CHAPTER XXXIII. Meanwhile strange things were happening to Philip Paxton. He had occasion one day to go to Greenwich upon important business for a client, and as he was anxious to get back just as soon as possible, he resolved to go by the underground rail way and return the other way. As he entered and took his seat in the coach at the station, he found three others in the compartment-a man and woman of very respectable appearance. and with them an exceedingly bright boy of perhaps twelve or thirteen

The man was evidently a mechanic of some sort, with an honest, open face, a frank, clear eye, and--what particularly attracted Philip's attention-was most politely attentive to his wife, who was a delicate, pretty little woman, wearing the happiest smile that he had ever seen.

The boy was full of life and eagerness, intelligent beyond his years, and kept asking questions regarding their trip, which, apparently was one of that both interested and amused Philip.

He appeared to take no notice of them, but nothing escaped his observation; he saw everything—the kind little attentions of the husband to his wife, her happy smile as she raised the patient, tender replies of both to their son's eager questioning. Thus the time passed until they had nearly reached Greenwich, where he found his companions were also going. when there suddenly smote the air, short, sharp, terrible whistle, then followed a crash which made him feel as if he was being crushed between a couple of thunderbolts, and he knew no more until he felt himself lifted and carried quite a distance, and then laid down upon a board or floor. Opening his eyes, he found he was station where they were about to stop, and where the accident had occurred: and as the mist cleared still farther from his brain and sight, he saw a crowd of people, with anxious, scared faces, running to and fro, carrying lanterns, buckets of water and implements for removing the debris.

A little way back he could see a great mass lying upon the track, and though but dimly discerning it in the gloom of that underground passage, he was a portion of the train which had brought him hither. A man came up to him just then and peered curiously into his face.

"Hump!" he said with an accent of surprise, "yer cum to, be ye? I didn't think ye ever would when we hauled ye up here-thought ye had kicked the bucket, sure.' "What has happened?" Philip asked. faintly, and trying to raise his hand to his aching head. "Switch wor wrong, and there's ben a smashup."

A NEW STUDIO. Miss Mydra I. Lent, reader and teacher, has just opened a handsome new studio, the London Studio of Elocution, Vocal and Physical Culture, at No. 288 Princess avenue. Miss Lent is a graduate and gold medalist of the Brantford Ladies' College, 1899. She subsequently took an extended course of study at the New York School of Expression, one of the most famous institutions of that character in America, from which she was gradu-ated in 1903. While at the Brantford Ladies' College, Miss Lent was awarded a special prize for elocution and the first prize for physical culture. She ossesses also a very fine soprano voice.
