

Most of the officers who will be called for service with this new brigade will come from reserve units. The officers in reserve units are usually men employed in the ordinary vocations in the town, in stores, offices and so on. They are promoted from the ranks. On their behalf I would ask the government to pay all the costs of the clothing that officers have to buy on entering active service, or upon being given a commission in the reserve army. Either the clothing should be given to them or an adequate amount of money allowed so that they could buy clothing wherever they wished.

I believe the government should reassure these men, particularly the rank and file, that proper care will be taken of them when their service is completed. Today a lot of men question this fact, and they question it when they read such statements in the press as appeared in the Globe and Mail about a week ago. The article is headed "Korea Veterans Seek Own Route to Civvy Street." It reads:

> Korean brigade soldiers discharged this week found that the federal government had made no effort to pave their road back to civvy street.
> D.V.A. officials said representations have been made to Ottawa for assistance to the veterans, but no re-establishment action has been authorized. There were no re-establishment credits, educational grants, Veterans Land Act, discharge leave or clothing allowances for men discharged from the UN force. Only unemployment insurance benefits are available and these only to men with over nine months' service—which few men of the brigade can yet claim.
>
> A few medical discharge cases now being "processed out" get their pay, but nothing more.
> "If a man declares himself destitute he may get a $30 voucher to obtain clothing, but this is supposed to be deducted from the army pay owing to him," an army spokesman said today.

I am not going to mention that further, but I would say to the minister that if he expects to recruit the full number of men for the armed services, then those men must be given the assurance that they will receive proper, just and fair treatment on being returned to civilian occupations afterwards.

I am going to deal briefly—I hope to pass on a suggestion or two to the minister—with my own province. I believe the Pacific coast has grown in importance, especially in the event of a possible war. I believe the minister should take certain steps to remove bottlenecks which prevent the free flow of traffic east and west. We in British Columbia are fully conscious of these bottlenecks, but have become so accustomed to them that possibly we do not object. The first problem is the immediate completion of the trans-Canada highway. I believe this has been a long standing need, and the speed with which it is being completed is far from satisfactory. For the sake of civil defence and the needs of war, the minister should see that the trans-Canada highway from Alberta to British Columbia is completed at a very early date.

The other bottleneck which I have always felt should be removed, not only for the war effort but for peacetime as well, is the railway track running on each side of the Fraser river from Kamloops to Vancouver. On one side you have the Canadian National, and on the other side about one hundred or two hundred feet away is the Canadian Pacific. They both run on single lines because there is not the width to allow for double tracks. Any time there is a meet they have to wait, sometimes for hours, to be overtaken on a siding, and there are not many sidings along that route. The result is that both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway suffer a severe bottleneck by way of slow transportation; whether it is wheat, troops or passengers, it does not matter. My suggestion would be that these two railways get together, either with the aid of the government in some way or at the insistence of the government, and make the Canadian National a one-route railway going east and the Canadian Pacific Railway a one-route railway going west from Kamloops to Vancouver. In that way traffic would be speeded up and long waits for shunting at sidings would be avoided. The value of the railway as a transportation system, between Kamloops and Vancouver, would probably be doubled. I merely pass that idea long.

Another bottleneck that we have, possibly by the very nature of our country, is that with respect to airports. We have possibly two dozen airports in the interior of British Columbia, an area several times larger than the British isles which has as many hundred airfields. We in the interior are independent and some years ago we started building our own airfields; but owing to lack of funds, we were not able to build fields that could be of use during war. We have, however, retained sufficient land so that the present fields could be extended to be of value in case of war. I could mention such places as Grand Forks, Kelowna, Vernon, and Kamloops. They are prepared to extend their airports in order to accommodate military planes.

As to Grand Forks, on their behalf I have already offered the government the full use, by lease, gift or in any other way, of their excellent port. All it needs is a slight extension to make it of first-class strategic importance, as it is close to Trail. Failing the government's taking active steps to do this, I am satisfied that the municipalities concerned are willing to co-operate and that, given a little bit of assistance, they would carry out the work themselves.

To my mind, these ports are important in the interior. They are safe from attack. They are not as vulnerable to enemy bombing and so on as they would be if they were actually on the Pacific coast. I feel that the government should investigate the possibility of having jet planes in the interior; because by jet planes particularly it is only about twenty-five minutes from Vancouver or maybe thirty-five minutes from Victoria. They would be quite safe in the interior in contrast with the danger they would be in from bombing at the coast.

The subject of my talk tonight was not to be that, but I became a bit sidetracked. My intention had been to speak for a short time on civil defence. I believe this subject is neglected too much by those who speak in the House of Commons, by the government and by the municipalities throughout the country. I believe that the public today are confused for want of instruction and authentic information. If you doubt this statement, I would ask you to just go outside in this or any other town and quite casually ask the first civilian you meet: What would you do in the event of enemy planes being reported coming in this direction? Just ask that question of any man or woman in Ottawa or in any other town, and you would be astounded at the blank look which you would receive. They have no answer. They are relying on some government or on some authority to be doing the thinking on their behalf.

We have been told that there are instruction schools and committees functioning, and that they have been set up in various parts of Canada. But the fact remains that the average Canadian has not the vaguest idea of what he should do in case of attack, where he should go or what part he should play in that case. The chances are that the people would scatter like frightened rabbits, seeking the deepest burrow.

One can imagine the confusion of the uninstructed population, faced with a disaster of that kind. We who saw active service remember quite well the terror that demoralized the people, especially the children, in Belgium and France, when the enemy advanced; the thousands who trudged weary miles along roads, going nowhere in particular, sleeping where they could under a hedgerow or maybe in a ditch for better protection. This happened to people in Europe who had first-hand knowledge of previous wars and who had been taught to expect such things. What would happen to our people? What would be the fate of Canadians, lacking instruction, lacking experience and lacking leadership, in towns like Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver? There is only one name for it: complete chaos; and complete chaos will be the result unless we take that leadership in giving these people direction immediately and now. It must be done immediately, because the article that I have already read by the Minister of National Health and Welfare would indicate that this danger is serious and urgent. If we have any pep or any fight, do not let us concentrate it all in Korea. Let us use some of it at home and see that we take adequate steps to protect our people.

I understand that General Worthington is doing his best to arouse public opinion; but instead of touring the country from coast to coast I believe that he would be better employed if he were properly established here in Ottawa, with a competent staff to take care of the provincial organization and to give proper direction. You cannot do that when you wander around the country giving speeches at Rotary clubs and so on. This thing is urgent. It is as necessary to have him here with a proper staff as it is to have a general staff for the army. I should like to quote what General Worthington had to say on May 5, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of May 7:

> Major Gen. F. F. Worthington, C.B., M.C., M.M., federal co-ordinator of civil defence, Saturday urged every man and woman in Canada to accept their responsibilities as part of a countrywide civilian force organized to play their part in the event of invasion.
> Speaking at V-E day ceremonies at Aylmer on Saturday afternoon, the general said there was no place on this continent which was not subject to invasion. In a future war America would not be protected by the barriers of two oceans and an Arctic icecap.
> "Today the front line is your own front yard," he said. He warned that the method of warfare now was to smash at the civil population in order to disrupt the home front and the productive capacity of a nation.
> Gen. Worthington said the civilian population would need to be trained to know what to do in the event of invasion to minimize the effect on morale and production.

And he went on to ask the branches of the Canadian Legion to take part in this particular work.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Claxton: Tomorrow we shall proceed with this debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

UNIVERSITY NAVAL TRAINING DIVISIONS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What quotas were allocated to the university naval training divisions of the various universities during 1950?

2. To what extent were these quotas filled?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2.

LABRADOR IRON ORE DEVELOPMENT—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Higgins:

Is the unemployment insurance office at Amherst, Nova Scotia, arranging for the employment of men for work at the iron ore development at Labrador?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): There are no orders placed with the unemployment insurance office at Amherst, N.S., for employment of men for work at the iron ore development at Labrador.

RESERVE UNIVERSITY FLIGHTS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What quotas were allocated to the reserve university flights of the various universities during 1950?

2. To what extent were these quotas filled?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2.

University	Quota Allotted	Quota Filled
Queen's university	27	24

ARMED FORCES INFORMATION BUREAU

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has an information bureau for the armed forces been set up?

2. If so, when, and what is the name of the organization?

Questions

3. Has a director of current affairs been appointed?
4. If so, who, and at what salary?
5. What is the present size of the director's staff, and what additions are contemplated?
6. Is such information bureau now operating?
7. If not, when is it expected to do so?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. March 12, 1951—Bureau of current affairs.

3. Yes.

4. Mr. H. R. Low—$7,500 per annum.

5. Director and secretary. Approval has been given for five additional members of a staff and five members of a substaff, such as stenographer, typists and clerks.

6. Yes.

7. See answer to No. 6.

QUESTIONS BY MR. BALCOM ANSWERED ON APRIL 26—FURTHER ANSWERS NOW TABLED

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (for the Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, two questions placed on the order paper by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) were incompletely answered on April 26 last. I wish to table the complete answers now.

H.M.C.S. "CORNWALLIS"—CONTRACTS FOR REPAIRS, ETC.

Mr. Balcom:

1. What firms were awarded contracts, and what was the amount of each contract, during 1950-51 for (a) new construction and repairs; (b) catering; (c) supplies for H.M.C.S. Cornwallis?
2. Were tenders called in each instance?
3. If so, who submitted tenders, and what was the amount of each tender?

Mr. Bradley: Contracts for new construction were awarded by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation during 1950-51 as follows:

Landscaping

Log crib at buildings 81-94 fire hall

Surface drains and catch basins at buildings 81-94 fire hall

With respect to landscaping:

1. June 22, 1950, Rosehall Nurseries Limited, Brantford, Ontario, $16,984.00.

(Storm damage—by change order to Rosehall Nurseries Limited for $11,250.00, August 25, 1950. Concrete walks and steps—by change order to Rosehall Nurseries Limited for $10,216.58, September 25, 1950.)

2. Tenders were called.

3. Rosehall Nurseries Limited, $16,984.00.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

With respect to log crib at buildings 81-94 fire hall:

1. January 11, 1951, George Mabee, Saint John, $3,350.00.

2. No.

3. See answer to No. 2.

With respect to surface drains and catch basins at buildings 81-94 fire hall:

1. January 13, 1951, George Mabee, Saint John, $2,052.00.

2. No.

2. Tenders were called.

3. Municipal Spraying and Contracting, $7,943.00; L. G. Rawding, $6,238.00.

With respect to power distribution—90 units:

1. June 27, 1950—Bryant Electric Co. Ltd., (extended for $9,500.00 to service 50 additional units), $15,460.73.

2. Tenders were called.

3. Dickie's Radio and Electric Co. Ltd., $17,187.00; Stirling Electric Company Limited, $18,000.00; Bryant Electric Company Limited, $15,460.73; Crowdis and Lewis, $21,550.00; L. St. Clair Baird, $19,405.97; G. M. Gest, $39,378.00.

With respect to school:

1. July 17, 1950—Kenney Construction Company (Herman MacDonald, the lowest tenderer, could not produce proof of financial ability to undertake a job of this size and therefore his tender was rejected), $195,-736.00.

(With additional number of houses a stage III school was required and contract extended for $196,400.00.)

2. Tenders were called.

3. Herman MacDonald, $179,460.00; Kenney Construction Company, $195,736.00; Eastern Woodworkers, $203,970.00; Terminal Construction, $209,756.00; Annapolis Valley Construction, $235,625.00.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PORT AUX BASQUES-SYDNEY FERRY

Mr. Fraser:

1. Were tenders called for the construction of the freight and passenger ferry to be used between Port aux Basques, Newfoundland and North Sydney, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, what firms submitted tenders?
3. What firm was awarded the contract?
4. What are the terms of the contract?
5. Were Vickers engineers employed in the designing of this ferry?
6. Was an outside naval architect employed?
7. If so, what architect or architects were employed?
8. What amount is to be paid to such architect or architects?
9. Were any other technicians, engineers or others employed in the designing of this ferry?
10. If so, who were they, and what will each receive for their work?

IMPERIAL SERVICE AND CANADA MEDAL AWARDS

Mr. Fraser:

1. How many imperial service medals have been granted to Canadians since 1930?
2. How many of such medals were granted in each year from 1930 to date?
3. How many were granted to persons in each department of the government during this period?
4. How many of these medals were conferred or granted to Canadians who had retired from the civil service after serving less than twenty-five years?
5. What are the names of the persons to whom they were granted, and in which department did they serve?
6. Have any awards of the Canada medal been made?
7. If so, to whom?

Mr. Blanchette: Return tabled.

POSTAL SERVICE

CHICOUTIMI AND LAPOINTE COUNTIES, QUE., MAIL CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Some time ago I placed two questions on the order paper. The first one was:

1. Who has the contract for carrying the mail between Chicoutimi and Grande Baie via the offices of Bagotville and Port Alfred, Quebec?
2. What is he paid for this service?
3. When does the contract expire?

Here was my second question:

1. Who has the contract for carrying the mail between Saguenay airport at Bagotville and the post offices of the counties of Chicoutimi and Lapointe?
2. What is paid for this service?
3. When does the contract expire?

On April 30 last, the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General (Mr. Langlois) replied as follows:

These two questions refer to the following service: Jonquiere-Kenogami and airport at Bagotville, via: Arvida, Chicoutimi, Bagotville, Port Alfred, Grande Baie.

I regret to inform the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General that his answer applies only to the second question and that the first has remained unanswered.

I really would like to know who has the contract for carrying the mail between the C.N.R. station at Chicoutimi and the post offices of Grande Baie, Port Alfred and Bagotville.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have made a note of the remarks made by the hon. member and I shall see to it that he gets a reply in due course.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, just before eleven o'clock last night I had quoted an extract from a statement made by General Worthington to the effect that the next war would be fought in our own back yard. When General Worthington made that statement I think he fully believed it. It is a serious statement to make, and we are compelled to agree that if war does break out it will be in our own back yard. Therefore the question of protection of that yard becomes a matter of paramount importance to every one of us, and I claim that today it is totally inadequate. No one knows that better than the gentleman whom I have quoted. To my mind we need a master plan immediately under which every citizen of this dominion can contribute efficiently his time, skill and effort to the protection of that back yard. Every citizen should be given a clear analysis of all the risks involved, and should be clearly informed of the personal responsibility within the defence plan of his particular community.

With proper information and clear instructions given to our citizens, we could avoid the confusion that otherwise must necessarily prevail. I think it is very important that the government should commit itself immediately to seeing that proper instruction is given. Confusion is responsible for more casualties than would occur from the actual bombing by a potential enemy. I shall not deal with civil defence needs in detail beyond urging the government to speed up the work of organizing nursing and other health services, air raid wardens, rescue squads, communication workers, ambulance, telephone and transportation services, light, power, and a thousand and one other things that are of primary importance in case of an attack by a potential enemy.

I would further urge upon the government that it should clarify its position with respect to its plans, if any, for aiding provincial governments to carry out their part of the over-all plan. Dissatisfaction is general in this regard. Practically every province is kicking about the present arrangements and is not satisfied with them. I think the position was forcibly expressed by the province of Ontario as reported in the Globe and Mail of February 28 last. I should first like to refer to the words of Premier Frost. The article reads as follows:

"We have a right to know what are the facts," said Mr. Frost. "How can the federal government leave this matter hanging in the air? This is a matter for national direction, for expert attention. If Ottawa does not want to spend any money, why not come out in the open and say so? We'll sacrifice gladly if we are told what to do. I'll prune my budget before next Tuesday to cut out every non-essential item if I am told it is needed. But we want to know; we feel we are entitled to clarification and guidance."

The report continues:

C.C.F. leader Jolliffe agreed that this was mystification in a high degree. If Mr. Welsh's report accurately covered the accomplishment of a conference of ten provinces and the dominion, it showed nothing but a lot of vague implications that the federal government would do a little in some cases, maybe a bit in others, and hadn't even considered some. He felt that no "half-baked" program should be launched by anyone; on the other hand, Ottawa had knowledge not held by others and it should impart that to the provinces in sufficient degree to assure them of what must or must not be done. Actually, he felt, Ottawa was about three years late in calling a conference; civil defence planning should have been started when the director of such work was appointed more than three years ago.

The article goes on to say:

Liberal leader Oliver agreed that Ontario was left very much in the air, and Mr. Frost's comments were very reasoned. He felt that the over-all direction of civil defence should fall within the jurisdiction of civil defence, despite what arguments might exist as to jurisdiction regarding property rights and damages assessments. "We will go along with the premier and leader of the opposition in expressing the belief that the situation must be clarified," said Mr. Oliver. "After all, the problem of civil defence arises as a result of international policies over which province and municipality have no control. This house should press for clarification of civil defence policy, and I feel it should come from the federal sphere."

I quite agree with that article. It puts in a concise form my argument that the federal government must clarify its position so that the provincial governments and municipalities can co-operate to the fullest extent while there is still time.

While it is true that the greatest need is to protect our larger cities and more vulnerable manufacturing towns, at the same time we must not forget the rural areas. In the event of evacuation becoming necessary, the rural areas would be a very important cog in the scheme of civil defence. I believe steps should be taken now to investigate and list all available accommodation in rural areas so the information would be available in case of need. First aid classes should be started in those districts immediately, and the residents should be trained to take care of evacuees so that they would be able to play their part if such an evacuation should take place.

Naturally the question will be asked, who is going to pay for all this? To my mind that is clear. This is plainly a matter for the federal government, which under the British North America Act is entrusted with the care and protection of the people. In any event the cost would be very small if the co-operation of municipal and provincial governments were sought at once. Such things as welfare services, nursing services, fire fighting services and so on, already established within the municipalities, could be improved and expanded through federal aid and assistance. In the event of war, failure to act now could be far more costly, not only in money but in human lives as well. So I urge the government to give this aid and assistance as quickly as possible. I believe the cost would be a fair charge on the billions we have already voted for our national defence program. If suitable plans for the welfare and protection of our people in the event of attack were prepared and made known, it would go far to reassure and give confidence to our people. I make this suggestion not on a political basis but as a Canadian seeking ways and means to protect our homes and our people from the danger that threatens.

Naturally the next thought that comes to mind is whether we are doing all we can for our protection, particularly from air attack, should another war break out. I am not satisfied that we are doing all we can. I am not satisfied that we have sufficient jet fighters ready to take to the air to keep the enemy from this country. I am not satisfied that they are strategically placed to carry out that task. Their distribution has been too haphazard; they are bunched in large centres and not strategically placed across the country. I feel that we have to step up our defences by means of speedy jet interceptors and jet fighters, together with a complete radar screen right across this dominion. We have been led to believe that we can rely completely upon our air force, and that we need not worry; but I was alarmed, as no doubt other hon. members were, by an editorial in the Globe and Mail of yesterday, which I should like to read. If the minister has not already read it I think he should hear it read so that he may reply to it and reassure the people. If the position is not as set out in the editorial, the minister should tell us that something is being done, because I am more afraid than ever that we are not properly protected. The editorial states—

Mr. Claxton: I do not want to be technical, Mr. Chairman, but I call your attention to the rule against reading editorials.

Mr. Jones: Then I will not read it, but I direct the minister's attention to this editorial in which his department is charged with providing totally insufficient protection for this dominion; with promises that have been made and not carried out, and so on. We are told that we have not the air force we should have, that we have not the men, the planes, or the equipment. I believe such a charge should be answered. If the statements are true, the minister should admit it and take steps to remedy the situation. If they are not true, this article should be answered and the public should be given some reassurance that something substantial is being done.

I am quite prepared to pass this editorial over to the minister, and I should like to hear his reply. I assure him that as a citizen of Canada I am anxious to co-operate to the fullest extent to bring our protection to the highest level possible within our means and capacity as a nation with a small population. I repeat that in my opinion if we have full co-operation on all sides we can bring about a system of protection that will reassure our people and permit them to sleep in peace without worrying about Russian domination.

Mr. Coldwell: There is a point, Mr. Chairman, which I believe should be clarified immediately. The minister objected to the reading of an editorial. If an editorial reflects upon the proceedings of this house of course it should not be read; but citation 265 at page 108 of Beauchesne, third edition, says:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that while I do not know what was in the editorial, if it does not reflect on the proceedings within the house the hon. member should have been permitted to read it. I am raising the point because I would not like the minister's objection to remain on the record without some challenge.

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps I was wrong; I will look it up later. I have seen the editorial.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Chairman, as I have listened to the speeches in this debate, some informative and some merely interesting, I have sometimes wondered whether those speaking have tended to lose sight of what we are attempting to do, why we are arming and to what extent we should arm at this time in view of the international situation.

As we all know, Russia has two alternative plans, either of which it can slip into from the other. The first obviously is to take all it can get by armed aggression when it chooses to use that method. The second is to take what it can get by infiltration and propaganda. At the present time we are not fighting Russia physically, and it would be silly, unnecessary and inadvisable to arm to the point where we would be prepared to carry on an all-out conflict. That is not what we are aiming at. We are aiming at putting ourselves into such a position that if war should come we would be able to make a maximum effort within a short time afterwards. We are placing ourselves in a position to rearm. In other words in three years, including this year, we hope to be rearmed, so that from that time on, provided no war breaks out, we can maintain a state of armament which would permit us to go quickly into full production should an actual war occur.

I sometimes think some of those who keep saying we are doing too little too late fail to keep that objective in mind. Russia has those two alternatives. One is to beat us by force; the other is to beat us by propaganda, by fear; to convince us that we must have an all-out war effort and must maintain that all-out effort for a period of years, so as to bring about an economic break-down. Then, when our standard of living is reduced, they hope to be able to achieve what they desire without having to go to war. That is obvious to everyone. Most people see it, but they sometimes tend to lose sight of that fact. We in Canada do not intend to lose this struggle either way. We do not intend to lose it through armed force, nor do we intend to lose it through an economic break-down engendered by fear and helped along by people who cannot quite understand what we are attempting to do.

Canada's policy in Korea is clear and extremely simple. We are trying, through the United Nations, to stop aggression there in order to prevent it elsewhere later. Nothing could be more simple. People are criticizing the United Nations for having got themselves into a hopeless mess by resisting this aggression in Korea; that they see no end to this fighting for years—we certainly hope that will prove to be incorrect. Nevertheless we shall have accomplished something if we can stop them from going into Indo-China, or by this resistance stop them from going into India or any other country. Such an event would more than justify the expense and the loss of human life, for which we all grieve, in Korea. The action is so transparently advisable.

There is a tendency to criticize the United Nations and say the organization is washed up; that they are not able to enforce their demands. Surely we have gone through this situation often enough in the history of Canada and in the history of the world to realize that any international organization has to creep before it can walk, has to walk before it can run. You do not develop an international organization overnight. It may never really develop to the point that we hope it will during our lives; it may not develop under the auspices of the United Nations, but the thing will continue. It is an ideal that is going to continue, and that is irresistible.

Until people thoroughly understand that international law is not only desirable but has been established, we shall not have achieved what we hope to do under the United Nations or through any other international body. Sooner or later, just as the common law crept up in England and was adopted by Canada, an international common law and statutory law will creep up. When that day arrives, we shall have achieved something. You do not do that overnight, nor would it be advisable to give those powers to the United Nations now. The United Nations lack the experience in the administration of international law. It will only get that when, with international law behind it, it has gained the experience and confidence of the peoples of the world.

There has been some criticism of our defence effort, and I should like to quote a few figures for the year 1951. Comparisons are sometimes misleading, and sometimes they are odious; nevertheless I do not think these figures are unworthy of quotation in this house.

First of all, the defence expenditure expressed as a percentage of the gross national production for 1951 is as follows: France, 7·2 per cent; Belgium, 4·4 per cent; United Kingdom, 9·0 per cent; United States 15·3 per cent; Canada, 9·4 per cent. Canada is second only to the United States. The 1951 defence expenditures per capita expressed in Canadian dollars are as follows: France, 51·9; Belgium, 35; United Kingdom 75·9; United States, 330·6; Canada, 138·4. It is true that while we are second we are a considerable distance behind the United States, but we are also a considerable distance ahead of the other three nations named. I believe those figures are interesting. They may have some significance, but it is difficult to know what significance to attach to figures of that sort. I do believe, however, they have just as much significance as, and probably more than, many of the adverse figures which I have heard quoted.

There has been a criticism that we have rearmed far too late. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that is a question of opinion. I do not know how anyone can prove whose opinion is right until the event happens. The event has not yet happened. We hope we are right, and we are sincerely trying to do what we consider to be right. The suggestion of the hon. member for Nanaimo may be perfectly correct. It may be that we should have rearmed more heavily two or three years ago. On the other hand, it may be that five years from now the hon. member for Nanaimo and others may be suggesting we have armed too early. I do not think this is something that can be defined accurately as a mathematical problem can be defined. It is a very difficult question, but it is one upon which we are acting with the best advice possible. I suggest it would be a strong criticism to keep telling us that we have armed too late. The situation is not one that is capable of accurate calculation.

The hon. member for Nanaimo suggested also that if we had armed three years earlier, it might have curbed the present inflationary trend which has been caused by our intensive rearmament. I am not an economist, although I studied economics at the university. The only thing I gained from my study of economics was a suspicion of economists. While I regard economists with great interest and I like to read what they say, I would hesitate to adopt what they recommend in my business for fear the Bankruptcy Act would apply very shortly.

Another one of the criticisms that is often aimed at the government by all parties in opposition is that they have too little information, and that from the little information they are able to obtain they are unfortunately strangled to the point where they cannot make proper criticisms. Well, that is what I call a negative argument. It is an excuse that I have seen from my earliest school days. It is an excuse that has been used I think since the time of the Greeks. If people are not willing to work sufficiently hard to digest the information which is furnished to them, then they say: We have not the information, so we cannot criticize. Mr. Chairman, what information do they get? First of all, they get the estimates, which are in some detail. They can have a great deal more detail any time they care to ask for it. Second, they have the public accounts. It is rather enlightening if one looks at the attendance of the Progressive Conservative members on the public accounts committee. There does seem to be a certain reluctance on their part to attend meetings.

Then, there are questions. Any hon. member in this house is entitled to ask a question, unless the information is top secret and should not be given in public. Members may ask any number of questions and receive answers accordingly. That is a method that provides a lot of information. This year the estimates were tabled early in order to meet the convenience of the leader of the opposition and others who requested that that be done. When they were tabled the leader of the opposition was asked whether he wished to proceed with them immediately, and his answer was in the negative.

The form of government which we have is not one which allows the government to delegate authority. It is true that in certain other countries the cabinet is not representative of the people, but is appointed. In our own country the cabinet is composed of elected representatives. The Minister of National Defence has the responsibility of discharging the functions of his cabinet post. His task is not to govern with the consent of the opposition or with the advice of the opposition. Having been appointed as a minister of that department by the party which has been elected to power in this country, he is given that responsibility and he must exercise it. He is not supposed to throw it into some committee and say: "Here, what do I do?

I have seen nothing so far—and others may agree with me—put forward by the members of the opposition that would lead me to believe the forming of such a committee would be to the advantage of Canada. The criticisms and suggestions they have made, if incorporated in one small volume, would not seem to me to justify the appointment of a committee. I suggest that they write them on a single piece of paper and send them to the minister. I suggest that, under the form of government which we have, and having regard to the manner in which our defence department is set up in this country, there is actually available to the opposition member who cares to put some work into it far more information than is available in the United Kingdom. I would say there is available far more information than one gets in the United States. This government provides the members of the opposition with more information about what is happening in national defence, I believe, than any other government in the world.

It is not my task, Mr. Chairman, to suggest things to members of the opposition, but I would just ask the leader of the opposition to consider this one thing and to consider it seriously: Is he not confusing lack of information with his lack of assimilation thereof?

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I feel diffident about taking part in this discussion after the lecture we have just had, inasmuch as I am not an economist nor a lawyer. To me as a member of an opposition party it sounded as if we had no business to be talking at all. But in order to justify our existence we must express opinions on matters that come before parliament, and that is what I am going to do at this time. I think the Minister of National Defence gets a great deal of value out of the suggestions that are made here.

Mr. Claxton: That is quite true.

Mr. Gillis: During the period in which I have been a member of parliament I have seen enacted a great deal of legislation that had its origin on this side of the house. In the task that the Minister of National Defence has today I am reasonably sure that he welcomes the opportunity of spending a little time in sitting down and listening to members who have not much to do except to think about these matters. As hon. members know, the minister is a busy man; he is the minister for air, for naval affairs and for the army. He also has a great deal to do with civil defence. The matters that he is required to go into, dealing with the problems of organizing defence in this world today, are such that a great deal of thinking is required. It is for that reason that I am going to say a few things to the minister at this time.

I should like to emphasize once again what has already been emphasized on two or three occasions in this debate, namely, that you cannot divorce national defence from external affairs. The two matters are closely bound together. Our defences today go all over this world, and the external policies of the government can either buttress or upset the defence plans of the country. I think the truth of that statement is clearly indicated by the MacArthur incident in the United States. Unless those who administer external affairs and those who plan defence inside and out of this country are close together and much in agreement about what is to be done at a given time, one group can upset the other.

There is one thing that I should like to emphasize in this debate, in which members are rather restricted because of lack of information. As I see it, the thing that has not been emphasized by the government or by anyone else—and definitely not by the press—is the question whether we are justified in spending $5 billion over the next three years in preparing the defences of this country. Anyone who gets out around in the country and talks about this matter of defence—the huge expenditures, and the inflation that we are experiencing at this time—will find that the people in the country have little knowledge of it. One opinion is that it is just another way of keeping out of a depression; that if it was not for the defence spending at this time we would be in a depression; that it is only an alibi. Not many people in this country are convinced that there is any danger or that there is any necessity for spending that large amount of money on defence. One thing that I think the government should do, and should continue to do, is to keep before the people the dangerous aspects of the present international situation.

For the purpose of pointing up that suggestion, I should like to give a few figures that were put on the record of the House of Commons in Britain in February of this year. What are we up against? What has our potential enemy? What are his possibilities of overrunning the territory facing him? What are his chances ultimately?—because ultimately the goal is this continent. If the situation develops as it is developing, then the final battles of this present era will be fought out on this continent. What is the strength of the people against whom we are today aiming to protect ourselves by arming?

According to Prime Minister Attlee, speaking recently in the House of Commons in Britain, the military strength of the Soviet union is as follows: He stated that Russia had an army of 2,500,000 men, or 176 divisions. These divisions were dispersed in the following manner: Eastern Germany, 22; Austria, 2; Hungary, 4; Poland, 5; Roumania, 3; western Russia, 49; central Russian front, 20; the Caucasus, 21; central Asia, 19; the Far East, 31, including 4 divisions in Manchuria. There were an additional 600,000 men in the MVD and another 600,000 men in the air force. While there are no figures for the navy, it is known that that country has one of the largest submarine fleets in the world.

That is merely the strength of the Soviet union as such. That is not saying anything about the satellites she has around her. You will notice that the Soviet armed might is dispersed in strategic spots from which she can step off in any direction at any time, with terrific force. In my opinion those figures alone are something that should be pounded into the minds of the Canadian people generally, and of the members of the House of Commons particularly. I do not expect the Minister of National Defence or his officials to be propaganda agents trying to put that kind of thing over. I think that every member of parliament has a responsibility, regardless of where he sits; and if he is trying to build up the idea, as many are, that there is no hurry about this matter of arming, he is making a mistake. The hon. member for Parkdale did that a moment ago. He said: We will just take our time; we will do it for three years. This fellow, our potential enemy, is ready; let us not make any mistake about that. Our enemies have a timetable. They know exactly what they are going to do this month, next month and next year; and when they figure that the time is ripe for them to step off, they will do it. As the Minister of National Defence said in his statement on his estimates, we do not know whether we have three years; we do not know whether we have a week. That is absolutely correct. But the other fellow has a timetable. He is working on it every day.

We often hear it said that there is no war. That is another statement that is made quite loosely. In 1914 a man was shot and a war was started all over the world. Today men are being shot all over the world. There are four or five wars going on in Asia at the present time. There is a major war going on in Korea. In Germany there are armies facing each other with all the weapons of destruction that are known; a fire could be lit here at any moment. There is a war on all over the world. Let us not make any mistake about it; the communist party have a timetable and they are working on that timetable week by week. They are marching on, taking over where they can without bloodshed, as they have done in Czechoslovakia and in many other countries, and they are fighting it out where they have to, as they are doing today in Korea. We talk about there being no war. No; there is no shooting at the present time in Canada, but all the moves that are being made today in places such as Tibet, Indo-China, Korea and other countries are merely strategic moves that are bringing them closer and closer to the time when they may be able to step in and hit this continent. That is the ultimate goal; do not make any mistake about it.

That answers the question whether these defence expenditures are necessary or not. They are necessary. We should be driving every day and every hour of the day in preparing the people of this country psychologically to realize that they have something to fight against, and that is an invasion of this continent; because our final preparations are for the defence of this continent. I should like to leave that thought with the minister and with the members of the house.

There was a time when I thought we might avoid an over-all conflict, but since the United Nations declared China an aggressor I have not that hope any longer. When you declare a country an aggressor and start to fight a war with it, then you have to continue until one side or the other is defeated. Fighting a war presupposes that somebody is going to win and somebody is going to lose. There is no such thing as stopping in the middle. We must understand that and make our preparations accordingly.

Another thing I should like to emphasize to the minister is that we should not have any timetable as to when we are going to start this or when we are going to stop it. The defence program upon which we are embarking is in my opinion a long-term program. I can see the defences we are building today continuing, and the men we are putting into uniform today being in uniform perhaps for the next fifteen or twenty years. It is a long-term program; and when we are thinking in terms of raising a brigade and that brigade going to Europe and another brigade going to Korea, we may be just picking up enough replacements for casualties. I do not think it is a realistic approach to the thing at all. The government has to start thinking in terms of equality of sacrifice in the business of defending this continent, and that is what we are preparing for at the present time.

I believe the minister's department or the government should consider a survey of our manpower and of our resources. That is one of the main requirements in preparation for defence. You may call it national registration, you may call it what you wish, but a survey of our resources and our manpower is necessary. The government is also going to have to start thinking in terms of this question: are we going to put a certain small percentage of our people in uniform and keep them there for the next ten or fifteen years at the pay they receive and at the inconvenience of being separated from their families and all that will entail, and are we going to leave everybody else back in Canada who is not in the services to go along with business as usual, making money for himself? If we are to embark on the kind of program that we feel is necessary, then everybody in this country should understand it, and there should be equality of sacrifice. Everybody should be obliged to pull his weight. That is another matter on which the government has not done very much thinking. It is about time we started to do some very serious thinking on this point.

When we talk about this business of democracy, our attitude to the people in the countries into which we have gone to liberate them requires considerable overhauling. For example, our record in Europe, in Germany and in Holland after the liberation was not good. According to reports, we were not the democratic gentlemen that we should have been. A lot was wrong with our attitude toward the people. Reference was made last evening by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to an article that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen a few days ago in the form of questions and answers which left much to be desired. The attitude indicated there was: Well, you came in to liberate us, but instead of liberating us you exterminated us. The people of South Korea have been walked over and run over five or six times in the last year. Our attitude toward the people in selling democracy to them has left much to be desired. It is not very good. We must be careful, in using democracy as a slogan, that we do not get back something which we have been fighting against for the last ten years.

Take a look at the elections which took place in Germany just a few days ago. Along with the United States and Britain we have been in western Germany selling democracy to them. The recent elections in that part of Germany showed that the nazi party is coming back very strongly in western Germany. On the other side, in eastern Germany you have the totalitarian set-up that is indoctrinating all the people in that part of the country; but on our side, where we should have been selling democracy and exemplifying it to them and building a democratic country, all we have succeeded in doing is to bring back the nazi party. In that election the three different nazi parties were able to capture at least twenty per cent of the votes. Political observers consider that a pretty bad development.

You pick up a press report and you find that under the guise of fighting communism and maintaining democracy, dictatorial powers are assumed to combat reds in Panama. The president throws over the democratic government and assumes dictatorial authority. He has a little revolution on his hands there today. We cannot sell democracy, in these countries that have never had it, by the use of semi-dictatorial powers and by pushing people around.

Another thing we have to be careful about—and apparently we are not sending the right kind of people into these areas to sell democracy—is this. Great emphasis has been laid on the question of economic aid. That is important, but it does not solve the whole problem. It seems to have been assumed that if we can build up these backward countries, give them plenty to eat, raise their standards and all that kind of thing, they will be our friends and will go along with us. A very good example is Korea itself, because that country was given a lot of aid during the time it was under the United Nations commission. The sum of $98,775,000 worth of economic aid was given to these people. One-third of it went for fertilizer to help them grow more food. Fourteen million dollars went for raw cotton; $7 million for coal, and other millions for wheat, flour and so forth. Yet, in the face of that huge expenditure, that huge gift in the way of economic aid, whenever the North Koreans were well fed and well armed they did not consider for a moment which side they were on. They attacked South Korea. They lighted the fire that is raging there at the present time.

While I am in favour of helping to feed these people in backward countries under the Colombo plan, I think that assistance should be properly supervised and distributed. We must not forget that billions of dollars worth of economic aid was given to China, and we are now being repaid for that. We should be careful not to make the mistake we did in building up China, in arming her, so that she could come back and fight us when it suited her. We should have that aid in the hands of our friends, not in the hands of our enemies. I want to emphasize that point most strongly.

Let us not forget for a moment that today we are facing guns. Unless we can get as many guns handled by people who are just as efficient with them, we are not going to come out of this with a whole skin. We did not start this business. Canada and the United States have always been peaceful nations. As Mr. Mackenzie King said at the outbreak of the last war, he was reluctant to declare war and send young Canadians to Europe every generation to rescue countries who apparently were not able to look after themselves. That was a realistic statement to make. That war was forced on us, and what we are up against today was forced on us. I do not think the people of this continent want to fight. But if a war is forced on us, we should fight with everything we have. There should be no quibbling about it. If we are to get in there to the full, then let us get in to the full.

I do not want anyone to assume that I am objecting to anything this government is doing by way of economic aid. But I contend that it should be organized, supervised and distributed in such a way as to bring returns to this country. It should not be placed in the hands of people who will use it to build up machinery in an attempt to bring about our ultimate destruction.

One thing we should watch very closely is the device being used by Soviet Russia—they know quite well how to use it—of splitting the allies who indicate a willingness to fight her. If hon. members have been following press reports for the last few weeks they will know that that device has been used quite successfully. In my opinion the MacArthur incident was a great victory for the communists. When they could get Truman and MacArthur in a public battle on vital issues in Korea, when they could cause such turmoil within the United States, they achieved a great victory. In my opinion they probably had a lot to do in bringing that about.

Many divisions have crept into the United Nations in connection with the Japanese treaty. The North Atlantic pact countries do not see eye to eye on this, nor do they see eye to eye on an arms embargo against China. Ever since the supposed end of the last war the communists have used the United Nations as a sounding board and as a means of dividing the allies. That war was never really ended; the shooting has never stopped.

I think the officials of the Department of External Affairs are levelheaded, and they should assume leadership in the United Nations and step in whenever they see these divisions cropping up. They are No. 1 on Mr. Stalin's list. He wants to divide the allies and take them one by one. That was Hitler's technique, and the technique used today by Stalin is no different. Hitler's theme in the last war was never to fight again on two fronts, but the aim of the communists today is to divide the allies and get them fighting on as many fronts as possible. Stalin has sat back and has used none of his own men. He is using the satellites all over the world to start little wars here and there in the hope that he can get one going that will be big enough to involve the United States and Canada in particular and deplete the economies of these countries. If he can do that, there is nothing left to fight for. The Department of External Affairs can make a contribution by preventing differences between the North Atlantic pact countries.

I think the limiting factor in this country in connection with our defence program is the idea that we should have business as usual. No one thinks that he has to make any sacrifices. Everyone feels that he is going to have the same supplies of civilian goods, and that he is going to get more money for them. Everyone feels that we are going to equip and build new plants for the purpose of turning out peacetime goods. That is the limiting factor. No one is pushing the program.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar indicate yesterday that the Ford Motor company had been refused a permit to establish an auto parts plant in Windsor, a project which has been under consideration for at least a year. I was glad to hear that the Department of Defence Production had refused this permit, because it would take such an enormous amount of steel. I know that at the other end of the scale a very small building requiring a small amount of steel was treated in the same way just a week or two ago. No building requiring steel is given a permit by the department. The priorities branch of the Department of Defence Production is limiting the construction of anything that will take steel from essential defence requirements.

I was glad this permit was refused. This particular controversy indicates that the Ford Motor company are not co-operating very much when they want to start this peacetime project rather than tool up for vehicles and machines of war which are needed at this time. The argument is that they have no contracts, but at least a year ago I heard that they had contracts for many things which they should have been tooled up for at this time.

The supply of machine tools may be a big problem in this country. I have in my hand a report published in one of our local papers indicating a labour shortage in the machine tool industry. Machine tools are the very basis of our defence production program. If you are going to swing over twenty-five per cent of peacetime industry to a war economy, one of the first things you have to have is machine tools. Without machine tools you cannot tool up for the new production. It is an industrialist who is being reported in this news item, and he points out that there is a terrific labour shortage in the machine tool industry. You cannot develop a toolmaker overnight. He must serve an apprenticeship of nine years, even longer than a medical doctor. We should have had an apprenticeship program going for some considerable time.

While it is all right to find fault about the fact that there is no plane production, no tank production, or no production of this and that, the fact is that we should have a manpower and resources survey to pinpoint exactly what we are short of and what we should be giving priority to. That is one of the main requirements of an effective defence program. Unless that is done you are working in the dark. All of your planning is haphazard because you do not know what you are doing, and it is not going to be done from the ivory towers in Ottawa. You have got to get somebody else outside working with you. As I suggested to the Minister of Labour on his estimates, one of the things he should have is industrial councils covering the auto workers, mine workers and steel workers, the men who work in these plants and who can tell you what to do. They are the only people who can tell you.

Mr. Sale, the head of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, is a member of the manpower committee, but he did not tell you very much except that from the standpoint of his own organization he wanted to build a big peacetime plant in the face of defence production shortages in steel. If we had had industrial councils covering our industries the machine tool makers could have told us a year ago when we were talking defence that unless we did something about the developing shortage in that particular trade there would not be very much that we could do about defence, but we did not have anyone to tell us about that. The Department of National Defence should get together with the Department of Labour and form industrial councils. I am not objecting to what you have now. They are all right. Let them stay there, but augment them by men direct from the plants and shops who do the actual work and know what work has to be done.

I should like to say a word or two about standardization of arms, something which I think is very important. Other members have mentioned the matter but nobody stated very definitely whether they favoured standardization on the United States pattern or on the British pattern. As I heard it, the suggestion was that we should stick with the United States pattern where we are fighting with the Americans, and that our brigade to Europe perhaps should follow the British pattern. I am no expert on the matter, but I have read something about it. I have read what was said in this house in the years before the last war. The argument always has been that we should standardize on the United States pattern. Many years before the last war this matter came up in the House of Commons and very good arguments were made for following that course, but I think that today the reasons are much stronger why Canada should standardize on the United States pattern.

Mr. Wright: Why not one pattern for all?

Mr. Gillis: I would say that if the North Atlantic pact countries mean business, if they are going to stick together, if it is going to be a case of when one is at war the others are at war, then no matter where these countries are engaged they will be fighting together, and there should be the one standard of equipment for all the North Atlantic pact countries. Of course the commercial aspect enters into the picture, and every country will want to do the manufacturing. That could be farmed out. No priority should be given any one country. Every country should manufacture an equal share, but there should be complete standardization for the North Atlantic pact countries.

Mr. Blackmore: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: I am greatly interested in his remarks. Suppose it were decided to standardize arms for the North Atlantic pact countries. That would include Great Britain. Would my hon. friend go so far as to suggest that it would be better to have Great Britain accept the United States standard of arms? I am particularly interested in the discussion.

Mr. Gillis: I am not saying whether Great Britain should accept United States standards or whether the United States should accept British standards. I think there is some equipment that perhaps can be turned out more economically and better in Great Britain, and there is perhaps other equipment that the United States can turn out better. These details are things that would have to be worked out. I am merely talking about the principle. If these countries are going to hang together then I think there should be one standard. No matter where they are their equipment should be interchangeable.

Mr. Blackmore: Would my hon. friend permit another interpolation?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: The reason I asked the question was that I gathered from what the hon. member said that he felt there was a controversy between the ideas of those who believe that the British standard should be the one adopted and those who believe that the United States standard should be the one adopted. I saw there was a difficulty there that my hon. friend probably would like to explain away.

Mr. Gillis: There is a controversy right now. For example, the proposal was made that a uniform rifle should be adopted. There is an argument now between Great Britain and the United States on that point. Great Britain thinks that a Belgian rifle offered at the present time is a better rifle. They think it is lighter and easier to handle and, so far as I know at the present time, Great Britain is going to adopt the Belgian rifle and equip her forces with it. On the other hand the Americans say that they are going to stick to their own rifle. It is heavier, and it is an automatic rifle. They claim it is better and therefore they are going to stick to it. There is a controversy at the present time. I am raising this matter now because of that controversy.

As the hon. member for Melfort suggested, there should be one standard for the North Atlantic pact countries; that is the ideal thing. But on the other hand if war develops and there is going to be any standardization so far as Canada is concerned it should be on the United States pattern. If those we expect to fight succeeded in their objective of invading this continent, and we were standardized on the British pattern of equipment, one of the first places to be isolated and cut off from us in the event of invasion of this continent would be Great Britain. Americans and Canadians would be fighting all over the continent and we would be stuck with the British pattern, a pattern that was not interchangeable with that of the United States. If we are going to accept any pattern I think it should be the United States standard. I mention this matter because it requires some thought by the Department of National Defence.

I have noticed that at the present time the department is sending out of the country considerable equipment—and rightly so—to Belgium and other countries. That presupposes that we are going to develop new patterns and equipment for ourselves. The matter of standardization has been brought up twice but no one made very emphatic recommendations on the subject. My own opinion is that if any standardization for defence purposes is going to be considered by the Canadian government, our best bet is to stick with our neighbours in the United States. I think that I am pretty well to the end of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Blackmore: I have interrupted you.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to say one other thing to the minister before I sit down. In his speech he made reference to the fact that recruiting would be carried on right across the country. He said that he was basing his recruiting centres on the reserve army, and that the new brigade was to be raised through the reserve forces. I agree with that. However, he also told us the centres where training is going to take place, and in looking over them I find that the minister has very carefully excluded any training centres in the maritime provinces. So far as eastern Canada is concerned the training is to be done—

Mr. Claxton: There is all the training for the navy and two big training centres for the air force.

Mr. Gillis: Well, I listened to the minister's speech, and I have a clipping here dated May 4 with the heading "No brigade training for camps in maritimes." From this I gather that all the men from eastern Canada will be trained at Valcartier. I would ask the minister not to let his department get into the same frame of mind the government appears to be in, with respect to the centralization of his forces in this part of Canada. That is the economic development.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Claxton: Proportionately we have more forces in Nova Scotia and spend more money there than in any other part of Canada, I think.

Mr. Gillis: Since when?

Mr. Claxton: In the defence department in 1950-51.

Mr. Gillis: Well, you built a number of good camps down there during the last war, but you destroyed them when the war was over; they were obliterated.

Mr. Claxton: More than half the total operations of the navy are centred in Halifax.

Mr. Gillis: I am talking about the army now; I do not know what you are doing in the navy. I have been up and down that province quite a bit in the last three years, and I have not seen any naval men there at all. There may be a few hidden away in Halifax, but they are pretty carefully kept out of the way. You know, navy boys get around when they are ashore. I am talking about your training camps. Valcartier is quite a good camp. I spent a considerable time there, camping in the sand, some years ago, and it is not a bad spot. At the same time I suggest to the minister that he should still consider Debert, which was one of the best camps in Canada for the training of troops that were to go overseas. I believe he should give that matter further consideration.

Now I am going to offer a few recommendations which I think would stimulate recruiting. Today I do not think very much is offered the average man to make him leave his employment, uproot himself, and leave the country for an indefinite period with the armed services. A moment ago I said what I thought of the minister's policy of using the reserve force as the basis for the organization of this new brigade. I also want to tell him that one of the greatest stumbling blocks in the way of building up the reserve force is the fact that the money these men are paid is taxed. You do not have to leave this city to find that out; you can get that information from any of the boys in the reserve army here. I understand the amount paid members of the reserve army is to be stepped up a little. A recruit comes in and says, "We get paid so much per drill. Is that money taxed?" He is told that it is taxed, so he says, "O.K., I am not coming in." That man has a job; he is in a certain income tax bracket. If he joins the reserve army he will be paid $20 or $25 a month, which must be added to his income. That puts him in another income tax bracket. At the end of the year, instead of the reserve army paying him something, he pays Mr. Abbott something. He really loses in the transaction; he has drilled for nothing, because the money is taken back in income tax. I think the Minister of National Defence, who has the responsibility of raising this force—and a very serious responsibility it is—should say to the Minister of Finance that the little bit of money he is getting out of this by way of tax should be forgotten; that in order to stimulate recruiting he should announce that the money paid the men who drill in the evenings, and who will form the basis of the next army, will be tax free. Then I think you will get a lot of them to go in who will not go in otherwise. It seems to me that a government so mercenary and parsimonious that it will not relinquish the little bit of money it gets by taxing the pay of the reserve army deserves very little consideration when it appeals to men to take the training necessary to form the basis of the next army, the very men who would be necessary to defend this continent if and when the over-all thing develops that we all expect.

I suggest to the minister very seriously that if he hopes to get recruits his department should not just sit back and say, "Well, we have done it before; we can do it again." Unless some serious thinking is done, unless there are more practical advances in the next two years than we have seen in the last two years, I suggest to the Canadian people that they had better join the moral rearmament group and start to pray for guidance. Very little has been done except talk and put schemes on paper. What I have recommended would be one practical step. It would recognize the fact that it is unfair to expect a man to join the reserve army and drill, and for that privilege and pleasure pay the income tax department at the end of the year.

Then there is this matter of the attestation form, which was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. There is not a uniform attestation form today. That form is a pretty important thing to a man going into the service, because it lays the basis for a lot of things that can happen to him after he comes out, such as pension rights, whether he has any disabilities that are considered hereditary, and all that kind of thing. Most of the boys joining up today either were in before or know something about the importance of that form. Surely that would not be a difficult thing to remedy. I imagine it would not be hard to get a uniform form ready and ship it out to the centres where recruiting is carried on. This may not sound very important, but anyone who has been in the service, or anyone who has fought pension cases, knows the importance of an attestation form. It pretty well forms the basis for everything that happens when you go before a board, unless your disability consists of a big hole that has been shot into you, or something like that. Generally they pull a statement from the form that the boy's grandfather had mumps or his grandmother had housemaid's knee, and when considering any kind of disability they say it resulted from the mumps or the housemaid's knee. I believe we should have an attestation form that would eliminate that sort of thing. A man is either fit when he goes into the service or he is not fit; and we still have a great deal of trouble at the present time from that sort of thing in connection with the last two wars.

I want to bring another point to the minister's attention, and I feel perhaps stronger on this one than on any of the others. Many of the young men in the service today, including many in Korea, are boys who left a home with a father, a mother and a dependent family. That boy was the only source of income, but there is no dependents' allowance in his case. If he has a wife he gets an allowance for her, though it is not too big. He gets an allowance for his children, if any. Most of the boys who went in the special force, however, were single. Let us not forget that many young men in this country today are maintaining families. They do not marry for that reason; they have families on their hands already. I know several who left mothers and fathers and younger children at home and joined that special force, and are now in Korea. In the first war and the second war there was a dependents' allowance available if there was an assignment of pay; today there is nothing but the assigned pay. There is no dependents' allowance board, as such. Those matters are handled through the national defence department, though handling dependents' allowance is a job by itself. You do not want it done by a brigadier or a colonel or a general, who may know all about the military angles of everything. You want someone who has some humanity about him, who understands the social problems that can be created by taking the breadwinner away from the family.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the member care to state whether or not the same thing applies to the boys who would be enlisting in the army today, whether or not they would be going to Korea?

Mr. Gillis: Yes, the same thing applies to the brigade that would be going to Europe.

Mr. Blackmore: That is a mighty serious matter.

Mr. Gillis: I would say to the minister that if you are going to raise an army by voluntary means, you are only going to get the boys of this country to put on a uniform who have some patriotism in their hearts and who recognize the fact that this country is worth fighting for. If these boys leave dependents behind and go out to do that kind of job, I do not think it is asking too much of the fellow who stays at home in order to make more money, and who has the comforts of a home, to pay a little tax to look after the family the chap leaves behind. If the man who volunteers is willing to offer his life, as he is doing in Korea today, I think his father, mother, dependent brothers and sisters are entitled to some subsistence allowance from the government. The precedent is there, because we did it in both of the last wars. We even had auxiliary dependents allowance boards and committees across the country with power to make grants in addition to the basic allowance given by the government. I am telling the minister that that is a very strong point when you go out to sell voluntary enlistment to the young men of this country, as you are doing today. Their fathers have gone through a war, and we are asking these boys, twice in one lifetime, to volunteer. This time it is necessary. It is our war this time. If we do not go out and meet it somewhere else, it is going to meet us here. We have to get away from this philosophy of "business as usual, and I am not going to make any sacrifice because a supernatural something is going to inspire the people of this country to do the job themselves". That is not going to happen.

We have to show the young man who leaves this country that we are interested to the extent of granting an allowance that will replace, to some extent at least, the obligation he accepted before he decided he had a greater obligation in the service of his country. I strongly urge the Minister of National Defence to consider those three points. There should be a manpower survey, and a resources survey conducted as soon as possible. I believe that is the basis for our whole defence set-up. As long as you are getting recruits on a voluntary basis, at least you should not make the reserve army pay taxes. Then we should follow that up by granting a dependents allowance where young men were maintaining homes before going into the service. I know that most of these boys fully expected there would be an allowance. Perhaps some of them would not have volunteered if they had known otherwise. I have had letters from them, and I have made representations to the deputy minister. The deputy minister informs me there is no regulation covering the situation, and there is no dependents allowance board. If we are going to get a defence program going which will take us over the next ten or fifteen years, then we had better commence setting up the mechanics necessary to administer it. We should do something to meet the requirements of those who are expected to leave this country to meet the enemy somewhere else and stop him before he gets here.

These points are not very difficult, but you have to do something about them. You cannot put them on paper and file them away in a desk. When the minister speaks in closing the debate I shall expect him to tell us that he has considered these three points, and to give us his assurance they are going to be taken care of immediately.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with three aspects of the defence program. They are:

The raising of a larger reserve army,

Making that reserve army more effective, and

The pay for the active forces.

First of all, I should like to deal with the raising of a larger reserve army. I believe all members will agree that if we are to raise an active force quickly, we must rely on a large and well-trained reserve. For the past five years, Mr. Chairman, I have been a staff officer in the reserve army. From my observations, I would say that the great majority of reserve units would not, on an average, parade more than twenty-five per cent of their authorized strength, and a large part of the numbers on parade are made up by the band.

Why is it that our reserve army is so small today, during a period which is vitally critical, and which adds up to undeclared war? Why is it, we must ask ourselves, do our young men not volunteer in larger numbers than they have for both our active and reserve forces? I have come to the conclusion that it is simply because they have not been told by this government that today the situation is critical. In fact, the government has attempted to lull the people into a false sense of security.

An outstanding example of that, I believe, is the statement which was made by the Prime Minister last December 12, and which was recorded by the Canadian Press all across this country. I intend to put it on the record, so there can be no doubt about it. This statement appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of December 13. The headline reads: "P.M. Optimistic General War Will Not Come at This Time." That is a big three-column heading on the article, and it reads:

A reporter asked Mr. St. Laurent if he was satisfied with Canada's defence progress.

He smiled and said:

"I think the progress is satisfactory."

Then he added:

"I am just as optimistic as Lloyd's." He noted that the London insurance firm had quoted odds of 50-1 against a general war breaking out. He concluded:

"I am just as optimistic as they are."

Now, Mr. Chairman, this statement was interpreted by people right across this country as meaning that the Prime Minister was saying he believed the chances were 50 to 1 against our becoming involved in a general war. I know that the Prime Minister has denied any intention of conveying that impression. However, as so often happens in these cases, the original statement gets the headlines, and the denial makes no news at all. That was the case in this instance. The result is that people only remember the Prime Minister's original statement, and it remains very clearly in their minds today.

I have talked to a great number of young men about joining the active or reserve forces. Time and again I have heard them say, "How can you expect me to take the situation very seriously if the man who is supposed to know most about the situation tells me there is only one chance in 50 I shall be needed?"

What is needed immediately is a statement by the Prime Minister which will outline, without the shadow of a doubt, the gravity of the situation today, and which will issue a clear-cut call to duty that the young men of this country can understand. Then, and only then, shall we begin to get some worth-while results from the hundreds of thousands of dollars we are spending every month in advertising designed to get young men to enlist in both the active and reserve forces.

What I believe we want to hear a great deal more of from this government is the kind of statement which was made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday morning while he was addressing a meeting of civil defence workers. I should like to quote what he said, as it was reported in the Ottawa Journal of last evening. The heading is "Whip up Fury against Soviet Threat" and the report reads as follows:

Civil defence minister Paul Martin, in a sizzling preparedness speech this morning, lashed out at what he termed Canada's "over-defence-mindedness" and urged a campaign to "whip up fighting fury" against the Soviet threat.

"You can't win wars by hiding behind trees," Mr. Martin told a group of civil defence instructors at the opening of a training course at Connaught ranges.

"Defence alone never results in victory," Mr. Martin added.

The minister—who was accompanied by civil defence co-ordinator Major General F. F. Worthington—made it plain the prospect of atomic fire raining down on key Canadian target centres was no idle dream.

"Now, if ever, we must take this thing seriously. God knows what the situation will be within a year."

I believe it is regrettable that we have had to wait for so long for a statement containing some realization of the gravity of the situation today, and that that statement would have to come from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, instead of from the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, from whom it should have come many months ago. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it indicates that there is an imminent cabinet shake-up in the offing, in which the present Minister of National Health and Welfare is going to follow in the steps of the former minister of national health and welfare. But whether that is the case or not, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare has certainly well earned the nickname of "the Windsor Warrior" which is being bandied about the parliamentary lobbies and corridors today.

The second matter with which I should like to deal is the making of our reserve forces more effective. I believe that if our reserve units are going to become effective fighting formations, capable of taking their part in the defence of this country if needed, they must train as complete units each year for a minimum of two weeks at a summer camp. In order to make this possible, it will be necessary to pass legislation requiring employers to grant to employees who are in the reserve forces a two-week leave of absence during the period of the camp each summer, without jeopardizing the employee's job or seniority. This was found to be perfectly feasible during the last war, and the results were highly satisfactory. I believe it is the only way that units can become effective, so that they can take their place in the defence of this country, if that eventuality should ever arise.

The third point with which I should like to deal is pay for the active force. I should like to deal with it under two separate divisions: first, the freeing from income tax of the pay of those who serve outside of this country; and second, the paying of danger pay to those who serve in the front line.

First, as to the question of freeing from income tax the pay of soldiers who serve overseas, may I say this. The Minister of Finance, during the debate, when this question arose, stated that he believed that no group of earners within this country should be exempt from income tax. I think we will all agree that that is perfectly satisfactory in so far as it affects those of us who live and work in the comfort and security of this country; but it is quite another matter when you are dealing with those who risk their lives every hour on some foreign battlefield, to fight our battles for us. I believe that these men should be allowed to retain intact what they earn while fighting our battles overseas. I believe it is the least we can do in repayment to those gallant men, for their magnificent efforts on our behalf.

The second matter is the payment of danger pay to those who serve in the front lines. During the last war members of air crew in the air force were paid flying pay; and it was quite right that they should be so rewarded because of the danger which their job involved. The paratroopers were paid jump pay, and I believe that was quite justified because of the danger involved. Also, those who served on small ships in the navy were paid hard-lying pay, because of the discomfort involved in serving in those small ships.

I do not think that anybody undergoes any more danger—in fact, I do not think that anybody undergoes as much constantly —or that he undergoes as much discomfort over a long period, as do forward troops who are in slit trenches, under almost constant bombardment, as is the case in the forward areas.

During the last war, in the army, you could receive trades pay if you were a motor mechanic, a driver mechanic, an artificer or an orderly room clerk, or if you were skilled in any one of several trades, most of which were performed in the rear areas. But there has never been any trades pay for proficiency in the most important job of all, namely, killing the enemy, without which we cannot win battles. That job involves by far the greatest chance of getting killed or maimed, and it involves living in what are, in many cases, almost unendurable conditions.

I therefore strongly urge on the minister that he and his department seriously consider the question of paying danger pay to those who serve within a reasonable distance of the front line, and in this way properly reward those upon whose courage and skill we must rely for the winning of our campaigns.

In conclusion, I should like to say to the minister that the suggestions I have offered arise out of a certain amount of experience in these matters, and that they are offered as an attempt to be constructive. I sincerely hope that they will be considered in that light by the minister, and that he will comment on them when he sums up at the end of this debate.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be brief. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the importance of finding a place in the defence of this country for those resident in Canada who have not yet been able to become Canadian citizens or British subjects. My information is that, to date, there are to be found in this country some 40,000 men who are between the ages of 20 and 40 years, and who are not yet British subjects. Nearly all those people are newcomers who have arrived here in this country since 1945. Many of them came from d.p. camps. The majority of them belong to the following ethnic groups: Polish, Dutch, Ukrainian, Italian, Hebrew, Lithuanian, French, Czechoslovakian, Belgian and others. I also understand that some have come in from the United States who have not become Canadian citizens. My information is that it is not the policy of the Department of National Defence to admit into the Canadian armed forces, both active and reserve, any person who is not a British subject. I should like to point out some of the reasons why I think these men should be permitted at least to train in the reserve army. To begin with, many of these men have important qualifications which should be considered. Many of them came from countries which in the last war were right in the midst of fighting. Many of them are acquainted with life under war conditions. Many of them served with various armed services, and are therefore familiar with military technique. Some of them had a very wide experience and have held high positions in the army. Admitting these men now into our reserves would, I think, do two thing from the military point of view. It would first of all give them a degree of military training, and those with battle experience would become acquainted with the Canadian military technique; and, second, in the event of war it would prepare them for their task before they are needed, thereby saving precious time.

In addition to the military advantages, perhaps the greatest advantage to Canada would be in the realm of Canadian citizenship. I have met many of these newcomers, and they are anxious and willing to serve this country. In reserve services a newcomer would be a member of a purely Canadian organization. He would intermingle with Canadians and become better acquainted with our way of life. I think it would be the best school for him in Canadian citizenship. The newcomer would feel that he is not merely getting certain advantages in this country, but that in addition to other services he is prepared to offer something more to this country,—he is prepared to defend it.

There are certain arguments that I have heard people use against the admission of these non-citizens. One argument is that serving in the armed forces is a prerogative of a citizen and should not be extended to others. The other argument against admission is for security reasons. Dealing with the first objection, my point is that the admission of non-citizens is not urged as a matter of course, but in the light of the present grave international situation I think it is essential that Canada use all the possible means at her disposal to prepare for defence. May I point out at this time that in the United States male non-citizens are required to register for service between the ages of 18 and 26 under the compulsory service act of 1948. But at the same time I am informed that United States military intelligence is actually encouraging United States residents with only the "first papers", which is equivalent to our declaration of intention, to enlist for special duties with the army.

Dealing with the other objection, namely, the question of security, those who use this argument seem to disregard the fact that newcomers have already been screened before they were allowed to enter Canada. We must not forget that most of these people are political refugees; that they are therefore the greatest opponents of Russian communism that we can find in this country. Many of them have been victims of Russian brutality, and have actually witnessed the workings of Russian communism in its worst form.

May I add further that if they were allowed to join the reserve army they would undergo further screening before they were admitted. Other important qualifications of these newcomers are that they are specialists to this extent, that they have a knowledge of a language which is other than English or French; that they are acquainted with the geography and the way of life of some country other than Canada; that some of them have lived for many years in countries now behind the iron curtain, and they are well acquainted with the lands and with the people. I think that this type of people would indeed be an asset for our defence purposes.

I should like to point out that although the admission of the newcomers to the Canadian reserve forces may be accompanied by certain difficulties, yet I feel that the advantages to Canada would far outweigh the disadvantages, and for that reason I urge that the minister give this matter serious consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, we are asked today to concur in the adoption of the defence estimates which will not only add tremendously to our national budget but also endanger the economic future of our country. Every man, every woman, every family in the country will therefore be forced to shoulder a heavy burden of taxes for a period of at least three years.

Together with the rest of the house I deeply regret that it should be necessary to devote such enormous sums to our national defence preparedness when that money could be put to such advantageous use in promoting our economic development and the social progress of our country.

It may very well be necessary to buy radar equipment, fighter planes, guns, and so on, but who holds that such production is creative and productive!

One has but to consider the military operations taking place in Korea, Indo-China and the Malay peninsula, to realize the menace which hangs over our free world. All the free nations of the world must unite against such aggression.

It is now impossible to mistake isolation for national interest. Canada's obligations are those of a great sovereign nation. Without committing ourselves beyond our means, or without imitating the frog that wanted to be as big as an ox, we nevertheless have a responsibility in this search for world peace.

Unfortunately, I regret that the present government, which likes to take all the credit with regard to Canada's status as a sovereign nation, has not yet seen fit to give our country a truly Canadian flag as a symbol of such sovereignty. Canadian soldiers are being asked once more to fight abroad and shed their blood under a flag which is not theirs.

Besides, the problem of choosing a national anthem to honour Canada, both at home and abroad, has not yet been settled.

Obviously such a state of affairs is inconsistent with Canada's present status as a sovereign nation.

Furthermore, the selection of a flag and national anthem, both truly Canadian, would help considerably in this recruiting campaign which has been launched by the Department of National Defence.

I was pleased to learn yesterday from the minister himself the part now taken by the French-speaking Canadians in the Korean war and their representation in the Canadian army.

I also wish to congratulate the minister for his reply to the unfounded articles which have appeared in the Contemporary Review and in Foreign Affairs.

I agree with the minister that we should avoid and condemn anything that might create friction between the various racial groups of this country.

Like the minister who quoted these figures in order to reply to unfounded accusations and also to help the recruiting campaign which has just been launched, I would like to make a few remarks prompted by these same feelings.

Voluntary enlistment should supply the recruits needed by our armed forces. But if we want the recruiting campaign to be really successful in my province, we must see to it that in serving his country Jean-Baptiste is not given the impression of being a sort of mercenary.

And yet, if upon enlisting Jean-Baptiste gives our general staff a glance, he will most certainly be struck by the fact that the Department of National Defence does not go overboard, as far as generosity and national spirit are concerned, in the choice of superior officers.

Here is what he will find. At national defence headquarters in Ottawa: 2 lieutenant generals, both English-speaking; 7 major generals, all English-speaking; 33 brigadiers, of whom only 2 are French-speaking; 43 colonels of whom only 4 are French-speaking; 220 lieutenant colonels of whom 18 are French-speaking, and 560 majors of whom only 57 are French-speaking.

Turning to the different army services and looking over their staffs, one will notice that the representation is about the same.

Consider, for instance, the staff of the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, with headquarters in the French-Canadian city of Montreal; there, one finds 20 lieutenant colonels, of whom only 1 is a French-speaking Canadian, and 50 majors of whom only 4 speak French.

The same state of affairs applies to the headquarters of the different branches of the Canadian army. But when one considers the Quebec command headquarters, located in Montreal, it is even more surprising to find that the commanding general is an English-speaking Canadian, as is the chief of staff. The G.S.O. 1 and G.S.O. 1 (planning) are both English-speaking. If one examines the various services of the Quebec command, one finds exactly the same situation.

Let us now deal with the reserve army. Montreal has a population of about a million and a half, of whom 70 per cent are French-Canadians. Only four reserve regiments are actually French-Canadian regiments. There are nine English regiments where roughly 50 per cent of the soldiers are French-speaking Canadians; yet hardly 1 per cent of them are officers.

In so far as the Canadian navy is concerned, the situation is even more deplorable. There is not a single French-speaking officer above the rank of commander.

There is no excuse for this. Not only does it harm recruiting in the province of Quebec, but it shows how senior officers of this service are utterly devoid of the spirit of national unity.

Besides it is not surprising when it is remembered that, to instil a little Canadianism in the navy, near-mutinies and a strict investigation were required.

This situation should be improved as soon as possible, not only because of the present recruiting campaign, but also for the good of the services themselves.

Again, it is a situation like this which provokes articles like the one that the minister answered yesterday. Seeing so very few French-Canadians in senior positions, strangers cannot but draw conclusions such as those evidenced in these two articles.

I trust that the minister will make a note of those few remarks and that the situation will soon improve. In closing I wish to make a few suggestions. May I be permitted to request again, as was done several times in this house, that a military college be established in the province of Quebec in order to provide the necessary officers to ensure a fair representation within the general staffs of our different units.

I also wish the department would consider the advisability of creating French-Canadian naval units along the lines of the French-Canadian regiments in our army. During the last war, the R.C.A.F. established French-Canadian squadrons and everyone knows that this arrangement produced excellent results.

It is recognized that the establishment of such French-speaking units has a valuable effect on the new recruits, as our young men obviously do not feel at home at the beginning of their military careers and it is easy to understand that they feel less at home when they are not surrounded by people who speak their language and who received the same kind of education.

Undoubtedly such units could not be established without difficulty, but experience has shown that the results secured are worthwhile. I hope that the hon. minister will be able to solve that problem.

(Text):

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the five o'clock edition of the Ottawa Journal today contains an article from which I should like to quote in part as follows:

> Reference to the Martin speech, as reported in the Journal, also was made by O. L. Jones, C.C.F. member for Yale and by Ray Thomas, C.C.F. member for Wetaskiwin.

I want to express my appreciation of the write-up given to me by the Journal, but I do not like the added title of C.C.F. that I have been given. I am afraid they might go just a little bit further and refer to me as a Liberal.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy only two or three minutes of the time of the committee, but coming from a constituency which is so keenly interested in the matter about which I desire to say a word, I want to rise at this time and take part in this general discussion with respect to national defence in order to place my own personal views upon the record.

Linked closely with our plans for national defence is an issue which because of its overriding urgency requires government action at once. I am fully aware that the minister and the cabinet have been considering their course of action very carefully relative to the vital St. Lawrence seaway development. Members like myself and others, including members of the government, have during the last few weeks stressed the urgency of immediate action on the treaty which is presently before congress for ratification. I want to stress it again while we are considering the nation's defence program.

Time is rapidly running out for planning the needs of power for the production of war materials, to say nothing of the strategic necessity for this new means of water transportation from the mines to the mills for the iron ore so urgently needed for defence purposes.

It now appears that the chances of a favourable congressional decision are becoming more remote. That means Canada is faced with a decision of her own. The premier of Ontario yesterday pointed out in clear terms the advisability of Canada doing the job herself. Construction of the seaway alone was not our original plan but the government has arrived at a point now where in my personal view a new all-Canadian development should be announced at once.

The Prime Minister in the house last week expressed confidence that Canada could handle the undertaking without help from south of the border and he will have heavy support for that view.

The risk in delaying commencement of the project as an all-Canadian one arises from several factors. One is that a favourable decision by congress might conceivably mean a long series of delays with respect to appropriations and the like which could well nullify the objective of urgency surrounding the work and put back the completion for an embarrassingly long time. Another is that many time-consuming procedures are required, such as an application before the international joint commission which should be started if the project on an all-Canadian basis is to be initiated in the early future. Time becomes therefore a vital element from a defence point of view. In my opinion the decks should be cleared for action. Otherwise the deep waterway may well get bogged down and lost in a maze of international negotiations and delays beyond description. We have waited many years for the treaty to be ratified and implemented. No one in the United States could reasonably expect us to wait longer in this atmosphere of acute and compelling urgency. In my own humble opinion we should go it alone.

I want to impress upon the minister now the great urgency and concern with which those in my part of Canada view this very important matter. I know that he, charged as he is with providing for the defence needs of this country, will realize that the situation has become alarmingly acute. I urge the government to make that declaration now, and to proceed on an all-Canadian St. Lawrence deep waterway scheme.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, in the course of the debate a number of very helpful suggestions have been made, and I can assure members of the committee that all of them will receive the most serious consideration. I appreciate too the constructive attitude taken again by the official critic for the opposition, the hon. member for Nanaimo, and I take this opportunity to congratulate him on his reformation. For a long period of his life he has been a very gallant soldier in a branch of the services which we respect as the queen of them all, the infantry, but recently I took advantage of a vacancy in the honorary colonelship of an artillery regiment to approve his appointment to it, so that now at last he is a gunner.

At the outset I do not want to say anything much by way of general remarks except that this time the discussion has followed extraordinarily closely those of the last four years in which there have been charges of no information and that we should have done something before. As to information, I have answered that, and so have some other hon. gentlemen. Certainly the complaint I have from persons outside the house is that far too much information is given for our own good. Certainly far more is given than in any other country I know of with the only possible exception of the United States. I wish hon. members would look at the debates on defence matters in the parliament at Westminster. They would see how restricted they are on questions of policy, they do not go into matters of detail. There is no reason why we should follow them, but I suggest that when we are criticized on that account on this side of the house it would be well to look at what the mother of parliaments considers desirable.

For example, this year the debates on the defence estimates took place on March 6, 1951, for air, March 8 for the army and March 12 for the navy. They occupied a total of twenty-three hours. So far as I know, that is all the time that will be spent on defence estimates by the British House of Commons. As we know, their select committee on estimates, which has a subcommittee on defence, deals only with matters of finance and the like. This year, in addition to the list of public announcements that I gave at the outset of my statement yesterday, we have had the white paper which was tabled in the house on Monday, and which gives much more comprehensively and in greater detail than ever before information about the work of our defence forces, about what has been done, what is planned and what the money is needed for. I think it should enable all hon. members to see the picture very well.

In addition, this is an occasion when hon. members can secure additional information, and during the last day and a half they have not been backward in asking for it. I will endeavour to answer every question.

There is only one other general comment with which I wish to deal. It was said that we should have done more in 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949. Let me give an illustration. If we had preserved in the air force, for example, ten or eleven fighting squadrons at full strength, equipped with the aircraft they were using at the end of the war, we would now have an air force with personnel almost entirely over age for the job they had to do and out of date with respect to equipment. Instead we deliberately set about, starting with our wartime experience and war-trained officers, to build up the training establishment and depots, and also to develop aircraft which would enable us, as I believe they will, to be right among the leaders of the world as we would expect to be in that field.

The same thing applies to the other services. We have very good schools in practically every line of activity teaching officers and men to do the best kind of work. If we had not had those schools we would not have been able to train the Korean force or to keep on training our men at the rate we have. Notwithstanding the overhead required for administration, training, supply and transportation, I submit that we still have a lower overhead than other countries with which I am familiar with the single expection of countries behind the iron curtain.

Coming to the questions asked, the hon. member for Nanaimo remarked that the present method of recruiting was haphazard. He said we were taking on men whom we should not enlist, and he referred to the wastage which resulted in taking on the special force. Wastage in the army this year is by no means abnormal. During the first half of the year it was 4·3 per cent and in the second half 5·3 per cent. These figures may be compared with 3·4 and 4·2 for 1949; 6·1 and 5·1 for 1948; 10·2 and 2·2 for 1947; and for 1939, which in some ways perhaps was a comparable period from the point of view of defence preparedness, 10·9 and 9·9 per cent. There is no evidence whatever that we are taking on men who should be engaged in industry. In point of fact we are not taking on as great a proportion of tradesmen as we would like to have. This matter is thoroughly worked out with the Department of Labour and my colleague, the Minister of Defence Production. It is felt that the present system is working as well as anything we could devise.

With respect to quotas for the C.O.T.C., the hon. member suggested they might be higher. These quotas are worked out on a local basis through the commands in discussion with the universities. The universities have co-operated magnificently in these plans, which I think are unique in the world. They have asked for more members whenever they felt they could get men who were desirable. Quotas have not been a limiting factor and, as the hon. member will see from the figures given, whenever a quota is reached it is increased. Quotas are fixed for purposes of planning, pay, allowances, supplies, equipment, and the supply of army and training staff. We can really congratulate ourselves that some thirty-two universities and colleges are co-operating most wholeheartedly in this plan. However, we hope to expand it, and to that end a conference is being arranged with the heads of the university contingents and the representatives of the services for the end of this month, which will be followed immediately by a conference jointly with the universities conference military committee, with which we work very well.

Then the hon. member asked whether we were getting full value from the service colleges, whether they were meeting our more urgent needs. Well, it is too early to say. The first class to have taken the full four-year course has just graduated, and we do not know yet how many are going into the active and reserve forces; but so far we have no reason to regret this development in tri-service officer training. It may be that it should be modified. It may be, for example, that the curriculum to cover in four years the equivalent of four years of arts and three years of engineering, with an additional 15 per cent on military subjects during the school year, is too heavy; but the combination of academic work during the seven school months and four months of practical work with the services has worked out very well.

The next question was whether we can afford to have such colleges which do not insist on the men continuing with the active force. We believe that so far it has been useful to have these men train in this way and then mix with the university men during the summer months. Some of them, of course, go on to the universities. They are all available. They are trained officers, qualified to take the rank of captain in the reserve force or lieutenant in the active force, and so far we have no reason to regret this very important development.

Then the hon. member regretted the failure to standardize, which was mentioned by half a dozen hon. members. I also exceedingly regret the failure to have more standardization. If there were any way in which one in Canada could force the United States to standardize with Britain or Britain to standardize with the United States, I would be glad to use all the persuasive force possible to bring that about. That is what we have been doing for five years in joint committees and joint activities, but it is an exceedingly difficult operation. For one thing both the United Kingdom and the United States have large stocks of equipment on hand. They have those stocks at a time when the world is short of military equipment. Nobody is going to dump any equipment into the sea; nobody is going to give it away to any country behind the iron curtain. So until we can gradually build up our stocks of military equipment there is no possibility of standardization to any great degree. But what is disappointing is that in the adoption of new weapons the United Kingdom and the United States have not seen eye to eye.

Faced with this, and remembering all the difficulties we had during the second world war, a good many months ago we decided to standardize our equipment—not right across the board but generally—with United States-type equipment. It so happened that we had the armament equipment for practically five divisions in mobilization stores, equipment of the latest type in use at the end of the second world war. We were probably unique in that respect. When the North Atlantic treaty organization was developed we saw at once that the one chance we would have to standardize with the United States would be by giving away this equipment of United Kingdom type to the North Atlantic treaty nations, and we proceeded to do so. Equipment for one division was given the Netherlands; for a second division to Belgium; and equipment for a third division is to be transferred to Italy, as well as artillery for Luxembourg. This is a practical way of getting on with the job, and at the same time each weapon we have put into the hands of a European has armed a soldier who is there waiting for a weapon with which to defend his country and ours. So we did a double job very quickly.

I should say that we have made good progress in standardization with the United States, in addition to weapons, which are on the way. To mention a few items hastily, there are aircraft fuels, oxygen equipment, photographic equipment, instruments and personal flying equipment, mapping and charting, air force training equipment, vehicles for the northland, pilot handbooks, geographic reference systems for maps, navigation tables, 3·5 rockets and rocket launchers, confidential signs and symbols, and many other things which are on the secret list. Some of these are Canadian products, or the procedures and techniques have been worked out in Canada.

The next question was with regard to unification, and the statement was made that we seemed to be going into reverse in the matter of motor vehicle maintenance. The fact is that in 1947 we decided on the unification of motor vehicle maintenance, and determined that it should be done by the army for the three services. That was my decision, and I put it into effect. We tried it for a year and a half, and it was found that it did not work. We had gone too far in unification. We have reversed it in part; but as in the case of other services common to the three branches, we avoid duplication just as much as possible. These are the principles on which we have made this decision: (a) the peacetime organization of each service should be capable of rapid expansion in war without major reorganization or reallotment of functions; (b) maximum economy is to be achieved in peacetime without prejudicing either efficiency or ability to mobilize rapidly for war; (c) administrative functions necessary to each service in war should be performed to an appropriate extent by each service in peacetime to ensure familiarity with the function and provide a nucleus for expansion in war.

With regard to motor vehicles we found this, to give a concrete example. The air force has to keep its runways open the year round. They have to contend with very heavy snowfall in many parts of the country, and they have very good heavy equipment for this purpose. When that equipment had to be maintained and supplied by the army, the air force would sometimes say they were not given a sufficiently high priority because we had too much to do in connection with motor vehicle maintenance with the personnel we had. We found that where a service had an essential special function to perform in peacetime, it was desirable that the service must be responsible for that performance.

With regard to avoiding duplication I can tell my hon. friends that we have gone very far indeed, both in respect to this and other matters. We have the following motor vehicle workshops across Canada. The navy has two workshops, at Halifax and Esquimalt, and both workshops look after army and air force equipment. The navy also has one other workshop at St. Hubert in Quebec, where the navy does its own work. That is combined with an armament workshop there. The army has workshops at Halifax, Saint John, Lachine, Ottawa, Kingston, Picton, Petawawa, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, Macdonald, Shilo, Calgary, Vernon and Vancouver, where it does any work there may be for the navy and air force as well. At Quebec city it does work for the navy; there is no air force at that point. At Kingston it does work for the navy; there is no air force there. At Churchill it does work for the R.C.A.F.; the navy has no motor vehicles there. At Rivers it does work for the R.C.A.F. At Regina it does work for the navy; there is no air force. At Fort Nelson it does work for the R.C.A.F.; there is no navy. At Whitehorse it does work for the R.C.A.F.; there is no navy. The air force has depots at Calgary and Trenton, where it does work for all three services.

So hon. members will see that in this respect there is no duplication, but there is sound military reason for maintaining the three maintenance activities.

The next question was, when will the new anti-submarine vessels be commissioned? It is very hard to make an estimate, and I do not know that we should make any announcement of this kind. It is not usual, but we can tell him that some of the new anti-submarine vessels are expected to be launched this autumn before the close of navigation. We expect it will take a considerable time longer before these are commissioned. These anti-submarine ships are of a new type. They were worked out with the British and Americans, but we are the first country to make them. The British are making a somewhat similar vessel but are about a year behind us in their production. There is no corresponding vessel, so far as we know, anywhere in the world.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Claxton: I think I had better go ahead because my time is getting very short, if you do not mind. Then, with regard to the Magnificent, it is suggested she is out of date, because she has sixteen Sea Furies and twenty Fireflies and cannot take modern jet aircraft necessary in chasing subs. The Magnificent is not out of date at all. It has three or four more years of useful life, and is of the same type as several carriers the Royal Navy has in commission. The Sea Fury is still an effective aircraft for protecting aircraft carriers and ships against attack by the kind of aircraft that could make that attack. It must be remembered that the range of the jet fighter possessed by the Russians is not very extensive. Then, too, the carrier is also equipped with Avengers which are still in front-line use in the United States, and are considered to be an effective weapon in anti-submarine work. It is not considered desirable to have jet aircraft at this time for work against submarines.

It was suggested that we should have an aircraft carrier on the Pacific coast. There is a limit to what a country of 14 million people can do, and I am afraid this is one place where that applies. So far as I know, no country of our size has one aircraft carrier, still less two. Incidentally, I do not know if I am breaching security, but to provide that type of protection in that way is not a part of our assigned role in accordance with our arrangements with our allies which have been worked out in detail with regard to the employment of each ship and the times at which it will be available.

Why is a second cruiser being commissioned? It is immediately for training purposes but it would also be useful in the event of war. We find it is much more satisfactory to give the first training to officers when they go to sea in the larger ships, because there is accommodation for them to take a much greater number. There is also room for classrooms, and there is every kind of instrument they would have to use on a small ship. Also we can handle, in proportion to the cost, very many more officers for training in this way. Without putting the Quebec, as the ship is called—I hope the member for Three Rivers will recognize this change—into commission, we could not possibly train all the officers we shall have to take in to meet the build-up of the navy. In the small ships such as destroyers, frigates, minesweepers, there is very little room indeed for the officers and men necessary to operate the ship. At a later stage, when the officers have had some sea training, they are fitted into the crew and they continue their training on the job in the small ship. This is considered to be the fastest way to take care of the biggest number.

What types of ships are now being operated by the navy? I should think hon. members would be fully familiar with that, but I shall list them: The carrier, with its naval air groups, cruisers, destroyers, anti-submarine escorts first class; anti-submarine escorts second class; minesweepers; seaward defence craft; Fairmile training vessels at selected reserve divisions; supply ships; tankers; research experimental ships; auxiliary vessels and harbour craft; loop layers; gate vessels, in reserve; repair ships, in reserve. Then there is the northern patrol icebreaker which is nearing completion. We have some 27 ships under contract, and there will be many more ordered shortly to be proceeded with as soon as we build the prototypes of the new vessels and learn by experience what modifications are needed.

The suggestion was made that we should not keep ships in reserve if they are obsolete, because it costs money. It costs much less money to keep ships in reserve than to keep them in commission. We keep in commission the number of ships we can man, and the ships in reserve are of the same age and class as corresponding ships in commission, and I cannot regard them as obsolete, as we would want almost everything that was available in the event of war. If we scrap any ships that are seaworthy and useful to the navy at a time like this, I would regard it as a retrograde step.

The hon. member said that we should not have gone to Fort Lewis because it was a waste of money to go there with the additional expense to the United States government and the additional pay of the men. I should like to refer to a speech which the hon. member made and which is reported in the Calgary Herald of April 11, 1951, under the heading "Pearkes Criticizes Use of U.S. Training Base". It reads:

> Failure to provide a proper training centre in Canada for the Korean forces had cost the Canadian people an extra $200,000 a day for the forces under training at Fort Lewis, Washington, Major General G. R. Pearkes, V.C., C.B., D.S.O., M.P. for Nanaimo, told a public meeting in the Canadian Legion west end branch hall Tuesday night.

I do not know where the hon. member got his information or how he made his calculation, because generally he is exceedingly careful and very responsible indeed. The cost of our being in Fort Lewis was not $200,000 a day, but a bit less than $20,000 a day. About $13,000 was paid to the United States government for food and accommodation and the provision of services of every type, at a capitation fee of $2.46 per man day. I hope the United States congress and the United States quartermaster general will not hear me say this—you have to say unwise things sometimes in answer to criticism—but we could not have done it for that cost in Canada. We had a generous and fair arrangement. Moreover, we could not have put our troops in any quarters in Canada without spending millions of dollars on the rehabilitation and winterization of those quarters. We have never had a force of seven to ten thousand people training during the winter in Canada as a brigade. Our experience in this connection indicates it will be very difficult to do it in any part of Canada and have really effective training. In almost every part of Canada there is such a heavy snowfall that in training men, particularly to fight in Europe, they would have to spend a big part of their time in shovelling snow and keeping themselves warm. That does not apply to the same extent to individual and sub-unit and even company training, but as soon as you get up to unit and brigade training you need a lot of space with roads for vehicles so as to correspond to something like the terrain in Europe. For good training on a brigade scale we would like to have an area twenty miles wide and a hundred miles deep. We use live ammunition fired from 155 guns over the heads of the troops, and they fire up to 20 miles. To provide for advances with all arms working together we should have, if we can get it, an area 100 miles long.

We have searched Canada ever since 1946 to find such an area. We have our eye on one or two that might be suitable, but only at tremendous expense to put them in shape, with accommodation, roads and so on. It was extremely fortunate that we were able to go to Fort Lewis. However, that was not the real reason for going to Fort Lewis. We went there because that was the staging point for the shipment of troops from Seattle to the Far East. When our movement was arranged for there we did not know whether they would move immediately to the Far East or stay there for training. Hon. members will recall the statements of a rather optimistic character that were made at that period when it appeared to some that the war was virtually over. We had to be prepared either to move the brigade off almost at a day's notice to the Far East to complete training there or to remain where they were but with uncertainty as to when the brigade should move forward. On that account it was highly desirable that the brigade should be at Fort Lewis. Further, we had exceedingly good experiences with our United States friends at Fort Lewis which was under the command of Brigadier LeRoy Watson. No. 426 squadron was at McChord field nearby, which was under the command of Colonel Bennett. I should like to pay this tribute to these officers and all working with them for the magnificent co-operation they extended to us. They treated us just as well as friends could be treated. Anything we wanted in the way of facilities, changes in rations—because our ration is rather different from theirs—or the like, was put through at once. It was as fine a demonstration of partnership in our joint defence as anyone would want to see.

The actual cost for the other item that the hon. member mentioned, of the extra pay for officers and men while they were out of Canada, is estimated at $6,000 per day; so that the item of $13,000, for the $2.46 capitation fee and the $6,000 for extra pay, total $19,000, not $200,000.

Then the hon. member suggested that we need now to provide winter quarters for training. I agree, and we are doing that. We are making substantial changes at Valcartier, Wainwright and other places. We hope that it will not be necessary to use those places for training units as large as brigades. Valcartier is not suitable for that purpose at the present time. Wainwright is the only camp in Canada of sufficient size and having the terrain suitable for this purpose. We hope to get another camp for this purpose in the east, but so far we have not been able to get the area. There is the question of fire hazard; and that is something which is highly important.

The next point was that in the air we should concentrate on essential types. We believe we are doing that. With regard to the supply of aircraft, the priority that is generally recognized is: Fighters, bombers, tactical aircraft, transport and maritime reconnaissance. We do not think that it is desirable at this time, particularly when there is no aircraft specially designed and in production for this purpose, to build in Canada the relatively small number of planes required for maritime reconnaissance. We have therefore worked out an adaptation of the Lancaster, the modifications in which are either completed or well under way at A. V. Roe Canada Limited; and it is considered to be a highly desirable aircraft for the purpose. It has good range with the additional tanks we put on it; and it carries weapons, equipment, cameras and so on quite well. It is an economical way of doing this particular job.

Another question was: What percentage of officers trained by D.V.A. are now serving? I think that is the only question that I have been asked during the past two days as to which I have not an answer. D.V.A. has not the answer. It is necessary to go through either all the army officer cards or all the D.V.A. cards in order to find it out, and that would be a large job. I am trying to have an estimate made; and I am sure the hon. gentleman would accept this.

I think that concludes the questions put by the hon. member for Nanaimo.

The next come from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He asks what has been done to inform young men what they are fighting for. Lectures have been given right from the outset by trained officers who were given special publications and briefing on current affairs. Every camp has a library and a number of them are very good. They are extensively used. A number of them have a wall map service and special magazines on current affairs, and these supplement the lectures. We have doubled the size of the chaplain service, and the chaplains are useful indeed in giving general talks. But we felt that the time had come, in view of the formation of the Korean force, to give direction in this matter. Accordingly, two months ago we appointed Mr. Harry Low as director of the bureau of current affairs. He served with the air force in this capacity during the war. He is responsible to the chiefs of staff committee. He will be holding courses for officers and N.C.O.'s of various types, to instruct them in the job of passing on the information, organizing study groups, classes, and the like.

As to the charge that the young men joining our forces are confused as to why we are fighting in Korea, I am surprised that they are not more confused than I have found them to be, in view of the conflicting ideas, as to why we are fighting in Korea, expressed by, say, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. While some of the young men may not be able to express themselves like a college professor, I think they are rather in the position that anyone would be in if someone came up to him in the street and asked: Why are you a Christian? You find it difficult to answer that question in a few sentences. They know why they are fighting but they would find it difficult to express the reason in a few sentences. But that does not prevent their being fine, understanding and intelligent in the work in the armed forces.

It was suggested that we should make an appraisal of our manpower resources. These appraisals especially made for a special purpose can soon become out of date. The dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Labour have continuous appraisals, and I have been told that from most points of view the information they have is adequate for statistical planning with regard to manpower in this country. To have a further survey for this purpose may be desirable, and it may be done. That matter is being considered by the advisory committee on manpower; and if they report in favour of it, no doubt the government will see that it is done. But the information so far put before me from the point of view of planning—and we have planned it out for several years ahead—is that the information is fully available on which to do the job.

The hon. member asked about motor vehicle contracts, apropos the remarks of Mr. Sale. This is a complicated subject which falls under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Defence Production. I am not sure that I have the whole picture; hence anything I say must be taken subject to that qualification. I can say this, however. For some time we have desired to manufacture in Canada a limited number of motor vehicles of military type. We in the defence department provided in our estimates a considerable sum of money—I think it was $21 million—for this purpose. The reason was not so much to supply ourselves with these motor vehicles, because it would have been much cheaper to buy them from the United States. The reason was primarily to tool up for their production in Canada. We had in mind particularly the one-quarter ton, the three-quarter ton and the two and a half ton vehicle. The one-quarter ton vehicle is the jeep. Our own requirements were not great. Having regard to the cost of tooling up and the number required, each motor vehicle would have cost an almost fantastic sum; but we thought it was desirable to tool up to manufacture those cars in Canada, and we requisitioned the Minister of Trade and Commerce in September, 1950, to obtain these. He entered into negotiations with the United States authorities and the industry both to secure the right and to make arrangements with the automotive industry to do it. It was found that the cost of tooling for the production of these cars in toto in Canada was far more than the sum estimated. I am speaking from recollection, but I believe that the cost of tooling for quantity production of cars of these types, the smallest military types, would be well in excess of the amount provided. I mean by "well in excess" much more than twice as much as the amount we had estimated. From the outset it was apparent that this would not be an economic move unless we could secure orders for these cars from the United States either for delivery to meet United States needs or for shipment to Europe at United States expense, because we had already committed all the money we had voted or were in process of doing that. However, United States military requirements for these vehicles now were not sufficiently great to justify their production in the United States and here. These discussions took some time; and in the end the Department of Defence Production decided to make part of the cars in Canada and buy part from the United States, and to tool up to make the parts which we could do most economically and most efficiently in Canada, just as was done at the commencement of the commercial automobile industry in Canada. But before we made that decision we wanted to explore every possibility with the United States of getting orders which would enable us to do as much as possible of the job in Canada. I understand that arrangements have now been worked out and that we shall be going ahead on that basis.

The next question is: Do we have to pay customs duty on war equipment, personal effects of service personnel, et cetera? Yes, we pay sales tax and duty on all purchases of war equipment, with the exception of the equipment we purchase from the United States to replace divisional and other equipment released to countries which are members of the North Atlantic treaty under the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950. On all other military equipment we pay sales tax and customs duty to the Department of National Revenue. Personal effects of service personnel generally enter duty free under reciprocal arrangements.

Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that it was stated in the public accounts committee that on March 31, 1950, we did not possess a single modern tank. I was not present at the public accounts committee, and I have not yet seen the report of the proceedings for that day, so I am speaking without exact information. But I would doubt very much whether the statement was made in that form. At the end of the second world war we had a large number of worn-out tanks. We scrapped these and we arranged to buy from the United States a very considerable number of the very latest tanks that were available at that time. Since then these have been maintained for training and are available today, except for those that we have shipped already to Europe, for two divisions, namely, the self-propelled guns, which are on tank chassis.

It would have been utterly ridiculous for us either to have contemplated the manufacture of tanks of an intermediate type or to have bought tanks from the United States when these tanks were still in the process of development, and were not yet in large-scale production in the United States. We have now the opportunity of buying from the United States the latest tanks, and they will be coming with the equipment for the two divisions we transferred to Europe. But our tanks are by no means obsolete. If a war were to come tomorrow this would be the kind of weapon that would be in most current use on our side, the Sherman Mark IV, with modifications, but there are more modern tanks. I hope hon. members do not think for a second that it is possible for any country, United States, Russia, the United Kingdom, Canada, France or any other country in peacetime to keep up to date on every development. Why, the number of developments and the modifications of radar sets would keep us poverty stricken on that account alone. What we have to do is to plan and make our replacements when we think a type has been developed that is going to be in good use for five years, or ten years or fifteen years, and then to keep up to date as far as we can with modifications. But these modifications cost a fantastic sum. Take the 3·7 heavy anti-aircraft gun that we have, the United Kingdom type. To modernize it to standards that we would regard as up to date would cost upwards of $200,000 per gun—the gun originally cost about $100,000—and the result would be a cost per gun of more than that type of weapon completely new at some future indefinite date when we get into another sphere. We cannot follow each weapon through every development. We must get from period to period.

The hon. member asked whether the manufacture of jeeps was held up because of difficulties with patents. The answer is no. He referred to standardization. I have gone into that. He said: If we are working with the United Kingdom in Korea will not there be complications through the use of United States equipment? No; our forces in Korea are supplied almost entirely with United Kingdom equipment so that they can work with the British, as was planned from the outset; but we use a number of United States-type motor vehicles and mortars and some other weapons just as the British do. There will be no difficulty or very little difficulty there. Since we will always be working with the British or with the Americans usually in a theatre where both are represented, we will not have quite as great difficulties, through having either equipment of one type or mixed equipment, as would otherwise be the case. During the second world war we had in the Canadian army at one time a division of United States troops using American equipment, a division of British troops using British type of equipment and others, and provided that you have a unit as big as a division it can be worked out. Of course it is much better to have it all uniform, and Canada has a greater interest in seeing to that than any other country, and we have worked harder to bring it about than any other country. I only regret that we did not succeed to a greater extent in bringing about standardization.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid it will take a few more minutes to answer hon. members' questions.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue with this debate.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 10, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HOCKEY AND LACROSSE

WINNING OF CANADIAN CHAMPIONSHIPS BY OWEN SOUND TEAMS

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the Owen Sound Mercurys won the Canadian senior hockey championship last evening. We in Grey North are of course exceedingly proud of the Mercurys. I regret that my duties here prevented me from seeing all but one game of the finals. To my good friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, I should like to say that his team, the Fort Frances Canadians, were worthy opponents. They were not quite good enough, but they proved to be a formidable hockey club. What is more important, they were good losers and good sports.

I should also like to remind hon. members that the Owen Sound Crescents won the dominion senior lacrosse championship last year.

Mr. Graydon: They dropped out this year, though.

Mr. Bennett: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the historic Mann and Allan cups, emblematic of two national titles, are in the city of Owen Sound, a precedent in the annals of Canadian sport.

EXCISE TAX ACT

CARAMEL CORN SNACKS—EFFECT OF BUDGET PROPOSALS

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to refer to page 2589 of Hansard of May 1, where I called the attention of hon. members, particularly of the Minister of Finance, to a product known as Caramel Corn Snacks. I submitted to the minister that the product should be treated in the same way as popcorn, should be outside the Excise Tax Act and made tax free. I was dismayed to find that many hon. members had not heard of this product. The manager of the W. T. Hawkins Company, of Tweed, Ontario, Mr. Armand Turpin, has sent a package of caramel corn snacks for the minister so that he may have the opportunity to decide whether the product is comparable to popcorn. He has also sent a standard package of Cheezies, another product made by this company.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A bottle of beer with it?

Mr. Follwell: He has also sent a standard package for every member of the house and I will have them distributed. In addition there will be an aerial view of the village of Tweed sent with the compliments of the Tweed chamber of commerce.

Mr. Harkness: What was the question of privilege?

Mr. Fraser: Just something to chew on.

Mr. Abbott: The privilege of expanding one's waistline.

QUESTIONS

CIVIL SERVICE—APPOINTMENTS AND RELEASES

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many employees of all classifications, including permanent and temporary civil servants and all other appointments outside the civil service, including also crown companies but excluding service personnel in the defence department, have been taken on in the government service from the 1st of May, 1945, to date?

2. What is the total number of releases for all categories covered by question No. 1 during the same period?

Mr. Rinfret: I understood that the hon. member for Kamloops wished to amend this question, and that it was to be dropped.

Mr. Fulton: I have not had time to do that as yet, so I would be prepared to have this question dropped now and I shall reword the whole thing.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

SALES TAX—PAPER AND INK USED IN PRODUCTION OF NEWSPAPERS, ETC.

Mr. Bertrand:

1. Is the ten per cent sales tax imposed on paper and ink used in the production of newspapers?

2. Is the said tax of ten per cent imposed on the paper and ink used in the production of reviews and magazines?

3. If not, what are the reasons therefor?

Mr. Rinfret:

1. Yes.

2. Provision is made in the Excise Tax Act for exemption from the tax for "magazines and literary papers unbound, regularly issued at stated intervals, not less frequently than four times yearly, and printing paper and printing ink for use exclusively in their production".

3. This is a matter of government policy.

IMMIGRATION, 1950

Mr. Laing:

1. How many immigrants arrived in Canada in 1950?
2. How many of each nationality?
3. What was the destination, by provinces, of such immigrants who entered Canada at Montreal, Saint John, Halifax and Vancouver?
4. Does the immigration department provide provincial labour departments with details concerning individual immigrants either before or after their arrival in Canada?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1. 73,912.

2. See statement below.

3. See statement below.

4. No.

CHARLOTTETOWN-MURRAY HARBOUR, P.E.I., BUS SERVICE

Mr. McLure:

Has the Canadian National Railways been granted a franchise for a bus service running from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Benidickson: No.

WHEAT—STORAGE AND CARLOADINGS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bushels of wheat are in storage in the local elevators in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba?
2. How many elevators are full and unable to provide any further storage?
3. How much damp wheat is in (a) Manitoba; (b) Saskatchewan?
4. How many cars a day have been loaded with wheat in the last ten days from loading points in (a) Saskatchewan; (b) Manitoba?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE—PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total paid by the Department of Finance for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?
2. What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of over $10,000 under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total paid by the Department of Veterans Affairs for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?
2. What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of $10,000 or more under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

AIR TRAINING PLAN, SASKATOON—HOUSING

Mr. Knight:

1. What is the total number of personnel likely to be engaged in any full capacity air training plan at Saskatoon, with the extension of facilities presently planned?
2. What plans has the government for the housing of such personnel?
3. Is there any firm agreement between the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal authority of Saskatoon in relation to a housing construction program in that city?
4. Are negotiations in that regard under way?
5. If so, what stage have such negotiations reached?

NEWSPRINT

Mr. Bertrand:

1. From 1940 to 1950 inclusive, what was the newsprint output in Canada, in tons, for each of these years?
2. In each of the years 1940 to 1950 inclusive, what was the average price of newsprint?
3. In each year from 1940 to 1950 inclusive, what proportion of the total output was assigned to the export trade?
4. To what countries, and what quantity to each of them?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—PERSONS APPOINTED AND LAID OFF

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many employees of the Post Office Department have been laid off since January 1, 1951, indicating (a) temporary employees; (b) permanent employees?
2. How many of the above were veterans of either the first or second world war?
3. How many permanent employees were engaged by the Post Office Department from January 1, 1940, to December 31, 1950?
4. How many of the above were veterans?

WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM PAYMENTS, 1950-51, AND FINAL PAYMENT ON FIVE-YEAR POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): In view of the fact that farmers are in urgent need of money for seeding expenses, will the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house what proportion of the interim payments on wheat and coarse grains, and of the final payment on the five-year pool, has been sent out, and when such payments are likely to be completed?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Assiniboia has given me notice of his question, and I should like to say that the payments involved in the increased initial payments for wheat, oats and barley delivered in 1950-51 were completed well in advance of seeding. In addition, the final payment on the five-year pool is about at the halfway mark and should be completed within the next two weeks.

Payment of the 1950-51 oats and barley increases was completed on March 29. This involved the issuance of 182,203 cheques, covering a total amount of $16,875,169.30. Payment of the 1950-51 wheat increase was completed on April 24. This payment amounted to $49,630,921.39 and involved the issuance of 322,834 cheques. As of last night 224,753 cheques had been issued in connection with the final payment on the five-year pool. These cheques amounted to $53,520,-169.98. The total payment will involve about 450,000 cheques and an amount of $119,109,-000. As I have mentioned, this payment should be completed within two weeks.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CROWN PROPERTIES

QUESTION AS TO PAYMENTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): In view of the fact that in the speech from the throne it was announced that parliament would be asked to consider measures with respect to grants to municipalities in lieu of taxation on crown property, will the Minister of Finance state whether this legislation will be brought in during the present session, and, if so, when he will make a statement to this effect?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): As indicated in the speech from the throne, it is the intention to bring in a bill to provide for the payments of these grants in lieu of taxation, which during the past two years have been provided by an item in the estimates.

NEWSPRINT

UNITED STATES ANTI-TRUST LAWS—QUESTION AS TO COMBINES INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the Minister of Justice care to comment on a dispatch from Washington concerning a proposal in the house of representatives to make Canadian newsprint companies subject to United States anti-trust laws? Would it not be appropriate for our own combines investigation commissioner to inquire into the alleged monopolistic practices of this industry?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of this question. I have read the Washington dispatch reported in the Ottawa Journal of May 5 to which my hon. friend has just referred, and naturally have discussed this dispatch with the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. The situation alleged by Congressman Celler would have formed a possible subject for inquiry under the Havana charter for international trade organization had that charter been ratified by the United States of America, which sponsored it, and if as a consequence of United States ratification it had been ratified by other countries including Canada. The Havana charter, however, has not been ratified by the United States of America or by the other countries which are parties to it with, I believe, the single exception of Australia.

Our combines investigation commission has no jurisdiction to inquire formally into an international situation which does not involve a combine detrimental to the Canadian public. Moreover, the effect of any information now before the Combines Investigation Act commissioner does not, in his opinion, justify an inquiry at the present time under our act into the newsprint industry. The information now before the combines investigation commission is that the Canadian newsprint industry is taking all reasonable steps to increase production, and that the prices Canadian newsprint producers are charging for sales of newsprint to the United States are exceptionally reasonable, having regard to the prices that could be obtained on the open market for newsprint at the present time if Canadian newsprint producers were to take full trading advantage of the present strong demand.

Under all the circumstances I do not think it would be desirable for me to comment further on a news dispatch to the effect that a subcommittee of a legislative body of another country has suggested the study of a bill to enforce the production of records of foreign countries.

INDIA

FOOD SITUATION—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, of which I have given notice. Will he advise the house whether, having regard to the famine conditions in India, and particularly having regard to the reported offers of help from China and Russia, the government proposes to recommend any action to the House of Commons?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Our high commissioner in New Delhi has been and is in touch with the government of India about the food situation in that country, but I am sorry I am not able today to give any answer to the hon. member different from that which I gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on May 2. The government is not yet in a position to make any announcement to the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUESTION AS TO BINDING OF SEAMEN'S DISCHARGE BOOKS DURING A STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Labour aware that the W. J. Stewart Company of Toronto is binding ten thousand copies of seamen's discharge books for the king's printer while the union employees of that company are on strike and picketing the plant?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the king's printer is responsible to my colleague, the Secretary of State, I shall bring this question to his attention as soon as he returns.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

DIRECTORS OF CROWN COMPANIES—LEDUC, ALTA., PUBLIC BUILDING SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the responsible minister. On February 19 a question in my name was passed as an order for return, and I have not yet received the answer. I should like to have it.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Will the Minister of Public Works investigate an order for return passed in my name on March 19?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I shall do that, with pleasure.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last night I was answering some of the questions put to me by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The next question related to aircraft production, and the hon. member said that we had spent $30 million in 1950 but had not produced a plane that year. He asked why. He also said he did not know whether the F-86 had been produced yet, or whether any aircraft have been produced in addition to the two CF-100. The situation is, Mr. Chairman, that it takes a minimum of four years to develop a new type of aircraft, which was about the time taken in the case of the CF-100, the design of which began in the late months of 1946. From the time of having an aircraft that will fly and that it is desirable to produce, it takes a minimum of eighteen months to begin production and to have the first aircraft ready. To tool up for the production of aircraft, I am informed, costs anywhere from $5 million to $30 million, depending upon the extent of the operation. In the case of an existing plant with floor space and basic machinery it might cost $5 million, and $30 million or more where all the machine tools have to be acquired.

It should be remembered that to produce one of these F-86E aircraft it takes about 25,000 man hours, and in the case of the CF-100 probably 40,000 or 50,000 man hours. The time laid down for the production of the F-86E, as announced by me when we placed the order, was met by the manufacturer with the production of the first of this type last year. They are now building up production, but it will still be some time before the planned rate of production is reached.

The CF-100 is a new type which is being entirely designed and developed here with a Canadian engine. It will go into production at the planned rate a little later than the F-86E. We expect that the planned rate of production on the F-86E will be reached during the summer or autumn of this year, and on the CF-100 early next year. I should point out that the performance in the production of the F-86E was really quite remarkable. This is an aircraft designed in the United States. All the plans and a good many of the parts had to come from the United States. Like every new bit of complicated equipment it was subject to modification, and sometimes as many as ten a day would be sent up by air mail, telephone or telegraph. Notwithstanding that, the aircraft was completed within a very short time of the completion of the first corresponding aircraft in the United States—less than two weeks. Since then they have been going ahead very well.

The hon. member then said he was glad to see co-ordination between the three services, and the appointment of a chairman of the chiefs of staff committee in the person of Lieutenant General Foulkes. He asked what his duties were. They are to act as chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, which consists of the chiefs of staff and such other persons as the minister may designate; to co-ordinate training and operations of the Canadian forces; to perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the minister.

The hon. member said there appears to be duplication in the three services, and that the only important branch unified is the dental branch. He asked why we have three medical, nursing and hospital services. We have looked into the question of unifying the medical services a good many times over the last four years, but so far have decided against it primarily because of the principles I mentioned yesterday in connection with the unification of the motor vehicle maintenance service. Everything possible has been done to eliminate duplication. For example, the navy has four hospitals, at Halifax, Cornwallis, Esquimalt and Dartmouth respectively, each of which looks after army and air force personnel. The army has eleven hospitals, and four in conjunction with the Department of Veterans Affairs. All these hospitals look after navy and air force personnel. The R.C.A.F. has nine hospitals, all of which look after navy and army personnel. None of the services has a hospital at a place where any other service has a hospital, so there is no duplication. No country in the world, so far as I know, has the medical services combined into one.

Such a combination would have some desirable features, perhaps, but on the other hand there would be a loss of direct association with the traditions and work of each particular service. We would soon have a joint medical service having specialists for the army, specialists for the navy, and specialists for the air force. The advantages of unification, therefore, would not be nearly as great as might be expected. Further, there would be administrative difficulties in deciding to which officer this neutral medical service would be responsible. Experience has shown it is necessary that a directorate be responsible to a single officer, not to a committee or to the minister. The only practicable way of doing that, in the light of experience, would appear to be to put the medical services of the navy and air force under the control of the largest user and the one having the greatest need under actual service conditions, the army; and that might not please the navy or the air force because they believe they have special functions, too. While the matter is continuing to receive very close attention, it has not yet been decided to do this job. I repeat to the hon. member and to the house that, so far as I know, this course has not been decided upon by any country.

The next question was: Is there duplication of supplies? The army provides stores and food for the air force and, to a considerable degree, for the navy. The rations are the same. The purchasing is all done through the Department of Defence Production and we do not see that there would be any elimination of services or any economy effected through unifying the supply services. It would probably mean the setting up of a new overhead organization to look after the supply services of all three.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say to the minister that what prompted the question was my impression that the bill for printing for the services was rather high; I refer to the printing of papers.

Mr. Claxton: All the printing for the armed services is obtained through the king's printer, and he places the contracts.

Mr. Coldwell: I refer to stationery.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid there is a good deal of paper work in connection with modern forces. We are trying to cut down on it; but the larger they get, the more paper work there is. It is like a telephone system; the larger it is, the more connections there are. I found recently that there were twenty-two forms required to document each recruit. I had an investigation made in an effort to cut down the number; and so far as I can make out, they feel now that they need one more. But seriously we are trying to cut down this work.

The hon. member stated that there is no common attestation form. The reason for that is that each of the three services—the navy, the army and the air force—feels that on attestation they require information peculiar to their particular service. Hence, in the light of their present attitude, to have a common form would mean having a bigger form so that you could cover all the ground in the navy, the army and the air force.

The army has lately instituted a completely new form of revolutionary design. It is designed to be a self-contained file. It has the carbon paper inserted. It has the recruit's medical report, enrolment, personnel selection report, oath and so on, all included. This is designed to expedite and simplify the work of enrolment. It is being used now for the first time in Canada; and the navy and the air force are watching with close interest to see if this is the right kind of form to have. We are therefore looking into the matter. We are also working on drawing up a uniform medical profile along the lines of the army pulhem, for all three services, so that any examining officer or personnel officer could examine men and code them for placement in the army, the navy or the air force according to their qualifications, physical, mental and so on. That is being done. It is a rather large undertaking, because in the three services there are no less than five hundred or more separate classifications of jobs that have to be related one to the other; for instance, you have to find what is the air force equivalent in requirements for an engine room artificer, and so on. That work is being pressed on. So far as I know, it is greatly in advance of work being done anywhere else.

The hon. member referred to the size of the reserve force as shown in the statement at page 88 of the report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1950. The reserve force has been built up steadily since the war. During the last three years the increase as shown in the white paper—and I am speaking from recollection—would be 44 per cent. It is bigger now than it was in the period immediately following the second world war. We have tried every means suggested, I believe, except exemption from income tax and compulsory service, in order to expedite this build-up. We have had great co-operation. The fact that it should have increased by more than one-third has been, I say, most encouraging indeed. We hope that increase will continue.

But our aim during this period has not been to have a reserve force in the army that is trained and ready to fight a trained enemy. That is not yet part of the role of the reserve army of Canada; and I think that a great deal of misunderstanding occurs because of that misconception. What we want to do is to have the organization, the armouries, the equipment, the procedure, the regimental traditions, the officers, and so far as possible the N.C.O.'s, on which to build rapidly. The aim during this period has been to have 100 per cent of officers, about 75 per cent of N.C.O.'s and about 50 per cent of men. We have come close to achieving that aim with regard to officers and N.C.O.'s, and we are not far off with regard to men. While we want to see more men in the reserve force, and to give them every possible kind of encouragement and assistance, there is no ground for the kind of talk of despair and discouragement that we sometimes hear either in the House of Commons or in its committees. Relatively, our reserve army is in a better position, from the point of view of officer qualification, N.C.O. qualification, armouries and equipment, than it has ever been before; and I believe it is better off than the territorial army in England or the national guard in the United States—that is, on a comparative basis. I believe it would help in building up the reserve if we recognize, as I do every time I see them,—and I see them probably more than does any other hon. member—the magnificent job they are doing, and give them every encouragement and every assistance.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin said that he was told that Canadair could produce ten F-86E's a day, and he asked why we should not do it. We have made arrangements with the United States for the supply to us of all government-found property that is to go into the F-86E's that they can deliver to us, at a cost of approximately $175,000 per aircraft. I may say that the allocation at first made by them was only just over half what we persuaded them to give or to sell us today; and what they are providing today out of their own resources, because there is not enough of this special equipment—engines, instruments and the like—to go round. They are short of them. We are making, or we shall be making when we reach the planned rate of production, all the F-86E's for which there will be engines and other equipment available. The suggestion that we should produce ten a day is an interesting one, because I think hon. members should know about what it would cost. Ten a day would be, we estimate, about $4 million a day, of which $1,750,000 would be paid to the United States. That would mean a total of $1,200 million a year; and that would of course mean having to provide for the expenditure in some way or another, by doubling or tripling the present income tax or by some other means of that kind, which would have a most inflationary effect. That rate of production would be beyond the peacetime capacity of this country, and, indeed, beyond that of any country of comparable size. The planned rate of production is within our capacity and within the budget.

Then the hon. member said: We should have started our three-year program three years ago. We have had a three-year program ever since 1947, and each year we have revised it in the light of the progress made and of the international situation; so that it has been a steady development in accordance with lines laid down three and even four years ago, but with a great acceleration.

Then he said: There should be more diversification of defence installations. I think there he suggests we should have a greater spread across the country. I do not know of any government activity where there is greater diversification. For example, much the largest concentration of defence activity is in Nova Scotia. In 1950-51 in the maritimes alone, where there is 9·30 per cent of the population, 14·10 per cent of the defence dollar was spent. In the prairies, as I have informed the house, we are opening or re-opening some eight major establishments, so that in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta we will be spending again a very considerable amount in proportion to the population.

Then the hon. member said: It is a crime that men serving in our armed forces and fighting for us should have to pay income tax. That is a question for the Minister of Finance, which he will deal with when he has material before the house if it is considered desirable; but I should point out that we in the Department of National Defence consider it very much fairer to have all personnel pay income tax. If they were relieved from income tax a major general would be relieved of a payment of $172.30 a month, whereas a first-class private would be relieved of a payment of $6.85 a month. We believe that the differentiation in responsibility between the private and the major general is correctly measured by the pay scales, and should not be further added to by exemption from income tax.

Mr. Coldwell: Why could not the ceiling on income tax exemption be that allowed to the private?

Mr. Claxton: It would affect your whole pay scale, which has been very carefully worked out. In the second world war it was found at one stage that it was possible that ten different men, each with a wife and two children, could be on a voyage from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to St. John's, Newfoundland, and these ten men would pay ten separate income taxes on the same rates of pay for doing equivalent work. It is exceedingly difficult to make exemptions and to make differentiations. At what stage would you start exempting the men? Would it be at Fort Lewis? Would it be at Tokyo? Would it be back in the line? Would it apply to the army service corps, to lines of communication, to the private in the front ranks?

Mr. Pearkes: You have to decide that point in connection with the application of veterans benefits.

Mr. Claxton: It is a tough one, and so far the view of the government is this: it is a good principle that everyone should pay income tax, and that any differentiation in service or responsibility should be compensated for directly in pay which everyone can see.

The hon. member for Trinity-Conception asked if any other ships could be stationed in Newfoundland, and could there be more defence preparations there. The answer is that Newfoundland comes within the zone of Canada-United States defence plans, ties in with the over-all planning for defence of both countries on the Atlantic coast, and future plans do envisage the stationing of additional ships in Newfoundland. But I point out that to do it at present would add greatly to the shore-based facilities needed in Newfoundland, and to the cost of operations, so that it is much better that ships exercising in the Atlantic should continue to be based at Halifax so long as the operations stay on their present scale.

The hon. member for Calgary East asked: How many fighter squadrons are ready for defence of this country now? That is the kind of question we do not give answers to, but the number will increase very rapidly as the new aircraft are produced. At the present time we have fighters equipped with Vampires and Mustangs, which are both good operational aircraft, but not nearly up to the class of the F-86E and the CF-100. Just as soon as they are available they will be issued to equip squadrons that will be trained and ready to receive them. The build-up will come along together, and without giving any information about which there should be security, it is quite obvious from the size of operations that Canadair Limited or A. V. Roe Canada Limited by the end of this year will be producing enough aircraft of the F-86E or CF-100 type to equip a squadron every month, approximately. I should think that would be a fair estimate.

Then the hon. member said: We have airborne battalions, but they are not trained together, and we have not the transport to carry them. Well, they are trained together as battalions. They have been trained together with supporting arms as battalions, but not as a brigade group, and it is not considered at this stage that they would be employed as a brigade group. However, they will receive combined training so that they can fit into the larger formations if that action is needed. The hon. member said: We have not the transport to carry them. I suppose he is thinking in terms of something like the C-119 of the United States. Neither has any other country except the United States. Plans provide for our acquiring some of these aircraft later, but we believe that priority in respect of aircraft can be regarded as first, fighters, second, bombers—we are not going to have any strategic bombers—third, tactical fighters; fourth, transport—and that includes of course transport of troops. We have a sufficient number of equipped North Stars and Dakotas to make an airlift of the kind which at the present we would envisage as being required.

Then the hon. member referred to the fact that in a speech on February 5 there was only one sentence referring to the reserve forces. I do not suppose that is a very serious comment. Throughout the year I suppose I have spoken to a hundred or more audiences in support of the reserve forces, and visited every reserve force unit that I have had time to visit, so as to give them every possible support and assistance.

The hon. member expressed the view that my reports on the reserve forces were too optimistic. I believe in giving people encouragement and praise when they deserve it. And I think we have carried into effect every suggestion made by the defence association or by the individual associations or branches of the reserve forces, except that regarding conscription and exemption from income tax; and as I say I am all in favour of their being exempt from income tax. However, neither myself nor anyone else has been able to find a way which would enable the Minister of Finance and the government to do it without finding some new principle, without providing for a special class in a special way, without calling something which is income not income. If somebody can suggest a way in which that can be done, then I will certainly bring it to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. Brooks: How was it done in the last war?

Mr. Claxton: In the last war we had about twelve scales of income tax, depending on whom you were serving with, where you were serving, and what you were doing. Our practice now is to have just one scale of income tax applicable to everyone, wherever he is serving and whatever he is doing.

The hon. member said that anti-tank regiments have had their weapons taken away. It is quite true that some armoured regiments have had some of their weapons used in a different way. We have taken away some of the tanks on issue to units to put them in shape for shipment abroad, where they would be closer to the fighting line. But in every case we have replaced them either with equivalent weapons mounted on carriers, or towed twenty-five pounders, which has enabled the training in the army to be carried on. Training out in the field is still carried on with tanks, whether the training is local or at a central camp.

The hon. member said there is no information that equipment will be replaced soon by United States weapons. We have sent two divisions of equipment abroad. Our expectation is that delivery of the equipment to replace the first will begin within the next two weeks. In view of the general situation in the world, that is an exceedingly good arrangement to make with the United States authorities.

The member said that the minister had made no statement as to how we are to replace equipment half of which we have disposed of. This is to be replaced from the United States or out of our own manufacture later.

He said that some of the United States equipment is not as good—the Bren gun as compared with the Browning, the twenty-five pounder as compared with the 105, and moreover, the cost is very much higher. That is a matter of opinion. You could not persuade an American of that fact. And, so far as one can see, from the advice I have received from my officials the difference in these weapons is very little.

He said that the adoption of uniform weapons would be of far greater advantage to the United States. There is the question of the Sten and the Thompson. Here, however, I think the hon. member is entering a field which is different, the field of handarms. So long as these weapons use the same ammunition—and I believe that is true of the Sten—it may be quite possible to keep the Sten, which is a much cheaper weapon, and not take the Thompson. That is receiving consideration.

The hon. member referred to overhead, with too many men not fighting, and the setup being top-heavy. As I have said, I think we have the lowest overhead of any of our partners outside the iron curtain, referring to operational troops in proportion to the total. And I believe that if a study is made on a comparable basis it will be found that our divisional slice is smaller than that of any comparable country. It seems to me that there may be a new principle we have discovered in this, and that is that the overhead goes up, not down, with the size of the force.

The hon. member for Yale said that the reserve force lacked funds, particularly for certain purposes, and that they were operating in cramped quarters and housed in school buildings. The accommodation for the reserve army has been increased by over one hundred per cent in the last five years, and we are doing everything possible to continue this increase as rapidly as we can, having regard always to other requirements which are considered more urgent. As far as I can recall there has been no suggestion from representatives of the reserve force that their funds should be increased again. Substantial changes have been made over the last three years.

The hon. member said that the personnel are not receiving rehabilitation grants. There was never any suggestion that the reserve force should receive rehabilitation grants. I have never heard that suggestion from anyone.

The hon. member said we should remove the bottleneck preventing defence activities over the highway between Alberta and British Columbia, and the highway between Kamloops and Vancouver. I have made inquiries of the general staff and find that they do not regard these as urgent military requirements.

He said that we should develop airfields at Grand Forks, Kamloops, and other points. We are developing all the airfields we need at the present time, or that we can afford to have at this time, and we are establishing them in the places which in our opinion are best suited for air-training, namely in the prairie provinces, where we will have eight additional airfields in operation, as soon as the work can be done.

The hon. member referred to civil defence, a matter which comes under the supervision of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who will speak about this at a later time.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said there was no brigade training area or camp in the maritime provinces, and that there was too much centralization. I have answered the question about centralization as it applies to defence establishments. I can tell him that we are looking for an area in the maritime provinces which will be suitable for large-scale training. At present the only two in Canada are at Petawawa and Wainwright, and both of them have cold winters and a good deal of snow. If in the maritime provinces we could find an area of more than one hundred square miles of suitable ground, which could be acquired at no great cost and without displacing too many people, and also with no valuable standing timber on it, we should be glad indeed to consider it. We have had officers looking into this matter since 1946, but they have not yet found a suitable area.

The hon. member referred to the question of men abroad not receiving dependents allowances. This was answered in the house on March 18, as reported at page 1373 of Hansard. We have tried to build up pay schedules by having pay rates which are equivalent to those in the eight leading industries of Canada, so that it will be unnecessary to have dependents allowances again. Should, however, the necessity become evident, that certainly must be considered.

The hon. member for Broadview said the reserve army should train as complete units. We believe that at the outset it is much more useful for the reserve army to go to camp and do individual training or sub-unit training, having all their housekeeping looked after for them. In this way the days they spend in camp can be spent in intensive training in weapons. That has been the view since the second world war, and that procedure will be carried on. However, as units achieve a standard in individual training where they can profit from unit training, then I agree with him completely. I can see also the advantage in having the unit, from the administrative and traditional points of view, and from the point of view of morale. As we pass through this period of acquiring trained officers, trained N.C.O.'s and a nucleus of trained men, we will do more along the lines of his suggestion.

The hon. member suggested there should be danger pay up in the front line. This is something they have had in the United States but, I think, not in other forces. The Canadian government has always been opposed to it. I think Canada's armed forces have been opposed to it. However, we are doing something in that regard. We pay an additional allowance to men abroad of $9 a month for privates, $12 for sergeants, $15 for W.O.2's and $16.50 for W.O.1's. So far $47,000 has been paid in this way to the forces in Korea.

The hon. member for Vegreville asked if it would not be possible for us to take in other than British subjects. I should say that an amendment was passed on March 16, 1951, to K.R. Canada concerning the qualifications for enrolment which now read:

> (a) be a Canadian citizen or other British subject; except that the minister may authorize the enrolment of a citizen of another country that is a party to the North Atlantic treaty if he is satisfied that the national interest would not be prejudiced thereby and if such enrolment is not prohibited by the law of such country.

As you can see, it is pretty restricted for security reasons. I must say that my military advisers are very strongly of the view that we should limit our armed forces to Canadian citizens or other British subjects. The same practice is followed in most countries. In Canada we are in a peculiar position in that we have a considerable proportion of our population of United States origin. They are just as loyal to the same causes as we are. We both move freely across the common border, and we thought it would be desirable to make some exception in their case, and other similar cases. After all, the twelve nations of the North Atlantic treaty are all in it together as partners, and we should accept each other's nationals in our services in so far as that can be safely done. I can tell the hon. member that that is the situation. If it should be desirable to extend it, then we shall be very glad indeed to give the matter further consideration.

The hon. member for Three Rivers referred to the small number of French speaking officers in the three services. There is nothing I should like to see more than a larger proportion of officers of French origin in the three services. However, I do not agree that just because we do not have them we should promote men of any race who have not the required qualifications of experience, education or military bearing. It would be very desirable indeed if we could secure a larger proportion of men who were originally French speaking, and who would have the desire to make the service a career. At the present time we are doing very well at Royal Military College and Royal Roads. Twenty-five per cent of the cadets are of French speaking origin, and a good proportion of those are making the services their career. That is fine, and we would like to see more of them. But there is a considerable handicap involved in the service of a French speaking officer in the armed forces due to the fact that it is quite impossible to keep him and his family located in a community predominantly French and Catholic. When he moves away to secure promotion, to take a course or to take on some other job, then he is faced with the alternatives of either leaving his family behind in the community of relatives and friends who speak their tongue, or taking them with him to a community that may be predominantly Protestant and English.

I can mention cases that have come to my attention. In the course of promotion an officer with the rank of major in the army was transferred from the ordnance depot at Montreal east to a senior position at Calgary or Edmonton. He was faced with the necessity of taking his children from a French speaking Catholic school to an English speaking Catholic school, and his wife from the community of their friends to one where very few people spoke their language.

Mr. Harkness: We speak French in Calgary.

Mr. Claxton: Not all of you. One can understand the difficulties. It is a real difficulty, but I can assure the hon. member who brought up the matter that it is one which has our complete and understanding sympathy, and that we are doing everything possible to overcome it. In opening R.M.C. a couple of years ago I referred to this question particularly, and perhaps I might read a passage from my speech. I said:

> Since my appointment I have emphasized the importance of a knowledge of both English and French to all Canadians, but particularly those of the armed forces. Obviously an officer possessing both languages has an advantage in exercising leadership and command, in getting along with his fellows in peace or war, in access to additional knowledge and in work as liaison officers, military attaches and the like. The knowledge of both languages is a positive military advantage. Accordingly, French and English are both compulsory subjects at both colleges for the first three years. That, however, is not enough. I urge staffs and cadets to see to it that by one means or another they learn to speak both languages fluently before the end of their course.

In point of fact, as to every promotion list that is put before me for consideration I ask the officer concerned, the chief of staff of the service or his representative, expressly if there is not a French-speaking officer within the range of qualifications who, despite seniority, can be promoted. The fact is that the gaps sometimes are too big to be bridged. For example, at the present time we have two brigadiers in the army who are very distinguished officers. They are both destined for high places. They have magnificent war records and are relatively young. One is eleventh and the other is twelfth in in the list of brigadiers. One has seventeen years' service and the other thirteen. To promote them to major generals at the present time would be unfair to them because they would reach the age of retirement, through having achieved and held the highest possible ranks, before they had acquired sufficient pension to justify their retirement. These officers are doing very good work indeed. One is at the imperial war college in London, having exercised command in Quebec. The other is the deputy chief of the general staff in Ottawa. One of them is destined to be in command in Montreal very shortly. But at present Major General Morton is in command in Montreal, and he speaks French, but one of these officers will be transferred there on General Morton's retirement. I am afraid we simply cannot run three services the size of ours if we do not see to it that we make the best of our racial and linguistic position. I regard it as a positive asset that we should have officers of both languages in all three services, and I should like to see more of them.

The hon. member also suggested that a military college should be established at Quebec city. That has been considered, and we do not exclude it at all. At present, however, the cost of the other two colleges is very considerable indeed, and we are most happy to have the proportion of twenty-five per cent French-speaking students mixed in with the English-speaking students at Kingston and Royal Roads. We hope it will have a good influence in making both groups better Canadians.

The hon. member suggested that we should have ships manned exclusively with French-speaking officers and men. That might be desirable if we had a very much larger navy, but with our navy, which has a present strength of about 14,000, it is not economically possible to do so, even if it were desirable; therefore I am afraid we cannot do it.

I think the only remaining suggestion made was that of the hon. member for Peel with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway. We regard this as a defence project of immense importance and would like to see it proceeded with, if possible jointly.

Mr. Sinclair: I intend to speak very briefly, not so much on national defence as in order to correct a statement which, if permitted to go uncorrected, might have an effect on reserve recruiting. Yesterday afternoon I listened to most of the speech by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but I was not in the chamber at the time he made this comment, which appears at page 2858 of Hansard:

> That man has a job; he is in a certain income tax bracket. If he joins the reserve army he will be paid $20 or $25 a month, which must be added to his income. That puts him in another income tax bracket. At the end of the year, instead of the reserve army paying him something, he pays Mr. Abbott something. He really loses in the transaction; he has drilled for nothing, because the money is taken back in income tax.

I want to start by saying that the hon. member is generally pretty well informed on his subject matter, but when I am through I think he will agree that in this case he was in error. It is quite a common mistake in this country to presume that when you cross into another income tax bracket somehow or other you are in danger of losing net income. I want to say quite flatly, before I give some examples I have prepared, that under our income tax system it is impossible for any person to work for extra income and suffer a loss of net income. Our income tax tables are designed to avoid that.

I am going to take one or two very simple examples which would apply to men in the reserve army. As hon. members know, in Canada a single man gets an exemption of $1,000 and a married man with no children an exemption of $2,000 from income tax. On the first thousand dollars of income beyond that in both cases the rate is 15 per cent, and most of these young reservists will be in that income tax bracket. This extra $20 a month, if it does not take him into the next bracket, as normally it would not, will be subject to tax at the rate of 15 per cent, or 18 per cent with the new surtax. So he will pay exactly the same tax as he paid before on his basic income, and in addition he will pay 18 per cent on the $20 or $3.60 a month, leaving him $16.40 tax free out of his additional earnings. That applies to both single and married men in the first income tax bracket. Let us suppose, whether he be single or married, he is right at the top of his bracket; that is a single man earning $2,000 or a married man earning $3,000, so the extra $20 a month he gets from the reserve army does carry him into the next bracket. In that bracket the tax is 17 per cent, but payable not on his entire income but only on the next thousand dollars. So he pays exactly the same income tax on his ordinary income, and on the extra $20 he pays 17 per cent plus the 20 per cent surtax or a total of 20·4 per cent. Therefore he pays the same basic income tax on his other income as he paid before. On this extra income, this $20 a month, he pays $4.08, and has roughly $16 left tax free.

I will even go to the extreme case, to show how it is impossible for any person to work more and suffer a loss in net income. Take one of those few but happy individuals in the very top income tax bracket, over $400,000 a year. In this bracket the tax is 80 per cent. Suppose he joined the reserve army and was paid this extra $20 a month. He would continue to pay his ordinary tax on his basic income. On the extra $20 he would pay 80 per cent plus the new defence surtax, making 96 per cent, so he would still have 80 cents left over and above his former net income. Of course in that case he would hardly be joining because of the incentive of $20. That leads me to the other point, which is based upon a statement made recently by the deputy minister of national defence. The small material incentive which would be given by cancellation of income tax on this reserve pay is not sufficient to induce any extra recruiting, in the opinion of the deputy minister given just last week. Again I repeat, just to correct any misapprehension which might have gone abroad, that a recruit in the reserve army cannot possibly lose financially by joining up, no matter what his base income may be and no matter what brackets he may cross. Certainly in low brackets he will have the great bulk of his extra income left to him, in addition to his ordinary net income.

I do not intend to speak on the question of income tax on those in the armed services, because the Minister of National Defence has pointed out that the Minister of Finance will deal with that matter when the income tax resolutions are before the house. I have been reminded, however, that in the years before I was a parliamentary assistant I made a speech on this matter when I was just home from overseas, and it reads very much like the speech made by the hon. member for Broadview yesterday. I have not changed my opinion very much on that matter. I think the proper way to pay for the extra hazard or danger of front line service is not by the remission of income tax but by extra combat pay. That was the American practice, and in my experience it was the British practice. In R.A.F. service in Libya we did get extra pay not only for the theatre of operations but also to make up for the fact that our living quarters and food certainly were not the same as those of the soldier back at base or in Canada. I suggest that the proper attack to be made on this problem is not by suggesting the remission of tax. The Minister of National Defence put his finger squarely on the issue. When you talk about the remission of income tax for those in the armed services it is not the private you are going to help; it is the high ranking officer. If the difference in what the private soldier would pay in income tax were regarded as the base for combat pay, I suggest that combat pay would be a very small item indeed. However, that point will be dealt with by the Minister of Finance when the budget resolutions are considered. All I want to do is emphasize that under our taxation system it is impossible for anyone, soldier or worker, who chooses to work extra hours to earn extra income to be left as a consequence with less net income. He cannot help but gain if he works more.

Mr. Fulton: I was very interested in what the parliamentary assistant just said with regard to combat pay and related subjects. I had not intended to deal with that in my remarks this afternoon, but since the hon. member has raised the question I just want to say that like him and probably every other member here who had the privilege of serving in either of the two wars, I think the feeling is universal that the proper man to receive trades pay or extra pay, if extra pay is to be given for extra service, is the man who carries the rifle, the man who operates the gun in the aircraft, or who mans the gun on the fighting ship.

I know this is a difficult subject, but by the very nature of things skilled tradesmen—probably not from their own choice—have to work under conditions and circumstances where they are not near the actual battle front. As a result trades pay is much more prevalent in rear areas and workshop areas. I do not deny there is danger in some of those areas, but as a rule trades pay is more concentrated in areas where the danger is not great than in danger areas, where there is little trades pay. I certainly feel this subject is one that requires careful consideration. Now that our troops are once more in actual battle, I think we might give some consideration to whether the trained rifleman should not receive some form of trades pay. I should think it would be possible to work out some scheme under which a man who qualifies to meet certain tests as a first-class infantryman with a rifle battalion, and similarly in the other services, should receive something in recognition of that fact. If it is right to give trades pay to a man who is trained to maintain vehicles, I think we might consider whether we should not also give trades pay to men trained in maintaining their profession as fighting soldiers.

It is quite obvious from the discussion that has gone on so far that all parties in the house are in agreement on the need for an expanded and accelerated national defence program. But the agreement on goals need not, and in my view should not, preclude honest disagreement on methods and interim objectives. No one denies that all the free nations are in peril of momentary Russian aggression. No one in this house denies the necessity for the enlarged defence program, and the raising of additional forces recently outlined by the minister. It is not correct to say, however, that to question either the adequacy of the over-all program or the efficacy of the methods being followed is in any way to impede the war effort. Such an argument I reject absolutely. What is needed is a measured examination of the whole program as announced, to see if it is adequate to meet the peril, and to see whether the methods being followed will, in fact, enable accomplishment of the program laid down by the government. If we believe there are doubts on either score, we must say so. National defence is too serious to fool around with. Personally, I have doubts on both scores.

First, as to whether the program announced by the government is adequate to meet the requirements of the situation: I intend to make no criticism at this time of the extent of the commitments presently laid down by the government which may be generally summarized as being, in the army, two brigades for overseas—one in Korea and one for Europe—and one airborne brigade for home defence; for the air force, forty operational squadrons, of which eleven are destined for Europe; in the navy, a general force of one hundred active ships. Whether or not that figure is intended to be one hundred fighting ships, I have not yet been able to gather from the minister's statements. If there were one hundred fighting ships, then we are obviously going to have many more ships than that in service in the navy, but the only figure it is safe to mention at this time is the one hundred ships in commission in the navy when our objective is reached.

I fear that it will not be possible adequately to fulfil and maintain these commitments within the limitations now governing our forces, that is the limitation of 115,000 service personnel by 1954. I believe it will be found either that the commitment must be reduced or the number of personnel increased, or we shall run the danger once again of inadequate support for our forces when they are engaged in operations.

Before stating my reasons in detail for this criticism, I think it is interesting to take a general look at our military commitments in terms of those of other countries, particularly of the United States. As I said, at this time I am making no criticism of the size and the extent of our commitment. But I think it does help us to keep a sense of perspective when we are discussing national defence just to look at the extent of the commitment of our ally. I realize also it is not strictly accurate to say, because another country has a population ten times that of our own, that we should necessarily, therefore, be able to put forth an exactly proportionate war effort, that is one-tenth of theirs, because there are many other factors which intervene. But when we are comparing population figures, it does seem to me it is an indication of the proportional effort of the two countries.

When we are considering this matter then, we find that the United States, with a population approximately ten times that of Canada, has as its goal of serving personnel in the armed forces—I understand that is what we would call active forces and does not include the national guard—3,500,000 men. According to my understanding they expect to reach that goal this year. Our active service personnel on a strictly proportionate basis would be one-tenth of that number or 350,000. Now, I have said that a strictly proportional relationship may not be possible because the United States has admittedly a more developed economy, but in terms of serving personnel it is an indication. We must bear in mind the fact that our goal is 115,000 service personnel by 1954; that is, our target is something less than one-third of what it would be if we were to achieve a goal on a basis exactly proportionate to that of the United States. And that in three years' time.

Then, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of a detailed consideration of whether we can meet our commitments within the target strength of 115,000 service personnel, it is interesting to compare our effort and strength in the last war with our announced commitments and proposed strength under the present program. If you will remember, Mr. Chairman, during the recent war Canada had five divisions in the field as a fighting force, three infantry divisions, two armoured divisions and two independent armoured brigades. Taking the equivalent of three brigades per division, that is either infantry or armoured brigades, and the equivalent of a brigade of artillery, one might say roughly that you had four brigades per division or that five divisions would give you the equivalent of twenty brigades plus the two armoured brigades which would make twenty-two. In making this comparison, I think it is only proper to bear in mind, of course, that there were reconnaissance regiments, as well as corps troops, who actually did fight although they were not included in any of the divisions or independent brigades.

I believe it would be a fairly generous estimate, and would form a fair basis of comparison, instead of taking twenty-two, the strict mathematical computation, to say we had the equivalent of thirty brigades within our five divisions and two independent brigades when we include reconnaissance, corps and army fighting troops. During the war of 1939-1945 to maintain a fighting force equal to thirty brigades took 495,804 men. Then three brigades, which is our present commitment, on the same basis would take approximately 49,580 men to maintain them. That figure of 49,580 would mean that the army alone would require a strength of nearly half the total planned strength of 115,000 which is to cover all three services.

Actually there has been an announcement that it is the intention of the government, with respect to the brigade for Europe, to rotate that brigade on a basis which the minister outlined. You cannot, therefore, just look for a brigade for Europe. Leaving out altogether the necessity of reinforcing either the brigade for Korea or the brigade for Europe, should hostilities occur there, we are committed to that rotation of the force. I believe I am correct in saying that at no time during the last war were we ever committed to a policy of complete rotation of service personnel. Since we are going to have to rotate the brigade in Europe, it would automatically follow that in fairness some provision will have to be made for rotating the brigade in Korea. You cannot, therefore, just take a figure of three brigades. It seems to me you have to take a figure of more like five brigades which we shall have to be able to maintain on the basis of the commitment the minister has laid down.

On a comparative basis—and although this I admit is not strictly accurate nevertheless it forms a basis on which to judge—taking the figures as to what it took to maintain that number of brigades during the 1939-45 war, to maintain five brigades or their equivalent at this time would take approximately 80,000 men. That is, I repeat, for the army alone.

When we come to the air force, a similar comparison is even more startling. It has been announced that our program calls for 40 squadrons. During the last war, at its peak, according to official figures which I have been given, the air force had the equivalent of 78 operational squadrons. That figure was reached in 1943. At that time, again according to the official figures, the air force's maximum strength was 209,803. Here, of course, comparisons are perhaps even more difficult to make; but I think that a comparison should be made for the purpose of discussion.

During the last war we had a number of bomber squadrons. I understand that we are to have no heavy bomber squadrons under the program now envisaged, so that one would have to make adjustments for that differential, as a bomber squadron takes a much higher proportion of men than does a fighter squadron. The official air force figures show however that even with the bomber squadrons overseas only approximately one-third of the air force personnel overseas was engaged in bomber activities. We therefore do not need to weight the comparison too heavily as a result of the fact that this time we eliminate the bomber squadrons. On the basis of a straight mathematical comparison, if there were 78 squadrons at the peak of strength, and a total of 209,800 men to maintain that number of squadrons, therefore 40 squadrons—again on a straight mathematical basis—can be said to need 117,000 men. That is for the air force alone.

Let us for the purpose of argument make a heavy cut because there are to be no bomber squadrons under the program that is now envisaged. Suppose you want to take a third off that figure. That still leaves between 75,000 and 80,000 which might be considered as being required to maintain that 40 squadrons, unless we are to say that the use of manpower during the last war was excessively prodigal. There are, of course, other reasons why the comparison must be carefully made. We are going to have only 11 squadrons overseas at this time, whereas a large portion of our effort last time was in Europe.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are committed to keeping 11 squadrons in Europe under this program, and again, since the intention has been announced of rotating army personnel in Europe, I can only presume that, in fairness, the same intention would apply with respect to air force personnel. You are therefore committed to an 11-squadron force in Europe on a rotation basis; so that even if it is necessary to be extremely careful in making your comparison between these figures and the figures of the last war, because of the absence this time of a bomber effort, nevertheless your figures are weighted back again because you are committed to maintaining a substantial part of your force in Europe on a rotational basis.

Taking then the mathematical calculations alone, one would have a figure of some 190,000 men for the army and the air force, on a comparative basis. Giving it then all the care and the weight which must be attached to the fact that our effort is not as all-out at the present time as it was in wartime, nevertheless I think it is quite safe to say that the ceiling of 115,000, if it is not going to be exceeded—and I would certainly think that it will have to be exceeded—would certainly have to be stretched to the limit to maintain the commitments to the extent outlined for the army and air force alone; and the figures that I have given take no account of our naval effort.

In this connection I think we should also consider the physical problem of actual reinforcements. We have to bear in mind the fact that our men are fighting a war in Korea. For international political purposes it may be called police action or it may be called the restraint of aggression. It makes no difference what political name we give to it; to the men on the spot it is a war; and by anyone dealing with the problem of maintaining that force and reinforcing that brigade, it must be dealt with on the basis of a war. One is therefore surely entitled to look, and should do so, at the figures of the last war for some basis of comparison. Official figures for a comparable theatre can be found in the figures of casualties during the Italian campaign during the last war. I think that Italy would be a more comparable theatre than northwest Europe because of the factors of disease and so on, which would be more nearly similar in the case of Italy and Korea than they would be in the case of northwest Europe and Korea.

The figure for our non-battle casualties for the Canadian component of the allied army in Italy for one year, namely 1944—and I point out that these are non-battle casualties alone—was 38,973. The approximate average monthly strength of the Canadian component was 72,000. So that of the total average strength in the theatre for a year, one-half were non-battle casualties. The rate of casualties of all types—that is, battle as well as non-battle casualties—was 61 per 1,000 per month which, it would seem to me, means a figure of 720 over a 12-month period. With the casualty figures being worked out on this basis, and that is the only way we can arrive at it, it would seem that 720 or seven-tenths would be casualties, either battle or non-battle, in the course of a 12-month period. The provision for reinforcements must surely be based on the anticipated casualty rate, which must take in casualties from all sources and when you look at the figures for the last war, you can see that the problem of reinforcing the Korean brigade is a heavy one indeed, when you realize that in Italy the non-battle casualties for a year amounted to a total of one-half of the total actual strength in the theatre.

In this connection there is an interesting statement by Brigadier Rockingham, commander of the Canadian brigade in Korea, as reported in a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of April 19. It is dated Fort Lewis, Washington, April 18 and reads in part as follows:

> Brig. John Rockingham said today Canadian casualties in Korea likely will be higher than they were in Italy and Normandy.
> He told a press conference on the eve of the 6,000-man force's departure from nearby Seattle for Korea that if a commonwealth division is formed in Korea, Canada might have to send additional troops to that war theatre.

When one bears in mind the reports that you have, Mr. Chairman, as to what I might call generally sanitary conditions in Korea, I think it is highly likely that what Brigadier Rockingham said will be realized, taking into account the non-battle casualties alone; and, these, as the figures I have placed on the record will show, are equal to, if not greater than, the battle casualties, but they have just as great an effect from the point of view of wastage of forces. If then approximately half the average strength in Italy were non-battle casualties during the course of a year, and if with battle casualties included your average rate was 61 per thousand per month for Italy, and with the likelihood that it will be higher in Korea, then I suggest these figures show that we need to take a second look at the manpower problem confronting this country in the light of the present program outlined by the government and the commitments which we have accepted.

We cannot afford to say to ourselves: "Let us not get excited, because this is peacetime; we cannot put forth an all-out effort." I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that we shall be doing a disservice to the country, a disservice to the men who are fighting in the forces now, and a disservice to those whom we are asking to volunteer if we do not face these facts and have a full and frank discussion of the implication of these facts, and we shall be horribly guilty if we ever again run even the risk of a situation arising where men are committed to battle and we suddenly find we have not got the resources, nor have we planned and prepared to have the resources in manpower immediately available adequately to maintain these troops, we simply cannot take that risk, because men are now fighting and dying in Korea. Also bear in mind this, which I will refer to again in a few moments —we are asking men to enlist to go to Europe. There is no fighting in Europe at the moment, but these men will have to be ready to meet an enemy, and a fully trained enemy, at any moment. That is why they are being sent there. This house is not entitled to regard the recruiting of a brigade for Europe as merely another aspect of a peacetime army. That brigade is being trained and raised to send to Europe to take its place in the line with our allies in the North Atlantic organization, ready to resist aggression at a moment's notice—and a moment's notice is all they will have if the Russians should ever make the fatal decision to start the next world war.

When we look at our figures of recruiting I do not think we can find there a basis which would even entitle us to agree with the minister that the recruiting figures show that his program of 115,000 men in the three forces will be completed in a year and a half. The minister drew that conclusion from the figures of recruiting at the present time. It seems to me they show it would take over two years at the best, because although it is true enough that during January, February, March and April the average increase in the three services was over 2,000 a month, it is significant to note that during the month of April the intake was substantially less than it was during the previous month. It is also significant to note that it was higher in January, less in February and it was less again in March. The net intake for April, or an estimate of it, was given by the minister in his statement on May 8, and we find that the estimated over-all increase for that month was still less than it was the previous month.

Let us look at the trend. In January the net increase of the three services was 2,642. For February it was 2,173; for March it was 2,075. Does the minister remember what the figure for April was?

Mr. Claxton: It was 1,934.

Mr. Fulton: For April the estimated increase was 1,934. Therefore the figures show a steady decline during the first four months. I realize that does not take into account the increase which will certainly be shown as a result of the announcement of the drive to recruit a special brigade for Europe, but the over-all trend was down steadily. That, Mr. Chairman, is a trend that will have to be reckoned with. That of course is the normal trend with respect to recruiting in the forces; that the winter months are the high months. Then, as we get toward the summer, they decrease, and particularly in the case of this country we must accept that, with the competing claims of industrial defence production, and particularly as that program is stepped up, there will be a tendency toward a greater increase in the downward trend of the recruiting figure.

Even if we take it that the average of 2,000 a month will be maintained, which seems to me to be making an estimate at a higher figure than the circumstances justify, when the minister made his announcement on February 5 we had 50,000 personnel to raise for the three services in order to achieve the program—fifty thousand at the rate of 2,000 a month. Even if that rate were maintained it would thus take 25 months to reach the objective, or just over two years. Therefore I cannot see that the figures, as they are at the present time, justify the minister's anticipation that the program will be completed in a year and a half.

Furthermore, when one looks at the experience of the Korean brigade, which shows that approximately something over 10 per cent of the new recruitment had to be discharged or released even before the brigade ever left the continent, it certainly shows that the present recruiting policy and the policy of suddenly rushing into recruiting drives and putting pressure on is not an efficient one, is not the way in which any country should approach this problem of raising forces, because it is unscientific and unsafe, because it is inefficient and expensive.

All this, Mr. Chairman, leads me to the conclusion that we need to take a second look at our manpower policy. I certainly wish to support the suggestion that has been made in this debate by one or two speakers who preceded me, namely, that we need right now a national registration put into effect in this country.

The minister has said that we have a three-year program, but he himself has admitted that it does not rest with us to determine whether we shall have three years to complete that program. It rests with the Russians, who are the only potential aggressors. The implications as to whether or not we are going to be able to fulfil our commitments within the present limitation of 115,000 for the forces—I have dealt with the implications inherent in that problem—the implications inherent in the question of reinforcements and the rate of casualties in Korea, the implications inherent in the necessity to rotate the brigades in Europe and Korea, and the eleven squadrons of air force in Europe, plus the implications inherent in the tremendously high proportion of discharges from the Korean force, even before they left this country, particularly when this is reinforced by the fact and sober realization that we may not have three years, but may have only three months or less—all these implications, it seems to me, point inescapably to the conclusion that we must prepare now to meet the worst. And the only way we can prepare to meet the worst is by having a survey of our manpower, by national registration, and by preparation now to put into effect those measures to raise the forces which I believe may be necessary even without an act of aggression by Russia, but which will certainly become necessary the moment Russia commits an act of aggression.

Mr. Chairman, my own view as to the only proper, the fair and the safe way in which to raise a force to go into battle has been expressed already, and I think it does not need amplification. I am now trying to approach the problem within the limitations of the program laid down by the government, and trying to show that within the limitations of their own program it is necessary for them to take a second look at the whole problem.

I think that can be seen in a clearer light when we examine the methods now being followed to raise the brigade for Europe. In my view the wrong method of recruiting is being followed. I do not consider it fair to ask men to volunteer to discharge a national duty. I do not consider it fair, nor do I consider it safe or efficient. And I press this again, particularly in view of the fact that these men are asked to go to Europe to take their places in the line, where they may be called upon to meet a highly trained and ruthless enemy at any time.

I have already referred to the example of the inefficiency which was necessarily inherent in the sudden, rushed and unscientific recruitment for the Korean brigade. Let me make it perfectly clear that I believe absolutely, and I am happy to believe, that the Korean brigade as it finally sailed for Korea was among the most efficient and most splendid, if not the most efficient and splendid that had ever been raised in this country—but at what a tremendous cost, in the matter of weeding out men who should never have been allowed to join it in the first place, as the result of a haphazard program of recruitment!

As I have said, these men are being asked to face the possibility of imminent war in Europe. I do not consider the method being followed of raising the brigade is the fair, the safe or the efficient way. Then, apart from that question, there are one or two other features of the present method of recruiting the brigade for Europe which, I suggest, should be examined. I realize it was extremely difficult to find a satisfactory compromise between the various factors the minister outlined for us when he announced the method to be followed in recruiting that brigade, having as a basis the reserve units across the country. He said we had to have a compromise between choosing three main units only and getting proper geographic representation. Those were among the factors considered.

The decision was arrived at to raise three battalions, one of which would be a highland battalion, one a straight infantry battalion and one a rifle battalion, and to give fifteen various reserve units the opportunity to recruit men for that brigade. As I understood the minister's statement, one of the advantages which were to flow from this method was the preservation of the regimental spirit—an objective with which I agree one hundred per cent.

But I think we should consider seriously whether in fact the method being followed will not actually defeat the objective. I wonder if it is going to be possible, when we have five different companies in a battalion wearing, as I understand they will wear, different regimental insignia. That is to say, a company of the Canadian Highland Regiment recruited by the Seaforth Highlanders would wear insignia different from a company recruited from the Canadian Scottish—that was my understanding, and I would ask the minister to correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Claxton: Shoulder badges.

Mr. Fulton: Different shoulder badges—it does seem to me it will be very difficult when there are companies within a unit competing, as it were, on the basis of prior regimental affiliations, to build up a unit spirit, such as our whole Canadian army tradition has shown is so important and counts for so much in the winning of battles. Because not only will companies now have that proper spirit of competition and rivalry based upon a competitive spirit as between, let us say, A company and B company, but there will be the other aspect introduced when it will be pointed out that A company used to be a company of Seaforth Highlanders whereas B company was Canadian Scottish.

Then there is the problem of transferring from one company to another within the same unit. The person involved would have to take down one set of shoulder flashes and put up another. It seems to me this would create a situation wherein the unit commander would find it exceedingly difficult to build up a proper unit spirit.

Then in addition we have the condition the minister outlined whereby other reserve force units will be asked to recruit reinforcement companies for the brigade, thus, as I understood him, further achieving the desired objective of maintaining the unit spirit and the regimental tradition. Again I believe the practice will defeat the objective. Because it seems to me that with a company of reinforcements raised by a battalion which is not a component company of the initial battalion of the brigade, and presumably wearing the shoulder flashes and the regimental insignia of their own unit during the time of their formation, coming into the battalion of the brigade and having to join companies with shoulder flashes different from that of the parent battalion of the reinforcement company, chaos and confusion would result, as well as a distinct feeling of let-down by the men, when they came in as members of X regiment and were then sent to one of the companies of the particular regiment and had to put up some other type of insignia.

The Chairman: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me that this problem may well create a situation where the unit commander may find he cannot allow this form of affiliation to exist, and he may have to say, "You will now regard yourselves as members of the first Canadian infantry battalion"—the first "Canadian infantry battalion" we have had in the history of the Canadian army. So that the very thing you are trying to preserve, under the system which has been adopted, may make it essential to disregard and to discard all unit affiliations, and we may thus be defeating that which we are trying to preserve.

Mr. George: Mr. Chairman, I shall confine my remarks to the reserve army, with which I am more familiar. First of all I should like to relieve the minister of his worries about camp sites. I am sure we have two excellent camp sites in my riding, and I would ask him to come and look them over some time. The reserve army has certain and distinct roles. They are not the roles that seem to be in the minds of most speakers today. The first is aid to civil power. The second is to have all their officers, W.O.'s, and N.C.O.'s fully trained, together with as many men as their equipment and facilities will allow them to handle, and to have them as fully trained as possible. The third role is for use and availability in case of a national emergency. The role of the reserve army is not that of occupational troops.

Let us deal with these points in order. The reserve army has been called out in the past to aid the civil power, and their work has been very effective. This is one of the roles that we all dislike, and fortunately very few of us have been called upon to perform such service. Briefly, to call out the reserve army as aid to civil power, the attorney general of the province concerned must make application to the federal government for the necessary troops. If authority is granted the troops are called out and the cost is paid by the province concerned.

The second role is the one with which most of us are fully acquainted. It is to have 100 per cent strength of officers and N.C.O.'s and from 50 to 100 per cent of other ranks as fully trained as possible. Many units have all their officers, W.O.'s and N.C.O.'s fully trained. That is the case in my own unit, the 8th Princess Louise's (N.B.) Hussars, which I have the honour to command. We are up to strength in officers and N.C.O.'s, and they are trained. We have a strength of around 650 all ranks although the other ranks are not all fully trained. About 30 per cent of the war establishment, in other words, 30 per cent of our total strength, are qualified.

The percentage of qualified personnel in units depends entirely on the type of unit to which they belong. In an armoured regiment, for instance, 75 per cent of the personnel are tradesmen. We find that it takes a minimum of three years to train these tradesmen. This tends to keep down our percentage of trade personnel compared, for instance, with an infantry regiment which has a lower percentage of tradesmen. These reserve units are to be available in case of war. They are not to go immediately into battle, but to be mobilized, fully trained and equipped within a reasonable time to take part in the defence of this country, whether it be in Canada or on foreign soil.

In cases of national emergency such as the Winnipeg flood last year, certain units of the reserve army were called out, and they did an excellent job. As I said before, the role of the reserve army is not occupation, and it could not be expected that reserve units should be sent to Europe or other foreign countries purely in anticipation of hostilities breaking out. We have not considered that one of the roles of the reserve army should be that of supplying personnel to what we know as permanent force units. That does not apply to the special or 27th brigade. Reserve army personnel are all employed in civilian occupations, and they do their training on holidays, week ends and in the evenings. Any move to mobilize complete units, except in the case of a national emergency, could be disastrous not only to industry but to the units themselves. However, I am sure that if any of the reserve army units were asked to mobilize today they would do so.

The minister's announcement of last Friday that the brigade for Europe was to be raised from and by the reserve units is in my opinion a fine idea and will ensure sufficient personnel being enlisted. Reserve army units will take pride in having sub-units in other larger formations wearing their badges, flashes, ties, and so on. The raising of the brigade by this method will not disrupt industry, and it makes the reserve army feel that at long last they are considered part of the defence forces of this country.

It has been said in this debate that the enlisting of personnel from and by the reserve army will weaken the reserve units. This no doubt is true in part. However, when the special brigade for Korea was being mobilized some time ago something over sixty of our personnel enlisted in the special force. In addition, we supplied a complete troop including tradesmen to the R.C.D.'s. This actually did cut down our strength and reduced the number of our tradesmen, but the unit was recruited back to its former strength and by putting on a number of courses ourselves we qualified more tradesmen than we have ever had before. In fact we now have 132 qualified tradesmen trade tested by an active force trades test board and drawing trades pay.

Some of these men are enlisting. The training which the reserve army has given them will mean that they enter the active force drawing trades pay, and the country will reap the benefit of the training they received and the money spent on them. While it reduces the number of our tradesmen we are very proud that they are doing so. We do not feel that we are being weakened by supplying recruits for the brigade. Actually we feel that it is a challenge to the reserve army to supply these men and then to get busy and replace them.

It has been said, and rightly so, that there are no poor units in the army; there are only poor officers. I have attended many conferences and meetings where reserve army officers deplored what they thought were the conditions in Canada with respect to the reserve army. If the officers are not prepared to back the idea of the reserve army, then they cannot expect their troops to be enthusiastic. I feel that the success of my own unit was due entirely to the enthusiasm of the late commanding officer, and this enthusiasm was contagious to such an extent that not only the officers but all ranks had it. So many people feel that the government and the country owe them a living, and I am afraid that has been the attitude of many in the reserve army. They felt that the government should introduce compulsory military service and thus relieve them of the additional work and initiative which would be required to build up their own units. I feel this situation will disappear pretty well as a result of the government's move to recruit from the reserve army, and in putting the responsibility on the reserve army to supply the troops. The hon. member for Broadview spoke yesterday, and at page 2860 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> From my observations, I would say that the great majority of reserve units would not, on an average, parade more than 25 per cent of their authorized strength, and a large part of the numbers on parade are made up by the band.

I am sure the hon. member appreciates the problems of the reserve army because he is a part of it. I did not feel, however, that a general statement like that should be allowed to go unchallenged. It gives a false impression to the general public, and as a result of such statements the general public tends not to hold the reserve army in too high repute. In the first place, the relationship between the number of men on strength and the authorized war establishment is not important. The important factor is what percentage of the men on strength turn out. How many non-effectives has a unit? Unfortunately we have all had too many, but we are gradually getting rid of them.

This afternoon the minister said, and I would repeat, that it is not necessarily the idea of the reserve army to be up to strength. I would like to give one instance, and I hope the committee will bear with me if I refer to my own unit, because after all it is the only one I know. I inherited it; it must go on, and it is going on. Three weeks ago I went down to attend a church parade. My unit is spread out over a radius of eighty-five miles. For that church parade we brought them in to the number of over two hundred, plus the band; and I am sure the hon. member for Broadview did not mean to imply that bands were not important parts of the units.

Tradition, as we all know, is one of the things that contribute to a good unit. All reserve army regiments in Canada have a long history of which they are proud, but I am sure that some of our traditions should go by the board; some being carried on today are ridiculous. On the other hand we have some good traditions which should be retained. I feel that we should make new traditions, after careful thought, and carry them on. These traditions revolve around the badges, colours, battle honours, mascots and many other things. To those interested in reading about tradition and how it is affecting units I would recommend the May issue of Mayfair. On page 43 appears an article by Allister Grosart entitled "All regiments of the reserve are uneasy." Mr. Grosart has written a very good article on the history and traditions of reserve army regiments, and he sums it up by suggesting that one of the greatest mistakes we could make would be to adopt the United States system of numbering regiments. Some of us remember the way armoured corps regiments were numbered during the war. I remember very well when it happened, and it caused more dissatisfaction than any other single thing I can remember. Today we have reverted to our own names, and have dropped the numbers. It was with great satisfaction that I learned the Minister of National Defence had denied rumours that regiments were to be numbered, and said they would continue with their traditional names.

We all appreciated the tribute paid by the hon. member for Nanaimo to the Gloucestershire regiment. Our own regiments have their traditions, but those of the Gloucestershire regiment go back much further. I came across an article dealing with the traditions of that regiment, which had this to say:

> The battalion was surrounded for three days and nights, stubbornly fought off the enemy from all directions, and finally the remnants cut their way out. It is an inspiring story, but most interesting is the point that the Glo'sters have done it before, 150 years ago.

That incident occurred on March 21, 1801, at Alexandria, when Napoleon was making his bid to conquer the east and the British were stopping him. I need not go into detail except to say that the Glo'sters were surrounded at that time also; and ever since they have had the privilege, unique in the world, of wearing two badges on their headdress, one in the front and the other at the back. I contend that tradition is a wonderful thing and is one of the ties that help to bind a good unit together.

There has been some criticism that the reserve army has not had sufficient equipment with which to train. As the hon. member for Nanaimo so well said the other day, no good officer ever has enough equipment, men and material with which to train or fight. Most reserve units have sufficient equipment. In the case of my own regiment there is nothing we need in the way of training equipment, neither do we lack accommodation or training areas. Perhaps we are more fortunate than many others, but even those units without sufficient accommodation have been able to carry on. All equipment and accommodation is useless without enthusiasm to make it work. I was surprised to hear the criticism yesterday that we have no tanks with which to train personnel. It is quite true that we have not the latest tanks coming off United States assembly lines, but the Sherman tanks we have were the best on the allied side at the end of the war; and like machine guns, if you learn one tank you learn them all. After that it is just a matter of a short course, and your men can go right on with them. So I do not believe this criticism is well founded.

It has been suggested also that reserve army regiments should train as units. This is practically impossible when there are a great many tradesmen in the unit. Like most reserve units, we like the school system we have been working under for the last three years. Units go to a camp such as Petawawa and everyone from the colonel down is put on a course. We have no housekeeping duties, and everyone goes home better trained. There is sufficient authority for special courses and exercises so commanders may exercise their units and get their administrative people into their jobs any time they wish to do so.

One of the mistakes that have been made in the reserve army, and we also made it, was recruiting numbers instead of quality. A large nominal roll does not in any way indicate a good unit. We found that by getting good types of soldiers we increased our efficiency and were able to qualify more tradesmen, and at the same time we built up a better reputation. The reserve army has the big job of selling public relations, and that is important. Troops who do not behave give us a bad reputation, but fortunately such cases have been rare.

The reserve army has a few problems, too; everything is not perfect. I do not think it would be wrong for me to bring some of those problems to the attention of the house. Between the wars we had what was known as the transportation grant, which worked out in this way. A soldier was allowed to bring his car to local headquarters training and receive mileage for it, provided he brought three or four other troops with him. In other words every man who had a car assisted in recruiting and in having a good turnout for parades. This was discontinued in 1946; today we have to use army vehicles to transport troops. These vehicles are not sufficiently winterized to be comfortable, and I sometimes wonder why the troops continue to ride in them in cold weather. Then in rural areas like ours it is too expensive to send a large truck a long distance for perhaps two men. I feel that we should have mass transportation by army vehicles and local transportation for local headquarters training mostly by private cars. I believe one of the most important things the department could do for the reserve army would be to restore this transportation grant. The reason given for taking it away was the increase in pay we were given at that time. I fail to see how the increase in pay was related to the transportation grant, unless it was in the over-all cost of the reserve army.

I agree with the statement by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance with respect to income tax and danger pay. I need not repeat it, because I think the hon. gentleman put it very well; and I believe that is the best solution that has been advanced so far. Today all units in Canada are having trouble finding sufficient pay for the handful of people who run them. We are allowed sixty days' training time, forty-five days at local headquarters and the remainder at summer camp. In addition there are special training exercises for which authority may be granted, and also ten days' administration pay.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that no one wants to tie a dollar sign to the reserve army. Money cannot buy a reserve army. It cannot buy the loyalty, initiative or anything else it takes to make a reserve army. However, I do feel that personnel should not be asked to train and work without receiving pay for the time spent. Unfortunately, we have to talk about money in these days. Instead of turning the pay back to the unit, as we used to do in the old days between wars, the men now need that money. It is a fortunate thing the government has a reserve army of this type. There is not enough administrative time to pay the handful of people who must administer the regiment. It is not like active service during the war where you can have the adjutant publish an order, and a short time later find the troops on the parade square. Every parade, every special exercise, means a terrific amount of work for those administering the regiments and sub-units. There seems to be a feeling among some that reserve army units can administer themselves within the ten days which is allowed. It cannot be done. I feel that the department should recognize the situation and deal with it accordingly on an administrative basis rather than on a training basis. It should not be granted arbitrarily, but as a matter of need.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, I want to pay tribute to the active force officers, areas, and commands of the army, for the co-operation which they have given the reserve units during the last several years. Without their co-operation, none of the units could have functioned. We have found that the active force officers will spend any amount of time and energy in assisting units with their problems, and in helping them to avoid pitfalls. This is so different from what we knew in the old N.P.A.M. days that I wanted to put it on the record.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee would be glad to learn that the 8th Princess Louise's (N.B.) Hussars commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel E. W. George, who happens to be the member for Westmorland, achieved its quota on the day business opened, Monday last.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the way that suggestion is made that this item carry at this stage is to me, in itself, one of the most alarming things connected with this debate. This one item covers a total of $1,412 million, and this is the item that, it appears to be suggested, members might pass without more information than they have at this time.

Mr. Knowles: It is more than all the rest of the estimates in the book put together.

Mr. Drew: Yes, more than all the rest of the estimates combined. May I point out that we are referred to what are mistakenly called the details at the back of the book. These details, so-called, commence at page 269. Let us see just how useful these details are, from the point of view of any hon. member who is assuming his responsibility here now of passing on hundreds of millions of dollars and placing that burden upon the Canadian taxpayer. Do not let anyone raise the suggestion that anyone is questioning the necessity for effective national defence. The more necessary that becomes, however, the more necessary it is that every member in this house take some steps to make sure that every dollar spent is being spent to the best effect, and that we are going to get results from this money; that we are not going to have the same failures that have occurred year after year in the past.

Let us look at these so-called details on page 270. Under the group of naval estimates, we find one single estimate described under the heading of details, "materials and supplies, $60,189,708". Now, that may be what the Minister of Finance is laughing at so loudly, but the taxpayers of Canada are not laughing so readily at this item. These things do require some consideration, and the flippant manner in which the Minister of Finance regards an item of that kind is a test—

Mr. Abbott: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should apologize to the hon. member, but I did not happen to be listening to him. I was speaking to my parliamentary assistant about something else.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the minister was laughing and chuckling, and it is interesting to note that he does not regard this discussion as sufficiently important, although he is the minister responsible for raising hundreds of millions of dollars for these items, which are not even given in sufficient detail for anyone to guess what they really are —

Mr. Abbott: It is only now that I thought perhaps I could stop listening for a few minutes.

Mr. Drew: It merely indicates the smart-aleck attitude of the Minister of Finance. First of all, he said he was not listening but was laughing as a result of a conversation with his parliamentary assistant, and now he says he is laughing because of the statements that are being made on the floor. It is a measure of the responsibility being assumed by this government in regard to these huge expenditures at this time.

Mr. Goode: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I point out —

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware that any question has been raised.

The Chairman: Any member can raise a point of order or a question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: I heard no remark about a question of privilege; apparently it was a suggestion that was going to be made.

Mr. Goode: May I point out to you, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Goode: —that the leader of the opposition is criticizing the minister, but he did not find it necessary to remain in the house while the minister was making his statement.

Mr. Drew: That, Mr. Chairman, was a tawdry and smart-aleck remark, unworthy of any hon. member in this house. I have done what perhaps the hon. member has not done: I have read every word of the minister's statement. I have been following this subject with a great deal of attention, and I perhaps will indicate that I am aware of some of the details before I sit down. Before any suggestion is made that every member of the opposition has not spent every hour in this house, may I ask the hon. member to look at the front ranks of the government benches and see how many cabinet ministers are here while we are discussing the allocation of hundreds of millions of dollars of the people's money.

Mr. Riley: Don't get mad.

Mr. Drew: Now, Mr. Chairman, the item to which I was referring was an item under the heading of "materials and supplies, $60,189,708". The next item is "acquisition and construction of buildings and works, including acquisition of land, $24,147,000". Then the next detail, as it is called, is "major procurement of equipment, $110,954,383". Now, that is the detail that is given in that case. In other details which bring that total for the naval services up to $277,754,980, there is no more real detail than that. Then we come to the army, and let us take as an example some of the items that are called details.

Materials and supplies, $201,432,075.
Acquisition and construction of buildings and works, including acquisition of land, $75,526,500.

Then here is another item, as an example only:

Major procurement of equipment, $198,930,650.

Then we find the various totals of the so-called details for the army amounting to $667,609,100.

Then under the heading of "Air", we have further so-called details:

Materials and supplies, $101,087,385.
Acquisition and construction of buildings and works, including land, $193,570,310.
Major procurement of equipment, $406,167,927.

Those are samples of the kind of detail that is given to explain this one item that we now have before us, amounting in itself to a total of $1,412 million. We are not dealing alone today with the assurance of adequate defence equipment. We are dealing with something that is in itself imposing upon the people of Canada one of the major problems that this country is going to be called upon to face. In the words of the Minister of Finance himself the people of Canada, along with the people of other nations, have before them two great concerns at this time: the pursuit of peace and the problem of inflation. In the pursuit of peace we are being called upon, through the vote of this committee, to supply not merely $1,412 million but, according to the statement issued by the Department of National Defence, $1,879 million during this current year. That pursuit of peace is something that is naturally going to engage the attention of the people of this country and it is something that should engage the attention of the members of the House of Commons in the most minute detail; because we are not going to defend freedom merely with dollars. We are not going to be able to defend freedom unless we make sure that we are going to be able to carry the load. In addition to taking such steps as are necessary to defend the dollar that is going to be used in this large quantity to defend our freedom, we must also be sure that, here as elsewhere, no unnecessary dollars are being spent.

I know there are those who will immediately say that when we make a demand for more information than we are getting, we are simply repeating a demand that has been made over and over again. But no matter what may have been true before, no matter what justification there may have been for urging greater detail in the past, that justification need hardly be pleaded at a time that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to place side by side with the pursuit of peace or, to use the other term, the preparation for defence, the problem of inflation itself. When we consider what measure of information we should require, I think that the strongest evidence we have of the need for more detailed information than we have yet had is furnished by the Minister of National Defence, and was furnished yesterday, as may be ascertained by anyone who was not here by a careful reading of Hansard for that day.

In his statement with regard to standardization, the Minister of National Defence said, as reported at page 2867 of Hansard:

I also exceedingly regret the failure to have more standardization.

That regret undoubtedly will be generally shared. That regret is one which undoubtedly should also cause us a great deal of concern at this time, recognizing as we do that the common activities of the Atlantic nations might easily demand supplies from one nation or another, and the failure to standardize might, in a period of crisis, spell the difference between victory and defeat, at least in any area where that problem had arisen.

But when we come to what follows in the statements of the Minister of National Defence, it seems to me that we find that atmosphere of continuing unreality which has surrounded all his statements since this crisis became acute a year ago. The Minister of National Defence, with justification, speaks with pride of Canadians in uniform. He is not alone in feeling that pride. I am sure every member of this committee shares that pride; and many members of the committee have been proud to be included amongst those who wore the uniform of this country on different occasions. But there is a difference between expressing justified pride in the Canadian armed forces and what they do, and giving the people of this country an impression that is not in keeping either with the facts as they really are or with the gravity of the situation with which we are confronted. Following up his reference to standardization, the Minister of National Defence said yesterday, as reported at page 2867 of Hansard:

> . . . a good many months ago we decided to standardize our equipment—not right across the board but generally—with United States-type equipment.

It was not a few months ago, Mr. Chairman, that it was announced that this decision had been made; it was two years ago. It was two years ago that the Minister of National Defence announced, in a speech to a service club—and may I interpolate that that seems to be the place where most statements of policy are now enunciated—that it had been decided to standardize with United States equipment, particularly in relation to rifles, machine guns and equipment of that kind. Some time went past and we found that, instead of manufacturing rifles and machine guns of the ·300 calibre during the period which had elapsed, government arsenals were manufacturing shotguns and sporting rifles which were being sold through the ordinary trade channels at a time when we were so greatly in need of equipment of this kind. That was one of the things which make it so difficult to be sure that any one of the glowing statements at any time has actually been carried into effect at some later date. There may be explanations. Yesterday the minister gave a great many explanations why a number of things had not happened that some people thought might have happened. But he then went on, after his reference to the position a few months ago, and he said this, and I am quoting from Hansard again:

> It so happened that we had the armament equipment for practically five divisions in mobilization stores, equipment of the latest type in use at the end of the second world war. We were probably unique in that respect.

I wonder what Stalin, or the men in the Kremlin, would say if they read Hansard forwarded to them by their representatives here in Ottawa. I wonder what they would think about Canada being unique in the fact that it has armament equipment for practically five divisions in store. Russia with 175 divisions in the field, and with another 175 divisions ready to be put in the field at any time, and ready also to supply China, Poland and other countries with the equipment for many divisions, and yet we are unique in that we have equipment for five divisions of a type which we were not able to use.

If that is the standard of the kind of information we are getting, then it is time that every member of this house of every party applied new tests to the statements which are given as to the ability of this country to meet any emergency which might arise. This emergency has not just arisen in the past few weeks. This emergency is one which has been foreseen for several years in increasing measure, and it should be recalled by every hon. member of this house that even if by some happy miracle we were to learn that tomorrow peace, full peace, had been declared in Korea, the necessity for preparations of this kind would not be diminished by one cent, by one gun or by one tank, by one ship, or by one aircraft. This preparation had commenced before anyone dreamed that South Korea was going to be attacked on June 25, so far as there is any evidence on the record.

The Atlantic treaty was signed long before June 25 of last year. Preparations were being made to combine the forces of the free nations for the defence of freedom and to build bulwarks of strength behind which freedom could be maintained against the threat of one great aggressor. That situation has not changed. The very fact that Korea has happened makes it clear that there can be other Koreas in other parts of the world, and that this preparation must go on. Therefore we must measure everything that has been done in the light of the fact that preparation has been going on for some time, and we must therefore see how far we have gone in meeting even the minimum basis of the requirements for a threat of that nature.

If this is the kind of threat which the Prime Minister has said it is, if it is the kind of threat that the Minister of National Health and Welfare said it was a few days ago, if it is the kind of threat which has been described by the Prime Minister of Britain and by the President of the United States, then what this country needs, and what every other country needs, is military forces in being ready to take the field, military forces which can be used to defend this country.

Today the Minister of National Defence explained the absence of equipment of a kind which would make it possible to engage in service activities by explaining the time that it required to produce many of the modern machines of war. That explanation undoubtedly is one related to the production now under way; but after all surely this country, and every other free country, should prepare to defend itself as best it can when an issue might arise while it is preparing for the more ideal form of defence at some later date.

It will not be any comfort to Canadians of future generations if they read that we were preparing a three-year plan or a five-year plan that would have been good had it ever been fulfilled, but that unfortunately those against whom we were making that preparation were not working on the same schedule. And yet that is exactly the situation with which we are confronted. We are confronted with the necessity of making use of such forces as we have for the preservation of peace. Surely it is within the capacity of this country to improvise and to make use of much of the equipment that we have for the purpose of creating forces in being.

We simply have no forces in being in this country today to meet any serious test that might be imposed upon us. We have a magnificent group of young men in Korea today, as fine young men as are joined today in the cause of freedom in that distant land; but it took many long months to train, to bring together and organize these young men. Now they have taken their places in the ranks of freedom. A long time ago, measured in terms of this emergency, the Canadian government, along with other governments, decided on the responsibility that this nation would accept in the defence of the Atlantic area. Surely it will not be said that Canada was not aware some time ago what its commitments were. Surely it was indicated some time ago that it had been agreed what these commitments would be.

If that agreement did take place some time ago, as was indicated in this house and elsewhere, then why is recruiting for the force required to fulfil that commitment being started only this week? It will not increase that force in size merely to criticize that delay; but it is important, because of that delay, again to consider how far we should be prepared to give blanket approval to broad statements without detail, and certainly without more detail than we have in the book of estimates now before us.

Yesterday the Minister of National Defence devoted a good deal of time to answering certain points that had been raised. This all could be summed up in the simple words "some sweet day"; because these are expressions of hope of things they are going to be able to do rather than answers as to what they have already done.

Naturally one of the things which must be a matter of concern to every hon. member is the availability of training supplies and training equipment for whatever men are called up for such force as may be required. Well, the house was informed and the people of Canada were informed through the press gallery and dispatches that went out from here, as well as by radio and news digests of these reports, that one of the points the minister made yesterday was that the Department of National Defence had been looking for five years for a huge camp area, one hundred miles by thirty miles, large enough to train an army formation as large as a brigade.

Mr. Chairman, we have many areas in Canada large enough to train a brigade. We have now millions of acres set aside as camp areas. But if, for any reason not disclosed in detail, we needed a camp area one hundred miles by thirty miles, we did not need to wait five years to get it. We have 3,600,000 square miles in Canada; so it should not be too difficult to find an area of 3,000 square miles for the purposes of defence preparation.

When we are told that we need an area of this kind to carry out training and, by implication, told that the reason we could not train a brigade in Canada before was that we did not have this area—and of course we are not training a brigade in Canada now, as a brigade—let us just see some of the camp areas that are available. There is Wainwright in Alberta. Wainwright is one of the largest camp areas in this country; it is a magnificent camp area.

I am not picking that out particularly as a chosen spot, but if additional land were needed, then the dominion government had plenty of power to increase that area substantially.

Mr. Claxton: Do you suggest that would be a good place in the winter?

Mr. Drew: And then there is Borden in Ontario. If more land is needed there, there is plenty of land that could have been acquired to add to the area of that very large camp, where at other times in the past brigades which have won renown on the field of battle in two world wars have been trained.

Then, what of Barriefield, which is not one of the largest camps by any means, but a very excellent camp and one which would compare favourably in size with some of the camps in Great Britain where divisions upon divisions have been trained in the past, and have left those camps to go right into battle. Then what about Debert, Sussex, Aldershot, Shilo, Rivers, Vernon—to mention only a few of the huge camp areas totalling millions of acres that we have here in this country.

If we needed a camp area one hundred miles by thirty miles for five years, then someone should explain to us what the ghastly failure was to act long ago. Surely we do not need to wait much longer for an area to be set aside.

And then may I refer to one of the most remarkable statements made in reference to this question of a training area. The Minister of National Defence explained that the department had its eye on an area. What an eye! This eye has apparently been well shaded for five years. But it has its eye on a place in the east. However, it may be that it would not want to tell us until after June 25, because one might know where another area might be arousing interest, in some particular part of Canada. There are of course large camp areas which would be of interest to those who may be called upon to make decisions at that time.

The really interesting part of the explanation, however, was where the minister said it was hoped that brigades would not have to do winter training in Canada, because much of the time would be spent shovelling snow. Where is the eye of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MacDougall: That is an all-seeing eye, George.

Mr. Drew: May I suggest it does appear the Department of National Defence does need one of those trained animals to lead it around, because if that department had its eye on winter problems of this kind it would have seen what is done at the airports. Personnel at airports do not shovel the snow; yet the runways are as smooth as a billiard table, and plenty smooth enough for any artillery, tank or infantry unit to train on them. Indeed, they would be training under conditions perhaps almost too favourable, when one keeps in mind the really severe training they would need to prepare them for the areas in which they might some time have to be used.

That explanation in itself indicates why a great deal more needs to be said in the house by way of explanation and by way of suggestion, so that the Department of National Defence may get out of the woods and actually wake up to the fact that the time when parade grounds were cleared by men with shovels passed many years ago. All the department would have to do would be to borrow some of the equipment being used in other places so satisfactorily, so as to be able to train just as well as training could be carried on anywhere in the world.

And, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that, far from taking Canadian troops out of Canada in winter, we should be training them in Canada under winter conditions; because it happens that there are the topographical contours in this country, the climate and all those other conditions which might be encountered in the very part of the world in which we would have to engage the only possible enemy we will ever have to engage within the lifetime of most of us, on a global scale.

That, Mr. Chairman, is one reason why we should, in the hope of preventing war, prepare in a way that will train our men to meet war if necessary in the very kind of area in which they would be called upon to engage the troops of the one great potential enemy that would lead the rest of the world to war at this time.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Before the dinner recess, Mr. Chairman, I was discussing the question of the training areas available in relation to the statement made by the minister yesterday about the fact that the government had been looking for a camp area. There is one point about which I confess there is some confusion. Perhaps the minister may have used inadvertently figures that gave a conflicting impression, but I was under the impression he used the figure of 100 square miles today in relation to the camp whereas yesterday the figure given was 100 miles by 30 miles.

I would point out that in addition to the camps I have already mentioned there are two camps which are perhaps the most historic and best known in connection with the provision of forces for the Canadian army in two world wars, and which I have not yet mentioned. I refer to Valcartier and Petawawa. Both these camps are very large by any standard, and it would seem strange indeed that in the case of Petawawa, as an example, adequate land could not be found in the adjoining area to provide whatever was necessary for purposes of training or manoeuvre. In fact it would seem that in the case of Petawawa the government might well have available one of the most remarkable training areas in the world because the provision of an added camp area on the Quebec side of the river would give the space required, and the camp would provide not only the artillery and armoured training facilities it now possesses but also immediate access to facilities for amphibious training of the very highest order.

In the case of Valcartier, with its great historic traditions, it would certainly be possible in that area to find further territory to give the required training space. I have not attempted to mention all the camps available in Canada, but the picture that is in the minds of most hon. members when the name of any one of these larger camps is mentioned must suggest that it would be a very strange thing if we could not train a brigade when the United Kingdom finds it possible to train many divisions with camps very much smaller than a number of those to which I have referred. I should think that in this country the decision should be made that training will be carried out here not only so that Canadian camps may be available for Canadian training purposes but also so that our own men, in this country of such immense variety and change in topography, would be ready for such service as they might be called upon to perform in any part of the world.

It is rather interesting that Great Britain should have sent a great number of men on different occasions to train in this country, and that we should find it difficult to provide adequate training for our own purposes. Many people will recall, for instance, that the famous Lovat scouts were sent over here to train near Jasper, and that other special units have been trained with great success in this country. I leave that question before the members in the hope that some of them at any rate will be impressed with the fact that one of the reasons given for not being able to proceed with training in Canada should not be the suggestion that we have not the space already available here.

Let me refer to another point made by the minister yesterday. He spoke of the fact that modification of the original plans for the production of military vehicles had been necessary, and that this was going to be done with a recognition of the fact that some of these vehicles, and certain parts thereof, could best be turned out in the United States. I should think there would be little tendency to take issue with that statement in regard to certain parts of our requirements, but I do suggest that here again the time is long overdue for such a decision to have been made if we are to accept the statements of the government last year as well as this in support of the very large appropriations which this house is being asked to vote.

Then we are told by the minister that it will be late this autumn before the first of Canada's new anti-submarine escort vessels is launched, and that it will be a considerable time longer before they are all at sea. Hon. members who have had contact with matters of this kind will recognize that specialists on the machines, the weapons and certain of the very intricate apparatus need to be trained for a very long time before they can handle this highly specialized equipment. Long before these ships are available the men who will handle the radar installations, the various submarine detection devices and the very delicate and intricate mechanism of the ship itself should be in training so they can be placed on board and put the ships into active operation as soon as they are completed.

Then may I refer to the statement by the minister in regard to the aircraft carrier Magnificent, in reply to the statement by the hon. member for Nanaimo that the Magnificent is obsolete. The minister does not say the description given by the hon. member for Nanaimo does not apply in any way. What he does say is that she has three or four years of useful life.

Mr. Claxton: If I said that, Mr Chairman, I did not say enough. I should have said "without modification", because the Magnificent and ships like her have many more years than that of useful life, but after modification. I would not like it to be represented that ships of that class are obsolete in three years.

Mr. Drew: Then does the minister agree that they are obsolete without modification?

Mr. Claxton: No; they are adequate for the job for which they were intended, and to handle the aircraft with which they are equipped at the present time. But successive improvements will be made in this class of aircraft, and if we have an aircraft carrier we will make those improvements at the time they should be made.

Mr. Drew: If it were convenient perhaps it might be best if the minister would say whether the Magnificent is in fact in every way up to date by modern standards, and able to deal with submarines.

Mr. Claxton: That is the sort of thing no one can say until submarines are met and dealt with. But I can say that aircraft carriers of her class are being successively and progressively modified. Whether we decide to do that this year or next year remains to be seen, but for the purposes for which the Magnificent is designed she is doing that job today.

Mr. Drew: That answer illustrates the difficulty with which members of this house are confronted. The minister has now informed us that aircraft carriers of this type are being progressively modified, and presumably after modification are capable of undertaking this extremely important work. Nothing the minister has said is in any way a direct reply to the statement by the hon. member for Nanaimo that at present, by modern standards, the Magnificent is not suitable for this service. The minister has said they do not know whether they will do it this year or next year; but we are dealing with one of the greatest emergencies this world has ever known, measured in terms of dollars by the figure of $1,800 million. That is merely the extent of the emergency in terms of dollars and cents, and I suggest that it is not sufficient to be told that perhaps this year or perhaps next year modifications may be made which would give us an aircraft carrier capable of undertaking the active service she was built and designed to perform. I leave that question there, because I am satisfied that the answer given by the minister is the most positive evidence that could be put forward of the unsatisfactory nature of the information before this house in regard to such an important piece of equipment as an aircraft carrier; and so it is with much of the other equipment that has been under discussion.

Then we were told about the training of the brigade, what it cost and what it would have cost if we had trained those men in Canada. I will revert to my earlier remarks about training in Canada only to say this. In addition to those already mentioned there is one reason why we should train our men in Canada. We are still under the necessity of seeking to conserve our dollar resources, and every dollar spent outside the country is an added burden at a time when money is part of the very struggle in which we are engaged. I do not think it amiss, either, to mention the fact, which has been stated officially already, that the cost of training men in the United States is higher that it is in Canada. That is another reason why we should provide for that training in this country.

Now let me refer to our air defences. It is not necessary to raise any question about the plans that have been made, whether forty squadrons will be sufficient in three years. I repeat that the thing we should be concerned about is what we are going to have this year. We have four squadrons now. What are we going to have in this year 1951? What are we going to have during the months that have been described as the most critical in the history of the modern world? As the minister himself has indicated, that question is not going to be answered substantially by our own production lines during the current year. Moreover there is the question whether even now we are taking those steps which should be taken to have trained personnel available when our own production lines are able to meet the demand for the latest type of modern aircraft. I do not think the minister will challenge the statement that one of the very real problems being faced today is that of providing adequate ground crews for the squadrons being trained. Hon. members who have had the opportunity of observing what is being done know that the whole efficiency of an air force rests upon the adequacy of the training of the ground personnel. The most skilled and the most gallant pilots may survive but a very short time, even without any other considerations than the problem of the aircraft itself, unless the men who handle these extremely fast and tremendously powerful machines have had long months, yes and years, of training in the jobs of servicing aircraft of that kind. Right now we should be far ahead of where we really are in the training of the specialists who are needed for the ground crews. If we, in fact, are contemplating a real contribution of forty squadrons at some time within the measurable future, then we should be training skilled ground crews now for those forty squadrons so that when the pilots and air crew needed for those machines go into the air the whole force could be brought into being at one and the same time. Certainly, the methods that are now being followed do not assure the availability of skilled men of that kind. It seems that the members of this house should not be satisfied to pass this, as merely a matter of dollars and cents, without some assurance that the steps that are going to be taken will in fact bring into existence the kind of force that we have been told is being planned.

When I mention specialists for the ground crews, and specialists for the navy, I might include the highly trained personnel required for the armoured forces, the artillery and other army units today. That brings us, then, to one of the subjects mentioned by the Minister of National Defence yesterday. As reported at page 2871 of Hansard, the Minister of National Defence said this:

> It was suggested that we should make an appraisal of our manpower resources. These appraisals especially made for a special purpose can soon become out of date. The dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Labour have continuous appraisals, and I have been told that from most points of view the information they have is adequate for statistical planning with regard to manpower in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I can only take it that the minister was speaking as the Minister of National Defence. If he was speaking of manpower as Minister of National Defence, then I say that it is misleading this house, whether unintentionally or otherwise, to convey the impression that the information in possession of the bureau of statistics or the Department of Labour is adequate for the allocation of manpower to the armed forces of this country. There is not an hon. member in this house who has had any occasion whatever to study the problem of allocating manpower in the armed forces, either in small units or in large, who does not know that there must be a most careful inquiry not only into the skill possessed by the individual but also as to the temperament, physical capacity for certain types of jobs, and the general suitability of the individual for the particular kind of work. Frankly, it is just eyewash, and eyewash of a very dangerous kind, to suggest that the Department of Labour and the bureau of statistics have the kind of information that would be required to allocate manpower for these three great branches of the armed services. Once again, Mr. Chairman, I only comment on this for the purpose of indicating something of the manner in which this important subject is being considered, when I refer to the very silly comments that are being made by some hon. members on the other side during the discussion of this very important subject.

Mr. Ferrie: What about yourself? Why don't you take that back? Why don't you tell Russia we have not got anything?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of informing Russia about the hon. member.

Mr. Ferrie: You have not any intention of telling us anything.

Mr. Drew: If there were anything whatever in the suggestion that these statistics supply the information required, then what was all the hullabaloo about the appointment of the manpower council which we heard only a couple of months ago? Apparently now the Minister of National Defence is going to wait to be told by the advisory committee on manpower whether he should do something about this. Well, the advisory committee on manpower was announced with every effort to create an impression as to its importance. The statements that were made at the time were accepted by the people of Canada as evidence that something definitely was being done to deal with this subject. Just as an example to illustrate how it was accepted in different parts of the country, let me read what was said by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of February 7, three months ago:

> The national advisory council on manpower, just announced by the Minister of Labour, will have serious tasks of allocation of such power on its agenda before long. Its work will have to be carefully integrated with that of the ministry of defence.

And so the comments went right across the country. This committee was to be for the purpose of examining manpower, and to make provision for its allocation. That was the impression given, and that was the impression which it was intended the people should have. Now this advisory council on manpower is apparently regarded as something unnecessary, if we are to take the statement of the Minister of National Defence yesterday. If his statement is to be taken literally, then all the information that we require from time to time is available from these other sources. But, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence said that statistics can very soon become outdated. Statistics will always become outdated if you do not get them in the first place, and that is exactly the situation. They are not going to be outdated if we do not even have them. At the moment, no attempt has been made to provide the basic information on which this government can carry out any part of those plans which have been placed before this house.

We received what was called a white paper just before the minister made his statement. It was called a white paper, but it has very properly been said in responsible references to it that it could be called a green paper, a yellow paper or a red paper or anything else, and it would mean the same thing. It is nothing but a collection of statements made publicly from time to time before they were brought into this form. Any suggestion that this so-called white paper constitutes a presentation of a new set of facts for consideration by this house has been properly described, in a number of responsible publications, as a fraud upon the people of Canada. It is nothing but an attempt to put in digested form the statements we have already been given.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one of the things that must surely be clear now is that if there were some method by which the members of this house were sure that what was happening was under constant supervision, then we would not suddenly discover these things indirectly as we do at the present time. If, for instance, there had been some device by which responsible members of all parties had continuing access to information in the House of Commons and outside, then, having regard to the statement by the Minister of National Defence that Canada had decided to standardize its equipment two years ago, the members of this committee would have known long ago that the decision had not in fact been implemented at any time. We would not suddenly have discovered two years later that the decision, if it was made, at any rate had not actually been carried into operative effect. The members of this committee would also have known that we were not able to train some of our units. They would know something about the equipment that we have available in this country. They would know something about the adequacy of our training facilities to which reference has been made.

In the light of the contradictions to which I have referred, in the face of the very kind of answer given by the Minister of National Defence with regard to the Magnificent, I repeat once again, in spite of the statement already made by the Minister of National Defence, that the security of this country and the fulfilment of the obligation of parliament demand the setting up without any further delay of a select committee on national defence. Why is the government resisting this reasonable proposal?

Not one reason given by the government for not setting up such a committee holds water. On an earlier occasion the Minister of National Defence said that it would be taking from the government its responsibility for policy.

An hon. Member: That is where I came in in 1949.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think I shall refer to the remark just made by one of the Liberal members: That is where I came in in 1949. I am glad to hear that flippant remark, which indicates exactly how much that member has learned since he came in in 1949, or how much he wants to learn. That hon. member has been here since 1949, and apparently he is just as satisfied now as he was then simply to cast his ballot and to hope that everything will be all right.

An hon. Member: You could not make a better statement.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: That is the best thing you have said tonight.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman; I think one of the most useful things that could happen would be if the people of Canada were able to listen over the radio to the applause of Liberal members for a statement of that kind. I only regret that we have not yet television in Canada, so that the people of Canada could see an imitation of trained seals such as we are seeing in this committee at the present time. The only difference, of course, is that trained seals usually have an intelligent look upon their faces.

An hon. Member: You are getting red around the neck now.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: You would look beautiful.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is just exactly as the hon. member said; and I am referring to the last one.

Mr. Chairman, we are discussing survival, and we hear these asinine remarks from Liberal members in regard to things of this kind. We are discussing at this time an item of over $1,400 million and we hear nothing but maudlin nonsense from many of the Liberal members who are supposed to be representing the Canadian people at a time like this.

An hon. Member: The people have put the administration of their affairs in good hands, though.

Mr. Drew: It is at least reassuring, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: We have to listen to this; we might as well participate.

Mr. Drew: —to know that some of the members are actually alive; because the only time that we hear from some of them is when they make noises such as they are making at the moment.

An hon. Member: That was a profound remark.

Mr. Ferrie: When they have something to say, they say it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising that the Minister of National Defence finds so little reason to be concerned about the information that he gives to the House of Commons when he has a demonstration of this kind, indicating that no matter how little information the committee gets, the Liberal members will act as rubber stamps just the same, and he can get their support.

An hon. Member: Get on with defence. Let us hear about that. Say some more.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: We cannot stop him.

Mr. Drew: That is another profound remark, "we cannot stop him", also from one of the Liberal members. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that you cannot stop me from saying what I intend to say with regard to this extremely important subject.

Mr. Sinclair: You go on like Tennyson's brook.

Mr. Drew: I have already said to the Minister of National Defence—I agree that this has been said since 1949; and it was said before that—that the members of the House of Commons should have the assurance of continuing access, through a select committee, to information as to how the defence preparations of this country are proceeding. On one occasion the Minister of National Defence made the statement that the reason for not appointing such a committee was that it would take from the government the responsibility for policy which is theirs. No suggestion at any time has been made that the responsibility of the government for policy should be in any way limited or abridged. What has been urged—and it has been urged over and over again—is that a select committee on national defence be set up in exactly the same way that a committee is set up to deal with external affairs, so that the members of the house may have an opportunity of discussing these matters in detail and finding out what the facts are.

Mr. Fulton: As with the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Drew: Committees are also set up to deal with such matters as the Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines and other public operations of that kind. Why should the Department of National Defence alone not be susceptible to the ordinary supervision of a committee, just as are these other extremely important departments? Surely the Department of External Affairs deals with just as secret material as does the Department of National Defence; and yet the Department of External Affairs is at this very time seeking the approval of a motion to refer to a committee the examination of their own accounts. The Minister of National Defence heard the very excellent speech made by the hon. member for Quebec South. That speech, made by the dean of the House of Commons, illustrated what is thought by hon. members with long years of experience as to the necessity for bringing back under parliament itself effective control over the most important subjects that are being considered by this body.

If such a committee were set up, it should be set up as a continuing committee, authorized to sit not only when the house is in session but when the session has prorogued. Members from every party with special knowledge of these subjects could be appointed, and I feel sure, Mr. Chairman, that if such a committee were meeting, were supervising the details of national defence, hon. members would be satisfied in almost every case with their reports without any further consideration of the detail beyond that which had already taken place. That is what we find happens when other committees are set up to deal with extremely important but involved details of government business.

I am not certain that the government has yet advanced to the point of parliamentary maturity that it would follow Westminster to the extent of appointing as chairman the man who is obviously best qualified. But this house is in the fortunate position of having as a possible chairman of that committee a man with unique experience, the hon. member for Nanaimo, who could sit as the chairman of this committee with experience such as no other member of this house possesses. But whether the government was prepared to appoint a member of the opposition as chairman, or insisted upon a member of their own party as chairman, would not in any way lessen the opportunity to have a real examination of all these details by a committee that could sit down in an orderly way and proceed to deal with the thing in a businesslike manner, if men like the hon. member for Nanaimo and other experienced veterans in this house were sitting on such a committee and asking the questions and obtaining the information which could be obtained.

In the closing part of his remarks the Minister of National Defence did say that he wanted these accounts examined in detail. These accounts cannot be examined in detail in this house unless the Minister of National Defence will take a preliminary step. That preliminary step would be to prepare a detailed statement of every one of these items which are now called details. This afternoon I referred to some of the so-called details. I just gave as one example not the general item but the detail: "Major procurement of equipment, $406,167,927." Even with a pencil and paper, if the minister were prepared to go through every detail that made it up, hon. members could not possibly follow it in an orderly way sitting in this house and obtaining it by question and answer; but there is one simple and obvious way to do it. The Minister of National Defence I am perfectly sure has, in the mass of material in these two great black boxes that he has beside him, fairly substantial detail in regard to these items. If a committee were meeting and dealing with these subjects then that committee would be entitled to have a statement of these various real details that go to make up that total.

Do not let us be misled by any suggestion that contained in that total are pieces of secret equipment. There is not a single hon. member in this house who would not be prepared at any time to take a reasonable explanation that some particular thing was really secret. Hon. members would soon be able to determine whether it was secret or not. But the broad answer that it is not in the public interest, which has been given so often in this house, is altogether too often simply a statement that the government does not think it is in the public interest for hon. members and the people of Canada to know how far they have failed to carry out the assurances they have given the public on earlier occasions.

The Minister of National Defence does not leave the members of this house with any real opportunity to go into detail by simply confronting us with a huge item like that, an item that is more than the total budget of this country for all purposes only a few years ago, and then say: You ask the questions and I will give the details. The Minister of National Defence knows how it would be done in any businesslike examination. Set the things out in detail. If there are subjects that should not be disclosed let them be so indicated, but the total given, and then hon. members will be able to discuss those with some knowledge of what the facts really are.

I come back to the fact that when, according to the statements made by the government, inflation and the defence of the country go hand in hand as the two greatest problems we face, then the time has come to be sure that we have something more than guesswork in regard to all this, to be sure that we have the real facts. And once again with all earnestness I urge the minister to reconsider the position that he has taken and to agree to setting up a committee, and to adjourn the consideration of these items, as will be done in the case of the Department of External Affairs, and refer all these items to such a committee of the house.

Mr. Pouliot: I have listened with great interest to the eloquent speech of the leader of the opposition. His conclusion was for the establishment of a select committee on national defence. I am for it, and I will surprise the hon. gentleman when I tell him that we have it already. This is a committee of the house, and this is a committee on national defence, and when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition speaks it cannot be otherwise. This is a select standing committee of the house. Still, Mr. Chairman, there is more to it.

I listened to the hon. gentleman before dinner. I was moved by his speech. Then I had to eat a little to get some strength to listen to the continuation of his speech. I was wide awake. I did not miss a word. He spoke very well, but he complained that he had not received detailed information with regard to an item in the estimates.

Mr. Fulton: Any item in the estimates.

Mr. Pouliot: I would remind the hon. gentleman of one thing. He made a statement, but did not ask a question. The minister could not guess what his question would be. He asked no questions; he made a statement. That is not detailed enough. I am sure that if he had asked the minister for further information he would have got it.

Mr. Drew: I have.

Mr. Pouliot: No, no.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, yes.

Mr. Pouliot: I heard the hon. gentleman complaining of the fact that it was not detailed enough.

Mr. Fraser: It is not.

Mr. Pouliot: I did not hear him ask any questions of the minister. I am sure that the minister, who is familiar with the constitutional and parliamentary practice, just as is the hon. gentleman, would give him any possible information about expenditures. That is why I am all in favour of a committee like this one to discuss national defence, as a matter of expenditures and as a matter of dollars and cents. But when it comes to a matter of strategy, when it comes to the national defence, proper, of this country, I do not see why it should be discussed in public.

To my mind the treatment of General Marshall at the hands of a committee of congress is disgraceful. Here is this man—

Mr. Fulton: So also was the treatment of General MacArthur.

Mr. Pouliot: I will ask Kamloops to keep quiet until I look after him.

Mr. Fulton: Talk sense and I will keep quiet.

Mr. Pouliot: And he shall not remind me that he is in the house at the present time, because I will think of him in due course.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: I am glad my hon. friend says hear, hear; it shows he is improving. I am speaking in reply to what his leader has said.

Mr. Fulton: You are not doing a very good job of it.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, if that is the judgment of a Tory, I am satisfied.

Mr. Fulton: You always did have a single-track mind.

An hon. Member: Better than two tracks going in different directions.

Mr. Pouliot: I may have a single-track mind; but I am on the main line, while my hon. friend is on a siding—with dead-freight cars.

Mr. Fulton: The Temiscouata railway has been the main line ever since the C.N.R. took it over.

Mr. Pouliot: The Temiscouata railway is the best railway in America, compared to my hon. friend himself.

I will not be personal, because I like the hon. member for Kamloops—but I also like my peace, too, especially when I am speaking about the remarks made by the leader of the opposition. I want him to understand my point of view, and I am sure he will.

Let me take this opportunity to congratulate him and to tell him what progress he has made in politics since he has been a member of the House of Commons—and I say that sincerely, and with respect and esteem.

Coming to the discussion of the matter before the committee, I would stress to the hon. member the fact that it is the function of this committee to check expenditures; it is not to go deep into the strategy of the Department of National Defence and its staff. This, sir, I contend should be secret policy that must not be advertised, as is American strategy, which is published in every American newspaper, and broadcast over all radio stations throughout the world. That cannot help in the defence of the great country that is the United States of America. So much is this true that our great neighbour could be spied upon from the Antipodes precisely because of the fact that the news items the leader of the opposition is so eager to get publicly may be the best information to any possible enemy.

This is so much the case that I remember very well the time when conscription was discussed in the house, immediately after the resignation of the late Colonel Ralston, the then minister of national defence, who said there were weak points in the allied army in France, and insisted so much on that that the information was given to the German command, with the result that they rallied all their forces for a supreme attack in northern France, an attack which cost countless lives of American and Canadian soldiers.

The hon. member who is leader of the opposition, and the hon. member who is chief opposition critic, both of whom are men of military experience, must be aware of that fact. Perhaps they have never thought of it, perhaps they have never put the two ends together; but they must remember what was said by the former minister of national defence, and the statements that were broadcast by the press and by all the Tory speakers. Those statements were put on the wires of the news agencies and spread throughout the world. They were known to the spies we had in the country and to the intelligence service of the enemy. They could draw conclusions.

It must be remembered that it is precisely on account of the untimely and uncalled for statements of that former minister of national defence in the house about the weaknesses of our army that the American soldiers and Canadian soldiers were killed in such numbers in the last days of the war.

Mr. Pearkes: Who was that minister?

Mr. Pouliot: I am speaking of the former minister of national defence, Colonel Ralston.

Mr. Pearkes: Oh.

Mr. Pouliot: Just after his resignation.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but is he referring to the attack that was known as the Battle of the Bulge, which was directed against American troops? I must confess I find it difficult to understand how that is related to any statement made by the late Colonel Ralston.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, I will explain it by the A-plus-B method to the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: That will be simpler than anything you have done before.

Mr. Pouliot: And I am sure he will understand. The hon. member, who is an encyclopaedia of bellicose warfare, and who knows everything about the three branches of the armed services, must remember that Colonel Ralston complained of the fact that conscription had not already been imposed for overseas service when reinforcements were badly needed on the allied front. Does he remember that? Does he not remember that was precisely the reason given by Colonel Ralston for his resignation? The hon. member was not in the house at the time. It is a very serious question. My hon. friend probably said the same thing as Colonel Ralston, but the point is that the reason alleged by Colonel Ralston for his resignation was the fact that reinforcements were badly needed on our front in France. The hon. member cannot deny that.

Although the hon. member for Nanaimo was then in the army, he had time to read the evening paper when he was on the coast, and I am sure he remembers this statement too. It was the very statement of a man who occupied a prominent position in the government that was the inspiration for the German command to make a supreme attack against the allied forces on the front. This is history.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member is talking nonsense, and he knows it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, just so that we may all have the privilege of reading this extremely interesting history, will the hon. member direct us to the place where that history may be read?

Mr. Pouliot: It can be read in Hansard. Hansard is this publication where we find the illuminating speeches of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: I did not know the speeches of the German command were recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Drew: I was referring to the decision of the German higher command to attack. Many of us are interested in this subject. I was under the impression that the record indicated this was one of the cases where Hitler had given direct instructions to his field commander. I for one should like to know where this contrary history is to be found.

Mr. Fulton: In the mind of the hon. member for Temiscouata and nowhere else.

Mr. Pouliot: Quack, quack, quack.

Mr. Fulton: That is just what you sound like.

Mr. Pouliot: I never had such a distinguished pupil as the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Fulton: No one ever had a more inept teacher.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Pouliot: I will explain to the leader of the opposition how history can be studied and understood by relating cause and effect. At that time the war in France was at a standstill. The Germans were not moving. Only two weeks after the ill-fated statement made by a former cabinet minister, two weeks during which the enemy organized, the attack took place which resulted in the death of countless men. I will tell the hon. gentleman that if he uses his intelligence to understand the relation existing between cause and effect he will not ask any more questions about these matters, and he will agree with me just as the hon. member for Kamloops must now do. To summarize what I have said—

An hon. Member: That will be a job.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Some undertaking.

Mr. Pouliot: It is a very simple thing. To summarize what I have said, I am satisfied with this committee. We are proceeding in the normal way to discuss expenditure. We are discussing the length of life of the Magnificent. When I utter that word I could apply it to the speeches of my hon. friend but I am speaking of the man-of-war. We are speaking of the rejuvenation of the Magnificent, of arms, ammunition, boats, aeroplanes, et cetera. My hon. friend wants some information. The Minister of National Defence has done something that should have satisfied him entirely if he had taken advantage of the invitations sent to him by the minister. Never before to my knowledge—and I am not one of those younger members of parliament for whom the hon. gentleman had contemptuous words—have I seen a minister invite members of parliament to visit munition plants, aeroplane factories, defence outposts such as Churchill, and so on, to see exactly how the money has been spent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: Instead of asking sempiternal questions in a select committee as was done unsuccessfully but at leisure last year in the railways and shipping committee with reference to the North Star, instead of wasting time answering silly questions—and the word "silly" is not mine; I learned it tonight—the minister has invited the leader of the opposition and other hon. members of the house to see with their own eyes what has been done.

Mr. Fraser: Colonel Ralston did the same thing. He told members they could go to the different plants if they wanted to. He said he would give them an invitation to go there.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, but he gave that invitation just before he gave his resignation.

Mr. Fraser: His resignation was forced upon him.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, now that I have established the fact I intended to establish, I shall not discuss it further. I have no grudge against a dead man. The only thing I wanted to indicate to the hon. gentleman, who is the great leader of a great party, is that when he indulges in suggestions like those he has made it is very dangerous, because it is informative to the enemy. In my opinion everything concerning strategy should be kept secret; and if the government has not the confidence of the house the only thing to do is vote against it. A distinction should be established between expenditure and strategy. I am sure the hon. member for Nanaimo will agree with me.

Mr. Pearkes: I will tell you whether I agree.

Mr. Pouliot: I do not want to force an agreement upon him; but I like him—

Mr. Knowles: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to get into the argument but out of fairness to the name of Colonel Ralston, which has been mentioned, may I say just now I looked in my pocket and found that I still have the parliamentary identification card and pass which was issued to me by the defence department, and it was dated April 9, 1943. That was at least a year and a half before the date of Colonel Ralston's resignation. We were advised that we could secure these passes and make the visits that were suggested. I am sure the hon. member would like to be fair to Colonel Ralston, and have it confirmed that these invitations were issued some time before his resignation, while he was minister of the department.

Mr. Pouliot: I had a similar card signed by Commissioner Wood of the mounted police, but I never had that invitation. If my hon. friend was invited it was probably because he was in the opposition. The members on the government side had no such invitation.

Mr. Fraser: Yes; it was given personally in the house.

Mr. Pouliot: I tell Peterborough to keep quiet. I am not going to discuss it further, but I stand by what I have said.

Mr. Fraser: You want the truth?

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, no; I referred to it only incidentally, and I will stand by what I have said concerning the statement on the necessity of reinforcements for our troops in France and the blunder it was to make that statement. It was an error of judgment that cost the lives of many good soldiers.

Mr. Harkness: How do you know?

Mr. Ross (Souris): He does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell Souris to be as quiet as a mouse.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member when referring to another hon. member to refer to him as the hon. member for Souris, or the hon. member for Kamloops, or whatever it may be.

Mr. Pouliot: I will call them right honourable. I have never put their honesty in doubt. We differ, that is all.

An hon. Member: There is a difference between a mouse and a rat.

Mr. Pouliot: I would ask my hon. friend who benefited from the operation of the nickel company in Norway during the war to keep quiet. He was so happy that those plants were making money in occupied Norway at that time.

Mr. Fulton: Better stick to something you know something about.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell the babe, who is not Babe Ruth, to keep quiet. It is so easy to arouse the feelings of hon. gentlemen. If we had some cards from the commissioner of the R.C.M.P., I never had any invitation to visit a munition plant during the last war. There is another thing I want to tell the hon. gentleman in all fairness. Apparently he is opposed to an advisory committee or council on manpower. I am opposed to it too, though probably not for the same reasons. With all the information already at the disposal of the Department of Labour and the Department of National Defence I do not see the need of any advisory council on manpower, and in this I agree with him.

There is more to it than that. I will tell the hon. member what are my credentials, what is my power of attorney to discuss these matters in the house. They are a resolution from the county council of Riviere du Loup, another one from the county council of Temiscouata, and another from the city council of Riviere du Loup, all approving the stand I took during the last war and encouraging me to continue to defend the right of the farmer, the man in overalls, the miner, the railwayman and all those occupied in essential industry to the respect of their fellow citizens, to be recognized as essential in war industry and not to be treated as slackers and zombies. I remember that during the last war, with some of my colleagues, I had the painful duty of explaining to the government the importance of the work of farmers, railwaymen, miners, makers of uniforms, arms, ammunition and so on.

Mr. Fulton: And the Temiscouata railway.

Mr. Pouliot: I have compassion for the hon. member, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fulton: I am grateful for it.

Mr. Pouliot: I discuss a matter which is vital to farmers, miners and those engaged in essential work, and an hon. member of the opposition speaks platitudes when I discuss that matter seriously. I am very sorry for him. In one sense he is fortunate, in that his constituents are not in the gallery here to judge his performance as it deserves to be judged.

Mr. Fulton: They are fortunate, because they would have to listen to you for an hour and a half.

Mr. Pouliot: My speeches are reported in full in the local newspaper, and there is not a man or woman in my county who ignores what I say. They approve it, too.

Mr. Fulton: They do not know anything better.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have been told to have pity, to be full of compassion, and I am. There are occasions when one has a duty to defend men who are doing a great service, such as the farmers, the miners, the railwaymen and many others. If all those men were brought into the army what would be the result? The result would be that there would be no transportation system; there would be no munitions and no arms available; the soldiers would not have the uniforms that they need; they would not be fed, and so on.

Now, sir, I am very glad that we do not hear very much about the advisory council on manpower. I am a supporter of the government, and I hope—

Mr. Harkness: God knows why you are a supporter of the government.

Mr. Pouliot: Because it is a good government.

Mr. Harkness: I am beginning to lose confidence in your judgment.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, my hon. friend could not say that to the hon. member for Nanaimo, who has shown that he is broadminded and recognizes the merit of the government in doing things that are sensible, especially with regard to manpower and with regard to the defence of this country. The leader of the opposition knows very well that what we need for our defence in this country is mobile units. Naturally, the R.C.A.F. is the best weapon for our defence. He will not deny it.

Now, sir, I regret that I have spoken at such length.

Some hon. Members: So do we.

Mr. Pouliot: I understand it. I have one thing to say in conclusion, and you will be surprised, sir, to hear me congratulate the opposition on their stand since the beginning of the war. When I say that, I refer to all the groups forming the opposition. During the last war—I would say with the exception of the hon. member for Peel when he was leader of the opposition—the fanaticism that existed in the Conservative ranks was something beyond words. I remember very well the hon. member who was leader of the opposition before the hon. member for Peel was so fanatic—he was praising the members of the government and handing them bouquets—that I had to compare him to Ferdinand the bull with a daisy in his mouth for each one of the cabinet ministers. He did not know that Ferdinand the bull was one of Disney's characters, and he was mad about it. He wanted me to withdraw, and I told him that I would withdraw everything except the bull.

Mr. Fulton: That is about your level.

An hon. Member: This is history.

Mr. Harkness: So said the bull calf.

Mr. Fulton: When you have withdrawn everything, that is all that is left, the bull.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not accustomed to understanding the language of the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: No, only when you are using it.

Mr. Pouliot: I am surprised that a gentleman of his refinement used language like that. I find it more pitiful than ever. Notwithstanding what has been said, I do want to compliment the opposition on the progress that they have made since the last war. It may be due in large measure to the great leadership of the hon. leader of the opposition. I say that very seriously. I know that in his party there are some active elements that he has to control. He has done it with tact, and I sincerely congratulate him. To show that I have no prejudice, I sympathize with him. I remember all the bellicose gentlemen who were going to war all the time, and who wanted some more information about strategy to inform the enemy. This must end. I am sure that if any hon. gentleman of the opposition is worried about some aspect of national defence, he will only have to speak—

Mr. Harkness: We are worried about all of it.

Mr. Pouliot: My hon. friend is worried about himself, that is the worst of it. But as he is worried about himself, he may improve in due course. I will say to the hon. gentlemen that whenever they want some information about secret matters concerning defence they will only have to go to the Minister of National Defence, and I am sure that he will trust them and give them the information they want.

Now, sir, I have spoken long enough. If I have said something that was not exactly pleasant, if I have not a flower in my mouth for every member of the opposition as Ferdinand the bull had, I regret it very much. I had to make two points. The first is that it is extremely dangerous to talk publicly about national defence strategy in the House of Commons, either in the house or before a committee. In the second place, all members of the House of Commons should bow before the man in overalls who is the friend of the soldier, the airman and the sailor.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Lethbridge. The hon. member for Nanaimo will agree that since there are other parties in this house, and that I am informed no member of the Social Credit party has spoken so far, I will give the floor to the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I would just draw to your attention the fact that this afternoon, after the Minister of National Defence had spoken, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano and I rose. The chairman saw the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, another member on the government side and a parliamentary assistant.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Fulton: Shame, yes; it is a shame.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will realize that if he wanted to raise that incident as a point of order, it should have been raised this afternoon.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, I did not want to raise a point of order; I just wanted to keep the record straight.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I always like to see a man who has served his country well receive credit for that service. I had the privilege of sitting in the house during world war II, and I had the privilege also of having a good deal of almost confidential relations with the late Mr. Ralston who was the minister of national defence. I should like to say here that, being a member of the opposition, I would have no ulterior reason for supporting the government or supporting Mr. Ralston, but in my judgment Colonel Ralston was largely responsible for the military success which Canada enjoyed during world war II. The hon. member for Temiscouata is quite justified in having his own personal opinions. He has expressed them. I do not question his sincerity. I now wish to say that in my judgment the attack which the hon. member referred to was not a result of any remark which Colonel Ralston made.

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, may I say that it was not an attack at all. It was just a reminiscence of public statements made in the house.

Mr. Blackmore: I fear that I did not make my meaning quite clear to the hon. member for Temiscouata. I was referring to the attack of the Germans upon the allies, which resulted in a great number of deaths. I do not believe that that attack was in any way a result of the remarks of Colonel Ralston.

I think it is only fair to the country and to Colonel Ralston to make this statement, namely, that Colonel Ralston conducted the Department of National Defence in Canada during world war II under conditions of extreme difficulty. He was confronted on every hand with the almost impossible problem of getting sufficient men into the army under the right categories to enable him to reinforce the men he sent across to Europe. That was a result of the altogether uncertain attitude which was assumed by various members in the house with respect to conscription for military service. It is only fair to Colonel Ralston that that fact be known; and the statements which Colonel Ralston made had something to do with that problem also. Probably that is the thing that caused him to be released from his position.

But certainly—and let me repeat it—this country owes Colonel Ralston a debt of gratitude not only for the gallant service he rendered in world war I but also for the splendid work he did as minister of national defence in Canada during world war II.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, by ancient custom the seating arrangement in this chamber follows that in effect in the House of Commons at Westminster, the mother of parliaments, in which on your right are aligned the supporters of the government of the day and on your left are aligned members of the opposition. It so happens that in this particular house the majority of the government supporters is so large that they overflow the seats which are available on your right and take over a portion of the seats on your left. But the fact remains that members of parliament of the various parties face each other. In many other assemblies there is a semi-circular seating arrangement, which undoubtedly enables the chairman to maintain greater control over the various members who may speak from time to time. No doubt there are advantages in both systems.

Under our arrangement, those who are seated opposite to the government must of necessity see some of the movements that are carried out between members of the government. Seated here opposite the government benches, although perhaps my head may have been lowered by the realization that we are a small minority, I could not help seeing movements which were carried out on the other side of the house about an hour ago. I could not help seeing the Minister of National Defence rise from his seat, walk over to the hon. member for Temiscouata and ask him to provide some comic relief—

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, —

Mr. Pearkes: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Claxton: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. There is not a word of truth in what the hon. gentleman says; and I ask the hon. member for Temiscouata to confirm what I have said. I also think that this is a most improper remark to be made by one member about another.

An hon. Member: Not at all.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister certainly was improper.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, and I will say that the Minister of National Defence did not say a word to me of that kind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pouliot: I asked him a question.

An hon. Member: What did he go over there for?

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell you what question I asked him. I asked him if the leader of the opposition had asked him a question about the detail of the item in the estimates, and he said no. I did not say a word besides that to the Minister of National Defence from the time the sitting commenced at eight o'clock tonight. I protest strongly against the unwarranted, untimely, uncalled for and untrue statement of the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. Pearkes: Of course it is quite impossible for me, Mr. Chairman, to know what the conversation was.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Claxton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Two hon. members cannot be on their feet at the same time. When the chairman rises, hon. members must resume their seats. The hon. member for Nanaimo has made a statement. If I recall it correctly, it was that he had seen the Minister of National Defence go over, talk to the hon. member for Temiscouata, and ask him "to provide comic relief".

Mr. Pouliot: A shameful suggestion.

The Deputy Chairman: The Minister of National Defence rose to a question of privilege, said that the statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo was untrue, and asked the hon. member for Temiscouata to confirm what he had said. The hon. member for Temiscouata rose on a question of privilege and also said that the statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo was not correct. In the circumstances, I think there is a simple way of putting an end to the discussion of this point of privilege, that is to follow the practice and the rule of procedure in this chamber and accept the statement made by the Minister of National Defence and the statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I would expect the hon. member for Nanaimo to do precisely that.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to admit that it was quite impossible for me to hear what the conversation was.

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Drew: Sit down.

Mr. Claxton: I rise to a question of privilege, and I ask that the hon. gentleman be asked—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Claxton: —be ordered to withdraw his statement.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I admit quite frankly it was impossible for me to hear what the Minister of National Defence said to the hon. member for Temiscouata. I drew conclusions. If these conclusions are wrong I frankly withdraw the statement which I made, in which I accused the Minister of National Defence of having asked the hon. member for Temiscouata to provide the comic relief; but the fact remains that the Minister of National Defence did walk over to and did have conversation with the hon. member for Temiscouata, and the hon. member for Temiscouata did provide the comic relief at that time.

Mr. Claxton: On a question of order, the hon. member for Nanaimo suggested that I, as a member of parliament and a member of the government, approached the hon. member for Temiscouata, than whom there is no less approachable member in the house, and asked him to co-ordinate our activities in order that we might provide some comic relief.

Mr. Pearkes: I did not say that.

Mr. Claxton: That is what he suggested. Now he has withdrawn that suggestion. He said that his conclusions were drawn from the circumstances. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Nanaimo make an unequivocal withdrawal and apology.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. Pearkes: I have only stated the facts, and I do repeat those facts: The Minister of National Defence did move across and did speak to the hon. member for Temiscouata. I have no knowledge of what he said. The hon. member for Temiscouata then came up and spoke to you, Mr. Chairman, and returned to his seat, and he was seen by you next. The hon. member for Temiscouata did provide the comic relief to this very serious discussion which was going on.

Mr. Adamson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearkes: I fail—

Mr. Claxton: I think the situation is much more serious than that. The hon. member for Nanaimo, for whom I ordinarily have the greatest respect, has brought forward a suggestion that I proposed to the hon. member for Temiscouata that he should do something or other, and that he did it. I deny it absolutely.

Mr. Fulton: All right; you are entitled to do that.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for Temiscouata has denied it absolutely. There is no warrant at all for the assumption which has now been repeated three times by the hon. member for Nanaimo, and he should make an unequivocal withdrawal of the whole thing.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I have been stating only the actual facts which happened as I saw them, sitting over here. The Minister of National Defence moved across to the seat of the hon. member for Temiscouata. I have no idea at all what he said. I did assume—

Mr. Pouliot: I rise to a question of privilege—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: —if you will permit me. The hon. member for Nanaimo has made a statement in the first place which was untrue.

Mr. Claxton: Wholly.

Mr. Pouliot: The Minister of National Defence rose on a question of privilege to deny it, and I did likewise. The hon. member for Nanaimo then withdrew what he had said. After that was done he rose again to make a second insinuation, and this other statement is just as untrue as the first one. The two statements were untrue. They were to the effect that the Minister of National Defence had suggested to me to speak on this matter, and in the second place that the Minister of National Defence had come to me to speak to me before going to the back benches outside the chamber.

I will tell you, sir, that when I went to the chair it was to ask the chairman who was going to speak after the leader of the opposition. He said: "No one". I said: "Will you please see me after he sits down?" Then on my way back the minister did not say a word to me, but I spoke to him and I said: "I will speak to the leader of the opposition about the advisory council on manpower". That was all.

In the second place, as I said before, I asked for information, and in order to convey that information to the house afterwards I asked the Minister of National Defence as aforesaid if the leader of the opposition had asked him for detailed information about an item in the estimates. He did not say a word to me, just shook his head in a negative gesture. That was all.

Mr. Fraser: He spoke.

Mr. Pouliot: He did not say a word, and afterwards I was speaking, and I was looking in front of me and I did not notice when the minister left his seat to go. He did not say a word to me. I know the hon. member for Nanaimo to be a gentleman and I hope that he will withdraw unequivocally what he has said.

Mr. Adamson: He has nothing to withdraw.

Mr. Pouliot: And which is completely contrary to the truth.

Mr. Adamson: Nothing to withdraw.

Mr. Pearkes: I honestly do not know how much farther I can go.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member permit me to help him?

Mr. Pearkes: Certainly, I will be glad to.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has accepted the statements made by the Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Temiscouata as to the incorrect conclusions he had reached on having seen the Minister of National Defence going to talk to the hon. member for Temiscouata. He has withdrawn the objectionable words but immediately after withdrawing them he added something else. In his words there was an implication. Notwithstanding the fact that he was withdrawing the positive remarks that he had made he said the fact remained that the Minister of National Defence went to talk to the hon. member for Temiscouata, and the hon. member for Temiscouata came to speak to the chairman, and so on. From that there might be left the impression that the hon. member for Nanaimo was withdrawing the words at which the Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Temiscouata took offence, but nevertheless what he had said previously might still remain in his mind to be true.

Mr. Fulton: He is entitled to that.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Of course the point is difficult to judge. When the hon. member for Nanaimo says, here are the facts, and then links his statement of facts with the words previously withdrawn and says, notwithstanding . . . there may be something in the declarations made about which the hon. member has a right to complain. I know that the hon. member for Nanaimo, if he withdraws, does not want to withdraw and then leave the implication that what he has withdrawn still stands. I will read to him citation 240 of Beauchesne, third edition, which appears at page 103:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian commons that a statement by an hon. member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary to temperately criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible.

In this instance it is easy to dispose of the question of privilege. I know that the hon. member will not want to leave any implication that whatever he withdrew before still stands.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I have already stated that I could not hear what the minister said; and when the minister told me that he had not made any remarks I withdrew my statement, and I withdrew it without any question whatever. I then described certain scenes which we all witnessed in the house, and I do not wish to refer again to those matters because all hon. members in the chamber saw what happened. Perhaps I might be criticized for saying that the hon. member for Temiscouata provided a certain element of comic relief. I do not know—if that word is not acceptable, I am not going to press it.

But then I do come to a point which affects me somewhat personally. Reference was made to a former minister of national defence. He was a minister of national defence of whom I have a very close recollection, not as a member of the House of Commons, but as one of the officers who served under the minister of national defence. I frankly admit that on many occasions my views did not coincide with his. But I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I have a very vivid memory of an occasion when he visited the division I was commanding in England, and had to be wheeled around in a chair because he was incapable of walking. In spite of great physical pain he went to visit the troops of my division, and spoke words of encouragement to them.

The memory of that man's name is hallowed in my recollection, and I regard the late Colonel J. L. Ralston, who was then minister of national defence, as one of the great Canadians in our history.

As a Canadian, I feel somewhat humiliated in having to sit here tonight and listen to a vicious attack made upon a man whose memory I cherish, although on many occasions I did not see eye to eye with him in some of the judgments he made.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pearkes: I want to say that.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise to a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise to a question of privilege.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is rising to a question of privilege.

Mr. Pearkes: I have no desire to discuss that point any further.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pearkes: There is one thing I should like to say—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Nanaimo will understand that when another hon. member rises to a question of privilege, it must be taken up immediately.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I cannot thank you, but I appreciate the fact that you want the rules of the house to be observed.

An hon. Member: More than you do.

Mr. Pouliot: And by all members. I regret the words which have been just uttered by the hon. member for Nanaimo, when he says that a statement made publicly in the House of Commons, and without any personal comment, was a vicious attack—

An hon. Member: What was it?

Mr. Pouliot: —on a former cabinet minister.

An hon. Member: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Pouliot: It is a question of privilege, surely, because I made no vicious attack against the memory of Colonel Ralston. I just mentioned a statement which is a public statement, and is recorded in Hansard, and I drew my conclusions from it. There was no personal word added to it, and there was no vicious attack against the late Colonel Ralston. I submit that under the circumstances the hon. member for Nanaimo should withdraw the expression "vicious attack".

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege; I am sure the house is glad to hear the withdrawal of the hon. member for Temiscouata with regard to this matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Temiscouata has risen to a question of privilege and has asked the hon. member for Nanaimo to modify the expression "vicious attack". Before the hon. member for Nanaimo replies or explains the expression he used, I would refer the committee to citation 298 in Beauchesne, second edition, page 97, which says:

> The following expressions have been ruled to be unparliamentary in the British House of Commons:
> Alleging that a member's statements were—

And then there is a list of some twenty expressions, one of which is "vicious and vulgar". Then above there is the expression "a malignant attack"; and I would consider the words "malignant" and "vicious" to be somewhat similar in meaning. I would ask the hon. member to consider this citation.

Mr. Pearkes: If the word "vicious" is considered unparliamentary, I should like to qualify it. Would it be proper to say "unwarranted attack"? I am not trying to be provocative. But an attack was made on the late Colonel Ralston, and he was charged with the responsibility for the loss of Canadian lives. That cannot easily be passed over. As an officer who served under the late minister of national defence I could not help resenting that remark.

Now, I do not want to prolong this argument; it was never my intention to do so. The observation has been made that the opposition has not been able to make an effective criticism of the statements made by the government in connection with these defence estimates. The hon. member for Parkdale accused the opposition of not working on these things. I never heard any member of the government suggest before what an opposition should do in criticizing government policy—although they have quite frequently asked the opposition what they would do if they were in office.

However, those are not the main points. What I was rising to do was to make the suggestion that perhaps we might get along with a careful examination of the estimates—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearkes: —and that the Minister of National Defence had suggested that, after a general discussion on the general defence policy, we might turn to the details of the estimates as they are laid out at page 269 of the book of estimates. He suggested we might deal with them in the order of administration, inspection services, civil defence, and so on, and that they should be taken one by one so that there would be a chance to discuss each of them.

I had risen earlier because I was under the impression, rightly or wrongly, that the minister wanted time to collect his thoughts in order to reply to the leader of the opposition. Then another member from the government benches spoke. Perhaps the minister might now reply to the leader of the opposition, after which we might reach the stage when the committee would consider that it had dealt sufficiently with the general matters of defence and would be prepared to go ahead.

It was suggested just before six o'clock that this item be carried; but I do not think that was in accord with the wish of the committee as expressed yesterday, or the day before, when the minister himself made the suggestion that we take these items one by one. I personally concurred in that procedure, and I think the majority of members concurred. Therefore it must be realized, as the leader of the opposition has pointed out, that we do lack a great deal of information, that there are many matters that could be discussed in a smaller committee and the anxiety of members of the opposition would thereby be relieved if they could get answers to their questions. The members of the opposition realize full well that in the interest of security they cannot ask for full explanations here. They realize that they cannot ask the minister to give such answers in the house when every word that he says may be communicated to those who may possibly be our enemies. Therefore there is a certain degree of anxiety and uncertainty, which is reasonable, amongst members of the opposition.

It is unfair for supporters of the Liberal government to accuse the opposition of not working and not being able to get information when every avenue of obtaining more detailed information is closed to them. We recognize that fact. The minister has stated time and time again in the past that he will not have a defence committee. Tonight the leader of the opposition has pleaded with the minister once again in this critical situation to give the opposition a committee. In the face of the challenges which have been made by members such as the hon. member for Parkdale, in the face of challenges which have been made in the press that the opposition is not doing its duty, in order that such challenges may be met the leader of the opposition has once again appealed to the Minister of National Defence for such a committee.

There is no thought of having a committee before which a General MacArthur or a General Marshall would be called. That is not the Canadian way of doing things, but the Canadian people have a right, I think, to have their representatives informed on certain matters which those representatives themselves realize it is not expedient to ask to have explained in the open forum of this house. There is the appeal made by the leader of the opposition. I hope that the minister has now had time to collect his thoughts and is ready to reply to the leader of the opposition. If that is done, and if there are no more questions on the general discussion, then instead of asking that the item be carried, as was done at six o'clock. I suggest that the committee follow the line of procedure suggested by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we have witnessed tonight one of the most extraordinary happenings I have seen in this house in some twelve years. We have seen a Liberal member on the government side of the house rise in his place and belittle the judgment of a former minister of national defence who, as the hon. member for Nanaimo said, went to Europe in a wheelchair to try to find out the difficulties which confronted our troops over there. Yet the hon. member for Temiscouata rises in the house and belittles his judgment while members on the Liberal side sit with smiles on their faces. It is most extraordinary. After that we find the Minister of National Defence rising to defend his own reputation but saying nothing about the reputation of Colonel Ralston.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. Nothing offends me more than when my statements are distorted by anyone, colleagues, newspapers or anyone else. I can be called names and I do not care. The statements are there. What I said is recorded, and there is no reason whatever for the hon. member for Melfort, any more than the hon. member for Nanaimo, to distort what I have said and to draw wrong conclusions therefrom. I want them to be fair, honest and just and not to try to give a different meaning to what I said. I mentioned only one statement and I drew conclusions from it. I did not say anything else about the former minister of national defence.

Mr. Wright: That is exactly the point, Mr. Chairman. I am saying that the hon. member for Temiscouata drew absolutely unfair conclusions, conclusions which are not based on facts or truth.

Mr. Pouliot: That is your right, but it is your conclusions that are wrong.

Mr. Wright: The hon. member for Temiscouata got up in this house and implied that Colonel Ralston's statement in the house that he thought the Canadian troops needed reinforcement was the cause of the German attack on the American front.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member remembers if he said that?

Mr. Wright: I remember it, and for any member of this house to get up and say such a thing, and other members behind him smile at it, and the Minister of National Defence not come to the defence of the former minister—

Mr. Pouliot: Nobody smiled about it, only the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Wright: Oh no; there were no smiles on this side of the house. The smiles were all behind you. That is all I am going to say on this matter. The leader of the opposition stated that he believed we should have more details before us before voting on this first item. The first item is a vote of $1,412 million. The total amount which we are going to vote in these estimates for all departments of the government this year is $2,441 million. For all other items besides national defence contained in the book of estimates we are only going to vote $1,029 million. What information is there in the book on this first item of national defence? There is half a page in a book of some 500 pages and four pages of details for a vote of $1,412 million.

Let us look at what they do in some other parliaments. I have in my hand the books of defence estimates of the British House of Commons for 1951. The army estimates contain ten items and there is a book of 196 pages giving details and explanatory notes. Then there are the air estimates, another book of 212 pages of details and explanatory notes on all the different items. Then we have the navy estimates, a book of some 300 pages with details and explanatory notes for all the items. That is what members of the British house have before them when they vote on their national defence estimates. We have an item of $1,412 million occupying half a page plus three pages of details of services. I ask hon. members if that is a fair thing to present to this house. Is it any wonder that the house wants a committee? Is it any wonder that we need more details before we can intelligently vote $1,412 million for this purpose? The people of this country are prepared to spend money for national defence, but they do expect this house to see that the money is spent wisely. That is what we are sent here for; that is what the hon. members who sit behind the Minister of National Defence are here for. Yet we see them ready to accept everything the minister wants to say. When the hon. member for Temiscouata makes a comic opera speech, they pound their desks. To them it is funny. Well, it is not funny to the people of Canada. With the situation that exists in the world today we in this house should realize that these defence estimates may mean life or death to many of our young people. We should see that we get the best value for our money, the best planes, the best tanks and the best equipment possible.

Are we getting it? Well, between 1946 and 1950 we spent $1,237,294,000 on national defence; but when we had to send a brigade to Korea we had a hard job to find the men. When the defence estimates were before the public accounts committee it was admitted that we did not have one modern tank in 1950. It was admitted that we had only two jet-propelled planes in 1950, and one of them blew up. It was admitted that when we sent three destroyers to Korea we had to scrape the bottom of the barrel to get enough men to man them. Yet we spent $1,237,294,000 in 1946-47, 1947-48, 1948-49 and 1949-50. Is it not time we asked a few questions in this house? Is it not time we got a few more details? I think we should have more information in the estimates so we can intelligently discuss the expenditure of this $1,412 million.

I do not like the attitude of this house tonight. I did not like the speech of the hon. member for Temiscouata, making a joke of this whole matter of defence. It is too important at this time to joke about. Some twelve months ago the Minister of National Defence intimated that we were going to raise forty squadrons, and that we would send eleven squadrons to Europe. What have we done? We have sent one squadron to Europe. We are going to send two more, and when those squadrons are finally equipped and sent we will have one squadron left at home. It is true that it takes time to produce jet planes; we realize that, but I do not think it takes all the time we have spent in the last four years.

As far as I am concerned I believe we should have a national survey of the manpower and material resources of this country. I do not believe we can have an efficient war effort without first knowing what we have to work with. That is the first problem, and it is time we had that survey. I do not care whether you call it national registration or anything else; it is essential that we have it. It is essential that when we are spending the sums of money we are going to spend this year and in the next three years, we have a committee on war expenditures such as we had during the last war, which can keep track of these moneys. That is all this house wants. It wants the government to take it into its confidence, and see that the taxpayers are getting value for the money being spent on national defence.

Mr. Gardiner: I think I am the senior member of the government in the house at the moment, and one of three in their seats this evening who served in the government during the time Colonel Ralston was a member of the government. On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I want to call your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Melfort made a suggestion which I think it is improper for a member of this house to make. Everyone knows that the hon. member for Temiscouata has the ability to bring smiles to the faces of members on all sides. He also has the ability to turn around and move some of us to tears occasionally. During the greater part of the speech this evening by the hon. member for Temiscouata there were smiles on the faces of all hon. members of this house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, one hon. member has called attention to the fact that we sit face to face in this house, not in a circular arrangement. Sitting in a front bench on this side I think I have an opportunity to see the faces of hon. members on the other side a little better than they can see themselves. I think I would be quite correct in saying that every hon. member on the other side smiled at certain remarks that were made by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Not when he was talking about Ralston.

Mr. Gardiner: I would be just as correct in that statement as any hon. member opposite would be in saying there were smiles on this side of the house. I do not know what expression was on the faces of those behind me, but I do know the expression that was on my own face and I know the expression that was on the faces of other hon. members I could see. Hon. members were not smiling at the particular remark which was made and which has been referred to. Some hon. members may have agreed with it and some may have disagreed, but to say that hon. members on this side of the house had smiles on their faces as a result of the suggested attack on a previous minister of this government is contrary to the facts. Hon. members on this side did no such thing.

The hon. member made a statement to the effect that hon. members over here smiled at suggestions that were made in connection with the slaughter of men during the last war. There is not a member on this side of the house or on the other side who would smile at a statement like that. Statements may have been made that caused hon. members to smile, but no hon. member on either side of the house smiled because of those remarks, whether or not they agreed with them. I want to make this correction in the Hansard that contains the remarks of the hon. member for Melfort. Those of us who served in this house during the last war, particularly those who served in the government during the whole war, and those of us who had members of our families serving overseas, rather resent anyone making the statement in this house that we smiled at anything that happened during the last war. We did not smile at any reference made to the prosecution of the last war. There may have been other things in the speech at which we smiled, but I think a statement of that kind should be withdrawn.

Mr. Wright: I am quite prepared to accept the statement of the minister as far as he personally is concerned, but I notice that a second minister rose without defending Colonel Ralston.

Mr. Gardiner: Colonel Ralston does not need any defence by anyone in this house. Colonel Ralston made a reputation for himself that is written into the history of this country, and it does not require defence. I may have disagreed with him, just as the hon. member for Nanaimo said that he as a soldier may have disagreed with the minister during the war. I may have disagreed on certain matters, but I recognize the fact that no greater servant of the Canadian people ever lived than Colonel Ralston, whether he was right or wrong on certain occasions.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege, with respect to the speech made a moment ago by the hon. member for Melfort. I will remind him of this, that if I made jokes about the living I respect the dead. There was no jocular remark in my reference to the statements of the former minister of national defence, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Wright: Then why make the reference?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Before I proceed with the remarks I want to make, I want to refer to what I consider to be a burlesque in this house for the last forty or fifty minutes this evening. I was ashamed of it. As the Minister of Agriculture has stated, I too had the privilege of serving in this house from 1940 on, and during the greater part of the war with the then minister of national defence, the late Colonel Ralston. Like Colonel Ralston, I had the privilege of serving in the first world war, and I want to say to this house, and to the country, that Colonel Ralston enjoyed a great reputation as a soldier in the first world war. As the Minister of Agriculture has stated, he was a great Canadian. He should be remembered by the people of Canada as a great public servant, and a great Canadian. I am very sure that the service he gave to this country as minister of national defence greatly shortened his life. I was ashamed to hear my good friend the hon. member for Temiscouata state that the former minister was responsible for the slaughter or loss of Canadian lives. Now, that is a very nasty thing to accuse anybody of.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The word "nasty" is unparliamentary and I want the hon. member to withdraw it. I want him to behave properly according to the rules of the house. There must be an end to the distortion of what I said. I want a ruling.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not want to enter too much into the discussion that is now taking place. We have before us an incident with which it is very difficult to deal. On the one side some hon. members feel that they must say something about the good deeds and the memory of a late minister of the crown, who sat in this house for many years. On the other hand, the member who has provoked these statements claims that he did not want to attack the memory of the late minister, and he has risen on a question of privilege to have words withdrawn that are attributed to some statement he has made, such as the word "nasty". As he says, this word appears in a long list of those words which, at one time or another, have been considered unparliamentary.

I think that perhaps we should look at this incident in another way. Impartial as I am in this dispute, I think the committee will permit me to ask hon. members if, from the point of view of prestige, decorum and order, we are gaining much by pursuing this discussion. I shall ask the hon. member for Souris to continue his remarks, but I would ask him also to bear in mind the remarks I have just made. I believe the members of the committee should now consider taking up a suggestion which was made by the hon. member for Nanaimo and the Minister of National Defence, and that is to study the details of the estimates as shown on page 269. We could proceed by calling each heading: administration, civil defence, general services, and so on.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I bow to your ruling, as you know sir, and I shall withdraw the word "nasty" if it is improper. I still must maintain that I believe it very undignified and very improper for a member of this House of Commons to speak of a past member as was done this evening. I believe my good friend the hon. member for Temiscouata, after having had time to think this over, will be parliamentarian enough to get up and apologize for some of the words—

Mr. Pouliot: Well, well, I do not want a lecture.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He may withdraw the statement he made about the minister of national defence being responsible for the loss of Canadian lives. I shall go further, Mr. Chairman, and say that I was surprised the Minister of National Defence did not attempt to get up as soon as the member sat down and refute some of those statements, or defend the former minister of national defence whom he served in this government during those war years. I know the Minister of National Defence was a very good soldier in the first war. I am sure when he has time to think this over he will refute the statement made by a member of his party this evening, and will speak on behalf of his old colleague the late Colonel Ralston. I know he is the type of soldier, minister, and member of this House of Commons who will do that when he replies.

I do not wish to say anything further about that, but I hope we do not have any more remarks like that about a great public servant, and a great Canadian citizen, such as the late Colonel Ralston. With respect to these estimates, in view of the requests that have been made in the past, it is possible that the Minister of National Defence may decide, after consideration, to set up a committee of this house on national defence. As I listened to the member for Temiscouata, I thought he was most inconsistent. He said we now had a select committee of this House of Commons, and then he proceeded to ridicule the idea of giving certain information publicly to this committee. The idea in setting up a select committee composed of members from all parties of this house is to give them access to information, and an opportunity to question some officials who cannot be questioned under our procedure in this house. I think that is very proper, and I am very keen about having a committee set up during a time of great international distress such as we now have.

There is another matter about which I am personally very much concerned. I want to make a request to the minister, and to the government, that those people who are actually serving in a theatre of war—young men are dying for us in a theatre of war today—and who are making this great sacrifice, should be exempt from income tax. I do not say that the people who will be going to Europe prior to the declaration of war there should receive that consideration. I do not believe there is a patriotic citizen in Canada who would not be willing to exempt from taxation the troops who are actually serving in a theatre of war. I believe that is the least this government can do. I want to make a very earnest plea to the minister to use his influence with his colleagues and have that done.

I was very surprised to hear the minister state—at least I thought he did—that it was very difficult to find an area large enough in this great nation of ours to handle brigade training. Surely that can be brought into being in this country. If I followed the minister correctly, that was what he implied. We have examples in Great Britain, where they have had a committee such as the one for which we have been asking here. I am sure that committee has rendered great service to the taxpayers of that country without giving any information to the enemy. It is just drawing a red herring across the trail to make accusations such as that. There are many other things that I might have discussed, but I do not want to take further time of the committee, because I know the minister wants to reply. I hope he will accede to the setting up of this committee, which is so very important from all angles to the people of this nation during these difficult and distressing times. I hope the minister will give fair consideration to these requests that I have made, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make any remarks in this debate but I am rather inspired to do so by a remark that was made by the minister this afternoon to the effect that a unit which has its headquarters in my town in the province of New Brunswick was the first unit in Canada to complete its complement with regard to recruiting.

Mr. Claxton: I did not say that. I do not know that yet. I just said it had completed it on the first day.

Mr. Brooks: If it completed it on the first day, I think the minister can rest assured that it will continue to complete it and will be ahead on the last day.

As I say, we are proud indeed of that accomplishment. I might also point out that we in New Brunswick are proud of both the units that have been chosen or selected by the minister for this special brigade. We would also have been proud if the other units in that province had been chosen, because our reserve units in New Brunswick have always done well. Not only in this war but in previous wars they have always maintained their record with regard to numbers in recruiting. I think this is a significant fact. I do not think it is because we in New Brunswick are more patriotic than are the people in any other part of Canada; but there is another factor which also helps recruiting in our province, namely the fact that our people in that section of the dominion have not the large amount of employment which is enjoyed in other parts of Canada. I am not saying that this is the prime reason why the people of New Brunswick are the first to fill their units; but in the past it has been one of the reasons. I should like to say to the minister and to the cabinet that I hope we shall not only be the first in filling the units, having regard to recruiting, but that we also shall be given the opportunity of being the first in providing war materials and other necessities.

I remember that in the first war Colonel Fowler raised, in my province, two regiments inside a month. In the last war there was a unit which went to Hong Kong. When it was given orders to prepare to go to Hong Kong, it had not more than 50 per cent of the men required. The men could not be recruited in their own recruiting section, and these men were recruited from New Brunswick. One reason for that was that, in the section in which this unit should have recruited, there was so much employment that they could not get the necessary recruits and had to get them from the province of New Brunswick.

If a war occurs we shall have to raise hundreds of thousands of men, as we did in the past two wars. It is possibly not necessary now; but if it becomes necessary to raise large numbers of men, as it was in previous wars, we shall have to adopt some other system of providing men than that by which they have been provided in the past; because the system which we have had does not bear fairly upon sections such as the one from which I come.

I was not here tonight, Mr. Chairman, when this debate arose with regard to Colonel Ralston. I do not intend to make any derogatory remarks about anyone. I did, however, know Colonel Ralston. I come from the maritime provinces, as did Colonel Ralston; and may I say that there is no man at present or in the past whose name stands higher in the maritime provinces than does that of Colonel Ralston. He was a great soldier and a great Canadian. I had the opportunity of serving under him in the city of Fredericton—in a camp there—and also in Windsor, Nova Scotia. I received much help from him.

The great crime which Colonel Ralston committed, if he committed any crime in the eyes of the people of Canada, was this. In the latter part of the war, when he knew that there was a great scarcity of men overseas, he asked for men in Canada. He knew that there were in this country thousands of well-trained men who could have gone overseas to assist the men fighting in Europe at that time. But instead of getting the men that he required, as he expected, he came to my camp and he went to camps in other parts of this dominion, and had to take cooks, clerks and hundreds of other men who were poorly trained instead of the men whom he had hoped to get, namely the well-trained men throughout Canada. If any crime was committed by Colonel Ralston, I say that was it; and I think it is one that every fair-minded man and woman in Canada will say that he was justified in committing.

It is not my intention to say anything more tonight, Mr. Chairman. I deeply regret that the name of a great man and a great Canadian should have been brought into this debate tonight as it has been, and that the debate should have been conducted in such a manner as it has been conducted tonight.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, I will not take up too much time; in fact, I will take just a few minutes. I also want to pay my respects to a great Canadian in the person of the late Colonel Ralston. He has been condemned by some here just because he was doing the right thing for his country in trying to have equality of service, something which we have advocated right along. I think that by this time the facts are known, even though at one time they were not known to most people throughout the country.

On the 18th day of last month, in the debate on the budget address, I advocated that the men who were doing our fighting should not be subject to income tax. At that time I pointed out that they are paying their full share over there, by offering everything they have. They do not know whether they will ever return to this country; and if they do so, they are asked to help pay off the war debt and contribute towards paying other expenses which are in some cases unnecessary. They are asked to do this in addition to doing their bit over there. In spite of the explanation given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance this afternoon, with his customary energy, I feel that some method can be worked out which will free the fighting men of the obligation of paying income tax. Let those who are staying home and making good profits make up those taxes.

There is a question that I want to ask the Minister of National Defence in connection with a camp in the best constituency in Canada. I refer to Wainwright camp in the Battle River constituency. At the present time it is one of the largest camps in Canada, although not many years ago we had buffalo, yak, elk and many other animals running about the country there. They were inside fences; but the national park has been done away with, and now it is turned into a military camp. On another occasion last year I had representations from the people of the town of Wainwright and the board of trade there with respect to housing for the wives and families of the officers and men attending that camp. The board of trade pointed out that in that town there have been provided schools, a good hospital, water and sewers. I understand that at the present time nothing has been done in connection with providing homes for the wives and families of those men serving at that camp. Only a short time ago I read that quite a large amount of money is being spent at Rockcliffe air station in order to provide similar accommodation. I should like to know now from the Minister of National Defence what provision is being made at Wainwright camp. Buildings might be erected either at the town of Wainwright or near the camp, wherever the department might find it to be most suitable for them to be erected.

Mr. Coldwell: Before the minister speaks I want to reiterate a suggestion that we have made several times, and that is for a war expenditures committee. I have noticed that at times it has been referred to as a defence committee. I want to make it very plain to the minister and to the committee that we think the defence policy of the government must be the responsibility of the government. It is not a committee to go into all the phases of defence, and the policy of the government regarding defence, that I think the house needs. I do not think anyone in the house is really asking for that, but sometimes it is said that that is what is being asked for. What we need is a committee that can go into all the phases of war expenditure, including the expenditures of the defence departments.

We did that in effect during the last war. At the beginning I think it was intended that this might be confined more or less to the department of munitions and supply, but hon. members who were on that committee will recall that we had the military men before us who told us a great deal about the equipment, the expenditures and the arrangements made for obtaining the equipment. We all saw to it, or we were given the information to enable us to understand, that we were getting the equipment that the armed forces needed.

I just rose to say that, because I did not want the minister to misunderstand. It is not a committee that would go into the policy, because we cannot take the responsibility for that policy. We can take responsibility only for the things that concern us as a house.

Just before I sit down I want to say also that all of us who sat in the house during the war had, I think, the highest regard for Colonel Ralston. As has been said so many times here this evening, he was a great Canadian, he was a great gentleman and one who invariably treated every hon. member with the greatest consideration and courtesy. Indeed, because he attended to the matters that were brought to him by individual members and because he was working long hours, as I know his own staff of assistants did, he served his country in a manner that I think will be an example to any minister of the crown in any department who may come after him in the years ahead.

Mr. Adamson: The quite shocking statement has been made in this house at least by implication that Ralston's policy cost us lives, whereas as a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, if there was any Canadian during the last war whose policy saved lives it was Colonel Ralston, and his insistence on getting the reinforcements that were needed instead of sending tired men back into the line over and over again, units with half or two-thirds strength, units improperly rested, units filled, instead of with combat infantry, with cooks, clerks and people not properly trained in their weapons—if there was any individual whose policy saved Canadian lives in the last war, it was Colonel Ralston. And in order to keep the record straight I want to read into this night's Hansard Colonel Ralston's statement on November 29, 1944, after he had resigned from the cabinet, as the reasons why he resigned, and as recorded at pages 6668 and 6669 of Hansard. I want to quote three paragraphs of Colonel Ralston's statement:

It is most desirable that losses be replaced quickly. If they are not replaced, there are less men for the job, with the consequent additional strain. If they are not replaced, morale is bound to be lowered. It is all very well to say that units may be filled up by the end of the month or the end of the week, but what about the days and nights in between? And so pools of reinforcements in the battle areas ensure that reinforcements are available to the units when needed. It ensures that they are not dependent for their reinforcements on the arrival of a convoy, or the uncertainties of how many the convoy will bring due to shortages in the United Kingdom or in another battle area.

It means everything to men in the line to see new men come in beside them to fill the gaps while the battle is on. The men can understand shortages if they know that there are no reinforcements available, but it is different—and I found this particularly in Italy—when the men know that we have these trained infantry men of the N.R.M.A. in Canada who can be made available.

In Italy I visited the reinforcement unit and most of the infantry battalions. I talked with the men themselves, and time and again I got that same story—about having to go back in the line repeatedly, or not having leave, or being short-handed, when trained N.R.M.A. men could be made available to give them relief.

Then on page 6669:

In the last war—

That is the first world war. I continue:

In the last war battles were short, the objectives were limited and long static periods intervened. In this war a battle is a series of continuous offensive operations, or, to put it the other way, a battle is a continuous series of offensive operations. That makes it most necessary that units while they are in the battle, be reinforced on the move to keep up the momentum of the operation and each unit's fighting efficiency. That does not mean that units are kept in the line a longer time than they should be. They are withdrawn and replaced constantly by other units. It only means that, while they are there, the activity is more intense, and to support men and the success of the operation the ranks should be filled up promptly.

[Mr. Adamson.]

That was the statement the minister made on that memorable night of November 29, 1944. That was the statement of a man who had seen what lack of reinforcements did to an army. He had spent not only days but weeks in Italy on the fighting fronts, and he knew from first-hand experience how the shortage of reinforcements increased the incidence of casualties. The fact that he had to resign from this government for his courage is to me one of the black marks on Canadian political history.

I want to come now, Mr. Chairman, to the question of a defence committee. I have advocated this for some years, and a minister just the other day, in fact the day before yesterday, emphasized the importance of this committee. General Marshall, in testifying before the Senate committee, said that if certain policies were carried out, Russia was likely to declare war on us and, according to the report I saw in the newspaper—I have not got it with me—rain atomic bombs on the defenceless cities of the United States and other parts of North America.

Well, if that statement is true, if our potential enemy has this weapon in such numbers as intimated in General Marshall's testimony, then the House of Commons and the country should be apprized of the fact. It is not a matter of secrecy. The Secretary of Defense in the United States made that statement; and if he made it, surely we should be informed of the true situation. If the situation is as represented by the press reports, then we should know exactly what the situation is. If it is not as General Marshall states, then he has made a political statement to the defence committee.

That is something that affects us very closely in Canada. If our potential enemy is making atomic bombs in large quantities, then it is surely debatable as to why we should not be making this weapon ourselves. Those are questions a defence committee could go into. No one on the committee would ask for secret information. The situation as intimated by the Secretary of Defense in the United States in open testimony, or at least in testimony that was not censored, certainly indicated that we in North America are in a most perilous state. The House of Commons, the representatives of the people of Canada, should be informed equally as well as the representatives of the people of the United States; and I feel that a defence committee is a proper instrument for that information. I say this sincerely, that a defence committee would be of inestimable help to the government. In a defence committee, composed, presumably, to a great extent, of ex-servicemen, it would be impossible to have what one must consider to have been the rather disgraceful scene we saw in this chamber tonight.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, we have had a long day. There has been a good deal of heat, and not much light.

An hon. Member: Who started it?

Mr. Claxton: I suggest that around about five or five-fifteen there was a general impression that we were ready to consider the estimates of the Department of National Defence in detail, beginning at page 269. Since that time events have taken a different turn, and no one could regret that more than myself.

We have a heavy responsibility today, trying to do everything we can to get this country as prepared as it can be, with the resources put at our disposal by parliament. On that account it becomes important that we should get on with the job and have the utmost possible guidance from parliament. But parliament itself has its own responsibility in ensuring that in the support of our great defence effort—and it is a great one—we should have the enlightened and informed support of the whole Canadian people, every section of it.

On that account it becomes of terrific importance that what we say here and what we do here should be said and done with a full sense of responsibility, so that we build up our strength and the strength of the nations allied with us, and so that we encourage our people to work together, and so that we create unity—not disunity.

Every now and again I recognize—and I have been ten years in the House of Commons—that we have an interlude where some exchange takes place. But it is terribly important that we get back to the main job, which is that of building up the defences of this country so that we, with others, can stand against the forces of the aggressor nations.

On that account I must say before the debate concludes tonight, for the purpose of the record—because it is unnecessary to do it for any other reason—that Colonel Ralston needs no praise from me, or from any other man in the House of Commons. Nothing we can say or do here will add to or detract from the record he has made for himself. That lives in the records of Canada.

But I do say: Let us get on with the job—just as he would have wanted us to do. Let us start at page 269, as I thought we would this afternoon, and give the information that can be given—and which we are being prevented from giving, by a discussion such as that which occurred.

Mr. Drew: Don't talk nonsense.

Mr. Claxton: If I am concluding this discussion—

Mr. Drew: You are not.

Mr. Claxton: Then I might have something to say later.

Mr. Fulton: The man who started it was your own member from Temiscouata.

Mr. Claxton: I might have something to say later, but I had hoped we would get on with the business, which is to discuss the estimates of the Department of National Defence, which are before the committee in the form recommended by the Auditor General. This is the form similar to that adopted by other government departments, and it is changed substantially from last year. We are here to do that, and we would like to get on with the job.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps it would help if the minister would answer the question which has been asked, and that is as to whether he is prepared to appoint a committee. Then there would be a chance to get on with the business with some assurance that we would get the facts.

Mr. Claxton: The appointing of a committee is not for me; it is for the government. The answer has been given half a dozen times.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue this debate. When it is concluded we will take up the veterans resolutions—and there are three of them on the order paper—Nos. 16, 5 and 17. I hope we do reach them.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 11, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—VETERANS AFFAIRS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Mr. L. D. Tremblay (Dorchester) moved:

That the name of Mr. Gibson be substituted for that of Mr. Cruickshank on the standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. Hosking be substituted for that of Mr. Carroll on the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE ON JOINT LOANS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, during the last few weeks many hon. members have expressed concern about the prospect of a diminishing volume of housing being built under the National Housing Act, particularly parts I and II, which provide for joint loans, and I wish, therefore, to make a brief statement on this subject.

In 1950 about 40,000 residential units were financed jointly by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and approved lending institutions under the act in the amount of approximately $280 million. The interest rate to the borrower is limited by the act to 4½ per cent. By agreement, pursuant to the act, the lending institution earns 5 per cent gross upon its three-quarter share and Central Mortgage 3 per cent gross on its one-quarter share of the loan.

During recent months, mortgage interest rates, in common with other interest rates, have risen. As a result there is a growing unwillingness of lending institutions to participate in National Housing Act loans at the present rate of interest. It has been pointed out by several hon. members that builders for home ownership or rental as well as prospective home owners are experiencing the effects of reduced activity under the National Housing Act. There are insufficient inducements to keep the lending institutions operating under the National Housing Act with a gross return of 5 per cent when higher rates are readily available to them in the conventional mortgage field.

On May 2 the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) asked what steps would be taken to enable the act to continue to be effective. I believe it is the opinion of hon. members generally that steps should be taken to assure the continuance of the general benefits of the act as contemplated by parliament. Therefore, I propose to introduce, as soon as possible, for the consideration of this house amendments which will have the effect of permitting an increase from 4½ per cent to 5 per cent in the interest rate payable by the borrower upon joint loans. Under such an arrangement, the lending institutions, upon their share of the joint loan, would earn a gross interest of 5½ per cent, and Central Mortgage would earn 3½ per cent upon its share of the joint loan. A change of one-half of one per cent in the interest rate amounts to 25 cents per month per $1,000 of loan. The proposed amendments will provide also for a like increase in interest rate in all other types of loans made under the act.

While the proposed amendments are being considered, National Housing Act mortgages must be registered at present interest rates prescribed by the act. Only after the proposed amendments have received royal assent can mortgages under the act be registered at the new rates.

The changes which I propose will restore joint loans under the National Housing Act to about the same position relative to other investments which they had prior to recent changes in the interest rate structure. Although there are evidences that more investment opportunities now exist than there are funds for investment, nevertheless it is hoped that the lending institutions will make National Housing Act loans readily available under these terms. There is reason to believe that such will be the case, because a number of lending institutions feel that loans under the National Housing Act, with its guarantees, are not only a satisfactory investment, but that the making of them is a public service.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if or when the government intends to resume lending, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the additional one-sixth provided by the 1949 legislation, the withdrawal of which has had so much to do with the reduction in the volume of housing built with the assistance of the act?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Winters: I believe the hon. member is fully familiar with the reasons leading up to the decision to suspend the one-sixth. I can only say that when the decision is made to restore it, an announcement will be made at that time.

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

PAYMENTS BY DEPARTMENT FOR PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, on May 8 the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) referred to the answer I gave on May 7 to his request for information concerning the total amount paid by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51.

The answer that was given is correct. It indicates the actual expenditure made in 1950-51 according to the basis of account classification used by the department in that year. However, as members realize, on the recommendation of the public accounts committee and the Auditor General, the form of presentation of the estimates was materially changed for 1951-52. This has resulted in a considerable change in our department in the method used to classify expenditures. In order to provide a basis for comparison with this year's estimates, last year's accounts have been reconstructed in the same manner for purposes of comparison only.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 267, to incorporate the Scripture Gift Mission (Canada) Incorporated.—Mr. Fleming.

FREIGHT RATES

QUESTION AS TO LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FOR EQUALIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a dispatch in this morning's press regarding legislation for the equalization of freight rates? Can the minister say when such legislation will be introduced, and will it include the recommended $7 million subsidy for the maintenance of the rail link between east and west?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have not seen the dispatch in this morning's press. All I can tell the hon. member is that the legislation to which he refers is still under consideration. When it is finalized, it will be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Argue: During the present session?

Mr. Chevrier: I hope so.

RAILWAYS

ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF WESTERN GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, with respect to the present shortage of box cars for the movement of grain in the prairie provinces. I should like to be permitted to quote one of several telegrams received today, and this one is from Reeve R. A. Patterson, of Boissevain, Manitoba. It is very significant. It says:

> Cars for grain urgently needed in this municipality; this covers station of Boissevain, Ninga, Croll and Regent. Approximately, by estimate of elevator agents at Boissevain alone, 145,000 bushels on farms to come to Boissevain, besides approximately 200,000 in elevators. Grain must be moved to make room for new crop and to help farmers to finance this year's operations. Considerable of this grain is tough; need over fifteen cars a week to clear Boissevain alone by July 31.

An answer to a question in my name which appears on page 2607 of Hansard for May 2 sets forth the problem facing the three prairie provinces by estimating the amount of grain still held in country elevators. This is a very serious matter.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member sent me a copy of a telegram which he had received from Mr. Patterson, the reeve of a municipality in western Canada. The copy was in his own handwriting, and I am sorry to say it was rather difficult to read. I believe I should add that many other members in the house are receiving similar telegrams, and if I were required to answer them on the orders of the day I suppose we would have to deal with any number of questions. I know that the position is urgent. I can tell the hon. member that it is the responsibility of the wheat board to direct the movement of box cars to the municipalities. The best I can tell the hon. member is that I shall be glad to bring to the attention of the wheat board the representations made by the reeve of this municipality.

The general position concerning box cars is exceedingly better than it was when I made a statement some ten days ago. In fact, the unfavourable balance is now down to 3,176, which is a decrease of 4,300 cars in less than three weeks. At the time I made my statement in the house on April 25, I indicated that it was hoped that 27 million bushels of grain would be shipped from the lakehead during the month of April. As a matter of fact, 30 million bushels have been shipped, which is 3 million over the estimated April requirement.

Mr. Ross (Souris): From the lakehead, or to the lakehead?

Mr. Chevrier: From the lakehead, and down the river. Then I stated that the delivery of grain cars to Vancouver was not as satisfactory as the chairman of the Canadian wheat board hoped. I made that statement in April. Since then a considerable improvement has taken place. During the period April 23 to May 8 inclusive, the requirement of the wheat board for deliveries to Vancouver was approximately 2,800 cars, and the railways were able to deliver to Vancouver some 3,150 cars. At the same time, the over-all position during the same period—that is, April 23 to May 8—was well in keeping with the requirements indicated by the wheat board. Total loadings were 17,489 cars as against a requirement of 17,808 cars. The house can therefore see that the position is far better now than it has been at any other time since the inception of the difficulty.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is still bad, though.

SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA

USE OF RADIOTELEPHONE ON SHIPS ON THE GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I too have a question for the Minister of Transport; this seems to be one of his days. Apparently an agreement was reached yesterday between Canada and the United States concerning the regulation of the use of the radiotelephone on ships on the great lakes. Can the minister make a statement about that agreement, either today or in the near future; and also can he tell us whether it will mean legislation?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): A Canadian delegation and a United States delegation have been discussing for the last four days matters concerning the safety of life at sea with reference to the use of radio on the great lakes. They have reached agreement, but unfortunately it has not been possible for me to discuss this agreement with my colleagues in the cabinet. That will be done in the near future. Whether or not legislation will be required I am not able to say. I think it may, but certainly not at this session.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POULTRY AND POULTRY PRODUCTS

IMPORTATION OF EGGS FROM HOLLAND—POULTRY IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has his attention been drawn to a dispatch announcing the arrival of hundreds of cases of eggs from Holland, and has he any comment to make on it?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was kind enough to give notice of his question, and I have therefore had an opportunity of reading the article to which he refers.

I am advised that 1,300 cases of eggs, or 39,000 dozen, arrived in Montreal from Holland on May 4, and are now being regraded for distribution in Canada. This shipment brings the total importations of eggs since January 1, 1951, to 2,964 cases, or 88,920 dozen, of which 500 cases, or 15,000 dozen, were imported from Ireland, and 1,164 cases, or 34,920 dozen, were imported from the United States.

Storage stocks in Canada are low at the present time, due to a slight falling off in marketings and to heavy exports during the present season, which to date have totalled 172,000 cases, or 5,160,000 dozen; and further imports may be expected.

The position there, I think, is clear, namely, that we are exporting many more eggs than we are importing. There are certain reasons why eggs are being brought into certain communities.

Mr. Coldwell: Can the minister tell us to what countries the eggs were exported? Did they, by any chance, go to Holland?

Mr. Gardiner: I would greatly doubt it. I think most of them went to the United States.

While I am on my feet I should probably say this, because if I do not make this answer now, there will be another question: Poultry is also being imported, particularly into Winnipeg. That would indicate that probably the producers of poultry and eggs have overdone the cutting down on their production.

Mr. Fraser: Will the minister say where the poultry is coming from?

Mr. Gardiner: From the United States—from Minneapolis, mostly.

STRAWBERRIES

QUESTION AS TO IMPORTATIONS FROM HOLLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, based on a telegram which I have received from the Syndicat coopératif des producteurs de fraises de Bellechasse, an organization grouping four hundred members in my constituency for the production and sale of strawberries, protesting the importation of considerable quantities of strawberries from Holland which threaten to affect the market for their product.

The question is also based on an article written by the prominent journalist, Mr. Eugène L'Heureux, and published in newspapers whose combined circulation is more than 300,000. The question is this:

1. What is the actual protection granted the strawberry growers against foreign importations?

2. Has the Department of Agriculture any information with regard to importation of strawberries from Holland?

3. Has the situation been examined by any department with a view to determining whether such importations may be considered as dumping?

4. Is it true that such imported strawberries are processed by a method that is not accepted by the United States Department of Agriculture? If so, will his department consider imposing similar restrictions on importations into Canada?

5. Does the department know of any other method by which our strawberry producers could be protected against mass importation of cheap-selling strawberries from abroad?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Picard: I do not think my hon. friends opposite should protest, in view of the kind of questions they ask.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a number of questions to ask, I think they should appear on the order paper. But I realize that a question relating to the importation of strawberries may be an urgent one. I am sure strawberries are not yet in season but perhaps I should allow the question to be answered.

Mr. Picard: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I just ask the question as it stands at the moment, and allow the minister to answer if he is ready to do so?

Mr. Speaker: That is what I have suggested.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have the answer here, and I think I might just as well give it.

The hon. member was kind enough to let me have advance notice of these questions, and I have had the following answers prepared:

1. The tariff on fresh imported strawberries is ten per cent. However, during the production season on application from the growers through the Canadian Horticultural Council a duty of 1¾ cents pound may be applied for a period up to six weeks. The duty on imported strawberries packed in SO_2 is 25 per cent.

2. The Department of Agriculture has no knowledge of any recent importations of SO_2 strawberries from Holland, although I am advised that there were some importations last year.

3. This matter has been discussed with the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Trade and Commerce. Following an inquiry into the situation by these departments we were advised that there was no evidence of dumping in these importations.

4. I am advised that while the United States food and drug administration prohibits the use of sulphur dioxide as a preservative for fruit used in the manufacture of jam, they do not prohibit its use as a preservative for dried or glacé fruits. So far as the Canada Department of Agriculture is concerned, the preserving of fruit in sulphur dioxide solution is considered an efficient and inexpensive method of preserving the farmers' product until it can be processed, and is a practice followed by processors for export and for use by jam manufacturers in Canada. In the final processing of the product the sulphur dioxide is removed by the cooking. The finished product is analysed to ensure that it is fit for human consumption.

5. No.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. The house again in committee of supply. Is it the pleasure of the committee to proceed to the consideration of the estimates in detail, beginning with page 269?

Mr. McIvor: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drew: Just a minute. Does that mean that, item by item, we shall proceed without further reference to the numbered item until each item is disposed of?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

The Chairman: I would call the first item, item 245, the details of which are to be found at page 269.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I cannot let the study of the national defence estimates go by without saying a few words about the personnel in charge of military affairs in Canada.

If it is fair and reasonable to press for a greater proportion of Canadians of French origin in the federal civil service; if it is logical and sensible to ask that members of our racial group hold the high posts to which they are entitled by reason of their number, their qualities and their ability; if in addition we are right in complaining of the present situation and in persistently claiming that the central government the consideration they French Canadians are not receiving from the deserve in respect to the allotment of positions, thereby being deprived of a great deal of influence in the administration of the country, it is also most important that in the various branches of our armed forces, the French Canadians be given the rank and the position they deserve.

We are seeking no favours or privileges. In the last war French Canadians nobly did their duty, and it has been recognized by all well informed people that, since the outbreak of the Korean conflict, Quebec has provided its fair share of volunteers. One-third of the high ranking officers' positions in our navy, army and air force, should go to our own people. In return for equality of sacrifice there should be equality of responsibilities and honours.

On Wednesday, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) made in this house a few startling revelations that must have surprised and saddened those who earnestly strive to promote harmony and understanding between the various racial groups in this country.

The hon. member gave many interesting details and clearly showed that French Canadians hold very few high positions in national defence headquarters or in the various services of our armed forces. After listening to the speech of the hon. member for Three Rivers and reading it in Hansard, we can easily understand why the government always declined to issue the list of chiefs of staff and staff officers.

Our ministers were possibly ashamed to show openly how French Canadians have been treated. I congratulate my colleague from Three Rivers on bringing the matter to the attention of the authorities and I fully agree with his statements.

The French Canadian is obviously a gallant soldier but he is also capable of leadership, and I find it extremely unfair that he should be trained and led by officers who are unquestionably upright and honourable but in a language he does not understand.

Let us not forget that most of those who join the army hail from the country and that in rural Quebec the English language is quite unknown, because there is practically no opportunity to use it.

When men are being mobilized for active duty, plain decency requires that at least they be in a position to understand the orders of their superiors.

How can a military career appeal to the young French Canadian serviceman when he knows that his superiors speak a language unknown to him? What pleasure and satisfaction can he derive when he has to stand apart by himself, unable to share in the conversations of his fellows? How sad and wearying must be the constant strain to understand and obey orders spoken or written in a language not his own!

For the French Canadian, the army as it now stands is the Foreign Legion. If this system, which seems to have a character of permanency, is indeed to last indefinitely; if it is an English army that is being sought; if instead of making it a national force, the intention is to make it a racial and unilingual one, let it be known. Our men will stay at home.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) stated he would like to see a larger proportion of French-speaking officers in the three services. That statement possibly reflects a very natural desire, but I wonder what is being done by the general staff to follow it up. Experience has made us sceptical and verbal professions of friendship, especially from leaders in Ottawa, generally leave us rather cold. Our hopes have been so often disappointed, so often have we been lulled in our legitimate dreams by soothing generalities that we have become incredulous. We believe only in facts, palpable and authentic.

Why does the minister state that our people have neither the qualifications nor the experience for promotion to those high ranks?

What are the reasons for this deficiency? Is it because the authorities never cared to train French Canadian officers? Were our people given the same chance and opportunity of promotion to the rank of officers?

Military colleges were and still are English-speaking. Can anyone say that if French Canadians had had the opportunity of attending a French military school, they would not have succeeded brilliantly?

According to the minister, it would cost too much money. So there is no wish to spend money on teaching military science to French Canadians; but they are being called and enlisted as privates, and our students are being sent to Kingston. It is high time to change that sad state of affairs!

Has the Department of National Defence adopted any plan? How is the situation going to be corrected? If the minister knew—as he must have known—that most officers belonging to the headquarters of his department were English-speaking, why did he not correct this anomaly? Why did he even let it develop?

Posts of major generals, brigadiers, colonels and other officers that make up the establishment have been filled by English-speaking persons! This was not done overnight. Who is responsible for those appointments, who should take the blame for the situation if not the Minister of National Defence and the whole cabinet?

The Liberal party has managed the affairs of this country for fifteen years. For fifteen years it has prepared for war and waged war. The organization of defence and the selection of military personnel have been its work.

If today we have grievances and charges to make, they must be levelled at our present leaders. As a representative of a riding in Quebec province, I urge that the wrongs which have been done to my fellow citizens be righted and that those people's abilities be acknowledged in the armed services as well as in the civil service.

The time to act is now, not tomorrow. We are not asking for speeches and statements; we want prompt and efficient decisions that will do justice to those of our people who dedicate themselves to our country's defence.

If today we have grievances and charges to make, they must be levelled at our present leaders. As a representative of a riding in Quebec province, I urge that the wrongs which have been done to my fellow citizens be righted and that those people's abilities be acknowledged in the armed services as well as in the civil service.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with sympathy to the representations made by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). If I said officers of French descent had not the required qualifications, that was not my intention at all. What I did mean to say was that we are short of officers of French descent. For instance, a lieutenant commander in the navy must necessarily have the age and experience required before he is promoted to the rank of admiral; that is obvious.

I have replied to the remarks made by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), as reported on page 2950 of the French debates, and I believe you will find there many reasons for the situation in which we have found ourselves.

We still want French-speaking officers. There is need for them in the navy, army and air force. There are many positions to be filled and the hon. member may be assured that French-speaking officers familiar with both tongues are always promoted. Indeed, they are promoted to higher ranks more often than the others, as was the case for brigadiers Allard and Bernatchez, whom I mentioned yesterday and who both are very distinguished officers. If there are others, I shall be very glad of it.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I understand that item 245 has been called, and that it is now the proposal to continue with the details as they are set out at page 269, the first group of which is under the heading of "Departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence". I wonder if the minister who is now responsible for civil defence would now make a statement in this connection? I notice that the subject of civil defence is not separated as a separate detail under the group of details connected with departmental administration.

Mr. Claxton: The minister responsible for civil defence is here. He might make his statement either now or, alternatively, at the conclusion of the discussion on the other items, whichever is the more suitable to hon. members.

Mr. Pearkes: I suggest, if I may, that it be done now, if that is suitable to the minister.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that the report and statement I am about to make involve, in large measure, work that was done under the direction of my colleague the Minister of National Defence when this matter was under his jurisdiction and before the transfer of duties to the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The purpose of civil defence is to defend the population of Canada and the property of the Canadian people against enemy action in time of war, and to take measures to reduce loss of life, to afford medical and other assistance to the civil population, and to mitigate the property damage that may be caused by such enemy action.

The type of civil defence that is perhaps best known—because of the part it played in the United Kingdom in the last war—is the protection of cities against air attack, the provision of medical, nursing, hospital and other assistance to aid the victims of air attack, and measures to deal with fire and other property damage.

This, however, is only one illustration of the type of work that falls within the general scope of civil defence. It includes planning for advance warning of attacks in liaison with the armed forces, for emergency food and welfare measures, and for protection of industrial plants and other essential facilities against sabotage. It has many other aspects with which I will deal in the course of my remarks.

It will be clear, I think, that on one boundary of its functions civil defence is related to the operations and responsibilities of our defence forces. Both civil defence and the armed forces are designed to afford physical protection to the people and property of the nation. However, the function of civil defence stops short of the actual military operations that would be required to deal with any direct attack in force on Canadian territory. That is the function of the navy, army, and air force. Civil defence is, in a sense, defence behind the lines, rather than on the lines of action—if any place can be said to be "behind the lines" in a modern war. Civil defence and the armed forces must, however, in many cases work very closely together.

In another aspect of its work, civil defence fits in with the operations of the R.C.M.P. and other police organizations dealing with subversive activity within the country. Civil defence is concerned with sabotage and the overt actions of enemy agents directed at the civil populace or at essential facilities. It is, however, primarily the function of the police to deal with espionage and other threats against internal security. The two functions overlap and clearly must be co-ordinated with one another.

I mention these points, and this relationship to the work of the armed forces on the one hand and to that of the police on the other, to emphasize that civil defence is simply one part of the general national organization that has to be established in times such as the present to deal with the dangers that would arise if war should occur.

In a broad sense, the national preparations fall into three parts: preparations to defend the country by military action; preparations to defend the people and the nation behind the lines; and preparations to deal with espionage and subversive elements.

It is the central sector of these preparations that we term "civil defence".

From the very nature of modern warfare and of modern weapons, it would be impossible, even using all the resources and manpower we might have available, to provide anything like complete protection for the civil population through civil defence. Safety is something that can only be relative in a world such as ours. Moreover, what can in practice be done must fall still further short of what in theory we could do.

Civil defence, industrial production, the armed forces and other essential national services will, in time of war, make competing demands on the manpower and production of the country. In time of war both manpower and production fall far short of the demands placed upon them. Priorities have to be established, and even needs of high importance have to be provided for to an extent less than we would wish.

The people of Canada would be the last to feel that the needs of civil defence, the protection of their own persons and property, should be provided at the expense of the striking forces of the country on which victory or defeat must ultimately depend. The armed forces must and will come first in time of war. For this reason, plans for civil defence have to be made with constant regard for the claims on our resources that will be made by the navy, army and air force.

Plans and preparations must also be made in the light of the best estimates that can be formed of the probable localities where danger will be greatest. It must be apparent that in a country of this size, with a widely scattered population, many of our people live in areas that can be regarded as almost entirely immune from air or other enemy attack. In such areas emphasis should be on mutual aid civil defence programs rather than on protective measures.

On the other hand, there are cities and particular localities which by reason of the activities carried on within them, or because of other factors which give them special importance, must be regarded as probable targets if any attack is to be expected. These considerations mean that while civil defence should concern every Canadian citizen, the need for active civil defence measures will not arise to the same degree in all localities, and it probably will not be possible for everyone to participate directly in civil defence.

Where civil defence protective measures are not taken, this will to a large degree mean, not that the individuals and communities are being left exposed and naked to the danger of attack, but that they are considered relatively safe and immune from attack.

With these broad considerations in mind I should like to set out that in 1948, because of world conditions, the government decided to reconstitute the nucleus of a civil defence planning organization. In November of that year Major General F. F. Worthington, well known throughout Canada for his distinguished war record, was appointed federal co-ordinator of civil defence. In succeeding months General Worthington visited all the provincial premiers to get their views and agreement on the best over-all civil defence plan for Canada.

He then studied plans and programs of European countries and the United States. In August 1949 a civil defence co-ordinating committee was established to bring together on a continuing basis representatives from all federal departments and agencies concerned with civil defence. This committee advises on civil defence policy, formulates plans for particular aspects of the problem and generally helps to develop collaboration with the provinces and the municipalities.

Canada's civil defence planning is now in an advanced stage. It draws on the plans of other countries that have had more direct experience than our country in the problem of civil defence. It is, however, related to and based on the fundamental federal character of this country, which embodies a division of responsibility among federal, provincial and municipal governments.

In civil defence, local planning and effort are all-important. It is essential to build an effective organization on the local level. Civil defence in one of its essential aspects is the assurance of the maintenance of normal community services. Fire protection for property obviously must be handled on a local basis, and most other measures for defence and assistance must be organized locally and operated by the citizens of the locality.

In civil defence the main operational responsibility, apart from over-all plans, training and co-ordination, must fall on the local municipal agencies that now maintain the normal amenities of life in Canada's urban communities. In a sense the success or failure of civil defence depends as much on the individual as on the community, since voluntary assistance and personal initiative and co-operation are of such importance. Civil defence can, moreover, be helped or hindered by the conduct of the people in the so-called danger area.

Obviously the defence and measures of assistance to be provided for an urban population with the courage and stamina of that of London, England, or of any other of the British communities that suffered so badly in the last war, can be organized much more effectively than that of a populace that might show less steadfastness. In both respects—in respect of readiness to aid in civil defence and in respect to conduct should danger arise—we are fortunate that we can rely on the qualities of the Canadian people.

Beyond individual and community efforts, the role of the provincial and federal governments is largely that of co-ordinating effort, assisting with local measures, and supplementing their preparations, particularly in areas where it is felt the danger is greatest.

To speed up civil defence planning throughout Canada, the first federal-provincial conference on civil defence was convened in Ottawa on August 24 last by the minister then in charge, the Minister of National Defence. This conference formed a continuing committee, made up of federal and provincial ministers and advisers, to further the organization and planning of the civil defence program. The federal government indicated that it would organize and pay for the considerable training program that will be later outlined.

On February 23, 1951, the continuing committee met in Ottawa. This is called the federal-provincial advisory council on civil defence. At this meeting it was announced that the federal government's responsibility would be as follows:

1. Civil defence organization within federal departments, the armed forces and other federal agencies.

2. Co-ordination with provincial and local authorities.

3. Information regarding general civil defence policy.

4. Co-operation with the United States and other countries.

5. Allocation of officers of the armed forces to work with provincial authorities to ensure co-ordination.

6. Provision of an advance warning system in co-operation with provincial and local authorities.

7. Protection against sabotage of federal works and support for provinces and municipalities.

8. Research and development in civil defence matters.

9. Civil defence staff courses and special courses on ABC defence and other technical matters, including payment of travelling expenses to and from the courses and living expenses while in attendance.

10. Support by federal agencies and armed forces in aid of local authorities in event of attack.

11. Provision of training aids, manuals and badges for civil defence workers.

12. Provision of radiological and technical instruments, respirators and special protective clothing for designated civil defence workers in selected areas, in connection with atomic, bacteriological and chemical warfare defence.

13. In municipalities having over 20,000 people, or other municipalities forming part of a target area, the supply and installation of sirens or other warning devices.

14. Payment of one-third of the cost of standardizing hose couplings, so as to increase interchangeability of fire-fighting equipment within a target area.

15. The provision of stirrup pumps and trailer pumps for training purposes.

16. Stockpiling of such medical supplies and equipment as might be considered necessary.

I might say that I have wanted for the last few weeks to point out the area of agreement between ourselves and the provinces, because I knew that some of the provinces felt it was important that the municipalities in the country be given this information. I have not done so because I thought that this was the first place to state the matter in detail as I have done.

On the provincial level, every province now has a minister responsible for civil defence, and a civil defence co-ordinator. Every province has a civil defence committee composed of senior provincial officials and—in some cases—representatives of province-wide voluntary and professional organizations who assist in the development of plans and the direction of programs.

I have indicated the national organization which has resulted from agreement with the provinces. The provincial organizations are to be integrated with the local community schemes. At the municipal level, almost all the larger cities in Canada have established civil defence committees and appointed civil defence directors. All communities of over 50,000 population, with only two exceptions, and a score or more of smaller cities, already have nucleus organizations in being and are getting down to the job of detailed planning, according to reports we received from the provincial ministers in charge.

Conferences also have been held both individually and collectively with many of the national voluntary organizations for the purpose of determining their relationship to the civil defence program at federal, provincial and local defence levels. Policy statements in this respect have been formulated, as I said, in consultation with the provincial governments. The extent to which these agencies will be integrated into provincial and local plans and the extent to which they will retain their identity in civil defence work rests, of course, with the provincial and municipal authorities.

During the two years of preparatory work on the federal level particular emphasis was placed on training, to prepare some hundreds of Canadians for positions of authority in our civil defence program. The civil defence co-ordinator, a senior member of his staff and two officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have attended a civil defence staff college in the United Kingdom. In addition eight federal employees were sent to United Kingdom schools that gave specialized training in civil defence work at the local level. In January, 1951, a Canadian civil defence staff course was established at Hull under the direction of Colonel Croteau, who had been trained in the United Kingdom. This school was maintained entirely at federal expense, and the federal government paid the travelling and living expenses of the provincial and municipal representatives who attended. Short term orientation training was given to 122 key federal, provincial and municipal officers, and to representatives of leading industrial and national voluntary organizations. These men and women returned to communities in all parts of Canada to help in the organization of civil defence activities in their areas.

In addition to those who have studied in the United Kingdom and the 122 who trained at Hull, 39 Canadian civilian physicians and nurses have attended United States courses on the medical and nursing aspects of atomic warfare, and 48 civilians have taken ABC warfare training provided by the Department of National Defence at Camp Borden. Armed force personnel have taken similar training in larger numbers. So, in all over two hundred Canadian civilians have been given instruction to prepare them for federal, provincial or municipal civil defence assignments, or for industry. These numbers will steadily increase during the coming months as we develop additional specialist courses and as the provincial governments establish their own training schools, there now being in addition to our own school in connection with civil defence another actually in being and one about to start. A technical school for instructors in civil defence has been established and is now beginning its courses at Connaught Ranges, near Ottawa. At this school alone it is hoped to train 400 instructors during the coming months. In addition to providing these various training facilities, the federal government will later supply a number of trained instructors for civil defence training schools set up by the provinces.

I should like to indicate in brief outline some of the other steps the government has taken to prepare plans for every major area of need in case of enemy attack on our population. Action is being taken in such fields as the following: liaison with the armed forces; advance warning; protection against sabotage; information; communications; transportation; health services; welfare services; industrial plant protection; food; and fire-fighting services. Of course I will not have time to comment on all these, but I do want to say a word about one or two of them.

The federal civil defence organization maintains close liaison with the chiefs of staff, as it necessarily must. On the basis of their assessment of the general situation, including the degree of risk, the relative vulnerability of Canadian communities as possible targets and the possible and probable scale of enemy attack, plans have been made and organization developed to minimize the effects of any such attack on the civilian population. Arrangements have also been made with the Department of National Defence for the closest possible liaison, at provincial and local levels, with the armed forces. Selected officers of the armed forces are being detailed to work in this liaison and advisory capacity. In addition there are plans covering the part the armed forces will play in support of civil defence organizations.

If an enemy attack should be directed against Canadian territory it is important to have an effective way of immediately warning both the armed forces and the civil defence authorities. The Minister of National Defence recently announced plans to organize a ground observer corps of 150,000 civilian volunteers to be the eyes and ears of Canada's warning system, supplementing radar and other service devices and observers. Reports from these ground observers and from other sources will come into the air defence communication centres, where civil defence liaison will be maintained on a 24-hour basis. In that way information can be immediately transmitted to local civil defence communication systems and the appropriate civil defence organizations put on the alert. It will be a federal responsibility to provide the information to the local communication network. From that point local authorities will carry on their work.

The federal government has also undertaken the preparation and publication of certain basic pamphlets, which obviously are important in a matter of this kind. The first of these, "Organization for civil defence" was produced last November. It has been widely distributed and well received by civil defence authorities in Canada and other countries. Manuals on individual basic training subjects and a basic training plan have also been widely distributed, and training memoranda and bulletins are regularly sent out. Useful publications and films produced in the United Kingdom and the United States are also being used or adapted for use in Canada. A second publication entitled "Technical guidance on the provision of air raid shelters" is now available for technical use. A non-technical pamphlet, "How to strengthen domestic basements", will soon be released. Other federal publications now being printed or under preparation include "Structural effects of the atomic bomb"; "How to survive"; "Zoning and dispersal"; "Industrial protection"; "Basic and full first aid", and manuals on various organizational aspects of civil defence covering health services, welfare services and so on.

It is of fundamental importance for civil defence to maintain communications. To prepare appropriate plans to ensure this a civil defence communications section has been established in the Department of Transport, and a civil defence telecommunications committee, comprising all the leading national telegraph, telephone and radio agencies and associations has also been formed and is now at work. Arrangements have been made by this committee to study the communications problem under four headings: line services, point to point radio, radio broadcasting systems, and air raid communications systems.

The federal civil defence health planning group, which has been at work for some months, is responsible for developing overall plans for health services and medical care that will serve as a general pattern for provincial and municipal civil defence services. The national professional health associations and voluntary organizations are co-operating fully. This group, like other federal committees, includes a number of subcommittees or working parties dealing with such subjects as casualty services, sanitation services, industrial medical services, mental hygiene, nutritional problems, and medical and health supplies. The working party on civil defence casualty services has now completed its preliminary plans for first aid, ambulance service, and emergency hospital accommodation. The working party for laboratory services, which deals with clinical laboratory services, public health procedures and biological warfare, is now preparing its report. The same is being done for other health problems.

I do not propose to deal with the question of research. This is a matter that more specifically comes under the Minister of National Defence, who would be better able to deal with it. One need only point out, with regard to biological and chemical warfare, that very significant work has been done in the research division of the Department of National Defence under Dr. Solandt.

One of the responsibilities assumed by the federal government was to arrange for collaboration with civil defence authorities in the United States. A joint meeting was held in Ottawa on February 21 of this year to agree on measures of co-operation and mutual aid between our two countries in the event of attack. As a result of this meeting, there will be full co-operation on civil defence information, research, planning, organization and training. The object is to ensure that civil defence will be carried on between Canada and the United States as if there were no border.

The agreement, which was confirmed on March 26 by an exchange of notes between the two governments, constitutes the basis for continued co-operation between the federal civil defence authorities in each country, as well as direct co-operation between provincial and state authorities and municipalities where that is desirable. This will make possible direct working relationships in civil defence between provinces and states—for example, between British Columbia and the state of Washington, or between the prairie provinces and the north central states, or between Ontario and Michigan, Ohio and New York. It will also facilitate co-operation between cities like Vancouver and Seattle, or my own city of Windsor and Detroit.

Preparation for civil defence, Mr. Chairman, like modern warfare itself, involves the work and effort of the people of the country—men, women, and even children have a part to play. If we are to be prepared, there must not only be the fullest co-operation of all governments, but also wholehearted public support. The greater part of what is required to be done today calls for time and patient effort, preparation and planning. In the months that lie immediately ahead it will be possible, on all three levels of government, to make accelerated progress in building what I know all governmental authorities have in mind—a compact civil defence organization, well planned, well organized, well trained and as adequate as we can make it to meet whatever the uncertain future may hold for this country's civilian population.

It must always be kept in mind that there are great uncertainties centring around any planning for civil defence, uncertainties as to the possible time, place and scale of enemy attack. We have to do the best we can on the basis of such assessments as can be formed of the urgency of preparation, the state of international tension, the possibility or probability of the actual outbreak of hostilities, and the degree of risk and probable scale of attack. We recognize, all of us, that we cannot afford to be complacent or to content ourselves with inadequate preparations. Nor can we afford to develop an elaborate organization prematurely, and have it rust away in idleness. We must maintain a proper perspective, a proper balance. We must guard against needless diversion of time, manpower, efforts and funds from the main job of production to support our positive military defence efforts.

Above all, we must remember that for a community there is no hiding place. If war, total war, strikes this nation every man, woman and child in every possible target area must develop—as I know they will if that should be necessary—that resolute courage in the face of danger that has always been the mark of our own fighting men. For those living in less vulnerable areas, the instinct to help their neighbours must take a practical and planned form. We must not let the threat of enemy action alarm us into paralysing the life and productive capacity of this country. If we are forced to accept war, we must also accept danger to ourselves at home as well as to our servicemen. We must prepare against enemy attack on our civilian population, while knowing that no preparation, however complete, can cancel out the risk. That is the fact that each one of us must learn to live with. It is the challenge, I think, of our generation, to face the terrors of modern war and not to flinch; to face them, if they should ever come, in the determination that by courage and devotion to the principles we know to be right, we shall win through to a better world and a better life.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, when the defence estimates were being considered last September, I brought this matter of civil defence to the attention of the committee. At that time I made it clear that there was no desire to alarm the population of this country, but at the same time we should make plans. Since that time, I have been very much disturbed, especially the other night when I read a speech made by General Worthington concerning this matter. I am going to read some of it into the record, because I think we have to adopt a position that is absolutely clear. Either it is worth while doing something about this now or, as the minister has said, we might delay doing something about it until there was an actual state of war. I quote now from a press dispatch in the Ottawa Journal of May 7 what that distinguished soldier Major General Worthington said about it in a speech on V-E day at Aylmer:

> . . . the General said there was no place on this continent which was not subject to invasion. In a future war America would not be protected by the barriers of two oceans and an Arctic icecap.
> "Today the front line is your own front yard," he said. He warned that the method of warfare now was to smash at the civil population in order to disrupt the home front and the productive capacity of a nation.
> General Worthington said the civilian population would need to be trained to know what to do in the event of invasion to minimize the effect on morale and production.

Sir, if there was anything further that was needed to cause alarm, it was an article appearing on May 8, generally carried by the press throughout Canada but which I happened to see in the Toronto Telegram. It carries the headline, "War Means A-Bombs Wipe Out U.S. Cities; Truman Raps MacArthur." We are not going to bring the MacArthur affair into this discussion. We are concerned about what Truman said concerning the possibility of warfare on this continent. The article reads:

> Washington, May 8. President Truman told the United States last night an atomic war with Russia is "a real possibility," but it would be more likely under the policies of General Douglas MacArthur.
> Mr. Truman said atomic warfare might wipe out some of the major cities of the U.S., and "I do not want to be responsible for bringing that about."

Further on in the same article he states:

> "The thing that is at stake in this debate may be atomic war. Our foreign policy is not a political issue. It is a matter of life and death. It is a matter of the future of mankind."

I again say that we should either seriously consider this matter or say that it is a matter we may delay until something really does happen. I say to the minister that the age of delay is gone as certainly as the age of chivalry. Certainly, our United States friends found that out at Pearl Harbor. Nations today do not bother declaring war or giving a month's or two months' notice that they are going to make war. Possibly the last time this custom was followed was at the battle of Fontenoy, where the French said "English gentlemen, fire first." I have quoted these two authorities, Major General Worthington, the present head of the civil defence body of Canada, and the president of a great country like the United States, who have said definitely that this type of war is a possibility and may occur. It would appear to me that in this matter we are sitting on a bomb. If anything further was needed to cause alarm so far as I was concerned, it was the speech by the minister which has been referred to in the house several times, in which he attempted to whip some white fighting fury into a group gathered for a course up at Connaught Ranges. While the minister may have been misquoted, there was no doubt whatever of the result, because the heading in the Ottawa Journal whips up fury against the Soviet threat; and I may tell the minister that I am all for it. But I was amazed that a placid man like the minister can be whipped into such a fighting fury that he came out with words of this type. The speech goes down as one of the great fighting speeches in history.

An hon. Member: Fighting Paul.

Mr. Blair: It was something like that of Henry V before the battle of Harfleur in which he said:

> Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more;
> Or close the wall up with our English dead.

History is full of great quotations like that. But today the minister comes up with another calm speech. He seems to be in varying moods in regard to this matter since he has joined the martial branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Today he comes up with a long speech on organization; it was a most quiet one, and he spoke in just about the way that you would plan out a campaign for something that you were going to do across Canada with regard to a welfare project. But two days before he was simply fighting. Possibly he looked at these people gathered out at Connaught Ranges and said to himself: "These people have just come in for a course; they are not too greatly interested". Then he ranged forth with this "every man must do his duty" sort of thing. I am not criticizing the minister for that. Thank God that there is somebody in this government who is trying to arouse the people. So far as this country is concerned, I have been amazed that, when we are getting soldiers killed in Korea, we talk about forming brigades and about battle squadrons of the air force. This country is at war, but nobody has ever said that this country is at war. For that I blame the Minister of National Defence, the government and the Prime Minister.

I am going home this week end and nobody will ever mention it. People are going about their everyday tasks. They do not seem to think that we are in the precarious position that we in fact are in at the present time. There is something wrong. Either we in this country are at war and we are in danger—and the Minister of National Health and Welfare in conjunction with the Minister of National Defence saw fit to make a speech today on an important subject—or we are not. We are one place or the other. So far as I am concerned, I may say that disliking these people with this other ideology as I do I have no faith whatever that there would not be a diversionary raid or a sneak attack; and their history has never proved that they can be trusted or that we are still existing in an age of chivalry. As I say, we should have more than plans on paper.

On Sunday I attended a meeting of the eastern Ontario branch of the Canadian Legion and I heard the discussion there. I heard a fine speech on civil defence. The main part of it was that the Legion itself was anxious to do something about it. They offered to co-operate in any way possible. I know of towns who have attempted to do something about it, with all the best spirit and will of good Canadian citizens. One town in my riding went to the trouble last winter of organizing for civil defence, feeling that there was some need for it. On Sunday I spoke to one of those men and said: What are you doing about this? He said: Well, we have had another meeting since. Mr. Chairman, as far as civil defence is concerned, this country will not be defended by meetings. We have got to get beyond that stage. We have got to get down to something really practical.

Last year when I took up this matter I made what I thought was a thorough review so far as danger in this country is concerned. I discussed the matter of atom bomb attack, or explosive bomb attack, germ warfare, chemical warfare and that sort of thing. I did bring the matter before the House of Commons, and two or three times in the course of that address I stated that it was far from my wish to do anything to alarm the Canadian people. But it is some eight and a half months since that speech was made. There was discussion then, and other hon. members in the house supported my view.

While those plans shown by the minister today may exist on paper, what would happen if this thing should suddenly come upon us, or if there was another Pearl Harbor? If the matter of organization is a big thing, it would appear to me that much more should have been accomplished in that time with regard to the provinces and municipalities. To date all that has been done is a matter of arrangements, paper work and plans. We should have something more practical than that.

Again, Mr. Chairman, without any idea of causing alarm to the people, I am looking for quiet organization of an effective unit of civil defence in this district. I think we should be getting on further with the job than we have been. Let us consider what could happen if the capital, Ottawa, were bombed some time. It could be bombed. It might not be an industrial target, but it could be bombed for the effect on morale. Or suppose if in this area the places where we develop electricity were bombed; and without mentioning any names, I may say there are some close to our capital. There are one or two in this valley where a great deal of the industrial electricity of Ontario is developed. Some form of sabotage or even a sneak bombing attack could put those out of business and tie up all our industries. One also wonders, as far as the capital is concerned, even if civil defence is something apart from the Department of National Defence, what protection we have in this area in the way of anti-aircraft protection. I am not aware of what the plans are so far as the Minister of National Defence is concerned. But I know that all the anti-aircraft protection I have seen in this area is an excellent anti-aircraft unit in Lanark and Renfrew, of which I feel extremely proud. There are good officers; there are good N.C.O.'s. But as with any other unit, they are having difficulty in getting people into it. That unit is armed with a type of anti-aircraft gun which would be considered antique under present-day standards.

In cities like Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton or Montreal, I wonder just how much the organization has gone forward towards the establishment of banks for blood or plasma in depots outside those cities; because it would be foolish to believe that a depot established in a city could do that type of work. I wonder how far that work has progressed, or have we wasted eight and a half or nine months in getting down to really practical work and to something more than plans on paper?

If one can believe even General Worthington himself or the President of the United States, this is a matter of vital importance. It does not look to me as though this would be really an expensive arm of defence, because a great deal of it depends on training. While the minister is training in the school at Connaught men who will bring out an organization of civil defence, or he cited the fact that at some time in the future four hundred people would be well trained in civil defence, it is going to take a great deal longer to train people in their capacity as fire wardens and above all—and I emphasize the phrase "above all"—to train people in first aid to attend to casualties. You cannot train first-aid people overnight. It just cannot be done. The longer they train, the more efficient they become. If it is necessary at all to train people, and if this horrible thing should ever happen to us, you are going to need many skilled workers, so far as courses in first aid or the St. John Ambulance type of course in first aid is concerned. You are going to have to train practically a whole populace, because everybody must understand this. Then you must thoroughly train those people who are capable of dealing with the type of injuries received under bombing attacks—and that will give you any type of injury, stuff that you never see except in mine accidents or in very severe industrial accidents nowadays. That is what you are going to have to do, and that is going to take time; because if a city is going to receive a bombing attack, certainly the hospitals can be obliterated at the same time. So far, I have not seen any sign in Canada, or in the Ottawa valley, that any person has made a practical survey of anything that could act as a shelter for these people.

I pointed out that problem last September, and I have not seen or heard of any person in my own town, or in the adjacent towns in my own constituency, making a survey so far as town halls, church halls or anything of that type is concerned where casualties could be accommodated.

So far there has been no move to reorganize the excellent work done by the Red Cross in the blood donor service. Once or twice I have heard of some enthusiastic groups who said they were going to blood test and group test all the people in a certain place. That is not going to solve the problem, because in a bomb attack all communications would be disrupted. It would be absolutely foolish to attempt to take a list of blood donor volunteers, call them up and get them to come into a certain point, because, with communications disrupted, and that sort of thing, it would be absolutely impossible. It would be an excellent thing if every person had a tag around his neck giving his blood grouping.

Depots must be established, and those depots should contain plasma in large quantities. If this thing is going to happen then we must not be caught napping. We would need depots for plasma, for blood, for medical supplies and there should be even depots with possible food supplies. Therefore I look at this picture as it might occur in the Ottawa valley if the capital here were bombed. Work should be done in all the towns in the surrounding area. Every town should be surveyed to find out the possible hospital accommodation, the possible shelter for civilians. That sort of thing should be done. I say to the minister it is discouraging when you find in a large town a group of enthusiastic people who, in all good faith, formed an organization last year, sometime around February or March, and were ready to do anything, ready to go ahead and do something—they had another small meeting—and now the whole matter is dropped. Nothing was done about training people in first-aid courses of the St. John Ambulance, in the Red Cross courses or in anything like that. As I said last fall, I do not believe that people will lose their keenness, so far as this matter is concerned, if the government will say, as President Truman has said to the people of the United States: there is a danger. That is something that has gone through my head. I may say I am absolutely frustrated so far as this is concerned when I think that we enlist people to go to war, and casualty lists are appearing in the papers, but when you ask the average citizen of this country if we are at war he will say: "I don't know." Nothing has been done. Some time ago a great man said that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." I certainly think that if this matter is worth touching at all it is worth getting at right now, and right down to the roots of the matter, and that would be the organizations in these towns.

Certainly the first big thing that could be done is the training of people to handle casualties. As I said before, you are not going to do that in two or three days. If a medical course takes about six or eight years to complete, it is not possible to organize and train civilians to deal with the type of casualties that we are going to have in a matter of a week or two after we have had some intimation that there might be a bombing attack or a diversionary raid on this country.

I am disappointed, having brought this matter to the attention of the house last year, and in all honesty covered all the branches of possible danger to Canadians, to find that after eight and a half months we have only a plan existing on paper. That has been a great disappointment. I covered all these matters last year. At the same time in that speech I pointed out the difficulty. With the idea of doing something about this, people have written to Washington to get some circulars. I have not yet seen any circulars put out for the people of Canada. I did see something in a magazine the other day which told you how to take care of yourself if there was an atom bomb attack, but some of it seemed a little unusual to me, because if there is an atom bomb attack I do not think you are going to get much chance to do some of the things they suggested. However, I was glad to see somebody doing something about it.

This matter of training the people should have been one of the first things done by this committee which has been set up. It would be very easy to get into operation across Canada organizations like St. John Ambulance, the Canadian Legion and the Canadian Red Cross. If nothing comes of the training, all well and good. It will not be expensive because all this will be largely voluntary and the expense will be practically nil.

It is an advantage to learn some of these things. There is no reason why these people should not have been busy on the job. It is going to take three or four months thoroughly to train people in first aid and in the care of casualties. As I said before, you are not going to do it the same day that you expect that something like this is going to happen. Therefore I implore the minister, even if he has made out plans on paper to deal with this matter, to do something concrete about it. I am always suspicious of plans. May I suggest to the minister that, in his capacity as minister in charge of this work, he take a trip across Canada. I would like to hear him make fifty or a hundred fighting speeches like the one he made at Connaught. If that were done then we would be getting some place, and the people of Canada would be alerted to the possible danger we are in. If there is any co-operation needed, he certainly will get all the co-operation from this side of the house and from this party; but we want to get on with the job, and we want to get something done.

While I like the idea of the elaborate plans he has made, I say this to him: Be careful you do not get bogged down in paper work and get nothing practical done.

Mr. Noseworthy: Following what the minister said, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has his department, or any of the civil defence officers, given any consideration to or done anything to prevent the present trend of providing all our hospital or civilian hospital accommodation in the heart of the large cities? I am thinking now of the city of Toronto, for instance, where we have just completed what is probably one of the best children's hospitals on the continent. We have built it right in the heart of the city, next door to the Toronto General Hospital. We are building another hospital there. We are going to find ourselves with the bulk of the civilian hospital accommodation in the Toronto district all located within a few city blocks of each other. I wonder whether the minister has thought just what would happen to his civilian defence organization in the city of Toronto if a bomb dropped somewhere near the Toronto General Hospital. I find that is true in Toronto, and I understand Montreal is at present about to build hospitals on what is known as the Mile of Mercy, where practically all hospital accommodation is to be centralized. What is being done to see that in future, in view of the kind of world in which we live, something cannot be done to see that hospitals are not built in the centres of cities?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member has touched upon a point which, of course, would be in the mind of anyone dealing with this problem. I know it was very much in the mind of the Minister of National Defence when he was charged with the responsibility for the matter, and it is very much in our minds.

I would point out, as I said in my statement, that in the pursuit of our plans we are observing the federal character of the country, and that means collaborating with those who are closer to the operations than we can be, sitting at the centre in a federal state.

With regard to the particular situation in mind, only ten days ago we discussed this and kindred matters with Sir John Hodsoll, head of the civil defence program in the United Kingdom, and with Governor Caldwell, civil defence co-ordinator in the United States. We have made known our views. These will be studied by the responsible authorities in Ontario and, I presume, through them, by the authorities in the city of Toronto.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask a question, while we are on this matter of civil defence. The minister has made a comprehensive statement. I do not think he missed a single detail, and I could not criticize it in any respect. I am glad he went to the proper source to get information on the subject, because what he said sounded to me like a duplication of civil defence in Great Britain during the last war. I do not think it could be any more practical or up to date. But in this complicated country of ours I hope it will not be necessary to get an amendment to the British North America Act for the purpose of financing this program, as between the provinces and the dominion. Would the minister tell us how the expense of bringing this program into effect is to be apportioned among federal, provincial and municipal authorities?

Mr. Martin: My good friend has complimented me upon the completeness of the statement. I am afraid however that my statement does not deserve his compliment, because apparently it has not convinced the hon. member, or has not indicated to him that I have already dealt with that problem. We had a conference in Ottawa under the chairmanship of my colleague the Minister of National Defence about six or seven weeks ago. This conference was with representatives from the provinces. Upon that occasion we discussed the area of responsibility, both from the point of view of function and that of finance. I set out today the extent to which at this time the federal government concedes it is prepared to go. I pointed out that we are prepared to undertake the financial responsibility for the training of instructors, both those who would become leaders in communities and those who would become civil defence instructors as well as technical instructors in communities of others who will carry on in connection with this work. We will be responsible for that financially. Already we have paid the way of two hundred people from all parts of this country to Ottawa, and provided for their maintenance while here to take these courses. We are also undertaking the responsibility for providing education material, that is a responsibility we have assumed. We also are making provisions for sirens in communities of twenty thousand and over, and we are accepting about one-third of the cost of hose couplings, to effect the standardization of hose couplings. We have undertaken to pay for the cost of certain equipment for civil defence, and so on.

We do not assume for one moment the full financial responsibility. We say we have a role to play, that the municipalites have a role to play and that the provinces have a role to play. But I may say that at that conference, under the chairmanship of the Minister of National Defence, there was a wide area of agreement.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I would point out to my hon. friend that in most communities of Canada and in all cities of fifty thousand and over, with the exception of two, civil defence directors have been appointed and are actually functioning. Their salaries and their operations, except for those things I have indicated, are being assumed primarily by the municipalities and the provinces.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the general question of civil defence. I am afraid I shall have to take exception to some of the observations of the hon. member for Lanark. Apparently he considers nothing has been done by the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the federal authorities generally, to deal with this problem.

I would not suggest for one moment that any of us, particularly the two ministers who have been directly responsible, are satisfied with the situation in the matter of civil defence. However it is a big problem which cannot be solved overnight. I say these two ministers are to be complimented upon the way in which the problem has been approached, and upon the progress already made.

I can speak for no part of the country other than that which I represent, but I do say that, through the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments, as well as the authorities of the city of Halifax and the county of Halifax, a great deal has already been done in that area to set up the civil defence organization and to commence preparations for whatever eventuality may lie ahead of us.

I think there is local responsibility in connection with this problem. I submit to the hon. member for Lanark that many of the conditions he described were the kind of thing for which local authorities should accept responsibility. Civil defence is of importance to many localities in the maritime provinces, but particularly to the city of Halifax which I have the honour to represent. Halifax was designated as an important target area by the committee set up some time ago by the Department of National Defence. The residents of Halifax know from past experience of the unexpectedness with which an emergent situation, one creating problems which could not possibly be met without the help of a carefully co-ordinated organization, can arise. As was set out so fully in the statement this afternoon by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the federal government has assumed certain important responsibilities for the training of personnel, the providing of assistance to local organizations and local governments, the acquiring of necessary equipment and providing of assistance in various ways to local organizations. I know in the case of Halifax we have had the finest possible co-operation from the federal and the provincial authorities. The provincial government has designated Colonel the Hon. A. B. De Wolfe as the minister of the local government responsible for civil defence matters within the province. That gentleman has undertaken his responsibility in a practical and energetic way.

A number of key personnel have already taken the course at the training school which has been in operation for some months in Hull, Quebec, across the river from this city. Those key personnel have gone back to take their places in the local organizations and undertake the necessary jobs of organizing and training of individuals who will form the lower echelons of these organizations. This work has been pressed forward with great energy in Halifax. A civil defence committee has been organized on which are represented the city of Halifax, the town of Dartmouth and the municipalities in the county of Halifax. That committee has undertaken a survey of the needs of the area with respect to civil defence. I think that is the type of survey the hon. member for Lanark was referring to. This survey, which has been pressed forward, has indicated a number of problems which are common to similar areas throughout the country.

It has also indicated a particular and fundamental problem which faces the city of Halifax. I submit to the minister that this problem will have to be faced. I refer to the question of the adequacy of the means of communication to and from Halifax. In order to indicate the nature of this problem I should like to describe briefly the situation in which the city of Halifax finds itself.

It is an urban development situated on a peninsula approximately four and a half miles long and about two miles wide. The only connection with the mainland is by a neck of land about a mile and a quarter to two miles and a half wide. There is a civilian population of about 100,000 on the peninsula with a density of about 24 persons to the acre, which is about half the density of a normal London borough.

In addition to the residential population on the peninsula there is also H.M.C.S. Dockyard, with headquarters of the flag officers of the Atlantic coast. There is also the headquarters of the eastern command of the Canadian army, as well as a number of important army depots and establishments. There is the headquarters of the eastern command of the Royal Canadian Air Force. There are important and extensive port facilities located at both extremities of the peninsula and lining the western shore of the harbour for some three and a half miles. There are the plant and drydocks of Halifax Shipyards Limited which are an important element in the shipbuilding and ship repair facilities of the Canadian Atlantic coast.

All this indicates the importance of the Halifax area and the necessity of making adequate plans to meet the needs of civil defence. One of the main heads in planning for an emergency is that of the evacuation of civil personnel from the danger areas as well as the evacuation of casualties which might be suffered in case of attack. In the case of Halifax, the problem of the evacuation of civilian population and the movement of casualties is made more difficult by the road and rail facilities now serving the area.

The peninsula which I have described is served by a double-track railroad which traverses the one and a quarter mile wide neck of land and then proceeds to the southern extremity of the peninsula. There are only two highways which traverse this peninsula and give access and egress for road transport to the mainland. One road is situated at the northern end of the neck of land and the other is situated at the southern end.

Both these roads are inadequate at present for the rush hour traffic. The province and the city have long-range plans for the improvement of both roads and the elimination of the bottlenecks which exist at both extremities of the neck of land joining Halifax to the mainland. However, these are long-range plans which will take some considerable time to realize in full measure. The Halifax advisory committee on civil defence has made submissions both to the provincial authorities and to the federal civil defence authorities indicating the immediate need from a civil defence point of view of facilities being provided for the evacuation of the civilian population and such casualties as may be suffered over these two narrow bottlenecks. They have requested that from a civil defence point of view the federal and provincial governments work out some program under which the necessary parts of this work can be done immediately. Until that is done it will not be possible to undertake the long-range plan. We in Halifax would like to feel, not in three years or something of that order but if possible within a few months, that if an emergency should arise we will not be faced with tremendous and almost insurmountable difficulties in dealing with the problem of evacuation.

This matter also has some importance from the point of view of defence. As I have indicated, Halifax is the headquarters of the three defence services in that area, and in addition there are very important defence installations in the city and the immediately surrounding country. If an emergency should arise during which important military operations had to be undertaken immediately, we might have the evacuation of casualties and the civil population going on at the same time. This would result in inadequate road facilities having to cope with the almost insuperable problem of evacuation, and the defence services using the same transportation and communications facilities for their very essential and important purposes.

I ask the minister to give this problem earnest consideration. We in Halifax and Nova Scotia recognize the share of responsibility that must be accepted by municipal and provincial governments in matters of this kind, but I would ask the minister to consider the problem from the point of view of both civil defence and national defence so that an early solution may be found. I think it is a problem that has to be faced by all levels of governments concerned, and I request the minister to give it his most serious consideration.

Mr. Fulton: As the minister pointed out in reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, his statement dealt with the basis of division as among dominion, provincial and municipal authorities of the financial and physical responsibility for the program of civil defence. There are, however, a certain number of questions of detail which remain unanswered and do not appear clearly at least from listening to the minister's statement; and I rather doubt if they will appear clearly when we have had an opportunity to read it. The most important question can be put in this form, perhaps. Have the civil defence authorities reached the point yet where they can estimate the total over-all cost of the program of civil defence they have outlined? I do not mean what it will cost to put a program of civil defence into effect in the event of enemy attack, because I am sure that could not be estimated with any degree of accuracy. I mean the cost of putting into organizational practicality the plans the minister now has on paper. Is there any estimate yet as to what those plans will cost, covering such things, for instance, as the adoption of a uniform coupling in fire-fighting services, the training of first aid personnel, and so on? These are things that can be estimated now. Has any estimate been made of the cost of placing this program in a state of readiness within the fiscal year? If there is such an estimate, what shares are to be borne by the dominion, the province and the municipality respectively?

I think those questions should be answered if possible, so the authorities concerned may know approximately what they will have to meet in the way of expenditure in order to put this program on a practical basis. Then I would like to bring to the minister's attention the position of the smaller municipalities which normally would not be likely targets, certainly not targets with any high priority, but which by reason of defence installations in the purely military sense or defence production installations, which would not exist except in connection with either military or industrial preparedness, would have a much higher potential priority as targets than otherwise would be the case. Such a municipality, by virtue of its increased vulnerability and increased importance, must now undertake extra civil defence preparations. Is the cost of those preparations to be borne entirely by the municipality? In other words, is there simply a cut and dried program dividing the cost into such a percentage to be paid by the federal government, such a percentage by the provincial government, and such a percentage by the municipality, or will there be room for special cases to be dealt with on an individual basis? I agree with the hon. member for Lanark that it is not wise to alarm people unduly, but on the other hand neither is it wise to ignore these problems. Having that in mind I hesitate to name a particular area, but I have one very definitely in mind; and I think probably the minister knows what I mean. In that case the municipality, by reason of the sort of thing I have been describing, could certainly be expected now to have a very much higher priority as a target than it would otherwise. Therefore I think some special attention should be paid such places, both because of their higher priority and because of the fact that they are smaller centres and normally would not have available the resources necessary to meet this situation which has been thrust upon them. They should receive special attention from that point of view, and special assistance in working out civil defence preparations. I believe there should be some leeway so they might also receive a more generous proportion of assistance from the federal authorities than would be the case under a straight percentage basis which might be worked out for the over-all program. I would be grateful if the minister would deal with those questions in the course of this discussion.

Mr. Drew: If that covers the discussion of civil defence at this stage—

Mr. Fulton: Are we to have answers from the minister?

Mr. Martin: I do not want to interrupt, but perhaps I could deal with it very briefly.

Mr. Drew: I was not going to refer to civil defence.

Mr. Martin: With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Halifax, I should point out to him that this matter was fully discussed with the Minister of National Defence when he had this subject under his direction. He intimated in my presence, when I took over, that we would not be prepared at this stage certainly to assist the scheme the hon. member has discussed. Undoubtedly there is a great deal of merit in the proposition, but it is one which would have not only a civil defence but a long-term value. Highways are matters that do not come directly under the jurisdiction of the federal authority. I am afraid this is a matter that will have to be discussed and negotiated between the provincial government and the municipality concerned.

In answer to the hon. member for Kamloops, I cannot give the estimated total cost with regard to the over-all plan, because that depends upon the action to be taken by the provinces. In some cases their budgets have been completed, while in others they have not, as in the case of Ontario. I do not single that province out by way of discrimination, but I just mention it as one which comes to mind. I believe that in the province of British Columbia they have appropriated some money, but what the total cost would be in that province I cannot say at this stage. These will be matters we will have to face as we go along.

With regard to the particular situation the hon. member brought to my attention, I can only say that at this stage it would be impossible for me to give any definite reply, not because I do not want to but because, as he understands, the municipalities are the creatures of the provinces. The provinces have, at this recent conference, accepted their area of responsibility. It is a matter that would have to be first discussed with them.

So far as the blood bank is concerned, and its great desirability that the member for Lanark mentioned, I fully agree. I would point out to him, however, that the process of building up this bank is under way and has been under way for two months. The Red Cross have been diligent, and are undertaking this work with characteristic vigour. I can only say that with regard to the matter of training, which as the hon. member for Lanark has pointed out is important, that too is well under way. We are not attempting to do the first-aid training or to establish first-aid schools. That is being left to the proper authorities. We have had discussions with the St. John Ambulance people, for instance, and they are undertaking this work in conjunction with provincial and municipal schemes. I believe the policy on first aid will commend itself to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: Since the minister says it is not possible to give an estimate of the total over-all cost of the program, because not all the provinces and I suppose not all the municipalities have yet prepared their budgets for their share of the cost—

Mr. Martin: Had not completed their budgets.

Mr. Fulton: —had not completed their budgets, could he tell us whether there is an estimate of the total cost to the dominion for its share of this program? If so, can he tell us what that amount is?

Just before the minister answers that, could he deal with the other question of the locality which has a vital defence installation in its area? Do I understand the procedure is, if the municipality wishes special assistance, to go first to the province, and the province is accepting that chain of communication? Is it a matter to be discussed at all between the municipality and the dominion, by virtue of the fact that it is a defence installation which is in question?

Mr. Martin: With the province.

Mr. Fulton: And the answer to the first part of the question?

Mr. Martin: With regard to the first part of the question, the estimated federal amount for the present year totals $4,196,202. Because of the necessity of placing orders now for equipment, materials and supplies which will not be delivered until later, authority is also being asked for permission to enter into commitments against funds for 1952-53 totalling $900,000; and also for a further period, funds totalling $1,822,500.

Mr. Drew: If that disposes of the review of civil defence at this stage, recognizing the item will of course come up again at a later point when it is called—

Mr. Martin: I hope not tonight.

Mr. Drew: That, of course, is a matter of procedure. I wish to return to a discussion of the manner in which we are to deal with the estimates that are before us. Since this subject was mentioned last night, I have had an opportunity of examining in some detail the estimates prepared in the books that were mentioned by the hon. member for Melfort. These books to which he refers, under the separate headings of estimates for navy, for army and for air, covering the total estimates presented to the parliament of the United Kingdom, embrace within 751 pages details of each of the votes in a way that makes it possible to examine this subject in an orderly and intelligible manner. I would point out that these details cover 751 pages, whereas the total of our estimates, both the basic estimates and the details covering all the thirty-two departments with which we deal, cover 540 pages. Yet this one department has 751 pages of detailed estimates and explanations.

It does not stop there. They are then referred to the committee on estimates, and that committee has an opportunity of considering these in detail, and obtaining information from officials who can deal with it. I have expressed my own belief on different occasions that we should have the widest inquiry. Since we are not permitted to have that, then I believe we certainly should proceed along the line which has been found so satisfactory at Westminster. The Minister of National Defence has details on a basis similar to these which are before us. There would be no difficulty in having those mimeographed and having them back within three or four days. In any event, I understand it is not the intention to proceed with these estimates on Monday. Certainly by Tuesday or Wednesday at the latest mimeographed copies of the details which are in the possession of the minister, perhaps in the house at this moment, could be made available to the members.

In order to bring my suggestion to a head I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes):

That the committee now rise and report progress, and that further consideration of estimates Nos. 245 to 252 inclusive be deferred until such time as they have been submitted to detailed study by a select committee, reported to the house and again referred to this committee.

Mr. Coldwell: This is a motion to rise and report. Is it debatable?

The Deputy Chairman: Before I deal with this point, I understand that the hon. member is raising a point of order. I was under the impression that earlier in the day the committee had given its unanimous consent to a certain procedure to be followed from then on, namely, that we should proceed by calling the various detailed sums as they appear under various headings at page 269. I do not have before me copies of Hansard as taken by our reporters earlier in the day; but when I heard the motion made by the leader of the opposition I immediately asked the clerk to see that those copies be brought down if at all possible, in order to make sure if a procedure had already been adopted. I want to ascertain if that is so. If that is so, the motion made by the leader of the opposition may not be in order at this time. There is a procedure to be followed before the committee, and this one calls for a different procedure. It seems to me that there is a difficulty there with which I am confronted. I will read the motion again, because I want to make sure—

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt you, Mr. Chairman, but may I point out that the fact that that procedure has not been accepted unanimously is demonstrated without any difficulty by the fact that we have all afternoon been having a general discussion under this item. There was no separate item called to raise the subject of civil defence. It was simply widening out to cover the two ministers' activities. That has been covered. The item is still before us, and this is the appropriate place at which to deal with matters of this kind. There was no general agreement. The question was asked as to what the intention was. The hon. member for Nanaimo then quite properly raised the question of civil defence which had not been covered. We now have that before us. It is clear from all of the discussion which followed that there was no unanimous consent to limit the debate. For that very reason the debate has proceeded on the assumption that it is open; and I would submit, as has been pointed out by the leader of the C.C.F. party, that a motion to rise is not debatable.

Mr. Claxton: Speaking to the point of order, if I may, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that when the committee met the chairman asked if it was the wish of the committee that we should proceed to the detailed discussion of the estimates at page 269. I think it was the understanding of everyone here that that was the desire of the committee at that time. We then proceeded, and the hon member for Nanaimo asked, under the head of departmental administration on page 269, if it is the intention to discuss civil defence. I said we could do that then or later, whichever met his convenience. We did it then. At that time we were discussing, at page 269·

Defence services—

Departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence.

It is quite true that there is not a separate item for that; but because of the way in which the defence estimates are put forward in one total sum, it is the way in which it was found convenient for the committee to deal with this matter over the last three years. Once the committee decides to go ahead on a certain basis, then I should think it would be contrary to the rules of order to reverse that procedure.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to make a point of order. I wanted to say that if this motion is put referring only these estimates to a committee, it is in line with what has been suggested, namely, that we have a committee set up. I was not raising a point of order. I was not questioning the right to move this particular motion at this time.

Mr. Drew: May I point out that standing order 59, in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, reads as follows:

A motion that the chairman leave the chair is always in order, shall take precedence of any other motion, and shall not be debatable.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

The Deputy Chairman: I looked into this standing order when the hon. member made his motion and I also considered citation 480 of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads as follows:

The only motion allowed, when a resolution is under consideration in committee of supply, is that the amount be reduced or that the chairman leave the chair (either without making a report or to report progress on certain resolutions).

If the motion of the leader of the opposition had been "I move that Mr. Chairman do now leave the chair", I would immediately have decided that the motion was not debatable and that the only duty I had to perform was to put the motion forthwith. But what puzzled me, and this is the reason why I raised the matter, was the part in the motion about the procedure; and my understanding was that the procedure had already been decided. Since the situation is doubtful, however, and as I have no authority at the moment on which I can rely for a decision as to whether the motion made by the leader of the opposition is in order or not, I will therefore put the motion right now. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Drew moves, seconded by Mr. Pearkes:

That the committee now rise and report progress, and that further consideration of estimates Nos. 245 to 252 inclusive be deferred until such time as they have been submitted to detailed study by a select committee, reported to the house and again referred to this committee.

Motion negatived: Yeas 35; nays 50.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion lost. Perhaps it would be the wish of the committee to consider the procedure to be followed from now on.

I have the copies of Hansard before me now. Perhaps I should refer to them and see what has been said with respect to procedure. In his opening remarks on this general item the Minister of National Defence said, as reported in Hansard at page 2805:

In order that we may have the discussion of these estimates in the order most convenient to members, I would suggest that we follow the practice of recent years. This is entirely a matter for the committee and there is no thought of binding it, but it would be a desirable thing and I am sure one that would meet the views of all quarters of the house if hon. members wishing to make statements about defence generally should do so at the outset. We could then follow with a detailed consideration of the estimates beginning at page 269, taking the main heads in the following order: administration, inspection services, civil defence—I would point out that, since the responsibility for civil defence was transferred to the Minister of National Health and Welfare by an order in council dated February 23, this branch of activity falls under that minister and I expect he will be here to make a short statement and to answer any questions—imperial war graves commission, navy, army, air force, defence research, mutual aid, grants, et cetera, pensions.

Perhaps I should quote also the remarks made by the hon. member for Nanaimo in reply to the suggestion offered by the minister.

Mr. Chairman, the method of examining these estimates suggested by the minister will, I feel sure, be acceptable to members on this side of the house.

Then, in Hansard of yesterday, at page 2913, the hon. member for Nanaimo in the course of his remarks said this:

The Minister of National Defence had suggested that, after a general discussion on the general defence policy, we might turn to the details of the estimates as they are laid out at page 269 of the book of estimates. He suggested we might deal with them in the order of administration, inspection services, civil defence, and so on, and that they should be taken one by one so that there would be a chance to discuss each of them.

Earlier in his remarks he had said:

What I was rising to do was to make the suggestion that perhaps we might get along with a careful examination of the estimates.

Then in the typewritten copy of Hansard of today I find these remarks by the hon. member for Nanaimo:

Mr. Chairman, I understand item 245 has been called, and that it is now the proposal to continue with the details as they are set out at page 269, the first group of which is under the heading of "Departmental Administration, including inspection services and civil defence." I wonder if the minister who is now responsible for civil defence would now make a statement in this connection? I notice that the subject of civil defence is not separated as a separate detail under the group of details connected with departmental administration.

At that moment he asked if the minister responsible for civil defence would make a statement on that subject. We had a discussion on civil defence, and the consent of the house had been given earlier to this type of procedure, which has been interrupted by the motion which has just been defeated. Is it the wish of the committee to follow from now on the procedure which was agreed upon earlier?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should point out to the committee that the way I propose to call these items will be in the order in which they appear on page 269 of the estimates, under the various headings, the first one being, departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence; the second one being imperial war graves commission; the third being navy; the fourth, army; the fifth, air; and the sixth, defence research and development. This is item 245 as detailed under these various headings. Is that satisfactory to the hon. members?

Mr. Drew: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Therefore, I will now call the first section of these detailed sums of item 245, appearing under the heading "Departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence." These details appear on page 269.

Mr. Pearkes: The first detail shown under this heading is that of civil salaries and wages. I notice that there has been an increase of roughly $1,200,000 in that item over the amount expended last year. I wonder whether we can have the details of that detail. I wonder whether the minister can tell us why it is necessary to have that large increase in the civil salaries. What are the main salaries covered? Has this amount of money been spent entirely with the headquarters here in Ottawa of the three services, or does it cover the administration in the different divisions, commands, and so forth across the country?

Mr. Claxton: The main reason for the increase is the increase in the activities of the inspection service due to the increased procurement. The staff of the inspection service is to be increased by a total of 323, the staff of the civil defence co-ordinator, for which we still provide the money, by 62. In addition, provision is made for increased rates of pay as announced to take effect as of December, 1950. The total number of civil employees in 1950-51 was 875; in 1951-52, 1,270; so that the increase is practically entirely taken up with the increased activities of the inspection service and civil defence.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

This covers civilians only, and it covers civilians engaged in civil defence, public relations and inspection services right across Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: What type of inspection service is that? Is it solely concerned with the making of equipment?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Entirely?

Mr. Claxton: Since the termination of the second world war the job of inspection, which used to be done by the United Kingdom and Canada inspection board, was assumed by the Department of National Defence for itself, and it is now carried on by an officer of the department and a staff assisting him, as well as by a number of expert service personnel. They inspect all equipment—ships, aircraft, motor vehicles, clothing, everything that we buy.

Mr. Pearkes: Do they go into the factories which are making this equipment?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, in all aircraft factories; for example, there would be continuous inspection of every part as it is made.

Mr. Pearkes: Do they also go into such organizations as dominion arsenals?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, just the same; Canadian Arsenals Limited is one of the manufacturing establishments which make and supply, through the Department of Defence Production, defence equipment, and we inspect products there in the same way as of any other producer.

Mr. Pearkes: There is, I believe, a dominion arsenal at Longueuil near Montreal?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Is there any change in the policy regarding that? I asked a question on May 4, I think, regarding a story that it was being leased to another firm. Can the minister tell me whether there is any change in the policy?

Mr. Claxton: I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Defence Production, to answer that.

Mr. Pearkes: Has there been any change in the policy regarding Canadian arsenals, and what exactly is the situation regarding the arsenal at Longueuil?

Mr. Howe: There is no change in policy to the extent that Canadian Arsenals is intended to keep a continuous nucleus for production of all the types of weapons that Canada will need in event of war. However, in a preparedness program of this type the arsenal organization is expanded out of its normal routine, as my hon. friend would expect.

The situation at Longueuil is that the Sorel Industries have taken a very large contract for the manufacture of 3-inch guns partly for the Canadian navy, but primarily for the navy of the United States. It is practically an unlimited order—at least their instructions are to make as many guns as they can handle. It was found that instead of building an addition at Sorel the reasonable and economical procedure seemed to be to combine the two gun plants under the one management, so that the forging capacity of one, which is excessive, could be combined with the finishing capacity of the two plants to permit the operation to turn out the maximum production. That is the arrangement at the moment. It is intended to make those two plants the heavy artillery manufacturers in this preparedness program.

Mr. Pearkes: Then the general nature of the arsenal will be maintained. Will the personnel who have been employed in the arsenal be retained on their special work of providing a nucleus of trained personnel for that development work?

Mr. Howe: Yes. All the personnel at Longueuil have been absorbed into the combined Sorel-Longueuil operation. There was no transfer of personnel. Expert personnel had in part to a very minor degree been transferred to Sorel when the original contract was entered into there. The balance have now been absorbed into the combined operation. The men who were permanent members of the arsenals organization retain their pension rights in the organization; and when this crisis ends they will continue to man the Longueuil plant, and that plant will be maintained as a pilot or an experimental plant for ordnance, as it was before this preparedness program was undertaken.

Mr. Pearkes: Are there any service or army personnel there?

Mr. Howe: I cannot say as to that. I presume there were. In staffing arsenals returned men were given priority.

Mr. Pearkes: I mean active army personnel.

Mr. Howe: Well, the arrangement is that all guns destined to the Royal Canadian Navy are inspected by the personnel of the inspection board, which is army personnel; and guns destined for the United States are inspected by military personnel of the United States.

Mr. Pearkes: Is a complete gun made at Longueuil, or is it done by piecework, letting parts out to other factories in Canada?

Mr. Howe: There are a great many firms engaged in making components of all kinds. It is a very complicated gun. One of the most essential parts is made by Canadian General Electric at Peterborough, and other components are subcontracted in the Montreal area.

Mr. Drew: In that connection, would the minister explain what the arrangements are under which government employees are taken over by the privately operating concern?

Mr. Howe: There is no special arrangement. They were simply voluntarily transferred from the arsenals payroll to the payroll of Sorel Industries, retaining their right as employees—and I am referring to health rights enjoyed by employees of the arsenals. However, they are now employees of Sorel Industries Limited.

Mr. Drew: But they do retain their ordinary rights as government employees, upon termination of their employment with Sorel Industries, is that so?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Drew: Is there any precedent for that arrangement? Has that arrangement been carried out in other cases?

Mr. Howe: It is the standard arrangement in the Civil Service of Canada. For instance the Department of Defence Production is a temporary department. No one can establish any rights in the civil service by joining that department. But under the act setting up the department provision is made whereby anyone, who is a civil servant and who transfers to the Department of Defence Production, retains his rights as a civil servant, just as though he were in a permanent department.

Mr. Drew: But what I had in mind was that this arsenal, as I understood the minister's explanation, was for the purpose of developing various types of heavy ordnance for the the government. How will the experimental and developmental activities of the arsenal be carried on, if its whole personnel has been absorbed into a private enterprise on a special contract?

Mr. Claxton: The answer is that development work is carried on by the Canadian armaments development establishment at Valcartier, which is a branch of the defence research board which, in turn, comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. The development work is being carried on there by officers of the armed forces working together with defence research, and, with regard to technical matters of production, and the like, personnel of Canadian Arsenals Limited who are specially expert in that field.

Mr. Pearkes: Would that be a change in policy?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: In the past was not the research work done at the arsenals? Has it now been changed?

Mr. Howe: Perhaps I could explain that. It was never the intention to set up the arsenals as a research plant. The purpose was to retain the skills and to retain the machine tools, or a certain number of them, used for the art, and do such gun-work as is carried out in peacetime which, as my hon. friend knows, is largely repair and maintenance work on existing guns or, if a new gun is required—for example, if a British-type gun is abandoned and a United States gun is installed—the tooling for the United States gun would be carried out at the arsenals plant, and the tooling data sent out to whoever was to be in charge of the large-scale production of the weapon.

But that is quite different from development. This is a production plant on a small scale for the purpose of retaining a staff that can be a nucleus of a greatly expanded activity.

Mr. Pearkes: Where is the repair work being done now on guns of a type different from those being made by this Sorel company?

Mr. Claxton: Those are all done by Canadian army establishments, largely RCEME—the Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers.

Mr. Pearkes: They have facilities to repair guns?

Mr. Claxton: Yes; the gun depot is at Long Point.

Mr. Pearkes: That is not the same place that has been taken over by this Sorel company?

Mr. Claxton: No, it is across the river.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I was interested in the statement by the Minister of Defence Production in which he pointed out that component parts of the gun are being made by outside industries. Is that distribution under the direction of his department, or of the principal manufacturers of the gun? If there is distribution of the construction of these components, has any such distribution been assigned to industries in the maritime provinces? Many of them had a splendid record during the last war in the manufacture of guns and other primary requirements.

Mr. Howe: The distribution of subcontracting is carried out by the private contractor. Whether any of it is being done in the maritime provinces, I cannot say. However, the Trenton plant of Dosco is being equipped with special machinery for doing naval work of a different type, and plans are being made to utilize the manufacturing facilities of the maritime provinces as soon as the primary work has advanced to a point where the work can be distributed.

Mr. Drew: My impression was that the setting up of these arsenals was for the purpose of having certain machinery available, of having certain skills developed to carry on what the minister has described as the art and which I believe is the term ordinarily applied to the over-all skill in the development of weapons of this type. We are not yet into an all-out war, but it seems to me that if there was a sound argument in the past for setting up arsenals of that kind, for equipping them, for training a skilled staff and for maintaining the gunmaker's art—we are told that we may be in a long struggle for ten, twenty or twenty-five years or more and we know that that struggle is one in which the development of new guns and other arms will be essential for the preservation of peace—it would seem that there is a sound argument now to retain this arsenal for the purpose for which it was built, for which it has been equipped and for which a staff has been trained. Does the minister think it wise at this time to abandon that particular function of the arsenal and to place that skill entirely under a private manufacturer who is carrying out a particular contract with a specific objective?

Mr. Howe: We are using the arsenal for exactly the purpose for which it was retained between the two wars, that is, to have available in Canada skills to do certain operations as required in a war. The three-inch gun is one of the few weapons that has been standardized by three countries. It has always been the objective of Canadian production to obtain contracts of a size that will permit economical operation. Our difficulty in Canada, particularly in the matter of guns, is that until we have all-out fighting the number of guns required by our services is small. For instance, I think our requirement for the three-inch naval gun is something in the order of twelve.

On the other hand, the United States require large facilities and they were willing to place a large order in Canada. I think the original order was for something like 120 guns. Progress has been so favourable that the United States order has been greatly expanded. The Longueuil plant was not suitable for an order of that size and we therefore put a combined order in the Sorel plant, once the order was expanded. We were using the staff of Longueuil on that particular gun and it seemed logical to use the facilities available rather than creating new facilities.

The forging capacity of the Sorel plant is still larger than could be used even on the expanded order of three-inch guns and we hope to put at least two other guns into the same plant. By subcontracting, the combined plant might handle even further business. This is a simple arrangement to balance the productive facilities available in the two plants. There is no forging capacity at Longueuil; they simply have finishing machinery. The Sorel plant has more forging capacity than finishing machinery. By combining the two we get a better operation and we serve the purpose of the arsenal by having a nucleus that can be expanded into a major gun organization.

Mr. Drew: Have any similar orders been placed with other arsenals or weapon plants owned and operated by the government?

Mr. Howe: Our shell production is concentrated at the Lindsay and Quebec arsenals. As we require more shells we are pushing machinery from the arsenals into other private plants. In that way the arsenals are serving the purpose for which they were created, to keep our tooling up to date and to provide a nucleus for the expansion of the shell production.

Mr. Drew: Has anything been done at the small arms arsenal in Toronto?

Mr. Howe: That is a nucleus for the electronics industry. This industry in the last war was largely subcontracted from Research Enterprises. The operations at Research have been contracted into smaller space, but the nucleus of all the work done in the last war was preserved. In this emergency we have taken on large electronics orders which are being handled through Research Enterprises. In fact a plant suitable for assembling one type of equipment for which we have a large order, in contrast to a small order last time, is being built in the Toronto area. Research Enterprises is again providing a nucleus for at least a part of the radar work that is being carried out all over the country.

Mr. Drew: I was referring to the small arms arsenal.

Mr. Howe: There again we have the nucleus for the building of small arms. We are tooling up there now for two new weapons and are considering starting plants outside. The tooling we are doing at Long Branch will, if the orders grow, be moved out into other plants. The production of small arms can be expanded from the Long Branch plant into private industry.

Mr. Drew: The right hon. minister said that the toolings would be moved out. Does he mean designs and patterns or will the tools themselves be moved out?

Mr. Howe: Certain tools will be moved out, but I meant more particularly the technique for tooling. A new gun requires a completely new set of tooling. That is worked out at Long Branch, and some of it is used there, but we can also dilute it and send it out to other plants in order to provide new tooling at those points.

Mr. Drew: Have orders actually been placed under which the full capacity of the Long Branch plant for ·300 calibre rifles and machine guns is being used?

Mr. Howe: There is no production of ·300 calibre rifles and machine guns because that is not a standard weapon at this time. Until a decision is made as to what will be the standard weapon to produce in Canada we will have no orders for the ·300 calibre guns.

Mr. Drew: I am referring back to a statement made a few minutes ago by the Minister of National Defence that a decision had been made to standardize this weapon. Do I understand now from the right. hon. minister that no order has yet been placed for the production of the ·300 calibre rifle or machine gun?

Mr. Howe: No.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order:

The house in committee on divorce bills Nos. 111 to 114, 119 to 129, 132 to 146, 149 to 168, 170, 171, 178 to 187.

Mr. Speaker: Is a motion necessary at this time? I believe the motion was made the last time these bills were considered. I do not believe any bills have been added since that motion was made, so I believe the order should be the house again in committee.

Private Bills—Divorce

EMILY RITA ROWLANDS SIMPSON

The house in committee on Bill No. 111 for the relief of Emily Rita Rowlands Simpson —Mr. Winkler—Mr. Dion in the chair.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that these bills should be taken together or separately?

Mr. Knowles: One at a time, and clause by clause.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Speaking to clause 1 of this bill I would point out that we started to discuss this bill Tuesday evening, but the sponsor at that time did not have the answers to all the questions put to him. I have looked over the evidence in this case since then, so it is not necessary for me to ask the sponsor further questions; but I do think the committee should take time to consider the nature of the bills we are putting through, and that applies to this Bill No. 111. As I have said on other occasions, if it is the will of the house that we do this job, we should do it in a responsible manner.

My reading of the evidence in this case leads me to feel that Mrs. Simpson is certainly entitled to a divorce from Mr. Simpson. His conduct as spelled out in the evidence is such that I for one would not ask her to continue to live with him or to be married to him. If this bill were to come to a vote I would vote for it; but I must say I am appalled at the nature of the evidence on the basis of which the divorce is granted. I do not intend to go into the details of the evidence, but if I were a lawyer taking a case like this to court I would not hope to get away with it on the evidence on which this case is based.

Mr. McLure: If you had a retaining fee you would try to get away with anything.

Mr. Knowles: I am not a lawyer, but if I were I would not be a lawyer of that type. I suggest to hon. members that they get copies of the evidence in this case and read it, and in particular page 9. I am sure they will agree with me that it looks as though matters had been carefully arranged in order to obtain the evidence of adultery against Mr. Simpson. I have no doubt he was doing a lot of things he should not have done, but this particular piece of evidence does look as though it was arranged. As I say, that is one of the dilemmas we face in dealing with these matters, and that is one of the reasons I feel parliament is not the proper body to deal with these cases. I believe this is a case that should have been dealt with by a court.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Coldwell: As I said the other evening, for a number of years in common with a good many members of this house, I am sure, I have simply refused to spend my time reading the evidence in these dozens and dozens of divorce bills that come before us. In spite of the fact that I have been pretty busy over the past few days, however, I have changed my procedure, and for the first time in a good many years have read the evidence in some of these cases.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre states this is a bill which should be carefully considered before it is passed by this house. It is one of those cases in which investigators or detectives were employed, and where the evidence is given by a couple of detectives. In this case the witness was asked by the clerk of the committee:

Q. What is your name? A. Clarence Melvin Simpson.
Q. What is your age? A. 61.
Q. Where do you live? A. Fonthill, Ontario.
Q. What is your occupation? A. Investigator.

Then the witness was asked by Mr. Harvey:

Q. Mr. Simpson, are you the proprietor of Employers Agency Investigators Limited? A. I am, yes.
Q. You are no relation to the petitioner, are you? A. No.
Q. Or to the respondent? A. Just a coincidence.
Q. Did you have occasion to be employed by Mrs. Simpson to investigate the activities of her husband? A. I did.
Q. Will you look at this photograph and state whether you have seen that subject? A. This is a photograph of a man that Mrs. Simpson identified to me on August 22, in the lobby of the Laurentien hotel as her husband, Mr. Simpson.
By Hon. Mr. Howden:
Q. I presume you mean August, 1950? A. Yes, August, 1950.
By Mr. Harvey:
Q. Did you have occasion to follow this man and ascertain his activities subsequent to that date? A. I did.
Q. Will you tell us what your investigation consisted of and what it revealed?

Then the investigator went on to say that he located Mr. Simpson's car; that he followed the car to a restaurant where Mr. Simpson met a woman, and that they then proceeded to a hotel. I am not going to name the hotel, but it is one of the good hotels in Montreal. Then the story is told of the registration, and how they went up to a room. The detectives put scotch tape on the door and left it there for about three hours. They went back and knocked on the door, and a man put his head out and asked what they wanted. One of the detectives replied: "Oh, I had this room a while ago and I left my raincoat here". Immediately the man tells them to come in and look for the raincoat. When they go in, ostensibly to do so, the witness described what they saw, and on that ground there is an application for divorce.

This business of investigators taping doors and being invited by the guilty party to come into the room and look for a raincoat, or something of that sort, seems exceedingly fishy to me. Then follows a description of the woman, and Hon. Mr. Howden, a member of the committee, asked this question:

Q. You did not make any attempt to obtain the name of the co-respondent? A. No.

I submit that if this were before a court, if a judge were investigating the case, this evidence would be gone into pretty carefully before a divorce would be granted under such circumstances. I am not criticizing the committee of the other place. All you have to do is look at this list of nearly 150 divorce bills. Today I found that they were dealing with another batch of them; that they are occupied next week with a list. I saw two agendas, one with eight cases on it for one day, another with nine cases for another day. I am told that they have to do from eight to twelve cases a day—with two committees of course. As a rule the committee sits from ten thirty in the morning until one o'clock, but sometimes when particularly difficult cases come along, and there are counsel and witnesses, the cases run over into the afternoon. Sometimes, they are longer than that. The average time I should think would be from twenty-five to thirty-five minutes.

Mr. Winkler: Sometimes they take all day.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what I say, sometimes they take all day. Sometimes they have to go into the afternoon. But where you find from eight to ten cases dealt with, as they are dealt with by the two committees in the morning, it means an average of twenty-five minutes to thirty minutes for each case. By looking at the summary of the evidence that is placed before us in some cases, what happens is quite obvious—again, I want to make it quite clear that I am not blaming the members of the other place. I think probably if we had a committee of this house, with several hundred of these divorce cases, our membership in this house would find it difficult to deal with them and do the other business which is expected of us or that we expect the hon. gentlemen in the other place to do. I want to make it very clear that I am not making that criticism.

All I am saying is this. Whether or not we believe that we should have divorce in this country, we have divorce. I believe the manner in which it is done today is a reflection upon this parliament. It is a burden placed upon this parliament which we, as hon. members, should do our very best to eliminate. I believe the only way that we can rid ourselves of this burden is to make a protest on every bill that comes before this house from now on. We may have to discuss, as I have been doing for the last few minutes, some of the evidence. I have been told that one of the reasons they are able to get through the number of cases that they do is the fact they often have experienced witnesses in these cases who know exactly what to say and do when they come before the committee. The committee has no means whatever of finding out anything other than what it is told. On this evidence, which looks to me to be rather fishy, you find the dissolution of a marriage. I do not feel, as I have often said, that I wish to be a party to this kind of thing.

Mr. Chairman, contrary to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, that he thinks this bill should go through, I do not think so. It looks to me as though this is a case where the investigators have been careful to get the evidence, and the man at least has been anxious to provide the evidence. The invitation to enter the room to see if the raincoat was still there is a most unlikely occurrence in my opinion, and that alone is ground for further investigation than we have before us in this particular instance. When this bill comes to a vote, I intend to vote against it. I say to hon. gentlemen that we have perhaps been derelict in our duty, because there are so many other matters of importance to all the people of Canada that we should not spend our time in dealing with matters affecting two people—although I should not say only two people.

As a matter of fact I have read only five cases, and I spent quite a little time in reading those five cases. If we had to read the 130 or 140 cases that are now on the list we would be reading nothing else. Perhaps we shall not be doing anything else from now on in the private members' hours but discussing these particular divorce bills. I said just now that they affect two people. In some cases there are children. So far as I can see no consideration, or very little consideration, has been given to the children, although some of the hon. gentlemen investigating do ask whether the children are being cared for. Although I have not been particularly interested in them, I have seen divorce proceedings reported from the courts in Great Britain, and if my recollection serves me well the children are placed in the hands of one of the parents, usually the innocent party, and recommendations are made for their sustenance and their care.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is true here.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes, it is.

Mr. Coldwell: No, if any provision is to be made the case has to go to another court.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Why not?

Mr. Coldwell: Why should the aggrieved person who has charge of the children have to go through another process of law, with more expense and all the rest of it in order to get some provision for the children? I say that if we had a proper court following proper procedure, we would have greater justice to the individuals and greater justice for the children of the marriage. I say to hon. gentlemen that whether or not we agree with the principle underlying divorce, that is an immaterial point. We have divorce now, and in my judgment it is far better to have it under proper conditions, with a proper judicial inquiry, than the kind of inquiry we have, or rather the kind of evidence we have which is not sufficiently investigated —I should say at least in the case of Bill No. 111 on our list tonight.

So I say to hon. gentlemen that I hope as a result of this discussion and the understanding of this situation in this country, there will be unanimous opinion in this house that we are going to rid this parliament, particularly the hon. gentlemen of the other place, of the obligation to do this kind of thing. Once or twice I have heard the other place referred to in recent years as merely a divorce mill. That does not bring respect to this parliament or to the gentlemen who occupy seats in the other place. So, Mr. Chairman, I am opposing this bill which, as I say, I have taken the trouble to read.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two in reply to the interjection by the minister of immigration. When the member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested that the children in these cases would get a better deal from a regular divorce court than from the divorce court of the Senate, it was suggested that his point was not well taken. When someone said that the parties would have to go to a regular court to see that these children were properly cared for, the minister of immigration said in my hearing, and the hearing of other members of this house, why not? My answer is, why should these people have to go to a second court to get justice? Why should there be two separate courts, two sets of lawyers, two lots of lawyers' fees? When the person has to go to one court, namely, this court of the Senate, to get a divorce, then he has to start proceedings all over again to see that the children are properly cared for. I think it is a foolish and stupid expenditure and, may I say with all due respect, a foolish suggestion.

An hon. Member: It is good for lawyers.

[Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).]

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Will the hon. member permit a question? I am not sure whether the argument—

Mr. Knight: Is this a question?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes.

Mr. Knight: All right.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I want it clearly understood whether the hon. member is arguing that parliament should exercise jurisdiction over the custody of the children.

Mr. Coldwell: No; he is asking for a court.

Mr. Knight: We are asking for a court in which the divorce and the care of the children can be looked after simultaneously.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): All right.

Mr. Knight: Now I should like to proceed.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): My question was this. Is that court to be parliament?

Mr. Knight: I did not hear the question.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Were you suggesting that parliament should exercise both jurisdictions?

Mr. Knight: No. I was suggesting that the whole rotten matter should be taken out of the jurisdiction of parliament and put somewhere else.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is a wholly different matter.

Mr. Knight: I should like to say a word or two upon this Bill No. 111, in regard to investigators. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring these bills a question. May I say that I have the deepest sympathy for him because I know he is performing what he considers to be a public duty. Somebody has to do this dirty work under the legislation as it now stands, and I take it that he is the rather unwilling victim, but in any case the victim. I know that I would so consider myself if I were in his position. But I should like to ask him if he considers that these people who are called investigators are people of integrity and people about whom there could be no suspicion.

I have felt it rather deeply on my conscience in the last five years, not only because I am a member of this House of Commons, having to deal with these matters by this phony and farcical method but also because I have been a member of the standing committee on standing orders, which considers these cases when they come in late, where we give to the people concerned a special dispensation so they can sneak in under the wire, as it were, and have their cases considered when they have not fulfilled the regulations in regard to the time limits for application.

I have read little, I shall admit, of this evidence; but I have read enough to convince me that these investigators as a class are not people to whom I would care to lend money or whose word I would care to take in any particular case.

An hon. Member: Parasites.

Mr. Knight: "Parasites," my hon. friend has suggested. These are the boys who sneak around in the middle of the night and put match sticks against bedroom doors, who sneak around with bits of sticky tape, that sticky stuff—

An hon. Member: Scotch tape.

Mr. Knight: —and stick it on the doors.

Mr. Dickey: Jealousy will get you nowhere.

Mr. Knight: No one has proved to me in this case that that scotch tape was not removed and another piece put on in its place. I see no evidence to prove that. They say that the scotch tape was there at nine o'clock and that it was also there at twelve. So be it. They said they had looked once in a while to see if the scotch tape had been removed; but in so far as they were concerned, it was still there.

Mr. Stick: Was it put over the key hole?

Mr. Knight: I should like to draw to your attention the manner in which this investigator regarded the telling of the truth or the telling of a lie in this particular case. This is his method. He knocked at this door, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, and he lied to start with. He said: Look, I was here two days ago staying in this room. I left my overcoat here. Can I come in and get it?

An hon. Member: It was a raincoat.

Mr. Knight: All right; it was his raincoat. That was a lie to start with, and it is a lie that is apparently condoned in this kind of thing, and is the regular method of doing business. I suggest that investigators who start out on premises of that sort are people whose word should not be taken in any court, I do not care whether it is a court of parliament or whether it is a special court in the matter.

I should like to say that there are peculiar things about this court. This is a peculiar, underhand way of getting a divorce through the back door. Personally I can never see the difference, as a question of conscience, between the setting up of a divorce court in a province and doing it honourably and in a manly fashion and the condoning of the granting of divorce by the House of Commons by a back door method. As far as I am concerned, that is only splitting hairs and making too fine a distinction for me to appreciate it. May I say that I wholeheartedly respect the opinions of those who oppose divorce upon religious grounds or by reason of their conscience, or on both grounds. I believe that there are a number of the people on the government side who are most sincere in that regard. There is, however, one easy and obvious way by which they could prove that sincerity. When I see and hear some of these hon. gentlemen over there on the government side who object to divorce—and may I reiterate that I respect their views and opinions—croaking out of one side of their mouths "carried, carried" when one of these bills come up, and croaking out of the other side of their mouths "on division", then I begin to wonder about that concern. As far as I am concerned those two things are contradictory terms. I am not stating that the same man says "on division" who says "carried, carried." But I am saying that some of these people over there say "carried, carried" with the object of getting the bill through with the least amount of trouble, while some others are saying "on division". As the Minister of Public Works said the other day—and he said it quite sincerely; and I am quite sure that he does so—he votes against every one of these bills. But he has not the opportunity to vote against every one of these bills. All he does is to say, "on division, on division" while his friends croak, "carried, carried, carried."

Mr. Sinclair: It is a free country.

Mr. Knight: There are other things that I should like to say about this bill. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, divorce in this country exists; divorce exists for the people of Quebec and for the people of Newfoundland, because they get divorces through this back door method. As I say, I cannot see the difference between having their divorces granted in a proper and regular way, whereby the children would be looked after and other things would be done, and condoning divorce and shouting "carried" or not opposing them.

I am going to say to my sincere friends—and may I say that I say that with no sarcasm and with all the good will in the world—including the Minister of Public Works, that if he wants to show his active and sincere opposition to divorce, he can gather around him five like-minded people on the other side of the house and they can hold up these divorce bills until the cows come home, and not another divorce bill will pass this house.

If people are honest in their opposition to divorce, I am going to suggest that they do just that.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has, on one or two occasions, suggested an alternative. He has said—and this would violate no one's conscience—that the province of Quebec, the province of Newfoundland or any other province is perfectly within its rights when it says: We will not set up divorce courts. With that stand I have perfect sympathy. But if they are going to condone the granting of divorce by this back door method, then I suggest they might at least study the proposition as set forth to the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He had two propositions, as I remember them. First that there be set up in the capital of Canada a special federal divorce court where these things could be studied, where lawyers would be present. Mr. Speaker, we are not competent here to study these divorce cases. I was not sent to parliament because of any superior knowledge I have of the matter of divorce. I am not competent to judge these things, and yet I am supposed to put my initials, as it were, on 150, 300 or 400 of these things without any investigation whatever.

I suggest that a divorce court should be set up in some other place. If the people of these provinces object to having it set up in their provinces, why not set it up anywhere, across the road, anywhere in Ottawa, but let us get it out of this parliament.

The second thing that my hon. friend has proposed is that these things should be handled by the exchequer court. I do not know enough about the exchequer court to know whether that is possible or not, but I am sure that any group before whom these things would be tried, where there would be judges, and competent lawyers for the plaintiff and for the respondent, would be more satisfactory than the present procedure, and we could get on with our work, the work that we were sent here to do which, so far as I am concerned, is not to wade through this filthy evidence. I am sure that if our constituents and the people of this country could read that evidence as it is available to us to read they would give us a mandate to clear this thing out of the House of Commons, a thing which is a farce and a disgrace against the dignity and the conscience of this house.

This is my opinion on the matter, and I have spoken plainly. I hope I have offended no one, but this is what I believe from the bottom of my heart. Later I shall have a word to say on the subject matter of this particular bill.

Before I sit down I want to say one more thing to you, sir, and to this house, and that is the inequitableness with which these divorce cases are considered. The other day in the committee on miscellaneous private bills we considered one particular divorce. In that case a certain amount of money was involved. The man concerned had set his separated wife up in a rather luxurious life. He had given her a house, a car and a large allowance. A little later he repented of his good deeds, if good deeds they were, and he decided to take away from her that which he had given her, and so the case came before parliament. Here was a case that received considerable attention. They had money on both sides. They were able to hire lawyers, and that takes some money. There was an appeal to the committee on miscellaneous private bills. Here was one case which was thoroughly reviewed by that committee. A lawyer was present representing the petitioner and another lawyer represented the respondent. We heard both sides of the case. We acted in our capacity as judges, and we largely agreed that the divorce should be granted. But my point is this: if these people had not had the money which was involved in that appeal there would have been no appeal. That particular case was investigated, as every case should be investigated, and I made up my mind that, so far as I am concerned, in every case on which I give a favourable opinion in this House of Commons the evidence shall be studied in this house, and I am going to give my decision on the basis of the evidence that is here produced.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say. There are 129 cases before the committee tonight. The Senate has asked our concurrence in dissolving these marriages. All I ask hon. gentlemen opposite is: why should these 129 innocent people be the guinea pigs for this—I will not call it a filibuster; the opposition is entirely within its rights to do this—why should these people be the innocent sufferers for this procedure?

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say a few words in connection with the case which is now before us, but before I say what I intend to say may I suggest to the hon. member for Lisgar, when he says that it is too bad that these people have to suffer when these bills are delayed, that innocent people will suffer no matter when divorce cases are delayed. It is clear, however, that this parliament will never provide any better way for the people of the provinces who have no divorce courts to get divorce so long as we facilitate divorce through this court. The stand has unfortunately got to be made here by those of us who object to this method of granting divorce.

Having said that, I believe we should discuss this bill a little more temperately than has been done by the last speaker.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Why?

Mr. MacInnis: For the reason that I shall give you in a moment. An hon. member referred to this "dirty business". It is easy to see that his married life has been happy. He has not had to try to find means of dissolving his marriage. He also referred to the "back-door method" of getting evidence. I am convinced it is no more a back-door method than is the case in a court of law in any of the provinces. Let us remember, there is only one ground for divorce in this country, and obviously to find evidence to prove guilt on that ground one does not find it in the public square. No matter whether you hire a lawyer and take the case to a proper court of law—where I think every hon. member will agree with me that is where it ought to go—you are not going to get away from this method of finding evidence or finding proof of guilt, so long as we have adultery as the only ground for divorce.

I think some hon. members will recall that when the divorce act was amended in Great Britain some years ago the humourist of the British House of Commons at that time, A. P. Herbert, wrote a very humorous story to demonstrate what fantastic things one had to do to give proof of infidelity. Eventually the grounds were broadened. The point which I wish to make is this: I am not opposed to this house granting divorce because I do not believe that they are properly investigated. I am satisfied they are just as well investigated as in any court of law. Nevertheless I am satisfied that this is not the place to grant divorce.

An hon. Member: Let them keep them there.

Mr. MacInnis: That is not the question. The laws of Canada provide for divorce, and until such time as the lawmakers of this country provide a court in every province, then those of us who believe that that is the way it should be done have a right to object in this house.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Why?

Mr. MacInnis: Because we object to the time of the house being taken—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): What do you think of the Quebec laws?

Mr. MacInnis: I am not discussing Quebec laws.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): You should.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not discussing Quebec laws, but if my hon. friend will go back into Hansard a little he will find that during the years 1928, 1929 and 1930 the people of the province of Ontario had to come to this parliament for divorce. Just imagine what the situation would be today if, with the province of Quebec and the province of Newfoundland, we also had the people of the province of Ontario coming here to seek divorces. We would be doing nothing else from morning until night, from January to July, but hearing divorce cases.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I agree with you on that.

Mr. MacInnis: Then if you agree with me on that you undoubtedly agree with me on the rest of my argument. I am very glad to have my hon. friend's agreement, because I think he can give intelligent reasoning to the question.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): You will find out later.

Mr. MacInnis: During the sessions of 1928, 1929 and 1930, and perhaps 1927 as well, there had to be—well, call it a filibuster, if you like—put on in this house before parliament decided that the province of Ontario should have its own divorce court.

Now, all of us here—and I think I speak for all of us; in any case I speak for myself—

Mr. Dickey: Are you sure about that?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes. As I said the other night, as each divorce case comes to a vote I will vote for the granting of the divorce so long as it has gone through the procedure laid down by the rules of parliament. But despite that I do insist that this is not the place for the granting of divorces.

Mr. Cleaver: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take long in what I have to say. However, I was rather shocked to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon a few moments ago, when he referred to the divorces granted by the parliament of Canada and described them as a farce and a disgrace. I do want to put my hon. friend right, because I have known him for many years, and I know he would not have made that statement if he had known the facts.

I want to tell him that no Senate divorce bill comes before this House of Commons for consideration until a trial has been held under oath by competent and experienced persons. At that trial the applicant for the divorce must prove the domicile of the husband, in order to clothe the court with authority—because only the court of the domicile of the husband has authority. Then the applicant must prove the marriage; the applicant must give full particulars respecting the children of the marriage; the applicant in every case—and there is no exception—must prove that adultery was committed by the offending member of the marriage.

Now I ask my hon. friend, in the face of all that—and this evidence must be given under oath—if it is fair to say that a Senate bill comes to the House of Commons as a farce and a disgrace. I also wish to tell my hon. friend this, that I well remember when we did not have a divorce court in Ontario, a time when our courts in Ontario did not have jurisdiction over divorce. I well remember in the early years of practice going to Ottawa and taking part in a divorce case before the Senate. Let me assure my hon. friends who are objecting to this procedure, and who are suggesting that the men who try these divorce cases are incompetent, that the procedure is a farce, or anything of that nature, that from personal experience I can assure them that the cases are carefully and thoroughly tried, and that they are tried in camera.

It is within the province of any member in the house who wishes to do so, on every section of every divorce bill which comes before us—if he wants to regale himself with that sort of publicity or information—it is quite within his rights to ask for and to have put in the minutes of the house the full particulars of the adultery, the full particulars respecting the names of the offenders, and all that sort of thing. But I do suggest that that would be going far afield; I would suggest it is a breach of the confidence that is placed in every member of the house. We are given these rights of information, rights of free speech and all that sort of thing; we are given these rights for our protection, as members of a democracy. But I do suggest that we should not offend against that very protection which is given to us by making ourselves objectionable or by holding up the proceedings of the house as, I believe, was threatened not long ago, until the end of the year, or something of that kind.

That is not the way in which we should assume the responsibilities reposed in us. Each one of these cases is thoroughly and carefully tried. But under the British North America Act, as we all know, every bill, even when initiated and carefully studied in the Senate, must come to this house for three readings and for passing. There is no doubt about that. When a Senate bill that has been studied comes to any other committee of the house, unless there is serious opposition to the bill, or something of that nature, we do not go over the work of the Senate again. We do not consider we are rubber stamps if we do not do that work all over again.

I suggest to my hon. friends that if they would take the trouble, unpleasant as it is, to read the evidence given in just two or three of the cases they would see how carefully each case is gone into, and that nothing is missed.

Mr. Knight: Is the hon. member in favour of the continuance of the present system of handling these divorces?

Mr. Cleaver: I shall be very pleased to answer the question, and to answer it frankly. I was very much pleased when the Supreme Court of Ontario was accorded jurisdiction to handle divorce work, and I would be very much pleased if every province in this country of Canada were to have a provincial court clothed with such jurisdiction.

Mr. Coldwell: On a question of privilege: the hon. member alluded to hon. members who had spoken, and suggested that we were abusing our privilege in parliament when we placed certain matters on the record.

Mr. Cleaver: May I interrupt; I do not wish to offend any member. What I meant was this, that in reading the record of Hansard—because I was not in the chamber the other night—if I read correctly I saw a rather direct threat that each of these bills would have to be called a section at a time.

Mr. Knowles: That is not a threat; it is a right provided by the rules of the house.

Mr. Cleaver: Oh, yes, you are within your rights! This man who poses as the expert on house procedure—I have listened to him this session ad nauseam on something like twelve arguments.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Is it out of order for a member of this house to ask that the rules of the house be obeyed? Is it proper for such a request to be called a threat?

Mr. Coldwell: I had not finished my question of privilege.

Mr. Cleaver: All I can say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is: there he goes again.

Mr. Coldwell: I had not finished my question of privilege. I had taken exception to the suggestion by the hon. member that we wanted to regale ourselves with this sort of thing, and that we are doing it merely for publicity. I wish to tell him that this sort of thing is pretty obnoxious to me, personally. And so far as I am concerned, I have no desire to go into it. If you will notice, when I spoke on the bill I mentioned no name of any litigant whatsoever—I did not mention even the name of the hotel involved. But we have a right to endeavour to get to the root of this thing to which we object—some of us. I have been here for 15 years and I have objected nearly every year. Apparently the only way we can get this matter out of this parliament where it does not belong is by showing that it is impossible to deal with these bills in the ordinary legislative way.

Mr. Cleaver: Does my hon. friend suggest that this committee has the power to clothe provincial courts with authority?

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Cleaver: Is not that entirely outside the jurisdiction of this committee?

Mr. Coldwell: I am suggesting that this parliament has the power and the right to designate a federal court that would take these cases instead of their coming before parliament. I was not suggesting that parliament had the right to set up a provincial court; I was suggesting that parliament had the right to designate a federal court where these cases could be heard properly.

Mr. Cleaver: I do not want to be a pest, but I do not take up much time of the committee. Does the hon. member think that it is fair to deny any subject the right to divorce when a marital offence has been committed? That is an inherent right of every subject. Until provincial courts are set up, no matter how much it militates against our feelings and all that sort of thing I think every subject is entitled to divorce.

Mr. Coldwell: I certainly think it is the right of every subject to exercise his right freely in that respect. I think it is the duty of every majority to see that minority opinion is respected wherever a minority opinion exists. I think also that we have the right to take from this house these obnoxious divorce matters and place them in a federal court where they can be handled according to the rules of procedure and the law.

I made it quite clear that I was not criticizing the hon. gentlemen of the Senate when I spoke. I said that I had been there on one or two occasions and had heard them go into these cases. While I thought they were overburdened and pressed for time, I was not critical of them and did not intend to be. That is not the point.

Mr. Knight: On a point of order. The hon. member for Halton insinuated that when I said this thing was a farce and a disgrace I was reflecting upon the judgment of the Senate. I had no such intention. When I said it was a farce and a disgrace I was indicating that we should not be asked to rubber stamp something of which we had no knowledge and in connection with which we had not the time to survey the evidence. I should like to correct something I said. I said that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had suggested setting up two courts, but I think he suggested rather that these things should be referred to the exchequer court.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, there does not appear to be a great deal of time left before nine o'clock in which I can say all I want to say on this bill, but perhaps I can pick up just a few loose ends. I think where the disgrace comes in is to impose upon parliament, the highest court in the land, all the ramifications of the presenting of bills to both the upper and lower houses, having the bills printed, going through all the procedure of having them adopted in this house, simply for the purpose of dissolving a civil marriage. The disgrace is further accentuated when we are expected, if we are expected, to pass one or two hundred bills within a period of a few minutes without having the opportunity of asking questions. That is where the disgrace comes in.

This is nothing new. We have brought this thing up every year. The hon. member for Halton has stated that it would delight his heart if a certain province in this country could see its way clear to pass such legislation as would refer these matters to the courts. I do not know what is the position of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, but he asked whether we wanted this house to be turned into a court. I should like to ask him if in his opinion some other court should attend to these matters.

The sponsor of the bill is experienced in dealing with private bills and I should like to ask him if he agrees with this method. They all seem not to agree with the method. They appear to think it is obnoxious, yet none of them seems to make any move to alleviate the situation and see that something else is done. Why cannot we urge that the government take some step? I am not a constitutional expert, but I believe we have the constitutional right to set up a special court, say a court of domestic relations. Then the people in any province which does not permit the reference of divorces to the courts could appeal to this court of domestic relations.

In connection with this particular bill, I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in that I think I can read into the bill some evidence of collusion. I read the evidence in connection with this bill quite carefully when I realized it would be coming up tonight and I find that what happened here is very unusual.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

Mr. Drew: Immediately before the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing the use of the small arms arsenal outside Toronto. Certain questions were directed to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce—I will wait, Mr. Chairman, until I can hear my own words.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask hon. members who are behind the curtains to remain silent.

Mr. Drew: Questions had been directed to the minister—I do not propose to continue, Mr. Chairman, until it is possible to be heard in the chamber.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should remind hon. members that the jurisdiction of the chairman extends not only to the chamber but also to the lobbies. If they do not wish to resume their seats and listen to the debate, I would suggest that they go to other quarters.

Mr. Drew: I shall start again. I was saying that before we rose at six o'clock certain questions had been directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to the use being made at the present time of the small arms arsenal outside Toronto. I do not know whether the minister is to be here this evening, but it would have been helpful in view of the nature of the discussion that took place. However, the Minister of National Defence is here. I took down the exact words of the Minister of Defence Production in answer to a question in regard to the production of the ·300 calibre rifles and machine guns at that plant, which is equipped to produce rifles and machine guns. These were his words:

> There is no production of 300 mm. rifles and machine guns because that is not a standard weapon at this time. Until a decision is made as to what will be the standard weapon to produce in Canada we will have no orders for the 300 mm. guns.

The minister referred to 300 mm. rifles, but I am sure that was in error; it should be ·300 calibre rifles and machine guns, because we were discussing rifles and machine guns, and also the fact that there were ·303 calibre rifles in this country at the present time. This indicates one of the difficulties with which we are confronted in discussing these estimates. In the London Free Press of May 3, 1949, the Minister of National Defence is quoted as saying at Detroit on May 2 of that year:

> Canada has decided to abandon the rimmed cartridge ·303 calibre rifle her troops used in two world wars for the rimless cartridge ·300 type which is the American army service rifle.

That was a positive, definite statement of a decision, announced by the minister primarily responsible for the type of weapons which will be used by the defence forces of this country. That was just over two years ago. Therefore it was a matter of both surprise and concern when the members of this house learned earlier this year that the plant which is tooled up to produce rifles and machine guns, and which has produced very large quantities of rifles and machine guns, was not in fact making those arms for the Canadian armed services; but that whatever else it was doing, it was making shotguns for sporting purposes for sale through ordinary civilian channels. More recently this subject has been under discussion in the public accounts committee. On May 1, 1951, the deputy minister of national defence was being questioned in regard to the type of rifle that was to be adopted for the Canadian forces. Certain questions and answers indicate that there was no doubt as to what was under discussion, and no doubt as to the answer. At page 246 of the proceedings of the public accounts committee I find these words:

> Mr. Fulton: Has it been decided to adopt the ·300 as a standard rifle for the Canadian services?
> The Chairman: Would you mind repeating your question, Mr. Fulton? There is a great deal of noise in the room.

By Mr. Fulton:

Q. Has it been decided to adopt the American ·300 rifle as the standard rifle for the Canadian forces, particularly for the Canadian army?

A. It has.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. As a matter of information may I ask the leader of the opposition if this evidence has been reported to the house? If it has not, it may not be quoted. If it has, I am sorry to have interrupted the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman, it has not been reported to the house, and if any objection is taken of course it cannot be read. I should have thought that on a matter so important there would be unanimous consent to the reading of a question and answer which have such a direct bearing on a question and answer given in this house today, especially since the question and answer I read are wholly incompatible with the answer by the Minister of Defence Production. One statement or the other is correct. The statement by the deputy minister of national defence, which I shall simply refer to as a statement to that effect, does at least indicate a belated carrying out of the declaration by the Minister of National Defence in Detroit on May 2, two years ago. But today we had the statement by the Minister of Defence Production that these rifles are not being made. It did not stop at that point. The minister went on to explain that no orders will be placed—and I am using the words he used in this house this afternoon—"until a decision is made as to what will be the standard weapon to produce in Canada".

The members of this committee need a great deal more information now before we depart from this discussion. If the answer of the deputy minister of national defence is correct I should think all the members of this committee would want to know why we were selling rifles and machine guns and ammunition outside this country. Many were under the impression that a decision to change had been made. I would imagine many hon. members would want to know why large quantities of ·303 ammunition were sold to China at a time when the ultimate use of that ammunition was likely to be in very uncertain hands. Certainly there was indication after indication that the reason we were disposing of ·303 weapons and ammunition was that a decision had been made to change to the American standard, and of course we had the statement of the Minister of National Defence to that effect. Now, I should think first of all, Mr. Chairman, there should be the clearest possible statement by the Minister of National Defence explaining his statement of two years ago. What has happened since then? Then, either from the Minister of National Defence or from the Minister of Defence Production, a full and complete statement as to what use is now being made of the small arms arsenal at or near Toronto, and exactly what is going to be done in regard to the equipment of our forces.

Mr. Claxton: The first observation I should like to make, Mr. Chairman, is that if we agreed to the position which you put to the committee two or three times, and which as I understood was agreed to by the committee, it would be a good thing if we kept to the order laid down, that is to deal with administration, inspection services, civil defence, and so on in order. Since the question has come up, I shall deal with it now.

On May 2, 1949, I did not say what was reported by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt, but it was not reported by the leader of the opposition, it was a report which the press carried.

Mr. McIlraith: You took the responsibility of reading it to the committee.

Mr. Drew: Certainly I read it.

Mr. McIlraith: You took the responsibility of putting it on the record.

Mr. Claxton: Let us say you reported the report.

Mr. Drew: I have read the report.

Mr. Claxton: That is all I said, and that is all I meant. I do not see why we should have to have little fights over such a small thing as this.

An hon. Member: Neither do we.

Mr. Claxton: Who started it? I did not. What I said on May 2, 1949, when I was speaking in Detroit was:

> A great step forward would be the adoption by the friendly powers of the rimless cartridge and the ·300 calibre. We in Canada have decided to take that step but bringing it about is again a difficult matter because we have some hundreds of thousands of perfectly useful weapons with rimmed cartridges and the ·303 calibre.

At that time the countries with which we were most closely associated in our defence were Britain and the United States. We had set up a joint committee on the standardization of weapons. One of the most important weapons to be standardized was the rifle. The aim of all three countries was to achieve a common standard. Certainly, it was the aim of Canada, perhaps more than the other two, and for this reason. Both Britain and the United States have such large needs for weapons of all types that they can get an economic run of weapons to equip themselves, and then can give or sell the surplus to some other country. Our position is directly the reverse. We cannot get an economic run of almost any weapon. We are a surplus producing country. We must work with the United States or Great Britain, and preferably both. We were, therefore, primarily interested in bringing about standardization.

The Department of National Defence at that time drew up a long list of weapons on which we were prepared to standardize. Very few of those weapons were weapons originally produced in Canada, because we are a nation of 14 million people, at that time 13 million, whereas the United States had 140 million or 150 million and the United Kingdom 45 million. Both of them had extensive connections and supply arrangements with other countries. We were the man in the squeeze. We had to work with one or the other, but preferably both. Our life would be much easier if both could come together, and we worked for that. At one time we thought the ·300 calibre rifle, not necessarily the present Garand of the United States, but a ·300 calibre would be adopted by all countries concerned. A team was set up by the three countries to look into the various possibilities. Our hope still was that they would agree, that the two would agree. It did not much concern us what the course was as long as there was agreement. That was our primary consideration, and it looked to us as if we would standardize on the ·300 calibre. So I said at Detroit:

> A great step forward would be the adoption by the friendly powers of the rimless cartridge and the ·300 calibre.

In talking about the rimless cartridge, I was not talking out of turn because since 1912 the war office in Britain has had the intention of adopting the rimless cartridge. The one thing which prevented that being brought about was the fact that at no stage did they have less than several hundred thousand rifles equipped to fire the rimmed cartridge, and at no stage did they have less than several hundred million rounds of ammunition for that rifle. They were not in a position to throw the ·303 rimmed cartridges and rifles into the sea, so they had to keep on with them. To make a transfer of this kind is difficult, and very expensive.

Then I went on to state:

> We in Canada have decided to take that step . . .

That is, to standardize on the ·300 calibre. That was what we thought would be adopted as a common standard at that time.

> . . . but bringing it about is again a difficult matter because we have some hundreds of thousands of perfectly useful weapons with rimmed cartridges and the ·303 calibre.

As a matter of fact, the number of rifles we had of the 303 calibre of Mark IV type was closer to 300,000 than 200,000. Were we to throw these into the sea, give them away or sell them? No, we kept them and we did not start manufacturing because there was no agreement on any common standard, or on a common calibre. It was a matter of the greatest possible regret that there was no agreement. There is no agreement yet.

Mr. Low: Does it look as if it is going to be impossible to get that agreement?

Mr. Claxton: Well, sir, I cannot say. It has been announced in the press that the British have adopted the ·280; that has not been accepted by the United States. I cannot go beyond that. Since we have decided, and I think properly decided, to give arms and ammunition for three divisions to Europe, including rifles, and replace it with equipment of United States type, then it means that we have decided, not right across the board but generally, to adopt American standards so that as far as possible our equipment will conform to North American industrial practice.

My colleague the Minister of Defence Production said today that there is no production of the ·300 calibre rifle and machine gun, because that is not a standard weapon at this time. That is completely correct. We have not begun to produce this weapon in Canada, because it is not a standard weapon, and also because to tool up for it would not be justified unless it was a standard weapon. Our own needs would not justify the cost of tooling up for the production of this weapon. We can buy them for far less money, even taking into account the exchange difficulties, from the United States without tooling up for production, so unless we can tool up for a production far greater than that necessary to meet our own needs—

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask what the cost of tooling up would be?

Mr. Claxton: I have not that information. That is a matter for the Minister of Defence Production. It would be a large sum.

Mr. Pearkes: It is a standard calibre with the United States army.

Mr. Claxton: Right.

Mr. Pearkes: Where it is a standard calibre, could it not be standard in Canada?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, with agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. Then the Minister of Defence Production went on and said, until the decision is made as to what will be the standard weapon to produce in Canada we will have no orders for ·300 calibre guns. I have explained why that is so. We can buy from the United States—if they do not change their calibre and do not change their type of weapons—weapons to equip our forces with three divisions equipment, far cheaper than we can produce them in Canada unless the weapon is made standard in some countries other than in Canada and the United States.

Mr. Low: Whom we could supply.

Mr. Claxton: Whom we could supply; because obviously the United States is not going to buy rifles from us.

Mr. Brooks: When can they supply us?

Mr. Claxton: Within a matter of the next two or three weeks supply will be beginning. If we had tooled up for the production of either the ·300 or the ·280, we would have been out of step with one country or the other. Meanwhile we had between 250,000 and 300,000 ·303 rifles that were just about as good, as I said. Why should we tool up and begin on production until we had explored every possible avenue of bringing the two countries together so as to have a common standard? That is the story. As I say, we now have somewhere between 250,000 and 300,000 ·303 rifles in good shape, ready to fire, ready to shoot; and if our forces had to go into action tomorrow they would be equipped with ·303 rifles. So would the British. So would the Dutch. So would the Belgians. So would the Italians but not the Americans. But in a year and a half from now or something like that the British will have the ·280 and that no doubt will be made uniform with the Belgians. Meanwhile if we go into action we would always be fighting with both the British and the Americans, on the same front, organized with possibly separate supply lines. So long as we fight on the same front with the British and the Americans the difficulties of supply will not be great. But it would be infinitely better if the British and the Americans would get together and that is what we have been trying to achieve. If we had followed any other course than the one we have adopted, we would have been wasting the public's money.

Mr. Drew: The statement by the Minister of National Defence constitutes an argument against a decision at this time. But it does not answer the question as to whether the statement made—and a very positive statement—by the deputy minister of national defence was accurate. The statement he made was consistent with the statement made much earlier by the Minister of National Defence and I might say that what he has read does not in any way suggest that the press report was incorrect because, referring to the ·303 calibre small arms, the exact words he has quoted from the text of the speech he made at that time were: We in Canada have decided to take that step. Evidently there were qualifications that followed and those qualifications are put before us today.

The minister says that we would not want to find ourselves out of step with one of the great nations with which we are associated. As it is we are going to be out of step with both of them. The United States has made its decision. It is going to use the ·300 calibre. The United Kingdom has made its decision; it is going to use the ·280 calibre. I think that all of us will agree with the minister that it is most regrettable that the United Kingdom and the United States have not agreed. But again without referring to the exact words but—and, I am sure, doing so correctly—paraphrasing what the deputy minister of national defence said before the committee on the same day to which I have referred, the deputy minister explained why the decision had been made. He explained that we are next door to the United States, that our industrial standards are similar to theirs, that the industrial flow in this country goes side by side with theirs and therefore it was reasonable for us to make the decision to adopt their standards. The explanation related to a decision that had already been made. I am pointing out at this time that we have conflicting statements before us and that those statements should be resolved. It is not enough for the members of this committee to be left to guess as to who makes correct statements and at what time. It is not for us to guess about a statement of the Minister of National Defence in 1949 on qualifications that were never fulfilled; nor is it for us to guess that there were some reservations which did not appear in any statement made when the deputy minister of national defence, taking great care to inform himself before giving any answer, gave a statement to this effect as recently as May 1.

The Minister of National Defence has placed some emphasis upon the fact that we can hardly yet make this decision. But I was under the impression that just a short time ago he had indicated that we had made a decision to the extent of buying equipment from the United States. I think we should know whether any ·300 calibre weapons have been purchased from the United States or, if not yet purchased, whether they are on order or whether an order is contemplated.

Mr. Claxton: I thought I had made the position just as plain as it could be made for the understanding of any reasonable being.

The fact is this, and I will repeat the whole thing again if necessary. The Minister of Defence Production was referring to production. He said: Until a decision is made as to what will be the standard weapon to produce in Canada, we will have no orders for the ·300 calibre gun. I said that and he said that. I say it again. And I will say it again and again, and he will say it again. There is no inconsistency. Unless we can have a line built up and a demand built up to justify the production of rifles by the 50,000 or the 100,000, there is no point in our doing it in Canada. We will get them from the United States, as I said. And as I said, we have arranged with the United States to get the ·300 calibre rifle. If they change, then we will have to look at the situation again. What could be plainer?

Mr. Drew: The answer has not been given to the question as to whether we are in fact buying ·300 calibre rifles.

Mr. Claxton: Of course we are.

Mr. Drew: We are?

Mr. Claxton: Of course.

Mr. Drew: Are those going to be orphans?

Mr. Claxton: No, not at all. I do not see how the leader of the opposition can feel that he could possibly raise such a question at this time. We are trying to standardize with the United States. We get the equipment for three divisions from the United States or make it in Canada. That part of it which it is economical to make in Canada, we make in Canada. So far, because the ·300 calibre is not standardized with any country except the United States, we do not think it is economical to make it in Canada. However, if the United States should, in the middle of the transfer of this three divisions' equipment, change the pattern of its rifle, we would stop the flow of the ·300 calibre rifle to Canada and take the new one. In the meantime, we have lots of rifles of ·303 pattern exactly identical with those with which the British, the Netherlands, the Belgians and the Italians would have to fight, as well as all the countries of the commonwealth at the present time. What other course can we follow? It takes about eighteen months to do one of these operations, to change the pattern of a rifle.

Mr. Johnston: We are still producing the ·303?

Mr. Claxton: We are not making any ·303's. We have more than we need, much more than we need. We are transferring them to Europe.

To make this kind of change takes time, sometimes a few years. As I said, the British war office decided on the rimless cartridge in 1912, and now for the first time it has decided to bring it about. Why? Because they always had such tremendous stocks of rimmed cartridges. This is very obvious. If there is any misunderstanding left I will be very glad to hear about it.

Mr. Drew: The minister has now indicated that we are buying the ·300 calibre weapons for our three divisions. I will assume from what he has said, and from what has been indicated before, this equipment is what is intended to be the service equipment. If that is so, then is there any thought that we will be manufacturing rifles or machine guns of any other calibre than that which we are purchasing of this scale for the service units?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Drew: If that is so, I would point out—

Mr. Claxton: I beg your pardon. As regards machine guns I am not too sure, because we have found the Sten gun to be exceedingly useful and we may continue to produce that if it becomes desirable because of any shortage of stocks. We hope that other countries will adopt it. It is a very cheap kind of gun to make and very effective at short range, and we think there is a real military need for it. There may be exceptions of that kind, but let us stick to rifles.

Mr. Drew: No; I think the minister will agree with me that distinction is drawn between the Sten and the machine guns of the same calibre as the service rifle, and that is standard practice with all arms, whatever their calibre is.

The Sten is correctly described as a sub-machine gun; is that not correct?

Mr. Claxton: Right.

Mr. Drew: And a distinction is drawn between machine guns and sub-machine guns. I was referring to machine guns because the ammunition supply is the same for both machine guns and the rifles. I would point out that this concern about manufacturing for our own demands is not consistent with the attitude this country has adopted in the past. This country first started to manufacture its own rifles before 1910, and some of the machinery which was used to make rifles and machine guns in this country during the war was machinery that was continuously in this country from that time.

Mr. Claxton: Right.

Mr. Drew: During the last war we set up plants and I understand that most of the rifles that are here now are rifles that were made in Canada, and for that reason it seems rather strange that at the time, after all these years of being prepared to make our own weapons, we should be so concerned now about embarking on the production of our own equipment.

I do raise some question about the fact that it would take a year and a half to produce a ·300 calibre rifle, because the machine tools are standard tools very largely, except for the tools which bore the internal diameter of the tube, and the other designs. If they are using a rifle that is of standard pattern in the United States the designs and patterns are ones that could be brought here for that purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that the members of this committee have reason to review with some care what has been taking place in regard to the public accounts committee, because undoubtedly an impression was conveyed there—and I am sure, conveyed in complete good faith—which is certainly contrary to that now placed before this committee. I would point out that the reason these questions are following in regard to the production of weapons is that this question was raised before dinner—not by me—and the discussion took place. The Minister of Defence Production gave explanations, and it seems logical that we should follow this through to the rational point. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence what is being produced in the way of military equipment at the small arms arsenal at Toronto at this time.

Mr. Claxton: That is a matter for the Minister of Defence Production when his own estimates come up. I should like to give a further answer to the hon. leader of the opposition and say that from my recollection —no doubt I am giving another military secret—perhaps for three divisions some 20,000 rifles might be required. During the second world war we produced rifles by the hundred thousand. To tool up for a production of 20,000 is far more expensive than to buy them from the United States—I mean by "far" very much more expensive.

Then, I did not say it would take a year and a half to produce the equipment from the manufacturing point of view; but to effect any changeover, given the present circumstances, we will be in the situation where Britain, the countries of Europe and ourselves will have part American and part British and part other type equipment for some period of time. We have done more than any country on the face of the earth to end that situation. We have not succeeded, but because we have not succeeded we do not see why we should be blamed. We have done our utmost, and we would like very much to be in a position to use some of our resources for the production of arms and weapons for other countries. We thought the most effective way we could do this would be to give equipment to the value of about one hundred and fifty million dollars to other countries and replace it and accelerate the job of standardization so that on the other side of the ocean they would have British type equipment; on this side we would have American type equipment; in between we are going to be a bit mixed up. Of course we know that is inevitable, but this course will speed the kind of operation which has never happened before in the history of the world and we hope it may be successful in bringing about some acceptance of common standards by other nations. We have made our way very plain, and I do not see what else we can do. There has not been any suggestion here that we should have taken any other course. I have discussed this around the table with the North Atlantic treaty nations. They think it is right. They are glad to get our equipment, and they think it is a good thing for them to standardize all equipment of the type which they got either from the British, from ourselves or from others after the end of the second world war; whereas we go on with the United States type. It all seems to make sense to them and to us.

Mr. Green: Has France adopted the British standard?

Mr. Claxton: No. I must say on this question of standards it has already been indicated by the Minister of Defence Production that one weapon, the 3-inch 50-calibre naval gun, has been adopted by the British, by the Americans and by ourselves. It is an American gun. It is a very complicated and difficult gun to make. I was told—I do not know whether it is true—that it takes 7½ tons of blueprints. There are other common types. We had mortars and some anti-tank weapons. Already they are common to all countries. There will be more. This thing will grow. It is developing; and I think we are going to be more in line with both the British and the Americans than any country —so long as we fight together—so that we will not have much difficulty. And when I refer to fighting together I mean fighting alongside each other—and it is inconceivable that in the event of war that should not happen. In such event we will not have much difficulty about supplies.

Mr. Drew: The minister did not answer the question I asked, but he did raise a point which he said had come to his attention after he sat down, and that was that the total number of rifles required for three divisions would probably be 20,000. I would point out that that might leave a most misleading impression—and I do not mean intentionally. It might mislead members as to the number of rifles which would be required. Three divisions do not require 20,000 rifles: three divisions require a great many more than that, if those three divisions are going to be in the field.

The minister shakes his head, but I point out that for every man who is in a serving unit there are a great many men training, and that those men in training need the same type of equipment, if they are to produce satisfactory results.

Mr. Claxton: Quite right.

Mr. Drew: If you are going to have 20,000 rifle strength in three divisions—and I grant it might be debatable as to what the exact amount would be—I should think a minimum of 100,000 rifles would be required, and probably more.

As the minister has already said, we had in excess of half a million rifles in this country after the end of the war. While we had three divisions in formations, we had at the most five divisions overseas. That gives some indication as to the number of rifles required in relation to the actual operational strength. So I suggest we should not in any way have our minds fixed on a figure of the rifles actually needed for the divisions, but on the total number that would be required for an integrated training program which would be capable of producing those divisions in the field.

I did ask a question which apparently escaped the minister's mind when he turned to the statement he made in regard to rifles. I asked what was being produced in the way of military equipment at the small arms arsenal in Toronto at the present time. The minister did say that the Minister of Defence Production could give that figure; but I am sure he could tell us whether they are making service rifles or Sten guns.

Mr. Claxton: No service rifles; no Sten guns. We have lots of them.

Mr. Drew: Without attempting to give exact numbers, would the minister say whether they are making service rifles, machine guns, sub-machine guns, or any weapons of that kind, including mortars, anti-tank rifles or anything of that nature, at the arsenal?

Mr. Claxton: I do not think so. I doubt it very much. But that is a question for the Minister of Defence Production to answer. Except for mortars, and two or three types of weapons which are very new, we have ample stocks to meet all our needs. What is going on is mostly by way of modification.

The Deputy Chairman: I would remind the committee that we are considering civil salaries and wages.

Mr. Pearkes: Regarding inspection services, which come under the civil service, I notice that in the annual report it states that inspection services contain well-equipped laboratories. Are they different from the laboratories maintained by the defence research and development board?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: And which are completely separate. Is there any overlapping there?

Mr. Claxton: None at all. But defence research will be brought in by inspection services to advise them as to a particular method of testing, or a new technique or new equipment. But most of the laboratories which are used by inspection services are for the testing of leather, metals, clothing, electronic equipment, et cetera, to make sure that their performances and standards are adequate. They are not for the purpose of research.

Mr. Pearkes: Are there any of these inspectors, in those laboratories or elsewhere, considering the manufacture or the methods of inspection required in connection with, let us say, rimless ammunition? They would have to go out of the country to do that, no doubt.

Mr. Claxton: All the people engaged in defence are in consultation with each other, through interlocking directorates and committees. But the job of inspection services is primarily to make sure that articles supplied by manufacturers, on orders from the Department of Defence Production, meet specifications. If they find that the method of production is uneconomic they will report back.

Mr. Pearkes: Do they carry out any inspection work in the United States at factories making material which we might make very shortly? What I am trying to get at is this: if we are likely to adopt this rifle, is not the time now ripe for these inspectors who would have to give the advice to be down there, finding out how these rifles are made, and finding out how the ammunition is made?

Mr. Claxton: That would not be done by inspection services. That would be done by defence research, working together with the proper personnel of the armed service concerned. We have teams in the United States watching the development of their weapons, just as they have teams in Canada watching the development of those we are producing. They work together and exchange views. We have a completely reciprocal service with regard to inspection.

Mr. Green: Would it be possible for Canada to manufacture these American type rifles, or are there some rights or restrictions which would interfere with their being manufactured here?

Mr. Claxton: No, none at all.

Mr. Green: None at all? I understand that, if we chose to do it, we could go ahead with it. Could we?

Mr. Claxton: So far I have known of no difficulty in that connection either by United States service authorities or the United States government. When it has been found to be sound economy for us to manufacture a thing in Canada, we have never failed to secure the right to do so.

Mr. Green: Would we be manufacturing ammunition for this rifle, or would it have to be purchased in the United States, as well?

Mr. Claxton: It would depend on the quantity. Certainly when we get the ·300 calibre rifle into Canada we will be making ·300 calibre ammunition in very short order.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask hon. members to follow the agreed procedure, and to confine their questions to the details respecting civil salaries and wages.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask a question along the lines of one already asked. Are the people employed as inspectors from civilian or military personnel?

Mr. Claxton: They are both. To a greater degree than ever before they have integrated the service and civilian personnel. We have on the inspection board at quite high levels, as well as at intermediate levels, service personnel from the army, the navy and the air force. To a greater degree than ever we have in the Department of Defence Production working with civilians who are doing the procurement of products for the defence forces, service personnel covering quite a wide range of interests and experience. So far as possible we fit into civilian production methods so that the civilians will know what we want, in advance, and vice versa.

Mr. Wright: How many of these personnel are engaged in inspection work in civilian plants?

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid I have not a note of it. My recollection is that at Malton, for example, where we are producing the CF-100 Canuck aircraft, there is a total air force personnel of 35 plus probably 100 civilian inspectors who represent us.

Mr. Wright: Is that in all the different plants?

Mr. Claxton: No, that would be just that one.

Mr. Wright: Can the minister indicate the total number of inspectors doing this type of work?

Mr. Claxton: The total civilian staff in the inspection service is 727 and in addition I would estimate there would be probably 50 service personnel.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister give a break-down of civilian salaries and wages amounting to $3,400,000 and indicate what is involved there?

Mr. Claxton: The minister's office, 33, $90,317, an increase of one over last year. Deputy minister, 44, $175,403. Civilian personnel, 100, $227,925. Central registry—this is for all three services—145, a reduction of more than 50 per cent through unification, $305,136. Printing and stationery, 50, $114,042. Auditing, 45, $136,521. Judge advocate general, 22, $45,980. Public relations, 18, $50,457. Inspection service, 727, $1,956,031. Library, 6, $16,980; we have now one single library for all three services. Civilian defence co-ordinator, 80, $271,702.

Mr. Drew: Those figures are just for headquarters, but I have a specific question I should like to ask. Can the minister give a list of the civilians attached to the following branches of the army, and also the total pay?

A. Civilians at the pay record office.

B. Civilians at headquarters. I assume the answer the minister has already given will cover this.

C. Civilians attached to regimental units, armouries and other establishments of that nature.

D. Civilians employed in connection with recruiting, welfare and associated activities.

E. Civilians at hospitals and medical establishments.

F. Civilians at military schools and training establishments.

G. Civilians at army educational establishments.

H. Civilians at Army Service Corps, veterinary and replacement establishments.

J. Civilians employed in connection with railways and inland water transport in any way connected with military activities.

K. Civilians at ordnance establishments.

L. Civilians at RCEME establishments.

M. Civilian staffs for works engineers and land services.

N. Civilians attached to the provost corps.

I am asking the minister to give under these heads the number of civilians employed, the nature of the employment such as is given in the estimates of other departments of government, and the total pay.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member is asking about the army and we are still under administration. I do not think it would be a bad thing if every now and then we conformed with the arrangement arrived at in this committee. The hon. member knows something about the armed forces, and I think he realizes that he has chosen an arrangement which could not be arrived at and told to the committee without going into individual files. It does not happen to conform to the arrangement of the estimates as laid down by the comptroller of the treasury and the Auditor General. Our estimates are arranged in exactly the same way as those of other government departments and in accordance with the directions of the Auditor General and the recommendations of the committee on public accounts.

The hon. member is asking about headquarters, regimental establishments, recruiting, welfare, hospital, medical establishments, military schools, educational establishments, army service corps, veterinary corps—I do not think we have one any more—post office, railways, inland transport and so on. I suggest that the easiest way for us to proceed is to take up the matters which are before us in the order in which they are laid out. If I cannot answer any questions on that basis then I shall get the answers. If it is really important for the information of this committee and the country that we should rearrange our accounts, then we will go back to the Auditor General and the comptroller of the treasury and see how we can do it. Until then I am subject to your direction.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the minister if it is his contention that the question asked by the leader of the opposition should have been asked under "civilian salaries and wages", of the heading "Army"?

Mr. Drew: I am asking it under civilian salaries and wages. I have asked the question in regard to the army and I will ask the same question in regard to the navy and in regard to the air force, all of which comes under administration and all of which I state definitely comes under civilian salaries and wages. We are not able to tell at what point the division comes, and surely this would be the place where we could best get that information.

Mr. Claxton: The item we are dealing with is administration and I have already given the break-down of the allocation of civilian salaries under that item. I do not know what more I can do to answer the hon. member under that item. Then if he wants to ask a similar question under each successive service I will be glad to give the same information.

Mr. Drew: I assure the minister that I shall ask the same question. I had thought it might be more convenient to bring them all together at this time, but if the minister prefers it otherwise then I shall certainly ask that question at each point. If the minister does not think the headings I have suggested are the most appropriate, then I simply suggest that for the purposes of convenience he adopt headings more satisfactory to himself. My only concern is that they be headings which adequately embrace the different categories of civilians employed in that way.

Mr. Claxton: We are in complete agreement on that.

Mr. Pearkes: I think it would help the committee if we had it quite clear that this amount is for civilians employed at headquarters here in Ottawa.

Mr. Claxton: And the civil defence and inspection services right across the country. As to headquarters, it is only that part of the civilian staff applicable to headquarters itself. As we look through the items later it will be found that there are civilian salaries under navy, army and air force, and they are not included here. These are the civil employees applicable to headquarters, with a total of $3,489,842 which I gave in answer to an earlier question. That includes under headquarters the civilian employees of the judge advocate general, public relations, inspection services and civil defence co-ordinator, all which report to headquarters.

Mr. Pearkes: Would that include the civilians employed on the clerical staff at naval headquarters?

Mr. Claxton: Not those under navy, army or air force; only those under the department, at headquarters itself.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask a question which is not so intricate as some that have been asked, but concerning a matter on which I should like some information. I have hunted through the details of the estimates and cannot find what I want. The question arises out of the answer to a question I asked a year ago with regard to the naval barracks and armouries being built in my province, at Charlottetown.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If we are to proceed in an orderly manner I am afraid I will have to ask the hon. member to ask his question at another time. This item covers civil salaries and wages, on page 269.

Mr. McLure: This is on the same page and under the same heading.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member please resume his seat. I am trying to tell him that we are now discussing civil salaries and wages, and while that discussion is being carried on we cannot discuss naval barracks. Once this discussion is terminated we will move to professional and special services. The procedure agreed on this afternoon is that we are to study each detailed sum as it appears under the heading, first, of departmental administration including inspection services and civil defence. Under this heading we are now studying civil salaries and wages. Later the hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss barracks.

Mr. McLure: Under what heading was the manufacture of guns and ammunition discussed a few moments ago?

The Deputy Chairman: I was not in the chair when the discussion started but I read the unrevised copy of Hansard covering the half hour before six o'clock in order to ascertain how the discussion had commenced. I may tell the hon. member that it arose from a question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo in connection with inspection services. At one point the hon. member asked if inspection services were carried on at the dominion arsenal at Longueuil, and since the Minister of Defence Production was here he gave an explanation. That is how it started, and that discussion was finalized a few moments ago. We are now on civil salaries and wages. Has the discussion terminated on that item?

Mr. McLure: If a mistake was made before six o'clock in not following the procedure that was laid down, why not make another mistake now? I am going to get the answers anyway.

The Deputy Chairman: I would be glad to accommodate the hon. member, but even if one mistake was made I do not intend to be a party to another.

Mr. Noseworthy: I notice that altogether there is something over $50 million for civil salaries and wages scattered through these national defence estimates. Would it be possible for the minister to provide us with a mimeographed sheet of some kind that would give us the sort of break-down he gave me for the item of $3,489,842? I would like to know, for instance, the scale of those salaries, what are some of the higher salaries and what are some of the lower ones. Are these people civil servants, permanent or temporary, or are they not in the civil service?

Mr. Claxton: The department employs civilians in a number of different categories; first, permanent civil servants; second, temporary civil servants, in exactly the same way as every other department of the government. They get corresponding salaries, and they received the increase which was made applicable on December 1, 1950. Then the department employs a very considerable number of prevailing rate employees, largely in the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt, and also in the shops of RCEME and the ordnance corps. In connection with those employees the practice is to pay the rate decided by the Department of Labour to be the rate prevailing in that locality for equivalent work. We observe that rule very closely. In consequence we pay the civilians working in the department, who are not civil servants but who are prevailing rate employees, the rates paid for equivalent work in the locality, as determined by the Department of Labour.

Mr. Noseworthy: Are some of those salaried employees who are not civil servants being paid at prevailing salaries?

Mr. Claxton: No. There are two categories. If a man is on salary then he is a temporary or permanent civil servant. If he is not on salary he is a prevailing rate employee, paid at the rate prevailing in the community.

Mr. Green: Has the department been making any study of the question of national registration? I ask that question because in the report of the national advisory council on manpower there was a recommendation that various departments, I think including the Department of National Defence, should make an immediate and comprehensive study of all aspects of the national registration question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member did not hear me a moment ago when I said we were now discussing civil salaries and wages. It may be that the question he is bringing up pertains to this matter, but it would help the committee very much if he would come to his question, because I do not see how he can discuss that matter at this point.

Mr. Green: A survey of that kind would be undertaken by the administrative staff at national defence headquarters, and I submit I am quite in order in asking the question under this item. This item covers, for example, the deputy minister. I believe that the deputy minister is a member of this manpower council. I submit that I am in order in asking the question on this particular item. I would ask the minister whether that recommendation of the manpower council has been carried out by the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Claxton: What recommendation is it?

Mr. Green: The recommendation reads as follows:

That the department concerned should make an immediate and comprehensive study of all aspects of the national registration question.

Now that included the Department of National Defence. I would ask whether any such study has been made or is being made by the department, and if so the results thereof?

Mr. Claxton: Such a study has been made, of course, and the results will be made known to the body which asked it, that is the advisory board on labour, when it next meets.

Mr. Green: There will be a report on this question of a national registration made to the advisory council on manpower when it meets next week?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: May I submit to the hon. member that, in my opinion, this question might more properly have been asked when the general discussion took place. We are now into the detailed study of the estimates, and if we are to follow the procedure agreed upon this afternoon we will have to consider now civil salaries and wages until that detailed sum is disposed of.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister inform us what numbers of these employees are men and what numbers are women, and if the proposed organization of the women's auxiliary will mean that some of these enlisted women will be utilized for this type of work?

Mr. Claxton: No women whatever. I was too quick in answering there: no women in the armed forces will be utilized for this kind of headquarters work. The object in recruiting women for the air force is to employ them at work such as radar, plotting, electronics, telecommunications and the like. We have no present intention of employing any women in headquarters except for the purpose of administration and instruction.

Mr. Noseworthy: Would the minister consider putting on the record a break-down of these civil salaries and wages similar to the one he gave on the first item about which I asked? If we could have that information on the record before we reach these items, I believe we could examine them more intelligently. It is very easy for the minister to read them out.

Mr. Claxton: Well, I could give the figures. I shall give the sheet to Hansard so as to make sure they are correct.

Mr. Noseworthy: My point is whether the minister would consider giving the same figures for the other sections, so that we may have them before us when we reach those parts of the estimates?

Mr. Claxton: No, I think we had better keep to the order of the discussion.

Mr. Noseworthy: There is some $15 million under the navy. Would it be possible to have that on the record before we come to examine this item, so we could have some opportunity of examining the details in advance?

Mr. Drew: Why would it not be convenient to give the salaries of each of the categories, and the number of employees in that category? After all that must be a matter of very simple record, and is a regular procedure. Can that not be given?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, it can be given if the people of Canada want to pay for it. We could give it. There is no security attached to it. We have approximately 30,000 civilian employees in the department today and about 70,000 service personnel. We can give you their names, dates of birth and salaries if you want, but does it serve any useful purpose? I believe what the hon. member for York South would want would be a break-down in respect of the navy, army and air force such as I gave for general administration. We will be glad to have that available as we reach each item.

Mr. Drew: Do I understand that the minister thinks that is not a useful thing, to give the actual salaries opposite the category and the number employed?

Mr. Claxton: They are exactly the same as any other government service. I could read them out, but what advantage it would be to hon. members, I do not know. I could do it here, for example—

Mr. Warren: Whoever reads them?

Mr. Claxton: If we came to the navy, I could easily say we have in the civil staff at Halifax, permanent, 89; temporary, 1,039; prevailing rates, 1,438; new continuing, 60; a total of 2,626. To draw off their actual pay would mean that we would have to draw each man's pay card, because a great number of them are prevailing rate employees, add it up and put it into shape to put before the committee. How that would help the committee, I do not know.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Chairman, I must confess I am unable to understand the resistance of the minister as to something that is the regular practice in the other departments. Just as an example, let me refer to page 382 of the estimates, resources and development. On that page it starts, departmental administration, and that is what we are considering here. The first item is "One deputy minister and commissioner of the Northwest Territories, $15,000." Then it gives the "assistant deputy minister, planning; assistant deputy minister, administraton; director of administration." Then, you go on down through the whole list in which you have the details. For instance, there are thirteen clerks, grade 4, salaries from $2,568 to $2,904, and then the total is given, $31,227.

Then, a little further on there is another example, "Nine clerks, grade 2A, $1,560-$2,088;" and so on with the rest of the employees of the department. Then, you will find that where there are people employed in this department at casual rates, or at what are described as prevailing rates, they are lumped under the total sum and the number. It is either one of two things; either this book of estimates is brought together on a most inefficient and unnecessarily complicated basis by including these figures for other departments, or else there is some reason for it. It seems to me the reason for it is so the members of this house will have an idea of the salary level of the various categories of civilian employees. No matter what may apply to service employees, civilian employees are in exactly the same category in the Department of National Defence as any other department. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I find it extremely difficult to believe these figures are not readily available, because I would imagine we would have had a report a long time ago from the Auditor General that the accounts of the Department of National Defence were kept on an entirely different basis than any other department if those figures are not available right now.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry to have to assure the hon. leader of the opposition that, from the information which I have at this stage, those figures are not available right now. We made up our estimate and kept our accounts in accordance with the directions of the Auditor General, and those figures have not been included.

Now, he has referred to page 282 of the estimates where there is a reference to 63 employees. If we are going to do that for the Department of National Defence, with 30,000 civilian employees, it will run to an awful lot of paper and it will not do anyone very much good. If that had been desired, it might have been indicated before, and then could have been considered. But the estimates have been made up in the form in which they have following the recommendations of the public accounts committee and the Auditor General last year; that is the form in which we have the material available. I shall be glad to give hon. members any information that is before me, and I shall be glad to get any information that they think it desirable to place before the committee. But I do suggest it is very desirable that we should consider the cost of obtaining this, and the advantages that might result.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence is really creating bogeys that do not exist. I have in my hand the army estimates for the present year for the United Kingdom. At page 72 of those army estimates I find, for instance, "civilians attached to regimental units." That is only one group, and that amounts to 5,438. It is not just a handful of people. In each case it gives the salary level; it gives the number and gives the total. I might say that that total, being 5,438, with the designation, the salaries and the totals, is all contained on one page of this book. When we are told that this would entail such a prohibitive cost and would be so difficult, I would only say that the minister would be following the practice that is well established, to which we have referred on numerous occasions and one which I am satisfied their records would now give, without any complicated detail.

Mr. Warren: Does it give their telephone numbers?

Mr. Drew: I shall not say what I intended to say.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not think the hon. member could handle them.

Mr. Drew: All through this book the same practice is followed. For instance, on the preceding page, there is given "civilians at command headquarters and other headquarters establishments, 17,350." There again you have the salary levels, the number, and the total; and in those cases whether they are employing people at current levels as the minister did, they give it in that way in a bulk figure.

Mr. Warren: We do not want it.

Mr. Fulton: Our own Post Office Department does it, at page 331; there are 17,000 employees.

Mr. Drew: Yes. To come to our own estimates, at page 330, under the post office, we find there a total of 15,495; and above that you will see the details of salaries given, except where there is simply one official or again where they are indicated at prevailing rates as in the case of some of the employees of this department.

Mr. Green: And approximately 17,000 on the next page.

Mr. Drew: Then on the next page—and I mention this just to show that it is not dealing with handfuls of men—under the post office again, there is given a figure of 17,638, with the details and the salaries, and the total of approximately $54 million.

With this practice so clearly established, it is difficult to credit the fact that the accounting method is such that this information cannot be given to this committee in some similar form; and I think it should be given. I suggest right now that instead of having the resistance that there is to giving information, it should be seen by this time how much more rapidly we would proceed if the minister would agree to follow the practice adopted in other departments and in the United Kingdom, and would take the lists that are available, have them prepared, and made available to us here. Then we can proceed to discuss this matter with knowledge of the facts before us.

The Minister of National Defence used glowing terms with regard to our attempts at standardization—and I only use this as an illustration—when he said that no nation in the world had done so much as we had done. The only way we have done that is to do nothing, in this particular case, evidently. But we are told that we can get the details of this department and that this department gives more information than any other. I must say that so far as I can see the answer is that this department is best because it does nothing to give us the information; the other departments do. This information is valuable or it is not. If the minister's contention is right and this information is not valuable, then it condemns every other department that takes the trouble to give us these details.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, when I asked for that information, I had no intention of asking the minister to do what he suggests he would have to do, namely to go back to these plants where men are employed and pull their time cards to find out what they were being paid. What I was asking is that before we vote for five items amounting to $50 million, we be given something more than just a statement "civil salaries and wages" repeated five times, and amounting to over $50 million in this one department's estimates. I think we should have at least something approximating the information that we have in the other departments here or that we should have some idea where these people are going, what salaries they are getting, whether they are civil servants and what proportion are civil servants. The minister wants to know what good that would be to the Canadian public. I would think the Canadian public would want some knowledge of how an item of this size, namely $1,400 million, is spent. I think some detail would be of interest to the Canadian public, even if the minister thinks it is not of interest to us here in the house.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to give the hon. member the information which I understand he wants as we come to each item. But to give it now, and put it on Hansard, I think would be anticipating the progress we hope to make.

Mr. Noseworthy: If we could have something of that kind, either before us or on Hansard, instead of having to sit here and try to catch what the minister is saying as he reads these figures off, it would help us to study the matter intelligently.

Mr. Knowles: May I just say one word in connection with this matter. Reference has been made to the form in which these details are given in connection with the other departments of government. I should like to point out that the book of estimates this year is considerably larger than it was last year. One reason is that more detail has been given, in keeping with suggestions made in the public accounts committee and here in the House of Commons. For example, greater detail is given as to the break-down between temporary and permanent employees. It seems to me that last year we did not ask that the one general item for civil salaries and wages in the Department of National Defence be broken down in the same way. Bearing in mind the fact that requests in former years with respect to the form of the estimates have been met to a considerable extent, I express the hope—without prejudice to the request that we get information this year—that next year, when the estimates are brought down, the Department of National Defence will bring down its information with regard to civil salaries and wages in the same way as do the other departments.

As the leader of the opposition has already pointed out, the number of civilian employees in the Department of National Defence does not differ greatly from the number employed by the Post Office Department. The total amount spent for civil salaries and wages in the Post Office Department is $52,860,461. The total amount spent for civil salaries and wages in the Department of National Defence is $58,024,590. Those two figures are comparable in magnitude. In the case of the Post Office Department we get a break-down in the back of the book of estimates. My plea is that next year the estimates for the Department of National Defence be broken down in the same way with respect to details in the back of the book.

Mr. Claxton: I think we are moving towards this, Mr. Chairman. As hon. members will observe, it has been possible to increase the detail each year as post-war organization has developed. Certainly I gave instructions this year that we should do everything possible to give all the information we can and to conform completely with the recommendations of the Auditor General. That has been done with regard to all categories of defence expenditures, in the same way as the categories for the expenditures of all other government departments. They have the same class numbers and they are given under the same heads. If in addition it is desired that we should give details of each group of employees, we will certainly be more in a position to do that than ever before, because the development which has been planned has occurred, and I shall be glad to consider it and discuss with the officials of the department, treasury and the government, what can be done to meet the hon. member.

Mr. Harkness: I have suggested to the minister in each of the last three years the desirability of putting forward the estimates of this department in the same form as they are put forward in every department, and in the same form in which they were put forward in this department up until I think 1947. The discussion we have had for the last half hour or more indicates I think the fact that if the estimates of this department were put in the same form as other departments we would have saved a great deal of time here in the house. It would be unnecessary to ask a lot of these questions as to how many employees there are in the administrative branch, such as the item we are considering. The whole thing would be there in front of us. There would be no necessity to ask questions about it. We would save a great deal of time in the house and greatly facilitate the examination of the estimates, and also the speed with which we might get through. I would certainly again recommend very strongly to the minister that when the estimates for next year are brought down the same form be used as was used in these estimates before, and the same form in which they are brought down by other departments.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the discussion on civil salaries and wages terminated?

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister tell us how many deputy ministers there are in this department and what are their salaries?

Mr. Claxton: There is only one deputy minister, and that is the deputy minister of national defence. His salary is $15,000. There are two associate deputy ministers at $10,000 each.

Mr. Pearkes: Is there any other officer under this heading who is drawing a salary of $10,000? For instance, is there a controller of the inspection services? If so, what is his salary?

Mr. Claxton: His salary is $8,500.

Mr. Pearkes: And the associate deputy ministers?

Mr. Claxton: I gave those.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister given the assistant deputy minister?

Mr. Claxton: No, I have not.

Mr. Fulton: There are both assistants and associates, are there not?

Mr. Claxton: There is one assistant who gets $8,000.

Mr. Pearkes: Having dealt with that, how many special advisers has the minister?

Mr. Claxton: None. I beg pardon, yes. Engineer Rear Admiral Stephens, on labour questions particularly. Engineer Rear Admiral Stephens is a retired naval officer and his salary is $10,000. But he receives that in lieu of a pension of something like $6,000 plus; therefore he works for about $3,500.

Mr. Pearkes: Would General Worthington be considered a special adviser?

Mr. Claxton: No; he is now transferred to my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and his salary is similarly fixed at $10,000, but he has not the advantage of both his pension and his salary, so he likewise is doing his present full time service for a supplementary income of something in the neighbourhood of $3,500 or $4,000.

Mr. Pearkes: Since this item covers civil defence, would not his salary be included in this item?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, that is right, and we will transfer to the Department of National Health and Welfare the money necessary to meet their expenses on civil defence which has been provided for in these items.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member for Calgary East has just pointed out that for the last several years he has asked the minister each year if he would not the following year bring down his estimates in the same form as they were brought down I believe up to 1947, and in the same form as other departments see fit to bring them down here. I have been here only one year, but last year I heard the hon. member for Calgary East pose this question to the minister. I think there was some kind of assurance, vague though it may have been, that that would be done. It seems that nothing has been done in the meantime. I think many hon. members have expressed the opinion before that if this were done a great deal of discussion would not have been necessary tonight.

The hon. member for Calgary East has again asked the minister the direct question: will the minister next year see to it that his estimates are brought down in the same form as other departments, and in the same form as I believe the department brought down the estimates prior to 1947? He did not see fit to give an answer. I would be very interested to hear from the minister a direct answer to that question.

Mr. Claxton: No, sir, I cannot give an answer because the form of the estimates is entirely a matter for the Department of Finance, and the form in which our estimates are presented is not the result of my machinations, I can assure the hon. member, but is the result of the work of the Department of Finance, the comptroller of the treasury and the Auditor General. They indicate to us the form in which our estimates should be put and we put them in the form in which they want them. Now, I have no doubt they will read the discussion in Hansard and will take account of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman,—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to go back to the question of the associate deputy minister, but perhaps there is more discussion on this question of the form of the estimates.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes, but I should like to observe that the previous point was somewhat out of order. We are not going to discuss the method by which the estimates are to be presented next year. In my humble view that suggestion has been made by some of the members to the minister who has replied to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and he has also given a reply to the hon. member for Broadview on the same question, and he has given a reply to the hon. member for Calgary East. Perhaps his reply is not that which the hon. member would wish, but nevertheless it is the reply of the minister, and he has indicated that that is the reply at least three times. I would suggest to the hon. members that we should carry on and discuss civil salaries and wages, which are relevant to the item.

Mr. Drew: According to my recollections, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence said that his department did not keep those records in a way that would make it possible to give this information without costing the people of Canada a great deal of money.

Mr. Warren: That is correct.

Mr. Drew: I have before me the last copy of the public accounts, and at page N-49 there is a list of the civil employees of the Department of National Defence. It gives the names and the salaries. There is no suggestion that this is in any way inconsistent with the practice of the department. On the contrary, it is put forward as a regular matter of record by the Auditor General. We see that for the year that was covered by these accounts it gives the deputy minister's salary as $12,000; it gives the controller general of inspection services, the official to whom the hon. member for Nanaimo referred, at $12,000; it gives the assistant deputy minister at $10,000, and then it goes on with lists of names, with the salaries of each one, and that goes on for several pages. This is not a case of saying we have heard enough answers. We have heard enough answers to know that we need another answer, and that is why it is not possible—

Mr. Warren: May I ask the leader of the opposition a question? Did he ever go into the military camp at Petawawa, and through the gate of that camp? If he did so he would be meeting men all the time and, with them, it is not a matter of salary. It is just a day's pay; that is all they get.

Mr. Drew: I hope the hon. member who represents the constituency in which the Petawawa camp is situated is not under the impression that records are not kept as to what is paid the men who are there?

Mr. Warren: They are getting small amounts. It might be only a day's pay.

Mr. Drew: Well, that is just the point. I would like to know how small or how large the day's pay is, as the case may be. But for one, I would like to know why it would be at all difficult to give the very information we have asked for, when the public accounts show that that information is available.

Mr. Claxton: The public accounts make it very clear that that information is available in respect of the year 1949-50, when the amount was paid. I am not responsible however for the form of our estimates, and they have been made in a form which involves the grouping together of items in accordance with the recommendations of the Auditor General and the Department of Finance. We are now being asked to put under each item the number of clerks, the rate of salary, and so on. That might be done in a static year, but we have not had a static year. Each year has been one of tremendous growth, as is revealed in the development of the expenditures of the department. It was $192 million four years ago, about $425 million for the first half of this year, and it is now maybe $1,879 million.

At a time when there is that kind of development it was felt, perhaps not so much by the officers of this department as by everyone concerned, that to put down three stenographers at $500 each or fifty soldiers at this or that amount would be likely to be found misleading—

Mr. Knowles: Civil salaries.

Mr. Claxton: —in consequence of the development of the department, which we were going to increase by fifty or sixty per cent or more each year. That, I understand, is the reason why this practice was adopted—and it was adopted before I came into the department. This year we adopted the form recommended by the Auditor General, and have conformed to the practice of other government departments, but without giving details as to civil servants. Details as to civil servants would take up a great many pages and it would be meaningless, and would not help the work of the committee. I think that must be the conclusion of everyone.

Mr. Noseworthy: Would it be in order to pass on to the next item, and ask—

Mr. Drew: No, no.

Mr. Fulton: On this item I would ask the minister to give us a clear picture of the number of assistant deputies and associate deputies.

Mr. Claxton: That has already been done.

Mr. Fulton: I must confess it is not clear to me. Would the minister at the same time say whether there is any effort in the department whereby either assistants or associates should concern themselves with one or other of the services? In other words is there an allocation of deputies or associates?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Fulton: Is there an allocation to any of the services?

Mr. Claxton: No, not at all.

Mr. Fulton: How many assistant deputies and how many associate deputies are there?

Mr. Claxton: I just gave that information. Do I have to give it again? We have a deputy minister, and two associate deputy ministers, and one assistant deputy minister. The organization of the department is completely on a tri-service basis. All of the services are performed at that level by civilians for each of the three services. We consider it desirable that the unification should extend in that way.

I should like to have one more word with reference to the public accounts. There they have an alphabetical list of employees. What I have been asked for tonight is a list related to something in a future year which does not correspond either to the alphabet or to functions as indicated in the estimates. I would be glad as we come to each item of the estimates to give as full information as is available.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly what we are asking. We are asking for full information respecting the category of each of these employees, and of the amounts paid, except in such cases as they are being paid at ordinary wages; and in that case we would have them bulked as they are done ordinarily. That is what we are asking.

Mr. Wright: It seems to me that in preparing the estimates to present to the Minister of Finance the minister's department must have had certain numbers of people in view, whom they were going to employ in different capacities. All we are asking is to have some of these figures which the minister must have presented to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Claxton: May I recall that I have already given those figures in relation to the item under discussion. I gave the amount of $3,489,842. I have described the number of employees, and their association with the department. It totals 1,270 employees. I have already given that.

Mr. Wright: But the minister has not broken it down in various classifications, namely those who are stenographers or inspectors, or whatever classification they may have had. He must have had that information when he presented his estimates to the Department of Finance. All we want is the number in the different classifications, and the salaries in those classifications. We are not asking for each individual.

Mr. Claxton: I see. As I understand it, you would like to have that information for the 33 people in the minister's office, and their classification?

Mr. Wright: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: And the 44 in the deputy minister's office, and their classification?

Mr. Wright: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: And the 100 of civilian personnel, with their classification; and the 145 in central registry, with their classification; and the 50 in printing and stationery; the 45 in auidt; the 18 in public relations; the 22 in the judge advocate general's office; the 727 in the inspection service; the 6 in the library; the 80 with the civil defence board co-ordinator. All these make a total of 1,270, and you would like to have their classifications?

Mr. Wright: Yes, the same classifications as are given in the other departments.

Mr. Claxton: Well, I would think it would take some time to obtain that. They were given, of course, in building up these estimates.

Mr. Wright: Yes, they must have been available then.

Mr. Claxton: Yes; and it would take some time to read it into the record. Of course we are only beginning with this. We will have some 30,000 altogether, including prevailing rate employees, which might represent 40 per cent. Do you want the same thing for the armed forces, too—which would be another 70,000?

Mr. Wright: Just the civilian employees.

Mr. Claxton: It would require another book like this one. We had better do it next year, don't you think?

Mr. Harkness: What the minister has just read out indicates the necessity for information of this sort. Among other things there is a public relations personnel of 18 civilians. It happens that a great deal of public relations work is done by service personnel. I believe there is a lieutenant colonel who is a public relations officer at national defence headquarters, with a man of equivalent rank in the air force and another in the navy. Then at each command headquarters there is a major or captain doing public relations work, along with other ranks. In addition to these public relations officers and other ranks there are 18 civilian personnel engaged in public relations work. I have been under the impression that public relations work for the department was done by these public relations officers. What do the 18 civilians engaged in public relations work do and what are their salaries?

Mr. Claxton: The director of public relations has charge of the public relations activities for all three services and the department. Then there is the necessary clerical and stenographic staff in addition to the service personnel. I would think that this is one branch of the department's activities which will be considerably increased in the near future. We find we are understaffed at present.

Mr. Harkness: What are the names and salaries of the 18 public relations civil servants and their classifications?

Mr. Claxton: The permanent civil servants are as follows:

F. Carlofsky, clerk grade 4, $2,580.
R. V. Dodds, information officer grade 5, $4,740.
R. C. Donison, typist grade 2B, $2,040.
M. M. Dustan, stenographer grade 2B, $2,040.
V. M. McCaffrey, clerk grade 3, $2,280.

Mr. Harkness: The director does not appear in that list.

Mr. Claxton: He is temporary so far.

Mr. Quelch: I take it that many of the civilians paid under this item will be doing the same work as service personnel who will be working alongside them. I know of a number of cases where the wages paid to a civilian amounted to $10 or $15 a day while the serviceman working alongside receives perhaps $2.40 a day or whatever the rate may be. I realize that the man in the armed service receives many benefits which the civilian would not receive but when the rate of pay is four, five or six times that paid to the serviceman he seems to have good reason to complain. I think as far as possible we should avoid having that situation develop. If work of a similar character must be done by civilians and service personnel then they should not be working side by side.

Mr. Claxton: In 1946 the armed services worked with a committee with the treasury board and the other departments concerned to work out a uniform scale of pay for the three services. At that time an effort was made to have the rates of pay in the navy, army and air force made equivalent to those paid by eight leading industries for similar work. The matter was gone into at great length, assisted by the Department of Labour, the dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Finance. At that time uniform rates of pay were fixed which we considered to be the equivalent paid by industry for similar jobs.

It must be remembered that the service personnel receive hospitalization, medical services, pensions, clothing and so on. All those benefits were taken into account. Subsequently there were two increases in rates of pay. The last increase was made as of December 1, 1950, and these were designed to make the increase across the board to all service personnel equivalent to the increase in the cost of living index since 1946.

A check was then made to see how they compared with the rates paid by the same eight leading industries, and they were found to be on the same basis. As far as possible the rates of pay are equivalent. No doubt in certain categories, particularly in jobs in RCEME, where the men would be working on motor vehicles or in the dockyards civilian personnel will be working alongside service personnel. Perhaps because of seniority or trades rating they may be receiving different rates of pay, but as far as possible we avoid that situation.

Mr. Hees: What is the name and the salary of the temporary director of public relations which the minister mentioned?

Mr. Claxton: The name is William Dumsday. He is not a temporary director, he is the director of public relations. His salary is $6,000, but he is still a temporary civil servant. He was a wing commander during the war and did the same kind of work with the air force.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): On Monday we will resume the debate on the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with respect to his estimates. Then we will take up the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with veterans professional loans. Then the two resolutions standing in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs with respect to pensions and certain rights and privileges to be granted to members of the special force. When those have been concluded we might consider the resolutions standing in the name of the Prime Minister with respect to certain matters here in Ottawa. If there is still time we will take up the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Labour having to do with an amendment to the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
