INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

En 1956, l'influence internationale de Lester B. Pearson, secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures du Canada, était à son apogée. Ministre des Affaires étrangères depuis 1948, Pearson avait modelé la politique du Canada pendant la première phase – la plus critique – de la guerre froide. Il était un des principaux architectes de l'Organisation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord (OTAN) et du nouveau Commonwealth multiracial, et avait en outre participé à l'élaboration des normes et procédures qui régissaient l'Organisation des Nations Unies (ONU) dans les années 1950. Vers le milieu de la décennie, ce Canadien, qui jouissait d'une grande popularité, avait tissé un extraordinaire réseau d'amis et de relations s'étendant de l'Europe occidentale et de l'Atlantique Nord aux nouveaux pays indépendants d'Afrique et d'Asie. Toutefois, son affabilité et son idéalisme libéral occultaient souvent son intelligence aiguë des dures réalités de la politique internationale. Bien que parfaitement conscient des limites de la diplomatie, Pearson répugnait à la confrontation et recherchait presque intuitivement un terrain d'entente et un compromis permettant de trouver une issue à un conflit. Il avait le génie de la négociation et, selon le mot d'un journaliste de ses amis, il excellait dans l'art de « jouer les bons offices entre deux parties »¹.

Comme le montre clairement le présent volume, les avis de Pearson sur les événements internationaux étaient recherchés et appréciés. Par exemple, le ministre des Affaires étrangères d'Israël lui communiquait copie de sa correspondance avec le secrétaire d'État américain, John Foster Dulles, désireux de le tenir au courant. (document 1) Par ailleurs, le premier ministre britannique, Anthony Eden, effectua une visite à Ottawa, en février 1956, afin de s'enquérir de son point de vue sur la situation au Moyen-Orient et en Asie du Sud-Est. (document 696) De même, au printemps 1956, comme l'OTAN ne savait comment réagir à la menace soviétique, Dulles se tourna vers lui pour redresser la situation. (document 519) Lorsque les troupes israéliennes envahirent l'Égypte le 29 octobre 1956, il était quasi inéluctable que « Mike » Pearson se retrouve immédiatement au centre de la crise.

La crise non résolue du Moyen-Orient et celle du canal de Suez dominant naturellement le volume 22. Ottawa continuait de manifester un vif intérêt pour les relations israélo-arabes au début de 1956; cependant, son attention croissait et diminuait au gré des urgences. Par conséquent, on ne possède qu'une documentation fragmentaire qui, dans la section préliminaire du premier chapitre, ne donne qu'une vue incomplète de la politique et des positions du Canada. Il s'en dégage des éléments tels que l'intérêt traditionnel que porte le Canada aux mesures d'instauration de la confiance comme l'Organisme des Nations Unies chargé de la surveillance de la trêve (ONUST) (document 5) ou les efforts des Américains visant à favoriser la coopération israélo-arabe pour ce qui est des voies navigables de la région. (document 8) On constate aussi que l'évolution de l'équilibre des pouvoirs au Moyen-Orient était perçue de façon pragmatique et réaliste. John W. Holmes, sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures, affirmait avec force que l'Occident devrait inviter l'Union soviétique dans la région, en lançant cet avertissement prophétique : « L'alternative à la non-coopération avec les Russes s'avère une faillite et peut conduire éventuellement au désastre. » (document 3) Pearson était de cet avis, mais pas Dulles (document 38), et lorsque éclata plus tard la crise de Suez, le sous-secrétaire d'État, Jules Léger, ne put

INTRODUCTION

In 1956, Lester B. Pearson, Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs, was at the height of his international influence. He had served continuously as foreign minister from 1948, charting a Canadian course through the Cold War's first, most dangerous, phase. He was a principal architect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and the new multi-racial Commonwealth, and had helped shape the norms and procedures that defined the United Nations (UN) in the 1950s. By the middle of that decade, this popular Canadian had developed an unrivalled network of friends and contacts that spanned Western Europe and the North Atlantic, and encircled the newly independent countries of Africa and Asia. His affability and liberal idealism, however, often hid his keen grasp of the hard realities of international politics. Though well aware of diplomacy's limits, Pearson shied away from confrontation, almost intuitively responding to conflict by seeking common ground and compromise. Negotiation was his genius, and in the words of one friendly reporter, he excelled in "finding out how one side felt, then playing it back to the other, and vice versa."¹

As this volume clearly demonstrates, Pearson's advice on international developments was sought and heeded. The Israeli foreign minister passed along copies of his correspondence with the American Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, determined to keep Pearson in the loop. (Document 1) Similarly, British Prime Minister Anthony Eden visited Ottawa in February 1956 anxious for Pearson's views on the situation in the Middle East and Southeast Asia. (Document 696) And in the spring of 1956, as NATO drifted aimlessly in the face of the receding Soviet threat, Dulles turned to Pearson to stop the rot. (Document 519) It was perhaps inevitable then that when Israeli troops invaded Egypt on October 29, 1956, "Mike" Pearson was immediately at the heart of the crisis.

The unsettled Middle East and the Suez Crisis naturally dominate Volume 22. Ottawa maintained a lively interest in Arab-Israeli relations in early 1956, though its attention waxed and waned with each passing emergency. Consequently, the documentary record is fragmentary and the opening section of the first chapter contains material that offers only incomplete snapshots of Canadian policy and attitudes. Some reflect Canada's traditional interest in confidence-building measures like the UN Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) (Document 5) or American efforts to encourage Arab-Israeli cooperation in the development of the region's waterways. (Document 8) Others reveal a practical and realist appreciation of the evolving balance of power in the Middle East. John W. Holmes, an Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, argued cogently that the West should invite the Soviet Union into the region, prophetically warning that "the alternative to non-cooperation with the Russians is proving bankrupt and just possibly leading to disaster." (Document 3) Pearson agreed, but Dulles did not (Document 38), and when the Suez Crisis finally erupted, the Under-Secretary, Jules Léger, could not refrain from privately expressing his department's sense of vindication. (Document 87)

Canada's direct interest in the Middle East during the first part of 1956 was largely confined to the export of Canadian arms to this volatile region. As the documentation in the first chapter suggests, Canada worked hard to keep its military exports to Israel

s'empêcher d'exprimer en privé le sentiment que les événements lui donnaient raison. (document 87)

Durant les premiers mois de l'année 1956, les intérêts directs du Canada au Moyen-Orient se limitaient en grande partie à l'exportation d'armes vers cette région explosive. Comme le montrent les documents réunis au premier chapitre, le Canada s'efforçait de maintenir la balance à peu près égale entre Israël et les États arabes en ce qui a trait aux exportations militaires, ne voulant pas jouer le rôle de chef de file en matière de livraison d'armes à la région. Cette position devint plus inconfortable en avril 1956, lorsque Dulles demanda à Pearson de fournir à Israël des avions de combat à réaction pour contrebalancer l'augmentation de l'aide soviétique à l'Égypte. (document 33) Pearson était favorable à cette proposition, mais ne souhaitait agir que dans le cadre d'une décision collective de l'Occident sur la livraison d'armes défensives à Israël. (documents 47-48) La mise en oeuvre de cette politique avec les alliés occidentaux s'avéra une tâche extrêmement ardue. La nationalisation soudaine du canal de Suez par le président égyptien Gamal Abdel Nasser, en juillet 1956, compliqua encore davantage la situation.

Ce volume ne prétend pas couvrir en détail les négociations internationales qui se déroulaient à Londres, au Caire et à New York par suite de la décision de Nasser. Préoccupé par la volonté manifeste des Britanniques et des Français de rechercher une confrontation avec l'Égypte, Ottawa était heureux d'adopter une attitude légèrement indifférente. Pearson était soulagé que le Canada n'ait pas été invité à la Conférence de Londres, au début d'août (document 82); par la suite, il déclina une invitation de l'Inde à se joindre à New Delhi dans la recherche d'une solution. (documents 101-04) Néanmoins, le Canada, à maintes reprises, fit clairement valoir ses réserves à Whitehall au sujet de l'utilisation de la force pour décider de l'avenir du canal. Le premier ministre Louis Saint-Laurent ne mâchait pas ses mots, adressant à Eden des messages officiels (et officieux) à la limite de la courtoisie diplomatique : « Je suis sûr que vous vous rendez compte que le recours à la force dans la situation actuelle — même en dernier ressort — ne se fera pas sans risques, notamment celui de voir la partie qui a tort saisir les Nations Unies de la question. » (document 78) La France et la Grande-Bretagne demandèrent par la suite au Conseil de sécurité de se prononcer sur leur différend avec Nasser, mais les inquiétudes du Canada persistaient. « Loin de rechercher une solution, la France et, tout particulièrement, le Royaume-Uni semblent vouloir humilier Nasser », note R.A. MacKay, représentant permanent du Canada aux Nations Unies. (document 99)

MacKay avait raison. Peu après l'attaque lancée par Israël contre l'Égypte, la Grande-Bretagne et la France exigèrent un cessez-le-feu. Les combats se poursuivant, les deux pays commencèrent à bombarder les aérodromes égyptiens, manifestement pour protéger le canal de Suez. Tout comme Dulles, qui s'était adressé à Pearson pour l'aider à déchiffrer les intentions britanniques (document 106), les représentants du Canada n'avaient « aucune idée » des plans de Londres ni « le moindre soupçon qu'il se préparait quelque chose d'extraordinaire ». (document 107) En raison de l'effet de surprise et de l'accélération des événements ultérieurs, les documents correspondant aux premiers jours de la crise sont relativement peu nombreux. « L'étonnement et la consternation » d'Ottawa devant le comportement de la Grande-Bretagne (document 108) sont bien documentés dans les dossiers du Cabinet reproduits ici (documents 112 et 117) et dans les échanges irrités entre Eden et Saint-Laurent (documents 110 et and the Arab countries in approximate balance, unwilling to assume a leading role as a regional arms supplier. This became much harder in April 1956, when Dulles asked Pearson to supply Israel with jet fighters in order to offset increased Soviet aid to Egypt. (Document 33) Pearson was sympathetic, but unwilling to act except as part of a collective Western decision to provide Israel with defensive weapons. (Documents 47-48) Working out this policy with the Western allies proved exceptionally complicated, and became even more so when Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser abruptly nationalized the Suez Canal in July 1956.

This volume does not attempt to cover the detailed international negotiations in London, Cairo and New York that followed Nasser's action. Distressed by the apparent Anglo-French determination to seek a confrontation with Egypt, Ottawa was happy to adopt a slightly detached posture. Pearson was relieved that Canada was not invited to attend the London Conference in early August (Document 82), and later declined an Indian invitation to join New Delhi in seeking a solution. (Documents 101-04) Yet Canadian reservations about the use of force to decide the Canal's future were clearly and repeatedly expressed in Whitehall. Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent's formal (and informal) messages to Eden were blunt, verging on the un-diplomatic: "I am sure that you appreciate that the use of force in present circumstances - even as a last resort - will be surrounded by risks and difficulties, one of which might be the submission of the matter to the United Nations by the wrong party." (Document 78) Though France and Britain eventually asked the Security Council to rule on their dispute with Nasser, Canadian misgivings persisted. "Far from seeking a solution," observed R.A. MacKay, Canada's Permanent Representative to the United Nations, "France and the U.K., but particularly the latter, seem bent on humiliating Nasser." (Document 99)

MacKay was right. Shortly after the Israeli assault on Egypt, Britain and France demanded a cease-fire; when the fighting continued, they started to bomb Egyptian airfields, ostensibly to protect the Suez Canal. Like Dulles, who turned to Pearson for help deciphering British intentions (Document 106), Canadian officials were "given no inkling" of London's plans and "not the slightest intimation that anything extraordinary was planned." (Document 107) Surprise and the rapid pace of subsequent developments explain why documentation on the first few days of the crisis is relatively sparse. Ottawa's "bewilderment and dismay" at Britain's behaviour (Document 108) are fully documented in the Cabinet records reprinted here (Documents 112 and 117) and in St. Laurent's angry exchanges with Eden. (Documents 110 and 113) Pearson's diplomacy in New York, where he arrived on November 1 to attend the special session of the UN General Assembly on the crisis, is often less completely documented. Reports were sometimes intended to supplement newspaper accounts (Document 119) or were sent several days after the events described. (Document 130) In one instance, a record of several important discussions on November 2-6 between Pearson and Dag Hammarskjold, the UN Secretary General, was not actually prepared until early December. (Document 192)

Despite these peculiarities in the documentary record, careful readers will be able to follow Pearson's efforts at the United Nations, where the dramatic debate on an American motion calling for a cease-fire and an immediate withdrawal opened in the afternoon of November 1. Before leaving Ottawa that morning, Pearson had asked Canada's experienced High Commissioner in London, Norman Robertson, to seek 113). Les efforts diplomatiques déployés par Pearson à New York, où il arriva le 1^{er} novembre en vue de participer à la session spéciale de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies sur la crise, sont souvent moins bien documentés. Les rapports étaient parfois destinés à être publiés dans la presse (document 119) ou étaient transmis plusieurs jours après les événements décrits (document 130). À une occasion, un compte rendu de plusieurs importantes discussions tenues du 2 au 6 novembre entre Pearson et Dag Hammarskjold, secrétaire général des Nations Unies, n'a été préparé qu'au début décembre (document 192).

En dépit de ces singularités de la documentation, le lecteur attentif pourra suivre les efforts de Pearson aux Nations Unies, qui furent le théâtre d'un débat dramatique, dans l'après-midi du 1^{er} novembre, sur une motion américaine réclamant un cessez-le-feu et un retrait immédiat. Avant de quitter Ottawa ce matin-là, Pearson avait demandé à Norman Robertson, haut-commissaire du Canada à Londres et diplomate chevronné, de s'enquérir des réactions de la Grande-Bretagne à son plan qui demandait à l'Assemblée générale de mettre sur pied une « force militaire d'interposition appropriée entre les Égyptiens et les Israéliens ». À son arrivée à New York, Pearson apprit que la Grande-Bretagne était prête à remettre le canal de Suez « à une force de l'ONU suffisamment importante pour empêcher la reprise des hostilités entre l'Égypte et Israël ». (documents 119 et 118) Cette mince concession était suffisante, et lors du débat sur la motion américaine, Pearson s'assit tranquillement jusqu'au petit matin. Prenant la parole à trois heures pour expliquer l'abstention du Canada, il fit remarquer que la résolution appelant à un retour au statu quo n'était pas suffisante; ce qu'il fallait, dit-il, était une « force des Nations Unies suffisamment importante pour maintenir le calme aux frontières en attendant l'élaboration d'un règlement politique ». (documents 119 et 120)

Après avoir déjeuné avec Hammarskjold, qui avait des doutes quant à la possibilité de mettre en application l'idée de Pearson, le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures retourna à Ottawa pour prendre part, le samedi matin, à une réunion du Cabinet au cours de laquelle les ministres appuyèrent sa proposition d'une force internationale de maintien de la paix. À ce moment-là, il était évident que l'Union soviétique avait décidé de réoccuper la Hongrie pendant que le monde avait les yeux tournés ailleurs. Le comportement des Britanniques et des Français était « d'autant plus déplorable qu'il empêchait le monde libre d'adopter une position unifiée, qui aurait probablement recueilli un soutien plus important de la part des Arabes et des Asiatiques, face à cette agression manifeste ». (document 126)

À la suite de la réunion du Cabinet, Léger demanda à l'ambassadeur du Canada aux États-Unis, Arnold Heeney, de sonder le Département d'État. Ottawa et Washington s'entendirent bientôt sur un projet de résolution des Nations Unies prévoyant la nomination d'un comité de cinq membres chargé de « planifier l'envoi au Moyen-Orient d'une force internationale d'urgence des Nations Unies, qui serait recrutée au sein des forces armées nationales disponibles ». (document 127)

Pearson retourna à New York tard dans l'après-midi du 3 novembre, muni du projet de résolution. Il apprit alors que la réaction des Britanniques au projet avait été encourageante. En effet, le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires étrangères, Selwyn Lloyd, avait même donné l'impression à Robertson qu'ils « accueillaient favorablement la résolution et [...] pourraient même voter en sa faveur ». (document 128) Pearson poursuivit ses démarches, espérant que la résolution pouvait empêcher un débarquement des

Britain's reaction to his plan to call upon the General Assembly to create an "adequate UN military force to separate the Egyptians from the Israelis." On his arrival in New York, Pearson learned that Britain was ready to "hand over" the Suez Canal "to a UN force strong enough to prevent the renewed outbreak of hostilities between Egypt and Israel." (Documents 119 and 118). This slight concession was enough, and during the debate on the American motion, Pearson sat quietly until the small hours of the morning. Rising at 3 a.m. to explain Canada's abstention, he argued that a resolution calling for a return to the status quo was not enough; what was needed was a "UN force large enough to keep these borders at peace while a political settlement is being worked out." (Documents 119 and 120)

After lunch with Hammarskjöld, who was doubtful that Pearson's idea would work, the Secretary of State for External Affairs returned to Ottawa for a Saturday morning Cabinet meeting, where ministers endorsed his proposal for an international peacekeeping force. By now it was clear that the Soviet Union had decided to re-occupy Hungary while the world's attention was diverted, making British and French behaviour "all the more deplorable in that it prevented the free world from taking a united stand, which would probably have had much Asian-Arab support, against this naked aggression." (Document 126)

Following the Cabinet discussion, Léger asked Canada's Ambassador to the United States, Arnold Heeney, to sound out the State Department. Ottawa and Washington soon agreed on a draft UN resolution appointing a five-member committee to "plan for the setting up in the Middle East of an emergency international United Nations force recruited from national military forces immediately available." (Document 127)

Pearson returned to New York late in the afternoon of November 3, bringing the draft with him. There he learned that British reaction to the proposed resolution had been encouraging. Indeed, the Foreign Secretary, Selwyn Lloyd, had even given Robertson the impression "that the resolution was welcome and that ... they might even be able to vote for it." (Document 128) Hopeful that the resolution might stop French and British troops from landing in Egypt, Pearson pressed ahead. After lobbying other UN members for support, he met with the U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations, Henry Cabot Lodge, and decided to base his resolution on a simpler U.S. draft that asked the Secretary-General alone to develop plans for a UN emergency force. Another late-night session followed before the UN General Assembly adopted the Canadian resolution early in the morning of November 4. (Document 130) Supported by an informal advisory committee, whose work organizing and deploying the United Nations Emergency Force (UNEF) is documented throughout this chapter, the Secretary-General submitted a plan for a force headed by a Canadian, Major General E.L.M. (Tommy) Burns, to the General Assembly on November 6. It was immediately approved.

Much of the subsequent material in chapter one on the creation of the UNEF deals with the problems created by the slow pace of the French, British and Israeli withdrawal from Egypt, the deployment of the force, and the broader international implications of the Suez Crisis. From the middle of November on, for instance, Pearson was deeply involved in resolving the impasse that resulted when Nasser refused to accept Canadian ground troops as part of the UN force. The Egyptian decision was a personal blow, as the account of Pearson's interview with the Egyptian representative at the UN troupes britanniques et françaises en Égypte. Après des négociations menées dans les coulisses pour s'assurer le soutien d'autres membres de l'ONU, il rencontra le représentant permanent des États-Unis aux Nations Unies, Henry Cabot Lodge, et décida d'aligner le libellé de sa résolution sur celui d'un projet américain plus simple, demandant uniquement au secrétaire général de préparer des plans pour la création d'une force d'urgence des Nations Unies. L'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies dut tenir une autre séance de nuit avant l'adoption de la résolution canadienne, tôt dans la matinée du 4 novembre. (document 130) Avec l'aide d'un comité consultatif informel, dont les démarches pour assurer la mise en place et le déploiement de la Force d'urgence des Nations Unies (FUNU) sont décrits dans ce chapitre, le secrétaire général présenta à l'Assemblée générale, le 6 novembre, un plan pour la création d'une force, dirigée par un Canadien, le major-général E.L.M. (Tommy) Burns. Ce plan fut immédiatement approuvé.

Les documents du chapitre premier sur la création de la FUNU concernent, en grande partie, les problèmes soulevés par la lenteur du retrait des troupes françaises, britanniques et israéliennes d'Égypte, le déploiement de la Force, et les répercussions internationales de la crise de Suez. Dès la mi-novembre, par exemple, Pearson déployait une intense activité pour mettre un terme à l'impasse créée par le refus de Nasser d'accepter des troupes canadiennes au sol au sein de la force des Nations Unies. Comme le montre clairement le compte rendu de la rencontre entre Pearson et le représentant de l'Égypte aux Nations Unies, la décision égyptienne constituait un échec personnel. (document 152) Par la suite interviendra un compromis permettant la participation du Canada au sein des unités logistiques de la force internationale; toutefois, Pearson était furieux qu'on ait permis à Nasser de dicter la composition de cette force, décision qui, comme il le craignait justement, a eu des conséquences durables sur les opérations de maintien de la paix des Nations Unies dans la région. (document 168) La section comprend également des évaluations canadiennes franches des répercussions de la crise sur l'ONU et l'Alliance occidentale. La crise s'étant apaisée à la fin de novembre et au début de décembre, Pearson et ses principaux conseillers étaient particulièrement préoccupés par la propension de Washington à se rallier aux positions africaines et asiatiques à New York, aux dépens de la Grande-Bretagne, ce qui était à leurs yeux une preuve que « la diplomatie américaine pratiquait un système de deux poids deux mesures ». (document 184)

Le chapitre sur la crise de Suez situe la diplomatie canadienne en 1957, au moment de la reprise du débat international sur le Moyen-Orient, à la 11^e session de l'Assemblée générale. Un sentiment aigu de crise persista durant l'hiver et le printemps 1957, obligeant Pearson à effectuer de fréquents voyages à New York où l'Assemblée générale tentait de résoudre la question du refus d'Israël de se retirer du Sinaï et de la bande de Gaza sans avoir obtenu des garanties de sécurité adéquates. Le ministre était favorable aux demandes israéliennes et s'opposait énergiquement aux efforts visant à amener l'Assemblée générale à imposer des sanctions à Israël. Il cherchait de préférence à apaiser les craintes d'Israël par un élargissement du rôle de la FUNU dans la région. Pearson a eu une influence limitée sur ce débat et, en fin de compte, Israël s'est vu obligé, par les Américains, de procéder au retrait, tandis que le rôle élargi de la FUNU restait imparfaitement défini.

Les sections consacrées à la crise de Suez mettent l'accent à juste titre sur les efforts diplomatiques concernant la création et le déploiement de la FUNU; toutefois, makes clear. (Document 152) Though a compromise was eventually reached permitting Canadian logistic units to participate in the force, Pearson was angry that Nasser had been allowed to dictate the composition of the force, a decision he justly feared had lasting implications for UN peacekeeping operations in the region. (Document 168) The section also includes frank Canadian assessments of the impact of the crisis on the UN and the Western alliance. With the easing of the crisis in late November and early December, Pearson and his senior advisors became especially disturbed at Washington's continued willingness to pander to African and Asian opinion in New York at Britain's expense, evidence of what they called "the U.S. double standard of diplomatic conduct." (Document 184)

The chapter on the Suez Crisis traces Canadian diplomacy into 1957, when the international debate on the Middle East was renewed at the 11th General Assembly. An acute sense of crisis persisted during the winter and spring, prompting Pearson to travel frequently to New York, where the General Assembly wrestled with Israel's refusal to withdraw from the Sinai and the Gaza Strip without adequate guarantees for its security. The Minister sympathized with Tel Aviv's demands, and actively resisted efforts to have the General Assembly apply sanctions to Israel. Instead, Pearson sought to ease Israel's fears by expanding the UNEF's role in the region, but his influence was limited in this debate. In the end, American might forced Israel to retreat, leaving an expanded UNEF role still imperfectly defined.

The sections on the Suez Crisis justifiably focus on the diplomatic effort to create and deploy the UNEF, but many of the documents scattered throughout the opening chapter pursue secondary themes of considerable importance. Among them are Canada's views on a Middle East peace settlement, the UN relief effort in the region (Documents 142, 150 and 151), instructions for the commander of the Canadian contingent (Documents 156, 204 and 293), and the legal status of the UNEF. (Documents 186 and 207) In addition, the chapter documents Canada's contribution to clearing the Suez Canal (Documents 211, 213 and 228), and its attitude toward Jewish refugees in Egypt. (Document 205) The chapter concludes with a brief selection of documents on financing the UNEF's operations, an issue that would vex the UN for almost a decade.

The Middle East and the Suez Crisis figure prominently in all four chapters in this volume. Chapter three on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), for instance, contains considerable material on the aftermath of the Suez Crisis, including records on the December 1956 ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council. The gathering was supposed to repair the breach in the Alliance, but Pearson was doubtful: "A distrust has arisen ... which is going to persist for a long time. The Council may have - though I am not sure of this - lessened that personal mutual mistrust. It certainly has not removed it." (Document 582)

The Suez Crisis underlined Britain's decline as a Great Power, with clear consequences for the Alliance. This decline, however, had been a long time coming and its effects had already been felt earlier in the year. In June 1956, Pearson had been confronted with British plans to withdraw some forces from Europe. His account of his effort to deflect Eden's government from its course emphasizes the startling ease with which he glided through the top levels of British society. (Document 544) Pearson's success eventually resulted in a review of NATO's military strategy (Documents 544 to 571), part of the "great debate" on the Alliance's future that was kicked off in the spring of 1956, when the North Atlantic Council appointed three ministers to study bon nombre de documents réunis dans le premier chapitre portent sur des thèmes secondaires, de grand intérêt. Parmi les principaux sujets abordés figurent les positions du Canada sur un règlement pacifique au Moyen-Orient, les efforts d'aide de l'ONU à la région (documents 142, 150 et 151), les instructions au commandant du contingent canadien (documents 156, 204 et 293), et le statut juridique de la FUNU (documents 186 et 207). En outre, le chapitre présente des documents portant sur la participation du Canada au nettoyage du canal de Suez (documents 211, 213 et 228), et son attitude à l'égard des réfugiés juifs en Égypte. (document 205) Le chapitre s'achève sur un choix de documents se rapportant au financement des opérations de la FUNU, question qui allait ennuyer les Nations Unies pendant près d'une décennie.

Le Moyen-Orient et la crise de Suez occupent une place de choix dans les quatre chapitres du présent volume. Par exemple, le chapitre III, consacré à l'Organisation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord (OTAN), renferme une abondante documentation sur les lendemains de la crise de Suez, notamment la réunion ministérielle de décembre 1956 du Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord. La réunion était censée colmater les brèches apparues au sein de l'Alliance, mais Pearson avait des doutes à cet égard : « Une méfiance s'est installée [...] qui va subsister longtemps. Le Conseil a peut-être atténué cette méfiance réciproque – ce dont je ne suis pas sûr. Il ne l'a certainement pas dissipée. » (document 582),

La crise de Suez a mis en relief le déclin de la Grande-Bretagne comme grande puissance, avec ses conséquences inévitables pour l'Alliance. Toutefois, ce déclin était prévisible et ses effets avaient déjà été ressentis plus tôt dans l'année. En juin 1956, Pearson avait été informé des plans de la Grande-Bretagne de retirer certaines de ses forces d'Europe. Le récit des efforts qu'il déploya avec succès pour dissuader Londres de mettre son projet à exécution souligne l'aisance étonnante avec laquelle Pearson approchait les plus hauts dirigeants de la société britannique. (document 544) Le succès de Pearson a contribué, en fin de compte, à une révision de la stratégie militaire de l'OTAN (documents 544 à 571), dans le cadre du « grand débat » sur l'avenir de l'Alliance, lancé au printemps 1956 avec la désignation par le Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord de trois ministres chargés de préparer un rapport sur les modalités d'un renforcement de la coopération non militaire au sein de l'Alliance. (documents 520 à 543) Cependant, au lendemain de Suez, l'influence canadienne à Londres s'est amoindrie, et le Canada a été tenu à l'écart de la décision de la Grande-Bretagne de diminuer le nombre de ses soldats stationnés en Europe, en février 1957. (documents 585 à 600)

Le chapitre III aborde quelques questions courantes liées à la participation du Canada à l'Alliance de l'Atlantique Nord, comme la contribution importante du Canada au titre de l'aide mutuelle. Toutefois, contrairement aux volumes précédents, il met l'accent davantage sur la politique de désengagement, étant donné qu'avec le redressement de l'Europe de l'après-guerre et l'atténuation de la menace militaire soviétique, la nécessité de l'aide militaire se faisait moins sentir. Au printemps 1956, le Cabinet a annulé le principal volet du compte d'aide mutuelle du Canada, le vaste plan d'entraînement aérien de l'Aviation royale du Canada (ARC). (documents 443 à 450) Parallèlement, comme l'indique la documentation sur la vente d'avions de combat à la Belgique et à l'Allemagne, Ottawa était prêt à utiliser son budget d'aide militaire pour subventionner des exportations de l'industrie de la défense canadienne.

and report on how to strengthen non-military cooperation within the Alliance. (Documents 520 to 543) In the wake of Suez, however, Canada enjoyed less influence in London, and watched from the sidelines as Britain unilaterally reduced the number of its troops stationed in Europe in February 1957. (Documents 585 to 600)

Chapter three explores some of the more routine matters associated with Canada's membership in the North Atlantic Alliance, such as Ottawa's important mutual aid contributions. In contrast to earlier volumes in this series, the focus is increasingly on the politics of disengagement as Europe's postwar recovery and the declining Soviet threat made military assistance less necessary. In the spring of 1956, Cabinet cancelled the largest single item on Canada's mutual aid account, the Royal Canadian Air Force's extensive air training plan. (Documents 443 to 450) At the same time, as the sections on the export of Canadian-built fighters to Belgium and Germany demonstrate, Ottawa remained ready to use its military aid budget to subsidize exports by Canada's defence industry.

Chapter four, which covers relations with the Commonwealth, also devotes substantial space to Middle Eastern questions. The region was discussed in some detail during Eden's visit to Ottawa in February 1956 (Document 696) and at the Commonwealth prime ministers' meeting the following June. (Document 646) In this final moment of international calm before the proverbial storm, Pearson, who accompanied St. Laurent to London, was wryly amused to find "most of the visitors preoccupied with Wimbledon, Lords and the Canada Cup." (Document 643)

The Suez Crisis and its repercussions cast a long shadow and the chapter includes extensive documentation on Britain's request for a waiver on interest payments on the large loan extended to London in 1946. This section traces Canada's specific efforts to renegotiate the loan, as well as Ottawa's attitude to the general problem of Britain's financial collapse and its search for relief from the International Monetary Fund. (Document 704) The chapter also reprints material on Nehru's December 1956 visit to Ottawa, and Pearson's unsuccessful efforts to enlist the wily Indian prime minister into the Middle East peace process. (Document 692) Finally, the Commonwealth chapter includes a lengthy report on St. Laurent's meeting in Bermuda with Eden's successor, Prime Minister Harold Macmillan, in March 1957. The meetings allowed the Canadian delegation, which included Pearson, C.D. Howe, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and Robert Bryce, the Secretary to the Cabinet, their first real look at the new British prime minister, and gave the two countries the chance to exchange views on a number of issues, including the Middle East. (Document 735)

Canadian policy-makers were well aware that Arab-Israeli tensions merely mirrored the strains associated with decolonization in general. Tensions between the colonial and anti-colonial powers, argued Deputy Under-Secretary R.M. Macdonnell in May 1956 "may well be the most vital issue in international politics today." (Document 41) For this reason, colonialism and its legacy are also principal themes in the Commonwealth chapter. In addition to the usual documentation on Canada's contribution to the Colombo Plan, Ottawa's main point of contact with the newly independent nations of Asia and Africa, there are several broad assessments of Canadian aid policy. The first, by Canada's High Commissioner to India, Escott Reid, neatly summarizes the Canadian contribution to Indian development since 1950. (Document 665) It is balanced by a more impassioned defence of Canadian aid to Pakistan, whose severely impoverished colonial inheritance made bilateral cooperation extremely difficult.

Le chapitre IV, consacré aux relations avec le Commonwealth, fait aussi une large place aux questions du Moyen-Orient. La région a été l'objet de discussions approfondies à l'occasion de la visite d'Eden à Ottawa en février 1956 (document 696) et de la réunion des premiers ministres du Commonwealth au mois de juin suivant. (document 646) Dans ce dernier moment de calme sur la scène internationale, qui annonce traditionnellement la tempête, Pearson, qui accompagnait Saint-Laurent à Londres, constata avec une ironie désabusée que « la plupart des visiteurs se préoccupaient de Wimbledon, des Lords et de la Coupe Canada ». (document 643)

La crise de Suez et ses répercussions ont jeté une ombre sur le Commonwealth, et ce chapitre renferme de nombreux documents relatifs à une demande britannique d'exemption d'intérêts sur un important emprunt accordé à Londres en 1946. Cette documentation souligne les efforts précis du Canada pour renégocier l'emprunt, ainsi que l'attitude d'Ottawa vis-à-vis du problème général de l'effondrement financier de la Grande-Bretagne et de ses démarches pour obtenir une aide du Fonds monétaire international. (document 704) Le chapitre reproduit des documents portant sur la visite effectuée par Nehru en décembre 1956 à Ottawa, et sur les efforts infructueux de Pearson pour amener l'astucieux premier ministre indien à s'engager dans le processus de paix au Moyen-Orient. (document 692) Enfin, il renferme un long rapport sur la rencontre aux Bermudes, en mars 1957, entre Saint-Laurent et le premier ministre Harold Macmillan, successeur d'Eden. Ces réunions ont été pour la délégation canadienne, dont faisaient partie Pearson, C.D. Howe, ministre du Commerce, et Robert Bryce, secrétaire du Cabinet; la première occasion réelle de prendre contact avec le nouveau premier ministre britannique; elles donnèrent lieu à un échange de vues entre les deux pays sur un large éventail de sujets, dont le Moyen-Orient. (document 735)

Les dirigeants canadiens étaient parfaitement conscients que les tensions arabo-Israéliennes ne faisaient que refléter les problèmes liés à la décolonisation en général. Les tensions entre les puissances coloniales et anticoloniales, déclara en mai 1956 le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint R.M. Macdonnell, « constituent peut-être la question la plus cruciale de la politique internationale aujourd'hui ». (document 41) Aussi, le colonialisme et son héritage sont-ils les principaux thèmes du chapitre sur le Commonwealth. Outre la documentation habituelle sur la contribution du Canada au Plan de Colombo, principal point de contact entre Ottawa et les nouvelles nations indépendantes d'Asie et d'Afrique, on y trouve plusieurs évaluations poussées de la politique d'aide du Canada. La première, réalisée par le haut-commissaire du Canada en Inde, Escott Reid, résume clairement la contribution du Canada au développement de l'Inde depuis 1950. (document 665) Elle fait pendant à une défense plus passionnée de l'aide canadienne au Pakistan, dont l'héritage colonial, marqué par une grande pauvreté, rendait extrêmement difficile la coopération bilatérale. (document 685) Enfin, le chapitre présente une revue interministérielle complète de l'aide canadienne, qui conclut, sur un ton suffisant, que « l'aide fournie a été orientée vers le bon type de projets et s'est révélée appropriée tant par son contenu que par sa forme ». (document 658)

Avec l'accession du Ghana à l'indépendance en 1956, le ministère des Affaires extérieures a été plus directement confronté aux défis politiques et économiques de la décolonisation. Une note de service portant sur le réveil de l'Afrique forçait les dirigeants à examiner « quelle place accorder à l'Afrique dans [leur] liste de priorités ». (document 737) Le Canada s'intéressait encore de plus près à la nouvelle fédération

(Document 685) In addition, the chapter documents a full-scale inter-departmental review of Canadian aid, which complacently concluded that "the assistance which has been provided has been directed towards the right type of project and that its form and content have been generally appropriate." (Document 658)

The Department of External Affairs confronted the political and economic challenges of decolonization more directly with the advent of Ghana's independence in 1956. A memorandum entitled "An Awakening Africa" forced officials to consider "how high should Africa rank on our list of priorities?" (Document 737) Canada's interest in the new federation that was about to unite the British West Indies was even more direct. The British connection had traditionally protected Canada's long-standing stake in the Caribbean, which remained an important market for Canadian banks and salt fish from the Maritimes. Independence threatened this tie, and Léger knew it: "In due course U.K. influence is bound to disappear; is it in our interest that it be replaced more or less in toto by the U.S.?" (Document 745) The answer was clear, and reluctant officials were told to devise an aid package for the new federation that would underline Canada's continuing interest in the region.

Decolonization was at the heart of Ottawa's preparations for the UN's 11th General Assembly too. It was not enough, Léger argued, for Canada to maintain its "policy of general non-alignment concerning colonial problems." It was time to pursue a "more active and positive" role, mediating between "the good colonials' and the more 'sophisticated' anti-colonials." (Document 303) Pearson agreed, but cautioned that this would not be easy. The challenges confronting Canadian diplomacy are apparent in the material on the Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED), the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), disarmament and Algeria. There was no ready solution to the growing divergence between North and South at the UN, but Canada firmly rejected the idea of abandoning the international organization. In a compelling paper reflecting on the UN's future, Holmes argued in March 1957 that there was no alternative, and that Canada should continue to "show a friendly interest in its workings, maintain the closest bilateral relations with all its members and make sure it remains pretty much what it is." (Document 366)

Tired and easily irritated by the burdens of government, Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent played a diminished role in the elaboration of foreign policy during the period covered in this volume. He was particularly active only during the initial stages of the Suez Crisis, when he was involved in responding to a series of communications from the British prime minister, Anthony Eden. For much of the Crisis, at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meetings, and at the Bermuda encounter with Eden's successor, Harold Macmillan, St. Laurent left most of the talking and detailed diplomacy to Pearson.

When Pearson was unavailable, his department was normally represented at the Cabinet table by Paul Martin, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Martin maintained his interest in arms control and headed Canada's delegation to the UN Disarmament Commission in the spring of 1956. In the fall of that year, he led the Canadian delegation to the annual meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee for South-East Asia, an experience that would profoundly shape his attitude toward Asian Communism. Other Cabinet ministers with significant foreign policy responsibilities included Ralph Campney, the Minister of National Defence, Walter des Antilles britanniques, en voie de formation. Traditionnellement, les liens avec la Grande-Bretagne assuraient la protection des intérêts que poursuivait de longue date le Canada dans les Antilles, qui demeuraient un marché important pour les banques canadiennes et le poisson salé des Maritimes. L'indépendance représentait une menace pour ces liens, et Léger le savait : « Au moment opportun, l'influence britannique est appelée à disparaître; est-il dans notre intérêt qu'elle soit remplacée plus ou moins complètement par celle des États-Unis? » (document 745) La réponse était claire, et les hauts fonctionnaires réticents se sont vu demander de préparer pour la nouvelle fédération un programme d'aide, qui soulignerait le maintien de l'intérêt du Canada à l'égard de la région.

La décolonisation était également au centre des préparatifs d'Ottawa en vue de la 11^e session de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies. Le Canada ne devait pas se contenter de poursuivre sa « politique de non-alignement général en ce qui a trait aux problèmes coloniaux », déclara Léger. Le temps était venu de jouer un rôle « plus actif et plus positif », en servant d'intermédiaire entre « les bons "colonialistes" et les anti-colonialistes plus «sophistiqués" ». (document 303) Tout en partageant ce point de vue, Pearson fit valoir que cela n'allait pas être une tâche facile. Il avait raison, et les défis auxquels devait faire face la diplomatie canadienne apparaissent nettement dans les documents concernant le Fonds spécial des Nations Unies pour le développement économique (SUNFED), le Conseil économique et sociale (ECOSOC), le désarmement et l'Algérie. Il n'y avait pas de solution facile face aux divergences croissantes entre le Nord et le Sud aux Nations Unies; mais le Canada rejetait fermement l'idée d'un retrait de l'organisation internationale. Dans un important document de réflexion sur l'avenir des Nations Unies, Holmes note, en mars 1957, qu'il n'y avait pas de solution de rechange et que le Canada devrait continuer à « manifester un intérêt amical envers les travaux (de l'organisation), maintenir les relations bilatérales les plus étroites avec tous ses membres et faire en sorte qu'elle demeure autant que possible telle quelle ». (document 366)

Fatigué et facilement irrité par les soucis du gouvernement, le premier ministre Louis Saint-Laurent joua un rôle restreint dans l'élaboration de la politique étrangère au cours de la période étudiée dans ce volume. Il ne s'y est réellement intéressé que durant les phases initiales de la crise de Suez, où il répondait aux communications du premier ministre britannique Anthony Eden. Pendant une bonne partie de la crise, lors des réunions des premiers ministres du Commonwealth et de la rencontre des Bermudes avec le successeur d'Eden, Harold Macmillan, Saint-Laurent laissa à Pearson le soin de s'occuper, la plupart du temps, des discussions et des détails diplomatiques.

En l'absence de Pearson, son ministère était habituellement représenté aux réunions du Cabinet par Paul Martin, le ministre de la Santé et du Bien-être social. Martin conserva son intérêt pour le contrôle des armements et fut le chef de la délégation canadienne à la Commission du désarmement des Nations Unies, au printemps 1956. À l'automne de cette année, il dirigea la délégation canadienne à la réunion annuelle du Comité consultatif du Commonwealth pour l'Asie du Sud-Est, expérience qui a profondément marqué son attitude à l'égard du communisme en Asie. Parmi les autres ministres du Cabinet, qui exerçaient des responsabilités importantes en matière de politique étrangère, figuraient notamment Ralph Campney, le ministre de la Défense Harris, the Minister of Finance, and C.D. Howe, the powerful Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Throughout his final 18 months as Secretary of State for External Affairs, Pearson was able to draw on the advice of the remarkably stable group of senior officials with whom he had worked closely for years. Jules Léger remained Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, assisted by his deputy, R.M. Macdonnell. Léger could also rely on his three seasoned Assistant Under-Secretaries: John Holmes, who accompanied Pearson to New York in November 1956, Jean Chapdelaine, and Max Wershof, who also continued to serve as the Department's Legal Advisor.

There was no change in representation at Canada's major posts abroad until late in the spring of 1957. Dana Wilgress remained Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council and Representative to the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. Norman A. Robertson stayed in London as High Commissioner to the United Kingdom until May 1957, when he replaced Arnold Heeney in Washington as Ambassador to the United States. Heeney returned to Ottawa as Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. Georges Vanier continued as Ambassador to France.

This is only the first of two projected volumes covering the period January 1, 1956 to June 10, 1957, when St. Laurent's Liberal government was defeated in a general election by John G. Diefenbaker's Progressive Conservative Party. Although it is clearly impossible to divide the period into two completely self-contained volumes, the editor and general editor have tried to keep as much associated material as possible together, without departing too much from the thematic organization that has characterized earlier volumes in this series. At the same time, practical and budgetary considerations dictated that the two volumes be roughly similar in size. As a result, this volume, with its focus on the Suez Crisis, contains material on the Middle East, the United Nations, NATO and the Commonwealth. The subsequent volume will document Canada's response to the Hungarian Revolution and related developments in Eastern Europe. It will also cover Canada's relations with Western Europe, the United States, the Far East and Latin America. Two chapters will look at atomic energy and international economic institutions.

Like other recent volumes in this series, Volume 22 is based primarily on the records of the Department of External Affairs and the Privy Council Office. These were supplemented where necessary by the private papers of Cabinet ministers and senior officials, and the files of the Departments of National Defence, Finance, and Trade and Commerce. In preparing this volume, I was given complete access to the files of the Department of External Affairs and generous access to other collections. A complete list of the archival sources consulted in the preparation of this volume may be found on page xxix.

The selection of documents is guided by the general principles outlined in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), as amended in the Introduction to Volume 20 (p. xxiii). In short, the series tries to provide a "self-contained record of the major foreign policy decisions taken by the Government of Canada," by concentrating on Canada's most important bilateral and multilateral relationships and on the major international issues that directly involved Cabinet members in substantive policy decisions.

nationale, Walter Harris, le ministre des Finances, et C.D. Howe, l'influent ministre du Commerce.

Durant ses 18 derniers mois comme secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Pearson pouvait compter sur les conseils d'un groupe remarquablement stable de hauts fonctionnaires qui lui avaient apporté une collaboration étroite pendant des années. Jules Léger demeurait sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, aidé de son adjoint R.M. Macdonnell. Léger pouvait aussi se reposer sur trois sous-secrétaires d'État adjoints expérimentés : John Holmes, qui accompagna Pearson à New York en novembre 1956, Jean Chapdelaine et Max Wershof, qui continuait parallèlement d'exercer les fonctions de conseiller juridique du Ministère.

Jusqu'à la fin du printemps 1957, il n'y a eu aucune modification dans la composition des principales missions du Canada à l'étranger. Dana Wilgress est demeuré représentant permanent auprès du Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord et représentant auprès de l'Organisation européenne de coopération économique. Norman A. Robertson, haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni à Londres, jusqu'en mai 1957, date à laquelle il remplaça Arnold Heeney à Washington comme ambassadeur auprès des États-Unis. Heeney revint à Ottawa comme président de la Commission de la fonction publique. Georges Vanier est demeuré ambassadeur auprès de la France.

Le présent ouvrage n'est que le premier de la série de deux volumes envisagés pour la période allant du 1^{er} janvier 1956 au 10 juin 1957, date à laquelle le gouvernement libéral de Saint-Laurent est défait face au Parti Progressiste Conservateur de John G. Diefenbaker, lors d'une élection générale. Il est manifestement impossible de diviser la période en deux volumes complètement autonomes; cependant, le rédacteur et le rédacteur en chef se sont efforcés de regrouper autant que possible les documents connexes, sans trop s'éloigner de l'organisation thématique qui a caractérisé les précédents volumes de la série. En outre, pour des raisons pratiques et budgétaires, le format des deux volumes sera sensiblement le même. Par conséquent, le présent volume, consacré principalement à la crise de Suez, comprend des documents sur le Moyen-Orient, les Nations Unies, l'OTAN et le Commonwealth. Le volume suivant présentera les réactions du Canada à la Révolution hongroise et aux événements connexes en Europe de l'Est. Il comportera également des documents traitant des relations du Canada avec l'Europe de l'Ouest, les États-Unis, l'Extrême-Orient et l'Amérique latine. Deux autres chapitres seront consacrés à l'énergie atomique et aux institutions économiques internationales.

Les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et du Bureau du Conseil privé ont été les principales sources des documents proposés dans le volume 22, à l'instar des récents volumes de la série. Au besoin, nous avons fait appel aux documents personnels de ministres du Cabinet et de hauts fonctionnaires, ainsi qu'aux dossiers des ministères de la Défense nationale, des Finances et du Commerce. Pour préparer ce volume, j'ai pu consulter sans restrictions les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et j'ai eu aussi largement accès à d'autres collections. La liste complète des archives consultées figure à la page xxix.

Le choix des documents est guidé par les principes généraux énoncés dans l'introduction du volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), modifiés dans l'introduction du volume 20 (p. xxiii). En bref, la série s'efforce de donner une vue complète des principales décisions de politique étrangère prises par le gouvernement du Canada, en mettant l'accent sur les

The editorial devices used in this volume remain those described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (†) indicates a Canadian document that has not been printed. Editorial excisions are shown by an ellipse (...). The phrase "group corrupt" indicates decryption problems in the transmission of the original telegram. Words and passages that were struck out by the author, marginal notes and distribution lists are reproduced as footnotes only when important. Unless otherwise indicated, it is assumed that documents have been read by the addressee. Proper and place names are standardized. The editor has silently corrected spelling, punctuation and capitalization, as well as transcription errors whose meaning is clear from their context. All other editorial additions to the documents are indicated by the use of square brackets. Documents are reprinted in either English or French, depending on their language of origin.

The preparation of this volume was a collective effort. The Historical Section continues to depend on the expertise of the National Archives of Canada for help in locating relevant records. Paulette Dozois, David Smith and Robert McIntosh of the Government Archives Division responded quickly and cheerfully to requests for help. Maureen Hoogenraad of the Manuscript Division was equally helpful. Ciuneas Boyle, Access to Information Co-ordinator at the Privy Council Office, and her colleague, Herb Barrett, facilitated access to classified Cabinet records for the period. Corrinne Miller, archivist at the Bank of Canada, was indispensable in dealing with that collection. Geoffrey Pearson steered me toward an important document on the Suez Crisis, and generously granted me access to the closed portions of his father's papers. Mark Hayes of the Naval Historical Center in Washington helped identify some of the American figures in this volume.

Ted Kelly helped research parts of this volume, and guided it through production with diligence. Christopher Cook, whose knowledge of the archival collections reflected in this volume is unrivalled, remained my main research assistant. He was ably assisted at times by Joseph McHattie, Nelson Joannette, Tina McLaughlan and Michael Stevenson. Boris Stipernitz extensively researched several sections in this volume, and compiled the index in trying circumstances. It continued to be a pleasure to work with this team of fine historians.

Don Barry, Hector Mackenzie and Norman Hillmer, former editors of this series, offered advice and encouragement. My colleague, Mary Halloran, joined them in encouraging my progress. John English, the author of an award-winning biography of Pearson, was always willing to discuss Canadian diplomacy in the 1950s. The general editor of this series, John Hilliker, carefully reviewed the whole manuscript, and played a major role in helping to define the scope of this volume as well as its successor. The series would not be possible without the active support of the director of the Communications Programs and Outreach Division, Gaston Barban. I remain solely responsible for the final selection of documents in this volume.

The Historical Section provided the supplementary text and coordinated the technical preparation of the volume. The manuscript was typed and formatted by Aline Gélinau. The Translation Bureau supplied the French for most of the footnotes, the captions and ancillary texts. My colleague in the Communications Services Division, Francine Fournier, generously shared her knowledge of the finer points of French grammar. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin proofread the entire manuscript, and helped compose the list of persons.

Les conventions utilisées dans ce volume sont les mêmes que celles décrites dans l'introduction du volume 9 (p. xix). La croix (†) indique que le document canadien n'a pas été imprimé et les ellipses (...) une suppression. L'expression "group corrupt" révèle l'existence de problèmes de déchiffrement dans la transmission du télégramme original. Les mots et les passages qui ont été supprimés par l'auteur, les notes en marge et les listes de diffusion ne sont reproduits dans des notes de bas de page que lorsqu'ils revêtent une certaine importance. Sauf indication contraire, il est supposé que les documents ont été lus par leur destinataire. Les noms propres et les noms de lieu sont normalisés. Le rédacteur a discrètement corrigé l'orthographe, la ponctuation, les majuscules et les erreurs de transcription lorsque le contexte révélait clairement le sens. Tous les ajouts du rédacteur dans le corps du texte sont indiqués par des crochets. Les documents sont reproduits en anglais ou en français, selon leur langue d'origine.

La préparation d'un volume est le fruit d'un effort collectif. La Section des affaires historiques fait toujours appel à l'expertise des Archives nationales du Canada pour repérer les dossiers pertinents. Paulette Dozois, David Smith et Robert McIntosh de la Division des archives gouvernementales ont répondu avec empressement et compétence à mes demandes. Maureen Hoogenraad, de la Direction des manuscrits, m'a également prêté main-forte. Ciuineas Boyle, coordinatrice de l'accès à l'information au Bureau du Conseil privé, et son collègue, Herb Barrett, m'ont facilité l'accès aux documents classifiés du Cabinet pour la période concernée. Corrinne Miller, archiviste à la Banque du Canada, m'a fourni une aide précieuse. Geoffrey Pearson m'a guidé vers un important document sur la crise de Suez et donné un accès sans restrictions aux documents personnels de son père. Mark Hayes, du Naval Historical Center de Washington, m'a aidé à repérer quelques-unes des personnalités américaines mentionnées dans ce volume.

Ted Kelly a participé à la recherche pour certains chapitres du présent volume et a assuré, avec diligence, le bon déroulement de toutes les étapes de la production. Christopher Cook, dont la connaissance incomparable des collections d'archives se reflète dans ce volume, a été encore mon adjoint principal de recherche. Il a été par moments secondé avec compétence par Joseph McHattie, Nelson Joannette, Tina McLaughlan et Michael Stevenson. Boris Stipernitz a mené des recherches approfondies pour plusieurs sections de ce volume et compilé l'index dans des circonstances difficiles. La collaboration avec cette équipe d'historiens remarquables a été un bonheur constant.

Don Barry, Hector Mackenzie et Norman Hillmer, anciens rédacteurs de cette série, nous ont prodigué conseils et encouragements. Il en est de même de ma collègue, Mary Halloran. John English, dont la biographie de Pearson a été primée, était toujours là pour discuter de la diplomatie canadienne dans les années 1950. John Hilliker, rédacteur en chef de cette série, a soigneusement révisé le manuscrit au complet et joué un rôle important dans la définition de l'envergure du présent volume et du volume suivant. Cette série ne serait pas possible sans le soutien actif de Gaston Barban, directeur des Programmes de communications et de la sensibilisation. Je

My wife, Mary, and my children, Katherine and Michael, cheerfully (and vocally) encouraged my work on this volume. I thank them.

GREG DONAGHY

demeure le seul responsable du choix définitif des documents reproduits dans le présent volume.

La Section des affaires historiques a fourni le texte complémentaire et coordonné la préparation technique du volume. Le manuscrit a été dactylographié et mis en pages par Aline Gélinau. Le Bureau de la traduction a produit le texte français de la plupart des notes de bas de page, des légendes et des textes accessoires. Ma collègue de la Division des services de communications, Francine Fournier, nous a donné des conseils en matière de rédaction. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin s'est chargée de la correction d'épreuves de l'intégralité du manuscrit et a dressé la liste des personnes.

Mon épouse, Mary, et mes enfants, Katherine et Michael, ont chaleureusement (et oralement) encouragé la rédaction du présent volume. Je les remercie.

GREG DONAGHY

ISRAEL

At his own request, the Israeli Ambassador called on the Head of the Commonwealth and Middle East Division on the evening of January 30.

2. Mr. Comay began the interview by referring to his letter to you dated January 27 (copy attached)† and specifically to its third paragraph which alludes to "certain communications which have a bearing on the problem of Middle East peace and in which you might find considerable interest." Mr. Comay understood that it was not possible for you to see him until the External Affairs debate was over, but he thought that it might be useful to you to see the "communications" prior to your meeting with Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Selwyn Lloyd.¹

3. Mr. Comay said the "communications" consisted of an exchange of correspondence between Mr. Dulles and Mr. Sharett regarding the possibility of a formula for the solution of the boundary aspect of the Arab-Israeli dispute.² He said that the correspondence dealt with the problem in considerable detail, and that it was accompanied by marginal observations by Mr. Sharett and Mr. Eban.

4. Mr. Comay said that when he was in Washington he had asked Mr. Eban whether he could show this correspondence to you. Mr. Eban had said that he had no objection, provided that Mr. Sharett's permission were secured. Mr. Comay telegraphed Mr. Sharett and obtained his permission. He added that, although this would exceed his instructions, he would have no objection to leaving the documents with you on a "see and return" basis.

5. Although he did not say so, we gained the impression that this initiative on Mr. Comay's part resulted from the favourable impression which was made upon him and upon Mr. Eban by your speech in the House on January 24.³

6. We undertook to pass this information on to you and said that we would ask you to give consideration to Mr. Comay's request for an interview. My own view is that it would be of advantage for you to receive Mr. Comay and to examine the documents which he described.

7. Mr. Comay then went on to say that various Opposition Members of Parliament had asked him for information on the Middle East. He gathered that it was for background purposes, for use in Party caucuses and in briefing Members to take part in debates. Mr. Comay mentioned specifically that he had received recent visits, seeking information, from Mr. Coldwell, Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Low. He said that he had prepared notes which he gave to these M.P.s, cautioning them that they were not for attribution and that they were for use as background only. He then handed us a copy of these background notes† (attached) explaining: "I want you to know what I'm doing." As you will observe, the paper is not identifiable as originating from the Israeli Embassy, and while it attempts to enlist sympathy for the Israeli cause, it is written without heat and appears to be a fairly rational presentation of the case — granted that it is from an Israeli standpoint.

8. Mr. Comay asked whether we had any objection to his distributing material of this kind. This was a difficult question to answer. Obviously it is propaganda for Israel in any discussion in the House; at the same time its measured terms and its anonymity appear to be within the bounds of propriety. We did not wish to give Mr. Comay the impression that there was any official Departmental sanction for actions of this kind; on the other hand we did not wish to give him the impression that we necessarily disapproved. We therefore confined ourselves to saying that the material appeared to be measured in its terms, anonymous as to source and that it presumably was open to the Egyptian Ambassador, if he so wished and was so approached, to take similar action. Mr. Comay agreed that it was.

9. Mr. Comay then said that he had "a hunch" that a movement was developing in the ranks of the Opposition in favour of an embargo on the export of arms to the Middle East, and perhaps of all arms; and that this movement reflected what he described as a "grass roots" upsurge of feeling among the people of Canada. He confessed that he was apprehensive of the results of such a movement to Israel and that this was why he had been prepared to give background notes to M.P.s. We said that we had gained the impression that, since your speech in the House of January 24, the movement in favour of an arms embargo had subsided. Mr. Comay said "I think it has, but I think it will be raised again." He made it clear that he was not referring to the interim embargo imposed by the Prime Minister pending a study of Canadian policy on the sale of arms, but to the possibility of a general embargo.⁴

CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE MINISTER AND THE AMBASSADOR OF ISRAEL

At noon today Mr. Comay, at his request, called upon Mr. Pearson.

2. Mr. Comay began the conversation by expressing appreciation for the Minister's forthright statements in the House during the recent debate, which had made clear that Israel would suffer from an embargo on arms shipments to the Middle East. He said that he had just received a cable from Mr. Sharet, in which the Foreign Minister of Israel had commended the Minister's discussion of the Arab-Israeli problem in his speech in the House on January 24. Mr. Comay also said he had heard that the Minister's speech had aroused considerable interest in Washington and New York.

3. Mr. Comay then turned to the matter about which he had visited the Department on January 30 and which was referred to in a memorandum to the Minister on January 31. He said that he had been authorized by Mr. Sharet, with the concurrence of the Israeli Ambassador in the United States, to show Mr. Pearson, on a personal and confidential basis, copies of certain exchanges which had taken place between the Israeli and United States governments on the matter of possible formulae for the solution of the boundary aspects of the Arab-Israeli dispute. This correspondence was accompanied by a personal letter from Mr. Comay containing some observations and explanations. Mr. Comay stressed the personal basis upon which he was leaving the papers with Mr. Pearson, because the matters which they dealt with had not been communicated by the Israeli Government to any government other than that of the United States. He thought that Mr. Pearson would like to know of their contents before his discussions with Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Lloyd. He was unable to answer the Minister's query whether the British were aware of the substance of the exchanges between Israel and the United States.

4. The Ambassador said that the State Department had been pressing the Israelis to consider the possibility of providing for a link across the Negev between Jordan and Egypt by giving sovereignty to those countries over territorial wedges which would intersect at the apex. At this point there might be a sort of clover-leaf arrangement, which would prevent Israel from being completely cut off from the Red Sea port of Elath. Mr. Comay said that Mr. Sharet does not consider such an arrangement to be practicable, since it would prevent the proper development of full facilities for the seaport of Elath. He reiterated that Israel would be prepared to grant suitable transit rights to the Arab countries.

5. Mr. Comay said that he had just been talking by telephone to the Israeli Ambassador in the United States. Mr. Eban had told him he believed that the article in today's issue of the New York Times, reporting on the U.K.-U.S. discussions on the Middle East in Washington, was fairly accurate. Indications were that there was now less interest in such matters as ultimate negotiation of border adjustments and more concern with immediate measures to be taken to prevent a renewal of hostilities. The practical difficulties in the way of an international police force for Palestine were also now being recognized. Mr. Pearson said that he appreciated, of course, the vital necessity of preventing the renewal of hostilities but he did not believe that the necessity for a general settlement should be obscured. He wondered what further measures could be taken to prevent the outbreak of war, if the United Nations police force idea were not considered practicable.⁵ Mr. Comay thought that a possibility being considered was that the governments of the United Kingdom, France and the United States should make it clear that they would intervene with armed forces against aggression. This would have the effect of protecting Israel with a security guarantee without putting it down on paper. Furthermore, it would allow quick action, should there be aggression, without depending on United Nations sanction, which would almost certainly be prevented by a Soviet veto. Mr. Pearson thought that action of this kind by Western countries, which by-passed the United Nations, would have serious implications, since it would lay the governments open to criticism that they had intervened from "imperialistic" motives without the approval of the United Nations. Mr. Comay agreed that this would be a difficulty.

6. The Israeli Ambassador went out of his way to make the point that United Kingdom policy in the Middle East was based on a consideration of particular British interests, which did not necessarily coincide with those of other Western powers. The Minister observed that the situation was so complex that it would be difficult for anyone to say what was the right thing to do. There was no doubt, however, that the recognition of the existence of the State of Israel was basic to any settlement. During the conversation reference was made to the annoyance of France at having been left out of the consultations on the Middle East.

7. Mr. Comay mentioned the subject of Israeli applications for arms from Canada. He said that he hoped the shipment of orders which had been approved could be expedited, now that the debate on External Affairs in the House had been concluded, and that certain pending applications could be approved. In the first category, he mentioned the 25 pounder ammunition and the machine guns. As to the second category, he said that he hoped it would be possible to ship more than twenty per month of the machine guns which had been ordered. (It had been agreed that 20 per month would be shipped but the Israelis have indicated before this that, for administrative reasons, they would like the monthly amount to be increased). Mr. Comay also hoped that approval could be given for 6 pounder anti-tank guns. Mr. Pearson replied that the matter of the moratorium on arms shipments to the Middle East was coming up for discussion by Cabinet. When a decision had been taken, we would be able to let the Israeli authorities know about the items which had already been approved. He reminded Mr. Comay that the 25 pounder shot had not been passed by Treasury Board and would have to come up again for formal approval. Mr. Comay repeated the hope that Canadian authorities would be notified immediately that the moratorium was lifted, so that consignments which were already on the docks could be shipped without further delay. The Minister reassured Mr. Comay on this point and said that appropriate authorities would be notified by telegram. Mr. Pearson said that he could not discuss future approvals of arms shipments until policy on this matter had been decided.⁶

8. The Israeli Ambassador expressed a wish to see the Minister again after a decision on the arms moratorium has been taken. He also said that he would be at the Minister's disposal, if any elucidations were required of the papers he had handed him. Mr. Pearson thanked Mr. Comay for showing him, on a personal and confidential basis, the exchanges which had taken place between the Israeli and United States Governments.

WESTERN POLICY IN THE MIDDLE EAST

The situation in the Middle East is deteriorating at a dangerous rate, and as the present policies of the United Kingdom and the United States seem to be producing most unsatisfactory results it may be time to consider urgently desperate remedies. Is it perhaps time, therefore, for the United States, the United Kingdom, and France to consider inviting the Russians to sit down and reach agreement on a settlement of the Arab-Israeli question and possibly also broader questions of Middle Eastern policy? This was Sir Anthony Eden's initial view of how to handle the problem of Communist arms shipments, but it was not received at all well by the Americans, — and one might presume that it was also discouraged by those elements in the Foreign Office who dislike instinctively untraditional proposals, especially when they concern the Middle East.

2. There are obviously objections to such a proposal, even if the Americans could be persuaded to agree to it. The Russians might well be expected to exploit such an opportunity for negotiation unscrupulously on their own behalf, and cannot, of course, be relied upon to keep an agreement in good faith. It might be, furthermore, that to recognize their interests in the Middle East as legitimate would give them the respectability in that area they have been seeking. From the Canadian point of view, one of the main objections would be in principle to Great Power negotiation outside the United Nations — particularly when we have not the excuse which we have in the Far Eastern situation of the temporary necessity of including Peking. All these objections are valid, but it must be recalled that the alternative of non-cooperation with the Russians is proving bankrupt and just possibly leading to disaster. It is a question of which course has more dangers and disadvantages, not of which course is perfect. As our Anglo-American betters are now telling us, we live in a grey world.

3. It has been customary to dismiss any such suggestion by pointing out that it would open the door to Soviet infiltration in the Middle East. This argument seems hardly valid when the Soviet agents are already coming and there seems to be nothing to stop their arriving in large numbers everywhere from Syria to Liberia. We can't stop the Russians from taking a direct and active interest in the Middle East but it is conceivable that if their interests in the Middle East and Africa were to be placed within a framework of international understanding, or at least a bargain which they would have an interest in keeping, it might be less nefarious.

⁷ Note marginale :Marginal note:

M. Holmes Je suis toujours surpris que vous trouvez le temps de penser ... et si clairement. Merci.
J.L.[éger].

4. The possibility of placing some control over Soviet economic activities might be found by exploring the ideas in which the Minister has been interested recently, by regularizing all programmes for aid and technical assistance and channelling them through the United Nations. By an invitation to the Soviet Union to collaborate in this way we might hope to identify such assistance and enforce certain rules. If the Soviet Union refused to collaborate, we should have made the nature of their aid clearer to the uncommitted countries.

5. As for the Communist arms shipments, which are the greatest immediate danger, the only possibility of controlling these would be through an agreement with the Russians on the terms of a settlement of the Arab-Israeli question. It may well be that the Communists do not want a settlement because they are profiting from the division of the Middle East. It is difficult to dispute this argument. On the other hand, there is the possibility that the Russians would be nervous about pushing the dispute to the point at which a war might start. This kind of caution seems to have pervaded their general world policy at the present time. Although their own statements must of course be looked upon with due scepticism, it might be noted that they have not shown themselves as quite 100% partisan in the Palestine issue. They have continued to insist that they do not want Israel to be destroyed and that all they are doing is using their influence to correct what they consider to be undue support of Israel by the United States.

6. It is difficult to dispute the right of a Great Power like the Soviet Union, situated as it is, to exercise at least as much influence in Middle Eastern politics as the United States. (One is very conscious of this if one attempts to argue this case with an Arab or a neutral.) The difference is of course that, however fumbling and selfish it may be in certain aspects, the policy of the Western Powers is fundamentally dedicated to peace and prosperity for the Middle East. The Russians have an equal right to benevolent intervention, but neither side has a right to use the area for its own malign purposes. We believe in Western intentions but a very large proportion of the world's population do not.

7. Whether we like it or not, the Russians are using their influence in the Middle East. This is a fact which we must recognize. The three Western Powers can encourage them to use their influence in an unscrupulous fashion by denying them a legitimate position or they can offer to sit down and strike a bargain in the hope that they can work if not in harmony at least not at cross-purposes. There is certainly no guarantee that the latter alternative would work, but there is plenty of evidence that the former has failed. The United States and the United Kingdom would in fact be doing nothing very different from what they did in Geneva in 1954, when they sat down with the Russians and Chinese Communists. They have tried collaboration with the Russians in Korea and in Germany and failed — possibly because the status quo remains acceptable. They did agree, however, on a bargain over Indo-China where the situation, as in the Middle East, was inflammable and both sides were extremely nervous of the consequences of fighting. Although we recognize the failure of the Communists to live up to the terms and spirit of the Geneva Agreements in Indo-China, we are agreed I think that as a military armistice it has been a success. Parallels are always dangerous but there may be enough of a parallel situation in the Middle East. We would not expect thereby to convert the Russians from their Communist aims and tactics any more than has happened in Indo-China, but we might hope to establish some kind of international discipline over competitive co-existence in the area.

8. One possibility that might be explored is the suggestion that an agreement with the Russians on the Middle East should be associated with the disarmament discussions. The British have at times shown an interest in proposals for experiments in disarmament in a limited area. They had suggested Germany. The difficulty with Germany of course is that such enormous forces, both military and political, are involved and the issues are so critical that neither side is prepared for boldness. In the Middle East, however, although the situation is critical, it is nevertheless peripheral. At any rate, the armed forces involved are relatively small and the nations to be controlled relatively weak and without their own armament industries. A good deal of careful study would have to be given to such a proposal before it could be put forward, but is perhaps worthy of examination.

9. The idea of inviting the Russians to work out an agreed settlement is not one which is likely to be received warmly if it were put forward to the State Department or the Foreign Office. However, it is the kind of large gesture which might appeal to President Eisenhower. It would be in harmony with the kind of thinking he has shown in his letters to Bulganin and might even be included in his next correspondence with the Marshal. Even if it was not taken up by the Russians, such a gesture would have a tonic effect on the morale of the West, which is at a very low ebb. The peoples of the Western countries are not only discouraged, they are doubtful and confused about the rightness of the Western position in Israel, Jordan, Egypt, Cyprus and North Africa. The notes of protest being sounded recently by President Gronchi and M. Pineau are fair warning of the impatience generally felt with Anglo-American leadership. If the U.S. and the U.K. are to preserve their position of leadership (and however much we argue against an arrogant use of that position it is nevertheless in our interests to preserve it) they must produce new ideas, new conceptions, gestures of faith rather than merely re-hashing tired old clichés about Soviet policy. It is not good enough to go on talking about Soviet intentions never changing without probing the indications that the Russians are interested in striking bargains to assure a peaceful framework for co-existence.

10. If the Russians accepted a straightforward offer from President Eisenhower to reach agreement on a Middle Eastern settlement, and if the negotiations were to be at least as successful as those on Indo-China, then a step of incalculable significance might have been taken. From this agreement on one major issue we might proceed to establish a firmer basis for co-existence. (The danger is recognized that an effort of this kind which failed would probably leave the situation worse than it was before.) If the Russians refused the offer, then at any rate the moral position of the West would be considerably strengthened. (Although it must also be recognized that the Russians are masters of the art of accepting with unacceptable conditions which put the other side apparently in the wrong.)

11. This disorganized memorandum is intended merely to provoke further consideration. I have not even tried to suggest the basis of any settlement with the Russians, nor have I dealt with the extremely difficult problems of how any such negotiations would take place, whether they would be within a United Nations framework, or whether they would include the parties to the dispute. All these things are not mere details but matters which could prove to be insuperable obstacles. It would seem useful, however, to have the idea critically examined by those concerned within the Department. If, perchance, we can make something of it, it might be that the suggestion could be conveyed to the President direct at White Sulphur Springs.⁸

THE MIDDLE EAST

I had been in the process of jotting down a few ideas on this subject when I received a copy of Mr. Holmes' memorandum on Western Policy in the Middle East. Instead of trying to comment on this directly I thought it would be better simply to finish my paper, even though it has been to a certain extent over-taken by events. In any event I am in general agreement with Mr. Holmes' thesis and the comments† thereon of Mr. Ignatieff.

2. The main points in my paper are:

(a) The Arab-Israeli quarrel is simply the most acute manifestation of the general problem of the evolution of the Arab world from colonial status;

(b) No progress can be made on the main problem until we solve the Palestine question;

(c) The Russians now hold the key and the only way to reach a solution is by trying to reach Four-Power agreement. The only time in the past ten years that any progress was possible in Palestine was during the brief period of Four-Power co-operation on this subject in 1947-48;

(d) The main lines of a settlement, which have already been laid down in essence by both Washington and London might also include the establishment of a free territory of Aqaba under U.N. supervision.

THE MIDDLE EAST

1. The purpose of this study is to examine the basis for the oft-repeated claim that the Middle East has become in the last few months the most inflammable part of the world, to outline Canadian interest in the problem, and to make a few suggestions for trying to meet the situation.

2. There are a number of factors which make the problems of the Middle East particularly complex and difficult:

(a) The anti-Western, anti-colonial feeling in nearly all the countries of this area;

(b) The Arab-Israeli impasse;

(c) The economic and political backwardness of the region;

(d) The vulnerability of the area to Soviet political and economic penetration; and

(e) Its strategic importance.

3. We tend too often to think of the problems of this area in terms solely of the Arab-Israeli quarrel, but the latter has simply exacerbated and complicated difficulties which would exist if the Jewish state had never been created. It remains, however, as both a real and psychological block, and it is doubtful if we will be able to get down seriously to tackling these other tasks if we are unable to diminish, if not solve, the proportions of the problem of Israeli-Arab relations.

4. Arab nationalism is a relatively recent growth, or rather re-growth, and we should not deceive ourselves about its strength because it has lain dormant for so many centuries. It combines a pride in Arab culture, history and military and political prowess, with a deep-seated feeling of inferiority because of the centuries of foreign — Turkish and European — subjection. It is also linked with pan-Islamism which extends beyond the boundaries of the Arab world.

5. Arab nationalism is now directed against the Jews and the West, and one of our problems is to prevent the engulfment of Israel without giving the impression that the West is pro-Israel and anti-Arab. But the purely anti-colonial feeling cannot help but be directed increasingly against France and Britain, against the latter because of its colonial history in the Middle East, the vestiges of which still remain in Jordan, Iraq and the Saudi peninsula, and against France because of its history in Syria and Lebanon, and the clash with the North Africans. The United States is associated with these two colonial powers by implication and because of its oil investments. In spite of the rapid evolution of the colonial policies of the United Kingdom and France, it seems improbable for some time to come that we can lessen the anti-Western, anti-colonial feeling in the Arab countries, particularly if it is fanned by the Communists, and accentuated by the quarrel with Israel, unless some concrete steps are taken to distract the attention of the Arabs from these two essentially sterile pursuits.

6. The political instability of the Arab countries, and the feudal nature of some of the régimes, makes it increasingly difficult to do business with them. There is a crying need for every kind of economic development, with the possible exception of the Lebanon. There is a not inconsiderable amount of natural resources, but they are badly distributed, and the huge revenues from oil are not being used for the purposes of economic advancement. They are indeed being exploited primarily to bolster up reactionary régimes and in the case of Saudi Arabia, for the subversion of other Arab countries.

7. So long as these conditions continue the area is ripe for Communist penetration. Up to now the West on the whole has followed the line that it was preferable to bolster up the régimes of the feudal land-owners as they alone could give stability to their countries and prevent Communist penetration. But the growth of Arab nationalism, the influx of new ideas, the contrasts of wealth and poverty, and the aid of Soviet ideas and agents, may soon make this theory untenable. Unless this is carefully guarded against, it is possible that economic and political discontent could also be directed against the West.

8. I think it is a mistake for the West to take a high moral stand about the entry of the U.S.S.R. into the Middle East. It is only surprising that this has been delayed so long. As a colonial, or a former colonial area, it fits in nicely with Marxist theory, and in addition, Russia has always looked longingly towards the Mediterranean and the Iranian Gulf. Certainly the Russians have given us sufficient warning that they were interested, and even how they would act. At any rate they are now prepared to use diplomatic, economic and other means to weaken Western influence in the area, to neutralise the Baghdad Pact, and if possible, to bring some of these countries into the Soviet orbit. Their plans are undoubtedly long-term, but I think it safe to assume that the days of exclusive Western big-power action in the area have come to an end. The region is more vulnerable than most to Soviet action for the reasons I have outlined above, and unlike South-East Asia, it is geographically exposed to direct Soviet pressure and threats.

9. None of this would be of such urgent importance if it were not for the fact that the Middle East occupies a strategic situation, and for the purpose of this study I include French North Africa. If this area were to turn against the West, even if it did not go Communist, it would be a fatal economic, political and military blow to the Western alliance. The oil supplies and revenues alone are of vital importance to the United Kingdom and Western Europe. Communist influence well established in Egypt or other parts of the Middle East would be able to infiltrate with ease west into North Africa, south into the Sudan and equatorial Africa, and east into the Indian subcontinent. The strategic value of this part of the world, I need not labour. It depends not only on its importance for communications, but also as a springboard against the vulnerable southern part of Russia, and in particular the areas of largest concentration of non-Russians — the Caucasus and Central Asia.

10. All of these factors I have mentioned above (and there are many more) are clearly interlocking, and the result is one of the most complicated, yet urgent problems in international relations.

The Canadian Interest

11. Our general interest is simply that the world today makes it impossible to disassociate ourselves effectively from the problems of any area. If war should break out in the Middle East between Israel and Egypt, say, we are just as likely to be involved as we were in Korea and Indo-China. It is also in our interest to try to contain Soviet expansion wherever possible, and to create conditions which will make communism impossible.

12. We also have a certain moral involvement because Canada played a leading role in solving the Palestine problem and helping the United Nations to set up the State of Israel. We cannot now wash our hands of the problem. Nor, for internal political reasons, could we permit the destruction of Israel, even if we did not believe objectively in our moral obligation towards Israel. This moral obligation does not mean blind support of Israel against the Arabs. It simply means that we ought to help, either inside or outside the United Nations, to reach a solution of a problem which we, together with the other United Nations members, recognized as an international responsibility in 1947.

The Arab-Israeli Dispute

13. While I said earlier that the Israeli-Arab dispute was simply a manifestation in an aggravated form of the wider problem of the Middle East, nevertheless it must be removed or modified before we can seriously tackle the more general question. Up to now the Big Three have proved incapable of solving the problem. They have been unwilling to use sufficient pressure on either side to achieve a permanent settlement. This policy of trying simply to prevent a general conflagration without forcing a solution cannot continue indefinitely since it is more likely than not to provoke a debacle. It has furthermore failed signally to win the sympathy of the Arabs for the West.

14. Now that the Russians have demonstrated their support for the Arabs, the temptation becomes even greater not to do anything which would further alienate the Arab states. It is very easy to reason that the Israelis have no alternative but to seek the support of the West, and that we need therefore think only in terms of preventing the Arabs from going over to the Soviet bloc. But there is a limit to the direction we should travel on this road, apart from its basic immorality. I think it would be disastrous to give the impression that this is Western policy, and indeed I doubt if our interests would be served by sacrificing some of the basic security of the State of Israel in order to gain a rather dubious Arab support. Israel still remains the only democracy, the only Western-orientated, and the only well-organized state in the Middle East, and one on which we can rely.

15. If we rule out, as I think we must, the thesis the U.K. has been advancing, that Israel should be forced to make considerable sacrifices in order to secure peace with the Arabs, then I think we must equally rule out the notion that anyone can force the Arabs to make peace on Israeli terms. Equally, we must rule out war as a solution though this may become more likely whether we approve or not. (Indeed, if the Jordanians were foolish enough to attack Israel in the next few months, and Israel were able, as I presume it would be, to drive the Jordanians out of Palestine, it would be very difficult for the U.N. later to force the Israelis to give up their conquests. This might indeed in the long run be a good thing as it would give the Israelis a more adequate territorial base in which to work, and reduce the risk that the Arabs would be able to drive them into the sea. It would also provide a better economic base for the young state).

16. Nevertheless, war is a solution which should not be contemplated, and we must avoid driving the Israelis to a preventive war by giving them the impression that the West has abandoned them.

17. Israel's only hope is to try to negotiate a settlement, even if it involves some territorial concession, although no one would expect Israel's territory to be "truncated". Israel's only chance of surviving is by making itself into an indispensable part of the economy of the Middle East. The so-called "abstract" concession which would be required of the Arabs — the recognition of Israel — in fact carries with it very great practical advantages for Israel. The economic suffocation of Israel is likely to result if peace is not made, and particularly if it is required to support the burden of modern arms. Israel cannot continue indefinitely to depend on outside economic help.

Recommendations

18. It is becoming increasingly clear that the Big Three have disqualified themselves from the role of adjudicators of the problems of the Middle East — the United States because of its pro-Israeli policy in the past. France and the U.K. for the reasons outlined above. Turkey and Greece are too immediately involved, and other European powers are not really qualified, with the possible exception of Italy. By a process of elimination, therefore, we are reduced to considering the possibility of relatively neutral and disinterested countries like Canada and India attempting to advance a settlement; of bringing the U.N. more directly into the task of seeking a solution; or of attempting to impose a solution agreed upon by the Big Three plus the USSR.

19. The proposal for arbitration is probably impractical even if we or the Indians were interested, and I presume we would not want to get directly involved in this area. We must fall back, therefore, on the last two suggestions, or possibly a combination of them.

20. The USSR is now firmly in the Middle East, and there is little we can do about it. The Big Three have failed to solve the problems of the Middle East without Russia; it seems inconceivable that they could do so now that the Soviet Union is an active participant. I think that the only course is to invite the Russians to participate with the Western Big Three in trying to solve at any rate the major problem — Arab-Israeli relations. This might be done in the first instance by private talks among the Big Four, plus the Secretary-General. These conversations might later be transferred more formally to the U.N., if they showed any sign of making progress.

21. There are many disadvantages in this course. In the first place it pre-supposes an interest by the USSR in solving the problems of the Middle East, whereas it is more likely that the Soviet cause is better served by continued divisions among the countries of this area, and the Western Powers. It is also possible that the Russians would ask, as a price of co-operation, the disbandment of the Baghdad Pact. My personal opinion has always been that both this pact and the previous Turko-Pakistani Pact served no useful military purpose and had many political disadvantages, and I would not think that its abandonment would be a serious loss, particularly as it is likely to lose its key member, Iraq, some day in any event. In any case, it is quite useless without active U.S. participation. The West, of course, should not try to bargain the Baghdad Pact against Soviet co-operation, and I think the Russians would not demand it as a pre-requisite. But I think the West should be prepared, if necessary, to sacrifice it in return for Soviet participation in arranging and guaranteeing a Palestine settlement.

22. I think, on balance, that the Russians would be prepared to work with the West in seeking a solution of the problem of Palestine if in this way they could achieve equal, and respectable, status with the Western Big Three in the Middle East. I do not doubt that they will continue to stir up trouble, and press their own specific aims, but that is something they are going to do anyway, and it might be easier to try to work with them, rather than against or without them. In fact Soviet co-operation is the only real hope we have now of reaching a settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

23. Finally, I have one suggestion to make on the nature of that settlement. It is clear that the Arabs will demand territorial concessions particularly in the Negev in order to establish a land-bridge between Egypt and Jordan. It is also equally clear that the Israelis will not permit an Arab corridor through the Negev, and insist on the importance of the port of Elath for their future economic expansion.

24. My suggestion is that, as part of a general settlement, an international territory similar to Danzig or Trieste, be established at the mouth of the Gulf of Aqaba to include a small slice of Egyptian, Israeli and Jordanian territory, including the ports of Elath and Aqaba, and that it be administered by an international force under the command of a U.N. official directly responsible to the U.N. Free access to the port by all three states should be permitted as well as free civilian transit. While the Israelis might object to ceding sovereignty, face would be saved by comparable concessions by Egypt and Jordan, and Israel's economic position would be assured. It would in fact be a very small price for them to pay if peace were to be secured. It would, furthermore, be almost the only way by which an international armed force could be introduced into the area and this in itself would add to the security of Israel and its neighbours. The other points in a general settlement; minor frontier adjustments, frontier guarantees, and compensation for the Arab refugees, have been pretty fully explored and I need not go into them here; but I think the suggestion for a free territory in the Gulf of Aqaba might just possibly prove a starting-point for negotiations on the delicate but essential question of the Negev.

REQUEST FOR FIVE ADDITIONAL CANADIAN MILITARY OBSERVERS WITH THE UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANISATION IN PALESTINE

This memorandum has been prepared, as you requested, for your use at to-morrow's Cabinet meeting.

2. The Secretariat of the United Nations in New York has formally requested in a letter to the Canadian Permanent Representative that Canada provide urgently five additional Military Observers for service with the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization in Palestine, which is headed by General Burns. In addition to General Burns, there are already five Canadian Military Observers with the Organization.

3. This request is pursuant to the recommendation which, according to the Secretariat, is to be made shortly by Mr. Hammarskjöld to the Security Council as a result of his trip to the Middle East that UNTSO should be enlarged by 20 to 30 Military Observers. As will be seen from the attached memorandum on UNTSO, this would at least double the number of Military Observers now with the Organisation, and would exactly double the number of Canadian Military Observers (apart from General Burns). The use to which the new Military Observers would be put is indicated by a report in this morning's press to the effect that UNTSO had announced that both Israel and Egypt had approved the establishment of U.N. observation posts and mobile patrols on the border around the Gaza strip.

4. The text of the letter from the Secretariat is contained in the attached telegram No. 356 of May 1† from our Permanent Mission in New York. The letter states that this request results from the Secretary-General's agreements with the parties concerned, which provide for greater freedom of movement by Military Observers along the demarcation lines with a view to reducing the prospect of incidents and warlike acts. Similar requests have been made to the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, Norway and Sweden, of which only the last now has Military Observers serving with UNTSO. (Our Permanent Mission has so far not been able to obtain any definite information concerning the reaction of these Governments.) The letter asks that the five additional Canadian officers be of the rank of Captain or Major, and that they be available initially until at least October 31, 1956. It also says that, as this is a matter of great urgency, it is hoped that the Observers can depart for Palestine at the earliest possible date.

5. We have been informed at the official level by the Department of National Defence that, if a formal request, such as that which we now have, were received from the United Nations, and if the Canadian Government decided to accede to this request, the officers required could be made available for duty with UNTSO.

6. From the point of view of this Department, I think it is most desirable that the Canadian Government should give favourable consideration to this comparatively modest request from the Secretary-General. The work which the Truce Supervision Organization has had to perform and will be carrying out is of very great importance and provides an opportunity for a Canadian contribution to the assistance of peace in the Middle East out of all proportion to the number of Canadians involved. This request for additional Canadian assistance undoubtedly is a reflection of the high regard in which the work of General Burns and the other Canadians who have served or are serving with UNTSO is held.

7. I suggest, therefore, that you recommend to the Cabinet that the Canadian Government should accede to this request. I should perhaps add that both the initial request in November, 1953, for Canadian Military Observers to serve with UNTSO and the proposal, in June, 1954, that a Canadian should become the Chief of Staff of the Organization, were approved by Mr. Pearson and the Minister of National Defence but, as far as our records show, neither proposal was formally considered by the Cabinet.

R.M. M[ACDONNELL]

P.S.: Since this memorandum was prepared, we have been informed by our Permanent Mission that the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, Norway and Sweden have all officially accepted the request that they provide Military Observers for UNTSO, and that the Norwegian Observers will be leaving for the Middle East to-morrow.

THE UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION IN PALESTINE

The United Nations Truce Supervision Organization in Palestine functions in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Security Council August 11, 1949, following the conclusion of Armistice Agreements between Israel and her four neighbours (Jordan, Syria, Egypt and Lebanon). The Organization is responsible for "observing and maintaining the cease-fire" ordered by the Security Council on July 15, 1948 and for "assisting the parties to the Armistice Agreements in the supervision of the application and observance of the terms of those Agreements". Officers of the Truce Supervision Organization watch conditions in demilitarized zones and along the armistice lines, investigate incidents and serve as chairmen of the four Mixed Armistice Commissions on each of which the parties concerned have two representatives apiece so that the chairman's vote is usually a decisive factor in determining the action taken by each of the four separate Commissions.

2. The Chief of Staff of the Organization, who since August 1954 has been Major General E.L.M. Burns of Canada, reports to the Security Council on the observance of the Armistice Agreements. He is assisted by about twenty military observers recruited by the Secretary-General of the United Nations with the cooperation of the Governments of Belgium, France, the United States, Canada, Denmark and Sweden. Canada currently is supplying five military observers, two Lieutenant-Colonels, two Majors and one Captain.

3. The military observers — most of whom are the majors, captains and lieutenant-colonels — are appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations for one-year terms on the recommendations of their respective governments. Appointments are renewable. The observers are paid a per diem salary by the United Nations, based on the cost of living in the area. The Chief of Staff is assisted also by civilians, most of whom are members of the United Nations Secretariat.⁹

SOVIET MOTIVES IN THE MIDDLE EAST

While reading some of the speculations about Soviet motives in making the Molotov Declaration¹⁰ on the Middle East and in suggesting to the British that they would be prepared to seek a solution of Middle East problems, a point occurred to me which does not seem to have been touched on in any of the commentaries I have seen. I was wondering if one of the considerations in the Russians' minds may not have been the fear that the situation could get out of hand in the Middle East and that the Russians would not be able to prevent it from leading to a general war which everyone seems to think the Russians now wish to avoid.

2. You will recall that the Swedish Ambassador reported a conversation with Khrushchev at the New Year's Reception in Moscow (this reached us through French sources). The Ambassador mentioned to Khrushchev that the Soviet entry into the Middle East seemed to have increased the risks of war and that this seemed inconsistent with the previous statements of Khrushchev that war must be avoided.

3. Khrushchev was quoted as replying "Bah, ne vous faites pas de souci. Si les Arabes s'enflamment trop, les Anglais sont là pour les calmer".

4. Since that time, however, the position of the British in the Middle East has deteriorated rapidly. The Russians must be as aware of it as we are. It could well be possible that Khrushchev has changed his opinion in these four months and now believes that the British are not in a position to prevent the Arabs from making war and that, therefore, the situation is more inflammable than seemed possible last fall. It, therefore, follows that the Russians would wish to hint to the Arabs that they could not rely entirely on Soviet help in the event of an attack on Israel. Prior to the present Soviet statement there was a real danger, which the Russians certainly must have recognized, that the Arab states, armed with Soviet guns and assuming automatic Soviet support, would precipitate a war which the Russians have come to realize could not be prevented from involving the big powers.

5. Apart from this big step forward, the Russians have put themselves in the position of disillusioning the Arabs, if only partially. This also is an advantage for the West, and one which I hope we will push. I think the Russians would only have endangered the advantage they had with the Arabs for big stakes — control of the inflammable situation in the Middle East, and not primarily, as the United Kingdom has suggested, because they want to destroy the Baghdad Pact and secure a voice in Middle East affairs, though naturally these must also be important Soviet aims.

INTERVIEW WITH AMBASSADOR OF EGYPT

In accordance with Mr. Pearson's request, I asked the Egyptian Ambassador to call this afternoon. It had been impossible to get anyone at the Egyptian Embassy for several days as they were celebrating the end of Ramadan.

2. When the Ambassador came I told him that the propaganda material which had been enclosed with Mr. Comay's letter† to the Minister of May 7, had been drawn to the Minister's attention but I did not mention by whom. I said that Mr. Pearson agreed that this material contained attacks on a friendly nation which went beyond the bounds of what seemed acceptable. I suggested that it seemed to me of a defamatory kind which if it had been published by someone other than a diplomatic source might have required some action. After having consulted Mr. Wershof on this subject, I was careful not to say specifically that it would be actionable. My personal view, I added, was that I did not think it was really of a kind best calculated to appeal to the Canadian public. I said that Mr. Pearson had not wanted to make a formal complaint but had asked me to draw this matter to the attention of the Ambassador.

3. The Ambassador took this pretty well. He contended himself with emphasizing that it was all factual, that this was what the Israelis were doing to Egyptians and these were actual photographs. He was inclined to get the impression that we were attempting to prevent the Arab countries from presenting their side of the question but I assured him very firmly several times that we had no such intention. He had every right to explain the Egyptian position to the Canadian population in the same way as the Israeli Embassy had the right to explain their position. It was merely a question of how far one should go in attacking another government. He said that not only the Israeli Embassy but many Canadians viciously attacked Egypt and Arab policy and referred to conventions which he said were frequently held in the Chateau Laurier where people said dreadful things about Egypt. I said that Mr. Pearson would take exactly the same attitude towards similar material put out by any other Embassy. Mr. El Khatib did not promise to withdraw any of the material or to cease putting it out and I did not press him to any commitment. However, I think that he will take the hint. In spite of his protests, the discussion was pretty amicable in tone.

4. After this unpleasant introduction, the Ambassador asked me if any decision had been taken on the planes for Israel.¹¹ I told him that no decision had been taken but that the matter was constantly under consideration. He gave me the usual arguments about the desirability of Canada preserving its neutrality and its high reputation among Arab countries and repeated the argument that to sell such planes would be to forfeit the friendship of the Arab countries. I did my best to explain to him that even if a decision were taken to send the planes to Israel, this gesture would in no sense mean that we were espousing one side against the other. All that the Israelis had asked for were interceptor planes capable of use only for defensive purposes. No offensive weapons were under consideration. As Mr. El Khatib constantly insisted that Egypt had no aggressive intentions whatsoever I drew to his attention the fact that although the Israelis had asked us only for defensive aircraft, the Egyptian Government had been buying bombers from Czechoslovakia and that these were useful only for offensive purposes. My argument was pretty difficult as I discovered that the Ambassador had not the faintest idea that there was a difference between a fighter and a bomber plane. He was tremendously impressed with my knowledge of this distinction and assumed that I must have had a long career in the R.C.A.F.

5. During our discussion as to whether or not the supply of aircraft to Israel would contribute to an arms race, I indicated that we were naturally much interested in the intentions of the Egyptian Government. If the Egyptian Government intended to continue buying bomber planes, then this was an important factor which we must consider in deciding whether or not the Israelis should have the means to defend themselves. He assured me that the purchase of bombers from the Soviet countries was something that had taken place and was finished. When I pressed him on this point, he did not seem too sure of himself and I do not think too much store should be placed in this statement. I am not suggesting that he was deliberately prevaricating but I doubt if he is very well informed on the subject. I did let him know, however, that this was something in which we were much interested and would like to know what his Government had to say on the subject.

6. In conclusion, he made some reference, not unfavourable, to Larry Henderson's reports from the Middle East. Although he criticized what Mr. Sharrett had said to Henderson, he admitted that both sides had been given an opportunity to speak. I said I hoped he would bear in mind the length to which the C.B.C. had gone to present the Arab case when he complained about the one-sidedness of newspapers and Members of Parliament in this country, as he had in the earlier part of the interview.

POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF WORK ON ISRAELI SCHEME FOR DIVERSION OF ISRAELI WATERS

In our memorandum of June 18,† we speculated that the replacement of Moshe Sharett by Mrs. Golda Myerson as Foreign Minister of Israel might produce a tougher line in Israeli foreign policy. Already there are indications that a policy of very firm diplomacy is being adopted. These have included an increase in the number and intensity of Israeli complaints to the Mixed Armistice Commissions and the complaint by Israel to the International Civil Aviation Organization against Arab failure to cooperate in established air-safety practices.

This apparent stiffening of foreign policy has revived apprehension that Israel may soon resume work on its project to divert the Jordan River waters for irrigation and power development. In recent weeks the Israelis have been constructing defensive positions in the demilitarized zone along the frontier with Syria north of Lake Tiberias. While this has no necessary immediate connection with possible intentions to resume digging operations in the zone, it inevitably has increased speculation that work is about to be resumed, and has led to a Syrian complaint to the Mixed Armistice Commission. Moreover, there have been several recent Israeli complaints of Syrian violations of the demarcation line in the area; and since these apparently are without foundation, it has been suggested that the Israelis may be concocting a pretext for an initiative of their own. In view of Prime Minister Ben-Gurion's frequent assertions that Israel cannot much longer delay work on the canal project in the demilitarized zone, and the recent loss of Mr. Sharett's restraining influence in the Cabinet, the possibility that Israel may now press on with the scheme certainly cannot be ignored. Should work be resumed in the face of the intransigent Arab opposition to the Israeli undertaking, the danger of large-scale hostilities being precipitated would be very real indeed, particularly at this time when other sections of Israel's frontiers are under tension, and the Arabs apparently are in a state of considerable military preparedness.

The Jordan River canal project, of which the disputed work in the demilitarized zone forms a part, involves diversion of a portion of the Jordan waters north of Lake Tiberias. It is intended to carry water from the river along an eight-mile canal to a point on the lake, where some of the water will be used to operate a hydro-electric project. The balance of the water would be carried to a nearby reservoir for ultimate transmission by tunnel, canal and pipe to the Yarkon River at Tel Aviv, thereafter to be utilized for various irrigation schemes.

Israel abandoned work on the canal diversion project in the demilitarized zone in September 1953, following a protest by Syria to the United Nations Security Council, and agreed to suspend digging operations while the question was given further "urgent examination". It was pointed out during the Security Council discussions on the complaint that the General Armistice Agreement gives the Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization responsibility for the general supervision of the demilitarized zone; and it has been suggested that Israel would require the approval of General Burns before resuming work on the scheme.

Since 1953, construction of other portions of the canal, from the edge of the demilitarized zone to Lake Tiberias and thence to the reservoir at Beit Natufa, has continued. This work is far from complete, and will probably take another two years to finish. However, the section in the demilitarized zone forms an integral part of the whole Israeli scheme; and Israel argues that it cannot be expected to go ahead with other sections of the work while its right ultimately to construct the disputed portion remains in doubt, since failure to complete that part would wreck the entire project.

Since work in the demilitarized zone was abandoned in 1953 at the request of the Security Council, the United States in effect has assumed responsibility for negotiation of the Jordan waters dispute, in the absence of any further United Nations action. President Eisenhower appointed Mr. Eric Johnston as his special ambassador to go to the Middle East and present to the Israeli and the Arab governments a comprehensive plan for development of the Jordan River for the joint benefit of Israel and the Arab states (particularly Jordan) under international supervision. The plan had been drawn up at the request of the United Nations under the direction of the Tennessee Valley authority, which had reviewed and analyzed all past proposals for utilization of the Jordan waters. The plan which resulted was optimistically entitled "The Unified Development of the Water Resources of the Jordan Valley Region". This original plan was considerably modified with a view to meeting specific objections raised by the parties during Mr. Johnston's first and subsequent visits to the Middle East. On his fourth visit, undertaken in August 1955, he carried with him the revised plan with which his name now is associated, embodying new compromise figures for water allocation, and involving a United States offer to pay 2/3 of the cost of the entire project (estimated at $200 million). Israel was to receive 40% of the total water flow to be shared, and the remaining 60% was to be divided among Lebanon (3.5%), Syria (12.5%) and Jordan (44%). The plan in this latest form provided that neither side would have physical control over distribution of the Jordan waters; this would be in international hands, presumably under a neutral board of engineers.

Mr. Johnston's own assessment of the benefits which could be derived from a comprehensive programme for developing the Jordan River basin is interesting. First, he points out, it would form the basis for an equitable allocation of the available waters, and thus take utilization of the river waters out of the area of controversy between Israel and her Arab neighbours. Second, it would mark at least the beginning of a constructive, practical and long-overdue solution of the refugee programme, in that it would bring into agricultural use sufficient new land to settle many thousands of the refugees. Finally, it would contribute to a general rise in economic levels and thus help to promote social progress in the whole region.

It appears that during his most recent visit to the Middle East Mr. Johnston was able to achieve virtually complete agreement on the technical and engineering details of the plan between Arab and Israeli authorities. The allocation of the controlled waters was agreed upon, and earlier Arab objections to the use of Lake Tiberias as the storage reservoir were withdrawn. There can be no serious doubt that the real burden of current Arab refusal to accept the scheme is almost entirely political. Even Syria, which stands to gain comparatively little under the international plan, and Egypt, which is not directly concerned at all, apparently appreciate the economic desirability of the development programme. Lebanon is only moderately interested, since it has a development scheme of its own in mind, involving exploitation of the Litani river; but for Jordan, full utilization of the River Jordan as well as the Yarmuk offers the only hope of developing sufficient cultivable land to feed even its own population, not to mention the 460,000 refugees within its borders. The chief question of the Arab states is, would the plan really imply recognition of the existence of Israel? It is with this in mind that the Arabs, throughout the negotiations, have maintained their insistence that any water distribution system should be regulated by international authority. The corollary to their legalistic apprehension about recognizing the existence of Israel of course is that the Johnston plan would give Israel means of implanting itself still more securely, by using the new water source to develop more land. Furthermore, it might imply acceptance of the principle of re-settling refugees, rather than repatriating them to Israel.

The immediate issue between Syria and Israel certainly is of a legalistic character, rather than economic; for a unilateral diversion project by Israel would not interfere with Syrian irrigation or power developments, and in any event could be fitted into any international scheme which might be agreed upon later. The essential conflict is that the Syrians say the Israeli digging operations are contrary to the terms of the General Armistice Agreement, in that they constitute strategic work in the demilitarized zone. The Israelis insist that the canal project is purely a civilian undertaking, and does not violate the provisions of the Agreement.

Israel regards the possible creation of a permanent international agency on the scene as an undesirable intrusion, and a reflection on Israeli sovereignty. However, the Israelis maintain that they are genuinely interested in cooperating in the Johnston plan. It embodies the major elements of Israel's own project for diversion of the Jordan waters, although it would provide only the absolute minimum amount of water to meet immediate Israeli development plans. Nevertheless, the possible political benefits to Israel which might reasonably be expected to follow the water agreement, and the economic attractions of the international scheme, are sufficient inducements to make the plan desirable to the Jewish state.

Israel has been growing increasingly impatient during recent months over continued delay in implementation of the plan, as a result of Arab failure to accept it. At the conclusion of Mr. Johnston's latest talks in the Middle East, the Arab states asked for further time to study the plan. The Israelis agreed to delay work on their own diversion scheme in the hope that the plan for international development would be accepted, but indicated that they would feel compelled to proceed with their own scheme during the 1956 dry season (May to October) if the Arabs had not yet agreed to the Johnston plan.

During his recent mission to the Middle East, Mr. Hammarskjöld was questioned about the implications of possible resumption of work by Israel in the demilitarized zone. While he did not insist that this would constitute a violation of the Armistice Agreement, he indicated that it might be contrary to the Security Council Resolution of 1953. Certainly it can be argued that the approval of General Burns would have to be obtained before work could be resumed. However, Israel points out that the issue technically has been under "urgent examination" by the United Nations for more than 2 1/2 years, and that in the absence of any Security Council action in all this time, Israel is free to resume digging operations. Both the United States and the United Kingdom governments have warned the Israeli government against proceeding with its diversion scheme at this time.

Recently there have been unconfirmed reports from Jerusalem that the Secretary-General intends to propose a modified version of the Johnston Plan, to operate under United Nations auspices, to the parties.

Israel's attitude toward the timing of resumption of work may not be unrelated to considerations of military preparedness. The Israelis may calculate that work in the demilitarized zone could be proceeded with this year without encountering serious opposition from the Syrians or precipitating war, which may not be the case next year with the increased flow of arms to the Arab states.

The Syrians have stated frequently that they would regard renewal of digging operations in the demilitarized zone as a cause for war and that they would expect Egyptian assistance under the terms of their alliance. Egypt has assured them that military assistance would be forthcoming. It has never been quite clear how far this position was qualified by undertakings given to Mr. Hammarskjöld during his cease-fire talks in Damascus. The United Kingdom Embassy in Damascus believes that Syrian leaders are by no means confident of Egyptian support in the event of Syrian military action over diversion of the Jordan river, and therefore would offer only token military opposition to resumption of work by Israel, before appealing to the Security Council. United States sources in Syria, on the other hand, express the view that Syria would put up strong resistance, and quote Syrian officials as saying in effect that they would blast the Israelis out of the zone if they attempted to resume digging. Since we have no direct diplomatic contacts with the Syrian government, a realistic assessment of the possibilities is difficult; but our Chargé d'Affaires in Beirut has stated that he is inclined to accept the United States estimate of possible Syrian reaction. On the other hand the Egyptians showed no inclination to assist the Syrians at the time of the Israeli attack at Lake Tiberias, which came shortly after announcement of the Syrian-Egyptian military alliance.

It seems unlikely that the Arab states would ever concede Israel the right to carry on with unilateral schemes for diversion of the Jordan waters. Therefore, in the absence of agreement on any international settlement such as the Johnston plan, it appears that the Syrian sector of the demarcation lines will continue to be a source of potential danger. Resumption of work in the demilitarized zone by Israel at any time before a full settlement of the issue is arrived at might well precipitate major disturbances. At this particular time, when considerable Syrian forces are understood to be massed near Lake Tiberias, and with the other Arab states also in a state of military alertness for a variety of reasons, it would almost certainly have drastic repercussions.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

You asked for a review of the export of military equipment and aircraft to the Middle East during the last two years. You also asked for a review of the procedures relating to the control of such exports.

2. I attach a Table† showing by dollar value and by types of items the export permits for such exports to the Middle East which were issued from January 1, 1954 to December 31, 1955. I should point out that these figures do not cover actual deliveries, since there is necessarily a time lag between the issue of an export permit and the delivery of an order. I shall return below to the matter of this time lag. Delivery figures are not directly available, and we have so far been unable to obtain them; I assume that the permit figures attached are sufficient for your present purpose.

3. With regard to the steps leading up to the issue of an export permit there are two different starting points. Enquiries or requests may be directed to the Canadian Commercial Corporation, or to private Canadian companies which sooner or later get in touch with the Department of Trade and Commerce about the likelihood of obtaining an export permit. When the matter reaches a stage where an export permit is sought it is the Canadian supplier and not the foreign purchaser who makes application for it.

4. Approaches may take the form of general enquiries about availability, more formal requests for specific quotations, or firm requests to place an order. An order is not normally accepted or a contract signed without the supplier having received assurance that an export permit will probably be granted; this is true whether the CCC or a private firm is the proposed supplier. With regard to general enquiries or requests for quotations practice varies among private firms, but the CCC normally give us an opportunity to comment before giving a positive answer to any such enquiry or request which might have political implications. The private firms most active in this field are also accustomed to consult Trade and Commerce in such cases, but I am not aware of any formal obligation upon the supplier to contact the interested government departments prior to the stage of applying for an export permit.

5. Whether we are asked for our formal concurrence in the issue of an export permit, or for an advisory opinion at an earlier stage, we invariably consult the Joint Intelligence Bureau before acting. In routine cases the advice from the J.I.B. usually takes the form of a statement that they have consulted the appropriate armed service and that it has no objection to the proposed transaction. In more substantial cases they add an assessment of the effect, if any, on the military capacity of the country concerned or on the balance of strength in the area. In really doubtful cases we seek to obtain a clear opinion, as detailed as possible, of the military value of the item concerned and of the full military implications of releasing it to the country in question.

6. Having obtained this information, we form an assessment within the Department of whether our approval should be granted, should be refused, or should be given only subject to limiting conditions relating to quantity, rate of delivery, etc. Our opinion is drafted in the Economic Division in consultation with the political division or divisions concerned, and is communicated by letter to the CCC or to the Department of Trade and Commerce depending on where the request came from. Copies are of course sent to Trade and Commerce and J.I.B. in all cases.

7. I attach a copy of a paper which you approved on May 26, 1954, setting out the extent to which you have delegated to officials of the Department the authority to approve the issue of export permits in certain cases of specifically limited importance. When approval has been given in accordance with those procedures, by yourself or by me or by the Head of the Economic Division as the case may require, our decision is transmitted in a letter which is normally signed on my behalf by the Head of the Economic Division. While it is not formally required, the same procedures are normally followed when we are asked for our opinion prior to an actual application for an export permit.

8. The authority to issue export permits is vested in the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I attach a memorandum dated January 21, 1954,¹³ which was approved by the Cabinet on March 10, 1954 setting out the conditions under which that authority is exercised. As you will observe, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is under obligation to obtain your prior approval in a variety of specified cases including shipments to troubled areas such as the countries of the Middle East. The manner in which your approval is obtained is set out in the preceding paragraphs, which include the arrangements you have approved for delegating the authority to approve in specified and limited cases.

9. It is my judgment that these various procedures, faithfully observed, are adequate. Early in this memorandum I referred, however, to the question of a time lag which could create difficulties if the situation altered considerably in that interval. This can come in at two stages, both between transmission of our approval to Trade and Commerce and the issue of an export permit, and between the issue of the permit and the completion of delivery. With your approval we would propose to discuss with Trade and Commerce the possibility of reducing the time covered by our approval and limiting it to a known period. Between the issue of the permit and the date of clearance through customs the Government has no direct contact with the transaction, and the latter date is limited only by the duration of the permit which now normally extends for one year from the date of issue. What we have in mind is that as a general rule permits should be valid only for a limited period (perhaps three or four months) from the date at which this Department grants its approval. Exporters would be asked to indicate the period they expect to require, and in particular cases of manufacture or reconditioning when the limited period suggested above is clearly insufficient, consideration could be given to issuing a permit of longer validity. If the time to complete delivery is likely to be too long, it might be decided to limit the initial permit to the standard period (of three or four months as suggested above) and require the exporter to re-apply for the necessary extension. Such a system would keep us far better informed than we are at present, and would ensure periodic review of outstanding orders.

10. It should be recalled that under the Act the Minister of Trade and Commerce "may amend, suspend, cancel or reinstate any permit ... issued ... under this Act." We are advised by Trade and Commerce, however, that to invoke this authority would be a very serious step indeed (with substantial financial consequences for the Canadian exporter) and that they would prefer to deal with this problem by means of tighter control procedures governing approval. I assume that we would also, from the point of view of our relations with the other countries concerned.

11. I should be grateful for any comments you may have, particularly on the proposal outlined in paragraph 9 above that we approach Trade and Commerce to try and reduce the time lag which can now develop between approval and delivery.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

My memorandum of January 19 on this subject was based on verbal requests from your office. Since it was prepared I have received Mr. McGill's memorandum† of the same date, and I shall attempt in this memorandum to deal with the questions he asks. I should make it clear from the outset that I am not able to give a complete answer to all of these questions.

Arming of Harvards for Egypt

2. I attach a copy of a report† on this subject which has been prepared by the Chief of the Air Staff for the information of his Minister. To the best of our knowledge the information in Air Marshal Slemon's report is accurate, and amounts to this: these aircraft were of a type which is intended for pilot training only, that they were not designed to carry armament although with substantial modifications they could be made capable of doing so, and that the particular aircraft in question were not in fact equipped with any armament or armament mountings. No items of armament have been released by the RCAF for export to Egypt, nor has any been requested of the RCAF.

3. While it does not appear in A/M Slemmon's report, we have been informed by the JIB that they have, with the assistance of an RCAF expert, checked through the lists of aircraft spare parts for which permits covering export to Egypt have been issued, and are satisfied that no items which could be used to arm Harvards are included.

History of the Harvards for Egypt

4. During the spring of 1955 the Trade Commissioner in Cairo reported to his Department that a representative of Canadair had held discussions with Egyptian authorities who wished to purchase military aircraft from Canada. The upshot of these discussions had been an Egyptian request to Canadair to provide quotations on 20 Orenda Sabre jets and/or on 20 Super Sabres, and to accept orders to provide 15 Harvard training aircraft. We were informed of this request, and sought the comments of the United States and United Kingdom governments. The United Kingdom replied that there was no objection to the export to Egypt of 15 Harvard T6G reconditioned aircraft, but that they did not want any modern aircraft in the hands of any Arab State or Israel. The United States authorities reported that they would offer no objection if Canada accepted an Egyptian order for five jet or super-jet aircraft, but would prefer it if the Egyptians could be satisfied with Orenda Sabres instead of super-jets. They did not comment directly on the matter of the Harvards, but the implication was clear that they had no objection to the export of this type of aircraft to Egypt.

5. At the same time the JIB was consulted, and reported in a letter dated July 18 that they had "no objection to the export of reconditioned Harvard trainers", while they opposed the release of modern jet aircraft to countries in the Middle East.

6. In a letter dated July 19 we informed the Department of Trade and Commerce that we were not able to give "a final view on the position which should be taken with respect to the proposal that Canada sell Sabre jets to Egypt." We stated, however, that we "would have no objection to the development of firm orders for 15 Harvard T6G reconditioned aircraft which, we understand, the Egyptians wish to purchase". This action followed your approval of the proposal to take this course recommended in our memorandum of July 8, 1955.¹⁴ Before making this recommendation we had been informed by telephone of the JIB position later confirmed in the letter of July 18 mentioned in my preceding paragraph. Our letter to Trade and Commerce is dated after that letter from JIB.

7. Our files show nothing further on this matter until the middle of October, when we received from Trade and Commerce the list of export permits for September recording the issue on September 8 of an export permit for these 15 Harvard aircraft. We have since been informed by telephone that the authority quoted in the Trade and Commerce file is our letter of July 19 which approved the development of firm orders but not specifically the issue of an export permit. This is no more than a technical departure from the established procedure, since our letter was tantamount to approval of the issue of an export permit and nothing occurred in the intervening period which would have altered our attitude. The incident does, however, draw attention to the desirability of tightening the procedures as suggested in my memorandum of January 19.

Survey of Requests for Arms from the Middle East

8. The annex to my memorandum of January 19 provides a summary of the export permits issued during 1954 and 1955 for shipment of military equipment to countries in the ¹⁴ Voir/See Volume 21, Document 548.

Middle East. We have not available the information covering actual shipments during this period, but we may assume that it corresponds with the permits issued if allowance is made for a time lag between the issue of permits and the completion of delivery. It is very difficult to compile data on the actual deliveries, since it involves detailed enquiries from the customs clearance ports or, alternatively, a thorough study of export statistics in which items of this nature are buried as inconspicuously as possible and not, of course, related to the corresponding export permits.

9. We are inevitably unable to present a complete report on requests which have not been followed through and approved, since such requests may take the form of enquiries to private firms which are not pursued further and never reported. To supplement the information on permits issued, which appears in the Table mentioned above, I am preparing a list of requests or enquiries which appear in our files but did not lead to the issue of an export permit. I hope to submit this list to you in the near future, and while there can be no assurance that it is complete, I am confident that it will indicate all the important items.

J. L[ÉGER]

P.S.:

I might offer an additional comment on the question of the military capability of the 15 Harvards.

The release of such aircraft — whether as pure pilot trainers or as machines with (very limited) military capabilities — would seem to be quite consistent with the statement¹⁵ which you made to the House on Tuesday covering the considerations governing the export of arms to the Middle East. It can scarcely be argued that such equipment would tend to disturb the stability of the Middle East or that its release to Egypt was improper unless it is maintained that the export of any military or semi-military items to any country in that area should be prohibited by Canada and presumably by all other western countries.

In the light of these considerations our approval of this transaction was not dependent on detailed knowledge of the particular version of Harvard in question. Enquiries from countries in the Middle East concerning the availability of modern combat aircraft, such as the F-86, have of course been treated as quite a different matter. Such enquiries have been received from both Israel and Egypt and have not been approved.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO SENSITIVE AREAS

I attach a table showing the amounts by countries of permits issued during 1954 and 1955 for the export of arms to sensitive areas. The total, as you will note, is just over five million dollars, while the total for the Middle East countries on which you have already reported to the House is just under three million dollars. Thus the figure for other sensitive areas is somewhat over two million dollars.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1956, Volume I, pp. 183-184.

(This differs from the figure given in my memorandum of January 27† because the Middle East figures used in that calculation for the over-all total contained the permits issued in 1954 for tank parts for Israel. Those permits, you will recall, were not used and were replaced in part by new permits issued in 1955. The Middle East figures which you gave the House did not include these unused permits, and the Middle East figures which were subtracted from the over-all total in my memorandum of January 27 were the same as those you used in the House. Thus the residual total obtained was about a million dollars too high. The figures now given have been corrected on this point.)

I should mention that the figures attached herewith are subject to the limitations given in my memorandum of January 27 commenting on the earlier figures. I attach a copy of that memorandum for convenience of reference.

I should add a word about the shipments to Indochina and Korea. At the time our Commission was settling in to its task there was a full review of the question of shipments to Indochina of military items, with full account taken of the provisions of the cease fire agreement. Those items which are prohibited are "arms and munitions, and other war material". A separate passage provides a definition of "other war material" as "combat aircraft, naval craft, pieces of ordnance, jet engines and jet weapons and armoured vehicles". It was our Commissioner's interpretation, supported by the Department, that items falling outside these categories were not prohibited. The items approved for release to Indochina have in fact consisted of maintenance parts for aircraft, tanks, trucks, jeeps and radios, and have all been examined prior to approval in the light of the considerations mentioned. The one item released for Korea was a radio transmitter, certainly not prohibited under the armistice agreement and possibly not a military item at all.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO SENSITIVE AREAS

In a separate memorandum† I have outlined an answer which might be given to the question asked by Mr. Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre) on this subject. There are two points connected with that answer which I would like to bring to your attention.

I have suggested that you should indicate the total value of permits as "just below 6 1/2 million dollars". There are two reasons for putting it this way, rather than naming a precise figure. For one thing, it is not always easy to define what constitutes military equipment, and there are borderline cases such as used military clothing which could raise or lower the total slightly depending on whether or not you include them. In the second place, the great majority of the permits (all in the case of Middle East countries) provide a maximum dollar value for the shipments to be released, but in a few cases the dollar value is not known and the maximum permissible shipments are shown only by the amount (by weight or number of units) of the item in question which may be exported. For what it is worth our total for the permits covering specified dollar values is about $6,332,000, subject to possible adjustment on the borderline cases as to whether or not they should be included. This figure excludes the shipments for which dollar values are not known, but there is little likelihood that they could be sufficient to raise the total over 6 1/2 million dollars. While there is no reason why these minor factors affecting the total cannot be revealed, I think that to do so might lead to further discussion; I would therefore recommend that the answer be limited to what is suggested in my earlier memorandum.

My second point concerns the position of India and Pakistan. The total for all areas is about 6 1/2 million dollars and for the Middle East is about 3 million dollars. Of the remaining 3 1/2 million dollars about $910,000 was for India and about $440,000 was for Pakistan. I think there would be serious objections to making public any details on this situation, but I thought you should have these facts available for your own information. (Incidentally, these amounts for India and Pakistan are very substantially lower than those which Ritchie had in mind when he guessed yesterday morning that the total for the 34 countries would be a much larger figure. He was basing himself on the size of the revolving credit — 5 or 6 million dollars — which Pakistan had maintained for arms purchases from Canada in 1952-53 when imports from Canada were apparently on a considerably larger scale than in the past two years.)

EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, with the conclusion of the debate in the House on foreign policy it would be advisable to lift the embargo on arms shipments to the Middle East. All cargoes destined for that area had been held up, but, in fact, they included only a very small amount of goods which could be regarded strictly as warlike materiel. If an affirmative decision — and such a decision should be explained — was not taken, it would be said that the Canadian government had been driven from a policy which it had been following for two years and which he considered sound. The alternative was to continue the embargo which, in practice, would mean an embargo against Israel only, because the Arab countries would continue to get arms from other sources. There were only one or two commitments which had not been fulfilled. These consisted of some spare parts and a small amount of electronic equipment the delivery of which had been held up, and some 25-pounder ammunition ordered by Israel but on which a decision had yet to be made.

5. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The sale of 25-pounder ammunition should be allowed. If it were not, this would be regarded as very unfriendly by the Jewish population of the country. However, the sale should not be approved until some time had elapsed after the lifting of the embargo, and after talks had been held with the U.K., the U.S., and France on Middle East problems.

(b) It might be said that the embargo was being lifted after consultation with our allies, in particular with the U.K. To this it was replied that the general policy on this matter was the government's responsibility and should not be determined as a result of discussions even with friendly countries.

6. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on shipments of arms to the Middle East, and agreed that the recently imposed embargo be lifted with effect from the time of announcement in the House of Commons,¹⁶ and that the authorization of export of 25-pounder ammunition to Israel be withheld until after the matter had been discussed with the United Kingdom and United States.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

It would appear desirable to review policies relating to applications for export permits to ship arms to the Middle East. Such a review seems useful, both in the light of the recent discussions of this matter in the House of Commons, and following the visit of United Kingdom Ministers to Washington and the discussions on this subject which they held there and subsequently reported to you.¹⁷

2. The Prime Minister has announced that the Government will continue to examine applications upon their merits in accordance with the general principles which have applied previously. In this context, it is important to take due account of the present policies of the U.K. and U.S. It is perhaps too early to judge how their policies, as agreed recently in Washington, will work out in practice, but it seems clear that no absolute embargo on shipments to either Israel or Egypt is intended. On the other hand, it is unlikely that either of those governments would be willing in the near future to release any substantial arms items to Egypt. The releases which they may be willing to make to Israel will probably be no greater and even possibly rather less than they have been. Neither the U.S. nor U.K. at this stage appears to be contemplating increased or accelerated releases to Israel to offset the recent Egyptian acquisitions (at least while attempts are being made to influence the Israelis to cooperate in a possible settlement).

3. Subject to review as U.K. and U.S. practice becomes clearer, I would suggest that the Canadian Government might deal with applications in future in accordance with the following criteria:

(a) no really large shipments of any item should be released for countries in the Middle East;

(b) moderate shipments of items clearly intended for repair or maintenance of existing stocks should be released unless there are particular considerations opposing such release;

(c) moderate amounts of the few weapons which can be identified as purely defensive should be released, subject again to special considerations which may warrant withholding release in particular cases; and

(d) offensive weapons should not be released.¹⁸

4. While I think these criteria may be useful, I should not expect that they could be readily applied without more detailed interpretation. Taking account of the general situation, I should imagine that the Government would wish to be even more cautious about releases to Egypt, Syria, or Saudi Arabia than about releases to Israel. Items intended only for maintenance of existing stocks are not always readily determined, and in cases of doubt it is probably desirable to be cautious. Even small shipments of ammunition, for example, which may be only enough for legitimate training purposes on any reasonable calculation of normal wastage, may in fact be used directly in military operations on arrival or be used for stock-piling if shipments of the same type sufficient for training requirements are being obtained from other sources at the same time. Purely defensive weapons are equally difficult to identify, but I think that some types of anti-aircraft gun with limited trajectories and some land-mines would probably fall into this category. For both these categories (i.e. defensive weapons and maintenance items) the advice of the Joint Intelligence Bureau will be of great importance.

5. You may consider it desirable for us to prepare a memorandum for Cabinet working out the suggestions above somewhat more carefully and in greater detail. On the other hand, you may wish us to carry on in accordance with existing procedures, taking account of the considerations outlined above and of any comments you may wish to add to them. In accordance with what has preceded, I might mention five particular cases that are now under consideration and suggest a decision for each of them; these are not the only Middle East applications on hand, but they provide a representative group.

(a) We have a request from Israel for $1200 worth of electronic equipment intended to service wireless sets of a type which the Israeli army is known to possess. The J.I.B. would have no objection to this export, and I think it would be difficult to refuse unless a policy of total embargo is intended. I therefore recommend that this application for a permit be approved.¹⁹

(b) Last summer Cabinet approved the release, at the rate of 60 guns per three months, of 600 30-calibre Browning machine guns ordered by Israel.²⁰ This decision would take effect beginning April 1st, 1956, following completion of delivery of the earlier order for 200 of these guns. The Israeli Government was informed of the decision to release the 600 guns and was also informed of the condition imposed by Cabinet that the decision might be reconsidered "if the situation should deteriorate seriously in the interval". It can safely be said that the situation has deteriorated seriously in the interval, although it would be more difficult to argue that this deterioration is solely or even primarily the fault of Israel. 600 of these guns is a fairly substantial quantity (even when spread over about 2 1/2 years), and they are of general as opposed to purely defensive use. While the J.I.B. does not believe that they would destroy the balance of strength in the Middle East (mainly because of the substantial armaments now being obtained by Egypt), it would be my own recommendation that the Government should invoke the escape clause included in last summer's decision and should now refuse to release these guns. The reason given to the Israelis could be the deterioration of the situation in the Middle East, but an additional reason would be the fact that these guns have an offensive capability and we are doubtful that their release can be justified in terms of replacement use.²¹

(c) Cabinet has not yet considered the application to release 1754 rounds of 25-pounder shot. The amount is small, probably justifiable in terms of normal training needs, but it is for use with a heavy weapon of offensive capability. I have suggested above that it might at present be desirable to resurrect the criterion that new weapons shipments be limited to defensive items, and while this does not directly cover ammunition, it may have some bearing. For this reason, and because there is some possibility that the U.S. and U.K. have agreed to "squeeze" Israel and might regard the release of this shipment as affecting such a squeeze, I would recommend that a decision be deferred and the U.S. and U.K. be consulted.²²

(d) You will recall that the Israelis have pressed you on several occasions to release their order for seventy 6-pounder anti-tank guns. As in the case of the Browning machine guns, this constitutes a fairly substantial order and these guns have a mixed offensive-defensive capability. Even prior to the Lake Tiberias incident and the recent discussions in Washington, both the U.K. and the U.S. had some misgivings about releasing these guns to Israel. In the present circumstances, I would recommend that they be not released.²³

(e) The Canadian Commercial Corporation has been asked if it can provide for the Israeli Government the drawings necessary for converting the River-class frigates now held by the Israeli Navy into anti-submarine vessels equipped with (i) squids, (ii) four 40-mm. anti-aircraft guns and (iii) Mark 19 twin four-inch dual-purpose guns. The drawings can be made available and it appears that there are no security objections to their release. The J.L.B. have pointed out that the proposed alterations to these vessels are not merely a matter of bolting a few guns to the deck surface but would involve something fairly close to major reconstruction of the hull. Thus, the process is likely to be considerably more expensive than the Israelis may suspect. These drawings are of Canadian origin, and the Israelis were advised by the U.K. to apply to us for them. The alterations which they would permit would as their major effect serve to increase the defensive and anti-submarine capabilities of the vessels in question, although the addition of four-inch dual-purpose guns might provide an increase in offensive fire power. By far the most important change, however, would be the addition of the squids, which I understand are solely an anti-submarine weapon. In the circumstances, I would recommend (subject to J.L.B. advice which has been requested but not yet received) that these drawings be released. The Israelis should be warned, if the drawings are delivered, that the alterations proposed are very far-reaching and expensive and that they should consider carefully whether it is advisable to proceed with them.²⁴

6. I should be grateful for your comments on the criteria which have been suggested above and on the recommendations made on the five particular cases.

7. You might also indicate whether for the time being you would wish us to suspend the previously established procedure and refer to you all applications for arms exports to the Middle East, regardless of size.²⁵

20. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he would no doubt be questioned soon on the last Israeli order for 25-pounder ammunition. He proposed to say, in reply, that shipment had been postponed until the discussions between the United States, the United Kingdom and France on security in the Middle East were concluded, and information about these talks was available to Canada. This corresponded with the position taken last fall when the middle east situation was before the U.N. General Assembly.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

In my memorandum of February 13th I suggested certain criteria which might be applied in future to applications for export permits to cover arms shipments to the Middle East. I went on to consider five particular applications now pending, and suggested decisions based on the criteria I had proposed. You commented on each of the five individual cases. Then at the end of the memorandum you indicated that you would wish to have all applications for arms exports to the Middle East, regardless of size, referred to you for approval at least for the present. You added a final comment that you would "take all these up at the next Cabinet".

2. I assume it is your intention to raise the general subject in Cabinet tomorrow morning and perhaps to obtain Cabinet approval for the decisions you have taken on the particular cases. I attach the memorandum of February 13th to which I have referred. I have set out below in condensed form a table listing the five particular applications mentioned and the recommended decisions; at the end of that table I have added the other applications for shipments to the Middle East which are now outstanding:

Outstanding Applications for Arms Shipments to the Middle East

6. Egypt—$2,335.10 worth of Harvard aircraft parts for the Egyptian air force. These parts are presumably intended for servicing Harvard aircraft already held by the Egyptian forces; JIB has informed us that Egypt has a number of Harvards quite apart from the 15 at present being shipped from Canada. JIB comments on this application have not yet been received but assuming that JIB has no objection, I recommend release of this order.

7. Lebanon—$956.92 worth of Harvard aircraft parts. Assuming JIB has no objection to this shipment, I would recommend that it also be released.

8. Israel—$136,361.59 worth of spare parts for Sherman M4 tanks. You will recall that a substantial order for tank parts for Israel was approved during 1954 but delivery did not take place during the validity of the permit. A new permit was approved in 1955 to cover most of the order originally placed in 1954 and deliveries have been proceeding under that new permit up to the present time. The permit has now expired, however, and delivery is not yet completed. This new application is intended to cover the unshipped balance of the order approved in 1955 and Trade and Commerce have satisfied themselves that no new items are included other than those for which approval was previously given. It is not surprising in an order of this size and diversity that delivery should take considerable time and I would recommend that approval be given for the release of this unshipped balance.

EXPORT OF 25 POUNDER AMMUNITION FOR ISRAEL

The Israeli Embassy has enquired several times recently about the order for 1754 rounds of 25 pounder shot. They are concerned, as a result of your announcement in the House that the Government had deferred a decision pending the outcome of the tripartite talks in Washington, lest what is described as a deferred decision on this and by implication on other items should in fact be a policy to impose a complete embargo by administrative delay. We have explained that there is no such decision on the part of the Government, either on this order or on the various others which are also outstanding.

You directed us to seek the views of the U.K. and U.S. governments concerning the proposed release of this ammunition. I attach copies of the replies† which have been received from Washington and London. You will notice that the U.K. authorities freely assent to the proposed release, while the U.S. authorities have had certain misgivings (which appear to us to relate more to U.S. domestic politics than to the merits of the case). The U.S. authorities have finally stated, however, that while in their present circumstances they would not themselves release this ammunition they see no objection to Canada's doing so.

It has been our own view throughout, and there is support for it in the U.K. and U.S. comments, that the proposed shipment is not of military importance. While the U.K. and U.S. are seeking to apply some "squeeze" on the Israelis in the matter of arms shipments, we have been informed that this does not extend to limited shipments of spares and maintenance and replacement parts. As a shipment of this size can properly be regarded as replacement for reasonable training needs, it would not appear to fall within the scope of the "squeeze".

To withhold this shipment would appear in Israeli eyes to imply a policy of almost complete embargo. This particular shipment has already been cleared once, and the Israelis so informed; to continue to withhold it now would be regarded by them as something like a breach of faith. For these various reasons, I recommend that you approve the release of this order, or alternatively that you seek the approval of Cabinet for its release. Should you decide to discuss the matter in Cabinet, it would be convenient if you could take up at the same time the other cases mentioned in my memorandum of February 22 and the criteria suggested in my memorandum of February 13. New applications continue to come in, and we are holding some six new cases in suspense pending an indication of your views on those two memoranda.

I attach for your convenience copies of the relevant telegrams from London and Washington (London: No. 219 of February 29, Washington: No. 310 of February 22, and No. 338 of February 27).²⁷

ARMS SHIPMENTS TO THE MIDDLE EAST
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE FEB. 3)

63. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that a ship had sailed from New York and would probably arrive in Halifax on Saturday, March 10th to take delivery of nine Harvard trainer aircraft, which represented the uncompleted portion of an order for Egypt. On Wednesday the Prime Minister had said in the House of Commons that a statement would be made when a decision had been reached as to whether or not the government should interfere with the completion of this order in the light of the situation in the Middle East.²⁸

There were two different problems; the shipment of the Harvard aircraft to Egypt, and the requests for arm shipments received from several other countries including Israel.

²⁷ Note marginale :Marginal Note:

I would like all outstanding arms applications to be put on the next Cabinet agenda L.B. P[earson]

²⁸ Voir Canada, Chambre des Communes, Débats, 1956, volume II, pp. 1939-1940.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1956, Volume II, pp. 1882-1883.

The Minister recommended that the Prime Minister make a statement in the House of Commons the following day announcing that the Canadian government had decided not to interfere with the shipment of the Harvard aircraft to Egypt and that two outstanding orders received from Israel should be approved if there had been an improvement in the Middle Eastern situation in the following week.

64. During the course of the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It might be desirable to postpone the decision on the Harvard aircraft until the ship had arrived in Halifax and to consider then how the situation in the Middle East had developed. It would be dangerous to make a decision immediately with the intention of announcing it only on Friday because the government would probably be asked that afternoon whether or not a decision had been made.

(b) Nothing short of an open conflict in the Middle East would justify the government in interfering with the shipment of the Harvard aircraft. This was the uncompleted portion of an order with a Canadian private company and had already been paid for. The Canadian government had always maintained that the trainers had no military value, but if war were declared, then all shipments to the areas involved in the conflict would be stopped.

(c) Orders for tank parts and for 25-pounder shells had been received from Israel and the order for tank parts authorized in 1954. A permit issued in 1955 had now expired and an application for a new one was now being made to cover the uncompleted portion of the order. To accept this application now would be inconsistent with the statement made by the Prime Minister that no new permit would be issued for this area until the situation had improved. Acceptance of the purchase order for 25-pounder shells, which were to come from government supplies, had not been approved by the Treasury Board but referred to the Cabinet for decision.

(d) From the point of view of public opinion in Canada, it might be preferable to apply the same decision to Israel's order for tank parts and to Egypt's order for Harvard aircraft.

(e) Consideration should be given as soon as possible to the outstanding orders for arm shipments to several countries and to the general policy that should apply on arms sales. It could be argued that such sales should be restricted to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and perhaps of the Commonwealth. However, it would be difficult to maintain a distinction between those countries and the others. Moreover, arms exports would help to strengthen the Canadian industry and what Canada would refuse to sell would be sold by other countries.

65. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on arms shipments to the Middle East and agreed:

(a) that the Canadian government should not interfere with the shipment to Egypt of the uncompleted order for Harvard aircraft;

(b) that the Prime Minister should make an announcement to that effect in the House of Commons either that day or on Friday, depending on the expected time of arrival in Halifax of the ship to load the Harvard trainers;²⁹ and,

(c) that the outstanding orders for arms shipments to other countries and the general policy on arms exports be considered at a subsequent meeting of Cabinet.

POSSIBLE CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN NEACC

In my memorandum of January 13³⁰ I reported the opportunity offered us to join the Near East Arms Coordinating Committee (NEACC) established some time ago by the United Kingdom, the United States and France and recently expanded to include Italy. I outlined at that time the considerations which had led us to defer any formal recommendation on whether or not Canada should join.

Recently Mr. Heeney has repeated to you his earlier suggestion that it would be to Canada's advantage to join, and has called this conversation to my attention in his telegram No. 318 of February 24† (attached). I understand that you incline to his view that it would be to our advantage to become a member.

I attach a copy of a departmental memorandum of November 30, 1955,³¹ in which the pros and cons were assessed and the conclusion reached that it would probably be better to defer a decision concerning Canadian membership, although there was a strong inclination on the part of officials against Canada joining. I believe that that conclusion was justified at that time, but that it should be reviewed in the light of recent developments.

Since that memorandum was prepared there have been public debates in the United Kingdom and the United States on the export of arms to the Middle East. Those debates, and report concerning French shipments to the area, suggest that NEACC has had limited success as an instrument for developing and applying among its members an agreed Middle East arms export policy. Perhaps the current review, which is almost completed and as one result has led to the accession of Italy and the informal invitation to Canada, will render it more effective. The NEACC reorganization, and this will presumably apply also to the Committee's activities when they are resumed upon completion of that reorganization, is however limited strictly to arms export policy matters. The three great powers have kept out of the NEACC framework their coincident Washington consultations on general Middle East policy. This example, and the addition of Italy to the membership, suggest that membership in NEACC might not provide as fruitful access to great power thinking on general Middle East problems as might earlier have appeared.

It is still my view that informal bilateral consultation with the United Kingdom and the United States such as we have at present, while perhaps not perfect, is sufficient for our needs on arms export policy. You may consider that it would be useful, in the public presentation of our arms export control policy, to be able to refer to formal arrangements for consultation. Nevertheless you are already able to refer, as you have done recently, to satisfactory informal arrangements. There is the additional point that too frequent public reference to a body such as NEACC would inevitably impair its effectiveness. Any increase in information which might be gained through membership in NEACC would, I suggest, be limited pretty closely to arms export matters, since I should imagine that we already get at least as good an insight into United Kingdom and United States thinking on more general Middle East problems as we would obtain in a committee in which France and Italy are members. On the other hand, with regard to the arms export problem itself, the membership still does not include such countries as Belgium, Sweden and Switzerland and thus the consultation obtained is not as complete as might be desirable.

³¹ Voir/See Volume 21, Document 546.

Thus I am still led to the conclusion that the advantages of membership would not, for us, be very important. What I would regard as the significant disadvantage still seems to me a real one, namely the risk of indirect commitment in possible great power responsibilities in the area. This risk may indeed have increased in recent weeks when the three powers have been giving active consideration to possible emergency action in the event of a serious outbreak such as might occur along the armistice lines or on the Jordan river. While it is true that the separation of the tripartite policy talks from the NEACC review lessens the likelihood of NEACC being used as an instrument for elaborating a policy of intervention, the increase in the possibility of such interventionist plans being worked out by the three powers seems to me to offset this.

I would still conclude that the risk of involuntary commitment more than outweighs the advantages of membership, but I recognize that the balance is close and a number of the factors on either side of the argument cannot be too accurately assessed. I should be grateful for your comments.³²

ISRAELI AMBASSADOR'S INTERVIEW WITH THE MINISTER

Mr. Comay came to see the Minister at 5 p.m. on Friday, March 9. He said that in view of the renewed discussion in the House on the export of arms to the Middle East he had come to inquire how matters stood with regard to current Israeli applications. He handed the Minister a list† (copy attached) of outstanding orders and requests.

2. Mr. Pearson informed the Israeli Ambassador that he intended to recommend to Cabinet that immediate approval should be given for the export of the 25 pounder shot and of two smaller items which did not appear on the Ambassador's list, i.e., a small amount of electronic equipment and specifications (drawings) for anti-submarine conversion of certain vessels. The Minister expressed the hope that once approval had been granted it would be possible to carry out exports quickly, so as to avoid publicity which might be embarrassing in the present political atmosphere. He did not believe that Cabinet would be disposed to approve the export of other items immediately but assured Mr. Comay that they

³² Note marginale /Marginal Note:

Your argument against joining but in favour of maintaining close contact with NEACC is impressive and I am willing to accept it. But we must make sure that the existing informal but close contact with Wash[ington], London & Paris is maintained on all arms shipment proposals for the Middle East. L.B. [Pearson] would be kept under review and he thought that some of them might be released in the future. Particular mention in this regard was made of Item 6, on the Israeli list — the 3.7 anti-aircraft guns. Mr. Pearson said he did not recall the details of this order but he would look into it.

3. Mr. Pearson drew Mr. Comay's attention to the position taken by the Prime Minister in the House on March 6, when he stressed the importance, in considering applications for permits, of whether "the situation in the Middle East seems to ease". He said he felt sure the Israeli Ambassador would realize that the Government would have to act, in considering arms application to the Middle East, within the spirit of this statement of the Prime Minister. Mr. Pearson related to this situation his own statement in the House on March 9, in which he said that "the situation seems to have eased somewhat". He pointed out that his recommendation for approval of the export of the 25 pounder shot would come before Cabinet in this context. Mr. Comay would understand, therefore, that if incidents should occur in Palestine, the Cabinet would have to determine whether the situation seemed to warrant further shipments.

4. Mr. Comay said that there had been a misunderstanding in the public mind in Israel and a certain amount of resentment because of the fact that the Harvard aircraft were released to Egypt, while shipments to Israel had been held up. Mr. Pearson replied that this was an unfortunate impression and that it was quite erroneous to believe that there had been any discrimination. Misunderstanding had been caused by the technical consideration that the Harvards had been released to Egypt before the recent renewal of discussions in the House on export of arms to the Middle East and had been cleared by Customs. In the case of the Harvards specific Government action would have been necessary to stop their shipment, while the Israeli arms applications now under review required Government action to clear them. Careful consideration had to be given to any current applications for arms exports to the Middle East because of the conditions in the area and because of public concern with them in this country. The Minister felt sure that Mr. Comay would appreciate the fact that Israel had received considerably more arms from Canada than had the Arab countries. Mr. Comay agreed and said that of course an embargo would be bad for Israel.

5. At the end of the interview Mr. Comay spoke in general terms about the position of Israel and the attitude of the West towards it. He hoped that Western nations would now make a practical reappraisal of their policy in the Middle East based on a realistic judgment of the actual value to the West of Israel and of the Arab countries. He also suggested that to ascribe Western difficulties with the Arab powers to the troubles caused by the establishment of the state of Israel was a superficial interpretation of events. He thought that the West would in any case have become embarrassed by an inevitable historic process of Arab nationalism and anti-colonialism. Mr. Pearson said that these issues would of course be a matter for close study at this time.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST; POLICY
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE MARCH 8)

20. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reviewed existing means of dealing with export permit applications for arms shipments to sensitive areas. In general, these appeared to be satisfactory but improvement of certain points was needed. There should, for example, be a more careful examination of permits in advance of shipping times. He proposed to submit a revised memorandum on the subject in the near future.

As regards the Middle East, he felt that no releases should be made to that area without the approval of the Cabinet, except for small amounts of under $2,500 which could be dealt with by the Ministers concerned. Of the outstanding applications he recommended that the 25-pounder ammunition for which an export permit had been issued, $1,200 worth of electronic equipment, and $137,000 worth of tank parts, the residue of an old order, be released to Israel. There were also two other orders from Israel, — one for 600 Browning machine guns and the other for 70 6-pounder anti-tank guns. Both types of equipment had an offensive capability and the quantities were appreciable. He therefore thought release should be deferred for the time being.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, March 15, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 67-56)†

21. Mr. Pearson added that, in his view, the greatest immediate danger in the Middle East could be a feeling of despair and frustration in Israel. Israelis knew they were getting weaker in comparison with their Arab neighbours, and a group felt they should forestall a defeat by provoking a conflict and taking action now. This feeling was making an impression in London and Washington, and the United States might, as a result soon release a substantial quantity of arms to Israel. Disturbing reports were being received about Russian activities. In addition to shipping ordinary arms to the Arabs, there was evidence that the Soviets were also sending sabotage material into Arab territories. It was known, too, that 200 Egyptians were being trained as "commandos" by the communists at Odynia in the Baltic.

A good deal of diplomatic activity was taking place in London, Paris, and Washington in an effort to produce a long-run political solution to the middle eastern problem. The U.S. was going to make a proposal to the Security Council. The proposal itself seemed to be a useful one, but if it was to be successful in the council the U.S. would be well-advised to consult the Russians first. At the moment this looked unlikely. The Russians were active in a large way in the Middle East now and springing a resolution on them in the Security Council without any warning might prejudice any chances of success.

On the question of arms for the Middle East the U.K. and U.S. had no intention of departing from their 1950 declaration. In the past Canada had consulted the U.K. and U.S. about shipments and had not received bad advice. A U.K.-U.S.-French committee was now considering policy in regard to that area and Canada had been asked to join. It seemed inadvisable to do so but Canada should continue to consult these countries.

22. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It could legitimately be said that the situation in the Middle East had eased temporarily. Ten days ago certain Arab troops were massing on the Israeli border and a number of unfortunate incidents had occurred. However, nothing untoward had happened and there had been no incidents in the meantime. From the long-run point of view, however, the situation remained serious.

(b) It was doubtful if a distinction could be made between the 25-pounder ammunition and the machine guns. However, it had been said that the shell order would remain under consideration until the situation had eased and this had, in a sense, happened. The machine gun application was not publicly known. The strongest cases could be made for the tank parts. Only a technical lapse of a permit prevented shipment. Although there were doubts about the 25-pounder shells, it would be a mistake to abandon help to Israel. Furthermore, Canada was probably the only source of supply for this kind of ammunition at the present time.

(c) The shipments proposed, even the one for electronic equipment, were really uncompleted transactions. The situation had eased somewhat and, if these could be cleaned up, there would be no embarrassment in the future except in the unhappy event of a war in the area. Any statement to be made should include a reference to all three items and precise details should be available in the event of questions.

23. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on arms exports to the Middle East and agreed,

(a) that 1754 rounds of 25-pounder ammunition, $1,200 worth of electronic equipment and $136,361 worth of tank parts (the residue of a large order), be released to Israel; an announcement to be made accordingly;

(b) that any issue of a permit to export 600 Browning machine guns and 70 6-pounder anti-tank guns to Israel be deferred, and reviewed in a few weeks time; and,

(c) that the general policy governing arms exports be brought up to date and considered at an early meeting.³³

EXPORT OF CANADIAN MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO THE MIDDLE EAST

I was glad to have received your telegram under reference yesterday, since Mr. Sharett raised the matter with me in the course of one of my periodic calls on him today to discuss general developments. The Foreign Minister said he had noted that Canada had recently released Harvard aircraft to Egypt, but that we were still withholding action on some Israeli requests. He then expressed the hope that we would be able to approve the shipment of Israeli orders in the near future. In view of the inference of discrimination, I reiterated the points made in your telegram, of which he was presumably already aware from the Israeli Ambassador in Ottawa. Sharett did not however seem over-impressed, which reflects, I think, the present mood of the Israeli Government. The authorities here are inclined to view any military equipment sent to an Arab State, regardless of how insignificant or the circumstances involved, as an accretion to the overall military potential of the Arab States and, therefore, as an increase in the security threat to this country.

2. It may well be that some people in Israel have drawn erroneous conclusions concerning the export of Harvard aircraft to Egypt, coming as it has during a period of emotional tension in Israel, and when Israeli requests for arms in the United States have not been making any headway. Each time the export of these Harvard aircraft was raised in the House of Commons it was reported briefly by the Israeli press. One report, unfortunately, added that Harvards can readily be armed and provided with bomb racks, which may have given some Israelis false ideas of the military value of this type of aircraft. However, the Minister's statement in the House of January 17 dealing with the supply of Harvard trainers to Egypt received front page coverage here. While that portion of the Minister's statement of January 24 dealing with arms exports received very little attention, and the further reference in it to the Harvard aircraft question was not carried by most newspapers, nevertheless the press did, as a whole, list the total quantities of military equipment for which Canada had issued export permits in 1954 and 1955 to Israel and Egypt respectively.

Cabinet did not discuss its general policy on arms exports during the period covered by this volume.

3. At no time have we seen any suggestion in the Israeli press that Canada has discriminated in any way in its arms export policy to the Middle East, or even in the matter of the release of the Harvard aircraft to Egypt. Nor have any newspapers so far tied these two questions together. While we would not doubt that some Israelis, for one reason or another, may not have a clear understanding of the situation, we have received no indication of public resentment having been created in Israel as a result.

4. Mr. Sharet's indirect linking of the export of aircraft to Egypt with Israeli arms applications at present under review in Canada was the first official indication of this nature that I have received from the Foreign Ministry. Since, however, he was unwilling to be very explicit, I rather suspect that he was choosing to suggest a possible misinterpretation in the hope that this might expedite Israel's current arms requests.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

I attach for your signature, if you approve, a letter to the Ambassador of Israel based on the Prime Minister's statement in the House on March 16³⁴ concerning the decision to approve the release of three arms orders for Israel. The letter goes on to identify the two applications mentioned by the Prime Minister on which decisions were "deferred", and to explain what this actually meant — namely, that a decision had been taken not to release the items in question at present.

The letter then gives an explanation of the present situation on two other applications for 40 mm. and 3.7" anti-aircraft guns. The Israeli authorities appear to believe that the 3.7" guns are being held up as a matter of policy, and you may consider it desirable to clear up this misunderstanding without, of course, making any binding commitment for the future.

Finally the letter refers to other outstanding export permit applications. The majority of these have been reported to you in earlier memoranda. I have set out these other applications in tabular form below, including four for shipments to Arab countries, with my recommendation in each case. I would suggest that in most cases the items are such that you might yourself decide on the course to be followed, but there are some (e.g. the Harvard parts for Arab countries) which you might wish to mention in Cabinet if you have not already done so.

A. Recommended for Approval

(In all these cases J.I.B. approval has been obtained, and the Divisions concerned see no objection).

1. $80 worth of radio crystal vibrators for Israel, for army wireless sets.³⁵
2. $2,730 worth of spare parts for C-47 civilian passenger aircraft to go to the Arabian American Oil Company in Saudi Arabia.³⁶
3. $60 worth of aircraft engine parts for Israel.³⁷
4. $260 worth of aircraft engine parts for Israel.³⁸
5. $280 worth of aircraft engine parts for Israel.³⁹
6. Quotations to be provided by the Canadian Commercial Corporation to the Government of Israel on 500 chests for .30 calibre machine gun ammunition belts and 500 belts for such ammunition.⁴⁰

B. Recommended for Approval if J.I.B. Concurrence is Obtained (J.I.B. comments have not yet been received, but the Divisions concerned see no objection.)

1. $750 worth of Chipmunk aircraft non-military spares, reported by de Havilland on the application to be for use in maintenance of Chipmunk aircraft exported under permit in 1951 to the Egyptian army.⁴¹
2. $2500 worth of aircraft engine parts for Israel.⁴²

C. Recommended for Deferment (i.e. not to be released at present)

1. $956.92 worth of Harvard aircraft parts for Lebanon. There is no technical objection to the release of these parts, which appear to be entirely of a non-armament character, but in view of the fact that they are for military training aircraft I understand you prefer not to approve their release at present.

2. $2,335.10 worth of Harvard aircraft parts for Egypt. (See comment under C 1 above).

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

I should be grateful for your views on twelve applications for arms export permits for shipments to the Middle East. I have outlined each of these cases below, and I attach a tabular summary.†

I should like first to mention three for Israel, none of which has been brought to your attention previously.

(1) Three cases of Packard Merlin aircraft engine parts, valued at $3000. There is no objection on the part of National Defence, and as these are non-armament parts presumably intended for the routine maintenance of present aircraft holdings I recommend that the application be approved.⁴³

(2) 190 "Aerial Bases" valued at a total of $104.50. I am informed that these are bases or sockets for mounting aerials for No. 19 army radio sets. National Defence has no objection, and I recommend that this application be approved.⁴⁴

(3) 50 transformers and rectifiers, valued at a total of $237.50. These are suitable for the conversion of a standard 110 volt alternating current power supply to direct current, presumably to power electronic (communications) equipment of some sort. National Defence has no objection, and I recommend that this application also be approved.⁴⁵

The next two applications were discussed in my memorandum of March 19. They are for the shipment of Harvard aircraft parts, $956.62 worth to Lebanon and $2,335.10 worth to Egypt. In my earlier memorandum I recommended that these applications be deferred (i.e. not approved at that time); you made no comment on that recommendation, and we have taken no further action. The supplier has in the meantime enquired of Trade and Commerce when he may expect an answer. Is it still your wish that a definite decision should be deferred on these two applications?⁴⁶

Three different permits for shipment of Harvard aircraft parts to Egypt are now expiring. The original permits, which we approved on May 13, November 2 and December 1, 1955, covered amounts of $81,657.00, $245.00 and $2,426.00 respectively. These permits expire May 18, May 4 and June 2 respectively (all were originally issued for six months but the first one was extended for a further six months when it came due for expiry on November 18). The unshipped balances are $14,073.74, $74.59, and $838.00 respectively, and no ship is available to take these residual quantities until June 10. We have therefore been asked if we are prepared to agree to the extension of all of these permits until about June 12 or June 15 in order that deliveries may be completed. It is my own view that we should not intervene in such a way as to prevent the completion of delivery on these orders since the fact would probably become known and could be represented as implying serious concern about the military capabilities of Harvard aircraft.⁴⁷

There is an application for a permit to export, to a UK firm for re-export to the Egyptian Ministry of War, $5,620 worth of spare parts for Staghound trucks. These appear from the list to be entirely non-armament maintenance parts, but the application states that they are "for use on military vehicles". National Defence has no objection, and I see no reason why approval of this application should not be given.⁴⁸

On the final three applications we are awaiting comments from National Defence. One is for $1,400 worth of (brass or copper) forging rod for the Israeli Ministry of Defence; we assume this material could be used for the manufacture of cartridge cases. If National Defence has no objection, I would recommend that this application be approved.⁴⁹

Another application is for $975 worth of aircraft engine parts for Egypt. These are for the model engine used in the Harvard, and are presumably intended for use with that aircraft. We have been informed that this engine is not suitable for use in any heavier or more powerful aircraft. As in the case of the Harvard parts orders for Egypt and Lebanon mentioned earlier, there is no objection to release at the official level.⁵⁰

Finally, there is an application for $608.56 worth of Harvard parts for Saudi Arabia. In view of the Saudi Arabian Government's mischievous and irresponsible behaviour, particularly in stirring up trouble with the UK, I recommend that action on this application be indefinitely deferred.⁵¹ On the other hand, you will be aware that the U.S. is considering the release of some military equipment to Saudi Arabia in the near future despite this consideration.

Ottawa, July 25, 1956

EXPORT OF MILITARY AIRCRAFT

From time to time, and more frequently in recent months, especially from South America, we have received enquiries from foreign governments concerning possible sales of military aircraft.⁵² Apart altogether from cases which obviously raise important political considerations, such as the Israeli request for F-86's, we have been disposed to deal with such enquiries very cautiously. I believe that this is desirable, since sales of modern jet aircraft have a dramatic quality and it is therefore important to weigh the consequences carefully before deciding to proceed.

Perhaps it is time, however, to examine this question as a general policy matter and without reference to any particular case, in order to determine as precisely as possible exactly what the Government's attitude is. There has I think been some tendency to regard requests for modern aircraft with some suspicion, more or less from the point of view that such sales are likely to be undesirable unless there are particular and special advantages in an individual case. It might be argued on the other hand that such sales are in fact desirable unless there are specific and particular objections in individual cases. There should of course, be as careful scrutiny of each individual case as in the past, but perhaps there should be a more precise understanding of the factors which are likely to be regarded as sufficient reason to refuse a sale and a recognition that in the absence of such factors a proposed sale is likely to be approved.

I might review briefly the arguments in favour of such sales. First there is the obvious commercial gain in selling abroad good and valuable products of Canadian industry. Related to this purely commercial consideration is an economic one of perhaps greater importance, concerning our aircraft industry itself. The domestic Canadian requirement is not likely to be sufficient to maintain the industry on an economic basis. To design and bring into production a modern aircraft is very costly, and a substantial volume of production is necessary before it is worth while. The limited Canadian demand can of course be supplemented by giving away aircraft, for example as NATO Mutual Aid, but this produces no direct economic return and thus does not directly offset the cost to Canada. To sell a moderate number of our aircraft would make it far easier to maintain the industry as an up-to-date production facility. In particular it would assist in carrying it over the transition period between the fulfilment of Canadian requirements for a particular aircraft and the coming into production of its successor, a period which now involves problems of unemployment and loss of skilled personnel. The industry, in other words, now tends to operate on a cycle tied to each new type of aircraft, and the development of foreign markets (especially in less advanced countries where aircraft becoming obsolescent by Canadian standards would still be in demand) could be most valuable in helping to smooth out the peaks and valleys of this cyclical process.

⁵² Voir Volume 23, Chapitre 5, 1^{re} partie.
See Volume 23, Chapter 5, Part 1.

As for the political factors, and leaving aside for the moment the question of sales to "sensitive" areas which will be mentioned below, it seems to me that there are both advantages and disadvantages. No doubt such sales to underdeveloped areas which might better use their limited resources for constructive social and economic purposes have undesirable aspects, but the fact remains that whether such countries will spend their money on military aircraft or on such things as hydro projects is not going to be settled by Canada's attitude to the sale of aircraft. For better or for worse, the South American countries (for example) are busily buying aircraft wherever they can get them. Many of these countries have already invested fairly substantially in U.K. and U.S. aircraft, and are looking for more. Some even appear to be considering purchases, which would no doubt be on favourable terms, from the U.S.S.R. In these circumstances it would seem to me that there would be real political and economic advantages in accepting in appropriate cases the role of supplier of such equipment.

At the same time we should, I think, continue to be as conscious as we have been of the particular factors relating to an individual case which might make it undesirable to proceed. Very briefly, I should expect that a proposed sale would be undesirable (a) if it seemed likely to give rise to a significant increase in international or domestic tension, or to lead to an outbreak of violence, (b) if it would appear to threaten the position, domestically or abroad, of a government with which we have friendly relations. (c) if there were over-riding technical difficulties arising from such factors as security. But I would suggest that the objections to a sale should be explicit; the mere fact that an area is considered "sensitive" need not preclude a sale of military aircraft.⁵³

EXPORT OF VEHICLE PARTS TO ISRAEL

I attach for your consideration a memorandum of August 7, submitted to Mr. Martin in your absence, concerning an application for a permit to export to Israel $38,498.17 worth of spare parts for military vehicles. While there was no significant objection to the proposed shipment in itself, the pattern which would govern military shipments in general for the Middle East was at that time much in question. Mr. Martin, I think wisely, considered it best to delay a decision on the application.

In the intervening three weeks it has become apparent that what might be termed routine arms shipments to Israel (i.e. those which have been permitted in preceding months) are being released by the various western governments. As this shipment would clearly fall in that category I see no reason to delay further and recommend that the application be now approved.

EXPORT OF VEHICLE PARTS TO ISRAEL

Recently you approved the issue of an export permit to cover the shipment to Israel of a substantial quantity (about $379,000 worth) of spare parts for "Commercial type vehicles". In the memorandum† describing that application, I mentioned another application (on which we had not yet received a report from National Defence) for a permit to ship $38,498.17 worth of spare parts for military vehicles.

National Defence has now reported that they have no objection to the proposed shipment. You will recall, however, that it had been pointed out in our own Department that these spares were to service vehicles of a type suitable for border raiding. In view of indications that Israel may be undertaking a more aggressive border policy, there might be some advantage in delaying approval of this order. On the other hand, this amount of spare parts is not large enough to have any very significant effect; it includes a wide variety of items, in quantities of the order of 5 or 10 up to 100, and presumably is intended for routine maintenance rather than the rehabilitation of presently inactive vehicles. You may therefore consider it unnecessary to delay the release.

I should be grateful for your guidance.⁵⁶

STATISTICS ON ARMS EXPORTS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

You reported to Parliament on January 24 last year on the dollar value and content of military equipment orders for the Middle East for which export permits had been issued during 1954 and 1955. You might wish to bring that report up-to-date along the following lines:

"On January 24 of this year I informed the House (Hansard, pp. 465 and 466) that in 1954 permits for military shipments to Israel had been approved to the value of $735,574.60; for Egypt $296.00; and for all other Arab states, none. For 1955 the figures were, for Israel $1,332,110.59; for Egypt $770,825.00; for all other Arab states, $70.00. At that time I gave the House an indication of the kinds of items contained in these totals.

"From January 1 to November 21 of this year permits to cover shipments of military equipment to the various governments in the Middle East were approved to the following values: for Egypt, $22,753.00; for Israel, $3,193,665.00; for Lebanon, $957.00; for all other Arab States, none.

"At this point I should like to mention that the closing date I have given for these figures, namely November 21, is purely nominal since the Government has issued no new permits for arms shipments to the Middle East since the Israeli move against Egypt on October 28, and at that same time took action to hold up all shipments under permits previously issued to permit a case-by-case study of each proposed shipment in the light of the latest information concerning the situation in the Middle East.

"Now I should like to indicate the kind of items covered by these permits, and what has happened to them. The total for Egypt of $22,753.00 consisted of permits for spares for commercial and trainer aircraft and for trucks; there were seven permits in all, the largest to cover an order for $12,190 worth of aircraft spares. The latest of these permits was issued on June 14, and the only permit still in effect at the time of the Israeli attack covered $5,620 worth of truck spares on which no shipments have so far been made. In the case of some of the other permits the actual orders delivered were somewhat less in value than the permits authorized, with the result that the total value of military equipment shipped to Egypt this year as reported by the export control authorities has been some $16,619.47.

⁵⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
I would delay P[aul] M[artin]

"Of the total for Israel of $3,193,665.00, $2,600,000.00 covered the first eight F-86 aircraft from the total of 24 of which the release was approved by the Government on September 21 and suspended on October 29; none of these aircraft has been shipped. The remaining permits for Israel, totalling $593,665.00, covered orders for tank and vehicle spares, aircraft spares, electronic equipment, and 25-pounder shot. The value of the material shipped on this last order, which was reported to the House at the time, was $30,099.00. There were some fourteen small orders, totalling $9,777.00, consisting of vehicle and aircraft spares and electronic equipment. Finally, the total for Israel included two orders for military vehicle spares of $136,362.00 and $38,498.00, and an order for spares for vehicles of commercial type (i.e., trucks, etc.) of $378,929.00. On these last three orders deliveries up to the suspension of shipments on October 29 totalled $171,465.00; on the fourteen small orders $4,836.33. Hence the total value of actual shipments to Israel this year has been $206,400.33 consisting of an order of 25-pounder shot, some electronic equipment, and various orders for aircraft spares and military and commercial vehicle spares.

"The figure of $957.00 for Lebanon related to a single order for trainer-aircraft parts of which delivery was completed on June 26.

"To summarize what I have reported, Mr. Speaker, permits have been approved this year for shipments of military equipment to Egypt totalling $22,753.00 of which $16,619.47 has been delivered; shipments to Israel totalling $3,193,665.00 of which $206,400.33 has been delivered; and a shipment to Lebanon of $957.00 which has been delivered. No permits for such shipments to other Arab Governments have been issued. No new permits for military equipment have been issued, and no shipments under existing permits have gone forward since October 29."

MEASURES TAKEN FOLLOWING THE ISRAELI ATTACK ON EGYPT

Within hours of the news of Israel's action, we first on your instructions verified that none of the F-86's of which release to Israel had been approved on September 20 was in a condition for shipment. The manufacturer was at that time informed that export of these aircraft would not be permitted.⁵⁷ Instructions to this effect were immediately transmitted to the customs control authorities. Subsequently on November 9 the permit which had been issued for the first eight of the 24 aircraft was formally suspended, and it will expire unused on December 5 (unless, of course, the suspension should be raised in the meantime.)

Having ensured that none of the F-86's for Israel had left Canada and that none would do so, we then had instructions sent to the control authorities not to clear any shipment of military equipment on an existing permit for any of ten Middle Eastern countries without a case-by-case check with Ottawa. The ten countries were Israel and nine Arab states (Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Libya, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen). About an hour and a half later (as an illustration of the effectiveness of the control machinery), we were asked for instructions concerning a proposed shipment of $250.00 worth of commercial vehicle parts under a larger order for the Israeli Ministry of Defence. On your instruction we informed the control authorities that this should be regarded as an arms shipment and not allowed to go forward.

The following day we informed Trade and Commerce that no new permits should be issued until further notice for arms shipments to any of the ten countries; Trade and Commerce had, of course, temporarily suspended the issue of permits immediately upon receipt of the news of Israel's action to obtain guidance from this Department. We explained that while no economic blockade was intended, and we did not wish to interfere with normal commercial transactions, there might be shipments proposed which could be of military significance even if they did not fall technically within the category of military equipment. We asked to be consulted on such cases, both in relation to shipments under existing permits and in connection with applications for new permits. We have in fact been consulted on several such cases, but have not considered any of them to be of a nature which would justify us in recommending that they be refused.

In summary, the issue of new permits for arms shipments to the Middle East was suspended immediately following the Israeli attack, and arrangements were made to hold up any such shipments under existing permits for review by this Department. As the two or three cases referred to us for permission to continue shipments under existing permits have all been refused, this has amounted in fact to a complete suspension of all arms shipments to governments of the Middle East. We are being consulted on non-military shipments which might be of strategic significance, but no case of this sort has so far appeared which in our judgment justified interference. It is assumed that this situation will continue until the Government determines a new policy relating to Middle East arms exports, in the light of the new situation in that area.

CONTROLS ON ARMS EXPORTS TO MIDDLE EASTERN COUNTRIES

During December we were approached by Trade and Commerce concerning certain applications for export permits which were being held up as a result of the suspension of arms shipments to the Middle East. They were to cover the shipment to U.S.-controlled oil companies (Aramco and Mobiloil) in Saudi Arabia and Libya of Beaver aircraft or spares for Beavers previously purchased. These aircraft are used by the companies for liaison and for patrolling pipe lines.

Trade and Commerce were disturbed on two counts. They felt that such shipments would in no sense constitute the supply of arms — might even be directly beneficial in helping to maintain oil supplies — and should not be regarded as falling under the suspension. Moreover, the special controls applied by the U.S.A. following the Israeli attack were more selective than our own, applying fully only to arms shipments proper and to Egypt, Israel and Syria. Hence shipments of the type in question continued to move freely from the U.S.A., and Canadian suppliers were learning of this and shipping through U.S.A. intermediaries for export to whom no permit is required if they are represented as the final consignee.

We agreed to review the terms of our special controls, with a view to determining whether they could properly be made more selective so as to permit consideration of such marginal cases. We consulted London, Paris and Washington to obtain more detailed accounts than we had available of the policies being followed by those three governments.

Before replies [on December 13] were received Mr. Howe in your absence raised in Cabinet the particular cases mentioned in my first paragraph above, of which there were five on hand at the time. While we were not asked to support Mr. Howe's recommendation, we would have been prepared to do so; the cases on hand were all approved by Cabinet. Later we received two more similar applications, both very small; one was for $1,000 worth of Beaver spares and the other for the return of a Beaver engine valued at $3,000 which had been sent to Canada for overhaul. Regarding the earlier Cabinet decision as an adequate precedent, I approved those two applications.

I now recommend that Trade and Commerce be informed that we are prepared to consider applications of certain specified categories which we have hitherto regarded as subject to the general suspension. Explicitly, we could agree to consider applications for permits to ship items within Group 8 of the export control list but not constituting weapons, ammunition or implements of war to the Middle East in general, and applications for permits to ship any Group 8 items to Middle East countries other than Egypt, Israel or Syria.⁵⁸ I do not suggest that we would necessarily wish to approve such applications, but merely to consider them. This would permit us to deal with applications for civil aircraft or spares and for spares for civil or transport vehicles (but not spares for fighting vehicles) destined either for Middle Eastern governments or for reputable private concerns in the area, and for arms shipments to countries such as Lebanon and Iraq where it might be in our interest to allow the shipments to go forward.

This course would bring us very closely in line with the policies which the U.S.A. has followed since the Israeli attack and is continuing to follow. It would also correspond to the selective approach being used by France and the U.K., although special interests of those governments (e.g. the U.K. treaty with Jordan and its membership in the Baghdad Pact, and the severance of relations with France by all Arab countries other than Lebanon) introduce variations. The change in administrative procedure would be purely a domestic one within this Department, and in no way in conflict either with the Government's public

EXPORT OF ALUMINUM INGOTS TO ISRAEL

Following for the Minister:⁶⁰ We have been approached by Trade and Commerce concerning two small orders for aluminum ingots to Israel on which at our request they are withholding the issuance of export permits. On an earlier case involving sale of 250 tons of aluminum ingots to the Egyptian Ministry of Defence, ostensibly for civilian use, we had advised withholding of permit on grounds that minor military end use was possible and that it was unlikely Egyptian authorities would make foreign exchange available for purely civilian purchases of this kind. Unlike Egyptian order, which is first of this kind to aluminum company, Israeli orders, for 32 and 15 tons respectively, are from two private companies which have done business before with Alcan.

2. In your absence the Under-Secretary agreed that it would be undesirable to appear to discriminate in favour of Israel and that since ingots were capable of military end use, even if minor, we should recommend against issuance of permit for either Israel or Egypt. Israeli Embassy have now approached Trade and Commerce requesting release of shipment and Mr. Howe has indicated strongly that since the potential buyers are established customers, this should be regarded as a legitimate commercial transaction. Mr. Howe has also expressed opinion that we should avoid any appearance of imposing unofficial economic sanctions against Israel and fears that question may be asked in House.

3. On strictly strategic grounds we doubt that we would be justified in withholding shipment to Israel but are somewhat worried about implications of any appearance of discrimination against Egypt. May we have your views?⁶¹

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

We have on hand an application from Levy Auto Parts, Limited, for a permit to export to the Israeli Ministry of Defence $750,000.00 worth of spare parts "for the overhaul and maintenance of 100 Sherman tanks".

2. The round figure suggests that the supplying firm is really seeking a "hunting licence"; in other words, that if they are granted a permit they will then invite the Israeli authorities to make up from items available an order totalling approximately this amount. Nevertheless there is no direct evidence to this effect, and the application is accompanied by (incomplete) lists purporting to constitute the proposed shipment. If there were clear evidence that the company had not yet received a firm specific order, Trade and Commerce would reject the application on procedural grounds regardless of destination. Lacking such evidence, however, and in view of the direct statement that the items proposed for shipment would be for military use (hence rendering the absence of detail less relevant), they would prefer not to do so in this case. They assume that we will oppose the shipment on political grounds, and are awaiting word to this effect to serve as the basis for their rejection of the application.

3. I understand that you would not wish any such shipment to proceed either to Egypt or to Israel at present, and that this is based upon assessment of the general political situation relating to the Middle East rather than upon the possibility that the arms embargo imposed by the U.N. Resolution of November 2 might be considered to be still in force after Israeli withdrawal. I therefore assume that you would wish us to inform Trade and Commerce that you would not wish a permit to be issued for this or any similar major military shipment consigned to either Israel or Egypt at present, that this position is likely to continue until such time as there may be a significant relaxation of tension and a real improvement of the political climate in the Middle East, and that there is at present no means of knowing how soon such a change might be expected to take place. I should be grateful for confirmation that it is appropriate to write to Trade and Commerce along these lines.⁶³

4. I should add that in bringing this case to your attention I had in mind that in due course it will be necessary to determine a more general policy governing shipments to the Middle East. In this connection Trade and Commerce have recently rejected a somewhat similar application from the same firm, for a permit to ship to Israel $1,000,000 worth of spare parts "for commercial type vehicles". This was not accompanied by any list of items, and was originally for shipment to the Israeli Ministry of Defence. When Trade and Commerce pointed out that a shipment of this size to a Defence Ministry could scarcely be regarded as intended for commercial use, the firm withdrew the application and re-submitted it with the consignee now shown as the Israeli Department of Public Works. The whole affair was by this time so patently unsatisfactory that Trade and Commerce rejected the application purely on procedural grounds and without seeking a political judgment from us. While the matter is thus settled for the present without our being involved, we may expect to be consulted about similar para-military orders where the applications are technically in order and where a political decision will be necessary. Any preliminary views which you may have, prior to our receipt of individual applications, would be most helpful as guidance for us in our conversations with officials of Trade and Commerce.

EXPORTS TO THE MIDDLE-EAST

Under this general heading there are a number of cases which I should bring to your attention.

A first item is a letter from Mr. Comay, sent to you just before his departure from Ottawa, listing certain Israeli applications for arms purchases which are at present outstanding. The list included,

- (a) A recent application for 750,000 dollars worth of tank spares.
- (b) The large order for .30 caliber browning machine guns which was suspended last year.
- (c) An order of spare parts for 3.7 anti-aircraft guns.
- (d) Spare parts for 25-pounder field guns.
- (e) Three specimens of a carrier telephone terminal model F-1450.

To this list we might add two new applications just received, one for shipment to the Government of Israel of $54,380.50 worth of tank spares, and the other for ten heavy trucks with trailers. (Although in the latter case the applicant alleges that they are for civil construction use, the manufacturer says they were built to U.S. Army specification as tank transporters and have never been sold for civil use.) All of these items should presumably be considered as directly military.

During your absence from Ottawa we acknowledged receipt of Mr. Comay's letter and explained to the Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Erell, that you had asked to have it examined by the competent authorities and would no doubt be replying in due course. Mr. Erell telephoned this week to ask what progress was being made. He stated that Mr. Comay prior to his departure had decided to speak to you about these matters but not to write unless he concluded from the discussion that you were now disposed to release the arms in question. His letter to you was allegedly based on the impression that you would receive it favourably.

It was my own understanding that prior to your departure from Ottawa you were not disposed in present circumstances to release any clearly military shipments to either Israel or Egypt. Since then you have had discussions with the heads of our Middle Eastern Missions.

Although the items mentioned above should be regarded as military, some are undoubtedly of greater political and strategic importance than others and it might be possible to make valid distinctions among them. I should be grateful for confirmation that you would not wish these shipments to go forward at present, or alternatively for an indication of your present views on this type of shipment.⁶⁴

In addition to such military items, we have on hand a number of applications apparently not of real military significance. These applications are for permits to cover shipments, all to Israel, as follows:

- (a) 8,000 automotive ball and roller bearings valued at $9,400.00 to be consigned to a private firm in Tel Aviv.
- (b) $1,312.50 worth of spare parts for International Harvester trucks.
- (c) $531.20 worth of G.M.C. trucks spares.
- (d) 100 Dodge cable and chain assemblies valued at a total of $600.00
- (e) $85 worth of aircraft engine parts.

On item (a), the Joint Intelligence Bureau has informed us that the bearings are of general application, not limited to or primarily suitable for military use; National Defence see no objection to the proposed shipment. Our own divisions concerned would be disposed to favour release of this order.⁶⁵

For (b), (c) and (d) above, National Defence similarly sees no objection.⁶⁶ These items do not appear to be of military importance, could probably be obtained readily from other countries and would not appear to raise problems relating to the U.N. arms embargo resolution of November 2, 1956. It might be considered that to refuse release of these items could contribute to the recent and in some respects undesirable reliance of the Israeli Government on supplies from France. The items, however, are consigned to the Ministry of Defence of Israel and are undoubtedly intended for the maintenance of military transport vehicles; the cable and chain assemblies may be intended for towing combat vehicles. There are no important commercial reasons to approve these shipments, and if they were to be approved they might be followed by larger orders which could cause some embarrassment. Other arguments, both pro and con, could well be adduced, but it is difficult to find a clear cut recommendation on such small orders. In the absence of a compelling argument against release, I wonder whether you would be prepared to let the shipments go forward or on the contrary would consider that a principle is involved.

⁶⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

Le Ministère a découvert par la suite que les « heavy trucks with trailers » ont effectivement servi à transporter du matériel de construction. Comme rien ne prouvait qu'il serait fait un usage militaire de ces camions en Israël, Pearson a consenti à délivrer une licence d'exportation. Jules Léger, Mémoire au Ministre, 13 mai 1957, MAE 50000-A-40.

The Department subsequently discovered that the "heavy trucks with trailers" were indeed used to haul construction equipment. In the absence of any evidence that they were to be used for military purposes in Israel, Pearson agreed to issue an export permit. Jules Léger, Memorandum for the Minister, May 13, 1957, DEA 50000-A-40.

Finally, on item (e) above, such small quantities of aircraft parts not identifiable as intended for military use would appear to create no particular problem. I recommend that item (e) be approved for release.⁶⁷

Trade and Commerce have written to us about the particular problem relating to the export of de Havilland civil aircraft and spare parts for them. Such aircraft are not now included in the arms section of the control list, but Trade and Commerce have continued up to the present to consult us about applications for shipment of them to the Middle East. It has been observed that the oil companies represent perhaps the most important foreign market served by this company through the supply of Beaver and Otter aircraft. These oil companies, in most cases with head offices in the United States, and with excellent credit ratings, can be most reliable customers. Satisfactory performance and maintenance of equipment in any one market is the best assurance of continuing sales to other branches, sometimes involving several different countries, of the same international concern. De Havilland find themselves handicapped through inability to give a quick decision on enquiries and to assure prompt maintenance service as required.

While recognizing the political problems relating to the export of aircraft to the Middle East, even those designed for civil use, Trade and Commerce have asked whether some formula cannot be found to facilitate prompt decisions on enquiries which this important Canadian industry is able to develop. They have suggested that the following criteria might be considered:

- (a) orders for more than three or four aircraft should be regarded as unusual and be the subject of special consultation.
- (b) The consignee should be a known private commercial organization controlled in the United States or the United Kingdom.
- (c) Orders requiring unusual equipment, or alterations of the standard models, which might involve military or political considerations should be regarded as special cases subject to consultation.
- (d) The use intended by the consignee should be the normal purposes for which these aircraft are designed, e.g., aerial survey work or patrolling of pipe lines.

Trade and Commerce has suggested that exports of civil aircraft covered by (b) and (d) above, and not involving special considerations such as (a) and (c), should not be expected to raise any political or military complication. They have accordingly proposed that in such cases they may issue permits without consulting us to cover shipment of aircraft or spare parts for them consigned to the Middle East as they now do for other less sensitive parts of the world. They would inform us of the issue of such permits and of the expiry dates involved, and have pointed out that such permits like all others would be subject to immediate suspension or cancellation in case of emergency. They would of course continue to consult us on any cases raising special considerations such as those mentioned in (a) and (c) above.

Upon reflection I have come to the conclusion that the proposal put forward by Trade and Commerce is not unreasonable and might well be accepted.⁶⁸ It is true that there would be some marginal risk of shipments being approved which could lead to trouble that might have been avoided had this department been consulted in advance. On the other hand, I

⁶⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
Yes [L.B. Pearson]

⁶⁸ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
I agree [L.B. Pearson]

believe this risk is more academic than real and against it must be set the delay which prior consultation with this Department involves, the consequent handicap in commercial competition imposed upon a responsible and important Canadian firm and the increased opportunity for minor irritation to arise between this Department and Trade and Commerce in the administration of export controls. In the light of these considerations, I recommend that we write to Trade and Commerce accepting their proposals in suitably discreet terms.

Within the general context of this question of de Havilland Aircraft exports, a particular case has been brought to our attention. Trade and Commerce have learned that de Havilland expect in the next few weeks to apply for a permit to export one of these aircraft for use, by the Atlantic Refineries Corporation of Dallas Texas, on oil survey work which this firm hopes to undertake in Syria. To avoid paying United States import duty the firm will wish to ship the aircraft direct to Syria. De Havilland have explained to Trade and Commerce that they have reason to suppose that their ability to obtain a quick answer on whether or not a permit will be issued is likely to determine whether they can obtain the order. Trade and Commerce have therefore asked if they may be authorized now to advise de Havilland that the permit will be issued when applied for provided that there is no further serious deterioration in the political situation in the area in question during the interval. I recommend that this proposed action be approved.⁶⁹

EXPORT OF ARMS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Comay, the Israeli Ambassador, called on me this morning on instructions from his government to make a formal request for permission to export from Canada one squadron of 24 F-86 aircraft. He referred to earlier enquiries which had been made a year or so ago regarding the possible export of such aircraft and indicated that in the view of his government it was most desirable that a complete squadron should be secured. Any smaller number would complicate the operations and maintenance problems. He added that an attempt would be made to get the number of Mystères from France raised in order that they would have a full squadron of that type of aircraft as well.

⁶⁹ Note marginale /Marginal Note:
OK [L.B. Pearson]

2. Mr. Comay appreciated certain difficulties which this request might present but his government hoped that the Canadian authorities would consider it most seriously and urgently and favourably.

3. Mr. Comay felt that there had recently been some disillusionment in both Washington and London concerning the situation in the Middle East. He reported that Mr. Dulles had told Mr. Eban that the U.S. Government was now prepared to recognize the existing imbalance in arms as increasing the threat of war. Mr. Dulles had intimated that it was in the interests of the West to supply some arms to Israel although it would be difficult for the United States to do so itself, except for small quantities of defensive weapons, at the present stage.

4. According to Mr. Comay, Mr. Sharett was of the view that the recent turn of events had made the position of the Canadian government crucial in the Middle Eastern situation. Canada had the type of aircraft which was most needed and Canada might have less difficulty than the United States in allowing them to be made available immediately. These aircraft were absolutely essential as a deterrent to aggression and to give the Israeli people some confidence in their ability to defend themselves. Their fears and their sense of isolation and weakness were a great danger.

5. Mr. Comay put forward the following reasons in support of his request:

(a) The Egyptians had, or would soon have, a bombing fleet within six or ten minutes of the main centres in Israel with 50 to 60 Ilyushin bombers and 200 MIG fighters. The Egyptians could operate with relative freedom from airfields in the Canal Zone, in the Sinai Region and in the Gaza Strip.

(b) The threat now was not merely or even primarily to the Israeli army but to the civilian population. No anti-aircraft defences existed which would be capable of protecting Tel Aviv, Jerusalem or the other main centres of population. The least that could be expected, therefore, in the event of operations by the Egyptians would be the death of thousands of civilians. The national survival of Israel was also involved. While the country might not be completely destroyed it would be crippled and the possibility of any reconciliation with the Arab States would be put off for generations.

(c) With two or three squadrons of jet interceptors the Israeli authorities would hope that they might be able to deter such an attack. While, in relation to the force which could be launched by the other side, this number would represent far less than was required for defence, the Israeli government would be prepared to take its chances if it had this quantity of effective aircraft.

(d) The nature of the request (confined as it is to short range interceptors) would rule out the possibility of use for offensive purposes. In fact, and in contrast to Egypt, the Israelis had no modern bombers that could be effective against MIG's.

6. Mr. Comay did not know whether in the event of such action by Canada the United States would also act. He mentioned that in a recent interview Mr. Allen had spoken of the possibility of anti-tank weapons being released, although he had not made a definite offer. In view of the usefulness of these weapons in warding off an attack by land, the Israeli authorities would undoubtedly welcome these weapons (with a priority somewhat lower than that attached to jet fighters) if the United States were to decide to make them available.

7. Would you please inform the State Department (and London the Foreign Office and Paris the Quai D'Orsay) fully on this approach and report immediately any views which you may receive. I would hope that this matter can be considered by Cabinet at its next meeting which will probably be within a week or ten days.

POSSIBLE EXPORT OF F-86 AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

I understand that you plan to raise orally in Cabinet tomorrow the Israeli Ambassador's request that the Government agree to release one squadron (24 aircraft) of F-86s. In accordance with your conversation with Mr. Ritchie we are not preparing a memorandum for the Cabinet on this subject, but have set out below points which may be useful to you in your oral presentation.

2. I attach copies of telegrams No. 615⁷⁰ and No. 628[†] from Washington, reporting respectively your discussion of this question with Mr. Dulles and on Mr. Heeney's subsequent interview with Mr. Eban. I also attach a copy of the outgoing telegram in which we informed a number of our missions of Mr. Comay's approach to you. Sufficient copies of these three telegrams are being prepared to permit distribution at the Cabinet meeting should you wish it, and copies have already been referred to the Prime Minister, Mr. Howe, Mr. Harris and Mr. Campney. I also attach a table setting out National Defence's best available estimate of present holdings by Middle East countries of similar aircraft.

3. You may wish to have in mind your reference in the House to a request for similar aircraft received about a year ago from Egypt, although I do not believe that incident or your remarks on it have an important bearing on the decision now to be taken. The Hansard report of your statement is as follows:

"In the spring of 1955 a supplier of these (Harvard) aircraft received enquiries from qualified representatives of the Egyptian government concerning 15 Harvard trainers. There were also received at the same time somewhat less formal enquiries about F-86 jet fighters. There was no problem regarding the jets. The reception by the government to the idea was negative and the matter was dropped even though that order, and others for jets about which we have been approached from other quarters, would have been very attractive commercially and would have assisted in maintaining work and employment in our aircraft industry.⁷¹

4. You will no doubt wish to bear in mind the fact that if these aircraft are released it would undoubtedly become public knowledge very soon. For this reason, and also because of the general position which the government has taken on such matters, the government would no doubt plan to announce an affirmative decision (if one should be taken) in the House. In this connection you will recall that the Security Council has under consideration a proposal that the Secretary General should visit the Middle East in a mediating role, and the government will no doubt wish to take account of this matter in considering the timing of a possible announcement.

5. Finally, a decision to release these aircraft would have important consequences concerning the government's general policies. If they should be released specifically to assist Israel in meeting the threat posed by Egyptian acquisition of Russian-built jet bombers, this would involve taking sides in the Arab-Israeli conflict to a degree that no western power has yet done, and would have critical foreign policy implications in many fields and for a number of countries other than Canada. If, on the other hand, they should be released without that specific purpose being designated it would have a bearing on other possible requests. For example, it might lead the Egyptians to renew their earlier application. (It would also, incidentally, make it very difficult to refuse the same type of aircraft to the Indian government, which has recently made an informal enquiry concerning F-86s and CF-100s.)

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the Israeli Ambassador had called on him and had made a formal request for permission to purchase and export from Canada one squadron of 24 F-86 aircraft. An attempt was being made to get the number of Mystères from France raised to a full squadron. A third squadron of jet interceptors might possibly be obtained from the United Kingdom.

The situation in the Middle East was becoming crucial for Israel. The Egyptians would soon have a bombing fleet of 50 to 60 Ilyushin bombers and 200 MIG fighters within six or ten minutes of the main population centres of Israel. It was estimated, however, that Egypt would not be in a position to use those aircraft effectively within the next three months. Israel might still be able to win a war against the Arab States because of a superior army but could not resist a strong attack from the air without interceptor aircraft.

There were factions in Israel in favour of starting a preventive war immediately while it might still be won rapidly. The feeling that the country had been abandoned by its friends, especially the United States, contributed to such attitudes.

The Arabs had turned down the Johnson scheme for the Jordan Canal and now Israel wanted to build her own canal. If this were done, a violent reaction from Syria was likely and Israeli workmen might be fired on. This in turn could be used by Israel to justify going to war.

The U.S. government was not ready yet to supply arms to Israel in any quantity. Its position in the Middle East was difficult. It was still attempting to influence the Arab States. However, the U.S. was now prepared to recognize the existing imbalance in arms as increasing the threat of war, and Mr. Dulles had said that they would make no objection if other western countries were to supply some arms to Israel.

It would be very undesirable to give a negative answer to the Israel request at this stage, but it would also seem inappropriate to agree to sell the aircraft just when the Secretary General of the United Nations had been sent on a peace mission. Mr. Hammarskjöld would report back to the U.N. during the coming month. There was no question of taking a decision on the Israeli request immediately, but a definite stand would have to be taken during the next six weeks.

11. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It would seem almost suicide for Israel to declare war at the moment. On the other hand, the Israeli government felt that, in spite of having no strength in the air, it still had a chance because Egypt could not yet use effectively the aircraft obtained from Russia.

(b) If Israel decided to start a war, it could probably win during the first two weeks. Under those conditions, there was very little that the U.N. could do once an open conflict had been started.

(c) The F-86 aircraft could not be used for offensive purposes but would be essential as a deterrent to aggression and to give confidence to the Israeli people.

(d) It might be possible to supply these aircraft without any delay, if Sabre V's were taken, or if National Defence were to accept some delay in its deliveries of the Sabre VI's now in production.

12. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the request for permission to export to Israel one squadron of 24 F-86 aircraft and agreed that no decision be taken on it at present.

TELEGRAM 665

Washington, April 7, 1956

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO MIDDLE EAST; F-86'S FOR ISRAEL

Merchant, whom I saw yesterday April 6, gave me Dulles's response to the approach which we had made on the basis of your telegram under reference outlining the Israeli request for one squadron of twenty-four F-86 aircraft. Although Merchant does not have specific responsibilities in this area I decided to speak to him since he had been present at your discussion of this matter when we dined with Dulles here on March 28 (our 615 March 29/56).

2. We had earlier on April 4, discussed your message under reference with Margrave of the State Dept's Office of Munitions Control. Margrave's initial reaction had been negative. He thought that interested US officials would "counsel against" a supply from Canada or the US of any such substantial numbers of such high quality aircraft. The views which he gave us in support of this attitude do not now seem important since Merchant gave us the Secretary's decision.

3. Merchant said that the decision as to whether or not the Israeli request for the squadron off F-86's should be met was recognized by the Secretary to be a decision "exclusively for the Canadian government." The US government would not "interpose objections" if the Canadian government decided to meet the Israeli request. If the Canadian government did so decide and their decision became a public issue leading to questions being asked of the US government, US authorities would indicate that the Canadian and US governments were in constant touch on matters of this kind; they would say that this particular transaction had been discussed and that the US government had clearly indicated that they had no desire to interpose objections to the sale.

4. Merchant, under questioning, said that US policy on the matter of supply of arms to Israel remained unaltered. US action to supply defensive armament to Israel could not be excluded as a possibility. On the other hand they had not yet reached any decision to do so.

5. I referred to our talk with Dulles at dinner on March 28 and said that we had been left with the distinct impression that the Secretary himself hoped that it would be possible for other countries to provide some assistance to Israel to minimize the increasing and dangerous imbalance between their armament and that of the Arab States. This had specific reference to the Israeli request to us for jet fighters which you had mentioned. Merchant confirmed that this was a correct interpretation of Dulles' private and personal view but it was not one which Dulles would wish to have made public. Merchant then ran over some of the arguments which Dulles had used to you on the same occasion — the US was not traditionally a heavy supplier of arms to Israel; remaining US influence with the Arabs would be affected by any substantial US supply of arms to the Israelis; and, finally, a grave moral responsibility attached to the prevention by any country of another country's efforts to provide for its essential defence.

6. Bearing in mind my telephone conversation with you on April 5, I told Merchant that in view of the US response he had now conveyed, personally, I thought it not unlikely that the Canadian government would feel unable to meet the Israeli request for such a significant addition to their air strength at this time. Our attitude might be otherwise perhaps if and when the US government were to decide to make more than a symbolic release of arms to the Israelis.

7. Merchant said that the US government would, of course, be interested in knowing what decision is reached in Ottawa.

8. You will have seen the comments on the supply of arms to Israel by other countries which were made by Dulles at a press conference on April 3, the text of which appeared in the New York Times for April 4. His remarks led to a good deal of public comment to the end that Dulles had given a "green light" to the supply by other countries of arms to Israel; in practice Dulles's green light seems to have paled to a pretty watery aquamarine.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL, PROGRESS REPORT
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE APRIL 12)⁷²

34. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he had had further talks with the Israeli ambassador on the export of a squadron of 24 F-86s and had obtained additional information from Washington about the attitude of the U.S. government on the release of arms to Israel. It was expected that the United States would soon start to send more arms to that country.

This general subject would be discussed in London during the visit of the Soviet leaders. In moves designed to prepare for that visit, it had been announced recently that the Cominform had been dissolved and that the Soviet government would be willing to participate in a settlement of Middle East disputes. Control over the shipment of arms to the area would of course be an essential element of any effective plan. The British government had been requested to mention in its discussions with the Soviet leaders the fact that Canada was considering at present whether or not to send a squadron of F-86s to Israel. This could be used during the talks as an argument to strengthen the bargaining power of the west or as a test to know the real intentions of the Soviet government. It would, for example, be better to have the Soviet government agree to reduce substantially the number of bombers going to Egypt rather than sell these planes to Israel.

The Secretary General of the United Nations was reporting real progress in his mission to the Middle East. His immediate objective was not to bring a political solution to the difficulties but to strengthen the armistice. Mr. Hammarskjöld would have a document ready for signature by the Middle East countries in two or three days and if he attained his immediate objective, it would be an important achievement on his part.

This was a résumé of the situation at the moment and the matter would be brought up again to report any major development.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE APRIL 19)

32. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said there was little that was new which he could report on this subject. He had told the Israeli Ambassador in a recent conversation that no decision, either positive or negative, could be expected this week on the request for a squadron of F86's. He hoped to find out what were the British, United States and French attitudes on exports of arms when he was in Europe attending the N.A.T.O. Ministerial Council Meeting. The U.K. and France were sending some aircraft to Israel and he thought the U.S. would do likewise in the near future. The situation in the Middle East had eased considerably following the mission of the United Nations Secretary-General. However, there was a tendency to read too much into the results of Mr. Hammarskjöld's trip. All he had really done was to restore a cease fire for which there was already an agreement. The most immediate danger lay in Israel's intention to proceed with the Jordan canal.

[Ottawa], May 10, 1956

Mr. Dulles discussed with me in Paris the question of arms shipments to the Middle East. He knew that we were faced with a request for 24 F-86 jet interceptors from Israel and he wished, very frankly and confidentially, to explain to me the policy of his government in respect of such requests, as it might help us in the decision we would have to make.

The United States had decided to release shortly some miscellaneous military supplies for Israel, but not — at least at this time — aircraft. They realized that while Israel could probably defend herself at the present time against attack from her Arab neighbours, the balance of military strength was moving against her because of arms, especially jet aircraft, coming from the Soviet bloc to Egypt. This growing imbalance, especially in the air, was a danger to peace, first, because it might strengthen the position of the extremists in Israel who felt that the only hope for survival was a preventive war waged while Israel was strong enough to defeat her neighbours; and, secondly, it would later encourage extremists on the Arab side who were determined to wipe Israel out. Mr. Dulles thought that it was, therefore, important from the point of view of maintaining peace, and also for psychological reasons, to permit some military supplies to reach Israel, especially jet interceptors. The reason the American government was not releasing such aircraft was primarily their anxiety not to be identified conclusively with the Israeli side and to participate in an arms race, which would not be so much one between Israel and Egypt as between the Soviet Union and the United States. These considerations did not apply, at least to the same extent, to other countries, and Mr. Dulles hoped, therefore, that their inconsistency in refusing to supply Israel with the equipment which they hoped other countries would be able to supply would be understood.

He then gave me some very confidential information about American policy, which was known to only a very few people in Washington, and to no one else except, I think, the British Foreign Minister. He was giving me this information because he felt it had a bearing on the Israeli request for Canadian jet interceptors. While the United States would not at this time ship F-86's to Israel, they did intend to have 2 or 3 squadrons of them available at air bases close to Israel under United States control, so that they could reach Israel within an hour or two if that country became the victim of aggression. However, it would not help Israel very much to have 50 or 60 F-86's land at Tel Aviv if there were not Israeli pilots trained to fly them. That is why F-86's from Canada at this time would be particularly important to Israel; she could train pilots in their use who would be, therefore, ready to man the additional machines, if and when they were sent.

I told Mr. Dulles that requests of this kind from Israel represented a very serious problem for Canada which was not any more anxious than the United States to become identified with one side or the other in this quarrel, but which was anxious to assist in preserving the peace. We realized that for this purpose some additional armed strength for Israel might be advisable, but we were even more conscious of the necessity of a political settlement which would stop the arms race and give both Israel and her neighbours some guarantee of security. For that purpose, the three major powers should act quickly and effectively, through the United Nations, and bringing the Soviet Union into consultation with them from the beginning. This was an idea which I subsequently repeated at the NATO Council. I told Mr. Dulles that the talks that the British had had with Bulganin and Khrushchev in London gave them at least some reason to believe that the Russians were becoming more worried about the possibility of serious trouble in the Middle East, and that they might now co-operate with the other three powers to avoid it. Sir Anthony Eden told me that he received the firm impression from his talks with the Russian leaders that they did not realize the extent to which they were playing with fire in their present Middle Eastern policy, and he thinks he may have sent them back to Moscow in a more chastened and even in a co-operative mood on this issue.

Mr. Dulles agreed that the major objective now should be to press on for a political settlement through the United Nations, though the bitterness of feeling between the two sides in the Middle East made such a settlement extremely difficult to bring about. Meanwhile, he emphasized that if we found it possible to send at least half the order of 24 F-86's to Israel at this time, it would be an important and constructive move, and in view of the MIGs and jet bombers going to the other side, he did not think that the Arab states could seriously complain.

I think United States' views, as expressed by Mr. Dulles, have a bearing on the decision which we will have to make very shortly in regard to the Israeli request.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL; MEDITERRANEAN SITUATION; PROGRESS REPORT
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE APRIL 26)

33. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said a decision might have to be made soon on the request from Israel for a squadron of 24 F-86 aircraft. The situation in the Middle East had calmed down as a result of the successful mission of Mr. Hammarskjöld. However, the Arab countries were receiving additional aircraft from communist countries and would possibly be ready to attack Israel in October.

The Middle East situation had been discussed in London during the recent visit of Marshal Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev. Mr. Eden had made it clear that Britain had vital interests in the area and would not hesitate to fight to protect them. The Russian leaders had indicated that they were sending arms to the Arab countries merely as a counter-tactic to the Baghdad Pact and that they were unaware of the immediate danger of war in the area. It seemed that they might be ready to agree to send arms on restricted conditions only provided other countries would do the same. Britain had decided to sell arms, including anti-aircraft equipment, to Israel but on a very limited scale.

The Minister had discussed the Middle East situation with Mr. Dulles. The U.S. Secretary of State had fully realized that the shipment of F-86 aircraft to Israel would raise a difficult problem for Canada, but his view was that the time had come to give more aid in the air to Israel. The U.S. government was not ready yet to send arms because it wanted to maintain its position as a possible mediator between the two parties; moreover it did not intend to participate in an arms race with Russia. However, other countries, like Canada, were in a position to help Israel without challenging the U.S.S.R. The U.S. government found it difficult to maintain an impartial attitude because the Jews were using all their influence within the U.S. in favour of Israel. Meanwhile, the U.S. government was making plans to ensure that Israel would be adequately defended at a few minutes notice if attacked by the Arab countries.

France had already sold 12 Mystères to Israel. Both the United States and the United Kingdom were urging Canada to send 12 F-86s but this could not be revealed.

The situation in Algeria was also dangerous. Both Tunis and Morocco were now free but Algeria raised a more complicated problem because it had never been independent and the French settlers formed an important portion of the population. The French government had stated that no solution could be worked out if order were not restored first but the rebels were still receiving help from the Arab countries.

The situation in Cyprus was very bad. The British were emotional about this question and it was almost impossible to argue with them. Their attitude was that they would not discuss possible solutions before order had been re-established. The Chiefs of Staff had said that the protection of the oil fields would be endangered if the British agreed to leave Cyprus. The Greek government had offered to permit the establishment of a N.A.T.O. base under British control on its own territory and in Crete; also on Cyprus if it came under Greek control, but that proposal had been refused. The execution of the Cypriot patriot Karselis at the time when capital punishment was abolished in the United Kingdom had been an unwise move. The Suez precedent should serve as a lesson because it had shown that it was unwise to keep complete control at all cost and until the last moment and then be obliged to give up completely. However, the situation in Cyprus had become a question of prestige for Great Britain and no compromise seemed possible at the moment. Mediation by the N.A.T.O. Council might lead to a satisfactory solution but Great Britain would not be likely to accept such mediation until after another two months and then it might be too late.

34. During the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) As a result of Mr. Hammarskjöld's visit to the Middle East, the armistice had been re-invigorated, but this achievement would not prove to be very significant if it was not followed by a political settlement. That problem would be discussed by the United Nations and could be solved if the U.S.S.R. were willing to cooperate in implementing a collective plan. That cooperation could be best secured if the U.S. representatives were prepared to talk to the Russians before the question was considered by the United Nations.

(b) There was strong sympathy in Canada in favour of Israel. The Canadian people would certainly support government action through the United Nations in order to find a solution which would be satisfactory to the Israelis. However, there would be objections in Canada to the shipment of aircraft to Israel during a period when the United Nations were considering a peaceful settlement. The fact that the United States and the United Kingdom were privately advising Canada to accept the request of the Israeli government would not solve the domestic political difficulties.

(c) The refugee question was only part of the overall problem and could not be solved separately. It had originated when the Arab countries had refused the partition plan, and since then they had never seriously attempted to solve the refugee question, as it could be used for propaganda purposes.

(d) The coming months would be crucial. The most probable objective of the Arab countries was to eliminate Israel, which was viewed as the western outpost in the Middle East. The most immediate danger was the isolation of Israel. At present, the Arab countries were getting all the supplies they could use and Israel received practically nothing. If the objective of the western countries was to preserve peace in the area, the only alternative to a general embargo on the export of arms, which seemed quite impossible to achieve, was to help Israel. The U.S. and the U.K. were in a difficult position to make a contribution at the moment. Canada was producing the F-86 aircraft and, if it were decided to refuse Israel's request, the danger of war would be increased. On the other hand, if the shipment of such aircraft were permitted, such action by the Canadian government would be interpreted as a direct contribution to a possible explosion.

(e) Mr. Pearson expected a confidential report from Mr. Hammarskjöld on the question and would probably make a definite recommendation on the basis of that report. However, even if the report were favourable to the shipment of aircraft to Israel, one could not use it to justify the action taken by the Canadian government, so that it would not solve the political difficulty created by this question.

ISRAELI REQUEST FOR F-86'S

In a separate memorandum I am setting out some of the political considerations bearing on this question. In this present paper I propose to outline some of the practical and technical factors involved.

Arms Holdings in the Area, Current and Prospective

I attach a copy† of the latest confirmed estimate of aircraft holdings of Middle Eastern countries. It should be noted that these figures refer to actual holdings only, and it may be assumed that additional aircraft have in certain cases been contracted for but not yet received. This applies in particular to the MIG 15's and IL 28's available to the Arab bloc. In addition, as you are aware, Israel hopes to obtain from France 12 more Mystères, and is negotiating with Italy for the possible provision of some F-86's. Norway is also being pressed to release 40 Vampires, but these obsolescent aircraft would have little bearing on the main question.

The real problem relates to Egypt's possession of a substantial number of IL 28 jet bombers and an adequate supply of MIG 15 jet fighters to escort them. Against this formidable attacking capability Israel's holding of 12 Mystères represents at present the only real defence. Israeli authorities estimate that with three squadrons of suitable aircraft (72 machines) they could muster a reasonable defence; this would appear a modest estimate. They hope to obtain 12 more Mystères from France, 24 F-86's from Canada and 24 F-86's (mentioned above) from Italy. While estimates vary, it is unlikely that Egyptian forces will be adequately trained and equipped to attack with IL 28's and MIG 15's before mid-summer at the very earliest.

Canadian Policy on Export of Modern Jet Aircraft

In general the Government has been cautious about approving the export of modern jets. As far as Canada is concerned the only such aircraft available for export are F-86's and CF-100's. As you are aware, the CF-100 is equipped with the MG2 fire control system which is of U.S. origin and which U.S. authorities have been unwilling to release even to Belgium, although there is a possibility of agreement upon a modified fire control system.

Apart from NATO, however, we have therefore been limited to the possibility of exporting F-86's. These are freely available to NATO countries, and Canada has provided them as Mutual Aid to Greece and Turkey. Consideration is being given to the timing of releasing 75 F-86's to Germany. Outside of NATO, F-86's have been sold by Canada to South Africa, and recently after careful consideration the Government approved the sale of six of these aircraft to Colombia. The only other possible export to which even partial consideration has been given involved a tentative enquiry from India, but before a decision became necessary the Indians lost interest because of the price. Enquiries from Egypt and Saudi Arabia, and an earlier approach by Israel, were not seriously considered.

It is not expected that there would be security objections to the release of F-86's to Israel, but (aside from the special considerations relating to the Arab-Israeli conflict and the tension in the Middle East) to make such aircraft available in a sensitive area would involve a precedent which the Government would no doubt wish to consider very carefully. The aircraft are manufactured in Canada under U.S. licence, and therefore the State Department's approval is required.

It will be publicly expected that release, if it takes place, should be preceded by consultation with at least the U.S. and the U.K. In fact we have consulted these two Governments and France as well. None of the three objects, and indeed the U.S. and France have both encouraged us to release although they might not be willing to make this position public. The U.K. has expressed the hope that we could avoid public reference to their position. If announcement of a release is made, it might include an indication that, taking account of the current situation, the Government considers the release in accord with the Tripartite Declaration of 1950. Because of their special responsibilities in the area, arising in part from that Declaration, those three powers were consulted prior to the decision. (It would then be possible to add, if necessary, that no objection was raised.)

Timing and Availability

Should the Government decide to release some F-86's to Israel there would be a number of subsidiary questions to which we believe consideration should be given at the time of the principal decision. It is assumed that such a decision would be announced almost at once in the House. Inevitably the Government would be pressed to state how many aircraft were involved and when delivery would be made. This information would necessarily be known fairly widely in several Government departments (e.g. National Defence, Trade and Commerce, Defence Production as well as External Affairs) and would probably leak fairly soon. We therefore believe that an effort to withhold the answers to these questions would be unsuccessful.

I understand that you have in mind the possibility that ten aircraft might be released. We have not wished to discuss such matters in any detail with other Departments, in order not to give rise to speculation, but it is our impression that this number would permit the Israelis to operate the aircraft satisfactorily. On technical grounds however, they would probably prefer 12; this would be apart from their obvious desire to obtain as many of these aircraft as possible. Ten might be a difficult number to explain publicly.

As far as we are aware there are three possible methods of making this number of aircraft available. One would be to approve a straight commercial sale by Canadair under which the Israelis would await their turn for aircraft coming off the production line; this would undoubtedly mean that completion of delivery would require several months. Should this be considered too slow, it would be possible to divert current production ordered for the RCAF, to meet an Israeli order; we have some reason to suppose that RCAF requirements are not urgent (the proposed provision of 75 aircraft to Germany should not alter the picture). Finally, it might be possible to release this relatively small number of aircraft from current RCAF holdings, for subsequent replacement from new production. This last possibility might be attractive to the RCAF, since it would permit the replacement of an earlier model of the aircraft by the latest version. We would expect that either of the latter two courses (diversion of current production, or release from existing RCAF holdings) would permit quite rapid delivery.

If it is decided to release some aircraft the choice among these three possible methods would have to take into account the speed of delivery desired and the preferences of the RCAF. We are not in a position, until we obtain full advice from the technical experts, to comment in detail on the question of delivery rate, but presumably account would have to be taken of the expected effect both on Israel's attitude and on that of her Arab opponents.

On the one hand prompt delivery might tempt the Israelis to provoke a "preventive war" or lead the Arabs to attack; on the other hand it might bolster Israeli confidence and consequently patience, and might induce greater caution in Arab capitals. To permit a time lag between announcement of a decision and actual delivery would have possible consequences equally difficult to predict; before a decision is taken even in principle we believe that this question of timing should be most carefully examined. The possibility of a U.N. embargo on arms exports to the area would also have to be considered, as well as the domestic political reactions in Canada. As to the preferences of the RCAF we have no firm information available, but this point could no doubt be quickly settled once a decision has been taken on the possible export of 75 aircraft to Germany.

POLITICAL FACTORS GOVERNING A DECISION TO EXPORT JET INTERCEPTOR AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

In my memorandum of May 11 concerning the question of the export of jet aircraft to Israel, I said that I would send you a separate memorandum on the political considerations involved. The following seem to be the principal political factors which might be taken into consideration in arriving at a conclusion as to whether to export F-86 fighter aircraft to Israel. First are set out the arguments in favour of sending either the full order of 24 or something less than that number.

Arguments for shipment

(1) It is a simple act of justice to enable Israel to defend itself. As an active member of the United Nations we share the responsibility for the establishment of that State and we share the obligation to see that the Israelis are in a position to defend themselves against an attack by those whose real objectives may be obscure but who have at any rate publicly threatened the destruction of Israel as a State. The Israelis in fact possess no adequate defence for their cities against the new Soviet bombers.

(2) It is conceivable that the principal danger of war breaking out at the present time arises not from any immediate intentions of the Arab States but from a fear psychosis which the Israelis suffer. If it is true that before the end of this year the Egyptians may be so strengthened by the Soviet countries that they will have superiority over the Israelis, then the temptation must be strong for the Israelis to launch a preventive attack. The sense of confidence which they would gain from having a fighter protection would diminish this temptation. It is in any case known that extremists in Israel have been advocating preventive war. Provision of defensive armament to Israel would strengthen the government's hand against the extremists. Mr. Hammarskjöld has brought with him from the Middle East the impression that Prime Minister Ben Gurion — as well as Col. Nasser — are against extremist action.

(3) The United States Administration, while refusing to send aircraft to Israel, clearly is anxious that friendly countries should do so. There is much in this position that is irritating and embarrassing but, if we consider broad international issues rather than our purely national interests, it is possible to recognize some logic in the American position. An arms race in the Middle East, with the Communists supporting the Arabs and the United States supplying the Israelis, is certainly not a happy prospect. It could easily degenerate into a straight arms race between the Russians and the Americans in the area. Furthermore, it is not in the general interests of peace that the United States should become committed to one side and so thrust the Arabs unrestrainedly into the arms of the Russians. Such a policy can be criticized glibly, as it is in some quarters, as a refusal to take a firm stand but it is often the wisest diplomacy to play a cautious game. The most laudable feature of American and British policy in the Palestine issue has been that, although it has done much that may be questionable, it has been characterized by a recognition of the fact that there is right on both sides and that a settlement can be achieved only by compromise and agreement and not by the triumph of one side or the other. As it is American policy, rather than the policy of her less powerful allies, which is predominantly significant in this area, a decision of the United States to supply arms to Israel would have an effect on the equilibrium of the Middle East which would not be produced by similar action on the part of Canada. It is true that we, rather than the United States, would have to take the anger of the Arabs and this is unpleasant. However, we have no very important purely national interests in the area, our fund of goodwill is apparently fairly large and this might well be a small sacrifice for us to make for a common cause. It is not right to think in terms of "pulling American chestnuts out of the fire". The chestnuts in this dangerous area are as much Canadian as they are American or British, because we would be inevitably involved in the consequences of war.

(4) It can well be argued that Nasser is engaged in blackmail. He and his agents and his Arab colleagues, including the local representatives, constantly threaten that any shipments of jet aircraft by Canada to Israel will be matched by further orders from Czechoslovakia. It would be unwise to allow him to paralyze support of Israel in this way. Israel is in a dangerously weak position, so long as her cities are vulnerable to destructive attack from the air.

(5) Much of the objection to our shipment of arms to Israel arises from a not very clearly thought out opposition on vaguely pacifist grounds. The fact is, however, that F-86 aircraft are as purely defensive as anti-aircraft guns. They could never be used for aggressive purposes but only for preventing hostile attacks on the overcrowded territory of Israel.

2. There are also arguments against our taking any action to ship aircraft to Israel or at least against taking action at this time.

Arguments against shipment

(1) Canadian relations with the Arab States would almost certainly suffer a severe blow, since F-86 aircraft would represent a major accession to Israeli military strength, albeit defensive. It is clear from the attitude of the Arab representatives in Ottawa and from moderate spokesmen like the Secretary-General of the Lebanese Foreign Ministry, who was here recently, that their countries would react very vigorously. We are not likely to suffer any very direct consequences, with the possible exception of a few broken windows in our Missions in Cairo and Beirut, but we should foresee the probability of an end to the reasonably good relations we have had with the Arab States in the United Nations and elsewhere. (If our assistance to Israel was on a modest scale and not continued, the reaction might not be as strong as we have been led to expect.) Our interests in the area are not great and any economic loss which might result from ill-will would probably not affect us greatly. The principal loss would probably be to our capacity to influence the situation in the Middle East any further. One should perhaps not take too seriously the constant statements by Arab leaders to us that Canada is looked upon by the Arab countries as one of the few Western Powers without any axes to grind in the area. However, one should not dismiss lightly the possibility that we could play a very useful role of mediation in the right circumstances. It is doubtful that we could do so if we were to supply Israel with jet aircraft at the present time. There is little doubt that the Arabs would regard the Canadian sale of jets to Israel as a partisan and unfriendly act.

(2) The best example of course of the role that Canadians can play is the work which has been done by General Burns, which is greatly respected by both sides. There is the danger that what would be considered partial action on the part of Canada in supplying one side with highly important weapons might adversely affect General Burns' position. It is by no means certain that it need do so but there is an element of risk. General Burns himself has told our Ambassador in Cairo that he hopes very much that Canada will not supply these weapons to Israel, or indeed give Israel any encouragement that we will do so at this time. He did not however argue this point on the grounds of the effect on his own position.

(3) United Nations officials are opposed to the sale. The reason why General Burns urged that we should not supply jet aircraft to Israel was that he did not think that, at the present time, it would have the right psychological effect on the Israelis. He clearly believes that the Israelis have caused a good deal of the recent trouble by being over-aggressive; that at the present time they need chastening rather than encouraging; and that this is having a salutary and restraining effect upon them. He is afraid, therefore, that a supply of jet aircraft would not give them the confidence to play safe but would inspire them to further provocative action. He argues therefore for the policy of constraint upon Israel. This was being advocated by the United Kingdom and the United States some weeks ago, but rather in regard to the possibility of an overall settlement, so as to induce Israel to make the necessary territorial concessions. We have been informed that Mr. Hammarskjöld holds the same views as General Burns in this matter and is strongly of the opinion that important arms shipments should not go to Israel at this time.

(4) It is unfortunate but true that Israel is looked upon by most of the anti-colonial nations of Africa and Asia as something in the nature of an imperialist stronghold. The support of these countries whether Muslim or non-Muslim has, as was revealed at Bandung, been given to the Arabs. Canada has to play and must continue to play a not insignificant role in the effort to remove causes of friction between the so-called anti-colonial and the colonial powers. This may well be the most vital issue in international affairs today. It is probable therefore that forthright support of Israel on our part would be looked upon as aiding and abetting imperialism not only by the Arab states but also by our friends in Pakistan, Indonesia and elsewhere.

(5) However justifiable the American position may be on this issue, as argued above, there is a strong case to be made for the common acceptance of responsibility by the Western Powers. If Israel should be supplied with arms, then the responsibility and the consequences should be shared by not only France, the United Kingdom and Canada but by the United States as well. United States intentions are unfortunately no secret already. Mr. Dulles has made it quite clear to all those who are interested that he would like Canada to send to Israel the jet aircraft which the United States does not want to send itself. The shipment of aircraft by Canada, therefore, might not only fail in its purpose of preserving American neutrality but might make Canada look, in the eyes of the world, like a satellite. Mr. Khrushchev took the position in London that the Soviet Union was not supplying Egypt with arms, that these were being sent by Czechoslovakia, that it was purely Czech business. It would be humiliating if Canada were seen in the eyes of the world to be playing the same role for the United States as we assume Czechoslovakia is playing for the Soviet Union.

(6) It may be worth considering that, in view of the strong arguments put forward by yourself in the NATO Council for more consultation on and coordination of policy by NATO members on important issues, no action should be taken on such an important matter without at least discussing the subject more fully with our friends. This argument may be all the more true in that it appears that not only France and the United Kingdom but also Norway, Italy and possibly other members of NATO have been asked for aircraft by the Israelis. Coordinated policy might be wiser lest Israel, by dealing with individual nations, obtain a greater number of aircraft than is considered necessary by the West for her self-defence. Furthermore a regulated contribution to Israel's defence by several western powers would help to prevent Canada from being placed in the position of appearing to take the lead in shipping arms to Israel.

(7) We have been arguing of late in favour of the importance of bringing the Soviet Union into a responsible position in settling the Palestine issue. One of the possible moves towards achievement of such a settlement would be the establishment, not of an arms embargo, but of some kind of international arms control. Such an idea did not make much progress at the recent London discussions but it need not yet be ruled out. It might be argued that we ought not to begin supplying important arms to one side, when there may be some prospect of securing an agreement with the Russians in the United Nations or elsewhere. On the other hand, of course, it is possible that the best way to make the need for arms control apparent to the Russians and to others would be some balancing of the shipments to Egypt with shipments to Israel. The Arabs are, perhaps, less likely to agree to any control of shipments if they have reason to believe that the West is not going to supply Israel anyway.

(8) Finally the sale of F-86's to Israel may stir up public controversy and rouse uneasiness in Canada. During the debate over the export of Harvards to Egypt the Government gave the impression that it would be very wary about exporting substantial quantities of arms to the Middle East during the existing tension.

F-86'S FOR ISRAEL — MR. COMAY'S INTERVIEW
 WITH MR. PEARSON ON MAY 21

At the request of the Israeli Ambassador Mr. Pearson saw Mr. Comay around noon on May 21. At the outset Mr. Comay indicated that he had come to discuss their application for permission to export 24 F-86's.

2. Mr. Pearson informed Mr. Comay that no decision had yet been taken and that one was not likely for several weeks. He mentioned some of the difficult problems involved in a decision. Whatever effects the actual delivery of these aircraft might have, an announcement that Canada had decided to release them would undoubtedly receive headline treatment throughout the world and would not help to maintain the fairly calm atmosphere required for discussions of Arab-Israeli relations in the immediate future. Mr. Pearson also remarked that although the difficulties standing in the way of action by the U.S. itself might be appreciated, any impression that Canada was acting in place of the U.S. would not be well regarded here and would not improve the reception of any decision to let these aircraft be exported. Canadians would resent any implication that their government was acting on behalf of the U.S. in the same way as Czechoslovakia had acted for the U.S.S.R. Mr. Pearson indicated that he did not intend to press for a decision now. He thought that this matter could probably be considered by the Canadian Government more satisfactorily at a later stage. He wished in particular to wait until Mr. Hammarskjöld had reported to the Security Council. He also thought that a delay in any Canadian decision might be used in a small way as leverage in encouraging the U.S., U.K. and others to make some progress on the political problems of the area. Mr. Pearson emphasized that domestic political considerations in Canada were not responsible for delaying the Government's decision. He remarked that the moderate statements from Ben Gurion (and the report that an Egyptian newsman had visited Israel and apparently been quite well received) were all helpful. Mr. Pearson told Mr. Comay that he would like very much to see Mr. Hammarskjöld when he was visiting Montreal although he was not sure that this would be practicable, and he also hoped to see General Burns during his visit to Ottawa to see his family in the near future. Mr. Pearson said that after his visit to Washington early in June, when he might have a chance to discuss this and other matters with Mr. Dulles, he would be pleased to see Mr. Comay again and he would also hope to review the question with Mr. Comay upon his return from Europe in July.

3. Mr. Comay then outlined the views of the Israeli Government on the question of timing or phasing. As they saw Mr. Hammarskjöld's mission, it was in the nature of a "stop-gap" operation. The next phase required the restoration of a "military stalemate". Over the next 12 months the Israelis were confronted with the prospect of witnessing the building up of forces on the other side while the gaps in their own defences remained largely unfilled. While there had been, and doubtless would continue to be, some improvement in Israel's land defences, there was little chance of making real progress in strengthening their Air Force without these fighter aircraft from Canada. In this connection Mr. Comay observed that the authorities in Tel Aviv were not counting heavily on reports of numerous crashes of Egyptian aircraft acquired from the Soviets. Israel's relative position in the air looked very unpromising. It was important that something be done to rectify this situation. The restoration of the military stalemate in this sense would fit in with the pattern of action through the U.N. and by other means to improve the political situation. Such an approach did not run counter to these activities. The proper sequence would be a cease fire, the achievement of military balance, and then political progress.

4. The Israeli authorities were considerably worried about the possibility of a premature embargo on arms shipments to the Middle East. At this stage such an action would have the effect of "freezing the imbalance".

5. Mr. Comay implied that in the present situation the parties concerned in the Middle East (and by this he presumably meant Israel in particular) might be hesitant about giving any evidence of progress towards a political settlement since that might inhibit releases of necessary arms. Any movement towards a political solution was scarcely likely to be made until the arms imbalance had been redressed.

6. Mr. Comay felt that there might be only a "fleeting moment" within which it would be possible to restore the arms equilibrium. If the military situation were to get worse the countries capable of supplying arms might hold back as they would not wish to "stick their heads in". If the political situation becomes more complex (for example, if the exploration of various possible solutions is undertaken in the Security Council or elsewhere), most countries would also not be anxious to release arms to Israel.

7. With regard to the actions and reactions of the Soviets, the Ambassador felt that the damage which they were going to do has already been done. They would continue to determine for themselves how many arms it was in their interest to supply and they would not be much affected by the amounts provided by Western countries to Israel. So far as the Soviets were concerned, Israel was a side issue. Soviet activities in the Middle East were aimed at the Baghdad Pact. Whether or not Israel received a few more planes would have no effect on Soviet deliveries. Moreover, the Egyptians had "bitten off as much as they could chew" and the Soviets would not see any advantage in supplying them with additional arms which they would not be able to use effectively but would probably have to leave in the packing cases. Mr. Comay was convinced, therefore, that there was no risk of increased danger from the Soviets if Canada were to release these aircraft to Israel.

8. The Minister then speculated on the possibility of some kind of Mediterranean security pact as a means of helping to stabilize the situation in the Middle East. Apart from his doubts about the practicability of such a pact, including both Israel and Egypt, Mr. Comay wondered whether it could be effective in the Middle Eastern situation.

9. The Minister referred to the change in Prime Ministers in Jordan and Mr. Comay was not inclined to attach much significance to this development. He remarked that the Government of Jordan was in no sense democratic and that a little group in Jordan tended to take turns in serving as Prime Minister.

10. Mr. Comay mentioned that he talked recently with the Conservative Party's Foreign Affairs Committee, at their invitation, regarding the Middle Eastern situation. He had deliberately avoided getting involved in discussion of the request for the release of aircraft from Canada. Mr. Pearson thought this was quite appropriate and saw no objection to the Ambassador continuing to discuss privately the issues involved. He thought it would also be quite fitting for the Egyptian Ambassador to do likewise. He thought it would be quite unwise for either Ambassador to get involved in a public campaign of any sort on this subject.

11. In conclusion Mr. Pearson emphasized that the delay on a decision on the request for F-86's implied no weakening of support in Canada for the existence of the State of Israel. He was confident that in the event of aggression occurring the Canadian Government would be anxious to see the U.N. intervene effectively and would support such U.N. action as might be necessary. Mr. Comay said he had no doubt of the willingness of Canada and many other countries to play their part in that kind of a situation but he remarked that any U.N. decision could apply only to the second stage. What the Israeli Government was anxious to do was to ensure that it could defend the centres of the country in the initial stage of any attack that might be made.

ARMS FOR THE MIDDLE EAST

Thank you for your prompt comments, which I have considered carefully.

2. I have somewhat modified my ideas relating to this particular case. The purpose in putting this problem before the Council would be twofold — to obtain an expression of views which might be of assistance to the Government in reaching a decision on the Israeli request, and through example to encourage discussion of political problems within NATO. For various reasons touched on below I am now doubtful whether the proposed discussion would significantly further either of these objectives, and I am conscious of certain real disadvantages in putting the matter forward at present. Despite my earlier telegram, therefore, I do not now wish you to propose this subject to the Council at the present time.

3. With regard to the problem facing the Government, I have come to the conclusion that it would be inappropriate to announce or even to take a final decision for some time, perhaps several weeks. It seems to me that if the matter is discussed in the Council there are three possibilities. One is that the general reaction will parallel that of the Three Great Powers, which are favourable to the proposed release. Should this occur it might be more difficult subsequently to refuse the Israeli request if that were desired; I do not think this development likely, however, in view of Spaak's attitude at the ministerial meeting and Norway's recent refusal to release Vampires to Israel. Perhaps more probable is a clear split, with the Three Great Powers favourable to the release and the rest, led by Belgium and Norway, opposed. This could be somewhat embarrassing, both to us and to the Council as a whole. Finally, and most probably, the expression of opinion apart from the three might well be inconclusive. This would do no harm, but would not help much. In summary, therefore, and confirming your own view, I cannot see that such a discussion at this particular time would greatly help us in determining our own policy on the question.

4. The possibility of using this problem to stimulate political discussions in the Council, obviously a desirable objective, is certainly more interesting. Here also, however, I have doubts. For one thing, such discussion should obviously be set in a proper context. It would not appear useful to initiate a council discussion of a particular case (such as the Israeli request for F-86's) without first holding a fairly thorough exchange of views on Arab-Israeli relations in general; within the framework of such a discussion it would then be possible to go on to consider the question of arms shipments to the area. To talk about arms export policy without a preparatory discussion of the general political problems would not appear likely to lead to constructive results; this would be still more true if discussion were to be focussed on a particular proposed shipment.

5. It might be that such a general discussion could be useful, although it would involve the risk of suggesting that NATO was becoming involved in Middle East affairs to counter Soviet intervention in the area. If it were to convey the impression that Arab-Israeli dispute is becoming another arena for the East-West conflict with which NATO is inevitably associated, it would run directly counter to the aim of establishing UN responsibility for the Middle East problem under which an understanding might be reached with the USSR. These considerations might militate against NATO identifying itself with any specific aspect of Middle East affairs, and in particular would make NATO involvement inopportune at the present time when there seems to be some real possibility of coming to an understanding on this matter with the Russians within the UN context.

6. Aside from the lack of previous preparation in the form of prior discussion of general Middle East problems, the request for F-86's has a more specific disadvantage as a subject for NATO consultation. There are certain factors having an important bearing on the problem which we would not feel free to introduce explicitly in the Council. The intelligence estimates available to us come mainly from US and UK sources, and we could not put before the Council the figures on estimated aircraft holdings of Middle East countries. Likewise we could not refer to the indications we have had of the views of UN officials, since this would compromise their position. It is doubtful whether we would advance the cause of consultation by introducing as an example a case on which we could not ourselves frankly put all of our cards on the table (a point on which we have been disposed in the past to criticize the Great Powers).

7. Finally, there is the risk of a leak. I understand that a recent issue of the Economist's "confidential report" has a fairly accurate and detailed account of the discussion of the Greek request for comments on the problem of providing transit facilities for Middle East arms shipments.⁷³ If it were to become known that NATO was discussing the actual merits of the Arab-Israeli dispute, or passing judgment on proposed arms shipments, it might do serious harm both to the organization and to the precarious situation in the Middle East by possibly appearing to put the dispute on a NATO-versus-Soviet-Bloc basis. If such discussion involved reference to the views or supposed views of UN officials it might even endanger the position of General Burns and his staff.

⁷³ Voir/See Foreign Report, No. 475, Confidential, May 10, 1956, "NATO's Arms Dilemma", p. 8.

8. I recognize that none of these objections is conclusive, but I am now doubtful if there are advantages sufficient to outweigh the disadvantages of bringing forward this particular Israeli request for discussion.

ARMS FOR ISRAEL

The Israeli Ambassador was instructed by his Prime Minister, Mr. Ben Gurion, to deliver to you personally a message. He very sensibly realized that you were too busy to receive him and he left it with me. I told him that I would forward it to you immediately and it is attached. He also hopes, and in view of the importance of the matter to Israel, I think this is not unreasonable, to have a word with you after you have studied the letter.⁷⁴

Mr. Comay also left with me an Aide Mémoire regarding the present Israeli application for F-86 jet planes, which I am also attaching to this memorandum.

So far as the first point is concerned, it seems depressingly evident that he is right in stating that the Security Council is not at present initiating any move toward a political solution. The meeting now being held will merely pass a resolution commending the Secretary General for his recent cease-fire effort, but does not go much further than that.

The Ambassador of Israel presents his compliments to the Prime Minister and has the honour to convey to him the following message from the Prime Minister of Israel:

"My dear Prime Minister,

Though not honoured with your acquaintance, I am addressing myself to you personally, relying on the sympathetic understanding of our problems, which, as I know from Mr. Sharett, you have always manifested.

⁷⁴ La note suivante a été jointe à ce document : The following note was attached to this document:

Memorandum for External: Please prepare an appropriate answer to the Ambassador. I am afraid it will not be possible for me to see him within the next few days nor to reach now an affirmative decision. L. St. L[aurant].

"The question of selling Israel a number of F.86 jet-planes has been for some time on the agenda of your Cabinet. I should like to impress you with the urgency of the matter, and its paramount importance for the preservation of peace in the Middle East.

"As a result of the acquisition by Egypt of some 250 jet-planes — fighters and bombers — of very high effectiveness, and of an additional number by Syria, we are faced with the menace of overwhelming superiority in the air. The attitude of the present rulers of Egypt — expressed in their preparations for aggressive warfare and in a virulent campaign of hatred and revenge against Israel, relentlessly pursued by their propaganda machine — impels us in the first instance to seek elementary safety in reinforcing our defensive strength.

"Our purchase of twenty-four French Mystères leaves us still gravely threatened. We do not aspire to full numerical parity in planes with Egypt, let alone with all the Arab countries together, but we are convinced that trebling the number of our fighter planes of this class is the indispensable minimum to deter aggression and to enable us, if need be, to withstand attack. Should Canada sell us twenty-four F.86's, France may well come forward with yet another twenty-four Mystères. If not, the French Government has already informed us that it is not prepared to continue in isolation as the sole Power willing to provide Israel with these necessary defensive arms. We shall then be left in the lurch.

"The right of nations to self-defense is enshrined in the Charter; yet that right remains an abstract formula, and aggression is encouraged, if the instruments of self-defense are beyond the reach of a nation whose security is endangered. Self-defense can become a reality only if States which possess or manufacture certain weapons are ready to place them at the disposal of friendly countries which do not. This is the moral and practical burden of my appeal to you.

"On a number of crucial occasions in the evolution of our fortunes during the past decade, Canada's weighty word has been of far-reaching importance. I feel confident that Canada will never have cause to regret her record with regard to Israel, which history will prove to have been one of international wisdom and justice. In the present case again, by responding to our urgent appeal, Canada will not merely extend a helping and protecting arm to Israel in the hour of her need and peril, but will act in the interests of international peace and co-operation.

With cordial and respectful greetings,

Yours sincerely,

DAVID BEN GURION"

The Ambassador of Israel wishes to renew to the Prime Minister the assurances of his highest consideration.

Aide-mémoire de l'ambassade d'Israël

Aide Mémoire from Embassy of Israel

Ottawa, May 31, 1956

The following recent developments have a bearing on Israel's application for F.86 jet planes which is at present under consideration by the Canadian Government:

1. The Security Council Discussion

It is now clear that the Security Council is not at present initiating any move towards the solution of Arab-Israel political issues. Arab delegations are apparently opposed even to the text of the United Kingdom draft Resolution, which does not call for any further specific action either by the Council or by the Secretary-General. In particular, they are strongly objecting even to mentioning the possibility of a "mutually acceptable" solution. It would appear, therefore, that the best that can be hoped for under present circumstances is to consolidate the ceasefire and avert the threat of war, by measures restoring some military balance.

2. Arab War Preparations

The information available from public and intelligence sources indicates that intensive war preparations in the Arab countries has not slackened, and that the threat to Israel continues to grow rapidly. For instance:

(a) Egypt has recently received an additional twenty Soviet jet-bombers, bringing its jet-bomber strength up to sixty, apart from about two hundred MIG jet-fighters.

(b) Egypt is now developing night-bombing capacity, against which Israel is helpless without F.86 interceptor jet-fighters.

(c) The delivery of Soviet planes to Egypt has been speeded up by flying them via Yugoslavia and Greece.

(d) Egyptian training programmes both in Egypt and in Polish and Czech military schools are being intensified.

(e) Egypt is establishing advance supply bases in the Gaza Strip and the Sinai Peninsula, in order to make forces operating against Israel less dependent upon lines of communication from the Nile Valley.

(f) Colonel Nasser has avowed that Egyptian recognition of Communist China has more military aid as a major motive.

(g) The Syrian-Czech arms deal, which has now officially been acknowledged, provides inter alia for the immediate delivery of twenty-five MIG jet-fighters, with perhaps more to come later.

(h) The recent changes in the Jordan Government and in the command of the Arab Legion have brought into control anti-Western and anti-Israel elements supported by Egypt, and have paved the way for integrating Jordanian forces into the Egyptian-led military coalition.

(i) There is a disquieting revival of Fadayeen activity across the Jordan border, and reports indicate the organized training of Fadayeen groups in Jordan with Egyptian help.

(j) Since the ceasefire negotiated by the Secretary-General, there has not been the slightest toning-down of the barrage of vicious anti-Israel incitement pouring through the Arab press and from Arab official radio stations. The Arab public is being indoctrinated with the notion that the "Palestine problem" can be solved only by the re-conquest of the country and the destruction of Israel.

Any study of Arab rearming established that it is proceeding under its own momentum, and that its scale and pace is determined solely by supply and absorptive capacity, and is little influenced by such defensive weapons as Israel may obtain.

3. The Time Factor

In the event of the sale of Canadian F.86's being approved, there will still be an unavoidable timelag of several months at least, before the planes can be ready for use in Israel.

They must be made available at the Canadian plant, undergo test flights, dismantled and crated, shipped from Halifax to Haifa, and reassembled and retested in Israel.

Apart from this, training facilities for the operating and maintenance of this type of aircraft will not be available to Israel until the purchase has actually been made.

These further delays involved in delivery and training must be seen against the fact that about eight months have already elapsed since Soviet jet-planes started arriving in Egypt.

ARMS FOR ISRAEL

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins: Before lunch today the Secretary of State raised this question with the Minister enquiring whether the Government had made any decision with regard to the F86s. Mr. Pearson told Mr. Dulles that the Cabinet had decided to do nothing now. There had been considerable pressures in Ottawa from both sides. He went on to tell Dulles (for his own personal information) that Burns did not himself consider that provision of these aircraft at this time would contribute to stability in the area.

2. Mr. Dulles said that the USA Government would like to be in a position to give prompt and effective assistance in the event of "a clear case of aggression coming up". If Egypt were the party attacked, the USA would be able to do this because of the nature of their requirements — anti-tank and anti-aircraft guns and the like. The position of Israel was different and more difficult. They wanted fighter aircraft which, because of training and technical requirements, would take longer and be more complicated to transfer effectively to the Israeli airforce. In this connection USA authorities had been wondering whether the Canadian manufacturer (Canadair) could allow a certain number of Israeli pilots and technicians to receive training at this stage, even though the Government were unwilling to release F86 aircraft.

3. The Minister undertook to have the Secretary's suggestion looked into on his return to Ottawa. He spoke of the Prime Minister's unwillingness in the present circumstances to have Canada take such a "dramatic" step as to provide twenty-four or more modern fighter aircraft to Israel. The situation might alter, of course, but for the moment the Government would not permit their release.

4. Mr. Dulles drew the Minister's attention to the heavy and growing political pressure upon the administration here to release arms to Israel. The President was probably the only person who could hold the line against such pressure and it remained in doubt whether this could continue to be done in an election year.

5. Finally, Mr. Dulles spoke of USA intelligence concerning Egyptian accumulation of submarines and naval equipment in considerable quantities. The reason for this was obscure and possibly sinister. This did not seem an appropriate concentration for anti-Israeli operations. Was there any Soviet purpose being served in this?

6. The State Department will no doubt be expecting to hear from us fairly soon on Mr. Dulles' enquiry concerning the possibility of training at Canadair for Israeli aircrew and technicians.

Dear Mr. Ambassador,

Mr. Pearson informed me of your recent interview with him, and sent me your Note No. 39 containing the message from Mr. Ben Gurion together with the Aide Mémoire concerning your Government's request for F-86 aircraft. I am aware that Mr. Ben Gurion wished you to deliver this message to me personally, and I regret that the demands on my time, especially Parliamentary demands, have not permitted me to see you. I have been considering carefully Mr. Ben Gurion's message and the various matters to which it relates. I should be most grateful if you would transmit to Mr. Ben Gurion the following reply to his message:

"My dear Prime Minister,

I wish to thank you for your recent message conveyed to me by Mr. Comay. Although, as you say, we have not met, I have been well aware of the problems with which your country is faced and which are so impressively described in your message, and I can assure you that my Cabinet colleagues and myself have the fullest understanding and sympathy for the difficult position in which Israel is today.

We are very conscious, particularly in the light of your message, of the considerations underlying your request for F-86 aircraft. Indeed we have had these considerations fully in our minds since your request was first received, and we recognize that you are anxious for a response.

Nevertheless this request raises very difficult and complicated problems for us — problems with which Mr. Comay is familiar and which I am sure he has brought to your attention. Unfortunately these problems are still under consideration and I am therefore unable to say now when a decision will be reached.

I realize that this must be a disappointment to you, and I wish to assure you again that we are in no sense unaware of the importance of this matter to you and your country. We have before us also, as you have, the essential fact that peace must be preserved in the Middle East and a constructive solution found to the conflict which has divided and deeply disturbed that area. We will do all in our power to contribute to those interdependent aims. You need no words of mine to assure you of the sympathy which I and my colleagues, and the people of Canada, have and will continue to have for all the people whose very lives have been rendered insecure as a result of that conflict.

In closing, I wish to thank you for communicating with me and I repeat that I have very much at heart the problems and burdens which press upon you.

With cordial and respectful greetings,

Yours sincerely,

LOUIS S. ST-LAURENT."

May I thank you in advance for sending this message on to your Prime Minister, and express again my regret that I am unable to talk to you about these matters at the present time.

I am, etc.

EXPORT OF F-86'S TO ISRAEL

I attach for your consideration a copy of a letter of June 15 from the Israeli Ambassador, Mr. Comay, to Mr. Pearson. It appears that this letter crossed the one which you sent to Mr. Comay the same day giving a reply to the message from Mr. Ben Gurion. I also attach for your convenience a copy of that letter, and of two background memoranda setting out various considerations having a bearing on the Israeli request.

2. I should point out that the complaints in Mr. Comay's letter are somewhat misleading. Mr. Pearson saw Mr. Comay (before his trip to Washington) and made it clear to him then that there was no immediate prospect of a decision. He undertook to talk to Mr. Comay again about the matter on his return from Washington (this he was unable to do) or on his return from Europe. Thus Mr. Comay had no reason to expect a decision by now or for some time to come. The new tone in his letter appears therefore to reflect fresh instructions rather than an unexpected delay on Canada's part.

3. Mr. Pearson spoke to me before his departure about this new letter from Mr. Comay. He asked me to bring it to your attention, and to suggest that it would be desirable for you to see Mr. Comay if you possibly can before your own departure for London. His suggestion was that you might speak to Mr. Comay along the general lines of your letter and the message for Mr. Ben Gurion.

4. I had an opportunity to discuss this matter further with Mr. Pearson before he left and he asked me to pursue it further with you. This subject has now been under consideration by the Government for several weeks, and not only are you under constant pressure from the Israeli authorities but also from Mr. Dulles who takes a special and keen interest in the matter. (Mr. Dulles called Mr. Livingston Merchant yesterday and asked him to make further representations about the training of Israeli pilots in Canada.) If there is little likelihood of the Government taking an affirmative decision in the near future, the time may have come to decide that the Israelis as well as our friends in Washington be told that no affirmative decision will be taken except as an element in a collective decision by the Western Powers on the need to provide Israel with military assistance of this type up to squadron strength. This would mean that Canada would not release F-86's to Israel unless such release were part of an agreed plan in which other Western Powers, preferably the United States and also the United Kingdom, Italy and possibly France, would participate. For example, Canada could provide six F-86's and the United Kingdom, the United States and Italy could do likewise, France having already provided twelve "Mystères". What would be important would be the collective nature of the decision involved.

5. The question of the training of Israeli pilots in Canada would create serious difficulties if divorced from the release of F-86's; if some planes were made available to Israel, however, it would be quite normal for Canadair and possibly the R.C.A.F. to train Israeli pilots since this is normally done when sales of planes are approved.

6. If you agree with this general line you might wish to mention it to Cabinet; if you prefer I could telegraph this proposal to Mr. Pearson in Paris and he might have time to mention it to the French authorities as well as to the Foreign Office on his return to London later on in the week.⁷⁵

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I have had instructions from my Government to request an interview with you in connection with our application for F.86 Sabre jets. As I understand you are leaving for Europe to-morrow, I am writing this note to you, and shall be entirely at your disposal should you be able to receive me for a talk before your departure.

The substance of my instructions is to convey the very great concern of my Government lest the urgent application made two and a half months ago should not meet with a positive response for yet a further period.

My Government is aware that this matter has been receiving earnest and sympathetic study, and that every factor and piece of information which in its opinion could have a bearing on it has been brought under our mutual examination. During this time, my Government has also been kept informed that a decision in Ottawa has been delayed by the necessity for full consultation with other interested governments, by the Hammarsjöld Mission, and recently by the pressure of events nearer home.

In the intervening period, the hope arose that the Security Council would initiate a move towards a mutually acceptable political settlement, but that hope has now been dashed. Furthermore, the expectation has not been realized that the Soviet Bloc might cease the flow of weapons to the Arab States, which has created so perilous an imbalance.

⁷⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

Original discussed with the Prime Minister by the Under-Secretary [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown].

Now, nine months after the original Czech-Egyptian arms deal, we witness Arab rearmament proceeding at a feverish pace, without any curb whatsoever, while the design to encircle Israel with a hostile military coalition under a joint command is making alarming progress.

In recent months we have received much assurance that the danger to Israel is recognized by Western statesmanship, and that the need is accepted to augment Israel's deterrent strength immediately, in order to avert a bloody catastrophe not only for us but for the whole world. My Government does not doubt the sincerity or the goodwill of the governments to whom it has turned in this emergency. Yet, two unhappy facts stare it in the face:

(a) that no Power, great or small, stands committed to Israel's defense; and

(b) that Israel has not been able to acquire adequate defensive armament — in particular, the three squadrons of modern interceptor planes which are the barest minimum to shield our people against devastation from the air. (By themselves, the 24 French Mystères could be swamped in battle by sheer weight of numbers.) It was the horrifying reality of this defencelessness against air attack which prompted Mr. Ben Gurion to cable the personal message to the Prime Minister, of which I handed you a copy a fortnight ago.

The point is now being reached where the Government must embark upon a sober reassessment of Israel's security plight. If it were forced to conclude that the F.86 planes did not seem to be obtainable from Canada in the near future, that conclusion might inevitably have far-reaching and grievous implications.

You will appreciate that only the gravity of the issues involved, and the mounting danger to the country, have brought my Government to state its position in such frank terms. It does so in the earnest hope that, in the light of this situation, the Canadian Government will now find it possible to take an affirmative decision. The manner in which that decision could most speedily and effectively be implemented could then be discussed.

In making this fresh submission, my government is conscious of that deep friendship and understanding which Canada has always demonstrated towards Israel and which the Premier of Israel recalled in his message.

I would greatly appreciate it if I could have the privilege of calling upon the Prime Minister in the near future in connection with Mr. Ben Gurion's communication.

Sincerely yours,

MICHAEL COMAY

EXPORT OF F-86'S TO ISRAEL

I attach a copy with enclosures of a memorandum for the Prime Minister based on a suggestion with which Mr. Pearson agreed before his departure for London. The Prime Minister discussed the matter with me this morning, and is favourably disposed to Mr. Pearson's suggestion. He asked me to inform you of the matter and to suggest that you should put the matter before Cabinet at its meeting tomorrow.

2. The proposal as I understand it is that the Government might now decide that the Israelis as well as our friends in Washington be told that no affirmative decision will be taken except as an element in a collective decision by the Western Powers on the need to provide Israel with military assistance of this type up to squadron strength. The purpose of such a decision would be to remove the Government from the present situation where it is not prepared to release the aircraft, but equally does not wish flatly and finally to reject the Israeli request. In the present position, of course, the Government has been subjected to continuous heavy pressure from the Israelis for a favourable decision, and this pressure has been dependent in large part on the indications by Mr. Dulles that he hopes we will take a favourable decision unilaterally.

3. Should the Government decide to follow the course suggested there would then arise the need to discuss with other Western Powers the question of whether such assistance should be provided on a collective basis to Israel. For this purpose it might be desirable for Canada to join NEACC (the "Near East Arms Coordinating Committee"), a body sitting in Washington with France, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States as members. While those countries have indicated that they would have no objection to our joining (and the U.K. at least would welcome it) we have so far declined in order to avoid any possible indirect commitment to join the other members in intervention should serious trouble break out in the Middle East.⁷⁶

4. It might be proposed in NEACC that a collective release of one squadron be arranged, with perhaps Canada, the U.K., Italy and the U.S. each providing 6 F-86's. (France has already released 24 Mystère fighters.) In such a case the training of Israeli pilots to fly these aircraft (which Mr. Dulles is pressing us to undertake) would fall easily and naturally into the pattern. Lacking such a collective basis for the release of aircraft, however, the training of pilots would not appear a desirable course.

5. The Prime Minister in an interview with the Israeli Ambassador this morning has given him some preliminary indication of this new line of thought, explaining that he was proposing to discuss it further with his colleagues. You might wish to have a word with the Prime Minister before the Cabinet meeting.

6. Assuming that you follow the Prime Minister's suggestion of raising the question in Cabinet tomorrow, you might wish to speak along the lines set out below. After outlining the dilemma which the Government at present faces in considering the Israeli request, you could suggest the need for a course which would neither involve releasing the aircraft unilaterally nor rejecting the request outright, and at the same time would remove the heavy pressure to which the Government has been subjected for many weeks now by both Israel and the United States. This could be attained by informing all governments directly concerned that Canada is not under present circumstances prepared to release F-86's to Israel except as an element in a collective decision by the Western Powers. It would certainly be desirable that such a collective decision should involve at least a token release by the United States, but the United States election perhaps creates a special situation. It might therefore be possible to consider a release in conjunction with the other two members of NEACC (Italy and the U.K.) which have not so far provided such aircraft if the United States could be clearly represented as a participant in the decision involved; that question could, however, be left until the attitude of the other governments could be determined.

7. I have not attempted to prepare a document for circulation to the Cabinet, since it appears to me unlikely that a precise formula can be presented for formal approval at this stage. It might be sufficient for Cabinet to approve now the general lines of the course proposed, leaving the details to be worked out by the Ministers most directly concerned (the Prime Minister, yourself and Mr. Pearson).

ARMS FOR ISRAEL; EXPORT OF F-86 AIRCRAFT
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE MAY 10)

13. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, said it now seemed undesirable for Canada to make F-86 aircraft available to Israel under a bilateral arrangement. This view appeared to have the support of the U.N. Secretary-General and General Burns. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was considering a proposal under which the aeroplanes might be exported, but only as part of a collective arrangement involving the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and possibly the United States. The Prime Minister had discussed the whole matter with the Israeli Ambassador the previous day.

14. The Prime Minister said he had informed Mr. Comay that, while Canada would not take a lead in providing arms on a bilateral basis, he would discuss the practicability of a collective arrangement with his colleagues. He had also told the ambassador that, should these powers decide collectively to provide arms on a joint basis, Canada would likely be prepared to share in the arrangement.

15. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The plan proposed might be possible of attainment, but it was doubtful if the U.S. would actually send any aircraft. The sale of one squadron of 25 aircraft was envisaged, with Canada supplying 6 if the U.S. took part, and 8 if she did not. It was noted that F-86's were produced in Italy, with U.S. aid, and if Italy were to take part, U.S. approval would be required.

(b) Participation in a collective decision to supply these arms did not necessitate joining the Near East Arms Co-ordinating Committee, even though it could be said that supplying the F-86's came about as a result of a decision of the committee's members.

(c) It was still considered advisable by some not to release the aircraft even under a collective arrangement.

16. The Cabinet noted the report of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs on the possibility of supplying Israel with a limited number of F-86 aircraft, as a result of a collective decision and under collective arrangements to be made by the United Kingdom, France, Italy, the United States, and Canada, and agreed that the proposal be discussed by the Prime Minister and the U.K. Prime Minister during the forthcoming Commonwealth meeting.

ISRAELI REQUEST FOR F-86 AIRCRAFT

In my immediately following telegram I am sending the text of a memorandum approved by Cabinet yesterday. The decision is that Canada will not unilaterally release any F-86's, but would consider joining with other countries in a collective action to assist Israel's defensive capabilities. To explore this possibility the first step is to learn the reaction of the United States to the idea that she might join Canada in such action with respect to F-86 aircraft. Merchant has spoken to me recently about this problem, and I therefore intend to seek United States views through the Embassy here. This telegram is to let you know our present position and the action I plan to take, both because you may be questioned by the State Department and because at a later stage discussions might be transferred to Washington.

ISRAELI REQUEST FOR F-86 AIRCRAFT

Following is the text of the memorandum mentioned in my telegram under reference, which was approved by Cabinet yesterday, Begins:

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 148/56

Ottawa, July 11, 1956

ISRAELI REQUEST FOR F-86 AIRCRAFT

The Israeli request for the release of 24 F-86 aircraft has now been under consideration for some time, but it is still very difficult to decide how best to proceed. There is suggested below a course of action which might be acceptable, and in order that it may be adequately assessed it is proposed to review briefly certain considerations relating to the request.

2. The Israeli case rests on (a) the continued hostility of the Arab states, involving an unwillingness to consider peace terms acceptable to Israel and the possibility of a breakdown of the armistice and a consequent attack on Israel; (b) the arms deal of last autumn whereby Egypt acquired through Czechoslovakia perhaps fifty Soviet IL 28 jet bombers and a number of MIG fighters variously estimated at up to two hundred. The Israelis contend that if war should come they would be incapable with their present airforce, equipped with obsolescent aircraft only, of conducting a defence of their centres of population against Egyptian bombing. They would be prepared, however, to face this threat if they had three squadrons (72 aircraft) of fighters capable of intercepting Egypt's modern bombers. To meet this declared requirement, in view of the apparent unwillingness of the United States to provide them with such aircraft, they have asked France to let them have 24 Mystères (roughly comparable to the F-86) and Canada and Italy each to provide 24 F-86's. France, after consultation with Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States, has recently released the 24 Mystères requested. Indeed there is an unconfirmed report that France is considering the release to Israel of a further 12 modern fighters, but it is also known that France does not wish to be alone in providing such equipment to Israel.

3. The Italian F-86's, should they be released, would involve the United States to a greater or lesser extent. These aircraft are being assembled (but not, we believe, completely manufactured) in Italy under a U.S. offshore procurement contract for NATO use. The same was true of the French Mystères, but they were a totally French aircraft both in design and manufacture. Release of F-86's from Italy would involve not only U.S. consent, but the consignment to Israel of aircraft of U.S. design and (apparently) partial U.S. construction, ordered under a U.S. contract. The United States Government has so far appeared reluctant to permit a diversion which would so much resemble the actual provision of the aircraft from the United States.

4. Canadian F-86's are produced in Canada under U.S. licence, but are virtually completely of Canadian manufacture with production taking place largely under Canadian Government contract. The United States is willing to see Canadian F-86's released to Israel, but it is entirely for the Canadian Government to decide whether or not such a release should be made.

5. Judged purely in terms of aircraft holdings, the Israeli requests are reasonable. On the other hand, it should be considered whether this increase in Israel's military capability albeit defensive, would in fact advance the cause of peace and assist in the search for a permanent and constructive solution to the problems of the Middle East. It may also be questioned whether the apparent refusal of the United States to play its part in solving this particular problem of Israel's air defences is reasonable and such that other countries should nevertheless respond to the Israeli appeal. Finally, and related to the last point, it should be considered whether the number of aircraft sought from Canada is justifiable in relation to the roles of the other western countries including the United States.

6. It can be argued that to provide these aircraft might if not increase at least do nothing to decrease the risk of war between Israel and the Arab states. It is apparently considered by some United Nations officials concerned that there is no immediate prospect of the Arabs starting such a war, and that the military insecurity in which Israel now stands is helpful in inducing her to be more reasonable. Conversely, if her present fear of Egyptian bombing were removed, Israel might demonstrate again the uncompromising, even belligerent attitude of which she has given some evidence in the past. On the other hand, it is not considered that the Egyptian Air Force will have mastered its new equipment for a few months yet, and there is always the possibility that Israel in desperation may seek war before that time comes in order not to lose her present relatively favourable military position. This risk of "preventive" war, if it is a real one, might be averted if Israel were to have the assurance that she will receive fighter aircraft in time to prevent Egyptian domination of the air.

7. To assess these political considerations is very difficult, and requires the fullest possible intelligence information which is available to Canada only with the assistance of the United States and the United Kingdom. A judgment as to whether or not Israel should receive the aircraft she has requested from the western democracies must relate full knowledge of the military capabilities of the countries concerned with the most careful estimates possible of their courses of action both if the aircraft are provided and if they are not.

8. If on balance it appears that Israel should receive all or part of the aircraft requested, there then arises the question of where they should come from. Already France has provided some, with U.S. and U.K. concurrence, and the United States and the United Kingdom have given Canada some encouragement to do likewise. This would appear to imply that the three countries with the best information on which to judge believe that the aircraft should be released. But two of these three countries whose positions are important to Canada are apparently themselves unwilling to act in the matter. It is difficult to see why Canada should act unilaterally, having less direct responsibility than any of the others. In addition there is the fact that Canada is serving on the Truce Supervision Organization, and her position there might well be prejudiced by the release. Resentment in Arab capitals, moreover, might lead to injury to the moderate volume of Canadian-Arab trade, violence against Canadian representatives, and other consequences only indirectly related to the aircraft transaction.

9. I would in this situation propose the following course of action. The Government might now decide that it will not unilaterally release any F-86's to Israel, but that in certain circumstances it would consider joining with another country or countries directly concerned to provide some aircraft. Such a release should depend (a) upon a joint or collective decision of those countries that the provision of such aircraft was desirable in their own interests and in the interests of security in the Middle East, and (b) upon collective action to assist Israel's defensive position. Such collective action might involve (subject to the collective decision on the total number of aircraft Israel should receive) the release of perhaps 12 F-86's by the United States, a like number by Canada, (possibly together with releases of some defence equipment by the United Kingdom). It may be, however, that it would not be possible to persuade the United States to participate so directly in the release of the aircraft; in that case a possible alternative which might be considered (but which I think should not be mentioned to the United States at this stage) would involve the release of some F-86's by Canada and, with the public consent of the United States, by Italy, together with releases of other defensive equipment by the United Kingdom and the United States. In neither case would any further French action be required, in view of the release of Mystères which has already taken place.

10. What I have in mind is a decision that no release should be made unilaterally, and that any release made as part of a collective action should follow a collective decision that such aircraft should be provided for Israel. The exact form of any such collective arrangement could be considered later if it appears that the other governments concerned would be willing to participate.

11. If the suggestion above is accepted, it would follow that we should take some action to initiate a discussion of this question among the Governments concerned. As the position of the United States would be of over-riding importance, I would propose first that our Ambassador in Washington should sound out the U.S. Secretary of State on the matter. If Mr. Dulles is not unreceptive, I would suggest that a meeting of representatives of the countries directly involved might then be arranged. This could conveniently take place in Washington, since the Ambassadors there of France, Italy and the United Kingdom have been accustomed in recent months to meet from time to time with senior officials of the State Department to discuss questions relating to the Middle East.

12. I therefore recommend that our Ambassador in Washington be instructed to explain to Mr. Dulles that Canada is not prepared to make a unilateral release, and to discuss with him the possibility of this question being considered collectively along the lines I have indicated. If Mr. Dulles does not appear firmly opposed, the Ambassador would be instructed to arrange a meeting with the Ambassadors of France, Italy and the United Kingdom and a suitable representative of the State Department. It would be the purpose of that meeting to seek an agreed judgment on whether or not it is desirable for Israel to be provided with modern jet fighters in addition to those which have gone from France, and if so to explore in a preliminary way the question of where they might come from, along the lines of collective action suggested above. Any specific proposal, which to be acceptable would have as a minimum to incorporate the concept of specific action by all or almost all of the five governments, would of course be referred to Governments for consideration.

ISRAEL'S APPLICATION FOR JET AIRCRAFT

The Minister saw the Israeli Ambassador at 12:30 on July 13 at Mr. Comay's request.

2. Mr. Pearson opened the interview by saying that he understood the Ambassador wished clarification of the statement which the Prime Minister made in the House on July 11⁷⁷ concerning the question of export of F-86 aircraft to Israel. The Minister said that there had not been much discussion in London on the specific question of arms for Israel. At the meeting of the Prime Ministers there had been some general talk about the situation in the Middle East. With regard to his own conversation with United Kingdom authorities, the Minister said he had heard nothing to indicate that they were not in favour of Canada providing the aircraft, although they had not been so emphatic about it as had United States authorities.

3. Mr. Pearson explained that what the Prime Minister had meant was that Canada was not prepared, in present circumstances, to make a unilateral provision of jet aircraft to Israel. The Canadian government might, however, be ready to participate now in some collective arrangement for supplying interceptor aircraft, if the United States would do likewise. The United States and Canada for example might each provide 12 F-86s, which could make up a full squadron; Italy might also release some jets and other countries might offer different forms of defensive military equipment.

4. Mr. Comay said that this response to the Israeli request would cause disappointment to his government and he hoped it was not the last word. The Minister replied that it was not perhaps a "final" last word. The situation would have to be examined in the light of the reply from the United States. Until that was known, however, it would have to be considered the last word.

5. The Israeli Ambassador observed that if the Prime Minister, when he referred to collective action, meant action to provide Israel with a variety of defensive military equipment, of which F-86s would be a part, then the conditions he required already existed because Israel had acquired a considerable amount of defensive material from Western countries such as Italy, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, as well as obtaining a certain amount from the United States. Mr. Pearson said he wished to make it clear that the Prime Minister's references to collective action were related specifically to jet interceptor aircraft. The Prime Minister did not intend to place obstacles in the way of the Israeli government's getting defensive equipment where it could. The difficulty for us about the F-86s was that their provision would be a spectacular gesture.

6. Mr. Comay pointed out it was not correct to say that Canada, if it provided jets, would be taking the lead in this matter. France had already done this by releasing Mystères. There were only three sources of supply open to Israel, namely the United States, France and ⁷⁷ Voir Canada, Chambre des Communes, Débats, 1956, volume VI, pp. 6070-6071.

Canada. Mr. Pearson mentioned Italy as a possible source. Mr. Comay said he would regard Italian F-86s in the same category as American aircraft, since United States approval for their export to Italy would be necessary. He also observed that Italian F-86s were not as good as their Canadian counterparts, which had the Oranda engine. He stated that the French were unwilling to provide more jets for Israel alone but that they might release additional Mystères if Canada sold F-86s to Israel.

7. Mr. Pearson promised to get in touch with the Israeli Ambassador and inform him as soon as we knew the United States response to the collective action proposal. Mr. Comay thanked him, observing that the heat would now be on Mr. Dulles.

8. The Minister expressed the hope that there would not be any publicity about the new trend of discussion with the United States. The Government was anxious that it should not be presented publicly as a Canadian initiative.

9. In conversation after leaving the Minister's office the Israeli Ambassador said that he had been talking in Washington with Mr. Eban, who had just returned from consultation in Israel with the new Foreign Minister. Mr. Eban had reported that the atmosphere in Israel was sober and not excited. The Cabinet was still giving top priority to the necessity for jet interceptor aircraft. Almost as urgent, in the Israeli Government's view, was a deficiency in heavy tanks and modern anti-tank weapons, in order to off-set a decisive Egyptian superiority in heavy tanks. The Egyptians had considerable numbers of Centurion and Stalin tanks, which could not be matched by the Israelis and which were a serious threat, in view of the terrain and short distances involved.

regarding the time of issuance of such a statement but the first part of August is being considered. Hammarskjöld's report on his present trip to the Middle East would be taken into account in this connection. Incidentally, Hammarskjöld has been informed of the general lines of this proposal and has welcomed it.

If the Canadian Government could see its way to releasing to Israel 12 F-86's, the United States Government would be prepared to approve the export from the United States of certain quantities of helicopters, machine guns and scout cars. These items, however, would not be released simultaneously and the United States would make a strong effort to prevent publicity at this time. However, the United States would keep you informed as licenses were issued.

The Department of State would welcome the opportunity of discussing these matters confidentially in Washington with a representative of the Department of External Affairs. Among aspects which could be usefully discussed would be means of employing these transactions as incentives to induce Israeli's full co-operation with the UN and the UNTSO, as well as questions of timing.

I know you also recognize the necessity of avoiding the sudden public disclosure of a series of moves involving major shipments to Israel by the Western powers. Accordingly, we think our programs should be carefully spaced out with every effort directed toward avoiding premature public knowledge.

Sincerely yours,

LIVINGSTON T. MERCHANT

ISRAEL'S APPLICATION FOR JET INTERCEPTOR AIRCRAFT

At the Minister's request the U.S. Ambassador called to see him at noon today. Mr. Pearson told him that, following consideration of the matter by the Cabinet,⁸¹ he could now give the Ambassador a reply to his letter of July 25 regarding collective action to provide Israel with defensive military equipment. The Minister said that Canada would not wish to take action, which would have to be made public, before the United States had done so. Putting it more positively, if the United States would issue export licences for not less than two of the items mentioned in the Ambassador's letter of July 25, e.g. helicopters and scout-cars, the Canadian government would release to Israel 12 F-86 aircraft and public announcement would be made in Canada of this transaction. Mr. Pearson emphasized that the Canadian Prime Minister would wish to state publicly what the United States had done, that is he would refer to the fact that the United States had given permits for the export of the helicopters and scout-cars. He understood that the United States in any case planned to make a public announcement regarding the stockpiling of certain military supplies and equipment in close proximity to the Middle East area. The Prime Minister would also probably mention that other Western countries had provided defensive military equipment to Israel.

2. The United States Ambassador replied that President Eisenhower would not wish publicity to be given to the granting of export permits to Israel for such items as the helicopters and scout-cars. Mr. Pearson repeated that it would be necessary for the Canadian Prime Minister to make public statements along the lines he had indicated. He presumed that, even if the United States Government would not make public announcements coincident with the granting of export licences for the helicopters and scout-cars for Israel, nevertheless it would not be possible to keep the matter from public knowledge once the permits had been issued. The facts would become known either through the Israelis or in some other manner. Mr. Merchant agreed.

3. The Minister went on to say that, if other defensive military equipment were made available to Israel by the United States or other Western countries, the Canadian government might subsequently release another 12 F-86 aircraft to Israel, perhaps some 6 or 12 weeks later. He told the Ambassador about the indications we had received from the French, that they might supply an additional 12 Mystères to Israel if Canada were to release 12 F-86 aircraft.

14. The United States Ambassador said he would at once convey to his government the information which had been given to him by Mr. Pearson. The Minister said that he proposed to advise the Israeli Ambassador immediately of the Canadian views in this matter in the same terms as they had been given to Mr. Merchant.

ISRAEL'S APPLICATION FOR JET INTERCEPTORS

When Merchant called on me this morning about the Suez matter, he told me that his government while appreciating our suggestion regarding co-operative action in regard to arms for Israel did not feel that in view of the tense situation brought about by Nasser's action re the Suez, they could agree to release even helicopters or scout cars at this time. They would now wish to wait and see how things developed as, they hoped, we would. They felt that any help to Israel at this particular moment might have the wrong effect, encouraging the extremists in both Israel and Egypt. They would, however, have another look at the situation in a few days.

2. I told Merchant that we would on our part not take any action regarding the F-86's without further consideration or until they had decided to accept our earlier proposal.

RELEASE OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

The United States Ambassador called this morning to report that the State Department position on the release of arms to Israel remained as follows: they agreed in principle to the sequence proposed by the Canadian Government but in view of the Suez Canal situation would not wish to have any announcement appear for the time being, as they would not wish a decision to release arms to Israel to be interpreted as retaliatory action against Nasser for his expropriation of the Suez Canal.

2. I suggested that the decision of the French, as reported to me by the French Chargé, to supply an additional 24 Mystères to Israel, probably to be designated as part of the communal effort to meet Israel's defence needs, might make it necessary to consider whether some ceiling on the supply of arms to Israel should not be agreed upon. Mr. Watkins thought that we had had a telegram from Paris stating that at the meetings in London, the French had agreed to go along with the United States and the United Kingdom in delaying further deliveries of arms to Israel in present circumstances.

3. (According to telegram no. 547 of July 30† from Paris, Crouy of the Foreign Office, on learning the Canadian position, stated that in deference to United Kingdom and United States views, which the French accept in order to preserve the unity of the Western position, they have agreed to withhold for the time being any decision on the supply of additional aircraft or other armaments to Israel. They would reexamine this aspect of the Middle East situation once agreement had been reached on the Suez plan being worked out in London.)

4. Mr. Merchant had got in touch with the State Department and found that the position remained as described above. It appeared that Mr. Eban's interpretation of his conversation with Mr. George Allen, as reported to me late yesterday afternoon by Mr. Comay, was mistaken.

5. Mr. Merchant was concerned about the Suez Canal situation, but emphasized that, although the nationalization was illegal and generally reprehensible, it was of much less immediate importance, in the view of the United States Government, than the matter of keeping the Canal open for international traffic. I mentioned that the Belgian Ambassador, Mr. Eeman, who knows the Middle East well, had told me that he was sure that the Egyptians were incapable of operating the Canal themselves without the assistance of the highly qualified foreign technicians now employed there. A mistake in the elaborate operation could easily result in an accident which would close the Canal to traffic for a long time. On the other hand, no one would wish to demand that the foreigners continue to work for Nasser against their will. It seemed to me, however, that the suggestion for an international conference to discuss the situation was hopeful. Mr. Merchant agreed but said that the Americans were worried only that it should not be called before there had been time for adequate preparations; it was a complicated business with need for careful thought and drafting. He thought then that Mr. Dulles did not intend to go to London but has since telephoned to say that he is flying this afternoon.

6. As you know, Mr. Comay wished to see you this afternoon; he dropped in to see me instead. The purpose of his visit was to find out the conclusion reached by Cabinet on the export of arms. I told him that I was not in a position to let him know since I had not seen you after Cabinet this afternoon. He then referred to David McIntosh's article in the *Gazette*⁸² this morning linking the seizure of the Suez Canal with the supply of arms to Israel, and asked whether there was any truth in this. I then referred to my conversation with Mr. Merchant and read to him the underlined part of paragraph 1 of this memorandum. I also referred to the decision taken by the French referred to in paragraph 3. Mr. Comay said that it was ironical indeed that as a result of the provocative attitude adopted by Nasser, the Israelis would now be prevented from receiving jet interceptors. He went on to say that if the Western powers continued to link the sale of arms to Israel with a settlement of the Suez Canal issue, there was little hope that his country would be provided with interceptors for a fairly lengthy period. In his view the negotiations will be long and difficult, and the West will not wish to indispose Nasser at least during those negotiations. I told him that his argument was quite forceful but that it should be related to the wider issues of peace and war in the Middle East. As I saw it, the problem was whether Israel would be better off if it received now two or three dozen jet aircraft and thus had to face a more irresponsible Nasser than the one we already knew, or, to do without the planes in the hope that a conference on the Suez Canal might lead to some pacification.

7. Mr. Comay is to call me tomorrow morning to find out what decision, if any, has been taken by Cabinet.

EXPORT OF AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL; SUEZ CANAL SITUATION
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE JULY 27)

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that on further consultation with the U.S. government, their first reaction had been to accept the proposal that Canada would send 12 F-86's immediately to Israel and 12 others two months later, provided that the U.S. would announce their plans to maintain stockpiles of military supplies and equipment close to the Middle East area for delivery to any nation subjected to aggression. The U.S. government would have authorized the Canadian government to make public that the U.S. had issued permits to export to Israel certain quantities of at least two of the three following items: helicopters, machine guns, or scout cars. However, as a result of the action taken by Egypt in assuming control over the Suez Canal, the U.S. government had decided to defer arms shipments to Israel until a settlement had been found to the dispute arising from this move. The U.S. had advised the Canadian and French governments to adopt the same attitude.

The situation with respect to the Suez Canal was still confused. Talks between the U.S., the U.K. and France now taking place in London would probably result in a proposal to establish an international control board, under the auspices of the United Nations, to ensure the unrestricted passage of ships through the canal. Representatives of the three governments were still discussing the details of that proposal. Reports indicated that the U.K. intended to suggest, as a next step, that this project be considered at a meeting of countries most immediately concerned with the control over the Suez Canal but excluding the U.S.S.R. and Egypt. Such a suggestion did not seem to be very realistic.

15. During the discussion it was pointed out that Sir Anthony Eden had written a letter⁸³ to the Prime Minister showing grave concern over the situation created by Egypt's decision to nationalize the Suez Canal Company, and expressing the intention of the U.K. government to take firm action in order to protect British interests in the area. In his reply,⁸⁴ the Prime Minister had indicated that the views already expressed to the U.K. government by Mr. Robertson were a reflection of the Canadian government's attitude on this matter, and that he fully shared Sir Anthony's great concern over Egypt's action.

16. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the export of aircraft to Israel, and deferred decision pending further consideration of the situation arising out of Egypt's move to assume control over the Suez Canal.

PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], August 7, 1956

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I felt heartened by your statement in the House last Wednesday night about our F.86 request,⁸⁵ when you expressed the hope that a decision might be announced within a few days. Almost a week has since gone by and in the absence of news, I am becoming increasingly perturbed lest the "relationship" of which you spoke may develop between our request and the Suez crisis. With your permission, I would like in this personal note to suggest some reasons why it would be in all our interests if this matter could now be disposed of, without more delay:

(a) The current events have shown an inflamed Arab nationalism on the rampage in our area, with Israel's safety very much involved. As I wrote to you on 27 July, "the implication is that we must more than ever concern ourselves with the urgent task of putting our defences in order and, in particular, must create an effective deterrent to any sudden air strike."

(b) Our request arose out of Colonel Nasser's Soviet arms deals, and it would be anomalous if it were held up now because he had seized the Canal.

(c) In the context of the general crisis the decision in Ottawa would attract less attention than before, and would more quickly recede into the background of events. On the other hand an announcement now delayed may become more awkward as the situation develops.

(d) I understand that the American Government has undertaken to release certain of the items we have ordered, and that these releases, together with what has been done by other Powers, would be accepted as meeting Canada's stipulations. Could these undertakings not now be regarded as in themselves the basis for a decision? If it were stated in general terms that in the consultations with "other governments", the "collective principle" had been met, surely such a statement would not require to be spelt out? These transactions would after all be between Israel and the other governments concerned, and Canada would not be directly a party to them.

(e) However, if it was felt that decisions of this kind should not yet be made public, because of the Suez crisis, could the mind of the Israel Government not be set at rest in the meantime, by confidentially communicating the decision to it?

You have all along shown such awareness of the moral and psychological aspects of this matter, that you will readily appreciate how heavily fresh suspense and uncertainty press upon us, in an ominous situation.

Sincerely yours,

MICHAEL COMAY

F-86'S FOR ISRAEL

I saw the Israeli Ambassador for half an hour today. He had little to add to the arguments contained in his letter to the Minister of August 7.

His main pre-occupation was, of course, that authority to export F-86's should be given as soon as possible. I told him that because of the desirability of not mixing up the questions of arms for Israel and the Suez dispute, the Government had found it necessary to defer making a decision. I could not predict how long a period of deferment would be considered necessary but it seemed to me unlikely that Ministers would want to make an announcement before the opening of the Suez Conference on August 16. Mr. Comay naturally argued in favour of the shortest possible delay contending that the Conference and its aftermath would drag on for a long time during which it would be more difficult than ever for the Canadian Government to announce a decision. In his view, it would be much simpler to get the F-86 issue out of the way before the Suez Conference began.

As a final point, Mr. Comay enquired whether, as suggested in paragraph (e) of his letter, if we could not make public a decision to export, we could not communicate a favourable decision confidentially to the Government of Israel. I said that we would of course consider this suggestion but I thought that Ministers would almost certainly prefer not to give a confidential assurance that could not be made known to Parliament and the public.

Mr. Comay did not raise, nor did I, the question of Export Credits Insurance. Trade and Commerce had recently been bombarded with high pressure requests for insurance under the Export Credits Insurance Act which is an entirely new feature of this already complicated problem. This may be just a try-on by the Israelis which they will not pursue when they realize how many difficulties it presents to the Canadian Government.

Dear Jules [Léger]:

This will confirm for the personal and confidential use of the Cabinet and yourself the information given you orally yesterday regarding the decision of the United States Government to approve the purchase in the United States by Israel of five helicopters, 50 half-tracks and 200 machine guns. This approval is contingent on the specific condition that the Israel authorities will agree to make every effort to prevent any publicity whatever concerning these sales and that neither France nor Canada will use in any public manner these sales as a justification for the sale of arms by Canada or France. The United States Government realizes that in all probability this action will not be regarded by Canada as a sufficient basis for the sale of F-86s. The United States, however, does not at this time wish to have its action serve as the basis for a decision by other governments to sell arms to Israel because of serious concern over the Suez situation.

The United States plans to proceed with the sales indicated above without tying them in with action by France or Canada. Helicopters are in short supply and actual delivery may be delayed, but Israel will be able to place orders now. Twenty-five halftracks are immediately available but the balance will also be delayed. One hundred machine guns are available for prompt shipment.

A further problem exists with regard to the training of Israeli pilots. If Israel is attacked, it is most likely that the planes which could be furnished Israel from Europe would be F-86s which would be of little value unless Israeli pilots have had training in this type of plane. The United States is looking into the possibilities of training overseas and believes that if Canada decides against the sale of 24 planes, Israel may try to obtain two or three from Canada for training purposes.

Sincerely yours,

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO ISRAEL

Mr. Tyler Thompson of the United States Embassy came in to see me this morning about the release of F-86's to Israel. He had just received a telegram from Washington, part of which read as follows:

"Before we carry out our decision permitting Israelis to obtain five helicopters, fifty half-tracks and two hundred machine guns here, we need to be clear there is full understanding between the United States and Canadian Governments that if our action becomes known publicly despite our efforts to keep it quiet, the Canadian Government will not cite our action as justification for any decision it may reach re sale of F-86's."

2. The reason given for this approach was that the State Department wished to take all possible precautions to prevent that the release of such military equipment to Israel be linked up in any way to the problem of Suez.

3. I asked Tyler Thompson if I should infer that the United States would not release this equipment to Israel until they had received an assurance from the Canadian Government that "the Canadian Government will not cite our (U.S.) action as justification for any decision it may reach re sale of F-86's". In other words, that the onus for the release of United States equipment was now with the Canadian Government. He replied that such was his understanding.

4. I then made the following points:

(a) There will be no opportunity to consider this problem until you have returned on August 26. If the matter has to be considered by Cabinet it may be further delayed.

(b) It is most unlikely that the release by the United States could be kept secret for long. The moment the press got wind of it the State Department would have to confirm this release. Would it then be possible for the Canadian authorities to use this confirmation as a basis for a decision on the F-86's. Mr. Thompson didn't know the answer.

(c) The moment this information became public it would be impossible to prevent speculation on the relationship of such a release to the Suez crisis, particularly if the negotiations now going on in London were inconclusive. The question therefore was whether it was worth while to release such equipment at this time and thus add fuel to an already most inflammable situation or delay a decision for sometime in the hope that a compromise solution will have been reached on Suez.

5. I told Mr. Thompson that we would be getting in touch with him once the matter had been discussed further after your return.

F-86'S FOR ISRAEL⁸⁶

The Israel Ambassador called this afternoon to report a change in the United States attitude on the release of arms for Israel as he understood it from a rather guarded telephone conversation with the Israeli Ambassador in Washington, Mr. Eban, who had discussed the matter with some senior official in the State Department, he thought Mr. Murphy.

2. Mr. Comay's understanding of the U.S. position coincided with what Mr. Tyler Thompson had told me in the morning (see my memorandum of August 20) except that Mr. Comay did not know (and of course I could not tell him) that the Americans did not propose to release the arms without an undertaking by the Canadian Government not to make any reference to the American release,⁸⁷ even if news of it leaked to the press, in justification of the Canadian Government's release of F-86's. Indeed, Mr. Comay said that he expected soon to be able to inform us that the United States licences had been issued.

3. Mr. Comay said that the Israeli Government would be glad to agree not to give the matter any publicity, although it would undoubtedly be very reassuring to the Israeli public to know that such assistance was promised, and he could almost guarantee that there would be no leak in Israel. I pointed out to Mr. Comay, as I had to Mr. Thompson, that once the shipment of hardware of this started it could hardly fail to be spotted by the press. The State Department would then be asked and forced to admit that licences had been issued. Mr. Comay agreed that it would be extremely difficult to preserve secrecy but suggested that although the licences might be granted now actual shipment might be delayed for a couple of months by which time the danger of associating the question of arms for Israel with the Suez problem might have evaporated.

4. For what he described as purely practical considerations, mainly financial and technical, Mr. Comay urged strongly that if a decision were reached to release F-86's for Israel, the whole 24 should be released at once instead of in two stages of 12 each at an interval of six weeks or so. The financing and shipping were complicated operations and it would be more expeditious if arrangements could be made for all 24 at one time. Mr. Comay had gone into these matters in some detail with officials of the Canadair Company and on the priority question with Mr. Howe, who had thought that delivery could start in November and be completed by February.

5. I explained to Mr. Comay that as matters now stood another reference to Cabinet would be required in any case. There was a possibility of a Cabinet meeting next week, if a quorum could be obtained. If not, there would certainly be a Cabinet meeting the week following. Mr. Comay said that he was expecting a written communication from Mr. Eban providing fuller information than he had been able to give over the telephone and promised to let us know of any further developments which might be of assistance in preparing a submission to Cabinet.⁸⁸

The Israeli Ambassador called this morning to report new developments in the matter of the sale of arms to Israel.

2. According to his information, the United States had issued licenses for the sale of certain items, those, he supposed, earlier specified. The Israeli Military Attaché, Col. Solomon, was at present discussing the details with the U.S. Military, who had been given the green light by the State Department. The understanding was still that there would be no publicity either from the U.S. or Israeli Government.

3. The British had released certain arms shipments to Israel which had been temporarily frozen. Apparently the decision to do so had been reached while the London Conference on the Suez Canal was in progress.

4. Mr. Comay understood that the French (although he could not be so definite about this as about the U.S. and U.K. developments) had now decided to go ahead with the release of the 24 Mystères which they had been on the point of releasing when the Suez crisis induced a delay. Mr. Comay had wired for confirmation of this information and promised to let us know when he had a reply.

5. The Israeli Government hoped that in view of this information the Canadian Government might very soon decide that the sale of the F-86's to Israel, already approved in principle, but held in suspense, could now be agreed upon, whether it was considered advisable to make an announcement now or later.

6. In the timing of the announcement, as he had stated in a letter to you some time ago, the Israeli Government could adapt itself to the wishes of the Canadian Government, but would like to be informed in advance when a decision was reached.

7. I observed that the chief new element in the situation was the issuing of licences by the Americans. That, together with the British action and the probable French action, appeared to meet the Canadian Government's desire that the release of F-86's should be part of a collective effort, except that the U.S. had not agreed to the Canadian condition that its decision should be made public. I could not myself see how publicity could be avoided. Mr. Comay thought that this was a matter on which a compromise could probably be worked out between the Canadians and the Americans and in which the Israelis were not directly concerned. It seemed to him that a Canadian announcement could be drafted in some way that would get around the difficulty (for example, that "as a result of consultations with other governments, the Canadian Government has decided, etc"), and not force Mr. Dulles to place Mr. Loy Henderson in too uncomfortable a position in Cairo.

8. Mr. Comay returned again to the point he had made in his last call about the desirability of reaching a decision on the release of all 24 F-86's, even if the actual shipment of 12 were to be further delayed. With the two-stage operation it would be necessary to make the decision all over again in six weeks or so. As a matter of fact, more than six weeks had now elapsed since the suggestion for a two-stage operation had been made. But, what was more important, the practical arrangements for delivery and shipment would be further complicated, as he had already noted. He said that he would write me a letter on this aspect of the matter.

9. I told Mr. Comay that I would bring these new developments to your attention and see what we could do. He said that he would like to see you as soon as possible after your return, as he was anxious for his own sake to be able to wire his Government that he was pursuing the matter at all possible levels.

THE SUEZ CANAL DISPUTE AND THE RELEASE OF F.86'S TO ISRAEL

In view of the possibility that the question of the release of F.86's to Israel may be raised in Cabinet at its meeting on August 29, I have endeavoured to set out below some of the implications of the recent shift in the viewpoint of the U.S. Administration regarding the release of military equipment to Israel.

As you will have learned from my memorandum of August 16† to you in Toronto, Mr. Tyler Thompson handed me on August 15 a letter from the United States Ambassador which informed us of the decision of the United States Government to approve the purchase in the United States by Israel of five helicopters, 50 half tracks and 200 machine guns. This approval was contingent on the specific condition that the Israel authorities would agree to make every effort to prevent any publicity whatsoever concerning these sales, and that neither France nor Canada would use in any public manner these sales as a justification for the sale of arms by Canada or France. Mr. Merchant's letter went on to say that the United States Government realised that in all probability we would not regard this action as a sufficient basis for the sale of F.86's but that the United States did not at this time wish to have its action serve as the basis for a decision by other governments to sell arms to Israel because of its serious concern over the Suez situation.

As you know Cabinet on July 12 concluded that while no release of F.86's would be made by Canada alone the possibility of our releasing the aircraft within the framework of a collective western decision might be examined and that the views of Mr. Dulles might be sought. On July 28 the United States Ambassador informed you that his Government did not feel that in view of the tense situation created by Nasser's action in respect of the Canal they could now agree to release the helicopters and half tracks to Israel. In reply you informed Mr. Merchant that we would not on our part take any action regarding the F.86's without further consideration, or until the Americans decided to accept our earlier proposal regarding co-operative action. On July 31 Cabinet agreed to defer decision pending further consideration of the situation arising out of Egypt's move to assume control over the Suez Canal. This is the present position with regard to Cabinet decisions.

The reason behind the original United States recommendation conveyed to you by Mr. Merchant on July 28, and which was concurred in by the other two major western powers, was a concern lest a decision to release military weapons, even of a defensive nature, to Israel at the time of the Suez crisis might give the appearance that the West was arming Israel in order to use her as a brake on Nasser's ambitions and that this would further inflame Egyptian and Arab opinion generally and reduce the possibility of the successful outcome of the London Conference. Mr. Robertson also informed us that the United Kingdom authorities had requested us to treat as being "in abeyance" their earlier views regarding a possible collective western decision to arm Israel. The view of the three major western powers that the Suez crisis and the Arab-Israel dispute must be kept separate found further support with the Government of Pakistan, whose Foreign Secretary transmitted a personal message† to you to this effect through Mr. Scott on July 31.

The United States decision to modify its attitude on the release of arms to Israel may have been prompted in part by purely domestic considerations. On August 15, at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, a plank was adopted whereby the Party, if returned to power, would undertake to supply defensive weapons to Israel to "correct the imbalance" of arms shipments to the Middle East. It is not impossible that the decision of the Administration to reverse its earlier stand on the export of the helicopters and half tracks to Israel may have been prompted by a wish to cut the political ground from under the feet of the Democrats and it is open to question whether such considerations would have the same validity for Canada.

When Mr. Thompson called to see me I told him that I thought that there was little likelihood that the decision to approve the export of helicopters, half tracks and machine guns would remain secret, and we should therefore realise that one of the conditions set by the United States Administration would not be met. On August 20 Mr. Thompson presented to me a refinement of Mr. Merchant's Note of August 16. He said that the State Department's position now was that they would not agree to release the helicopters, etc., to Israel unless they had our assurance that we would not make any reference to the United States decision as having influenced our own decision in the matter. Neither of these proposals meets the conditions laid down by you in your conversation of July 27 with the United States Ambassador in which you informed Mr. Merchant that "the Canadian Prime Minister would wish to state publicly that the United States had given permits for the export of helicopters and scout cars". Taken together the two communications from the United States Embassy could be interpreted as inviting us either to "go it alone" or even to decline to release the jets at this time.

These somewhat complicated proposals immediately became known to the Israeli Embassy in Washington and Mr. Comay has called on us a number of times and Mr. Eban has called twice on Mr. Heaney to urge that we now reconsider the release of the F.86's. It has been the impression of the Israeli Ambassadors both in Washington and in Ottawa (as outlined to you in my memorandum dated August 20) that they would be able soon to inform us that the United States export licences had in fact been issued. Indeed on the occasion of his most recent visit to me on August 24 Mr. Comay said that not only had the United States agreed to issue export licences (this has been confirmed by Mr. Merchant) but that, according to the Israeli Embassies in both London and Paris the British had also relaxed their ban on the export of arms to Israel and the French were likely to do so. We have asked our missions in Washington and London for comment. This has now been confirmed by Mr. Heaney.

Mr. Comay has said that the Israeli Government would be glad to agree not to give the United States decision any publicity although it would undoubtedly be very reassuring to the Israeli public to know that such assistance was promised. On the other hand he has agreed that it would be extremely difficult to preserve secrecy. He has suggested that although the licences for the F.86's might be granted now, actual shipment might be delayed for a couple of months by which time the danger of associating the question of arms for Israel with the Suez problem might have evaporated. Mr. Comay has also urged strongly that if a decision were reached to release F.86's for Israel the whole 24 originally requested should be released at once instead of in two stages of twelve each at an interval of six weeks or so.

On each occasion that Mr. Eban has seen Mr. Heenev, or that Mr. Comay has seen me, he has been told that as matters now stand another reference to Cabinet will in any case be required. At the same time we have been informed by our Embassy in Paris that the Israeli Embassy there is getting a lot of information about the discussions in both Washington and Ottawa on the possible purchase of F.86's from Canada. We have informed our Embassy in Paris that it has not been possible for us to keep them up to date on all the recent comings and goings on the subject, that the Canadian position must be regarded as unsettled, that it would probably be best for them to say nothing to the French at this stage, but that we hope to be able to let them know of any developments in discussions here next week following your return.

Should it now be regarded as appropriate in the light of the United States decision that we carry out our part of the understanding reached with them, you may agree that the most careful consideration should be given to the timing of any decision to release the F.86's. Since we must, I think, assume that the United States decision will become public very soon, we must also expect that it would have the following effects:

(a) It would further inflame Arab opinion and increase Arab truculence by injecting into the Suez dispute the factor most likely to cause the Egyptians to act irrationally;

(b) It may prejudice the Egyptian view of the visit to Cairo of the five-power delegation headed by Mr. Menzies bringing with it the eighteen-power statement of views which emerged from the London Conference. The delegation will seek Egyptian agreement to treat this statement of views as a basis for further negotiation. At a time when the threat of the use of force seems to be receding, that threat would then reappear — at least to the Arabs and especially to Nasser — in another guise. The U.S.S.R. could and probably would say that it was idle to negotiate with the West when it was arming Israel and the fact that these were defensive arms designed to correct an imbalance would be lost sight of;

(c) A decision to export F.86's to Israel would mean that Canada would lose in the eyes of the Arab world its reputation for impartiality, often remarked upon by the Egyptians and Lebanese here in Ottawa. It would be of little avail to equate Harvards for Egypt with F.86's for Israel as evidence of impartiality. A subsidiary effect would be loss of confidence by the Arabs in General Burns and in the undermining of his position.

(d) Any decision to release the F.86's would place Dr. Norman in a most embarrassing and unpleasant position. While this in itself must inevitably be a subsidiary consideration, it would nevertheless be wise to avoid the likelihood that the decision would be made public soon after his first arrival in Cairo, or timed to coincide with the presentation of his credentials. This may now take place some time in the week beginning August 26. No argument that Dr. Norman could make is likely to weigh with Nasser because of the bitter Arab resentment — irrational but present — against the existence of the State of Israel.

There is the additional point that recent JIC appreciations suggest that Israel is at present strong enough, should Nasser become otherwise embroiled, to attack Egypt, Syria and Jordan simultaneously and probably to nip off the Gaza Strip and capture Damascus within twenty-four hours. Any gesture on our part which might suggest to the Egyptians that we were in any way encouraging Israel to do this would be unfortunate.

There are, of course, cogent reasons in favour of releasing the F.86's to Israel. These are summarized in the first five paragraphs of the attached document dated May 14 and entitled "Political Factors Governing a Decision to Export Interceptor Planes to Israel".⁸⁹ They are as follows: it is a simple act of justice to enable Israel to defend itself; it is conceivable that the principal danger of fighting arises from a fear psychosis on the part of the Israelis; the United States Administration is anxious that friendly countries should send interceptor aircraft to Israel; much of the opposition to our shipment of arms to Israel arises from general opposition to the supplying of arms on vaguely pacifist grounds; it can be argued that Nasser is engaged in blackmail by threatening that any shipments of jet aircraft from Canada to Israel will be matched by further orders from Czechoslovakia. There is the further point that although the Egyptian Counsellor here denied any knowledge of new arms agreements with Soviet bloc countries, and stated that recent shipments of arms were merely delayed results of the Czechoslovak arms deal of August, 1955, intelligence sources suggest that such new agreements may be in process of negotiation.

On the other hand the arguments against the release of F.86's contained in the memorandum are reinforced by the Suez Canal crisis. They are as follows: Canadian relations with the Arab States would suffer a severe blow; the release would have an adverse effect on the position of General Burns; United Nations officials are opposed to the sale; Israel is regarded by most of the anti-colonial nations of Africa and Asia as something in the nature of an imperialist strong-hold; there is a strong case to be made for the common (and public) acceptance of responsibility by the Western Powers; we should hesitate to supply important defensive arms to one side in a dispute when there may be some prospect of securing an agreement with the U.S.S.R. in the United Nations or elsewhere; the sale of F.86's to Israel may stir up public controversy and arouse an uneasiness in Canada.

For these reasons, I would recommend that consideration be given to delaying any decision to release the F.86's to Israel until Nasser's reaction to the delegation from the London Conference becomes fully apparent, and until any subsequent conference or negotiation which may emerge from the proposals of the eighteen nations has had a chance to run its course and to produce constructive results.

EXPORT OF AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUG. 7)

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that the shipment of 12 F-86's to Israel was on the point of being approved when the Suez Canal dispute occurred. As a result, the decision had been postponed and no action had been taken by ourselves, nor by the United States and France, as to the items they proposed sending to the Israelis. However, the U.S. had now decided to ship some items and had requested the Canadian government, if it decided to do likewise, not to state that Canadian action was related to U.S. plans as they were not proposing to disclose their action. This was quite unrealistic because, as soon as permits were approved, the sales would become public knowledge. Nevertheless, he had told the U.S. authorities Canada would agree to their request. The French were also going to release some Mystères.

He had discussed the matter with the Prime Minister who felt that the decision in principle to release the F-86's should stand but that, for the moment, shipments should not actually be authorized. The matter would, therefore, be kept under study and a recommendation made for release when the time appeared right. If the situation in the Middle East deteriorated, then the decision would have to be reviewed. In response to any questions that might arise in the meantime he proposed to say that the matter was still under consideration.

4. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the export of aircraft to Israel and agreed in principle that an Israeli order for 12 F-86's be approved, but that a decision to authorize such shipments be postponed until the time appeared more appropriate.

F86'S FOR ISRAEL AND SUEZ DISPUTE

Following for the Minister from Macdonnell: Since your interview with Comay just before your departure, he has informed us that he had earlier in the summer reached agreement with Mr. Howe and Mr. Campney on a schedule of deliveries calling for eleven aircraft to be made available in November and the remainder to follow fairly promptly in succeeding months. This had been arranged on the assumption that the decision to proceed would be taken by the end of August. Comay also raised the question of the method of delivery, pointing out that to send the aircraft by ship would be slow and uneconomical since it would involve taking the aircraft apart after testing, crating and shipping them, and re-assembling and re-testing, on arrival in Israel. His Government therefore hoped that the delivery could be made by ferrying the aircraft from Canada. Israel did not have pilots sufficiently experienced in the operation of the F86 to undertake the trans-Atlantic flight, and it therefore hoped that the RCAF could ferry the aircraft to some point in Western Europe (perhaps Rome) where Israeli pilots would pick them up to fly on to Israel.

2. We have learned that the schedule outlined by Comay was in fact agreed with Mr. Howe and Mr. Campney and could still be met even if the decision to release the aircraft were not taken until the end of September. This relatively early release is possible, however, only because the RCAF is not prepared to ferry F86's across the North Atlantic in winter and therefore can defer acceptance of scheduled deliveries intended for use in Europe. Hence the same circumstance which permits relatively early release to Israel at the same time prohibits prompt delivery by ferrying as hoped by Comay. It would appear that from the Israeli point of view the best that can be hoped for is to accept delivery in accordance with the agreed schedule (assuming, of course, that the Canadian Government decides by the end of September to release them) and transfer them to Israel in crates by sea.

3. Had the aircraft been ferried the first ones could have left Canada early in November in accordance with the agreed schedule. Since that is not possible and since they will presumably have to go by ship the precise time at which transfer would begin depends on the number to be crated. We are informed that normal time for dismounting and crating is from two to three weeks but that as a matter of urgency this could be reduced to about a week. If, therefore, the eleven aircraft originally proposed for release in November were to go en masse they could all be out of the plant by December 10. Individual aircraft could probably begin moving piecemeal by about November 10. As soon as crates of F86's leave the Canadair plant destined for Israel the fact may well become known to the public.

4. You will recall that in your comment on a departmental memo dated August 24 just prior to your departure you agreed to the following proposal "for these reasons, I would recommend that consideration be given to delaying any decision involving publicity to release the F86's to Israel until Nasser's reaction to the delegation from the London conference becomes fully apparent, and until any subsequent conference or negotiation which may emerge from the proposals of the eighteen nations has had a chance to run its course and to produce constructive results."

5. When Comay called at the Department on September 10 he advanced the view that, a decision in principle having been made to release the aircraft, the most propitious moment for a decision on timing had now been reached. The negotiations of the committee of five with the Egyptians had broken down and there were no negotiations presently under way which could be influenced by the sale of aircraft to Israel. This situation would not last long and Comay was apprehensive that the commencement of fresh negotiations would introduce a new element and make it difficult for the Canadian Government to reach a decision on timing. We explained to Comay that you were in Paris and the Prime Minister on a much needed vacation and that it would be difficult to get a decision in Cabinet at this time but that we would discuss the matter with the official concerned.

6. The present intention of the UK and France is to submit the Suez Canal dispute to the Security Council. It is difficult to forecast a precise timetable but it would appear that if the matter goes before the Security Council towards the end of this month it is unlikely in view of the delaying tactics which would probably be used by the USSR, that the debate would be over by the time the shipment of the aircraft was under way. We would therefore face the probability that the shipment of jet aircraft by Canada to Israel would become public at a time when the Suez Canal dispute was still being debated in the Security Council. The question arises as to whether this would prejudice the debate in the Security Council.

7. If our intention is almost certainly to approve the sale of the jets and if it were possible to inform the Israelis that they would have to take delivery of and arrange to ferry over the whole 24 before the Suez dispute goes to the Security Council then perhaps we would be unlikely to find a better moment to act than the present. As Mr. Howe and Mr. Campney are apparently unwilling to contemplate release of even the first batch before November however this would not appear to be a practical possibility.

8. You will recall that you undertook to give Comay a definite answer one way or the other before the end of September. We should be grateful for your instructions as to what, if anything, he should be told prior to your return or, alternatively, whether you wish any discussion with him to be postponed until after your return. A consideration which may or may not affect your instructions to us is that by the time you return the Security Council may be already seized of the Suez issue, thus rendering an affirmative decision more difficult. You will have seen that Eban makes this point in his recent letter† to Heeney. It has also been made to us by Comay.

Ottawa, September 19, 1956

EXPORT OF F.86 AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

1. On June 21, 1956, Cabinet agreed that the possibility be explored of supplying Israel with a limited number of F.86 aircraft as a result of a collective decision carried out under collective arrangements by the United States, United Kingdom and France, and asked the Prime Minister to ascertain the views of the United Kingdom during the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Meeting in London. On July 12 Cabinet concluded

(a) that no release of F.86's be made by Canada alone;

(b) that the possibility of Canada releasing the aircraft in the framework of a collective western decision be examined and that the views of Mr. Dulles be sought.

2. On July 27 a decision on the release of the aircraft was deferred pending further consultation with the United States Government. On July 31 a decision as to the release of the aircraft was again deferred pending further consideration of the situation arising out of Egypt's move to assume control over the Suez Canal.

3. On August 7 Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the reluctance of the United States to make military supplies available to Israel at this time for fear of the publicity involved.⁹⁰ On August 29 Cabinet agreed in principle that an Israeli order for 12 F.86 jet interceptor aircraft be approved, but that a decision to authorize such shipments should be postponed until the time appeared more appropriate.

4. In his telegram No. 1472 of September 12† from Paris Mr. Pearson expresses the view that the present may be a more appropriate time than any which is likely to be reached in the near future. Mr. Pearson's estimate is based on the following considerations:

(1) Information received by him since arriving in London and Paris, and from Washington before leaving, regarding the policy of renewed arms exports to Israel now being followed by United Kingdom, France and the United States;

(2) The likelihood that negotiations over the Suez situation, unless it deteriorates rapidly into the use of force, will be drawn out for a long time;

(3) The measure of success achieved in keeping the Suez situation separate from the Arab-Israeli conflict in large part because of the wise policy of restraint adopted by the Israeli Government.

5. The various decisions by the three major Western Powers to withhold or scale down shipments of arms to Israel pending a solution of the Suez dispute were due to their concern lest the two issues become confused. However, it is now the opinion of the United Kingdom, United States and French Governments that this likelihood has receded.

⁹⁰ Le compte rendu de la discussion du Cabinet du 7 août se trouve dans le document 82. For the record of the Cabinet discussion of August 7, see Document 82.

6. This view was supported by Mr. Dulles when he said to our Ambassador in Washington on September 11 that even though the Israelis seemed to be adopting a "tougher line" toward Egypt and the Arabs generally, the United States Government would be glad if Canada could find a way to release F.86's to Israel. Mr. Dulles said that he understood Canadian difficulties in the matter, but he thought it might be easier now than it would be later to make the release. With the developments in the Suez Canal the release of F.86's to Israel might at the moment, he thought, attract less attention than in the weeks to come.

7. The United Kingdom also decided last week to release up to ten Meteor trainers to Israel subject to clearance by the Near East Arms Co-ordinating Committee. The Israelis have not so far been informed of this decision.

8. On July 27 the Secretary of State for External Affairs informed the United States Ambassador that the Prime Minister, in making any announcement of a Canadian decision to ship arms to Israel would wish to state that the United States had also given permits for the export of military supplies (helicopters and scout cars). On August 20, however, the United States Government informed us that they would not agree to release this materiel to Israel unless they had our assurance that we would not make any reference to the United States decision as having influenced our own decision in the matter of F.86's.

9. If, however, Cabinet now decides to give a favourable answer to the Israeli request it is recommended that it be accompanied by a press statement. It now appears probable that the tentative agreement between the Israeli Ambassador and the Ministers of Defence Production and of National Defence calling for a schedule of deliveries of eleven aircraft to be made available in November, and the remainder to follow fairly promptly in succeeding months, can still be adhered to. This schedule had been arranged on the assumption that the decision to proceed would be taken by the end of August and that delivery could be made by ferrying the aircraft from Canada by the R.C.A.F. to some point in Western Europe, perhaps Rome, where Israeli pilots would pick them up to fly on to Israel. In spite of the fact that the R.C.A.F. is not prepared to ferry F.86's across the North Atlantic in winter, and that it will therefore be necessary for the aircraft to be crated and shipped by sea, delivery of the first eleven can probably be completed by mid-December. The movement of such materiel to the seaboard would arouse speculation and therefore reinforce the need for a press statement.

10. It is suggested that this statement be drafted along the following lines:

"After full and useful discussion with certain friendly Governments, the Canadian Government has now decided that it would not be justified in refusing the request made some time ago by the Government of Israel for permission to purchase interceptor planes from Canadian production for use in the defence of that country. The Government has been greatly influenced in this decision by the fact that Israel's neighbour has recently received large numbers of jet fighters from the Soviet Union and, even more important, a considerable number of modern jet bombers, of which Israel possesses none.

Assurances have been received from the Government of Israel that the interceptors in question will be used solely for defence against aggression.

This approval of the Israeli request for 24 F.86's covers a period of five months, during which the planes would normally be made available and shipped. If at any time during this period political circumstances should change in a way which would warrant a cancellation or postponement of the outstanding part of this order, such action will be taken."

11. An official statement has already been received from the Israeli Government that any planes released were to be used for defence only. The Israeli Embassy here has undertaken to reaffirm this assurance in writing as and when requested.

12. The political factors (other than those mentioned in Mr. Pearson's telegram) governing a decision to export interceptor planes to Israel may be summarized as follows:

Reasons Favouring Release

- (1) It is a simple act of justice to enable Israel to defend itself;
- (2) It is conceivable that the principal danger of fighting arises from a fear psychosis on the part of the Israelis;
- (3) The United States, United Kingdom and French administrations are anxious that friendly Western countries should send interceptor aircraft to Israel;
- (4) Much of the opposition to a shipment of arms to Israel arises from general opposition to the supply of arms on vaguely pacifist grounds;
- (5) It can be argued that Nasser is engaged in blackmail by threatening that any shipment of jet aircraft from Canada to Israel may be matched by further orders from the Soviet bloc.

Reasons Against Release

- (1) Canada's relations with the Arab States would suffer a severe blow;
- (2) The release would have an adverse effect upon the position of General Burns;
- (3) United Nations officials are reluctant to see such a sale;
- (4) Israel is regarded by most of the anti-colonial nations of Africa and Asia as an "imperialist" stronghold;
- (5) The sale of F.86's to Israel may stir up public controversy and arouse uneasiness in Canada.

13. The distinction between the release of jets for Israel and the Suez Canal dispute may not always be clear in the Canadian public mind, partly because of the approach which the Government of Egypt is known to have made to all governments, including Canada, regarding fresh Suez negotiations.⁹¹ A decision to sell jets to Israel might be regarded by the public as Canada's "answer to Nasser".

Recommendations

(1) That a decision be taken now to release twenty-four F.86 jet interceptor aircraft to Israel, deliveries of the first eleven to begin about November 10 and to be completed by about mid-December; the balance to be delivered over a further period of three months. (In his telegram No. 1526 of September 18† from Paris Mr. Pearson makes the alternative suggestion that the decision "be put in the form of four planes to be shipped per month over a period of six months. That would emphasize our control over the suspension or cancellation of deliveries if circumstances warranted it, and might not in actual fact delay very long the receipt by Israel of the 24 which would take some months in any event").

⁹¹ Le 10 septembre 1956, le gouvernement égyptien a fait circuler auprès de tous les membres des Nations Unies une note dans laquelle il réaffirmait sa volonté de négocier avec les utilisateurs du canal de Suez. La note est reproduite dans Documents on International Affairs 1956, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs - Oxford University Press, 1959, pp. 199-201. Dans sa réponse remise le 14 septembre 1956, le Canada a simplement indiqué que «the communiqué is being carefully studied» (voir le dossier DEA 50372-40).

On 10 September 1956, the Egyptian government circulated a note to all members of the United Nations reiterating its willingness to negotiate with users of the Suez Canal. The note is reprinted in Documents on International Affairs 1956, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs - Oxford University Press, 1959, pp. 199-201. The Canadian reply, delivered on September 14, 1956, simply observed "that the communiqué is being carefully studied." It is located on DEA/50372-40.

(2) That a press statement to this effect along the lines outlined above be issued after this decision has been taken;

(3) That if at any time during this period political circumstances should change in a way which would warrant a cancellation or postponement of the outstanding part of this order, such action will be taken.⁹²

RELEASE OF SABRE JETS TO ISRAEL AND PROPOSED DELIVERY TO EUROPE BY THE RCAF

Attached is a chronological account of developments on this subject since Cabinet agreed on September 20 to release the aircraft. You will notice that although we conveyed to the Israeli Embassy on September 27 the message† received from A/M Slemon we understood that since discussions were going on between the Israelis and Canadair on the question of delivery, the final decision of the RCAF not to ferry the aircraft would be communicated to the Israel procurement authorities by this channel. In the event the RCAF did not inform Canadair and it has become apparent that A/M Slemon expected us to notify the Israelis.

2. It seems clear that one reason for the confusion which has arisen in this matter has been the multiplicity of channels used by the Israelis in their approaches to the Canadian Government. A result of the several simultaneous channels used in this instance was that all became blocked and everyone assumed that someone else was notifying the appropriate Israeli authorities of the decision which had been taken.

3. In our discussion on October 17 with Mr. Erell two points were emphasized:

(a) The RCAF decision was one which had been reached without reference to and without pressure from governments other than the Canadian Government. The decision against ferrying by the RCAF was an exclusively Canadian decision based on legal and technical considerations.

(b) Although the effect of the decision could be to delay delivery of the first eight aircraft, this decision was in no way influenced by, and was only coincidental with, the recent displays of Israeli strength along the Jordanian border.

On September 20, 1956 Cabinet agreed to export the 24 F-86s "over a period of months and at a rate to be determined by the departments concerned. It being understood that during this period the outstanding part of the order would be cancelled or postponed if the political circumstances were to change." A press release announcing this decision was released on September 21 and is reprinted in Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1957, Volume 1, p. 1048.

4. Although to date we have not had any written communication with the Israeli Embassy on the subject of ferrying you may consider it appropriate to send Mr. Comay a Note along the lines of the attached draft.† This would put on record the decision which has been reached and the grounds on which it is based and would offer appropriate co-operation of the Canadian Government in facilitating transfer of the aircraft by such means as the Israelis may themselves arrange. It would seem desirable to let the Israeli Embassy have a Note along these lines as soon as possible so that misunderstanding may be kept to a minimum in talks the Israelis will be having with the RCAF. In the concluding paragraphs of this memorandum I am suggesting that thought be given to the question of possible modification of plans for release of aircraft to Israel: it would be very desirable for the question of ferrying to be disposed of quickly if any such action is contemplated.

5. We have just learned that a contract was signed last night between Canadair and the Israeli procurement authorities covering the purchase of twenty-four aircraft, with a subsidiary clause to the effect that sixteen of these would be shipped at the rate of four per month provided the Government grants the necessary export permits. Payment was made for the first eight planes, ownership of which was thereupon transferred to the Israeli Government.

6. Once the immediate question of ferrying has been disposed of I think we shall have to consider whether, in view of the accelerated rhythm of Israeli attacks on the Jordanian border, there should be any change in the planned delivery of the aircraft. The following points are, I believe, relevant:

(1) Since September 12 Israel has begun an openly acknowledged policy of large scale military attacks on Jordan in reprisal for terrorist attacks on individual Israelis or for small scale border incidents. The most serious of the Israeli military attacks occurred on September 12, 14 and 25 and October 11.

(2) After the Mixed Armistice Commission had adopted a resolution condemning Israel for the attack of September 25, Israel withdrew from the Commission and has ceased to co-operate with UNTSO.

(3) Jordan has appealed to the Security Council for early consideration of the situation as a threat to the peace, following the attack of October 11. The Army of Israel, and some elements in the Government, are believed to favour the occupation now of the whole of Palestine as far as the Jordan River, though others are reluctant to acquire half a million new Arab citizens or face the loss of Western support resulting from the deliberate accentuation of the refugee problem.

(4) General Burns, following the refusal of Israel to co-operate with UNTSO, believes that Israel is now seeking an opportunity to demonstrate its military strength even more impressively than in the past.

(5) Jordan has asked the United Kingdom for an assurance of aid against aggression and the United Kingdom has renewed its pledge. At the same time it has agreed to join with France in giving the Israelis adequate assurances so as to minimize the risk of an incident which might set the Middle East afire.

7. On the basis of its performance during the past month it would appear that Israel is on the verge of embarking on a deliberate policy of large scale military retaliation and that if it does so, it will seek fresh opportunities to demonstrate its military strength. It is true that the factors behind the Canadian Government's decision to release the aircraft to Israel — the threatened imbalance of forces in favour of the Arabs and the threatened growth of a preventive war psychology in Israel — are still valid. On the other hand it is questionable to what extent the Israelis are taking to heart the conditions we have placed on release of the aircraft. The situation now reached may make it necessary for us to consider whether the policy of retaliation recently resumed by Israel — and out of all proportion to provocative incidents — is only a milder variant of preventive war.

SECRET

CHRONOLOGICAL SEQUENCE OF EVENTS IN CONNECTION WITH PROPOSED
FERRYING OF F-86'S TO ISRAEL

September 20, 1956—Cabinet approved the conditional sale to Israel of 24 Sabres during the following six month period.

Following Cabinet's decision there were a number of informal exchanges between Harrington of Economic Division and W/C Gillespie of A/M Slemmon's office on the question of possible ferrying. W/C Gillespie indicated a certain reluctance on the part of the RCAF to undertake this operation, but said that A/M Slemmon had not to his knowledge reached any firm decision. Harrington said that we were not pressing the RCAF to undertake the ferrying operation (and mentioned some of the obvious problems such as ownership of the aircraft when en route and difficulties that would arise if a plane crashed killing an RCAF pilot).

September 25, 1956—It was learned from the RCAF that Colonel Katriel Solomon would be seeing A/M Slemmon; on the same day Mr. Erell requested an appointment with Mr. McInnes to discuss delivery of the aircraft. McInnes received Erell in his office with Harrington present; Erell made a number of suggestions designed to speed delivery of the aircraft, including one that all 24 be flown to Europe by the RCAF and there released to Israel at the agreed rate of four per month. It was pointed out that this was hardly feasible in view of the fact that the RCAF were cutting their own requirements to a minimum in order to permit the Israelis to receive 8 planes before November. A general discussion of ferrying then ensued during which McInnes and Harrington drew attention to a number of unsolved problems; these Erell brushed aside as details which could be discussed at the technical level between the appropriate Israeli authorities and the RCAF. It might be fair to summarize his position in the following terms: "The RCAF are giving up 8 aircraft to us which they would otherwise have ferried to Europe for themselves; if they agree in principle to fly these 8 for us the details can be arranged later". It was then pointed out that no official request for ferrying had to our knowledge been made; Mr. Erell said he was now making a request. Harrington undertook to inform him as soon as the RCAF's decision was known.

As indicated above, Colonel Solomon was talking to A/M Slemmon while Erell was with McInnes and Harrington. According to Erell's account given on October 17, A/M Slemmon indicated that the RCAF could ferry the aircraft if instructed to do so but that the basic political decision would rest with this Department. He then indicated that actual arrangements should be discussed by the Israelis with Canadaair and not with the RCAF.

September 26—On the basis of the request from Mr. Erell a letter† was drafted in Economic Division to be sent by the Under-Secretary to General Foulkes; before the draft had been approved A/M Slemmon spoke to Mr. Léger by telephone and "it was agreed that the RCAF would facilitate the delivery of four aircraft per month as of September. Their present plans are to fly eight of these aircraft to be delivered in Europe late October".

September 27—Mr. Erell had called Harrington several times enquiring whether the RCAF had reached a decision; shortly after the Under-Secretary's memorandum† had been received he called again and Harrington informed him of the decision, reading the operative part⁹³ of the memorandum to him. The conditional aspect was not especially emphasized but reference was made to the fact that certain questions remained to be resolved directly between the Air Force⁹⁴ and the Israelis.

September 28—Having learned that⁹⁵ the RCAF wished to have it made clear to the Israelis that they would not be prepared to ferry more than eight aircraft,⁹⁶ Harrington called Erell; in the latter's absence he spoke to Mr. Comay. On this occasion no emphasis was placed on the conditional nature of the RCAF's ferrying plans since the purpose of the call was to head off any request for the ferrying of additional planes.

October 9—A note† was sent from the Minister to Mr. Comay formally notifying him of the Government's decision to release the aircraft, and of the conditions pertaining to that release. No reference was made to possible ferrying.

October 10—The Under-Secretary wrote to A/M Slemon enquiring about the arrangements being worked out with Canadair for delivery of the aircraft and enquiring at what stage it was proposed that title would pass. It was suggested that while it would not be desirable to withhold a reasonable amount of co-operation in connection with delivery of the aircraft, it would not be appropriate for the Canadian Government to be or appear to be, involved, particularly after ownership had passed to the Government of Israel.⁹⁷ We asked to be informed of the arrangements contemplated with the Israelis and Canadair before the commencement of delivery so that we might have the opportunity to comment.

On October 11 or 12—A/M Slemon called the Under-Secretary to say that he had reached the conclusion that the RCAF would be unable to ferry the Israeli aircraft. After reviewing possible arrangements they had come upon the additional problem of passage through Iceland, which would be difficult regardless of markings. All that could be done now would be for Canadair and the Israelis to arrange for delivery by the fastest ship available.

The Under-Secretary passed this message to Mr. Ritchie who informed Harrington. It was understood in this Department (as implied in Mr. Léger's letter to A/M Slemon) that word would go to the Israelis through the Canadair or Air Force channel.

October 16—Erell called Harrington to ask where arrangements for ferrying now stood. He said that the contract with Canadair was to be signed and transfer of ownership to take place the next day but that the Embassy had no information as to when the planes were to be flown to Europe. After discussion with Mr. Ritchie, Harrington told him that there was some reason to believe that ferrying plans had fallen through, but that he should check with Canadair who were responsible for delivery arrangements.

October 17—Erell called Mr. McInnes and requested an interview as soon as possible; he implied that the Department had acted in bad faith in the matter and suggested that our "decision" was politically motivated. He called Harrington later in the morning and the latter confirmed that the Air Force were now no longer prepared to ferry the aircraft.

At 5:00 P.M. Erell met Ritchie, Harrington and McInnes in the latter's office. It was pointed out to him that the decision of the RCAF communicated on September 27 had been conditional upon a satisfactory solution being reached to various problems and that in the event these problems had proved incapable of solution. Mr. Ritchie explained that the RCAF would have been placed in the position of either flying Israeli aircraft or of flying ostensibly Canadian aircraft which were in all but name the property of the Government of Israel. The first course would have meant far too great a degree of Canadian Government involvement in the sale while the second would have involved subterfuge to which the Government could not be a party. Erell professed to be unable to see that either of these alternatives constituted an insurmountable barrier and suggested that, since A/M Slemon had told Colonel Salmon that the basic political decision rested with this Department, the change of plans must be a result of such a decision having been taken. He admitted that on the previous day he had been in touch with Dooley (?) at Canadair and had learned from him that the plan for RCAF ferrying had fallen through. When he had reported this to his Ambassador Mr. Comay had told him to disregard such information since the Embassy had been informed by External Affairs that the Air Force would ferry. Erell pointed out that since Harrington's message of September 27 had been received after Salmon's conversation with the CAS the Israelis had assumed that the basic decision had been taken and that only administrative details remained to be discussed through Canadair. McInnes told him that this assumption was in the circumstances hardly justified and suggested that he had perhaps been too ready to jump to conclusions while assuming away difficulties.

Erell persisted in the suggestion that there were ulterior motives behind the decision and asked whether it was a result of objections raised by other governments. He was assured categorically that the decision had been taken by the Canadian authorities alone and for the reasons which had been indicated to him.

After Erell had left, Mr. Ritchie received a call from the Under-Secretary who had been speaking to A/M Slemon. The CAS confirmed that after he had spoken to Mr. Léger a week before he had said nothing further to Canadair or the Israelis, since once having reached a negative decision he considered the Air Force to be no longer "in the act".

[Ottawa], October 19, 1956

INTERVIEW WITH THE ISRAELI AMBASSADOR CONCERNING THE RELEASE
AND FERRYING OF F-86 AIRCRAFT

Mr. Comay called on me at his request at noon to-day to discuss the situation which has arisen over the possible ferrying of these aircraft by the RCAF. He said that his Government had been most appreciative when it was indicated earlier that the RCAF would be willing to fly these aircraft to Europe. They regarded this as a very generous gesture and not as something to which they had a right in some sense. He was not, therefore, coming to complain at the new intimation that these aircraft could not now be ferried by the RCAF but he was merely seeking some clarification of the new decision and of the reasons which lay behind it in order that his Government might correctly understand it.

2. Mr. Comay reviewed the history of the proposal which, he said, had occurred to them only after it appeared that enough aircraft might be released before the end of the ferrying season to make the operation worthwhile and only after Canadair had suggested the possibility of the RCAF being willing to undertake such ferrying. Mr. Comay's account did not differ materially from the chronological record contained in the memorandum sent to you yesterday.

3. I confirmed that it has now been decided that the RCAF could not ferry these Israeli aircraft. I remarked that to the best of my knowledge the most that Air Marshal Slemon had ever said was that the RCAF would be willing to consider including such aircraft in one of their own ferry flights. When Slemon had gone into the matter he had ascertained that, primarily for technical reasons, it would not be practicable to carry through the operation. I added that there was also the problem of arranging for such aircraft to pass in transit through at least two other countries en route to Europe and this was a matter which the Israeli authorities would want to look into if they contemplated some arrangement of their own for flying these aircraft across the Atlantic.

4. I stressed that the decision concerning the ferrying operation had not been influenced by the political situation in the Middle East or by the views of any Government other than the Canadian.

5. I observed that the Israeli Military Attaché was apparently seeing A/M Slemon at about the same time as Mr. Comay was seeing me and I was sure that Slemon would be explaining the technical reasons for not proceeding with the ferrying operation under RCAF auspices. I remarked incidentally that the practice of making approaches to the Canadian Government through several channels was one that could lead to a good deal of confusion. I explained that any delay in notifying the Israeli authorities of the recent decision was attributable to the fact that no one was quite certain who was responsible for conveying this information to one or another of the Israeli representatives.

6. Mr. Comay seemed to understand our position. He thought there was no point in discussing whether or not some commitment had been given to them at an earlier stage, and even if there had been such commitment, his Government would recognize that practical difficulties could prevent such an undertaking from being carried out.

7. I mentioned to Mr. Comay that if the Israeli authorities chose to arrange to have the aircraft ferried independently of the RCAF or the Canadian Government we would no doubt be prepared to let them use certain facilities under our control which might be required en route. In any event we would look into this possibility if that was desired. Mr. Comay expressed the personal opinion that an independent ferrying operation, especially at this time of the year, and in view of the lengthy negotiations which would undoubtedly be required with the Danish and Icelandic Governments, was not really feasible. He thought therefore they would probably have to turn their attention to possible shipping arrangements which would enable these aircraft to reach Israel in the shortest possible time. In this connection he noted that since the St. Lawrence would not be navigable in the latter part of November it would be a great help if the export permit for the four aircraft expected during that month could be issued in time to allow those aircraft to be taken on the same ship (bringing the total number for that ship to twelve). The later aircraft would presumably have to go out through Maritime or U.S. ports.

8. I merely promised to look into the possible timing of the release of the November aircraft. My own view is that if we have not by then suspended releases it would be reasonable for us to agree around the end of October or early in November that these four aircraft might be exported any time in November when they became physically available.

9. I suggested to Mr. Comay that we might send him a note confirming our decision on the ferrying question in order to avoid any misunderstanding or further confusion. Mr. Comay doubted that this was necessary since the matter had so far been dealt with orally. He was particularly anxious to avoid having anything put on paper which might imply that the Israelis had made a request which we had rejected. He recognized however that it was up to us to determine whether or not we would send him a written communication and said that if we decided to do so he would of course be pleased to receive it. Since there seems to be a real risk that this whole episode may later be misunderstood or misrepresented, I would still think it desirable that we give the Israeli Embassy something on paper.⁹⁸ It need not necessarily be a formal note but might take the form of a memorandum or aide mémoire. I think it would be desirable for it to include an indication of our willingness to make available such appropriate facilities as would be of assistance in the movement of the aircraft, even though it is likely that this offer would not be taken up.

10. At the conclusion of the interview Mr. Comay referred to his Government's concern over the situation which would result from the proposed movement of Iraqi troops into Jordan. He said that when this possibility had first been mentioned to the Government of Israel by the United States Representative, it was expressed in terms of a small number of Iraqis whose main function would be to re-enforce the local constabulary during the election in Jordan. It later became evident that what was envisaged was a larger and more permanent movement of troops. This was disturbing to Israel, especially when accompanied by statements by prominent Arabs which implied that the movement was a threat to the existence of Israel. The possibility of the Iraqis taking over Jordan could not be ruled out. Such an expansion of Iraq would endanger the position of Israel, and the Israeli Government had to reserve its complete freedom of action against such an eventuality. An Armistice Line which had been tolerable between Jordan and Israel might not be suitable between such a larger state and Israel. Mr. Comay added that according to their latest information the movement of Iraqi troops might not now take place. He thought that reconsideration of the venture might have been prompted by the strong statements from Israel and also by the protests from the population of Jordan. The riots which had occurred in Jordan had made it evident that the intrusion of troops from Iraq might have an unsettling rather than a stabilizing effect.

The Israeli Ambassador called this morning to inquire about the Prime Minister's statement regarding the cancellation or suspension of shipments of F-86's to Israel.⁹⁹ I said that I thought the meaning of the Prime Minister's remarks was pretty clear. Mr. Comay felt that further clarification was necessary and had instructions from his Government to secure it.

It was clear to the Israeli Government that the cancellation or suspension would apply to the outstanding balance of the purchase of 16 planes but they thought there was a complete difference in status between them and the 8 planes which had been released for shipment and were now being crated, at the expense of the Israeli Government, in Montreal. Export licenses for these 8 planes had been granted; they had been handed over and paid for; Canadair had formally and legally delivered them and they were now Israeli Government property which happened to be physically on Canadian soil. The Israelis had made arrangements for a vessel to pick these planes up in Halifax towards the end of this month. The Israeli Government therefore wished to know exactly and not be in a position of merely guessing whether or not these planes could be shipped according to schedule.

In the Israeli view neither the Canadian Government nor Canadair had any further connection legally with these planes and they would like to suggest that a decision should not be taken to cancel retrospectively this part of the order, since they would hope that the situation which had given rise to the Prime Minister's statement would have been clarified by the end of the month.

In support of his argument, Mr. Comay recalled the position of the Canadian Government in February last when the shipment of Harvard planes to Egypt was under discussion. The Prime Minister had announced an embargo but the Government had decided that the embargo should not apply to the Harvard planes already on their way to Egypt.¹⁰⁰ Mr. Comay thought that this was a parallel situation.

I said that we would look into this matter and give him an answer as soon as possible.

F-86'S FOR ISRAEL

There seems to us to be no doubt whatever that both the Minister and the Prime Minister made it clear in their public statements that they had no intention of permitting any of the 24 aircraft ordered by Israel to leave Canada in present circumstances. It also seems clear that the Government has every legal right to prevent the departure of these aircraft including the eight aircraft which the Israeli Government has already paid for.

The provisions of the Import and Export Permits Act, under which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has authority at his discretion to suspend or cancel a permit at any time, appear to relate without restriction to the physical departure from Canada of items requiring Export Permits without regard to the ownership of the items. I should imagine that the Government could not challenge the rights of ownership which the Israeli Government presumably has in the eight aircraft for which it has paid, at least without legal proceedings, but if it is true that these aircraft are without limitation the property of the Government of Israel it seems equally clear that they are in Canada and subject to the relevant provisions of Canadian law. It would follow that the Canadian Government is just as entitled to withhold the export of these aircraft as it would be if they were the property of a Canadian citizen or company.

The Export Permit which has been issued to cover the eight aircraft paid for was valid until December 5, 1956 and has now been suspended. Unless this suspension is lifted, therefore, the aircraft will remain in Canada until the expiry of the permit in a month's time. Should that occur it would be necessary for the exporting firm to re-apply for a new permit, which presumably the Government would not be willing to approve in present circumstances.

It is my own impression that Mr. Comay is quite aware of the considerations outlined above and does not really believe that the Canadian Government will accept the arguments which he presented to Mr. Watkins. Nevertheless, these circumstances will no doubt have to be explained to him in order that he may report our official position to his Government. When this explanation is given it would no doubt be desirable to deal with the other question which he raised, namely the alleged parallel between this situation and that which applied in connection with the Harvard aircraft shipped to Egypt last winter. At that time questions were asked in Parliament concerning the order for 15 Harvards at a time when some, but not all, had left Canada. The Government announced that despite the questions raised in the House it had decided not to interfere with delivery of the remainder of the order. There may have been mention of the fact that the aircraft still to be shipped were the property of the Government of Egypt, although I do not recall such a reference myself, but in any case the Government's decision was based and explained on the Government's judgement that the international political situation did not require the suspension or cancellation of deliveries of such training aircraft.

There is a parallel between the two cases to the extent that the Government had then, as it has now, the right to withhold delivery of aircraft whether they have already been paid for by foreign Governments or not. The difference in the two cases is that last spring the Government did not see grounds for taking such action while in the present case involving combat aircraft it has stated that there are such grounds. In addition, it should be recalled that at the time the Israeli order was approved by the Government the approval was publicly made subject to the proviso that the delivery could be suspended or cancelled at any time should developments so warrant. Such a limitation, of course, applies in any such case by virtue of the provisions of the Import and Export Permits Act, but in the particular case of the Israeli order it was publicly underlined at the time that the order was approved.

Dear Mr. Léger,

SABRE JETS

At the time when the Prime Minister announced that the shipment of arms to the Middle East would be suspended, eight of the twenty-four Sabre jets purchased by my Government had already been delivered by Canadair at its plant in Montreal, and were in the process of being dismantled and crated. It was thereupon agreed with Canadair that the contract should be regarded as in suspense regarding the remaining sixteen planes, with the Company retaining an amount of nearly four million dollars already paid on account of the whole transaction.

On 7 December, in response to an enquiry I had made at an earlier date, Mr. Ritchie told our Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Erell, that the eight planes which had already become the property of the Israel Government were included in the ban on shipment. As I informed you in our talk last Wednesday, my Government feels that under these circumstances, it should be given the opportunity to return the planes which have become "frozen" in Montreal, and receive back the amount paid to Canadair, leaving the whole contract in suspense until an appropriate time in the future, when it could be brought into operation again by mutual consent.

I have been instructed to request the Canadian Government's concurrence in principle with this course, prior to the practical details being discussed with Canadair.

Yours sincerely,

M. COMAY

Dear Mr. Comay,

SABRE JETS

In your letter to me of December 31, you asked for my views as to whether it would now be appropriate for your Government's representatives to approach Canadair Limited with a view to recovering the money paid for the F-86 aircraft.

2. It is my understanding that the contract between your Government and Canadair was concluded in the light of the Canadian Government's decision, announced on September 21, 1956, that in the circumstances prevailing at the time it would be prepared to approve the export from Canada to Israel of 24 F-86 aircraft. It was made clear that this position might be altered at any time if in the Government's judgment that should be required as a result of changing circumstances.

3. On October 30, following the outbreak of violence in the Middle East, the Canadian Government took action to hold up all arms shipments from Canada to the Middle East. In the meantime, however, your Government had made a substantial payment on account. As I am unaware of any present disposition on the part of the Canadian Government to raise its suspension of permits for arms exports from Canada to the countries concerned in the Middle East, I should consider it natural that your Government would wish to come to an understanding with Canadair concerning the present status of the contract. This would appear to be a question between the Government of Israel and Canadair, in which the Canadian Government is not involved; I am sure that the latter would have no objection, however, to an approach to this end.

4. The terms which might be reached between the Government of Israel and Canadair would not appear to me to be the concern of the Canadian Government whose role in the matter is restricted to determining at any particular time whether it is prepared to permit the export from Canada of such items of military equipment.

5. Should you wish to do so, I have no objection to your showing this letter to representatives of Canadair.

Yours sincerely,

J. LÉGER

SUEZ CANAL COMPANY

1. The Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations asked the High Commissioners to meet him at 10 a.m. this morning. He had not yet received any information beyond last night's press report of Colonel Nasser's announced expropriation of the Suez Canal Company. The report reached a Downing Street dinner being given for the King of Iraq before it broke up, but was not on last night's wireless news.

2. The Prime Minister is meeting Parliament at 11 a.m. this morning and will make a short statement, the text of which is given in my immediately following telegram.¹⁰¹ The Cabinet has been called for 11.15 a.m. this morning, and consultations with the French and Americans, which began very late last night, are expected to continue during the day.

3. At the meeting in the CRO this morning, Lord Home said that the United Kingdom Government took "a very grave view" of yesterday's developments, which had taken them completely by surprise. There had been a good deal of speculation about the effect of Egypt's economic and political relations with the USSR of the withdrawal of the offer of assistance on the Aswan dam, but nobody had thought of the vulnerability of the Suez Canal Company in this new context.

4. The discussion at the CRO was brief and desultory. I said that I assumed the Foreign Office would be considering the advantages and disadvantages of bringing this new situation to the notice of the Security Council. I also said that I hoped the United Kingdom would not be too quick to gather too many spears to its own bosom. In the history of last week's developments, the first and major decision had been taken by the United States. The Company's headquarters were in Paris; its operating staff were French. There was a very wide general interest in the maintenance and free operation of the canal. It would be a mistake to measure this in terms of the national ownership of vessels using it. The countries whose imports and exports passed through the canal all had an interest. It seemed to me it would be wiser to identify the United Kingdom interest with these general interests as much as possible.

You will have seen account of Nasser's action over Suez Canal. We cannot allow him to get away with this act of expropriation and we must take a firm stand. If we do not, the oil supplies of the free world will be at his mercy and Commonwealth communications and trade will be gravely jeopardised.

2. We are meeting on Sunday representatives of the United States and France whose governments are most immediately concerned, with the object of concerting future action. We believe that we should seize this opportunity of putting the canal under proper international control as a permanent arrangement. We hope we may be able to attain this objective by bringing the maximum political pressure to bear on Egypt, and we shall try to enlist for that purpose the support of the main maritime and trading powers using the canal. But it may be that this will fail and that in the last resort force may have to be used to secure Egyptian agreement. We may well have to face that possibility. I will however telegraph to you again after our week-end meetings, and will see that you are kept fully informed.

SUEZ CANAL CO.

We have sent you the text of the statement which I gave to the press yesterday in response to enquiries.¹⁰² This statement expressed our concern at the threat to what is recognized as an international waterway although the Canadian Government has no participation in the Suez Canal Company. It would appear that there has been no technical violation of the Constantinople Convention so long as the Egyptians do not interfere with shipping going through the canal, but that there has been a unilateral breach of the Suez Canal Company's concession. We do not have the terms of this concession available and it would be useful if you could cable to us a summary of them.

2. Quite apart from the legal and technical aspects of the Egyptian action, we are aware that it has broad implications of a potentially explosive character. We believe that you have adopted a prudent line in urging upon the United Kingdom the wisdom of proceeding in a manner designed to obtain the greatest amount of international support.

3. The Prime Minister today received a message from Sir Anthony Eden stating the necessity of taking a firm stand and of endeavouring to get a permanent arrangement to put the canal under proper international control. We have also been asked by the United Kingdom authorities to take action in regard to the Suez Canal Company's assets. We have stated to Earncliffe that we will examine this matter but that our initial reaction is to doubt its practicability in this country.

4. I am deeply concerned at the implications of some parts of Eden's message; especially as I doubt very much whether he will receive strong support from Washington in the firm line which he proposes to follow. A talk which I have just had with the United States Ambassador here strengthens these doubts. Surely the UK Government will not do anything which would commit them to strong action against Egypt until they know that the US will back them.

5. I am also worried as to the meaning to be given Eden's words, "we believe that we should seize this opportunity (sic) of putting the canal under proper international control and permanent arrangement." Surely with the Russians dissenting and supporting Egypt, the UK do not think that this can be done, as they profess to hope, "by political pressure" alone. There remains force — which they visualize as a last resort. But is it not clear that to be effective enough force would have to be used to destroy the Nasser Government and take over Egypt? Any effort to use force, in fact, would in all likelihood result in an appeal by Egypt to the UN. That would be bringing the UN into the matter with a vengeance, and by the wrong party.

6. I'm glad that you have stressed the importance of bringing the UN into the question. This may not be practicable but it certainly shouldn't be dismissed without the most careful consideration. It might well be argued that if an international dispute is of such a character that force is envisaged, it is also one that should be brought before the UN in order to try to avoid the use of such force.

7. These observations, which are sent to you in haste, may all seem pretty negative, but at the moment I am less worried about being negative than about being rashly positive.

8. Since beginning this message I have read your Message 1009 and I entirely approve of the line you took during the discussion with Lord Home. I should tell you, however, that the view of Israel's possible reaction given by Lord Home is shared, according to Merchant, in Washington.

EXPROPRIATION OF SUEZ CANAL CO.

1. I was called to Lord Home's office this afternoon and given a copy of Sir A. Eden's message to Mr. St. Laurent. The New Zealand High Commissioner and the South African Acting High Commissioner were also there. Australia was not represented.

2. Webb was doubtful whether the legal case against the Egyptian government's action was sufficiently overwhelming to support and justify the course of action envisaged.

3. Jordan equally without instructions thought his government would share the United Kingdom's appreciation of the importance of the issues raised by Nasser's action.

4. I explained my own misgivings about the policy contemplated pretty much in the language I have used in my messages to you. I thought that it would be difficult to bring forward now Egyptian breaches of the basic Canal Convention which had in effect been condoned despite the findings of the Security Council as a justification of a threat of force. I thought the issue of expropriation and the way in which it had been brought about should be kept distinct from the issue of international rights in the water way. I was afraid that if the situation developed along these lines it would be Egypt who would be in a position to bring the dispute before the United Nations perhaps with disastrous results.

5. As an element in a holding policy I mentioned the possibility of reconsidering decisions about the release of defensive arms to Israel. Home did not follow me at all. We thought that if the situation should move toward the use of force against Egypt there would be a risk that Israel might be encouraged by additional armaments to strike at Jordan which would bring Irak in on the Arab (and Egyptian) side.

6. Home told us that a meeting with the French and Americans was now arranged for Sunday night or Monday morning. Pineau would be here and Bob Murphy is expected from Washington on Sunday.

7. I am arranging to see the U.S. Chargé d'Affaires this afternoon and will find out what instructions, if any, he has.

SUEZ CANAL COMPANY

With reference to the UK Prime Minister's message to Mr. St-Laurent, no reply has been specifically requested but one may be expected. If you feel that an answer in the terms indicated below would be helpful, will you please pass it on. The Prime Minister is anxious, of course, not to appear to be intervening with advice which would be too negative in character to do anything but irritate. On the other hand, a message of this kind at this time might be useful and welcome.

2. If you feel that the message should be kept in suspense or if you have any changes to suggest to it before forwarding, will you let us know. Message beings:

I have just received through your High Commissioner's office your message regarding Nasser's action over the Suez Canal. I can fully appreciate and I have noted with interest that you are meeting representatives of the United States and French Governments who must be equally concerned. While the matter is not of the same direct interest to Canada, nevertheless, as our Secretary of State for External Affairs said in the House of Commons this morning, we would be concerned about and would condemn any action which interfered with the efficient and non-discriminatory operation of the canal.

2. I shall look forward to receiving the result of the consultations you are having with the two other Governments Monday. I am impressed by the difficulty of securing any permanent arrangement for bringing the canal under appropriate international control in view of the attitude of Nasser, who is not likely to co-operate in any effort to this end, and not, I think, likely to succumb to pressure unless all the Great Powers were united in applying it.

3. I am sure that you appreciate that the use of force in present circumstances — even as a last resort — will be surrounded by risks and difficulties, one of which might be the submission of the matter to the United Nations by the wrong party. On the other hand, if access to the United Nations could be brought about by the right party; there would be obvious advantages in that course, though also, of course, some obvious difficulties.

4. I am grateful for the opportunity that has been afforded our High Commissioner of exchanging views with you and some of your colleagues on this whole question. The views which Mr. Robertson has already expressed are a reflection of our own, and he will pass on to you any additional observations which we may desire to submit as the situation develops. Ends.

ASSETS OF THE SUEZ CANAL COMPANY IN CANADA

The attached telegram† from the Foreign Office to the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa was left with the Department on Saturday by Mr. Belgrave from Earncliffe. As you are aware, this telegram requests the U.K. High Commissioner to urge the Canadian Government to follow their example in freezing the assets of the Suez Canal Company. The U.K. Government issued instructions to their banks over the weekend that permission of the U.K. Government must be obtained before the banks acted on any instructions received from the Egyptian Government concerning the disposal of Suez Canal Company assets. The U.K. Government also gave instructions that any transfers from Egyptian sterling balances held in the United Kingdom would also be subject to permission. As you are aware, Mr. de Villelume, the Counsellor of the French Embassy in Ottawa, also called on me on Saturday to explain that his Government had taken similar measures with respect to Suez Canal assets held in France.

2. So far the "urging" from the United Kingdom has been limited to a visit from a relatively junior officer from the staff of the High Commissioner. The Canadian authorities are not aware of what assets the Suez Canal Company holds in Canada and at your suggestion we have not pressed Earncliffe to obtain this information for us. However, I suspect that this information may be made available to us, although unsolicited, later today.

3. It is the preliminary view of officials in this Department and in the Bank of Canada (Mr. Rasminsky was consulted at some length over the weekend) that no legislative authority short of the War Measures Act exists in Canada by which the Government could intervene in the disposal of privately held assets in Canadian banks. I assume that in the circumstances there would be no thought of invoking the War Measures Act. The Department of Justice is being consulted this morning to ensure that the preliminary view of officials who discussed this question over the weekend is correct and I shall confirm this preliminary view later in the day.

4. I believe that the U.K. Government fully appreciated that we did not have authority to comply formally with their request. (In fact Belgrave intimated to an officer of this Department that their own Financial Adviser at Earncliffe was well aware of the fact that no such authority existed.) However, I believe that the United Kingdom are hoping that Canadian Ministers might wish to speak informally to the banks in Canada to suggest that there is some doubt about the legality of the action which the Egyptian Government has taken in nationalizing the Suez Canal Company by decree. In view of this doubt the banks might wish to avoid taking any action on instructions which may be received from the Egyptian Government (or possibly even from the head office of the Suez Canal Company in Paris) until the situation became clearer. While any action along such lines is clearly not one on which officials of this Department would wish to make any judgment, such an approach would obviously be very delicate. Before taking any decision I should assume that the Minister of Finance would wish to consult very thoroughly with the Bank of Canada and with the Inspector of Banks.

5. I assume that it would be your thought that Mr. Harris should reply in the House to any question which might be raised concerning Canadian action with respect to the disposal of Suez Canal Company assets in Canada. I am sending a copy of this memorandum to the Acting Deputy Minister of Finance and to Mr. Rasminsky in the Bank of Canada.¹⁰³

The United Kingdom High Commissioner, Sir Archibald Nye, called on the Minister in his office in the House of Commons yesterday at 6:15 p.m. to discuss the Suez Canal situation. The two points in which he was mainly interested were our attitude towards the use of force and our views on the calling and composition of an international conference.

The Minister told him that we doubted the efficacy of attempting a solution to the problem by the use of force. The Prime Minister had considered including an expression of this feeling in his message to Sir Anthony Eden but had decided not to do so.

It had just been reported over the news ticker that a decision had been reached at the London meetings to call a conference of the Constantinople Convention signatories, including both Egypt and the Soviet Union. The Minister thought that this was a hopeful sign and that it was a good idea to include the Soviet Union. Sir Archibald agreed.

When Sir Archibald inquired whether Canada would wish to participate, the Minister said not unless it was felt that we could make a useful contribution. It seemed doubtful that we could be included under the Constantinople Convention of 1888. We were not one of the countries having a great deal of shipping through the canal, like Norway, for instance. On the other hand, we were one of the three or four largest trading nations. If the British felt that our participation would be helpful and wished to formulate the criteria in such a way that we could be included, we would not refuse to take part.

Sir Archibald read out a telegram stating that the British Ambassador in Cairo had been interested to advise the United Kingdom citizens discreetly that, if they have no urgent reason to remain in Egypt, there might be less anxiety for their families if they were to leave. The Ambassador was keeping in touch with his Commonwealth colleagues. (See memo of Aug. 2† attached). The Minister thought that the decision to call an international conference would mean that there was less immediate danger.

Robertson later informed Pearson that he had shown Norman Brook the "original unrevised draft" of St. Laurent's reply to Eden as well as his initial reports to Ottawa on the crisis. See London to Ottawa, Telegram 1144, August 21, 1956, DEA 50372-40.

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Suez Canal situation was very serious. Probably no untoward developments would occur between now and August 16th, the date set for the 24-power conference called by the United Kingdom. However, the British and the French would be submitting proposals at this conference for an international régime to control and operate the canal and it appeared that these would not be acceptable. The British had committed themselves to the use of force, and, in the event that the conference was not a success from their point of view, would take action and presumably occupy the canal zone. They were as firm in their attitude on this matter as they had been on any other issue since World War II. They felt they could impose their authority on the Egyptians. Such a step would lead to the most serious consequences. The whole Arab world would rally in support of Egypt, and the Commonwealth would be split as would the United Nations.

The United States would not be so vigorous in supporting the U.K. and French proposals at the conference. In fact, the U.S. authorities would probably try to get Britain and France to retreat as gracefully as possible from their present position. They were profoundly alarmed at the course events were taking and thought the situation even more serious than that which prevailed when war occurred in Korea. The Australian Prime Minister, too, was most disturbed. He was in Washington at present, and instead of returning home would go to England for the meeting on August 16th. He hoped to exercise a moderating influence on the U.K.

The British did not want to raise the matter in the United Nations. But if they took action the Egyptians probably would refer the matter to the Security Council. They had the legal right to do this and would undoubtedly have moral support as well for doing so.

7. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It might be desirable if Mr. Pearson were to go to Washington or New York immediately to see Mr. Menzies. On the other hand, he was in close touch with him about the situation and going openly to Washington at this stage might only be misinterpreted.

(b) Nasser could not seriously hope to build the Aswan dam from the earnings of the canal. Last year, it only had a profit of £20 million. Presumably much of this had to be used for maintenance and the remainder, plus any surplus that was available, would have to be devoted to compensating the shareholders of the company.

(c) The U.K. hoped to have Nasser removed from office as they had been able to remove Egyptian leaders in earlier history. However, times had changed, and an old-fashioned show of force in the Middle East would only lead to the most serious and undesirable consequences.

(d) Canada had not been invited to attend the conference, which was understandable and desirable in itself on many counts. But it was hard to explain why South Africa and the various Middle Eastern countries had been left out. The U.K. had, in fact, behaved rather strangely throughout this crisis. For instance, the royal proclamation declaring a state of emergency has stated it was desirable to protect the interests of the Commonwealth. This was improper but perhaps just a mistake.

(e) As regards arms shipments to Israel, the U.S. had asked that we postpone action to enable an assessment to be made of what effect they might have at the present time. The French were anxious to release their Mystères right away. But the U.S. authorities were concerned with the domestic political reactions to any shipments they might make during an election campaign.

8. The Cabinet noted the further report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the situation arising out of Egypt's decision to nationalize the Suez Canal and the discussion on the related question of exporting aircraft to Israel.

SUEZ CANAL

Our feeling here of relief and satisfaction that the tripartite meeting resulted in an agreed communiqué which provided for an international conference is qualified by anxiety as to what will happen at that conference and subsequently. Our main worry is that the United Kingdom and the French have gone so far in committing themselves to the use of force if the forthcoming conference does not produce a result satisfactory to them. I assume that the British position is based on the hope that an agreement for an international control authority for the canal, along the lines which have been communicated to us, can be reached at this conference. This proposed scheme seems sensible and practicable but I find it difficult to share the hope that Egypt will accept such an agreement. I hope I am wrong but if not, where do we go then? Presumably the British and the French and the others who support them at the conference will try to impose the arrangement by political pressure on a resisting Egypt. This might be possible if active support for such a procedure were widespread, but frankly I do not see such general support forthcoming. The Russians, of course, are not likely to co-operate, while the Asian-Arab states will be unanimously opposed to bear on the Egyptians. Among other things, this will split the Commonwealth with possibly far-reaching results, and may break up the Baghdad Pact. Furthermore, is there any assurance that the USA will co-operate in the kind of strong political pressure which would be required? The Egyptians know that American interest in this matter is not as immediate or as strong as that of the UK and France, and they will try — as indeed they are already trying — to exploit this difference. If the Americans do not, in fact, back the British and the French to an extent which seems satisfactory in London and Paris, there is bound to be grave disappointment and even bitter criticism, and this will impose strains on the Alliance; especially as the US Government's hesitation will be related, and no doubt with some justice, to the current domestic political situation.

2. If political pressure fails, then the British and French seem committed to the use of force for which they might have little legal justification whatever the practical necessities might be. If this is not their plan it seems strange that they would be giving so much publicity to troop movements, etc. but here I think they will be almost entirely on their own, certainly in so far as Arab, Asian, or USA support is concerned. As the use of force would probably have to extend beyond the Suez area to Egypt itself, the consequences would be far-reaching for the Commonwealth, for Anglo-American co-operation, and for peace in the Middle East generally. In these circumstances, it seems almost inevitable that Egypt would appeal to the United Nations which would be a very strange result indeed from the developments of last week and one which I should think would be most embarrassing for the UK, and hardly less so for her friends.

3. I take it that they are just as worried in London as we are about these possible consequences, but what are they doing to avoid them, except to assume that Nasser is either bluffing or is weak and can be brought to book by firmness. I gather from messages received from Cairo that Nasser himself has his own worries about his recent action and would not be averse to some way out of his dilemma if one could be found which would save his face and his nationalization decree, and at the same time be agreeable to Paris and London.

4. I take it from your messages that there is no possibility of agreement on the United Nations being brought into the matter at this stage, and I assume also that there is no possibility of extending any proposed international régime for the Suez to other international waters, like Panama. So I am at a loss for ideas myself.

5. It has just occurred to me, however, that if the forthcoming conference could recognize the nationalization of the company, Nasser might conceivably agree to a continuing committee of the conference, possibly taking the form of a council of some of the Ambassadors in Cairo of the States represented at it which could be used as an agency to ensure that Egyptian ownership and operation would be carried on within the principles of the Constantinople Treaty. This would be a less formal arrangement than the International Suez Control Authority now visualized, but might possibly be acceptable to Egypt.

6. In any event, it is clear that every possible effort must be made to prevent a chain of developments which would result in Anglo-French military force being exerted against Egypt in a way which would split the Commonwealth, weaken the Anglo-American Alliance, and have general consequences which would benefit nobody but Moscow.

7. As you will have gathered from the above, we are not very happy here about developments and where they are leading. But we have no desire to be critical unless and until we can come up with some constructive ideas of our own.

8. I would be glad to get your comments on the above analysis of the position. We will then have to decide here whether we should make our worries known officially to the three Governments.

Following for Washington, Paris, Permdel, New York and Canac Paris: I should be glad to receive your comments on our analysis of the position as seen from your posts.

1. Lord Home had me down to CRO this morning to inform me of developments. He saw me alone and referred to my talk yesterday with Garner. He told me that India had accepted the invitation to attend the conference, and he then discussed in general terms the UK's objectives and what would happen after an agreement had been reached.

2. I asked him what would happen if an agreement was not reached and I said it was in that area that the preoccupations lay which had prompted me to speak to Garner yesterday. I said I could not go beyond that position because I had not been asked to place any Canadian views before him officially on this aspect. I knew, however, you were giving a great deal of thought to all aspects of the problem including this one, hoping to be able to come up with some constructive ideas. I said I knew you would welcome at this stage any light on what the UK was planning to do in the event of disagreement because of the serious consequences that could flow from it. I then briefly outlined the argument in your M1092 of August 7, and asked whether the UK was prepared to embark on a course that entailed such risks. Lord Home answered: "It could not be washed out, it could not be washed out", and added that all parties should understand quite clearly that the United Kingdom was in earnest.

3. He then dealt with the routine of the conference, but when I was leaving he returned to the use of force, and asked what were our views. I thought this an odd question because he knew our original position from Mr. St. Laurent's first message to the Prime Minister and I thought I had gone as far as I could to indicate how we were thinking now. However, I repeated what I had said about the inherent threat to the Commonwealth and to the Anglo-American alliance and the effect of an Egyptian appeal to the United Nations.

4. I found Lord Home less reassuring than Garner had been. He was also harder to follow and I do not know how much of what he said came from a determination to show no weakness and how much was based on a careful assessment of what was involved in the use of force. His mind did seem to run so much more on the problems of what to do when the conference produced agreement than on the problems of disagreement.

5. He said he intended to see me frequently. I said I would report the conversation to you and advise him of any comments you might make.

6. I feel we should put our worries officially before the UK. Indeed, it seems an inescapable obligation unless we can obtain solid comfort from Eden's address tonight.

7. On the conference itself, what Lord Home had to say was more reassuring and I felt that the UK is prepared to go some way to reach an agreement. I asked specifically if their ideas for international control precluded a nationalized Egyptian Canal Company, and he said it would be a most unwelcome solution but could not be ruled out.

8. On the role of the UN, he said that now that India had agreed to participate in the conference he did not think the UK would accept a proposal from Egypt to give the issue over at this stage to the UN. However, the UK were contemplating bringing the UN in in some manner, after an agreement had been reached. In this context, I referred to Mr. Pearson's reference to the UN in his statement to the House on August 1, and I added that you were undoubtedly carefully considering the relation of the UN to the problem. Hence if we do develop any constructive suggestions, we could easily pass them on.

9. On the subject of a change of venue, he said now that the Indians had decided to come in it was likely the UK would insist on the conference being held in London. There were enough acceptances in hand to ensure that it would be an important and representative conference.

The situation appears to have eased somewhat during the last two days with Western spokesmen emphasizing the importance of a peaceful solution and with the acceptance by a large number of countries, including India, of their invitations to attend the International Conference. We agree therefore that it would probably be best not to say anything more formally to the Foreign Office at this time about our apprehensions over the possible consequences of failure of the conference.

2. The Prime Minister has already expressed Canada's support of the objectives of the conference.¹⁰⁶ We think that it would be useful if you were to carry out your suggestion of conveying to Lord Home our relief at the improved atmosphere and at Eden's assurance that what is being sought is a solution by the broadest possible international agreement and not by force.¹⁰⁷

3. We were glad to learn that the Indians have been making constructive efforts to try to get Egypt into negotiations and we should be interested to know the Foreign Office view on the line taken in para. one of your message No. 1067 of August 8.† We too have doubts about the practicability of imposing an international authority on Egypt entirely against its will. In this regard you might also pass on to the Foreign Office informally the suggestion about a continuing committee of the conference contained in para. five of our message M1092 of August 7 and let us know their reaction to it. This is in effect another version of the Indian idea of a smaller group to exercise international authority, if such authority can be established. It might be in some such form as this that a settlement could emerge if, as seems possible, the Western and Egyptian sides come to propose control authorities composed of different groups of States.

2. Garner had told me earlier today that although the atmosphere had, he felt, improved somewhat, there had been no let-up in the "precautionary measures" and he did not expect any. He said there were some who still needed convincing, and he (2 groups corrupt) was important to leave no doubt as to our misgivings about the use of force.

3. I passed on your informal suggestion for a continuing committee of the conference to both Lord Home and Garner, and both were much interested. Lord Home intends to take it up with Selwyn Lloyd. We discussed the suggestion briefly. The first reaction of both of them was that the suggestion did not meet the requirements of international control, either in terms of operations or of finance. I commented that it was probably not intended to cover the technical aspects of control, but was a formula for providing continuing international supervision, and had the advantage first that it did so without requiring the introduction into Egypt of any new foreign bodies; and secondly that it supplied an ingredient that was missing in the present position, that is, international backing. I think it would be helpful to develop your ideas more fully for them, which I was unable to do. Lord Home again mentioned he would welcome our suggestions.

4. I have the clear impression that they are doing everything they possibly can to work for the success of the conference taking into account, as Lord Home said, the need for respecting Egypt's sovereignty and interests. However, Eden's statement is regarded by many here as having reduced his grounds for manoeuvre, as Rockwell observed to Mr. Heeney in the conversation reported in Washington's Tel 1466 Aug 9.† Eden's attack on Nasser personally has not only made it more difficult for Egypt to attend the conference but for the British to accept a solution that depends on Nasser.

5. Lord Home told me that the British do not intend to meet any of the suggestions put forward by the Russians in their reply to the invitation, a reply he took as a prelude to refusing to attend.

THE SOVIET POSITION IN THE SUEZ CRISIS

The Soviet position in the Suez crisis, so far as it has been disclosed, is as follows:

(a) On August 9, the Soviet Government issued a formal statement in reply to the British note of August 3. It supported Egypt's right to nationalize the Canal; condemned military preparations on the grounds that, since Nasser had guaranteed free navigation and promised compensation, these constituted unnecessary and unjust pressure which contributes to tension; urged a peaceful settlement; and agreed to attend the London Conference, although it stated that 22 additional countries should be invited, a date closer to the end of August should be selected, and the location of the conference should be Cairo. The statement also noted that questions concerning free navigation in waterways of international interest should be discussed in the framework of the UN.

(b) At the London Conference on August 16, Shepilov repeated these and made a few additional points. He recognized that the problem is acute and regretted the British refusal to accept the Soviet proposals. In view of the improper nature of the conference, Egypt could not possibly attend and the conference should not attempt to achieve more than an approach to the problem which would be acceptable to Egypt for succeeding negotiations. Shepilov emphatically denied that the USSR has special interests in the Middle East.

(c) On August 17, Shepilov stated that Nasser had to be trusted. The Western proposal for international control of the Canal was incompatible with Egyptian rights and the principles of the United Nations. The Soviet Government supported the Egyptian proposal of August 12 for a new or supplementary convention on free navigation and called for a discussion of tariffs with Egypt.

2. The factors affecting the Soviet position are economic, strategic and political.

Economic

(i) Since the construction of the Canal, Russian use thereof steadily increased until 1914. After the Revolution, the Soviet Government made relatively little use of the Canal. Since 1945, however, it has assumed a heightened importance for the USSR. The growth of the economy of the Soviet Far East, and new-post-war commitments to China and Northern Vietnam, and trade and shipping agreements with India and Burma have greatly increased the west-east flow of Soviet freight, especially of oil. To cope with the growing burden on the Trans-Siberian Railway since 1950, the USSR has had to resort to a major programme of electrification, dieselization, and expansion of the network of parallel track, and it has been forced to aid the Chinese in building two new links through the Mongolian People's Republic and Sinkiang. Meanwhile, her merchant and high seas tanker fleets and her Pacific port capacities have been expanded, and the volume of Soviet freight moving through the Canal has risen considerably. The fact that her present plans envisage the further long-term expansion of her fleets indicates that she does not expect to rely exclusively on the new and improved overland routes. Although the total volume of Soviet freight which moves through the Canal is still a small proportion of the world aggregate, this has a very great, and will assume an even greater significance, for Soviet economic interests in the Far East and South-East Asia. For example, in May 1956, out of a total of 1404 transits by ships totalling 11.3 million tons, Soviet Bloc vessels accounted for somewhat less than .3 million tons. In only one week (May 27-June 3, 1956), however, nine Soviet tankers carrying 85,000 tons of petrol passed through the Canal en route East. Over twenty Leningrad class tankers have been built in the USSR, apparently for this trade. It is expected that these vessels will be capable of three round trips on the Black Sea/Far East run. The increasing importance of petrol movements can be further seen from the figures for the past four years. Shipments to the Soviet Far East have risen from 20,000 to 442,000 tons, to China from 15,000 to 50,000 tons, and the total, including shipments to Vietnam, from 35,000 to 500,000 tons. Last year, 40,000 tons were delivered to China in Polish, rather than Soviet bottoms.

(ii) Although a lesser amount of freight moves from the satellites through the Canal to the under-developed areas of Asia, the number of vessels carrying this which are of Polish registry is no longer negligible. Moreover, of the total Bloc trade with the Far East, about 1/10 moves through the Suez Canal. Thus not only the USSR, but the entire Communist Bloc has every reason to seek for the Canal a régime which will ensure free navigation.

(iii) The Russians themselves have stated that since the opening of the Volga-Don Canal in 1954 has connected the central European USSR with the Black Sea, the Suez Canal has acquired increased significance for the Soviet economy.

(iv) The USSR must appreciate that Western use of the Canal will exceed Bloc use thereof for many years to come. In view of the importance of oil sales to the Arab lands, she is in no position to encourage any restrictions on navigation so far as the West is concerned.

Strategic

(i) For the foreseeable future, it is certain that the USSR wishes to prevent a major war from arising out of the present issue.

(ii) It must be assumed that the USSR has concluded, if only from the experience of the Second World War, when both defending and attacking powers were prepared to destroy the Canal, that a convention is inadequate to keep it open in time of war.

(iii) The precise course of a major war cannot be foreseen by the Russians any more than by the West. In a war of short duration, the Canal will probably have as little importance for the Russians as for the West. In a prolonged war, it is possible that the Russians might attach some importance to the Canal. The economic importance would arise out of the factors considered above. In the event of a major war, Western planners have concluded that the USSR would mount a campaign in the Middle East primarily to gain control of the oil sources of the West. In view of the possible strategic importance of the Canal to the USSR, it is doubted that the Russians would attempt to extend this campaign to accomplish its destruction, unless this proved necessary, though they would undoubtedly wish to put themselves in a position to prevent its full use by the West. The USSR must therefore desire a régime which will facilitate her ends in war, either to destroy the Canal, or prevent its use as events dictate.

Political

(i) One Soviet objective which has survived all the shifts in Russian tactics and propaganda in the Middle East is the withdrawal of Western interests from the region. The primary Soviet political objective in this case is the abolition of British and French control over the Canal. The USSR must also be at pains to ensure that American influence does not fill the vacuum left by the withdrawal of the British and the French.

(ii) There would seem to be no other comparable waterways concerning which the Soviet Union might expect to compromise her position by that which she adopts in the case of the Suez Canal. The reference in the Soviet statement of August 9 to the Western lack of concern about other canals and straits of international significance seems to be gratuitous and ineffective sarcasm. The analogy with the régime of the Bosphorus is not entirely accurate, though it has been Soviet (and Russian) policy consistently to urge international control of the waterway. In this respect, the USSR has, then, to consider the regional and world reaction to her position only with regard to this Canal.

(iii) As regards the Arabs, the Soviet Union stands to gain prestige by supporting Nasser against the West in all respects, especially in view of her refusal, after apparently hinting her readiness for nearly two years, to finance the Aswan High Dam.

(iv) The Soviet Government seems clearly satisfied with the results of its new policy vis-à-vis the West, and undoubtedly does not wish to risk loss of the ground gained, in the past three years.

(v) The USSR has thus far shown herself highly sensitive to world opinion and clearly wishes to mobilize this as far as possible in favour of Egyptian and Soviet Bloc requirements.

(vi) In 1954, a Soviet publication on the Suez Canal stated that the "fate of the Suez Canal does not constitute a private question of the mutual relationships of England and Egypt but is a complicated international problem. All states taking part in international trade are interested in a correct and just solution of this problem.... The Suez Canal should serve the purposes of international navigation without the establishing of distinctions or the granting of advantages to individual powers. No single state should try to obtain a privileged position on the canal." In urging a peaceful settlement, and by agreeing to attend the London Conference, the USSR has implied that there is room for negotiation and has set an example for Nasser. The Soviet agreement to come to London, and the Soviet call for a wider conference, is a specific recognition of international interest in this issue.

(vii) The USSR has thus far said little about submission of this issue to the United Nations, and, in view of the composition of the Security Council, may well wish to settle this outside of that body.

Conclusion

(a) The nationalization of the Canal would contribute to a primary Soviet political purpose in the Middle East, the withdrawal of French and British control. It also gratifies Arab as well as merely Egyptian sensibilities. The USSR has therefore supported this from the outset and will probably continue to do so. Her first objective at the London Conference has been and will be to secure world recognition and support for this fait accompli.

(b) The Soviet Government has thus far evaded the issue of the nationalization of the foreign assets of the Canal Company. Its statement of August 9 was confined to assets on the territory of the nation concerned, and its reference to the resolution of the General Assembly of December 1952, which urged nations to refrain from the infringement of other nations' rights may have been intended as a caution to Egypt in this respect. The recent Soviet drive in the under-developed countries has exported Russian capital for the first time since 1917. It may be that Moscow will not now be so quick to oppose negotiation on this aspect of nationalization.

(c) The USSR has thus far carefully avoided any precise commitment on the control of the Canal, and it should be easy for her to delay any clear pronouncement until positions of the Western Powers and of Egypt have been further clarified. She is unlikely to press for an early solution, since Egypt can presumably enjoy the revenues in the meantime.

(d) It would seem highly unlikely that the USSR will willingly entrust the present and future economic and strategic interests of the Communist Bloc in the Canal solely to the Egyptian Government. There is no reason to assume a high degree of mutual confidence between the USSR and Egypt at the present time, and presumably the Russians consider it possible that there might be a shift in Egypt back to a less anti-Western government. In view of the crucial importance of the Canal to the West, the Russians probably do not think it possible in the near future to secure control for the Bloc behind a facade of Egyptian ownership. It would appear that the only solution for the control of the Canal to which the USSR can lend its support, which would guarantee the interests of the Bloc, which might be made to appear to satisfy the Arabs, and which would not alienate the West, would be some form of international control of an Egyptian owned waterway.

(e) Thus far, the Soviet Government has called for a convention, rather than a controlling authority. She has hinted at the need for a specific agreement on the maintenance of free navigation in time of war, and has suggested that co-operative measures to this end should be discussed with Egypt.

(f) While the nature of the Soviet solution cannot be foreseen in detail, it can be expected that the USSR will probably seek:

- (i) to secure formal recognition of Egyptian ownership;
- (ii) to assign the revenues to Egypt;

(iii) to minimize the compensation of the present owners by calling for graduated payments at very low interest rates;

(iv) to secure an international agreement on control;

(v) to secure as large as possible a representation for the Bloc in the conclusion of this agreement;

(vi) a settlement outside of the United Nations under present circumstances; this could easily change if negotiations break down and the British and French seem tempted to use force.

(g) In these negotiations, it may be useful to:

(i) remind the USSR that she has contributed to this situation by her equivocal policies towards Egypt in the last twelve months;

(ii) point out that her plea for the presence of those states which are successors to the Hapsburg Empire implies recognition of continuity in law and therefore has implications for the full compensation of the present owners of the Canal;

(iii) her economic and strategic interests behove her to co-operate with the international community in securing a just and stable solution, not only for the control of the Canal, but also for the just disposition of its assets.

(h) Finally, it should be pointed out that by inviting the USSR to participate in the Conference, the Western powers have done precisely what Mr. Dulles told Mr. Pearson last spring they could not contemplate — formal recognition of Soviet interest in the Middle East.¹⁰⁸ The Russians are, of course, in the Middle East to stay, but their right to a voice in Middle East affairs will have to be recognized from now on if the Russians are given any share in the international control of the Canal. I think it only fair to recall that we have been recommending since early this year that a frank and equitable Four-Power approach to the problems of the Middle East provided the only hope for a peaceful settlement. We must now accept consultation with the Russians after irreparable damage to the Western cause has been done, and in circumstances which can only turn to the disadvantage of the West, and to profit of the Soviet Bloc.

SUEZ CANAL DISPUTE

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said there was not much information that could be added to what had already appeared in the press on the Suez Canal situation. The United States and the United Kingdom were anxious that Canada announce its support for the plan recently approved by a large majority of the London conference and now about to be conveyed to the Premier of Egypt. He had discussed the matter with the Prime Minister who felt this should be done, as the plan appeared to provide a satisfactory basis for a solution to the problem.

On the whole, the situation had eased a good deal and he doubted if really serious trouble would occur. The British and the French were retreating from their original attitudes and so was Nasser. It was conceivable that the London conference committee of five, headed by the Prime Minister of Australia, might be able to negotiate a settlement with the Egyptians, although Nasser would not likely accept the plan the committee would present. One danger at the moment lay in the fact that the technicians might leave their jobs on the canal, with the consequence that it would cease to operate efficiently. The Egyptians certainly could not run it without these highly qualified personnel. Another worrisome feature was public opinion in Egypt. Already a Canadian newspaper correspondent and some diplomats had been asked to leave the country for reasons which were none too clear.

2. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Suez Canal dispute and agreed that an announcement be made that Canada supported the plan of the majority of the London conference on this subject as a satisfactory basis for a solution to the problem.¹⁰⁹

Dutt, the Foreign Secretary, asked me to call on him this afternoon September 1. He said Mr. Nehru had asked him to see me about two items which had appeared in the papers here this morning. One item stated that French troops had been landed from a ship at Cyprus and from aircraft and that further landings of French troops from ships would take place soon. The other item stated that the North Atlantic Council would discuss Suez on Wednesday September 5 and that the British Foreign Secretary would be present. Mr. Nehru wondered whether there was any connection between these two developments and whether I had any news of the North Atlantic Council meeting which I could pass on to him.

2. Dutt said that he assumed that since the Suez Canal was outside the area defined in Article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty the discussions in the North Atlantic Council would take place under Article 4 and he referred to what he called the "classic exposition" which you had given in relation to Goa of the nature of consultation under Article 4. He however drew attention to the fact that Article 6 included islands north of the Tropic of Cancer.

3. I said that because of my absence from the office until this week I was out of touch with developments and had not seen all the recent incoming tels. I was fairly certain however that we had not received any tel about the meeting of the North Atlantic Council next Wednesday. I too assumed that the discussions in the North Atlantic Council would take place under Article 4.

4. After Dutt had delivered this enquiry from Mr. Nehru, I encouraged him to talk about the Suez question. He said the Indian Government was certain from the info at its disposal that if there were an armed conflict between Great Britain and France and Egypt such a conflict could not be localized. He drew attention to the Soviet Foreign Minister's ominous reference to "volunteers" and said we had had experience of volunteers in Spain. I added "and in North Korea". Dutt said that the Indian Government believed that a resort to force by Great Britain and France would not protect the oil interests which were so important to them. The "fanatical Arabs" in such countries as Syria and the Lebanon would blow up pipelines. He emphasized that the Arab world was united with even Iraq supporting Egypt on this issue.

5. He considered that it was unfortunate that publicity was being given to further movements of armed forces by Great Britain and France just before the important negotiations were about to begin between the Menzies Mission and the Egyptian Government.

6. In his opinion the important thing was to give time for negotiation and reflection. There had been no interference so far with the traffic through the Canal. Why therefore were the British and the French giving so great an impression of urgency? One possible explanation of why the UK was in such a hurry was that it was afraid that if negotiations dragged on for 6 months and there were still no solution of the difficulties, public opinion in Great Britain would have become more accustomed to the Egyptian action and less willing to support drastic measures.

7. I said I understood that India had been able to exercise a moderating influence in Cairo. Dutt said that the Indian task in Cairo had been most difficult. He added that he was sure that you understood that there was nothing in the stories that India had been backing Nasser's intransigence.

8. This crisis over Suez was for India an entirely different sort of matter from previous crises such as that over Korea. In the Korean crisis India was concerned because of the danger of war spreading. In Suez India has also a very direct and compelling interest because the success of the second five-year plan would be gravely endangered if there were interference with traffic to India through the Canal. The London Conference was in his opinion "the most important international conference" which India had attended.

9. Reverting to the necessity for patience in negotiations with Egypt he said that no country could be expected to accept without negotiation a proposal agreed to by a conference at which it was not represented. India on the other hand realized that other countries could not be expected to rely merely on Nasser's promises.

10. I hope you can let me have for transmission to Mr. Nehru some indication of the line which Canada will take at the North Atlantic Council Meeting on September 5.

11. Could you also let me know whether in your opinion Article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty would cover an attack on Cyprus or on British or French vessels or aircraft in the Mediterranean considering that the whole Mediterranean is north of the Tropic of Cancer.

Following for Prime Minister from Pearson¹¹⁰ (copy to USSEA): When we reached the subject of the Suez at our talks this morning at the Foreign Office, Selwyn Lloyd said he would like to discuss this matter with me alone, and the official therefore withdrew. I think he felt that he would like to have a very personal and very frank conversation.

Pearson was in Europe in connection with his duties as Chairman of the NATO committee charged with finding new ways to strengthen Alliance solidarity. See Chapter 3, Part 3.

2. He did not attempt to disguise his worries over the present situation and I doubt whether anything I said decreased those worries. At the same time, he was satisfied that the course the UK had been following was the right one and he seemed somewhat perplexed and disappointed that certain of the moves that they had made in following this course had been misinterpreted and aroused anxieties in the minds of their friends, which he did not think were warranted. He was thinking particularly about the charge of "sabre rattling" and the suggestion that the British and the French were willing and prepared to use force. He said that they had tried to make it clear from the very beginning that they did not even contemplate force except as a last resort, and that on the contrary they were most anxious to bring about a negotiated solution. He emphasized that the military moves that they had made were purely preparatory and precautionary and that if they had been played up and misconstrued by the press that was not their fault. He also felt that public opinion in this country was pretty firm behind the Government, at which I said that I did not get that impression from reading seven Sunday newspapers yesterday.

(a) Perhaps the key to the Foreign Secretary's thinking on this aspect of the question, as well as to UK tactics, was Lloyd's remark, "The chances may be ten to one against us using military force against Egypt on this issue, but if Nasser only felt that the chances were ten to one that we would, he would be more reasonable and a settlement could be reached."

(b) I pointed out the obvious weakness of this kind of reasoning based on the efficacy of bluff, and the danger of tactics designed to put it into effect. Lloyd realized this but asserted that Nasser must be made to give way by some form of pressure, economic or political.

3. Lloyd was satisfied with, indeed he was pleased about the results of the London Conference and particularly gratified by the solidarity displayed by the 18, which was even greater than the public accounts would indicate. He also was encouraged by reports which he felt were entirely reliable that Arab leaders, no matter what they might say in public, were just about as worried over Nasser's rash moves as the British were and just about as anxious that he should not be allowed to get away with them. Lloyd said they felt in London as strongly as ever that Nasser's efforts to establish control of the Suez Canal must be defeated, and they were resolved to do everything possible to bring this about. I asked him how we thought it could be done if Nasser refused to accept the 18 report, or indeed, if he merely ignored it, would not time seem to be working in his favour? Lloyd agreed that Nasser might create great difficulties merely by doing nothing. If he refused to accept the London proposals Lloyd's own view, and he told me this in the greatest possible confidence, was that they should take the matter immediately to the Security Council. Even if the Russians vetoed a British-American-French Resolution there it would get a majority vote and would establish a firm UN basis for any further action. Lloyd felt that any such further action would probably have to take the form of economic pressure unless there was direct interference with British shipping or British nationals by the Egyptians, or unless the operation of the Canal broke down completely, in which case other methods of more direct intervention might have to be attempted.

4. Lloyd was worried about the breakdown of the operation of the Canal consequent upon the resignation of pilots, something which he felt could not be postponed much longer. He said that this contingency was equally worrying to India and other Asian countries for whom the operation of the Canal was so important.

5. I told Lloyd that I thought the reference of the matter to the Security Council by the UK would be favourably received in Canada where we were particularly preoccupied with two aspects of the question: (1) that the UK and the others might act without reference to the procedures of the UN; and (2) that the British and French might not be able to carry the Americans along in any course which they proposed. Lloyd did not seem particularly worried about this latter possibility and felt that Dulles and the administration were just as determined as the British to prevent Nasser exercising sole control over the Canal. Lloyd also wondered whether, if things dragged on, Israel might not take advantage of the situation by some aggressive move against Egypt. He seemed to think that this might help the UK out of some of her more immediate difficulties, but agreed with me when I said that the long range results and, indeed, even the shorter range results of such action would be deplorable and dangerous. Such action by Israel would certainly consolidate Arab opinion behind Egypt, and even Arab leaders who might now be worrying about Nasser's moves would have to rally behind him.

6. Lloyd was very critical of the part played by Krishna Menon at the recent conference where he had ended by "making a fool of himself". He apparently left London very resentful, a feeling which is based, according to Lloyd, largely on the consciousness of the bad part he had played. He had succeeded in identifying the Indian position with that of Russia, which was not Indian policy. If he had been clever, said Lloyd, he would have waited for the Russians to declare themselves and then offered compromise proposals somewhere between the Russian and the British-American-French position. India then would have been able to maintain her position in the middle out of which Shepilov had been able to manoeuvre her by Krishna Menon's inept tactics.

7. They expected here that the Menzies' Committee would have completed its talks with the Egyptians in a day or two and that they might then be confronted with a situation which would require important decisions.

8. The impression I got from my talk with Lloyd, not only on the Suez matter but on the circumstances surrounding the meeting of the NATO Council on Wednesday, is that the UK Government are not being very skilful in their management of these international problems, even when the policies they may be pursuing are the right ones. Lloyd, for instance, seemed quite surprised when I told him that the manner and place of the announcement that the NATO Council would discuss the Suez question, made from London rather than from NATO in Paris was the wrong way to proceed and that it was bound to create unfavourable impressions in certain quarters. He said that it was purely accidental that it came from London because he had been discussing the possibility of the Council putting the subject on the agenda with Ismay that day and, therefore, the decision was given out here rather than by NATO in Paris. He had no intention of giving any impression that the UK were summoning the Council.

9. The same lack of skill seemed to have been shown in the way the earlier British troop movements to the Middle East and the recent despatch of French troops to Cyprus were explained or, rather, were not explained to public opinion. There seems to be a lack of imagination and skill on the part of those who are concerned here with the public relations aspect of UK policy moves. The results are often perplexing for the friends of the UK and indicate, it seems to me, a lack of direction and no sureness of touch. There was another example of this in our talks this morning when we got on the subject of NATO Defence Policy.¹¹¹ As you know in June the British were very excited over the necessity for an immediate reassessment which would rationalize certain changes which they thought were required in regard to their NATO defence contributions. Lloyd seemed unworried about this matter during our talk today and was calm about the probability that there would be no real decisions or even any serious discussion of the problem by NATO until the December meeting.

10. I hope I am not being unfair to people here or unduly pessimistic when I say that my impression is that events in the international field are pulling the British Government with them rather than being influenced and directed by that Government. Ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETING, SEP 5/56

I made the following statement on the Suez situation at the meeting this afternoon. In accordance with the arrangement reached at the end of the meeting it should be treated as strictly confidential and I am saying nothing about it to the press here, not even that I took part in the discussion. It may, however, be of some importance as a statement of Canadian policy to the Council and therefore I am sending it in full, apart from the introductory observations which dealt with the propriety and value of political consultation of this kind; in receiving a report from the Chairman and other participants in the London Conference on a matter of such importance to all members of NATO. I expressed gratification that the accident of my presence in Paris on other business enabled me to be present at the meeting and to take part in the discussion. Statement begins:

While Canada did not come within the criteria, the very reasonable ones, laid down as a basis for an invitation to the London Conference — and we had no complaint on that score — we were very conscious of the importance of the problem created by the sudden and arbitrary seizure by Egypt of the control of a waterway which was under an international régime, and we were aware that though geographically remote from the Suez we could not escape the consequences of the failure to find a satisfactory solution for that problem through those peaceful means to which we were pledged as signatories both of the UN charter and the NATO pact.

Certainly we don't underestimate the seriousness of this problem — especially for countries like France and the UK for whom it is, in fact, of vital importance.

Though we have heard a lot and will hear more about the issue in terms of nationalism, colonialism, imperialism, etc., the problem is the concrete one of ensuring the efficient, impartial and non-political operation of the Canal in the interests of all those who use it — especially of those for whom it serves a vital economic and transportation purpose.

Because this is our understanding of the problem the Canadian Government welcomed proposals of (group corrupt) Governments and have already stated publicly our support for them.

We also welcomed Colonel Nasser's decision to talk with the five-member committee representing the 18, from five continents of the world, even though we had and have no optimistic illusions about the certainty of success of these talks. The fact that this group of five is trying to find out merely whether Egypt will negotiate a convention on the basis of the 18-Government proposal is sufficient denial of the suggestion that the Egyptian Government is being confronted with anything in the nature of an ultimatum.

We feel that the 18-Power proposal is reasonable and satisfactory as a basis of negotiation. It respects the sovereignty, interests, and even the susceptibilities of Egypt. It provides adequately for safeguarding and preserving the international character and use of the Canal through cooperative international arrangements to be appropriately associated with the UN.

We appreciate the view of the users of the Canal that the efficient and non-political operation which is essential can, in present circumstances, be assured only through agreed international arrangements which would minimize the possibility of interference — political or economic — and prevent its exploitation by any single state — including the state through whose territory the Canal runs.

We understand and appreciate the desire of Egypt to safeguard its sovereignty and its national interests and dignity. We do not think that the proposal of the eighteen powers infringes on either.

If the present negotiations in Cairo fail or, more likely, if they are inconclusive and Egypt merely takes note of the proposals without doing anything about them, we inevitably ask ourselves, what then? It is a worrying question.

We must, I think, rule out force. I say that not without qualification because otherwise we would not be spending between 40 percent and 50 percent of our budgets on defence. But we must rule out force except as a last resort and use it only in accordance with the principles we have accepted in the NATO Pact and the UN Charter.

If the negotiations in Cairo fail, what political action can be taken? Where should it be taken? at the UN? — And how? I feel myself that a majority opinion at the Security Council — even if it is vetoed there — as it would be — might be an important and valuable support for subsequent negotiations or action.

Another question: what, if any, form of economic action is possible or is contemplated, which might bring pressure on Egypt for the conclusion of a satisfactory arrangement, and which would not do more injury to those imposing the sanctions than to those against whom they are imposed?

In this connection I have listened with great interest to Mr. Spaak's views that we should refuse to accept the Egyptian action as a fait accompli. This involves, I suppose, the application of the doctrine of non-recognition with which we have had some experience in recent years in other contexts; non-recognition and non-payment of dues.

Finally, there is the question, the dangerous implications of which Mr. Pineau has emphasized — what happens if the operation of the Canal breaks down before a settlement is reached; or if non-Egyptian personnel are interfered with in their desire to leave their duties at the Canal?

I can ask these questions but I can't answer them. I am, however, glad to know that those Governments who are most concerned with this matter are seeking the answers with a sense of responsibility — national and international.

I can only add in conclusion that my own Government will support them in their political and diplomatic endeavours designed to bring about an international solution which will recognize the vital importance of this waterway to them and, indeed, to all States. Statement ends.

It would, I think, be desirable, if you have not already done so, to send Escott Reid info regarding the Wednesday meeting of the NATO Council, which should reassure the Indians. There was no effort to rally the Council behind any recent British or French moves and, indeed, Selwyn Lloyd specifically disclaimed any such purpose. The Indians have, of course, no reason to complain that the Chairman of the London Conference, representing a NATO country, should report to the Council on a matter of such great importance to all NATO members.

2. I hope that the Indian Government will also realize that whatever influence we have been exerting is on the side of moderation, negotiation, and no use of force which could not be justified under the UN Charter. In this connection it might be desirable to send Reid a copy of my remarks at the Council meeting. It would, however, be wrong to give the impression to the Indians that we are not whole-heartedly supporting the international solution embodied in the proposal of the 18 members of the London Conference for the reasons which we have already indicated.

SUEZ CANAL

I saw Mr. Dulles this morning, September 12, and asked for his personal appreciation of developments with respect to the Suez Canal, for transmission to the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson. Dulles quickly accepted the opportunity and spoke almost without interruption at some length giving every evidence of having this problem uppermost in his mind.

2. Mr. Dulles said that with the failure of the Menzies' mission to secure Egyptian cooperation, the UK and France had seen no alternatives but resort to force on the one hand, or complete capitulation to Nasser on the other. Dulles added parenthetically that he didn't think that his colleagues had tried very hard to find another course of action. In these circumstances, Dulles said he devoted all his personal attention to developing a "makeshift arrangement" which would provide an intermediary route between the alternatives of force and capitulation. He said, with an obvious degree of pride of authorship, that he had devised the scheme of a "users' association". It would ideally be a group comparable in membership to the 18 Nation Conference. Dulles said he developed the idea with the hope that the association would provide a way of obtaining Egyptian cooperation on a de facto basis when it seemed that no scheme could produce Egyptian cooperation on a de jure basis.

3. It was his idea that the users' association would serve to keep the London Conference group together as a cohesive body to deal with practical matters and even some political matters. Nasser might find it possible to cooperate with the users' association at the working level without being forced to agree formally to the bonafides of the body. Dulles believed that the association could take over as the employer of the pilots; it could be the authority setting the traffic pattern through the Canal; and it would be the "collecting agent" for tolls. It would use the money coming into its hands to pay the pilots and other expenses and to recompense Egypt for expenses which it might incur in the operation of the Canal. The continued employment of the pilots was a worrying problem. The USA would not let its boats go through the Canal "if the Egyptians attempted to put Soviet pilots, for example, on our boats". It was to be hoped that Nasser could agree on a de facto basis to the association's control of pilots. As far as the USA was concerned, USA ships would be required under a Treasury regulation to pay tolls to the new association and to cease payment of tolls to the Egyptian authorities (which we understand is now being done under protest).

4. Dulles said that the UK and France had accepted his scheme reluctantly. (In a conversation which I had this morning with Makins, the UK Ambassador emphasized the UK conception of this proposal as a "completely Dulles" scheme). Dulles went on to say that the scheme "did not abound in intrinsic merit" but it could, in his estimation, provide some middle ground for a provisional solution. He said he had been assured that the UK and France were "prepared to act" on September 15. His scheme had had enough merit to induce the UK and France at least to delay in the taking of military measures.

5. At the same time as the users' association scheme was being developed, the USA was considering with the UK and France what to do if the device failed. The UK and France had intended to bring the subject to the UN, in a procedure which he, Dulles, described as "cockeyed". He had no objection to going to the UN with a good case and in the right way. The UK and France had, however, put forth "the novel idea to me" that through the Security Council they could force Egypt to make a new treaty; and if Egypt refused, could hold that refusal as an act of aggression within the terms of the Charter. Their idea, according to Dulles, was to require Egypt to accept the 18 nations' proposal and to treat the expected Egyptian refusal as a threat to the peace. When the French Ambassador had contended that France would thereby obtain "liberty of action" Dulles had reminded him that France's liberty of action was already circumscribed by the Charter of the UN; the Security Council could not, under any circumstances free France of its obligations thereunder. Dulles had said that he could not commit the USA to oppose an amendment ruling out the use of force (which could be expected) to any such approach to the Security Council. As a result, only yesterday, the UK and France had decided not to go to the Security Council. Dulles said that the UK and France had, within the last hour, submitted a note to the Secretary General of the UN drawing attention to the unlawful seizure of the Canal by Egypt, reporting the failure of the London Conference, and stating that the present situation was considered to be a danger to peace and security. The note, as you will have seen, did not request a meeting of the Security Council.

6. Dulles said he was not sure how the users' association scheme would be portrayed by Eden in his presentation to Parliament. If it was interpreted as a punitive action against Egypt, the scheme would in all likelihood fail. If it was presented as another step to attempt to bring about the practical operation of the Canal, leaving the door open for broader negotiation, it might work.

7. In response to my question, Dulles said that the UK might station one or two naval vessels at each end of the Canal to serve as a central point for handling traffic and pilots if the Egyptians refused to allow the pilots to operate from Egyptian soil. The UK was entitled by treaty to station ships at Port Said and Aden.

8. Dulles believed that if his scheme was unsuccessful, the breakdown was likely to come as a result of physical obstruction by Egypt of the passage of ships through the Canal. Then there might be a case to be taken to the Security Council, on the grounds that the 1888 Treaty had been contravened. This would be quite a different state of affairs than would have applied if the UK and France had gone to the Security Council as they had intended. If such a breakdown did occur, Dulles said "We won't fight our way through the Canal". He said the USA would re-route its tankers around the Cape.

9. Dulles said a plan was in existence to increase oil production in this hemisphere. It was possible in the short run to provide the volume of oil needed to replace that lost if the Canal were closed, and to provide transportation for it as well. There had been "very preliminary discussions" with the British and the French as to the strain which such a plan would put on their dollar reserves. It might be possible to provide export-import bank loans to tide over the immediate situation. In the long run Dulles believed there was bound to be a serious exploration of alternatives to the use of the Canal. Large tankers were already being built which would make the Cape route economic. Nasser's action would certainly cause second thoughts about pouring more money into the development of the Suez.

10. Dulles ended our interview (his guest list was full) with brief references, at my request, to the attitude of other Arab countries, and Israel. He said it was possible to detect on the part of Iraq and Saudi Arabia "great concern" at Nasser's activities. On the other hand leaders in these two countries were unwilling to split publicly with Nasser for in such a circumstance they believed "they and not Nasser would lose". Syria was "in the Egyptian pocket". Dulles believed that Syria would cut off its oil output if force were used to bring Nasser to terms, but might be prepared to maintain the supply of oil even if tankers were diverted around the Cape. The Israelis were "getting tougher" and there was some sign that they would attempt to exploit the present situation for their own end. He said that Secretary General Hammarskjöld was very angry with the Israelis for their failure to cooperate with his mission and was thinking of filing a tough report against them. Dulles' brief mention of our F86 problem will be dealt with in a separate message.¹¹²

11: As I was leaving his office, I suggested that the Soviet Union were probably delighted at the embarrassment which had been caused to Western countries in the Middle East. Dulles agreed that this indeed must be the case. I regret that it was not possible to explore this matter further for I have the impression that in much that is being thought of and done in Washington, officials are looking over Nasser's shoulder at the Russians and in whatever manner they can are tailoring their suggestions to the end of delimiting as much as possible the obvious Soviet gains in the area.

12. Dulles is to have a press conference tomorrow when the Suez may be expected as the principal subject to be raised.

SUEZ CANAL DISPUTE
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUG. 29)

6. The Acting Prime Minister reported that the United Kingdom had expressed the hope that Canada would give public support to the plan, announced in the British House of Commons by Sir Anthony Eden yesterday, for the establishment of an international association to protect the rights of the users of the Suez Canal. The matter had been discussed by telephone with the Prime Minister who felt it would be desirable to say that the Canadian government was not in a position to comment at the moment but that the question was being studied carefully.

7. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, said that, after the Menzies mission to Cairo had failed, the U.K. and France were reconciled to having the dispute referred to the Security Council. However, the United States was opposed to this course because it would not support — and the President had thus stated — any effort of the U.K.

and France to persuade the Security Council to sanction the use of force. By referring this matter to the council at this stage the U.K. and France hoped to avoid a discussion in the General Assembly later when there was bound to be a wide measure of support for Egypt. This appeared to be unrealistic as the problem would likely be raised by Egypt or some other country.

In the circumstances, the U.S. Secretary of State had proposed the users association as an interim arrangement. The founder members would include the U.K., France, and the U.S., with other user countries invited to join. The association would co-ordinate traffic, provide pilots, collect dues and pay Egypt an appropriate amount for the facilities she provided. Sir Anthony had adopted this plan and announced it in a provocative speech in Parliament. Beyond what was already public, and some information which the Canadian Ambassador in Washington had been able to gather from an interview with Mr. Dulles, was about all that was known of the arrangements. Furthermore, there was no indication of the views of other principal users such as Sweden, who had supported the majority plan presented to Nasser by the Committee of Five.

Officials in External Affairs suggested that, if asked to comment, and they were being asked, a statement might be issued indicating that the plan was being studied, that further information about it and the views of the principal users were being sought and that, in the circumstances, it would be premature to comment.

8. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The form of announcement suggested would only lead to undesirable speculation as to what Canada's attitude might ultimately be. Obviously the user plan would result in serious division in the western world and, in the circumstances, it would be desirable at this time to say no more than that the matter was being carefully considered.

(b) United States policy was most unfortunate. In effect, the Americans insisted that the U.K. and France agree to a U.S. proposal which, in the end, the U.S. would not help enforce. Mr. Dulles had tried to justify his plan by saying that if it were resisted the British and French would be in a much better position than they would otherwise be to argue their case in the Security Council.

9. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Acting Prime Minister and the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs on the plan announced by the U.K. Prime Minister for the creation of an association to protect and implement the rights of the users of the Suez Canal, and agreed that it should only be said that the Canadian government was studying the situation closely.

SUEZ CANAL

I have read with much interest and some surprise tel 1654 from Washington. Lange, the Norwegian Foreign Minister, had lunch with Guy Mollet yesterday, who confirmed the info in the above tel that the proposal put forward on Wednesday by Eden in London was indeed Mr. Dulles's "brain child", and that this was one of the reasons why even the French and the British were still uncertain about many of its details. The French Government, however, seems as resolved as the British to see the matter through, even if as a last resort, force has to be used. In fact, Lange got the impression from Mollet that a main reason for French firmness in this matter was not only the necessity of international control of the Suez, though that was of great importance, but also — or even more — the desirability of inflicting a defeat on Nasser which would result in his disappearance and give other Arab states a chance, which their rulers would like to take, of withdrawing from the wrong kind of Egyptian leadership. Mollet also indicated to Lange that the French would not flinch from sending a warship through the Canal with a French merchant vessel if the Egyptians obstructed passage.

2. There was an informal meeting today of Lange, Martino, Beyen, Birgi, Secretary-General of the Turkish Foreign Office and myself when we exchanged views on the new Suez proposal, which had taken everybody completely by surprise. While the four of them were upset by the suddenness of the move and the lack of consultation, especially the Italian and Norwegian Foreign Ministers, who were distinctly irritated, reactions on the merits of the proposal varied. The Turk, while anxious about the effect of this latest move on opinion in Asian countries and about the increased difficulty of keeping Iran and Pakistan in the 18, felt that the paramount consideration was common action in that group which should stand and work together. I got from him the impression that Turkey would go along with the London proposal and do her best to persuade Pakistan and Iran to do likewise. Beyen also, though having doubts about the practicability of the new scheme or its operation without the use of force and a head-on collision with Egypt, did not seem as worried by that prospect as Martino and Lange were. Martino said that his Government was most alarmed about developments. He himself could not find any legal or sound political basis for the Anglo-French-American proposal. He was sure that the Italian Government would not join the users' association, or even announce its support for it without very careful consideration indeed. Lange took the same view and has been instructed by his Prime Minister to return to Norway over the weekend where the matter is to be discussed by the Cabinet. He told me that the Danes and Swedes were equally perturbed.

3. All agreed, and I share their agreement, that in default of the unlikely submission of Nasser, the new arrangements can hardly be put into operation without some kind of clash occurring. As Beyen put it: "They won't work, but they probably aren't meant to work."

4. I do not myself get too much comfort out of Wednesday's developments in London and I would be glad to get your opinion of them. I am surprised at Dulles's rather optimistic conclusion that the new proposal is a satisfactory make-shift until something better can be worked out and that Nasser may be persuaded to cooperate, at least in a form which would keep the traffic going. Nor do I share his view that a submission to the Security Council at this time would have been "cockeyed", and I am not impressed by the argument that any resolution proposed would be amended to exclude the use of force in a way which would necessarily be embarrassing. As a matter of fact, any such resolution on our side from the beginning should include a provision against the use of force except in conformity with the principles of the UN Charter. There is, I think, a real danger of a split developing between the USA and the British and French on the presentation and the application of the new proposal. Mr. Dulles, for instance, may think that Eden has put it forward in too forceful a way in London. The USA Government may be able to divert American shipping around the Cape if there is trouble — as Dulles proposes — but that may well be interpreted over here as a weakening of a scheme of which he was the main author, with the British and French left to deal with Egyptian obstruction by other and more positive means. If these means require force then most of the 18, even if they have remained together up to that point, will I suppose follow Dulles and the front will collapse.

5. These are some random thoughts put down without much time for consideration. I thought I had better send them along at once.

SUEZ

You will be receiving a separate report† on the Suez discussions at Saturday afternoon's WEU meeting. I had thought of attending myself as the Canadian observer when I learnt that the European ministers would be raising the matter with Lloyd. But I decided against it as I didn't think that we should appear to be politically associated in any way with these new Suez developments until either we have been formally invited to attend a conference on the subject and have accepted, or until we know more about the latest users' proposal than we do now and, on the basis of that knowledge, feel we should officially consult with the British and others regarding it.

2. I do not think that we can dismiss the possibility of Canada later being asked to join the users' association and, of course, it is hoped both in London and Paris that we will publicly support it in any event.

3. I think, however, we should be very careful in this interim period in saying or doing anything which would give the impression that Canadian association or support is something that can be taken for granted.

4. Selwyn Lloyd casually mentioned to Wilgress on Saturday afternoon after the meeting that he assumed that I would be in London next Wednesday and Thursday when the latest Suez Conference is being held. I have, however, no intention of leaving Paris for any such ambiguous purpose, as Robertson can get all the info regarding developments and details, and my presence in London might be misinterpreted. If, however, we were formally invited to the conference, which I suppose is unlikely, a different situation would arise. Any such invitation would have to be carefully considered. But even if it were accepted, we should, I think, make it clear that acceptance does not imply automatic membership in the users' association; an implication that I know is already worrying Italy and the Scandinavian States.

5. In any event, as Lange and Martino will now be away from Paris for much of next week, it is all the more important that I should stick to my NATO job here.

6. The more I think of this users' association proposal the more sceptical I am about either its practicability or wisdom. I still feel that it would have been better to have gone to the Security Council, and I wouldn't be surprised if the British and French do not soon regret that they rejected that course for this dubious Dulles proposal which can't work without some form of Egyptian technical, if not political cooperation, which does not seem to be forthcoming.

7. In any event, what is the next move? Force, without USA support or approval, or an appeal to the Security Council for some backing for this latest proposal which, as I see it, though I confess I don't see it clearly in the absence of details, will be more difficult to advocate or defend than the earlier 18-power proposal.

8. I am keeping in close touch with Robertson by telephone. You know of his anxieties. I share them.

PART A

I. THE MIDDLE EAST

1. The Second Suez Conference and Related Developments in the Canal Dispute

COMMONWEALTH & MIDDLE EAST DIVISION: Representatives of the eighteen governments which endorsed the proposals submitted to the Egyptian Government by the Menzies Mission met in London from September 19 to September 21, to consider the Suez situation in the light of the report of the Committee of Five and subsequent developments. The principal item of discussion was the proposal, agreed among the United Kingdom, France and the United States and announced on September 12 by Sir Anthony Eden, for the establishment of a Suez Canal Users' Association. Delegates from several of the eighteen states expressed apprehensions about the practicability of the plan, and indicated that they would have preferred taking the matter directly to the United Nations. However, a considerable measure of support for the proposed Association ultimately emerged from the meeting and a declaration providing for its establishment was drawn up. The general objectives of the Association, as defined in the statement issued at the conclusion of the conference, are "to facilitate any steps which may lead to a final or provisional solution to the Suez Canal problem; to further cooperation among the governments adhering to it concerning the use of the canal; to seek the cooperation of the competent Egyptian authorities, pending a solution of the larger issues, and to deal with such problems as would arise if the traffic through the canal were to diminish or cease." It was agreed also that the Association should begin to function as soon as possible, after the delegates to the conference had had an opportunity to consult their respective governments. To this end, a third meeting of the user nations is scheduled to be held in London on October 1.

In their final statements at the second Suez Conference, none of the delegates rejected the idea of setting up the Users' Association. Representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australia expressed definite approval. Delegates from France, Italy, Denmark, Norway, Turkey, Germany, Holland, Spain and Portugal undertook to recommend the proposal to their governments. The Ethiopian and Swedish representatives agreed to submit the scheme to their governments, with some measure of support. The delegates of Japan, Iran and Pakistan avoided commitment as to what they would recommend to their governments. The statement issued at the conclusion of the second Conference took note of the fact that the governments of the United Kingdom and France on September 12 had informed the United Nations Security Council of the Suez situation, and said it was the view of the Conference that recourse should be had to the United Nations whenever it seemed that this would facilitate a settlement. Two days after the close of the meeting, on September 23, the United Kingdom and France decided that a reference to the Security Council should be made at once. They requested the President of the Security Council to call a meeting of the Council for September 26, to consider the following item:

"The situation created by the unilateral action of the Egyptian Government in bringing to an end the system of international operation of the Suez Canal, which was confirmed and completed by the Suez Canal Convention of 1888."

The Egyptian Government subsequently registered with the President of the Security Council a protest against the actions of "certain nations, particularly the United Kingdom and France," in the Suez controversy. It was the Anglo-French hope that the meeting of September 26 would be purely procedural, and that substantive discussion of the question would not take place until October 2, by which time the Suez Canal Users' Association would be established.

SUEZ SUPPLEMENTARY ASSESSMENT

In view of recent developments we are less hopeful now than we were earlier about the chances that the Western Powers can win a favourable response from the Afro-Asians in any UN consideration of the Suez question. Unfortunately events since our earlier assessment have tended to drive the Afro-Asians closer to Nasser. I have in mind the following:

(a) The UK and France have maintained the threat of military force, even though it has become clear that the US and other members of the "users" group are opposed to force.

Parliamentary debates and press comments in the UK and France have shown, moreover, that the threat of force has not nearly the backing it was earlier supposed to have. In these circumstances the Anglo-French tactics have understandably failed to impress Nasser (in particular during the visit of the Menzies mission to Cairo) and, perhaps, only served to harden Afro-Asian opinion against the UK and France. (In a UN context the Latin Americans, too, might be expected to react unfavourably to this and other forms of coercion.)

(b) In the process of negotiation Nasser may have appeared more flexible than his adversaries. The broad opinion among the Afro-Asians has been to regard him as an underdog ready to negotiate all save his country's honour. This "heroic" stand against powerful "white imperialists" is a situation hand-made for the applause of Asia and Africa. There the vast majority would agree that Egypt today could never accept Western proposals like Dulles' users association, certainly in its original form. As long as the suggestion remains that outside powers are striving to dominate the arrangements for running the Canal, Nasser can expect to hold popular support in Afro-Asian countries.

(c) Support will be all the stronger if the Egyptians can keep the Canal open. Afro-Asian admirers will not look for long-range results, like the much needed improvement of the Canal. As long as Egypt is able to maintain the present strenuous efforts, which are deserving of admiration, to run the Canal, the Afro-Asians will take pride in the success. Chaos in the operation might, however, rapidly reverse the trend when the impact hit the Afro-Asian economies.

2. Notwithstanding the foregoing we continue to see merit in having the Canal issue discussed in a UN forum. Here the Western case can be heard at first hand by representatives of all governments concerned. Here the real issues and difficulties could be exposed fully. In a UN context a plea for international law and order would have much stronger effect than in a narrow contest between disputants. The Afro-Asians, in particular, must be made to see what is really at stake. Given a careful explanation, they might do so in the atmosphere of the UN.

3. This opinion presupposes, of course, that the Western Powers will have reached agreement on clear-cut objectives. These objectives must be consistent with present-day political facts in Asia and Africa. They would be something short of those which the Western Great Powers have been variously pursuing in recent weeks, such as the virtual reversal of the Egyptian nationalization order, the downfall of Nasser and a return to international control of the Canal. The main effort must be directed toward international supervision rather than control. If an international board is contemplated, it should have advisory, consultative and supervisory capacity rather than managerial power. The emphasis in presentation should be that this international body is required to assist the Egyptians to run their Canal in the interests of Egypt and the countries whose shipping uses the Canal. Although there is undoubtedly a balance of right between user and owner, for the purpose of selling internationalization to Egypt and to the Afro-Asians surely the emphasis should be allowed on the right of ownership.

4. The Western Powers should get rid of the idea that Egypt is to be "hailed into court" for its part in the Suez crisis. Nasser's refusal to cooperate with the users association, whatever the legalities of the matter, is unlikely to be accepted generally in the UN as a pretext for condemning Egypt. There has been too much provocation on the other side; too much appearance that might is right. The Egyptians and their close friends (USSR and Yugoslavia on the Security Council) might easily turn the debate into a counter condemnation against the UK and France. In these circumstances the seven safe votes which the West usually counts in the Council might not prevent a practical defeat for the West, especially since the UK and France might consider that as parties to the dispute they should remain aloof from the voting.

5. All this suggests that the appeal to the Council should be carefully presented. Our view has been that it should be made under Chapter VI, Articles 34 and 35. It should involve an investigation of a situation which has led to international friction and given rise to a dispute. The aim should be to seek a solution to the problem of operating the Canal for international benefit under the new management. The right of ownership should not be open to question nor the right of the users; these should be assumed. The fundamental question would be how to reconcile these two rights. One interim solution might be to set up a committee or commission to explore with the parties the possibilities for reconciliation. This commission would be required to report back to the Council. There might also be some interim arrangement for the operation of the Canal, such as a body of technical personnel representing both sides. This would be a reasonable and practicable UN approach and the one most likely to win support. It would preclude threats of coercion and any kind and threats of retaliation on the part of Egypt.

6. Proposals of this kind may be quite unpalatable to those who have been thinking in terms of an imposed solution, either reoccupation of the Suez Canal zone or the economic strangulation of Egypt. Neither of these is likely to produce even temporary benefits for the West and the first might easily result in the most appalling consequences. To restore the Western position in the Middle East, a position which had deteriorated sharply even before Nasser's nationalization order, the Western Powers will be required to make some major readjustment in their thinking and their policies. Even if this means that some of them suffer some loss of face, it might not be too disastrous in the long run. I am not too impressed with the prophesied horrors of letting Nasser boast about his success. The Hitler analogy which is going the rounds is out of all proportion to the facts of life in the Middle East. Nasser's grandiose schemes have produced little tangible result and he is running out of scapegoats. There are recurring reports that even some of his close supporters, at home and abroad, are beginning to worry about his antics. The kind of UN debate, which I hope will result from the Council's consideration of the Suez issue, might well circumscribe Nasser's hasty seizure of the Canal and encourage those Egyptians, Arabs and other Afro-Asians who have cause to fear the direction in which Nasser's ambitions have been carrying him.

SUEZ

Today Murray spoke to a number of officials and as a result we gained a clearer picture of what the UK and France hoped to achieve by bringing the Suez question to the Security Council. I regret to learn that their objectives, at least for the moment, are rather limited and not likely to lead to an early solution to the problem of keeping the Suez Canal in efficient operation.

2. Keeble of the UK Mission stated that the immediate objective is to have the Council inscribe the item exactly as presented in the Anglo-French submission, that is, "situation created by the unilateral action of the Egyptian Government in bringing to an end the system of international operation of the Suez Canal, which was confirmed and completed by the Suez Canal Convention of 1888" (Document S/3654 of September 24). The UK Mission is most anxious to avoid any change in this wording; they wish particularly to avoid any attempt to have the item stated in more conciliatory terms. As you may be aware, the Egyptians have asked for an urgent Council meeting to consider an item which is as strongly anti-UK and France as theirs is anti-Egyptian. The UK expect that the USSR might endorse the Egyptian item. There is the danger that a procedural debate on what the item should be called might result in a proposal to inscribe the item merely as "the Suez question". The UK would be opposed to this result.

3. Fourier-Ruelle of the French Mission stated that the immediate aim of substance was to obtain a Security Council endorsement of the Eighteen-Power position as conveyed to Nasser by Menzies and including the subsequent proposal for a users association. To achieve this aim it was necessary to obtain the Council's agreement to inscribe the item precisely as stated in the Anglo-French letter of September 23. Fourier-Ruelle said that France had not been too keen about submitting the question to the Security Council but that the UK "for internal political reasons" had insisted upon doing so. He believed that the Anglo-French submission would be supported by the necessary seven votes in the Council.

4. Hill of Australia stated that the forthcoming meetings of the Council were to be a "bashing session", in which Egypt was the intended victim. He stated that in meeting with friendly members of the Security Council Dixon had been urging that the Western Powers should "go in with flags flying". The object was to show Nasser that the Security Council strongly disapproved of his "unilateral action". Hill suggested that ultimately it might be desirable to try to work out a solution through UN machinery but for the time being it was essential to "bash" Nasser. He admitted the force of our suggestion that a "bashing session" now might render difficult if not impossible a UN solution later. He said in strict confidence that Menzies and Casey were sharply divided on how the matter should be dealt with in the Security Council. Menzies wished to follow a tough line; Casey and his department wished to pursue a UN solution. As a consequence the Australian Mission was not sure how it would act in tomorrow's meeting.

5. We had no opportunity to discuss the situation with the USA Mission. I gathered from speaking to others, however, that the USA was not very happy about the line the UK and France were pursuing. Dulles was said to be in favour of a conciliatory debate aimed at reaching eventually a UN solution. It was suggested, for example, that the USA might be prepared to modify the item to be inscribed to some middle form like "the Suez question". The USA position could of course have an important bearing on the attitude adopted by others, like China, Cuba and Peru.

6. This morning the position of the USSR was only a matter of speculation. UK, French and Australian officials assumed that the USSR would oppose the inscription of the Anglo-French item and try to have it modified. The USSR could also be expected to oppose any resolution on substance endorsing the Eighteen-Power position. Iran was expected to oppose inscription of the Anglo-French item but to do so in a moderate manner; Fourier-Ruelle was confident that Abdoh could be counted upon to play his difficult role well. Yugoslavia was expected to press for the inscription of a more conciliatory item.

7. Anglo-French opinion seemed to be that the other eight members of the Council would vote to inscribe the item as proposed by the UK and France and that a majority of at least seven votes could be counted upon throughout the Council's deliberations. This assumed that the USA position would ultimately be closer to the UK and France than indicated now. The majority of seven or eight could be depended upon to defeat the inscription of the Egyptian item. It was less clear whether a possible Soviet proposal to exclude the use of force, at least during the time when the Council was considering the matter, could be blocked.

8. Today the UK Mission, which is directing the present manoeuvre, has been working hard to win the full support of at least seven Council members. Because of the uncertainties which I have mentioned it is by no means a sure thing that the procedural debate will be concluded at the meeting tomorrow afternoon. The French expect a further meeting on September 27. If all goes well the UK and France hope to begin the debate on the substance on October 2 when Selwyn Lloyd and Pineau will be here. Fawzi is expected to arrive in the next day or so. The speculation is that Dulles will not attend the Council and that, if he does not, neither will Shepilov.

9. The UK and France apparently hope that Egypt will be the only non-member of the Council to be heard. They assume that the Egyptians will ask to attend the Council once the agenda has been approved. There is some possibility that Israel will also ask to be heard, particularly because Israel's interest has been clearly established. The UK Mission hopes that Israel can be persuaded not to seek a hearing because this would greatly complicate the proceedings. It seems that all the Arab States have signified their intention to ask for a hearing if Israel should be allowed one.

10. You probably share my anxiety about the way in which this matter is developing. Far from seeking a solution, France and the UK, but particularly the latter, seem bent on humiliating Nasser and perhaps showing the helplessness of the Security Council in this matter. The UK initiative seems to have been prompted largely by political pressure at home. The present tactics if we have interpreted them correctly would be a disappointing use of UN machinery, which might be the only means of obtaining a practicable solution to the Suez problem. We heard today that the Secretary General has expressed the view, which we put forward earlier, that only in a UN forum can Egypt be expected to negotiate seriously for a reconciliation of the conflicting rights and interests in the Canal. It is our impression that this view is shared by some of the smaller Western Europeans. We can only hope therefore that the Anglo-French tactics proposed today will in the next few days be modified in the direction of a more practicable approach.

THE SUEZ QUESTION IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

In telegram No. 744 of September 24 (attached) our Permanent Mission in New York suggests possible lines along which consideration of the Suez issue in the Security Council might develop. While Canada will not be directly involved in the Security Council discussions, it may be useful at this time to formulate our own views as to what course the Council's action on the question might usefully follow and to look beyond this to the possibility — indeed the likelihood — that the matter will eventually be referred to the Assembly. We envisage a Security Council resolution not entirely acceptable to either party; a subsequent period of unfruitful¹¹³ negotiation followed by a reference to the Assembly. In this case factors bearing on the securing of a two-thirds majority become important.

Our Mission in New York envisages the setting up by the Security Council of a committee or commission to operate as a conciliator between the parties, and, as an interim measure pending achievement of a settlement, co-ordination of technical services for operation of the Canal under United Nations auspices. The matter of interim arrangements is of particular interest and, of course, immediate concern, if Canal operations are to proceed without interruption while negotiations are in progress following the Security Council debate.

You will recall that Mr. Robertson in his telegram No. 1260 of September 15† (attached) suggested United Nations involvement in technical direction of Canal operations as an interim measure. He pointed out that the organization and control of traffic through the Canal must be integrated under a single planning authority, since one could not safely have ships simultaneously passing through the Canal, some directed by the Canal Users' Association and some by Egyptian authorities. It seems to us that there is considerable merit in his suggestion, and that it might be usefully expanded to meet the present need, provided that the agreement of both Egypt and the members of the Users' Association could be obtained. The United Nations staff involved would not have to operate the Canal themselves; all they would need to do would be to provide the framework within which the resources of both the Egyptian authority and the Users' Association could be fully utilized in the interests of efficient operation. United Nations personnel required would therefore be senior administrators, rather than specialists in communications and transit. This proposal might be further improved upon if it were coupled with Mr. Robertson's previous suggestion for an escrow arrangement whereby the United Nations officials providing the services would collect the dues, meet current expenses and hold the surplus to be allocated in accordance with whatever agreement might ultimately emerge from negotiations.

Such an interim agreement would offer advantages to all concerned. The Egyptians presumably are interested in ensuring that the Canal continues to be used, and that customers are not compelled to seek alternatives which may become permanent solutions. The Users would also derive the advantage of not incurring additional expenditure required to by-pass the Canal.

¹¹³ Note marginale /Marginal Note:
Please! [L.B. Pearson]

It is clear, however, that such an interim scheme would not generally commend itself within a United Nations context unless it were accompanied by an understanding that pressure on Egypt would be relaxed. The Users under this proposed scheme would be able to send their ships through the Canal at substantially the present rates; this is a considerable advantage and meets, for the time being, their essential objective. It follows from this that Egypt must not be expected to negotiate under economic and military pressure. As we see it, an interim arrangement under United Nations auspices implies an acceptance on the part of all concerned to negotiate and therefore makes the United Kingdom, French and Egyptian military and economic measures probably unnecessary and certainly undesirable. However, should negotiations fail subsequent to a Security Council resolution, the Users would be in a better position later to appeal to the United Nations if the Egyptians were unable to accuse them of threats or even of the use of force. This is an accusation which is likely to impress many Arab and Asian nations and which could easily draw attention away from the main issue.

Thus, while we agree with the Permanent Mission as to the general lines which Security Council action might follow, we are not sure that we can fully endorse the views expressed in paragraph 3 as to the powers of any international board which might be set up. It seems to us that the powers of such a Board should be related to the status of the Canal in international law, and that any attempt to outline the functions of the Board before the legal status of the Canal is clarified and agreed upon, would be premature. The argument that the Board's powers should be related to the status of the Canal in international law would appear to be a sound line to take in the United Nations, and indeed perhaps the only one likely to attract majority support. The Legal Division of the Department is at present studying various legal problems arising out of the Suez dispute, including the status of the waterway in international law.

What we therefore have in mind is that the United Kingdom and France should follow a line that may ultimately have to be endorsed by a two-thirds majority in the Assembly. Our view is that such a line is likely to be one substantially in accordance with international law and which would exclude, in the immediate future, any move on the part of the United Kingdom and of France which might weaken their case and distract attention from the basic issues. Acceptance of this line and of these tactics by the United Kingdom and France involves a difficult initial sacrifice; but it is the sacrifice of an objective which is almost certainly incapable of achievement "Cutting Nasser down to size". We think that the more subtle approach suggested here may ultimately have the effect of undermining Nasser's position as a self appointed spokesman of the exploited coloured masses.

I had a long talk with Krishna Menon this morning, in the course of which he gave me, solely for your information, a pretty full account of his conversations with Eden and Lloyd. I am afraid that I have to stress that this was "an exclusive interview", and ask for an embargo on circulation, because Menon, so far at least, has succeeded in keeping his conversations so completely private that Home and Nutting, whom I saw yesterday, knew nothing about them, and Mrs. Pandit and the Indian Deputy High Commissioner have asked me separately whether I had any idea what Krishna was talking to British Ministers about.

2. Krishna told me that he had had long, friendly and encouraging talks with the Prime Minister and with Selwyn Lloyd. He told them that his Prime Minister did not wish India to act as an intermediary between the UK and Egypt. He was not bringing to London any proposals from Colonel Nasser, nor did he wish to take back to Cairo any counter-proposals from London. He and his Prime Minister did think, however, that they were perhaps in a position in which they could usefully formulate their own views as to what ought to be a basis of negotiation acceptable to both sides. Nehru and Krishna had drawn up a list of specific points — developing, I took it, from the Indian proposals put forward at the first Lancaster House Conference — which Nehru was prepared to urge Nasser to accept if he could be assured that they would be acceptable to the UK. Krishna had been encouraged by Eden to develop his argument. He thought Eden now understood and appreciated the position of the Indian Government in the matter, and welcomed their efforts to help in finding a peaceful solution. It was his understanding that the principal object of Eden's talks in Paris today could be to persuade the French to contemplate the possibility of a negotiated settlement. Eden would discuss the idea of negotiation in the context, and as a probable consequence, of the reference to the Security Council. He would not relate it in any way to the Anglo-Indian exploratory conversations, which would remain completely secret. If Eden comes back from Paris having convinced the French that negotiation is possible and must be sought, Krishna will fly back to Delhi via Beirut, not Cairo, on Saturday morning. He thought he might spend a day or two with Nehru, and then if present plans hold he would fly from Delhi to Cairo on Tuesday of next week and do his best there.

3. He wanted me to let you know that he now thought there was about a "fifty-fifty" chance of this latest Indian initiative proving successful. He was "not discouraged" by its reception in London, and found Eden forthcoming and taking a more realistic view of the situation than he had been led to expect. He said he would come and see me on Saturday morning before he leaves for India to let me know the kind of message Eden is able to send back to Nehru in the light of his conversations with Mollet and Pineau.

4. I asked Krishna how the timetable he was working on could be squared with the timetable in the Security Council, where I understood Selwyn Lloyd was preparing to present the UK case on Thursday, October 4th. He appeared to be confident that the Security Council meeting could be postponed for a few days if the UK asked for a delay in the hearing, or alternatively if the meeting had to go on as scheduled that it could be spent in developing the legal arguments about the validity under international law of the act of nationalization. He hoped that the UN discussions in New York could provide time and cover for more serious diplomatic conversations elsewhere.

5. I felt Krishna was intent on minimizing the possible usefulness of the UN context. He told me he was glad to find that London was allergic to the idea of a Good Offices Committee. He was obviously jealous of any role that might be given Hammarskjöld in the search for a settlement. He referred to the reluctance on the part of the Egyptians to having the UN figure too prominently in a possible future régime for the Canal. His attitude and these observations are, of course, explicable in personal terms, but should not thereby be discounted.

6. I told him I thought he should not underestimate the importance of having the Suez situation kept within a UN framework, for three reasons (1) while the situation was before the UN, the risk of a resort to force was ipso facto diminished (2) given the very explicit public positions taken by the leading statesmen on both sides over the last weeks, it should be easier to reach a compromise solution by negotiation in a medium in which the parties could abate their more extreme positions out of respect for the purposes and principles of the UN rather than in deference to any argument or condition set up by their adversaries (3) I myself thought it desirable that the USSR should be associated with an ultimate settlement. This would be more feasible through the use at some stage of UN procedures than otherwise.

7. I do not know quite what to make of this Indian initiative. I think it should be taken seriously and given an opportunity of seeing what it can accomplish. I am worried about how it can best be related to what is in train in New York. It will be difficult to accommodate it to the requirements of the Anglo-French entente and of the Canal Users' Association. It also raises difficulties in relation to the position of the USA, which has not yet been told anything of the Anglo-Indian conversations. (Krishna told me that when he had raised the question in Whitehall of his going to Washington to explain the new Indian approach, Eden appeared to have an open mind as to the advisability of his doing so, and Selwyn Lloyd was completely opposed.) I suppose if all goes reasonably well that one way of tidying up the position would be if, through Indian good offices, agreement were reached secretly between London and Cairo on a mutually tolerable basis of negotiations, a UN committee could give its blessing to such an agreed basis of negotiation so that the continuing diplomatic negotiations could proceed under its auspices.

I saw Selwyn Lloyd this afternoon. I told him of my talks with Nutting and with Menon while he was in Paris, and asked him how I should interpret the Paris Communiqué.¹¹⁴ He was very upset to learn that Krishna had told me of his conversations with Eden and himself. I probably should not have referred to my conversation with Krishna, but since I did he knows that you and I know of his discussions with India. I told him I had reported it to you as fully as I could, but had wrapped my message around with every kind of embargo and I was sure that there would be no leak whatever from Ottawa. I felt also that I had to try to protect Menon, and got an assurance from Lloyd that he would not tax Menon with having told me about his discussions with UK Ministers.

2. Our talk was short and troubled, and I was not able to get any real clarification of Anglo-French thinking about procedure in the Security Council. Lloyd said he hoped they could get a three or four days' adjournment. To my mind this suggested that the British were in fact prepared, however reluctantly, to fit their tactics to Krishna Menon's timetable and were taking seriously his efforts to prepare the way for direct negotiations.

3. I gathered from Lloyd that he had given Menon a list of points which from the UK point of view had to be provided for in any tolerable settlement of the Canal dispute. The UK are now thinking in terms of a revision of the 1888 Convention which would, inter alia, elaborate assurances against discrimination in the levying of tolls; provide for arbitration of charges of "covert" discrimination in the operation of the Canal; provide for arbitration of the adequacy of the offer of compensation to the Canal Company and its shareholders; provide for some kind of international supervision of the operation of the waterway; provide for some kind of international consultation and approval of plans for the development and expansion of the Canal.

4. I got the impression that these points that Lloyd mentioned to me may have been formulated by Menon as a development of the original Indian proposals. Lloyd obviously was not very happy about having to use Menon as an intermediary, complained that his records of conversations were unreliable, and feared that they would have a lot of trouble in reconciling what Menon might say in Cairo with what Menon had said in London.

5. Lloyd said that he himself was as ready to bash the Egyptians as anybody, but he had to ask himself where this country and the Commonwealth would stand after the job of bashing had been done; hence his reluctant acceptance of the inevitability of exploring the possibilities of a negotiated settlement.

6. Our conversation was undoubtedly soured by my indiscreet disclosure that I knew a little more than I was supposed to know about the way things were going. It was also shortened by the presence of the Israeli Ambassador in the anteroom.

7. In the circumstances I hope you can carry out the assurance I gave Lloyd that there was no possible risk of a leak from Ottawa.

Following for the Minister only from Robertson. No other circulation. Krishna Menon came to see me this morning on his way to the airport. He wanted you to know that he was not unhopeful about the way things seemed to be working out. The Indian object is to get the British, French and Egyptians together in direct discussions on a basis of negotiations which Menon hopes he may be able to confirm in Cairo next week. Present thinking here is that if the USA were not a party to such preliminary direct negotiations, it would be easier to keep the Russians out of it. Menon believes Nasser is under a good deal of pressure to find a settlement pretty soon, and he is satisfied from his talks with Eden and Lloyd that they have come to see that the probable consequences of the other courses of action which have been contemplated could in their several ways be pretty disastrous. He thinks they have succeeded in persuading the French to accept the idea of seeking a solution by negotiation, but have not yet told them of the specific bases of negotiation which they have been examining with Menon.

2. Krishna thinks that if the present position can be held for another week or ten days, it will be possible to tell whether the Indian efforts on both sides are producing results; in the meantime he hopes there will be no "constructive solutions" put forward from Washington or anywhere else. Menon wondered whether, without disclosing anything of his conversations, you might find an opportunity of suggesting to Mr. Dulles that he could safely hold his hand for a while and refrain from any new initiatives.

3. I suspect that what possibility there is of persuading both parties that they can each achieve peace with honour lies in the unwinding of the implications of the key-word "unfettered". Eden has said over and over again that the UK will not tolerate a situation which leaves the Canal "subject to the unfettered control of one man and one nation". Nasser has summarily rejected international control. As the same time he has indicated that he is prepared to negotiate a revision of the 1888 Convention which would provide safeguards against discrimination in respect of tolls, Canal operations, etc. The acceptance by Egypt of more explicit international obligations under the new convention could, I think, perhaps be presented to UK and French opinion as the imposition of "fetters" within the meaning of Eden's public declarations. Part of the job will be to find an inoffensive Arab equivalent for "fetters".

4. It is my judgment, in the light of my talks with Menon and Lloyd, that we need not and should not offer advice at this juncture. Press reports of the Wheat Board's deal with Egypt have not at the moment strengthened whatever reserve of influence we may have over here.

Following for High Commissioner only from Minister. Krishna Menon's ideas seem to me to be pretty constructive but I am disinclined to associate myself, however discreetly, with his activities, even to the extent of approaching Mr. Dulles as he suggests; more particularly as Selwyn Lloyd knows about your contacts with Menon. You can assure Lloyd that no circulation whatever is being given to your messages and, therefore, there will be no leakage of any kind. I agree with you that negotiations must soon begin and that the objective will be to agree on "fetters" without calling them that.

2. I also agree with your judgment that this is no moment for us to offer advice. I think, however, that our position in the wheat negotiations with Egypt has been exaggerated and misinterpreted in London. I have discussed this matter with my colleagues here and find them quite unrepentant, especially as no special consideration is being shown Egypt. Mr. Howe has given me explicit assurance on that point. Moreover, he has pointed out, and rightly, that we have no knowledge of any U.K. moves which imply economic sanctions against Egypt, and surely we cannot be expected to ask our trade to operate on the assumption that this might happen. Furthermore, he has told me that American wheat is going to Egypt via Switzerland and that also the Australians are negotiating for shipments. In any event, no deal has yet been closed.

 MIDDLE EAST; SUEZ CANAL DISPUTE; ISRAELI-ARAB TENSIONS

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Suez Canal dispute appeared to be quietening down. The United Kingdom and France were negotiating with Egypt under U.N. auspices.

However, tension had increased between Israel and the Arabs and the situation in the Middle East was quite dangerous. Israel had said that any more incidents on the Jordanian border would lead to substantial retaliation and not just be treated as a border affray. The U.K. had supported Iraq in its decision to send troops to Jordan to stabilize the situation there but this appeared to be an unwise move.

The first eight Sabre aircraft for Israel would be shipped by boat in the next few weeks and the balance at the rate of four a month. He had emphasized to the Israeli Ambassador, however, that if Israel committed aggression the shipments would be suspended. Even though Israel had already given a cheque to Canadair for all 24 airplanes, this would not change in any way the original policy on the rate of transfer. The situation in the Middle East would be watched closely from month to month.

31. During the discussion it was observed that the British were in a very awkward position. By their treaty with Jordan they were committed to come to Jordan's aid in the event of aggression and it was conceivable that, if large-scale hostilities occurred, they might find themselves siding with Nasser at the same time that they were endeavouring to settle the Suez Canal dispute. Only recently had the U.K. informed Jordan that it reserved the right to decide when there was actual aggression against Jordan. This position should have been taken months ago.

32. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Suez Canal dispute and on the increasingly dangerous Israeli-Arab situation.

UK POLICY IN THE MIDDLE EAST

The US Ambassador saw the Minister this morning on instruction from Mr. Dulles, with whom Mr. Merchant had been in touch by telephone. Mr. Merchant said Mr. Dulles was concerned because little info seemed to be available in Washington about UK thinking on Middle Eastern policy. He mentioned specially the apparent lack of interest shown in London in establishing a date for resuming conversations about the Suez Canal. There is also considerable uncertainty in Washington about UK intentions in relation to the preparations Jordan is making to protect itself against possible attack by Israel.

2. Mr. Pearson told Mr. Merchant that we have little or nothing to add to what Mr. Dulles himself already knows on this subject.

3. I cannot instruct you to call on Mr. Selwyn Lloyd for the special purpose of asking for more info than you have already transmitted to us in your very informative and useful tel under reference, which dealt with Jordan. It would be particularly difficult to ask Mr. Lloyd for info with a view to passing it along to Washington, since the UK would probably prefer to talk directly to US officials themselves. Nevertheless I should like you to bear Mr. Dulles' perplexity in mind and the possibility that we might help to facilitate cooperation between the State Department and the Foreign Office. If you have a suitable opportunity to talk to Mr. Lloyd we should be grateful for any light you can throw on the constructive thinking which the UK is undoubtedly doing in relation to Middle Eastern Affairs.

ISRAELI INVASION OF EGYPT

Robertson called me from London just after I was speaking to you this morning. He made it clear that he had had no information whatsoever about the decision just taken by the British and French to send an ultimatum to Egypt and Israel.¹¹⁵ Not only had he been given no inkling of what was under consideration, but the members of his staff who had just returned from canvassing the Foreign Office and C.R.O. had not had the slightest intimation that anything extraordinary was contemplated.

2. I asked him to let Home know our grave anxieties over the decision that had been taken. I passed on to him the report which we had just received by telephone from New York, with special reference to the charge by Sobolev that Britain and France were exploiting the situation for their own purposes. He confirmed my impression of the complete gulf which now exists between the British and French on the one hand and the United States on the other on Middle Eastern issues. He said it was his impression that the British and French had not had time to consult anyone. However, as I told him, the impression on this side would be that the British and French had been cooking this up in their recent conversations.

SITUATION IN PALESTINE

In accordance with the request I made in our telephone conversation this morning I hope that you have been able to express to United Kingdom Government our feeling of bewilderment and dismay at the decisions which they have taken along with the French Government while the Security Council was meeting in New York; decisions which came as a complete surprise to us and which had not been hinted at in any previous discussions. Since I spoke to you Dulles telephoned me from Washington in a state of emotion and depression greater than anything I have seen before in him. He said that for some days they had been cut off from all sources of information in London on British policy in this area. He said that the British and French decision undid everything. As a result of their brutalities in Eastern Europe, the Russians were on the run, but now the British and French had done something which, it would be argued, was comparable to the kind of action which Russians had taken or were accustomed to take in situations which they claimed to be of an emergency kind.

2. British action in this matter seems to us all the more surprising because of the condemnation of Israel by the U.K. Delegate at the Security Council last week and his expressions of sympathy and support for Jordan in regard to border episodes. If the British felt so strongly about Israeli provocations, surely they must have been planning for the kind of action by Israel which has, in fact, taken place. Their present ultimatum, however, seems to be much more anti-Egyptian than anti-Israel in its terms, as it apparently would leave Israel in possession of a good deal of Egyptian territory.

3. The French position on this matter seems to us particularly hard to appreciate. Dulles was most strong in his criticism of Paris, and he feels, I think, that the whole thing may have been manoeuvred by the French Government as a way out of some of their own difficulties, and that that Government has been sending arms to Israel recently, including jet aircraft, which they had not mentioned to their allies. If true, this is one of the most depressing features of the whole sorry situation.

4. Needless to say, the fact that such a decisive step seems to have been planned without any consultation with any of their closest allies, including not only the United States but ourselves, makes cooperation extremely difficult.

5. The other aspect of the situation which disturbs me most is the fact of the ultimatum being despatched and action being taken, if it is not accepted in 12 hours, at a time when the United Nations Security Council is considering the matter. It is going to be very difficult to explain this to public opinion here.

6. I realize of course that these are first reactions and perhaps may turn out to be unnecessarily pessimistic in the view of later information and later developments, but I can assure you at the moment there is nothing but pessimism around here.

ISRAELI INVASION OF EGYPT

1. Lord Home met the Commonwealth High Commissioners this afternoon at 6 o'clock. He handed around copies of the Prime Minister's statement,¹¹⁶ which you will be receiving from Earncliffe. He had not himself been involved in its drafting and was not in a position to add anything by way of explanation to what the Prime Minister had said, except that according to British info, the Israeli Forces had virtually reached Suez by noon today, from which it was inferred that the Canal itself was one of the Israeli objectives. On this appreciation the Israeli thrust was not a wheeling raid through Sinai which would bring them back to Israel on its completion.

2. I told Lord Home that I had had an opportunity of speaking with you since hearing the Prime Minister's statement, and that you had already received the first reports of the proceedings of the Security Council. I said that the first impression in Ottawa was one of dismay that the UK and France appeared to be cutting across the deliberations of the Security Council which was already in session when the Anglo-French notes were delivered to Israel and Egypt. These were very grave decisions which appeared to have been taken without opportunity for consulting the USA and the other Commonwealth countries.

3. Home said that the sole Anglo-French object was to prevent the fighting spreading and to protect the lives and property of peaceful users of the Canal. Proceedings in the Security Council might take days in argument as to who was the original aggressor, etc. The UK feel that the initiative which the French and themselves have taken is in accordance with the purposes of the UN and consistent with the Tripartite Declaration, though not taken under it.

4. Discussion was short and desultory. The Indian Acting High Commissioner was puzzled as to why it should be an important Israeli objective to reach the Canal. The Pakistan High Commissioner thought they were driving to the Canal with a view to outflanking and encircling the Egyptian Armed Forces in the Gaza Strip.

As you know, for a long time now the Middle East has been simmering. Now it is boiling over.

2. It has been obvious for some time that Israel was increasingly restive, and we feared that she would turn on Jordan. That would have presented us with a calamitous situation in which we might well have found ourselves under our Treaty fighting alongside Jordan with Egypt as our ally, against Israel armed with weapons from Canada and France, and supported by France. You who know the Middle East situation so well will understand what a nightmare that prospect has been.

3. We have made clear to Israel through diplomatic channels what our attitude would be should hostilities break out.

4. In doing so (1) we have warned them off Jordan absolutely. That we have done by publicly declaring our intention to stand by our Treaty with Jordan in the event of Israeli aggression. We have now obtained assurances from Israel that she will not attack Jordan. (2) We have told them that we do not consider ourselves under an obligation to defend Egypt. Nasser (confirming what his Foreign Minister had earlier told our Ambassador) told the Foreign Secretary last March that the Tripartite Declaration conferred no rights and imposed no obligations on its authors. His press has stated that Egypt would not allow Western troops to come to Egypt's aid.

5. We have emphasized that we cannot allow a war between Israel and Egypt to block the Suez Canal; that we and the French would feel bound if war broke out to require both countries to cease hostilities and to withdraw from the Canal; that we should send them a requirement to that effect, and that in the event of refusal we would take any military action necessary to compel each party to conform.

6. It may be that both would accept such conditions.

7. Our latest information is that Israel has accused Egypt of aggression and is delivering a counter attack. The situation is fluid but we will let you have the latest information as we get it.

8. Our concern in this grave matter is to stop the fighting and to ensure the safety of the Suez Canal on which so many nations' lives depend. We expect to raise all this at U.N.O. in the most appropriate way.

9. Meanwhile, however, it is of vital urgency to act at once. We and the French with us propose therefore at once to send a requirement to Israel and Egypt demanding that hostilities must cease immediately and that troops must be withdrawn from both banks of the Canal. We will add that in the event of either side refusing we reserve the right to take such military action as may be necessary to compel the offender to conform. We are doing this because this war must be stopped before it has time to develop into a wider conflict involving others.

10. Clearly there are risks in intervention. But the risks of hesitation and delay are in our judgment greater and unless hostilities can be brought to a close at once they risk developing into a wider conflict involving others. I know that we can look for your understanding and much hope for your support in our endeavours to limit its scope, and to bring about a truce so that a permanent settlement may be worked out which will pacify this turbulent area. We will continue to keep you in the closest touch.¹¹⁷

MIDDLE EAST; WASHINGTON REACTIONS

This will be an attempt to convey our impressions of the reactions in official circles to events subsequent to the crossing of the Egyptian border by Israeli forces. They are drawn from a large number of conversations with USA officials, diplomatic colleagues and journalists. It is to be hoped that the present state of mind will prove transitory. At present, as the Australian Chargé put it this morning, it can best be described as a combination of anger, disappointment and depression.

2. Late yesterday afternoon I saw Burke Elbrick, the Acting Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, who has been very close to the Secretary of State during this affair. From him I sought the State Department's reactions. He began by showing me a copy of the President's message of earlier in the afternoon to the UK and French Prime Ministers, in which Mr. Eisenhower expressed deep concern at the announcement from London and Paris of imminent joint military action in the Suez area. This message was subsequently the subject of a press statement by the White House but the text has not yet been made public. It began by saying that the President "had just learned from the press" of the Franco-British ultimatum to Israel and Egypt. It went on to urge "the great unwisdom" of taking the threatened "drastic action" when the matter was still under consideration in the Security Council. It concluded by expressing Mr. Eisenhower's sincere belief that "peaceful processes" should be employed "to secure a solution which would restore the armistice condition as between Israel and Egypt and also provide a just basis for settlement of the controversy with Egypt about the Suez Canal". (Elbrick was not sure that the text he showed us was the final one, though we are satisfied that it remained substantially unaltered; it should, however, be regarded as a paraphrase only).

3. Elbrick had just come from a long session with Mr. Dulles and reflected, I feel quite sure, the Secretary's own state of mind. He told us that Coulson, the British Chargé, and Alphan had been in during the afternoon and had delivered messages from their respective Prime Ministers in support of the joint action upon which they had decided, and by that time announced. We were not shown the messages but gather that the Mollet explanation was brief to the point of being perfunctory. The Eden message, on the other hand, attempted to explain in some detail the reasons for the British action and primarily on the ground that emergency military measures were necessary to compel a cease fire in the area of the Canal and to part the belligerents.

¹¹⁷ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

(Delivered to the Prime Minister at 5:00 pm, October 30) [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown].

4. It is our impression that the failure of the UK and French Governments to consult or even to inform the USA Government in advance of their proposed course of action has been as severe a shock to the USA Government, from the President down to the most junior State Department officials, as the nature and circumstances of the Franco-British action itself. There is no doubt whatever that this is regarded here as a very serious blow to the Western alliance and to the cohesion of the free world. In this connection the effect on NATO was mentioned by Elbrick several times. Coulson, the State Department believe (and this I had earlier learned from Coulson himself) had had no forewarning of the UK Government's intention. (My Message 1952 October 30†). Elbrick was not sure about the French position.

5. Elbrick emphasized how unhappy it was that the Franco-British action had deprived us of the great opportunity which recent events in Eastern Europe had afforded the West in their dealings with the Soviet Union. It was little short of "tragic" that the Israeli invasion and the prospect of UK and French military action in the Middle East had at one blow dissipated the encouraging gains of recent weeks in the satellite countries.

6. Last evening, at dinner, I had a chance for some private conversation with Allen Dulles. He was very depressed. He told me that he had been with "the boss" most of the day. The President had been very angry when he had heard of the Franco-British ultimatum. At that time they were considering the action the USA would take in the Security Council. The President had said that, if people thought that he was going to be deterred from the course he thought right just because the USA were on the eve of an election, they were greatly mistaken. At any rate the President and the Secretary of State did decide, as we know, to push ahead with their resolution in the Security Council even though they quite realized that meant bringing into the open the serious breach between Washington, London and Paris. Walter Robertson was another with whom I spoke last evening. Despite his wide differences with the British on China policy he has always been a stout proponent of the Anglo-American alliance. He told me that he had been in a state of despair and depression since he had heard the news, and he could not shake it.

7. Allen Dulles told me, incidentally, that he had had advance intelligence which had led the CIA to conclude (by Saturday, October 28th, I should think,) that the Israelis intended to move against Egypt. As you know they had also learned of France supplying Israel with fighter aircraft and probably other armament beyond what had been hitherto known. He remarked wryly that the USA would soon be facing a demand from the UK for oil.

8. In this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald Chalmers Roberts heads his piece "British, French, Israeli collusion on moves in Mid-East now seen". We shall send you the clipping by tomorrow's bag. It reflects, I believe, pretty accurately the present state of mind of the administration. Of French collusion they seem quite convinced. The circumstantial evidence against the British has to many seemed strong but I think most would be willing to give London a day in court. It will be hard to convince them, however, that the motive of the UK and France has not been primarily to restore their positions in the Suez Canal rather than to bring about a cease fire.

9. It may be that we are exaggerating the gloom. Further, it is likely that the gloom is a good deal thicker in Washington than in the rest of the country. Nevertheless it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that serious harm has been done, at least temporarily, to British-American and Franco-American relations — and this primarily by the failure of London and Paris to consult the USA. It remains to be seen whether the Franco-British action will in fact serve to bring about a cease fire and to restore the status quo. If it does and Israeli forces are withdrawn quickly to their original positions it is possible that this greater good may ultimately assuage the present severe wound. But it is hard for us now to believe that the bitter experience of the past twenty-four hours will soon be forgotten.

10. The Korean parallel will be in many minds. In that case the USA were able to gird themselves effectively with the collective armour of the UN. There will be many who are not convinced that in the present case the UK and France could not have achieved similar salutary results (and with USA support) in their efforts to bring about a cease fire, separate the fighting elements and introduce minimum stability in the Middle East.

11. As a postscript, one cannot but have apprehensions as to the effect of these events upon the relatively dormant isolationism of the right wing of the Republican Party. The temptation to revert to the continental approach which President Eisenhower has done so much to dissipate or drive below ground could be greatly encouraged. On the other hand one of the curious cross currents in this mixed up situation is the statement attributed to Senator Knowland, yesterday, in which he appeared as a champion of the UN Charter.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; ISRAELI INVASION OF EGYPT;
UNITED KINGDOM AND FRENCH ULTIMATUM TO ISRAEL AND EGYPT; SUSPENSION OF ARMS SHIPMENTS TO THE MIDDLE EAST

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reviewed the grave situation in the Middle East arising out of Israel's invasion of Egypt and the declaration by the United Kingdom and France of their intention to occupy the Suez Canal zone.

He also reported on the reaction in the United States and on the developments in the United Nations. The High Commissioner in the U.K. had been instructed the previous day to inform the U.K. government that the Canadian government viewed their proposed action with dismay and to make an appeal for the postponement of the British and French ultimatum. He had seen U.K. ministers several times and expressed views in accordance with these instructions. The U.S. Secretary of State had phoned the Minister and entreated him to do everything possible to bring home to the British government the grave consequences of the steps they were taking and to do what he could to repair the damage done to the relations between the United States and the United Kingdom.

In the United Nations it appeared that a meeting of the General Assembly would be called under the terms of the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, which had been designed to provide for action on measures vetoed in the Security Council and in the preparation of which Canada had played an important part. The position of Canada and of the United States at the meeting would be particularly embarrassing in relation to the U.K. and France.

The Prime Minister had received a message from the U.K. Prime Minister informing him of the intentions of the U.K. and France, but this had reached Ottawa after the press had reported the announcement of these measures in the Parliament at Westminster.

Events were moving quickly and information on the situation was not complete, and it was difficult to reach firm conclusions on all aspects of the matter at present. However, there were a number of immediate problems which had to be settled. These included the question of arms shipments, the form of reply, if any at this moment, to Sir Anthony's message, and arrangements for evacuation of Canadian personnel whose presence was not essential in the Middle East.

4. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the situation in the Middle East arising out of the invasion of Egypt by Israel and the subsequent action of the United Kingdom and France and agreed,

(a) that shipments of all arms to Israel and the Arab nations be suspended;¹¹⁸ the public statement on this subject, however, to refer only to the F-86 aircraft for Israel unless questions were asked about other shipments;

(b) that a reply to the United Kingdom Prime Minister's message on the intentions of the United Kingdom and France be prepared for early consideration; it should include appropriate references to the effect such actions would have on matters of such paramount importance as the Anglo-United States alliance and the future of the Commonwealth;

(c) that the visa officer of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in Tel-Aviv be instructed to suspend his immigration activities and assist the Department of External Affairs in protecting Canadian citizens in the area; and,

(d) that, if any R.C.A.F. transport aircraft were available in the Middle East, they should form part of the U.S. airlift evacuation operation, but that if Canada needed to supply additional aircraft for evacuation purposes, civilian transport planes should be chartered for the purpose in order to avoid any danger of confusing R.C.A.F. aircraft with those of the R.A.F.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Thank you for your message of yesterday, which reached me at five o'clock, our time, in the afternoon. I understand, of course, that in view of the rapidity with which your government and that of France felt it was necessary to act, it could not be otherwise; but the first intimation I had of your government's intention to take certain grave steps in Egypt was from the press reports of your statement in the House of Commons.

I must add that without more information, and information different from that which we now have, about the action of Israel, we cannot come to the conclusion that the penetration of its troops into Egypt was justified or that the probable resistance of the Egyptians necessitated the decision of the U.K. and France to post forces in the canal zone. No doubt, however, your own information is much more complete than ours. We now await developments, and information concerning them, with most anxious interest.

In the meantime, we have suspended all shipments of arms to Israel and will endeavour to shape our course in conformity with what we regard as our obligations under the Charter of and our membership in the United Nations. We are never unmindful, of course, in our own decisions, of the very special relationship of close friendship and intimate association which we have with the United Kingdom and with your government. Nor do we forget the vital importance of the Suez Canal to the economic life of the United Kingdom.

You will not be surprised when I tell you that, apart from the danger of a war which might spread, there are three aspects of this distressing situation which cause us particular anxiety. Our misgivings in this respect have already been communicated to some of your colleagues through our High Commissioner, who may have passed them on to you.

The first is the effect of the decisions taken on the United Nations, of which the United Kingdom has been such a staunch and steady supporter. The fact that the action which you took was taken while the Security Council was seized of the matter is, I think, most regrettable, and the result of the Security Council vote last night equally regrettable.

There is also the danger — and I am sure that you are even more conscious of this than we are here — of a serious division within the Commonwealth in regard to your action, which will prejudice the unity of our association. The statement which the Government of India issued this morning is significant evidence of this danger.

Finally, and this is a matter of deep and abiding interest to Canada, the deplorable divergence of viewpoint and policy between the United Kingdom and the United States in regard to the decisions that have been taken, and the procedure followed, is something that will cause as much satisfaction to the Soviet Union and its supporters as it does distress to all those who believe that Anglo-American co-operation and friendship is the very foundation of our hopes for progress toward a peaceful and secure world. That co-operation and friendship, which you yourself have done so much to promote, has now served the world well for many years. It would be a tragedy beyond repair if it were now to disappear, or even to be weakened. It is hard for a Canadian to think of any consideration — other than national survival or safety — as more important. This aspect of the situation is very much in our minds here at the moment, as I know it must be in yours.

I have no desire, of course, to add by any words of mine to the heavy burdens you are already carrying, but I know that you would like me to tell you frankly, and as a friend, of my worries; and this I have tried to do.¹¹⁹

A press despatch just received carries the story of Indian condemnation of the Israeli attack on Egypt. MIDDLE-EAST CRISIS

A course you might wish to consider following in the Assembly would be to do our best to ensure that the British and French intervention in Egypt is not examined under a spot-light narrowly focussed only on the recent events; but that it is examined in the fullest possible perspective both against the situation in the Middle East that led to the intervention; and against the past record of both countries.

2. The line of argument would run that in the fuller perspective, one still regrets, as you have already done, that the British and French thought it necessary to take the keeping of the peace into their own hands. But one must admit that peace needed keeping in the Middle East. That was because the members of UN had failed to discharge their collective responsibility. They had failed to protect life on both sides of the border. They had failed, too, even to enforce the 1951 resolution that the Canal be kept open to the traffic of all nations.

¹¹⁹ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

3. For those failures, all members of the UN are to blame. None has the right now to act the accuser or throw the first stone. We have in the past been too concerned with deciding who was to blame for the last incident and too little concerned with preventing the next. The lesson now to be learned is that the UN and the principles of the Charter have not failed us, but that we the members have not been true to those principles and have not given the organization the support it needs. We must turn our minds to more than finding a way out of the present dilemma, vital though that is. We must seek the way to a lasting settlement and be ready to make the sacrifices involved. We must work to prevent the recurrence of a situation such as this, where two powers have felt themselves obliged, rightly or wrongly, to intervene to keep the peace. Any permanent solution requires the co-operation of England, France, the Arabs and Israel, and of all of us. What we do now must not make such a solution more difficult but must contribute to it, and our eyes must be fixed on that goal.

Following for the Minister only from Robertson.¹²⁰ Yesterday morning Home asked me to come and see him. I told him what I had told Sir Norman Brook at Downing Street earlier that morning about our misgiving and dismay at the action his Government had taken. I found it difficult to say anything which did not sound an explicit endorsement of every criticism the opposition had made of Government policy.

2. He said, and I think he meant it, that he hoped I would continue to let him know frankly the feeling of the Government of Canada. I said we had had a bad three months in which I had found it difficult to explain to my Government the reasonableness of the policies his Government had been advocating and acting on since Nasser's seizure of the Canal. I was afraid that some of the foundations of the relationship between Commonwealth countries had been severely shaken. The UK and France had somehow got themselves into a truly tragic position. Neither of them had any closer friend and ally than Canada, but at this pass I could not see what we could do to help.¹²¹

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; REPLY TO UNITED KINGDOM PRIME MINISTER'S MESSAGE ON INTENTIONS OF UNITED KINGDOM AND FRANCE IN THE MIDDLE EAST; POLICY AT UNITED NATIONS ASSEMBLY
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE OCT. 31)

7. The Prime Minister read the message he proposed to send in reply to Sir Anthony Eden's communication on British and French intentions in regard to the situation created by the Israel invasion of Egypt.

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on further developments in the Middle East crisis. The General Assembly of the United Nations had been called to meet later in the day and he proposed to attend this session in New York. It was quite conceivable that a resolution would be presented, which would undoubtedly receive widespread support, condemning the United Kingdom, France, and Israel. It would be embarrassing to be faced with a motion drafted in extreme terms by the Arab-Asian bloc and endorsed by the communists. He hoped, therefore, that if such a resolution were moved a vote could be delayed and amendments proposed which would include a reference to the provocation which had led Israel and the U.K. and France to act in the manner they had.

There were indications in U.K. official quarters of serious concern at the direction in which events were moving, and it might be that the U.K. government would soon welcome a proposal calling for the cessation of hostilities, the convening of a widely-based conference on Middle Eastern matters and, in the interim, the provision of substantial police forces stationed on the Israel-Arab borders to keep peace.

As regards the General Assembly, he would report developments as they occurred, and seek the advice and assistance of his colleagues on the stand he should take at the meeting.

9. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the situation in the Middle East and, subject to minor amendments, approved the message from the Prime Minister in reply to the United Kingdom Prime Minister's communication of October 30th on the United Kingdom and French intentions in the Middle East, and the policy, it was proposed to follow at the meeting of the United Nations later that day.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

Following for the Minister only from Robertson.¹²² Since speaking to you I have been in touch with Kirkpatrick, and have told him you were turning over in your mind the possibility of proposing a cease fire, to be followed by a major diplomatic conference to deal with the whole context of Middle Eastern and North African questions, and that as part of this approach it would be essential to set up an adequate UN military force to separate the Egyptians from the Israelis pending the establishment of stable and peaceful settlements of the outstanding Middle Eastern questions.

2. Kirkpatrick told me that in the speech he is going to make in this afternoon's censure debate, Eden will say, after referring to the fighting going on between the Egyptians and the Israelis: "But police action there must be to separate the belligerents and to prevent the resumption of hostilities between them. If the UN were then willing to take over the physical task of maintaining peace, no one would be better pleased that we".¹²³ This is not much, but it is something. It means, I take it, that the UK and France would be prepared to "hand over" the police task they have taken on themselves to a UN force strong enough to prevent the renewed outbreak of hostilities between Egypt and Israel pending the conclusion of a peace treaty which would guarantee the existence and integrity of the latter.

3. Kirkpatrick, who had Chauvel with him when I spoke to him, did not comment one way or another on the idea of a general diplomatic conference, but did stress that if Britain and France were to hand over to a UN force, it would have to be to a substantial and properly supported international force set up to maintain peace and prevent aggression in the Middle East, and not just a notional force thought up as a diplomatic gimmick to meet this evening's diplomatic requirements. I asked him if he recognized that a UN force set up between Egypt and Israel in present circumstances would contain a Soviet component, an obstacle you will remember that Eden and Lloyd stumbled over the last time we discussed something like this with them.¹²⁴ He said he did. I said it seemed to me that if a UN force were to be set up for this purpose between Egypt and Israel it would probably have to be on the frontiers and not on the Canal. He did not demur at this.

PALESTINE EMERGENCY ASSEMBLY

We prefer to await the verbatim record before reporting fully on the debate which took place in the emergency special session in two meetings between five o'clock yesterday afternoon and five o'clock this morning. Instead it might be more profitable to report on the procedural and tactical developments. This will enable you to place in perspective the press reports on the proceedings. Yesterday morning we were informed by the USA Mission about arrangements for the emergency session.

(a) The Permanent Representative of Chile would take the chair since he was a representative of the same country as the President of the Tenth Session. The rules of procedure were mandatory on this point.

(b) The USA Delegation proposed to submit in its own name only a draft resolution along the lines of the one the USA had introduced in the Security Council. The new draft, however, would take note of the Anglo-French intervention in Egypt but would be "as easy as possible" on the UK and France. By these tactics the USA hoped to head off demands for a strong condemnation. Later in the morning the USA Mission informed us that Dulles would attend the session and would bring with him the final version of the USA draft resolution. For this reason we did not have the actual text until after Dulles had spoken, although we had received an earlier version on the phone from Heeney.¹²⁵

(c) The UK and France were expected to contest the proceeding in the emergency session on the legal grounds they had raised in the Council. The USA Mission had asked all other Missions (except apparently old Commonwealth) to send a letter to the Secretary-General noting the Security Council decision and concurring in it. (About fifty were circulated). The USA hoped this would minimize the effect of the Anglo-French attempt to stimulate a procedural debate. This USA action was not intended to embarrass the UK and France but was taken because the USA believed that any legal argument in the Assembly could not but be regarded by world public opinion as stalling by the UK and France and this would only increase suspicion about their intentions. (In fact the UK and France merely mentioned their legal objections and both participated in the emergency session). The USA Mission fully understood that we might not wish to take a position on this procedural issue.

2. Until shortly before the emergency session began we understood that it would continue at least until the weekend and we therefore envisaged that there would be an opportunity to discuss the whole matter behind the scenes to see whether a positive and constructive course of action would be developed. By the time Dulles began to speak, however, it was common knowledge that the USA and others wished to proceed to the vote on the draft resolution before the end of the night. The turn of events in Egypt demanded that some action be taken quickly. There was the continuing danger too that a less constructive proposal than the USA text might be put forward. These factors combined to stimulate opinion in the Assembly for an early vote. After Dulles had spoken there was an hour's recess for dinner. By that time there were about thirty speakers on the chairman's list. During the recess a decision was taken in the Afro-Asian group (and apparently agreed to by other members) to move a closure of the debate and to proceed to an early vote. The original idea was that after the motion three speakers on each side of the draft resolution would make statements and then the vote would be taken. Later after considerable confusion it was agreed that the parties directly concerned with the Middle East situation (Egypt, Israel, UK and France) could speak in addition to the other six. Mir Khan of Pakistan informed us that the Afro-Asian group would be happy to have Canada make the motion for closure. Because we were awaiting instructions concerning our position on the draft resolution and because we were not in agreement with the haste with which the proposal was being considered, the Minister declined. Later it emerged that Mir Khan himself would make the motion. He told us that one of the reasons why he agreed to do so was that he hoped to save the UK from violent attacks like those voiced by the Representatives of Egypt, Syria and Saudi Arabia.

3. Pakistan and other members, notably the Scandinavians and Turkey, were anxious to have Canada's support for the draft resolution. Accordingly Mir Khan agreed to withhold his motion for a while in the hope that the Canadian Delegation would have received its instructions in time to vote. Mir Khan actually made the motion, after consulting with us, before the Minister had spoken to the Prime Minister about the Canadian position on the draft resolution. However, because Eban made a long speech as one of the parties and because some of the other speeches were not short, the Canadian Delegation did receive its instructions in plenty of time for the vote.

4. It had been agreed that after the voting there would be explanations of vote. The procedure was complicated by the fact that several speakers led by the Italian wished to say something about the Hungarian situation, in particular about the letter which the Secretary-General had received (and which we shall discuss separately). A roll call vote was taken and the result was 64 in favour, 5 against (Australia, France, Israel, NZ, UK) with 6 abstentions (Belgium, Canada, Laos, The Netherlands, Portugal, South Africa) and one absent (Luxembourg).

5. Canada was the first country to explain its vote and although this took place about three o'clock in the morning, there was a large audience in the Assembly hall, including the public galleries, and the proceedings were still being televised in the New York area.

We shall report on the Canadian statement and on other matters of substance in a separate tel.¹²⁶

6. You will have noted the operative para six whereby the Assembly decided "to remain in emergency session pending compliance with this resolution". This para, we understand, was added at the insistence of India. We are not sure of its full implication but we consider it possible that if the resolution is not acted upon by the parties directly concerned and if the situation in Egypt should deteriorate still further, the session will immediately reconvene. At the end of meeting early this morning the Chairman merely adjourned without any indication of when the next meeting would be.

PALESTINE EMERGENCY ASSEMBLY

During the recess on November 1 of the emergency special session the Minister spoke to Dulles about the USA draft resolution and the proceedings generally. The Minister explained his apprehension about the haste with which the USA draft resolution was being pressed. Dulles said that it was essential to have some resolution passed because events were moving so swiftly that there was no telling what might happen if something were not done to arrest them. There was the possibility that the military operations by all parties concerned might be stepped up, increasing the danger to international peace. Moreover, there was the ever present possibility that the Afro-Asians might decide that the USA draft resolution was not strong enough and might press for sharper condemnations and essentially less constructive measures. This would exacerbate the situation.

2. In these circumstances the Minister said that he would not complain about the procedure being followed nor would he attempt in the short time available to improve the USA text. He pointed out, however, that he would have preferred to have any draft resolution before the special session contain a provision for the establishment of negotiating machinery, perhaps an Ad Hoc Committee of the Assembly with functions along the lines of those set forth in para 3 of Washington telegram 1978 Nov 1.† The Minister asked Dulles why this provision had been dropped from the current USA draft, since it was desirable to establish some means for trying to effect a settlement in the Middle East.

3. Dulles replied that the USA had not the time to work out the details of those ideas conveyed to Heeney in Washington. If time had permitted this, the proposals would have been left in the USA draft. Dulles enquired whether the Minister was prepared to make proposals along the same lines. The Minister said Canada was in favour of setting up some kind of UN machinery for a settlement and saw no purpose in merely working for a return to the status quo along the demarcation lines. Dulles said that if the Minister did make proposals of that kind, the USA would support them.

4. The Minister said that it would not be possible to make formal proposals in the short time available. Not only was the special session about to vote on the USA draft but the proposals themselves would have to be developed carefully and this would take more time. In addition to the establishment of a committee for working out a peaceful solution, the Minister pointed out, the Canadian Government had been considering the desirability and feasibility of establishing an international police force for maintaining strict order along the demarcation lines in Palestine. It would not be good enough merely to move the parties back to the demarcation lines and to hope that they would remain there without incident during the painful process of negotiating an overall settlement. It would be essential to establish an international force strong enough to see that order was maintained. This kind of proposal could be incorporated with the ideas advanced in Washington by USA officials but the formulation of concrete proposals could not be rushed. Accordingly in his statement the Minister proposed to put some ideas forward in general terms.

5. His object in doing so, the Minister said, was not only to stimulate interest in serious proposals for solving the complex problems of the Middle East but to provide the UK and France with a suitable basis for accepting the USA draft resolution. Something was required to enable the UK and French Governments to withdraw from their current involvement in Egypt without losing too much face. Canadian thinking, however, was not confined to getting the UK and France out of a difficult situation. This result would be in a sense subsidiary to the main aim which was to set in motion machinery for seeking a lasting settlement of the larger issues.

6. During the Assembly proceedings on the night November 1-2 it was not possible to develop these ideas to any extent. After talking to the Prime Minister about them, the Minister included some suggestions in his explanation of vote but in a very general way. Dulles, speaking a short time later, referred to the importance of a constructive and positive development of the situation "and not merely attempting to turn the clock back". He emphasized his complete agreement with what Mr. Pearson had said "and not only my personal agreement but the feeling of President Eisenhower with whom I talked a few hours ago about this aspect of the matter". He added that the USA Delegation "would be very happy indeed if the Canadian Delegation would formulate and introduce as part of these proceedings a concrete suggestion" along the lines Mr. Pearson had outlined.

7. By phone from New York the Minister had discussed his ideas with Robertson, who said that Lloyd, in a statement yesterday, had hinted that the UK might possibly accept the establishment of UN machinery for working out a settlement. (Dixon, in the special session here, said: "The first urgent task is to separate Israel from Egypt and to stabilize the position. That is our purpose. If the UN were willing to take over the physical task of maintaining peace in the area, no one would be better pleased than we. But police action there must be, to separate the belligerents and stop hostilities. In my [group corrupt] submission all members of the UN should earnestly bend their efforts to bring about a lasting settlement which can replace the Armistice Agreements which have now proved to be too fragile for their task of preserving peace and order in the Middle East.") It appeared that the UK Government might be interested in finding a way out of the difficulties in which it found itself. Robertson said that Lloyd would be talking to Pineau today (November 2); that both of them were worried about the way in which the whole matter had developed. They might well be in a mood to accept the kind of proposals which Dulles and the Minister had discussed and especially if the Canadian concept of an international police force were part of the overall arrangement.

8. Robertson said that the UK had taken no decision as yet on the UN resolution. It might help them to accept it if concrete proposals could be formulated in advance. In a later conversation, however, Robertson agreed that it was not feasible to put forward in the next day or so a draft resolution. Instead the various ideas might emerge in a more precise and detailed statement.

9. The Minister, who will discuss the matter with Heeney, has asked us to prepare notes along these lines which might form the basis for a statement which the Prime Minister might make Sunday evening. We shall send this material to you as soon as possible.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

Following for the Minister from Robertson. Selwyn Lloyd asked me to come to see him at 2.15 this afternoon. After reviewing the immediate and historic background of the Anglo-French decision to intervene in Egypt in terms on which I shall report separately, he asked me to let you know at once that he was very seriously interested in the suggestion attributed to you by the one o'clock radio news that a UN Police Force should be established in the Middle East. I did not have the text of your remarks at the time, but I showed him the text of my tel under reference, on which he made no comment.

2. Lloyd said he thought there were two indispensable conditions for the establishment of such a force:

- (a) it would have to be accepted by both Egypt and Israel;
- (b) the UN members contributing to such a force should undertake to maintain it in being until agreed settlements of outstanding Middle Eastern questions had been arrived at and were guaranteed by the UN.

3. I said that I thought the chances of such arrangements materializing would largely depend on the promptness and character of the Anglo-French reply to the resolution of the UN Assembly. I thought they should accept at once the call to cease military operations. The first phase of those operations was presumably completed by the blasting of Egyptian military airfields and the destruction of Egyptian military aircraft. They could claim if they wanted to that the results of this stage of the operation had at least temporarily altered the balance of striking power between Egypt and Israel, and had postponed what they had believed as an imminent threat to Israel. As far as I knew, and Lloyd did not correct me, there had not been any landings from sea or air on Egyptian territory. If they responded now to the call from UN, there might still be an opportunity for getting a UN Police Force established with the consent of the Egyptian and Israeli Governments, which Lloyd himself had said would be a pre-condition. If they went on with their scheduled landings and the occupation of the Canal Zone, this would be immensely harder to bring about.

4. Lloyd saw two major difficulties in the way of accepting the cease fire immediately. The first was what he described as the virtual impossibility of suddenly putting into reverse the elaborate combined schedule of air and sea movements by two forces. Secondly, the sudden abandonment of the Anglo-French effort to stop by force the Egyptian-Israeli fighting might have disastrous effects on the stability of other Middle Eastern Governments. I did not argue against the validity of either of these objections, but said that I thought the present position was so serious that he should do everything he could to convince his colleagues and Pineau, who is arriving at five o'clock this afternoon to discuss the Anglo-French reply to the resolution, that they should accept the UN call for a cease fire immediately.

UNITED KINGDOM REACTION TO CANADIAN VIEWS ON THE MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

Belgrave of Earncliffe called on November 1 to hand us the statement in the House of Commons by the Foreign Minister¹²⁷ which has already been referred to you separately. He volunteered the information that he had read Mr. St. Laurent's Top Secret and Personal letter to Sir Anthony Eden, dated October 31, and that London was "aghast" at its tone. I asked him if Earncliffe shared London's opinion. He said that they did not because the Canadian reaction as expressed in Mr. Pearson's Press Conference of October 30 and in the Prime Minister's letter had been anticipated by them because they were on the spot. In his view however it had come as a great surprise to London. I said that it was not appropriate for me to comment upon the substance of either the Prime Minister's or the Minister's statement but that I did think that London's reaction, if correctly reported, suggested a really surprising lack of understanding of the basic Canadian political climate, especially in view of the visits paid to us by senior United Kingdom officials and statesmen during recent months.

2. Belgrave made no comment except to observe that this was the first occasion on which Canada had "parted company" from the United Kingdom in public on such a crucial issue but that he hoped that having done this it would now be possible for us (by which he meant Canada and the United Kingdom) "to pick up the pieces".

3. I said that I could assure him from our experience of the Minister's modes of thought, and his political philosophy, that any action which might be initiated by him would be bound to be positive and constructive.¹²⁸

SITUATION IN EGYPT AND PALESTINE

We received a copy of your telegram K98 November 1¹²⁹ to New York in time for Council meeting on November 2. As we suggested in our tel under reference, opinion in Council proved to be most receptive to that line of thought. News of emphasis given by Butler in the British House of Commons and apparently by Dixon in New York concerning British willingness to turn their "Police Action" over to UN if the latter could enforce a solution had done much to prepare the ground for our comments in Council.

2. USA Representative referred to a statement apparently made by Dulles emphasizing the complete agreement of USA Government with your suggestions.¹³⁰ It was still the general view of course that the UK and France had gravely prejudiced their case unnecessarily by their method of handling their intervention.

3. The question of Soviet participation in policing a solution arrived at through UN was discussed briefly but Permanent Representatives could only give personal views. There was no clear opinion as to whether such participation was likely, and what attitude should be adopted in the event of its being offered by the Soviet Union. However, it was interesting to note that the UK Representative cautioned against the view that such a possibility should be rejected. He underlined that UN or any other group assuming responsibility for resolving the present conflict must be prepared to undertake the necessary forceful measures.

4. The German Representative spoke for the first time in these discussions stating that the Federal Republic considers that the Middle Eastern problem cannot be solved without at least the availability of the means to enforce any proposed solution. However, in his view it would be preferable for the British and French action to continue rather than envisage the possibility of Soviet participation in any police action arranged through the UN.

5. The only other statement of interest today was made by Belgian Representative concerning talks between Spaak and Shepilov. Apparently Spaak had emphasized the inseparability of the Suez problem and that of the present open hostilities, a view which Shepilov vehemently opposed. De Staercke considered that any action now taken under the UN must include the problem of Suez.

6. Neither French nor British Representatives could offer anything further on the military situation apart from the obvious suggestion that present air activities would probably be supplemented by other activities in the course of the next few hours. Council will meet again tomorrow.

UN ASSEMBLY; ACTION ON MIDDLE EAST

The Secretary of State asked to see me this afternoon concerning proceedings in the Special Assembly. He showed me at once two "working papers" in the form of draft resolutions, the one related to the Suez Canal, the other to Palestine. The text of each are repeated in my two immediately preceding telegrams.¹³¹

2. As I have just reported to the Under-Secretary by phone, Mr. Dulles is thinking of having to introduce resolutions along these lines as early as tomorrow (Saturday, November 3) afternoon, or perhaps Sunday. Otherwise he fears that the initiative will be lost to those who are already rumoured to be preparing resolutions of a condemnatory character, involving sanctions, etc. against the UK and France.

3. Dulles and his advisers (Phleger and Elbrick were with him) believe that it is the part of wisdom to divide the two subjects and keep them separate so far as possible. With regard to the Suez Canal, the Secretary is optimistic that a proposal along the lines of his Working Paper 1, would receive wide support. He would be prepared to gamble that the UK itself would welcome it, and Egypt, after the events of the past few days, may be similarly disposed.

4. Dulles is thinking of a Three Man Commission for the Suez Canal, to consist of Pearson, Lange and an Asian (or perhaps Popovic). The manning of the second Five Man Commission for Palestine would be on a geographic basis.

5. Dulles conceives of these resolutions as being the second element in the strategy initiated in the Special Assembly yesterday by the US resolution. In this connection he continues to recognize the force of your own argument. He feels that the action taken so far has avoided something much worse. But we must now press on to the next stage to provide for political settlement in these two main areas and we have not much time.

6. I put to the Secretary the points you had made to me earlier this afternoon, on the phone from New York. A primary objective was to realign the UK and the US; this meant that there must be opportunity of ensuring UK acquiescence, if not support. We were in urgent touch with London. It was important to avoid taking up a fixed position too soon until sufficiently wide support was reasonably assured. I explained our own Government's timetable for the weekend and emphasized the advantage which might be derived from at least a minimum period of deliberation with our friends. I also described your own preliminary thinking with regard to a UN "Police Force" and the convening of a general conference and/or a relatively small ad hoc committee to work out a Middle East political settlement.

7. Dulles was not unsympathetic to these views (except that he clearly disliked the suggestion of a general conference on Middle Eastern affairs). But again he emphasized the severe time limitations under which we were working. With respect to a UN force, he thought this would take quite a long time to work out, though he did not exclude it as part of an ultimate solution.

8. Finally, the Secretary said that he would very much welcome your reactions to his proposals, as well as any reactions which we could get from London. At the same time he said that we would, of course, recognize that the USA were free to proceed without further reference to us if they felt they must do so. Incidentally, he said that he would welcome our co-sponsorship. There is, however, no doubt that the USA intend themselves be sponsors.

9. In the interests of speed we thought it necessary to repeat the texts of the two working papers and this telegram to London, Permanent Delegation New York and Paris Embassy for their info only. Any instructions thereon to them will of course have to come from you. We agreed with Dulles that discussions in London should include the whole of the USA proposals but should not involve communication of draft texts at this stage.

10. You will note from para 8 that we were not asked to take any initiative in Paris.

PALESTINE EMERGENCY ASSEMBLY: MIDDLE EAST POLICE FORCE

This tel contains our preliminary views on this subject. The USA working papers contained in Washington telegrams 1988-90 relate to the establishment of machinery under UN auspices for dealing with the Middle East crisis. The USA would like to separate the Suez and Palestine issues. They are working along lines which we discussed here with the Minister, that is, establishing a small body with power to discuss the issues with the parties directly concerned, to recommend measures for settlement and in consultation with the Security Council and the General Assembly to see that the agreed plan is implemented.

2. Clearly the negotiating group cannot achieve a solution of these complex problems in a short time. It may take months. During the period of negotiation it will be absolutely essential to maintain a cease-fire and withdrawal of troops upon which all this process of negotiation is predicated. It would be absolutely necessary to restrain elements on both sides of the demarcation lines in Palestine and while this may be the most important policing operation, it may also be necessary to maintain law and order in the Canal Zone. Accordingly, parallel with measures which are being developed for negotiating a settlement, it would seem desirable to take steps at once to establish an international police force under UN auspices which could be employed in the area to maintain law and order during the process of negotiation.

Directing Authority

4. One of the difficult questions is what body or person will be responsible for giving orders to this police force. The Security Council as the executive body of the UN is an obvious choice but the problem of the veto is equally obvious and in this case it is not only the veto of the USSR which might cause difficulty. It seems essential, however, that the Great Powers must be agreed on the steps to be taken to solve the Middle East crisis. It is inconceivable that settlement can be reached on any other basis. Accordingly the Council's authority could be brought into the picture at some stage.

5. In addition it will no doubt be necessary for the police force to act in close harmony with the negotiating group or groups. The attitude of the parties during the process of negotiation might well give warning about violations of the cease-fire arrangements. The negotiating group would no doubt wish to be in a position to head off any dangerous situation by the rapid employment of the police force.

6. The link between all the proposed measures surely will be the Secretary-General. It may well be therefore that the primary responsibility for alerting and using the police force should rest with the Secretary-General. He would act in much the same capacity as he has acted with respect to the UN Truce Supervision Organization. He would of course act in close consultation with the negotiating group or groups and with the Security Council and if necessary the General Assembly. But the executive act would be his and he would be in a sense an International Police Commissioner.

Composition of the Force

7. This is also a difficult question. General Burns estimated at one time that the force needed in Palestine would not have to be too large as long as it had freedom of movement and freedom to act. And here we should emphasize that the International Police Force must be able to act with or without the consent of the parties concerned. There can be no question of a return to the hampering conditions imposed on UNTSO by the Armistice Agreements of 1948. With this in mind we suggest that the force should be not too large, but compact, mobile and hard-hitting; perhaps a divisional group completely mechanized, with a paratroop element with a supporting air arm would be sufficient. (Military experts can suggest the detailed organization). For greater efficiency this force must be drawn from a few countries with the most up-to-date forces rather than from many countries with less advanced armies. It would be essential to exclude from the force the UK and France. It might be desirable to exclude the USA and the USSR. There would also be a problem if forces from colonial countries were included. All these qualifications narrow the field from which the force could be drawn. The following countries are possible: Australia, Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Greece, India, NZ, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, Sweden, Turkey and Yugoslavia. The list might be reduced further because Australia and NZ, for example, have been too closely associated with UK, because Pakistan has been associated with Egypt, because Greece has been so strongly anti-UK. With the current situation in Eastern Europe it might be impracticable to draw forces from there. Brazil, Canada, India, Norway, Sweden, Turkey and Yugoslavia might be unexceptionable.

8. We believe that the forces contributed by the various member nations should be as far as possible self contained units. There should be a fairly large contribution by one or two of the contributing countries to establish a clear-cut claim to command. Perhaps, for example, the bulk of the mechanized infantry could be supplied by India, the air force and paratroops by Canada, the artillery arm by Norway and Sweden.

9. We have included India in our calculations because we consider that Nehru's off-expressed desire to be a peace maker should be translated into effective action and because India is the one Afro-Asian country with military forces qualified to carry out the tasks we have in mind. It seems to us important that India should be part of the settlement machinery in this Middle East crisis and be committed with the Great Powers and others in working for conditions which would ensure an overall and a lasting settlement.

Methods

10. For the organization of the police force the UN would have to establish a small committee of experts, political and military. The Secretary-General might be authorized to produce proposals in consultation with General Burns. The expert committee might be drawn from the same countries who would comprise the committee which the USA is proposing for the settlement in Palestine but we should have to know the composition of that committee before making any final recommendation. The force cannot be organized overnight but the machinery for organizing it could be set in motion almost immediately. Perhaps as an initial step the Secretary-General should begin his studies at once.

11. The starting point should be a resolution of the emergency special session of the General Assembly. This resolution should be correlated with the USA resolution calling for a cease-fire and withdrawal and the resolutions which the USA is contemplating concerning the Suez and Palestine issues. The resolution on the police force should reaffirm the cease-fire and withdrawal of forces, since these are the basic conditions which must exist before the police force could begin to act. The preamble of the resolution should presumably refer to the negotiating machinery which is being established and to the necessity of maintaining law and order in the area pending the successful outcome of the negotiations. The operative part of the resolution should include a decision in principle to establish a UN International Police Force, a provision establishing a committee of experts to produce recommendations, a direction to the Secretary-General to produce studies in consultation with UNTSO and perhaps with member governments, a call to all members to cooperate fully with these measures, a request for an early report.

12. When the Committee of Experts and the Secretary-General had reported back to the General Assembly it would be necessary to pass a further resolution providing for the actual establishment of the force. To give the necessary urgency to these proposals the first resolution should perhaps contain a deadline for the report by the Committee of Experts and the Secretary-General.

Sponsorship

13. Problem of sponsorship exists. Canada could introduce this resolution on its own but because of our links with the UK and France and of the position which Canada adopted on the USA resolution of November 1, there is some possibility that the Afro-Asians, in particular, might think that the Canadian proposal for a police force was designed to assist the UK and France out of their difficulties. Since as well the proposal for an International Police Force is open to the charge of "collective colonialism" it would be desirable to have the resolution introduced by a number of countries whose reputation in the field of colonialism is unassailable. Canada is certainly one of these. Norway, Sweden, Iran, Burma, India and Pakistan are others. Tentatively we have been considering whether the resolution on the police force could be introduced by Canada, Iran and Norway. The Norwegians appear ready to do so. It might be desirable to include one or two other countries but because of the complexity of the issues involved it would be desirable to keep sponsors at a minimum. Before introducing the resolution setting up the force (that is the second one contemplated in para 12), it would be necessary to canvass very carefully the countries which might be affected by the UN police force, both those in whose territory the force would be required to operate and those who would be expected to contribute to the force. At the same time it would be absolutely essential to consult fully on the subject with the Four Great Powers (but particularly the USA and USSR) and the Secretary-General.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; MIDDLE EAST; HUNGARY; POLICY AT UNITED NATIONS
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 1)

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on the latest developments in the Middle East situation. The United States intended to introduce two resolutions in the U.N. General Assembly over the weekend to establish committees at once, with mandate to settle the Palestine question and the Suez Canal dispute. He thought that by themselves, these proposals did not go far enough as there was no provision for the constitution of a police force to prevent fighting until settlements were reached. Pending the setting up of such a force on a long-term basis, the combatants should be requested to accept the stationing between them of limited police forces organized immediately under U.N. auspices.

The United Kingdom and France had said they would suspend their military intervention provided a truce force was established and Egypt and Israel agreed to having such a force to keep the peace. If the U.K. and France would agree that the force should include detachments from other countries and all be landed under a U.N. military command, there was a good possibility that the General Assembly would give substantial support to such a plan. The chances of success would not be great, however, if the U.K. and France landed in strength and there was heavy fighting.

2. Mr. Pearson said that, as regards Hungary, the Russians were now re-occupying the country and were showing the true character of their régime. The action of the British and French in the Middle East was all the more deplorable in that it prevented the free world from taking a united stand, which would probably have had much Asian-Arab support, against this naked aggression.

3. The Prime Minister noted that a contribution to a U.N. police force in the Middle East would require Parliamentary support. Although long-term arrangements might not be worked out for some weeks, it might be desirable to summon Parliament soon if Canadian forces were to participate in any police action to be authorized in the near future.

4. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the situation in the Middle East and Hungary and the policy suggested for further meetings of the United Nations.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington], November 3, 1956

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

This is a summary of a number of conversations I have had today with the Under-Secretary and the Minister, at the Ottawa end, and Elbrick, Acting Assistant Secretary for European Affairs in the State Department, concerning proceedings in the U.N. Special Assembly, consequent upon the British and French reply to the Assembly's Resolution of November 2nd.

2. Prior to this morning's Cabinet meeting, the Minister was considering how advantage could be taken of the terms of the Franco-British reply to initiate "police action". He had asked the Acting U.K. High Commissioner to ascertain whether his Government would be willing to accept at once token U.N. detachments and a formal relationship with the organization of General Burns. I communicated this to the State Department, arranging to see them later as the Cabinet meeting progressed.

3. Léger called me at 11.30 a.m. to say that the Cabinet approved our proposed U.N. police action in two stages — in the short term to be conducted by troops immediately available, but not exclusively British and French. (We would hope for a U.S. contingent — Canada would help); these to remain between Egyptian and Israeli forces until a longer term U.N. police force could be provided for.

4. If the U.S. Government thought this approach in any way promising we would try to convince the U.K. Government to agree and undertake that there would be no landing until the U.N. Assembly had passed a Resolution providing for police action in the above sense.

5. A Resolution in the above sense might be the first of three to be presented immediately; the second two to be based on the U.S.A. working papers of the previous day.

6. Ottawa contemplated such a Resolution to be sponsored by Canada with United States support, or by the United States if they would be willing to take it on.

7. The State Department reaction to this proposal was interested but sceptical. Elbrick saw Hoover (the Acting Secretary — Dulles had just gone to the hospital with appendicitis) and told me that it had just been decided at the White House that the U.S. Delegation would go ahead at once with their two Resolutions on Suez and Palestine, respectively. Our proposal offered obvious difficulties. Although they were anxious as we were to extricate the United Kingdom from her present position, it was important that they should not give ground for the charge of collusion to that end. This might deprive them of such sanction as they had in their present position. Furthermore, they were sceptical that the landings could be stopped at this stage and the addition of token forces to the Franco-British occupation might be taken as legitimizing the present operation. It would be taken as an attempt to give U.N. auspices to the action to which the majority of the U.N. took exception.

8. Mr. Pearson called me after the Cabinet meeting (the above report having been communicated to him) to say that Cabinet had now approved a somewhat different approach. The new proposal would involve the immediate establishment by the Assembly of a Committee of Five, to consider and report within forty-eight hours upon the immediate establishment of an "intervention force". The Committee might consist of India, Brazil, Yugoslavia, Sweden and Canada (or one of the other "abstaining" nations). Alternatively the United States might take the fifth slot, which would mean that all five were supporters of the Resolution of November 2.

9. The intention would be to move this Resolution this evening (a session having now been called for) and seek to obtain priority for it. We were immediately proposing this in London, urging that the landings be deferred pending an attempt to have the United Nations act on this basis. If we could obtain Indian support, or even sponsorship for such an initiative this would obviously be of great importance. I communicated this immediately to Elbrick and Hoover at the State Department and told them that I would let them know what response we had from London. I also said that the Minister would probably be flying to New York this afternoon to attend the evening Assembly.

10. Léger later in the afternoon confirmed that Mr. Pearson was going to New York. He told me that preliminary reactions from London to the line we were proposing to take were favourable. I could so indicate to the State Department, in very general and guarded terms. The Minister would, of course, wish to know as soon as possible the further reactions of the U.S. Government to the initiative we were proposing to take.

11. At about 5.30 p.m. I received a call from Murphy, the Deputy Under-Secretary of State, asking if I would go down and discuss the matter further with him, Elbrick and other officials concerned. Rae and I were at the State Department until shortly before 7 o'clock. In addition to Murphy and Elbrick, Phleger, the Department's Legal Adviser, was present.

12. Murphy and his colleagues were obviously interested in our proposal as it had developed. They made a number of suggestions for possible amendment of our latest draft Resolution, of which I gave them copies (copy attached). These suggestions were as follows:

- (a) Phleger thought it important that agreement of the parties concerned should be provided for in the Resolution;
- (b) he also thought consideration might be given to omitting the reference to recruiting "from national military forces immediately available"; and
- (c) it might be that the reference to the police force should be incidental only; that is to say, the Committee might be given the general task of recommending means for carrying out the U.S. Resolution of November 2.

13. We undertook to communicate the U.S. suggestions to the Minister in New York, and Murphy said we could definitely indicate to Mr. Pearson that the U.S. Government thought our approach promising, and one which (without commitment) they would be able to encourage, provided general support in the Assembly were forthcoming. The State Department would immediately communicate the result of our discussion to the U.S. Delegation in New York. On the essential question of delaying the Franco-British landings, Murphy confirmed the intelligence report we had had indicating a disposition in London to suspend operations. I undertook to communicate to the State Department the London reaction when we had it.

14. I called Léger on our return from the State Department. He told me that the response of the U.K. Government to our initiative had been encouraging. Robertson had seen Selwyn Lloyd, the Foreign Secretary, shortly before and had now informed Léger that the U.K. Prime Minister would accept our draft Resolution, with a few minor changes, and subject only to the terms of the two U.S. Resolutions which he had not at that time seen. The Under-Secretary authorized me to inform the State Department that, as a result of Robertson's conversations in London "we were confident" that the British (and French) would not begin their landings before tomorrow night (November 4) and, further "we believed" that if the Assembly took action along the lines of our Resolution, no landing would take place during the period that recommendations for an international police force were being worked out. (This I took to be the forty-eight hours mentioned in the draft Resolution).

15. I immediately telephoned Elbrick in this sense and asked him to see that this important information was communicated immediately to the Acting Secretary of State and to the President. This Elbrick undertook to do at once. This was at about 7.30 p.m.

16. I had no further contact on November 3rd with the State Department, and the Assembly proceedings went forward to passage of the amended Canadian Resolution at about 2 a.m. November 4th.

DRAFT RESOLUTION—CANADA

The United Nations General Assembly bearing in mind the urgent necessity of implementing Resolution No. ____ of November 2;

RECOMMENDS that a Committee of Five Members of the Assembly be appointed to submit to it within forty-eight hours a plan for the setting up in the Middle East of an emergency international United Nations police force recruited from national military forces immediately available and adequate in number to carry out the purposes of Resolution No. ____.

Mr. Léger has just telephoned the following message from Mr. Robertson.

2. Robertson had shown the draft resolution to Lloyd and Lloyd had taken it up with Eden. With one small change Lloyd gave the impression to Robertson that the resolution was welcome and that he (Lloyd) thought they might be able to vote for it. He did not much like the membership of the proposed committee but he might be willing to accept it. He would not promise that there would not be any landings.

3. The following is the change in resolution which was proposed by Eden.

After the words "adequate in number" delete the following words "to carry out the purposes of resolution No. ?".

Substitute the following words: "to procure a cessation of hostilities between Egypt and Israel pending a general settlement of all outstanding problems in the area to be guaranteed by the United Nations."

4. Eden said that he did not think he could honestly say now that they could support this resolution because, he said, he does not know anything about the two United States resolutions. It is not that, at the moment, he is opposed to the Canadian resolution, but that it must be considered along with the two United States resolutions before he can say what his attitude would be. It is therefore still possible that the United Kingdom may be able to support it when they have studied it with the two United States resolutions.

5. Léger also passed this message from Mr. Heeney who had discussed the resolution with Hoover. The United States is very much interested but Hoover had three suggestions:

(1) He thought it would make it more palatable to insert after the phrase "within 48 hours a plan", the words "with the agreement of the parties concerned".

(2) He thought we should omit the phrase "recruited from national military forces immediately available". The idea of this was that it might well be that in the end United Kingdom and French forces will be used but it should be up to the Committee to decide what forces and this need not be mentioned in the resolution.

(3) On a point of general interpretation, the Americans would hope that the Committee would be able to consider any means to implement the resolution and not only the setting up of an international police force.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS: EMERGENCY UN FORCE

At the Secretary General's request, the Minister and Representatives of Colombia, India and Norway met at UN Headquarters on November 4 to discuss the Canadian resolution adopted by the special session of the Assembly earlier this morning on an emergency UN force. The Secretary General is required to produce by tomorrow night (November 5) a plan for the setting up of an emergency international UN force. The special session will meet again tonight (November 4) at 8.00 o'clock to consider another report by the Secretary General called for in the nineteen power resolution, also adopted by the special session early this morning.

2. The meeting this morning in the Secretary General's office was attended by representatives of some of the States which had supplied military observers for service in Palestine or military units in Korea, and which had supported the Canadian resolution on the emergency force. Great Power representation was excluded for the time being. As the Secretary General explained, he considered he had a mandate to consult with representatives of any member government and that he would do well to start his consultation with this small group which might represent countries directly involved in the establishment of the emergency force.

3. The Secretary General hoped from this meeting that he would get the best possible advice on how to proceed with the stiff mandate he had been given. He proposed to regard the representatives present as sort of [an] advisory committee but he would be consulting with other delegations and personalities. For the time being he was leaving aside the question of whether permanent members of the Security Council should be consulted.

4. A related question in the Secretary General's mind was the need to obtain the consent of Governments which would contribute to the emergency force. It might be that in time the force would contain at least token participation by a large number of States but in the initial stage it was likely that only a few countries would be represented on the force. He considered that contributions from the four Governments represented at the meeting would under all circumstances give the force the "proper accent", representing as it would Scandinavia, Asia, Latin America and North America. Reverting to the question of consent, he hoped that in this consultation phase the representatives participating in the meeting would keep in close touch with their governments to enable them to make their position known at short notice.

5. In deciding the composition of the emergency force, the Secretary General was obliged to bear in mind not only political considerations but practical ones. There were political reasons why some States should not contribute to the force, at least at this stage; there were practical reasons why some States must contribute in the initial stage. He wished to make clear that he envisaged a two stage programme for establishing the UN force. (a) As an immediate step it was necessary to place in the area as soon as possible an emergency force to separate the opposing forces (Egypt and Israel). There would also be the task of policing the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Egyptian territory. These were tasks of high priority and ones which should be assigned to an emergency force; but (b) while efforts were being made to reach a lasting settlement in the Middle East (for both the Suez and Palestine issues) it would be necessary to keep a UN force in position to maintain peace and order particularly along the lines of demarcation. A subsidiary question would be how the transition from the emergency force to the long term UN force could be effected. States contributing to the emergency force would wish to be assured that they would not be required to continue their contribution, at least on the same scale, to the long term force.

6. The Secretary General believed that he should concentrate for the moment on the immediate steps for setting up the emergency force. He pointed out that a UN command could be set up at once. He had in mind that Burns would take on as a temporary assignment the task of Commander-in-Chief. Burns would choose from officers serving with UNTSO a nucleus for a command staff. He could draw upon officers who had been serving with the Egypt-Israel Mixed Armistice Commission. Perhaps twenty-four officers might be available but this group could form the core of a UN command. He had cabled to Burns for his views.

7. The next urgent step would be to get troops into the area. The Secretary General wondered what the representatives present might estimate to be the time required. He believed it might take as long as two weeks to assemble the emergency force required for the immediate tasks. This led him to throw out for suggestion that UK and French troops in the area might be employed on a very temporary basis and exclusively under the UN command. Then as troops from contributing countries arrived, they could be substituted for the Anglo-French forces on the ground.

8. This provoked an immediate reaction from Lall, who said that the Afro-Asians would never accept UK and French forces in the emergency force. It would discredit the UN to do so and create the impression that the proposal for an emergency force had been made to cloak with respectability the impending occupation of Egypt by Anglo-French forces. Later in the meeting the question was raised about what should be done if the UK and France proceed with their plans to land troops. Lall recognized that this would create a very difficult situation but stated emphatically that the Anglo-French troops should be regarded as "untouchables". This Indian reaction was of course to be expected and we have no reason to doubt that Lall was saying moderately what the Egyptians and others would denounce in violent terms.

9. The Minister explained that until yesterday we had not devised a resolution on the emergency force, that we were still thinking through the implications of establishing a force in the area. We had, however, been encouraged from contacts during yesterday to make the move which had a two-fold purpose (a) to discourage or at least postpone the landing of Anglo-French forces in Egypt; (b) to discourage the Israelis from concluding that they could settle down in the occupied Egyptian territory. To accomplish these purposes it was necessary to act quickly and because of the haste, the action taken may have been inadequate. We had, however, succeeded in passing a resolution which the UK and France had not opposed and this represented a not unimportant change, for the first time, in their attitude. It was also of significance that nobody had voted against the resolution. And the task now before the Secretary General and the national representatives at the meeting seemed almost impossible. But the nature of the crisis was such that it was essential to do something to try to save the situation.

10. The Minister said that our ideas about the emergency force were much the same as those expressed by the Secretary General. We had in mind the two-stage approach. We believed that the establishment of the UN force should be linked with an effort to reach political settlements in the area. It was very necessary to keep this two stage approach in mind because it had a very direct bearing on the contribution which States might make to the UN force. Canada, for example, would be very reluctant to participate in the emergency force if we thought it would develop into a long term commitment which might result in little more than maintaining the unsatisfactory status quo, perhaps until another explosive situation developed in future. For this reason it was most desirable to see that action, linking the political settlement with the emergency steps we were now contemplating, was initiated quickly.

11. The Minister gave support to the Secretary General's views concerning the UN command and concerning the immediate tasks which would face the emergency force. He expressed hope that not only could the Egyptian and Israeli forces be kept apart but that the Israelis could be rolled back to the demarcation line. He admitted as regards the latter that the difficulties were great. The Minister said that the question of security of the Canal was largely a matter of freedom of transit and this was a technical problem for the moment. As a later step, of course, political questions concerning the Canal would have to be settled.

12. The Minister referred to the question of Anglo-French participation in the emergency force. He recognized that some delegations had voted for the Canadian resolution on the assumption that the UK and France would not be involved. Canada did not necessarily share this assumption because it was possible that if the Anglo-French troops should land, it might be desirable to bring them immediately under UN command at least until forces from other countries could be brought in. It is clear, however, a difficult political question was involved and perhaps the most profitable course would be to pursue alternatives to Anglo-French participation.

13. The Canadian Government agreed, the Minister continued, to the establishment of a UN force under UN command and, certainly as regards the long term force, we shared the view that permanent members of the Security Council should not contribute. There would be a psychological advantage in making this clear at once because it might facilitate what had to be done in the first stage. It was very desirable to have on the ground as quickly as possible at least a token UN force. Mr. Pearson said that the Canadian Government would be willing to participate in a UN emergency force and that there were Canadian forces in Europe which could be used. However, the Canadian Parliament might have to be called into session to agree with any such participation and there would have to be a decision as to the numbers, et cetera, depending to some extent on what others did. But Canada would do its part. We envisaged, too, that the USA might contribute to the emergency force because USA forces were immediately available in the area.

14. Lall reverted to the question of Anglo-French participation and argued with some force that if such participation was even contemplated, it would be tantamount to a polite invitation from the UN to land troops at once. It was most important to convince the UK and France that there would be a UN force and that they would not be part of it. Lall saw no difficulty about USA participation in the immediate stage. He agreed, too, that for the time being it might not be possible to assemble troops quickly from more than three or four countries. He agreed that the force should not have a strongly Western or NATO accent. He could not commit his government but he conveyed the impression that India might be ready to participate in the force. The Minister made the point that if almost at once a small force from India and a small force from USA were to proceed to the area, there would be great compulsion on the UK and France to withhold their hand.

15. There was some discussion about when the UN command should be set up. The Secretary General believed that it could be established almost immediately. Before the end of the meeting, he and the others agreed that he could report this to the special session tonight (November 4). The psychological effect of this announcement could be most useful. It would be even better if some countries could indicate either at tonight's meeting or tomorrow that they would make available troops for the emergency force. There was some discussion about the countries from which contributions to the force might be made. Canada, India, Norway, Sweden and USA were considered as immediate prospects. Brazil, Colombia, Ethiopia, Pakistan, The Netherlands and Yugoslavia were considered possible contributors. It was not impossible that Turkey might contribute during the emergency period.

16. It was agreed by all that the toughest problem facing the special session and the emergency force would be the task of securing the withdrawal of Israel's forces from Egyptian territory. Bunche pointed out that such a move would be contrary to Ben Gurion's long-held thesis about the function of the UN in Palestine. It was an open question whether sufficient political pressure could be brought on Israel to achieve the withdrawal. At the end of the meeting, the Secretary General read a press report from Jerusalem which indicated that Israel would not accept the presence of an emergency force in the "conquered" Egyptian territory. The Minister pointed out that this reaction was to be expected and while it made the situation more serious, it should not deter the UN from pursuing the course it was following. It was undoubtedly true that Israel might use the Egyptian territory for bargaining purposes but if the proposals for a political settlement were pressed, there would be many advantages to Israel, like the security of its borders, the use of the Suez Canal and of the Port of Elath, all of which offered considerable inducement. One of the real worries, the Minister said, was whether the Israelis would try to improve their bargaining position by further invasion of Arab territory, either in Syria (there have been some disturbing indications in this regard) or in Jordan.

17. About the end of the meeting, the Secretary General said that the USA had offered to provide aircraft for the air lift of troops needed for the emergency force. Lodge was enthusiastic about the Secretary General's report on the meeting this morning. It was generally agreed by those participating that the meeting was encouraging.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS: EMERGENCY FORCE

Again because of the pressure here, we have been unable to send complete reports on the course of the debate. However, we hope to keep you abreast of the developments behind the scenes which help to explain events in the public forum. This telegram is concerned with the special session meeting November 3-4, which began at 8.00 o'clock in the evening [and] ended at 3.00 o'clock in the morning. The meeting was called at the request of Egypt because parties concerned had not complied with the Assembly's resolution of November 2 (Document A/3256).

2. Just before the meeting the Minister met with Lodge to discuss the text of the proposed Canadian resolution on the emergency UN force. The Minister explained why Canada considered it desirable to press the resolution in the special session. It was our hope that the resolution would provide a basis for an emergency force which could supervise the cease-fire and withdrawal called for in the resolution of November 2. This however, would be emergency action and we had in mind the establishment of a UN force of longer service which would maintain peace and order during the period of negotiating settlement of the two main issues, Suez and Palestine. For this reason, we welcomed the two USA draft resolutions providing machinery for negotiation. We hoped to link our own proposal with those of the USA.

3. Another aim was to persuade the UK and France not to land troops in Egypt. There were some indications that the UK Government was in a hesitant mood, although we could not be sure of this. We had received no repeat no assurance that the landings would not be made. In addition, we were anxious to demonstrate to Israel that its invasion of Egyptian territory could not [be] condoned.

4. We also hoped, the Minister continued, to head off any condemnatory resolution proposed by the Afro-Asians. We understood that the Indians had been circulating a draft. We had some reason to believe that this draft would not be too offensive.

5. Lodge expressed broad agreement with Canadian views on the subject. He enquired whether the Minister had a text providing for the establishment of an emergency force. The Minister showed him the draft which he had brought from Ottawa. Lodge suggested a simpler text which he had in front of him and which, we gathered later, had come from Washington. It read: "The General Assembly bearing in mind the urgent necessity of implementing resolution No. A/3256 of November 2, requests the Secretary General to submit to it within 48 hours a plan for the setting up with the consent of the nations concerned of an emergency international UN police force to carry out the purposes of resolution No. A/3256". Lodge said that he had every reason to believe that this text would be acceptable to the Egyptians and consequently to the Afro-Asian group.

6. The Minister pointed out that with some exceptions our text had appealed to UK Ministers. They had, however, suggested amendments which might be difficult to incorporate in the Canada text (we had received by then Léger's relay of the message from Robertson). The Minister explained that we were anxious to have a text which the UK and France would not oppose. Lodge said they could not oppose the text he had suggested. After further discussion, in which several changes were made in the draft, the Minister agreed to consider the possibility of submitting the draft resolution in Canada's name.

7. Later the Minister discussed the text with the Secretary General. He expressed himself in favour of it, though not optimistically. We canvassed the views of a number of delegations, among them Norway, Pakistan, India, Ceylon, Australia, NZ, South Africa, France and the Netherlands. The Norwegians discussed the draft with the other Scandinavian countries. Since there was a general expectancy in the Assembly that Canada would introduce a draft resolution, in a very short time our text was widely distributed.¹³²

8. A difficulty arose over the interpretation of the words "with the consent of the nations concerned". The Afro-Asians, in particular the delegations of Pakistan, Egypt, Indonesia, India and Syria enquired informally whether this meant the consent of the nations contributing to the emergency force or the consent of the nations mentioned in the Assembly resolution of November 2. The Canadian Delegation had to consult several times with the USA Delegation to seek clarification. Since the language had come from Washington, the USA Delegation was reluctant to delete it and indeed there were psychological reasons for not doing so. Eventually the Minister and Lodge agreed that the interpretation should be the consent of contributing nations. After considerable persuasion the Afro-Asians, but particularly Egypt, agreed to accept an oral interpretation in a supplementary statement from the rostrum. They also insisted on the inclusion of the word "all"¹³³ before "the terms" in the operative paragraph. They would have preferred a specific reference to the "withdrawal" of forces but this would have created difficulties, because the language proposed followed the words "secure and supervise" and the whole would have implied that withdrawal could be effected by force.

9. This process of negotiation behind the scenes occupied several hours but fortunately there was a long list of speakers. There was also the problem of whether Canada could support a nineteen power draft resolution.¹³⁴ Para three of this resolution coincided to some extent with the proposal made in the Canadian draft. Accordingly, the Minister was able to say in his statement that the Canadian proposal was in a sense "supplementary" to the nineteen power proposal. The Minister was somewhat doubtful about supporting this draft resolution because in many respects it was unrealistic. In the end, however, he considered it desirable to give the nineteen power text his support in order to ensure strong Afro-Asian support for the Canadian draft resolution.

10. This correlation of the two proposals was carried still further when Lall agreed to give priority to the Canadian draft resolution, although the nineteen power proposal had been submitted first. This ensured that the Canadian proposal would have the support of the Afro-Asians because, had they not supported the Canadian resolution, the support for their own might have been weakened.

11. As you are aware, the two resolutions were adopted by large majorities. The vote on the Canadian draft resolution was 57 in favour, none against with nineteen abstentions (the Soviet Bloc, the old Commonwealth, Egypt, France, Israel, Laos, Portugal and Austria). The representatives of Egypt and Portugal explained to the Minister afterward that they had no instructions. The nineteen power proposal was adopted by 59 in favour, five against (Australia, France, Israel, NZ and UK) with twelve abstention (Benelux, Scandinavians, Dominican Republic, Laos, Portugal and South Africa). Both votes were roll call.

12. The Minister had some discussion about our text with Dixon. The latter complained that the text was very different from what he understood had been discussed in London. He gave the impression, however, that he would not vote against it (although as part of its price of abstention, the UK exacted an abstention from the Scandinavians on the nineteen power proposal).

13. At the meeting in the Secretary General's office today he read a message from Selwyn Lloyd concerning the resolution on the emergency force. In effect, it said that no reply could be given until UK Ministers had considered the resolution, a step they were taking as a matter of emergency. The Secretary General, who has been very pessimistic this past week, took some hope from the fact that the UK had not rejected the resolution out of hand.

After reports to the contrary we have now heard that the Israelis' acceptance of the United Nations cease-fire call is qualified and that they have asked for conditions including free passage of the Canal.

I should like you to know at once that in these circumstances, after discussion with the French, we have decided that the operation to separate the combatants and to ensure the safety of the Canal must proceed as planned.

It is obvious that unless we keep the combatants apart the fighting will continue with all the risk that this entails of a major conflagration. Nasser's position will be strengthened.

¹³⁵ Ce message a été livré à Saint-Laurent vers 22 h 30 le 4 novembre.

This message was delivered to St. Laurent about 10:30 p.m. on November 4.

No steps will be taken to clear obstructions and get Suez Canal traffic going. The whole area will relapse into chaos.

In these circumstances we have had a difficult, indeed an agonising, decision to take, but I am sure that we have reached the right one. The French agree with us.

In carrying out the operations no possible precaution will be spared to avoid civilian casualties and to reduce material damage to the absolute minimum.

Adequate warnings will also be broadcast to the civilian population concerned before military operations are launched.

We warmly welcome the Canadian initiative in New York to establish an emergency international United Nations force. I am most indebted to Mr. Pearson for the skill and energy with which he has sponsored this idea. But it will obviously take at best at least some days for the United Nations force to come into being. This makes it imperative for us to take a grip of the situation and to create conditions under which the United Nations force, once it is formed, can relieve us of our responsibility.

It is only after most anxious thought that we have taken our decision. I trust sincerely that we can rely on your support for it. It would be of a deep and real value to us.

We are proposing in addition, that a meeting of the Security Council should be convened at ministerial level to try and arrive at a permanent settlement of the Israel/Egypt problem.

MIDDLE EAST

Eban asked to see me before the meeting of the special Assembly last night and we had a very discouraging talk. He said that his Government were worried about the UN police force-cease fire resolution as it seemed to put Israel in a position of inferiority to other States in requiring her to accept UN interference. He had hoped that this worry might be removed by an interpretation of the words "with the consent of the States concerned", specifically to include Israel but this had not been the case. His Government felt strongly that what was required now was not a UN police force to separate the combatants, because the fighting was almost over, but a political settlement which would establish peace and accepted boundaries. He did not say where these boundaries would be but it is quite clear from the tenor of his talk and other info that the Israelis will not now be satisfied with the present armistice boundaries.

2. Eban talked about the unwarranted interference of the UN with Israel's sovereign rights and in territory under "Israel's jurisdiction". It seems quite clear that he meant by this territory recently conquered by Israel. He added that his Government felt that the thing to do now was to press on with the political settlement which I had emphasized in my statement to the Assembly last Thursday night, and they were disappointed that I seemed to have abandoned that stand in favour of a police force. I said that I had not changed my position in the slightest and had emphasized on every possible occasion the necessity of pressing ahead with the political settlement; that was why I welcomed so strongly the USA resolution which had been introduced for this purpose. Eban said there were some parts of this resolution which his Government did not like very much and that in any event it would not get, he thought, the necessary support in the Assembly.

3. The Israelis are obviously in a confident mood and are not likely to cooperate with the UN in the moves under way unless they are forced to do so. But with the USA and the French and the British so bitterly divided on this issue it is going to be very difficult indeed to apply the necessary political pressure.

MIDDLE EAST

Hammarskjöld asked me to have lunch with him today. Cordier, Bunche and Engen (Norway) were also present. The latter, incidentally, showed me a message from Lange saying that the Norwegian Parliament had unanimously approved the immediate despatch of a company of infantry to the UN force in Palestine.

2. Hammarskjöld wished to bring us up to date on developments, and discuss his final report on the UN police force which he will make to the Assembly tomorrow. It will include provisions for organization, finance, etc., but, more important, certain principles governing the purposes and use of the force and its relationship to the UN. He contemplates that the UN command will report to him and that he will work with an advisory committee of five Assembly members appointed for that purpose by the Assembly. A resolution will be introduced tomorrow at the Assembly seeking approval of his report and authorizing him to proceed as recommended in it. I expect to be working with him on a final draft of it tonight during the Assembly meeting, which is called for 8.00 o'clock.

3. Hammarskjöld and his colleagues are enthusiastic about the response to the UN force initiative and feel that something very important has begun, the advantages of which may be in the long run far more significant than the setbacks that the UN has recently received because of the British-French action. Discounting some of their enthusiasm there is no doubt that under the impetus of an immediate and critical situation, certain steps have been taken which might have been very difficult, if not impossible, to take in normal circumstances. Contributions to the force have already been offered by NZ, Pakistan, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland and Colombia, while favourable responses are expected soon from other Governments. Of course there are a multitude of logistic, organizational and other problems, some of which have already been pointed out by General Burns, but people here are hopeful that these can be overcome, especially as the United States has made whole-hearted offers of co-operation in the field of logistics, supply, transport, etc. Hammarskjöld is particularly pleased that we have already secured approval for a resolution restricting the force to non-permanent members of the Security Council. This will keep the operation in the Assembly and also keep out the Russians as well as the French and the British. The inclusion of the first would make American co-operation impossible, and of the latter, Arab-Asian. The greatest difficulty will be to overcome Israeli opposition to the whole idea, though Hammarskjöld said that today in a talk with Eban he found him much less intransigent than he was yesterday. Of course, the Anglo-French landing has complicated matters and added to our difficulties. The Arab-Asians will be violently emotional tonight and may wish to take action by condemnation and sanctions against the British and the French.

4. My own view is that the best chance of overcoming our difficulties and avoiding dangers is to press ahead with the utmost speed and determination in the organization of the force. I discussed this aspect of the question in terms of an immediate Canadian contribution with the Prime Minister over the telephone this afternoon. I hope that we can plan on a battalion and that the detailed offer can be made in advance of the convening of the House of Commons. We are really at a critical stage in developments at the moment and if we can exploit the possibilities of a UN force quickly and effectively we may not only find a way out of present difficulties and have saved the UN from a disastrous setback, but also have paved the way for UN progress in the whole field of collective security through the Assembly action. I realize, of course, that none of these hopeful results may be achieved, but we should certainly do our utmost to bring about that achievement.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS—EMERGENCY UN FORCE

Hoover, Acting Secretary of State, asked to see me today at noon about the problem of immediate steps in connection with the establishment of the proposed UN force under UN command. He was accompanied by Phleger, State Department Legal Adviser, and Elbrick, Acting Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs. Hoover began by showing me what he described as a paper briefly summarizing current thinking here on the shape of the next steps. The paper began by indicating that the landing of UK and French troops represented a further complication in an already difficult situation. It then proposed the following general set of requirements:

- (i) An immediate cease fire.
- (ii) Withdrawal of all foreign forces (including UK and French forces that have landed in the Suez area).

(iii) Immediately on a cease fire and a withdrawal, as indicated in (i) and (ii), the entry of UN forces to stabilize the situation.

(iv) While the UK was not called on to contribute to such forces and does not expect to do so, the USA is ready to supply transportation if called upon to do so by the UN.

2. This working paper further emphasized the need for putting the programme into effect at the earliest possible moment. Finally, it indicated that the process envisaged must be set in motion in order to reach a permanent settlement in the Middle East, including resolutions of the factors that underlie the present hostilities. This final step was the object of the USA resolutions dealing with the Suez Canal settlement and with an Arab-Israeli settlement.

3. Hoover, in accordance with this outline, devoted his principal remarks to the prospects of obtaining a cease fire and to an indication of the willingness of the USA to furnish land or sea transportation promptly in order to facilitate the support and transportation of the proposed UN force. He had just received the press report of cease fire discussions between the UK and Egyptian commanders in the Port Said area. If these reports were verified and if a genuine cease fire were in sight, the need for urgent action on the logistical and planning side would be all the more pressing. He was in close touch with Admiral Radford whom he telephoned during our visit to ensure that the USA service departments were ready to begin immediate logistical planning against the prospect of a request for assistance from the Secretary General and the group in New York with whom he is working on the establishment of the UN force. Hoover assumed that our own contribution would be likely to come from available forces in West Germany and suggested that it might be useful for Admiral Radford and General Foulkes to concert preliminary plans which could be fitted into the requirements set by the New York group under the Secretary General. In view of the fact that important discussions have been under way in New York, and that the details of our own contribution and the contributions of other participating States have not yet been settled, I thought that it would not repeat not be advisable to proceed on this basis until I had checked with the Minister in New York, in order to avoid any possible duplication or conflict.

4. At the same time I should report our impression that the USA administration (including the President himself) are genuinely interested in helping to the utmost extent on the transport and logistical side and that they will do whatever is possible to assist in the organization and backing up of the proposed UN force which they regard as a decisive element in the present fluid situation.

5. It will also be apparent from the general summary given above (the USA paper in this connection was marked Top Secret) that they intend to press forward with the general strategy of taking up actively the USA proposals relating to the Suez Canal and to the general political settlement envisaged; in this process they have come to regard the UN force as an essential contributing factor.

6. Finally, it is our impression that in this period on many important matters contacts between UK and France on the one hand, and the USA, on the other, are far from normal. The implications for our own position are obvious.

Reference: Our tels 1096-97 Nov. 4.

Repeat Washington, London, Paris, NATO (Information).

As forecast in our telegram 1096 November 4 a meeting of the first emergency special session was held at 9:45 last night. The principal matters considered were:

(a) a report by the Secretary-General in response to operative para two of the nineteen-power resolution of November 4 (Document A/3275 and contained in our telegram 1095†);

(b) a first report by the Secretary-General on the plan for an emergency international UN force requested in the Canadian resolution adopted by the Assembly on November 4 (Document A/3276);

(c) a draft resolution prepared by the Secretary-General and sponsored by Canada, Colombia and Norway (Document A/3290 of November 4).

2. Before the meeting the Minister spoke with Eban at his request. This conversation has been reported to you. Also before the meeting there was some informal discussion about who should sponsor the draft resolution establishing a UN command. The original intention was that it should be sponsored by the four Governments represented at the meeting in the Secretary-General's office on the morning of November 4. However, in private conversations, members of the Pakistan Delegation urged that if India were given too prominent a role in the arrangements for an emergency UN force, they would have opportunities to exploit differences among the Arab governments which might weaken the whole effort. The Pakistanis urged us to be wary of India's real intention in the Middle East which was to divide the Moslem States and to sow seeds of discord which might plague the world for years to come. Pakistan was not claiming a position of leadership in the present manoeuvre but was worried about the prospect that India would take one.

3. The Pakistanis were clearly upset about the result of the vote on the resolution concerning the Hungarian situation. They had supported it while all the other Afro-Asians, except Iran which had voted in favour and Lebanon which had been absent, had abstained. Shafqat saw in this vote the gravest implications for the future of the UN. This state of mind, plus the genuine Pakistani suspicion of India, no doubt influenced the Pakistanis to express opposition to giving India too great a role in the present Middle East crisis. However, it is likely that the Pakistanis were expressing the anxieties of the Baghdad Pact powers. For this reason we were inclined to heed the Pakistani advice.

4. The actual need for blocking Indian sponsorship of the draft resolution did not arise, however, because at the time the document was being printed Lall could not be reached. The document was issued in the name of Canada, Colombia and Norway. It appeared that Lall was making strenuous efforts to have India's name added but he did not succeed. During the debate he spoke strongly in support of the draft resolution.

5. During the course of our conversation with the Pakistanis we were told that if Pakistan were invited to participate in the force and if Anglo-French participation was excluded, there was a good chance that Pakistan would make troops available. (Today Mir Khan informed us that Pakistan had offered a contingent).

6. The verbatim record of the debate will be sent to you by tonight's bag. The highlights were:

(a) Loutfi announced that Egypt had accepted the nineteen-power resolution which he recognized as a second appeal to the parties to abide by the provisions of the USA resolution of November 2. He had nothing to say about the international emergency force.

(b) Dixon and Guiringaud stated that the Governments of the UK and France were still considering, in close consultation, the messages from the Secretary-General concerning the cease-fire. Because of time and geography it had not been possible for their delegations to receive a reply.

(c) Engen introduced the draft resolution establishing a UN command. This draft was immediately supported by Lall who made a further clarification of the word "all" before the words "the terms of the resolution of the General Assembly of November 2/56". He said among other things, "it should be clear beyond doubt that what it referred to was in fact the full implementation of the resolution".

(d) Eban spoke about the requirement of consent from the State in whose territory the proposed emergency force would operate. He said it would be "axiomatic under the law of the Charter that the stationing of any force in a territory under Israel's jurisdiction or control is not possible in law without the Israel Government's sovereign consent ...". He also enquired about the change in the status of the Chief of Staff of UNTSO and about whether the capacity of military recruitment was in the spirit of the Charter. Eban received a short and sharp reply on these points from the Secretary-General.

(e) Sobolev and the Ukrainian said nothing about the reports or the draft resolution before the assembly but confined themselves to propaganda against the UK and France.

(f) Lodge gave strong support to the draft resolution on the emergency force. He said in addition "to facilitate the success of its operation, the USA is prepared to help, and help in an important way, as regards airlifts, shipping, transport and supplies". He moved an immediate vote.

7. Lodge's motion for an immediate vote evoked immediate opposition from the UK and France. Both argued that their Governments had not had time to consider the proposal being made. The co-sponsors of the draft resolution agreed that there was no point in delaying the vote because if the UK and French reaction should be favourable the passing of the resolution had their approval. If they were opposed to the establishment of a UN command, it was all the more important to proceed with the plan. (In addition we were more or less certain that Anglo-French landings would become known by morning. This made it imperative not to check the momentum of the move to establish a UN emergency force.) As the vote showed (57 in favour, none against with 19 abstentions) there was considerable pressure in the Assembly to have an immediate vote. It goes without saying that the USA motion was carried by a vote of 50-6-16.

Your Acting High Commissioner personally delivered your message to me about ten thirty our time last night. Shortly afterwards I discussed its substance with Mr. Pearson who was about to speak at the General Assembly meeting. I think we have a sympathetic understanding of your and France's position but we still regret you found it necessary to follow the course you are taking. Of course the motives and the known character of the actors do make a difference, but it is unfortunate that the events in the Middle East have cloaked with a smoke screen the renewed brutal international crimes of the Soviets. Many felt their satellite empire was crumbling and that they would not dare challenge world public opinion alone by resorting to the use of their military forces against their neighbours to reverse that trend. However they now say they too are restoring order in the face of inability of local authorities to do so; they may also say that they spare no precaution to avoid civilian casualties, that they give adequate warning so that these populations can submit to their will without suffering from military operations etc. To you and to us all this is specious but the opportunity for comparisons resulting from what can seem to be disregard of United Nations Charter and the decisions made by its constitutional organs themselves and not by others for them, handicaps us in using world opinion as a check upon their outrageous conduct. We are also much concerned about the reactions of the Eastern members of the Commonwealth and can only hope that events will turn out to be such that the results will come to be regarded by all on our side as much more important than the measures taken to bring about such results which we hope in the end will be brought about under the aegis of the United Nations with the co-operation of the United Kingdom and France acting as influential and helpful members.

During this crisis we have concentrated our thought and action upon seeking some way of resolving matters that would lead finally to some workable solution of Middle-Eastern affairs with a minimum of damage to the unity of the Commonwealth and the Western alliance. Our concern with the seriousness of the large issues has led my colleagues and me to offer to have Canadian forces participate in whatever United Nations force is needed to secure an acceptable solution. We will continue to do our best to be of whatever assistance we can in a positive way but I would not wish to leave with you the impression that as seen from here the situation appears other than tragic.¹³⁷

I have received from Pritchard an account of his talk with you yesterday evening.

I must tell you that I understand your feelings and anxieties. Here we have been living with them from day to day and our decisions have been taken only after we have weighed the moral considerations with scrupulous care and with the thought of the strain upon our friends in the Commonwealth always first in our minds.

From the moment this war broke out, it has been clear to me that every Arab country would be involved and set about Israel under Egypt's direction, unless the war was stopped at once. Our operation was thus a life saving one.

A war of that kind would be fought backwards and forwards across the Canal and it would be lost to all of us for months and months. There is little doubt that Israel would have decisively defeated the Arabs one by one and that by our intervention we have saved them.

The only possible way of stopping hostilities was for someone to get there quickly and be on the ground. The ideal would have been an international force from the start but there isn't one and in the nature of things couldn't be one for a time. As soon as we are on the ground in force we shall call upon the Israelis to withdraw towards their frontiers. I am sure they won't begin to do so until we are there. There must be a protective pad between the forces.

The United Nations now look like providing a force and the United States seem to be willing to provide a contingent. We are ready to stop our operations as soon as we can hand over responsibility to a United Nations force.

I know that we have incurred much criticism by the action we have been forced to take but I hope that you whose Government have played a leading part in encouraging acceptance of the proposals for a United Nations force will regard what we have had to do as paving the way for it to become a reality. I hope you will press ahead with the force plan which I believe may yet give the United Nations strength which is the only hope of preserving international law and peace in the world.

Throughout this business our most pressing anxiety has been to avoid civilian casualties. We have gone to extreme lengths to do so even to the point of endangering our own operations. I am thankful to say that so far we have been successful in this aim.

MIDDLE EAST

Last night, during the meeting of the Security Council, where certain Russian moves were frustrated,¹³⁹ a message was received by the Secretary-General from Israel with an unconditional acceptance of the cease fire. This seemed to me to be of most immediate importance, because if now the UK and France commitment in para 4 of their note to the Secretary-General could be implemented, then the way to a general cessation of hostilities was clear. It became important, therefore, to cancel the meeting of the General Assembly where there would be intemperate language and a strong resolution under the impetus of the events of the day in Egypt. Indeed, we had seen a copy of a draft Arab-Asian resolution which we certainly would not have been able to support. The Secretary-General, therefore, prevailed on the President of the Assembly to postpone the meeting. This was the easier because the Security Council had not finished until 10.30, and he could announce that the lateness of the hour made an Assembly meeting undesirable. The other necessity was to finish the report of the Secretary-General on the international force and get that to London and Paris in time for consideration there by Governments during the morning. I felt it would be also most helpful if the Prime Minister could send a final appeal to Sir Anthony Eden pressing for acceptance, and steps were taken to draft such an appeal for transmission to Ottawa in case the idea proved acceptable to Mr. St-Laurent.

2. I then told Lodge of our plans to finish the report and press for UK and French immediate acceptance. I also saw Dixon and told him that in my view it was vital that the UK Government now take this way out of their difficulties. He was inclined, I think, to agree, but felt that unless there was time for consideration in London and for instructions to be received here, they would not, of course, be able to accept any report. Meanwhile he was communicating to London the latest developments.

3. Accompanied by Mr. Holmes I joined Hammarskjöld, Bunche and Cordier and worked with them on the Secretary-General's report which was completed about 2.00 am. It was then sent immediately to the UK and French delegates and cabled at once to London and Paris.

¹³⁹ L'Union soviétique avait demandé au Conseil de sécurité d'adopter une résolution demandant à tous les États membres des Nations Unies, en particulier aux États-Unis et à l'Union soviétique, de fournir une assistance militaire au Caire si le Royaume-Uni, la France et Israël ne mettaient pas fin immédiatement à toute action militaire contre l'Égypte.

The Soviet Union asked the Security Council to adopt a resolution asking all UN member states, especially the United States and the USSR, to provide military assistance to Cairo if the United Kingdom, France and Israel did not stop immediately all military action against Egypt.

4. This morning at 8.30, Mr. Robertson phoned me with the important news of his talk with Eden which I then telephoned immediately to the Prime Minister. I passed this on in strict confidence to Hammarskjöld who was, of course, elated. If British and French confirmation of the news reported to me from London comes in this morning the Assembly can meet this afternoon and, I hope, give final approval to the UN force and a cessation of hostilities under the terms of our resolution.

Repeat Permis for the Minister.

1. I was summoned to the Prime Minister's office at the House of Commons at 12.30 today and told that, after considering an aide mémoire received from the Secretary General this morning, in which inter alia it was stated that Egypt and Israel were ready to agree to a cease fire and that the Secretary General was prepared to take the responsibility of proposing conditions to regulate the cease fire, the UK Government and the French Government have decided to notify the Secretary General that for their part they are ready to agree to a cease fire.

2. They wanted me to say to the Prime Minister and you that they are very grateful for Canada's steady influence in the councils of the UN and to ask if we could help achieve two primary objects which are not, repeat not, conditions of their acceptance of the cease fire. In the first place, they hope our efforts to get a really effective UN force set up quickly in the area will be pursued successfully. The second but equally important point is that a start should be made immediately with the job of removing the block ships and other physical obstacles to transit through the Canal. The Anglo-French force has technical equipment available to tackle this engineering job at once. From aerial reconnaissance reports it looks like a big long job; the experts think it may take from three to five months. It is therefore all the more important to start on it at the earliest possible moment, and with the best technical equipment available. It is appreciated that there will be all sorts of political and psychological objections in the UN to allowing the French and British technical services to do this job. They hope that we and the Americans may be able to persuade the majority of the UN, including Egypt and perhaps principally India, that this is the urgent, sensible first follow-up of the cease fire.

3. Since starting this message, I have put a call through to Mr. Pearson in New York and have told him of its contents.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS—EMERGENCY USA FORCE

I met again today at 11.30 am with Hoover, Acting Secretary of State, Phleger, Legal Adviser, and Elbrick, Acting Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs. On the Minister's authorization I informed Hoover that the Prime Minister had made a strong appeal to the UK Prime Minister to accept a UN force and the cease-fire as provided in the Assembly resolutions. Our info was that our High Commissioner in London had been informed by Sir Anthony Eden that the UK Government is likely to accept today unconditionally the constitution of the UN emergency force and cease fire. Our High Commissioner had been told that the matter was going to the UK Cabinet at once and that approval is expected, in which case the UK Permanent Representative in New York would be instructed to communicate the UK's decision to the Secretary General this morning.

2. It was our understanding that Israel was accepting the cease fire unconditionally; the French position was not known but presumably they would follow the lead of the UK.

3. I reported to Hoover that the Minister had been working with the Secretary General all night on Hammarskjöld's final report on the UN emergency force. The report was now ready and in the circumstances stated above it was likely that the Assembly meeting would be postponed until this afternoon or this evening with the hope that the report would be adopted with the concurrence of the UK and France.

4. Our info was that the UK Government had worries on two main points. First, that the UN emergency force should be effective and capable of prompt deployment in the Suez area; and second, that the UK should be in a position to "unblock" the Canal. I passed on the Minister's thought on the latter point, that a UN technical expert might be appointed under the authority of General Burns and possibly UK methods employed in this technical work.

5. I also informed Hoover that the Minister and the Secretary General are preparing the resolution for submission to the Assembly today accepting the Secretary General's final report. The report (and resolution) would propose the setting up of a committee of five, including the Secretary General, "as a kind of cabinet" for the UN emergency force whose members would be Canada, Norway, Colombia, and Iran.¹⁴⁰

6. Finally, on the planning side I passed on the view of our Prime Minister that it is important that General Burns should be brought to New York as promptly as possible.

Meanwhile, I suggested that the USA should take great care not to associate itself too closely or publicly with the UN force. This would certainly arouse suspicion and give the Soviet Government an opportunity to press for their own inclusion. The best procedure was that the USA Government should await UN requests which will be forthcoming.

7. Before reporting on the foregoing basis, I asked Hoover for the latest State Department estimate of the significance of recent Soviet threats implying a Soviet intention to use force to stop the fighting in the Middle East. Hoover was concerned over reports that significant number of Soviet jet overflights are now taking place over Turkey. Their info was that the Soviets had been sending minor shipments of war supplies into the Middle East, most recently into Syria, and that they were anxious to "legitimatize" this sort of activity through their various efforts to share in UN action in this area. Hoover indicated that so far as the work of the group in New York was concerned, tonight might represent a crucial deadline. Every effort should be made to press forward with the work done so far.

8. So far as the UK position which I had outlined was concerned, Hoover said that a message received by the President yesterday from Sir Anthony Eden was the first of its kind in over a week.¹⁴¹ For a variety of reasons, the President had not yet been able to reply and it was Hoover's view that the effect of this may have been to accelerate UK acceptance of a cease fire.

9. On the cease fire itself, the State Department had just received a message from the USA Embassy in London which on first reading seemed to indicate that the UK acceptance was not unqualified.¹⁴² Four principal points gave the State Department concern:

(i) It was not clear whether the UK in fact accepted the essential principle of withdrawal of their forces from the area.

(ii) The UK, as indicated on the basis of our own info, was concerned about the technical problem of clearing out the Canal. On this point the State Department considered that this was a technical matter which could be left for subsequent settlement and should not affect the unconditional acceptance of the UN resolutions. As an aside, Hoover remarked that the President had expressed to him the view that on the basis of his wartime experience the Italians could do this job better than anyone else.

(iii) The message from London left blank the precise timing of the cease fire with the inference that the cease fire would depend on current military operations in the course of today. This, too, was a point which should not blur the idea of unconditional acceptance.

(iv) Finally, there was the problem of UK and French participation in the UN force. The language used in the communication reporting UK views from London indicated that the UK would be prepared to accept "the international force". While this was not entirely clear, in Phleger's view it meant that the UK accepted the UN resolution which specifically excluded the permanent members of the Security Council from participation.

10. Summarizing the USA view, it is clear that they consider here that the UK acceptance should be stated in unequivocal terms and should be as clearcut and as intelligible as possible, leaving over for subsequent settlement such technical problems as the clearing out of the Canal, etc.

11. The State Department understood, as we did, that the Israeli reply had been unequivocal, although they agreed that the question of withdrawal was not specifically mentioned in the Israeli reply. They further understood that the Egyptians had also accepted, and they considered that the Secretary General's technique of placing interpretations on notifications of action received so far had served a most useful purpose.

12. In the course of our meeting, a further report was received by the State Department to the effect that the French had agreed with the UK decision and that the cease fire was to come into effect at 12.00 midnight GMT. It was expected that the UK Prime Minister would be making a statement to this effect in a couple of hours.

13. Subsequent to this discussion I phoned the Minister in New York and understood from him that a message had been received from Robertson in London indicating that in fact the UK acceptance would be unconditional. This info was communicated at once to the State Department.

MIDDLE EAST — UN EMERGENCY FORCE

The following is the text of a draft resolution which it was intended should be submitted by Burma, Ceylon and Ethiopia:

"The General Assembly.

Recalling its resolution of November 2 (A/3256) concerning the cease-fire, withdrawal of troops and other matters related to the military operations in Egyptian territory; as well as its resolution of November 4 (A-3276) concerning the request to the Secretary General to submit a plan for an emergency international UN force, having established in its resolution of November 5 (A/3290) a UN command for an emergency international force; having appointed the Chief of Staff of the UN truce supervision organization as Chief of the Command with authorization to him to begin the recruitment of officers for the Command; and having invited the Secretary General to take the administrative measures necessary for the prompt execution of that resolution noting with appreciation the second and final report of the Secretary General on the plan for an emergency international UN force (A/3302) as requested in the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on November 4 (A/3276), and having examined that plan;

1. Expresses its approval of the interpretation presented in the report of the decisions of the General Assembly in its resolutions of November 2, 4 and 5, respectively (A/3256, A/3276 and A/3290), and of the guiding principles for the organization and functioning of the force as expounded in paras six to nine of the report.

2. Concurs in the definition of the functions of the force as stated in para 12 of the report.

3. Invites the Secretary General to continue discussions with the force, toward the end of a balanced composition.

4. Authorizes the Chief of Command, in consultation with the Secretary General to proceed with the (full) organization of the force (as regards size and composition).

5. Approves provisionally, the basis rule concerning the financing of the force laid down in para 15 of the report.

6. Establishes an Advisory Committee composed of one representative from each of the following countries: Brazil, Canada, Colombia, India, Iran, Norway and Pakistan, and requests this committee, whose chairman shall be the Secretary General, to undertake the development of those aspects of the planning for the force and which are not within the area of responsibility of the Chief of Command.

7. (Authorizes)(Advises) the Secretary General to issue all regulations and instructions which may be essential to the effective functioning of the force, following consultation with the Advisory Committee afore-mentioned.

8. Determines that following the fulfilment of the responsibilities defined for it in operative paras 6 and 7 above, the Advisory Committee, representing the General Assembly, shall continue to assist the Secretary General in meeting the responsibilities falling to him under this and other relevant resolutions.

9. Decides that the Advisory Committee, in the performance of its duties shall be empowered to request the convening of the General Assembly whenever matters arise which, in its opinion, are of such urgency and importance as to require their consideration by the General Assembly itself."

2. The plenary session tonight (November 6) has just been postponed until 10.30 am tomorrow. The above draft has not yet been circulated as a UN document but was given to us by Bunche. It has been issued as a press release.

3. Also issued as a press release is an Afro-Asian draft resolution calling for the withdrawal of the forces of Israel on the one hand and of France and UK on the other. The Secretary General is requested to report on compliance with this resolution within 24 hours from its adoption.

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION IN EGYPT

We have of course been concentrating on measures for the promotion of the cessation of hostilities and the establishment of the UN emergency force. It would be desirable, however, to anticipate and to prepare for some measures of relief assistance to Egypt. We do not know, of course, the extent of the damage done in Egypt by the UK and French military actions. It is clear however that a substantial additional refugee problem will have been created by the Israeli action particularly in Gaza.

2. UN machinery already exists for assistance to Palestine refugees for which I note Cabinet has just approved a continuation of the present level of Canadian contributions.¹⁴³ However no special UN machinery now exists for such assistance as may be necessary for Egypt.

3. We can anticipate that the USSR may seek to maintain its prestige in Egypt by offering substantial relief assistance. Probably the USA is already thinking in terms of what help it could provide but I think there would be good reasons for the UN playing an active role. In addition to the political and psychological advantages, the UN has personnel experienced in the area, possibly still in Egypt, who could undertake relief as well as technical assistance responsibilities.

4. If a UN operation on the UNKRA model, but presumably on a much smaller scale were to be set up, you might wish to give consideration to how Canada could play its part. It would be useful to make some comment soon about relief measures as a help in promoting cooperation from the Egyptian authorities. I am assuming that a cease fire can be maintained and that there has been sufficient destruction in Egypt to justify UN action. Your comments would be appreciated.

5. Separate messages† are being sent concerning the preliminary consideration which has been given to financial problems connected with the UN emergency force.

Ottawa, November 6, 1956

MIDDLE EAST — CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO EMERGENCY U.N. FORCE

At Mr. Campney's request a meeting was called at 4 p.m. November 6 in the Minister's Office to discuss the possible extent and form of the Canadian contribution to the U.N. emergency force to be established pursuant to a decision of the U.N. General Assembly. Those present were Mr. R.B. Bryce, General Foulkes, Mr. Miller, General Graham, Mr. Léger and Mr. Ignatieff.

2. At the request of Mr. Campney, Mr. Bryce reported on a telephone conversation which he had just had with Mr. Pearson in New York, from which it emerged that the Secretary-General of the U.N. was thinking in terms of a force of about 10,000 in all to be raised from nations other than the permanent members of the Security Council, to be available as soon as possible in order to supervise the cease fire which is to go into effect at midnight tonight GMT (or 7 p.m. EST). Mr. Pearson had said that an added consideration for speed in considering the form and extent of a Canadian contribution was that some of the Soviet satellite states were already offering contributions, notably Poland. Mr. Pearson had spoken to Mr. Bryce in connection with the Cabinet meeting which is to take place tomorrow morning. Mr. Pearson expressed the hope that the Canadian Government would be in a position to make an offer of a contribution, details to be worked out with the Secretary-

¹⁴⁴ Paul Martin

General and General Burns, the designated commander of the U.N. force. He also hoped that the force would be available in ten days to two weeks time. The Secretary-General had asked General Burns to come to New York and while the meeting was in progress Mr. Pearson confirmed to me that he would in fact be in New York Wednesday November 7.

3. Mr. Campney said that, pursuant to this message from Mr. Pearson, it seemed that the Cabinet would need to consider whether the Canadian Government would be willing to supply the equivalent of a battalion group in Canadian forces and to announce the intention to make this offer. He asked for the advice of the officials present on considerations bearing upon this question.

4. General Foulkes said that it was clearly necessary to obtain more information from General Burns before plans could proceed on the possible Canadian contribution to the U.N. force. The exact task of this force was not clear. Mr. Léger said that it was his understanding that the U.N. force would be required to supervise the compliance with the U.N. resolutions and particularly the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on November 2, text attached. (Attached also is the text of the U.K. Government's acceptance of the cease fire which also refers to this resolution.) Cease fire lines would presumably have to be drawn, separating Israeli and Egyptian forces behind which the opposing forces would have to withdraw. This policing would presumably have to continue pending the working out of political settlements. The Assembly resolution comprised steps to be taken to reopen the Suez Canal and restore its freedom of navigation. While the latter would presumably involve a technical job of clearing obstructions to the canal, this would also need policing. The position of the U.K. and French troops and their withdrawal would have to be taken into account and it was all the more urgent that a U.N. force should be available to take over police duties because strong political pressures could be expected from the Afro-Asian group in the U.N. to have the U.K. and French forces withdraw as quickly as possible. Mr. Léger added that an additional difficulty which would have to be overcome would be Egyptian and Israeli agreement to have the police force land and operate on the contested territory. Agreement on this would have to be worked out through the U.N.

5. General Foulkes said that apart from clarifying the task of any Canadian contingent to the U.N. force, which would obviously affect its equipment as well as the nature of the contingent, it would also be necessary to clarify its logistic support. It would clearly be impossible to depend on U.K. sources of supply, although this would be the most readily available through Cyprus. Mr. Léger noted that the U.S. Government had indicated through the Canadian Ambassador in Washington that the United States would be prepared to furnish assistance at least in the matter of land or sea transport to facilitate the support and transportation of the force. General Foulkes thought that it would be necessary to explore whether Naples could be used as a base for supply of the force. If the Canadian contingent could be despatched with personal weapons only and be dependent on some U.N. base for supply of vehicles, etc., it could be made ready in a matter of days, possibly ten days or two weeks. If vehicles and other equipment would have to be provided, this would make the interval before a force was available much longer, possibly a month to six weeks.

6. At this point, Mr. Léger was able to report a further message from Mr. Pearson, from which it emerged that General Burns would be in New York tomorrow¹⁴⁵ and that the Secretary-General would like each country willing to make a contribution to have liaison officers available for discussion of plans with General Burns. The Secretary-General had also indicated a desire to have a suitable Canadian liaison officer available as his military adviser.

¹⁴⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
now Saturday L.B. P[earson]

7. After discussion of this further message, it was agreed that two liaison officers would be made available by the Army for immediate despatch to New York for discussions with General Burns.¹⁴⁶ It was also agreed at General Foulkes' suggestion that to meet the Secretary-General's request a senior military representative would be appointed to the Permanent Canadian Mission in New York who would include in his functions continuing liaison with the Secretary-General.

8. Mr. Campney in summing up indicated that he would recommend to Cabinet that the Canadian Government would offer as its initial contribution to the proposed U.N. emergency force a battalion group of between 1,000 and 1,500 men to be available to leave Canada in ten days to two weeks time.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; MIDDLE EAST; ESTABLISHMENT OF U.N. POLICE FORCE
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 5)

1. The Prime Minister reported that President Eisenhower had called him on the telephone to say he did not know of any government that had acted more admirably in the present crisis than had that of Canada. The President had agreed it was desirable to have the U.N. police force composed of contingents from countries which were not permanent members of the Security Council, and had said that the United States would be glad to assist the operation in any way that would be helpful but that would not lead to U.S. involvement contrary to the intent of the United Nations.

¹⁴⁶ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

I told him that this would not be possible [L.B. Pearson]

As regards the despatch of the Canadian group, it appeared, at the moment, that the formal authority for this purpose might be given next week and Parliament convened about November 21st. It was impossible to know at this stage what the cost might be and how much of it would be borne by the United Nations. Perhaps a $1 item should be submitted to the House seeking authority to use National Defence appropriations for this purpose and a larger item presented later when detailed information was available. Meanwhile, he had asked the Clerk of the House to make preparations for a special session.

2. The Minister of National Defence reported on the plans being made in his department for sending troops to the force in the Middle East. It was proposed to provide a battalion group, augmented by supporting service troops, totalling approximately 1,000 to 1,500 men. These could be flown to the area by the R.C.A.F. In addition, HMCS Magnificent would be used as a mobile base. She would be able to go to the Mediterranean in two or three weeks time loaded with vehicles and equipment. The precise role and duties of the Canadian contribution were not yet clear but this suggested plan would appear to be suitable for the early stages of the operation until more permanent arrangements could be made. General Burns would be arriving in New York in a few days when he would be in a position to indicate what was needed, after which more detailed planning could proceed.

3. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) An announcement should be prepared and made immediately, indicating the government's proposals on the Canadian contribution to the U.N. force. It should be kept in mind, however, that it was not yet possible to decide whether the Canadian contribution could eventually be sent.

(b) In addition to making an announcement about the despatch of a group as part of the U.N. force, it would also be desirable for the Prime Minister to state publicly that the proposed trip of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the East was more important now than when originally contemplated.

(A draft press announcement on the Canadian contribution to the U.N. police force was subsequently circulated and considered in detail.)

4. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence on the Middle East situation and on plans for a Canadian contribution to the U.N. police force, and approved for immediate release an announcement on the offer of a Canadian contingent to the force and on the arrangements for transporting the group and supplying it in the area.

MIDDLE EAST SITUATION; FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS

5. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, reported that the Afro-Asian group were pressing in the U.N. to have a vote taken at once on their resolution condemning the U.K., France, and Israel and demanding the immediate withdrawal of their troops. Mr. Pearson was in an awkward position at the General Assembly and would probably welcome such guidance as it was possible to give.

6. During the discussion it was pointed out that it would be quite unrealistic to expect a withdrawal in 24 or 48 hours after the passing of a U.N. resolution with no provision made for the introduction of a force between the original combatants. Much hinged on the interpretation given to the word "immediate". It was probably true that the mischievous elements in the Afro-Asian group, and the communists, hoped to force their resolution through with the objective of making the constructive efforts to police the area come to naught. Mr. Pearson should vote against this kind of resolution or at least abstain.

7. The Prime Minister reported subsequently that he had spoken to Mr. Pearson in New York who had indicated that the British, and presumably the French, might be willing to accept a resolution which sought, not an immediate withdrawal of troops, but withdrawal as soon as practicable. If the further U.N. action with respect to the police force were taken first, and if the Afro-Asian proposal were modified in this way, he would find it difficult to vote against it.

8. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Prime Minister and the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Middle East situation and on the policy to be followed during the United Nations deliberations on the matter.

Ottawa, November 7, 1956

I was able to reach Mr. Pearson on the phone at 3.00 p.m. He said that the situation was getting more and more difficult and highly confused.

The Arabs are insisting that their resolution demanding the immediate (24 hours) withdrawal be given priority and voted upon before the other resolution setting up the police force.

Mr. Pearson very much hopes that he will be allowed to vote for a resolution demanding immediate withdrawal but he naturally would feel happier were it not necessary to face such a resolution before consideration is given to the other one.

The complications arise from:

- (a) The statement made by Mr. Eden this morning to the effect that he could give no assurance that the U.K. troops would withdraw;
- (b) The statements made by the French that they have no intention of withdrawing;
- (c) The alleged statements of Ben Gurion saying that Israel will not withdraw from the Gaza Strip and the Sinai Peninsula;
- (d) The mischievous comportment of Krishna Menon who is to participate in the debate this afternoon, and who seems to take the line that India would only be voting for the cease-fire resolution if there is agreement on the resolution calling for immediate withdrawal.

Mr. Pearson doesn't exactly know what is going to happen. He will call back before the day is over. Meantime the U.S. Delegation take the view that in this confused situation the only thing to do is to go full speed ahead in sending troops for the police force. They would hope that some could be landing there within the next two or three days.

MIDDLE EAST

Following for the Prime Minister confirming my phone conversation. The situation with regard to the voting on the resolution was as follows. There was never any possibility of Canada voting against this resolution as the UK and France had decided to abstain. Dixon informed me of this decision during the afternoon when he read to Casey and me the text of his speech — which he later gave to the Assembly — and which indicated that the principle of withdrawal was accepted but the word “immediately” was unacceptable.

2. There were at that time and when I spoke to you on the phone reasons why we should also abstain, particularly because of the interpretation given to “immediately” by the delegate of Lebanon as meaning 24 or 48 hours. I told a number of friendly European delegates and some Arab-Asian and Latin American ones that we would abstain on the above grounds.

3. There were, however, many reasons why we should vote for this resolution if the word “immediately” had not been put before “to withdraw” in para 3. We were anxious to get unanimous non-Communist support for our UN force resolution and the Arab-Asians were watching the five proposed members for the advisory committee carefully to see how they would vote on withdrawal. If Norway, Canada and Brazil had abstained, they would have been suspicious of our honest intentions re the UN force — indeed some still remain suspicious that the force is a smokescreen behind which British and French forces will remain at the Suez Canal.

4. There was also a hardening of opinion against Israel because of Ben Gurion's intolerable speech this morning, and even to some extent against the UK because of Eden's answer to a question in the House of Commons this morning, though Dixon's speech did something to correct this.

5. When Krishna Menon and others learned we were abstaining, they made a genuine effort to meet our difficulties by giving, for the Asian-Arab group, a less rigid interpretation — that “immediately” was not to be interpreted in terms of hours or days but meaning “as quickly as possible”. The delegate of Peru then linked the “UN force” and the “withdrawal” resolution. This made it difficult to maintain our attitude to the impracticability of the interpretation of “immediately”, especially as we had already voted in support of the principle of withdrawal.

6. As I was in a difficult position, and unable to consult you lest the vote be taken in my absence, and as abstentionists such as the Scandinavians and the Latin Americans had changed their minds, I decided to explain before the vote was taken, why we could now vote for it. In doing so, I gave an interpretation much freer and more flexible even than others had done — to the extent that I thought it would be challenged as it gave the specific and definite impression that withdrawal had to be linked, not only to the arrival, but the functioning of the UN force.

7. As it happened, this interpretation, which was not challenged before the vote, has put the extremists of the Arab-Asian group in a disadvantageous position now and improved the situation for the UK and France and indeed for the UN force itself.

8. I hope that this explanation of my position in a very difficult situation will be satisfactory to you and my colleagues.

SITUATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST

It is clear that a critical point in our difficulties is going to be Israel's intransigence about returning from the lands she has just occupied militarily. Ben Gurion's speech yesterday underlined the difficulties and dangers — and must have been about as offensive to the British as to the Arabs. At lunch time yesterday I had a talk with Eban about the deplorable effect of this speech and warned him that a persistence in this stand would cause Israel to lose all her friends. She would be isolated. Eban was obviously worried about the situation and said that my words — as coming from a Canadian — added to his worries. This morning Raphael, Eban's assistant here, told me that they had reported what I said to their Government which was now considering the whole position in the light of the Assembly resolutions, the atmosphere here, and especially, I suppose, of Eisenhower's statement of yesterday.¹⁴⁷ He hoped that they would be authorized before the day was up to say something which would improve the position.

2. I also had a word with Wadsworth this morning and emphasized the very great importance of pushing on here with their resolution on a Palestine settlement — without delay and as a matter of urgency. I told him that if we are going to get the Israelis to withdraw, and this will be difficult at best, we must give them an assurance that the UN is taking energetic action to ensure that they don't withdraw to the old state of affairs, boundaries undefined and insecure, development plans impossible because of political hostility, a closed Suez Canal, etc. This operation, therefore, has to combine "kicks and carrots". The Americans here understand this; I hope they do in Washington. During the morning Mr. Robertson phoned from London to say he had been talking with people there who felt that the Israeli withdrawal aspect of the problem was now considered to be of critical importance and if this was forced without any parallel efforts to bring about a political settlement there would be dissatisfaction in certain quarters which had up to the present strongly supported UN action.

3. I phoned Mr. Heeney this morning asking him to bring these considerations to the attention of the State Department.

MIDDLE EAST: EMERGENCY FORCE

One of the developments on November 7 which has not been clarified in other reports we have sent was the evolution of the Secretary-General's Advisory Committee, (Resolution A/3308 passed last evening). You will recall that on November 4 the Secretary General held a meeting of the representatives of Canada, Colombia, India and Norway to discuss the establishment of an emergency UN force. Later that day a resolution was introduced by Canada, Colombia and Norway for the purpose of establishing the UN command. We explained in an earlier telegram why India was not included as a sponsor.¹⁴⁸

2. On November 5 it became necessary to appoint an advisory committee which would assist the Secretary-General with the political questions arising out of the establishment and operation of an emergency force in the Middle East. By then Pakistan had offered to contribute to the force and, indeed, had let it be known that it was prepared to contribute a brigade. India had made no offer. Accordingly, to avoid friction between India and Pakistan, the secretariat suggested including Iran as the fourth member, with Canada, Colombia and Norway, of the Advisory Committee.

3. You will recall that early in the afternoon of November 5 the Minister discussed the whole problem with Krishna Menon. Menon appeared reasonable and even ready to contribute to the UN force. However, minutes later at UN Headquarters Murray was approached by Lall who in great excitement demanded to know why India was not included on the Advisory Committee. Lall said that if India were not included the draft resolution would have no support from the "uncommitted" Asians. He argued that because India had attended the first meeting it should automatically be included in the Advisory Committee. He saw no reason why Iran should be included. He regarded what he called the "dropping of India" as an insult and he was clearly prepared to make trouble if no redress was offered.

4. We proceeded immediately to discuss this situation with the secretariat. It would obviously have been difficult to prevent India from being added to the Advisory Committee.

There was, however, the attitude of Pakistan to be considered, since Pakistan was prepared to contribute substantially to the force. We consulted the Pakistanis and they agreed, with some reluctance, to serve on the advisory committee with India and the other four powers. This was the situation on the evening of November 5 but for various reasons the Assembly did not meet that night.

5. By the next morning the Indians were voicing objections because there were two Baghdad Pact powers represented on the Advisory Committee, two NATO and two Latins (Brazil had been added for balance). India was the only "uncommitted" country and the Indians argued that there should be at least another; they suggested either Burma or Indonesia. Menon said that the Egyptians would not accept both Iran and Pakistan because of their connection in the Baghdad Pact. Accordingly Entezam was persuaded to withdraw Iran in favour of Burma. Once again the matter seemed settled. However, the Indians argued later that Burma was unacceptable to Egypt because of Burma's close relations with Israel. (The Indians were also toying with the idea of adding Yugoslavia but we succeeded in heading this off). After lengthy discussions the Minister told Menon that we would accept whichever "uncommitted" country was acceptable to Egypt, and they apparently settled for Ceylon which greatly pleased Gunewardene, who had been canvassing independently for a position on the Advisory Committee.

6. By that time Poland proposed Czechoslovakia as an addition to the Advisory Committee. Having ascertained that the Afro-Asians were not particularly disposed to include Czechoslovakia, we organized a vote against the Polish amendment. We were successful in blocking it and all that remained was for Entezam to bow out gracefully in favour of Gunewardene.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS: EMERGENCY FORCE

Once the UN command was established it was essential for the Secretary General and his staff to pursue quickly their studies with a view to evolving a plan for the establishment of the force. This took place on November 5. The result was that early on November 6 a second and final report (our telegram 1119 November 6†) was ready for distribution.¹⁴⁹

2. The text of the report together with an aide mémoire [UN Doc A/3310] was sent to the Governments concerned. By noon (New York time) we had received from the UK delegation the text of the announcement which Eden was to make in the House at one o'clock.¹⁵⁰ The way was being cleared for the force to begin its operation in the area. A great deal depended, however, on whether the force could be effectively organized in time. Accordingly there were good reasons for pressing ahead vigorously.

3. As reported in our telegram 1155 November 8 one of the urgent problems on November 6 was to reach agreement on the composition of the Secretary General's Advisory Committee (para 6 of resolution A/3308). We have already explained in detail how and why the present composition of the Advisory Committee was decided.

4. Concurrently with our efforts to obtain support in the Assembly for the plan to establish an emergency force, the Afro-Asians were maintaining their pressure for resolutions calling upon the parties to cease fire and withdraw their forces. One such resolution had been the Nineteen-Power Resolution (Z/3275) which was passed by the Assembly at its meeting on November 4-5. On November 5 the Afro-Asians had circulated another resolution of this kind but, because the Assembly did not meet, this text, which we found unacceptable, was not pressed in the Assembly. On November 6, however, the Afro-Asians decided to press a new text which ultimately emerged in the Assembly record as Document A/3309. The fact that these two courses of action were being pursued in the Assembly complicated the consultations on voting but, at the same time the constructive effort to establish a UN force had a moderating influence on the pressure tactics which were being employed by the Afro-Asians.

5. The verbatim record of the Assembly meeting on November 7 (A/PV.566-7) was sent to you in last night's bag. In addition you have already received our telegram 1128 November 6 which contained the draft [seven power] resolution on the emergency force and 1138-1139¹⁵¹ November 7 which explained the situation which led to the Canadian vote on the Afro-Asian resolution. We also sent to you by our telegram 1143 November 8 the text of the seven power resolution as adopted by the Assembly on November 7 (this was document A/3308 as amended in the course of the debate).¹⁵²

6. We hope that with the aid of the verbatim record and these telegrams you can put together a complete picture of the developments in the Assembly on November 7. Of particular importance were the statements of the UK and France concerning their attitude toward the cease fire and withdrawal of forces; also the statements later by Menon, Lodge and several others concerning the interpretation of the word "immediately" in the Afro-Asian draft resolution. The effect of these interpretations was to create in the Assembly a general understanding that the withdrawal of UK, French and Israeli forces would be phased with the arrival and functioning of the emergency UN force. Largely as a result of the compromise reached on the interpretation of the word "immediately", it was possible to have a large vote in favour of both the resolution on the UN force and the Afro-Asian resolution calling for the withdrawal of forces.

7. The attempt by Poland to have Czechoslovakia added to the Advisory Committee was not a serious threat but it could have divided the support for the seven power resolution on the UN force. In other circumstances it might have been possible to accept an Eastern European on the Advisory Committee, particularly since two Eastern European countries (Czechoslovakia and Romania) had offered to send forces. However, there was a widely shared opinion that the inclusion of a Soviet satellite element, either in the force or in the Advisory Committee, would add greatly to the complication of establishing the force quickly and of having it accepted by the four governments most directly concerned. Accordingly, after a rapid canvass of Afro-Asian views, the Canadian delegation worked to defeat the earlier amendment. We had ascertained that the defeat of the amendment would in no way jeopardize the support for the resolution on the UN force. The Polish amendment was rejected by a vote of 23 in favour, 31 against with 14 abstentions.

8. The amendments we mentioned in our telegram 1143 November 8 were adopted by large majorities and the replacement of Iran by Ceylon was adopted without objection. The resolution on the force was adopted by a vote of 64 in favour, none against with 12 abstentions (Soviet Bloc, Egypt, Israel, South Africa). The South Africans were without instructions.

9. The Nineteen Power Resolution (A/3309) was then adopted by a vote of 65 to 1 (Israel) with 10 abstentions (Benelux, Portugal, Laos, France and four old Commonwealth).

10. The Soviet delegation said very little during the debate on these two resolutions. Kiznetsov spoke after the vote. He continued the Soviet propaganda campaign against the UK and France for their "aggression" in Egypt. He also did his best to throw doubt on the assembly decisions calling for the establishment of an emergency force. He stressed, for example, that the UN had accepted "the Anglo-French demand" that their armed forces should remain in Egypt "until the international armed force is created and stationed there". It was the apparent intention he said, "to use international armed forces not at all for repelling aggression against Egypt ... (but to introduce) international armed forces into Egyptian territory and transfer to their control a considerable part of Egyptian territory, including the Suez Canal Zone ... (which he alleged) was one of the purposes of the aggressive acts committed by the UK and France against Egypt". He said also that "the victim of aggression in this case was compelled to give its consent to the introduction of international armed forces, hoping that this would ward off a further extension of aggression". For all these reasons the Soviet delegation had abstained on the resolution establishing the UN force.

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION IN EGYPT

The Egyptian Red Crescent has appealed for aid through the International Committee of the Red Cross and we understand the Canadian Red Cross is responding. Norman reports from Beirut that Israel is making practical arrangements (presumably for relief) in the Gaza area and that UNRWA functions there have not been appreciably hampered. Until the need for additional action emerges we are inclined to think that the humanitarian task of emergency relief may now after a brief period of confusion be considered under control in Gaza.

2. We have given preliminary departmental thought to the problems of emergency relief under UN auspices. Because of the possible political implications we regard a cautious approach as advisable. The lines of our present thinking follow.

3. Provided that Israel withdraws within its previous borders, we would not expect any increase in UNRWA's direct responsibilities in the Gaza area. Even if Israel remains in temporary occupation it would not appear that the local populace would meet the definition of eligibility for relief which UNRWA has used for some years. In either of these cases, however, there might be a continuing emergency relief problem among the local populace because of the disruption of supply channels and there might be cause for supplementing Israeli and Red Cross action. In that event we think it would be reasonable to request UNRWA to conduct the supplementary emergency relief distributions in the area. The cost of such distributions should not, however, be a charge on the normal agency budget.

4. Only if Israel plans to annex Gaza does it appear to us that the refugee problem will be increased. However, even if the entire local populace were to move out and acquire refugee status, the maximum increase on the UNRWA rolls would be 100,000. There would, of course, also be the problem of the removal of the 216,000 refugees already in Gaza and the existing UNRWA installations to points outside Israel. We do not consider this possibility to be one requiring urgent consideration.

5. Any emergency relief measures by the UN in the Port Said area and in other areas subjected to bombardment should in our opinion be separated from any rehabilitation programme. We consider that the provision of food, medical supplies and tentage could probably be conducted under UN auspices without prejudice to the political situation. We do not think that UNRWA should become directly involved in areas where it is not now operating, although an emergency relief administration could doubtless arrange to use the agency's procurement facilities and draw on existing stocks.

6. Should there be a need for emergency relief action beyond what may have been taken by the Red Cross and Red Crescent, we are inclined to think an administrator for a special emergency fund should be appointed. We would not favour distribution through either the Egyptian Government or the Franco-British force commander. We doubt also that the UN force would provide a satisfactory channel.

7. In our view, rehabilitation will require a particularly cautious approach. The problem seems to be to organize some UN reconstruction arrangements which would anticipate any unilateral Soviet move without involving the possibility of a condemnation of Britain and France. We have no information on the extent of the destruction caused by the military action and this makes the formulation of a plan difficult. However, we think there may be a case for proceeding to promote an initiative in the UN which would make it clear that appropriate reconstruction assistance to the Egyptian populace is intended. Measures of this kind directed towards repairing battle-damage ought, in our view, to be considered separately from any long-term economic development plan for Egypt or the Middle East in general. This last matter is the subject of a separate telegram.

8. If you discuss these observations with other interested delegations, you should make it plain that our attitude may undergo changes when there is more information available.

POLITICAL SETTLEMENT AND REHABILITATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST:
PROPOSAL FOR U.N. AND NATO DISCUSSION

Following for Minister. Begins: We have not as yet been able to give full consideration to the part Canada might play in connection with the relief measures for Egypt although some action is already being taken through the Red Cross. We recognize however the urgency of such consideration especially in view of possible Soviet offers and are sending you a separate telegram on this subject.

2. With regard to your suggestion that some early comment on relief measures as a help in promoting cooperation from Egyptian authorities, we feel that a distinction should be drawn between such emergency relief as must be made available on humanitarian grounds and efforts to rehabilitate and develop the Egyptian and Middle Eastern economies.

3. Our preliminary thinking is that the longer term measures to rehabilitate the Egyptian economy should be considered and undertaken in the light of a general political settlement in the Middle East and in the context of broader Middle East economic development. Such a settlement would have as its basic premise the acceptance by the Arab States of the continuing existence of Israel and form the foundation of stable relations and the hope of future cooperation between them. It would also involve efforts to restore in some measure Afro-Asian trust in the British and French governments policies in the Middle East. Any economic support (probably through the U.N.) apart from emergency relief could be a strong factor in bringing about a settlement. We are therefore inclined to feel that we should proceed cautiously on the economic rehabilitation front until a political settlement is in sight. We recognize however that Soviet offers may place this bargaining factor in jeopardy and oblige quicker action by Western Powers on the problems of economic rehabilitation.

4. Recalling the frustrating history of economic development plans for the Middle East since the creation of Israel, and how these plans have all been held up pending a political settlement, we wonder whether the whole future policy of the Western Powers towards the Middle East — political and economic — should not be considered with some urgency, beginning in New York and extending to the NATO Council as soon as there seems to be some prospect of agreement among the principal powers concerned.

5. The object of such informal consultations would, therefore, be threefold:

(a) To prepare the way for subsequent formal action which might have to be taken in the U.N. or elsewhere.

(b) To restore the rather badly shaken habits of consultation in NATO.

(c) To enable NATO discussion of the Middle East and Suez problems to take place in a more positive atmosphere focussed on necessary action for the future rather than on recriminations for what has happened in the past.

6. Our own feeling is that every effort should be made to induce the French and British governments, not as penitence but as evidence of good will, to participate in the rehabilitation of the Middle East. The U.S.A. would naturally be expected to take the lead at the U.N. We are not of course under any illusion as to the difficulties of persuading the French and U.K. NATO discussion of this whole problem would, however, serve to create a better atmosphere for initiating U.N. proposals and provide support of individual NATO countries for the line to be adopted.

7. If you feel that these suggestions should be followed up, we wonder whether you might consider our seeking the reactions of the U.S.A. first and the U.K. and France afterwards. Ends.

TOP SECRET

New York, November 12, 1956

MIDDLE EAST — UNITED NATIONS FORCE

On my arrival at the Drake Hotel in New York last evening I met the Egyptian Ambassador to the U.N., at his request, and had a half-hour talk with him. Mr. Holmes will be reporting on this separately. (Report attached).

Later, at 8.30, I went to Mr. Hammarskjöld's flat, at his request, where I found the Foreign Ministers of Sweden, Norway, Finland and Denmark, as well as their Ambassadors to the United Nations.

Mr. Hammarskjöld outlined to us the difficulties that had been encountered in regard to the composition of the United Nations force and the conditions under which it would be operating in Egypt. The Egyptian Government who a few days ago had been very co-operative, were now becoming very difficult both in regard to the composition of the force and the relation of its operations to Egyptian sovereignty.

So far as composition is concerned, the Egyptians were now attempting to exercise a veto and to disbar from the force contingents from any country that had a collective security arrangement with the British or the French. In addition, they had a special reason for excluding Canadians, which I explained to the Scandinavian representatives. If this Egyptian position were accepted, the Norwegians and Danes would have to be excluded from the Scandinavian force, as well as Pakistanis, Iranians, Canadians and, indeed, any members of NATO, SEATO, or the Baghdad Pact. The Egyptians at the present time would only accept from those who had offered contingents Colombians, Swedes, Finns and Yugoslavs. There seems to be some doubt about their attitude toward India, though it is hard to believe that they would not welcome them.

The Scandinavians reacted very violently to the exclusion of two of their members, just as I reacted equally violently to the exclusion of Canadians. Hammarskjöld said that he understood our position and was adopting a firm line with Cairo. He read us a telegram which he had sent to Nasser refusing in strong terms to accept the Egyptian contention. He thought that the weakest point of the Egyptian case was in respect of Norway and Denmark and he proposed, therefore, to "go to the mat" with the Egyptians on this point as the best way of forcing them to reverse their position on the others as well. He was quite determined not to give way to the Egyptians and felt that in the circumstances his best course of action was to fly to Cairo himself and see Nasser and Fawzi. This he proposed to do on Tuesday [13 November].

So far as the sovereignty aspect of the problem is concerned, the Egyptians are making difficulty here also, though this is not considered to be very serious.

We discussed at some length what the reasons might be for the changed Egyptian attitude toward the force. It seems obvious that the Russians have been encouraging them to take a strong stand, and equally obvious that the Russians are doing this for their own selfish purposes. They undoubtedly want the conflict to be continued and not settled by a U.N. intervention.

It is undoubtedly true however that the Egyptians would be suspicious of the U.N. force, even if the Russians were not there to fan their suspicions. They may think that with a U.N. force of varied composition strung along the Suez Canal, their control of that canal will be more difficult to resume. They may also think that with world opinion opposed to British and French policy and with promises of help from Russia, they can, through the United Nations, press the British and French for immediate withdrawal irrespective of the entry of a U.N. force, and if they do not get this that they may be able to drive the British and French out by force, with Russian help. It may be that Nasser and the more extreme people around him are willing to gamble with peace in this sense.

Mr. Hammarskjöld said that notwithstanding the Egyptian attitude they were pressing ahead with arrangements for getting the U.N. force into the area, but would send Colombians and Swedes and Finns in the first group. The others could, he thought, without too much difficulty, remain at the base in Naples until the situation cleared. He advised that we should send our own advance guard of Canadians immediately to Naples irrespective of the developments referred to above.

This morning I telephoned the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of the Cabinet (Mr. Bryce), and Mr. Heeney, outlining the conversations I had last night, and emphasizing the necessity for keeping the whole matter completely secret at this stage. It would be very unfortunate if it leaked out as long as there is the hope and expectation of clearing matters up, as public reaction in Canada to the present Egyptian position regarding Canadian participation would be one of consternation and anger.

I also advised that notwithstanding Mr. Hammarskjöld's advice above, we should not pass the Order-in-Council at this time permitting troops to go forward. This would be an irrevocable step in so far as summoning Parliament is concerned, and could be postponed for a few days without any serious delay in preparing for Canadian participation. I suggested to Mr. Campney that arrangements might proceed as planned, but that the advance guard could be held back for a day or two, and that the Order-in-Council need not be passed until, say, Wednesday. Both the Prime Minister and Mr. Campney agreed with this position. If there are press enquiries as to why the Order-in-Council has not been passed, it was agreed that we should say merely that there had been some delay in clearing things with Cairo and that General Burns would not now be reaching New York until Wednesday [14 November] morning. We wished to have his report, therefore, before passing the Order-in-Council.

Before the opening of the Assembly this afternoon Mr. Hammarskjöld showed me the following communication which he had just sent to Fawzi Bey in Cairo on the composition of the U.N. Force:

"I thank you for your message of today, transmitted both in the course of your most welcome telephone call and through General Burns. I note that we are now agreed to start the operation and will send you separately details concerning the beginning of the air-lift.

"I share your trust that we all work for the same purpose of speedily ending the present crisis. I welcome the spirit of cooperation in which you on that basis have accepted Danish and Norwegian participation while suggesting a few additions which I for my part find that I should accept. On the other hand I note that you have left the question of Canadian participation open. I maintain my very firm views on the necessity of Canadian participation, but, as I declared over the telephone, I have to accept to discuss the position of Canada further with you when we meet in Cairo.

"Agreement thus exists on starting the operation on the basis of the participation of the following countries: Colombia, Denmark, Finland, Norway, Sweden, India, Indonesia and Yugoslavia. The question of additions to this list will be discussed when we meet."

He told me that he was gratified at the fact that the Danish and Norwegian difficulties were cleared up and he thought he could deal with the Canadian aspect of it when he reached Cairo. Subsequently, Mr. Heeney phoned me to give me an account of his discussions of this matter with the State Department, and I told him that I did not think that he need pursue the matter further at this time.

Mr. Campney then phoned to say that he was proposing to issue a press release about the immediate despatch of the airborne advance force and the movement to Halifax of The Queen's Own. He wondered whether the press release which he read me would be satisfactory. I told him that before anything were issued, I should check with the Secretary-General to make sure that an announcement of this kind would fit in with his own plans. I therefore went to see the Secretary General, who had left the podium. He was with Selwyn Lloyd, and while I was waiting, Mir Khan, the Pakistani delegate also arrived to see him in a state of white hot indignation at the news that the Indians were acceptable to the Egyptians as part of the United Nations force, while the Pakistanis were not. Mir Khan expressed himself in violent terms at this attitude and said that not only should the Pakistanis be welcomed, but that they should be at the Suez before the Indians as they had been the first to volunteer.

I then saw Mr. Hammarskjöld who gave me an account of recent developments with Egypt. There is another difficulty, namely, the insistence of the Egyptians that the U.N. force should leave Egypt whenever, in the opinion of the Egyptians, their work has been accomplished. Hammarskjöld, however, does not seem to take this too seriously as he has told the Egyptians that it is quite inadmissible. He will take a strong stand about the Canadian force and is reasonably optimistic. He was quite satisfied with the proposed statement from Mr. Campney. Indeed he said that our Minister could go further and say, if he so desired, that the Canadian plans as outlined were in accordance with and had the support of the Secretary General. This should help to meet any criticism in Canada that we are being too slow.

I then phoned Mr. Campney and gave him the green light on his statement, with Mr. Hammarskjöld's addition.

I saw three Canadian journalists who are attending the Assembly. They have no knowledge apparently of any real difficulty about Canadian participation, but I do not think we can keep the lid on this much longer.

SITUATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST: CONVERSATION WITH THE EGYPTIAN REPRESENTATIVE

The Egyptian Representative to the United Nations, Dr. Loutfi, called on Mr. Pearson at his own request at 7.30 p.m., Sunday, November 11. Dr. Loutfi said he had a somewhat delicate matter to raise. He had been talking on the telephone with Dr. Fawzi who had asked him to talk very confidentially with Mr. Pearson. He said that his Government had accepted the idea of the international force and they were very appreciative of the role which had been played by Mr. Pearson and by Canada in the present crisis. They were very anxious to have General Burns, a Canadian, in charge of the international force. There was a problem, however, about Canadian troops. He himself and Dr. Fawzi understood Canada's position very well but it would be difficult to explain. Canada was politically associated with the United Kingdom, and it was, for instance, a fact that the Canadian forces were technically, at least, under the command of the Queen of England. The Egyptians would want a neutral force. He mentioned later that they would not want Pakistanis because of the differences between Egypt and Pakistan. It was clear that Dr. Loutfi, who is a very polite man, was acutely embarrassed, and he did not at any time specifically say that they would not accept Canadians. He did not say whether he was reporting the views of his Government. He merely repeated several times that it was a matter over which Dr. Fawzi was concerned and which he had asked him to discuss with Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Pearson said that what Dr. Loutfi had said had put him in a very difficult — indeed an impossible position and he would find it very hard to report to his Prime Minister. Canada had taken an entirely independent and objective position on this matter in the United Nations. Because of our close and friendly association with the British, this was not an easy thing to do and it had been criticized by some Canadians. Having taken this independent position, it would be very hard for Canadians to be told that their troops were not considered independent. Canada had played a leading role in proposing the establishment of an international force. Canadians had taken up this idea with enthusiasm. Arrangements were already under way and an advance party would be leaving Canada within 48 hours. Having taken the lead, Canadians would want to play their part. Mr. Pearson recognized that there was a problem about Canadian uniforms and perhaps some risk that Canadians would be mistaken for English soldiers. However, arrangements were under way to provide all forces with United Nations badges and special white helmets. We had even been careful to exclude from the force any Canadians with noticeably English accents in order to avoid misunderstanding. Furthermore, Canadians were likely to be stationed near the Israeli frontier. They were not likely to be in Cairo or the larger cities and would have little contact with the Egyptian population. Surely it was on the Israeli borders that the Egyptians would like to have the force in order to prevent border incidents.

Dr. Loutfi did not make clear whether or not the principal problem was the danger of incidents arising from confusion between Canadian and British troops. At one point he indicated that that was what was troubling Dr. Fawzi, but at other times he seemed to imply that the objection to Canadians was for more general political reasons. He did not seem to think that the efforts to clarify the identity of the United Nations forces would have much effect. The Egyptian people were for the most part not well educated. They did not understand English and would not detect these differences. He was most emphatic that he would like to have General Burns and indicated that Canada should be satisfied if it held the top position.

Mr. Pearson emphasized again the extremely difficult position this would put Canada in and urged Dr. Loutfi to explain this situation to Dr. Fawzi. He was sure that Canada would not at all understand a situation in which the force was commanded by a Canadian but Canadian troops were not to participate. In fact it would not be possible, he thought, for General Burns to command the force if this were the case. It was most important that plans for the force be carried out urgently so that, in accordance with Egyptian wishes, the British and French would withdraw as soon as possible.

Dr. Loutfi seemed to recognize the urgency and made quite clear that they did not want to have to bring in the Soviet forces. He agreed to report what Mr. Pearson had said to Dr. Fawzi. He mentioned that Mr. Hammarskjöld would go to Cairo on Tuesday and that in Cairo he would better grasp the temper of the Egyptians. Mr. Pearson expressed the hope that Mr. Hammarskjöld would be able to explain the Canadian position to the Egyptian Government. Dr. Loutfi did not abandon his position in any respect but he did agree to report Mr. Pearson's views.

[Washington], November 12, 1956

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS: U.N. EMERGENCY FORCE

The Minister called me before 10 o'clock this morning to describe to me the attitude of the Government of Egypt regarding the introduction of the U.N. force, with particular reference to the Canadian element. Press reports indicated that Egyptian authorities were raising difficulties but so far the most serious feature — insistence on a veto on the force's composition — had not become known; in particular there had been no public reference to the Egyptian attitude toward a Canadian contingent. It was essential that this secrecy be maintained.

2. The fact was, however, Mr. Pearson went on, that the Egyptian Foreign Minister had made a personal appeal to have the Canadians kept out of the U.N. force. The Egyptian Permanent Representative to the United Nations had called on the Minister for this purpose. Loufti had drawn attention to Canada's close relationship with the United Kingdom, her membership in NATO, and the similarity in uniform between Canadian and British troops.

3. Mr. Pearson's reaction to this approach had been very strong. The Canadian Government could not give one inch; in view of our stand in the U.N. emergency session and the independence of our policy he had told Loufti the Egyptian suggestion was "outrageous". The argument concerning uniforms was nonsense, since all U.N. troops wear distinctive head gear and arm bands. Under no circumstances would we accept the Egyptian request.

4. The Minister said that the Egyptian Government were also objecting to Danish and Norwegian troops forming part of the U.N. force, on the ground that their countries formed part of NATO. Mr. Pearson had been meeting with the Secretary-General, and Mr. Hammarskjöld was determined to stand his ground and force the issue with Egyptian authorities on the Scandinavian contingent. Confidentially, Hammarskjöld might fly to Cairo tomorrow for this purpose. He had already been in touch with the White House to urge vigorous U.S. support.

5. Mr. Pearson said that he hoped that the United States would "go to bat for us". The Canadian reaction to Egyptian refusal to accept Canadian troops as part of a U.N. force would be violent and damaging to a very serious degree. Support for the United Nations by the Government and people of Canada, in such circumstances, would be gravely weakened.

6. For the present, Mr. Pearson said, we were making no change in our plans. The timetable for completing organization and despatch of the Canadian Contingent to the Italian staging base still stood (External Affairs telegram to U.N. Delegation DLD 477 of November 10† — advance party November 12; R.C.A.F. airlift November 19 to 26; balance of Contingent by R.C.N. carrier November 28). However, Mr. Pearson had spoken to Bryce and the Order-in-Council authorizing Canadian participation was being held up.

7. The Minister instructed me to take this matter up with the Acting Secretary of State as soon as possible. (Hoover and Phleger were tied up all morning with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, but I arranged to see Elbrick as a first move).

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS: U.N. EMERGENCY FORCE

The Acting Secretary, still being unavailable, I called on Elbrick at 11.45 a.m. and put to him the position as indicated to me by the Minister.

2. It was our conviction, I said to Elbrick, that the consequences of the U.N. yielding to the Egyptian Government's attempt to exercise a veto over the composition of the emergency force would be very grave. In the first place it would seriously affect the authority of the United Nations and its capacity to stabilize the position in the Middle East. In the second place, if the Canadian contribution were to be refused this would be a repudiation of the Canadian Government's initiative within the U.N., and its effect in Canada would be disastrous. Finally, as Elbrick knew, the Canadian Contingent was to provide the backbone of the force; its elimination would seriously jeopardize the force's effectiveness, and I thought it very doubtful that in such circumstances Burns would be willing to accept command.

3. For these reasons we were seeking the U.S. Government's strong support for the Secretary-General in his stand in further discussions with the Government of Egypt. (Elbrick knew that Hammarskjöld was proceeding to Cairo tomorrow). We also sought, in particular, United States support for participation of the Canadian Contingent.

4. Although Elbrick was not fully informed on the present position concerning the U.N. force, he was aware that difficulties had arisen in Cairo. His attitude was entirely sympathetic on both points which I had made and he undertook to communicate our anxiety and our requests to the Acting Secretary (who was still occupied with the Foreign Relations Committee) just as soon as possible. He is also to arrange for me to meet Hoover as soon as there is an opportunity.

5. I reported my conversation with Elbrick to the Minister, by telephone, at 12.30. He expressed satisfaction with what had been done and I was to be in touch with him later in the day. Incidentally, he confirmed that Burns would not accept command, if the Canadian Contingent were not included. Mr. Pearson had no knowledge of the press report that came out at 11.29 this morning that Egypt had accepted the U.N. emergency force.

Note de l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis
Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

[Washington], November 12, 1956

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS: U.N. EMERGENCY FORCE

Elbrick telephoned me at about 4.15 p.m. to say that he had just seen the Acting Secretary. Hoover had been tied up until then with the Congressional Committee. Elbrick had communicated to him what I had said to Elbrick in the State Department this morning. (See my two earlier memoranda of this date).

2. Elbrick said that he had been asked by Hoover to tell me, at once, that the U.S. Ambassador to Egypt had already made representations to the Egyptian Government in the sense we desired. These had been both on the general principle i.e., the U.N.'s authority for constitution of the Emergency Force, and on its particular application, i.e., in respect of a Canadian Contingent. These representations had been made on instructions from Washington either this morning or yesterday.

3. Elbrick added that the U.N. Secretary-General had not been in touch with the President today, although he had yesterday. It was not intended that a further message be sent to the Egyptian Government today by U.S. authorities.

4. Finally, Elbrick said that the Acting Secretary fully understood the Minister's anxieties and shared his views. For the United States the general question took priority, but the special Canadian position was fully understood and sympathized with. Elbrick said that he would keep me informed.

5. I reached the Minister by telephone in New York at 5 o'clock and reported the above exchange to him. Mr. Pearson did not wish us to do anything further at this end, for the moment. He appreciated the action which the U.S. Government have taken.

6. Mr. Pearson went on to tell me that the Secretary-General had now heard from Nasser that the Egyptian Government would accept the two Scandinavian Contingents, but not the Canadian. This, of course, was quite unsatisfactory to us and Mr. Hammarskjöld would insist upon the inclusion of the Canadian Contingent when he saw Nasser in Cairo. (He is flying there tomorrow).

7. The Minister was speaking from the Secretary-General's anteroom. He was about to tell Hammarskjöld that it had now become necessary for him to inform the press that the main body of Canadian troops were entraining at Calgary for Halifax, for embarkation.

8. Mr. Pearson was seeing Canadian correspondents later this evening. As yet they did not know but presumably were beginning to suspect what had transpired with regard to Canadian troops.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], November 12, 1956

COMMAND INSTRUCTIONS

General

1. As a result of the recent hostilities in the areas of Suez and Sinai, the United Nations has authorized the formation of the United Nations Emergency Force to secure and supervise the cease fire which has occurred. The Canadian United Nations Emergency Force is the Canadian Army element of this Force.

Appointment

2. You have been appointed Commander, Canadian United Nations Emergency Force and Senior Canadian Army Officer, Middle East.

Composition

3. The composition of your command will be:

1st Battalion, The Queen's Own Rifles of Canada; Canadian Base Unit, Middle East.

Such other units as may, from time to time, be placed under your command.

Role

4. The role of the Force under your command will be to undertake such duties in connection with the cease fire as may be ordered by the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force (Major-General ELM Burns, DSO, OBE, MC, CD).

Status

5. The Canadian United Nations Emergency Force will form part of and be under the operational command of the United Nations Emergency Force, but will remain under the administrative control of Army Headquarters.

6. The principle of the separate entity of the Canadian Force will be maintained at all times. In this connection, while the grouping of the Force is a matter for the operational commander to decide, it is anticipated that, in the normal course of operations, your tasks will be so allotted that the Canadian entity of your Force will be readily preserved. At the same time, you will cooperate with and assist as much as possible the forces of the other nations forming the United Nations Emergency Force.

7. If, at any time other than when required temporarily by urgent operational necessity, it appears that the principle of maintaining the separate entity of the Canadian Force is likely to be violated, you will represent your views to your immediate superior officer in the United Nations Emergency Force and to the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force and immediately report the matter to the Chief of the General Staff.

8. The legal relationship between the Canadian Forces and the other forces of the United Nations Emergency Force has not yet been established and it will be necessary for you to work out a suitable relationship. However, your Force and its members will be subject only to Canadian military law, and all offences alleged to have been committed by them, whether military or civil, will be dealt with by Canadian military courts. Should a member of your force be arrested by the civil authorities or charged before a civil court, you will immediately take steps to arrange, if possible, for his release or for the withdrawal of the charge. Should you not be able to accomplish this, you will at once report the matter to the senior United Nations representative in the area, with a request that he take such steps as are possible to effect the release of the man concerned, or to have the charge withdrawn. You will at the same time report the matter with full particulars by message to Army Headquarters.

Command, Discipline and Administration

9. You will be responsible for the discipline and administration of all Canadian Army troops in the United Nations Emergency Force.

10. Pursuant to QR(Army) 1.13, the Minister of National Defence has designated you as an officer to have and to exercise the powers and jurisdiction granted by QR(Army) to an Officer Commanding a Command.

11. Administration of the Force will be in accordance with existing instructions and such other instructions as may be communicated to you from time to time.

12. The Canadian Base Unit, Middle East has been formed to assist you in the administration of the Force under your command. This unit will, under your direction, be responsible for all administration of the force except the internal administration of the 1st Battalion, The Queen's Own Rifles of Canada and such other tasks as you may require. Separate Command Instructions† are being issued to the Commanding Officer, Canadian Base Unit, Middle East setting forth his responsibilities to you.

13. In the event of your temporary absence, your duties as operational commander of the Canadian United Nations Emergency Force will devolve on the Acting Commanding Officer, 1st Battalion, The Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, and your duties as Senior Canadian Army Officer, Middle East will become the responsibility of the Commanding Officer Canadian Base Unit, Middle East.

14. Various other matters, including the rendering of reports and war diaries, and the procedure with respect to honours and awards, will be dealt with in separate instructions.†

Liaison with HQ International Emergency United Nations Force

15. When required, and as you so direct, the Commanding Officer, Canadian Base Unit, Middle East, will represent your views to the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force on any matter.

Action in the Event of an Emergency

16. If an order given by the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force, or by any subordinate commander under whose command you have been placed, appears, in your opinion, not to accord to the role of the United Nations Emergency Force, you will request direction from the Chief of the General Staff before the order is executed, and will represent the case to the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force. You will, however, inform the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force, through any commander subordinate to him under whose command you have been placed, that you have requested direction from your own authorities and state the reasons why you have done so.

17. If, due to the resumption of hostilities in the area in which your force is stationed, or any other circumstance it appears to you that the safety of the Force under your command is imperilled to a degree exceptional in view of your task and military capabilities, you will, after taking any measure necessary for the defence of the force, still endeavour to carry out your task. At the same time, you will report the matter by OPERATIONAL IMMEDIATE message to the Chief of the General Staff and obtain his direction. In the event that you arrive at this opinion as a result of any action or order by the United Nations Emergency Force, you will represent the matter to the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force and inform him, and any of his subordinate commanders who may be involved, of the action you will take and the reasons for taking it.

Channels of Communication

18. No limitation is placed on your direct channel of communication on any matter with the Chief of the General Staff.

19. Channels of communication will be:

(a) Routine administrative correspondence with Army Headquarters will be sent direct to the Canadian Base Unit, Middle East.

(b) Correspondence other than the above will be sent to the Canadian United Nations Emergency Force.

Effective Date

20. These Command Instructions become effective the date you arrive at the staging base in Italy.

MIDDLE EAST UN FORCE

I have just had a talk with the Secretary General regarding his proposed trip to Cairo. I wished to emphasize to him how essential it was that he should remain firm in the light of the Egyptian attempt to impose conditions on the admission of the UN force. My strong feelings in this matter, which are shared by all the delegates in the Assembly with whom I have talked and who have read the newspaper reports from Cairo, are concerned primarily with the effect on the UN as a whole if the Egyptians are permitted to exercise control in this way over the UN force, though, of course, our own particular difficulties in regard to the composition of the force are in important additional consideration.

2. Hammarskjöld gave me some info which indicates that the difficulties are greater than they were yesterday. He told Cairo yesterday that he could not admit the validity of the Egyptian contention, particularly in regard to their assertion of the right to demand withdrawal of UN forces from Egypt when they, the Egyptians, think their task is completed. Hammarskjöld insists that Cairo has accepted the right of UN forces to remain in Egypt as long as their tasks remain uncompleted, and if there should later be any difference of opinion between Egypt and the Secretary General on this score of timing the matter should be referred to the Assembly. The Egyptians have even gone so far as to say that their agreement, already announced, to receive the force, even with conditions, is now inoperative until all misunderstandings are removed. Hammarskjöld has reacted strongly against this and he will not go to Cairo if the Egyptians persist in this stand as he refuses to be put in the position of begging for concessions. I told him I thought he was quite right in this. He may hear from Cairo in the next hour or so, but if not, a way has opened up which will permit a longer time to get the question settled before Hammarskjöld has to decide whether to go or not. The Hungarian Government has asked him, or his representative, to go to Budapest at once to discuss humanitarian questions. Unless, therefore, he hears from the Egyptians within the next two hours he will fly to Europe as scheduled, but go first to Budapest, and then only to Cairo if later developments make that possible. The situation is, therefore, both confused and dangerous.

3. I asked Hammarskjöld his opinion of the effect of these developments on plans for organizing the Canadian and other contributions. He hoped very much that we would go right ahead with our plans as he is still optimistic that when Cairo is confronted with the consequences of the position which they are now taking they will give way; those consequences include his decision which, at my suggestion, he will now communicate to them, to submit the whole matter at once to the UN, if they do not back down. If in spite of this they persist in their course, then presumably Hammarskjöld will return at once from Budapest and submit all the evidence to the General Assembly, which will then be asked to take the necessary decisions.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; CANADIAN COMPONENT OF UNITED NATIONS FORCE; HUNGARY
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 7)

3. The Prime Minister said the Egyptians were still raising difficulties about the role of the U.N. force and when it should arrive. The Secretary-General might have to take a firm line with Nasser and inform him that elements of the force would soon be reaching the troubled area. In the meantime, it was still not possible to submit an order authorizing the despatch of troops or to decide to summon Parliament. The situation might be clarified sufficiently in a few days to enable these steps to be taken.

4. Mr. St-Laurent also reported that he had discussed the Hungarian situation with the Russian Ambassador and had told him that Canadians had been horrified by the recent events in Hungary. He had given the Ambassador a message for the Chairman of the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers asking the Soviet government to comply with the U.N. resolutions on the subject, and also requesting Mr. Bulganin to use his influence to alleviate suffering and to allow international organizations to help in relief work in Hungary.

5. The Minister of National Defence explained that before an order in council could be passed authorizing a contribution to the emergency force two things were necessary. The first was the consent of Egypt to receive the force and agreement on the terms under which it would be stationed in that country. The second was General Burns' concurrence with the nature of Canada's contribution. There would be no difficulty over the second of these points and the U.N. Secretary-General was doing all he could to deal with the first.

The Magnificent was in Halifax and would be ready to load the troops on Sunday and leave that night. Meanwhile, the main elements of the battalion group were arriving in Halifax and would be housed in the naval barracks there until ordered to leave. In a general way the proposed contribution could be said to be appropriate for the purposes of the force. If Egypt insisted that Canadian infantry should not be included, it might be possible to furnish a base unit for the whole force of about the size of the battalion group, but this would be difficult and complicated and would bring no credit to Canada.

6. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The Egyptians had taken the view, tentatively, that the force could not include troops from any country allied to the U.K. Probably they had been encouraged to do this by the Russians who were afraid that the U.N. might become an effective instrument for peace which was not what they wanted. However, Asian countries were coming to know that Russia was using Egypt for its own ends and resented these tactics. It might be that resentment in Asia would reach such a pitch that the Russians would feel compelled to restrain their efforts in this respect.

(b) Sending an advance party to Naples might be criticized on the grounds that no formal authority for this existed and that Parliament had not been informed. On the other hand, preparations for the arrival of the main body of Canadian troops had to be made, and the 30 members of the advance groups had been despatched to do everything possible to ensure that the main body could be properly established and perform its duties efficiently.

(c) It would be important to provide good mail service and to distribute Canadian newspapers to the troops engaged in this new and difficult task.

(d) The letter to Mr. Bulganin had been drafted with the thought in mind that it might be made public at some stage. If this happened, it might be said to be inconsistent to withhold the messages sent to Sir Anthony Eden on Middle East questions. There was a good deal of interest in these and many people expected them to be published at some stage.

(e) Egypt was reported to have asked for Russian "volunteers" to assist her in defence. However, India and other Asian nations were against this and had already stated their views publicly.

7. Mr. Campney submitted for discussion the draft of a recommendation† for the despatch of the Canadian contingent to the U.N. police force. It was proposed to designate 2,000 members of the services for the purpose, but the figure could be adjusted. The order in council for the Korean special force had actually placed all the forces on active service, but he felt that to rely on it for the present Middle Eastern operations would be inadvisable.

8. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence on developments in the Middle East on the status of the proposed Canadian contingent for the United Nations Emergency Force, and with respect to Hungary.

MIDDLE EAST — CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UN FORCE

The Egyptians have been raising difficulties about the inclusion of a Canadian component in the emergency UN force on the ground that we are too closely associated with Great Britain. We are surprised and dismayed at this attitude in view of the position we have tried to take at the UN on this matter and the genuine efforts we have made to be helpful and impartial. The Prime Minister and I think that a word from Mr. Nehru to Cairo might clear up any doubts and suspicions that the Egyptians might have and we would be most grateful if he could intervene accordingly. Hammarskjöld will be mentioning the matter in Cairo but his hand would be immensely strengthened if the Indians could support our position. You will understand of course that if it became public, and so far we have avoided this, that Canadians were not considered appropriate for inclusion in this international force, the effect on Canadian public opinion re the UN might be far reaching and disastrous, to say nothing of the anger it would arouse against Egypt.

MIDDLE EAST: CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UN FORCE

I saw Nehru shortly before one o'clock for twenty minutes. The Indian government had about three or four days ago, heard about the possibility of Egypt's objections to the inclusion of Canadians. He had immediately sent a message to Nasser to say that he was much distressed to hear this and expressing the hope that Canada would be among the countries which would be chosen. He had said that "Canada would be a good choice". About a day and a half ago Krishna Menon had sent a very strong message to Delhi from New York with a copy for the Indian Ambassador in Cairo. Nehru repeated several times that Krishna

Menon's message was "in very strong language". Thus India had already made two approaches to Nasser. Nasser was naturally in a very excitable mood. India could not repeat not hope that Nasser would always do what they asked him to. Nehru said that nevertheless he would immediately get in touch with Cairo again.

2. In my immediately following telegram† I shall report more fully on my talk with Nehru.

MIDDLE EAST SITUATION

This afternoon Krishna Menon called Holmes out of the Assembly to tell him that he had just been talking to Cairo (he did not say exactly to whom) and he had learned that the Egyptian Government would now agree to Canada providing air transport and field ambulance. He said that the connection had been poor and he was not sure whether it was air transport and ambulance or air transport or field ambulance. This info was to be given to our Chargé in Cairo this afternoon. Menon seemed to realize that this would not be satisfactory and said he had sent a personal message to Nasser urging him to agree to a Canadian company on the ground at the very least. He emphasized, however, that he believed that this reply meant that the Egyptian position was being "cracked". In his habitual way he was vague, but he implied that the Egyptian offer might now be expanded.

2. Shortly afterwards, Cordier informed Holmes that they had just received the following message for the Secretary General from Fawzi: "After careful reconsideration of composition of UN forces in light of new developments, Egyptian Government has decided to accept Canadian participation in form of air transport". Cordier said this was not good enough; he was trying to get Hammarskjöld in Naples by phone. He said that Hammarskjöld already had this info. The above info was passed to Mr. Pearson, who was at the time seeing Mrs. Meier. Before leaving New York for the evening, Mr. Pearson asked Holmes to tell Menon that the Egyptian position was quite unacceptable, that Canada had been asked for a self contained unit and we had provided such a unit which was now under way. We could not allow the Egyptians to determine the nature of our contribution. We did not want to provide air transport and there was, in fact, more danger of the insignia on our planes being mistaken for British than was likely in the case of the army. Nevertheless, he expressed our thanks to Menon for his continuing intervention. By this time Menon was engaged in the debate on the Chinese seat and a note was sent to him with Mr. Pearson's comments.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNEF

Received during the night copy of following message from Secretary General to Cordier and am at moment waiting for telephone call from Cairo, Begins: I urged matter most strongly today with both Nasser and Fawzi. Egyptians believe what they accepted to have been in line suggestion from Pearson to Loutfi. I will pursue matter tomorrow and report immediately what with most serious efforts can be elicited just now. There are also here some very hard political facts in picture. Although clear Egypt's reply yesterday not last word, I doubt any argument of mine, with immediate military situation what it is, can open door Canadian ground force. Egypt's reply means in their view addition of Canada to list of countries participating UNEF. I fear only acceptance effective inclusion now Canadian air units in UNEF functioning within Egypt may be reached here. Some adaptability both sides seems necessary. Let us try get round corner until direct talks Pearson-Fawzi possible early next week if, as still is planned, Fawzi goes to UN now. Ends.

2. Have already telephoned to Mr. Campney about this and we agree that some press statement will be required during the day. It could take one of two forms: a more general statement in order to soften the difference of opinion with the Egyptians and therefore possibly make it easier for them to withdraw from the position they have taken, or a flat statement saying that they refuse to accept Canadian ground forces in the UN force. Draft statements of both kinds are in my immediately following telegram.†

This is a summary of recent developments. Yesterday afternoon, after talking to the Prime Minister, I told Cordier that it was essential that we hear from Hammarskjöld as quickly as possible on his negotiations with the Egyptians. He accordingly sent the following message: "Canadian Cabinet standing by. Situation critical. Most necessary positive reply". No reply was received until some time after midnight when a message was telephoned from Cordier's office, which was forwarded to you in our telegram POLEG-1293. Incidentally we are at a loss to understand what Fawzi Bey meant when he said that the air force contribution was in line with the suggestion we made to Loutfi last Sunday. A note of our talk, made by Holmes, confirms my memory that no such suggestion was made. This morning I telephoned Mr. Campney outlining the situation and suggesting certain press releases in case there was no change. However, a telephone call from Norman in Cairo, received around 9.30 am, gave us reason to hope for a more satisfactory result. Though the connection was very bad, a draft message was dictated by Norman and taken down by us. I later read this to Léger over the telephone. The draft is as follows:

"Canada is welcome as a country from which elements of the UNEF be drawn. It is felt that the most important contribution that could be given at the present stage from that country would be air support in the transport of troops from Italy and for the current functioning of the UNEF in Egypt.

"The question of ground troops of Canadian origin could best be considered when UNEF can assess its needs at the armistice line. The present situation seems to be one where it is not a lack of troops for the immediate task but of possibilities to bring them over and maintain their lines of communication. That is a cause of worry". Ends.

There is some doubt as to whether the last sentence was part of the message or an additional observation by the Ambassador. Norman in his talk emphasized that the Egyptians appeared to be friendly and cooperative but were, or professed to be, very worried indeed about the arrival at Port Said for stationing on the Canal at this time of The Queen's Own Rifle regiment of Canada. In my turn, I told Norman how worried we were about the impression we were receiving that the Egyptians were dictating to Hammarskjöld the composition of the UN force; that we could not accept any such principle, and we hoped that it would not be agreed to by Hammarskjöld. With this reservation, however, we were naturally anxious to help Hammarskjöld in his discussions with the Egyptians but we could not ignore the fact that the contribution we had promised had been accepted in New York as the most effective that we could make, and we had been encouraged to proceed accordingly. Norman pointed out that Hammarskjöld had told him that the message in question did not lay down any conditions for Canadian participation, which would have been improper, and that it did not involve any objection to Canadian forces in principle, but was concerned merely with the timing of their arrival and the area of their activity. Norman was to keep in close touch with Hammarskjöld and let us know as soon as the discussions were concluded.

2. After this telephone conversation I went to the Secretary General's office with Mr. MacKay. I discussed the situation with General Burns and Cordier. Burns felt that a Canadian battalion was still essential, though he felt also that even more important at the present moment was air transport and administrative headquarters — troops, signals, transport, engineers, medical, etc. If the Canadian Government could, as suggested, supply an air transport squadron and the 300 or so administrative personnel which were due to be flown this weekend, that would certainly be the most effective immediate contribution, with the infantry battalion to come later in the light of circumstances. He could conscientiously give a military opinion as commander of the force that this would be the most effective action on our part at this moment. Cordier agreed.

3. I then talked the matter over with Mr. Campney, who thought that the course outlined by General Burns could be agreed to subject to the Prime Minister's approval. I then talked to the Prime Minister on the telephone, who thought that the suggestions mentioned above would be satisfactory. Mr. St. Laurent also suggested a change in the draft statement read by Mr. Norman on the telephone. The first sentence of the second para should read "The question of when and where ground troops of Canadian origin shall be used can best be considered, etc." A telephone call was put in to Cairo for Mr. Hammarskjöld and the following telegram was sent immediately by Cordier, Begins:

"In connection with suggested communiqué, after conference top level suggestion is made that no infantry come for time being but that country concerned help to supply at this stage administrative supporting units which commander considers urgently essential, including engineers, signal corps, army service corps and medical corps of about fifty each, as well as other smaller administrative detachments, making total of between two hundred fifty and three hundred men. This responsibility then would be shared between this country and Norway.

"Hence at end first para following might be added "country concerned would help to supply at this stage much needed personnel for administrative services of UNEF". In next sentence after question of just before ground troops insert "when and where". In same sentence after word origin add "shall be used" and change "could" to "can". Assume last sentence regarding cause of worry not a part of communiqué. For your info country concerned is able to provide air transport squadron immediately." Ends.

4. Later in the afternoon Cordier phoned to say that he had discussed the matter with Hammarskjöld but that the connection was very bad and that the Secretary General would wait for the telegram. Meanwhile he had sent a message which might be disregarded in the light of new developments. He would take the new suggestions up with Nasser immediately and hoped to let us know the result during the course of the evening.

5. That is where the matter now stands.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UN EMERGENCY FORCE

Following for Minister. After phoning you I immediately saw Secretary General just before he left to see Nasser. He wanted me to make these points:

(i) To best of his knowledge Egyptian Government had not repeat not at any time agreed to participation of Canadian of ground forces.

(ii) On the other hand he has met no repeat no opposition in principle from them to our ground forces. This is most advanced stage that has been reached. The approach is essentially pragmatic and stage by stage. A danger of friction arises Egyptians believe, from Canadian troops following hard upon British withdrawal from Port Said area. (In this connection he finds British use of phrase "taking over" as a vexing factor in these negotiations). This area is really nub of problem. If we insist on our troops immediately following the British in Port Said he thinks Egyptians have grounds for not repeat not wishing to shoulder full responsibility for consequences. He fears that all this might distort at very start an operation which is delicate enough and which looks to no repeat no assistance from precedents.

(iii) He has insisted as draft shows that airlift alone is not repeat not enough from Canada which would put us in same category as Swiss air operations. He emphasized importance of air cover (in draft "current functioning") which he hopes we can provide.

(iv) Egyptians have not repeat not in effect laid down conditions nor attempted (in any?) way to dictate but have expressed in reasonable terms he believes the practical problems that they must face. They are the guinea pig of this first experiment, any government in their place would examine carefully the internal political consequences rising from various aspects of this operation.

2. As soon as possible I will inform you of results of Secretary General's talks with Nasser. If Nasser gives his concurrence the draft will become an official communication from Secretary General to Canadian Government and not repeat not just a confidential document drafted by Fawzi and Secretary General.

UN EMERGENCY FORCE

Following are texts of two messages which Cordier received early this morning from the Secretary General.

First message.

Reference your 9 and telephone conversations. I stress again the text sent by me is not communiqué but message from Secretary General to Foreign Minister of country concerned setting out substance of my agreement with other party. If (true?) to the substance, addressee and his Government can, of course, paraphrase it as appropriate for their purposes or use my words as their own if they so prefer, in both cases indicating that judgments are those of Secretary General.

As to substantive side of suggested amendment, I have been able to discuss matter late tonight on top level and have agreement to inclusion of administrative supporting units which Commander states urgently essential (including, for example, medical corps and army service corps). As to other details I did not get them over the telephone and therefore have not necessary agreement. I fear that number of men in case of full implementation may be on high side. Declaration can, for these reasons, not be more explicit than I have said here and detailed settlement must be made by Burns as I cannot possibly re-open case on details on top level before my departure tomorrow morning. Under these circumstances the question on wording raised in your cable does not arise. What I achieved in substance is clear from above and as, in any case, final statement is most likely to be paraphrased, they can include content of addition, as it suits them.

Final sentence regarding cause of worry is, of course, not part of any formal statement but, as part of message to the party, was intended to serve as an indication of what judgment I feel they, in their own words, may use in order to indicate value of contribution.

Most gratified to hear country concerned is able to provide air transport squadron immediately. We can, pending arrival, proceed with temporary additional assistance as indicate in special cable, if stationing possibilities permit and/or need indicated in that cable makes it necessary.

Second message.

As known to you, air transport has developed into bottleneck due to landing difficulties at night. You are presumably informed about Italian offer to assist with a number of C119 transport planes. Nasser agrees temporary use of C119's pending arrival of Canadians. He does not want this to mean Italy should be included "participating countries" in any other sense than it is already as support party providing staging area, Naples. Temporary character of arrangement should be made quite clear to Italians so that no bad feelings arise when they are replaced by Canadians. Please inform Naples and instruct them to cross check with Egyptian authorities. Wing Commander Sabry was present at settlement else probably nothing on record so far.

Please draw most urgently to Burns' attention the following situation. Insistent reports allege that trouble between civilians and occupying forces in Port Said continue with a daily death toll. Egyptians are firmly convinced truth of allegations and very serious about it saying that echoes from Port Said have strong inflammatory effect and may lead to uncontrollable reactions against foreign elements in country. Stories partly emanate from people who have managed to escape from the city. Popular reaction strengthened through alleged eye witness reports from international press.

Personally I can of course have no opinion on validity of charges short of impartial observers' reports. Possibility also of Egyptian underground and feelings developing are every reason for consideration counter action. Egyptian conclusion is that we should with greatest urgency detach reasonable number of observers and as quickly as possible at least small unit UNEF down to Port Said. They are willing to provide all facilities including necessary support and supplies if that would at present be bottleneck. Under these circumstances, please undertake immediately exploration and planning for detachment of unit to Port Said so that we can agree on orders on my arrival Monday morning. If you do not feel that unit could go to Port Said before your return it should at least be possible to detach more speedily observers in such number as would count. As part of preparation please contact, together with Bunche, the British, if possible Selwyn Lloyd himself, and explain situation, stating that this instruction and ensuring steps do not imply any judgment of what are the facts on either side, but represent counter measures rendered necessary already by the way rumours develop in restive Egypt, as this must be recognized as a most serious element at present stage.

UN EMERGENCY FORCE

My immediately preceding telegram with messages that came last night from Cairo, confirms that the compromise suggestions that we have put forward regarding Canadian forces is satisfactory. The situation now is:

(1) Canadian participation in the UN force has been approved by Egypt. The question of Egypt's agreement does not, of course, arise, even though some of Hammarskjöld's language seems to give that impression. This is something we will have to clear up with him when he returns to New York to make sure that there is no doubt on this score. However, the question of approval is something else and that has been secured by Hammarskjöld.

(2) Our immediate contribution is that of air transport and administrative units and General Burns has stated that this is the most important thing that we can do now. In fact, he realizes that the headquarters and base in Egypt must be organized before more police troops can usefully be employed. The Canadians, for the time being at least, will mainly supply the administrative services for the force that is there, along, I understand, with some Norwegians.

(3) The Canadian infantry battalion will go when and where the UN Commanding Officer and the Secretary General (who, it must be remembered, is to act on major decisions with the advice of the Political Advisory Committee of seven) decide.

2. It is hoped here that the air transport with the administrative units can now leave with the least possible delay.

UNEF

About noon on November 19, after the meeting of the Advisory Committee, I spoke privately to Hammarskjöld about his visit to Cairo. I was, of course, mainly interested in the question of Canadian participation in UNEF.

2. Hammarskjöld assured me that he had entered into no agreement with Nasser concerning the composition of UNEF. He had not departed from the position in principle that it was the UN General Assembly and not the Egyptian Government which should decide the composition of the force. The Secretary General had, however, recognized that political reality made it desirable to take into account the Egyptian point of view. He had been faced in Cairo with some hard political facts and in particular with the fact that Egyptian public opinion was deeply involved.

3. In speaking to Nasser, Hammarskjöld had been hard-pressed to persuade him that there was nothing suspicious about the inclusion of such a strong Canadian contingent in UNEF. Hammarskjöld thought he had made some headway but clearly Nasser continued to feel that Egyptian public opinion would be uneasy. However, Hammarskjöld had taken no stand which would exclude the sending forward of the Canadian infantry battalion when the UN Commander, having organized the present forces at his disposal, had occasion to consider necessary additions to the force to enable it to cope with expanding functions. There should be no misunderstanding on this score.

4. The real problem about Canadian participation seemed to be that the Egyptian Government would have difficulty in explaining to the Egyptian public the situation which would arise, in particular in Port Said, when the UK troops had gone or were going, and it appeared that they were largely being replaced by Canadians. The Egyptians claim that not only would there be a strong possibility of incidents involving the Canadian troops, but there might be popular repercussions in Port Said and even in Cairo. Hammarskjöld suggested to me that this situation might ease considerably once the Egyptian Government and people had become accustomed to the presence of UNEF and once the force itself had been deployed on its various functions. Specifically, it would be easier to deploy Canadian infantry in the Sinai or along the demarcation line than in the immediate vicinity of the Canal, though the latter was not excluded. This was the impression that Hammarskjöld was left with after his discussions with Nasser and Fawzi.

5. In strict confidence Hammarskjöld told me that his visit to Cairo was the toughest situation he had ever had to face. He had been under considerable pressure. He found Nasser friendly but confident and demanding, expressing a determination to continue the fight if the UN could not produce a solution. Nasser seemed quite prepared to call in the Russians if he had to, although professed a very strong preference for not doing so. The Secretary General is extremely worried about the situation he found in Cairo. He is convinced that Nasser is keeping in close touch with the USSR and is ready to take advantage of their offers of assistance and advice if driven to it. In Hammarskjöld's view there remains considerable risk in the whole situation. At the same time he does not ignore the possibility of a good deal of bluff behind Nasser's firmness. Hammarskjöld's three worries in order of immediate anxiety are:

- (1) incidents in Port Said which will end the cease fire;

(2) refusal of the British and French to withdraw until all their own maximum demands are met;

(3) refusal of the Israelis likewise to withdraw.

6. He is also very worried about a clash between the British and French desire to ensure an early clearance of the Canal with their own participation in the operation and Nasser's determination to move in and take full control of the Canal as soon as the UNEF take over and British and French troops begin to move out.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED NATIONS
 EMERGENCY INTERNATIONAL FORCE IN THE MIDDLE EAST
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 16)

3. The Minister of National Defence said that the Chief of the General Staff and the Chief of the Air Staff had returned from New York where they had held conversations with the Commander of the United Nations Emergency Force concerning his request that the most urgently required contribution from Canada at the moment would be an augmented transport squadron of the R.C.A.F. and administrative elements of the army. General Burns had reached this conclusion because of the present attitude of the Egyptian President towards Canadian infantry being stationed in Egypt, the need to provide quickly adequate transportation between Naples and Egypt and the necessity of establishing a headquarters and administrative services in Egypt for the remainder of the force. It was proposed that the Queen's Own Rifles and H.M.C.S. Magnificent remain at Halifax for the present, and that an R.C.A.F. squadron consisting of C-119 aircraft and from 400 to 600 men, and certain service sub-units of the army, totalling approximately 300 men, be dispatched forthwith to the Middle East.

The Minister submitted a recommendation† to authorize the maintenance on active service of up to 2,500 members of the armed services as part of the U.N. Emergency Force.

4. Mr. Campney added that the army part in the operation would be a particularly difficult one and he and his advisers would have preferred to have sent the battalion group. However, the U.N. Commander had requested the change and the only course open was to accept it. The Queen's Own Rifles and the Magnificent might eventually be sent, once the situation in Egypt was clarified and General Burns was able to determine when and where the battalion could be used. One of the many complicating factors affecting such a decision was the uncertainty surrounding the British and French intentions on the future of their forces in the canal zone.

5. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The Egyptian objections to the landing of the Queen's Own Rifles in their country would be difficult to explain, particularly after the battalion had been brought from Calgary to Halifax and the Magnificent hurriedly returned from the United Kingdom. However, it could be said quite emphatically that everything done in Canada in preparing a contribution to the emergency force had been done as a result of requests by the U.N. There might be some dissatisfaction with the way the U.N. had handled the situation, but there was no alternative but to deal with the U.N. requests as they were made.

(b) Another aspect of the matter was that Canada had acted rapidly to set an example to other countries to support the U.N. This was surely right and something which the public would be apt to understand and appreciate.

(c) Many who had earlier criticized the British and French invasion of Egypt were now beginning to feel that the original intentions of this action were correct and that they should have seized the whole of the canal and toppled Nasser from his position. Some would say that this had not been done due to influences brought to bear on the U.K. and French governments including pressure from Canada.

6. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence that personnel of the Armed Forces not exceeding 2,500 in number, be maintained on active service for the purpose of contributing to the United Nations Emergency International Force, established to secure and supervise hostilities in the Middle East; such personnel to include an air transport squadron, certain administrative elements of the army, and possibly an infantry battalion.

(An order in council was passed accordingly; P.C. 1956-1712, Nov. 20).

UNEF

The Advisory Committee on UNEF met twice on November 20 to give further consideration to the Secretary General's proposed reports on his visit to Cairo. The Secretary General will be producing three reports:

- (a) a report on basic points for the presence and functioning in Egypt of the UNEF;¹⁵³
- (b) a report on arrangements for clearing the Suez Canal;¹⁵⁴
- (c) a report on compliance with the Assembly resolutions calling upon the UK, France and Israel to withdraw their forces from Egypt.

2. As a result of the meetings yesterday and today the first two reports have been finalized and will be released either late tonight or early tomorrow. We will send you the texts as soon as they become available here. To transmit the various drafts would be of little help to you because of the complicated process of negotiation which has involved not only the advisory committee but also the Foreign Ministers of the UK, France and Egypt. We understand that the final version of these two reports has been approved by all concerned.

3. The report on compliance is not complete because it will depend on replies which the UK, France and Israel give to the Secretary General to questions along the following lines:

- (a) Has any withdrawal taken place?
- (b) What plans have been made for withdrawal?
- (c) What are the reasons for the delay in withdrawal?
- (d) Have the parties any observation to make concerning compliance with the cease fire called for in the Assembly resolutions?

The Secretary General hopes to be in a position to finalize this report on November 21. He intends merely to transmit the correspondence with the UK, France and Israel under cover of a short explanatory note. Ordonneau of the French Delegation told us this evening that the French could not reply until tomorrow (November 21). In speaking to the Advisory Committee the Secretary General emphasized that he considered it necessary to make this report on compliance because the Assembly resolutions asked him to report "promptly" and two weeks have elapsed since the adoption of the resolution.

4. The Secretary General expressed the opinion that the debate on the report on compliance would be more acrimonious than that on the other two reports. This heated debate might slow down rather than speed up the actual withdrawal. It might also create a bad atmosphere for the discussion of the other two reports. In consultation with leading delegations, therefore, the Secretary General is giving careful consideration to the timing of the presentation of the three reports to the General Assembly.

5. We regret the sparse reporting on the discussions in the Advisory Committee but this is almost unavoidable. Quite apart from the pressure of work here, the discussion in the Advisory Committee is so complicated that it is difficult to rely on memory or rapidly scribbled notes. For this reason we have been sending you, as soon as we can, the verbatim record of the Advisory Committee which is distributed (in one copy) only to the Head of each of the seven delegations. In today's bag we are sending the record for two meetings,

UNEF

In para 3 of my telegram under reference I gave the sense of the questions which the Secretary-General had directed to the Governments of UK, France and Israel concerning compliance with the Assembly resolutions calling for a cease-fire and withdrawal of their forces from Egypt. On November 21 at a meeting attended by Selwyn Lloyd, Casey, Macdonald and myself, Casey asked how the UK intended to reply to the four questions. Selwyn Lloyd said that he had suggested to London replies along the following lines:

(a) No significant withdrawal has taken place but the character of the Anglo-French forces has changed from assault to ground troops. Moreover, the Anglo-French forces have been assisting and cooperating with UN command, specifically making arrangements for the Norwegian company to enter Port Said; the main body of the Yugoslav contingent to disembark at Port Said and to be assisted in transit; providing the necessary vehicles for the Norwegian ambulance company, a complete military transport for the Indian infantry battalion, and some fuel, medical supplies and rations for UNEF.

(b) In replying to the second question the UK would refer to their reply of November 6 to the Secretary-General and to the cease-fire which had resulted from the fact that satisfactory arrangements were made. As soon as the UK is satisfied that UNEF can effectively assume the tasks assigned to it, the Anglo-French forces will be withdrawn. At present, however, UNEF is still being built up and is not in a position to carry out its tasks.

(c) UNEF will need time to mobilize a sufficient force to undertake the tasks assigned to it. At present it is not organized nor equipped to fulfill its functions. (This reply is intended to explain the delay in withdrawal).

(d) The cease-fire has and is being strongly observed by the Anglo-French forces despite Egyptian provocation.

2. On hearing these suggested replies I emphasized that in order to improve their position in the debate on the Secretary-General's report, the UK and France should try to state in the Assembly that they have taken some steps to comply with the resolution concerning withdrawal. Casey agreed that even a token evacuation would help the Anglo-French position. Macdonald said that it was a gamble either way but that undoubtedly some evidence of compliance would be helpful. Later in the day Selwyn Lloyd told me that, as a result of consulting his Government, he would be in a position to announce during the Assembly debate the withdrawal of a UK battalion from Port Said. This is encouraging not only because it will help to mitigate Afro-Asian opinion but may persuade the USA to be more cooperative in assisting all of us, including the UK and France, out of this acute dilemma in relations among the Western Powers.

UNEF

At a Commonwealth meeting on November 22 on the initiative of Selwyn Lloyd there was a useful discussion about several questions raised in the Secretary-General's report on basic points for the presence and functioning in Egypt of UNEF. Lloyd's intention seemed to be two-fold, to sound out the Asian members, particularly Ceylon and India, on the attitude they would adopt toward the report and to reassure Australia, NZ and South Africa that, notwithstanding the alarming speculation about Nasser's attitude, the development of UNEF was proceeding in an encouraging way.

Composition

2. Lloyd referred first to the composition of the force; he said he wanted to know the basis on which elements of the initial force had been determined; he suggested that the report seemed to leave open the question in principle of how the force should be composed. I pointed out that the report was general in character and represented the barest summary of a long and difficult process of consultation and discussion, both between the Secretary-General and the Government of Egypt and in the Advisory Committee. I said that there were differences of opinion in the Advisory Committee about interpretation of language both in the Secretary-General's report and in the relevant resolutions of the Assembly. Regarding the composition of the force, I emphasized that my interpretation, which I had pressed in the Advisory Committee, was that, although it was wise and desirable to consult the Egyptian Government about the arrival of the force in Egypt, that government should not have the determining voice in any question of composition. It was on that understanding that Canada had accepted those parts of the report concerning the composition.

3. Mir Khan said immediately that Pakistan was one of the first countries to offer a contingent. Pakistan's offer had not been accepted although subsequent offers had. It seemed to Pakistan that the Egyptian Government had been permitted by the Secretary-General to veto some of the national contingent. Mir Khan then gave in a vague way his understanding of how the question of composition had been discussed between Hammarskjöld and Nasser (Mir Khan spoke to us in greater detail about this and we are reporting his views separately†). He said among other things that the Egyptians had proposed that certain countries be included in the force and these countries had been accepted by the Secretary-General. He alluded to the fact that the Secretary-General had emphasized that the present force was an advance element to which other units would be added. What Pakistan wished to clarify was whether the additional elements would be provided from existing offers, not accepted, or by enlarging the contribution of countries now participating in UNEF.

4. Lall said that his views about the composition of the force were not irreconcilable with mine. He stated (as he had in the Advisory Committee on November 20) that there appeared to be no insurmountable problems in practice and that he hoped there would not be; that questions of composition could be worked out. It was India's view, however, that the UN had taken no general decision about the creation of a UN force. This could only have been taken after a full discussion of the principles involved. What had been decided was to establish a UN emergency force for an ad hoc purpose. Questions of basis principles had not been discussed because of the time factor. These questions remained "largely reserved or undecided". It had been essential to get Egyptian consent to the arrival of UNEF; this had been secured on the basis of clarifications which the Secretary-General had given and which included the notion that the composition of the force would be negotiated. In India's view Nasser had reacted "rather reasonably". Concerning Canadian participation Lall said that India was strongly in favour of it; that India had pressed the Egyptian Government to accept a Canadian contingent and would continue to do so. He pointed out that UNEF was a most popular army; that the Secretary-General had in no sense screened the offers; that the initial force had been composed of units on a basis of immediate availability. The Egyptians had asked for the inclusion of some contingents which had not been accepted. On the whole the matter was developing well and in time, Lall hoped, all the problems of composition could be resolved. The ultimate size of the force would likely be larger than the 4000 now contemplated.

5. Mir Khan said that Egypt's main objection seemed to be to Commonwealth contingents. He argued that the Egyptians should at least accept the whole Canadian contingent to show that this was not the case. Lall observed that some Canadians were already in the force. I intervened to say that we had some difficulty about the form of the Canadian contribution to the force. We had originally planned to send a self-contained battalion but for reasons (partly political and partly practical) we had agreed to send as a matter of priority the augmented air transport squadron and the service elements of the army contingent. I emphasized the difficulty which Burns was having in absorbing infantry contingents; how necessary it was to establish his headquarters and support units. We had sent our service elements in the hope that they would assist him out of his difficulties but this [does] not mean that our infantry battalion would not be joining the force. Its arrival in Egypt was merely postponed. I acknowledged the assistance which India had given us in resolving our initial difficulties with Egypt about the inclusion of a Canadian contingent in UNEF.

6. Mir Khan insisted that the principle should be clarified of whether the Government in whose territory the force would serve should have a veto. Canada, I said, would not admit that this veto existed. We had accepted the advice of the Secretary-General and the UN Commander about the priority of our contribution to UNEF but this did not mean that the Canadian battalion would not participate in the force. Lall expressed the hope that the Canadian battalion would be participating. He pointed out that the issue of principle remained undecided but he added that we should all bear in mind that Egypt was the victim rather than the perpetrator of aggression. If Egypt had been the aggressor, the position might be very different.

Function

7. Lloyd then raised the question of the functions of the force. No one had suggested that UNEF should have the task of clearing the Canal but UNEF must create conditions for the clearance, that is, it must ensure that there was no fresh outbreak of hostilities and that the cease-fire was maintained as well as internal order in the area. If the UNEF's sole purpose was to supervise the withdrawal of Anglo-French forces, this would not be satisfactory to the UK.

8. I said that the functions of the force had also been discussed in the Advisory Committee but that we had considered it desirable to leave them undefined but without prejudice. The functions were of course derived from the various Assembly resolutions but these were subject to different interpretations. To some extent the functions had been clarified in the Secretary-General's final report (A/3302 of November 7). I referred to the Canadian resolution of November 4 and the USA resolution of November 2. In my view neither of these resolutions precluded the force of taking action in any part of the territory in which the hostilities had taken place. I said there was a clear relationship between securing the cease-fire and clearing the Suez Canal. In short I argued that there should be no restrictive interpretation of the functions of UNEF.

9. Lall supported me by pointing out that India had introduced the word "all" into the Canadian resolution before the word "terms", both words referring to the USA resolution of November 2. Lall pointed too to the fact that the annex to the Secretary-General's present report [on basic points for the presence and functioning in Egypt of the UNEF] (A/3375 of November 20) implied that UNEF would be maintained "until its task is completed". Lloyd said that as long as Egypt continued to recognize this position, there should be no difficulty. The Representative of Ceylon endorsed what Lall had said. Mir Khan said Pakistan's position corresponded to that of Canada.

10. Munro asked why the words "in good faith" appeared twice in the operative part of the annex. I replied that the Secretary-General had laid great emphasis on the fact that if there should not be "good faith" on the part of all concerned, there could be no progress along the lines on which we were proceeding. There was general agreement at the meeting on this point.

11. Lloyd who had given no prior indication that he would raise these questions in the Commonwealth meeting, asked whether I agreed with his approach. I said I thought the exchange of views had been very useful and that I was encouraged to expect a moderate and perhaps more expeditious debate in the Assembly on the Secretary-General's report than had seemed possible a few days ago.

12. There was another talk later with the same group as above except India and Ceylon. Lloyd expressed the hope that the debate on the Secretary-General's report would not begin until tomorrow as their instructions from London had not yet been finalized. I undertook to find out from the Secretary-General's office what the plans were. Therefore I left to see Cordier and found that the orders were about to go out for an afternoon discussion. I gave the cause for delay and the Secretary-General having joined us it was decided to begin the discussion tomorrow. I reported accordingly and the others seemed very relieved.

13. Later Hammaskjöld showed me a draft resolution of approval for both parts of the Secretary-General's report. I persuaded him to divide those parts with a resolution for each, and to give priority to the one regarding the clearance of the Canal which is matter of urgency and should if possible be dealt with first and quickly. He is trying to get the USA and India to sponsor the resolution or rather now the two resolutions. I hope he is successful in this and he thinks he will be.

You will have received separate reports† on the actual debate in plenary on November 24 concerning the two resolutions:

(a) One submitted by the Afro-Asians concerning compliance with the earlier resolutions calling for the withdrawal of forces;¹⁵⁵

(b) The other submitted by six powers (including Canada) noting with approval the reports of the Secretary-General on the presence and functioning of UNEF and arrangements for clearing the Suez Canal.¹⁵⁶

2. The main argument in the debate was about the first operative para of the Afro-Asian draft resolution. We have already sent you the first text of this para which began with the words "notes with grave concern". This text emerged in the debate on November 23 and was found unacceptable by a large number of delegations, including the old Commonwealth, most of the Europeans and a substantial number of Latin Americans. It may also have been unacceptable to the USA. Realizing that their draft resolution would not have overwhelming support in the Assembly, the Afro-Asians, led by India, made some effort to improve its wording. About the close of the debate on November 23 Lall showed to a number of delegations a revised para, couched in the language of the Secretary-General's report on compliance. This para in effect noted the steps which had been taken to comply with the earlier Assembly resolution.

See The Crisis in the Middle East, October-December, 1956, p. 18.

3. This revision might have been acceptable to the large majority of delegations but it turned out to be unacceptable to the Arabs, particularly to Egypt. As a result, overnight the para was reworded in the form in which it appeared in Document A/3385/Rev.1. The text of the revised operative para 1 was sent to you. It began with the words "noted with regret". This revised para used the substance of the Secretary-General's report on compliance but in a negative sense. In other words, the revised para expressed regret for what had not been done and contained an implication that the UK announcement to withdraw the battalion might be no more than an announcement. It stated moreover that "no Israel forces have been withdrawn behind the armistice lines". For this reason during the course of the debate on November 24 Eban declared that this para apparently had the support of the USA delegation. Late in the debate on November 23 and occasionally during November 24 Menon and Knowland had long consultations. The revision was not, however, acceptable to the UK and France, nor to the majority of Western Europeans. A few of the Latins also had doubts about it, notably Brazil, Cuba and Peru.

4. Menon's effort to precipitate the vote on both the resolutions has already been described [telegram 1421 of November 25/56†]. His threat to withdraw from the sponsorship of the second resolution and not to vote in favour of it was a crude attempt to bully the Assembly into giving him his way. In the debate on the afternoon of November 24 his language was less obstreperous but his intention remained clear; unless the Afro-Asian draft resolution were accepted in its revised form, Indian and Afro-Asian support for the more important draft resolution on the force and on the clearing of the Canal might be withheld.

5. Because of the unholy alliance between Menon and Knowland the amendment submitted by Spaak had no chance of being adopted. It made it possible, however, for Spaak to make a strong statement in favour of applauding to some extent the way in which the UK, France and Israel were responding to the Assembly resolutions and urging wisdom and moderation in trying to reach a solution. The amendment also made it easier for a number of delegations to abstain on the Afro-Asian resolution.

6. Menon offered another show of bad manners in refusing to allow, in advance of its being requested, a separate vote on the contentious first operative para of the Afro-Asian draft resolution. It is not often that a request for a vote on parts of a resolution is denied. A Jordanian motion to bring about a closure of the debate was also permitted by the chairman without allowing the usual two statements for and against the motion for closure.

7. Notwithstanding the unpleasant moments in the debate, the adoption of the resolution on the force and on the clearing of the Canal was a considerable achievement. It will enable the Secretary-General to pursue his plan regarding those two important measures concerning the Canal. On its face the Afro-Asian resolution is not too unreasonable and, in effect, amounts to an unnecessary reiteration of the previous Assembly requests that parties comply with the resolutions on cease-fire and withdrawal.

8. The Canadian position on these two resolutions was explained in the Minister's statement in plenary on the afternoon of November 23. The text of this statement was transmitted in our telegram 1405 of November 23.†¹⁵⁷

ANGLO-AMERICAN RELATIONS AT UN

The UK Delegation here seem to be more depressed and bitter about Middle East developments and rift with the USA than we have yet seen them during the present crisis. Lodge had told Lloyd on November 22 that it would "make all the difference" if Lloyd could announce withdrawal of one battalion before the vote on an Asian resolution calling again for immediate withdrawal. At same time in Washington, Hoover had told Caccia that the USA would "at least abstain on Asian resolution". By pushing London hard, Lloyd was able to announce battalion withdrawal. Yet on November 24, the USA, judging the battle useless, had failed to support the Belgian amendment and had voted in favour of the Asian resolution in the form demanded by Menon. Lodge had excused himself by saying that Menon's tactics had made it impossible for them to abstain on the Asian resolution without being misunderstood, while Hoover sent word through Murphy to Caccia that in the circumstances the USA Government was "the prisoner of its own policy".

2. While UK Delegation acknowledged that breach with USA cannot be repaired until Anglo-French withdrawal from Egypt, they would be more willing to withdraw if they were less dubious of intentions of USA even after withdrawal. In short term, they are worried by the USA reluctance to bring forward their two resolutions on procedures for a settlement. The UK Delegation point out that these USA resolutions were submitted at same time as UNEF and withdrawal resolutions and were regarded by UK as part of the package they accepted. Now the USA are delaying action on their resolutions as a form of pressure upon UK and French to withdraw.

3. Thinking further ahead, UK delegation recall Dulles' speech in August as an indication of latent desire of the USA Government to play a role on colonial issues less inhibited by their Western Alliance. They are talking now of possibility of Afro-Asian group, unrestrained by USA, adopting tactics on Algeria and Cyprus which would make it difficult for the French at least to remain in the Assembly. They are even questioning whether USA want UK and France to remain great powers in any sense.

4. Ramsbotham, who is the chief source of these misgivings, thinks personally that Senator Knowland has been a principal roadblock in USA Delegation but that his point of view is pretty well reflected by Rowntree in State Department. Present situation is a heaven-sent opportunity of improving position of USA in Afro-Asian area to offset headway made by USSR in what has become the crucial uncommitted group in the new General Assembly.

5. UK and French delegations are not of course the only ones who are seriously worried by these developments. A real crisis of confidence appears to be in the making between the USA and a good many of the Western European countries. It is natural that Western Europe should feel keenly the dangers to the Western Alliance and that the colonial powers of Western Europe especially should fear the new anti-colonial tack in USA policy. Some of them are charging the USA with alienating their true friends in order to curry favour with peripheral countries who will never really be their friends. These concerns have already found expression in Assembly statements, notably Casey's on November 26 (our telegram of November 26). The rather crude reporting from Rabat and Algiers in New York Times November 27 will add to the general impression here of USA attempt to displace the UK and France in North Africa and the Middle East.

6. While the USA seems to be deliberately applying pressure upon the UK and France to withdraw their troops from Egypt, most of their delegation appear to be as concerned as the rest of us that the rift should be healed as soon as the UK and France have withdrawn the bulk of their force. DePalma told us on a personal basis that he felt it was a tragedy for the USA delegation to be under instructions not to repeat not to talk to the UK delegation frankly. As soon as the UK had withdrawn the USA would work with them to apply whatever pressure might be necessary, including cutting off supplies, to ensure that Israel withdrew from Gaza where UNEF forces would be stationed. Similarly, USA would then work hard for negotiations being resumed both on Palestine and on Suez questions. If, as now seemed possible from indications USA had had from Egyptian sources, direct negotiations based on six principles could be resumed between UK, Egypt and Secretary-General, DePalma thought USA would withdraw their suggestion for establishing a committee. Their present hope was that if the fact of negotiations could be kept secret, direct talks could begin within two weeks of Anglo-French troops being withdrawn.

7. USA delegation are convinced UK and French Governments have seriously overestimated the strength of their bargaining position both in Assembly and outside. If they attach conditions to their withdrawal and the upshot will be a further Assembly demand for withdrawal, probably on terms less favourable to UK and France than those which have just been approved by the Assembly in the Secretary-General's report. Though Suez clearance appeared to be most important UK precondition now, DePalma thought UK would have to be content with present understanding which would leave UNEF forces in small numbers to observe Canal area until cleared of obstacles, ie for some months. Meanwhile Canal negotiations could be resumed and a formula might with luck be negotiated.

8. As you know, we have urged UK not to take public positions or insist on pre-conditions from which they would have to climb down later with no advantage to their short or long term bargaining position. Whatever motives may be attributed to USA policy, it seems to us that the facts of our present situation require the USA to increase its influence in North Africa and the Middle East since this is the only hope of preventing Soviet influence from dominating the area. Some of the heads of the Arab and Baghdad States are no doubt still privately well disposed to the British but in terms of public opinion the UK and still more the French must have lost tremendously. Therefore the interests of the free world are that the USA rather than the USSR fill the vacuum. It is not a matter of intention or motive but of necessity.

9. The UK-French action is a fact which the Afro-Asians will not quickly forget or forgive and it is no use the UK delegation attempting to silence their feelings by deploring "recriminations", and "digging up the past". Both morally and strategically the position of Anglo-French forces in Egypt appears to have become untenable.

10. While the present crisis in Anglo-American relations is inescapable, and will require our best thoughts and efforts to repair at the proper time, we are of the opinion that Canadian delegation should continue in the independent course we have taken in Assembly while working on the USA and the UK delegations to talk to each other at all times and return to full cooperation as soon as major withdrawals of UK and French forces from Egypt have begun.

11. Meanwhile, Mr. Pineau has returned to Paris over the weekend with ill concealed irritation and Mr. Lloyd went back to London noon November 27.

12. While we hesitate to put forward suggestions in the Minister's absence in Ottawa, it does seem to us at official level that present rift in NATO is bound to have serious repercussions at December 11 Ministerial Council unless real efforts have been made by both sides before Council meets. In any case by that time patience of Assembly majority will be running out unless withdrawals are under way. If substantial Anglo-French withdrawals have by then taken place and if UK and France have been reassured that USA are prepared to act firmly to secure a Middle Eastern settlement on both Suez and Palestine issues, then NATO Ministerial Council might provide a timely opportunity to repair alliance as quickly and as thoroughly as possible.

MIDDLE EAST; SOME USA VIEWS

Following personal for the Minister and Under-Secretary. This afternoon I encountered Phleger and travelled with him from New York to Washington. He had spent the morning with Hammarskjöld and we took the opportunity for a personal and very private chat on a number of features of the developing situation.

2. I opened by saying that you had been disappointed in the USA vote on Saturday, November 24, in favour of the further resolution for withdrawal of the forces; Lodge's statement seemed logically to imply abstention. Phleger agreed. The fact was that Washington had been in favour of abstention and had given instructions with regard to the statement. But the delegation in New York were committed to voting in favour (presumably in deals on adjustment in language).

3. Next, I went on to express Canada's anxieties lest the USA be weakening in its adjustment to the Western Alliance. Regardless of what had transpired it was surely of first importance for all of us to work together now to restore the position. Phleger agreed heartily. There was no division in the administration on this score and no bitterness against the British and French remained. The best evidence of the importance which they attached to the Alliance was the fact that Dulles himself (who will return to the State Department next week) will be going to the North Atlantic Council in December. Phleger was obviously aware of the coolness between Lloyd and Lodge over recent days, for he offered excuses for the latter.

4. With regard to Suez, Phleger drew my attention to the terms of Hammarskjöld's letter to Fawzi, dated, I think, October 23 and annexed (with Fawzi's reply as annexes 1 and 2 to UN document S/3728 November 3). Hammarskjöld thought that there was a good prospect of working out a Suez settlement along the lines of this letter which, on examination, Phleger said contained almost all the elements that would be required for a stable solution.

5. In the same connection Phleger went on, withdrawal of Anglo-French forces should and could in fact be "phased" with the introduction of the UNEF by proper management, even though it was impossible, politically to have the former operation made conditional upon the latter. Hammarskjöld, he said, proposed to proceed in this way. He remained anxious about the possibility of incidents in Port Said, of which the UNEF might be the victims.

6. Incidentally, in conversation with Phleger on the composition and effectiveness of the UNEF (Phleger had been urging the disproportionate percentage of Indian and Yugoslav personnel) Hammarskjöld had given Phleger the impression that we had "grown cool" over the employment of our infantry battalion. I assured Phleger that this was not so at all and that we were expecting the Queen's Own to be called for in due course.

7. One final point, when I urged the importance of getting on with steps towards political settlements, Phleger said that the USA still felt that no time should be lost unnecessarily. However, until some acceptable schedule for withdrawal of Anglo-French forces had been agreed, they felt that no progress could be made.

8. Because of the private character of this conversation I have marked this telegram for you and Léger, MacKay and Robertson personally. I trust the source will be protected.

UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 20)

45. The Minister of National Defence reported that the United Nations Emergency Force commander had suggested that Canada now supply a signal unit similar to that recommended by the Canadian military authorities for the whole signal requirements for U.N.E.F. This would mean sending over an additional three officers and 128 other ranks. The organization had been set up on the use of English as the only common language for command and intercommunication purposes, and Canada appeared to be the only country which could supply the signals personnel. This would mean taking charge of the whole system and use of larger planes or ships for transporting the bulky pieces of needed equipment.

It would be possible to send over H.M.C.S. Magnificent with the equipment and signals personnel and perhaps with the addition of part of the Queen's Own Rifles battalion. However, it seemed that there might be repeated requests for specialized services which would throw the composition of the Canadian contingent out of line. Careful consideration should be taken before meeting this new request.

46. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, in connection with the composition of the Canadian contingent, there appeared to be a misconception that it was necessary to get the approval of Egypt each time. He had told the Secretary General that, in his opinion, any such requests would not have to be cleared with anybody. If Canada agreed, that was sufficient, and no Egyptian political clearance was needed. Mr. Hammarskjöld had agreed in principle. This fact was very important.

The Secretary General had a most difficult job. He had to get the maximum co-operation from Egypt whatever he thought of the Nasser contention that United Nations forces would be withdrawn whenever Egypt said so. The U.N.E.F. must be well-balanced, and care taken to do nothing which would let the Russian type communists in. This meant that several offers had been pigeonholed and, for instance, that action had been suspended on the offer of a Pakistan brigade. However, the position could be taken that Egypt had nothing to do with other troops to be sent in once she had agreed to the first landing of the force. There were now about 4,000 to 5,000 U.N. troops in Egypt with an expected total of about 10,000. The Minister suggested that nothing be done about the request for a few days until some proposals for the use of the Queen's Own Rifles had been explored with Mr. Hammarskjöld. It was possible that part of the United Nations force would have to be used on the Israeli-Syrian borders, which really posed the most serious problem now.

47. Mr. Pearson further commented on the very delicate situation in Egypt. The Yugoslavs were not Russian-communists and their army was intensely jealous of any influence from Moscow. Accepting an offer of 700 Yugoslav soldiers made it easier to keep out Czech and Roumanian contingents.

The important thing was to get a U.N. battalion into Port Said immediately. The British now wanted to get out, but must have a respectable reason and be assured that there would be enough U.N. forces to keep order. The operation was now over and the main object was to open up the canal. There could be no co-operation from Egypt as long as there were U.K. and French troops in Port Said. The U.S. also indicated it would be very difficult to give assistance unless this were done. If the troops got out use might be made of British naval units in clearing the canal.

There did not seem too great danger to U.N. forces as Israel and Egypt would be very careful to take no action against them. The great danger lay in the morale of the U.N. forces themselves. It was possible that these forces might disintegrate because they did not know what they were to do and also because of restiveness through lack of recreational facilities.

Communication with the U.N. forces was not too difficult. Telephone conversations were possible from New York with General Burns and his staff. Canada had a military representative now in New York.

48. Mr. Campney added that it appeared that the communication proposal went beyond the normal functions of Army signallers and would mean setting up a large communication system for the whole area.

In regard to the charge that the Queen's Own Rifles were not up to strength when they were earmarked for this U.N.E.F. duty, he explained that there was a list of categories of persons that were not taken overseas, such as married men under 21, hospital cases, and so on. There were 127 such persons in the first battalion and some 200 of the second had been added to the first, which was now over peacetime strength. There were now about 400 second battalion and 127 first battalion left at Calgary.

49. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the build-up of the U.N. Emergency Force and deferred decision on the possibility of Canada sending further signals units at this time.

THE ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE ON THE CRISIS IN ANGLO-AMERICAN RELATIONS

Hoover asked me to see him at six o'clock last evening. His purpose was to follow up my conversation with Phleger earlier in the afternoon (my telegram under reference), particularly on the immediate means of healing the breach between the USA and British positions over the Middle East crisis. He said he would welcome any thoughts that I might have, recognizing that our conversation was on a wholly personal basis. I took the opportunity at once of telling Hoover of your own grave concern at the growing divergence between the USA and the UK. The USA vote in the UN on Saturday last (and their failure to support the Belgian amendment) had come to you and to us all as a severe shock; the vote had not flowed logically from the argument in Lodge's statement (the private explanation is given in my telegram under reference). I referred again to your impression of the personal coolness which had developed between Lodge and Lloyd in New York. This was a thoroughly unsatisfactory state of affairs. It was your hope and belief that the USA should now concentrate on enabling the UK "to work their passage" back; every constructive means to this end should be vigorously explored.

2. It seemed to us, I went on, that the time for recriminations was past and that we should concentrate on the earliest possible realignment of the Western Alliance of which the Anglo-American partnership was the essence. The British should be extracted from their present exposed position as quickly as possible. This was the reason why we thought it necessary to get on with the Suez settlement and the broader political solution in the Middle East. If we were unable to reverse the present divergence, only the Russians and their friends would benefit. I referred to the present debate in parliament over Canadian participation in the UNEF. The crisis in Anglo-American relations was being reflected in these discussions. Our interest, however, arose not merely from national considerations but because of the vital importance we attached to close Anglo-American relations.

3. Hoover began by commenting on the relations in New York between Lodge and Lloyd. He realized that Lloyd had been in an extremely difficult position, in view of the political situation in London and the virtual isolation of the UK delegation in the Assembly. Nevertheless the USA had reason to believe that Lloyd had allowed himself in briefings of the UK correspondents some sharp personal criticism of Lodge. This had been reflected in a mounting volume of anti-American press publicity in the UK. Hoover himself had deliberately refrained from any contact at all with the correspondents over the past ten days, probably at the risk of their own public relations. The USA objective had been to "keep their tempers" and not to indulge in public recrimination. Hoover added that the President, himself, had been deeply upset; few things had hit him quite so hard as this public deterioration in relations between Britain and the USA.

4. Hoover then indicated that, in the USA Government's view, the first step toward closing the gap was to complete satisfactory arrangements for the withdrawal of UK, French and Israeli forces. Before anything constructive could be done by the USA, some public indication must be given by the UK that their forces would leave Egypt in accordance with UN resolutions. Such a statement could not be made conditional on any unilateral determination by the UK of the adequacy or effectiveness of the UNEF. The capacity of the UNEF to do the job was certainly very important but this could only be determined by the Secretary General, who was responsible for the implementation of the Assembly resolutions. It was Hoover's understanding that Hammarskjöld (who had the full confidence of the USA) considered that the UNEF now had sufficient forces in sight to accomplish its tasks. While Selwyn Lloyd had given Hammarskjöld his personal assurance concerning the withdrawal of British forces, the UK affirmation of compliance would have to be made public if it were to gain its maximum effect and permit the USA to go forward with constructive measures. At the moment Nasser had the initiative. But once UK compliance with the UN decisions was made known publicly and a time-table for withdrawal announced, it would be possible to bring pressure on the Egyptians and move forward. Hoover recalled how close agreement on a Suez settlement had been just before the outbreak of hostilities. (In this connection he referred, as Phleger had done, to the Hammarskjöld-Fawzi correspondence). He added that, at that time, Pineau had not given his agreement; whether this implied that Pineau knew of plans for military operations was an open guess. One difficulty which had arisen in these negotiations was that the Egyptians had refused to accept provisions involving sanctions, an attitude with which the USA was inclined to sympathize. These earlier negotiations in the UN gave grounds, the USA felt, for hoping that, once the UK default under the UN resolutions had been cured, it would be possible to move rapidly toward an acceptable Suez settlement and to apply the necessary pressure to Nasser (an individual for whom, Hoover added, the USA had no more regard than had the UK).

5. Hoover went on to say that, in addition to such a result in Egypt, rectification of the British position before the UN, would help materially in dealing with Soviet propaganda which had been using the Anglo-French intervention in the Middle East to cover up its own sins in Hungary. It would also help to bridge the widening gap between the Western world and the free nations of Asia.

6. As a means of leading up to such a public statement on the part of the UK, Hoover thought that it might be possible for Hammarskjöld to make an early announcement that the UNEF was on the ground and in an effective state to carry on its priority duties. A statement of this kind could then be picked up by the UK Government as a basis for a declaration not necessarily of immediate withdrawal, but of a phased schedule for getting out which would nonetheless be a clear and unqualified expression of willingness to comply with Assembly's resolutions.

7. Hoover spent little time on the French position. He thought they would follow the UK lead and indeed it was the State Department's understanding from the French themselves that they were prepared now to make such a statement concerning complete withdrawal.

8. In answer to my enquiry, Hoover said that the USA views on the lines of the foregoing had been transmitted to the UK Government through the USA Embassy in London. He added that Sir Harold Caccia was also fully informed.

9. Hoover then informed me of an additional and compelling argument for urging the UK Government to proceed on these lines as promptly as possible with the request that it should be for you alone. I am dealing with this in my immediately following telegram marked personal for you.

10. When you have (an opportunity?) of considering this message and my immediately following telegram, I should like to know as soon as possible whether there is any supplementary action which you wish me to take at this end.

THE ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE ON THE CRISIS IN ANGLO-AMERICAN RELATIONS

The additional and compelling argument to which Hoover referred arises from what Hoover referred to as the critical financial situation in which the UK would find itself in the next few days. Next Monday, December 3, the UK Government would have to bring out its quarterly statement on the position of its reserves. This would reveal a very bad picture indeed and a financial position of a critical character unless, what Hoover described as "heroic measures" were taken in the meantime. The USA was willing and anxious to help. But the authorities here would not be in a position to provide the UK with the necessary backing so long as their basic positions in the UN on withdrawal were not reconciled. The UK financial difficulties went far beyond the immediate and prospective oil deficit problem. They involved a serious weakening of confidence in world financial markets. This could have the consequence of creating a run on sterling with the most serious economic and financial consequences not only for the UK but for many other countries as well. Hoover would not take the opportunities I gave him to be specific on the methods by which the USA would be prepared to assist the UK in this regard. But he did say that American "backing" would be immediately forthcoming and effective, providing the UK Government were willing to take action along the lines indicated in my immediately preceding telegram.

2. Hoover made it clear that, in the USA view, the financial crisis he foresaw was far more serious than the problem of the oil deficit. On this last point he said the necessary emergency machinery was at hand for immediate use, and that the USA was ready and willing to use it promptly, once the major political hurdle could be cleared.

SECRET & PERSONAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Minister from Robertson. This country is moving into a very acute political crisis. The Cabinet are, I am told, all agreed on the inevitability of the early evacuation of Port Said. They feel they can make a case in Parliament in this country for holding on there up to now, but they recognize that there is no political or diplomatic advantage to be gained from trying to hold on longer. But they are at the moment completely immobilized by the revolt in the Conservative Party. They have postponed the day of reckoning until Wednesday of next week when the opposition opens a two-day debate on Foreign Affairs. In the meantime they hope to persuade the French tomorrow to agree to the announcement on Monday of an early date for withdrawal, and they hope over the week-end to persuade the Tory back benchers to support the Government policy, from which no member of the Cabinet now dissents.

2. When I went to see Kirkpatrick this evening to see if in his judgment there was any helpful action we could help to promote in New York or Washington, he described the present position in pretty much the words of the preceding para. The immediate crisis is a domestic political one, i.e. it is still inside the conservative party, with ministers desperately trying to recreate a parliamentary majority for a policy they recognize as inevitable. If they fail there will be a dissolution and a quick general election, but even with that there is a month in which, for practical purposes, this country will be without an effective Government.

3. Kirkpatrick said that as far as Conservative Members of Parliament were concerned, the last straw had been the American vote on Spaak's amendment to the Afro-Asian resolution. He claimed that this vote had not only profoundly shocked English opinion, but had deeply incensed public opinion all through Western Europe. He foresaw flowing from it all sorts of consequences including the ultimate end of NATO.

4. He told me that the Acting Secretary of State in Washington called the US Ambassador yesterday to protest against the terms of the Conservative back benchers' resolution deploring American policy which people in Washington construed as a direct attack on the President and suspected had been organized with the blessing or connivance of ministers here. Kirkpatrick said he thought he had succeeded in disabusing Aldrich's mind of this idea.

5. Kirkpatrick said as I left that if you were talking to Hammarskjöld, or if Arnold Heeney were talking to the State Department, it might be helpful if you could make the point that Selwyn Lloyd and all the Cabinet accept the inevitability of quick withdrawal, and are now doing their best to carry out this policy and still maintain a Government.

MIDDLE EAST; SUEZ

Elbrick has just told me that, yesterday, agreement was reached (with the Secretary General and the Egyptian Foreign Minister in consultation with the USA and UK delegations) to a "four act play" devised as a curtain raiser to the resumption of political consultations on the Suez Canal under UN auspices.

2. The four "acts" were to be as follows:

Act 1. The Secretary General's announcement concerning the UNEF (this, as you know, was made yesterday, November 28, and mentioned 6,000 men within two weeks).¹⁵⁸

Act 2. The statement by the UK Foreign Secretary in the House of Commons today,¹⁵⁹ November 29, indicating that the UK Government were satisfied with the competence and projected strength of the UNEF; accordingly, the UK would arrange withdrawal of British forces. No specific date was to be mentioned but Lloyd was to hint at the early resumption of settlement talks under the Secretary General, at the point at which they had been suspended before hostilities.

¹⁵⁸ Voir/See New York Times, November 29, 1956.

¹⁵⁹ Voir/See United Kingdom, House of Commons, Parliamentary Debates, 1956-57, Fifth Series, Volume 561, columns 579-581.

Act 3. After one or two days Cairo was to announce that the Egyptian Government had taken note of the UK's intentions and stood ready to cooperate in arrangements for clearing the Canal.

Act 4. The stage being then set the Secretary General would report on arrangements for Canal clearance to begin by December 15.

3. Hammarskjöld sent word to the State Department that on the above basis he would expect to resume the Suez talks about the end of December. In so doing he would not try to pin the parties down to the six principles he had stipulated at an earlier stage.

4. As we were talking the first ticker reports of the UK Foreign Secretary's speech today were coming in. Lloyd was reported to have said that he was not yet in a position to make more than "an interim statement" until he had consulted Pineau; he would make a further statement on Monday. The USA are mystified and somewhat disturbed by this which, on the face of it, appears to throw the four act play off schedule. And this could be serious in the light of what was reported in my personal telegram to you 2162 of yesterday, November 28.

[London], November 30, 1956

Selwyn Lloyd has been in close contact with Mr. Pearson in New York, and I am sure that as a result you know our thinking about Suez up to the time the Foreign Secretary left. I should like to let you know what our thought in London is now that we have been able to discuss the matter with Selwyn Lloyd and have been able to give consideration to the possible lines we might take, in particular with regard to the withdrawal of Anglo-French troops from Egypt.

2. The operation has been very burdensome to us, but more and more of our people have understood the need for the action and will give us solid support if results can be shown.

3. So far we can claim,

(a) a war was stopped,

(b) a Russian-Egyptian plot to dominate the area was exposed and disclosed and we hope killed,

(c) the United States (if belatedly) has declared support for the Baghdad Pact powers,

(d) largely as a result of the valuable Canadian initiative, an effective United Nations force is being introduced into the area.

So far so good.

4. There follow certain questions which cannot yet be put so confidently into this first category of successes. Therefore we are trying to get more clarification from Hammarskjöld and United States of America on two in particular.

(a) We are seeking clarification that clearance of the Canal will be begun as soon as it is technically possible. Nasser as you know, has always said that it could not begin until the last British troops were out. We are discussing ways and means of trying to get over this deadlock. The linking of the clearance to the date when it is technically possible to start clearing seems to be one way. We will keep you in touch as our thinking on this develops.

(b) Then we attach great importance to the agreement about the Canal's future control. It seems as though the Egyptians will be willing to resume negotiation on the "six principle" basis which was agreed to unanimously by the Security Council. It is possible though, that Nasser might feel at liberty to discriminate against our ships and French ships on the ground that we and Egypt are at war. That would mean he would treat us as he treated the Israelis. We don't think this likely but we are trying to get this cleared up in New York to our satisfaction — again, we will let you know how things go.

5. We meet the French this afternoon and I will send you another message as soon as I can. Meanwhile, any comments or advice will be most welcome.

6. I am sending similar messages to other Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

UNEF

Following the Minister's telephone conversation this morning (November 30) Holmes and Murray saw Cordier. They made the following points:

(a) The fact that no part of the Canadian infantry battalion had yet been integrated into UNEF, notwithstanding announcements about its rapid buildup, had created a clear impression in Canada that UNEF had become the tool of Nasser. This impression was strengthened by statements made in the General Assembly by Fawzi and Menon. As a result, there was widespread criticism in Canada about the Government's action in assembling the infantry battalion at Halifax for immediate despatch on HMCS Magnificent.

(b) The fact that no part of the infantry battalion had yet been activated made it extremely difficult for the Government to give favourable consideration to further requests from the UN for Canadian contributions to UNEF. The example was cited of the additional signals element which the Canadian officials concerned recognized was urgently required by Burns. If nothing could be done to activate any part of the infantry battalion, even one company, it was difficult to see how those additional requests for assistance could be met.

(c) The continued inactivity of the infantry battalion and the Magnificent at Halifax had become a source of grave embarrassment to the Government and unless there should be some indication by December 3 that the infantry battalion, or a part of it, would be called upon to participate in UNEF, the Government would be obliged to return the infantry battalion to its quarters in Western Canada and to off load the equipment for the battalion group from the Magnificent. If this step had to be taken, it would have a most detrimental effect on Canadian participation in UNEF.

2. In these circumstances (we informed Cordier) it was urgently desirable for the Secretary General to consider whether some step could be taken very soon to activate the Canadian infantry battalion. The Canadian Government realized the delicacy of the current situation but could not continue to acquiesce in the development of the impression that UNEF was operating at the bid and call of Nasser. Mr. Pearson had made the Canadian position in this regard very clear both in the Advisory Committee and in the General Assembly. The Canadian Government was not prepared to withdraw from that position. We realized that the Secretary General was aware of this Canadian attitude but we urged that he should consider ways and means of making clear to the Egyptian Government and to the General Assembly that UNEF could not operate subject to the veto of any single power. UNEF derived its authority from the General Assembly whose resolution on UNEF has received almost unanimous support.

3. Cordier showed that he was completely aware of the Canadian position and of the difficulties which the non-participation of the Canadian infantry battalion had created for the Government of Canada. He said that the Secretary General was conscious of the need to uphold the principle which Mr. Pearson had advocated as to the composition and functions of UNEF. The Secretary General had been unable to devise a formula for overcoming the difficulties of the situation.

4. Cordier referred to the possibility that elements of UNEF might be employed at once in the Gaza Strip. He clearly had in mind that this would be a probable area in which the Canadian infantry battalion could be deployed. Preliminary explorations had revealed, however, that Israel would be "adamant" about the deployment of UNEF in the Gaza Strip. The Israelis were digging in there very rapidly. They had established a civilian administration; they were telling the inhabitants that at long last economic justice was at hand; they were encouraging them to believe that the Gaza Strip henceforth would be part of Israel. (In our view this seemed to be all the more reason for deploying UNEF in the Gaza Strip at the earliest possible date.) We enquired whether it would not be desirable from the point of view of the UN and Israel that UNEF should be deployed in the Gaza Strip to stabilize the situation there. We asked whether there might be any advantage in our talking to the Israelis about this possibility. Cordier's reply was largely negative; he said that the problems of Gaza and Sinai would have to be tackled after the current problems of deploying UNEF in the Canal Zone had been resolved.

5. Cordier said he would discuss the points raised by us with the Secretary General "during the day" and would let us know the outcome. He seemed keenly aware of the urgency of the matter and anxious though not hopeful that a formula for activating the Canadian infantry battalion should be found soon. We shall of course report at once any further conversations on this subject.

6. As you know, the situation is at the moment in the most delicate phase. If we can get through the next few days without any serious disturbance, we may arrive at a position when the whole atmosphere could change rapidly for the better and make possible an easier solution for Canadian difficulties. You are aware of the care and effort on the part of many parties which have gone into the endeavour to prevent eruptions here. While we realize the strength of Canadian feeling, we earnestly hope that you would be able to hold the line for a few days more. There is little doubt in our minds here that any public indication of Canadian dissatisfaction at this point would have a most precarious effect on current negotiations.

MIDDLE AND FAR EAST; A DOUBLE STANDARD FOR DIPLOMATIC CONDUCT?

While I agree entirely that the application by the USA of a double standard in the Middle and the Far East would provide further serious disturbance to the Western Alliance, it may be that Caccia has taken too much from Hoover's answer that the USA determination to act only through the UN is applicable to "a particular area" (Robertson's telegram 1706 December 1).

2. On the other hand I have little doubt that in due course there will be further difficulty between the allies over Formosa and the offshore islands and that there will be many in this country (and doubtless in the administration itself) who will be unwilling to see the applicability of the present USA policy with regard to the Middle East. It would, however, in my judgment be a serious mistake to introduce this topic at this time when we are all doing everything we can to restore the cohesion of NATO.

3. The time will almost certainly come when we shall have to do so and it should be helpful then to refer to the determinedly UN stand of the President and the USA administration. But for the moment my, perhaps craven, advice is to regard this difference in your words "as trouble ahead".

UNEF — STATUS OF UNEF IN MIDDLE EAST

It is clear from your telegram under reference that the United Nations officials do not repeat not feel as strongly as we (and perhaps some of the other countries concerned) do on the question of full immunity from local jurisdiction for the UNEF. We are glad to note however that the initial United Nations position is that members of UNEF should be fully immune from the jurisdiction of Egyptian courts and we trust that you will use your utmost endeavours to see that this position will be maintained. The United Nations officials will no doubt realize that the question of immunity from local jurisdiction is one on which there is likely to be considerable public interest in contributing States and could pose a domestic political problem for governments concerned. For your own information the Opposition has already expressed the view in Parliament that Canadian forces should not be exposed to the jurisdiction of Egyptian courts and it is possible that there will be considerable public support for this view.

2. Since there have apparently already been some informal discussions with the Egyptians on the question of immunity you should bring the following comments in whole or in part informally to the attention of the United Nations negotiating officials in an attempt to influence them at this stage rather than wait until the matter is referred to the Advisory Committee by which time United Nations opinion may have hardened as a result of their talks with the Egyptians:

(a) While it is probably true that the bulk of practice, as reflected in intergovernmental agreements, is in favour of only granting immunity from local jurisdiction to friendly visiting forces in respect of on-duty offences it seems to us that the role of the UNEF places them in a different category from other visiting forces and hence the provisions of existing Status of Forces Agreements (e.g. NATO) do not repeat not provide a satisfactory precedent. While UNEF may be in Egypt at the invitation of the Egyptian Government, the fact remains that they are a police force and their task is to maintain the peace between two sides. It may be questioned whether this task can be impartially performed if the members of UNEF are in any way subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of either of the parties to the dispute.

(b) During the Korean operation United Nations forces were not repeat not subject to the jurisdiction of the Korean courts. It is true that Korea was a large fighting operation but we think that the precedent there is not repeat not irrelevant to the Middle East operation. While the UNEF does not repeat not expect to engage in hostilities presumably they must be prepared to do so if attacked from any quarter or possibly if the belligerents were to resume fighting. To this extent therefore, that is to say to the extent that UNEF are on active service in a theatre of operations rather than merely stationed in a rear area, the Korean precedent has some application.

(c) The Egyptians may point to the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, the Agreement on the Status of United Nations Forces in Japan, the United Kingdom-Egyptian Status of Forces Agreement of 1936 and the war-time United States-Egyptian Status Agreement of 1943 as precedents for the view that members of visiting forces should not repeat not be immune from local jurisdiction in respect of off-duty offences. Against these agreements we could cite the Canada-United States and United Kingdom-United States agreements of the last war which gave the United States exclusive jurisdiction over United States visiting forces. Moreover we believe that there are still in existence to-day exclusive jurisdiction agreements between the United States and certain non-NATO countries in which United States forces are stationed. For example, (although we have no definite information) we imagine that United States and British air forces in Libya and the United States forces in Morocco are not repeat not subject to the local jurisdiction. But our main argument against the precedent of previous agreements is that outlined in (a) above. Another point (which we do not repeat not suggest should be communicated to the Egyptians, but which might be mentioned informally to the United Nations officials), is that during the operation of the above-mentioned United Kingdom and United States status agreements with Egypt, justice was administered by mixed courts which we understand is not repeat not the case today.

(d) We note in paragraph 2 of your POLEG-1534† that Malania said that the arrangements for UNTSO observers, i.e. bringing them under Article VI of the convention on the privileges and immunities of the United Nations, could hardly be made applicable to UNEF personnel. Malania's remark seems to be at variance with paragraph 21 (a) of the (second) draft of regulations for UNEF which provides that officers at United Nations Command Headquarters will enjoy immunities of Article VI of that convention. This would seem to indicate according to Malania's interpretation of Article VI that the officers at United Nations Command HQ would enjoy full immunity from local courts unless waived by the Secretary General whereas rest of UNEF would not repeat not.

(e) Finally it seems to us that the United Nations may wish to bear in mind the precedent which would be set for future United Nations military operations if they agree with respect to Egypt that members of the UNEF shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the host country.

3. Our purpose in sending you the above views at this time is to provide you with material in support of the Canadian view for future discussion with officials of the United Nations and other interested delegations.¹⁶²

UNEF: DR. MACKAY'S VIEWS ON POLEG 1562

My memorandum of December 4,† attaching a draft of a suggested telegram to Washington, has been overtaken by the attached telegram (POLEG 1562) from the Permanent Delegation and a conversation with Dr. MacKay.

2. Dr. MacKay feels that there is now no doubt in his mind that the Canadian battalion will be asked to join UNEF; the question is that of timing. Two main considerations in his judgment are affecting the timing:

- (a) the effort of the Secretary-General to provide as balanced a force as possible in terms of regional contributions (he wishes to accept contributions from Brazil and Pakistan), and
- (b) the problem of building up the logistical supply for an integrated force.

3. He does not believe that political objections on the part of Egypt are now blocking the constitution and deployment of the force. He would therefore doubt the advisability of asking the U.S. to put pressure on the Egyptians as the Secretary-General is trying to keep the Egyptians out of the picture at the moment. He also believes that the Secretary-General is doing all that is possible to speed up a decision on the Canadian battalion.

4. Dr. MacKay said that he hoped to be in a position to phone you or me around noon today with further information about paragraph 4 of the attached message.

UNEF

After the meeting of the Advisory Committee this morning (December 4) I asked the Secretary General whether he was in a position to say anything more about the integration of the Canadian infantry battalion in UNEF. I pointed out that the Canadian Government was anxiously awaiting an indication of when the actual integration was likely to take place. I referred to earlier conversations which we had with Cordier and emphasized, from the Canadian point of view, the need for an early decision.

2. The Secretary General said that he was conscious of the difficulties which were facing the Canadian Government. He believed that developments in the Middle East situation during the last few days have brought us much closer to the time when some positive step could be taken to integrate the Canadian infantry in UNEF. He referred to the indications from Israel that its forces would be withdrawn from Sinai and said, as he had done in the Advisory Committee, that it would shortly be possible to expand and deploy UNEF. He spoke of his desire to maintain a numerical balance, as between national contingents, in the composition of UNEF but said that this would not cause any particular difficulty as regards the integration of the Canadian infantry battalion. I gathered that he intended in the immediate future to expand the contribution from the four geographical areas now represented on the force: Asia, Latin America, Scandinavia and North America.

3. The Secretary General said that he wished to integrate the Canadian infantry battalion as soon as possible. He also wished to accept contributions from Brazil and Pakistan. To some extent this depended on discussions he was about to have with Israel. He explained that he had been unable to enter into these discussions before now because of the complexity of the negotiations concerning the withdrawals from Egypt and the clearance of the Suez Canal. He suggested that it would be unrealistic to say that within the next two days he could give us a definite answer about when the Canadian infantry would be integrated but that about the weekend he should be able to give us an indication (throughout he was speaking of the battalion as a whole). I was not happy about these non-committal utterances by the Secretary General. I reiterated the urgency with which the Canadian Government viewed the need for a clear indication of when the Canadian infantry would be called forward. To some extent I believe the vagueness in the Secretary General's replies can be attributed to his customary caution in matters of this kind. I am satisfied that he is well aware of our particular problem and from what he said I judge that the delay in calling forward the Canadian infantry is now perhaps more a technical problem of deploying the force rather than a political problem involving Egypt.

4. Shortly after my discussion with the Secretary General I spoke to Cordier. I explained that we were somewhat disturbed by the continuing lack of any indication of when the Canadian battalion would join UNEF. Cordier, whose approach is considerably more direct than the Secretary General's, said he saw no reason why at least one company of the QOR could not be integrated in the force almost at once. He explained that on December 5 the Secretary General would discuss with his officials the current problems of the force and particularly that of deploying and expanding it. Cordier assured me that he would press the view that some element of the Canadian infantry should be called forward at once and that the departure of the balance of the battalion in the Magnificent should follow very soon. We have been sufficiently encouraged by what Cordier said to recommend that if at all possible any decision concerning the removal of the QOR from Halifax or on unloading of the Magnificent should be delayed at least until Cordier has had an opportunity to report to us on tomorrow's meeting of Secretariat officials.

UNEF: DR. MACKAY'S COMMENT ON MOST IMMEDIATE TELEGRAM
NO. 259 FROM CAIRO

Dr. MacKay phoned Ignatieff at 1:00 p.m. to say that he wanted you to have certain preliminary comments on General Burns' latest proposals concerning the Canadian contribution to UNEF.

2. Dr. MacKay said that General Burns' latest suggestion seemed to make sense, i.e. that, instead of the QOR's Canada would supply an armoured reconnaissance unit or squadron of company size of about 200 men, in addition to the contributions previously requested but not yet met of: a signal unit of 180 men, a communications and observation air squadron of about 300 men, a workshop of about 150 men and two more transport platoons of about 100 men (totalling about 1000 men or the equivalent of a battalion).

3. He discussed Burns' proposal in a preliminary way with Bunche and Cordier as well as with the Canadian military advisers. Their reactions were likewise favourable on the grounds that they emanated from the U.N. Commander himself and reflected his own view of military requirements. In particular, there had already been evidence that General Burns was having difficulty in digesting additional infantry units.

4. Dr. MacKay stressed, however, that the Secretary-General had not yet been informed of General Burns' latest proposal. Cordier hoped to speak to him at lunch-time and Dr. MacKay hoped to be able to report further around 2:30 this afternoon. He would be phoning Ignatieff and a message will be sent to you as soon as it is received.

5. In the meantime, Dr. MacKay added the comment that in view of the current debate at Westminster on the Middle East situation, he would like to submit his strong plea that no announcement be made until there is further consultation with the U.N. that there has been a change of plan on the Canadian contribution affecting the QOR's and the Magnificent.

He also wanted to stress again that the difficulties in his judgment were practical ones and not political objections on the part of the Egyptians.

UNEF

General Burns has just seen me to say he is sending a message tonight to Secretary General making the following proposals relating to Canadian contribution to UNEF. The following is not a transcript of his message but a summary of his suggestions. He is not advancing these views as a firm recommendation at present but rather as an idea for consideration. He hopes that after further study and if the idea is acceptable final recommendations could be made within a day or so. I am therefore forwarding these ideas of his to you for your consideration.

2. It is understood that the Canadian Government is pressing for the despatch of the Queen's Own Rifles to UNEF and of course General Burns would welcome a Canadian battalion in this force. But it is now his view that some other type of contribution from Canada (groups corrupt) in both a better organized and more effective force.

3. Inquiries have already been made as to whether Canada would supply the following: A signal unit of about 180 men; a communications and observation air squadron of about 300 men, this to come after the air lift is completed and transport squadron released. A workshop of about 150 men is needed and there have been yet no offers from other countries; two more transport platoons are required of about 100 men.

4. General Burns would find it desirable if he could have as a combined unit an additional armoured reconnaissance unit or squadron of company size of about 200 men. The total number of troops listed above would approximate a battalion and if they could be sent out by the Magnificent there is no question that the effectiveness of UNEF would be greatly increased. The above suggested Canadian contribution is based on the assumption that UNEF would remain in force for at least another three months. This ends summary of General Burns message to Secretary General.

5. I have not seen press reports on present Canadian contribution to UNEF, but I hear from all sides and first and foremost from General Burns what an invaluable component part they are. Other countries in the main have sent infantry units, but the Canadian contribution of signals and administration personnel, medical and army service have made it possible for UNEF to function administratively. But more than mere functioning thanks to present Canadian contribution UNEF has been able to set about its complex task briskly and efficiently. Further contribution suggested above in General Burns message would be in this tradition of highly specialized and practical type of contribution.

6. You will of course shortly learn of this proposal of General Burns to Secretary General but I am transmitting this message so that you must have advance notice as soon as possible.

UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 28)

26. The Minister of National Defence said it was understood that the commander of the United Nations Emergency Force was sending the Secretary General further proposals on the Canadian contribution to the force. These were not as yet firm recommendations but ideas for consideration. General Burns was aware that the Canadian government was pressing for a decision on the Queen's Own Rifles and, of course, would welcome a Canadian battalion. However, his view was that some other type of contribution would lead to a better organized and more effective force. The proposals included the following:

- (a) A signal unit of about 180 men;
- (b) a communications and observation air squadron of about 300 men, to come after the airlift was completed and the transport squadron released;
- (c) a workshop of about 150 men, for which as yet no offers have come from other countries;
- (d) two more transport platoons of about 100 men; and,
- (e) an additional armoured reconnaissance unit or squadron of company size of about 200 men.

The total number of the above troops would approximate a battalion. They would be sent out in the Magnificent and there was no question that the effectiveness of U.N.E.F.

would be greatly increased. The suggested contribution was based on an assumption that U.N.E.F. would remain in being for at least another three months.

27. Mr. Campney added that the Chief of the Air Staff was working out a proposal in connection with the communications and observation air squadron which would involve retaining 4 C-119's from the airlift and the sending over of some small planes. The C.A.S. considered such a request could be met and some 250 men would be needed. The Chief of the General Staff was looking into the question of a reconnaissance squadron. If the proposals came forward officially and were agreed to, it would mean that General Burns would be provided with what was really a Canadian-manned headquarters. Very good reports had been received as to the present Canadian contribution in this field and there had been no objections from the Egyptians. Settling on this type of assistance would preclude the use of the Queen's Own Rifles at the present time, and it would be most advisable then to return the unit by train to Calgary before Christmas.

28. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that the suggestion was entirely one made by General Burns himself. It had now reached the Secretary General who was in consultation with his military advisers. Mr. Hammarskjöld had his own ideas as to the possible use of the Q.O.R., probably in the Gaza strip. No decision should be taken immediately and the Secretary-General should have at least twenty-four hours to decide what to do. If he told General Burns that it was necessary to take over the Gaza strip, and use the Q.O.R., the latter would have to decide whether or not to proceed with his present proposals. Canada could not provide for both. There would be no question of any reference to Egypt in either case.

A message could be sent to New York for the Secretary General's information that, if there were an inclination to ask for Canadian specialized units rather than for the Q.O.R., the Canadian feeling was that this had best be done, but that Canada could not undertake to send both.

29. During the discussion the following points were made:

(a) It would be better to provide headquarters' troops rather than get involved in occupying the Gaza strip, even though there would be criticism of failure to use the Q.O.R. Negotiations on the strip were only now beginning and, although the idea of interposing a U.N. force between the returning Egyptians in the Sinai peninsula and the Israeli army was sound in principle, many difficulties could be expected, particularly as Israel had said the Gaza strip was not part of Egypt.

(b) The future of the police force was completely indefinite. It might break up in a few weeks but might more likely operate for a year. There was a much better chance of a settlement of the Suez Canal and Israel problems if a U.N. force was on the ground. The next important item on the agenda was to start work on clearing the canal. Then the Israel problem might be tackled. It would take one year to demonstrate whether the U.N. could or could not do the latter job.

(c) The Q.O.R. had been sent to Halifax following formal advice from the Secretary General that this would be the most satisfactory contribution from Canada. Subsequent experience on the spot in Egypt had led General Burns to think that a different kind of assistance was better. Care had been taken, with every change, to get the requests in writing from the Secretary General.

30. Mr. Pearson subsequently reported that the Canadian representative at the United Nations had transmitted his message and had been informed that a definite decision would be known to-night or, more likely, to-morrow. It was likely that the decision would be in favour of a headquarters unit.

31. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the reply to the message sent to the Secretary General of the United Nations, and agreed that if specialized service units, such as those described, were requested by the Secretary General rather than the Queen's Own Rifles, they might be despatched on the Magnificent if that course appeared best, and the Queen's Own returned to Calgary.

UNEF: DISCUSSION WITH CANADIAN PERMANENT MISSION, NEW YORK

In accordance with your instructions, I telephoned Dr. MacKay after the Cabinet meeting and told him that what the Canadian Government now wants urgently is a statement in writing from the Secretary-General of exactly what the UNEF Commander desires as a Canadian contribution. In this statement it should be made quite clear why the contribution of a battalion is no longer required and what different contribution is to be requested of the Canadian Government in specific terms.

2. Assuming that the Queen's Own Rifles would no longer be required, I emphasized the importance of the public relations aspect of this change in the form of the Canadian contribution. I emphasized particularly that the Secretary-General's letter should bring out clearly Canada's prompt response to the previous U.N. request for a self-contained battalion and why Canada was now being asked to do something else. I also emphasized the time factor, namely that you and Mr. Campney would be leaving for the NATO meeting this Saturday [December 8] and that a decision would have to be reached before then.

3. This conversation was followed up the next morning with an enquiry by telephone as to what had been done to bring these views to the attention of the Secretary-General. We were told Thursday morning that the Secretary-General had sent a priority message to General Burns to the effect that his suggestions about the new form of the Canadian contribution seemed to make sense in terms of the new plans for the build-up of UNEF to approximately 6,000 and that, if he (Burns) were to put his enquiry of yesterday in the form of specific recommendations, these would be put in the form of a request to the Canadian Government.

4. We were further informed that Dr. Bunche has been asked by the Secretary-General to draft a letter along the lines suggested by us which would incorporate the specific recommendations of General Burns. It was confirmed to us that there would be no question of referring this specific request in any way to the Egyptian Government for clearance and that therefore the written request from the Secretary-General and the reply from the Canadian Government would be sufficient to put the new plan for the Canadian contribution into effect.

5. I shall report further developments as further information is received from New York.

MIDDLE EAST

We have been giving a good deal of thought here to the nature of a possible settlement on the Middle East. It can perhaps be said that the diplomacy of a settlement is as important a matter for consideration as the terms which can be negotiated or imposed. There is no use working out plans if they will not be accepted. The force that will induce acceptance is bound to be a mixture of pressure and self-interest, with due regard to face.

2. The pressures and appeals which can be brought into play will have to come to a large extent from outside, primarily from the Great Powers. However, there has been a radical change in the position of the Powers, which will have to be assessed coolly. The unpleasant and unwelcome fact that we must accept is that Britain and France are not, for the immediate future at least, in a position to exert pressure and would, in fact, be wise to stay out of the picture entirely. We are left to invoke the power of the USA and the Soviet Union, both of which seem to have strengthened their positions in the favour of the Arab countries.

3. It is clear that the interests of the free world depend upon the extension of the influence of the USA in the Middle East. This extension may have to be to some extent at the expense of the interests and prestige of the UK in that area. That is not a situation we would have wished, and which we should do everything to mitigate but the stakes are such that British and French feelings, if not their basic interests, may have to be sacrificed. Although relations between the NATO Powers must be re-established, the USA cannot play the role it must play in the Middle East unless it stands somewhat aloof from British and French policies in that part of the world — or unless, of course, it is offered changed policies on such subjects as Cyprus and Algeria to support. Our anxiety over relations between the USA and its European allies should not lead us into pressing the USA to accommodate these allies to such an extent that it loses its position of influence in the Middle East and Asia, because it is a fundamental interest of NATO that the influence be maintained.

4. Some months ago we were tending to think that we had to accept Soviet participation in a Middle East settlement as a sine qua non of such a settlement, on the grounds that the Arabs could never be persuaded to compromise so long as they knew that the Russians would support their most extreme demands. We had some hope that the Russians were sufficiently worried over the explosive nature of the conflict in the Middle East to agree to some kind of stabilizing agreement. It is still possible that they would settle for some agreement rather than provoke the USA too far, but British and French action last month and the repulse of this action by American intervention must have altered their calculations considerably. While they may still agree to come to terms, it is wise to assume that for the time being they consider their best policy would be to keep the Middle Eastern pot stirred and to seek their best advantage from backing the Arabs to the hilt. At any rate for some time to come our relations with the Russians are not likely to be conducive to a Four-Power solution unless there were a radical change in the situation in Eastern Europe.

5. If this is the case, then the prospects of a settlement are dim. The Egyptians and other Arabs are probably nervous about closer association with the USSR and would prefer American support, but if the Americans are supporting not a complete Arab triumph but a just settlement with Israel and a reasonable solution of Suez, the Arabs are unlikely to resist the temptation to fall back on Soviet diplomatic support. They will be encouraged to do so in particular if they have also the moral support of the Asian countries, and of India in particular. Asian support may not mean much in economic or military terms, but their moral backing combined with that of the Communists would make it impossible for the USA to get a majority in the UN to press the Arabs into acceptance.

6. Is it possible, however, that the diplomatic situation would be altered considerably for the better if the USA could win over India and her Asian associates to collaboration in the formulation of a settlement? Such an endeavour might be achieved at the meeting between Mr. Nehru and Mr. Eisenhower this month, and the Canadian Government could assist it greatly by following up such a gambit when Mr. Nehru comes to Ottawa. The Indian record on the Middle East, in spite of the protestations of Mr. K. Menon, is not a very worthy one. They have either stood back pharisaically and cried out at the wickedness of the Western Powers or they have played Arab-Asian politics to get support for their own positions. At no time — except possibly during the recent Suez crisis when their economy was affected — have they shown any serious interest in contributing toward a genuine pacification. It is, of course, tempting for countries to be irresponsible when the Great Powers do not encourage them to be responsible. The Indians may often cause a lot of trouble, but there can be no doubt that, unlike the Soviet Union, they really want peace and stability in the Middle East. They react irascibly to any request to subscribe to a settlement imposed by what were formerly the major powers in the area. Is it not possible, however, that Mr. Nehru would respond differently to a direct request from President Eisenhower to work out with the USA and sell to the Arabs a framework of peace in the Middle East? The Indians are committed to the continued existence of Israel and to the freedom of the Suez Canal. There is little that stands in the way of a common front between them and the Americans. The differences are more in the mind, and might be exorcized by a genuine offer of collaboration on terms of equality.

7. India is, of course, no substitute for the Soviet Union as a partner in a Middle Eastern settlement. However, even if India could not bring military or economic assistance, its collaboration would at the very least have a negative value; they would not, in that case, be working against a settlement, encouraging the Arabs to refuse on the basis of anti-imperialism any terms whatsoever. There would be no use, of course, bidding the Indians to join the Americans in order to oppose the Russians, because this would be contrary to the deepest Indian instincts as to how settlements can be achieved. The Indians might, however, put pressure on the Russians to be sensible, and the very fact of their being in association with the USA would make Soviet opposition more difficult.

8. It could be objected that the USA, by appealing to India in this way, would be exalting India close to the rank of a Great Power in place of the UK and France. Certainly the result would be to enhance still further the position of quasi-Great Power to which Krishna Menon has clawed his country's way in the UN. The authority of India among Asians and Arabs, although by no means absolute and unquestioned, is nevertheless a fact to be faced. The trouble now is that India too often wields the influence of a Great Power without the sobering sense of responsibility for peace in all parts of the world which goes with that status. One important reason why they do not do so is that the Western Powers do not treat them as equals. That is why it is important for the USA, without any further delay, to invite the Indians to work with them in achieving a settlement. They should certainly declare this attitude before we are launched on the USA resolutions in the Assembly. The Indians are now suspicious of these resolutions and of the whole effort by the Western Powers to use the present crisis to achieve permanent solutions, and the effort is unlikely to succeed unless the USA can win more allies that it now has in favour of a settlement which is fair to the Arab States but which asks them to retreat from their extreme demands.

9. The difficulty in a programme of this sort is that the Americans will have to ride two very balky horses at the same time. They will have to restore the Western Alliance, and try to protect the basic Western economic interest in the Middle East, if NATO is not to suffer from early inanition. But they will also have to gain the confidence of the Arabs and Indians, by giving the impression of working separately from the UK and France. It may be that the USA will be able to secure the confidence of their European allies in their ability to do this. But the danger remains that public opinion in England and France, already dangerously anti-American, will interpret a USA wooing of the Arabs and India as in some way a betrayal of the Alliance. If this should happen it would further exacerbate USA relations with France and the UK, and precipitate the dilemma for Washington of having to choose between the Western Alliance (and the solid base of the anti-Soviet policy of the USA) or the Arabs and India. Nevertheless I see no alternative but attempting to wed these two policies, and it should not be beyond the possibilities of diplomacy, of which the basic ingredient must be absolute frankness between the three major Western powers.

10. If there is anything in this approach, could we talk to the Americans in Washington about it?

New York, December 8, 1956

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Attached is a memorandum which I have prepared in a few quiet moments we have had recently. I recall your asking us to keep notes of the various stages of the recent excitements here. What I have prepared is not a chronological report in any sense as this has been much better done by you and by Geoff [Murray]. However, there were a few things I recalled which seemed to me ought to be on the record and might be useful for reference in future.

The other day I had a long talk with Leo Malania which was concerned to a large extent with the personality of the Secretary-General and his attitude on many things. Leo referred to the article in Time about the creation of UNEF and said that it was, of course, quite wrong to suggest that Mr. Hammarskjöld had initiated the idea of a United Nations force. In fact, he said, the Secretary-General had been quite cool to the idea at first.¹⁶⁴ I mentioned to him the lunch on November 2 and Leo confirmed entirely the impression we had of the Secretary-General's attitude at that time. He said, however, that this lunch, which he knew about, had been the turning point in the Secretary-General's thinking. I said that I was somewhat surprised as it did not seem to me that the Secretary-General had been influenced much by what you had said at the lunch. Leo said that this was the way the Secretary-General usually worked. If an idea was left with him, it began to germinate. In this case, he said, it germinated later in the day and in a short time he began to see in it a way out of the situation which had previously depressed him completely. Leo said that he had discussed these things with Andy Cordier and Andy had told him that it was the lunch with you that was the turning point.

If there are any other parts of the story which you think we should set down, please let me know. We have had a bit more time of late although we are still very hard pressed. Fortunately we have an even better than usual delegation which works very well together. The Parliamentary group are a particularly nice lot this year and seem to be making the most of the opportunity. Because everything is very harmonious and there is such a high level of general competence, we are all feeling a lot better than we otherwise might. I do hope that you will not exhaust yourself in Paris. The U.N. needs you badly.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN [HOLMES]

SECRET & PERSONAL

[New York], December 6, 1956

I have at last had an opportunity to go through a few notes I have made during the past few weeks and make a note of a few assorted aspects of recent events which you may wish to have for your personal record. The following is not intended to be a consecutive account but merely a few notes which may not be reflected in the files.

1. On Friday, November 2nd Mr. Hammarskjöld and Mr. Cordier came to lunch with you. Dr. MacKay and I were also present. It was the day after the first long night session of the Assembly during which you had, in explaining Canada's abstention on the USA resolution, spoken in general terms about an international force. You talked about this idea at lunch but the Secretary-General was not very receptive. He did not seem to have directed his attention very seriously to the proposal. He did not reject the idea but he spoke almost entirely of the difficulties. He seemed confident that such a "police force" would not be accepted. He emphasized the Israeli objections. He said that Ben Gurion considered even

¹⁶⁴ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

This is correct — witness the comment he made on the note [non retrouvée/not located] I sent to him on the podium an hour or so before introducing the resolution. L.B. P[earson]

the present United Nations observers to be intruders. In the course of the discussion he was extremely critical of Israel and its leaders; a position which may be attributed to some extent to the shock of the recent invasion. At one point he expressed the view that Israel as a state would not last. He was very critical of Israeli methods of negotiation, particularly their habit of gaining a point and then moving on to gain more. He seemed to believe that there had probably been collusion between the French and the Israelis before the invasion but he was very doubtful if the British were involved.

One of the reasons for his failure at this point to back up the idea of an international force seemed to be his preoccupation with the Suez Canal negotiations in which he had been involved with Messrs. Fawzi, Pineau and Lloyd. Clearly he was bitterly disappointed that these discussions, which he thought were progressing hopefully, had been frustrated by the invasion. He said that the advance towards agreement of the three Foreign Ministers had gone farther than was generally known. The Foreign Ministers had, in fact, gone farther than their instructions, and one of the problems was the difference between their positions and those of their respective prime ministers. The latest proposals he had made had not been rejected by Fawzi at the time of the invasion. Hammarskjöld had even taken some steps to arrange a private meeting in New York between Fawzi and Mrs. Meir and had some hope that this might take place. He added that early in July, that is before the nationalization of the Suez Canal (July 26), the Egyptians had approached the British and French about the possibility of negotiations with the Israelis and had spoken to him as well. He also expressed his firm conviction that Nasser did not want the Russians to gain control in Egypt and would be cautious about going much farther with them.

The Secretary-General was very much exercised over the situation in the Gaza strip. He believed from his reports that the refugees were being badly treated and that, as they were armed, there might be a terrible massacre. He said that if this did break out he would personally ask the United States fleet to intervene.

2. During the night session of November 3rd (that is two days before Krishna Menon arrived in New York) Arthur Lall drew me aside to speak about the idea of an international force. He told me that he had been quick to notice Sir Anthony Eden's statement that the United Kingdom and France would be happy to turn over their responsibilities to a United Nations force — which, he seemed to think, would be largely American. He saw in this a way out of the situation and talked to Cabot Lodge who agreed with him that this was a very profitable line to pursue. (Mr. Dulles had, of course, given support to your "constructive" suggestions shortly after your intervention on November 1—2.). Lall and Lodge then spoke to Loutfi and Loutfi himself agreed. Loutfi then telephoned to Fawzi in Cairo, who explained the idea to Nasser. When Lall spoke to me he had just received the news that Nasser had agreed in principle. This conversation took place before the Canadian resolution had come to a vote (November 4). Lall gave no indication that (as Krishna would have done in similar circumstances) he wished to claim Indian authorship for the proposal. He gave it to me simply as background information which we should have and which explained his willingness to go along with the Canadian resolution. I would gather also, from reports I have had from the Pakistanis and Japanese, that this preliminary negotiation, about which Krishna Menon knew nothing, was the cause of his discomfiture at the Arab/Asian meeting on Monday morning November 5. You will recall that at that meeting he began by opposing the idea of an international force and was then told that not only had most of the Arab/Asians supported the proposal but Nasser himself had agreed to it.

3. During the night session of November 3-4, when you were making up your mind whether or not to put forward our tentative resolution on an international force, I was approached on several occasions by one of the senior United Kingdom Advisers and one of the Senior French Advisers both of whom spoke to me on a personal basis. While the United Kingdom Adviser asked me never to reveal what he was saying, François de Laboulaye specifically said he did not mind at all being cited. Although they spoke to me separately they spoke in similar terms. They both urged me to urge you to push ahead with the idea of an international force which they saw, in their mood of desperation, as the only way out. The United Kingdom adviser took great pains to draw my attention to Sir Anthony Eden's statement on this subject (on November 1) and to the fact that Sir Pierson Dixon had quoted it in the Assembly. He added that the United Kingdom Delegation were not certain that their Prime Minister had not spoken ironically but they were determined nevertheless to use his statement for the purpose which they considered essential.

There is no doubt, of course, that both of these men, and more particularly de Laboulaye, had in mind the conception of a United Nations force which would take over from the French and British. Whether they would have been so enthusiastic about the United Nations force, as it has later been developed, I am not sure. De Laboulaye, while expressing the strong opinion that the international force was the only solution, nevertheless urged us to take it slowly. He said that it would take time to sell it to the French Government. He thought, however, that this could be done if we did not rush them. He was confident Alphand would accept it, and Alphand was very influential with the Government. He was not very happy with the speed at which our proposal was carried and when I last saw him, before he went back to Washington — November 6 — the day of the cease fire, he seemed to be disappointed in the proposal as it had finally come out, particularly with regard to the vague functions assigned to the force. You spoke to him, however, at this time and would be in a better position to know his attitude.

UNEF: CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

This afternoon Bunche gave Murray a letter No. PO/125 of December 10 confirming the request from General Burns, discussed orally during the past week, concerning an alternative Canadian contribution to UNEF. Bunche explained that this letter was an interim confirmation because at a later stage the Secretary-General proposed to send formal notes to all the Governments concerned about their contributions to UNEF. This was offered in explanation of the form of the present letter, the text of which reads as follows:

This is to confirm the request from General Burns, earlier transmitted to you orally, concerning an alternative Canadian contribution to the UNEF.

As you know, General Burns is decidedly of the view that the most effective Canadian contribution to UNEF would consist of additional personnel in the form of a signal unit, a communication and observation squadron, a workshop unit, one or two additional transport platoons, and a mobile reconnaissance unit. These would be in addition to Canadian personnel now in UNEF and would take the place of the standing offer of additional assistance in the form of Canadian infantry. General Burns has pointed out that any further infantry requirements of UNEF can be easily met elsewhere, while Canada is uniquely equipped to afford the vital support and administrative units not otherwise available. To the extent that Canada may find it possible to provide these urgent needs, General Burns hopes that the personnel and equipment may be dispatched to Port Said in HMCS Magnificent at the earliest possible date.

The assistance which Canada has already rendered to UNEF is invaluable and is greatly appreciated, and this is equally so with regard to the availability of Canadian infantry. But there can be no doubt that the best interests of the UNEF effort will be served if the additional Canadian contribution can be along the lines proposed by General Burns. Ends.

2. This text was telephoned to Leech about five o'clock this afternoon. He and McCordick were informed as well that the UN had issued a brief press release concerning the revised Canadian contribution to UNEF. This press release read as follows: Begins.

Secretary General Dag Hammarskjöld announced today that the Government of Canada has agreed to provide additional units to the UNEF, on the basis of an urgent request transmitted by the UNEF Commander, Major General E.L.M. Burns.

The additional units will include engineers, an army signal squadron, an infantry transport company, a field ordnance workshop unit, and a Royal Canadian Air Force communications and observation squadron. These are units needed to serve the force as a whole.

The additional Canadian contingents will leave for Egypt with their vehicles and equipment as soon as possible aboard the Canadian aircraft carrier HMCS Magnificent.¹⁶⁵ Ends.

MIDDLE EAST

1. Our ideas on the substance of a Middle East settlement are far from crystallized, but there is one practical question which we think needs to be examined right away. The delegation in New York has already suggested the desirability of an American invitation to India to collaborate in the formulation of a settlement. We have been asking ourselves whether it might be useful for the Canadian Government to recommend such a course to the United States, with a view to its discussion during the Nehru visit to Washington.

2. We start with certain basic assumptions:

(a) The Anglo-French-Israeli action has removed any immediate prospect that the Arab States and Israel might be able to agree upon a settlement on their own initiative;

(b) Plans for a settlement will therefore need promotion from outside the circle of parties directly concerned, and the settlement itself may very likely have to be imposed;

(c) If an imposed settlement is to be effectively guaranteed, it must be acceptable to Moscow as well as to the United States;

(d) The United Nations provides the only feasible avenue leading to an imposed settlement, although if in due course a peace conference were held, this need not necessarily be too closely linked with the United Nations.

2. For reasons developed in the delegation's message we would favour early Indian association with the United States in efforts to prepare a settlement, and we think there are important advantages in having President Eisenhower or Mr. Dulles raise the matter personally with Mr. Nehru rather than having it done through an intermediary such as Krishna Menon. If we decide, however, to suggest this to Washington, we should perhaps accompany our suggestion with some general thoughts on the role we would like to see played by the main Governments concerned.

3. In this connection we do not think that the United Kingdom and France should stay out of the picture altogether at this stage. It is, of course, obvious that they should conduct their diplomacy as unobtrusively as possible, and also that it would be fatal to the preservation of United States influence in the region if by rash public alignments with the United Kingdom and France, Washington were to squander the credit it has won among the Arabs and Asians. On the other hand there are reasons against allowing it to be publicly assumed that the United States contemplates moving into the Middle East like a battleship unsupported by friendly escorts. For one thing such tactics would almost certainly give rise to anxiety in London and Paris even though, as the delegation recommends, the way were prepared by absolute frankness among the three Western powers. Secondly, our guess (but this is only a guess) is that the Soviet Union would be likely to react with alarm to the prospect of more positive American policy in the Middle East if such a policy gave the appearance of being based on a "go it alone" principle, to the exclusion of the United Kingdom and France. Thirdly, it strikes us that despite the bitterness engendered in the Arab world by the military action in Egypt, the United Kingdom has somehow managed to retain a not inconsiderable political influence among all the Moslem members of the Baghdad Pact, as it certainly does in Turkey. These Governments may well require careful nursing if the Soviet Union and India are to participate in devising a peace settlement, and it would surely be prudent to endeavour to see that British influence in the Baghdad circle was being used from the outset in a manner likely to facilitate a general settlement. Finally, despite what has happened, Arab leaders undoubtedly expect NATO to mend its fences and will respect Western powers more fully if this is rapidly done and is reflected in the adoption of a more constructive policy toward the Middle East by the United Kingdom and France, which cannot but recognize that this will be necessary for them both if they are to continue to play an influential part in world affairs.

4. With regard to the role of the Soviet Union we have, it seems to us, to reconcile our determination to contain undesirable Soviet penetration and subversion of the Middle East countries, with an acceptance of the Soviet Government as an essential participant in the peace negotiations. We also think it desirable that the Soviet Government should be a guarantor of a peace settlement, or else that it should be shown to be the principal obstacle to such a settlement. We do not know how the United States would react to Soviet participation. There are obviously great difficulties, particularly if it proves that the Soviet Government used the role of a peacemaker to cloak continued trouble-making in the area. If, however, we accept the necessity of Soviet participation we must direct our efforts to seeing that the peace settlement should include, as a complement to the fixing of territorial boundaries, a comprehensive and intelligently planned programme of economic and social assistance, to aid the Arab States to improve their own living standards, establish their self-respect, reduce their fear of Israel, and thus gradually limit the opportunities for the Soviet brand of mischief from within. It would be preferable if such a programme, blueprints of which already exist at the United Nations, could be launched under the auspices of the U.N. and appropriate agencies, even if the main original source of the necessary funds were American.

5. India's role also deserves comment. The sooner the Indians can be induced to accept responsibility commensurate with their influence in the Arab world, the better. It is not, however, realistic to think of the Indians as being brought in as a substitute for the Russians, or even to mollify them. India's position is unique in that it has special links with the West, a latent position of leadership vis-à-vis the Arabs, a tolerable reputation in Israel, and a clear wavelength to Moscow with the assurance of being listened to. India therefore has qualifications to be a participant in its own right, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Nehru can be prevailed on to play the role for which India appears qualified. He has not shown much eagerness in the past, except in relation to the Suez Canal aspect of the Middle East problem, but his recent speeches show that the subject is uppermost in his mind.

6. It remains to consider how India might be brought in. One possible way would be to appoint it to the Committee envisaged in the pending U.S. draft resolution. We are, however, not sanguine about the likely productivity of this body, and we continue to favour the appointment of a single negotiator appointed with the approval of the General Assembly. Perhaps the two methods could be combined, with the Secretary-General being given power to take preliminary soundings with the assistance of an advisory committee of perhaps five individuals representing different geographical regions but excluding the major powers. The advantage of this would be to insulate the preliminary talks, to prevent a situation developing in which, from the outset of the negotiating process, the four major powers took conflicting public positions from which they could not later withdraw and which would prejudice the whole enterprise.

7. When the Advisory Committee (which might, of course, include an Indian) has completed preliminary soundings, a way might be found, again with the approval of the General Assembly, to call a Middle East peace conference limited to Israel, the Arab States, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, the U.S.S.R., plus India, under the chairmanship of the Secretary-General. It would be the task of this conference to examine plans put forward by the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee and to attempt to work out a general settlement which the Four Powers and perhaps India would endorse, and, insofar as a territorial solution was concerned, impose and guarantee.

8. We think it is not too early to urge President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles to talk seriously to Mr. Nehru about the channels and the agents, if not the substance, of a settlement. During our consideration of these questions we have been struck by the important place which the Baghdad Pact occupies in the thinking of all those Governments which will be directly associated with future negotiations. We ourselves have not decided what we should say if our advice were asked by, say, the Americans or the Indians. On the one hand the United States is searching now for a means of strengthening the Baghdad Pact powers without adhering to the Pact itself. If it takes a leading part in diplomatic moves leading to the establishment of security in the area which is guarded by the Northern tier alliance, this will of itself greatly reduce the danger of Soviet penetration in the Middle East. The United States may greatly prefer this indirect means of excluding effective Soviet influence, reserving military support of the Baghdad Pact powers as a last resort, to fall back on only if hostilities actually break out.

9. Another point of view is that the Baghdad Pact, now such a divisive element in the Middle East situation, might eventually come to have less of a raison d'être with the establishment of more stable conditions in the area. Members of the Pact could hardly be expected to entertain this thought as a short-term possibility, but it can be argued that Soviet penetration in the Middle East would be less determined, and meet with less success, if the Baghdad Pact did not exist to provoke the Russians, irritate the Indians, and divide the Arab States. Although perhaps these ideas apply to the distant future, they seem to point to the undesirability of formal U.S. association with the Baghdad Pact. If, as we hope, there is a genuine international desire for a new order in the Middle East, the U.S. should, on this argument, withstand pressure to join an organization whose future scope cannot yet be defined.

10. We should be grateful if you could find time to consider these thoughts with a view to their possible use by Arnold Heeny before Nehru's arrival in Washington.

AFTER SUEZ

Although the UK Suez policy is at last getting back on to the rails, some of the intangible but effective causes of the aberration remain and may prove to be less easy to cure. Indeed, the very failure of the intervention may in itself tend through frustration to strengthen some of the underlying attitudes which contributed to the Anglo French decision to intervene by force: among these attitudes has been dissatisfaction with the USA, with the UN, and even with NATO, and in general a restiveness at some of the restraints involved in living in international society as it now is organized.

2. The go-it-alone mentality, which led to the Anglo French decision to take matters into their own hands sprang in considerable part, as you know, from frustration and exasperation with what the UK and France interpreted as unreliability and almost indifference on the part of the USA towards vital Western European interests in the Middle East or North Africa. But now that it is becoming increasingly difficult to hide the fact that the Anglo French intervention has been a failure, the tendency to make America the public scapegoat has assumed disturbing proportion. In a sense the parties in power in the UK and France have acquired, temporarily, a political vested interest in anti-Americanism. Certainly anti-American feeling seems to be rather wider and deeper in France than in this country, where the more responsible governmental as well as the opposition leaders recognize its dangers. We have reason to believe, however, that Sir Anthony Eden last week sent messages from Jamaica encouraging more "standing up to the Americans" in ministerial statements.

3. Among the more sophisticated an alternative scapegoat is the UN. Though the events of the past five weeks have probably impressed opinion in the Western hemisphere and Asia as a demonstration of the efficacy of the UN, important sections of opinion here regard it primarily as a rather dangerous example of institutionalized injustice, in view of the contrast between its effectiveness against the UK and France and what might be considered its impotence in Hungary, Kashmir and elsewhere. One hears increasing doubts whether an institution with what is called a built-in double standard is after all compatible with European interests.

4. There is, of course, a very real problem here and frank recognition of it can be all to the good. The institutions of the UN, and particularly the General Assembly, unquestionably do involve a double standard in more than one way. First, the force of recommendations is largely moral, and therefore inevitably more effective in democracies where public opinion is decisive, than in totalitarian societies. Again, the more highly evolved democracies are more sensitive, and may therefore be considered more "vulnerable" to UN resolutions, than the rawer, more primitive, or more parochial societies. Again, England appears to be more sensitive than France to this sort of sanction. Secondly, the vast Afro Asian group of States had, of course, repeatedly demonstrated double standards both in terms of colour and in terms of a prejudice against the possession of overseas spheres of influence, which they are apt to consider more imperialist than the expansion of control round a nation's land periphery. This rather [sic] prejudice seems to involve a bias against civilizations which have traditions of sea communications, as contrasted with a tolerance toward the expansiveness of land (group corrupt) such as Russia and China.

5. Recognition that the UN has not been all that could be desired, can lead either to constructive proposals for improving, or to excuses for weakening, the world organization. I am afraid it cannot be taken for granted that all responsible thinking in this country — either in Parliament or in the Foreign Office — would prefer to strengthen the UN.

6. We have learned in confidence that some UK and French ministers during recent weeks have been talking about a situation in which withdrawal from the UN might be found necessary. There is no risk that they would actually go that far, now. The UK Foreign Office has, however, been asked in the past few weeks to make a reappraisal of the UN. (Group corrupt) a couple of meetings of the officials concerned, the reassessment has, we understand, been postponed without definite conclusions being reached. We have not obtained very much info on this study, but we understand that while there have been considerable divergencies of view many officials of head of departmental level and seniors consider that on balance the UN has been a gravely damaging factor, "if not, indeed, a disaster", for Western Europe. Naturally, we expressed the hope to our informant that the Foreign Office would at least recognize that the evolution of North America away from continental isolationism toward active participation in world affairs was part and parcel of the development institutionalized in the UN: and that if Europeans succeeded in weakening the UN they would probably create a reversion toward a continental "fortress America" policy. Unfortunately many Englishmen underestimate the strength of the North American predilection for an institutional and legalistic approach to international politics and seem to think that with enough education the USA could be made into the sort of pragmatic great power the UK itself was a century ago.

7. Concern at the danger of irresponsibility inherent in the one-state-one-vote system does not seem to have prompted in the Foreign Office any interest in possibilities of correcting this artificial imbalance in the Assembly, but prompts rather a desire to reverse the trend of the last seven years. The relative importance of the Assembly was built up in a desire to circumvent the Soviet veto; but this many here consider to have been a costly error. At the same time it is perhaps worth remarking that none here has yet noted that the recent Anglo French veto — leading almost automatically into the "uniting for peace" procedures — is likely to turn out to be a major undermining of such protection as the veto power did provide against irresponsible majorities.

8. UK Ministers and Foreign Office critics of the UN have been pleased to see recently increasing signs of criticism of the UN in other West European countries as well as France. They were, for example, delighted with Spaak's speech of November 29. They might not be unhappy to see wider discussion of UN shortcomings. This could be expected to appeal particularly to countries who have, or who had, colonies, such as Belgium, Portugal and The Netherlands.

9. We intended to send a message a couple of weeks ago reporting our misgivings about some of the UK attitudes towards the UN. Under pressure of more obvious and more immediate tasks we postponed this, perhaps wrongly, to get more info. Meanwhile the Economist, as always sensitive to Foreign Office trends, and we believe worried about this one, published last week a leading article on the UN designed inter alia to warn against excessive anti United Nations conclusions.¹⁶⁶ The article is worth perusal.

10. UK and French dissatisfaction with international institutions extends also to NATO. A Foreign Office informant has told us that some French Ministers including Mollet and Pineau have seriously contemplated emasculation, if not actual break-up, of NATO during 1957. Part of this, according to our informant, is apparently motivated by the hope that they might thereby free themselves of irksome American restraints. In the UK dissatisfaction with NATO is based on more rational grounds (a) that it costs too much and pins down too high a percentage of UK forces in Europe, and (b) that it frees Germany to concentrate on competing with British goods in world markets, while not pulling her weight in her own defence.

11. There is at present in Whitehall inevitably, and rightly, a fundamental reassessment taking place of Britain's position and policies in the world. This is as it should be, and events of the past three months have brought the need into sharper focus. There is however, the danger that resentments built up in this country during these months may in some circles colour and vitiate the thinking and make difficult the requisite dispassion.

12. Not least among the resentments is that between London and Paris. We gather that some of the British Ministers feel that the French were less frank with them about the extent of their prior arrangements with Israel. Some of the French on the other hand, feel that the UK having set their hand to the plough, turned back too soon. Each thus serves to some extent as a scapegoat for the other.

13. Naturally enough, not all the resentment, or search for scapegoats, is directed across national boundaries. In this country there has been unusual bitterness both between the parties and among the Conservatives themselves.

14. It is not only their allies whom the senior British and French Ministers failed to consult. So far as we can gather, Sir Anthony Eden, Mr. Macmillan and a very few others took the decision to intervene without discussion with many of their Cabinet colleagues, and without consulting most of their top official advisers either in the Foreign Office or the Chiefs of Staff Committee. Drastic and unexpected action which obviously depended for results on estimates of political reactions in the Middle East, Washington, the UN and other capitals, was decided on without any attempt to get estimates from diplomatic representatives in the areas concerned. A decision to use warlike measures was adopted without notice to the Leader of the Opposition. Virtually all the checks and balances normally considered inherent in democracy were by-passed.

15. It would be wrong were this message to give the impression that we are pessimistic about the way things will work out. It is, we feel, important that the dangers of some of the underlying currents be not under-estimated. On the other hand, and this will probably prove more important, the recent enforced contemplation of the abyss and the very costliness of the errors may prove salutary for future judgement.

16. We will be reporting separately on various aspects of the objective reappraisal which seems to be under way.¹⁶⁷

MIDDLE EAST — ROLE OF INDIA

As agreed in our phone conversation yesterday (with the Under-Secretary), I called on Murphy at noon today. I explained that the purpose of my visit was to pass on some tentative Canadian thoughts on the approach to a Middle East settlement, in view particularly of the impending visit of Mr. Nehru to Washington and Ottawa. I took with me as a basis for our conversation a memo drawn from paras 2 to 8 of your telegram under reference with some additional material from Holmes' message of December 6, and some editorial changes of our own. (Copies are being sent forward to you by bag). Handing this paper to Murphy, I explained that it was highly informal and did not represent anything more than tentative thinking at the official level. The Under-Secretary, I said, had agreed, nevertheless, that I pass it to the State Department at this stage in view of its relevance to Mr. Nehru's visit.

2. After we had read over the memo together, Murphy remarked first that he noticed we had not urged that the USA join the Baghdad Pact and enquired as to the Canadian attitude on the Pact. I said that the Canadian attitude was that we understood and sympathized with the purposes of the Pact and regarded it as a regional security arrangement justified by circumstances. I said that we were not urging the USA either to join the Pact or not to join it; there were serious arguments both ways.

3. Murphy said that, while it was not impossible that the USA might join the Pact at some stage, at the moment he saw no prospect of their doing so. Admittedly, this situation might change quite quickly. (Murphy himself pretty clearly felt that they would not and should not.) The USA, he went on, were under pressure from various quarters — notably the UK — to join. On the other hand, India, which was of course against security pacts generally, was strongly opposed. Saudi Arabia had also urged the USA not to join. Murphy thought the advantages of USA membership at this time were doubtful, particularly as it might be taken to imply that the USA could do more than in fact they were able to contribute to the security of the member countries. He was sure that the USSR would take a serious view of the USA's adherence; there was no telling what the Russian reaction might be but he had no doubt it would be positive. In view of the current Soviet preoccupations and anxieties in Europe, he added, the possibility of war by miscalculation, in his opinion, was now greater than it had ever been.

4. In connection with the Baghdad Pact, Murphy enquired whether we had in mind any other grouping or arrangement in the area. He said he did not mean a security pact but an association for political and economic co-operation. I replied that we had nothing else in mind beyond the sort of arrangements that might emerge from a Middle East peace conference of the kind mentioned in the memo.

5. In connection with the references in the memo to the role of the UK and France, Murphy commented that it was his impression that the British would not be satisfied with any subordinate role; nor did he think they should. Certainly the USA were most anxious to consult with the UK on the Middle Eastern situation. During the initial period prior to the commencement of the withdrawal of the Anglo-French forces from Egypt it had been necessary to avoid the appearance of too close consultation and not give the impression that they were working in collusion with the French and British. Once the withdrawal had commenced and UNEF had begun arriving, this phase had however passed and the USA had been willing and most anxious to resume their normally close contacts on this subject.

6. On the main contention in our memo — that the USA and India should collaborate in a search for a settlement — there was pretty clearly some reservation in Murphy's mind. He said he thought India could be most useful, if they were to take a constructive role. Immediately he went on to add that the USA could not depend on Krishna Menon as an agent in such co-operation. Quite frankly he had not trusted Krishna Menon's participation in Middle Eastern affairs so far (he mentioned particularly his visits to Cairo during the Suez Canal negotiations). In fact Krishna Menon was so unreliable and emotional in his methods and behaviours that the Americans would find it most difficult to work with him. So far as India was concerned, its collaboration would be most welcome to the USA and could be most valuable. India, he agreed, had a real interest in a Middle Eastern settlement since its economy would soon suffer severely from the consequences of the Canal closure.

7. On the prospect of these things being discussed by the President with Mr. Nehru, Murphy implied that this had not been planned in any positive way. Both the President and

Mr. Nehru had their own techniques and approaches in a meeting of the kind about to take place. There was certainly no precise agenda (personally I doubt if there is any). The President, Murphy said, apparently planned to play by ear. On the other hand, he was sure that the President had certain things in mind which he would say to Mr. Nehru. Similarly, he was reasonably certain that Mr. Nehru would have some definite things to put to the President — including Communist China.

8. Before leaving, I expressed the hope that we be kept informed about Mr. Nehru's visit — any word they could give us in advance, particularly on the topics raised in our memo; also some indications as the talks progressed. We would wish to take both into account in connection with Mr. Nehru's visit to Ottawa. Murphy said he would discuss our memo with Hoover and get in touch with us; if possible, he would let us know whether these matters would likely be discussed with Mr. Nehru in Washington.

SUEZ AND THE UN

There is growing impatience both in Parliament and among ministers and officials here at the delay in the work of Canal clearing. In particular there is a feeling that Hammar skjöld and General Wheeler have been unduly leisurely and compliant towards political conditions and obstructions from Nasser as regards the organization and start of salvage operations. There is some danger that this mounting frustration, coupled with renewed pressure from the Suez group in Parliament and the return from Jamaica later this evening of Sir Anthony Eden — who some think may lean towards a tougher and impenitent course — may lead to exasperated outbursts directed against the UN as such.

2. We understand in strict confidence that the French have proposed that the UK join them in introducing a resolution in the UN, perhaps tomorrow or Monday, criticizing non-cooperation by Egypt in the Canal clearing, and urging on the Secretary General stronger and speedier UN action to get the Canal open. We understand that the French also wish to accompany this draft resolution with statements criticizing the UN's impotence on Hungary and Kashmir, condemning its softness thus far towards Egypt, and perhaps even implying that if the UN does not insist on speedy cooperation from Egypt with regard to the Canal corresponding with the compliance it obtained from the UK and France on the cease fire and withdrawal issues, then the whole Anglo-French attitude towards the UN will inevitably have to be examined.

3. Our informant in the Foreign Office told us at noon today that the UK have not as yet taken any decision about the idea of a new UN resolution. We understand that the Foreign Office has recommended against introducing a resolution at this stage and that Selwyn Lloyd will be discussing the question with Pineau later today in Paris. We have also been told that Mollet and Pineau have been telling the British that they consider it a mistake to have gone as far as they have gone to build up the UN prestige: apparently some French leaders may look on the Canal clearing issue in part as an opportunity to weaken the UN which unless weakened is a nuisance to France over Algeria.

4. Presumably the UK Government will not go along with at least the more extreme French promptings and if they do decide to cooperate on a UN resolution and statements these will doubtless be more moderate than the French suggestions referred to above. At the official level, the Foreign Office would prefer to try to speed up the Canal clearing action through unofficial démarches and without any UN resolution. The Foreign Office is conscious inter alia of the danger that putting forward the UN resolution might prompt an acrimonious debate on Egyptian demands for reparations.

5. It is however, important not to underestimate the extent of concern here, and to recognize that the UK would seem to have a legitimate grievance if Hammarskjöld and Wheeler are, in fact, in order to be unduly compliant to Nasser, accepting any unnecessary delays in getting the actual job of clearing done.

6. As you know, British ministers have refused to allow British salvage vessels now in Port Said on the Canal to be used without their trained British crews. It seems to us that balance of reason is with them on this point. Indeed it might be logical for the UN to insist that the UK and France provide, at their own expense but under UN control, such salvage facilities and personnel as they have available. This might ease the debate in the Fifth Committee on sharing the cost and might help to head off or counter reparations claims.

7. We understand that last night in Paris Dulles sent McArthur to Selwyn Lloyd to propose that the UK agree to let the UN use six of the UK salvage vessels with the British crews on condition that (a) the crews wear civilian clothes; (b) any armaments on the vessels be made inoperative; (c) the ships fly the UN flag; and (d) there be one or more UN officials on each vessel as cover. The Americans estimated that use of these six British salvage vessels and crews will save two weeks in clearing a channel through the Canal. Dulles promised that if Selwyn Lloyd would accept he would "bring to bear whatever influence was necessary" on Hammarskjöld and McCloy to get them to accept this and proceed forthwith with the clearing.

8. We understand that Selwyn Lloyd replied to McArthur that he would have accepted this offer weeks ago. Lloyd did now of course accept it, and has sent a wire to Butler saying that the Cabinet must back it up. We understand also that Lloyd told the Americans that he hoped they would make use not of six but of all the UK salvage vessels on the spot. Using the lot, Lloyd said, would save not only two weeks but seven weeks.

9. The question about the employment, as civilian servants of the UN of UK salvage vessels and crews, to which Nasser has apparently objected, is in one aspect somewhat analogous to the question whether Hammarskjöld would accept and employ in Egypt Canadian, Pakistani and other components of the emergency force to which Egypt was raising objections. On the UNEF issue you insisted on the UN's right to decide for itself the composition of the force.

10. It occurs to me that you might wish to speak to Dulles and to telephone to Hammarskjöld urging maximum speed in clearing the Canal, by making use of all British salvage equipment and crews (under the conditions outlined above) which would contribute to speedier results. You might express to them your concern lest too much frustration and dissatisfaction in London lead to the loss of some of the progress made during the past few weeks: and, indeed, your concern at the growing feeling that the UN employs a double standard. You might also wish to do what you can with Lloyd and possibly Pineau to hold off an early or at least a drastic Anglo-French draft resolution, in order to give time for the private pressure on Hammarskjöld, Wheeler and McCloy to bear fruit.

MIDEAST SETTLEMENT

It is understood that some discussion is going on in the Department on the problem of a MidEast settlement. We should like to make a few observations for what they are worth.

2. In the first place, I think we should be careful to avoid linking up UNEF in any way with the procedure of settlement, at least at this stage. Although in debates Mr. Pearson and Mr. Pinard have emphasized the necessity of pressing on with the problem of settlement, we have carefully avoided implication that UNEF should be used for the purpose of coercing the parties or imposing a settlement. It has been widely recognized, however, that the presence and functioning of UNEF in the area may well assist in the creation of conditions and an atmosphere favourable to a settlement. The Secretary General has, I feel sure, kept the procedures of settlement quite distinct from the functions of UNEF in his negotiations with any of the parties to the recent conflict, as well as with participants in the force; and I doubt very much whether the force would have been so readily accepted by the Egyptians or by countries of the Afro-Asian group had this not been the case.

3. The British and French for their part, and the Israelis for theirs, have not unnaturally taken the opposite view from time to time. For the British and French it was at least an explanation to their publics for accepting the cease-fire. The Israelis, of course, would like the force to be used to prevent the return of Egyptian military forces to Sinai and to help them obtain a peace settlement satisfactory to them. Because these attitudes of the British, French and Israelis are well known, especially among the Arabs, I suggest that we should be extremely cautious about suggesting at this stage that the force might have any other purpose than that specified in the Assembly resolutions already adopted.

4. For the present I think we should also assume, at least publicly, that the force is likely to be only of short-term duration. It may well be that a force of some sort will be required all round the Israeli border to prevent a renewal of raids and reprisals pending a settlement. But this would entail border patrolling in Israeli territory and in other Arab States as well as Egypt. UNEF has no such territorial ambit as this and could not have without the consent of the States concerned. For the present I think it would be unwise to suggest that it should have any such function. In our view this suggestion would almost certainly be rejected by the Arabs and their Asian supporters and would make the sponsors suspect. Further, it would alarm the Indians and many others who are seriously concerned about the financial implications of UNEF.

5. No doubt the problem of the extension of UNEF functions will have to be faced before long, perhaps even before the close of this Assembly but I think it is highly desirable to wait at least until UNEF is in position along demarcation lines and on a firm administrative footing.

6. This does not mean that we should not now be thinking about the problem of settlement, but I suggest the first step is that of procedure rather than of substance. The American resolution introduced in the emergency session calling for a commission of five is an interesting suggestion but it does not seem to have caught on here. We share your preference for a single intermediary. There is also much to be said for the procedure used for the establishment of UNEF; namely, empowering the Secretary General to conduct exploratory discussions with the assistance of an advisory committee. We are in the process of developing ideas along this line and hope to send our views forward early in the week.

SUEZ CANAL CLEARANCE

Early this afternoon I discussed with the Secretary General the current developments in the arrangements for clearing the Suez Canal under UN auspices. Prior to our conversation and in response to my request for an interview, the Secretary General sent me a memo which set forth the present position from his point of view. He explained that this was an internal memo but he saw no reason why I could not transmit it to you, provided that its source was fully protected. The text is contained in my immediately following telegram. † I strongly urge that these two telegrams be given the most restricted distribution.

2. Basing myself on the London telegram under reference I expressed to the Secretary General our concern about the growing sense of frustration in the UK over the delay in beginning the UN clearing operations in the Suez Canal. I referred to the publicity which had been given to the question whether the Anglo French salvage fleet would be used in any way. I mentioned the possibility that the UK and France might introduce a resolution complaining about Egyptian procrastination regarding the Canal clearance. I emphasized that my visit was not intended in any way to put pressure on the Secretary General but to obtain from him his most up to date views on the course of events. I pointed out that the Minister would be returning to Ottawa this weekend and would no doubt wish to have an authoritative report on the situation as it appeared from UN headquarters.

3. The Secretary General began by saying that his memo contained the most up to date info on the situation as he saw it. He wished to call attention first to the facts, which he said were roughly as follows:

(a) Admiral Dawnay, who has been in New York for the past month and who is number three in the UK admiralty, was completely satisfied that the arrangements which the UN had made for clearing the Canal were sound and would be as effective as any the admiralty had made. Admiral Slater, who was in command in Port Said, was "reasonably satisfied" that the UN team could do the job. There was, however a problem of prestige which was emphasized in Hailsham's statement in the press today (New York Times of December 15), which implied that even if the UN could do the job it would not be done as quickly or as effectively as under admiralty auspices.

(b) About Thursday, Dulles had sent a report from Paris to the State Department which gave the impression that the question of using Anglo-French ships and crews could be resolved if the UN would make use of 6 heavy-lift ships, which in fact were barges equipped with heavy cranes but not self-propelled. Each was manned by a crew of 15 (3 officers, 12 others). It was Dulles' contention that the prestige of UK and French in this matter would be saved if these 6 vessels, with their crews, could be incorporated in the UN fleet. The Secretary General had no info from the UK to this effect, but he had passed Dulles' suggestion to Fawzi, who had transmitted it to the Egyptian Government.

(c) With the addition of these 6 vessels the UN fleet would be the equivalent of the Anglo-French fleet. The UN, in addition to bringing in very experienced Scandinavian and Dutch crew and their equipment had taken over German vessels and crews which had been under contract to the admiralty. Wheeler was probably the leading expert in the world on operations of this kind. In these circumstances the criticism expressed in the press and attributed to ranking UK officials was particularly irritating to the Secretary General, who was not in a position to reply in detail.

(d) The UN fleet, once the immediate problem had been solved, would begin operations in the southern part of the Canal. The Anglo-French fleet would continue those operations which it had already begun in the northern end. In particular there were 15 sunken vessels in the Port Said area in the process of being lifted; all but two jobs would be completed by December 20; the other two should be finished shortly after that. In any event, the Anglo-French vessels with their own crews would continue this work until it was finished. The remainder of the Anglo-French fleet (that is less 15 vessels in Port Said and the 6 required by the UN) would be withdrawn to Cyprus. After the withdrawal of the Anglo-French forces and assuming that a more detailed survey might indicate the desirability of building up the UN fleet, some of the Anglo-French vessels might be recalled to the Canal zone. In those circumstances the Secretary General would have no hesitation in making full use of the Anglo-French ships and their crews.

4. The apparent question of the moment was whether the 6 heavy-lift barges would operate under UN auspices for one week with Anglo-French officers and UN crews, or with complete Anglo-French crews and with a sprinkling of UN personnel. The Secretary General failed to see how this relatively insignificant practical problem could make or break the clearing operation. As far as he was concerned either side should be able to accept the position of the other but, failing this, they should be able to reach a practicable compromise. Unfortunately, however, there were complications of psychological nature. UK political leaders were taking the stand publicly that the entire Anglo-French fleet with its crews should be employed. The Egyptian leaders could not accept this (and the Secretary General believed there are sound political reasons, arising out of the Egyptian political situation, which required Nasser to take this stand). The Secretary General was critical of the fact that the UK Government had repudiated the stand which Selwyn Lloyd had taken publicly in the Assembly on November 24. He was aware, of course, of the inflexible position which the Conservative right wing had adopted.

5. The Secretary General acknowledged that much might depend on whether the Anglo-French position was what Dulles had reported from Paris, and on what reply the Egyptians made concerning the use of the 6 salvage barges. The Secretary General could not believe that a compromise would not emerge, but he recognized the explosive nature of the whole situation. This was complicated by the growing uneasiness in the UK and France about the treatment of their nationals in Egypt. (I am reporting what the Secretary General had to say on that subject in a separate telegram†). The anxiety about the welfare of British and French nationals produced an impact on Anglo-French plans for withdrawal and this in turn had its effect on arrangements for clearing the Canal.

6. My general impression was that there is absolutely no basis for any charge that the Secretary General has been either dilatory or ineffective in making arrangements for clearing the Canal, nor has he pandered to the whims of Nasser. The Secretary General spoke about his conversations with Nasser and showed, I thought, a much keener insight of Egyptian politics and Nasser's personality than has been demonstrated in the public utterances in London and Paris. It is perhaps not without interest that the Secretary General said about our info from Robertson that Dixon had given no inkling that the Government was dissatisfied with the Secretary General's handling of the situation.

MIDEAST SETTLEMENT

On re-reading paragraphs 4 and 5 of my telegram under reference I think it might be desirable to elaborate upon the ideas in those paragraphs for purposes of clarification. In accordance with existing Assembly resolutions UNEF is intended to operate in the MidEast on an emergency basis. Having separated the opposing forces, UNEF is required to follow up the withdrawal of the foreign forces in order to secure and supervise the cease fire. This means, as regards the Egyptian and Israeli forces, that UNEF should follow on the heels of the withdrawal of Israel's forces from the Sinai and Gaza. Ultimately UNEF would take up positions along the demarcation lines between Israel and Egyptian territory.

2. It does not follow that UNEF can be used to prevent Egyptian armed forces from re-occupying Sinai. The practical effect of placing UNEF along the demarcation line between Egypt and Israel would be to deter Egypt from re-occupying the Sinai in great strength and from re-establishing their bases for fedayeen raids. However, UNEF is not empowered to prevent these things under existing Assembly resolutions.

3. We believe that any attempt to give this function to UNEF would be strenuously resisted by the Arabs and their Asian supporters. The sponsors of any resolutions along these lines would immediately become suspect. An immediate reaction on the part of the Egyptians and other Afro-Asians might be to call for the withdrawal of UNEF from the area. This might be the result of any attempt at this time to extend the function of UNEF.

4. Nevertheless, before the end of the eleventh session, it will be desirable and perhaps necessary to consider whether UNEF's field of operations should be extended. If it is to perform a holding operation while an Arab-Israeli settlement is being worked out, and we foresee that this will be a protracted process, UNEF should be given responsibility for maintaining order along the entire demarcation line between Israel and its Arab neighbours. This might mean an increase in the size of UNEF but it would certainly mean that it would be required to operate on Israeli territory as well as in Egypt, Jordan, Syria and perhaps Lebanon.

5. Whereas the Arabs and others might react strongly now against any such extension of UNEF's function, particularly since the basic financial question has not yet been resolved, there is every reason to believe that once UNEF has established itself firmly in the area and has begun to prove itself, the opponents of extending UNEF's functions could be persuaded to see the advantage of doing so. In our view this change of attitude perhaps could take place before the end of the current Assembly.

MIDEAST SETTLEMENT

In our telegram 1746 I said that we would send our views on what might be done in the Assembly before the end of this session to begin, or at least to promote favourable conditions for, the long and difficult process which any solution of Arab Israeli differences will necessarily involve. In a short time we shall know whether the carefully prepared scheme for a Suez settlement will prove practicable. Assuming progress in that matter (and we know there are still obstacles to be overcome), we can reasonably expect a substantial improvement in the political atmosphere in the MidEast but we should not delude ourselves that Arab Israeli differences can be approached with the same swiftness that characterized the change from armed conflict in the Suez Canal zone to an apparently serious desire by the parties principally concerned to resume discussions about a Canal settlement. The Canal question has the compulsion of hard economic facts to prod the parties into businesslike negotiations, a compulsion lacking in the case of the Arab Israeli impasse.

2. The Israelis are of course most anxious to enter into direct negotiations with the Arabs. This has been Israel's declared aim ever since the signing of the armistice agreements. Israel's desire for a peaceful settlement has been voiced repeatedly in the Assembly and elsewhere, and irrespective of whether warlike retaliation by Israel was just finished or about to begin. The Israeli activists have clung to their belief, mistaken in our view, that the Arabs can be frightened into a negotiating mood. This is part of a theory that only through toughness will Israel win recognition and respect from the Arabs.

3. Judging from conversations we have had here with Arab officials, we conclude that they are far removed from a mood to negotiate with the Israelis. Arab claims in the Assembly have since the invasion of Egypt been more extravagant than ever and privately even thoroughly westernized Arabs have dismissed out of hand the suggestion that the recent dangers in the MidEast, having brought matters to a head, necessitate, as a matter of urgency, a conference to negotiate an Arab Israeli settlement. One gains the impression that the Arab representatives are in a state of profound shock and that they will require a period of convalescence before they can talk sensibly about problems having to do with Palestine. If this is the reaction of Arab officials here, it is a safe conclusion that reactions in the area, among political leaders and the Arab masses, are nothing less. As long as this state of mind of the Arabs (and as regards Israel we think it is no less for the Iraqis than for the other Arabs) persists, there is little likelihood that direct negotiations between Israel and its Arab neighbours could begin. This means that an approach through a peace conference should be ruled out for the time being. It might be six months or more, during which the most favourable conditions should prevail in the area, before the Arab Governments could be persuaded to be more accommodating. Unfortunately the situation in the MidEast is such that the West cannot afford to mark time for very long.

4. An alternative would be an imposed settlement. This would require agreement among the Great Powers. With the current deterioration in relations between the USSR and the West, it would not be practical politics to suggest that there can be an early Big Four agreement on a MidEast settlement. This does not mean, however, that ultimate agreement among these powers on this subject should be ruled out.

5. The most likely means for tackling in the near future Arab Israeli differences would seem to be a UN approach. The ultimate aim might be that the General Assembly would recommend a new settlement in Palestine. This could be related to the earlier Assembly recommendations and to that extent it might be a face saver for the Arabs. Before their actual implementation the new recommendations would need to have at least the acquiescence of the Great Powers. At the same time the recommendations should not be too far removed from the desires of the parties. In a sense, therefore, the UN approach would be a compromise between a negotiated and an imposed settlement.

6. We are not suggesting, however, that the eleventh session of the General Assembly should attempt to prescribe the formula for settlement. Any debate now on the substance of Arab Israeli differences would be supercharged with emotion and would come to naught. We can see no likelihood of mobilizing sufficient support at present for recommendations on a settlement. In their present mood the Arabs would refuse to take the discussion seriously and because of their own difficulties, the Soviet Bloc would merely exploit the situation. Many of the Afro Asians and even some Latins could be expected to follow the Arabs blindly at this time.

7. This does not mean that the Assembly should do nothing at the current session. On the contrary we believe it is essential that it should take very positive action on the Palestine question. Our suggestion is, however, that we should concentrate on procedure rather than substance. Concretely we suggest the following:

(a) The Assembly should decide to keep UNEF in position along the demarcation line and extend this function to include the demarcation lines between Israel and all its Arab neighbours. Of necessity this would mean that UNEF should operate on Israeli territory as well as in the Arab countries concerned.

(b) UNEF might be given specific functions in the Gaza Strip and at the entrance of the Gulf of Aqaba.

(c) The Secretary General should be authorized to explore through private consultations with the parties not only means of maintaining order in the area but of bringing about a settlement.

(d) To relieve him of some of the responsibility the Secretary General should have an Advisory Committee.

8. As in the case of the earlier resolutions on the current MidEast crisis, the one we are suggesting should be not too precise. To define exactly what UNEF should do along the demarcation line or in other areas and to attempt to give the Secretary General and his Advisory Committee precise terms of reference might destroy the whole effort, because it would lead to a full debate on the substance of Arab Israeli differences. This we should try to avoid for the time being mainly because of the Arab state of mind.

9. It may be argued that what we are suggesting is merely a return to the status quo. This is far from our intention. We believe that UNEF had a great deal to do with the favourable developments in the Suez crisis. It paved the way not only for the withdrawal of foreign forces and the clearing of the Canal, but an early resumption of serious negotiations. It can serve a similar purpose in Palestine and at the same time enhance the prestige of the UN, an enhancement which may be very necessary if Arab Israeli differences are to be resolved under UN auspices.

10. It will also be argued that all we are suggesting would play into the hands of Nasser; this would restore his confidence and make him more difficult to deal with. We certainly agree that one of the results would be to strengthen Nasser's position; we do not, however, regard this as necessarily being evil. It seems to us that in any settlement of Arab Israeli difficulties the West would have to come to terms with Nasser. It would be easier to do business with a confident Nasser, whose confidence was based on a faith in the UN led by the Western Powers and particularly by the USA. There is, in addition, the psychological impact of the military invasion of Egypt on the Arabs generally. Other Arab leaders may have wished to see the downfall of Nasser, may have secretly hoped that the combined invasion would have that result. But since it has not had that result, in matters relating to Israel all the Arabs can be expected now to rally to Nasser's side. This again would not necessarily be a bad thing, because Arab Israeli differences could more easily be resolved if the Arabs were united under a hardheaded leadership. The principal tasks would then be to come to terms with that leader, that is, Nasser.

11. The Israelis will be dismayed at this approach. They, however, must learn that hard lesson that military retaliation does not pay before any lasting settlement can be reached in the MidEast. They will be exasperated at the thought of having to delay the negotiations on substance, having to allow UNEF to control the demarcation lines. During this difficult period, however, the Israelis can be assured that we and others are earnestly working for a just settlement in the MidEast and they must be persuaded by whatever means to cooperate. It will be a painful process but no more painful nor dangerous than the impasse of the past eight years. The position may be considerably eased for Israel if in the evolution of a Suez settlement some formula can be reached for allowing at least cargoes, bound to and from Israel, to proceed through the Canal.

12. The Secretary General will have the thankless task of sounding out the parties on questions of substance. He will however have the help of his advisory committee (which for easing the adoption the new Assembly resolution could be the same body now in existence). On substance, we think that the various issues which make up the Palestine question proper may have to be tackled in a coordinated manner but not necessarily in a package as some people have been suggesting. As a quite separate venture there might be a general plan for assisting in the economic development of the area, a scheme which would be closely related to the oil, water and other resources and which would have the effect of softening up the Arabs who feel that they have been left out of the general plans for economic development. This approach on the economic front might well ease the refugee problem in a large and practicable way. Especially if the Israelis could be prodded in some token move on refugee repatriation and compensation, these moves could produce conditions most favourable to tackling the toughest nut of all, the territorial settlement.

Ottawa, December 18, 1956

THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE SUEZ INTERVENTION

During the week I was away from Ottawa I had discussions with Butler, Lloyd and Macmillan — in the first two cases, long and remarkably frank discussions — about British policy leading up to intervention in Egypt. Apart from Eden himself there is no one in the Government, I suspect, who could add much to the information I received. Even in the case of the Prime Minister, I doubt that I would learn much more from him about his views and actions than I got from his chief collaborators who have indeed been almost embarrassingly frank in discussing the part that their leader has played in recent unhappy developments.

There is no doubt in my mind now that the whole ill-conceived and ill-judged enterprise, at least on the British side, was Eden's. Macmillan was an active and willing collaborator; Lloyd a not unwilling one at the beginning, a loyal supporter throughout, but now a somewhat disillusioned and defeatist defender; Butler, whatever he may say in public, a doubtful fellow-traveller, who is now not only willing but anxious to voice his unhappiness at being on the journey at all. But Eden was the active, determined and confident leader of the enterprise, showing qualities of vigour and resolution worthy of a better cause.

It is, I think, safe to say that his colleagues — or at least many of them — feel that the failure of the policy should result in the departure from office of its author; a feeling that is reinforced by growing doubts of his physical and temperamental suitability to face the problems ahead.

It is a sad reflection on the judgment of those responsible that only now are they beginning to realize the fact that failure was likely from the outset and that the consequences of failure, economically and politically, would be heavy and hard to bear, or that as a result there would be a strong temptation to throw the blame for such failure on others, on the United States, or on the United Nations, or on fate! Yielding to this temptation, however, puts an extra strain on the alliance and indeed on the whole postwar effort for collective security and international organization. The process from official to popular disillusionment and frustration, has gone further in France than in England; indeed it is already deep and dangerous in the former country where it has not yet expressed itself in political action only because no one at the moment wants to take on the task of replacing a socialist government which is carrying out "right wing" policies — at least in foreign affairs.

Mention of France brings up the question whether there was collusion between London and Paris on the one hand and Israel on the other, in respect of the latter's attack on Egypt. The information that I have received confirms my belief that in so far as France is concerned, they knew in advance of the Israeli move and, indeed, sent in help, particularly aircraft, just before it took place. The situation is different, I think, in regard to the United Kingdom. It is true that military plans, beginning in August after the nationalization of the Canal, had been worked out in collaboration with the French for an attack on Egypt, but that was a normal preparation for a contingency which might arise but which certainly had not been decided on. I was assured categorically by Selwyn Lloyd that they did not know in advance of the Israeli decision and had done nothing to influence that decision or assist it by promises of military support. He assured me also that the famous meeting in Paris between Eden and himself on the one side, and Mollet and Pineau on the other, did not discuss military plans to intervene in Egypt on the assumption that the Israelis were about to make a move. I think that his assurances in this regard should be accepted, even though, as he admitted to me, they had been less than categorical in dealing with the charge in the House of Commons. Lloyd told me that their great worry before the Israeli attack was that it might be directed against Jordan, not Egypt, in which case, ironically enough, the British would then have had to intervene, and probably with Egypt, on behalf of Egypt's and their own ally. When they realized that Israeli mobilization was directed not against Jordan but against Egypt (and they were only sure of this a day or so before the attack), their relief was so great that the expression of it may have left them open to the suspicion that they had themselves changed the direction of Israel's attack and given an indication of support if that change were made. There is no doubt, of course, whatever may be the situation in regard to collusion, that the British and the French were quick to exploit the situation by an intervention which was in effect and probably in intention directed against Egypt rather than Israel.

The British still vigorously defend that intervention; in public on the ground that it saved the Canal from even worse damage than would have occurred (this seems to fly in the face of all the evidence), and also because it "galvanized the United Nations into action", even though they tried to keep the U.N. out of it. This latter argument, which must have been a rationalization after the event, is used more and more often and it is one that Lloyd dwelt on in his statement to the Council. However, it made little impression. There is the other argument that a Russian-Egyptian plot was nipped in the bud; also mentioned by Lloyd to me in Paris and by Butler in London. They do not, however, seem to speak with much conviction on this matter, at least in private.

Little is said about what may be the real, less publicized reason for the action, to destroy Nasser, and no one was able to give me any satisfactory answer to my question: "If you had destroyed Nasser, who could have taken his place and would you be better off?" I mentioned on one or two occasions the point that if the destruction of Nasser was the objective, they should have given the Israelis two or three more days to complete the military job which would probably also have resulted in a political crisis in Cairo, then the British and French could have taken the lead in the United Nations in a move to push the Israelis back. Both Butler and Lloyd indicated to me that this was where they made a big mistake, but David Ormsby-Gore, who is Lloyd's Parliamentary Private Secretary and who was present during my final talk with Lloyd last Saturday night at the British Embassy in Paris, would not accept this judgment. He was positive that if the Israelis had been allowed to go on fighting, all the Arab states would have intervened militarily at once and the conflict would have spread all over the Middle East.

There is one somewhat depressing matter that came to light in my discussions, namely, the inadequate and, at times, even misleading nature of British, and, I suppose, French military and political intelligence. On the political side there apparently was no feeling that the consequences of their military move would be active United States and Asian-Commonwealth opposition, or that the United Nations would be likely to take such a strong stand. This, of course, may have been due to the fact that Eden and the very, very few people in London who were in on the decision, and this included only two or three Cabinet Ministers, were so preoccupied with their planning in those last few hectic days that they had no time adequately to consider the political results, even if the political intelligence had been available to them. On the other hand, there is some evidence to indicate that they were completely misled about the possible reaction in Washington. This they are inclined to blame on Eisenhower and Dulles, whose words, they feel, during the weeks preceding the crisis had led them to believe that the United States Administration would not take a very harsh line in opposition. Butler and Lloyd are particularly bitter about Dulles' misleading role in this respect.

As far as the military intelligence is concerned, this seems to have been very inadequate, as indeed was military planning and action. Even now there is a good deal of military intelligence which has had the effect of misleading people like Lloyd on the results of the action. Lloyd was frankly disbelieving when I told him that we had impressive evidence that there had been far more damage to life and property in Port Said than the British were willing to admit, and that the behaviour of the troops, especially the French, had been bad in so far as looting was concerned. Also, when I said that our Embassy in Cairo had first-hand evidence that there had been bomb destruction in Alexandria, including the Presbyterian Church, he thought that I must be mistaken. When I assured him that I was not, he said that orders had been given to the RAF not to drop bombs on Alexandria at all, and he could not understand why these orders were not carried out.

Perhaps I should add a word about the four leading British characters in this drama — Eden, Butler, Macmillan, Lloyd. My impressions in three cases are drawn from my own observations, and in the fourth, Eden, from what I heard about him from the others. Incidentally, it is strange — and a shade unhealthy — that his colleagues are so willing, almost eager, to discuss the condition, political, physical and mental, of their chief. I know that their remarks to me were very personal and confidential and meant to be considered as such, but after all, I was a member of another Government and they were talking about their own Prime Minister. I should exempt from this suggestion of impropriety, Harold Macmillan, who was more inclined to worry about his own woes and his own condition, present and future, than those of his leader. Also, he has been more whole-heartedly in support of Eden's policy than the others. Lloyd also showed some care in his references to the P.M., but made it clear that his confidence in Eden's judgment has been badly shaken, and that he does not think much of the way he conducts Cabinet or Government business. Lloyd, of course, has had a particularly difficult role to play opposite Eden, for the latter still considers himself to be the Foreign Minister, in fact, and Lloyd to be a kind of Minister of State. Lloyd himself is in a depressed and exhausted condition which may also account for some of his pessimistic views about his colleagues. He told me emphatically that he could not stand the strain much longer and would be resigning the Foreign Office in a few weeks. I rather believe that he thinks the P.M.'s tenure of office will not be much longer.

It is Butler, however, who is the frankest commentator on the personalities and policies of the P.M. and his colleagues. Indeed, his comments to Mr. Robertson and me were so frank that they should not be put down even in a personal report. They were perhaps as revealing about Butler as they were about the men of whom he was talking. He is a strange character, indeed, Butler, covering a devious subtlety by an appearance of childish candour, and a tough appreciation of his own interests by an appearance of disinterested concern for duty alone. He likes to appear almost fey at times but I am sure he can be hard and practical enough when necessary, indeed his record makes this clear.

It is unfortunate, I believe, that at this terribly difficult and indeed decisive moment in British history, the Prime Minister should be one who has lost so much ground politically and physically; and his chief associates two such complicated and unclear personalities as Butler and Macmillan.

I am satisfied, however, that the present "set up" will not last and that changes of personalities as well as policies are in the offing.

My week in London and Paris has persuaded me that both these results are desirable.

UNEF: CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

Attached is a copy of the memorandum which I sent you earlier today, paragraph 2 of which reports on the position which the Department of National Defence is planning to adopt on the request of the United Nations (made initially by Major-General Burns) that Canada provide an Army mobile reconnaissance unit for service with the United Nations Emergency Force.

2. I understand that Mr. Campney may raise this question tomorrow at either the Cabinet Defence Committee or the Cabinet meeting. It would be desirable for a decision to be taken tomorrow as the United Nations Secretariat is pressing us urgently for an answer.

3. If this question is discussed tomorrow, I recommend that you urge that the Canadian Government comply, if at all possible, with this request.¹⁶⁸

J. L[ÉGER]

¹⁶⁸ La question n'a été discutée ni par le Comité du Cabinet sur la Défense ni par le Cabinet en décembre. Elle est restée apparemment en suspens jusqu'à ce que le ministère de la Défense nationale puisse se pencher sur la question de la nécessité d'une unité de reconnaissance. Se reporter au document 224.

This was not discussed by either the Cabinet Defence Committee or the Cabinet in December but was apparently held over until the Department of National Defence could explore in detail the need for a reconnaissance unit. See Document 224.

UNEF: CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

In case you are asked a question at your press conference this afternoon concerning the Canadian contribution to the UNEF, I attach a copy of the press release issued by the Acting Prime Minister on December 10th. I attach also a copy of telegram POLEG 1649 from the Permanent Mission in New York, following receipt of which Mr. Howe authorized the issuance of the press release. Paragraph 1 contains the text of the letter of December 10th to the Permanent Mission outlining and endorsing General Burns' request concerning an alternative Canadian contribution to the UNEF. You may be asked about this letter, the text of which has not been made public to my knowledge, since the delay in the issuance of the Canadian Government's press release was explained by the fact that we were awaiting a formal request from the Secretary-General.

2. The difficulty about the Secretariat's letter of December 10th is that it includes the request for an Army mobile reconnaissance unit, which is still under active consideration by the Department of National Defence and has not been made public. We asked the Deputy Minister of National Defence about this at noon today. Mr. Miller said that the Army has scout cars, in the militia and in 1's and 2's in active regiments, but no reconnaissance units. If Canada were to meet this request, therefore, we should have to make up and train a unit, which would be a lengthy process. In other words, we could provide the desired unit but it would have to be done in a makeshift way. Thus it is the hope of the Department of National Defence, of which we have not yet been informed officially, that the United Nations will turn to some other member government which has reconnaissance units in being. Dr. MacKay just called me to say that if we do not provide this unit UNEF will have to turn to the Yugoslavs.

3. Our press release of December 10th states that the Canadian Army component will be despatched with its vehicles and equipment in HMCS Magnificent before the end of December. The schedule for Magnificent has not yet been announced by the Department of National Defence; in fact we do not know whether it has been definitely decided. We have learned from the RCN, however, that it is proposed that Magnificent should sail from Halifax on December 28th, arrive at Port Said on January 10th and sail from there on January 20th.

COMMAND INSTRUCTIONS

General

1. As a result of the recent hostilities in the areas of Suez and Sinai, the United Nations has authorized the formation of the United Nations Emergency Force to secure and supervise the cease fire which has occurred. The Canadian Army has provided certain units for the United Nations Emergency Force.

Appointment

2. You have been appointed Commander, Canadian Base Unit, Middle East, and Senior Canadian Army Officer, Middle East.

Composition

3. In addition to the Canadian Base Unit, Middle East, the Canadian Army units in the United Nations Emergency Force are:

- No 56 Canadian Signal Squadron, RC Sigs
- No 56 Canadian Transport Company, RCASC
- No 56 Canadian Infantry Workshop, RCEME

Your responsibility for these units is set out in paragraph 9 below. You should note that the Canadian Army Transit Officer, UNEF Staging Area, Italy, although carried on the establishment of and administered by the Canadian Base Unit, Middle East, is not part of the United Nations Emergency Force. A copy of his Terms of Reference is attached as Appendix "A".† (Copy No. 1 only)

Role

4. The role of the Canadian Army units in the United Nations Emergency Force will be to undertake such duties in connection with securing and supervising the cessation of hostilities as may be ordered by the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force.

Status

5. The Canadian Army units will form part of and be under the operation command of the United Nations Emergency Force, but will remain under the administrative control of Army Headquarters.

6. The principle of the separate entity of the Canadian Force will be maintained at all times insofar as it is consistent with the composition and normal tasks of the Force. In this connection, while the grouping of the Force is a matter for the operational commander to decide, it is anticipated that, in the normal course of operations, tasks will be so allotted that the identity of Canadian units will be readily preserved.

7. If, at any time other than when required temporarily by urgent operational necessity, it appears that the principle of maintaining the separate entity of the Canadian Force is likely to be violated, you will represent your views to the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force, and immediately report the matter to the Chief of the General Staff.

8. The legal relationship between the Canadian Forces and the other forces of the United Nations Emergency Force has not yet been established and it will be necessary for you to work out a suitable relationship. "Regulations for the United Nations Emergency Force", setting forth the status, provisions for command, administrative arrangements and rights and duties of members of the United Nations Emergency Force, will be issued by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in the near future. Until these regulations are issued, members of Canadian Army units in the United Nations Emergency Force will be subject only to Canadian military law, and all offences alleged to have been committed by them, whether military or civil, will be dealt with by Canadian military courts. Should a member of the Canadian Army units be arrested by the civil authorities or charged before a civil court, you will immediately take steps to arrange, if possible, for his release or for the withdrawal of the charge. Should you not be able to accomplish this, you will at once report the matter to the senior United Nations representative in the area, with a request that he take such steps as are possible to effect the release of the man concerned, or to have the charges withdrawn. You will at the same time report the matter with full particulars by message to Army Headquarters.

Command, Discipline and Administration

9. You will be responsible for the discipline and purely Canadian administration of all Canadian Army troops in the United Nations Emergency Force. In this connection:

(a) pursuant to QR(Army) 1.13, the Minister of National Defence has designated you as an officer to have and to exercise the powers and jurisdiction granted by QR(Army) to an Officer Commanding a Command;

(b) administration of the Canadian Army units will be in accordance with existing instructions and such other instructions as may be communicated to you from time to time.

10. In order to assist you in the execution of your duties, an officer in the rank of lieutenant-colonel has been appointed as your Second-in-Command and has been designated as a Commanding Officer, as defined in QR(Army) 1.02 (XVII). In the event of your temporary absence, your duties as Commander, Canadian Base Unit, Middle East, and Senior Canadian Army Officer, Middle East, will devolve on this officer.

11. Various other matters, including the rendering of reports and war diaries, and the procedure with respect to honours and awards, will be dealt with in separate instructions.

Special Duties Regarding the Organization and Equipment of the Canadian Army Units in the United Nations Emergency Force

12. As soon as possible after arrival in the Middle East, you will make a survey of all aspects affecting the Canadian Army units of the United Nations Emergency Force in relation to their task in the United Nations Emergency Force and report your findings, together with any recommendations which you may have, to the Chief of the General Staff.

Channels of Communication

13. No limitation is placed on your direct channel of communication on any matter with the Chief of the General Staff.

14.(a) Routine correspondence of an administrative or technical nature only may be despatched direct between Army Headquarters and the Canadian Army units of the United Nations Emergency Force.

(b) Correspondence other than the above will be sent to the Canadian Base Unit, Middle East.

JEWISH REFUGEES

Since you will be lunching with Mr. Pickersgill today you may wish to have a note on the relationship of the Jewish refugee situation to the problem of a Middle Eastern settlement, both discussed in the light of Canada's national interests.

The Canadian Jewish Congress asked the Canadian Government during Mr. Pickersgill's absence if it would permit the Canadian Jewish Congress to sponsor as immigrants to Canada some of the Jews uprooted in Egypt as a result of Israel's invasion. Mr. Harris, as Acting Minister of Citizenship & Immigration in his reply said in part that while he did not minimize the plight of Jewish residents of Egypt their position was regarded as being "somewhat different from that of Hungarians who fled from their homes under desperate conditions and have no country (in) which they might legitimately claim refuge".

The last clause of the passage quoted above appears to be a reference to Israel, whose government has said that it is preparing to receive 20,000 Jewish refugees from Egypt.

The Jews in Egypt have been noted for the detachment of their attitude toward Israel. They are conscious of the strains in the Middle East created by Israel's policy of "the ingathering of the exiles" which has as its corollary the exclusion of almost a million former inhabitants of the country. They know that every fresh wave of Jewish immigration to Israel adds to the anger of the stateless refugees, the intransigence of Arab Governments and the problem of security in the Middle East. For this and other reasons the majority are apparently not inclined to go to Israel to live but are heading westward wanting to get away from the Middle East altogether. Recent press reports show a similar disinclination on the part of Hungarian Jews to accept immigration to Israel as a solution of their problem, although Israeli immigration agents in Austria and elsewhere have been offering special facilities for Hungarian Jewish refugees. If these reports are to be trusted, the proportion of those agreeing to go to Israel has been very much less than ten per cent.

The immediate question is whether or not it is to our interest to insist that Jewish refugees should look to Israel for help whether they wish to do so or not.

One of the basic problems which confronts us in trying to work out a peace settlement for Palestine is the fact that Israel is too small to accommodate all displaced European Jews, while the very existence of Israel is having the effect of displacing, one after another, long-established Jewish communities in the Arab world which formerly felt no need for migration. Israel itself suffers from claustrophobia already, and if it becomes necessary for the United Nations to surround it by a protective force the sense of being hemmed in may become even more acutely uncomfortable, particularly to the activist elements in Israel who have been counting on pushing the eastern frontier to the Jordan River and want as rapid an increase of the population as possible in order to justify this expansion of territory.

We shall be sending you shortly a memorandum commenting on the plan for a Palestine settlement published in The Observer on December 16. We see many virtues in the territorial arrangements proposed, which should reduce a number of standing causes of irritation. They appear practical and sensible. But there seems to be something illogical about our putting a great deal of effort into the task of bringing peace to the Middle East through the United Nations if our immigration policy is based on the assumption that all Jewish refugees should go to Israel, whether they wish to do so or not, when we know that the increased pressure of immigration to Israel will make the achievement of a peace settlement a longer and more costly operation for the United Nations.

What we have in mind is that a sensible principle to accept would be that Jewish refugees wishing to go to Israel should do so and that those not wishing to go to Israel should be accommodated elsewhere in the free world, including Canada. We have the offer of the Canadian Jewish Congress to sponsor a certain proportion of Jewish immigrants. If it is accepted the expense of settlement and rehabilitation will be borne by the CJC. A good proportion of the immigrants will have above-average intelligence and will actively help in the development of the country. Not one of them will be allowed to become a charge on federal, provincial or municipal funds. Their admission to Canada will help to relax the tensions in the Middle East which we are trying to counteract through the United Nations. If we do not in this way help to relieve the pressure on a country which is only a little more than half the size of Lake Erie, we may have to lend Canadian forces to the United Nations to keep peace in the Middle East for a longer period than would otherwise be necessary. In Canada's national interests it might therefore be good policy to accept the offer of the Canadian Jewish Congress.¹⁶⁹

Dear Mike [Pearson],

One of the distressing features of the Suez crisis from our point of view was the way in which local correspondents of Canadian newspapers were dealt with by their editors in Canada.

I asked Bob Farquharson to give me a note of his experience. This I am enclosing. It reveals both a shocking bias against the United States and, even worse, an unwillingness to hear and print the truth when it is unpalatable.

When we next meet, I should like to have a chat with you on this delicate and difficult subject.

Yours sincerely,

As a group, the Canadian correspondents in Washington have never had as difficult a time as since the British initiative in the Middle East. Almost everyone of them has been under criticism from their home papers on two counts:

1. First they were accused of being anti-British;
 2. Secondly, they are now accused of being pro-American.
2. The strange thing is that almost all of them, including the ones who seemed to me before to have been unfairly anti-American, are quite upset about anti-Americanism in Canada.
3. John Walker, the Southam representative, has had criticism on both the counts mentioned from Edmonton, Calgary and Hamilton. Some of his papers just threw away his copy. The editors seem to go on the basis that if the material he wrote from Washington and from the United Nations did not agree with their emotions it was wrong and should be edited accordingly.
4. George Kitchen of Canadian Press has had complaints relayed to him from Head Office but so far has been supported by his editors. The very fact that he knows of the complaints is, I think, a form of sanction.
5. Don Minifie complains that almost none of his material has been published by the Toronto Telegram. He has had no trouble whatever with the CBC. He has drawn letters from listeners both complaining and praising his stand.
6. Ed Hadley of the Montreal Star who, though an American, is the Dean of the Canadian correspondents has been quite upset for several weeks by the feeling that he is out of step with his office. He told me yesterday that there had been a great deal of criticism within the Star that he was pro-American.
7. Philip Deane of the Globe and Mail has had a most uncomfortable time and has almost given up attempting background pieces for the Globe and Mail's editorial page. Dalgleish made a special trip to Washington to convert Deane to Globe and Mail doctrines. Deane has a two-year contract with the Globe and Mail which the Observer is most anxious he carry out but the Observer has told him that if the going gets too rough he can drop out and will be accepted back in the Observer fold. He now writes for both papers with the Globe and Mail paying about 7/8 of his salary. He is still carrying the flag of his news integrity flying at the masthead and says he will not haul it down. He will continue to write what he feels regardless of the Globe and Mail's views.
8. I have written this at length because I feel it represents a situation that is serious. Except for the men that I have mentioned, Canadian coverage of United States news is almost entirely in the hands of United States news agencies.
9. I feel we should plan in some way to help the Canadian group to do better reporting in Canada.

UNEF DRAFT REGULATIONS — RIGHT OF APPEAL BY NATIONAL COMMANDERS TO THEIR GOVERNMENTS

A question has arisen with the Department of National Defence as to whether or not the Senior Canadian Officer serving with UNEF should have the right of appeal to the Canadian Government if he is given an operational instruction by the Commander of UNEF which, in his view, necessitates the taking of action inconsistent with the purposes for which UNEF has been constituted.

At the request of the Department of National Defence we sent a telegram [LL31 of 21 December]† to New York instructing the Delegation to make the suggestion in the Military Adviser's Committee that such a right of appeal be included in the draft regulations for the UNEF which are now under discussion.

In paragraphs 6-10 of telegram Poleg 24 of January 3,† (attached) the Delegation expresses some apprehension about this suggestion and asks that we reconsider our instructions to them. Dr. MacKay points out that the question of such a right of appeal is an extremely delicate one. He feels that the functions of UNEF are mainly political in character and that in the field of operations the Commander UNEF should be the sole interpreter of the directive given to him by the General Assembly. At the same time Dr. MacKay would agree that the Senior Canadian Officer could have a right of appeal on certain purely military matters.

Dr. MacKay's comments have been communicated to the Department of National Defence, and Mr. Miller in a letter dated 9 January† (attached) has commented on this point as follows:

"The point is made in the telegram under review that the operations of the UNEF are of a type different to the operations of the Korean Force and that accordingly the arrangements concluded for the Korean Force should not be considered as precedent for the UNEF operation. The difference is entirely appreciated and it is because of that difference that such a large measure of control over the Canadian contingent has been yielded to the Commander, UNEF. The prime consideration has been that the UNEF is engaged in action which Canada fully supports and which, indeed, Canada took a major part in initiating. So long as the role of the UNEF is limited to complying with its present terms of reference as reasonably interpreted, it is agreed that the Commander of the Canadian contingent should have no right of appeal to the Canadian Government against orders emanating from the Commander, UNEF. We have great confidence in the good judgment of the present Commander. It is possible, however, that in the future the then Commander might issue orders to the Canadian component inconsistent with the role assigned to the force. In such circumstances the reason for having vested complete control in the Commander, UNEF, would disappear and it would seem to me to be imperative that the Canadian Government be given an opportunity to reassess the situation.

"If the right of appeal in the circumstances that I have outlined is not contained in the regulations or elsewhere, it may conceivably result in the Canadian Commander being required to commit his troops to a course of action the consequence of which might be serious in the extreme and completely unrelated to the purpose for which the UNEF was despatched to the Middle East. The Canadian Commander would in that case have no choice but to take that action without prior consultation with the Canadian Government. I consider that this state of affairs would be extremely serious and that we should do all that we can to press for the right of appeal substantially as outlined in your telegram LL31 of 21 December."

At the conclusion of his letter, Mr. Miller says that he understands that his Minister feels strongly on this matter and he suggests that if you are not agreeable to the Canadian Delegation being instructed to press for this right of appeal we might hold up further instructions to Dr. MacKay pending Mr. Campney's return.

While I can understand Dr. MacKay's concern about this question, at the same time I do not think that anybody could take exception to the idea itself that national contingents should not be required to carry out operational instructions inconsistent with the purposes of the UNEF. Where the difficulty arises, of course, is that if such a right of appeal is written into the regulations it may be interpreted in some quarters so as to cast doubts on the complete independence of UNEF from the control of participating governments. On the whole, however, I think that there would be no harm in asking the delegation to put forward the idea and see how it is received. For all we know, some of the other participating governments may also wish to reserve such a right of appeal for their national commander.¹⁷¹

If you agree I am attaching for your approval a telegram† to the Delegation instructing them to make the suggestion to UN officials that provision for this right of appeal be made either in the regulations or under some other arrangements.¹⁷²

APPROACH TOWARDS A MIDDLE EAST SETTLEMENT

Before the Minister left for the NATO meeting early in December he said he hoped that by the end of the year we would be able to let him have a paper setting forth ideas on a Middle East settlement.

2. We cannot pretend to have reached the point of being able to submit a coherent plan for a general settlement, although we are, of course, continuing to study the various substantive proposals which have been put forward recently and in other years. For the Minister's more immediate purposes we have been considering what initiatives the Canadian delegation might usefully take in the General Assembly which, as you know, resumed its regular session yesterday. The attached memorandum reviews the reasons why we believe that the most fruitful avenue of progress for the moment lies in the realm of procedure rather than a substance. The memorandum suggests that our attention should be directed towards the establishment of the United Nations machinery best designed to facilitate progress towards a settlement and towards the preservation of the greatest possible degree of political and military stability in the interim period during which a settlement is being sought.

3. To help achieve these objectives it seems to me to be of cardinal importance that the future of the United Nations Emergency Force should be examined without delay in order that, either in its present or in some modified form, it should continue to serve as a stabilizing factor in the area. There have been some disturbing signs that the Egyptians may wish to get rid of the Force as soon as the withdrawal of Israeli forces behind the 1949 armistice lines has been completed. We should, I think, do our best to forestall any such development by helping to bring home the point to the Egyptians that their own interests would be served by the continued presence of the Force or of something similar to it, under another name, along the Egyptian frontier with Israel. If the Egyptians are to be convinced of this, it would probably also be necessary to obtain the agreement of the Government of Israel to the stationing of part of the Force on Israeli territory. If progress along these lines could be made with the Egyptians and Israelis, it might conceivably lead the way to corresponding arrangements being made on the borders between Israel and its other Arab neighbours, particularly Jordan and Syria, or at least to a strengthening of the existing Truce Supervision machinery. The need for some such action is underlined by recent reports of renewed violence on the Israeli-Jordan border.

4. I should perhaps add one final point. The attached memorandum was prepared before we had received any official information concerning the new developments in United States policy for the Middle East. We shall, of course, be examining these developments and the effects they may be expected to have on prospects for a settlement of the various problems of the area.

APPROACH TO A MIDDLE EAST SETTLEMENT

A new element has been injected into discussions of a peace settlement between Israel and the Arab states by the announcement that President Eisenhower's administration will seek the approval of Congress for a two-year Middle East aid programme of over $400 million and for authority to use United States armed forces to repel Soviet aggression in the area if the President should consider this to be necessary. One of the purposes of this policy, as described in early press statements, is to provide a security screen behind which countries of the Middle East may work together in confidence on economic problems, thereby easing tensions and preparing the way for political settlements.¹⁷³

The United States initiative outside the United Nations is intended to supplement United Nations action¹⁷⁴ to secure stable conditions in the Middle East. Coming as it does immediately after the withdrawal of British and French forces from Egypt, it is designed to provide the element of constructive leadership from a major power which was considered by many to be indispensable if the General Assembly is to take effective action toward remedying the conditions out of which the present international crisis arose.

There is, as you know, very wide agreement with the view you have expressed at the Assembly that there should be no return to the conditions of insecurity and violence which have characterized relations between Israel and its Arab neighbours in the past. Of the speakers who have supported your position in this regard Mr. Lange was perhaps the most ¹⁷³ La Maison-Blanche a fait la promotion, en tâtant le terrain, de la nouvelle politique de l'Administration américaine au Moyen-Orient (la « doctrine Eisenhower » comme on l'appellera par la suite) pendant la mi-décembre 1956 en menant une série de consultations auprès des alliés et des membres des deux partis au Congrès et en lançant quelques ballons d'essai auprès de la presse américaine. La politique a été officiellement exprimée le 5 janvier 1957, dans un message spécial que le Président a adressé au Congrès au sujet de la situation au Moyen-Orient. Voir Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1957, Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1958, pp. 6-16.

The U.S. Administration's new Middle Eastern policy, which was eventually dubbed the Eisenhower doctrine, was tentatively advanced by the White House in mid-December 1956 through a series of consultations with allies and members of both Congressional parties, as well as a number of trial balloons in the American press. It was given formal expression in the President's Special Message to Congress on the Situation in the Middle East on January 5, 1957. See Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1957, Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1958, pp. 6-16.

¹⁷⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

Yes — but it has had to be linked up with "cold war" considerations — exclusion of USSR from any participation in Middle East developments or consultations. L.B. P[earson] succinct. He said, as you will recall, that a mere return to the fragile armistice arrangements which were meant to last at most for only a few months is not "a realistic policy". The present Government of Israel, placed in an extremely difficult position by the hostility of the Arab states, has been operating on the theory that a realistic policy must be one of considerable toughness, and that the only way to win recognition and respect from the Arabs is to exact in reprisal raids several Arab lives for every Israeli life taken by Arab infiltrators. As our delegation in New York has pointed out, that policy seems to have had the opposite effect of stiffening Arab opposition. It may also cost Israel the regard of some of the friends in other parts of the world on whom it has been depending for support. Thus the "realistic policy" required in the interests of peace in the area will have to be sought through other avenues.

We have been warned from all sides that this is not the moment to propose negotiations between Israel and the Arab states with a view to reaching a tolerance settlement. Even Mr. Comay, who is as anxious as anybody for negotiations to begin, has admitted as much in his letter to you of December 10. As the Canadian delegation in New York has put it, the Arabs give the impression that they are suffering from profound shock¹⁷⁵ and that they will require a period of convalescence before they can talk sensibly about Palestine. Mr. Heeney reports a senior State Department official as having said that in their present state of mind the Arabs are "simply not responsive to the normal types of pressure" when it comes to discussing a long-term settlement. On another occasion, in speaking of a Suez Canal settlement, Mr. Dulles himself said to Mr. Heeney that since the bombing of Cairo the Arabs have not been in a reasonable state. Our delegation in New York has warned us not to delude ourselves that Arab-Israeli differences can be approached with the same swiftness that has characterized United Nations action to secure either a cease-fire in Egypt or the resumption of efforts to secure negotiations for a Suez Canal settlement. The Foreign Office and the Quai d'Orsay take the same view. Mr. Nehru is not inclined to believe that negotiations would be productive now. The Arab states have officially taken the position that this is not an appropriate time to discuss the Palestine issue and have decided not to raise it themselves at this session. In Cairo an Arab League official warned Dr. Norman that in present circumstances no Arab leader would dare to negotiate directly with Israel. He thought the most that could be aimed at for the moment would be a condition of absence of war — a relationship between Israel and the Arab states similar to that which prevails between members of the Soviet bloc and members of the NATO alliance.

Fortunately, however, this does not at all mean that there is no hope of aid from the Arab-Asian members for an approach to a settlement through the United Nations at this session. At the very moment when the feelings aroused by the landing of British and French troops in Port Said and Port Fuad were at their height, the Muslim members of the Baghdad Pact announced on November 8 that at their Teheran meeting that week they had "emphasized the urgent necessity of solving once and for all the Palestine dispute between the Arab countries and Israel". They might perhaps find certain Asian and African states ready to follow them in this view if we could make discreet use in our discussions with the Afro-Asian delegations of the five principles which were the theme of the Bandung Conference in April 1955—(a) mutual respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty;(b) non-aggression;(c) non-interference in internal affairs;(d) equality and mutual benefit, and(e) peaceful co-existence.

¹⁷⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

modified by profound relief and growing conceit & assurance? L.B. P[earson]

I have, of course, been wondering what we should do about the warnings we have received against proceeding too quickly toward a Palestine settlement at the present session of the Assembly. I had hoped that we might try to do something effective at this session and believe now that President Eisenhower's newly-announced policy may give us the opportunity in this regard which has hitherto seemed lacking.

What our missions have said about the present time not being propitious for negotiations looking toward a Palestine settlement has meant, I believe, that recent events have greatly increased Arab fears of Israel's intentions. It is these fears which have always been at the root of Arab hostility to Israel, and it is consequently at them that we shall have to look if we are to make an effective break with the past.

Part of the Arab fear of Israel seems to be associated with the strength and influence of Zionist organizations in the western world, which organize Jewish financial support for Israel and go to some trouble, particularly in the United States, to secure governmental action favouring policies of Israel which the Arabs consider detrimental to the interests of the Middle East as a whole. Whether it is true or not that Washington has allowed its policies to be unduly influenced by Zionist representations in the past, the point has always been that the Arabs believe the charge, and much of their destructive fear of Israel has stemmed from this belief. The Eisenhower aid programme is an intimation to the Arab Governments that the United States administration is now planning a better balance in the level of aid to Israel and to the Arab countries and that this better balance is considered to be in the interests of the United States as a whole, whether minority groups welcome it or not. We do not know yet how the Arab Governments will respond, but the aspect of the new policy which I have mentioned will not be likely to escape them and it should, I believe, have a moderating effect upon one of the causes of their fear of Israel.

I have an impression that we may count on the United States delegation to agree that for the moment we should turn our attention to choosing the best procedures for securing a settlement rather than to the substance of the settlement itself. The United States, though strongly in favour of a United Nations approach, is not planning to bring forward soon its own draft resolution on a Palestine settlement, since it is not likely to secure a two-thirds majority. A senior officer of the State Department has suggested that the best progress in the direction of a settlement might be made if the Secretary-General himself were to be authorized to sound out the parties through private consultations. The United States is prepared to leave much of the initiative to Mr. Hammarskjöld, will continue to support him fully, and will not propose measures to facilitate negotiations until the Secretary-General sees the need for them.

I am inclined to believe that it would be preferable if the Secretary-General were encouraged to begin private consultations without an Assembly resolution specially authorizing him to do so, since there is much to be said for avoiding a Middle East debate for as long as possible after the Christmas recess to allow passions to cool. The Secretary-General has shown deep interest in the possibility of mediating in the Palestine dispute, and during the three missions he undertook to the Middle East in 1956 gained detailed first-hand knowledge of what is required for the welfare of the area. It may be objected that he is carrying so heavy a load of responsibility already that he will be unable to conduct all the necessary preliminary conversations himself. With this possibility in mind it has been suggested that he should be given an advisory committee to help him during the initial phase.

On this point Mr. Hammarskjöld's own judgment should, I think, be our guide. Nevertheless, since the private conversations with government leaders must be of an informal and purely exploratory character, I think we should bear in mind the possibility that an advisory committee might be an embarrassment to him, since some of its members might press for information or interfere in other ways at moments when, owing to their extreme delicacy, the consultations require the direction of a single mind.

I have wondered if it might not be more helpful to encourage the Secretary-General, perhaps with the tacit agreement of influential delegations, to appoint a thoroughly well qualified person to devote his full time to the preliminary consultations if Mr. Hammarskjöld cannot do all the necessary work himself. This arrangement would have the great advantage of providing a higher authority, in the person of the Secretary-General, on whom the United Nations negotiator might call for aid at any critical juncture in the informal discussions. It might, however, have the disadvantage of requiring formal authorization by the General Assembly, which would give rise to the kind of debate I think we should try to avoid.

If there is merit in these suggestions, I suppose they would mean that the Canadian role in the renewed session of the Assembly should be primarily one of preventing premature initiatives, of smoothing the way for the Secretary-General to perform the work of mediation, and of using our influence with the delegations principally concerned in support of realism in working toward a settlement.

All observers seem to be agreed that a breathing spell is necessary, during which quiet will prevail in Palestine, before there can be any hope of working out a lasting peace settlement. In this connection wide interest has been taken in one aspect of the proposal made in The Observer on December 16 that the United Nations should purchase a corridor from Gaza on the Mediterranean to the Gulf of Aqaba, both Israel and Egypt yielding territory for this purpose. This plan provides that the United Nations corridor would turn eastward at the Gulf to cut across the southern tip of Israel and provide, for the first time since the creation of Israel, direct land communications between the two halves of the Arab world in Africa and Asia, and thus eliminate another major cause of Arab bitterness. Israel, meanwhile, would of course have free communication also across this part of the international corridor to the port it has built at Eilat on the Gulf of Aqaba. The corridor would be patrolled by a United Nations force. The suggestion has now been made that the functions of UNEF itself might be extended to include not only this responsibility but also the protection of the armistice demarcation lines separating Israel from Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. Such a proposal would, of course, require the consent of Israel and the three Arab states concerned to the presence on part of their own territory of the United Nations force. It would also involve a further resolution of the General Assembly.

In this regard I agree with Mr. Comay's suggestion to you that the way for the United Nations to proceed is one phase at a time. UNEF's functions in Gaza and at the outlet of the Gulf of Aqaba should be established first. This would not require a new Assembly resolution. In the Secretary-General's private consultations with the parties to the Palestine dispute he should meanwhile try to persuade all of them, for different reasons, that on a temporary basis UNEF may be able to provide the security they all require. Jordan, which is in the most dangerous position at the moment, faces the likelihood of an early withdrawal of the British subsidy and the protection that goes with it and should be particularly open to persuasion on that account.

Meanwhile the possibility exists that unless they can be persuaded that it would be in their own interest to retain UNEF as a barrier between themselves and Israel, the Egyptian authorities may be tempted to press for the withdrawal of the force. In this they could count on Indian and Yugoslav support, since the governments of the latter countries have said that their contingents will remain only so long as the Egyptians wish. We should therefore be on our guard against any effort to secure UNEF's dissolution. Indeed we should work immediately for the consolidation of UNEF along the Israeli-Egyptian armistice line, and preferably operating on Israeli as well as on Egyptian territory. In considering the future of UNEF, however, we should, I think, bear in mind the desirability of avoiding new Assembly resolutions early in the resumed session. The principle of extending the responsibilities of the Force to the armistice lines between Israel and its other Arab neighbours could not, of course, be implemented without a new resolution by the General Assembly.

We may suppose that neither Israel nor the Arab states would quarrel with the view that Canada has earned the right at the present session to interest itself as actively as any other member in the procedures by which more stable conditions may be established in the Middle East. In fact, Israel and the Arabs may well expect Canada to take some further initiative with this end in view. The Canadian delegation should therefore be able to take a lead in encouraging procedures which will avoid re-opening the substance of the Palestine issue during the eleventh session, consolidate the gains already made through the creation of UNEF, give Israel and its neighbours a sorely needed respite from violence, and enable the United States initiative outside the United Nations to divert the minds of both Israelis and Arabs into new channels while the Secretary-General is preparing the way for a settlement within the framework of the United Nations.¹⁷⁶

MIDEAST: ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM SINAI

On January 7 at the request of Mrs. Meier the representatives of all the Scandinavian countries, Belgium, Netherlands, France, Australia, Canada, NZ, South Africa, Italy and Austria met to hear a statement of Israel's position on the withdrawal from Sinai. Earlier in the day the Israelis had spoken to a number of Afro-Asian representatives, excluding the Arab states. There had also been separate discussions with the UK and USA. Today the Latin American delegations will meet with Mrs. Meier. The object of this initiative on the part of Israel was to state its attitude towards withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and from the islands and that part of the mainland which dominates the entrance to the Gulf of Aqaba.

2. Mrs. Meier said that the main reason for giving the delegations concerned advance notice of Israel's attitude was to avoid a "serious situation" which would result if the UN should insist on an unconditional withdrawal behind the Egypt-Israel demarcation line. Israel forces were withdrawing but the Israel Government was carrying out the relevant provisions of the Assembly resolutions "with a heavy heart". Israel was apprehensive about what was going to happen once the withdrawal from Sinai was completed. Israel did not know how long UNEF would remain in the area or whether the Egyptians would return with military forces to re-establish the bases for fedayeen raids on Israel territory. The uncertainty of the situation was causing grave concern in Israel.

3. Mrs. Meier emphasized the economic importance to Israel of retaining access to the Gulf of Aqaba. As a result of Israel's occupation of the islands and part of the mainland, the Strait was open to the shipping of all countries. It was in fact and in law an international waterway. The illegal Egyptian blockade had been remedied. Moreover, the territory involved was unpopulated and had no value to Egypt other than as a base for hostile action against Israel, action which the UN had already condemned.

4. Mrs. Meier admitted that technically Israel was required to withdraw. The question was whether Israel should leave without receiving adequate assurance that the blockade would not be re-imposed. It was surely not the intention of the UN to permit Egypt to resume its illegal activity in the Strait. Israel would not regard as sufficient private assurances by Nasser that the blockade would not be re-imposed. There must be a public assurance and, as well, an ad facto demonstration that the UN would exercise its authority in the Strait. The Israelis had in mind that UNEF might be established on the islands and on the mainland and there might even be a UN naval patrol.

5. Mrs. Meier said that Israel had not yet been pressed to evacuate the Strait, but this was likely to happen soon. She stated categorically that unless adequate assurances were given Israel "would not be able to evacuate" the territory now occupied. Israel believed that the Strait should be an international waterway and in fact open to shipping of all nations. In order to avoid a crisis Mrs. Meier urged that Israel and the UN should discuss at once arrangements for obtaining the necessary assurances that the blockade would not be re-instated after the withdrawal of Israeli forces.

6. As for the Gaza Strip, Mrs. Meier re-stated the well known arguments about how vital it was to the security of Israel; that it had not been declared Egyptian territory; that no effort had been made by Egypt to integrate either the indigenous population or the refugees; that it had been the main base for fedayeen raids against the agricultural settlements in the Negev. For all these reasons Israel "refused to envisage the possibility that Gaza would be again placed under Egyptian domination". Mrs. Meier emphasized that she was not talking about annexation of the Gaza Strip by Israel but about the solution to the problem which would provide the necessary security to Israel and the administrative services needed by the inhabitants. In the present circumstances the inhabitants of Gaza and the refugees were happier under Israel than they had been under Egypt. The Israel Government believed that the Secretary-General should now begin discussions about establishing UN authority in the Gaza Strip which would be exercised in cooperation with Israel. In the meantime Israeli armed forces should remain there.

7. Elaborating these ideas, Mrs. Meier said that the Gaza Strip should be neither part of Israel nor Egypt but under the UN. Presumably UNEF should occupy the Strip but UNEF could not be expected to maintain order there because of the large refugee population. In these circumstances UNEF, rather than preventing fedayeen raids would serve only as a shield for them. As soon as the Israel forces withdraw Egyptian agents would return and they would re-organize hostile activities against Israel. The fedayeen raiders could easily infiltrate into Israel through UNEF posts and they would be safe in the knowledge that armed retaliation by Israel would be less likely than in the past because of the presence of UNEF. For these reasons Israel should be allowed to maintain in the Gaza Strip its civilian administration and particularly its police. There would be no danger in letting the Israelis stay but there would be a very real danger if the Egyptians were allowed to return.

8. The burden of all these arguments was to persuade the delegations represented to put pressure on the Secretary-General to negotiate with Israel concerning the two areas of occupation. The Israelis were also laying the ground work for a possible new debate in the Assembly concerning the delays in the Israeli withdrawal behind the armistice line. On January 8 the Secretary-General told the Advisory Committee that in conversations with Israeli representatives on January 5 he had informed Eban that if Israeli armed forces did not speed up their withdrawal from Sinai and in fact comply with the Assembly resolutions on withdrawal, the Secretary-General would be obliged to report the situation to the General Assembly. Notwithstanding persistent efforts by the Israelis, the Secretary-General has insisted in his conversations with them that he had no mandate to discuss political conditions which the Israelis might attempt to attach to their withdrawal. The Secretary-General has interpreted the resolutions, and correctly so, as calling for the unconditional withdrawal. He has had to deal with stubborn attempts by the Israelis to impose conditions; the Israelis have tried to carry out their withdrawal by delayed stages; there have been arguments about the line of withdrawal at various stages. Consistent with his attitude on the Anglo-French withdrawal, the Secretary-General has maintained the utmost pressure on the Israelis.

9. During the meeting of the Advisory Committee today the Secretary-General was informed that the Israel representatives desired an urgent meeting with him to discuss further the withdrawal from Sinai. Currently they are asking that the present line of the withdrawal through Elarish should run north and south instead of diagonally to the head of the Gulf of Aqaba. The Israelis' interpretation would leave them in occupation of about 42 percent of Sinai, whereas they had previously agreed that by the end of the first week in January they would have evacuated "most" of the territory occupied. Lall reacted sharply when the Secretary-General discussed this situation and we understand that among the Afro-Asian group there is growing pressure for a debate designed to mobilize opinion against Israel. Unless the Israelis comply more readily with the Secretary-General's insistence upon withdrawal he will be obliged to report to the Assembly and a sharp debate will almost certainly ensue.

10. The Israelis are clearly anxious to win assurances before they withdraw and in the case of the Gaza Strip are demanding much more than assurances. The Secretary-General's attitude as we understand it has been that Israel must first withdraw before any effort can be made to improve the situation both in the Gaza Strip and in the entrance to the Gulf. There can be no doubt that the Secretary-General's position is soundly based on the Assembly resolution. In addition, we see little likelihood that the Israelis will achieve any of their desired aims as long as they refuse to withdraw behind the armistice line.

11. We sensed that this opinion was held by most of the representatives present at yesterday's meeting. No-one commented on Mrs. Meier's statement but Spender and Munro questioned her briefly. Eban attempted to win sympathy by saying that in a very short time there would be a link by pipeline and road between the Gulf of Aqaba and the Mediterranean, a link which would release Western Europe from the "monopolistic stranglehold" which Egypt had on the Suez Canal. Whatever influence this might have had on the West Europeans was probably offset by their lack of sympathy with Israel's bold attempt to capitalize on armed aggression.

12. After the meeting of the Advisory Committee this morning we discussed informally with several delegations the press report from Cairo that the Egyptians would insist on a complete withdrawal of Israel's forces before they would permit ships of the UK and France to use the Canal. In reply to a direct question from Engen, the Secretary-General stated that, as he understood the position of the Egyptian Government, there was no substance whatever in the Cairo report. Yesterday Ramsbotham said substantially the same thing.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM SINAI

Today we canvassed the views of a number of delegations concerning the position which the Israelis have adopted regarding the withdrawal of their armed forces from Sinai. We refer in particular to Mrs. Meier's statement about Israel's objectives as regards the Gaza Strip and the Strait of Tiran. I suggest that the info in this telegram be regarded as supplementary to my report on the conversation I had on January 8 with Noble, Dixon, Lodge and Spender.

2. Ramsbotham confirmed our impression that the UK was disposed to mobilize support in the Assembly for the position taken by Mrs. Meier. He argued in effect that the Israel Government could not afford and could not be expected to relinquish its hold on the Gaza Strip and on the Strait of Tiran unless and until Israel had adequate assurances about future developments in those two areas. He expressed conviction that Israel would not withdraw its forces without the required assurances. To deny these to the Israelis would be to invite further armed conflict. There was every prospect that Egypt would try to restore the blockade of the Strait of Tiran and to re-establish the basis for fedayeen raids from the Gaza Strip. Accordingly, the powers most concerned, and we gathered that UK, USA and Canada were included among these, should take steps now to ensure that UNEF would be firmly established in both places and the Egyptians would be prevented from restoring their military position there. Until some arrangement along these lines could be made we should resist efforts to bring pressure on Israel to withdraw. Notwithstanding what Mrs. Meier had said to the contrary, Ramsbotham was persuaded that in proper circumstances the Israelis would withdraw from the Gaza Strip.

3. Under questioning Ramsbotham admitted that a move of this kind was unlikely to succeed in the Assembly. The burden of his argument was that the countries principally concerned (the Western Great Powers and the countries contributing to UNEF, except India, Indonesia and Yugoslavia) should put pressure on the Secretary-General to be more accommodating in his current dealings with the Israelis. Ramsbotham said that the Secretary General was in favour of establishing some form of UN régime in both places. Ramsbotham could not answer our comment that the Secretary-General had no authority to depart in his negotiations with the Israelis from the terms of the Assembly resolution which called for unconditional withdrawal. He said that the UK delegation would be discussing this situation with the USA delegation and implied that they shared UK views to some extent.

4. With this in mind we talked to Barco of the USA. He said that his delegation had no official reaction from Washington on the proposals which Mrs. Meier had advanced. He confirmed that the USA Government had taken a firm line with Israel on the question of withdrawal. He could see no justification for allowing the Israelis to attach conditions to their withdrawal and, while he had every sympathy for the objectives which Israel was seeking, he believed these should come as a consequence rather than a prior condition of withdrawal. The Israeli Government should be disabused of the idea that it could accomplish its aims through a policy of toughness. Barco agreed that the Secretary General has no mandate to negotiate a conditional withdrawal and said that any member state which showed a tendency to back away from the terms of the resolution on withdrawal would immediately become suspect in the eyes of the Arabs and of many of their supporters, a situation which the USSR would be glad to exploit.

5. Barco agreed that we should be studying ways and means of strengthening the Secretary General's hand in his negotiations with Egypt, in particular to permit the possibility of establishing a UN régime in Gaza and in the Strait. It would not be strengthening the Secretary General's position, however, to urge him to be more lenient with the Israelis. Barco promised to keep in close touch with us on this matter.

6. Naevdal of the Norwegian delegation said that his government had not reacted to Mrs. Meier's suggestion. The Norwegians here were not favourably disposed to them. They see no alternative but to continue their support for unconditional withdrawal. It was their impression that the other Scandinavian delegations held the same view. Naevdal pointed out that any equivocation on the part of states like Canada, Norway, Sweden and the USA concerning the Israeli withdrawal might not only jeopardize the chances of improving the situation in the Strait of Tiran and Egypt-Israel demarcation line but might have adverse effects on the continued operations of UNEF in the area and on the negotiations for a Suez settlement. He observed that the Israeli suggestion about a pipeline and road connection between the Mediterranean and the Gulf of Aqaba was tempting but not one which could be easily implemented in the face of Arab opposition.

7. Bernardes of Brazil said that Mrs. Meier's presentation had impressed the Latin American delegations. They recognized that Israel had a good case for improving the situation along the Gaza Strip and in the Strait. Nevertheless it was difficult to see how the Israeli objective could be pursued in the Assembly as long as Israeli forces had not withdrawn behind the demarcation line. It was his impression, however, that many of the Latin Americans would resent any attempt by the Afro-Asians to press a resolution calling for drastic action against Israel because it had not withdrawn.

8. There have been indications that Arab restiveness about the delays in the Israeli withdrawal may result in a demand for a new debate. We heard that the Afro-Asians (or at least some of them have prepared a draft resolution which would condemn Israel for not carrying the withdrawal and which would call for economic sanctions unless the withdrawal were completed at once. We assume that a debate in the Assembly can be avoided as long as some progress is being made in the Israeli withdrawal. In this regard the Israelis are said to have informed the Secretary General yesterday (after the meeting of the Advisory Committee) that they would give up a further slice of the Sinai peninsula. Presumably this may for the time being allow the Secretary General to withhold any adverse report on Israel's withdrawal from Egyptian territory.

9. Our view is that the Secretary General should be permitted to continue the course he has been following. We know this view is shared by other delegations closely connected with us in MidEast matters. We can see no advantage in putting pressure on him to be more accommodating with the Israelis. We would hope that next week there would be an opportunity to consult fully with interested delegations on ways and means of reassuring Israel that its legitimate aims in the Strait of Tiran and along the Gaza Strip would be safeguarded. We see no alternative to supporting the Assembly's expressed demand for unconditional withdrawal. In these circumstances it would be necessary to persuade the Israelis that their announced intransigence about the occupation of the Strait and the Gaza Strip can lead to no useful result. We shall, however, reassess this question next week when the reactions of many delegations are likely to be more precise.

SUEZ CANAL; FINANCING OF CLEARANCE

27. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Secretary-General of the United Nations had asked all Permanent Delegations in New York to request their governments to give early consideration to the possibility of making advances to an interim fund to meet the current costs of clearing the Suez Canal. At the same time, the Secretary-General, through his Financial Adviser, had approached ten governments requesting specific advances to the fund.

Clearing of the canal had been undertaken by the United Nations at the request of the Government of Egypt. In accordance with a General Assembly resolution of November, 1956, authorizing Mr. Hammarskjöld to negotiate the necessary arrangements to begin the operation, obligations had been entered into with several salvage concerns. Arrangements for financing these should be made immediately if the clearance was to continue without interruption or delay, and the interim fund was designed to meet immediate requirements pending an agreement on the general financing programme.

In addition to Canada, countries approached directly had been the United States, Australia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, West Germany, India and Italy. The U.S. had already advanced $5 million, Norway was prepared to provide $1 million, and West Germany a similar amount. Several other countries had reacted favourably but had not committed themselves to specific sums.

It seemed in the interest of Canada to help restore free passage through the canal as quickly as possible, as this would contribute to obtaining peace and stability in the Middle East and help to alleviate economic distress and dislocation brought about in western Europe through closing of the canal. The Minister recommended that Canada make an advance of up to $1 million to the interim fund.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, undated, Cab. Doc. 8-57)†

28. Mr. Pearson added that this money would be borrowed by the United Nations. Canada had received specific assurances that this was not a grant but a loan to be repaid. It was difficult to work out a formula for allotting costs of the clearance operation amongst the U.N. members, but it had been suggested that up to $10 million of the amount might be covered by assessments on the same proportions as general contributions to the U.N. This would mean about 3 per cent for Canada.

A 100 per cent sharing would likely not be acceptable to all U.N. members and sufficient funds could not be got this way. The principal other means suggested was a special toll on users going through the canal. The Users Association had been consulted and had agreed to work out some arrangement by which users would earmark certain amounts for repayment, to be obtained by a voluntary levy on shipping using the canal. It was estimated that the total cost might be from $30 to $40 million. This was small in proportion to the losses being incurred by the closing.

If an advance were approved, he proposed in the reply to the Secretary-General's request to make it very clear that any participation by the Canadian Government in financing the clearing operation would be on the firm understanding that the resolution of the Security Council and the General Assembly as to the principle of free transit through the canal, without discrimination, by ships of all nations would be made effective once the canal was opened, and that the advances which the Secretary-General had requested would assist in promoting the common purpose of the members of the United Nations.

29. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It should be recognized as an elementary principle that clearing the canal was restoring a valuable asset and that the users who would benefit should be prepared to find the bulk of the funds necessary rather than the Canadian taxpayer. On the other hand, Canada was being asked to advance funds for much the same reason as the U.S., being a prosperous country which had accepted some responsibility in trying to resolve the Middle Eastern problems. The users could not be expected to bear the full cost of the operation. The people of western Europe would get immediate benefit from re-opening the canal but if this were delayed or did not take place, the whole economic situation would deteriorate markedly and Canada would suffer.

(b) Nothing should be advanced before some assurance had been obtained that the Users Association would agree that they would find the money; in fact, the first countries approached for an interim loan should all be users. It must be noted however, that the United Kingdom and France were supplying and paying for ships and personnel. They would have cleared up everything themselves but the U.N. had found this politically impossible. With these costs directly borne plus a percentage of tolls as users, the U.K., for instance, would be paying more than most of the other nations.

(c) In relation to the economic position, the discrepancy between $5 million from the U.S. and $1 million from Canada might well shock the Canadian people. On the other hand, the proposal was only for a loan of $1 million and, anyway, a straight loan now on an emergency basis would likely be more acceptable on all counts than an outright contribution made later when the plan of distribution of the costs had been worked out. However, there should be definite assurance that Mr. Hammarskjöld would not quit the field when the canal was cleared without making definite and satisfactory arrangements for the free use of the canal. If all the countries asked to assist would stress this point, it would help.

(d) The best case for assistance was that it was helping to make the U.N. an effective international agency in actually doing things that would help to secure peace. This was the first time the U.N. had taken an active material part in dealing with an international problem.

30. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the request from the Secretary-General of the United Nations for an advance from Canada to an interim fund to meet current costs of clearing the Suez Canal, and agreed that an advance of up to $1 million be approved for this purpose; it being understood that, in informing Mr. Hammarskjöld of this, it would be made clear that any participation by the Canadian Government was understood to be contingent on the establishment of freedom of passage in the canal for the shipping of all nations.

FUTURE OF UNEF

1. It seems to me that we shall soon have to face up to the question of the future of UNEF in the General Assembly. As you know, there have been several indications that at least some of the Arab states might not be opposed to some transformation of UNEF functions whereby the stabilizing role which it has so far been playing in Egypt might be prolonged and extended to include Israel's boundaries with her other Arab neighbours. In this connection, the following is a preliminary draft of the line which I am thinking of taking in my statement in the House of Commons on Monday January 14. Begins.

The long term objective of UN efforts in the Middle East must be to find a permanent political settlement of the problems which have kept the area in turmoil for so many years. Unfortunately, however, we must recognize that the present atmosphere is not conducive to constructive discussion of these broad political questions. The apprehensions and uncertainties of the peoples concerned, which contributed to the violent outburst of last October and have been intensified by that incident, must be given time to recede.

While the political climate of the Middle East is maturing toward the point when conditions will render practicable [direct]¹⁷⁷ efforts to negotiate a comprehensive settlement, it is essential for the countries of that region, indeed for us all, that security and stability should be effectively maintained and guaranteed. The UN emergency force is, I think proving successful thus far in its limited function of securing and supervising a cease-fire; but there will be a continuing need for some such stabilizing influence as the emergency force is exercising now, throughout the intervening period until a political settlement is achieved.

Perhaps it is not too early to direct our thoughts to the problem of how this essential continuing role is to be filled during that time. One possibility which we think might merit consideration would be the establishment of some form of [buffer]¹⁷⁸ along the boundary between Egypt and Israel, and, if this could be arranged by agreement with the other states involved, along the borders of Israel with her other Arab neighbours as well. Some such interposed element might be effective as the guarantee of the security of the nations concerned which is so vitally needed if their minds are to be free to concentrate with some hope of success on negotiations. Ends.

FINANCING CANAL CLEARANCE: CANADIAN ADVANCE

Further to your telephone conversation with Léger this morning, the following is the general line which you might take in conveying to the Secretary-General word of the Cabinet's decision to recommend Canadian participation in the interim fund. The reply to the Secretary-General's letter of December 25† will be deferred for the time being.

2. You might begin by emphasizing that the government is anxious to lend Canadian support to his efforts to keep the canal clearance operation moving, both because of our own broad political interest in seeing the water way reopened, and as an expression of United Nations solidarity. Therefore you had been instructed to convey to him at once in strict confidence the Cabinet's decision to recommend an advance by Canada of up to one million dollars. At the same time it was felt that a discussion with him at this stage on certain aspects of the interim financing arrangements might facilitate the framing of our offer in suitable terms, in reply to his appeal of December 25.

3. You could observe that the Canadian Government has been assisted to some extent in reaching a favourable decision on his request, by the assurances which he had given you regarding the strictly interim nature of the financing arrangements now being made, and the intention that the loan we had been asked for would be repayable when a general financing programme is agreed upon. However, there were other aspects of the question on which we would welcome any further reassurance he could provide. The government fully appreciated the urgency of getting the canal cleared, with a view both to easing tension in the Middle East and relieving the severe strain which the interruption of traffic has imposed on the economies of many nations. However, we had grave apprehensions as to whether either of these objectives, to both of which we attach great importance, would be furthered by the clearing of the canal without a clear and firm understanding that when it is reopened freedom of passage would be ensured for the shipping of all nations. As Mr. McCloy himself had observed, an essential part of the domestic public justification for Canadian participation in the interim fund would be our direct interest in sustaining the economies of our important friends and trading partners in Western Europe. From a purely practical political point of view, the Canadian Government would be placed in an extremely difficult position if it made an advance to promote the early clearing of the canal, only to have a situation develop in a few months where the shipping of some of our closest friends was being refused passage through the canal on political grounds. This of course was only one aspect of our concern over the question of freedom of passage without discrimination; it was not necessary for us to reiterate to the Secretary-General our broader apprehensions regarding the international implications of a crisis over Suez passage in the near future, which we were sure he fully shared.

4. You might add that we naturally wish to avoid contributing in any way to the Secretary-General's problems, and we hope that by mentioning our broad pre-occupations orally at this stage we can contrive to avert any possible embarrassment to him in the terms of our reply to his note of December 25.

5. For your own information, it has proved exceedingly hard to convince other departments and the Cabinet of the general desirability of any degree of Canadian participation. It would not be consistent with the discretion which I received yesterday in Cabinet if we failed to register our reservations in this manner.

GULF OF AQABA

The Israeli Chargé d'Affaires came to see the Middle Eastern Division again this morning and talked mainly about the Gulf of Aqaba. The only fresh point was that, according to information which Erell had received from Comay in New York, it is likely that a debate on this subject will start in the General Assembly on Tuesday. Again according to Comay, the Secretary-General is preparing a report on the progress of the Israeli withdrawal, presumably as a basis for the debate.

Erell said that he had been asked by Comay to tell us that the Israelis were very concerned that the Secretary-General would prepare a report which would not do justice to the Israeli case. In this situation they were relying on their friends to help them by talking to the Secretary-General, but the voice of Canada had been conspicuously silent. The Canadian delegation was apparently without instructions. Erell was told that while we were very much alive to the problem, it was not at present likely that any instructions would be sent to the Delegation before you reached New York yourself on Tuesday. Erell said he understood the position, but time was short and a word to Hammarskjöld today or tomorrow might have a substantial effect on the course and outcome of the debate.

Erell telephoned this afternoon to say that he had just had another call from Comay. The Israeli delegation in New York has apparently been encouraged by certain remarks made by a member of the United States delegation indicating that the Americans are now playing a somewhat more positive part in seeking a compromise which, while continuing to insist on the withdrawal of Israeli forces, would at the same time meet Israeli preoccupations with regard to freedom of passage in the Gulf of Aqaba. The Secretary-General is also reported to be showing more inclination to work something out that would be satisfactory to the Israelis, and the United Kingdom and Australian Governments are mentioned as being active in corridor efforts to promote this trend. Erell said that Comay naturally had a personal interest in the line taken by the Canadian delegation and that he was rather distressed that in all the comings and goings Canada was taking a back seat. I asked Erell whether matters had developed to the point of drafting resolutions or whether delegations were still in the talking stage. He said that as far as he knew, no resolution was yet in circulation.

DEVELOPMENTS ON MIDDLE EAST QUESTIONS, JANUARY 12

Following the meeting on Saturday morning [January 12], the Minister asked me to phone the Delegation in New York to let them know his thinking on the next step in the General Assembly and in particular, to enquire whether a date had yet been set for the resumption of the Middle East debate.

2. As Dr. MacKay was not available, I spoke to Geoff Murray, who said that the best estimate he could give was that the debate would begin in the middle of next week. The Arab states had made it known that they were thinking of putting forward a resolution reiterating the call for Israeli withdrawal, but they would probably not decide to go ahead until the Secretary-General had produced a report on this subject, which he is preparing for publication on Monday. I said that the Minister did not like the idea of supporting a straight withdrawal resolution, and that he had been wondering whether it might be possible either to amend such a resolution, or to propose a parallel resolution, reaffirming the principle of freedom of navigation, with particular reference to the Straits of Tiran. I said that the Minister wished us to be ready to submit an appropriate text, depending on the contents of the Arab draft.

3. Murray said that there was a strong feeling in the Delegation that it would be very difficult to obtain support for a resolution or resolutions linking Israeli withdrawal with the Gulf of Aqaba problem. He admitted that the United Kingdom and Australian delegations were in favour of something that would meet Israeli apprehensions, but that the Indians and, he thought, a majority of delegations in the Assembly would be adamant that the Israelis should be given no satisfaction until they had completed their withdrawal. He thought that there was a wide appreciation of Israeli objectives, but that to jump too quickly might do the Israelis more harm than good. When I mentioned the idea that a detachment of UNEF might take over from Israeli forces at Sharm-el-Sheikh, he said that he understood it was already the intention that Norwegian forces should be stationed there, and that this movement would take place in due course and without the necessity for further direction by the General Assembly.

4. In general, the Delegation would hope that until he has had an opportunity for a full discussion with the Secretary-General on Tuesday night, the Minister would not, in public at any rate, go beyond the draft text on the future of UNEF in our telegram ME-7 of January 11. (This text has since been somewhat revised by the Minister, but the essentials remain as in the original draft. Two small corrections were received from New York and incorporated, and suggestions from Washington and possibly London are awaited.)

5. After speaking to Mr. Watkins, I reported the foregoing to the Minister, who said that some way would have to be found to modify a resolution embodying nothing but a call for Israeli withdrawal, if such should be proposed by the Arabs. Otherwise the Israelis might simply refuse to withdraw and confront the Assembly with another problem. The Minister then instructed me to phone Mr. Heeney in Washington to bring him up to date on thinking here so that he could discuss the position with the State Department and possibly the Secretary of State himself. Mr. Pearson gave me a copy of a message† which had arrived via the Israeli Embassy here from Comay in New York to the effect that the State Department was looking into the possibility of having the Assembly pass a resolution or a brace of resolutions which, while covering the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Sharm-el-Sheikh, would also make provision for freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba.

6. When I spoke to Mr. Heeney about 5 p.m. he had no information that the State Department had yet reached the stage of considering what kind of resolution might be needed next week in the General Assembly. Nor did he know how the State Department or Mr. Dulles himself would react to the ideas we had been examining here. He approved the suggested language for Mr. Pearson's reference in the House on Monday to the future of UNEF and proposed, when the final text was available, to use this as the basis for an approach to the Secretary of State in which he would hope to elaborate further on the Minister's intentions in the General Assembly. He asked for confirmation, however, that the Minister definitely wished him to see Mr. Dulles and I agreed that we would send a telegram on this point and setting forth the questions on which we would like to have State Department views.

7. I reported this conversation to Mr. Pearson, who said that it was not essential that Mr. Heeney should see Mr. Dulles, but that he might see Elbrick or someone similarly placed. The Minister hoped to have an indication of State Department views before he spoke to Mr. Hammarskjöld on Tuesday night.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL AND RELATED PROBLEMS

1. This will confirm that I would be grateful if you would speak to the State Department about the way things are shaping in the General Assembly. I do not think at this stage that you need see Dulles personally, although if through Elbrick or someone similarly placed you could obtain Dulles' reaction to our present thinking this would be particularly helpful. I shall, as you know, be seeing Hammarskjöld on Tuesday evening and would like if possible to have an indication of United States views before then.

2. The immediate problem in the Assembly is that the Arabs are threatening to propose a resolution aimed at speeding up the Israeli withdrawal. Arab intentions are not yet clear, as they are apparently dependent to some extent on the contents of Hammarskjöld's progress report on the withdrawal, which I understand may become available today. If Hammarskjöld is critical of the Israelis, the Assembly may be confronted as soon as Wednesday with a pretty uncompromising withdrawal resolution which most delegations would doubtless find difficult to oppose. For their part, the Israelis have as you know been campaigning assiduously for some form of U.N. guarantee of freedom of passage through the Gulf of Aqaba and of prevention of fedayeen raids, as pre-conditions for withdrawal from the Sinai peninsula (although it should be added that they have at no time signified willingness to allow the Egyptians to re-occupy Gaza). The Israelis have told us pretty firmly that unless they receive some assurance, particularly regarding access to the Gulf of Aqaba, they will be unable to comply fully with the Assembly's recommendation to withdraw.

3. I gather from the delegation in New York that except for a small number of delegations, including the United Kingdom and Australian, the general opinion is that nothing should be done to appease Israeli apprehensions until they have shown their good faith by completing the withdrawal, as already recommended by the Assembly. There is, of course, no question but that previous resolutions of the Assembly must be carried out, and we cannot appear to be less insistent on the Israeli than on the Anglo-French withdrawal. On the other hand, some of the Israeli objectives seem to be legitimate, and I would hope that something more constructive than a mere reiteration of the previous withdrawal resolutions could be devised.

4. There is perhaps a rough analogy between the position we took at the time of the original cease-fire resolution and that which should be taken now. Then we were concerned that the Assembly should not only stop the fighting and start the withdrawals but do something more constructive towards ensuring stability. UNEF was the result. Now, while we want to see that the withdrawals are carried through, I think the Assembly would be failing in its duty if it did not seize the opportunity to lay some more solid groundwork for the future. What I have in mind is that without attempting to give the Israelis the assurances they wish or weakening the injunctions to withdraw, we might perhaps try to insert in the Arab text some not too pointed reference to the principle of freedom of navigation as well as making the frontiers secure (perhaps by reference to the cease-fire resolution of November 2), so as to make it difficult for the Egyptians to oppose and yet to place them under a fresh moral obligation not to reimpose the blockade against Israeli shipping. Another possibility would be to propose a second resolution with the same aims in mind, but this would be perhaps a more patent attempt to balance a withdrawal resolution, and thus more difficult to sell. Incidentally, I received a message† on Saturday from Comay in New York indicating that the State Department were looking into the possibility of having the Assembly pass a resolution much along these lines, but this may for all we know contain an element of wishful thinking.

5. A directly related matter on which I would also like to have State Department reactions is the future of UNEF. A copy of the amended text of my remarks in the House today on this subject will be put on the wire as soon as possible.¹⁷⁹ On the basis of these remarks you might indicate to the State Department that we think it will very shortly be necessary to provide in the Assembly for the transition from the original emergency role of UNEF to something of a more extended nature. We are hopeful that the idea of continuing U.N.

supervision along the Israeli-Egyptian boundary, and perhaps also along Israel's other frontiers may not be unwelcome to the Arab Governments, and that in return for the increased security it would bring them, they (and especially the Egyptian Government) would be ready to use their influence to prevent a continuation of border raids. I hope too that if this idea caught on in the Assembly, the Israelis would be encouraged to hasten their withdrawal from Sinai, particularly if arrangements could be made for UNEF or its successor to maintain a continuing patrol (by land or sea) in the Straits of Tiran. I also think that such a force might at least temporarily occupy the Gaza Strip, if only to establish the point that its future is subject to eventual negotiation in the context of the political settlement.

EGYPT AT THE CROSSROADS

I am giving this message the above heading because I cannot escape the feeling that the present régime is facing a critical moment in its history. The opportunity for indefinite postponement of a major decision in foreign policy is running out, perhaps the time is limited to the interim before President Eisenhower's statement becomes effective policy.

2. Looking at that statement from this quarter of the globe it seems to reflect a mood of increased confidence on the part of President Eisenhower and his advisers and a decision to lead from strength. It cannot be an oversight on the part of the White House that in the statement there is very little attempt to cater to the popular fetishes in this part of the world such as anti-colonialism and more particularly anti-British and anti-French sentiment. What has annoyed most commentators here, both press and official (the latter in private conversation), is the absence of condemnation of Anglo-French action in this part of the world and the subsequent assumption that these powers are not only forgiven but will retain a favoured position in USA policy making. In other words it appears as if the USA are saying: "We are going to pursue a policy that rewards our friends and hurts our enemies". Not only this but those who refuse to be counted as either friends or enemies will have to bear the consequences if they are denied preferential treatment which is to be reserved exclusively for those who have proved they are endeavouring to be true friends of the USA.

3. While I have not been able to study reactions in many of the neighbouring countries, I gather Lebanon is favourable and Syria critical. Other governments such as Libya, Sudan, Saudi Arabia, and of course the Baghdad powers (and in a separate category Israel) are in varying degrees welcoming this new approach. The whole impact of the new USA policy is thus tending to isolate Egypt from some of its Arab neighbours. King Ibn Saud is known to be uneasy because of the popularity of Nasser among his own subjects and his preferential treatment by Washington will tend to strengthen his bargaining position vis-à-vis Nasser, and also to allow him greater flexibility in his relations with other Arab states. It cannot have escaped Nasser's attention that the Saudi Arabian King has just last week been officially invited to visit the USA, and even more galling the regent of Iraq is due to visit the USA next month. I have learned from a reliable source that Nasser, using one of the journalists closest to him, Mohammed Hassanein Heikal, let it be known to the USA Embassy that during 1957 he would not visit any country (other than Arab neighbouring countries) with the exception of the USA. It is apparent at least up to the present that the USA have not taken this hint, and while not publicly rebuffing Nasser have remained cool to the suggestion. As I see it he is getting something of the Mossadegh treatment from the USA; that is to say they disapprove of much that has been done by the régime, yet they deprecate armed intervention which was threatened by the British in the case of Mossadegh and was actually tried here, but after checking this move they are not prepared to go further in salvaging the régime. Judging from Mr. Dulles' recent remarks,¹⁸⁰ they are even probing into the weakness of Egyptian economy while carefully saying that there is no intention to assist Egypt on account of these weaknesses. For the present, USA policy seems to be content to let this régime wither on the vine.

4. I said to the USA Ambassador recently it appeared as if the USA were requiring Nasser to work his passage back into their confidence before they would actively assist him, and he replied that this was about the size of it. The USA are not throwing their weight against the régime in the sense of encouraging a coup against Nasser, but on the other hand neither are they disposed by economic or diplomatic means (e.g. an invitation to Nasser) to build him up to the extent that he would appear to be an indispensable or essential corner-stone of USA policy in the Middle East. Thus it is now up to Nasser to make the next move; if he should turn to the USSR asking for lavish military and economic assistance and receive it, it would seem certain that his account with the USA will be finally closed. On the other hand, if he seeks and obtains USA assistance he would have to do so in such an unequivocal manner, and doubtless under such conditions, that he could no longer continue to be the exponent of a policy which seeks to jockey for position between the two great powers. This would undoubtedly have a deflating effect on his own prestige among the masses of the Arab world where even despite the poor showing of the Egyptian army in the recent hostilities his name still carries a potent appeal.

5. There is increasing evidence that the régime is worried by challenges to its prestige. First they are concerned about the continued Israeli occupation of Gaza, which increasingly emphasizes their impotence to do anything effective about it in spite of vague threats. Then the Jordanian Prime Minister's public flattery of President Nasser coupled with lavish expressions of gratitude over future aid from Egypt in connection with the possible loss of subsidy from the UK must be embarrassing particularly since everyone concerned must realize that Egypt's finances are in no condition to stand much extra burden.

6. Internally while it might not be correct to speak of a crisis, there is an air of political stagnation and indecision which suggests that the President and his associates are either at a loss in which direction to turn or are hesitating before taking a plunge. Nasser has shown signs in recent interviews of vexation and frustration. The economy of the country is running down at such a rapid pace that almost every day new shortages become apparent.

¹⁸⁰ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXVI, No. 918, January 28, 1957, pp. 126-130.

Supporters of the old régime, some of whom still hold positions of importance, talk with utmost frankness to diplomats of western missions in criticizing the policies of the régime.

7. Yet no experienced observer that I have met considers that a return to "normal" constitutional government is at least in short run a likelihood. The only alternative to the régime would probably be either another military government represented by a rival army faction or introducing new blood in an attempt to extend the base of the support of the present government (there have been some plausible rumours of such a development).

8. In short, the RCC régime both in its foreign relations and its internal economy appears to be in a quandary. There was an air almost of exhilaration in the period of hostilities and immediately after last November when, despite the poor performance of the army, Nasser displayed coolness, and a certain diplomatic flair in his moves on the international chess board. This has all passed now. There is increasing discontent over economic chaos and an attempt to shift all the responsibility to the West for this will not satisfy the critics indefinitely. The poor performance of the army in Sinai is general knowledge among the better informed sections of the population, and this is bound also to encourage boldness in criticizing the inadequacies of the dominant junta. In the past the President has shown a resilience and even an ability to produce a rabbit out of the hat. In the present situation however it appears to me that with his room for manoeuvre being so drastically curtailed he must make a decision which will tie him more closely to one or other of the great blocs and hence inevitably reduce his stature in the Arab world.

9. These thoughts are not intended to be a prophecy of the imminent overthrow of Nasser. They are rather an indication, necessarily sketchy, that this régime is facing difficult, unpleasant and almost certainly tense days in the immediate future.¹⁸¹

Following for Minister. I called on Phleger this afternoon to carry out the instructions contained in telegram under reference. I outlined to him what you had said in your speech in the House of Commons as background, and then put to him your ideas on how to meet the immediate problem of a possible Arab resolution in the General Assembly.

¹⁸¹ Copie du télégramme a été remise aux gouvernements américain et britannique.
Copies of this telegram were given to the American and British governments.

2. Phleger said that this had been the subject of lively discussion in the State Department and that their thinking had been very much along the lines of your own. While they had not come up with any firm conclusions as to how to proceed, two points had emerged from their discussions: (1) it would be most unhelpful if at this juncture the Arabs should come forward with a resolution calling upon the Israelis to complete their withdrawal; and (2) if such a resolution should be proposed, it should not be one sided in its application, but should advert to Egyptian as well as Israeli obligations.

3. Referring to the original November 2 resolution, Phleger pointed out that it had been written in such a way as to put obligations on the Egyptians as well as the Israelis, and that its language was broad enough to include an obligation on the Egyptians to prevent further fedayeen raids and even, he thought, to ensure freedom of navigation through the Gulf of Aqaba. He thought these were legitimate objectives of the Israelis, but agreed that it would not be feasible for the UN to provide any assurances to the Israelis as a precondition for their withdrawal from these areas. In the circumstances the State Department is of the view that nothing formal and categorical in these respects should be attempted in the UN at this stage; any such approach indicating that UNEF was moving into Gaza and the Straits of Tiran to ensure that fedayeen raids are not resumed and free navigation is maintained would be likely to defeat its purpose. He thought, however, that the Secretary General already had a certain degree of latitude to interpret the resolutions on the UN books; it might be possible for him to interpret the task of UNEF as now authorized by the General Assembly in such a way as to achieve these objectives with respect to Gaza and the Straits of Tiran. Phleger said that the issue was a most important one and that now was the time to do something: he thought the first thing was consultation with the Secretary General, and was gratified to hear that you would be discussing these problems with him tonight. He said he hoped you would also be talking to Lodge, who was aware of State Department thinking on these subjects.

4. I then outlined to Phleger your ideas on the future role of UNEF, and added that we were concerned that, if UNEF were merely to be left without any expanded mandate, there was danger that the Indians and Yugoslavs might decide to withdraw their contingents as soon as the Israelis had withdrawn behind the armistice lines, since these governments interpreted UNEF's role in terms of a very short-term operation.

5. Phleger again said that the State Department was thinking along the same lines with the same objectives in mind, but that there was the question of how to go about achieving these objectives. He said there were two sides to the problem: first, it was dangerous to count on UNEF growing like Topsy without any understanding with Hammarskjöld as to where it was going; and secondly, neither the UN nor any grouping of powers in it should get in the position with the Israelis of appearing to have guaranteed certain results if they should complete their withdrawal. As with the shorter term immediate problem of the Straits of Tiran, in connection with the future role of UNEF, we should first have resort to Hammarskjöld. Phleger thought it was "extremely helpful" that you should be thinking along the lines indicated with respect to the future of UNEF; the question was simply how the desired results were to be achieved.

6. Speaking generally, I would say that the State Department are fully alive to the critical phase we are now entering and are not inclined simply to let matters drift. They think that the dilemma presented by Israel's legitimate preoccupations with the security of its borders and of free navigation both in the Canal and the Gulf of Aqaba on the one hand and the requirements for Israeli withdrawal under the November 2 resolution on the other is unlikely to be resolved by any precise formula in the Assembly or by any private guarantees. In their view best prospects at the moment for avoiding an impasse and a helpless return to the status quo lie in the ability of the Secretary General to persuade both parties to comply with all the terms of the November 2 resolution and to employ UNEF in a flexible manner on the basis of its existing terms of reference to achieve this end. In this process it was up to "us" to exert pressure not only upon the Israelis but also upon the Egyptians.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM SINAI

Yesterday morning (January 15) Lall showed us a draft resolution, which he said the Afro-Asians were intending to submit shortly to the plenary session of the Assembly, concerning the withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from Sinai. In summary the draft resolution:

- (a) recalled the earlier resolutions on withdrawal;
- (b) noted "with regret and concern" that Israel had not complied with them;
- (c) condemned this "non compliance by Israel";
- (d) called on Israel to complete the withdrawal behind the demarcation line within five days;
- (e) called on all States to refrain, pending this withdrawal, from giving military, economic and financial assistance to Israel (the language is that employed in the USA resolution in the Security Council on October 30/56; and
- (f) requested the Secretary General to report on compliance with this resolution.

2. Lall said that the Afro-Asians would like to have this draft discussed by the Assembly on January 17. He was informed that the Secretary General's report on the Israeli withdrawal would be distributed on January 16 (as has been done). It too would be a basis for discussion in the Assembly. Lall was busily promoting his draft resolution in the First Committee on January 15.

3. Before noon I discussed this development with Noble and Dixon. They referred to the attitude which the Israelis had adopted in conversations with them, that is, Israel's position on the Straits of Tiran and the Gaza Strip. The Israelis had reported to the Secretary General that they would withdraw from the Sinai, except for the small coastal Strip dominating the Straits (Sharmal Shaikh). They wanted to comply with the earlier resolutions on withdrawal but they could get no assurances about the future status of the Straits or that UNEF would remain in the area pending a more permanent solution. They complained that the Secretary General seemed unsympathetic to what they regarded as legitimate apprehensions. The UK delegation believed that the situation would quickly become dangerous because this Israelis seemed determined not to withdraw unless some kind of assurance was forthcoming.

4. I said we were concerned about the way in which matters were developing. We had been thinking about the possibility of extending the functions of UNEF to allow it to occupy the Straits of Tiran during the transitional period between the withdrawal and settlement. We also had in mind that some form of UN régime, including the deployment of UNEF, should be established along the demarcation line and in particular in the Gaza Strip. I referred to my statement in the House on January 14. I said we saw no reason why the task of securing the cessation of hostilities (envisaged in the Assembly resolution of November 2 and subsequent resolutions concerning UNEF) should not extend to maintaining order in the area pending a more permanent solution. We had purposely chosen the word "secure" for our resolution of November 4 with this aim in mind. I recalled my first intervention on this subject in the Assembly on November 2, in which I had clearly indicated the Canadian view that the Assembly should follow a more constructive and comprehensive course than merely to restore the status quo before October 29.

5. Dixon wondered whether it might not be wise to concentrate for the moment on the situation in the Straits. He recognized that this might be difficult but it was his impression that the Israelis attached the greatest importance to keeping that waterway open. He suggested that the Israelis might derive the required assurance if at the time of the debate on withdrawal, and particularly on the Afro-Asian draft resolution, a "companion" resolution should be introduced which in effect would take note of Israel's apprehension about the future situation in the Straits and would provide for UNEF occupation in the area pending a more permanent solution. There was a problem that they should remain in the background; it might be helpful if the USA could take the necessary step; but the companion resolution might well originate with some of the countries which had contributed contingents to UNEF, since the operative part of the proposed resolution would mean an elaboration of the functions of UNEF.

6. I said we had been thinking along the same lines. We had not decided whether to try to amend the Afro-Asian resolution on withdrawal or whether to work for a concurrent resolution. We would be glad to do whatever we could to help, although because we had taken earlier initiatives we would prefer that others should provide leadership in the present situation. There might be some advantage, however, in continuing the combination of states, such as Canada, Colombia and Norway, which had cosponsored earlier resolution concerning UNEF. I said I would be canvassing the views of other delegations and the Secretary General before reaching any firm conclusion about tactics.

7. It was Dixon's impression that the Secretary General was very uncomfortable about the most recent developments. He recognized the dangers of the situation but he also saw no way in which he could deviate from the position in principle that he was not authorized to negotiate conditions for the Israeli withdrawal. Dixon thought it would be helpful if the Secretary General in his report on withdrawal would give a lead about the situation in the Straits of Tiran. This might enable members of the Assembly to mobilize opinion in favour of some remedial action. The Secretary General had shown some disposition to give this lead. Much might depend on the attitude of the Israelis and in particular on statements they might make in the Assembly. The UK delegation had been urging the Israelis to be reasonable and conciliatory.

8. Later in the day I discussed the same subject with Skaug and Engen of Norway, with Lodge, and with Eban and Comay. These conversations are being reported in separate telegrams.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM SINAI

Yesterday afternoon Skaug of Norway came to see me about the Norwegian proposal for the registration of nuclear tests.¹⁸² We also discussed the MidEast situation and in particular the problems arising out of the Israeli withdrawal from Sinai. In my conversation with the Norwegians, I dealt with many of the matters which I had discussed with Noble and Dixon. In this telegram, therefore, I shall confine myself to some of the additional points which the Norwegians raised.

2. Engen said that according to Eban there would probably be in the Secretary General's report a paragraph or two concerning the situation in the Straits of Tiran. The Israelis had been trying to ensure that the report should acknowledge the need to maintain UNEF at Sharm Al Shaikh until such time as a more permanent solution for the Straits could be evolved. In the meantime UNEF would serve to prevent "a recurrence of the state of belligerency" in the Straits. It was Engen's impression that if there should be sufficient endorsement by the General Assembly of this interpretation of UNEF's function in the Straits, the Israelis would withdraw from that area. Without an expression of Assembly opinion of that kind, however, the Israelis might refuse to withdraw, producing another serious crisis.

3. In the Norwegian view the Israeli attitude on Gaza was even more uncompromising. Israeli representatives had indicated that even if it should be agreed that UNEF would occupy the Gaza Strip, this would not provide sufficient security for Israel. In these circumstances Israel would withdraw its regular army but would wish to maintain in the Strip Israeli security police and civil administration. The Israelis argued that UNEF was not strong enough to prevent fedayeen raids from the Gaza Strip and there would be a practical problem of administering the 300,000 Arab inhabitants. The real intent of the Israelis was to keep the Egyptians out of the Gaza Strip and perhaps to establish a de facto basis for eventual annexation by Israel. In many ways the Gaza situation is more worrying than that in the Straits of Tiran, although the current disposition was to concentrate on the latter for the time being.

5. I said that we were aware of these difficulties and that we were particularly concerned at the moment about the possibility that the Assembly would be called into plenary session on January 17 to discuss among other things an Afro-Asian draft resolution on withdrawal. It was our view that as long as the Israeli forces remained outside the demarcation line the Afro-Asians would continue the pressure for withdrawal and we could assume that the resolutions would grow stronger in their condemnation with each report on non compliance. Since this could lead to a very undesirable situation, there was good reason now for initiating constructive action in the Assembly. We were giving some thought to submitting a concurrent resolution which without laying down conditions would give an indication that when the Israeli forces had been withdrawn, UNEF would move into the two main troubled areas and along the demarcation line and would stay there pending a more lasting settlement. I said that the Israelis had a right to expect that the blockade would not be reimposed in the Straits of Tiran and that the Gaza Strip would not be used as a base for fedayeen raids. Similarly the Arab states had a right to expect that there would be no further retaliatory attacks by the armed forces of Israel.

5. Engen said he was worried about the possibility that sharp disagreements in the Assembly about the withdrawal of Israeli forces might disrupt all that we had achieved. While he agreed that there was a sound case, under the Assembly resolution providing that UNEF should "secure" the cessation of hostilities, for continuing and perhaps extending the functions of UNEF in the interim period pending settlement, the Indians, Indonesians and others might take the attitude that once the withdrawals had been completed, there was no further reason for maintaining UNEF in that area. This might mean a return to the status quo before October 29 and indeed to a worse situation because of the increased tension on both sides. Moreover, if the functions of UNEF should be disrupted this might adversely affect arrangements for clearing the Suez Canal and ultimately negotiations for a Suez settlement. Similarly, or course, Israeli intransigence about the Straits of Tiran and the Gaza Strip could cause a stiffening of the Egyptian attitude toward UNEF and toward the evolution of a new régime for the Canal.

6. Although he was worried, Engen did not despair that a way could be found out of these difficulties. He and I agreed that the General Assembly had a responsibility for seeking a solution. It would not be sufficient for the Assembly to confine itself to condemnatory resolutions. Members must be persuaded to pursue constructive aims. To allow time for a constructive approach to be developed we should not be hurried into a vote on an Afro-Asian draft resolution on withdrawal. The draft which was being circulated was most unhelpful. I indicated that we would probably vote against it in its present form. The Norwegians agreed with us that the best course in these circumstances would be to try to postpone or prolong the debate in the plenary session so that a vote on withdrawal could be avoided and there would be time to develop a constructive proposal.

7. Lodge came to see me shortly after the Norwegians. He had just had separate interviews with Fawzi and the Secretary General. Fawzi had said his intention was to press for a plenary debate on January 17 and to introduce the draft resolution which Lall had shown us. The Secretary General's report would also be before the Assembly at the time. There was some chance that the report would contain some attempt to meet the conflict between Israel's refusal to withdraw without assurances about the Straits of Tiran and Egyptian insistence that the withdrawal must be unconditional. Lodge expected that the Secretary General's formulation would be "metaphysical" but it might be adequate for purposes of developing a constructive approach in the Assembly. Lodge agreed that the Afro-Asian draft, as it stood, went much too far but that if the operative paragraph on sanctions were removed and perhaps the exact deadline for withdrawal, it might be difficult to oppose.

There was no reason why we should give Israel more favoured treatment than France and the UK.

8. I pointed out that there was the difference that Israel faced the prospect of a return to the intolerable situation which had existed along the demarcation line. I agreed that Israel should not be allowed to attach conditions to its withdrawal but the Israelis could not reasonably be expected to accept the kind of conditions which existed before October 29. The Assembly should demonstrate that it was aware of the problems of the Straits of Tiran and the Gaza Strip and indicate an intention to do something about these problems. Unless the Assembly gave some expression to these views, there was grave danger that the MidEast situation might deteriorate to something as bad as, if not worse than, the outbreak of hostilities last November.

9. Lodge agreed with this assessment and also with my suggestion that what we really needed was time to consider not only the substantive positions of the parties concerned but also the best tactics to employ in the General Assembly. I explained our ideas about a concurrent resolution, which he agreed might be better than an attempt to amend any Afro-Asian resolution. It was Lodge's impression that Egypt and Israel both agreed that UNEF should be interposed between their armed forces. There might be some difficulty, however, in getting the Israelis to grant UNEF the right to operate on Israeli territory. Lodge saw no reason why a constructive approach could not be developed, provided that we were given time. He agreed that it would be helpful if the Secretary General would give some lead in his report, which Lodge had seen in draft. (It was our impression that Lodge had tried to persuade the Secretary General to insert a reference to the situation in the Straits of Tiran. As you will see from the report, A/3500 of January 15, this has been done.)

10. I told Lodge that I was glad to see that the USA views corresponded to our own. I said we would be consulting with other delegations during the next few days and that we hoped to work closely with the USA delegation in this matter. Lodge agreed that this would be very desirable.

MIDEAST

I had two hours with Charles Malik at lunch time today. He arrived yesterday from London and had not yet been able to inform himself of MidEast developments here. In fact, I was the first person, he said, whom he had seen as he had been trying to rest since arrival in order to recover from a very exhausting visit to various capitals since leaving Lebanon.

2. He told me very frankly about his seven hour visit with Nasser and his info tallied with that which Mr. Norman has reported. He fears Nasser's influence and his simple and puritanical fanaticism, and obviously hopes that Egyptian ambitions can be kept in check. He is also somewhat worried about USA plans and policies for the above purpose, and notwithstanding recent events regrets the weakening of British and French influence in the MidEast. He thinks that in the long run Western Europe and the MidEast can and should work together in a more friendly and effective way than the USA will be able to do.

3. Malik was emphatic that Lebanon was now adopting for the first time, for ten years an independent foreign policy, and he hoped that this would make its influence with other Middle Eastern countries and with European countries a constructive one. While, of course, he is not perhaps representative of majority Arab opinion, nevertheless his views are of some importance. He is not pessimistic about future developments, especially after his visit to Paris and London which he thought had been successful. He said that he was impressed both by Mollet and by President Côté, while he had had a very good talk with Harold Macmillan.

4. Returning to the UN force, he expressed the hope that he would be able to exercise a moderating influence in Arab councils here, but he realized that there were difficult and extremist forces to contend with. I did not press him about current problems in regard to Israeli withdrawal and the control of the Canal because he had not had a chance to study them, but I begged him to do what he could to prevent hasty and unwise decisions, especially regarding Israel's delay in withdrawing from Sinai, and I emphasized that this withdrawal had to be linked up in some way, though not as a condition, with navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba, security on the border and Gaza.

5. Malik was brimming over with energy, confidence and good will, and highly complimentary about Canada's recent role in Middle Eastern affairs. He is anxious to visit Ottawa and we should now begin to make arrangements for that purpose.

6. I should have mentioned that in addition to the fear that Nasser's personality and policies aroused in him, he is very alarmed about the situation in Syria. He thinks that is the real focus of danger at the present time. He contrasted the political situation there very unfavourably with that in the Lebanon where the people are, he said, practically all behind the present policy of independence, moderation and accommodation to the greatest possible extent with the West; and even of a political settlement, if the atmosphere could be improved, with Israel.

7. After leaving Malik I spent an hour with Fawzi who was, as usual, very friendly, very plausible and, indeed, reassuring in his own careful and subtle way. I asked him to give me as frankly as possible his views on the two situations which will soon be confronting the Assembly, e.g., Israel's withdrawal and arrangements for the control of the Canal, which, he thinks, will be open for navigation within a month or so.

8. As to the first, he was adamant that the Israeli withdrawal from occupied territory must be unconditional and that they must not be permitted to benefit from their military action. I expressed agreement regarding conditions, but gave my view that withdrawal could not be separated from steps which should be taken for greater border security than had existed, and for freedom of access to the Gulf of Aqaba. Fawzi acknowledged the connection and said that if a withdrawal resolution were accepted by the Assembly this could be done on the understanding that the questions of first, the functioning of a UN force on the borders to prevent incidents, etc.; second, freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba; and third, the situation in Gaza, would be discussed immediately afterwards and the Assembly could take any action it wished regarding them. So far as the first was concerned, they welcomed the acceptance by a UN force of certain responsibilities to keep the peace between the contending forces and would not object to a corridor being marked out for UN occupation for that purpose, some part of which, however, would be over the Israeli border. As to the second, the Assembly if it so desired could pass a resolution regarding freedom of navigation and authorize a UN contingent to be stationed at Sharm Al Shaikh or, and this would be in his opinion much preferable, the matter could be referred to the permanent court for an advisory opinion on the rights of Israeli shipping, which opinion the Egyptian Government would accept. In any event, he thought that the Gulf of Aqaba should be demilitarized. He stated that in point of fact 95 percent of the Israeli ships that had attempted to use the Suez Canal or the Gulf of Aqaba had done so without interference and that the 5 percent that were stopped were carrying armaments. I have heard this statement before and wonder if it is true. As to Gaza, the UN forces could move to the Israeli border and, indeed, UN officials could move in along with Egyptian administrative officials as soon as the Israelis had withdrawn, pending a decision by the Assembly on the future status of the Strip.

9. Fawzi then went on to discuss a régime of control for the Suez Canal. He did not think that there should be any effort to bring about an interim arrangement but that discussions should begin at once on the initiative of the Secretary General and through his instrumentality with 8 or 9 governments, individually or in small groups, as to what should be done to reconcile Egyptian control of operation with a legitimate international interest in freedom, level of tolls, etc. Fawzi said that the countries which he had in mind were Canada (through he may have mentioned this just to be polite) the USA, UK, France, USSR, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Yugoslavia, India and Norway. He thought that if agreement in principle could be reached within this group, the Secretary General might set up a committee to translate that agreement into an international instrument which could then be submitted to an international conference. However, pending such arrangements (and this is where the difficulty will occur) ships using the Canal should pay tolls to the Egyptian company. So far as the Egyptian Government is concerned, they would accept an international arrangement by which their right to increase tolls and charges would be controlled and which would guarantee freedom of passage in an even more effective way than that guaranteed by the 1888 Treaty. He said that they would be entirely reasonable in this matter because obviously it was in their interest to be so. After all, the users of the Canal would be their customers and if their customers were not satisfied Egypt would be the first to suffer. He thought that there should be no great difficulty about financing the clearance of the Canal as this could be done by a surcharge on vessels using it until the cost had been paid for.

10. All this sounds very reasonable if, and the "if" of course is overriding, you accept the position that pending the above arrangement the Egyptian company is permitted to receive tolls. I asked Fawzi whether, in order to avoid this difficulty, there was any possibility, in his view, of an agreement being reached before the Canal was opened. He did not think so, but thought that it should be possible within a short time of that opening.

11. He emphasized to me that the Egyptian Government would be fair and reasonable in all these matters and was even willing to accept some responsibility for the recent unhappy events. He kept on repeating that the important thing now was to look ahead and not behind. Looking ahead, however, he expressed considerable worry about the trend of American policy. He accepted USA objectives and USA intentions, but he felt that Mr. Dulles in his statements before the congressional committees was putting those policies forward in terms that would not commend themselves to Arab public opinion in the sense that he was emphasizing too much the idea of a vacuum which had to be filled by somebody, and the "cold war" aspect of future American policy in the MidEast. I confess I found it hard to disagree with some of Fawzi's observations on this matter.

12. I told him before we parted that if an Arab-Asian resolution was put forward tomorrow in the terms of the draft which I had seen we would have to oppose it as we were not willing to penalize Israel for non compliance within 5 days. He assured me that the resolution would certainly be modified and made milder in tone and content. I then begged him to use his influence with the other Arab states so that the Assembly would not be asked to come to a hasty decision on a matter of such importance. Even if they put the resolution forward tomorrow we would need a good many days to consider it and its implications. Fawzi agreed that there should be no undue haste in this matter. I reminded him that by showing some restraint last autumn in regard to imposing a time limit on Franco-British withdrawal, that that matter had been satisfactorily settled in a way which would not have been possible otherwise, and I hoped that he and his friends would show the same restraint in regard to a resolution concerning the withdrawal of Israeli forces.

MIDDLE EAST CONVERSATION WITH COMAY AND EBAN

Last evening (January 15) I discussed with Eban and Comay the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Sinai. Comay had asked for an early interview after my arrival here.

2. Eban said that Israel viewed the withdrawal as a three phased operation from the main part of the Sinai, from Sharm Al Shaikh and from the Gaza Strip. The Israelis considered that discussions concerning these phases should be consecutive, that to attempt to reach agreement on all three at once would only complicate the operation as a whole. The withdrawal from the main part of Sinai would be completed by January 22. The Secretary General had been so informed.

3. The Israel government was currently preoccupied with the withdrawal from Sharm Al Shaikh; they were greatly concerned about the future status of the Straits of Tiran; with the Canal closed and with the threatening statements which were emanating from Egyptian sources, blockade of the Straits would not be reimposed. It was of great international concern that the Straits should be treated as an international waterway open to innocent passage by the shipping of all States. This would loosen the monopolistic control which Nasser exercised over the economy of Western Europe and, indeed, of many of the States of Asia and Africa. The government of Israel was pushing plans to develop this alternative route between the Red and Mediterranean Seas. An 8-inch pipeline would be completed by April, 16-inch and 32-inch pipelines were projects under active consideration. (A Western European government, which we believe to be France, was prepared to assist in building the 16-inch pipeline.) In these circumstances, Israel would "cling tenaciously" to its stand concerning the Strait and because success in this regard would place Western Europe in a better psychological position vis-à-vis Nasser, Israel was being encouraged by "many people" to stand fast. Dulles accepted the fundamental Israeli position on the issue of the Straits.

4. What was needed before Israeli forces could be withdrawn was a practical guarantee that the blockage by Egypt would not be reimposed. UNEF was the key to the situation and should remain in Sharm Al Shaikh until other measures had been devised to safeguard Israel's position. This could be done through a peace settlement, which Israel would prefer, or through an international agreement on the régime of the Straits adhered to by the riparian States of the Gulf of Aqaba and of the Straits. Such an agreement might require some months of negotiation but in the meantime Israel must be assured that the present freedom of access to the Gulf of Aqaba and to Elath would continue.

5. The Secretary General's position (Eban went on) was vague. He was taking the "legalistic" view that he was not authorized to discuss conditions of withdrawal. The Israelis were not demanding "conditions" but they wanted some kind of assurance that they would not have to submit again to Egypt's "acts of belligerency" in the Straits. Eban produced a few paras on the subject which he hoped could be included in the Secretary General's report (due to be released a few hours after our talk). Eban confirmed my impression that Lodge had tried to sell Eban's language to the Secretary General. If some such reference could be included in the report, the Assembly would be in a position to consider the problem of the Strait and presumably to take remedial action. The General Assembly could, for example, decide that UNEF should remain at Sharm Al Shaikh until the Assembly had subsequently decided that the situation in the Straits had been satisfactorily resolved. The State Department (so Eban said) liked these ideas and they had been discussed with Lodge. It would be a "tragedy" if no formula could be found for overcoming the present difficulty.

6. This presentation by Eban was much more conciliatory than that by Mrs. Meir (reported earlier)†. I agreed that something should be done by the UN to achieve the ultimate aims which Israel was seeking. The question was complicated not only by practical (the narrowness of the Straits) but by political considerations. It was beyond argument that Israel could not attach conditions to its withdrawal. It might be possible to arrange that simultaneously with the withdrawal UNEF could occupy Sharm Al Shaikh and as long as UNEF remained, there should be no difficulty about shipping in the Straits. As for arrangements of more permanent duration and those for the transitional period, there might have to be a demilitarization of the Gulf and the Straits except for the UN troops there. Eban confirmed that there were two or three Israeli frigates in the Gulf of Aqaba; he was, however, non-committal about my suggestion concerning demilitarization. I agreed that it would be helpful if the Secretary General could include in his report some reference to the situation in the Straits of Tiran (as you know this has been done).

7. I said that our main preoccupation at the moment was to prevent a decision being forced in the Assembly on the question of Israeli withdrawal. Time was needed in which to work out a satisfactory approach to the specific problems to which Eban had referred. Eban suggested that perhaps one week's delay might suffice for reaching an understanding concerning the Straits and that at the end of an additional week some arrangement could be made for the Gaza Strip. Israel's present disposition was to stand fast because this attitude was fully supported by Israeli public opinion and because Israel's case was receiving a sympathetic hearing by several important member states of the UN. As a matter of tactics Eban wondered whether the report which the Secretary General was about to submit could not be treated as a progress report which required no immediate action by the Assembly but which would provide a basis for discussion both by the Assembly and by parties immediately concerned, including the Secretary General, about possible ways of resolving the problem of the Straits.

8. I suggested that it might be possible to deal with the Israeli withdrawal in phases. There would perhaps be less difficulty about the Straits of Tiran than about the Gaza Strip (about which Eban had very little to say). There was the added difficulty that pressure might be exerted to have UNEF disbanded once the withdrawal between the demarcation lines had been achieved. It was our intention to give UNEF some role along the demarcation line. I inquired whether the Israelis had given any thought to having UNEF operate within Israel. Eban produced the expected argument about the size of Israel, which could not spare territory for a UN corridor. There was also sensitivity in Israel about its sovereign rights. I emphasized in reply that it was psychologically important for UNEF to operate on Israel's side of the demarcation line.

9. Eban inquired whether we could mobilize the necessary support in the Assembly for maintaining UNEF in the area during the interval between withdrawal and settlement. I acknowledged that there were difficulties, in particular India's attitude. It was our impression, however, that if the proposal were properly presented the necessary majority of the Assembly would support the continuation of UNEF and perhaps in spite of opposition from some influential members. The main requirement was, however, that we should have time to study the whole question thoroughly and to canvass various opinions. If necessary, we might seek to have the Assembly discussion about withdrawal postponed.

10. Eban volunteered that any intervention he might make in the debate would be reasonable in argument and moderate in tone. He would not "breathe defiance". He hoped that this would encourage others to give some support to Israel's contentions. I tried to impress upon him that the more reasonable he could appear in the debate the more easy would be the task of evolving in the Assembly a satisfactory solution to the present difficulty.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM SINAI

This morning (January 16), we attended an informal meeting of the Advisory Committee on UNEF to discuss briefly the Secretary-General's report on the Israeli withdrawal (Document A/3500 of January 15). This report had already been distributed and we surmised that the Secretary-General had called the informal meeting as a sort of apology for not discussing the report formally with the Advisory Committee before releasing it. In any event, the Secretary-General added little to what was actually said in the report, except to restate his position that he was not authorized to discuss with the Israelis any conditions which they might seek to attach to their withdrawal from Sinai.

2. Nevertheless, the Secretary-General acknowledged that the apprehensions which the Israelis had voiced, particularly concerning navigation in the Straits of Tiran, had considerable substance. He had tried to persuade the Israelis that, once the withdrawal had taken place, the problem of the Straits would probably have to be faced by the General Assembly. There was also a possibility that UNEF might be deployed in the vicinity of the Straits in the interim period between the withdrawal and a more permanent settlement of differences between Egypt and Israel. In the meantime, there could be no question of delaying the Israeli withdrawal.

3. In his roundabout way, the Secretary-General seemed to be saying that his reference in the report to the situation in the Straits was an invitation to the Assembly to discuss the matter and perhaps to provide the Secretary-General with some kind of authority to explore the possibilities of interim settlement. To this extent, he seemed to be trying to meet the Israeli position. He left no doubt about his view that Israel should accept the position in principle that its withdrawal, both from the Straits and from the Gaza Strip, should be unconditional.

4. We enquired whether, in view of the desirability of exploring the situation more fully, the Assembly should perhaps postpone any decision on withdrawal. We wondered whether, for example, the expected Afro-Asian draft resolution could be held in abeyance for a few days. Lall indicated that efforts were being made to tone down the Afro-Asian draft and that perhaps it need not be pressed to a vote this week, provided that a sufficient number of delegations outside the Afro-Asian group should support in principle the contention that the Israeli withdrawal must be unconditional. Later, Fawzi said much the same thing to the Minister. Our interpretation is that Afro-Asian efforts to mobilize support for the draft which Lall was circulating on January 15 were not too successful. Since the Afro-Asians would obviously not like to run the risk of either a defeat or a greatly reduced majority, they have no doubt been persuaded by the response to water down their draft resolution and to present it less vigorously in the Assembly debate this week.

5. The Afro-Asian group was to meet this evening to decide upon their tactics during the next few days. We can only hope that the voices of moderation will be heard and that the result will be to provide the time necessary for working out a more satisfactory approach to the current situation, which is not without its risks.

Ottawa, January 16, 1957

Dear Mr. Léger,

Further to our conversation of this date, I am attaching hereto a copy of a message† received from Colonel Dare, the Canadian Commander in Egypt, together with a memorandum from the Chief of the General Staff. Aside from the information in Colonel Dare's message about a possible neutral zone, you will note that the Canadian Reconnaissance Squadron is a requirement that arises out of General Burns' views that Canada should be represented by some element of operational front-line contributions and that he would be strengthened by the presence of Canadian combat elements in the forward area.

This view attributed to General Burns may stem from the original controversy over the Q.O.R. and be an interpretation by him of Canadian attitudes advanced at that time. Since then the Q.O.R. have been stood down; Canada has accepted a large commitment for support elements by both the Army and the Air Force, and it is the view of this Department that any additional contributions should not be accepted unless they are militarily essential; in other words, we are not now pressing for Canadian operational elements to be incorporated in the UNEF just because they are Canadian and front-line forces. If there is a sound military need for this additional contribution, and if Canada, through some circumstances, is in the best position to fill this need, then we will do our best to do so.

You will note that even under the best circumstances there will be a considerable time lag between acceptance by Canada and the arrival of a further Canadian force in the Middle East, and if we have to supply armoured cars the time lag will be very considerable.

As the views set out above are only those of this Department it would be appreciated if we could have the benefit of your opinion on this matter. I think it is essential that a clear Canadian position be developed and advised to our various representatives and to the U.N.¹⁸³

Yours sincerely,

REQUEST BY UNITED NATIONS FOR A RECONNAISSANCE SQUADRON FOR UNEF

1. On 21 December I sent you a memo on this subject and stated in part "I consider that before we accept the commitment for a reconnaissance squadron, we should send an experienced officer out to Egypt to get answers" to certain questions.

2. Colonel MR Dare is now in Egypt as senior Canadian officer in that area; he is an officer of the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps. Before Dare left, I told him to send me information as soon as possible concerning the proposed task of the reconnaissance squadron and to give me his opinion as to the need for a recce squadron, and the organization or form that it should take.

¹⁸³ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

Jan[uary]. 17 — I discussed this on the telephone with Mr. Murray in New York, who said he would raise it with Mr. Pearson and send us a telegram. K.C. B[rown]

3. I now have a wire from Colonel Dare, copy attached, and it will be noted that in his opinion the proposed task can be carried out by United Nations Forces already in Egypt, but he does consider that General Burns would be strengthened by Canadian representation in the forward area.

4. If we accept the commitment, it would mean the despatch of 105 personnel and 23 Ferret scout cars. We can meet this commitment but it would prejudice our Armoured Corps training to some extent during the coming summer. Furthermore, a ship would be needed to transport the scout cars. No action has been taken to warn the personnel or prepare the equipment, and I estimate that about three weeks would be required from the time we were told to take action until troops and vehicles were at the seaboard.

5. So far as I know, there has been no answer given to the United Nations with reference to this request for a reconnaissance squadron, and perhaps one of the following courses should be taken:

- (a) We let the matter stand and await further request from UN.
- (b) We inform the United Nations that we will not meet the request.
- (c) That we inform United Nations that we will meet the request but, before doing so, would like reaffirmation by UNEF that there is need for both personnel and Ferret scout cars, — and if both are needed, that it will be some six weeks before men and equipment could be in Egypt, and even this depends upon shipping being available.
- (d) That, if vehicles are not required, personnel can be flown over within three weeks.

DRAFT AFRO-ASIAN RESOLUTION ON ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

The General Assembly, recalling its resolutions 997 (ES-1) of 2 November, 1956, 998 (ES-1) of 4 November, 1956, 999 (ES-1) of 4 November, 1956, 1002 of 7 November, 1956, and A/RES/410 of 24 November, 1956.

Noting the Report of the Secretary-General on 15 January, 1957 (Document A/3500),

Notes with regret and concern the failure of Israel to comply with the terms of the above-mentioned resolutions,

Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts for securing the complete withdrawal of Israel in pursuance of the above-mentioned resolutions and to report on such completion to the Assembly within five days.¹⁸⁴

MIDDLE EAST

I had a talk yesterday with Firoz Khan [at] noon with Percy Spender also present.

2. The Pakistani Foreign Minister took up a very strong anti-Nasser position and expressed the fervent hope that we would not give in to him on the question of Gaza, free navigation of the Gulf of Aqaba, or the deploying of the UN force along the demarcation line. He was emphatic that Nasser was a dangerous individual and should be weakened in every possible way. This seems to be another occasion where a Moslem leader says one thing in private and something else in public. He indicated that his own delegation was not entirely united on this matter and that he was having some difficulty preventing the Begum Ikramullah making a strong anti-Israel speech.

3. I also saw Eban and Comay who expressed considerable satisfaction over a statement I had made earlier in the day. Their main preoccupation now is to ensure that the complete Israeli civil administration of Gaza should not be withdrawn immediately, if and when a UN force moves in. They think that in any event it would take some weeks for the UN to be able to exercise efficiently administrative responsibilities in Gaza and that during that

On January 19, after two days of debate, the General Assembly adopted the Afro-Asian resolution by a vote of 74 in favour, two against and two abstentions. In announcing Canada's support for the resolution, Pearson hoped that the Secretary General's forthcoming report would consider "ways and means of stabilizing through UN action the situation after the withdrawal has taken place and pending a political settlement which alone can establish real and lasting peace and security in the area. Surely there must be no return to the conditions, if we can avoid it, which helped to provoke the initial military action." time the Israelis should remain. They are, of course, as is, indeed, everyone else, very worried about what the next five days will bring forth. We are undoubtedly approaching a crisis in the whole problem of the UN and the Middle East, and if we cannot next week in some way relate satisfactorily Israeli withdrawal to the acceptance by the UN of new responsibilities, the whole position of the UN, including the UNEF, in this area is likely to collapse. I wonder whether this is sufficiently realized in Washington?

SUPPLEMENT TO MY TEL "EGYPT AT THE CROSSROADS"

1. I wish to advance some considerations further to my telegram under reference suggesting that the Egyptian government is finding itself in a rather tight spot, both internally and also in its relations with the Arab world around it.

2. I suppose nothing that President Nasser has done so electrified the Arab world as his fateful arms deal with the Communist bloc. According to observers who were here then even Nasser himself was surprised by the extraordinary acclaim with which this move was greeted in most parts of the Arab world and which generally overrode ideological reservations. In his present (groups corrupt) of frustration that period must now appear as an Olympian peak which wistfully he would like again to reach if he could. Since that time however, while there have been many ups and downs in his prestige, he has been in my opinion losing considerable ground with his natural friends and allies.

3. There is no doubt that some of the Arab leaders especially King Ibn Saud resented the manner in which he announced the nationalization of the Suez Canal company, with no consultation on a matter which concerned them vitally. In the immediate months following and especially after the Three-Power intervention in Egypt, it was not the moment for his Arab friends to throw this up at him. Now however with relative calm and opportunity to ponder the past and prepare for the future some home truths will undoubtedly be said in the private council chambers of Arab leaders. I am informed that King Ibn Saud on his way through Cairo yesterday and today will find an occasion, with all due courtesy of course as head of one friendly state to another, to leave President Nasser in no doubt that he does not wish to be subjected to a repetition of unilateral steps taken by the President with all their alarming consequences.

4. Up until recently Libya seemed to be falling more and more under the influence of Egypt, but now it is reasserting its natural inclination to be a staunch friend of the West.

What must appear in Cairo as the crystallizing of a trend which might develop at the expense of Egypt was the signing about ten days ago of the pact of amity between Libya and Tunisia, and described as "a corner-stone of North African unity". If this trend towards federation extends all the way to Morocco, where the ruler is known to be highly critical of Nasser, a new force will appear in the Moslem world which in certain circumstances could challenge the pre-eminence of Egypt.

5. It is another dint in the prestige of Egypt that they have had to accept the expulsion of three military attachés from friendly countries, viz Libya, Lebanon and Ethiopia.

6. The Sudan has made appropriately sympathetic gestures towards Egypt during the last few months, but there are now serious misgivings as to the course of Egyptian policy particularly with regard to its too close association with the Communist bloc. I am informed that the Sudanese Ambassador here told the USA Embassy that his country would not make up its mind about the Eisenhower Plan until other countries concerned had registered their views. Sudan was without experience in world affairs and could not afford to be out of step with the majority of its neighbours, and consequently would definitely come down on the side of the consensus. Thus if the consensus favours the Eisenhower Plan, USA government could be assured of full Sudanese support.

7. Since sending my telegram under reference there is more evidence to support my estimate that on balance there will be a comfortable majority of governments in the MidEast which, with varying degrees of qualification, will look with favour on the Eisenhower Doctrine particularly its economic aspects. Even Jordan is wavering, as seen in the recently published remark by King Hussein who, while not giving full support, spoke in friendly terms of the Eisenhower statement. While the Egyptian government is still officially silent on the plan and Nasser has directed a number of enquiries to Washington to elicit further clarification on certain points, the press campaign which is gathering momentum here against the Eisenhower statement is probably a fair indication of what the government really thinks. The general line is that the USA plans to replace Britain and France as the dominant "imperialist" power in the MidEast, that there is no vacuum in this area since, it is claimed, emergent Arab nationalism is already both in effective control and is determined to steer a middle course between the two great powers, and that what are described as the main problems, (1) Israel and (2) the possibility of aggression from quarters other than of Communist origin, are not properly covered. Since these press opinions are being given wide publicity over the radio, the Egyptian government appears to be trying to swing opinion in the Arab world sufficiently against the plan to prevent them from being completely isolated. In this connection we may assume that Nasser asked King Ibn Saud, in his forthcoming trip to Washington, to put in some precautionary words on what the Egyptian allege is the disruptive effect of the Eisenhower Plan. The other day I could not help but overhear Saeb Salaam, the prominent Lebanese businessman and former Prime Minister, urging Wadsworth, USA Ambassador to Saudi Arabia, to endeavour when in Washington to induce his government to view the Arab world as a whole area that needed help and to avoid playing upon the differences among the governments by favouring one group of countries, e.g. Saudi Arabia or Iraq, at the expense of others.

8. President Nasser is fully aware of the fact that he has lost USA confidence and good will, and that it is entirely up to him to demonstrate his good faith if he expects to benefit from the Eisenhower Plan. This puts him in an extremely difficult position vis-à-vis his Arab associates who have hitherto lauded him as a man who can move and make policy independently. But he is under a critical scrutiny not only from the West but I am certain from some of his own friends and allies. Arabs are notoriously impulsive, emotional and given to melodramatic gestures, but in private they no doubt make allowances for these exuberances. Yet I doubt whether a serious misstep in policy on the part of Nasser will again be overlooked, particularly if it threatens to drag other neighbouring countries down into the abyss.

9. Internally the situation becomes more and more confused and perhaps, without exaggeration, chaotic. The decree to nationalize (the word was then corrected to "Egyptianize") banks, insurance companies and import firms, announced on January 16, exists only in a draft copy so that embassies and other interested establishments cannot as yet secure copies of the law. (I hope to report further on this measure). Published attempts to explain the measure have only darkened the obscurity.

10. A Canadian missionary with years of experience here has just described to us conditions in the villages of Upper Egypt where he lives. Financial burdens are becoming so heavy that there is general discontent and it is particularly resented that forced collections are being made by methods, not too nice, ostensibly for the rebuilding of Port Said.

11. I am reliably informed that there are definite signs of dissidence even within the army and that in particular the officers of the armoured (cavalry) corps have been kicking over the traces. A few of them are being held under arrest. The two Salem brothers are not disguising their disaffection. Some of these will recall that the chief reason that Neguib was removed from office was his lack of political sense and judgment. In similar circumstances, Nasser can expect even less charity since he is not as affectionately regarded in his person as was Neguib. His pre-eminence has been due to his associates' confidence in his political judgment. This judgment is now being tested in the most acute form and if enough of his fellow-officers should decide that his touch has gone and that his judgment shows signs of becoming erratic or suicidal, they would have even better reason to move against him than they had to rusticate General Neguib. There is this difference, Nasser almost certainly would not "go quietly" as did Neguib.

12. While no doubt the Soviet Ambassador is both pouring out words of encouragement and playing upon Nasser's suspicions of the West, the latter must be somewhat sobered by the recent evidence of underground Communist activity. The Communist movement is still illegal here. It has never been strong and it is hard to estimate its strength. The present régime seems to have driven it fairly completely out of the labour unions but since the Suez war there has been a revival of Communist activity marked by the distribution of Communist pamphlets in the main cities. The most sinister of these urges the populace who received arms during the recent hostilities not to surrender them because "the battle against imperialism has not yet been won". I am informed that the Ministry of the Interior is seriously concerned by this and has been strenuously attempting to collect all arms that were distributed but up to the present has not been completely successful. (I think it is a safe inference that a number of these arms have been sold across the borders, as there is always a demand for small arms in this part of the world notably of course in Algeria). This challenge from the Communists, while it may be a sign to Nasser "no larger than a man's hand" still might reveal to him that in Soviet eyes he is definitely expendable. In his present quandary therefore Nasser must be ruminating as to various means by which he can break out from his present constricted position. It would be rash to speculate as to what move he might make but I fear we can rule out one possibility and that is a decisive step towards conciliation and friendship with the West.

13. In the event that this telegram is shown outside the department, paragraph 12 might be deleted as source on Communist activity and government's reaction to it is USA Embassy.

CANADIAN ADVANCE TO INTERIM FUND

In accordance with the instructions in the above telegram, I saw the Secretary General on January 14.

2. I said to the Secretary General that the Canadian Government is anxious to lend its support to his efforts to keep the Canal clearance operations moving satisfactorily, both because of Canada's broad political interest in seeing the waterway re-opened and as an expression UN solidarity in support of the decision taken in the General Assembly. I said that, accordingly, I had been instructed to inform him immediately of the decision to advance $1 million towards the interim fund. I asked him however to keep this info strictly confidential for the time being pending a formal reply to his note of December 25.

3. I said further that the Canadian Government has been assisted in reaching a favourable decision to his request by the assurances which he had already given regarding the strictly interim nature of the financial arrangements now being made and the intention that the advance to the interim fund would be deemed a loan repayable following agreement upon a general programme of financing clearance of the Canal.

4. There were, however, certain other aspects of the question on which the Canadian Government would welcome any further assurances he could provide. The government fully appreciated the urgency of getting the Canal cleared, with a view both to easing tension in the Middle East and to relieving the severe strain which the interruption of traffic has imposed on the economies of many nations. The government, however, had grave apprehensions as to whether either of these objectives, to both of which it attached great importance, would be achieved by the clearing of the Canal without a clear and firm understanding that when it is re-opened freedom of passage will be ensured for the shipping of all nations. He would appreciate that from the domestic Canadian point of view the case for participation in the interim fund was essentially the direct Canadian interest in sustaining the economies of Canada's important friends and trading partners in Western Europe. The Canadian Government would therefore find it extremely difficult to explain to the people of Canada an advance to promote the early clearing of the Canal, if a situation were to develop a few months hence in which the shipping of some of Canada's closest friends were being refused passage through the Canal on political grounds. The Canadian Government had also broader apprehensions regarding possible international implications of a future crisis over Suez, but it was sure that these apprehensions were fully shared by the Secretary General.

5. The Secretary General said that he fully appreciated the concern of the Canadian Government over the future of the Canal. He could not predict the kind of arrangement that would ultimately be worked out but, having regard to the progress already made, he had good hopes that a satisfactory settlement would be reached. While he could not of course commit any of the governments whose consent to a satisfactory arrangement would be required he assured me that he would use his best efforts:

(a) to achieve assurances that negotiation under the auspices of the UN would be pursued rapidly for an over-all agreement on the Suez Canal problem, having regard to the progress already made, and

(b) to work out a definitive plan for the financing of the total cost of rehabilitation of the Canal which would include provision for repayment of the interim advances to the governments concerned.

6. The Secretary General also said he would use his best efforts to obtain assurances from the Government of Egypt that pending a final settlement of the Suez Canal problem, any operation of the Canal would be in accordance with the principles of the Constantinople Convention of 1888 and in the light of the progress already made, including the six points set forth in the Security Council Resolution of October 13/56. He said that he had received assurances from the Government of Egypt that it supported and would cooperate with the UN in its undertaking to assist in the clearance of the Suez Canal as effectively and as expeditiously as possible. He had also been assured that the Egyptian Government was ready to negotiate a settlement of the Suez Canal problem, having regard for progress already made. In this connection, the Secretary General drew attention to the action of the Security Council (UN document S/3675) and the exchange of letters in elaboration of this action between the Secretary General and the Foreign Minister of Egypt circulated as Security Council Document (S/3728).

7. In view of the assurances of the Secretary General, I felt that it was in accordance with my instructions to inform him officially that the Canadian Government was prepared to advance $1 million dollars to the interim fund. This I did by note of January 17, to which he replied on the same date. Copies of this correspondence† have already been sent to you.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

On January 19 the Secretary General discussed this matter with the Advisory Committee immediately before the Assembly began the meeting at which the Afro-Asian resolution on withdrawal was adopted by an overwhelming majority. Assuming that the resolution would be adopted the Secretary General spoke about the "negotiation problem" with which he would be faced in the next few days. This problem involved practical issues of the greatest significance and the Secretary General appealed to the Committee for "collective joint thinking on those issues". He invited members to give him their views either in the Advisory Committee or privately.

2. This meeting of the Advisory Committee had been called on the assumption that it would follow rather than precede the conclusion of the Assembly debate. The Secretary General had hoped to have a full discussion about the line which he should adopt in his separate discussions with the representatives of Egypt and Israel. In the absence of an Assembly decision he was not disposed to discuss the problem comprehensively on Saturday morning. He pointed out that there would be a request for full compliance on withdrawal with a time limit of five days for the report. On the other hand the Committee should bear in mind the attitude of Israel and specifically that the Government of Israel was prepared at an early stage "to discuss proposals for arrangements for the Gaza Strip". The Secretary General suggested that the Israeli attitude on Sharm Al Shaikh should also be interpreted as "preparedness to enter forthwith into conversations with the Secretary General". Combining this Israeli attitude with the resolution which the Assembly was about to adopt the Secretary General said that his forthcoming discussions with the representative of Israel should be concerned with "the plan for withdrawal from these two areas and, if these plans are in any way tied up with the proposals for arrangements, to insist on having such proposals on the table". If the Secretary General disregarded those proposals, his report to the Assembly must be confined to compliance or noncompliance with the resolutions on withdrawal.

3. The Secretary General pointed out that his note on the Israeli withdrawal (A/3500 of January 15) had emphasized the great significance of what must come after the withdrawal stage. The debate in the General Assembly had given even more emphasis to that. "From my point of view I would not now like to say more than one thing concerning my own stand; the more I think of this problem the more certain I am of the overriding importance of adherence to the armistice agreements". Before the clash, the Secretary General went on, there was a state of affairs which practically on no point corresponded to what the armistice agreements had established, and if there was to be no return to the status quo ante but to a more satisfactory state of affairs, the first reasonable effort should be to reestablish a military situation as close as possible corresponding to the armistice agreements. The present situation might offer certain opportunity in that regard.

4. A directly related question was whether UNEF could be deployed in such a way as to bring about an improved situation. The Secretary General drew attention to two statements in the basic report on UNEF (A/3302 of November 7). Paragraph 8 of that report stated: "It follows from its (UNEF) terms of reference that there is no intent in the establishment of the force to influence the military balance in the present conflict and, thereby, the political balance affecting efforts to settle the conflict". This was intended as a statement of the complete impartiality of the force and it had an important bearing on any additional task which might be given to UNEF. Paragraph 12 of that report included the following: "Nor should the force have military functions exceeding those necessary to secure peaceful conditions on the assumption that the parties to the conflict take all necessary steps for compliance with the recommendations of the General Assembly". This assumed the parties would without exception comply fully with Assembly resolutions. The assumption included withdrawal and also adherence to the armistice agreements.

5. The Secretary General said he had introduced these two quotations because he believed "that they are perfectly sound and that they are helpful in the consideration of how we should use UNEF to the best effect in our general effort to get control of the situation and move back not to this now so decried status quo ante but to status juris which gives us a chance for progress towards real solutions". The Secretary General said he would welcome any further views which members of the Advisory Committee might have on this difficult problem and he expected that the Committee would be discussing the whole matter more fully before he made any further report to the Assembly. I expressed the hope that the Committee could meet early in the week.

6. The Secretary General's remarks in the Advisory Committee were in line with views he had expressed privately to us on January 16. At that time he was at pains to explain why he had been unable in his report (A/3500) to go farther than he had in looking towards constructive solutions. He made the following points:

(a) Gaza. He did not think it wise to try to force a decision on the future of Gaza at this stage. In paragraphs 11 and 16 of his report he hinted at an extension of UNEF's role but he could not press this too far as long as UNEF was confined to Egyptian territory. Hence his use of the word "responsibilities" in paragraph 11, which signified that UNEF might be stationed on both sides of the demarcation line.

(b) Sharm Al Shaikh. After careful consideration he had decided that he could not go farther than what was said in paragraph 14 of his report. There was no doubt in his mind that the objective should be to secure freedom of passage through the Strait. He was very doubtful whether there would be a two-thirds majority in the Assembly now for a resolution directing UNEF to occupy Sharm Al Shaikh for an indefinite period. (Hence the reference in my statement on January 18 to "observers" from UNEF.) Concerning (b) the Secretary General reported that the Israelis were worried about the second sentence of paragraph 14 but it was the Secretary General's view that he would need a new mandate to station UNEF indefinitely on the Straits of Tiran. In the Secretary General's view it might not help for the Assembly to give detailed directions on the deployment of UNEF. He wished to keep this in his own hands for the present. He had to maintain good working relations between UNEF and the Egyptians.

7. As long as the Israeli troops were beyond the armistice lines the Egyptians could argue that there was a state of undeclared belligerency. This made it desirable to avoid an Assembly debate at the present time on the status of the Straits of Tiran and the Gulf, since discussion in present circumstances might prejudice a clear decision later concerning the international character of this waterway. From talks with the Egyptians and other Afro-Asians the Secretary General believed that if the Israelis withdrew from Sharm Al Shaikh and did not try to force the issue in the Gulf, the Egyptians would be very cautious about aggravating the situation there. The Secretary General had reason to believe that Dulles shared these views.

8. In all these circumstances and because we were then (January 16) aware that the Afro-Asian draft resolution on withdrawal had been watered down, we agreed that there would be no advantage either in trying to revise further the resolution on withdrawal or to introduce a concurrent resolution concerning the functions of UNEF along the demarcation line and including perhaps specific reference to its function at Sharm Al Shaikh and in the Gaza Strip. This did not rule out the possibility that a resolution of that kind might have to be introduced at a later stage but at least we would have five days to explore the situation. As matters stand the five days would presumably expire about noon on January 24. The Secretary General hopes that he can forestall a renewed Assembly debate before January 28. The fact that Kashmir will be discussed in the Security Council later this week might afford him the desired opportunity. It was Menon who was most insistent that the Assembly should meet automatically at the end of the five days but he may not be anxious for this to happen at the same time as the Council meeting.

9. In the meantime the Secretary General will continue his talks with the Egyptians and Israelis. He will no doubt consult further with the Advisory Committee and with others directly concerned with this very difficult question. If the Secretary General can produce a report which will meet the situation, that is, the impasse between Israel's insistence on assurances and Egypt's insistence on complete and unconditional withdrawal, the remedy might be simply an Assembly resolution endorsing the report, which would presumably give greater definition to UNEF's functions along the demarcation line. In the absence of a report of this kind and in the face of increased pressure for unconditional withdrawal, it might be necessary to introduce a resolution concerning the régime to be established along the demarcation line and including provisions about the Gaza Strip and Sharm Al Shaikh. Within the delegation we are seeking a formula and, of course, would appreciate any suggestions you may wish to make.

MIDDLE EAST SITUATION

Last Saturday's resolution regarding Israeli withdrawal gives us five days to work something out which will avoid deadlock on this whole issue. While the Secretary General should report by Thursday or Friday morning, it is hoped now that the debate on the question will not begin until next Monday. The delay is desirable because the problem to be solved is a very difficult one and not very much progress has yet been made by delegations in the search for a solution which will be acceptable to the two parties mainly concerned, and likely to receive 2/3 majority.

2. The Secretary General began his conversations with Israel and Egypt, as required by the resolution, on Sunday last. He told me yesterday that it had been a bad day and that the prospects were grim because of the unyielding stand of both sides. The Israelis are adamant in their refusal to withdraw further until they get some assurance that the UN will accept responsibility for Gaza, policing the armistice, and ensuring freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba. The Egyptians insist on immediate unconditional withdrawal before these other matters can even be talked about.

3. We are working in the delegation and with other delegations for some kind of agreed compromise, but are handicapped by the fact that the USA policy in regard to the matter is far from clear. Perhaps this situation will improve on Lodge's return today from Washington.

4. The best chance of finding a solution would seem to be in the inclusion in the report of the Secretary General of specific references to the UN's responsibilities in the matters referred to above and of suggestions as to how these responsibilities might be carried out. In that case, along with any further resolution on Israeli withdrawal, we could submit a resolution giving Assembly support to the Secretary General's ideas. There might be some chance of getting a 2/3 majority for a resolution on these lines. If this cannot be done, some other action not directly related to the Secretary General's report might be required. The core of any such resolution would be the use of the UN force for policing and administrative purposes in a zone which would have to cross, at some places at least, into Israeli territory, would cover Gaza in some form and to some extent, and also the Gulf of Aqaba. It would also require the demilitarization of the whole zone including Gaza and the Gulf of Aqaba. If we cannot get agreement by one or other of the above procedures, then we will be in serious trouble and the whole UN intervention in the Suez crisis, including the UNEF, may collapse. In default of agreement the Israelis are not likely to leave Gaza or the Straits of Tiran, and the Arabs may not, I think, be able to command 2/3 majority in any effort to bring about sanctions to force them out. It is this latter eventuality which presents the most immediate danger as I see it. I do not think that we should vote for any Arab-Asian resolution which proposes sanctions if the Assembly refuses to accept any responsibility for these wider and related problems. This, however, may be interpreted as a departure from our previous attitude and may indeed involve a difference of policy with the USA, though this is not yet certain.

5. The issues are not, of course, as dramatic as they were last November but in the long run they are just as serious, especially for the future of the UN. If it is felt in Ottawa that we should demand unconditional Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and the Aqaba area, and agree to diplomatic and economic pressure to this end through an Assembly resolution, I would be grateful to learn about it at the earliest possible opportunity. We shall soon have to make some very important decisions.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Following for the Minister. As you know, we have been examining possible ways of getting around the impasse which has developed over the Israeli withdrawal. Our conclusion is set forth in the following paragraphs which, if you agree, might serve as the basis of an aide-mémoire which I could discuss with Merchant here tomorrow and which might perhaps be of assistance to you and Mr. Heeney in any talks you may be having in New York and Washington. In view of the need to act quickly if representations along these lines are to have a useful effect, I should be grateful to have your comments as soon as possible. Text begins.

(1) Information from the Canadian Delegation in New York suggests that the General Assembly is faced with a grave dilemma, perhaps one of the gravest in United Nations history. Our reading of the signs is that unless some positive action by all countries concerned but more particularly by the United States is urgently forthcoming, the Assembly may be faced within the next few days with a complete breakdown of the U.N. effort in the Middle East.

(2) Establishment of UNEF was an essential factor in securing the cease-fire in early November. Its continued effective existence is no less important now if a return to border incidents is to be prevented between Egypt and Israel and if the United Nations is to assist in building the measure of stability and confidence needed to enable a start to be made on a political settlement.

(3) In addition to our general judgment that UNEF has a vital continuing role to play, our position as initiator of the force increases our concern that it should not be allowed to fold up in the face of the issue of Israeli withdrawal. We presume that other governments, including the United States, which supported UNEF's formation, share our concern.

(4) The future role of UNEF has now become inextricably tied up with the problem of the Israeli withdrawal. Even if the Secretary-General considered that existing resolutions gave him the necessary mandate to place units of the force in Sharm-Al-Shaikh and Gaza, he could not take action accordingly because, as matters now stand, the Israelis would not allow it unless they received certain guarantees. It would not be consistent with UNEF's terms of reference for the Secretary-General to order General Burns to move into the disputed areas by force of arms. Nor are the Egyptians, nor a majority of the Assembly, disposed to concede or even to discuss with Israel the guarantees Israel demands until all Israel's forces have been withdrawn behind the 1949 armistice lines.

(5) The Secretary-General has until Thursday or Friday of this week to prepare his report on the Israeli withdrawal in response to the Assembly resolution of January 19. The Canadian delegation reports from New York that up to yesterday, January 21, the Secretary-General's talks with the parties had apparently made no progress. It now appears unlikely that the Secretary-General will succeed in his efforts to reach a compromise between the Israeli and Egyptian positions, i.e. a compromise which, while providing for the completion of the Israeli withdrawal, would at the same time offer Israel some compensatory assurances concerning freedom of passage and the prevention of raids, and which would give UNEF a provisional function at Sharm-Al-Shaikh and in Gaza. If the Secretary-General does indeed fail to break the deadlock, the Arab states, aided by the Soviet group and a large number of Asian members, can be relied on to prepare a resolution calling for sanctions against Israel, and this might be difficult for the United States and perhaps ourselves not to support.

(6) The Egyptians are in a stronger bargaining position than the Israelis. A large majority of opinion in the Assembly is behind Egypt in its contention, which we share, that the primary element in the November 2 resolution was the injunction to withdraw. The Egyptians also have a strong bargaining point, if they care to use it, by virtue of their power to discriminate against shipping in the Suez Canal, which will be open in not much more than a month. It seems unlikely that the Egyptians will see any reason to lower their price; the only conceivable factor which might incline them towards compromise would be United States willingness to help them through their imminent economic crisis by some form of financial or economic aid. But it is extremely doubtful at the present stage that Egypt would put material aid before political principle and prestige.

(7) If Egypt will not yield, can anything be done to move the Israelis? We think that there may be some hope of this if the U.S. is prepared to use its influence with Israel. Somehow the Israelis will have to be persuaded to withdraw without prior assurances. This would admittedly mean that they would be obliged to lean on the good faith of the Assembly and more particularly on the ability of the Secretary-General to negotiate an acceptable solution of immediate Israeli pre-occupations. Our guess is, however, that once the Israelis have fully withdrawn, there could develop a good deal of support in the Assembly for Israel's position, and that this current of opinion might well find expression in a resolution defining the functions of UNEF as applying to Gaza and the Straits of Tiran (although Egypt might reasonably insist that UNEF's role required it to operate at least in part on Israeli territory, perhaps in territory adjoining the Gaza Strip). There have been indications that Egypt would not resist some form of U.N. supervision on its border with Israel.

(8) In view of the short time available before the Assembly must return to this item, we think that the U.S. authorities should know immediately of our belief that intervention by them in the sense indicated in paragraph 7 above, holds out the best if not the only prospect of resolving the current dilemma. Moreover, we think that they should be aware of our view that a critical stage has been reached in the United Nations' effort to settle the problems of the Middle East. We seriously fear that unless the United States acts, as we believe it can, to break the deadlock, all the good work that has so laboriously been done by the establishment of UNEF and the supervision of the cease-fire may fall to the ground. Text Ends.

Dear Mr. Miller,

I refer to your letter of January 16, 1957 asking for my views as to the desirability of Canada supplying an Army Reconnaissance Squadron for service with the United Nations Emergency Force.

2. According to a message from Lieutenant-Colonel Pope to your Department (POLEG 281 of January 21†) our Permanent Mission in New York has received, or will shortly receive a formal request from the United Nations Secretariat for Canada to provide a Ground Reconnaissance Unit. I presume that the Permanent Mission will be forwarding this request to us in the next day or two, and I shall of course inform you immediately that it is received here.

3. In the meantime I have received from Mr. Pearson an expression of his views on this subject. These are that we should make every effort to meet this request from the United Nations. He believes that General Burns is very anxious to have some Canadian troops in the forward element of the United Nations Emergency Force, and reports that both Burns and the United Nations officials in New York believe that the inclusion of a Canadian unit of this kind would be psychologically beneficial to UNEF, and would increase the effectiveness of ground patrols along the demarcation line. In Mr. Pearson's view this is sound reasoning, certainly from the political standpoint.

4. In addition, he has pointed out that there is some possibility that the functions and responsibilities of the UNEF might be extended in the near future. He suggests therefore that in all these circumstances we should perhaps look somewhat beyond the immediate military needs of the UNEF in deciding whether to provide the Reconnaissance Squadron.

Yours sincerely,
JULES LÉGER

ISRAEL WITHDRAWAL

This is to confirm our phone conversation about the revisions I have made in the draft memo contained in your telegram under reference. Since these revisions occur in paragraph 5 and following, I am now sending you the last four paras as revised. Begins:

5. The Secretary-General has until Thursday or Friday of this week to prepare his report on the Israeli withdrawal in response to the Assembly resolution of January 19. The Canadian delegation reports from New York that up to yesterday, January 21, the Secretary General's talks with the parties had apparently made little progress. It now appears that the Secretary General may not succeed in his efforts to reach a compromise between the Israeli and Egyptian positions, i.e. a compromise which, while providing for the prompt completion of the Israeli withdrawal, would at the same time offer Israel some compensatory assurances concerning freedom of passage and the prevention of raids, and which would give UNEF at least a provisional function with respect to freedom of navigation in the Gulf, and in the Gaza Strip. If the Secretary General does indeed fail to break the deadlock, the Arab states, aided by the Soviet group and a large number of Asian members, can be relied on to prepare a resolution calling for sanctions against Israel, which would be difficult either to support or oppose.

6. The Egyptians are in a strong bargaining position at the Assembly. A large majority of opinion there is behind Egypt in its contention, which we share, that the primary element in the November 2 resolution was the injunction to withdraw. The Egyptians also have a strong bargaining point, if they care to use it, by virtue of their power to exercise control of and discriminate against shipping in the Suez Canal, which will be open in not much more than a month; or even in regard to clearance of the Canal. It seems unlikely that the Eryptians will see any reason to lower their price, especially while they think that Assembly action might be effective in forcing the Israelis out of Gaza and the Straits of Tiran. A factor which might incline them towards compromise would be USA willingness to help them through their imminent economic crisis by some form of financial or economic aid. But it is doubtful at the present stage that Egypt would put material aid before political and prestige considerations.

7. If Egypt will not yield, what can or should be done to convince the Israelis that they should withdraw at once? We think that there may be some hope of this if the USA is prepared to use its influence both with Israel and at the Assembly along the following lines. Somehow the Israelis will have to be persuaded to withdraw without prior conditions but with assurances of UN action which will take effect as soon as they withdraw. This would admittedly mean that they would be obliged to lean on the good faith of the Assembly and more particularly on the ability of the Secretary General to negotiate — and the Assembly to ratify — an acceptable solution of immediate Israeli pre-occupations. Our guess is, however, that once the Israelis have fully withdrawn, there could develop a good deal of support in the Assembly for Israel's position, and that this current of opinion might well find expression in a resolution to be acted on immediately after the withdrawal resolution defining the functions of UNEF as applying to Gaza and the Straits of Tiran (although Egypt might reasonably insist that UNEF's role required it to operate at least in part on Israeli territory, perhaps in territory adjoining the Gaza Strip and in El Auja). There have been indications that Egypt would not resist some form of UN supervision on its border with Israel.

8. In view of the short time available before the Assembly must return to this item, we think that the USA authorities should know immediately of our belief that intervention by them in the sense indicated in paragraph 7 above, holds out the best if not the only prospect of resolving the current dilemma. Moreover, we think that they should be aware of our view that a critical stage has been reached in the UN's effort to settle the problems of the MidEast. We seriously fear that unless the USA acts, as we believe it can, to break the deadlock, all the good work that has so laboriously been done by the cease-fire may fall to the ground. Ends.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Yesterday (January 22) I discussed this subject with Lall who had asked to see me. He said that he wished to present some "moderate views" about the current impasse between Egypt and Israel. Lall had previously spoken in the same vein to a number of other people immediately concerned with the problem. He mentioned, in particular, the Secretary General, Lodge and Fawzi. I gathered that his conversation with Fawzi took place about a week ago.

2. Lall had gained the impression that the Egyptians were prepared to let a de facto situation develop in which ships of all flags would be allowed free navigation in the Straits of Tiran and in the Gulf of Aqaba as long as they were pursuing peaceful purposes. Lall thought it would be a mistake to insist at this stage on a "crystallization" of that situation. The Egyptians might be forced into opposition if any attempt were made to define the conditions in which the freedom of navigation would be exercised. At a later stage it might be desirable for the Assembly to ask the International Court for an advisory opinion on the status of the waters. It was Lall's impression that the Court's opinion might be in favour of Israel. It would be inadvisable to take this step, however, at the present time.

3. To give some assurance to the Israelis that the Egyptians would allow a de facto situation to develop UNEF should move into Sharm Al Shaikh on the heels of the Israeli withdrawal and should take its time in following the withdrawal from Sharm Al Shaikh to the demarcation line. Lall suggested that the poor condition of the roads, the roughness of the terrain and other factors could serve as reasons why UNEF should remain in the vicinity of the Gulf and Sharm Al Shaikh for several weeks. During this period normal ship traffic in the Gulf would presumably continue. If it did not, UNEF would be on hand to ascertain the cause for any disruption in the traffic. Lall implied that UNEF could perform this function in the ordinary course of following up the withdrawal and without any further definition of UNEF's role.

4. I said that Fawzi had left me with the impression that Egypt might be able to acquiesce in the kind of situation Lall had described. The Secretary General also seemed to share Lall's views about the part which UNEF might play. I said that we had been wondering whether a few UNEF observers in the vicinity of Sharm Al Shaikh together with some aerial patrolling in the Gulf might not meet the immediate needs of the situation. The main question was, however, whether the Israelis would withdraw; they would no doubt require some assurance that the situation which Lall had described would in fact develop. Lall's suggestion was that if a sufficient number of delegations were to express to the Israelis their views about future developments in the Gulf and in the Straits, the Israelis should be reassured to the extent of withdrawing from Sharm Al Shaikh.

5. I asked Lall about future arrangements for policing the demarcation line. Lall readily agreed that UNEF should be deployed along the demarcation line, that the opposing forces should be withdrawn about a mile or two from the line, that efforts should be made to restore the armistice agreement to full effect. There had been no suggestion in Delhi that the Indian contingent would be recalled once the Israeli withdrawal had been completed. Lall's attitude was encouraging because from remarks which Menon had made in the Assembly we had begun to doubt whether India would cooperate in any attempt to improve the situation along the demarcation line through the deployment of UNEF.

6. Lall wondered whether the Israelis would permit UNEF to operate within their territory. I said that this would be necessary, particularly in the vicinity of El Auja. I suggested that the area of UNEF operation within Israel might be less than that on the Egyptian side of the demarcation line. Lall acknowledged that this might have to be the case although the arrangement of the UN zone should not appear too one-sided.

7. As for the Gaza Strip Lall said there should be a "heavy impregnation of UN authority". He had in mind that UNEF would be thickly deployed along the demarcation line, bordering the Strip, that there should be a nominal return to Egyptian administration, but that UN supervision of this administration should be enlarged particularly in relation to the administration of refugee affairs. Moreover, determined efforts should be made in the near future to reach a solution of the refugee problem in the Gaza Strip. Lall had been urging the Egyptians and the Syrians to give consideration to plans for resettling the Gaza refugees in other Arab areas. Accompanying steps should be that Israel agree to a token repatriation from the Gaza Strip and compensation should be arranged for refugees which had to be resettled in other Arab lands.

8. We also discussed the possibility of demilitarizing the Gulf of Aqaba. I pointed out that the Israelis had two or three naval vessels in the Gulf and this might suggest that they were planning to organize a naval base at Elath. This could be a source of anxiety not only to Egypt but to Jordan and Saudi Arabia. It might jeopardize the possibility of establishing free navigation for all peaceful shipping in the Straits of Tiran and in the Gulf. In these circumstances it might be desirable to demilitarize the Gulf. This would mean that the Israeli warships should be withdrawn and that the Arab states bordering the Gulf should be precluded from establishing gun positions from which shipping in the Straits and the Gulf could be controlled, and of course they would not be allowed to establish a naval blockade at the southern entrance to the Gulf. A more lasting solution would be to conclude an international agreement among the riparian States but as an interim measure the General Assembly might prescribe demilitarization for the Gulf. Lall did not dismiss this as a possibility but he left me with the impression that he regarded any such proposal on demilitarization as something which should be pursued after the immediate problem of Israeli withdrawal (including whatever accompanying steps that could be taken to assure Israel) had been solved.

MIDDLE EAST

Following my phone conversations with the Minister and with the Under-Secretary, I arranged, as agreed, to see Phleger, State Department Legal Adviser, in order to transmit the aide mémoire set out in the revised form indicated in your telegrams under reference. He was accompanied by Rickwell of the office of Near Eastern Affairs, DePalma, UN Political and Security Affairs, and Meeker of his own division. The presentation of the aide mémoire was timely and served the useful purpose of emphasizing again your real concern at the prospect of deadlock in the continuing UN effort in the Middle East.

2. On the central argument of our aide mémoire (paragraph 7 of your telegram under reference), Phleger questioned the prospect of persuading the Israelis to withdraw without prior conditions, but only with assurances of subsequent UN action to preserve the position, through the employment of UNEF in Gaza and the Straits of Tiran. He thought that the time was shortly coming when it would be necessary to remind the Egyptians of the obligations they had undertaken in the November 2 resolution, and to make it clear that the complete withdrawal of the Israeli forces must be matched by corresponding action on the part of Egypt to comply fully with terms of earlier UN resolutions. Phleger was afraid that if the Assembly should insist upon Israeli withdrawal without at the same time making adequate provision for protecting the UN position in Gaza and the Straits of Tiran, through the deployment of UNEF, the bargaining position of Egypt would be strengthened, and the prospects of an adequate and effective settlement on the lines of our common objectives would be more difficult to realize.

3. From our ensuing discussion which covered a wide field, the present USA position may be summarized in the following propositions:

(i) The present State Department appreciation of the state of Hammarskjöld's negotiations with the parties is of this moment rather less pessimistic than indicated in our aide mémoire. The State Department is still hopeful, although it may be a dwindling hope, that Hammarskjöld may be able to make some progress with the parties. They recognize, however, that the public statement of Ben-Gurion, and the strong bargaining position of the Egyptians, are likely to militate against the success of the Secretary-General's efforts to reach an agreed solution.

(ii) Even if Hammarskjöld should not be able to secure agreement on the lines proposed in your speech in the Assembly on January 18, and the similar views expressed by Lodge, the State Department consider that the best pathway to progress still lies in the Secretary-General's efforts and in his report. Although no agreement with the parties may be possible within the time limit, they hope that Hammarskjöld may be persuaded in his report on compliance to present his own views of the requirements of the situation in terms which would provide both for Israeli withdrawal and for an adequate vote for UNEF in the Gaza Strip and in the Straits. If the Secretary General comes forward with such proposals, the State Department would expect that the Assembly should take formal action to accept them, and thus continue the pressure on the parties to move forward on these lines.

(iii) On the other hand, the State Department recognizes quite clearly the strong possibility of action by the Arab-Asian bloc to produce a condemnatory resolution with provision for sanctions against Israel. The estimate of those closest to UN operations is that the Americans could in fact muster sufficient support in the Assembly to ensure that any resolution proposing sanctions would fail to obtain a two-thirds majority. They made it clear that in fact the USA would not support, and indeed would oppose, a sanctions resolution against Israel.

(iv) If such a sanctions resolution should be forthcoming, the State Department is at present thinking of putting forward an amendment or an alternative resolution which would place obligations on both parties, possibly by restating in the preamble the obligations on Egypt to ensure freedom of navigation in the Gulf and the prevention of raids across the frontiers. (I should emphasize that the State Department's ideas here are at a very early stage).

4. Of these various possibilities, the first aim should be to attempt to persuade the Secretary-General to take the line indicated in subparagraph (ii) above. We have the impression that instructions will be sent to Lodge at once asking him to see the Secretary-General again, and to consult closely with you and the delegation in New York. In addition to the part which Canada has played in the establishment of the force, our role on the Advisory Committee seemed to Phleger to provide a further opportunity for trying to steer matters in the direction suggested. Above all, the view here is that in the last resort our common objectives can only be reached through negotiation, since the consent of the Egyptians and the Israelis is required to permit UNEF to assume the new functions. There is no difference of view that UNEF is the key to the present problem of holding the line in the area.

5. The State Department think it will be possible that the Assembly discussion on the Secretary-General's report can be held off until Monday.

ASSEMBLY ACTION ON SECRETARY-GENERAL'S REPORT

We have discussed with DePalma (Office of UN Political and Security Affairs) the follow-up action envisaged by the State Department following submission of the Secretary-General's report.

2. DePalma showed us in confidence a copy of a proposed draft resolution which he thought would shortly be going forward to the USA Delegation in New York. This draft resolution begins by recalling earlier General Assembly resolutions beginning on November 2, and including the resolution of January 19, and records the receipt of the latest report by the Secretary General. It then goes on to note with "grave concern" the failure of Israel to withdraw its forces behind the armistice lines despite requests of the General Assembly. It calls upon Israel to arrange for the complete withdrawal of Israeli forces without further delay, but at the same time calls upon both Egypt and Israel to observe the positions prescribed in 1949 armistice agreement. It then calls for approval of the recommendations of the Secretary-General's report, and the measures required as a result of that report which are to be implemented on the withdrawal of Israeli forces. Finally, it urges all members to observe and respect these recommendations, and consequential measures, and to extend full cooperation.

3. DePalma explained that the background of a resolution of this type lay in the generally satisfactory character of the Secretary-General's report. In the view of the State Department, it was a "courageous" document, and despite some obscurities, laid down the essential lines on which progress might be made at the present moment to maintain and expand the role of UNEF.

4. The USA was anxious to stave off an Arab-Asian resolution calling for sanctions against Israel and the delegation would be instructed to discuss a text on these lines with the Secretary-General, with the Minister, and with other friendly delegations who might be interested in co-sponsorship (for example, Brazil, India and Norway) in the hope that an acceptable resolution could be formulated capable of receiving the necessary two-thirds majority.

5. DePalma said that he understood the present Canadian position to be that there would need to be reference in such a resolution to specific authority to provide for the deployment of UNEF on both sides of the armistice lines, as well as in the area of Aqaba, and the Gaza Strip. The present thinking in the State Department is that such a detailed spelling out of UNEF responsibilities in the resolution at this time might not be the best course. While the State Department agrees with the objectives of bringing about a UNEF operation on both sides of the armistice lines, and especially in the Gaza Strip and at El Auja, they are inclined to doubt that these objectives should be specifically tied in with a General Assembly decision just at this time. The first consideration is that Israel should be urged to withdraw. The State Department believes that the problem of stationing UNEF on both sides of the armistice line is one for the next phase of operations, and that this is especially true in connection with the use of UNEF in the Gaza Strip. The fact that Israel desires the strengthening of the role of UNEF in the Gaza area, and generally agrees with the objective of prolonging the stay of UNEF, might induce them soon to agree to the deployment of UNEF on the Israel side of the line, which it is assumed the Egyptians will press to bring about.

6. Further, it is believed here that there is no question that the Secretary General has the authority to station UNEF in the Gaza area, with some form of Egyptian administration, as the Secretary General has proposed, and further consideration should be given to the possibility of expanding the UN role at Gaza. The State Department considers that the precise requirements for further Assembly action might better be deferred until after the arrival of UNEF in the area.

7. DePalma also indicated that the Secretary-General considers that he has an adequate basis at present for using UNEF elements in the vicinity of Tiran, and that the force could remain in this area at least until the Egyptian Government gives an assurance that it will not assert belligerent rights. At this stage, further UN action would then be required to keep at least UNEF observers on the spot.

8. In general terms, therefore, the view here is that the Secretary-General's report as it stands provides a satisfactory basis for immediate progress, and the USA delegation seems likely to be encouraged to endorse the Secretary General's report, and deal with the matter on a "flexible" basis.

9. It should be noted, however, that the views set forth in paragraphs five and six above are not finally fixed, and that modifications in the direction of more specific reference to UNEF's tasks would be made if, in the view of the Secretary-General, this is desirable, and if such action would not prejudice the chances of obtaining the necessary majority. The State Department, for example, might be prepared to accept some reference in the draft resolution to an expression of readiness on the part of the Assembly "to consider further steps as required" to give effect to the recommendations and measures proposed in the Secretary-General's report.

10. Another possible change which the State Department might have to accept in a resolution of the type proposed would be a somewhat stronger condemnation of Israel for its failure to carry out the Assembly's request to withdraw.

11. The foregoing info was collected at some haste in our discussion with DePalma, but we believe it substantially represents the line the USA Delegation in New York is likely to take. We were also handicapped by not having seen any text or summary of the Secretary-General's report. We would be grateful, however, since final decisions here have not been reached, if the info in this message could be regarded as for background at this stage.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

We have prepared a preliminary draft of a resolution which Canada, together with the USA, Norway, Colombia and others, would introduce early in the resumed debate on this subject. During the next day or so we shall be discussing this text with the Secretary-General and other possible co-sponsors. The Minister wishes to emphasize that the text is provisional and may well be changed before it is submitted to the Assembly. The question of sponsorship will not be decided until we have firm views about the text.

2. The Minister would be glad to have your comments and those of Robertson and Heenev. He would prefer, however, to consult on this text with the UK and USA through their delegations here.

3. The operative part of the draft resolution reads as follows. We shall add a preamble later. Begins:

- (1) Notes with approval the Secretary General's report () of January 26;
- (2) Deplores the non compliance of Israel with resolutions of the General Assembly regarding the withdrawal of its forces behind the armistice demarcation lines and demands that Israel complete that withdrawal without further delay;
- (3) Recognizes that withdrawal of forces must be followed by action which would represent real progress towards the creation of peaceful conditions in the region;
- (4) Urges the Governments of Israel and Egypt to reaffirm their undertakings under the General Armistice Agreement between them of February 24/49, and to take all necessary measures to return to full implementation of that agreement;
- (5) Instructs the Secretary General to make arrangements after consultations with the parties concerned for the deployment of the UNEF on both sides of the armistice demarcation line, and in the Gaza Strip, so that it may be in a position to assume the supervisory duties of the Truce Supervision Organization in all the territories where the Organization now functions under the armistice agreement between Egypt and Israel;

(6) Instructs the Secretary General to delimit, in agreement with the parties concerned, the area in which the UNEF will be deployed to prevent incursions and raids across the armistice demarcation line; and to maintain quiet and peaceful conditions along the line;

(7) Requests the Israeli and Egyptian Governments to remove all military forces from this area of deployment;

(8) Authorizes the Secretary General, through a civil and military mission to be selected by him, to assist in and supervise the replacement of the present civil administration of Gaza, and to take steps to ensure that this area shall not be used as a base for incursions and raids against Israel;

(9) Recommends that determination of the legal status of the Gulf of Aqaba and the Straits of Tiran should be sought from the International Court of Justice, which should be accepted by the countries concerned, and pending this determination calls upon the parties to the armistice agreement to give assurances that they will not assert or exercise any belligerent rights in these waters, or interfere in any way with the right of innocent passage therein;

(10) Authorizes air and ground units of UNEF, on the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Gulf of Aqaba area, and through arrangements with and in cooperation with the Egyptian authorities, to assist in the establishment and maintenance of peaceful conditions in the area, based on mutual restraint and non-interference, and in the prevention of acts in contravention of the preceding paragraph.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

As we indicated on the phone the Minister had discussions last evening (Friday January 25) with Lodge and Dixon about our draft resolution, which we have shown to the delegations of the USA, UK, Australia (in an effort to head off Spender) and Norway. Earlier in the day the Minister had discussed the draft with the Secretary General whose reaction was favourable.

2. In the conversation with Lodge it was agreed that the proposed resolution should be co-sponsored by seven or eight powers probably including the following: Canada, Colom-

¹⁸⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

Mr. Elliott

This came to me from Mr. Watkins & has not been registered or anything. [H.B.] R[obinson] bia, Norway, India, Burma, Brazil or Peru and Yugoslavia. Lodge said he would approach Fawzi and Menon in an effort to persuade them to accept the resolution along the lines we were thinking. The Minister informed Lodge that we would be speaking to the Egyptians on January 27. The Minister emphasized that we would not wish to have the resolution watered down too much in order to attract support from India and other Afro-Asians. Our draft was intended as a document which might serve as the "other international instrument" which the Israelis had said in their aide mémoire of January 23 would give them the kind of assurances they were seeking prior to withdrawal from Sharm Al Shaikh. Lodge said that he liked the Canadian text but that it might be necessary to make some changes in order to ensure that the resolution passed with a two-thirds majority.

3. Lodge then showed us a USA text, which we understand was approved by Dulles. We assume it is the one referred to in Washington telegram 9 of January 25. Lodge had discussed this text with the Secretary General who told the Minister that, although such a resolution would probably attract wide support, it would be of little assistance to the Secretary General because it would give him no guidance on how he should proceed. The USA text "Approves the recommendations and measures proposed by the Secretary General in his report" and requests him "on this basis to undertake discussions with the parties". In fact the Secretary General has made no "recommendations" although he has suggested a possible basis for negotiation. He told the Minister he would much prefer our text.

4. Lodge suggested that it would not be too difficult to integrate the two texts. We agreed and this has been done. The revised text is contained in my immediately following telegram. The phrases in brackets are still under consideration and there will undoubtedly be other suggestions for revision.

5. The USA delegation today sent the joint text to the Egyptians as a "working draft". We gathered last evening that Lodge would today discuss the whole matter with Fawzi. Also today the Minister discussed with Lall the various ideas which were contained in our draft resolution. The Minister explained the tactics we proposed to follow and said that Lodge would probably approach Menon about sponsorship. Lall did not see the text but he seemed generally receptive to most of the proposals which have been incorporated in it.

6. Lall envisaged that when the debate resumed on January 28, while it might be a heated discussion it would not involve any resolution. Most of the Afro-Asians have agreed to the suggestion that after a general debate on the current situation in the MidEast the Assembly might adjourn for a day or so to give delegations an opportunity to reach an understanding about resolutions. We hope that matters will proceed this way but it will be necessary to be fully prepared for alternative moves in the Assembly. As you know the Australians have a draft resolution and we understand that the Netherlands delegation has received instructions to co-sponsor it. There has been some talk about a wilcat Arab draft resolution. In these circumstances we cannot be too sure that the present encouraging trend will be allowed to continue.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

The following is the revised text of draft resolution referred to in our immediately preceding telegram: The General Assembly,

1. Recalling its resolutions of November 2, 4, 5, 7 and 24/56 and January 19/57;
2. Having received the report of the Secretary General contained in Document A/3512 of January 24/57;
3. Deplores the non-compliance of Israel with resolutions of the General Assembly regarding the withdrawal of its forces behind the armistice demarcation line and demands that Israel complete that withdrawal without further delay;
4. Notes with satisfaction the Secretary General's report A/3512 of January 24; and approves the recommendations and measures proposed by the Secretary General in his report, which are to be carried out upon the withdrawal of Israeli forces;
5. Recognizes that withdrawal of forces must be followed immediately by action which would represent real progress towards the creation of peaceful conditions in the region;
6. Calls upon the Governments of Egypt and Israel scrupulously to observe the provisions of the 1949 armistice agreement, (and to this end to refrain from all acts of hostility including the exercise (by either party) of any claim to belligerent rights);
7. Instructs the Secretary General to make arrangements after consultations with the parties concerned, for the deployment of the UNEF on both sides of the armistice demarcation line, and in the Gaza Strip, so that it may be in a position to assume the supervisory duties of the Truce Supervision Organization in all the areas where the Organization now functions under the armistice agreement between Egypt and Israel; to prevent incursions and raids across that line; and to maintain quiet and peaceful conditions along the line;
8. Requests the Israel and Egyptian Governments to remove their military forces from these areas of deployment;
9. Authorizes the Secretary General, through a civil and military mission to be selected by him, to assist in and supervise the replacement of the present civil administration of Gaza, and to take steps to ensure that the Gaza Strip shall not be used as target for attacks from Israel;
10. Recommends that determination of the legal status of the Gulf of Aqaba and the Straits of Tiran should be sought from the International Court of Justice, which should be accepted by the countries concerned, and pending this determination calls upon the parties to the armistice agreement to give assurances that they will not assert or exercise any belligerent rights in these waters, or interfere in any way with the right of innocent passage therein; (calls upon the parties and other governments concerned, pending a final determination of the status of the Gulf of Aqaba and the Straits of Tiran to give assurances that they will not assent...etc.)

11. Authorizes the Secretary General to arrange for air and ground units of UNEF, on the withdrawal of Israel forces from the Gulf of Aqaba area, and through arrangements with and in cooperation with the Egyptian authorities, to assist in the establishment and maintenance of peaceful conditions in the area, based on mutual restraint and non-interference, and in the prevention of acts in contravention of the preceding paragraph;

12. Urges all members to observe and respect these recommendations and measures and to extend their full co-operation in giving them effect;

13. Requests the Secretary General to report, as appropriate, to the General Assembly.

DESPATCH 32

New York, January 28, 1957

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM SINAI

On the afternoon of January 26 Mr. Comay, on behalf of Mrs. Meier, again discussed this subject with me. At that time Mr. Eban was in Washington consulting with the State Department on the same matter. I asked Mr. Comay for his views on the Secretary-General's report (A/3512 of January 24) but he offered little comment, saying only that the report was ambiguous and that he did not understand what the Secretary-General was trying to achieve. There were, as far as Comay could see, no recommendations in the report.

2. I agreed that the Secretary-General had made no recommendations. He had, however, gone well beyond mere withdrawal and suggested a basis for future negotiation. The main suggestion was that the parties should return to the régime of the General Armistice Agreement of 1949 but in particular to Articles I, II, VII and VIII. The aim would be to make the principal articles of the Armistice Agreement fully effective and to this end to deploy UNEF along both sides of the demarcation line. The Secretary-General's hope was that the General Assembly would make appropriate recommendations.

3. There were two special problems, as regards the:

(a) Gulf of Aqaba — A good case could be made for insisting that if the Armistice Agreement should become fully effective, Egypt would be precluded from the exercise of any claim to belligerent rights, including of course the right to blockade the Straits of Tiran; UNEF or some other UN agency might be employed to ensure through supervision that belligerent rights were not exercised in the Gulf;

(b) Gaza Strip — There seemed to be no case for continuing the present administration by Israel; probably some nominal Egyptian authority would have to be restored; but the United Nations, including UNEF, should have a considerable hand in the administration. To achieve these aims it would not be sufficient merely to ask the Secretary-General to pursue negotiations on the basis of his report. This was the approach of the United States but we did not agree with it. We believed that there must be a clear directive from the Assembly in the form of a resolution. It was our hope that this would give adequate assurance that the United Nations would not let matters in Palestine drift back to the deplorable state of affairs before October 29, 1956. Comay, who seemed depressed, did not comment specifically on the various proposals. He emphasized that public opinion in Israel was firmly behind Mr. Ben Gurion's recent policies and there was a determination not to return to the status quo ante. In particular the Israelis would not accept a resumption of Fedayeen raids from the Gaza Strip and a blockade of the Straits. There was too much uncertainty about the future of UNEF to conclude that it would afford adequate assurance that the Armistice Agreement would be fully implemented. Israel had suffered in the past from partial implementation. Mr. Comay's arguments were a recapitulation of those advanced by Mr. Eban on January 24, and earlier by Mrs. Meier.

4. I emphasized that our present preoccupation was to achieve a degree of security in the area which it had not enjoyed in the recent past. Through the deployment of UNEF we hoped to bring about a state of affairs which in time would produce the political atmosphere for more permanent solutions. We believed that the UN supervision in the area should extend to the Gulf of Aqaba, as well as along both sides of the demarcation line and in the Gaza Strip. The first step would be to persuade the General Assembly to adopt an appropriate resolution. If the Egyptians and their supporters did not agree with it, the resolution might fail to be adopted by the necessary two-thirds majority.

5. Mr. Comay wanted to know whether we would expect the Israel armed forces to withdraw if the resolution failed to be adopted. I said that in these circumstances the United Nations might be in grave difficulty but Israel would be in very great trouble too. If its armed forces were not withdrawn, there would follow a series of resolutions on withdrawal with ever more drastic recommendations. Israel would be on the defensive all the time. Sanctions might be recommended sooner or later. A move might be made to expel Israel from the United Nations. Although we would not wish to see developments of this kind, it would be difficult to stem the tide of opinion in the Assembly. In addition, tension in the area would be increased.

6. Mr. Comay said that Israel's only alternative to maintaining its troops along the Gulf and in the Gaza Strip might be a "simple capitulation" to Assembly pressure, which he regarded as wholly favourable to Egypt. He did not see how the Israeli Government could accept this position. His belief was that if constructive efforts at the Assembly next week did not succeed, Israel would not withdraw its armed forces. I said that in the absence of satisfactory assurances I could hardly blame Israel for adopting this attitude. I then outlined the measures which we hoped to have included in the draft resolution which would be submitted to the General Assembly. Without quoting the text, I paraphrased various paragraphs in our draft resolution.

7. When I completed this summary, Mr. Comay asked whether there would be any reference to the Suez Canal in our draft resolution. Israel could see no reason why it should recognize Egypt's right in the Gaza Strip when the Egyptians would not recognize Israel's rights in the Suez Canal. I replied that Israel's rights in the Canal would have to be taken into consideration when the general settlement of the Canal question was being considered. In the meantime we might re-examine our draft resolution to see whether some reference to the Security Council's resolution of 1951 on the Suez Canal could be included. If the Arabs and their supporters could refrain from pressing for a condemnation of sanctions in the early part of the debate, there would be no need to introduce our draft resolution then. In these circumstances we would have more time to work out the details. We had reason to believe that there was a general disposition in the Assembly to have an exchange of views on the Secretary-General's report, as the opening stage in the debate, and then to adjourn for a day or so in order to provide time for delegations to consult concerning the resolution or resolutions.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

I had lunch Sunday with Fawzi and Loufti at their request. MacKay was also present. Fawzi was as usual sweetly reasonable and talked quite frankly about the Secretary General's report and the next step. Lodge had given him a copy of our resolution as revised to date much to my concern so that Fawzi was quite aware of what we have had in mind. I emphasized that the draft was nothing more than a working paper for consideration.

2. Fawzi took the line that he has consistently followed that the first step is to get the Israelis out and that after that Egypt would be quite prepared to talk about ways and means for preventing further outbreaks and settlement of the Gulf and Canal problems. However he was not unreasonable about the timing of completion of withdrawal and suggested that the end of the month or even the first week in February might be satisfactory. He seemed to appreciate that some interim administrative arrangement might have to be made in Gaza.

3. With respect to subsequent arrangements he said that they would not oppose although they could not support an immediate reference to the Court or other judicial agency of the question of Israeli rights to the Gulf of Aqaba and use of the Canal. He said quite definitely that Egypt would accept a decision of the Court even if it were adverse. He was however careful to avoid any commitment about the stationing of UNEF at Sharm Al Shaikh.

4. He referred favorably to the deployment of UNEF on both sides of the demarcation line and seemed to accept my suggestion of its stationing in the Gaza Strip also. He also said that they would not be adverse to seeing the functions of UNEF enlarged by which he seemed to imply that they could accept turning over the functions of UNTSO to UNEF. He did not comment on the proposal in the draft resolution of further demilitarization in the zones already partially demilitarized by the Armistice Agreement.

5. I pointed out that it might be very difficult to get the Israelis to move out without some assurances on these various points. Fawzi did not suggest that the Israelis could be easily persuaded but suggested that a withdrawal resolution might include a commitment by the Assembly to take up these other matters immediately withdrawal was completed. He stressed the point that he thought it would be a grave blow to the prestige and the future of the UN if it formally allowed an aggressor to profit by his aggression as would be the case if withdrawal were formally accepted as conditional.

6. With respect to procedure over the next few days Fawzi thought that the best way was to let the Assembly debate the report of the Secretary General without a resolution. He suggested that the visit of King Saud on Wednesday might be a convenient excuse for adjourning the debate or at least postponing action. Meantime a small working party under the chairmanship of the Secretary General might be established to draw up an agreed resolution. The working party should not include Egypt or any of the participants or their close friends. He appeared most anxious that an agreed resolution might emerge. He felt that they could meantime hold back their Arab friends from presenting a resolution if other parties could prevent a resolution from coming forward.

7. My impression is that the Egyptians are genuinely anxious to avoid a re-establishment of a situation which would lead to recurrences of border raiding provided this can be done without loss of prestige. I am inclined to think also that they would be prepared to accept an indefinite deployment of UNEF with perhaps enlarged functions along the demarcation line as a mean of stabilizing the situation. As against this there is the Israeli insistence on prior and definite assurances. It is unlikely however that the Egyptians will give any definite assurances to the UN in advance of withdrawal. It is an open question whether we and other UN members who are sympathetically disposed to support the substance of the Israeli case even if we deplore their methods can rely on oral conversations with Egyptian representatives who may indeed prove more reasonable than Cairo. It is even more doubtful that the Israelis will be prepared to rely on conversations between the Egyptians and third parties.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

As we expected, the resumed debate in plenary session on this subject dealt with the Secretary General's report (A/3512 January 24) and was not concerned with any resolution. Between the scenes largely under USA guidance efforts were made to organize a group of potential cosponsors of a draft resolution which would be acceptable to at least two thirds of the Assembly. It was Lodge's idea that the draft resolution, which the Canadian and USA delegations had prepared jointly, serve as a working paper for the group. It has been suggested that the group should consist of the members of the Advisory Committee of UNEF plus Burma, El Salvador, USA and Yugoslavia. Through consultations with the parties this group would try to evolve a constructive resolution which would break the current impasse.

2. Today (January 28) Lodge explained these tactics to the Minister and later to Dixon. Lodge also had discussions with Menon who seems anxious to become associated with current efforts to reach a solution. This probably means that Menon rather than Lall (who normally represents India on the Advisory Committee) would participate in the activities of the group of sponsors. Menon, who spoke briefly to the Minister today, said that the current debate could be adjourned tomorrow at noon until the end of this week or even until February 4. Previously Fawzi had indicated his willingness to accept a recess until Thursday or Friday.

3. There has been some speculation about the readiness of the Afro Asians to acquiesce in this delay. Several reasons have been advanced.

(a) The Afro Asians are aware that they could not attract a two thirds majority for a resolution on withdrawal calling for drastic action against Israel.

(b) A delay might help them to organize sufficient support for such a resolution, particularly if it should become apparent that Israel's intransigence would block ostensibly constructive efforts acceptable to Egypt.

(c) Egypt and the other Arab states realize that their only hope of bringing about a withdrawal by Israel lies through cooperation with the constructive efforts sponsored by the Western powers.

(d) Egypt may wish to delay the withdrawal of Israel until the re-opening of the Suez Canal, when Egypt's bargaining position will be very strong. Meanwhile the non compliance of Israel with the resolutions on withdrawal gives Egypt an excuse for not pursuing negotiations about the Suez Canal.

4. Whatever the reason for the delay, most delegations welcome the opportunity to consult more fully about the next step.

5. During the debate today the representative of Ceylon made a largely constructive statement in which he emphasized that the various suggestions made by the Secretary General in his report should be pursued by the General Assembly immediately after the problem of withdrawal had been dealt with. Fawzi had taken a similar position in discussions with the Minister. The Egyptians did not participate in today's debate and they are not scheduled to speak tomorrow. Eban made a long statement which in large part was a criticism of the Secretary General's report and in which he tried to justify Israel's attitude towards withdrawal from Gulf of Aqaba and the Gaza Strip. He dwelt at length on Israel's proposals for the future administration of Gaza. Much of what he said was conveyed to us privately in conversations which have been reported to you.

6. Lodge made a brief clear cut statement in which he reiterated the USA position that Israel must withdraw its forces without further delay. He gave strong endorsement to Secretary General's report and particularly to the suggestion that UNEF should move in between withdrawing Israeli forces in order to assure the maintenance of the cease fire and to safeguard the armistice agreement. UNEF should be deployed on both sides of the demarcation line, particularly with regard to the sensitive positions in the Gaza and El Auja sectors. Lodge went farther than we expected when he said that "It is essential that units of UNEF be stationed at the Straits of Tiran in order to achieve there the separation of Egyptian and Israeli land and sea forces". The Secretary General should be authorized to carry out these measures immediately upon the withdrawal of Israeli forces. Eban expressed to the Minister considerable satisfaction about Lodge's reference to the Straits.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

The debate in plenary continued during the morning of January 29. Statements were made by the representatives of Iraq, USSR, Bolivia, Canada and Morocco. Jamali made a fiery speech blaming Israel for almost all the problems which have arisen in the Middle East since Israel's inception. On the constructive side he expressed a willingness to have UNEF deployed along both sides of the demarcation line in order to separate Egyptian and Israeli forces and to ensure full compliance with the armistice agreement. Kuznetsov followed the line which previous Soviet speakers have done during the current crisis in the Middle East. Efforts made by the Western powers, principally the USA, to deal with the crisis, including the establishment of UNEF, were characterized as an attempt to restore colonialism. The Eisenhower doctrine was part of this sinister plan. However, Kuznetsov's language was more moderate than on previous occasions.

2. I was undecided whether to intervene in this preliminary debate. There was much to be said for letting the Afro-Asians, and particularly the hotheads, talk themselves out before serious efforts should be made behind the scenes to break the deadlock. I did think, however, that it might be useful to inject into the debate and to place on record our ideas about how the Assembly should proceed and particularly about the kind of draft resolution we thought would meet the situation. There might be some value too in giving endorsement to what Lodge had said on January 28.

3. I discussed tactics in separate interviews with the British and Lodge. They both agreed that a Canadian statement would be helpful, especially if it could be made just before the adjournment of the debate. Lodge rather surprised me by stating his conviction that the Afro-Asians could muster a two-thirds majority for a resolution on sanctions. This is not our assessment of sentiment in the Assembly; surely if the USA joined the opposition sanctions could be blocked. I recognized, however, that it might be difficult for the USA to oppose at this time that kind of resolution. Even if the USA should abstain, there might be sufficient voting strength among West Europeans, old Commonwealth and Latin Americans to defeat it.

4. The text of my statement was sent to you in my telegram 397 of January 29.¹⁸⁶ Afterwards I was glad I had decided to intervene because the statement evoked some Arab reaction. At lunch Fawzi told me, as he had done earlier, that Egypt would be prepared to have the Assembly discuss fully and decide the various measures I had proposed for inclusion in a draft resolution. The Assembly must first, however, deal with the problem of Israel's non-compliance with the resolutions on withdrawal. Malik said much the same thing but went as far as to say that he would vote for the various proposals I had made (after withdrawal). Jamali's attitude was largely negative but I had expected this. The representatives of Australia, UK and a number of West European countries privately expressed satisfaction to us.

5. Lodge, who has taken charge of tactics for the present manoeuvre, had told me that once he had a firm reaction from Fawzi to our draft resolution (my telegram 367 of January 28), the USA delegation would meet with us to decide upon the final version of the resolution. After that we would seek additional cosponsors and ultimately submit the draft resolution to the Assembly. Lodge was also considering whether there should be two resolutions, one on withdrawal and the other containing the constructive measures.

6. Apparently Lodge had further discussions with Fawzi yesterday afternoon (January 29). In the early evening he came to see me with two draft resolutions. One called upon the Israelis to withdraw "without further delay"; the other was an [amended] version of the joint Canada-USA draft and, in fact, was almost a return to the USA draft which Lodge first showed me on January 26 (our telegram 365 of January 26). In effect the second resolution approved the recommendations and measures contained in the Secretary-General's report and implied that he should seek to negotiate a settlement along those lines.

7. I was very disturbed by this drastic change in the draft resolution. I could not see how it would assist in bringing about an Israeli withdrawal. It would hardly be satisfactory to the Israelis because it contained none of the assurances which were inherent in our original text. It might be possible to save the situation by having the Secretary General publicly state specifically what he understood his mandate to be. It would also help if a number of delegations including Canada and the USA were to make strong statements endorsing the various measures which we think should be put into effect in the areas of disturbance. Interpretations of this kind, however, would surely be no more acceptable to the Arabs than the inclusion of operative language in the text of the resolution. I suppose that if the resolution were not too categorical, the Arab Governments would have an easier time at home.

8. I took this line with Lodge who said he agreed entirely. His main argument was that our resolution as originally drafted was unacceptable to the Egyptians and would not attract the necessary two-thirds majority. As we mentioned earlier, the USA delegation seems to regard a two-thirds majority more as an end than a means. My guess is that at least some of the ideas in the new American texts came from Menon. Of course, it may be true that the resolution would have to be watered down in order to be adopted but it seemed to me that the USA had given in too quickly and too completely. Lodge argued that his draft resolutions meant the same thing as our earlier text and that indeed the Egyptians were prepared to see most of the measures implemented. This may also be true but we have very little assurance that the Egyptians and others might not change their position after the withdrawal had taken place.

9. We shall be discussing the American texts today at a meeting with Lodge and the representatives of Norway and Colombia. The four of us will form the nucleus of a larger group of co-sponsors. We shall try to put back some of the teeth which Lodge has extracted from the draft resolution. I am reasonably certain that the Secretary General would not go along with Lodge's draft and this should strengthen our hand in our dealings with Lodge. Because the texts are at present in such a fluid state I see little advantage in sending them to you at this time.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

The following are texts of two draft resolutions which we have been discussing with the USA and Norwegian delegations. The first is a resolution on withdrawal and the second is one which is intended to be discussed and decided immediately after the first and which it is hoped will provide sufficient basis for the Secretary General to negotiate the actual withdrawal of Israeli forces. As regards the first resolution, except for the words in brackets in the first operative paragraph, the text has been cleared with Fawzi who has passed it to Cairo. He said that this text was sufficiently acceptable to allow Egypt to abstain but he will require confirmation from his Government. Tomorrow Lodge will discuss the substance but not the text with the Israelis.

2. The first resolution reads: "The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions of November 2, 4, 5, 7, 25, 1956 and January 19, 1957, deplors the non-compliance of Israel to withdraw all of its forces behind the armistice line despite the repeated requests of the General Assembly.

Calls upon Israel to complete the withdrawal of its armed forces behind the armistice line without further delay."

3. The second resolution reads: "The General Assembly,

Having received the report of the Secretary General of January 24/57 (A/3512),

Recognizing that withdrawal of forces must be followed by action which would assure progress towards the creation of peaceful conditions in the region,

(1) Notes with appreciation the Secretary General's report and approves the measures proposed by the Secretary General therein (including his proposals for deployment of the UNEF), to be carried out upon the withdrawal of Israeli forces;

(2) Calls upon the Governments of Egypt and Israel scrupulously to observe the provisions of the 1949 Armistice Agreement; and accordingly

(3) Urges that the recommendations and measures contained in the Secretary General's report be observed, respected and given effect to after full withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Sharm-Al-Shaikh and Gaza areas. So that the Secretary General will be thus assisted to achieve situations envisaged in his report conducive to the maintenance of quiet and peaceful conditions there;

(4) Requests the Secretary General, after consultation with the parties concerned, to take steps to carry out these recommendations and measures and to report as appropriate to the General Assembly."

4. In a separate telegram we shall report more fully on our conversations today about this matter.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

We had two meetings today (January 30) with the USA and Norwegian delegations to discuss the two draft resolutions which Lodge had shown me on January 29. By noon today, in response to comments which I had made last evening, the USA text for the second resolution, the one in which we are mainly interested, had been strengthened, although not as much as we would have liked. Lodge said that it was his intention to have both resolutions sponsored by a group consisting he hoped of the members of the Advisory Committee on UNEF, Burma, USA and Yugoslavia. Before approaching the others Lodge wished to clear the text with the Norwegians and ourselves (he would have included Colombia but Urrutia was out of town). If we agreed, Lodge would show Fawzi this new text. He promised to let us have Fawzi's reaction later in the day.

2. At the noon meeting I said that the revised draft of the second resolution was an improvement on the one which Lodge had shown me yesterday. There were, however, some doubts in my mind:

(a) We now had two resolutions instead of one. Was there any assurance from the Egyptians and their supporters that having discussed and adopted the resolution on withdrawal the Assembly would immediately proceed to discuss and favourably decide on the second and more important resolution? Lodge stated emphatically that he had an explicit understanding with Fawzi that the proceedings on the second resolution would follow immediately after a decision on the first.

(b) I pointed out that the USA draft spoke about the "recommendations and measures proposed by the Secretary General". We were wondering what were the "recommendations" in the Secretary General's report. It was true that he had proposed and discussed certain measures but in several respects the report was equivocal about what should be done. I wondered how the Secretary General would interpret the operative paragraph requesting him "after consultation with the parties concerned to take steps to carry out these recommendations and measures". Concerning (b) the USA delegation replied that the measures intended were the deployment of UNEF on both sides of the demarcation line in the Gaza Strip and at El Auja; UN "association" with freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba and with the administration of the Gaza Strip. The USA officials said that the Secretary General was anxious to avoid a conflict of interpretations about what his mandate should be and he was not disposed to give his own interpretation.

3. Lodge said that if we tried to be too specific in our draft resolution we would not produce a text which would be acceptable to a two-thirds majority. I agreed but said that I was more interested in getting a resolution which would serve as a basis for agreement and which would induce the Israelis to withdraw than merely drafting one which would attract a two-thirds majority. I pointed out that we could devise a resolution acceptable to two-thirds of the members but this did not mean that we would thereby persuade the Israelis to withdraw. If after the adoption of these two resolutions the Israelis should stand their ground the Assembly would be in a worse position than it was now. We should therefore strive to prepare a resolution which would provide a reasonable basis for withdrawal.

4. To some extent Engen though not emphatically supported me and emphasized, in addition, that the Secretary General should not be left in doubt about what he was expected to do. To this Lodge said that the Secretary General had agreed that the language of the USA draft was sufficient for his purposes. Engen said if this was the Secretary General's attitude the USA draft might be satisfactory.

5. After the noon meeting I thought it might be useful to discuss the USA draft with the Secretary General. He agreed with me that his report contained no "recommendations" and that the text could be more specific for his purposes. One obvious addition would be specific reference to the deployment of UNEF (there was no mention of UNEF in the USA draft). However, the Secretary General seemed reasonably confident that if the USA text were adopted by the Assembly, he would have a sufficient mandate to allow him to pursue negotiations to achieve the aims we had in common. He shared my view that the Israelis would not like the USA text.

6. My conclusions in this regard were strengthened by an interview which I had this afternoon with Eban and Comay. Admittedly they would like to see a resolution which spelled out in precise detail the arrangements and understandings particularly as regards the Gulf of Aqaba. Comay made the point that proposals for the Gaza Strip could be blurred for the time being. We went over the ground which we had covered in earlier conversations and I explained, without discussing texts, what we and the USA delegation were seeking to achieve. Eban suggested that it was perhaps more important for Israel than for Egypt to endorse the text of the second resolution. Comay offered to "draft some language". I said that at the present stage it would serve no useful purpose to discuss texts with them.

7. With the Israelis attitude fresh in my mind I attended the second meeting with Lodge and Engen. Lodge had another text (the one which we have sent to Ottawa) which Fawzi had accepted and which made no great change in the substance of the draft resolution. The important third operative paragraph had been recast in the passive rather than active sense. It urged that the recommendations and measures contained in the Secretary General's report "be observed, respected and given effect to after full withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Sharm-Al-Shaikh and Gaza areas, so that the Secretary General will be thus assisted to achieve situations envisaged in his report conducive to the maintenance of quiet and peaceful conditions there". Fawzi had indicated that Egypt and perhaps some other Arabs would not oppose a draft resolution along the lines of the current USA text. Fawzi had asked his Government to confirm his.

8. I restated my objections about the lack of precision in the draft, about the word "recommendations", and about the absence of a reference to the deployment of UNEF. After some discussion, in which Lodge, Engen and I reiterated positions we had taken earlier, Lodge agreed to drop the word "recommendations" and to add the words "including his proposals for deployment of the UNEF" in the first operative paragraph. Lodge will seek Fawzi's concurrence to include these words. I see no reason why the Egyptians or any of the other Arabs should object to this addition because almost all of them have gone on record in favour of the deployment of UNEF along both sides of the demarcation line. The more general formula which Lodge accepted, if included in the first operative para, might serve our purposes very well.

9. We shall probably meet with the USA and Norwegian delegations again before we approach the additional co-sponsors. As well as seeing Fawzi, Lodge is to discuss the substance of the draft resolution with the Israelis. We strongly advised this. He did not expect to receive a clearcut answer either in favour or against but he apparently had some hope, based on his discussions with local Zionists, that Israel might be persuaded to accept the current text. I must say I am not too optimistic.

New York, [February, 1957]

January 29

The general debate continued. The Minister made a statement in which he outlined the procedure which he thought the Assembly should follow and in which he suggested certain ideas for inclusion in any resolution which the Assembly might discuss (Press Release No. 44 of January 29; Ourtel 397 of January 29). At King Saud's luncheon the Minister discussed these possibilities with some of the Arab representatives including Fawzi, Malik and Jamali. In the evening Lodge showed the Minister two draft resolutions, one on withdrawal and the other on certain arrangements which would follow upon withdrawal. Procedure by two resolutions and the texts of both had been the result of further conversations between Lodge and Fawzi. The second resolution was a greatly watered-down version of ideas which had been contained in the original Canadian draft. The Minister made some suggestions for strengthening the USA texts and said he would like to discuss them with the Secretary-General (Ourtel 409 of January 30).

January 30

At noon the Minister met with Lodge and Engen for a further discussion about the USA draft resolution. The representative of Colombia, who was supposed to attend this meeting, was absent from New York. Lodge had revised the second resolution, strengthening it slightly. He said he had reached an understanding with Fawzi. The Minister discussed the second resolution with the Secretary-General, who suggested that the third operative paragraph should be split in order to make specific reference to the deployment of UNEF along the demarcation line, as one paragraph; and to urge all member states to assist the Secretary-General to achieve de facto situations in the Sharm-el-Sheikh and Gaza areas, as a separate paragraph. The USA texts were transmitted to the Department (Ourtel 410 of January 30). After the noon meeting Lodge had a further discussion with Fawzi. The Minister had an interview with Eban and Cornay. About five o'clock the Minister met again with Lodge and Engen (Ourtel 413 of January 30) to discuss the USA drafts, which were still too imprecise to serve as an assurance to Israel. Lodge agreed to discuss additional changes with Fawzi, with Menon, and the resolution as a whole with Eban.

January 31

At the Commonwealth meeting the Minister arranged to brief later in the day old Commonwealth representatives and others. The Advisory Committee met to discuss the financing of Canal clearance (Verbatim Record). The Secretary-General discussed the current situation with the Minister and Engen and urged the Minister to join the working group on financing with India and Norway. The Minister declined.

At noon the Minister met with M. Pineau who was mainly concerned with Algeria.¹⁸⁷ The Minister described the efforts which we were making to reach agreement on a draft resolution, which we hoped would be satisfactory for further negotiations about the Israeli withdrawal. Pineau expressed hope that the debate in plenary on the Middle East situation would not interfere with the First Committee debate on Algeria which was due to begin on February 4. Pineau would have preferred a single resolution on the Middle East situation because he feared that the Afro-Asians would not honour their side of the bargain.

In the afternoon the Minister presided at a meeting of representatives of the old Commonwealth, Belgium, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway and Portugal. The Minister reviewed the discussions he was having with Lodge and others concerning draft resolutions concerning withdrawal and subsequent arrangements. He explained why Canada preferred a more precise definition of these arrangements and why Lodge was ready to accept a vaguely-worded resolution. Because there would be difficulty in gaining acceptance of a procedure by a single resolution, one which would link withdrawal with the subsequent arrangements, Lodge had agreed with Fawzi to proceed by two resolutions. Lodge had categorical assurances for Fawzi that both resolutions would be discussed and decided at the same time. The Minister said he had no objection to this procedure and he gave the meeting the substance of the two resolutions. Dixon, Spender and Munro expressed misgivings about the vagueness of the language in the second resolution. The representatives of the Netherlands and France also voiced scepticism. Vitetti seemed doubtful but later told the Minister that the second resolution was "too good to be true". At the time of this meeting there seemed to be considerable opposition to the kind of resolution which Lodge was preparing.

At 4:30 p.m. the Minister and Engen had a further meeting with Lodge about the draft resolutions. Lodge by now had agreed to revise both resolutions, largely as a result of discussion with Krishna Menon. The first resolution referred to the "complete withdrawal of Israel" rather than to the "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces". In the second resolution a substantial revision had been made as regards the important third operative paragraph. It was deliberately vague about the "other measures" which would be applied (other than deployment of UNEF on the demarcation line) after withdrawal of Israel and about the area in which these measures would be applied. The USA Delegation had pressed to have the word "there" retained at the end of the paragraph but this gave no real assurance that the "measures" could be held applicable in the Gaza Strip and Sharm-el-Sheikh as well as on the demarcation line.

At 5:15 the Minister and Engen discussed this latest draft with the Secretary-General and Cordier. The Secretary-General said he could probably live with the new paragraph 3 but he suggested that the word "other" before "measures" should be replaced by "effective"; that "there" should be replaced by "in those areas"; and that the phrase "with due regard to the considerations mentioned therein" should be deleted. These comments were passed immediately to Lodge, who was not hopeful that he could do more than have "there" replaced by "in the area" (this change appeared in the final version). Lodge had just seen Menon again and Lodge was reluctant to continue the argument about wording.

The Minister had a brief conversation with Rafik Asha of Syria who intimated that the Arabs would not accept the procedure by two resolutions. This probably was the attitude of the wilder members of the Arab group.

In the evening the Delegation was faced with the problem of whether Canada should co-sponsor a draft resolution (the second) which was considered inadequate to the purpose for which it was designed, that is, as an inducement to Israel to comply with the resolution on withdrawal. There was the risk that if Israel rejected the resolution, the co-sponsors would be obliged to go along with more drastic action to get compliance with resolutions which they considered inadequate. It seemed desirable on balance for Canada to keep its freedom of action either to strengthen the Lodge-Menon text through amendment or to introduce a Canadian text with greater precision. On these grounds the Delegation concluded that Canada should not co-sponsor the Lodge-Menon text. The Minister discussed the matter with the Prime Minister and Mr. Martin.¹⁸⁸

U.N.E.F.; FURTHER CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE DEC. 5, 1956)

50. The Minister of National Defence said the Secretary General of the United Nations had requested that Canada furnish some additional troops for the United Nations Emergency Force. About 60 more men were required to strengthen the Canadian units already in the force, and there was urgent need for a reconnaissance squadron with a strength of from 125 to 150 men. There was no such unit in Canada but it would be possible to make it up from the armoured regiments. Transport of equipment would be looked after by the United Nations, probably by chartering a ship, and it was suggested that the men be flown over.

There were now 1,100 Canadian servicemen with U.N.E.F., which had an approximate strength of 5,800 at present. Raising the Canadian figure to 1,300 might be thought to put Canada's contribution somewhat out of line. However, there was a possibility that the whole force would have to be increased, particularly if additional duties had to be taken over in the Gaza strip and at the Gulf of Aqaba.

51. Mr. Campney added that General Burns had found Canadian assistance most valuable and wanted the skeleton of his force from Canada. The whole force was served by these units and English was the main language of communication. It would be possible to meet the latest request but he wished to point out that the reconnaissance unit would not be administrative but would be on patrol duty.

52. During the course of discussion the following points were made:

(a) Having Canadian units undoubtedly made it easier for General Burns to operate, particularly in communications. If the whole force were enlarged there would be need for more administrative personnel but there was no reason why Canada should be expected to furnish further men if this current request were met.

(b) It might be a good thing to supply a reconnaissance unit as this would offset criticism that the Canadian contingent was all administrative.

53. The Cabinet agreed that, if the Minister of National Defence considered it advisable, the Canadian contingent to the United Nations Emergency Force would be increased along the lines requested by the United Nations Secretary General, by providing a reconnaissance squadron of from 125 to 150 men and about 60 additional men for the Canadian units already with the force.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Following are the texts of the seventh drafts of the USA resolutions which Lodge has been discussing with Menon, Fawzi and others. The words in brackets are revisions which we would like to make in order to strengthen paragraph 3 of the second resolution which is the most important paragraph in the whole text. These suggestions originated with the Secretary General. To make the position clear: (a) we would delete "other" and substitute "effective"; (b) we would delete "with due regard to the considerations set out therein", and (c) we would delete "there" and substitute "in those areas" or at least "in the area". Text begins:

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions of November 2, 4, 5, 7, 25, 1956 and of January 19, 1957,

Deplores the non-compliance of Israel to complete its withdrawal behind the armistice demarcation line despite the repeated requests of the General Assembly,

Calls upon Israel to complete its withdrawal behind the armistice demarcation line without further delay.

Draft Resolution

The General Assembly,

Having received the report of the Secretary General of January 24, 1957,

Recognizing that withdrawal by Israel must be followed by action which would assure progress towards the creation of peaceful conditions,

(1) Notes with appreciation the Secretary-General's report and the measures therein to be carried out upon Israel's complete withdrawal;

(2) Calls upon the Governments of Egypt and Israel scrupulously to observe the provisions of the 1949 Armistice Agreement;

(3) Considers that, after full withdrawal of Israel from the Sharm-El-Sheikh and Gaza areas, the scrupulous maintenance of the Armistice Agreement requires the placing of the UN emergency force on the Egyptian-Israeli armistice demarcation line and the implementation of other (effective) measures, as proposed in the Secretary-General's report, (with due regard to the considerations set out therein) with a view to assist in achieving situations conducive to the maintenance of peaceful conditions there (in those areas or in the area);

(4) Requests the Secretary General, in consultation with the parties concerned, to take steps to carry out these measures and to report, as appropriate, to the General Assembly.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], February 1, 1957

REVISED TEXT OF RESOLUTION ON THE MIDDLE EAST

In giving me over the telephone this morning the revised text of the two resolutions on the Middle East, Geoff Murray drew attention to a number of points.

2. In the first resolution the change of wording from "to withdraw all of its forces" to "complete its withdrawal" was adopted as a result of the pressure from Krishna Menon. The intention is, of course, to frustrate Israeli attempts to retain civil administration in the Gaza Strip. A consequential change appears in operative paragraph 1 of the second resolution.

3. The Delegation are unhappy for two reasons about operative paragraph 3. First, they regard the word "other" before "measures" as a potential source of ambiguity. On one interpretation it could cover the moving of UNEF into Sharm-el-Sheikh. Alternatively, if one was opposed to such action, as the Egyptians are presumed to be, one could argue that the words "with due regard to the considerations set out" in the Secretary-General's report, refer to the need to respect Egyptian sovereignty, which could, on such an argument, be said to be infringed by the placing of UNEF in Sharm-el-Sheikh. The Delegation fear that unless another word is substituted for "other", this ambiguity will cause trouble in the future. The Secretary-General would like the word "effective" instead of "other", so that he would be in a position to say whether or not an action such as moving UNEF into Sharm-el-Sheikh should or should not be undertaken. Lodge has undertaken to try to sell "effective" to the Egyptians this morning, but the Delegation fears he may not succeed or perhaps that he may not even press it hard enough.

4. The second point in operative paragraph 3 which concerns the Delegation is the word "there" at the end of the paragraph. The Delegation's objection is that the word "there" goes back to the "armistice demarcation line", which would not cover Sharm-el-Sheikh. The Delegation would prefer some such phrasing as "in other words" so that there would be no ambiguity on this point.

5. Geoff Murray confirmed that Mr. Pearson's present inclination is to withdraw from co-sponsorship because of the extent to which the second resolution has been watered down. If, however, Lodge managed to sell the word "effective" to the Egyptians, and if something like "in other areas" were substituted for "there" at the end of the paragraph in question, this might, I gather, be sufficient to change Mr. Pearson's decision. On the other hand, he thinks that there is something to be said for staying outside the list of co-sponsors to preserve greater freedom for manoeuvre during the course of the debate.

6. The debate is expected to begin this afternoon at 3 p.m. It is still not certain how Egypt and Israel will vote on the two resolutions.

7. With regard to press accounts yesterday that the Delegation was thinking of dropping out of the negotiations, the position is that the only thing we might drop out of is co-sponsorship. There is no question of withdrawing from the negotiations.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

At noon today I met with Dixon, Spender and Munro to discuss the draft USA resolutions on this subject. We were of course mainly concerned with the second resolution. I explained why we had decided not to co-sponsor the resolutions and gave them the gist of my conversation earlier this morning (separate telegram) with Lodge.

2. I said we were considering the following amendments (to the USA seventh draft phoned to Robinson and sent today):

(a) Operative paragraph 2 — After "armistice agreement" add "and to this end to refrain from all acts of hostility including the exercise by either party of any claim to belligerent rights".

(b) Operative paragraph 3 — Substitute "effective" for "other" coming before "measures"; delete "with due regard to the considerations set out therein"; and substitute "in those areas" for "there". (We understand Lodge, Menon and Fawzi have agreed to use "in that area" instead of "there" but the change is hardly an improvement).

3. On tactics the Commonwealth at the noon meeting agreed that if amendments of this kind were accepted the resolution could be more easily supported by them and in particular Spender agreed that he would not feel obliged to press amendments of his own. Dixon might wish to add "approves" before "the measures" in the first operative paragraph but this might not be necessary. We agreed to let the debate develop during the day before making any move to amend the USA draft. I suggested that the amendments might be moved tomorrow but that before then it would be helpful if statements, suggesting changes along the lines of our amendments, could be made.

4. Lodge had expressed conviction that our amendments, which he favoured, would not carry. The Commonwealth representatives did not entirely agree with Lodge's assessment. They agreed in any event that by moving the amendments we would clarify the meaning of the resolution and perhaps the intentions of the main parties. The discussion of these amendments would bring any ambiguities into the open and the general effect would be to make it much easier for all of us to accept the resolution in the end, even if our amendments were defeated. Conceivably at that time the situation might be such as to make it desirable to have some resolution adopted, notwithstanding its shortcomings. Meanwhile we will do our best to persuade the Israelis, who have been entirely negative about the present draft, to agree to accept it with our amendments. Any indication of this acceptance by them would greatly increase the possibility of receiving the necessary majority for our amendments, which in present circumstances are not likely to carry.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This morning (February 1) I informed Lodge about our decision not to co-sponsor the USA draft resolutions. I said that I realized why he considered it necessary to retain the general language, particularly in the third operative paragraph of the second resolution, but that in our view the text was too ambiguous and open to many interpretations. I mentioned our misgivings about the word "other" before "measures" and about "there" at the end of the paragraph. I said that in addition we would like to see included some reference to the exercise by either party of any claim to belligerent rights. I suggested that reference of this kind might be included in the second operative paragraph.

2. Lodge agreed that the textual changes which we had in mind would be a great improvement to the resolution. The USA would very much like to see them included but if the Egyptians and their supporters would not accept them this meant that they would not have the support of the necessary two-thirds majority. Lodge said that he had persuaded Menon and Fawzi to accept "in that area" instead of "there" at the end of the third operative paragraph. Lodge was probably disappointed by our decision not to co-sponsor but he expressed satisfaction about the frank manner in which we had discussed our differences.

3. I told Lodge that we were considering whether we should submit amendments to the draft during the debate. I mentioned the kind of amendments I had in mind. Lodge reiterated his conviction that such amendments would not be adopted. He was afraid that their defeat might have a detrimental effect on the implementation of the resolution because the Arabs, for example, would argue that the USA text meant something less than the amendments which the Assembly had rejected. There is of course something to be said for this argument.

4. I informed Lodge that our intention was to let the debate develop before making any move to amend the draft resolution. I said we would keep in close touch with the USA delegation and that we would try to minimize the impression that we were engaged in a competitive move. I expressed regret that we had not been able to reach agreement on a text which we both could co-sponsor. Lodge said that India, Indonesia, Yugoslavia, Colombia, Brazil and Norway would join with the USA in co-sponsoring the draft resolution, which would be released about noon today (February 1).

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

After speaking to Lodge this morning (February 1) I discussed current developments with Engen. He informed me that Norway had decided to co-sponsor the USA draft resolution on the basis of the following considerations:

(a) Having been closely associated with UN action, including participation in UNEF, to meet the MidEast crisis, Norway believed it should continue to do so. This was particularly desirable because if Norway dropped out of the group of sponsors, the USA would be left with no NATO partners and with no representation from Western Europe.

(b) The Norwegian Government was satisfied from its consultation with the Secretary General that he could under the proposed resolution resume his negotiations about withdrawal. For this purpose the text was not as satisfactory as it might have been but it could be interpreted in the sense desired by the Secretary General.

(c) There was no real alternative. Attempts to get greater precision would probably be defeated by the Afro Asian and Soviet Blocs combined. The Assembly could not run the risk of having no resolution at all because the situation might produce chaotic conditions not only in the Assembly but in the area with grave consequences for the whole UN effort there, that is, for UNEF and the Canal clearing operation.

2. These considerations are of course very important and I told Engen that I recognized their importance. I explained why we had decided not to co-sponsor the resolution, the main reason being that we desired a free hand for a possible contribution during the debate on the constructive side. Engen, who has been in close touch with us throughout, fully understood this point of view. I cited our fears about deliberate misinterpretation of the vague language in the USA draft. As for alternatives I suggested that we might try (Group corrupt) the debate either to add precision to the resolution or at least to bring into the open the ambiguities in the text. Either way there might be more likelihood that the resolution would provide a better basis for expecting Israel to withdraw and many delegations might find it easier to accept the resolution in the end.

3. Engen said that his instructions were to co-sponsor the draft resolution but to leave himself a free hand to accept any amendments which he considered would improve the text. He had so informed Lodge and he does not consider himself bound to consult the other co-sponsors on the subject of amendments.

4. The USA draft resolutions appeared in the Assembly late this afternoon. They have been co-sponsored by Brazil, Colombia, India, Indonesia, Norway, USA and Yugoslavia. The only change from previous texts we have sent you is in the last line of the third operative paragraph; instead of "there" the words "in the area" follow "maintenance of peaceful conditions". This is only slightly better than "in that area" which we had previously considered no improvement over "there".

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Before the meeting of the Assembly on the afternoon of February 1 Lodge met with representatives of Western European countries and the Old Commonwealth to discuss the two draft resolutions the USA was submitting in co-sponsorship with Brazil, Colombia, India, Indonesia, Norway and Yugoslavia (Document A/3517 and A/3518 of February 1). Lodge explained that he would have preferred that the second resolution should be more precise, particularly as regards the functions of UNEF, but that the text contained in Document A/3518 was the best obtainable compromise and one which was calculated to obtain two-thirds majority support. Lodge referred to conversations which he had with the Minister about this resolution and said that Canada had decided not to co-sponsor it because of the lack of precision in the language.

2. Spender, Munro and Dixon led the discussion which followed Lodge's presentation of the draft resolutions. They expressed misgiving about the absence in the second resolution of any reference to the exercise of any claim to belligerent rights. They were concerned about the ambiguity in the third operative paragraph and particularly about the words "other" and "in the area". In other words they raised with Lodge questions which they had discussed with the Minister earlier in the day. Lodge adopted the same attitude he had in his conversation that morning with the Minister; the USA would very much like to have a more precise text but this was not possible because of opposition from the Egyptians and their supporters; the USA believed that the draft resolution would accomplish the aims which all of the Western powers were seeking. Lodge understood that the Secretary General was prepared to continue negotiations with Egypt and Israel on the basis of the USA draft. Engen confirmed this and said that the Secretary General's attitude was the basis of Norway's support for the USA draft. The representative of The Netherlands expressed doubt that the USA text would accomplish what Lodge said it would. The representatives of Italy and Ireland agreed that the text was perhaps the best obtainable. Most of the other countries represented were non-committal.

3. The Assembly debate had already begun. Fawzi and other speakers were concerned with the various measures and conclusions contained in the Secretary General's report. The two draft resolutions were not circulated until just before the close of the debate at six o'clock (February 1). The most important statement was made by Spender who expressed firm views about how the impasse concerning Israel's withdrawal should be met. He was much concerned with the situation in the Gulf of Aqaba; he also discussed at length the nature of the "consent" which was required for the use of military force by the UN other than that under Chapter VII of the Charter. As you know, Spender has been anxious to attribute to UNEF functions somewhat beyond those generally acceptable in the Assembly and beyond the concept contained in the various reports of the Secretary General.

4. After Spender had spoken the Secretary General made a brief statement concerning Egypt's consent to the presence and functioning of UNEF on Egyptian territory. He said among other things that "in practice the consent obviously must be qualified in such a way as to provide a reasonable basis for the operations of the UN force". To all the extent that movements of UNEF were supposed to follow from the duties of the force in relation to the cease-fire and the withdrawal, the matter had been regarded as non-controversial because it was covered by Egypt's general consent. On the other hand "as regards activities of the UN force which would extend beyond what is covered by this consent, an additional consent has been considered as necessary". This means, we understand, that UNEF could follow the withdrawal of Israeli forces along the West bank of the Gulf of Aqaba to the armistice demarcation line but that units of UNEF could not be stationed for any length of time in the Gulf, and particularly at Sharm-El-Sheikh, without further agreement with Egypt.

5. The debate was resumed on Saturday morning. After speeches by the Ukrainian and Czechoslovak representatives, who did their best to discredit UNEF, Lodge made a strong statement concerning the two draft resolutions. He emphasized that the withdrawal of all remaining Israeli forces must be completed without further delay; that the UN must avoid a return to the conditions that prevailed prior to the recent hostilities; that upon the withdrawal UNEF should continue to move into the areas evacuated "in order to ensure the implementation of the General Assembly's Resolution 997 (ES-I) of November 2". To be effective UNEF must serve as a restraint "against any attempt to exercise belligerent rights or to engage in hostile actions contrary to the Armistice Agreement, the decisions of the Security Council and the resolutions of the General Assembly". The force could best fulfill its mission if it were deployed along both sides of the armistice demarcation line and particularly "in the sensitive Gaza and El Auja sectors".

6. Lodge then reiterated what he had said on January 28 about the stationing of UNEF in the Straits of Tiran in order to separate Egyptian and Israeli land and sea forces. "This separation is essential until it is clear that the non-exercise of any claim to belligerent rights has established in practice the peaceful conditions which must govern navigation in waters having such an international interest". Lodge said that the draft resolutions, although not perfect documents, did contain "certain words which will make possible the ends of which I have just spoken". He acknowledged, however, that the final result would be "up to the parties".

7. This statement (especially the sentence quoted) by Lodge greatly disturbed the Arab delegations and some of their supporters. Although the debate continued after Lodge had spoken the main center of activity shifted from the Assembly to the corridors where the USA delegation was under angry attack by the Arabs.

8. Our own activity behind the scenes was more concerned with the delegation of Israel, on the one hand, and with the Old Commonwealth representatives and some of the Western Europeans on the other. In the morning the Minister urged Comay to advise Mrs. Meir and the Israeli Government to abstain on the second draft resolution. The Minister hoped that the interpretation which he and others would place on the language in that resolution would be sufficient to encourage Israel to abstain. The statement by Lodge no doubt helped in this connection. In any event, after lunch Comay informed the Minister that Mrs. Meir had received instructions from Jerusalem to abstain.

9. We had prepared a statement which we wished to withhold until after the principal co-sponsors had spoken. We were of course mainly interested in hearing from Menon. With some difficulty we managed to keep a position subsequent to India on the speakers' list. In view of Lodge's strong statement the Minister considered it unnecessary for us to try to strengthen the second resolution through amendment (although we had our amendments ready) but we assumed that Menon would try to counteract Lodge's interpretation.

10. This in fact happened in the afternoon meeting. By then it was common knowledge that the Arabs, in angry response to Lodge's statement, had shifted their position from abstention to opposition to the second draft resolution. The USA delegation informed us that, although Fawzi still seemed disposed to go along with the pre-arranged plan of abstaining on the USA draft, Sudan, Syria and some of the other wild elements in the Arab group wished to break the arrangement. Presumably to save the situation Menon gave his interpretation of what the second resolution meant. As expected, his was a restrictive interpretation and particularly as regards the activities of UNEF. Menon's interpretation extended to the Secretary General's report (A/3512 January 24). On re-reading his statement we found it not as damaging to the aims we were seeking as it sounded in the tense atmosphere of Saturday's debate. It contained, of course, India's well-known stand on the presence and functioning of UNEF on Egyptian territory.

11. Lodge followed Menon with a brief statement which we feared at first might be a retraction of his earlier statement. He laid great emphasis on withdrawal which should take place "in only the few days necessary physically to move the forces behind the armistice demarcation line". This withdrawal should take less time than was taken by the Anglo-French forces since their withdrawal was delayed by the time necessary to establish UNEF. On the subject of withdrawal Lodge added: "Let me also say this in all seriousness and solemnity, that I cannot predict the consequence which can ensue if Israel fails to comply with the will of the General Assembly as expressed in the pending resolutions". This solemn warning may rebound on the USA delegation in subsequent proceedings in the Assembly. Lodge also emphasized that withdrawal was a preliminary and essential phase in a development through which a stable basis might be laid for peaceful conditions in the area. None of the constructive measures in the second draft resolution were intended to go into effect until Israel had completed its withdrawal nor "will any of them be undertaken without the agreement of the affected party".

12. Fawzi then stated "in as clear an outline as possible the position of the Government of Egypt on this question, which position is perfectly in line with these resolutions". The full text of what Fawzi said is contained in my immediately following telegram.† Once again it seemed in the atmosphere of the debate that all our arrangements for UNEF would be thwarted. Matters were made worse when, after an emotional and scathing attack on the second resolution by the representative of Sudan, Jamali asked Lodge and Menon whether "the points so clearly put by the Foreign Minister of Egypt are fully recognized by the second draft resolution". (At this point the Minister tried to move an adjournment but failed to catch the President's eye). Lodge declined to speak at the moment and Menon's reply seemed to endorse Fawzi (but on re-reading it appears as something less). The adjournment then followed. The text of this exchange is contained in a following telegram.†

13. Fawzi's intervention and what followed agitated representatives of the Old Commonwealth and we met with them immediately after the Assembly adjourned. The events of the afternoon had spoiled the good effect of Lodge's strong statement. Spender and Munro were disposed not to support the second resolution and Dixon was wavering. We discussed how Lodge should respond to Jamali's question and agreed that much might depend on this response. If the USA rejected Fawzi's position and in effect broke with the Arabs, we must support the resolution. The Minister said that our statement could have the effect of restoring the balance of the debate and that he would discuss with the Secretary General the possible effect of the afternoon's debate on the Secretary-General's proposed negotiations with Egypt and Israel.

14. This was done right after the meeting of the Old Commonwealth representatives. The Minister discussed the situation with the Secretary General, Cordier and Bunche. The UN officials were not too disturbed by Menon's interpretation nor by Fawzi's statement of position. By then we were able to study the verbatim text which proved to be less formidable than had been our first impression of it. On the basis of this text and the views expressed by the Secretary General, who seemed reasonably optimistic that he could negotiate on the basis of the second resolution, the Minister was encouraged to continue his support for it. During the afternoon he had discussed the situation with the Prime Minister.

15. To take into account events in the Assembly in the afternoon, we made some revision in the text of our statement. The Minister spoke after an intervention by Kuznetsov, who presented a warmed-over version of earlier Soviet arguments against the presence and functioning of UNEF. We showed the extracts (Fawzi-Jamali-Menon) from the verbatim record to Dixon, Spender and Munro and informed them about the Secretary General's reaction. At the same time it became known that the Arabs were again prepared to abstain on the second resolution. By the end of the Minister's statement¹⁸⁹ the USA delegation was confidently counting its two-thirds majority. Moderate and constructive statements by

See, The Crisis in the Middle East, January-March, 1957, pp. 15-19.

Noble, Entezam and Engen kept the atmosphere calm in the Assembly, notwithstanding a contentious statement by Eban shortly before the vote.

16. Israel's position on the second resolution remained in doubt because the debate in the afternoon had shaken the Israelis here. Comay had said that Mrs. Meir wished to reconsider whether Israel should abstain. Before the voting, however, Comay informed the Minister that Israel would abstain. The voting on both resolutions was by roll call and the results were as follows:

(a) A/3517 on withdrawal 74 in favour, 2 against (France and Israel) and 2 abstentions (Luxembourg and the Netherlands) with 2 absent (Hungary and South Africa);

(b) A/3518 56 in favour, none against and 22 abstentions (Soviet Bloc, Arabs, Netherlands) with 2 absent.

17. About the time of the voting, Lall was circulating a procedural resolution which would request the Secretary General to report on compliance with the first resolution "not later than February 3/57". The idea, which was probably Menon's, was that the same group of co-sponsors would put this resolution forward. There was considerable opposition to this move. Engen declined to co-sponsor; Dixon strongly urged Lodge not to go along with it; the Minister informed Lall that we could not accept February 3 as the target date although we might accept February 11. There was undoubtedly further opposition from Western European and Latin American delegations. As a result the procedural resolution was not moved.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

The Advisory Committee met this morning (February 5) to hear a report from the Secretary General on his meeting yesterday with the representative of Israel. The Secretary General had written to Eban on February 3 transmitting the two resolutions, adopted by the Assembly on February 2, and inquiring about Israel's attitude to the first resolution on withdrawal. The Secretary General's letter was so phrased that it did not exclude possible observations by Israel on the second resolution.

2. Yesterday Israel replied with an aide mémoire which took note of the "two interrelated resolutions" and raised the following questions:

(a) The Secretary General was asked to inquire of Egypt whether it would agree to a mutual undertaking to refrain from belligerent acts. In elaboration, the Israelis pointed out that renewed interference by Egypt with Israeli shipping in the Straits of Tiran would result in a new outbreak of hostilities.

(b) Eban had been instructed to ascertain whether UNEF would be stationed along the West Coast of Aqaba to insure that there would be freedom of navigation in the Gulf and in the Straits.

In effect, the Secretary General said that the Israelis had replied, to one question by asking two more.

3. The Secretary General said that in the "present very serious phase" he believed it essential to keep the Assembly abreast of his consultations with the parties. He had informed Eban that the records of their discussions would be used in reporting to the Advisory Committee which the Secretary General would use as his channel to the Assembly. Concerning question (a) in the preceding paragraph Eban had been informed that the Secretary General did not wish to comment without prior consultation with the Advisory Committee. Concerning (b) the Secretary General pointed out that the stationing of UNEF along the Gulf would depend on further agreement with Egypt. The Secretary General had quoted from the Minister's statement in this regard. The Secretary General had asked Eban whether the second question meant that Israel would only withdraw if UNEF were stationed along the Gulf; if Eban's reply should be in the affirmative this would amount to a prior condition to withdrawal because of the requirement of agreement by Egypt to such stationing. Eban implied that his question was not in that form but merely one concerning intended arrangements.

4. The Secretary General had asked Eban two other questions:

(1) whether Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip would include the present civil administration;

(2) whether Israel would agree to the stationing of UNEF on Israel's side of the armistice demarcation line.

Eban replied that both these questions had to be referred to Jerusalem. The Secretary General had observed that replies to these questions were essential for the implementation of the arrangements contained in the second resolution.

5. Bunche informed us after the meeting that during the conversations yesterday the Israelis had concentrated on the situation in the Gulf of Aqaba and done their best to avoid references to the Gaza Strip. In addition they seemed less interested in reinstating the 1949 Armistice Agreement than in reaching a new non-aggression agreement with Egypt. This is consistent with the line they took in private conversations here with the Minister during the past two weeks.

6. The Secretary General's conclusion was that no progress had been made during the past two days although there had been some shift of emphasis. Lall pointed out that the first resolution prescribed the "complete withdrawal of Israel" so that there was no question about the withdrawal of Israel armed forces and not the civilian administration of Gaza. The stationing of UNEF in the Gulf of Aqaba would require a further agreement with Egypt and, moreover, once the Israeli forces had been withdraw from the Gulf there would be no need for UNEF there, since its main purpose was to separate the armed forces of the parties. Concerning belligerent rights, Lall said that there was no need for any affirmation beyond that contained in the Armistice Agreement. In fact the only issue which arose out of the recent Assembly discussion was whether Israel would comply fully with the first resolution. Until this happened the second resolution would remain inoperative.

7. The representatives of Brazil, Ceylon and Canada suggested in various ways that the Secretary General's position on the questions raised by Eban should not be too rigid.

Although we were all agreed that withdrawal must come first and must be unconditional, this should not prevent discussion of arrangements under the second resolution nor clarification of them. It was suggested that the Secretary General might seek some clarification from Egypt about its intentions, particularly in the Gulf of Aqaba. The Secretary General replied that to raise Eban's two questions with Egypt now would be to invert the order of the resolutions. This could not be regarded as a process of clarification but as an attempt to establish conditions and Egypt's attitude would almost certainly be negative at this stage. On the other hand, if Israel would give a clearcut commitment to withdraw, it would be entirely feasible to raise with Egypt questions about subsequent arrangements. Lall said that the Secretary General should reply to Israel's aide mémoire in the latter sense.

8. The Secretary General showed signs of frustration and weariness. At one point he said that any further attempt to explore the situation would be futile. The legitimacy of the Israeli questions was in his view over-ridden by the greater legitimacy of the demand for complete withdrawal. Speaking privately to us he said that nothing further could be accomplished by him, that the friends of Israel must take steps to encourage Israel to withdraw and that Israel must do this as an act of faith. Bunche observed that Israel had never shown much faith in the UN.

9. After the meeting we discussed the situation with Barco. He agreed that the deadlock was if anything more serious than last week. He had no suggestion to offer as to how we might proceed. He said that Lodge would return from Washington today and might have something to report on his consultations there which had been conducted at the highest level. Barco confirmed that Fawzi had addressed a letter to the Secretary General requesting a plenary meeting "as soon as possible". It was Barco's impression that other Arabs, "even those usually more friendly to us", were pressing for a resumed debate and one which would involve a resolution containing sanctions against Israel. This would seem to be an inevitable consequence of Israel's refusal to accept the outcome of last week's debate.

10. As regards sanctions, the Norwegians here believe it will be very difficult to resist new demands by the Arabs. The only alternative which is being discussed here is that Governments friendly to Israel should urge it to go along with the two resolutions of February 2, on the understanding that Israel's friends would do their utmost to see that the arrangements of the second resolution were implemented. Combined with this kind of encouragement the Governments best able to do so might apply firm pressure on Israel to complete its withdrawal.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

As I reported to Léger on the phone this noon (February 6) events are moving rapidly in the direction of another crisis. Last evening Fawzi told Lodge that the negative attitude of Israel concerning withdrawal and the resulting pressure within the Arab group for renewed Assembly action made it necessary for Fawzi to request an early meeting of the Assembly. The Arabs expected the Secretary General to report then on compliance with the first resolution. When asked whether the Arabs had any resolution in mind, Fawzi said they had not. Without directly saying so, he implied that the Arabs expected the USA and the other co-sponsors of resolutions 460 and 461 of February 2 to continue their leadership in the Assembly and to press for more drastic action against Israel in order to bring about compliance with the earlier resolutions on withdrawal. Fawzi made a pointed reference to the discussion in Washington between the USA and Saudi Arabia. The implication was clear that the Arabs were watching the USA closely to see whether USA action at the UN corresponded with USA interest, expressed in the Eisenhower Doctrine, in the security and well-being of the Arab states. In this manoeuvre the USA delegation here are somewhat at a disadvantage because they know less than Fawzi does about the negotiations in Washington DC. There are two Egyptians on the advisory staff of King Saud.

2. We understand that Lodge's conversations with the President and Dulles were largely concerned with the attitude the USA should adopt toward a resolution on sanctions introduced by the Afro-Asian group. The USA delegation had not considered the possibility that they might be one of the co-sponsors of such a resolution. Accordingly they were taken aback by the Egyptian suggestion that the seven co-sponsors of last week's resolutions should follow through with a resolution on sanctions.

3. This morning we spoke to Cordier about the current situation. He confirmed what the Secretary General had stated in the Advisory Committee on February 5 (ourtel 475 of February 5). Israel's reply to the Secretary General's question about withdrawal had been substantially to pose two questions, one about a mutual undertaking to refrain from belligerent acts and the other about the stationing of UNEF along the West Coast of the Gulf of Aqaba. Since both these questions involved agreement by Egypt, the Secretary General considered that he could not raise them with the Egyptian authorities while Israel armed forces were still occupying Egyptian territory. To do so would be to give UN endorsement to an attempt to influence by armed force the policy of Egypt. The Secretary General could discuss these questions, or others like them, with the Egyptians, as a matter between the UN and Egypt, but he would be precluded from transmitting Egyptian replies to Israel, especially since Israel had made no commitment whatever to withdraw. The kind of assurances which Israel was seeking could not be regarded as anything short of prior conditions for the withdrawal.

4. On February 5 the Secretary General had raised again with Eban whether Israel's withdrawal from Gaza would include civil administration and whether Israel would agree to the deployment of UNEF on Israeli territory, particularly at El Auja. The Secretary General considered that replies to these questions were essential to the whole negotiation. Unless the Israelis were prepared to withdraw completely from Gaza and unless they would agree to the deployment of UNEF on their side of the demarcation line, there was no point in approaching the Egyptians about the stationing of UNEF along the Gulf of Aqaba or in asking them to agree to refrain from belligerent acts. In other words, the Israelis must demonstrate their readiness to return to the régime of the Armistice Agreement. This is an issue they have consistently tried to evade, a fact which leads to suspicion that they wish to negotiate a new agreement with Egypt based on a territorial situation changed as a result of their recent military activity.

5. I explained to Cordier the Minister's view that the Secretary General should at least discuss with the Egyptians the implementation of the second resolution of February 2. We considered that the two resolutions were interrelated and both could be the subject of current negotiations. Cordier pointed out that this was not the view of the majority of the Assembly and that even those who believed that the two resolutions were related had agreed that withdrawal must come first. The fact that the two resolutions were adopted one after the other was an earnest of the Assembly's intention to proceed, immediately after withdrawal, to the implementation of the second resolution. The Israelis had tried to argue that the defeat of Kuznetsov's motion to postpone the vote on the second resolution was an indication that the two resolutions were inseparable and must be considered side by side in the negotiations with the Secretary-General. Cordier said that, in the Secretariat's view, this was not a correct interpretation. The linking of the two resolutions was intended as an inducement to Israel to withdraw but the withdrawal must take place before any step could be taken to implement the second resolution.

6. Cordier said that unless there should be some change during the day, the Secretary General would write his report tonight. It would deal with the discussions between the Secretary General and Eban. It was Cordier's view that a debate on the report could not be delayed beyond noon tomorrow. He had heard about no resolution but he assumed that a resolution on sanctions would be introduced. His estimate was that such a resolution would receive two-thirds support from the Assembly. The Secretary General hoped that this difficult situation could be headed off through some action by Israel. Cordier said that Eisenhower had sent a firm message to Ben-Gurion urging him to withdraw. In addition prominent members of the local Jewish community, which was split on the issue, had been in touch with Ben-Gurion begging him to comply with the UN resolutions. So far there had been no reaction from Jerusalem.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, February 7, 1957

MIDDLE EAST

The Minister discussed this matter in a telephone conversation this morning with Mr. Heeny. Mr. Pearson said that he had postponed his return to New York until the situation became a little clearer. There was not likely to be a meeting before Saturday at the earliest as the Security Council was scheduled to discuss Kashmir tomorrow (Friday).

Another reason for not going immediately to New York stems from a conversation with Dr. MacKay last evening. There is apparently a rumour going around New York that the President's strong intervention at Jerusalem might bring about Israeli withdrawal, on present terms. Mr. Pearson doubted that the rumour was true, but if it were, he wished the Americans to be made aware of two preoccupations we had here.

If the Israelis got out because of pressure from Washington, that is, if they complied with the first resolution passed last Saturday, then we would have a very definite obligation to back up the second resolution, as interpreted by Mr. Lodge and Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Heeney said he had pointed this out to Mr. Phleger, whom he saw yesterday. He had hoped to see Mr. Murphy, but he was completely tied up, as was the Secretary of State, with King Ibn Saud of Saudi Arabia, the Crown Prince of Iraq and Dr. Malik of Lebanon (something that must be of small comfort to the Israelis).

Phleger agreed that we would be in a very bad position indeed if, having brought pressure to bear on the Israelis, on the basis of the second resolution of Saturday, as interpreted by Mr. Lodge, they did withdraw, on the understanding that UNEF would be deployed along the border, at Gaza and Sharm-al-Sheikh, and then the Egyptians would not accept this. Certainly Dr. Fawzi had put a diametrically opposite interpretation on the second resolution when he spoke last Saturday.

Mr. Pearson agreed, and said that it would be difficult for us to permit our forces to remain in UNEF if the Egyptians did not co-operate and tried to control its functions and movements. Public opinion in Canada was now more suspicious of the operation, and there is a feeling here that Nasser is dictating what the Force should do, and not the United Nations.

Mr. Pearson said that if, however, the Israelis did not withdraw, it will, of course, be necessary to have another meeting in New York. The line we would like to take is that we will not vote for any resolution or support any measure for sanctions against Israel standing by itself. After all, we could not support the application of sanctions against Israel when we have not done so against anybody else. We would like to avoid a head-on collision over this issue, however, and perhaps the best way out would be to produce a resolution along the lines of our thinking last week, modified so that the second part of the resolution, which would be voted on separately, would be an indication that the Assembly might have to use financial and economic pressures against Israel if they do not accept withdrawal, on the basis of the new and stronger resolution on arrangements subsequent to withdrawal. If we drafted such a resolution, we would try to get advance assurance from the Israelis that they would accept withdrawal on this new basis. Then there would be no reason for calling for sanctions at all.

MIDDLE EAST-ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

As agreed in my phone conversation February 7, and as a follow up to our discussion February 6 with Phleger and his group (see my telegram 273 February 7)†, we have spoken to both Wilkins, Head of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs, and to DePalma, Deputy Director of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs, on the present position with respect to the Israeli withdrawal. In these discussions, we made the following points:

(a) That according to our delegation in New York, it was now thought in New York that the President's strong intervention in Israel might bring about Israeli withdrawal on terms of the present resolutions;

(b) That we hoped that the State Department agreed with our view that if, as a consequence, the Israeli Government did yield and pull back their troops, a very heavy obligation would fall on the USA to put full pressure on Egypt to accept the deployment of the UNEF in accordance with Lodge's (and our own) interpretation of the second resolution;

(c) That consideration is being given in Ottawa to what the position would be if the Israelis did not withdraw: in this event Canada would not support a resolution to impose sanctions against Israel; in our view such action would be quite intolerable. On the other hand, we should certainly wish to try to avoid a head-on collision, and for this reason we outlined informally the general nature of the alternative possibilities for action in the Assembly now under consideration in Ottawa, indicating that we wished the State Department to understand privately but clearly how we felt on these aspects of the present critical situation.

2. In reply, State Department officials emphasized, that, as we had been told previously, final decisions had not yet been taken here, although urgent consideration is being given to what is regarded as the prior problem, i.e., how pressure can be placed on both Israel and Egypt through the most effective means to ensure compliance with the two resolutions.

3. It seems reasonably clear that a message has gone from the President to Ben-Gurion, although the State Department has not been authorized to confirm this and we have not yet been given an indication of its content. At the same time, according to Wilkins, the State Department is canvassing possible methods as to how pressure can be put on Egypt to indicate acceptance of the deployment of UNEF in accordance with the terms of the second resolution. We understand that the methods by which this second step might be taken have not yet been finally fixed. Our impression, however, is that the State Department is likely not to approach Nasser directly, but to continue to work through the Secretary General and Fawzi in New York. Emphasis here seems again to be placed upon the Secretary General as the person best able to make progress on the two resolutions through his technique of "interpretations" which stand so long as they are not specifically rejected by one or other of the two parties. Wilkins said he would get in touch with us as soon as possible when their course of action had been determined.

4. DePalma, who is on the UN side, also indicated that they have not yet faced up finally to the problem which would be presented for the USA by a sanctions resolution. Their present efforts would be devoted, he thought, to obtaining in some way some form of Egyptian acceptance that would enable the Israelis to move. He doubted greatly whether it was a "starter" to think of a public Egyptian statement, and therefore thought, on lines similar to Wilkins, that the Secretary General might still be the best hope. He might be able to make some positive affirmation or statement (on the basis of his talks with Fawzi) that he had a clear authority to proceed (after Israeli withdrawal) with the tasks specified, albeit in vague terms, in the second resolution. DePalma emphasized that nothing, however, was final as of the present.

5. On the "next stage", DePalma welcomed the indication of our present thinking. He was unable, however, to indicate at the stage reached in their internal consultations what the State Department reaction would be to proposals of this nature, should it become necessary to put them forward in the UN next week. He also referred again to the problem of obtaining a two-thirds majority either for a sanctions resolution, or for a resolution on the lines of those referred to in paragraph (c) above, but agreed that the final position taken by the USA on resolutions of this kind would probably be decisive.

6. It therefore appears that Canadian thinking as of this moment is one or two hurdles ahead, and for this reason it was useful to let our views be known to the State Department, particularly with reference to our attitude to sanctions.

MIDDLE EAST; ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

As I reported to you on the phone, this morning, I had an opportunity, after dinner last evening at the British Embassy, for a three cornered conversation on this subject with my UK colleague and the Secretary of State. What emerged concerning the USA position was far from conclusive but I think, nonetheless, it is probably worth recording.

2. In response to my question whether the Secretary thought that the Israelis would withdraw, Dulles answered that as he was leaving for dinner he was told that "a reply" from Ben-Gurion to the President was in process of being decoded. He seemed sceptical that it would indicate acceptance of the UN demand. (We have assumed that Mr. Eisenhower's message had urged withdrawal but have still had no confirmation of this from the State Department).

3. In trying to draw the Secretary on what should be attempted if the Israelis persisted in their refusal to withdraw, I sketched to him the kinds of resolutions which you were thinking of to provide a means for having the UNEF stationed in the Straits and across the armistice demarcation line. Dulles expressed interest in your ideas and hoped very much that you would return to New York where your presence was most important. (There were things which Canada could do more easily than the USA or the UK).

4. Dulles then went on to say that the UNEF might be sent into the area of Straits (and presumably into the Gaza Strip) ostensibly "to put the Israelis out"; and then simply "stay on" pending the working out of more permanent solutions (Caccia thought the Secretary contemplated new action by the Assembly for this purpose; I did not think he implied this).

5. When Caccia and I questioned the Secretary on the USA attitude in the Assembly on a resolution invoking sanctions against Israel, Dulles was noncommittal. I gained the impression indeed that he was still undecided as to what stand the USA delegation should take.

6. We did not succeed in having Dulles express himself with any confidence on the intentions of the Egyptians in the event of Israeli withdrawal. I gained the impression, however, that he was hopeful that Nasser would permit the UNEF to function, as we hoped. He expressed high regard for the Secretary General's handling of the situation, and commenting on his methods, he observed that Hammarskjöld often followed the practice of keeping to himself, for good reason, the substance of private exchanges which he had had. (This in reference to my question as to Dulles' view of Hammarskjöld's appreciation of Nasser's intentions).

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Following is text of draft resolution referred to in my immediately preceding telegram. Text begins.

The General Assembly,

1. Recalling its resolutions of November 2, 4, 7 and 24, 1956 and January 19 and February 2, 1957;

2. Deplores the continued failure of Israel to comply fully with resolutions of the General Assembly regarding withdrawal behind the armistice demarcation line, and demands that Israel complete that withdrawal without further delay;

3. Reaffirms its responsibility and concern for facilitating after Israel's withdrawal, effective arrangements relating to security in order to create more settled conditions within which the attainment of a lasting political settlement may become possible;

4. Urges the Governments of Egypt and Israel to commit themselves once more to observe scrupulously the provisions of the 1949 Armistice Agreement and to this end to take all necessary measures without delay to assure full implementation of that agreement;

5. Instructs the Secretary-General to make arrangements, after consultation with Israel and Egypt, for the deployment of UNEF on both sides of the armistice demarcation line, in the El Auja district and in the Gaza Strip, so that the force may be in a position

(a) to assume the duties of the Truce Supervision Organization in all the areas where the Organization now functions under the Armistice Agreement between the two states, and

(b) to prevent incursions and raids across the armistice line, to help maintain peaceful conditions;

6. Authorizes the Secretary-General, through a civil and military mission to be selected by him, to supervise the replacement of the present civil administration of the Gaza area;

7. Authorizes the Secretary-General to arrange, upon the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Gulf of Aqaba area, for assistance by units of UNEF in establishing and maintaining peaceful conditions in the area in co-operation with the Government of Egypt;

8. Recommends that pending agreement on the legal status of the Gulf of Aqaba and the Straits of Tiran, the parties to the Armistice Agreement should give assurances in the spirit of the non-aggression clauses of the Armistice Agreement that they will not assert or exercise belligerent rights in these waters or interfere in any way with the right of innocent passage therein;

9. Requests the Governments of Israel and Egypt to remove their military forces from the areas of deployment of UNEF;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report in 30 days to the General Assembly on the implementation of the foregoing recommendations;

11. Recommends that unless Israel's withdrawal is brought about within the terms of this resolution, the General Assembly should give consideration to measures which might be effective in achieving the desired ends. Text ends.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Last evening (February 10) Engen and I met with the Secretary General. Cordier and Bunche were also present. The Secretary General showed us a draft of his report (which has now been released as Document A/3527 of February 11). The report is mainly concerned with the Secretary General's exchanges with the Government of Israel. The various documents are annexed to the report. In addition to the three which were contained in our telegram 507 of February 7† there is a letter of February 10/57† and also an earlier one of January 25† from Eban to the Secretary General. The report will be sent to you by bag.

2. The Secretary General said that Israel's questions, the two contained in the aide mémoire of February 4, must be regarded not only as dictated conditions of withdrawal but also as an attempt to exact from the Government of Egypt under duress an undertaking of non-aggression. The Secretary General was persuaded that Israel would like an excuse for not withdrawing from the Gaza Strip and in fact had not the slightest intention of withdrawing its civil administration from there. Nor did Israel intend to have UNEF in the Gaza Strip. What Israel hoped to gain was a non-aggression pact before withdrawing its troops to the Israel side of the demarcation line followed by a de facto absorption of the Gaza Strip into Israel. This is why the Israelis have been so insistent that the Secretariat should transmit their two questions to the Egyptian Government.

3. I agreed that the Israelis were trying to bargain from a position of strength and that they would unquestionably like to derive as much benefit as they could from their occupation of Egyptian territory. Nevertheless, the Israel Government had good grounds, based on the bitter experience of the past, for trying to obtain assurances from the Egyptians that the intolerable conditions which existed before October 29 should not be re-established. There was no reason why we should expect the Israelis to go back willingly to that deplorable state of affairs and it was doubtful whether the UN would be serving the interests of peace in the area if we did not seek to accomplish something considerably better than the status quo ante. I explained that public opinion in Canada was to a large extent on the side of Israel but in respect to the UK, France and the Western powers generally had made him suspect in Canadian eyes. It was for this reason that Canadians took the position that in order to break the current deadlock pressure should be exerted on Egypt as much as on Israel. In the public mind the complexities of the issue and of the negotiations were not understood. It was not easy to comprehend, for example, why the Secretary General in his recent consultations had apparently concentrated on the first resolution adopted by the Assembly on February 2 and had not made much effort to obtain from the Egyptians clarification of their attitude toward the second resolution. The Secretary General acknowledged that in the public eye, particularly in view of the press coverage, the issues have been over-simplified and sympathy for Israel has developed. It was his impression from talks with Fawzi and earlier with Nasser that the Egyptians were prepared to let situations develop which would be conducive to much better conditions in the area. He was persuaded, for example, that the Egyptians would not interfere with freedom of navigation in the Straits of Tiran. It seemed likely too that they would make serious efforts to control incursions and raids across the demarcation line. However, it was not politically possible for them either to make unilateral declarations or to enter into new non-aggression pacts and certainly they could do nothing in this direction as long as Israeli armed forces remained on Egyptian soil. Moreover, the withdrawal of Israeli armed forces must be complete. If they withdrew from Sharm-el-Sheikh and not from Gaza, Egypt would find it necessary to retaliate, probably in the Straits, as a matter of self-defence.

4. Bunche, who seemed to be more bitter about the Israelis than the Secretary General, said that the UN must insist on withdrawal as a matter of principle. The Israelis could not benefit from military intervention. He pointed out that in 1948-9, whenever the UN had insisted on the withdrawal of Israeli forces, eventually they had been withdrawn. Moreover, there was no indication at present that the Israelis would withdraw even if they obtained guarantees of non-belligerency. Bunche pointed out that in the recent exchange of views between Israel and the Secretary General there was no commitment whatever to withdraw.

5. I said that from Israel's point of view there was no value in private assurances from Fawzi and other Egyptians. Nobody would believe that the Egyptians would do what they said privately. The Secretary General agreed and said that he had been urging Fawzi to explain Egypt's position on non-belligerency to delegations which the Israelis would listen to, delegations of such countries as Canada, Norway and the USA. The Secretary General believed that this was the best advice he could give to Fawzi. I acknowledged that it would be helpful if Fawzi reassured other delegations but I suggested that this would not be enough. Ben-Gurion would need more than that if his Government were to be put in a position to withdraw. They would probably need some kind of document and perhaps an Assembly resolution stating precisely what arrangements would follow immediately after withdrawal by Israel would serve that purpose.

6. Engen said that he had come to regard Gaza as the real issue. He believed that something could be worked out to take care of the situation in the Gulf of Aqaba. The Gaza Strip posed a much more complex and difficult problem. He sensed that the Israelis would do all in their power to remain there. The Secretary General and I agreed with this view. The Secretary General said that Ben-Gurion had made up his mind to round off its Western border whatever the Israelis might say about annexing the Gaza Strip. They were in fact attempting to carry out annexation. It might be possible to dislodge Israeli armed forces from the Strip but the replacement of the present civil administration would be tenaciously opposed.

7. I agreed with the Secretary General's assessment and asked what the UN could do to prevent the Israelis' carrying out plans which could not be justified. I was sure that sanctions would not work; that not enough Governments would get behind them even if these were warranted; that although sanctions might inconvenience the Israelis, they could find ways of getting around them, especially in the field of financial aid. I remarked that public opinion in Canada would not support the policy of sanctions against Israel in the current circumstances and that Canada would not vote for a resolution containing sanctions. Engen confirmed that public opinion in Norway was much the same and that his Government had grave doubt whether it could support sanctions.

8. Bunche was clearly disappointed by what Engen and I said about sanctions. He did not see how the UN could shrink from its duty of combatting military aggression by any means available. He cited Korea as a comparable case of UN reaction to aggression. I said that the Korean situation was not analogous; the circumstances of the Israeli intervention were not nearly as clearcut; many regarded Israel's military action last November as a defensive move made in desperation, even though it was unwise. The Secretary General agreed that the moral issue was probably not clear enough to warrant a recourse to sanctions. Bunche remarked glumly that if there were no sanctions there would be no withdrawal and that eventually Nasser might, in order to save face, resort to force with far reaching consequences.

9. I said I was not so pessimistic. I hoped that if the Egyptians could be persuaded to be more forthcoming about their intentions we might produce a resolution which would serve as an acceptable basis for a decision by the Israel Government to withdraw. I pointed out that we had been trying to do just that two weeks ago but that our original text had been so watered down as to become useless for the purpose we had in mind. We were giving some thought to a new resolution and I outlined in very general terms what it might contain, while emphasizing that our ideas were still tentative and we did not wish them to be disclosed at least at this stage. I hoped that other delegations, but particularly the USA, would now be prepared to promote these or other ideas. I referred to Lodge's main intervention in the recent debate, a statement which suggested the kind of developments which might create the conditions not only for withdrawal but for a greatly improved situation in the area. I emphasized that our aim would be not to produce a resolution which pleased one side or the other but to produce a sort of Assembly judgment on what should be done to break the deadlock and to assure progress toward the creation of peaceful conditions. If Egypt should co-operate with this move it might make it easier for Israel to do likewise and in any event, if Israel still refused to withdraw on a basis which we considered reasonable, Israel would be shown to be clearly in the wrong which was not the case now in public opinion.

10. We discussed various parts of a resolution defining more precisely the arrangements which should follow upon withdrawal. We agreed that the withdrawal from the Gulf of Aqaba must be linked with the withdrawal of troops, at least, from Gaza or else the Egyptians would not agree to allow freedom of navigation in the Gulf. The UN officials, particularly Bunche, believed we would have great difficulty in persuading the Israelis to allow UNEF on the Israel side of the demarcation line. We agreed that if Israel insisted on linking its withdrawal with freedom of passage in the Suez Canal our task would be even more difficult. The Secretary General expressed the view that Nasser would be prepared to allow the Canal clearing to be completed before the completion of withdrawal but that Israel's defiance as regards withdrawal might make Nasser's position untenable. It was a virtual certainty, moreover, that once the Canal was cleared Israel would put to the test its right to use the Canal. If Israel had not withdrawn from Sharm-el-Sheikh and Gaza by that time, the Egyptians would certainly not let Israeli ships pass. Even if some withdrawal had taken place Egypt might find means to block Israeli shipping; the Egyptians would also try to use their control of the Canal as a means to bring about a refugee settlement.

11. The Secretary General said that the USA wished to delay the debate until February 14. The Secretary General's report would be distributed on February 11. The Secretariat were not sure that the debate could be delayed until Thursday. They remarked, however, that the Afro-Asians were not as sure of their position as they had been earlier. They too were conscious of the lack of public support for sanctions. The Arabs were counting on the success of King Saud's visit to Washington but there was little evidence yet that this would result in the kind of support needed to make sanctions effective. The Secretary General suggested that the best course might be to persuade in a subtle way the Egyptians to be more forthcoming. He saw no possibility that the Israelis would "risk" withdrawal if assurances about the future were not precise. He agreed with my view that if we did not succeed soon in bringing about a withdrawal the whole UN effort in the MidEast might be gravely jeopardized with the most serious long-range consequences for the UN and perhaps even for peace.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This morning (February 11) I discussed this subject with Mrs. Meir and Comay at their request. Mrs. Meir explained that Eban was in Washington discussing the same matter with Dulles. She wondered whether we had any info about the USA attitude. She referred to the speculation in the press about sanctions as being the next step which the UN would take in its effort to bring about a withdrawal of Israel behind the demarcation line.

2. I said that it was my understanding Dulles was now giving the subject his full attention. We had heard that he was considering the possibility of giving to Israel a guarantee of freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba and the Straits of Tiran. This guarantee would be given on the understanding that Israel's withdrawal would be completed and the guarantee would remain in effect pending a satisfactory and more permanent arrangement to ensure Israel's rights in these waters. There had been some suggestion that other states might join in the guarantee.

3. Mrs. Meir said at once that such a guarantee would be satisfactory to Israel. Ben Gurion had suggested as much to the USA Ambassador in Israel and Mrs. Meir had raised the possibility in her discussions with USA representatives. She thought it would be sufficient to give the guarantee and that it would not be necessary for ships of the USA navy to stand by to implement it.

4. Léger enquired whether, if the guarantee were given, Israel would consider it necessary to have UNEF stationed at Sharm El-Sheikh. Mrs. Meir replied that this would depend on the Egyptian reaction to the guarantee and in particular, whether Egypt took steps to re-establish its military position in the Straits. We had the impression that a guarantee by the USA and perhaps other powers would obviate, as far as Israel was concerned, the need for other measures to ensure freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba.

5. Mrs. Meir then spoke about Eban's most recent conversation with the Secretary General. She could not understand why the Secretary General had called Eban from Washington because nothing had been added to the exchange which took place from February 4 to 6. (She, of course, did not share the Secretary General's view that he should give Israel a further opportunity to reply to his two questions). Mrs. Meir complained that the Secretary General had been interested only in Israel's attitude towards withdrawal and not in Egypt's intentions concerning the arrangements which must be made effective immediately upon withdrawal. She mentioned, in particular, the Secretary General's negative attitude towards the questions which Eban had asked the Secretary General to pass to the Egyptian government. She showed clearly that she shared Eban's view that the Secretary General had declined to act as an intermediary. (We have explained in earlier telegrams why the Secretary General considered that he should not transmit the questions).

6. I said that we foresaw three possible lines of development: (a) the withdrawal would be arranged on terms satisfactory to all concerned (b) Israel would not be satisfied with the terms which the UN approved for the withdrawal and would stay in both Sharm El-Sheikh and the Gaza Strip (c) the Assembly would agree on detailed arrangements for withdrawal but these would not be accepted by Egypt. We, of course, were interested in promoting (a). However, if our efforts should fail and the result turned out to be (c) this would leave Israel in a stronger position. It would be difficult in such circumstances for the Assembly to take drastic action. If we were to prepare a resolution which would contain the arrangements implicit in (a), we must know with some precision what Israel would expect before it would agree to withdraw.

7. What followed was a lengthy explanation of Israel's position on the main issues.

(a) Sharm El-Sheikh — Mrs. Meir said that there was no difference of opinion between Israel and the Secretary General about the ultimate objectives; Israel should be guaranteed freedom of navigation in the Straits and in the Gulf. This view was shared by a number of influential states. There was a difference, however, on how the aim should be accomplished. The Israelis believed that they should stay until they had received satisfactory assurances about freedom of navigation. They had made very clear to the Secretary General that the ships of Israel would never again be turned back at the Straits because of the threat of Egyptian guns. Israel would shoot its way through. Accordingly, if Israel should withdraw without satisfactory assurances, the real risk was that there would be a new outbreak of hostilities. The fundamental question was whether or not there was a state of belligerency between Egypt and Israel. For this reason the most satisfactory assurances about freedom of navigation would be a mutual undertaking to abstain from belligerent acts. This was why Israel had asked the first question (aide mémoire of February 4) but the Secretary General had declined to put the question to the Egyptian government.

(b) Gaza Strip — It was essential that Nasser should not return to the Gaza Strip as a victor. Mrs. Meir described the "victory parade" which the Egyptians had staged on their return to El Arish. Already there had been Fedayeen raids based on El Arish. This "proved" that Israel was right in its attitude towards withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. UNEF troops — and particularly Indians, Yugoslavs and Indonesians — could not be counted upon to take the measures necessary to prevent Fedayeen activity. It was doubtful whether Canadians and Scandinavians would wish to conduct the kind of operations which would be necessary in a search for arms. Since the security risk to Israel was so great, Israel could not allow the Egyptians to return to the Gaza Strip and to revert to their evil practices of the past. There was no advantage to Israel in keeping the Gaza Strip; it would be a costly operation because, unlike Egypt, Israel could not allow the Gaza population to live in the misery which they had suffered during the Egyptian occupation. Nevertheless, Israel could withdraw its armed forces from Gaza and it was prepared to have a UN committee discuss with the Government of Israel future arrangements for administering the Strip. The Gaza Strip was the key to Israel exploitation of the Negev and a recent increase in the number of immigrants (from Egypt and Poland) made it imperative that the Negev should be exploited rapidly. It should be recognized that the situation as regards the Gaza Strip was complicated and it could not be settled by a simple demand that Israel withdraw. There was a need for a comprehensive study of the situation without the pressure of an Assembly resolution calling for a report in a very short time.

(c) Deployment of UNEF. In response to questions Mrs. Meir expressed a strongly negative reaction to the deployment of UNEF either in the Gaza Strip or on the Israel side of the demarcation line. She employed the usual arguments about the narrowness of Israel's territory, the density of population, the possibility of incidents between UNEF and Israel armed forces and the adverse reaction of Israeli private citizens. She added that the presence of UNEF along the Egypt-Israel demarcation line might result in pressure, through the occurrence or the threat of incidents along the other demarcation lines, to have UNEF deployed all around Israel. This would create an impossible situation. She seemed unimpressed by the arguments that an agreement between the UN and Israel for the presence and functioning of UNEF in Israel would give UNEF a better international standing and weaken whatever control Egypt might now exercise over it.

(c) Sanctions. Mrs. Meir wondered why all the pressure was being exerted on Israel. She acknowledged that the military intervention of last November had produced a psychological reaction but there had been other "aggressions" (she mentioned Kashmir and Hungary) which had not stimulated the same reaction in the General Assembly. The Israel Government had carefully considered the possibility of sanctions and had decided it would not give in to a threat of sanctions because it could not do so. There would certainly be terrible hardship but Israel could not forego its right to self defence nor could it throw up a barrier against the immigration of Jews from various countries in which they had been oppressed. Mrs. Meir acknowledged that the first objective of Egypt and its supporters would be to introduce a resolution on sanctions; she was glad to hear that Canada would work to prevent such a resolution.

(e) Suez Canal. Towards the end of our interview I asked Mrs. Meir whether Israel would link freedom of passage in the Suez Canal with its withdrawal. I pointed out that in a very short time the UN team would have cleared a passage through the Canal; that this would necessitate interim arrangements for traffic in the Canal. Mrs. Meir's first reaction was that Israel would insist on assurances concerning freedom of passage in the Canal but later we gathered from Comay that this might not be one of the pre-conditions of the withdrawal.

8. As you will appreciate the line taken by Mrs. Meir was a tough one. It offered little opportunity for compromise. Her attitude was particularly disturbing as regards withdrawal from Gaza and the deployment of UNEF on the Israel side of the demarcation line. She was almost as uncompromising in her attitude toward the Armistice Agreement and argued in favour of a new non-aggression pact. I found all this discouraging but Mrs. Meir might have deliberately taken this tough line for purposes of bargaining.

9. I tried to persuade Mrs. Meir that Israel should make a clear commitment about withdrawal and that this should apply to the Gaza Strip as well as to Sharm-El-Sheikh. I pointed out that Israel's attitude toward and actions in Gaza would inevitably be interpreted as a determination to annex the territory by force. This was a difficult position for Israel's friends to defend. I recognized Israel's security problem in the Negev but I urged Mrs. Meir to place greater reliance on the arrangements which the UN could make along the demarcation line and in the Gaza Strip to prevent raids and incursions. If Israel tried to remain in Gaza in defiance of the UN, Israel could expect increasing criticism in the UN and, of course, a deepening of Arab bitterness and hatred.

10. I also urged Mrs. Meir to consider carefully the deployment of UNEF on Israel territory. I said there were a number of important advantages in having UNEF on both sides of the demarcation line; in particular UN prestige in the area would be greatly enhanced; and the net effect could only be to the advantage of Israel in its quest for peaceful relations with its Arab neighbours. I acknowledged that there might be some problem because of the density of population on Israel's side of the line but it seemed to me that practicable arrangements could be made which would meet the principle of deployment on both sides.

11. I must confess that my arguments, both about Gaza and the deployment of UNEF, seemed to make little impression on Mrs. Meir. Nevertheless, she was clearly anxious to have our support in the forthcoming debate and I sensed that for all its toughness the Israel Government was not a little concerned about the prospect of having to face the mounting hostility in the Assembly which Israel's apparent intransigence would produce.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This morning (February 12) I discussed the current situation with Lodge. He could not tell me much about the USA position because at the very time we were talking Dulles was holding a policy meeting in Washington. Lodge expected to know the results later in the day and promised to let me know them. His understanding was that Fawzi would ask for a plenary session on February 13 and that the Afro-Asians would introduce a draft resolution providing for sanctions. Lodge had seen the text (we did not see it until later in the day). Lodge agreed that Fawzi might withhold his hand until the results of the USA declaration on freedom of navigation had become apparent.

2. Lodge agreed that in the Middle East proceedings the Assembly was near the end of the road. There were not too many courses open. Lodge had been studying the possibility of having the Assembly refer the matter back to the Security Council. Later Barco told us the idea would be to have a Council resolution which would prescribe the various steps which should be taken after and including withdrawal. This resolution would have teeth, probably in the form of sanctions, and would be so designed as to put pressure on both Egypt and Israel and at the same time not provoke a veto. This sounded to me like a tall order but it would certainly make life easier for members of the Assembly. Lodge explained that the idea had originated in NY and thus far did not have the blessing of the USA Government. We should treat it with reserve, I think.

3. I said we must try to avoid a resolution containing sanctions but it seemed inevitable that one would be submitted. In this event we should try to prevent a vote on the draft resolution. Lodge seemed to agree. I said we were considering whether to introduce an alternative resolution which would attract the support of delegations who were not keen on sanctions. I said that in present circumstances Canada would not vote for sanctions; that public opinion in Canada was largely sympathetic to Israel on this issue and any vote in favour of sanctions would be misunderstood. Lodge said that the same sentiment was developing in the USA.

4. The alternative in our view was to present a draft resolution which spelled out in some detail what UN intervention in the various areas would mean. It would be necessary, however, to persuade the Israelis in advance to accept a resolution of that kind. If Israel should find it acceptable we might be able to organize sufficient support for such a resolution.

5. I described briefly my talk yesterday with Mrs. Meir. I referred in particular to Israel's tough stand on the Gaza Strip. I suggested that we might eventually have to include in any draft resolution we might propose a recommendation that a committee be established to study conditions in the Gaza Strip with a view to determining its future status and the kind of administration there. Referring to the proposed USA guarantee on freedom of navigation, I said that it might be possible to arrange a withdrawal of Israel armed forces from Sharm-El-Sheikh and Gaza and to combine this with a proposal for an investigatory committee or mission to deal with the question of how the Gaza Strip should be administered.

6. It was our view that instead of placing additional burdens on the Secretary General we should establish a committee, perhaps of three persons rather than governments, for Gaza. Lodge agreed that the Secretary General had probably reached the end of the line in his current dealings with Israel and that he could hardly be expected to take on the complex negotiation which any future arrangement for Gaza would involve.

7. We compared notes about the possible voting on a sanctions resolution. We agreed that it was difficult at this stage to reach a definite conclusion but it was clear that sanctions would not have overwhelming support; that it might not be too difficult to organize a blocking third.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This morning (February 13) I discussed current developments with Dixon, Spender and Munro. Because the situation here is so fluid we were unable to reach any definite conclusions about future proceedings in the Assembly. The timetable for the debate is unsettled; the Afro-Asians last evening were planning to resume the MidEast discussion in a plenary session on February 14 after a number of committee items had been disposed of. This could mean that the MidEast debate would begin tomorrow afternoon but the timetable would depend on how much discussion there was about committee items. Late last evening the Secretariat could not forecast how the proceedings in plenary would develop.

2. Another unsettling factor is that the USA position remains unclear. The USA delegation have not yet received instructions on how to deal with the MidEast question when it is raised again in plenary. Presumably the USA position would depend largely on the reaction from the Israel Government to the USA aide mémoire which has handed to Eban on February 11.¹⁹⁰ The USA delegation this morning could only confirm what had appeared in the press, that the Israel Cabinet had deferred decision pending clarifications which were unspecified.

3. At the Old Commonwealth meeting this morning we discussed the USA aide mémoire. Dixon and I had the text but the others had not seen it. We wondered whether the USA planned to integrate its bilateral dealings with Israel in the proceedings at the Assembly. The best guess seemed to be that Lodge would refer to it in a statement and he would like others to make supporting noises in the debate. It seemed unlikely that the USA move could be formally endorsed by the Assembly.

4. We also speculated about Israel's reaction to the aide mémoire. It was clear that the precondition of any USA guarantee of freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba was the withdrawal of Israel armed forces both from Sharm-El-Sheikh and the Gaza Strip. The aide mémoire implied that Israel's civil administration in Gaza must be withdrawn as well. We assumed that withdrawal from the Gulf area would not prove difficult for Israel but withdrawal from the Gaza Strip might be the sticking point. The USA might be pressed by Israel to go farther and to give additional assurances about the future administration of the Gaza Strip.

5. This led to a discussion about the possibility of associating the UN with the civil administration of Gaza. Reference was made to the views of Labouisse who has had separate discussions of some detail with Munro and me. Labouisse had also made his views known to Dulles. Although the practical problems were extremely difficult (we were all four agreed) that some form of UN civil administration, working in conjunction with UNEF, might be established. The chance for success in this direction would be increased if the USA could be persuaded to provide financial backing from the funds which the President will have at his disposal for economic aid to the MidEast. The presence of 250,000 refugees, who were wards of the UN and who would require UN relief as long as they remained in the Gaza Strip, was a compelling argument for associating the UN closely with the Gaza administration.

6. I pointed out that the main problem might be to gain time in which to study the practical problems. I believed that there was no alternative to insisting on the withdrawal of Israel's armed forces; they should be replaced by UNEF. There could not be, however, and Labouisse emphasized this, any haphazard replacement of the present civil administration. A simple return to the Egyptian régime seemed out of the question. I wondered whether we could persuade the Assembly to establish a three-man committee or visiting mission which would study the political, economic and social problems of replacing the present administration with one which would be largely in UN hands. The emphasis in any such investigation should be on the humanitarian needs both of the refugees and indigenous Arabs. The other three Commonwealth representatives responded favourably to this suggestion.

7. At the end of the meeting we agreed that the immediate requirement would be to seek clarification of the USA position. I said that Lodge had promised to let me know as soon as he received his instructions from Washington. Dixon said that we might explore with the USA delegation our ideas for dealing with the problem of replacing the Israeli administration in the Gaza Strip.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Yesterday (February 14) there was little change in the situation here. Behind the scenes the Arabs continued their pressure for a resumed debate. They were dissuaded, so I believe, largely through the efforts of the Secretary General and the USA delegation. The most obvious reason for postponement was the desirability of having a reply from the Israel Government to the USA aide mémoire of February 4. There was also the continuing doubt among the Afro-Asians that a resolution containing sanctions would not get the kind of support which would be necessary to make it practicable. This was particularly true as long as there was some possibility that Israel's withdrawal could be brought about through other means.

2. The USA delegation had received no instructions from Washington about the position which they should adopt either with respect to sanctions or as regards the USA initiative concerning freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba. We and others considered it essential to know the USA position before we could map out tactics for the expected debate. In the circumstances we spent most of the day trying to find out whether the USA position had been made firm and when the expected debate would take place. Since both depended to a large extent on the reply from Israel and since this reply (as we learned late last evening) was not to be delivered until today, our discussions and consultations yesterday were inconclusive.

3. In the late afternoon I discussed the situation with the Secretary General. While agreeing that Dulles' initiative had had some useful immediate effects and had brought us a little time, he was doubtful whether such a unilateral approach would produce the desired result, especially as it was a somewhat indecisive one. The Secretary General believed that the Israelis would do all in their power to prolong their discussions with the USA and that a definitive reply would not be given for some time. The Israelis would probably try to separate the guarantee concerning the Gulf of Aqaba from the requirement of withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. The Secretary General's impression was that the Arab resolution to counter these Israeli tactics would contain some provision for sanctions but that the text might be more moderate than the one which we were shown earlier this week. We hope to get a copy of the latest Arab text tomorrow. It has been agreed on but its contents are being kept very secret at present.

4. The Secretary General was surprised by the fact that the USA had not shown the Egyptians at once the text of the aide mémoire to Israel. The Secretary General had been shown the aide mémoire but he had not kept a copy of it as he did not wish to be the intermediary in sending it to the Egyptians. The Egyptian Foreign Minister had told the Secretary General that it was difficult for them to express any opinion about the USA move pending details and the receipt of news of the Israeli reaction to it. The Secretary General considered the USA approach somewhat unrealistic and he would not be surprised if the Egyptian reaction turned out to be as negative as the Israelis would be indecisive.

5. Last evening I had a further conversation with Dixon, Walker and Munro. We had earlier agreed to keep in close touch during this period of confusion. We discussed developments during the day. In particular I reported on my conversation with the Secretary General. On tactics, we concluded that in the circumstances which could be foreseen, we should work to have the debate begin without any resolution. During this preliminary stage we and others could continue to consult to see whether a resolution, alternative to the Afro-Asian attempt to impose sanctions, could be worked out. Such a resolution might be introduced after the debate had continued long enough to show that opinions about sanctions were sharply divided. At that stage it might be possible to attract sufficient support for a constructive resolution along the lines of our original draft of two weeks ago.

6. The Commonwealth representatives agreed that the Israelis would try to delay their withdrawal until the Canal was opened. At that time they might make an attempt to pass one of their ships through the Suez Canal. If, as we expect, the Egyptians prevented this, the Israelis would have a strong excuse for continuing their occupation of Sharm El Sheikh and the Gaza Strip. There is little new to add today (February 15). It is now known that Fawzi is determined to have a debate in the next day or so. The USA delegation expects to hear this afternoon about Israel's reply to the USA aide mémoire. The USA continued their efforts to dissuade Fawzi, and after they had told Fawzi that President Eisenhower wished to consult Dulles and Lodge tomorrow in Georgia on the Israeli reply, and after Fawzi had consulted some of his friends, it was agreed to postpone the debate until Monday.

CURRENT TRENDS IN THE MIDEAST

There are significant signs that throughout the whole MidEast there has been manifested a determination to resist subversion by communism. (While not being altogether an exception to the above trend, Egypt's case is somewhat unique and requires different treatment, as given below).

2. In Jordan, about two weeks ago, there was the strongly worded letter of the King to the Prime Minister warning him of the dangers of Communist subversion. It is well known that there is coolness between the King and his Prime Minister. Certainly Nabulsi is no fellow traveller but a shrewd politician whose main object, naturally enough, is to remain in power. According to competent observers he is still with some reservations pro-Western; he was even known once to be favourably inclined towards an Iraqi orientation with a record of having spoken in favour of the Baghdad Pact. He would probably have wished to form his government at a later date so that he could further develop his relations with the "street"; opposition is always a more strategic position for this. Although I understand that Nabulsi has tended to minimize the political significance of the King's letter, yet right afterwards he ordered a crackdown on all Soviet publications and banned all forms of Communist propaganda within the country. In talking to me recently the Jordanian Ambassador did not attempt to hide his delight in the King's letter; he assured me that it had received encouraging support within Jordan, but even more important, it was a sign that the young King would not sit idly by and see his régime subverted.

3. In Syria there is evidence from various quarters of a strong anti-government current being manifested, particularly with regard to the current political trial in Damascus. The populist "Al-Sha'b" forces which recently were so badly routed seem to be getting up courage again in the Aleppo area, which is their political base, and to be showing signs of fighting back. It is I think worth noting that one of the leaders of the national party, Michael Elian, who has recently taken asylum in Turkey, could easily with Turkish connivance slip across the border into Aleppo and start a rebel movement when the moment seemed propitious. Takieddine, the Lebanese Ambassador here, believes that the time is not right for an armed move against the Syrian Government because Serraj and his cohorts have still too tight a grip on the army machine. (Takieddine's brother is a prominent Druze politician, a master of intrigue with close connections with the rebel Druzes of Syria who can be counted upon to be hostile to the present Syrian régime). But, allowing a few months for discontent to gather momentum and for support from neighbouring countries such as Turkey or Iraq to be cultivated, such a move might well succeed although if backed by foreign governments might have alarming international consequences. I have been informed in strict confidence that the Syrian Ambassador here (a former Minister of Finance) is out of sympathy with his government and would welcome a return to a more balanced and traditional form of régime.

4. Through a source in the Syrian Embassy, I understand that Akram Hourani, the Socialist leader in Syria (presently cooperating with the Communist) had recently proposed that if King Saud should launch a diplomatic campaign to isolate Egypt, then his party in retaliation would initiate a subversive movement in Saudi Arabia, aimed at installing a republic. According to the same report Nasser is said to have sharply discouraged Hourani from any such move as having a disastrous effect upon relations between the four allied Arab states.

5. This whole trend of course is most open and unequivocal in the Lebanon. Not only has the Foreign Minister been openly proclaiming Lebanese friendship for the West but this week President Chamoun has, in a press interview, taken issue with those Arab leaders who believe that they can follow a neutral course between East and West. His government's unswerving preference for the West has not been seriously challenged within Lebanon. Increasing Lebanese irritation with the present Syrian policies is also compelling them to look more and more to the West for protection and support.

6. As for Saudi Arabia no-one can seriously doubt the anti-Communist sentiments of the King; the dangers of internal subversion in that kingdom would seem to arise chiefly from dynastic factors, i.e. smouldering Hashemite resentment and from the Shammars of the Northern Nejd. There is of course popular sympathy for Nasser, which would not threaten the King as long as he remains friendly to Nasser.

7. Within Egypt there are most noticeably two trends: (1) because of the desperate economic situation there is, however unwilling it may be, increasing dependence on the Soviet Bloc, and yet (2) as reported in earlier telegrams, there is some nervousness about dangers of internal subversion as seen by the closing down of recent Soviet film festival, and stringent measures against indigenous Communist activities. We have also reported on the toning down of press criticism of the Eisenhower Doctrine while the government has still refrained from any public comment. Thus although Nasser is too heavily committed particularly in the commercial field to the Soviet Bloc to be able to afford the luxury of any overt gesture against the Soviets, I still believe that he is as reluctant as ever to become a Soviet puppet. But to avoid this grim fate he desperately needs some diplomatic encouragement and economic relief from the USA. But I have the impression that the terms the USA may ask for such aid will be such that Nasser may find it difficult if not impossible to accept. There will probably be a major policy decision made following King Saud's forthcoming talks in Cairo with Nasser, Kouatly and King Hussein.

8. I have had hints that as a counter balance to the alarming economic dependence on the Soviet Bloc Nasser would even welcome the early resumption of relations with the UK if the proper formula could be found. Thus Egypt's position is somewhat different from its neighbours; however anxious Nasser may be [to] show himself independent of all blocs the supply situation is so critical that he cannot afford to offend the USSR unless and until he is sure of something like a quid pro quo from the USA. He is also acutely sensitive to what he believes are USA attempts to isolate Egypt from other Arab states.

9. Yet with all these various signs of desire to resist Communist subversion combined with varying degrees of hope for better relations with the USA, there is mounting fear and dismay over recent USA moves vis-à-vis Israel. Those Arab leaders who wish to stand forth as friends of the USA and the West must have some tangible evidence that such friendship pays off, and this in the present situation means more than military aid to a King of Arabia. It means convincing proof that the USA has been the effective power in dislodging Israel from the Gaza Strip and Sharm-El-Sheikh unconditionally. If there is serious compromise on this and if there appears to be more concern in USA policy over Israeli susceptibilities than with what the Arabs believe to be their just cause, tentative moves indicating determination to resist communism will be stultified. Those leaders who wish to show their independence of Nasser or who firmly reject flirtation with the Russians, will be seriously discredited. They will be taunted with the charge that friendship with the USA has earned nothing but major concessions to Israel. In this connection it should be emphasized that there tends to be an over-simplification on the part of some foreign observers in thinking that Egypt is the only Arab country that has a quarrel with Israel. They are all in varying degrees obsessed with the phenomenon of Israel's dynamic expansion.

10. There is no stronger unifying force in the Arab world than fear and hatred of Israel. It may seem strange to speak of fear of such a small state, but in the light of its demonstrated military striking power, of the diplomatic support that the Israelis can mobilize abroad, of substantial grants and financial aid especially from the USA that the Israelis enjoy, of the steady expansion of its borders, of its recent mauling of Egyptian forces, there is obviously no neighbouring Arab country that can effectively cope with Israel. In the light of all this, there is no doubt that fear of Israel is the predominant emotion in this part of the world. Unless the Arab world is convinced that Israel can be contained, the fear, in my estimate, is so great that it overrides the fear of communism even among conservative Moslem leaders, particularly if to it is added the belief that Israelis enjoy massive Western support. It is refusal to appreciate the depth of this fear, however it may be, that drives the Arabs more and more towards the USSR. Without expecting that the USA will ever go back on its assurances that Israel has a right to exist, if the USA could nevertheless prove to be the decisive agent in effecting Israeli withdrawal, it could score a resounding diplomatic victory over the Russians in this whole area. Conversely if this is not achieved and Israel succeeds in winning major conditions for her withdrawal, (or remains in possession of its present gains), not only will the Arab leaders whose encouraging moves I have described above be generally discredited but the unifying force of fear and hatred for Israel will be translated directly to the USA. The outside world may scoff and ask what has a great power like the USA to worry about the resentment of these impotent, quarrelsome and frustrated nations, but the sequel to this I fear would be a stunning gain for Soviet diplomacy and the conversion of this whole area into what the Eisenhower doctrine is aimed to prevent, namely a point d'appui for aggressive Soviet policy. Nobody would be more mortified than the Russians to see the USA emerge as the effective power in curbing Israeli ambitions and no one would be more delighted to see Israel succeed in her efforts to flout the UN, and thus to stampede the Arabs into turning to them for aid and comfort.

UNITED NATIONS; MIDDLE EAST SITUATION
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE JAN. 31)

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on recent developments in the United Nations concerning proposals to deal with Egyptian-Israeli differences and to bring about the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Egyptian territory. A major debate on Middle Eastern problems was to have begun some days ago but the United States, not wanting a decision on sanctions if it could be avoided, was successful in having the debate postponed. This had been all to the good, because it gave other countries an opportunity to seek a more constructive solution or prepare for the debate. The U.S. had hoped to persuade the Israelis to evacuate their troops from the Gulf of Aqaba area and the Gaza Strip and to place the civilian administration of Gaza under U.N. auspices in return for an undertaking that the U.S. would make every effort to see that Israel's rights were protected. Israel had not agreed. Meanwhile, the Israeli Ambassador to the U.N. had returned home for a day or two for consultations and President Eisenhower was consulting U.S. congressional leaders on what the next American step should be. The U.N. debate would probably open on Thursday.

Rumours were rife about U.S. intentions. Mr. Lodge was supposed to have assured the Arab-Asian countries that the U.S. would support a resolution imposing sanctions on Israel. The Secretary of State had made strong appeals to our mission in Washington and to others to support the U.S. position, whatever that might be. But this would not be determined until after Mr. Eisenhower's talks with congressional representatives. In Mr. Dulles' opinion the situation was difficult, dangerous, and momentous. If Israel did not leave Egyptian territory at once and trust her friends to obtain the assurances she so badly desired, hostilities would be resumed and the Suez Canal might remain closed indefinitely.

In this event, Mr. Dulles argued, western countries and Israel would have played in to the hands of communism and the Soviet Union would penetrate deeper into the Arab world. If the west did not get the Israelis out, Russia would. The Arabs have said clearly that if Israel does not move it would be extremely dangerous for the west not to support sanctions.

2. Mr. Pearson said that he had been in touch with the Secretary General and the Israeli, Arab, Commonwealth, and several other delegations to try to obtain agreement on a plan which would spell out in detail the arrangements to be made after Israel withdrew. Following this he had prepared a resolution which would provide for freedom of navigation in the canal and in the Gulf of Aqaba, and for U.N.E.F. to be placed along these waters to see that such freedom was provided and also in positions on the armistice lines and in the Gaza Strip. Gaza was complicated. It should return to Egypt but his proposal would ensure that this happened under the aegis of the U.N. The plan was not new but there seemed to be a good deal of support for it. Mr. Hammarskjöld was enthusiastic. The Egyptians had made no comment but could not be expected to. The Israeli U.N. representative would probably accept it. However, his government would no doubt want to have the security arrangements stated more clearly. This was impossible.

He found it hard to believe that, in the last analysis, the U.S. would support the Arab-Asian move for sanctions even though Mr. Lodge appeared to have said his government would take such a stand. He had told Mr. Lodge that the Canadian delegation would not support such a resolution under any circumstances and would do its best to avoid a vote by introducing other ideas. Many others would also join in efforts to escape this possibility.

3. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It was the general impression that Israel wanted to absorb the Gaza strip. This was true but the Israelis justified their stand by saying they had to prevent Gaza from being used as a base for attacks. The Canadian view was that this prevention should be done by the U.N.E.F. The Minister had told the Israeli Ambassador to the U.N. that, if Israel maintained its hold on Gaza, it would also have to assume responsibility for the welfare of the refugees in the area, of which there were over 250,000.

(b) Neither side in the dispute should know Canada's final position or that of the U.S. because whoever did would immediately stiffen its own demands. However, both had been given a general indication of the kind of resolution that Canada would support.

(c) If Canada were to sponsor the resolution outlined by the Minister, there would be a commitment, to participate in U.N.E.F. to see that its terms were observed. However, General Burns thought that no more troops would be required, and if they were, a number of other nations had offered contributions which had not been accepted and which offers might then be taken up. No ships were really needed for patrol work and the story that the Minister had suggested ships be used in the Gulf of Aqaba had just been built up on his mention of the possible use of aircraft.

(d) The additional troops which Canada had already agreed to provide would be ready to leave in two weeks' time and their equipment next week. What would be the situation if a reasonable solution were not reached in a few days? To this it was said that the issue could not be postponed much longer and by next week it should be known if U.N.E.F. could continue to function.

(e) Even if a sanctions resolution were passed, it could probably not be enforced effectively nor would Egypt be apt to renew hostilities to force Israeli troops off Egyptian territory. The Russians would not step in actively either, but they would no doubt increase the flow of arms to Egypt and intensify their political support for Nasser.

(f) Israel had stated its case well. Canadian public opinion would not countenance the U.N. forcing Israel to withdraw without reasonable guarantees as to her future safety, and with respect to freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba and the Suez Canal. On the other hand, the situation would be different if the U.N. gave these assurances and Israel still refused to move.

4. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on recent Middle Eastern developments in the United Nations and approved the general attitude to be taken by the Canadian delegation during the forthcoming negotiations and debate on the Israeli withdrawal from Egypt and related questions, as outlined by the Minister.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Shortly after my arrival last evening (February 20) Engen and I discussed current developments. MacKay was also present. The main theme of our conversation was an Afro-Asian decision made yesterday afternoon to allow a further postponement in the plenary debate on this subject.

2. As you know, it was assumed yesterday that the debate would begin on February 21. The Afro-Asians had their draft resolution containing sanctions and it was to be presented by Malik. We understood that most of the Afro-Asians would co-sponsor the resolution. The info which emerged here at noon from the President's consultation with congressional leaders in Washington was that the USA would support sanctions if the UN voted them.

3. Yesterday afternoon at four o'clock Engen had a conversation with Fawzi about the problem of withdrawal, among other things. Engen informed Fawzi that in present circumstances Norway would probably not support a resolution containing sanctions. This disturbed Fawzi, who obviously regarded Engen as a spokesman for the whole Scandinavian group. During the same conversation Fawzi assured Engen that whatever happened Egypt would not deliberately delay the UN clearing operation of the canal. Fawzi did say, however, that the prolonged delay in bringing about Israel's withdrawal was creating serious difficulty for the Egyptian Government. Fawzi was under heavy pressure to resume action in the Assembly.

4. About the same time yesterday afternoon Comay informed MacKay that Eban had transmitted by phone a new message from Eisenhower to [Ben-Gurion]. Ben-Gurion's reply by phone was that he could not reverse his policy without further consultation with his Cabinet which was to meet on February 21; that moreover any change of policy should be referred to Knesset. Comay said that Israel would require until February 23 to reach any new decision on withdrawal. The implication seemed to be that there might be a softening in the Israel Government's attitude. Engen was approached in the same sense by Rafael of the Israel delegation. We understand that the USA delegation received the same info.

5. In these circumstances Engen and MacKay consulted with Cordier to see whether today's debate could be further postponed. Cordier promised to take the matter up with the Secretary-General and with the Afro-Asian group. Concurrently, the USA delegation tried once again to persuade the Afro-Asians to have patience. Lodge had said earlier that he would argue no longer in favour of postponement. In speaking to Fawzi Lodge may have given him some indication of what the President would say in his television broadcast last evening.¹⁹¹ In any event, the Afro-Asians decided to postpone the debate for "twenty four hours" which we understand may run until noon on February 22.

6. The USA delegation have been suggesting to us that events are now moving in the right direction and that the Israelis will agree to withdraw. I am not at all sure that this will be the case, although Ben-Gurion may not wish to put too much strain on his relations with the Eisenhower administration. What worries me is that if the withdrawal should be effected in these circumstances without some clearer understanding about the arrangements which should follow on the heels of withdrawal, the Assembly will not accomplish what we have always regarded as its main task, that of establishing conditions in which real improvement in Egyptian-Israeli relations could develop.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Last evening (February 21) the Secretary General and Bunche called on me at my request to discuss the current situation. The Secretary General's opinion was that the attitude of Israel, as reported in the press, continued negative. It seemed unlikely that Eban would bring back with him any proposal which the USA could consider seriously. The Israelis seemed bent upon spinning out the bilateral negotiations. After the President's statement of February 20 the USA seemed committed "to follow suit for quite a distance" along the path of putting pressure on Israel.

¹⁹¹ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXVI, No. 924, March 11, 1957, pp. 387-391.

2. The Secretary General said that he had been discussing informally with Fawzi arrangements which might be made in the Gaza Strip after the withdrawal of Israel. Fawzi's reaction had been encouraging and the Secretary General proposed to make a brief statement in plenary session which would indicate in broad terms the kind of action which the UN might take to ensure not only security but efficient administration in the area. The Secretary General showed us the text of his proposed statement and suggested that we might wish to incorporate some of the ideas in the statement which we were preparing for the debate on February 22. The Secretary General was aware that our statement would contain a programme of the measures which we thought should be put into effect immediately after the withdrawal of Israel.

2. I gave a summary of our proposed statement and read some sections from the draft which I thought would be of interest to the Secretary General. I explained that we intended to base our initial position on a statement but later we might introduce a draft resolution along the lines which I had previously discussed with the Secretary General. We wondered whether the USA would be taking an initiative; we agreed that the USA position might not emerge until after Eban had returned from Israel. Bunche suggested that the President's statement would crystallize opinion in the USA in support of a tougher policy against Israel. I said that the USA press gave little indication that this was happening. I added that we wished to be sure that any position we might take would not undercut the one which the USA proposed to adopt. For this reason we were processing carefully. Bunche said that my statement might be interpreted by some as a rejoinder to Eisenhower.

4. We were then joined by Charles Malik who had an appointment with me. I reviewed some of the ideas which we were considering. Malik enquired why we considered it necessary to spell out in a public statement the various steps which would follow upon withdrawal. He seemed to be in agreement with most of the measures we had in mind but he obviously would have preferred that the necessary arrangements be made through secret diplomacy. I explained why we considered that a precise programme to follow upon withdrawal should be brought squarely before the General Assembly. I explained the general lines of our statement. After further discussion Malik and I reached agreement on the tactics which might be followed in the debate on February 22. Malik was to introduce the Afro Asian draft resolution containing sanctions and he promised to do this in a moderate statement. He even agreed to try to persuade the other cosponsors not to submit the draft resolution in the opening stages of the debate. It seemed likely, however, that they could not be so persuaded. I agreed that our statement, which I hoped would follow closely that of Malik, would concentrate on the constructive elements and not deal at all with the question of sanctions. This meant considerable revision to the statement which we had prepared but it obviously would be sound tactics not to have at the outset of the debate a drawing of the lines on the issue of sanctions.

5. This morning (February 22) I met with Dixon, Spender and Munro and told them what we had in mind. They were in favour of the kind of programme which I proposed to explain in detail in my statement. They also shared our view about the tactics we proposed to follow. We all agreed that it would be helpful if the Israelis could be kept quiet and that, after a few statements had been made, the debate should adjourn until February 25.

6. About noon I discussed these developments with Lodge. I assured him that we had no wish to discuss sanctions at this stage and that our statement would be mainly concerned with a constructive programme to follow upon withdrawal. Lodge did not say so, but I gathered that he would have preferred no Canadian statement in the opening phase of the debate. He said that the USA delegation was preparing a resolution of its own; that he hoped we would keep an open mind about resolutions; and that we would find the USA draft acceptable. He could not elaborate, he said, until Eban had returned to Washington with a detailed reply from the Israel Government. Lodge said that Fawzi had agreed to have a brief debate this afternoon followed by an adjournment until Monday.

7. Later we learned that the Secretary General proposed to make his brief statement; that Fawzi would make a general statement urging Assembly action to deal with Israel's non-compliance with the earlier resolutions on withdrawal; and that Malik would introduce the draft resolution containing sanctions. I proposed to speak after Malik. Before the plenary meeting, however, I was approached twice by Comay who strongly urged me not to participate in the debate this afternoon. He argued that Eban was bringing further proposals from Jerusalem and that the measures which would be advocated in my statement (I had earlier given the Israelis an outline of my ideas) might create the wrong impression in Israel and spoil the chances for a successful negotiation between Israel and the USA. The implication was that Eban was bearing hopeful tidings. This impression was not confirmed by the USA delegation. I was not a little surprised at the vigour with which Comay tried to persuade me not to speak.

8. At lunch Malik told me that his statement would be very moderate and that the Arabs were prepared to get the debate moving and no more. In other words, after short statements by Fawzi and Malik the proceedings would be adjourned. In all these circumstances I decided that it might be unwise to press our own ideas at this stage. Accordingly I did not intervene this afternoon but put my name on the speakers' list for Monday morning. As we reported by telephone, the debate this afternoon developed as forecast.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Last evening (February 22) Dixon and I discussed the current situation. He was a little disturbed because the short debate in the afternoon had resulted in having before the Assembly only the Afro Asian draft resolution on sanctions. He agreed that Malik's statement had been moderate but pointed out that the statements by both Fawzi and Malik revealed a firm Arab position, which thus far in the current debate had not been counteracted. (During the afternoon Dixon tried several times to persuade me to make the statement which we had prepared).

2. Dixon said that the UK could not support the Afro Asian resolution; public opinion in the UK was strongly opposed to putting UN pressure on Israel without at the same time giving adequate assurance that after withdrawal conditions in the area would be better than those which existed before the Israel armed intervention of October 29. The UK Government hoped that I would pursue the plans which I had discussed during the last few days with Dixon, and particularly that I would put forward a draft resolution along the lines of the text which we had shown the UK. I explained again to Dixon why I had not intervened in the afternoon debate; I said that we were determined to put forward our programme as soon as the debate resumed. Before committing myself to any draft resolution, however, I wished to know what the USA proposed to do. I had learned from Lodge that his delegation was working on a draft resolution.

3. Dixon and I agreed that it would be useful to discuss the situation with representatives of the Old Commonwealth and West European countries. Accordingly, we organized a meeting at the Beekman for noon today. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Italy, Netherlands, NZ, Norway, Portugal, Sweden and the UK attended. We had a useful discussion.

4. I began by discussing the current situation in the Assembly. I explained why I had not intervened in the debate yesterday. I referred to the relatively non controversial nature of the Arab statements and to the vigour with which the Israelis had urged me not to make my statement. I said that Lodge would be producing a draft resolution which he said should be satisfactory to us. I added, however, that I hear that also Lodge had informed the Arabs that they would like his draft resolution which might mean that it would be less satisfactory to European and Old Commonwealth delegations. I said it would be impossible for us to accept the sanctions resolution which Malik had submitted. I then invited comments from the meeting.

5. Dixon said that the UK wished to see a composite plan presented to the Assembly, one which would cover withdrawal and the other arrangements which must follow immediately after withdrawal. The UK could not accept withdrawal under UN pressure before adequate provision had been made for the subsequent arrangements. The UK objective was to bring about withdrawal but at the same time to avoid a return to the status quo ante. Dixon suggested that current USA policy placed too much emphasis on withdrawal and not enough on the subsequent arrangements. He was aware that the USA was preparing a draft resolution but he feared that there would not be time enough to evolve a plan satisfactory to all concerned. He pointed out that Eban would not reach Washington until tomorrow afternoon and that USA plans for the Assembly on Monday could not be completed until Eban had reported to the USA Government. The French representative had been informed that the Assembly would not meet until the afternoon of February 25 which would give a little more time for planning.

6. Dixon then proceeded to present UK views on the "elements of a plan" rather than the details of a resolution. This plan was almost word for word our own and no doubt based on the UK study of the draft resolution we had shown them. Dixon was obviously interested in demonstrating to the meeting that the UK was firmly behind Canada in the current approach to the problem.

7. We also discussed tactics. At the outset, I said, we proposed to make a statement which would contain a complete programme of the measures which we thought should follow upon withdrawal. In this way we hoped to attract support from other members of the Assembly. Until we knew the USA position we were hesitant to submit a draft resolution. We were particularly anxious to avoid the situation of two weeks ago when, because we circulated our ideas too soon, they were watered down as a result of suggestions from others. Our current belief was that instead of trying to negotiate a draft resolution acceptable to all concerned, we should lay down precisely what we hoped to achieve in the debate. It would be more difficult for others to whittle away our position in public.

8. Without giving the exact text I explained the various proposals which were contained in our draft resolution. This seemed generally acceptable to those present. Dixon and Munro urged that a draft resolution along those lines should be submitted as soon as possible. Engen and others were anxious to avoid a split with the USA and they agreed with me that we should wait to see the USA text before taking any final decision about submitting our own draft resolution. We all agreed that if the Assembly should be faced with three draft resolutions there might be a real danger that Krishna Menon would move in with a "compromise" which might upset our efforts to establish a programme for withdrawal and the sub-arrangements to it.

9. I said we hoped to discuss the situation with the USA delegation tomorrow. In the meantime we would put our draft resolution in final shape. It was agreed that the group should meet again early Monday morning at which time they could discuss our text. In response to requests I showed members of the group the text of the statement which I proposed to make when the debate resumes.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Over the weekend we have discussed our draft resolution with the Secretary General and Bunche. In particular we had a useful discussion on Saturday evening (February 23) after our telegram under reference was despatched. As a result of these discussions we have made a number of changes in the text.

2. The present draft, dated February 25, reads as follows:

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions of November 2, 4, 7 and 24, 1956, and January 19 and February 2/57;

Reaffirming its responsibility and concern for facilitating, after Israel's withdrawal, effective arrangements relating to security in order to create more settled conditions within which the attainment of a lasting political settlement may become possible;

1. Deplores the fact that Israel had not yet complied fully with resolutions of the General Assembly regarding withdrawal behind the armistice demarcation line, and calls upon Israel to complete that withdrawal without further delay, as the essential prerequisite to the implementation of the other measures contained in this resolution;
 2. Reaffirms the necessity for a scrupulous observance of the provisions of the 1949 Armistice Agreement, and calls upon the Governments of Egypt and Israel to take without delay all measures necessary to ensure full implementation of that agreement;
 3. Requests the Secretary General to make arrangements, after consultation with Israel and Egypt, for the deployment of UNEF on both sides of the armistice demarcation line, in the El Auja zone and in the Gaza Strip, so that the force will be able
 - (a) to assume the duties of the Truce Supervision Organization under the Armistice Agreement between the two States;
 - (b) to assist in preventing incursions, raids and retaliatory attacks across the armistice line; and generally in maintaining peaceful conditions along both sides of that line;
 4. Requests the Secretary General to make arrangements for the replacement of the present administration of the Gaza Strip, and for the association thereafter of the UN with its administration, having regard to the political, economic and social problems involved, including particularly those concerning refugees;
 5. Declares that there should be no interference with innocent passage through the Straits of Tiran;
 6. Requests the Secretary General, in cooperation with the Government of Egypt, and upon the withdrawal of Israeli forces, to make such arrangements for the deployment of UNEF as may be necessary to maintain peaceful conditions along the west coast of the Gulf of Aqaba and in the Straits of Tiran;
 7. Considers that the provisions of this resolution, if fully implemented, would provide a satisfactory basis for maintaining and developing peaceful conditions in the area concerned, and accordingly calls upon member states to cooperate in whatever steps may be necessary to fulfill these provisions;
 8. Requests the Secretary General, within one week from the adoption of this resolution, to report to the General Assembly on the state of compliance with paragraph 1 calling for complete withdrawal by Israel, and to report when appropriate on the implementation of the recommendations set forth in paragraphs 2 to 6 inclusive;
 9. Recommends that unless Israel's withdrawal is brought about within the terms of this resolution, the General Assembly should give consideration to measures which might be effective in achieving the desired ends.
3. We are still not circulating this text. The Minister had decided not to do this until we have a clearer indication of USA intentions.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

About six o'clock on February 24, Comay came to see me to inform me about talks which he and Mrs. Meir had had with Eban on his return that morning from Israel. Comay emphasized that he was giving the Israeli side of the picture "unofficially and confidentially". He had no info on what actually happened at Washington. As far as he knew the talks might still be in progress.

2. Comay said that Eban's new instructions contained an attempt to reach accommodation with the USA position set forth in the aide mémoire of February 11. Israel was prepared to accept the "order of priority" suggested by the USA. In other words the question of belligerency would be left aside and priority would be given to withdrawal from the two areas which were "non-Israeli territory". For the moment in its negotiations with the USA Israel would concentrate on withdrawal and later talk about the other measures contained in the Secretary-General's report of January 24 (A/3512). The Israelis hoped that in these discussions the situation in the two areas should not be too closely linked because they related to two very different problems.

Gulf of Aqaba

3. As regards the Gulf of Aqaba, initially Israel had wanted a firm guarantee concerning freedom of passage. Israel had hoped that this guarantee would be backed up by the presence of UNEF at Sharm-El-Sheikh until there should be either a permanent settlement or an agreement among the coastal states concerning rights in those waters. Another alternative had been a USA guarantee which would cover Israeli shipping. None of these things had appeared possible and Israel was therefore faced with the decision whether it could accept something which fell short of a firm guarantee.

3. Israel was now prepared to withdraw from Sharm-El-Sheikh if the following "bundle of circumstances" prevailed:

(a) UNEF would follow up the Israeli withdrawal from Sharm-El-Sheikh. Even if UNEF did not remain in the area long, it would be desirable to have it present there during the period immediately after withdrawal. Israel's hope was that UNEF would move into Sharm-El-Sheikh as a result of an Assembly decision so that UNEF could not be evicted by Nasser without further reference to the Assembly. If the question of removing UNEF from Sharm-El-Sheikh were put to the Assembly, the members would be alerted that Nasser was up to something in the Gulf area.

(b) Israel was attracted to the "Pearson proposal for naval patrol" and hoped that this might be established. (I stated flatly that there was no such proposal and that the UNEF Commander had made no request for naval units. Presumably if he believed a naval patrol in the Straits would be desirable, he would ask for one).

(c) The USA assurance concerning USA shipping in the Straits should be implemented. This would establish the practice of free passage. Israel was anxious that this shipping should include a few oil tankers.

(d) It should be understood that Israel could take all means to protect its own shipping in the Gulf and in the Straits. This might involve a naval patrol in the Gulf.

(e) Other nations might associate themselves with a declaration concerning freedom of passage in the Straits and should put this declaration to the test by sending ships to Elath. The implication seemed to be that Israel would withdraw from Sharm-El-Sheikh if some or all of these circumstances should exist.

Gaza Strip

4. Comay said there had been a marked shift in Israel's policy concerning the Gaza Strip. The Israel armed forces would be withdrawn and Israel would not insist on maintaining its civil administration. Israel would insist, however, that the Egyptians should not be allowed to return to the Gaza Strip. Israel would accept instead a UN administration of the area. The Israeli Government believed that there were three primary requirements in any administration of the Strip: the welfare of the refugees; the economic rehabilitation of the indigenous inhabitants; and the security problem of maintaining order with the area, in particular to prevent raids and incursions in Israel. Israel now envisaged that immediately upon the withdrawal of Israeli armed forces UNEF would move into the Gaza Strip and that discussions would begin at once concerning the replacement of the Israeli civil administration. These discussions would be "without political strings".

5. I agreed at once that Israel's policy had moved a long way in the right direction. I pointed out, however, that it might be politically very difficult to prevent at least a token return to Egyptian administration in the Gaza Strip. The scrupulous observance of the Armistice Agreement implied that the Egyptians should return to Gaza at least on a nominal basis. I enquired whether Israel could accept a nominal return by Egypt but with the UN effectively in control of the area. Comay's reply was negative. I then asked whether Israel could accept such an arrangement on an interim basis, pending an investigation of a long-term solution for the Gaza Strip. I mentioned the ideas contained in our draft resolution. I emphasized that Israel should be prepared to accept at least an interim return to the régime of the Armistice Agreement.

6. Comay said that Ben-Gurion was in difficulty with his Cabinet; that he had already moved a long way from policies which he had enunciated earlier; and that he could not go any farther without the risk of real trouble. Comay regarded the present Israeli position as making large concessions to opinions held in the Assembly and particularly by the USA. If the UN considered that in spite of this major shift in Israel's policy sanctions should be imposed to make Israel comply unconditionally with the earlier resolutions, Israel would face sanctions. (The Israelis know full well that few governments would support sanctions against Israel if the only sticking point should be Israeli insistence that Egypt should not return to the Gaza Strip).

Deployment of UNEF

7. Comay was obviously anxious to keep the conversation on the Gulf of Aqaba and the Gaza Strip. I enquired about Israel's attitude toward the deployment of UNEF on both sides of the demarcation line. Comay said his government would prefer to concentrate on the problems of withdrawal and "not go farther at this stage". I argued that the Assembly must take some action before it adjourned to make arrangements for the deployment of UNEF. It would give the force greater permanency if it could be deployed on both sides of the demarcation line. Otherwise it would be difficult to resist Egyptian demands for its withdrawal. If Israel's aim was to get an agreed solution to Arab-Israeli differences, Israel should show some willingness to return to the régime of the Armistice Agreement, and in the interests of improving conditions along the demarcation line to allow the deployment of UNEF astride the line. The Assembly might not agree to deployment on one side.

8. Comay agreed that my arguments had force but urged that we should not try to settle all these problems at once. The question of deploying UNEF in Israel was "controversial" for the Israel Government. He reviewed briefly some of the well-known reasons why the force could not be deployed on Israel's side of the line. He suggested that the question should be left for the future. I agreed that details of the question could be decided in the future but it should not now be regarded as a closed question. It seemed to me that the Assembly could now request the Secretary-General to make arrangements for deployment, even though all these arrangements might not be completed for some time to come.

9. I suggested that Israel had gained something out of the Sinai expedition. If Israel completed her withdrawal now the main problem for the Arabs would be to hold Israel behind its present borders and there would be less heard about the partition plan of 1947; less about territorial adjustment and about the status of Jerusalem. Israel was in a better position to consolidate behind the existing demarcation lines. Moreover, there was greater pressure not only in the Assembly but in world public opinion to have something done about the Palestine question. All these were advantageous to Israel and she should not forget them in bargaining over Gaza, UNEF.

10. Comay said that the armed intervention of last autumn had been "worthwhile". A severe blow had been struck against the "Nasser menace" and to some extent this had made it possible to separate Nasser from King Saud and others. Israel recognized that its long-term position was inevitably based on the need for the USA to occupy a strong position in the Middle East. This was the main reason why Ben-Gurion had agreed to be more accommodating about the withdrawal. One of Israel's fears was, however, that in its efforts to establish itself in the Middle East, through such means as the Eisenhower Doctrine, the USA might be required to make concessions to the Arabs at the expense of Israel. In reply to this I said that a mainspring of the Eisenhower Doctrine might now be a vigorous quest for a settlement of Arab-Israeli differences, notwithstanding the many difficulties.

11. Bunche came to see me shortly after Comay's visit. In strict confidence I told Bunche about the position which Eban would adopt in his negotiations with Dulles. Bunche thought that any attempt to prevent the Egyptians from returning to the Gaza Strip might create serious difficulty in the Assembly. He confirmed from UN sources reports about explosions within the Gaza Strip. He could not say, however, whether these were demolitions prior to departure or merely the destruction of old mine fields by the Bedouin.

12. Later Comay informed me that from a phone conversation with Eban he believed that the talks in Washington had resulted in "progress in the South and agreement on objectives in the North". I again urged him to consider the possibility of an interim return by the Egyptians to the Gaza Strip with full association by the UN in its administration. Bunche then called to say that Lodge had informed the Secretary-General that developments in Washington were encouraging, a report which later turned out to be too optimistic. Lodge suggested that Israel's withdrawal could now be worked out without further pressure from the Assembly. Knowing what Comay had told me, the Secretary-General cross-examined Lodge and was informed that the Israelis had agreed to withdraw and that subject to some clarifications the details could be worked out "on the basis of the Secretary-General's statement of February 22" concerning UN association with the administration of the Gaza Strip. The Secretary-General found this disturbing and I did too, because it looked very much as though the USA was prepared after this brief skirmish with Israel to throw the real problem back into the Secretary-General's lap. We were without details, however, because Lodge's report to the Secretary-General had been based on a phone conversation with Dulles.

13. About nine o'clock I discussed the situation with Engen and suggested that we were perhaps not as near a solution as Lodge's report to the Secretary-General might indicate. Our understanding was that Eban would have a further conversation with the Secretary-General on February 25. It is my belief that if this conversation should reveal that the USA is trying to saddle the Secretary-General with the implementation of its so-called settlement with Israel, the Secretary-General should strongly resist this attempt and should throw the ball back to the USA.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

After I spoke in the Assembly this morning¹⁹² (February 26) I agreed to see Mrs. Meir and Comay. Mrs. Meir wanted to tell me what "our current troubles are". She said that on Sunday, after Eban had spoken to Dulles, the Israelis believed that matters were developing in the direction of a solution and all that was required were some clarifications from the Secretary General concerning the implementation of various measures in the Gulf of Aqaba areas. Eban's subsequent conversation with the Secretary General had produced a number of new difficulties. Mrs. Meir showed me the Secretary General's memoranda on his conversations with Eban. These texts were transmitted to you earlier today and they have now been circulated as a UN document [A/3563].

2. Mrs. Meir dealt mainly with the situation in the Gaza Strip. She said that there was a misunderstanding about the "conditions" in which Israel would withdraw. Eban had not suggested to Dulles nor to the Secretary General that Egypt should consent to abandon any juridical rights which it conceivably had in the Gaza Strip. Israel's position was there should be no de facto return by Egypt to the area. This exclusion of Egypt would be without prejudice to any rights it might have in the area. This rights, however, would be kept in abeyance pending a final settlement. Israel had consistently maintained that in the negotiation of a peace settlement both sides could invoke any rights they considered valid. Mrs. Meir recognized Egypt's argument about the rights it had under the Armistice Agreement to administer the Gaza Strip but she failed to understand why Egypt should be permitted to exercise this claim to rights when Egypt also claimed the right to exercise belligerent rights in other areas. She seemed to be saying that because Egypt had exercised belligerent rights elsewhere, Egypt's rights in the Gaza Strip should be considered as forfeited. In any event, she asserted, Israel required concrete assurances that there would be no return to the situation in which the Gaza Strip served as a base for raids and incursions against Israel.

3. I pointed out that, as now envisaged, Egypt's return to the Gaza Strip would be "nominal". I asked whether Israel would agree to the establishment of an administration which would be in fact uncontrolled but in the name of Egypt. Mrs. Meir replied that in my statement I had correctly described the character of the population in Gaza as "bitter". Even if the UN should be effectively associated with the administration, as long as there was a nominal Egyptian return, Egyptian agents would see to it that the bitterness of the populations was turned against Israel. Mrs. Meir emphasized that Israel's aim was to establish peaceful conditions along the Strip; no expansion or colonization was intended.

4. She then spoke about a fact-finding commission, which she urged that the Assembly should establish to investigate existing conditions in the Gaza Strip. She argued that this commission should go at once to the area and find out how it was being administered. She said "Let the Assembly give us a chance to prove what we have been saying about conditions in the Gaza Strip". In response to questioning she said that the commission should go to the Gaza Strip immediately upon the withdrawal of Israel's armed forces but not the civil administration. (Our suggestion for a committee of three was of course that the investigation concerning the future status of the Gaza Strip should take place after the replacement of Israel's administration.) Mrs. Meir said that if the investigators decided that Israel should quit the Gaza Strip, Israel would gladly do so.

5. Mrs. Meir wondered why Fawzi, as the representative of the Egyptian Government, would not state in the Assembly that Egypt had no intention of re-establishing full control in the Gaza Strip. She asked why the Secretary General had considered it necessary on February 22 to say what he understood to be Egyptian policy in that regard. She implied that the Secretary General's statement at that time had misled the Israelis into believing that there would be no de facto return by Egypt. I reminded her that the Secretary General's statement could in no way detract from Egypt's rights in Gaza under the Armistice Agreement. Although we might like to exclude the Egyptians completely from the Strip, I did not see how we could establish a situation of security by doing so. As long as the Egyptians could rally support on the ground that they had been denied their rights, they would be able to block any effective UN administration in Gaza.

6. Mrs. Meir insisted that Fawzi should make a public statement about Egyptian intentions in the Gaza area. She referred to the fact that the Secretary General's statement of February 22 had been denounced the next day by the Cairo radio. This had the effect of destroying the "confidence" which the Secretary General had expressed at that time. She said that responsible members of the Assembly should ask Fawzi to declare whether Egypt still claimed belligerent rights. If Fawzi replied affirmatively, Egypt could no longer claim rights under the Armistice Agreement. Egypt could not expect to enjoy the privileges of that Agreement as well as the rights of belligerency.

7. Mrs. Meir agreed with me that scrupulous observance of the Armistice Agreement did give Egypt rights in the Gaza Strip. She said that Israel had never questioned this but that these rights had become questionable because of Egypt's acts of belligerency. I then reminded her about a case which had come before the League of Nations involving Peru and Colombia and in which the League had established a commission, which in order to secure Peruvian withdrawal had taken over the administration of disputed territory "in the name of Colombia". (Urrutia had mentioned this case to me). I asked whether this technique might not be applied in the Gaza Strip. In effect the UN would exercise the rights of Egypt in Gaza pending a permanent settlement. It was my impression that Mrs. Meir's reply was that Egypt should not be allowed to return to the Strip "with the capacity for exercising control". In other words, if I understood her correctly, she implied that the UN might exercise control in the name of Egypt. This would be a modification of the position, which we understood Eban took with the Secretary General, that Israel could not compromise on any direct or indirect restoration of Egyptian authority in Gaza. This reply by Mrs. Meir was, however, offset to some extent by arguments which Comay had adduced to the effect that it was now disputable whether Egypt had any rights in the Gaza Strip.

8. Mrs. Meir spoke about the non-recognition by Israel of the Arab states. She said that in her statement in the current debate she proposed to emphasize that Israel was most reluctant to recognize the rights of Arab states, particularly under the Armistice Agreements, when those states refused to recognize the very existence of Israel. I encouraged her to hammer away at this point which was so fundamental to all the questions at issue. Mrs. Meir ended by reemphasizing that Israel was not asking Egypt to forego its legal rights, that Israel (group corrupt) to maintain the Armistice Agreement "as it is", and that the Assembly should not decide now that Israel could not continue its administration in Gaza.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This afternoon (February 26) I agreed to discuss the current situation with Lodge. He said that the USA delegation was considering a draft resolution which would contain the "thoughts" in my speech and "something about sanctions". The main recommendation in the resolution would be that unless within seventy-two hours from its adoption the Secretary-General reported that Israel's withdrawal was "being completed", a form of sanctions would be applied. Lodge hoped that the seven co-sponsors of the February 2 resolution would agree to sponsor a new one. He would be glad to add Canada to the list if we should find it possible to co-sponsor it.

2. I said that I would have to study the text but that if we could co-sponsor it, we would. It was my impression that the resolution might go farther on sanctions than we would prefer; this might make it difficult for us to co-sponsor the resolution but we might still be able to support it. I pointed out that our own text had contained a final para which envisaged sanctions in due course. I agreed that there had to be a para of that kind in the current resolution, although it could be dropped if the Israelis should indicate a willingness to withdraw on the basis of the resolution.

3. Lodge had concluded that the Israelis would not withdraw unless they were convinced that a two-thirds majority in the Assembly would support sanctions. I said that the Israel Government probably hoped that as a result of the current debate no resolution would get the required majority. I referred to my conversation today with Mrs. Meir and particularly to the possibility that Israel might modify its stand on Egypt's return to the Gaza Strip. Lodge said that Eban had indicated to Dulles that Israel would be agreeable to a nominal return "on the basis of the Secretary-General's statement of February 22" but that in his conversations with the Secretary-General Eban had raised further difficulties.

4. We agreed that some resolution was necessary and I welcomed the initiative which Lodge was taking. He undertook to show me the text as soon as it was in final form.¹⁹³ (We were aware at the time that Lodge had been discussing the text of a draft with the other six co-sponsors. Engen showed it to me later in the afternoon). We expect to receive the USA text tomorrow morning. We have been informed by the USA delegation that further revisions have been received from Washington.

5. In the Assembly debate the representatives of Jordan, Canada, USSR, Syria, Czechoslovakia and Iraq spoke. Zeineddine and Jamali made sharp attacks on the programme which I had suggested. They accused me of siding with Israel and taking too little account of Arab rights. They should have known that many of my suggestions were also distasteful to Israel. It is not necessarily a bad thing that our programme has been criticized from both sides.

6. The most disconcerting and disappointing feature of today's developments is the failure of the USA delegation to show us or even take us into their confidence about their draft. The UK, French, Australian and NZ delegations are even more in the dark, having been told nothing. As Spender put it to me "The Assembly apparently think the Indians, Egyptians etc speak better English". It would be easy for us to become very annoyed about this and to suspect that Lodge is trying to pay us off for not having sponsored his earlier resolution. His tactics are not making it any easier for us to sponsor this one apart from its merits.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This morning (February 27) I met with Dixon, Spender and Munro to discuss this subject. I told them that the USA delegation had not given us any text of a draft resolution. We had expected to have one last evening but we were informed that developments in Washington had delayed the USA decision about their draft resolution. Munro understood that Dulles and Pineau had discussed the current situation and that they were considering the possibility that Israel might withdraw under cover of a unilateral declaration and that the Israel Government assumed that there would be a UN administration in the Gaza strip. Spender suggested that the Israelis might also include in their declaration a reference to their right to protect themselves against interference with Israeli shipping in the Straits of Tiran. It was further suggested that this declaration by Israel would be reinforced by private assurances from the USA and perhaps other States.

2. The Old Commonwealth representatives deplored the lack of consultation between the USA delegation and "our group". Spender strongly urged that we should ask Lodge to meet with us and to discuss frankly USA intentions. I gave as my impression that the USA delegation was having difficulty in preparing a draft resolution because of conflicting opinions among the delegations which they were consulting here and because of developments in Washington. Dixon agreed that this was probably the case but he feared that if we did not keep in close touch with the USA delegation we might be faced with a draft resolution which would "put us in appalling difficulty". He suggested that in order to protect our position (meaning that of the various Commonwealth Governments) we might be obliged to submit a resolution along the lines of the Canadian text.

3. I pointed out that in Washington USA and French representatives might be able to bring effective pressure to bear on Israel. I was against submitting our own resolution until the USA position was made clearer. It would obviously be undesirable to have two resolutions with the same purpose. Not only would support in the Assembly be divided but the situation would allow Israel to play one faction against the other. I added that I was reluctant to seek a further interview with Lodge, since he had undertaken to put me in the picture as soon as the USA position was clarified. I agreed, however, to participate in any meeting which the UK might arrange with Lodge.

4. This in fact happened about noon. By then Engen had shown me a revised USA text, which at first glance seemed inadequate to meet the current situation. The draft contained a lengthy preamble, in which the main elements of our "programme" were described in vague language. The operative paragraphs contained a condemnation of Israel and a new call for the completion of its withdrawal. Provision was also made for the implementation of Resolution II of February 2 and for bringing pressure to bear on Israel if it did not comply with this new resolution. The language was not that of the Afro-Asian resolution on sanctions but the draft suggested that pending withdrawal member governments should refuse assistance to Israel and so regulate their relations with that country. What was probably intended was that governments should refuse public assistance to Israel in the hope that private contributors would follow suit.

5. At the meeting with Commonwealth representatives, however, Lodge insisted that he still had no text to discuss with us. In response to questions he described in broad terms the kind of resolution which the USA had in mind. Spender, Munro and Dixon gave their views on the draft resolution they would like to see submitted to the Assembly. These corresponded more or less with our draft, which all of them had seen. They insisted that there should be an emphasis on complete withdrawal by Israel but that it was necessary to spell out in some detail the arrangements which would follow withdrawal and which would serve as assurances to Israel. They agreed that the draft resolution should also include provision for bringing pressure to bear on Israel if it did not respond to the new appeal.

6. Concerning Gaza the Commonwealth representatives told Lodge that they could not go along with Israel's insistence on the exclusion of Egypt from the area. Spender said that Israel was obviously trying not only to improve its security but to gain advantage which would serve it well if and when a peace settlement should be negotiated. It seemed inevitable that Egypt's rights in Gaza under the Armistice Agreement should be recognized at least nominally. However, every effort should be made to see that de facto UN control was established along the lines of the Secretary General's statement in the Assembly on February 22. It was too bad that the Egyptian Government could not take a public stand but presumably we must rely on the "confidence" which the Secretary General had expressed that Egypt would agree to an effective UN association with the administration of Gaza.

7. Lodge said that he was "pleasantly surprised" to see how closely Old Commonwealth views corresponded with those of the USA. He insisted that the USA draft resolution would contain all the "ideas" expressed in my statement yesterday. Lodge was encouraged to believe that we would all be able to support the text he had in mind. He referred to the problem of attracting two-thirds support in the Assembly, a problem which made it necessary to "play with words" in preparing a resolution. It was his impression that some of the other Arabs were being more difficult than the Egyptians.

8. So that Lodge would not be too optimistic about Commonwealth support Dixon explained in some detail the kind of resolution which the UK wished to see. He agreed that we were all working toward the same objectives but that the "structure" of the resolution would be very important. In particular it would be necessary to ensure that the arrangements or assurances, intended to encourage Israel's withdrawal, should come into effect automatically after withdrawal. The UK could not support a resolution containing sanctions if there was to be no "balance" as regards the assurances. Dixon referred to public opinion in the UK which was opposed to sanctions. He agreed that the UK would not wish to "cut across the USA effort", especially in view of the broader political issues like Soviet infiltration in the MidEast and the Suez Canal problem, but if the final version of the USA resolution should prove difficult for the UK, it might be necessary to introduce a resolution, like the Canadian one, which the UK considered properly balanced.

9. After Lodge had departed the Commonwealth representatives continued the discussion for a short while. I said that the USA text which we had seen was not sufficient but that since the situation was changing rapidly we should perhaps not attach too much significance to the current version. There was no use belittling the fact, however, that the drafting of the resolution would be important. This led us into a discussion of our text and particularly about our use of the words "innocent passage". As you know, the UK would prefer "free passage". I must say that I was not persuaded by the arguments Dixon adduced and I was left with the impression that the UK was trying to ensure that our draft resolution would endorse the UK position on the Straits of Tiran, as though the issue was beyond controversy. I gave Dixon no reason to believe that we would change the language we had used. We also discussed the last two paragraphs and agreed that these might have to be revised before the draft resolution was actually submitted.

10. Since there were no speakers either this morning or this afternoon, there was no debate today on the MidEast. The Assembly was marking time until the USA had produced its draft resolution. The drafting of that resolution was being complicated by developments in Washington. (Lodge has spoken about the frequency of his telephone conversations with Dulles). Late this afternoon we learned from Engen that Dulles had telephoned the Secretary General to report on the latest discussions with Eban. Eban had apparently agreed to recommend to the Israel Government that Eban should announce in the Assembly that Israel would withdraw unconditionally but on the "assumption" that the fullest possible use would be made of UN agencies, including UNEF, for the administration of the Gaza Strip and for preventing acts of belligerency in the Straits of Tiran. Engen understood that the Israel Cabinet was actually considering this recommendation and that its reply was expected shortly. Dulles had been fairly optimistic in his report to the Secretary General.

11. I shall be interested to see whether Ben-Gurion will accept this arrangement for withdrawal, an arrangement which is undoubtedly reinforced by private assurances from Dulles (and perhaps Pineau). It may be that the Israelis would consider withdrawal on these terms preferable to withdrawal on the basis of the programme I suggested. We understand that in his discussions with Eban Dulles had shown him the USA draft resolution, which Dulles said implied the Canadian programme and was likely to command two-thirds support in the Assembly. We gained the impression from Mrs. Meir (and Engen shares this view) that the Israelis were somewhat disappointed with the programme which I proposed. They were particularly opposed to my suggestion that UNEF should be stationed on both sides of the demarcation line. With the prospect that the Assembly might endorse a programme of that kind (even if the endorsement should be in the vague language of a USA text), the Israelis might have gone to Washington in search of a more acceptable deal. Even if Ben-Gurion should accept Eban's recommendation, there is a considerable chance that the Arabs will decry the Israelis "assumptions", a development which might upset the whole arrangement. In all these circumstances I believe it is too soon to look forward to a break in the current deadlock.

12. During the day Wadsworth had been suggesting to the press here that there might not be a USA draft resolution, certainly not in the next day or so. In addition, reliable press sources say that Menon has withdrawn from the drafting process. This evening the USA delegation informed us that their current text had been transmitted to Cairo for comment.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This morning (February 28) Kidron (Permanent Representative of Israel) spoke to MacKay about current developments. He gave the "background" of today's press reports about the arrangement for Israel's withdrawal.

2. After Eban had seen the Secretary-General here on February 25 he had returned to Washington to inform Dulles that the Secretary-General had been unable to give the necessary "clarifications", which Israel required before it would agree to withdraw. Dulles and Eban had discussed again the assurances contained in the USA aide mémoire of February 11 and the possibility that other states would give similar assurances. Dulles said he had discussed the matter with Pineau, who had developed some ideas which Dulles thought might be of interest to Eban.

3. Pineau's plan, which apparently Dulles endorsed, was that Israel should announce in the Assembly that it would withdraw completely from both areas. The armed forces would withdraw at once; the civil administration in the Gaza Strip would be withdrawn by stages so that there would be no lapse in authority there. The withdrawal would be on the assumption that UNEF would move into the Sharm-El-Sheikh area on the heels of the withdrawing Israelis and an exclusively UN civil administration would be established in the Gaza Strip in conjunction with its occupation by UNEF. It was Kidron's understanding that no Egyptians, civil or military, should be allowed to return to the Strip. In addition, Israel would declare that it reserved its right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter, a right which Israel would be free to exercise if the situations in Gaza and the Gulf of Aqaba did not develop as forecast in the Secretary-General's report of January 24, in various statements in the Assembly and in the USA aide mémoire. Kidron said that it would be a matter of "judgment" by the Israel Government whether these situations were developing unfavourably to Israel.

4. The intention was that the USA, France and presumably other states would welcome the Israeli announcement and endorse it. In reply to our question about what would happen if the "assumptions" were challenged in the Assembly, Kidron said that the expected support for the move would be so strong that any such challenge could be brushed aside. Kidron said that the USA delegation would organize the support for the move. He emphasized throughout that the exact text of the announcement had not been completed; he said that it was being drafted in Washington and implied that Dulles and Eban were co-authors.

5. Kidron's explanation of the "assumption" concerning the future administration of the Gaza Strip differed sharply with our info about what Dulles told the Secretary-General yesterday. We raised the question again with Engen who confirmed that Dulles had said that Israel's complete withdrawal from Gaza would be on the assumption that Egypt would agree to the maximum association of UN with the administration. This would not exclude a nominal return by Egypt although the intention was that the UN would exercise the effective control in the area. This approach is consistent with the Secretary-General's attitude and we earlier understood that Dulles shared the Secretary-General's view about the "validity" of the Armistice Agreement concerning Egypt's rights in the Gaza Strip. We can only assume that Kidron might not be fully informed about the latest developments.

6. Certainly this morning the USA delegation was ill-informed. I spoke to Barco and other USA officials and learned that the USA delegation knew little more than what was in the press about the proceeding in Washington. We were able to tell them about the proposed move in the Assembly because I had spoken to Heeney and because Kidron had voluntarily informed us. Apparently Kidron had told the USA delegation only that Mrs. Meir would be making an important announcement in the Assembly tomorrow. The present plan is that at the opening of the Assembly tomorrow Mrs. Meir will make an important statement concerning withdrawal. She is expected to do this and to be followed by representatives who wish to speak in support of the announced arrangement. The expectation is that the USA, UK, France and other European states will support them. Presumably the USA delegation will organize Latin American support. I shall be most surprised if there is any support from the Afro-Asians, although the Philippines and Thailand might be so persuaded. My expectation would be that the Arabs and their Asian and Soviet Bloc supporters will strongly oppose the manoeuvre. There has been no indication here that the USA had discussed it with the Egyptians. In the Assembly support by France would do much more harm than good.

7. We shall have to know more about the text of the Israeli announcement before deciding what support, if any, we can give it. The whole move seems doubtful to me and could well create a hopeless mess in the Assembly proceedings. Perhaps that would not be a bad result to the Israelis. Because we have so few details and because the USA delegation is without instructions it is difficult to suggest how we might meet this new situation. We can only hope that precise info comes from Washington soon. In this regard Lodge is apparently as worried as any of us.

8. At noon I spoke to the Secretary-General who is baffled and distressed. He believes that any move along the lines suggested will not only provoke a storm in the Assembly but greatly aggravate the whole situation in the Middle East. He said that Dulles sounded optimistic on the phone yesterday. In fact his optimism seemed to be in direct proportion to the pessimism which Dulles' revelation caused the Secretary-General.

9. Since beginning this message Mr. Heeney has phoned today he would be sending us, very confidentially, this afternoon details about Eban's proposed statement.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Hammarskjöld, Cordier and Bunche lunched with me again today and we discussed the situation. Hammarskjöld and his aides felt somewhat less pessimistic about the outcome of the Washington, Israel-France-USA initiative than they did earlier today though still doubtful of its success. We agreed that the best chance for such success would be tangible evidence of immediate Israeli withdrawal from Sharm-El-Sheikh and Gaza. This would create an improved atmosphere and perhaps permit some of the "assumptions" and "expectations" of the Israeli declaration to be realized. I suggested that for this purpose a telegram be sent to General Burns immediately Eban had finished speaking instructing him to see the Israeli military commander at once in order to make arrangements for complete and quick withdrawal of Israeli forces from the two areas and for a withdrawal of Israeli forces from the two areas [SIC] and for a UNEF takeover. This was agreed to by the Secretary General. Such a move would at least show whether the Israeli Government were going to withdraw at once without further formalities or were going to negotiate their withdrawal in the light of the debate here on their "assumptions".

2. Hammarskjöld's great worry is that immediately on Israeli withdrawal a few Egyptians at least, perhaps civilian administrators, would move into Gaza. What would he do then? would UNEF be expected to stop them?

3. I emphasized another difficulty. Suppose UNEF-contributing countries like India, Yugoslavia or Indonesia refused to allow their forces to assist in the realization of the Israeli "assumptions" and in the absence of any explicit Assembly decision to that effect, it is still too soon of course to predict what the result will be. The situation seems somewhat easier but I still think that we are heading for trouble, especially in regard to the future of UNEF.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

March 1 began with a state of confusion here. We and a few others had received advance texts of the proposed Israeli statement but the USA delegation had given us little indication about the attitude they would adopt in the afternoon's debate, after the Israeli announcement had been made. The Secretary-General and his immediate advisers were depressed by the turn of events. In particular he was in doubt whether he had sufficient authority, under the earlier Assembly resolutions to implement the "assumptions" and "expectations" which the Israeli statement would contain. We expected a violent Arab reaction to the manoeuvre and we knew that this could lead to the breakup of UNEF, because India, Indonesia and Yugoslavia, for example, might refuse to allow their contingents to be used for the "occupation" of the Gaza Strip and Sharm-El-Sheikh. We were also disturbed by the prospect that Israel might use the fact that its assumptions and expectations were not materializing, as a pretext for resuming hostilities. There were some suggestions here that the French might consider themselves free to go to the assistance of Israel in such circumstances.

2. These gloomy prospects were discussed in an Old Commonwealth meeting in the morning. Dixon and the Minister had received the text of the proposed statement by Mrs. Meir. Dixon said that he had received instructions to support the move, although the UK had reservations about it. The UK support was based on the "broader political advantages" (meaning in particular the opportunity for the Western Three to act together again) and on the opportunity not only to avoid the issue of sanctions but to make effective in the area some of the arrangements which we had been considering in recent weeks (the deployment of UNEF at Sharm-El-Sheikh and UN control of the administration in the Gaza Strip). Dixon's impression was that the Secretary-General was not as pessimistic as he had been earlier about the possibility of making these arrangements. Dixon agreed, however, that the attitude of India, Indonesia and Yugoslavia would be important to the success of the move.

3. The Commonwealth group discussed what they should do about the debate in the afternoon. It was difficult to reach any firm conclusions because we knew so little about USA intentions. Dixon said that the UK would probably not intervene in today's debate and the Minister took the same attitude. Spender and Munro, who seemed very sceptical about the proposed move, wondered whether an adjournment after the Israeli announcement might not be the best procedure. A related question was whether Israel intended to withdraw whether or not a debate took place. The meeting agreed that as matters stood the Commonwealth group would prefer an adjournment but that the views of the USA should be ascertained before any final decision in that regard. It was also agreed that a larger meeting including the Scandinavians and West Europeans should be organized.

4. This meeting took place later in the morning and was attended by the representatives of the Old Commonwealth, Ireland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, France, Belgium, Italy, Portugal and The Netherlands. Lodge was unable to be present. Picot led the discussion and explained the content and purpose of the Israeli announcement. He said that Israel wanted as much backing as possible, particularly from maritime powers; that no further decision by the Assembly would be required; that the necessary arrangements would be made in meetings between the Commander of UNEF and the Chief of Staff of the Israel defence forces. Noble expressed UK support for this proposed manoeuvre; he recognized, however, that there were practical difficulties. Spender and Munro pressed for adjournment, which might be moved after statements by Israel and the USA.

5. The Minister said he hoped that the move would work; that he had some doubts about its practicability; but that he would like to know more about it before deciding what attitude to adopt. He suggested that the proposed meeting of military leaders should take place as soon as possible after the Israeli announcement; this would be a firm indication that Israel intended to withdraw at once and in good faith. The Minister hoped that the governments participating in UNEF would not raise difficulties. He assumed that the necessary arrangements could be made under the Assembly Resolution II of February 2. Vitetti said he had received instructions to support the right of free and innocent passage in the Straits of Tiran and the Gulf of Aqaba. Schurmann of the Netherlands enquired whether Egypt had been consulted; the impression was that it had not. There was little enthusiasm and considerable scepticism among the West European officials, but particularly among the Scandinavians.

6. This meeting had followed the plenary meeting of the Assembly yesterday morning. Menon had been the principal speaker in that debate and had seemed to serve notice that India would not support any move which was inconsistent with the Assembly's demand for complete and unconditional withdrawal. He restated India's position as regards its participation in UNEF and as regards the presence and functioning of the force on Egyptian territory. He took issue with what he describes as the Canadian view that "the present crisis should be utilized to solve what is called the Middle Eastern problem". This was Menon's last intervention in the current session, since he departed for India in the afternoon.

7. In the afternoon debate Mrs. Meir made the expected announcement¹⁹⁴ and statements followed by the representatives of the USA, Spain, Argentina, Philippines, France, Costa Rica, El Salvador and Panama. This list of speakers had been "organized" by the USA delegation. Their method was to have some of the junior members of their delegation talk to various other delegations. We understand that Japan and Thailand declined to speak. We were approached too but the USA delegation readily agreed that our participation in UNEF made it desirable for us not to intervene too soon in the debate, at least until some Arab reaction was known. Before the debate Eban and Picot urged the Minister to speak.

8. You will have no doubt seen the text of the statements by Mrs. Meir and by Lodge. We hope to analyze them in a separate communication. They are by no means matching statements and the USA text is much less of an endorsement of the Israeli position than the subsequent statement by France. In particular Lodge emphasized his understanding that the Israeli withdrawal would be immediate and not "unconditional". It was the view of the USA that "from a juridical standpoint the future of the Gaza Strip must, as the Secretary-General said, be worked out within the framework of the Armistice Agreement". Concerning the situation along the Gulf of Aqaba Lodge repeated what he had said on January 28 and February 2 about the deployment of UNEF. Concerning any recurrence of hostilities "or any violation by either party of its international obligations, including those of the Armistice Agreement", Lodge said this would create "a situation for UN consideration", a statement which was no doubt meant to counteract Israel's assertion of its right of self-defence.

9. The other statements of welcome to the Israeli announcement require no comment. A brief intervention by Lall, after considerable Afro-Asian consultation on the floor of the Assembly, was significant. He emphasized that there had not been "any serious challenge to the Assembly's explicit view that the withdrawal of the invaders had to be and must be unconditional". The statements made in the debate yesterday would require serious study and the Indian delegation reserved its right to "express its views on them in the coming meeting of the Assembly on Monday and in the light of the implementation, the unconditional implementation which we hope to see by then of Resolution I of February 2/57". Instead of asking for an adjournment until Monday, Lall simply assumed that there would be no debate in the intervening weekend. A few minutes later Fawzi expressed his understanding that the Assembly was "unanimous in expecting full and honest implementation of its resolutions calling for immediate and unconditional withdrawal by Israel". This position remained "intact and entire" and nothing said by "anyone here or elsewhere could shake this fact or detract from its reality and validity nor could it affect the fullness and the lawfulness of Egypt's rights and those of the Arab people of the Gaza Strip".

10. There followed a brief statement by the Secretary-General, noting the plans of Israel for full and prompt withdrawal and its proposal that a meeting be held immediately between the military leaders. The Secretary-General then stated that he had instructed the Commander of UNEF "as a matter of the utmost urgency to arrange for a meeting with the Israel Commander-in-Chief tomorrow, Saturday, if at all possible, or if not, as soon as possible thereafter". Thereupon the President announced that the discussion would be resumed on Monday. After the Assembly meeting the Old Commonwealth and West European representatives met with Lodge. He expressed satisfaction with the way matters had developed in the Assembly. He believed that Israel should begin its withdrawal at once; that the necessary meetings between military leaders should not be delayed. The USA would urge Israel to take those steps and Lodge hoped that other governments would put similar pressure on Israel. If the "programme" was to develop it was essential that Israel should demonstrate its good faith and that other states should endorse the Israeli announcement. This endorsement, of course, would be much more effective if the Israelis had already begun to withdraw. Lodge, who had just spoken to Dulles, seemed relieved and confident.

11. Some of the other representatives present continued to express doubt. They would like to know more about Arab reaction. Boland pointed out that psychology was more important than legalism in this manoeuvre and that it was essential that Israel should begin its withdrawal over the weekend. He wondered whether it would not be possible to clarify some of the subsequent arrangements. When Lodge said it might be "dangerous" to have too much clarification, Boland replied that it was perhaps "even more dangerous to have an obscure situation which it is dangerous to clarify".

12. The Minister said that if the Israelis made moves over the weekend to begin their withdrawal, it would be easier to maintain a helpful momentum in the Assembly debate. Other speakers could then readily welcome the Israeli announcement. If no move were made before the resumption of the debate, the situation might be very difficult because the Israeli statement would be denounced as a sham promise of unconditional withdrawal and as a mere negotiating position. It was desirable therefore to get the process of withdrawal started, and to create the impression that UNEF was moving into the occupied areas. In this atmosphere the whole arrangement might have a better chance of success. It would be of equal importance to dissuade governments participating in UNEF not to disrupt the process of takeover by raising objections about the use of their national contingents.

13. Sandler of Sweden took a similar position which we found encouraging because earlier in the day he had expressed doubt whether Sweden would permit its contingent to be used as an "occupying force" without a further decision from the Assembly. He had grave doubts about the Dulles-Eban manoeuvre.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

As we reported by phone yesterday morning (March 4) we were informed by the Israel delegation that the order for the complete withdrawal from Sharm-El-Sheikh and the Gaza Strip had been issued by the Israel Government and that Mrs. Meir would be making a statement to this effect in the General Assembly when the debate was resumed in the afternoon. In view of the controversy and doubt which had appeared in the press here, we were somewhat puzzled by what appeared to be a sudden and decisive change in policy on the part of the Israel Government. You will recall that it was suggested that Lodge's statement in the Assembly on March 1 had fallen short of Israeli expectations and had not been in accordance with the understanding reached in Washington between Dulles and Eban. The [Israeli?] delegation on March 2 publicly took the position that Lodge's statement was inconsistent with the discussions which had been held in Washington.

2. Before the Minister left Ottawa on March 3 Comay phoned to say that Eban would be seeking from Dulles one final clarification which was required because of Lodge's remark that "from a juridical standpoint the future of the Gaza Strip must be worked out within the framework of the Armistice Agreement". This suggested that Egypt might be permitted to return to a position of control in the Gaza Strip and the Israel Government required assurance that this would not happen. Eban was to suggest to Dulles that if the Egyptians should regain control, this would amount to "a return to the conditions of deterioration which existed previously" (quotation from Mrs. Meir's statement in the Assembly on March 1), in which case "Israel would reserve its freedom to act to defend its rights". This could mean that in those circumstances the Israelis would march back into the Gaza Strip. The Minister wondered, therefore, whether the Israeli decision to withdraw was based on an assurance from Dulles to Eban that Egypt would not regain control of the Gaza Strip or that, if this should happen, Israel would be allowed freedom of action in the area.

3. On March 4 the Minister lunched with the Secretary General who said that he had received from Nasser an encouraging telegram inviting the Secretary General to come to Cairo to work out the details of the withdrawal and to discuss other matters, including the Canal question. The Secretary General was worried because of doubt in his mind whether he could implement the Dulles-Eban understanding without further action by the Assembly. The Secretary General said that he would have to report to the Assembly in some way about compliance with the various resolutions on withdrawal. It might be desirable too to report on the related arrangements which would follow immediately upon withdrawal. As a matter of tactics the Minister and the Secretary General agreed that the Minister should, in his statement in the Assembly in the afternoon, raise the question of a further report to which the Secretary General would reply.

4. Before the debate was resumed the Minister had a brief conversation with Eban at his request. Eban reaffirmed that the Israel Government had decided to withdraw completely and that Mrs. Meir would make a brief statement to this effect. In reply to a direct question by the Minister, Eban said that he had received no further assurance from Dulles concerning the return of Egypt to the Gaza Strip. He implied that, although the decision to withdraw had created difficulty for Ben-Gurion, the Israel Government had decided to do so with confidence that Israel's friends, particularly the USA, would see to it that there would be no return to the unsatisfactory conditions which existed before October 29. Eban hoped that there would be in the afternoon debate a series of speeches supporting Israel's position but that after this debate the Assembly should forego further discussion of the subject and let matters work themselves out. Eban argued that there was no need for further Assembly action. Comay spoke to the Minister in the same sense later in the day. It seemed clear that the Israelis wished to minimize the role of the Assembly in any implementation of the Dulles-Eban understanding.

5. You will have seen an account of the debate in the press. The representatives of Israel, UK, Ceylon, Italy, Netherlands, Colombia, NZ, Iraq, Australia, Japan, Belgium, Canada, USSR, Peru, Norway, India, Sweden, Portugal, Denmark, Brazil and Egypt intervened. The relevant document A/PV.667 of March 4 has been mailed to you. Following are the highlights of the debate:

(a) Mrs. Meir stated that Burns and Dayan had met "to discuss measures necessary to carry out the withdrawal from both areas in accordance with the statement made by me on Friday last" and that "they have come to full agreement as to the technical details of the withdrawal and takeover."

(b) Jamali made a relatively mild statement denying that any conditions could be attached to the withdrawal and in particular that the Gaza Strip could be internationalized.

(c) The Minister expressed the Canadian view that the ideas which had been suggested in previous resolutions and reports should immediately on withdrawal be converted into concrete arrangements and "that the Secretary General should take steps to that end with our full support and if he later requires it with our endorsement". The Minister also suggested that the Secretary General could "report to us on the completion of the withdrawal of Israel forces and on related matters".¹⁹⁵ Subsequently the Secretary General noted these suggestions and said it was his intention "to inform the General Assembly about relevant developments and of course especially of the withdrawal".

(d) Sobolev made a half-hearted attack, directed principally against the USA, on the "circumvention of the UN". As in earlier statements he attempted to discredit UNEF.

(e) The maritime states, particularly the UK, Netherlands and Norway, argued that the Straits of Tiran constituted an international waterway and that none of the bordering states should undertake measures which would hamper freedom of innocent passage. This caused Lall to restate and amplify arguments which Menon had raised on March 1 concerning the Gulf of Aqaba and the Straits. He also restated India's attitude as a participant in UNEF.

(f) Fawzi insisted that the withdrawal should be unconditional and urged that UNEF should take all the necessary measures to "foreclose a recurrence in the Gaza and Aqaba areas" of Israeli "atrocities and destruction". His intervention was calm and encouraging.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

Before the Minister left New York this morning (March 5) the Secretary General asked to see him. Cordier and I were present and we were later joined by Engen. The Secretary General had explained on the phone to the Minister that there was some doubt in his mind as to how he should proceed to implement the Dulles-Eban understanding. It was our first impression that the Secretary General considered that he did not have sufficient authority under existing Assembly resolutions to make some of the arrangements which were to follow immediately upon withdrawal, in particular arrangements for associating the UN with the administration of the Gaza Strip.

2. It turned out, however, that the Secretary General's main concern was about the tactics he should follow in negotiating with Egypt for the implementation of the various arrangements. The Secretary General expects to discuss these matters with Nasser next week. In ¹⁹⁵ Un extrait de la déclaration de Pearson se trouve dans La crise du Moyen-Orient, janvier-mars 1957, pp. 34-35.

An extract from Pearson's statement may be found in The Crisis in the Middle East, January-March, 1957, pp. 33-34.

the Secretary General's view, which the Minister shared, Nasser would almost certainly raise two points.

(a) He would insist that Egypt could not forego its rights in the Gaza Strip under the Armistice Agreement. If Egypt should in any way abandon these rights it would be giving away for nothing in return a bargaining advantage in the subsequent negotiation of a peace settlement. Egypt probably expects that in the eventual settlement the Gaza Strip would go to Israel, but obviously Egypt would receive something in return. If Egypt should now surrender its juridical rights in the area, the Israelis would deny any subsequent claim which Egypt might advance. It is the Secretary General's impression, however, that Egypt will be glad to have the UN assume the main responsibility, particularly the financial burden, of administering the Gaza Strip.

(b) Nasser will press for deployment of UNEF on both sides of the demarcation line. He has already expressed strong views on this subject. Moreover, it would be in the interests of UNEF and the UN, and indeed of stability in the area, for UNEF to be deployed astride the demarcation line. The Israelis, of course, have no wish to discuss this possibility because they want to keep UNEF out of Israeli territory and because they do not care whether UNEF continues in existence.

3. The Secretary General argued that it was essential to make clear the UN position on these two matters before he began his discussions in Cairo. Otherwise world public opinion, and particular some sections of the press, would hold that the UN had "again bowed to the wishes of Nasser". The Secretary General said that last November he had been obliged to begin his discussions with Nasser without clarifying the UN position in advance but that the situation today, being neither as urgent nor as dangerous, made it necessary and desirable to avoid as far as possible unfounded charges about the UN attitude.

4. The UN position could be established in one or two ways.

(a) The Assembly could adopt a resolution along the lines of the Canadian draft, suitably modified to meet existing circumstances. The Canadian text was perfectly clear on both the points of controversy. It called for the deployment of UNEF on both sides of the demarcation line, and it left no doubt that Egypt's rights under the Armistice Agreement would remain intact. In the present atmosphere, however, it might be most difficult to have such a resolution adopted by the Assembly.

(b) The Secretary General could produce [a] report on withdrawal and on related matters. With his usual subtlety he could make abundantly clear the view that UNEF should be deployed on both sides of the line and that Egypt's rights in the Gaza Strip would be unimpaired by any arrangements which might be made for the UN to share in the administration of the Gaza Strip. It would probably be desirable for the Assembly to take note of this report with approval. If Israel's withdrawal was substantially complete by the time the report was introduced, the possibility was increased that the Assembly would approve the whole report with satisfaction. It would be necessary, however, to lay the ground work for this Assembly action through careful consultation with the most interested delegations.

5. The Secretary General and the Minister agreed that (b) was the preferable course. The Secretary General said that, in drafting his report, he would make use of the Canadian draft resolution and the Minister's statement of February 26. The Secretary General proposed to proceed as follows: after seeing us he would have separate discussions with Engen, Urrutia of Colombia, Lodge, Dixon, Lall, Fawzi, Eban. He would draft his report tomorrow and try to have it endorsed by the Advisory Committee on March 7. On March 8, probably in the afternoon, he would submit the report to the General Assembly for approval. He will travel to Cairo on the weekend. The Secretary General urged strongly, and the Minister agreed, that the report, before being submitted to the Assembly, should have the approval of the Advisory Committee.

6. We were somewhat surprised to learn that Israel's withdrawal, including civil administration, from the Gaza Strip would be completed by 9:00 am (New York Time) on March 7 and from Sharm-El-Sheikh by 9:00 am on March 8. The Secretary General read this info to us from a report by Burns on his meeting with Dayan. The Secretary General pointed out that this sudden withdrawal would create complex problems for the UN but he was confident that UNEF, in the first instance and later with UN civilians, could assume effective control of the Gaza Strip. In a very short time there would be about three thousand UN personnel in the area. (At this point the Secretary General remarked on the need for additional armoured cars and the Minister assured him that the Canadian reconnaissance squadron would soon be on the scene.) The Secretary General expected that in the not too distant future the Egyptians would try to move a token administrative element into the Gaza Strip. We ascertained that UNEF would be in position in the area before the withdrawal of Israeli troops was completed. The Indian battalion will be among the UNEF troops in Gaza and a company of Finns will move into Sharm-El-Sheikh.

7. The Minister and the Secretary General speculated on why the Israelis had made their decision to withdraw. Obviously it created difficulty for Ben Gurion. The Minister suggested, and the Secretary General agreed, that the following considerations had a great deal to do with that decision:

(a) In the process of moving from "guarantees demanded" through "assurances requested" to "assumptions and expectations", the Israelis had attracted substantial support in the Assembly for the view that there should be no return to the deplorable conditions which existed before October 29. Most important Israel had obtained assurances from the USA, whose continued support was essential to the existence of Israel. The attention which was now focussed on Israel's difficulties with its Arab neighbours would serve to ensure that in future violence and threats against Israel would win it swift and sympathetic support.

(b) Israel had gained significant support from the maritime powers for its contention that there should be no interference with peaceful existence in the Gulf of Aqaba and the Straits of Tiran.

(c) Israel had reasonable assurance the UN would exercise the effective control in the Gaza Strip and that the threat of raids and incursions from this area would be greatly decreased.

(d) Israel had managed to avoid, for the time being, the deployment of UNEF on Israel's territory. The Israelis had always resisted strongly efforts to increase UN influence in the area. The Dulles-Eban understanding had made it unnecessary for the Assembly to make precise its recommendation for the deployment of UNEF along the demarcation line.

In addition, the Secretary General could not shake off the suspicion that Israel had received some secret assurance from the USA, notwithstanding Eban's point-blank denial.

8. The Secretary General said that the attitude of the USA would be most important to the success of the tactics which he had suggested for the next few days. He suggested that Lodge might not be too difficult to persuade but that the attitude in Washington would be to let well enough alone. The Secretary General hoped that the absence of Dulles would not complicate matters.

9. Concerning his trip to Cairo, the Secretary General proposed that he should take Engen with him for added support. Engen was persona grata with both Israel and Egypt and could act as a sort of agent of the Advisory Committee. The Minister agreed that it would be useful for Engen to accompany the Secretary General and suggested that there might be some pressure to have an Indian included as well. The Secretary General and Cordier believed that they could resist such pressure.

UNITED NATIONS; MIDDLE EAST SITUATION
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE FEB. 19)

44. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on recent developments in the United Nations in regard to the Middle East situation. The Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and the Gulf of Aqaba area had been brought about by heavy diplomatic pressure, but without a discussion on a sanctions resolution in the General Assembly. Israel had changed its attitude quite suddenly without obtaining the assurances it had so persistently sought on Gaza and the Gulf of Aqaba because it felt it had achieved certain objectives.

Firstly, the U.S. was now morally committed to freedom of navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba, which was important in relation to a large oil pipe line which would probably be built across Israel to the Mediterranean. Secondly, the Israeli authorities thought that once the U.N. occupied the Gaza Strip, Egypt would never return. Finally, withdrawal at this stage, without further assembly action, meant that U.N.E.F. would have no status on the Israeli side of the border with Egypt. When the Israeli forces retired from the Gaza Strip they also took with them all the Israeli civilian officials, who had moved in last November, and thus dismantled the civil administration. This would now become the responsibility of the U.N.E.F.

While the withdrawal was undoubtedly satisfactory, the manner in which it had occurred left certain difficulties to be faced. The U.S. was most anxious to have no further discussion of the dispute in the U.N. at this stage and had told the Secretary-General he should administer Gaza and deploy the U.N.E.F. along the Israel-Egyptian boundaries. Mr. Hammarskjöld felt he could not do this without the endorsement of the U.N., which could be sought either by a resolution or by the assembly noting a report he proposed to make which would include references to these two important matters. He would probably adopt the second alternative. If the report were approved, the U.N. would then accept responsibility for administering the Gaza Strip. He had informed the Israelis they would lose a good deal of sympathy among their friends if they did not allow the U.N.E.F. to take up positions on the Israeli side of the border.

The other important question to be settled was the Suez Canal. Egypt had refused to allow the complete clearance of the canal until Israeli forces were off Egyptian territory. Now it could be assumed that the one remaining scuttled boat would be removed and the canal opened. However, no arrangements had been made for its operation. The U.K., France, the U.S., and Norway, who were the main users, had decided amongst themselves to pay Egypt a share of dues for operating expenses of the canal, and had referred the question of settlement to the U.N. Secretary-General. However, if Egypt refused to discuss the problem in the U.N., the only way it could be settled was through negotiations between Egypt and the other nations involved. If Egypt barred free passage then the question of sanctions against her might be considered.

Nasser had agreed to allow the U.N.E.F. on Egyptian soil and, so long as the functions for which the force had been established remained undischarged, the only way, technically, he could have the force removed was through action by the General Assembly. In fact, Nasser could force U.N.E.F. not to operate by withdrawing the rights and immunities he had accorded to its members and by refusing to co-operate any longer. Nasser was steadily losing support in Egypt and it was unfortunate that people here and elsewhere attacked him because this only strengthened an otherwise tenuous position.

ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL

This telegram is intended to round off our reporting on the Assembly's consideration of this subject.

2. After the Advisory Committee's meeting on March 7 there were conflicting opinions here whether there should be any statements in support of the Secretary General's report (A/3568 transmitted to you in our telegram 791 March 8†). The USA delegation was strongly in favour of making a statement and they hoped that others, including the Canadian delegation, would follow suit. The USA intention was to give support to the Secretary General and to impress upon the Assembly that, the withdrawal having been completed, the Assembly should turn its attention to the implementation of the second resolution of February 2. The USA delegation wished to offset Mrs. Meir's assertion on March 4 that Dayan had met with Burns "to discuss measures necessary to carry out the withdrawal from both areas in accordance with the statement made by me on Friday last". USA officials were particularly anxious that the Assembly should not lose sight of the provisions of the second resolution of February 2 calling for the scrupulous maintenance of the Armistice Agreement and for the placing of UNEF "on the Egyptian-Israel armistice demarcation line" (which had previously been interpreted as meaning on both sides of the line).

3. The UK delegation promoted the idea that statements were unnecessary and might upset the delicately-balanced arrangements for the withdrawal. They argued that the Secretary General was anxious to avoid a debate. They tried to persuade Urrutia and others to head off prospective speakers. Late on March 7 they expressed the hope to us that the USA could be dissuaded from speaking, although we had a clear indication that Lodge would make a statement.

4. On that evening we were in close touch with Cordier, who confirmed that the Secretary General would welcome statements in support of his report. Cordier emphasized that the report would be non controversial and the Secretary General hoped that the statements would be of the same kind.

5. On the morning of March 8 the speculation continued whether there should be a debate in the afternoon. The Secretariat had arranged for the Assembly agenda to include the admission of Ghana, the MidEast item, and the procedural arrangements for adjourning the session, to be considered in that order. The Secretary General's report had been circulated in the morning. By noon, however, it had become evident that there would be statements in support of the Secretary General's report. During the morning the Minister had instructed us to make a brief statement.¹⁹⁶ (The advance text was transmitted to you in our telegram 800 March 8†).

6. The debate opened with a short statement from the Secretary General emphasizing that since UNRWA would be assuming extended responsibilities in the Gaza Strip its financial problems, already grave and urgent, would be increased. He urged that outstanding pledges be paid immediately and that pledges and payments be increased to the full extent of capacity of member governments. Lodge followed with a statement which supported the Secretary General's report and which called attention to the provisions of the second resolution of February 2. He made a pointed reference to the deployment of UNEF on the armistice line. Statements followed by the representatives of Burma, Iraq, Iceland, Nepal, Sudan, Denmark, Indonesia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Jordan, Yugoslavia, Israel and Egypt.

EGYPTIAN ATTITUDE ON CANADIAN REINFORCEMENTS FOR UNEF

1. A major parliamentary storm has blown up here over press reports that Egypt is withholding permission for the landing of Canadian reinforcements for UNEF. On the basis of your telegram 204 the Prime Minister stated in the House this afternoon that the government's latest info was that a technical misunderstanding had arisen but that it had been cleared up. He added that in view of conflicting reports which were still being investigated, the government did not repeat not wish to comment in any detail today. It has been arranged that I shall make a full statement on this and other pressing Middle East problems tomorrow March 13 in the House.

2. As our info from the delegation in New York indicates that there is substance in these reports, I would be glad if you would take the earliest opportunity to see Fawzi who, I understand, will be arriving in Cairo tomorrow. If Fawzi is not repeat not available you might try Aly Sabry. You should express frankly to him the depth of our concern about the Egyptian attitude toward Canadian reinforcements. You might remind him that from the outset of the Suez Canal dispute and throughout the crisis which followed the Israeli invasion, the Canadian Government has gone out of its way, both in public statements and in diplomatic exchange, to express its recognition of Egypt's sovereign rights. (You could draw on excerpts given in our telegram ME87).¹⁹⁷ We freely recognized that the presence and functioning of UNEF in Egypt was feasible only in the context of Egypt's agreement to accept limitations on its sovereignty, as it did in its acceptance of the General Assembly resolution of November 5. On the other hand, there is a clear distinction between the consent which was required before the force as a whole was permitted to enter Egypt, and the quite separate position regarding individual national components of the force or reinforcements for national components. It has been the Canadian Government's understanding that Egypt accepted this distinction and that whatever may have been the practical difficulties ¹⁹⁷ Le télégramme ME87 reproduit les échanges qui ont eu lieu les 6 et 7 mars 1957 entre Saint-Laurent, Pearson et des membres de l'opposition au sujet de la marche à suivre si l'Égypte demandait le retrait de la FUNU. involved in the case of the Queen's Own Rifles, the Egyptian Government had never claimed in principle the right to determine the composition of the force or the make-up of national contingents. Certainly the Canadian Government has never accepted and could not repeat not now yield to, any contention on the part of Egypt that its prior approval was required to the admission of Canadian reinforcements. (We would maintain the same position, of course, in respect of Israel or any other host country on whose territory UNEF might come to be stationed.) The UN alone must be responsible for the composition of UNEF; there could be no repeat no restriction on the right of the Secretary-General to exercise the ultimate responsibility of the UN in this regard.

3. So far as the Canadian reconnaissance squadron is concerned, you should emphasize to Fawzi that these troops are being added to UNEF in response to the specific request of General Burns, conveyed to us through the UN. In asking for them, General Burns expressed the view that these troops would be more than ever necessary in the new tasks assumed by UNEF following the Israeli withdrawal. In other words, these troops are intended to meet essential requirements for the effective operation of the force. From the point of view of the Canadian Government it has been a matter of considerable practical difficulty to provide these additional elements. We decided to comply with the UN's request because we were convinced that the addition of these troops might facilitate UNEF's performance of its stabilizing role in the Middle East. You should say quite frankly that the current reported Egyptian objections to the entry of Canadian reinforcements, if these objections determined the Secretary-General's attitude, would create a situation in which it might be impossible for the Canadian Government to leave the remainder of its troops in the force. You should leave Fawzi in no repeat no doubt of the grave responsibility which the Egyptian Government would be taking upon itself if by maintaining its objections in this matter a situation were created which would force us to act in the above manner.

4. While you should not repeat not delay in carrying out these instructions if Bunche is not repeat not available for consultation I should prefer it if you could speak to him before you see Fawzi or Aly Sabry. I understand that Bunche, in addition to his instructions to see the Egyptian Government about the particular case of Canadian reinforcements, is also engaged in the important task of trying to persuade the Egyptians not repeat not to precipitate an explosion by establishing their administrative governor and his staff too quickly in the Gaza Strip. I gather that the hope is that Bunche will be successful in persuading Fawzi, and more important Nasser himself, that while Egypt's legal rights in the strip are not repeat not in any way questioned, the situation in Gaza requires the greatest caution in implementing the Egyptian Government's decision, and that for this reason the actual introduction of the Egyptian administration should be slowed down. I would not repeat not, of course, wish to prejudice these important negotiations, but I hope the Egyptian leaders can be brought to understand that unless they can refrain from trying to interfere with these Canadian reinforcements, which will be the last contingent from Canada, we may be faced with the necessity of withdrawing our whole contribution, something which we would greatly regret for obvious reasons. The effect which such a step would have on the future of UNEF and on General Burns' own position is, I think, not difficult to imagine. Surely the Egyptians are conscious of the risk which would confront them if UNEF were pulled out, leaving them face to face with the Israelis in Gaza.

5. I leave it to you how best to put these points to Fawzi, and if the situation develops in such a way that you do not repeat not think it necessary to intervene, please seek further instructions. I greatly regret that a particular Canadian problem has flared up at this time, but I know you will realize that its solution or otherwise may well have a bearing on the role that UNEF can continue to play in the future.

6. Since this telegram was drafted, the Opposition have asked for the postponement of my statement until Friday, so that their leader [J.G. Diefenbaker] can be there to participate in the debate.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR CANADIAN CONTINGENT TO UNEF

I have just seen Bunche who had just come from long interview with Nasser. Bunche tackled him at once on question of Canadian reinforcements and asked why were Egyptian Government making difficulties. In brief Nasser said he had noted remarks made by our Prime Minister in the House which he interpreted as implying that in our government's view they were the sole judge of how long the Canadian (or UNEF) contingent should remain in Egypt. He went on to say to Bunche that he was aware that questions directed to Prime Minister were designed to embarrass him for obvious political reasons. Nevertheless some of the answers given were politically embarrassing to him in Egypt. UNEF had become a political issue in Canada and would likewise be a political issue in Egypt, and accordingly his government would take the view that there is no need for further reinforcements for Canadian contingent.

2. Bunche pointed out to him that

(a) entry to Egypt of Canadian armoured reconnaissance unit had been agreed to by Egyptian Government some time ago and Colonel Gohar had confirmed it to him (Bunche) yesterday. Bunche told me that Nasser seemed to be unaware that agreement had been given;

(b) contemplated action by Egypt would embarrass our Prime Minister who, as Head of our Government, was loyally discharging Canada's responsibility to UN which in turn was assisting Egypt. Hence contemplated action seemed against Egypt's best interests.

(c) even if President's purpose was to embarrass our Prime Minister the real damage would be done to Secretary-General and UN.

3. Nasser agreed with all arguments and said that he had been faced with strong feeling within his own Cabinet on this subject and had agreed to go along with their view. He now assured Bunche that he would do everything he could to persuade his colleagues, in the light of Bunche's arguments, to agree to onward movement of Canadian troops presently in Naples. He only asked Bunche to give him about two days grace and promised him that matters would then be cleared up. Nasser went on to pay tribute to quality and behaviour of Canadian contingent in Egypt, saying that they were in every way model soldiers. (I wish the President would some time make this statement to his own press; my comment E.H.N.).

4. Bunche was most anxious that any statement that I might make to the press should not attribute following remarks to him, nor should any reference be made to his talk with Nasser. He agreed upon following statement I might make in answer to press queries which I have been staving off for the last two days: Begins:

I am aware of rumours of difficulties concerning arrival in Egypt of remainder of Canadian contingent for UNEF. Responsible UN officials have assured me that there is no basis for concern on this point. Ends.

CONVERSATION WITH NASSER

I saw Nasser last night as briefly reported in my telegram 216 March 14; I made it clear that I was not visiting him on your instructions but that I had very much on my mind recently the increasingly hostile tone of Egyptian press and what appeared to me serious misunderstanding even on government level of important statements made by the Prime Minister and yourself. I fear I went on at greater length than I had intended in setting forth Canadian policy and traditional outlook on foreign affairs especially towards countries who had recently gained their independence. I reviewed our UN role in the MidEast, pointing out how fantastic were press charges which attributed "imperialist" motives to Canada, and finally stressed the damage that can be done by unscrupulous press attacks on the Canadian contingent in UNEF. I only touched marginally on question of Canadian reinforcements as I did not wish to directly introduce the subject myself.

2. After listening intently to me and asking for clarification on one or two points, he frankly admitted that he had been adopting an increasingly critical attitude to Canada. He had great hopes from our position last November and succeeding weeks, but said he had noticed an increasingly pro-Israel tone in your most recent interventions in UN. He had been deeply disturbed by remarks in the House by the Prime Minister on March 6 referring to the use of "force" in connection with Canal clearance and the presence of UN in Gaza and Aqaba. Egypt, he said, had lived in an atmosphere of threats for the last few months and people here were becoming more and more sensitive to threats. They were still living under threats from England, France and Israel (whom he linked with these two powers); Australia had openly showed its hostile intentions, the USA was showing a cold attitude and its press was generally pro-Israel, and now Canada, he said, had appeared to join the chorus against Egypt. Naturally this would have repercussions in their view of the Canadian contingent in UNEF. Then working late at night in his office on the 10th he had heard that Canadian troops had fired on demonstrators in Gaza that afternoon. He asked for a thorough investigation from competent quarters, but he had no convincing account of events until Dr. Bunche informed him (March 12) that it was Danish troops who had been involved. All these events, however incorrect some of them might prove now, had contributed to his growing fear of Canadian intentions; that Canada in some vague and ill-defined but alarming fashion had now joined forces with those powers which were most hostile to Egypt.

3. Since I had gone over your intervention and four-point proposal in the UN in great detail with Aly Sabry, I told the President that I did not wish to take up his time again on this subject unless he had specific points to raise. I summarized our position in trying to find a fair compromise between two embattled and embittered parties and, as is so often the role of the peacemaker, being criticized unfairly by both. I concentrated especially on his distorted interpretation of the Prime Minister's remarks of March 6. (We had sent copies to competent officers in the Foreign Ministry of the expanded form of the remarks to give their full context which would include their clarification. Apparently these had not filtered through to the President. I had also spoken to a few leading Egyptian journalists on the matter but without any effect as far as press comment was concerned.) I had with me text of exchanges in the House between the Prime Minister and members of Opposition on March 6 and 7 relating to Egypt, which I left with him, first reading out to him Prime Minister's relevant remarks on "use of force", clearance of Suez, etc placing them in their proper perspective and knowing how entirely distorted had been their interpretation. He admitted that there had been misunderstanding on his part, but then more in sorrow than in anger complained of hostile tone of press abroad including Canada. Everything he did was reported as "provocative", "abrupt", etc. When he sent an administrative governor back to Gaza, which he was fully entitled to do according to the (group corrupt) Egypt, and which he would have done in any case regardless of the incident of (group corrupt), the Western press accused him of "aggressive" designs. The same papers had not used such epithets in referring to Israel's attack of October 29. Ben Gurion had recently made an open threat of force of relation to Gaza. Yet, to his knowledge, no important Western paper had rebuked him for it. What would their comments have been if he had threatened force against Israel on the occasion of their making some arrangement behind their own borders? Could any fair-minded person be asked to believe that the press of the West was impartial in viewing the Israeli-Arab problem?

4. I interposed a question on his intentions in Gaza, expressing the hope that Fedayeen raids would not be renewed as it hardly seemed in the long run to serve Egyptian defence interest. He went over some familiar ground insisting that authorized raids were purely retaliatory and only commenced in early '55 when a new Ben Gurion allegedly aggressive policy became apparent. He said he had no intention of organizing future Fedayeen raids but the occasional marauder that broke through both lines would be always used by Israel as an excuse for attacks upon Arab neighbours. (It appears to be true that for at least three months before the attack of October 29 there had been no Fedayeen raids from Egypt. The only incident was one in which an Israeli truck was blown up by a land mine in a demilitarized zone, therefore an area unauthorized to the Israeli military.)

5. He then brought up the question of reinforcements for Canadian troops and fully admitted that he had doubts even fears of Canadian intentions following Prime Minister's references to "use of force". I gather that Egyptian Embassy in Ottawa does not keep him too well informed by telegram of important debates. Replying to my query he said that all important references in our debates he had studied through the various news agencies reports.

6. À propos of his complaints concerning the foreign press I spoke with some sympathy saying that we had likewise been the target of very malicious press campaign. I showed him copy I had with me of Egyptian press summary prepared in the office, giving recent (March 12) press comments on Canada and Canadian contingent. I pointed out the editorial in Al Gomkouriya, which made wild attacks on alleged Canadian "impertylist" designs, constructed on the hypothesis that our troops had taken over Gaza presumably as a first step towards "internationalizing" it, and had been responsible for the shooting. I said that while I was aware that he could not be held responsible for everything that appeared in the press, nevertheless he must agree that such wild and irresponsible remarks, which it was my duty to report to Ottawa, could not be expected to help in a sympathetic attitude on the part of Canadians towards Egypt. I said what was even more important, our troops here must be increasingly annoyed by this campaign and hence it could have an unfavourable effect on their morale. He agreed whole-heartedly with these last remarks.

7. I then thought it proper to ask whether he would not agree some time to giving a statement which would help to correct some of these impressions and whether he would confirm publicly the excellent performance of our troops here. I mentioned Brayley, the Canadian press representative here, who has been vainly trying through the press office to get an interview with him, saying that such an interview might help in clearing away some of the obstacles in recent misunderstandings in Egyptian-Canadian relations. He agreed to such an interview within the next few days. He added that he had some knowledge of the Canadian record in foreign affairs and he had believed that our policy was devoted to peace and friendly relations with all who wished to reciprocate. He was glad that some false impressions had been removed and hoped that friendly relations would exist between us as between two free and equal states with no designs on each other.

8. He mentioned again the reinforcements from Canada saying that he had assured Dr. Bunche that the matter would be cleared up and told me to pass this on to you.

9. Before leaving he expressed the wish that I might perhaps see him more often if I so wished, particularly if it would help in clearing up possible understanding.[SIC]

10. Finally I congratulated him on (group corrupt) recent announcement that there would be general elections (date and details to be announced later). While we would not interfere in the internal affairs of any country it could not but be a source of satisfaction since we were a democratic people, to see Egypt taking a step in this direction since it would certainly help in closer understanding between us both.

CONVERSATION WITH NASSER: SUPPLEMENT

I omitted to mention two points in my telegram 218 March 15 about my interview with the President. I left Nasser with no illusion about the attitude of the Canadian Parliament and people about any apparent discrimination or slight towards the Canadian troops in UNEF. Since assurances had already been received from Bunche I did not follow precisely the instructions in your telegram ME96 March 12 which were designed to ensure that no further difficulties would be raised concerning the entry of Canadian troops but I did state that if this kind of problem occurred again it was my opinion that the whole question of Canadian participation in UNEF would have to be reconsidered in Canada. Nasser made no comment.

2. The President did state that in his view the press campaign which had been launched against UNEF following on the Gaza incidents had started to get out of hand. He said that he himself had directed Hatem to issue a press statement which would cast UNEF in a favourable light. This release had appeared earlier in the day and had stated that "full cooperation characterized the relations between the Egyptian authorities and UNEF". It also said that the people of Gaza considered UNEF as friendly and that they were cooperating with the Force.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

March 16

The Minister arrived shortly before noon and went immediately to UN Headquarters to attend a meeting of the Advisory Committee on UNEF. This meeting was the most important in a series which preceded the Secretary-General's departure for Cairo on March 19. The Committee discussed in particular the role of UNEF in the Gaza Strip, both along the demarcation line and as regards internal security within the Strip. The Minister gave a full explanation of Canada's position which was supported more or less by the majority of the Advisory Committee. The Indian position, as explained by Mr. Lall, was to a considerable extent opposing. During the meeting the Secretary-General received a message from Bunche informing him that the difficulty concerning Canadian reinforcements had been removed and that orders had been issued for their onward journey from Naples to Egypt. The advance copy of the Verbatim Record of this meeting was taken to Ottawa by the Minister.

Immediately after the meeting the Minister had lunch with the Secretary-General and Cordier. The Secretary-General discussed in greater detail the problems he expected to face in Cairo. He would be discussing not only the Gaza situation but also interim arrangements for the Canal and an overall Suez settlement. He assured the Minister that there was every likelihood that arrangements could be made between the UN and Egypt for repaying the interim advances, which Canada and other countries had made to assist in financing Canal-clearing operations of the UN. The Secretary-General also referred to interviews which he had during the previous week with representatives of France, UK and US. During these interviews the Secretary-General had tried to ascertain the reaction of those countries to the stand which Israel had taken publicly concerning the return of the Egyptian civil administration to the Gaza Strip. The Secretary-General had addressed seven questions to those representatives. The UK and USA had each given an answer which contained not direct replies to the questions but a more general statement of policy. The UK reply was very close to the position which the Minister had expressed in the Advisory Committee on the subject of internal security in the Gaza Strip (Ourtel 864 of Mar. 18†).

As soon as the Minister arrived at UN Headquarters, just before noon, Kidron enquired whether the Minister would see Eban in the afternoon and Mrs. Meir on the following morning (March 17). The Minister agreed to see Eban and this interview took place at five o'clock. Kidron was also present. The following points were made:

(a) Eban referred to the "demonstrative assertion" by Egypt of its rights in the Gaza Strip. The picture was one of "complete take-over" with UNEF being pushed into the background. This was contrary to the "assumptions and expectations" with which Israel had withdrawn. Eban had seen Herter on March 14 who expressed the hope that it was still possible that Egypt would accept a "formal position" in the Strip by maintaining its administrative governor and a small staff. Eban suggested that this was wishful thinking.

(b) The people of Israel were in an excitable mood and the atmosphere in the area was tense. The developments in Gaza were the opposite of what Israel had hoped would happen and the Israelis believed they had considerable support among Assembly members for their position. Dulles had cautioned Mrs. Meir that a token return by Egypt must be expected but what was happening was a triumphant return of Nasser to Gaza as a victor. In addition, there were renewed threats to blockade the Straits of Tiran and the Suez Canal. The Egyptians were evading the issue of belligerency. Eban characterized all this as "an important and sombre development".

(c) The UN had played its role badly. The Secretary-General had spoken about the confidence which he had that Egypt would cooperate as regards the UN assistance in the administration of the Gaza Strip. However, Bunche had begun his talks in Cairo with "an attitude of subservience". The Egyptians were having their own way as regards the deployment and functions of UNEF. UNEF could only be effective if participating governments and others showed determination in the face of Egyptian arrogance.

(d) The Minister pointed out that for Egypt symbolism in the Gaza Strip was not unimportant. There was no denying Egypt's legitimate rights under the Armistice Agreement. It did appear that Egypt's return to the Strip was precipitate but there were undoubtedly strong political pressures on Nasser. The Minister reminded Eban that Bunche had denied the tendentious press interpretation of Bunche's remarks in Cairo. The Minister described in some detail the morning's discussion in the Advisory Committee and particularly the attitude which Canada and others had taken as regards UNEF's role in the Gaza Strip. The Minister pointed out that much of the difficulty resulted from the fact that the Assembly had not prescribed what the role of the UN and UNEF should be. There was a tendency in some quarters to let the UN be the scapegoat.

(e) The Minister urged strongly that Israel should exercise restraint and moderation and should not react too strongly merely because Egypt had established a pro-forma control in the Gaza Strip. The Secretary-General, supported by a number of influential governments, would work to keep effective control, especially in the field of internal security, in the hands of the UN. If Egypt would agree to let this happen, the situation along the Gaza Strip could be stabilized. If Egypt should raise difficulties, however, there might be serious trouble. Conceivably the question might be referred back to the Assembly. However, Israel should not put too much blame on the UN for the way in which the situation had developed. The understanding which Eban and Dulles had reached in Washington was a step taken outside the UN. It was now up to the Israelis to seek clarification and satisfaction in Washington. Eban agreed and said that this was what Mrs. Meir intended to do in her talk with Dulles on March 17.

(f) Eban said that the USA, including President Eisenhower, was more optimistic than the Secretary-General. The Minister suggested that the USA should put pressure on Egypt to cooperate with the Secretary-General. Eban then spoke about the problems of Suez and Aqaba. These, he said, should not be isolated from the Gaza situation. Israel insisted that there could be no assertion or exercise of belligerent rights in these waters. The Israel Government hoped after the withdrawal that the "present vigilance of the Assembly" would be used "to get that basic idea endorsed". The Minister pointed out that the Assembly was not unanimous on the question of belligerency. This resulted to some extent from the fact that Israel had taken armed action last autumn. It would be important in any future Assembly consideration of the problems of the area that Egypt and not Israel should be on the defensive. In this regard there would have to be "evidence or action of a belligerent nature by Egypt". Israel should bear this in mind when considering its reaction to developments in the Gaza Strip.

After this conversation with Eban the Minister telephoned Mr. Heeney and asked him to try to get a message to Mr. Dulles, before he saw Mrs. Meir on Sunday, concerning the crucial importance of UNEF's role as regards internal security in the Gaza Strip and to urge that the US exercise effective influence over Nasser on this matter. Later Mr. Heeney reported that he was unable to see Herter but he had given the message to Elbrick (Memorandum for the Under-Secretary from the Minister dated New York March 17†).

In the early evening the Minister met with Engen and Gunning of Norway. They reviewed developments during the day and the Minister reported on his conversation with Eban. Engen was pessimistic about the prospects for the Secretary-General's visit to Cairo. After considering the matter carefully, the Secretary-General and Engen had agreed that Engen should not go to Cairo. Apparently the Indians had reacted adversely to the Secretary-General's suggestion that Engen should accompany him; Menon had insisted on being present in that case; the Secretary-General had decided that in these circumstances he had better go alone to Cairo.

At 11:30 on March 17 the Minister saw Mrs. Meir at the Plaza Hotel. Eban and Comay were present. The discussion ranged over the same subject matter which the Minister had discussed the day before with Eban. Mrs. Meir's presentation of the Israeli case was forceful and at times bitter. She was most critical about the way in which the UN had "surrendered unconditionally" to Nasser. She also expressed resentment about suggestions by USA representatives that Israel should permit UNEF to be deployed on both sides of the demarcation line. There had been suggestions that US aid to Israel would be withheld unless this happened. Mrs. Meir said this was incongruous when UNEF was in such a precarious position in the Gaza Strip. The Minister urged that the Israel Government should not have a closed mind about the possibility of deploying the Force on the Israeli side of the line. This would give UNEF greater permanence and a more truly international character. Mrs. Meir acknowledged this but insisted that the question should not be raised yet (Ourtel 866 of Mar. 18†).

At one o'clock the Minister departed for Ottawa. At the Minister's request, about five o'clock Murray telephoned a report to Mr. Heeney about the Minister's conversation with Mrs. Meir. Mr. Heeney said that he would pass this information to USA officials so that Mr. Dulles would have it before his interview with Mrs. Meir.

In the evening Cordier informed Murray that the additional Canadian personnel for UNEF would begin moving from Naples to Egypt on March 18. This information was telephoned to Ottawa and confirmed in Ourtel 865 of Mar. 18.†¹⁹⁸

THE FUTURE OF UNEF

1. The Egyptian decision to re-establish an administration in the Gaza Strip has forced us to consider urgently whether a satisfactory balance can be worked out between the responsibility of the United Nations and of Egypt in the administration of the Strip. Developments over the past few days have caused us serious concern and I think the time has come for you to have a frank talk with Pillai or someone similarly placed, since the Indian position is not only different from our own but has, I think, very dangerous implications for the future of the Emergency Force and for the whole U.N. effort in the Middle East.

2. The Advisory Committee on UNEF has become the focal point of discussions in the United Nations regarding developments in Gaza. At the meeting which I attended in New York on March 16, it became clear that the critical question in the Gaza situation is the control of internal security in the Strip. So long as UNEF had the degree of control required to carry out its operations and responsibilities, a deterioration of the situation might be prevented and the presence of an Egyptian governor and administration of other matters would not cause difficulty. If, however, the United Nations were prevented from exercising effective control of internal security, i.e. if it were restricted to operating along the demarcation line without freedom of movement and the right of search in the Strip itself, it could not effectively discharge its duty of preventing raids. The Israelis would then have reasonable grounds for alleging that they had withdrawn from Gaza "under false pretences" and, if they get no satisfaction in their talks with the Americans, they might take steps to restore the position. We would certainly be in trouble then.

3. The issue of internal security is likely to arise in an acute form during the next few days. At the meeting on March 16 the Secretary-General reported that Burns and Bunche were of the opinion that UNEF troops were spread too thin along the armistice line, and that they proposed to remedy this as soon as possible. The Secretary-General pointed out that in order to liberate UNEF personnel for this purpose, it would probably become necessary for UNEF to recruit some local help. He was quite firm that insofar as any such local employees were to be engaged in internal security functions, it was essential that they should be under UNEF and not Egyptian control. In general, he acknowledged — and I emphasized to him in private — that if UNEF was to be effective as a border police force it must also have effective control of internal security in the Strip. I hope that Hammarskjöld sticks to this position in his talks later this week with Nasser. I sent him a personal message† this morning with the idea of stiffening his resistance to any arrangement which would inhibit UNEF in Gaza.

4. The general feeling in the Advisory Committee was strongly in favour of the Secretary-General's and our own interpretation. Lall, however, was not inclined to accept a role for UNEF in internal security, and insisted that popular feeling would be against it. He envisaged UNEF serving only along the demarcation line and did not seem to appreciate the impossible position in which the Force would be placed by such an arrangement. I heard yesterday from New York that in a further meeting of the Advisory Committee yesterday morning, Lall read a prepared statement into the record reiterating the line he had taken on Saturday to the effect that UNEF's rôle should be restricted to patrol functions along the armistice line. This Indian position worries me because I am afraid it will increase the likelihood that Nasser will insist on control of internal security and take measures to turn the local population against UNEF and UNRWA if he does not get it, a state of affairs which would be disastrous for UNEF and might well encourage the Israelis to take some drastic action.

5. I should be grateful if you would use this telegram as the basis for a talk with Pillai. The point I would like to get across to the Indians is that any arrangement whereby the force was prevented or in any way limited in its efforts to check the planning and development of raids and incursions from the Strip would be intolerable, as would a state of affairs in which UNEF personnel came under any form of Egyptian control. UNEF must not be allowed to become a screen along the armistice line behind which raids can be mounted. You should tell Pillai that unless we can reach a satisfactory arrangement with the Egyptians on this problem, it cannot be assumed that the Canadian contingent will remain, much as we would deplore having to withdraw it, something we would only do as a last resort. Pillai will realize that if the Egyptians forced us to withdraw our contingent, they would be causing the collapse of the Force and making General Burns' own position difficult if not impossible, as well as making it a relatively simple matter for Israel to mount a fresh attack against Egypt.

6. I understand that Krishna Menon is in Cairo this week at Nasser's request. I hope very much — but I must say I have little confidence — that Menon will take a sensible line on UNEF.

7. If Pillai should raise the question of Israel's attitude toward UNEF's presence in Israel, you should say that we are doing our best to persuade the Israelis that it would be easier for us to help them if they would agree publicly in principle to the stationing of UNEF on Israeli territory. I have also urged Mrs. Meir, whom I saw on March 17 in New York, that the Israelis should not take a position regarding the deterioration of the position in Gaza until the point about U.N. control of internal security is cleared up.

8. We have made these points to the State Department in Washington, and I hope that they will do what they can with the Egyptians before Hammarskjöld arrives in Cairo later this week. The advice Nasser receives from the Indians, however, will undoubtedly be influential, so that anything you can do to induce them to take a reasonable line (and a line which would be in Egypt's interests) will be of value.

9. Cairo. Unconfirmed and probably inaccurate press reports here this morning state that the United Nations has agreed to move all of its troops out of Gaza to the demarcation line. I hope this does not mean that Bunche and Burns have already given way on the internal security issue. It seems to me that if the Egyptian Government has in fact, as Nasser indicated to Bunche, adopted a policy of no raids, it should be possible to work out an agreement for cooperation between UNEF and the Egyptian authorities on the maintenance of internal security. This telegram will serve as background in any talks you may be having on this subject.

FUTURE OF UNEF

Our latest information indicates that position regarding internal security in Gaza has been satisfactorily held pending start of Hammarskjöld's talks in Cairo. I still think there would be advantage in letting Indians know our position on role of UNEF along lines of our ME-102. It may be as well, however, not to make too much at this stage of references to possible withdrawal of Canadian contingent as we would not like Indians to think that we were pessimistic about outcome of Hammarskjöld's negotiations. Main point is that UNEF must be given sufficient control of internal security in the Strip to enable it to carry out effectively its responsibilities along the demarcation line. You could say that unless this was assured we think it would be the end of UNEF. Indians will doubtless realize consequences for Egypt if UNEF obliged to withdraw.

SECRET

[Ottawa], March 29, 1957

RECORD OF A CONVERSATION WITH THE SECRETARY GENERAL OF THE UNITED NATIONS

I had lunch with Mr. Hammarskjöld yesterday before the meeting of the Committee of Seven. (Mr. Engen and Mr. Cordier were also present).

The Secretary-General had returned from Cairo at 6:00 a.m. that morning, had been in his office since 8:00, but looked remarkably fresh and gave no indication of the stresses and strains of his visit to Cairo.

He was reasonably satisfied with the visit, though Nasser, whom he had found calm and relaxed, had been very tough in the discussions. Hammarskjöld had been, I gather, equally tough, and, as a result, had pushed Nasser from several positions, especially in regard to arrangements in the Gaza Strip. He indicated that Ali Sabry, with whom he had also discussed matters, had now acquired almost as much power as Nasser himself, and he felt that on the whole he would be a more reasonable man to deal with. Nasser, he thought, was becoming more and more the captive of his past policies, and of the group of Egyptian officers around him. He did not give the impression of having full and unrestricted control of things.

So far as Gaza is concerned, the Secretary-General was pleased indeed at what he accomplished; and he had every right to be so. He emphasized that the requirements for control of internal security which had been laid down by Burns in a memorandum, a copy of which he gave to me very confidentially, had been accepted by Nasser, though only after a long and hard discussion. He felt that if these terms were satisfactory to Burns as the Commanding General, they ought to be satisfactory to us. We could hardly be expected to go further than General Burns himself. I agreed. We also agreed, however, that much would depend on how the arrangements were carried out. Hammarskjöld was optimistic that the Egyptians would sincerely co-operate because he said they were disturbed at the possibility of the break-up of UNEF and the necessity of facing the Israeli army without a United Nations line between them. In this regard, Hammarskjöld said he had been helped in his discussions by my statement in Parliament¹⁹⁹ here last Friday about the withdrawal of the Canadian contingent unless satisfactory conditions were established.

There is one difficulty of procedure, and Hammarskjöld particularly wished to talk to us about this. The memorandum drawn up by Burns and agreed to by the Egyptians is a secret one and if it were made public, Nasser claims he would be in great trouble with his own public opinion. Hammarskjöld, therefore, cannot circulate it to the Committee of Seven because of the danger of a leak. He thought, however, that it would be possible to outline its provisions and he hoped that we would express satisfaction and agreement immediately after he had spoken, and that there would be no necessity for tabling the document. We agreed to do this.

He emphasized that the arrangements in Gaza, except in one respect, were not dependent on Israeli acceptance of the UNEF on their side of the demarcation line. Nevertheless, Nasser insisted that the UNEF could not be deployed along that line on the Egyptian side only. This is a matter which Hammarskjöld now has to take up with the Israeli Government and he will be greatly strengthened in his talk by the Egyptian attitude over other matters.

Nasser also indicated, for instance, that there would be no interference with the UNEF at Sharm-al-Sheikh and that the Egyptians did not intend to move troops there or, indeed, into the Gaza Strip. He also said that the Egyptians did not intend to interfere with the merchant shipping through the Straits of Tiran, though they certainly would not permit Israeli warships to go through unchallenged.

On Suez questions, however, little progress had been made. Nasser was adamant in regard to the control of operation and payment of tolls, and the memorandum on this matter which the Egyptian Government had given to one or two governments (a copy of which we have) was as far as they were disposed to go. The only encouraging development was Egyptian acceptance of a reference of the whole matter to the International Court. Hammarskjöld indicated that the Egyptian position had been stiffened in this matter as a result of Krishna Menon's visit, which had proved to be a most unhelpful one from the Secretary-General's point of view. He said that he had come across traces of that visit and none of them had been good. This is in contrast, of course, to the report that Krishna Menon himself has been spreading about his own visit.

There is one matter in which the Secretary-General has had real difficulty with General Burns: the insistence of the latter that UNEF must have the right to fire in self-defence not only on infiltrators but on bodies of troops moving against U.N. positions. Hammarskjöld, quite rightly in my view, could not agree to this and the matter is still under discussion. General Burns' requirements in this regard are laid down in the attached very secret memorandum.

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE FUNCTIONS, RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE UNEF FOLLOWING THE WITHDRAWAL OF ISRAELI FORCES BEHIND THE ARMISTICE DEMARCATION LINE

The memorandum concerns certain points as to the functions, rights and responsibilities of the United Nations Emergency Force in the situation following the withdrawal of the Israeli forces behind the Armistice Demarcation Line, and pending the effecting of compliance by both parties with the principal provisions of the Armistice Agreement as indicated in Section III of the Secretary-General's report of 24 January 1957.

1. Egypt will make it known effectively to the refugees and residents of the Strip that it is Egyptian policy to prevent infiltration across the Demarcation Line.
2. The Egyptian regulations against infiltration, which include penalties, will be again put in force. If UNEF is to be effective in its function it must as a matter of right have the duty of assisting in the enforcement of these regulations. This role of UNEF will be made clearly known to the population of the Gaza Strip by the appropriate authorities.
3. A unit of the Palestinian Police will be designated specifically for duty in the prevention of infiltration, and will co-operate closely with UNEF in this function. The officer or official in responsible charge of this unit will have standing instructions from the Egyptian authorities that he shall take immediate action on requests by UNEF dealing with actual or apprehended infiltration. There will be a free exchange of information concerning actual or potential infiltrators between this policy unit and UNEF.
4. UNEF will have the right to take infiltrators into custody in a zone 750 metres deep on the Gaza side of the Demarcation Line, and will hand them over to the police authority for appropriate judicial action. It is understood that the depth of this zone may be reduced by agreement between Commander UNEF and the Gaza administration in areas where villages, orange groves, etc. make the maintenance of the full depth impracticable.
5. It is recognized that a matter requiring special attention is the question whether UNEF should have authority to fire at infiltrators coming from either direction who refuse to halt when challenged in the zone in which movement is prohibited by the Gaza Administration during the hours of curfew prescribed by that Administration. Egypt will eventually accept giving UNEF troops authority to fire, provided that Israel on its side accepts the same. Pending such parallel acceptance, the cooperation between UNEF and the Palestine police must be encouraged and systematized. In this regard, the feasibility of joint night patrols composed of personnel of both UNEF and the Palestine police and their authority to fire, should be seriously explored.
6. The announced policy of Egyptian cooperation with UNEF will periodically be emphasized to the population of the Strip.
7. The right of UNEF to take action necessary for its own defence will be made known to the population.
8. The UNEF Base will be established in Rafah, and stores and installations now at Abu Suweir will be moved there.
9. In accordance with the Agreement of 8 February 1957 between Egypt and the United Nations [UN Doc A/3526]²⁰⁰ there will be full freedom of movement for personnel and vehicles of UNEF in the Gaza Strip and in the Sinai between the bases and headquarters of UNEF and the elements of its troops deployed along the Armistice Demarcation Line. There will be similar freedom of movement for personnel and vehicles of UNTSO and UNRWA in the Gaza Strip. Checkposts in the Gaza Strip wherever located will be manned jointly by the local police and representatives of UNEF, the former to control civilian traffic, the latter to control UN traffic.
10. In accordance with the same agreement UNEF aircraft will continue to have the right to fly freely over the Sinai and the Gaza Strip as at present. The present facilities for aircraft landing and maintenance at Abu Suweir will be moved to El Arish as soon as the necessary facilities can be established. Because of its proximity to the Demarcation Line the airstrip at Gaza will be manned by UNEF, with a representative of the Egyptian UNEF Liaison Office present.

11. UNEF will have the right to use Gaza as a port for the landing of stores and equipment if desired.

12. UNRWA stores and installations will normally be protected by guards employed by UNRWA, but if disturbances occur or threaten which are on a scale beyond the ability of the guards or civil police to deal with, it is clearly understood that the necessary assistance could be given to UNRWA by UNEF on agreement with the Governor of Gaza or at his request. It is noted that Egypt has indicated a willingness to accept responsibility for restitution and reimbursement to UNRWA for any losses resulting from inadequate police protection. The UN must, of course, reserve its right of self-protection.

*Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], April 4, 1957

Dear Mr. Miller:

In recent telephone conversations we have discussed the "police" function of UNEF and the possibility that an imprecise use of the term could lead to misunderstanding, bearing in mind the functions which the Canadian authorities envisage for the Canadian contingent. We have noted from telegram 235† from Cairo of March 22 that General Burns had expressed concern on learning of instructions to Colonel Dare from the Chief of the General Staff that Canadian troops should not be used "in aid of the civil power".

2. General Burns' conversation with Colonel Dare presumably took place at the time when UNEF took over from the Israeli forces and before Egyptian administration entered the Gaza Strip. The situation has since changed, and I presume that there would not now be any essential difference between General Burns' understanding of the limited police functions of UNEF and our own.

3. Any new task given to the Canadian contingent would be in line with the recent arrangements arrived at between the Secretary-General and the Egyptian Government during the former's recent visit to Cairo. You will have received by now copies of the following telegrams from our Permanent Mission in New York: 958† of March 29 and 962†, 963† and 964† of March 30, which give some clarification of General Burns' intentions for the use of UNEF and of what the Egyptian Government is prepared to do to co-operate with UNEF. These arrangements are still indefinite and their implementation will depend in large measure on the co-operation of the Israeli Government to which the Secretary-General has sent a note on April 1st requesting permission to station UNEF troops on the Israeli side of the demarcation line.

4. Our understanding of the proposed arrangements is that UNEF will not be involved in general police work in the sense of narcotics control or traffic direction. Its main concern will be the prevention of infiltration across the demarcation line. If the performance of this task requires UNEF to operate in the interior of the Strip it will, under arrangements to which the Egyptians have agreed, be able to call on the assistance of the Palestine police force which is now under the control of the Egyptian Administrative Governor in Gaza. It is their responsibility to look after general police work in the Strip and to assist UNEF in all activities relating to the prevention of infiltration. An important reason for enlisting the aid of the Palestine police, apart from the obvious advantage of language and local know-how, was the consideration that in the case of riots or disturbances in the Strip, the responsibility for restoring order would rest with the Palestine police and not with UNEF. The only conceivable possibility in which UNEF might have to act in an anti-riot capacity would be if demonstrators were threatening UNWRA stores or if the safety of the Force itself were threatened by demonstrators. In both cases, however, UNEF troops would only take action in legitimate self-defence and the responsibility for preventing trouble and, if necessary, restoring order would automatically fall on the Palestine police force which is responsible for the maintenance of public order in the Gaza Strip. It appears therefore that the proposed duties of UNEF, as we understand them from the above-mentioned telegrams, are consistent with the purpose of the Force, which is to secure and supervise the cease-fire.

5. In addition to these main points affecting UNEF as a whole there are certain features peculiar to the Canadian contingent. The first of these is that since nearly all the Canadian troops are working in an administrative or support capacity, the likelihood of their being engaged in functions conflicting with their terms of reference is even less than would be the case with all the other contingents. Secondly, with regard to the 56 RECCE Squadron, it is our understanding that this unit is likely to be deployed for the most part south of the Gaza Strip along the Israeli-Egyptian border. So far as we know, therefore, its functions are intended to be of a genuine reconnaissance nature.

6. I assume that the proposed arrangements as we know them now are satisfactory to your Department and that any misunderstanding which may have existed between General Burns and Colonel Dare with regard to the use of the Canadian contingent is by now cleared up.

Yours sincerely,
JULES LÉGER

[Ottawa], April 12, 1957

Dear Mr. Miller,

In my letter of April 4th concerning the "police" functions of UNEF I stated that the Palestine police force, on which the UNEF can call for assistance in preventing infiltration across the demarcation line, was under the control of the Egyptian Administrative Governor of Gaza. This is still essentially true but, in view of recent press reports and questions in the House of Commons concerning the employment of joint patrols formed by detachments of UNEF and the Palestine police force, I believe that I should qualify my statement.

2. According to information received recently from the United Nations Secretariat, the situation is that at the demarcation line UNEF has the sole responsibility for preventing infiltration, and it is no longer the intention to employ joint or mixed patrols as originally contemplated. Behind the demarcation line, however, those units of the Palestine police force concerned with the enforcement of regulations designed to prevent infiltration are under instructions to co-operate with UNEF and will take immediate action on UNEF's request in dealing with actual or apprehended infiltration.

3. This information on the relationship between UNEF and the Palestine police force is based on arrangements agreed between the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Egyptian authorities, as developed in subsequent discussions between the Egyptian authorities and the Commander of UNEF. For parliamentary purposes it would have been preferable if we could have used this information publicly. Unfortunately, however, it has reached us on a highly secret basis from the Secretary-General, who considers that any publicity given to this aspect of his discussions in Cairo might have damaging consequences. It was for this reason that a direct answer was not returned to a question asked in the House of Commons on April 2 concerning the position of the Palestine police force (see Hansard of April 2 and 5). It is therefore of the utmost importance that, at least for the time being, this information should be carefully safeguarded.

4. I believe you will agree that in the light of this further communication on UNEF's responsibilities and functions, the arrangements in effect are unlikely to lead to any misunderstanding as to the possible use of UNEF "in aid of the civil power in Gaza". Needless to say, however, officials of this Department would welcome an opportunity to discuss this problem in greater detail with Colonel Dare on his return and/or his successor, Colonel Brown.

Yours sincerely,

OF CANADIAN CONTINGENT

We attach six copies (two for you, two for the Secretary-General and two for his Military Adviser) of the Command Instructions issued to Colonel H.E. Brown who has been appointed Commanding Officer of the Canadian contingent in replacement of Colonel Dare.

2. These Instructions follow pretty much those issued to Colonel Dare but, as you will note, in addition to minor changes of the Instructions issued to Colonel Dare last November, paragraph 8 has been deleted and replaced by paragraphs 7, 8 and 9. You may be interested to know that these new paragraphs were inserted after an exchange of letters between this Department and the Department of National Defence and are intended to cope with any difficulties arising out of orders issued by General Burns for functions which might not be entirely in line with normal military duties. As you may know there was, at the time UNEF entered the Gaza Strip, some divergence of views between General Burns and Colonel Dare over the possible employment of Canadian troops in aid to the civil power. This issue never materialized and the temporary disagreement died of itself. It was, however, considered desirable to make provisions in the new Instructions to avoid a repetition of a similar misunderstanding between General Burns and Colonel Brown and to assure the former of the full support of the Canadian Army.

7. The status, provisions for command, administrative arrangements and rights and duties of the members of the United Nations Emergency Force are set forth in the "Regulations for the United Nations Emergency Force" issued by the Secretary General of the United Nations on 20 Feb 57. You should note, in particular, that Canadian members of the Force are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of Canadian military courts with respect to criminal offences alleged to have been committed by them in Egypt, they are not subject to the civil jurisdiction of Egyptian courts in matters related to their official duties and, in no circumstances, may their personal liberty be restricted by an Egyptian court or authority under the guise of a civil proceeding.

Employment in Aid to the Civil Power

8. Because the political situation in the Middle East is subject to sudden and frequent changes, it is not possible to give you detailed policy direction on the problem of employing Canadian troops in the United Nations Emergency Force in connection with aid to the civil power; however, I must impress upon you the positive necessity of being cooperative to the utmost limit with the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force. The United Nations has recently made arrangements which give sole responsibility for the maintenance of public order in the Gaza Strip to the Egyptian controlled Palestine police. The United Nations Emergency Force will not be called upon to deal with civil disturbances unless the safety of the Force or United Nations property is threatened.

9. Should a Canadian Army unit of the United Nations Emergency Force be ordered to undertake any duty contrary to the above arrangement, you will report the matter with your recommendations to the Chief of the General Staff by the fastest means and inform the Commander, United Nations Emergency Force, of the action you have taken.

FINANCING OF THE INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY FORCE

It is evident that establishment of the emergency international force will entail heavy expenditures and that it will be necessary to give more precision to methods for meeting these costs. We have, therefore, initiated informal discussions with a number of representative delegations to ascertain whether there is basic agreement on the cost sharing concepts which might be applied. We have stressed that these talks are explanatory only and that they are primarily designed to help governments to establish a basis for more definitive decisions that will have to be made at a later stage.

2. We first approached the delegations of the USA, Australia, Norway and India, the last two being members of the Advisory Committee established under the resolution of November 7. In order to provide a basis for discussions, we suggested that we might consider that governments contributing personnel would be willing at this time to assume costs, such as pay and allowances, which would be a continuing charge for these personnel if they were to continue service at home. However, the international community should be prepared to share added costs attributable to the movement of the Force to the Middle East as well as for the further expenditures required in performance of the responsibilities as defined in the terms of reference of the International Emergency Force.

3. If we apply this general concept to anticipated expenditures, we would achieve a division of costs on the following basis:

(a) The member state providing personnel would pay the normal pay and allowances and the costs of any clothing, equipment, etc., which would be required if the forces were to remain at home.

(b) Common expenses to be financed by the UN membership as a whole; these would include:

(i) Costs of any headquarters in the area or elsewhere set up to administer the Force.

(ii) Any costs of equipment or maintenance which would be attributable to the activities of the Force in the area.

(iii) Costs of transporting the Force to and from the area.

4. Although the common costs referred to above would ostensibly be shared by all member states, we would contemplate that some members would be prepared to make voluntary contributions which would reduce the size of the budgetary claim on the UN membership as a whole. The USA has already decided to provide a considerable amount of air transport at its own expense. However, there will be other costs of transportation (e.g., a contract now being negotiated with Swiss Airlines) which will be advanced by the UN out of the working capital fund. These advances will have to be recovered by a charge on the membership as a whole. We would hope that the governments of the UK and France or other governments might be willing to contribute equipment which they have already sent to the area, including transport.

5. Although delegates approached were uncertain whether their governments would be willing to accept these ideas, they indicated that their first impressions are most favourable.

6. Consideration should also be given to the desirability of inviting governments in the area to contribute local currencies which might be utilized to defray some of the local costs.

7. Quite apart from these questions of financing the Force are those of relief and rehabilitation and clearance of the Canal. We anticipate that there will be pressure to treat clearance with special urgency to meet the wishes of countries vitally interested in rapid restoration of Canal facilities. At the moment there does not seem to be any measure of agreement on the basis for financing these costs and we intend to maintain a clear distinction between these issues and those of financing the Force. It is the impression of some delegations that the costs of clearing the Canal should be met by the UK and France, but we anticipate that these latter delegations may resist any such suggestion both because of the financial magnitude and because it can logically be contended that the Canal was blocked by ships sunk by Egyptian action. We will wish to avoid a political debate on this question if possible but our first impression is that it might be reasonable to call on the main maritime and trading nations which are directly interested in rapid clearance of the Canal to contribute specialized equipment and personnel for this task. The costs of organizing the operation and perhaps some of the residual administrative changes might be included in any common budget.

9. We are forming a small group on the delegation to discuss these ideas and to formulate a possible approach which will assist the Assembly to avoid the diffuse and often uninformed discussion which is likely to emerge if the Assembly as a whole is asked to deal with these complex questions without precise advance guidance. We will inform you of further developments, but would welcome your preliminary reaction and those of the other department concerned on the ideas we may wish to circulate as a basis for discussion in the Assembly.

FINANCING OF THE INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY FORCE

At a meeting last week, including chiefs, National Defence and Finance (External was absent owing to a misunderstanding), there was general approval of the broad principle which you put forward in paragraph 2 and its elaboration in paragraph 3. While there was some discussion of possible further elaboration in order to reach greater precision, it was in the end concluded that it might be unwise, indeed unsafe, to make this attempt at this stage. The following points may give you helpful guidance in further discussions. In the first place at this juncture you should not discuss financing in terms which seem to imply a long term operation. The Force is envisaged as an emergency operation at this stage. If at the end of say six months it seemed more permanent arrangements should be made or that the functions of the Force are not what we anticipated new arrangements could be worked out at that time. In the second place, we recognize nevertheless the desirability of making arrangements for the emergency which would not be too far from the appropriate ones in the not unlikely event that operation would be longer than we would like to hope. In the third place, Canada's eventual contribution to the Force being still uncertain some interpretations of your paragraph 3 would suit us better in some circumstances rather than under others; for example, if Canada's role is largely administrative it is clearly to our advantage to insure that all possible common costs are clearly charged to UN account but if our contribution consists largely of maintaining an operational force then there are certain outlays which we might feel willing to make as a matter of expediency to insure arrangements suitable to our own force. In the fourth place, while we can agree in principle that the cost of transporting the Force to and from the area ought to be borne by the UN it seems inexpedient to press this point if in fact the U.S. is willing to pay for the greater part of this cost (in this regard you should know that in the past the U.S. has sometimes "provided" transportation and other services and then put in bills in the expectation of reimbursement).

2. We have the views of the Department of Finance on other points in your message as follows: it is doubtful whether the governments in the area can be tempted to contribute local currencies. After all they are not in the position of South Korea which called for help from the UN. The most that might be hoped would be some minimum contribution to general funds along the lines suggested in your paragraph 4.

3. As you say, there are four separate financing problems in the offing: the force; relief; rehabilitation; and clearance of the Canal. It is fully agreed that these four should be kept, if possible, completely separate. A not too serious suggestion was made that the clearance of the Canal might become a responsibility of the Canal Users Association. It may perhaps be worth keeping in mind that the size of the Canal has in recent years become inadequate and one of Egypt's grievances against the Suez Canal Company was that with its limited expectations of life it could or would do nothing to improve the facilities.

FINANCING OF THE INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY FORCE

Since forwarding our POLEG 1357 of November 21†, the Secretary-General's paper A/3383 has been circulated and you are presumably familiar with its contents. We also have your preliminary comments in DL532 of November 21. The following comments are offered in elaboration of our basic position and to inform you of further issues which will require clarification in the near future.

2. As you know, the financial arrangements for the Force will be determined by a decision of the Assembly in which a heavy preponderance of votes are held by delegations who are emotionally aroused but whose share of the costs would be small. Past experience has demonstrated that, whatever the protestations of many delegations concerning a desire to co-operate, they will not hesitate to support proposals which limit their financial responsibilities if they are given a reasonable opportunity to do so. Accordingly, in attempting to devise arrangements which will safeguard our main interests as a large contributor to the Force, we shall have to try to find a formula which will be acceptable to a majority of the membership. At this early stage we are therefore required to make advance judgments as to a course of action which will be consistent with Canadian interests and at the same time will be logical and defensible in principle. You observe that "if Canada's role is largely administrative, it is to our advantage to charge maximum costs to the common account but if our contribution consists largely of maintaining an operational force, then there are certain outlays which we might feel willing to make as a matter of expediency to ensure arrangements suitable to our own force". We will certainly attempt to adjust our positions to changes in the Canadian role in the Force, but we are sure you will recognize that there will be no difficulty in securing acceptance of proposals which would increase the Canadian share of the cost of maintaining our own force. This possibility is covered by our suggestion of provision for "voluntary contributions which would reduce the size of the budgetary claim on the UN membership as a whole". However, we are more likely to be confronted with a situation in which a large majority of the membership will press for financial arrangements which will rely on a few contributors to assume the main burdens both of providing personnel and financing their activities. On balance we believe that our interest would be most likely to be served at this stage by cultivating the idea that there are common responsibilities which should be shared widely and equitably by the membership while at the same time leaving it open to governments to make maximum voluntary contributions to the force.

3. Our observations on the costs of transporting the Force are based on the same approach. In paragraph 4 of POLEG1228 we indicated our belief that the USA could be counted on to provide air transport at its own expense. At the same time, we referred to "other costs of transportation which will be advanced by the UN out of the working capital fund and which will have to be recovered by a charge on the membership as a whole". Our thought was that voluntary contributions should be encouraged but if we make no provision for shared costs, the large majority of membership will be pleased to be absolved of any financial responsibility and are likely to let the issue go by default. In that event, Canada, as a large provider of troops, may end up by assuming more than a fair share of the responsibility of meeting the costs of transportation of its own and other contingents.

4. While we are attempting to keep this question separate from that of the Force, similar problems arise in dealing with the question of financing the clearing of the Canal. As you know, the costs of this operation have been estimated in the press at amounts ranging between 30 to 40 million dollars. The USSR and many other governments have already suggested that these costs should be borne entirely by UK and France and, as we anticipated, these latter governments have pointed out that the Canal was blocked by Egyptian action. The UK has already circulated a paper (A/3382) offering to make available a number of salvage vessels in the area and other experienced maritime nations have offered to provide specialized personnel and equipment. The draft resolution which Canada is co-sponsoring authorizes the Secretary-General "to proceed with the exploration of practical arrangements and the negotiations of agreements so that the clearing operations may speedily and effectively be undertaken". If this resolution is accepted, the UN will be committed in principle, to take initiative to organize the canal-clearing operation. Regardless of the extent to which the UK or others assume special responsibilities for this task, it seems likely the UN will be heavily involved. We consider that we should not, at this stage, encourage the membership at large to assume that they will not be required to back these commitments.

5. We have already brought the Secretary-General's proposals for insuring members of the Force to your attention but we must now comment on two further proposals referred to in A/3383.

6. A figure of $10 million has been suggested as the initial advance required to meet initial UN expenditures for the Force. We agree that this figure is as good an initial estimate as any other and we see no objection to a request that member states advance this amount. However, we would wish to ensure that any initial assessment for this purpose will be treated as an advance only and that the actual expenditures to be charged against individual states will be determined after definitive decisions have been made on the financial arrangements in the Fifth Committee.

7. The Secretary-General has also made proposals in A/3383 concerning the currency of payment of troops. He observes that "the troops assigned to the Force will need to be paid to some extent at least in the currency of the country in which they are situated, and this may create foreign exchange difficulties for the nations which contribute the units and are responsible for their pay". To meet this situation, he considers that "it would be appropriate for the UN to make available to the contributing government against reimbursement in their own currencies such foreign exchange as would be necessary for this purpose at a rate of exchange to be determined by the Secretary-General in consultation with the governments concerned."

8. In its literal sense, this would mean that the UN will not only be required to finance its own budgetary outlays for the Force, but it will also be required to act as a foreign exchange intermediary to provide governments participating in the Force with Egyptian currency and to accept reimbursement for the outlays in the currency of the member. If the UN accepts this responsibility, it will end up with a large supply of inconvertible currencies for which it is unlikely to have any ready use (e.g. Indian rupees and Colombian pesos). Similar arrangements might be required for the Yugoslav contingent which is already participating in the Force and for the Czech if the UN should agree to include in the Force troops from USSR satellites which have already made offers. In its issue of Friday, November 23, the New York Times offered, possibly inadvertently, a more practicable interpretation of this proposal. According to the Times, the countries in the area, for example Egypt, might make local currency available for payment of the soldiers and receive a credit against "the nations' UN assessment".

9. We spoke to the UN controller to inquire whether there is any validity to the Times interpretation. As expected, he informed us that the New York Times' story was incorrect. We will be examining this question more closely and will submit suggestions, but our first impression is one of reservations regarding the extent to which the countries participating in the Force should be encouraged to rely on the UN to accept inconvertible currencies to cover the local pay for their own troops. We have requested an estimate of the amounts likely to be required for this purpose.

FIFTH COMMITTEE: FINANCING OF UNEF FORCE

As anticipated in our telegram 1419 November 25, it immediately became clear in the opening debate on the allocation of costs of the Force that a large number of delegations would make a serious effort to absolve their governments of any financial responsibility or alternatively would endeavour to find justification for reducing their share of the cost.

2. The debate began mildly with Denmark, Finland, the USA and Italy agreeing with the Secretary General's proposal for sharing the costs among all members according to the 1957 scale of assessments. The delegations of Czechoslovakia, Romania opposed these views in mild statements which indicated their belief that the "aggressors" should pay.

3. Contrary to our expectation, there was no invasion of the Committee by heads of delegations and it appeared that the debate might be limited to moderate and objective discussion of the financial issues. However, Sir Leslie Munro of NZ visited the Committee and intervened, after the speakers noted above, in a well intentioned but ill-timed political statement attempting to refute the idea that the UK and France should pay and using the phrase "Egypt is not blameless in this matter". At this point the Egyptian delegate intervened on a point of order and the Chairman partially lost control of the meeting. Sir Leslie realized quickly that he had, as he described it later, "dropped a brick" and agreed to a motion of the adjournment until the following meeting. The following morning he made a modified and moderate statement indicative that the responsibility for the crisis in the MidEast lay on a very broad basis. The Egyptian delegate spoke next and began a lengthy and vitriolic rebuttal of Sir Leslie's charges of the previous afternoon. There were constant interruptions on points of order by the Israeli delegate, Sir Leslie and others and the Chairman again lost effective control of the Committee. After a lengthy procedural debate during which the Committee threatened to adjourn the session, it was finally agreed that all speeches would be limited to treatment of the financial issues but it was agreed that it might not be possible to entirely exclude references to political factors which should be taken into account in reaching final conclusion on questions of cost sharing.

4. We had prepared a brief non controversial statement indicating the firm support of the Canadian government for the Secretary General's proposal (sent to you in our telegram POLEG1559 December 4†). When it appeared that order had been restored in the Committee, we intervened in the hope that our statement would encourage other delegations to discuss the question in a moderate and objective way.

5. The speeches that followed were on the whole quite predictable. All the Communist countries continued to express the view that the cost should be paid by the "aggressors". The Cambodian representative stated that his country did not utilize the Canal and therefore, was not convinced that it should share in the expenses of UNEF. He went on to say that his country would, in fact, be entitled to submit a claim for the damages to his country's economy due to the blockage of the Canal. The delegates of Turkey, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, approved the Secretary General's proposal subject to endorsement by their legislative bodies of the financial expenses involved.

6. The representatives of Spain and Guatemala indicated that they were prepared to fulfil their international obligations but they contended that the burdens should be shared on some other basis and that other countries should bear a larger share of the responsibilities. The Spanish representative suggested that the Big Powers might be prepared to pay the first fifty percent of the cost and that the remaining fifty percent should be financed by all delegations, including the Big Five, according to the scale of assessment. The Ceylonese delegate was careful to avoid any commitment and contented himself with statements indicating that he thought that more careful consideration should be given to better ways for sharing the costs. In private conversations, he observed that the Ceylon delegation felt that the "aggressors" should pay but he did not present this view at the debate. We did not disagree with him, but we inquired informally whether it was his view that the costs of the domestic policy forces of members should not be supported by the whole community.

7. At one point the representative of Guatemala requested the Secretary General to make new recommendations for a revised scale to share the costs. The Controller very properly pointed out that the Committee already had received the considered views of the Secretary General and that a request for further suggestions would place the Secretary General in an embarrassing and difficult position.

8. The discussion was inconclusive and there was considerable uncertainty as to the probable results if an immediate vote had been called. Accordingly, although many delegations would have preferred to make a decision in principle at the meeting, we did not oppose the motion for adjournment but abstained along with the delegate of USA.

9. Following the meeting, we discussed the question further with the delegate of India and others in the hope of encouraging a better understanding of the fundamental issues involved as well as the detailed Canadian position. We suggested that the Indian Government as a contributor to the Force and a potential leader in the Afro-Asian group should consider very carefully the adverse consequences which would result if the Committee should fail to accept the Secretary General's proposal for sharing expenses. We observed that it was most important to maintain the integrity of Assembly resolutions and suggested that a bad precedent would be set if members, having approved the resolution by an almost unanimous decision, were to decide that their government should not provide adequate resources to carry out these responsibilities. Although it might be to the short term financial advantage of the smaller countries to avoid any financial responsibilities for the Force, it was important to recognize that, in the long run, they were the countries which might be most anxious to receive protection at some future date under the Collective Measures Articles of the Charter. In addition, we pointed out that if members could ignore their financial responsibilities under this resolution, the same could happen in connection with a resolution of some other committee, for example, the Economic Committee in which the under developed countries might have a strong interest. The Indian representative indicated that he recognized the dangers of the course some delegations were advocating and he has undertaken to consult with his government. We are hoping that he will be in a position to exert a healthy influence among other members of the Afro-Asian group.

10. The question will come up for debate again today and we have been informed that there have been many caucuses over the weekend amongst the Afro-Asian group and the Latin American group to attempt to devise a new approach. In a phone conversation with Plumtre before his departure for NATO, Pollock suggested that it would be desirable to be on guard against a concerted move by various groups to avoid assuming their equitable share of the costs and to be ready to cooperate with other delegations in securing sound and adequate principles for financing the Force.

11. The next stage of the debate will be completed before this telegram reaches you and we will be basing our position on this and previous communications. We will be reporting later today on further developments on this important debate and are repeating this telegram to NATO, Paris with a request that copies be provided for Messrs. Pearson and Plumtre.

FIFTH COMMITTEE: FINANCING OF UNEF

The discussion of the financing of UNEF continued on the afternoon of December 10. India [and] 18 other Arab and Asian states had submitted a resolution proposing that "further study" be undertaken of the problem of allocating expenses. In the resolution they requested that the Administrative and Budgetary Committee appoint a nine-member group to consider the matter and report back by January 20.

2. El Salvador presented an alternative plan in the name of all twenty Latin American representatives. The plan accepted the idea that the 1957 scale be followed in collecting contributions up to five million dollars "for the time being". Expenditures above that amount during 1957 would have to come from voluntary contributions.

3. We had been informed confidentially that these proposals would emerge from week-end caucuses of the Afro-Asian group and the Latin American group and we had consulted with the USA on action we might take to submit a proposal which would meet the immediate financial needs of the force and at the same time would be acceptable to a majority of member states.

4. To attain this end the USA considered that it would be necessary to make some concession to the expressed wish of many delegations to limit the commitments they would be required to assume for the Force. In accordance with these discussions the representative of the USA made an oral proposal at the beginning of the meeting suggesting that:

(a) that the expenses of the Force, with the exception of the pay and equipment of the national contingents and such other supplies, equipment and services as might be furnished without charge by member governments, should be borne by the UN;

(b) that up to the sum of ten million dollars these expenses should be apportioned among the member states in accordance with the scale of assessments adopted by the General Assembly for contributions to the annual budget of the Organization for the financial year 1957, this decision being without any prejudice to the eventual apportionment of the expenses of the force in excess of ten million dollars.

5. In introducing this proposal, the USA representative alluded to the large contributions the USA was already making to the force and pointed out that these "had appreciably reduced the amount of expenses yet to be covered". At the same time he considered that all member states should share these further outlays on the basis recommended by the Secretary General. He realized, however, that many governments would be unable to assume obligations of an unlimited and indeterminate amount.

6. In order to encourage acceptance of this proposal we suggested a modification to combine the USA recommendation for provision of the first ten million dollars on the basis of the scale of assessments with the idea of establishment of a working group to consider the basis for apportionment of the expenses in excess of ten million dollars, as suggested in the nineteen-power draft resolution. The USA representative immediately accepted this proposal and agreed to incorporate it in a joint resolution.

7. In the discussion that ensued most delegations continued to maintain their original positions. These can be summarized under the four following categories:

(a) The USSR and satellites are refusing to assume any part of the costs, stating that these should be borne by the aggressors. Cambodia has taken the same position.

(b) The Afro-Asian Bloc have submitted a resolution "considering the several different views on such contributions not yet reconciled", "considering that the matter of allocation of the expenses necessitates further study ..." "decides to appoint a Committee of nine member states to consider the matter in all its aspects and to report not later than January 20/57".

(c) A group including USA, Western Europe, "Old Commonwealth" and a few others support the principle expressed in the Secretary General's resolution.

(d) A mixed group, including Spain and a number of Latin American delegations, accept the principles of shared contributions but consider that some arrangements should be worked out to reduce their share of the costs.

8. As the discussion progressed it became clear that a favourable solution could not be obtained immediately and the Committee decided to postpone until Wednesday afternoon further consideration of this question. After the meeting we discussed this matter with the USA and other delegations and agreed that it would be desirable to utilize the time before the next meeting in a concerted attempt to try to induce other delegations to adopt a more co-operative position.

9. After the meeting Pollock spoke with Ventkataraman, representative of India in the Fifth Committee, to ascertain whether they were in fact receptive to compromise. Ventkataraman replied that his mind was still open on this question but it was evident from his replies to various questions that he was acting under fairly rigid instructions. In view of the importance of the matter MacKay spoke personally to Krishna Menon to emphasize the important issues involved and to underline the dangerous precedent which would be established if delegations are able to vote for resolutions and then refuse to provide resources to carry them out. He will also approach Gunewardene of Ceylon.

10. Although the Pakistan delegation had co-sponsored the Asian-African resolution, their delegate indicated support for the Secretary-General's recommendation. They admitted that they had co-sponsored the Afro-Asian resolution for political reasons. Iraq and one or two others implied that they are in the same position. The USA delegation has undertaken to canvass the Latin American group in order to obtain as much support as possible for the USA and Senator Lodge is taking a personal interest in the matter. We spoke to various Western European, Scandinavian and Old Commonwealth delegations in order to crystallize support of these members and urged them to speak with other members with whom they have friendly relations, in order to encourage further support for the proposal for collective payment of the charges of the Force. The USA-Canadian proposals have been submitted formally as an amendment to the Afro-Asian resolution.

11. The Committee originally had agreed to vote on the matter on Wednesday afternoon, December 12. However, the USA informed us before the meeting that further time might be valuable in ensuring a satisfactory decision. Accordingly the USA requested a further postponement until Monday, December 17. This proposal was concurred in by India, the spokesman for the Nineteen-Power Afro-Asian resolution, and Urquia, the chairman of the Latin American caucus. The deferment is intended to give the Latin American and other delegations more time to obtain authority to support the Canadian-USA compromise. This compromise is now embodied in an amendment to the Nineteen-Power resolution and is co-sponsored by USA, Canada and Norway.

12. Our USA colleagues consider that by Monday there will be enough support for the amended resolution to ensure a two-thirds majority. As you know, this majority will be required for ratification of the Fifth Committee decision by the Assembly. We are continuing our discussions with Afro-Asian delegations and many of them give evidence that they may be ready to accept the amended resolution. Despite Dr. MacKay's conversation with Menon and Lall, India has not yet committed itself and without India's assured backing it is always possible that enough delegations will follow the Indian lead to jeopardize the possibility of obtaining a two-thirds majority.

13. NATO delegation, please provide copies for Messrs. Pearson and Plumtre if they are still in Paris.

FINANCING UNEF

As a result of lengthy negotiations during and after yesterday's meeting of the 5th Committee a joint resolution has emerged which will be submitted tomorrow December 20 under the joint sponsorship of the 19 Afro-Asian members, USA, Canada, Norway, Finland, and probably Guatemala.

2. The resolution, the text of which is contained in my immediately following telegram†, is a careful merger of the main ideas expressed in the debate and has the effect of authorizing an immediate assessment against all member states to provide ten million dollars for the Force leaving the question of arrangements for apportioning any expenses in excess of this amount for subsequent consideration of a committee which will report later to the Assembly. The composition of the committee is still under discussion but the proposed list now includes Canada, USA, USSR, El Salvador, Mexico, Sweden, India, Ethiopia and Ceylon or the Philippines. Since the USSR has stated that it will not contribute to the Force Yugoslavia may be called upon to replace USSR.

3. The negotiations leading to this compromise were difficult and complex but it would appear that the resolution will receive very wide support except for the USSR and satellites. Toward the end of yesterday's negotiations the representative of the Secretary General indicated that the composite resolution would be acceptable to the Secretary General.

4. We will report in detail on the main positions of individual delegations in these discussions but we are sending this by immediate telegram tonight in order to provide you with the text before the vote is completed in the Committee.²⁰¹

FINANCING OF UNEF

You will recall that the Assembly on December 21/56 decided that the expenses of UNEF other than for pay, equipment, supplies and services furnished without charge by member governments should be borne by the UN and apportioned among member states to the extent of $10 million in accordance with the scale of assessments adopted by the General Assembly. The same resolution established a Committee of Nine (including Canada) to examine the question of the apportionment of the expenses of the forces in excess of $10 million.

2. The first meeting of the Committee of Nine was delayed pending collection of more info concerning the extent of the further financial requirements for UNEF. It was also hoped that discussion of MidEast questions in the Assembly might result in an easing of tensions and thereby improve the atmosphere for financial discussions.

3. In a report issued on February 8 the Secretary General estimated that the requirements for the Force during 1957 may reach $16,500,000. The Secretary General's report "holds to the view previously expressed that decisions which are taken by the Assembly itself and which have important financial conclusions carry with them an obligation on the part of all member governments to make available to the Secretary General the requisite requests for their implementation". However, the report goes on to say that "in the light of the discussion of this question which has already taken place in the Fifth Committee and of the fact that the time remaining before the close of the eleventh regular session will scarcely permit the working out of special assessment or similar arrangement the Secretary General is disposed to recommend that member governments exert further efforts to ensure that any sum needed in excess of $10 million will be financed by voluntary contributions either in cash or in kind".

4. This recommendation of the Secretary General makes it virtually certain that the Committee of Nine will reject any proposal for mandatory sharing of costs. Last week the USA approached us to indicate their belief that it would be unrealistic to press for any common assessment and gave us a draft resolution which I am forwarding in my following teletype† which would decide that further expenses should be financed by voluntary contributions. We informed the USA that a resolution of this kind is objectionable as it does not reaffirm the principle of collective responsibility for UN decisions on the Force. They have, therefore, amended their text to include a new preambular paragraph which would "recognize that UNEF expenses consist of UN expenditures within the general scope and intention of Article 17 of the Charter, subject to apportionment among member states in accordance with the scale of assessment adopted by the General Assembly for contribution to the annual budget of the UN".

5. Although this paragraph improves the USA text and if adopted could be used to support our general position when this matter is under consideration at the Twelfth Assembly, the Minister has agreed that Canada should continue to press for collective financial responsibility for the cost of the Force. To this end we have submitted an amendment to the USA resolution proposing replacement of the operative paragraph which "decides that UNEF expenses in excess of the 10 million dollars already assessed be met to the extent possible on a voluntary basis" by a new paragraph which will "invite member governments to make voluntary contributions which will ease the financial burden for 1957 on the membership as a whole".

6. By this amendment we hope to avert a "decision" in favour of voluntary financing which might be cited in future debates as a precedent against assessments by substituting an invitation to ease the impact of the general principle for assessments under Article 17 of the Charter. Since this distinction is rather subtle we are also considering other tactical moves including the possible introduction of another amendment. These prospective moves can be best described by Monk of the Department of Finance who returned to Ottawa yesterday.

FINANCING OF UNEF

As indicated in our telegram 671†, the special committee on financing the costs of UNEF was unable to reach agreement on a new basis for assessments and we therefore concentrated our attention on amending the USA resolution to ensure that any appeal for voluntary contributions to meet the added estimated requirements of $6.5 million would not undermine the principle of collective financial responsibility and would not prejudice the possibility for agreement on a further assessment at the Twelfth Session of the Assembly.

2. We were successful in this effort and the Committee of Nine, which was strongly opposed to the USA resolution as drafted, was able to accept an amended version by a vote of 8 to 1, with only the USSR in opposition. The Committee report and the resolution were subsequently approved by the Fifth Committee and the Assembly. The resolution follows:

The General Assembly,

Recalling its Resolutions A/RES/412 of November 26, 1956 authorizing the establishment of a UNEF special account in an initial amount of $10 million, and A/RES/448 of December 21, 1956 apportioning this initial $10 million among the member states in accordance with the scale of assessments adopted for contributions to the annual budget of the organization for 1957,

Noting that UNEF expenses already approved for 1957 represent a sizeable increase in assessments placed on member states, causing a grave unanticipated financial burden for many governments, acknowledging that certain governments have borne certain UNEF expenses without charge, such as pay, equipment, supplies and services,

Noting, nevertheless, that the Secretary-General estimates that UNEF expenses for 1957 will exceed the $10 million previously assessed,

Noting the request of the Secretary-General for authority to enter into commitments for UNEF up to a total of $16,500,000,

1. Authorizes the Secretary-General to incur expenses for UNEF up to a total of $16,500,000;

2. Invites member states to make voluntary contributions to meet the sum of $6,500,000 so as to ease the financial burden for 1957 on the membership as a whole;

3. Authorizes the Secretary-General, pending receipt of contributions to the special account:

(a) to advance from the working capital fund such sums as the special account may require to meet any expenses chargeable to it;

(b) where necessary, to arrange for loans to the special account from appropriate sources, including other funds under the control of the Secretary-General, provided that the repayment of any such advances or loans to the special account shall constitute a first charge against contributions as they are received; and further provided that such loans shall not affect current operational programmes,

4. Decides that the General Assembly, at its Twelfth Session, shall consider the basis for financing any costs of UNEF in excess of the $10 million not covered by voluntary contributions.

3. As a result of this decision, there will be an estimated gap of $6.5 million. The Committee report mentions a [unintelligible] contribute about half this amount. In making the offer, the USA made the customary announcement that the USA contribution would be forthcoming provided adequate contributions are made by other member states.

4. In view of the substantial Canadian contribution to the Force, and our assessment of $315,000, the Minister is convinced that Canada is under no compulsion to make a further financial contribution to the Force and he would not favour the introduction of a new item in the estimates for this purpose. However, as pointed out in paragraph 6 of our telegram 671, there is some flexibility in the attitude we may adopt in determining the extent to which we bill the UN for costs of the Canadian contingent. As indicated above, we do not consider that a further contribution is necessary but if, in your opinion, some financial contribution is warranted, we could claim reimbursement for marginal expenditures on behalf of the forces and use the amounts recovered as an offset for a Canadian contribution. We cannot recollect the procedures and authority required under the Financial Administration Act to re-expend any amounts recovered but we are drawing attention to this possibility in case you find that it is technically feasible and if you see any advantage either in terms of public relations or in case a Canadian contribution would help the USA to meet any Congressional requirement for matching contributions.

[Ottawa], May 27, 1957

On February 27, 1957, the General Assembly authorized the Secretary-General to enter into commitments for the UNEF up to a total of $16.5 million and invited member states to make voluntary contributions to meet the additional sum of $6.5 million (representing the difference between the $10 million already authorized and the assessed total cost of operation of UNEF for the year ending on December 31st, 1957) so as to ease the financial burden of the membership as a whole.

2. On that occasion you expressed the view (see paragraph 4 of the attached telegram 702 from New York dated February 27, 1957) that Canada was "under no compulsion to make a further financial contribution to the Force" and you did "not favour the introduction of a new item in the estimates for this purpose". The telegram went on to say however that "if some financial contribution is warranted ... we could claim reimbursement for marginal expenditures on behalf of the Force and use the amounts recovered as an offset for a Canadian contribution".

3. Finding merit in this proposal we left the matter in abeyance pending result of the talks between the Secretary-General and the UNEF members on allocation of costs. While there has been an attempt on the part of the Secretary-General to arrive at a financial arrangement, this question is still unresolved and we are in no position to set a figure of marginal expenditures which could be used as an offset for a contribution. Since then we have received, on April 19, a formal request from the Secretary-General inviting members to make voluntary contributions and pointing out that the U.S.A. had announced its intention to contribute the equivalent of about half of the amount of $6.5 million, provided that other governments contribute the other half.

4. We asked our Permanent Mission to sound out the Secretariat on the reaction of the members to the Secretary-General's last request for funds. Up to now very few countries have shown a willingness to subscribe and it is anticipated that the amount required will not be easily obtained. The U.S.A. contribution to UNEF is under heavy fire in Congress and it is not sure that the American contribution will be authorized. If it is authorized it will most probably be conditional on an assurance that other U.N. members have already come forward with their contributions for half of the $6.5 million. As you know, the principle of contributing to the first $10 million on the basis of the scale of assessment was not agreed to without opposition from some quarters and there are good reasons to expect that contributions to half of the $6.5 million may not be received before the next General Assembly Session when further funds will probably have to be voted if UNEF is to continue in operation after December 31st, 1957. Furthermore it is also not entirely certain that the amount of $16.5 million will cover all UNEF expenses for 1956-57. If member countries of UNEF, such as the Scandinavians, press for reimbursement of items which were thought to be their responsibility when the assessment was done the total cost of UNEF may well exceed the figure of $16.5 million and further funds will have to be authorized by the General Assembly for the current year of operations.

5. Canada has already contributed $315,000 of the first $10 million and is spending considerable amounts of money to maintain the Canadian contingent without any definite idea of what is recoverable from the U.N. since the matter of allocation of costs is still unsettled. Attached is an illustrative table of available figures of expenditures incurred up to the end of May by the Department of National Defence.

6. In view of the uncertainty surrounding the whole question of the financing of UNEF we are of the opinion that we should inform the Secretary-General that pending the solution of the problem of allocation of costs we are in no position to commit ourselves further.²⁰² We might explain that Canada's expenditures on behalf of UNEF are considerable and until we are able to assess what our membership will cost the Canadian Government we cannot assume a larger share of financial responsibility. We could add that we will be prepared to review our position next fall in preparation for the discussions at the General Assembly but for the time being we are unable to meet the Secretary-General's request.²⁰³ Furthermore, we have sounded out the Department of Finance where the question of a contribution to the $6.5 million has been discussed between Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Pollock. They would be reluctant to recommend to their Minister the approval of a further contribution at this moment.

7. If you agree a letter† along these lines can be sent to our Permanent Representative in New York.

SELF-DETERMINATION AND COLONIAL ISSUES IN THE UNITED NATIONS

In anticipation of discussions which will take place at the forthcoming General Assembly, we have made a reassessment of the Canadian attitude on self-determination and reviewed our policy on colonial issues as a whole. A meeting of representatives from the Divisions mainly concerned was recently held and a number of tentative conclusions were reached.

Self-determination

Our past difficulties in this regard may have been due in part to the fact that we have not made and maintained a clear distinction between self-determination as a legal concept (which has not yet been satisfactorily defined) and self-determination as a political principle (to which we subscribe but which must be related to other charter principles, e.g. domestic jurisdiction, respect for valid international obligations, etc). Canadian policy statements have accepted the principle but we have not always been clear in our minds as to what exactly the concept involved legally; hence our reluctance to subscribe to the proposed articles on self-determination in the Covenants on Human Rights. In the early days of the United Nations, it was generally assumed that self-determination meant the sovereignty equality of states but lately the notion has become much broader.

Should the above distinction commend itself to you, it is thought that it could be put to practical use at the next General Assembly when the Canadian Delegation will be faced with two resolutions suggesting the establishment of commissions responsible for making recommendations to strengthen the right of self-determination and for investigating alleged denial of this right. There is, however, an alternative United States proposal calling for the establishment of an ad hoc study group to be appointed by the Secretary-General to carry out a study of the concept of self-determination.¹ You may agree that we should give our support to this suggestion on the grounds that it would be difficult for the proposed commissions to apply concepts which still require legal definition. We could, however, informally explore with other delegations the possibility that the study group, without being turned into a roving commission or being given the task of making proposals relating to specific issues, might also look into the practical applications rather than restrict itself to the theory. While there is a genuine conviction on the part of many western countries that the problem has not yet been sufficiently explored, this view is not shared by the anti-colonialists who may consider the establishment of an expert group as a mere stalling device. Therefore, by proposing that the group should relate theory and practice, we would show that we do not merely propose to delay the application of self-determination but that we are anxious to find out whether effective arrangements can be worked out on an acceptable theoretical basis. An added advantage in setting up the proposed study group would be to remove the issue from the heated atmosphere of the Assembly for at least a short while.

The suggestion has been made also that we might try to persuade some of the Colonial Powers to show greater willingness to co-operate with the United Nations on self-government issues, and to consider, for instance, placing under trusteeship certain of their non-self-governing territories.² The Colonial Powers would not be required to agree that the United Nations should decide whether independence is to be granted; but once the decision to grant self-government had been made it might be possible in certain cases to get the Organization into the act and to involve the Trusteeship Council, for instance, in the subsequent discussions on procedure and timing. The Colonial Powers might thus relieve a certain amount of pressure on themselves and elicit reasonable and constructive reactions on the part of the more responsible anti-colonial countries. Admittedly, strategic and other considerations will have to be taken into account, but if we consider that we will, in any case, be faced with more pressure as years go by, new initiatives seem essential. Although it may be premature to submit these views formally to our friends, we were wondering whether you would have any objection³ if the appropriate officers were to try the idea out informally on Mr. Bourdillon, Under-Secretary of State in the Colonial Office, who will be visiting Ottawa shortly for discussions on colonial matters. The British, whose position vis-à-vis the anti-colonialists has been steadily deteriorating recently, may be prepared to consider new suggestions.

Colonial Issues

On reviewing our policy of general non-alignment concerning colonial problems, we have found it acceptable on the whole, although it may not have been too constructive and imaginative at times. It is therefore proposed that we should continue on our middle course, but perhaps in a somewhat more active and positive way. This need not, however, be overly systematic or obvious, but closer consultation and co-operation with countries which are not directly concerned in colonial issues could, we believe, be profitable. It does not seem sufficient to go on instructing our delegations that we must be circumspect and tactful so as to balance our European ties with the need of retaining the friendship of the Asians. While being careful not to lose contact with our traditional friends and not to do anything which might lead them to consider that we are withdrawing our sympathy, we could do something occasionally to bring closer to each other the "good colonials" and the more "sophisticated" anti-colonialists, and thus make a contribution in the urgent task of preventing the new countries and dependent areas from falling prey to communism.⁴ If we wait until each particular case of emancipation becomes an international issue it will then be already too late. If, as we believe, there is a desire on the part of many anti-colonial countries to be listened to by some western countries, we should perhaps be prepared to do our share of listening and conveying. We believe that, in some cases we should be able, with the assistance of countries like New Zealand, Norway, Denmark, etc., to assist both sides in solving their problems and understanding each other.

I do not suggest that we should undertake a major operation at the forthcoming Assembly. If you agree, we might, however, make a definite effort, whenever possible, to find compromise solutions and to persuade the countries concerned of the necessity of adopting reasonable attitudes.⁵ Such efforts would be well rewarded if, for instance, we were able, with other like minded countries, to bring the more intransigent anti-colonialists to realize that no advantage can possibly be gained by pushing France out of the United Nations on Algeria. In other words, what we propose is that at the next Assembly our Delegation might play occasionally a more active and constructive role than in the past on colonial issues by making greater use of the moral influence which we have with both sides. Closer contacts with as many Asians and Arabs as possible may provide the required framework for what we have in mind. It is symptomatic that, this year, our Delegation will be seated between the Cambodians and the Ceylonese. I hope to submit for your approval a telegram to our Mission in New York outlining, on the basis of the above considerations, certain tactics we might pursue during the next session of the Assembly on colonial and on a number of other issues.

It is our hope that the general approach suggested above may be applied successfully in specific instances e.g. West New Guinea, Algeria, Cyprus if circumstances appear to be auspicious. Before any action is taken, however, detailed briefs and recommendations will be submitted for your approval in each case.⁶

CONVERSATIONS AND NEGOTIATIONS WITH SOVIET OFFICIALS

As a result of the new Soviet tactics, the members of our delegations to international conferences may find greater opportunities for conversations and negotiations with Soviet officials. It is thought that it might now be desirable to provide some guidance on the subject as part of the Commentary for the next session of the General Assembly.

The attached comments are submitted for your approval: our intention is to expand this paper in the light of experience during the session of the Assembly and to incorporate it in the general instructions provided to all delegations.⁷

The comments, I realize, are perhaps a bit restrictive, but, on the whole, it may be better to err on the side of prudence.

DISCUSSIONS WITH SOVIET OFFICIALS

Since the USSR adopted their new and milder policy, Soviet officials abroad have shown a greater willingness than in the past to meet representatives of Western countries and on certain occasions to discuss informally the substance of, or the tactics relating to, particular issues. It may be desirable, therefore, to provide some guidance should members of Canadian delegations be approached by Soviet officials or find opportunities for talking to them.

2. Although precautions have to be taken to ensure the success of conversations with Soviet officials, yet any moves on their part should be encouraged, whenever possible. Negotiations with Soviet representatives are usually protracted and difficult, but they are essential if co-existence is to lead to a peaceful settlement of outstanding issues. While it may be desirable to convey the idea that it will take more than a few official statements to achieve a detente, Western representatives should be ready to discuss on their merits any Soviet proposals and to come forward with suggestions of their own.

3. It has happened in the past, although rarely, that on a specific issue the Soviet and the Canadian Delegations were seeking similar objectives: in such cases an exchange of views between members of both Delegations, with the above safeguards, has had effective

⁷ Note marginale /Marginal note:

Very useful and interesting. I wonder whether it should not be expanded somewhat to cover possibilities of exploiting with satellite delegations the present situation in Poland & Hungary. L.B. P[earson] results. The Soviet officials, for instance, did not seem always to understand fully certain aspects of parliamentary procedures in Western countries and by insisting on certain courses which were incompatible with these procedures, they were prejudicing the achievement of the common aims. Canadian representatives have been able to explain the situation and, it is believed, to induce Soviet officials to alter their tactics satisfactorily. This, however, is a rare occasion and, as suggested in paragraph 5 below, such exchanges should be carefully circumscribed.

4. Occasionally also, the Canadian Delegation has played a mediatory role between Soviet and Western positions: this is a more delicate situation and the circumstances in which discussions can be held with Soviet representatives, the scope of such discussions must be determined in each case by the Head of the Delegation.

5. Members of Canadian delegations should assume that any conversation they have with Soviet officials, no matter how informal, will be fully reported to the Soviet authorities concerned. Furthermore, given the nature of their system and of their training, Soviet officials will assume that any statement, information, or opinion, however much its personal nature may be stressed, is given with the prior consent of the competent Canadian officials. In the circumstances, it would seem to be desirable as a general rule for the members of the delegation not to initiate discussions, informal or otherwise, on any official matters with Soviet officials without prior approval of the Head of the Delegation. The scope and the nature of the discussion can then be determined carefully beforehand.

6. If Soviet officials themselves take the initiative of conversations, and there has been no time to obtain prior authorization, it is safe to assume that the action is part of a deliberate scheme fully endorsed by the Soviet Delegation. In such circumstances, as a rule, it is best to listen and merely to undertake to report the views expressed or the suggestions made. As soon as convenient after the conversation, a detailed account should be submitted to the Head of the Canadian Delegation and decisions can then be made as to the proper course to follow.

7. If they have to negotiate with Soviet officials, Canadian representatives must particularly be warned against the impression that where so many experienced Western negotiators have failed before, by a show of good faith and the exercise of ingenuity they will be able to overcome Marxist/Leninist prejudice and achieve man-to-man relationships conducive to positive results. Soviet representatives operate according to rules and on the basis of principles which are substantially at variance with our own. Even if individual Soviet representatives are lovers of good music or fond of their children, for instance, this does not mean that they are incapable of being arrant communists or members of the Soviet Intelligence Service. Their code of honour, their conception of fair play, are part of a scheme of living which is often remote from the normal Western pattern. For this reason, Canadian representatives cannot assume that the norms which would be generally effective in ordinary diplomatic intercourse can be applied to negotiations with Soviet representatives.

8. It should also be borne in mind that any Soviet delegation, in the same way as any Soviet Embassy abroad, is organized for espionage as well as diplomacy. It is quite normal for delegates to have dual roles, one on behalf of the K.G.B. (Committee of State Security, which is responsible for the conduct of the greater part of Soviet intelligence activities abroad), and the other on behalf of the Foreign Office. They are always looking for members of Western delegations who can be helpful to the Soviet Union from an intelligence point of view and individual delegates may be assigned the task of "studying" those who might be developed through other contacts later. Frequently a purely social approach is used for this purpose; and discussions relating to one's family, salary, etc., may be conducted entirely with the object of studying a delegate with a view to making a more direct approach to him later through other channels. Members of our delegations are encouraged to report incidents which bear on this problem, since we are interested in identifying Soviet delegates who have been assigned an intelligence role.

9. It is unwise to assume that a generous attitude and a willingness to approach an issue in an open-minded fashion will elicit a similar attitude on the part of the Soviet representative. For Soviet negotiators no detail of procedure, no shade of substance is so devoid of significance that it can be abandoned except as a result of a complicated, slow and most deliberate process. They are never inclined to give away anything for nothing. We should therefore do likewise.

10. Soviet diplomats are generally very stubborn, shrewd and able negotiators. They are past masters in procedure and they always have an eye for propaganda effect; infinite patience, a determination to be tenacious, are essential to success in negotiating with them. While an appearance of inflexibility must be avoided, early concessions are often considered by Soviet, and indeed by other negotiators, as a sign of weakness and as an encouragement for additional requests. Usually it is best to start negotiations with both an expendable and a firm position so as to be able to match Soviet concessions and thus encourage progress towards an acceptable compromise.

11. It has been our experience that when discussing with Soviet officials, it is more effective to proceed on the basis of a closely reasoned demonstration of the merits of our case or of a serious weakness in theirs: they seem to be most sensitive to a dialectical approach. Personal appeals and emotional considerations are unlikely to be successful. It must be borne in mind that because of their training, Soviet officials are particularly suspicious of Western representatives; they have generally little room to manoeuvre and they must avoid placing themselves in the position where they might be suspected of sympathy for the West; this accounts often for their rather brusque manner and for their insistence on having a witness for their own side who can corroborate their account of the conversation.

12. In appropriate circumstances and with adequate safeguards as indicated above, members of the Canadian Delegation should be on the alert particularly for any openings from representatives of Soviet "satellite" states. When it is desirable to discuss a particular issue with Soviet representatives, it should not always be assumed that the Moscow representative is the only spokesman for Soviet countries: representatives from the "satellite" states should be encouraged if they display initiative and express their national views. In this respect, recent events in Hungary and Poland may provide new opportunities. Members of the Delegation should report any signs that representatives from these countries are taking independent attitudes in the discussions or in social relations: they should also observe carefully the relations between Polish, Hungarian and other communist representatives. It will also be interesting to note whether Yugoslav representatives are attempting to exercise any leadership among communist delegations. During the Assembly it may be possible to form some impression whether on foreign policy or/and in personal conduct, as a result of recent events, representatives from certain communist countries are in a position to enjoy greater freedom. Any signs of independence on their part may provide openings for useful manoeuvres on the part of Western delegations.

CANADA'S ROLE AT THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Misunderstandings and tensions which were restricted in the past to the relations between the East and the West, the Colonial Powers and the anti-colonialist have now become obvious within the Western group itself, as a result of the U.K. and French policy in the Middle East. In the circumstances, it has been necessary for us to take an active and resolute part in U.N. proceedings to help restore Western unity. The urgent need for our initiatives has been understood and welcomed both domestically and abroad.

The need for Canada to continue to play a similar role may be no less great during the Eleventh Session. It would seem that, in any case, constructive interventions on our part will be required as a contribution to the development and maintenance of Western cohesion. Such moves are also likely to be needed if the outcome of their intervention in Egypt is such that the U.K. and France are disillusioned and disheartened and if, as may be likely, their ability to act as leaders of the community of nations is impaired. Such a trend was already noticeable before the Middle East crisis, it may well gain momentum as a result of it. In such a case, apart from contributing to Western unity, we may be called upon to take a very direct interest in promoting understanding and co-operation between the Afro-Asians and the West.

While, undoubtedly, the U.S.S.R. will have weakened its U.N. position through its intervention in Hungary, Soviet recipes for economic development and Soviet determination to espouse anti-colonial causes are likely still to present a formidable challenge. Our task and that of friendly countries will be to attempt to demonstrate that the West has not abandoned its principles nor the objective of improving the spiritual and material lot of the less favoured nations who need all the help and encouragement we can give.

As a matter of fact, in reviewing the various commentaries and instructions prepared during recent weeks for the guidance of the Canadian Delegation at the eleventh regular session of the General Assembly I note a widespread feeling that, in many fields, constructive Canadian action would be of great assistance in restoring United Nations prestige and giving new faith to those who may be inclined to lose hope in the World Organization and its ability to solve problems peacefully. Should the Canadian initiative during the special General Assembly on the Middle East crisis meet with success, it may well provide an excellent basis for other worthwhile suggestions, since our influence will be high and people may be inclined to listen more readily to us.⁸

One of the questions which presumably will be actively discussed is that of self-determination which raises the complex of colonial issues opposing the European Powers to the Asians and the Africans. When these problems come up, we may have a unique occasion to steer the discussions along more positive lines. As we favour self-determination when the circumstances are right, we shall be supporting a U.S. proposal for an analytical study or else they may get tired of listening to us! [L.B. Pearson] of the whole question of self-determination. Our efforts will be aimed at persuading the anti-colonial countries that this is an essential preliminary to the systematic and orderly solution of colonial problems. The study should not be confined to theory but it should encompass practice also and, if possible, general recommendations as to the best ways of implementing self-determination. In this way, we may help to allay anti-colonialist fears that such study will be merely another device to delay the application of this yet ill-defined principle.

Colonial questions generally are of course closely related to this problem of self-determination, and you have already agreed that in this field we should make an effort, whenever possible, to find compromise solutions and to persuade the countries concerned of the necessity of adopting reasonable attitudes. As you indicated, moves along these lines will be "delicate operations and will have to be very carefully thought out". However, if mistakes and fumbblings by our allies remain the order of the day, we have a definite duty to be imaginative in seeking solutions to situations which have so markedly deteriorated in recent weeks.⁹

There are only a few economic items on the agenda, but these are rather important. Last summer's sessions of ECOSOC showed that the under-developed countries were specially concerned with assistance to economic development, and with commodity trade problems. On both of these subjects there were important differences of views: the United States and more particularly the United Kingdom were often placed in a position of isolation from the views of the majority of Delegations. The Canadian Delegations played an active and, I think, a useful role in moderating more extreme views on both sides and in assisting ECOSOC to arrive at decisions which could be given majority support. Instructions have been prepared with a view to encouraging the Delegation to play a constructive role in the economic debates, to take initiatives where these seem useful and in keeping with basic Canadian policy.

With regard to SUNFED, the Delegation could follow up the suggestion you made in your Red Cross speech last spring regarding having the United Nations act as a clearing house for information and statistics on assistance for economic development, and help in working out bilateral assistance programmes.¹⁰ On the SUNFED proposals themselves, the Delegation has been instructed to be forthcoming, bearing in mind the wide differences of views that still exist concerning various aspects of them, and particularly the fact that the United States Government is still reviewing its policy concerning economic assistance. In general, however, the Delegation could lend support to the wider use of the United Nations in the field of economic development.¹¹

I am under the impression that there will thus be a continuing need for positive Canadian contribution both to Western unity and to better relations between the West and the Afro-Asians and this, not only in the general political field, but also in the economic and social field and in regard to questions such as the colonial issues and self-determination which in the past we have not considered of substantial and direct concern.

Our policy will, of course, have to be related to the resources available, but our experience during the last two sessions of ECOSOC is that the approach, the attitude, is of major importance and that it can have repercussions out of all proportion to the material investment involved.

A more important problem, I think, will be to avoid dispersion of our efforts. In practice, it will be very difficult for us, given our staff limitations, to undertake constructive operations on all fronts where our intervention could be effective and it may be necessary for us to make a choice. I venture to suggest the following priorities:

(a) we naturally have to use our best efforts to promote and consolidate Western unity. This is the most urgent and the most important requirement; if a need arises in this area, we have no choice but to mobilize all our energies to restore the situation;¹²

(b) as between the competing needs which may arise with respect to relations between the West and the Afro-Asians, I wonder whether at this juncture we might not perhaps consider making our main contribution in regard to self-determination along the lines already suggested. Any progress we could make on this issue would yield interesting dividends in colonial affairs. Furthermore, U.K. and French financial problems are such that they are unlikely to be prepared to increase their contributions to U.N. projects for economic developments and the prospects of the revival of the cold war may also very seriously affect the U.S. approach to these problems. It seems therefore that it may be in this area of self-determination (particularly as regards the legal definition and machinery) that, at this time, we might be able to effect our most useful contribution. In fact, what we could do in this field may help in healing the wounds inflicted lately by the U.K. and French operations.

I should be glad to learn whether you agree that, to achieve maximum effect, our Delegation, in the new role it may have to undertake, should concentrate on the issues I have suggested and deploy its personnel accordingly.¹³

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE ELEVENTH
SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS¹⁴

Attached to this memorandum are General Instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the Eleventh Session of the United Nations General Assembly which opens in New York on November 12, 1956.

These instructions provide broad policy guidance on major issues likely to arise at the Session and summarize the position to be taken by the Delegation on the more important items on the Assembly's agenda. Reference is not made to subjects such as West New Guinea and the South African items on which our general position will be the same as that adopted last year,¹⁵ nor to Algeria on which a further submission will be made if, in the light of current developments it becomes desirable to adopt a different position from that taken last year. The final report of the International Law Commission on the Law of the Sea will be the subject of a separate submission.¹⁶

The undersigned recommends that the attached instructions be approved by the Cabinet.¹⁷

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The course of the eleventh session of the General Assembly is unusually difficult to forecast since much will depend on the attitude of the 16 new members admitted at the close of the last session and of the three (possibly four) states likely to be admitted early in the new session. Recent events in Eastern Europe, and the effect of the Middle East crisis on East-West relations are factors the impact of which upon the General Assembly cannot readily be assessed in the present confused situation. Two things emerge with reasonable clarity: the session is likely to be rather longer than usual and political and ideological stresses between East and West may well be accentuated to the disadvantage of the West unless means can be found to arrest this process.

2. On controversial issues, newly independent and less-developed countries are disposed to vote in bloc opposition to the more advanced countries without adequate consideration of the merits of the arguments put forward; this may provide the Soviet Union with opportunities for the employment of divisive tactics with the object of reducing the West to a minority group within the United Nations. Such issues include those whose substance is essentially political but are susceptible to ideological coloration, those related to the provision of money and facilities for economic development, and questions of self-determination. In all these areas it is necessary to concentrate attention on the merits of the arguments and on the possibilities for constructive action and co-operation according to the relevant circumstances in each case, in order to prevent as far as possible the consolidation of blocs and the comparative isolation of the West. The Canadian Delegation may therefore be called upon as in past sessions to advocate counsels of restraint and moderation, to consult with delegations on both sides of particular issues in the conciliation of differences and, on occasion, although this may be difficult, actively to seek acceptable compromises on both tactics and issues whereby, with goodwill, tensions may be relaxed, a spirit of co-operation may be engendered and divisive debate may be avoided or minimized.

The Representation of Communist China

3. The problem of Chinese representation has arisen at every session of the General Assembly since 1950. A crisis on this question may be expected within the next two or three years as impatience with the intransigence of the United States increases. It is estimated that this year, in spite of the introduction of new factors, the United States will be able to carry its procedural motion to postpone consideration of the question of Chinese representation for the duration of the eleventh session. We have already undertaken to support this procedural motion this year. The main danger in this problem is that the General Assembly may move faster than United States opinion; it might be expected, however, that there will be a gradual realization in the United States that a change in Chinese representation is inevitable. But this realization must not be too sudden if harmful effects, possibly extending as far as United States withdrawal, are to be avoided. The Canadian Delegation is, therefore, instructed to support the procedural motion for postponement with its vote but not to take an active part in the debate.

The Admission of New Members

4. The Delegation should support the admission of the Sudan, Tunisia, and Morocco, all of which have been recommended for admission by the Security Council. The Delegation is also instructed to support the admission of South Korea but, except in very special circumstances, to abstain in the case of South Vietnam because of our position as a member of the International Supervisory Commission on Vietnam.

5. The question of Outer Mongolia may raise difficulties. The Delegation should abstain if there is a vote on Outer Mongolia alone but should avoid taking a position which might prejudice Japan's admission.

Elections

6. The Canadian Delegation should vote for Prince Wan of Thailand for the Presidency of the eleventh session of the General Assembly. In the elections for the Security Council, the Delegation should support Iraq to replace Iran, and Colombia, the nominee of the Latin American bloc, to replace Peru. If, in accordance with the arrangement made between the Philippines and Yugoslavia last year, Yugoslavia should relinquish its seat in favour of the Philippines the Delegation should vote for the latter on the understanding that Canada remains opposed in principle, pending amendment of the Charter to provide additional seats, to any interference with the present broad geographical allocation of Security Council seats. For the seat to be vacated by Belgium, it is to be hoped that the countries of Western Europe will be able to agree on a candidate as between Sweden, Italy and Spain, in which event the Delegation should support that candidate; failing such agreement the Delegation should vote for Sweden. It is anticipated that a proposal to establish an additional Vice-President position will be introduced at the eleventh session. If this happens the Delegation should support this move and if it carries, vote for Italy for this position, provided it does not run for the Security Council.

Self-determination

7. Three resolutions will be submitted for the consideration of the Assembly. Two of these resolutions originated in the Commission on Human Rights and provide for the establishment of two commissions, the first one to conduct a full survey of the status of the right of people to self-determination including "permanent sovereignty over their natural wealth and resources", and the other to examine and suggest remedies for situations resulting from alleged denials of the right of self-determination.

8. The third resolution was sponsored by the United States, more or less as an alternative to the two above-outlined resolutions, and provides for the establishment of an Ad Hoc Commission of five persons which would undertake an analytical study of the whole question of self-determination.

9. We favour the United States resolution although it will probably have to be amended substantially to make it more generally acceptable. The United States authorities have already agreed to widening the terms of reference for the commission they propose, with a view to empowering it to make general recommendations as to the best ways of implementing the right of self-determination in practice. In order to ensure adequate representation for all significant points of view the Delegation may support enlargement of the proposed commission provided the latter is not permitted to become a roving commission or to seek to suggest solutions to particular problems of self-determination.

10. The Delegation should strongly oppose the second resolution proposed by the Human Rights Commission; it is hoped that the first resolution will be dropped in favour of the revised United States resolution.

The Draft Covenants on Human Rights

11. At the tenth session the texts of the preambles and first articles of two Draft Covenants on Human Rights were adopted, although the terms of the articles that dealt with self-determination were opposed by Canada and most Western countries. One of the Draft Covenants deals with civil and political rights; the other with economic, social and cultural rights and, as prepared by the Human Rights Commission, both contain a Soviet sponsored article calling for their provisions "to extend to all parts of federal states without any limitations or exceptions". Unless this anti-federal clause is replaced by a clause which would meet the requirements of federal states, it would seem impossible for Canada to adhere to the Covenants; unfortunately, these clauses will not be discussed until after article by article consideration has been given to the numerous substantive articles preceding them, many of which relate to matters within the jurisdiction of the Canadian provinces.

12. The Delegation should make it clear that while, for constitutional reasons, we are obliged to insist on the eventual inclusion in the Draft Covenants of a suitable federal state clause, we cannot make any commitment to sign the Covenants in final form even if such a clause is adopted. Nevertheless, subject to this proviso, the Delegation should participate constructively in the discussion of articles which deal with matters wherein the Government of Canada has competence with a view to rendering the drafts broadly acceptable to Canada, but, with respect to articles concerning matters in which the provinces have jurisdiction, should not go beyond giving such support as may seem proper to proposals designed to meet the reasonable requirements of friendly governments.

The Peaceful Utilization of Antarctica

13. India has submitted an item regarding the peaceful utilization of Antarctica which many countries, particularly those with territorial claims in the Antarctic, fear may become the subject of acrimonious and unprofitable debate. Several governments, including Canada (which is concerned about possible future implications for the Canadian Arctic), have made representations to India to this effect, and there are some grounds for hoping that the item will be withdrawn; if it is not the Delegation may either vote for or abstain on inscription depending upon the apparent measure of support for placing the item on the agenda. If it is inscribed, the Delegation may join in supporting the introduction of as innocuous a resolution as possible in the hope that it may be approved with a minimum of debate, and that extraneous controversy regarding conflicting territorial claims may be avoided.

The Togoland Unification Problem

14. The population of this United Kingdom trusteeship territory of Togoland has voted in favour of unification with the Gold Coast when the latter becomes independent next March, and the plebiscite was observed by a United Nations special mission which found it entirely satisfactory. The Canadian Delegation should therefore wholeheartedly support any action taken with a view to terminating as of March 6, 1957 the trusteeship status of British Togoland and for its incorporation into an independent Ghana.

15. In French Togoland, a referendum was held on October 28, 1956 offering the population of this trust territory a choice between continuation of the trusteeship system and a measure of local self-government within the French Union. As a result of the Trusteeship Council's refusal to assent to a French request to that effect, the referendum held on October 28 was not supervised by the United Nations. Since the population favoured the new constitution, it is likely that France will request termination of the Trusteeship Agreement at the forthcoming General Assembly. On this issue, the Canadian Delegation should support the French stand, mainly on legal grounds. However, the Delegation is also being instructed to impress upon the French Representatives the undesirability of adopting an extreme position, should the United Nations refuse to terminate the Trusteeship Agreement.

Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development

16. Instructions to the Delegation assume that the present attitude of resistance of the United States and the United Kingdom to the SUNFED idea will not change during the eleventh session of the Assembly, and that developments in United States policy which may come from current studies being made will not necessarily bring acceptance of the particular SUNFED proposals. The Delegation should use its influence to avoid a situation where the United States and the United Kingdom are placed in an isolated position on this question. The Delegation should carry forward the suggestions put forward by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in an address to the Canadian Red Cross Society last March for having the United Nations act as a clearing house for information about the plans and policies of all countries with respect to economic development assistance.¹⁸ It should adopt a sympathetic but reserved approach to the SUNFED proposals themselves, being guided by the terms of the memorandum to Cabinet of April 30, 1956, and the reply to a United Nations questionnaire on SUNFED.¹⁹ It should attempt to delay the drawing up of Draft Statutes for SUNFED in the absence of support for such a proposal by the expected major contributors, and should consider suggesting as an alternative, if necessary, broadening the terms of reference of the existing ad hoc Committee on SUNFED which was established by the last Assembly to examine member countries' views on the SUNFED proposals.

The Industrialization of Less Developed Countries

17. At its twenty-second session, the Economic and Social Council endorsed proposals made by the United Nations Secretariat for studies in the field of industrialization. The Assembly will be required to approve the expenditure involved (estimated at $100,000). The Canadian Delegation is instructed to express sympathy for the efforts of less developed countries to diversify their economy, to caution against undue enthusiasm as to what can be achieved as a result of United Nations studies, to satisfy itself that the projects will be of practical value and correspond to the actual requirements of the countries concerned and that the programme as a whole is warranted, given the resources available and the relative priority of other projects. There is considerable pressure for United Nations studies in the field of industrialization and the Delegation should attempt to confine the programme within reasonable proportions and to projects of practical value.

Expansion of United Nations Organs

18. Security Council: The Delegation should be prepared to support a resolution calling for enlargement of the Security Council by two non-permanent seats, one for Asia and the other for Western Europe, but should not co-sponsor it initially. However, if a very wide measure of approval develops for this proposal among Asian as well as Latin American and Western European countries, the Delegation may join in co-sponsoring for the purpose of sustaining pressure on India and the U.S.S.R. to accept it.

19. ECOSOC: Any enlargement of ECOSOC should preferably be in multiples of three. Provided there is wide support for the expansion of ECOSOC, the Delegation should support an increase of six seats as the best means of preserving the present voting balance in the Council.

20. International Law Commission: Canada does not favour enlargement of this body, but if such a change commands wide support, the Delegation should support an increase of six in the membership of the Commission, as the best means of maintaining the present voting balance in the Commission.

21. International Court: As the number of states in the United Nations has no bearing on the size of the Court, the Delegation should oppose any increase in its size.

Cyprus

22. The United Kingdom may not oppose inscription of the Greek item, having themselves submitted a counter item on Greek support for terrorism in Cyprus, and both items are likely to be inscribed without debate. If, however, there is opposition to inscription on the part of "old" Commonwealth countries, the Delegation could abstain. If these items are placed on the agenda, the Delegation should support both of them being taken up together late in the session in the hope that by then progress will have been made towards a negotiated settlement.

Administrative and Budgetary Questions

23. The Secretary-General's estimates for 1957 are approximately $685,000 higher than those for 1956 adjusted for purposes of comparison. The Delegation should give due weight to the recommendations of the Advisory Committee for a total reduction of some $354,000 in these estimates and encourage the Secretary-General to implement them to the fullest extent practicable. Every effort should be made to secure the election of the Canadian candidate (S. Pollock) to the Committee on Contributions.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN UN

Background

Our High Commissioner, London, reported July 10 that the US has asked the UK for early agreement to a further moratorium on the Chinese representation issue at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly, and that the Foreign Office has recommended to Cabinet that it agree to a moratorium for the whole of the eleventh session.

2. Since the State Department may have it in mind to make a similar approach to Canada on this issue, we have considered what response we should make to such an approach.

Canadian Views

3. At the White Sulphur Springs meeting, the President and the Secretary of State were made aware that Canada would not occasion any difficulty over Chinese representation in the U.N.,²⁰ at least until after the presidential elections; this did not constitute a commitment with respect to the forthcoming session of the General Assembly which will not meet until after the election.

²⁰ Voir Volume 23, Chapitre premier, 1^{ère} partie.
See Volume 23, Chapter 1, Part 1.

4. Approval by the British Cabinet of a further moratorium would seem to make it difficult for us as a country which does not recognize Communist China, to adopt a more divergent attitude than the UK which maintains diplomatic relations with Peking. Moreover, the appointment of Senator Knowland to the US Delegation to the next session of the General Assembly seems clearly to presage continued strong resistance by the US to review of the question of Chinese representation at the forthcoming session. Full discussion of the issue might be expected not only to embitter and disrupt proceedings within the UN, but also to produce a violent reaction in the US itself which might well find expression in intemperate criticism of the UN and opposition to less controversial aspects of its work with a consequent weakening of the general western position. While another moratorium may place a further strain on relations between East and West, there does not appear to have been any change in the situation since the last session that holds out any reasonable hope that the United States will be prepared to alter its position towards the issue in the near future.

5. At the Tenth Session 42 members voted in favour of the moratorium, 12 voted against it, and 6 abstained. Mr. Menon has stated that at the 11th session India will "fight" the moratorium resolution, but that he believes the US will succeed in putting it through. It is likely, however, that the proportion of votes in support of a moratorium at this session will be lower than last year. In itself the change in voting proportions will no doubt have a salutary effect on the United States and might go far towards persuading it to reconsider its policy before the twelfth session without there being any requirement for us to alter our position.

6. On the other hand an attempt by us to anticipate such a development by refusing to make a commitment for the next session might well react to our disadvantage, cause the United States to increase their efforts to obtain support for a moratorium and adversely affect our relations with them without achieving any more positive result.

7. If we were to decline to make a commitment we should, of course, be free to abstain whenever the matter came to a vote and thereby adopt a position of apparent neutrality. This, however, would scarcely be consonant with our accepted policy of not taking a "leading position" in this controversy, since a change on our part from support to abstention would attract a good deal of attention; it could be expected to be taken as serving public notice that we were at odds with the US on the whole Chinese issue and would undoubtedly arouse resentment in the US, where there may well be lively recollections of the pressures to which we exposed them as a result of our initiative for the admission of new members. It would probably also stimulate a rash of speculation at home and abroad that we were preparing to recognize the Peking Government.

8. On balance we believe it will be to our advantage to continue to stand with the United States on this issue at the 11th Session. This will not, of course, preclude our reminding them of our misgivings over the continued exclusion of Communist China from the UN and of our expectation that a more positive approach to the problem cannot be deferred much longer.

9. If the State Department decides to approach us on this matter we shall delay our reply, in the knowledge, however, that ultimately we will concur in a further moratorium for the duration of the Eleventh Session of the General Assembly. It is hoped that our apparent reluctance to commit ourselves in advance will in itself give some notice that we are no longer as reconciled as in the past with the moratorium arrangement.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN UN

We have noted with interest the substance of PITEL 10 of August 10 that Canada will go along, although reluctantly, with the USA moratorium. We should like to offer one or two comments having in mind the work and the effectiveness of this Mission and of the Canadian Delegation to the Eleventh Session.

2. With this in mind and with reference particularly to our relations with the USA Delegation, there seems little to be gained from going through a period of pretending that we are undecided whether to support the moratorium at the Eleventh Session. Since we intend to support the USA in the end, might it not be better to be forthright about the issue on which the USA position is less inflexible and where there is consequently greater scope for the Canadian Delegation to make a useful contribution. If we try to keep the USA Mission guessing until the last moment about our attitude on Chinese representation, they are almost certain to be less forthright with us on other issues coming before the next session. The net result might be that we achieve nothing with respect to Chinese representation, since we intend to support the moratorium when it comes to the vote, and we reduce the possibility that we may influence the USA on other questions.

3. We wholeheartedly agree that our reluctance in this matter should be brought home to the USA in the hope that it might have the desired effect on USA thinking about Chinese representation. The main suggestion in this telegram relates to method. We think that Canada's attitude toward the moratorium could be emphasized positively in a frank and forceful explanation of position. This would, it is true, reassure the USA that Canada is prepared for the sake of Western solidarity to give its support for another moratorium but it would also put the USA on notice that we have adopted this position with increasing and we think well founded misgivings. Moreover, by frankly stating our position we would encourage the USA to reciprocate on this and, more important in our view, on other issues.

4. The alternative method, a delay in stating our position, could work to the disadvantage of the Mission and latter of the Assembly Delegation. It is our impression that the differences which arose between the USA and Canadian Delegations at the last Assembly have produced some coolness towards us on the part of USA officials here, at least on political subjects. This naturally prompts us to be wary about playing hard to get on an issue on which the USA is so sensitive and on which Canada has already decided to give USA support, however reluctant.

5. The last sentence of the PITEL indicates that we may not make any use of this restatement of policy. Although it may be difficult to contrive, it would be useful for the Permanent Mission to have as well a statement of Canadian views which could be used at least in informal conversations with friendly delegations (I have in mind India as well as USA) during the period of exchanging views which precedes every session of the General Assembly. In preparing such a statement you may wish to consider the views expressed in this telegram.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN U.N.

There are two related problems in dealing with a possible United States approach to this issue.

2. First, how long do we delay advising the United States, if we are approached, that we propose to go along with the moratorium? It was not our intention to suggest that the delay would be very long and that we would keep the United States guessing until the very last days before the issue was raised in the Assembly. Apart from the objections outlined in your message, if we are in the end to give our support, too long a delay may give the impression that the United States can get us to rally to any of their views if they apply enough pressure. Our thought was merely that we should not immediately agree when we are approached but that we should take a few days at least before committing ourselves: we would wait long enough to establish that we had to make an effort but not so long as to enable the Americans to lay siege and to have grounds to believe that we have yielded to pressure. Such a tactic is more likely to lend plausibility to the positive and frank explanation you suggest in paragraph 3 of your message under reference.

3. A second problem is involved in the degree of support we should give the USA on this issue should there be an Assembly discussion. It seems to me that, to be consistent, if we agree with some reluctance to another moratorium, we shall have to be restrained in our support and either abstain from making a statement or make a somewhat cautious one. This will depend of course on the trend of the debate: if there appeared to be a risk that the moratorium might be defeated, we might have to review our position.

4. In the circumstances, at this stage in informal conversations with friendly delegations, it can merely be said that the problem is under consideration and that we have some doubts about the mechanical solution provided by the moratorium formula. When we have discussed the matter with the USA and made our views known to them, the line will have of course to be revised, but again it seems to me that we should have to explain frankly our reservations in supporting the USA in discussions with the representatives of certain countries.

ADMISSION OF CHINA TO THE UNITED NATIONS

When Mr. Heeney was speaking to me on the telephone on September 1, about another matter, he referred to our telegram No. V-386 of August 29, to the Mission in New York, concerning the attitude we should adopt to the United States when it proposed a moratorium. Mr. Heeney had spoken on the telephone to Mr. Pearson about this and Mr. Pearson had agreed with him that it was not advisable for us on the whole to follow a "coy" policy. If we intended to go along with the moratorium (and we had, in fact, no alternative), then we should tell the Americans straightforwardly that we would agree with them and gather whatever kudos we could from this agreement. You will recall that Mr. Pearson spoke along the same lines when we saw him on August 30.

I explained to Mr. Heeney that it had not been our intention to play coy. We had not as yet received any requests for support from the U.S. and it seemed to us that we ought not to give an impression of enthusiasm by rushing our agreement. It was essential that the Americans not assume that they could count on support from their friends for such proposals indefinitely. It was particularly important that they should realize the difficulties they would face in the future and take this into consideration when planning their policy. Mr. Heeney agreed that we should make this point clear to the Americans but he suggested a different method of doing so which I think has a great deal to recommend it. Mr. Heeney agreed that when the Americans asked for our support we should send him a message asking him to tell the Americans frankly our position. We would agree without further hesitation to support the moratorium but he would explain our doubts on the wisdom of the policy and our belief that such a policy could not be continued much longer. Mr. Heeney spoke of seeing either Mr. Dulles or Mr. Murphy.

It seems to me that this would be an excellent way to deal with the subject. We could get some credit from the Americans for loyalty and at the same time we could explain to them our misgivings much more effectively than in any other way. If you agree with this policy we shall, when the time comes, prepare a telegram to Mr. Heeney for your consideration.²¹

BRIEF FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION TO GENERAL ASSEMBLY — CHINESE REPRESENTATION

If we are planning in any event to support the moratorium resolution, I think as I said to you by phone on August 31 that there would be advantage in our informing State Department to this effect now on our own initiative. We should thereby get some credit for taking this decision without pressure and more attention may be paid to any misgivings we may express about the continued exclusion of Communist China from the UN.

2. Policy outlined in your V386 of August 29 was presumably based on the assumption that State Department would be making an early attempt to secure our support for the moratorium resolution. USA has not yet approached us presumably in expectation that we will support the moratorium or at least that we will not withhold support without giving them reasonable advance notice. In discussing question of Chinese representation at UNESCO conference (reference our telegram 1881 of October 20†) we were at some disadvantage in not being able to allude to our position on the moratorium resolution in the General Assembly. This subject is going to be progressively more difficult to avoid and, in the circumstances, I see little advantage in waiting longer to be approached by USA. At this late stage the delay tactic suggested in paragraph 2 of your V386 is unlikely to be convincing.

3. These observations take on further point from the request to us (your telegram V1409 of October 27†) to discuss outstanding agenda items for the next session of the Assembly at the official level here (paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference refers). It would be helpful if this matter could be cleared up at the same time and we hope to begin conversations with State Department officials on the agenda in the next two or three days.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION

An aide-mémoire left with us on October 29 by an officer of the United States Embassy here contains a review of the US Government's tentative position on a number of items, including Chinese representation, to which it refers in the following terms:

"The US shall continue actively to oppose any efforts designed to change the representation of China in the General Assembly. The United States shall take the position that the Assembly should decide not to consider any proposals designed to exclude the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and/or to seat Chinese Communists."

2. In the circumstances, I agree that you should now let the State Department know that we have considered their position on this issue and are prepared to support another moratorium provided that, along the lines of last year's resolution postponement of consideration is limited to the regular session of the Eleventh Assembly. At the same time it should be pointed out that we are not — repeat not — contemplating taking part in any debate there may be on the subject.

3. You might then go on to explain our view that they should not count on indefinite continuance of support from their friends for such proposals, and that we foresee breakers ahead next year; we would hope therefore that they would take account of these difficulties when planning their future policy on this issue. In particular you might make the following points:

(1) Countries are once more beginning to extend recognition to the Central People's Government, and this factor, taken in conjunction with the enlarged membership of the United Nations, including many states which have already recognized the Peking régime, may be expected to frustrate attempts to hold the present line in the Assembly a year from now.

(2) One effect of the present Middle Eastern crisis will no doubt be to consolidate the Arab-Asian Bloc and consequently increase pressure for seating representatives of the Peking Government in the United Nations. Relations between East and West are likely to be exacerbated — in our view without adequate compensatory advantages — by what they will regard as a stubborn refusal to recognize the political facts of life.

(3) The interest of Canada, and presumably also that of the United States, in fostering the development of the United Nations into an effective instrument for the realization of the aims set forth in the Charter argue strongly for making it as universal as possible in membership. The denial of representation in the U.N. to the effective government of one-fifth of the people of the world is not only a source of weakness per se to the United Nations but introduces stresses into the organization which further complicate and undermine much of its work.

4. In view of the heavy preoccupation of the Acting Secretary of State and Senior Officers of the State Department with the Middle East and Eastern Europe I leave it to you to decide what level the approach on this subject should be made.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION

I saw Walter Robertson this morning and informed him of our decision to support the moratorium along the lines of last year's resolution provided that postponement of consideration is limited to the regular session of the Eleventh Assembly. Robertson said he had hoped we would do so and expressed appreciation for our having reached this decision and informing him of it. He said that the USA intention was that the moratorium should apply for the entire Eleventh Session of the Assembly and any difference in the wording of this year's moratorium resolution from last year's would simply reflect the fact that the Eleventh Session would run beyond the end of the calendar year.

2. I also expressed our misgivings about the moratorium approach to this problem in the future along the lines suggested in your paragraph 3. These considerations, of course, carried no weight with Robertson, who expressed himself in the same uncompromising terms on this subject with which you are familiar. He recalled the three congressional resolutions on this subject as evidence of full congressional and public support for the USA Government's attitude towards Chinese representation in the UN. When I asked him what the attitude of the USA Government would be if the number of governments supporting Communist Chinese membership were to increase to a point where the barrier against them could no longer be held, he said they presented no problems so far as the USA was concerned: if the General Assembly were to vote in favour of Communist Chinese membership, the Administration would be faced immediately with a unanimous demand by Congress for action to take the USA out of the UN.²²

Ottawa, March 2, 1956

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

CANADIAN POLICY ON TERRITORIAL WATERS AND THE CONTINENTAL SHELF

In 1952 the Interdepartmental Committee on Territorial Waters began a general study of Canadian territorial waters and continental shelf problems having regard to certain international and domestic events that had taken place since the last general study in 1937. The principal new events were the following:

(a) The Union of Newfoundland with Canada

Shortly before the Union of Newfoundland with Canada the Prime Minister stated in the House of Commons on February 8th, 1949:

"We intend to contend, and hope to be able to get acquiescence in the contention that the waters west of Newfoundland constituting the gulf of St. Lawrence shall become an inland sea. We hope, that with Newfoundland as a part of Canadian territory, the gulf of St. Lawrence west of Newfoundland will all become territorial waters of Canada, whereas before there would be only the usual off-shore portion that would thus become part of the territorial waters. Of course that is a matter which is not governed by statutes; it is governed by the comity of nations. It is our intention to assert that position and it is our hope that it will be recognized as a valid contention."

(Hans., Can., Feb.8, 1949, at p.368)

Also, during the negotiations for Union in 1948, in response to an enquiry by the Newfoundland delegation, the following answer was given on behalf of Canada:

"With respect to the establishment of territorial waters it is our understanding that the "headland to headland" rule, as it now applies to Newfoundland, will continue to apply."

(b) The Anglo-Norwegian Case

The decision of the International Court of Justice in the Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case in 1951 upheld the Norwegian "baseline" system. Norwegian territorial waters are measured, not from the coastline but from baselines drawn between promontories and islands along the coast. It was indicated that in certain circumstances this was a proper way of delimiting territorial waters. The decision has led to a re-examination of territorial waters by many countries.

(c) The Continental Shelf

In 1945 the Government of the United States by proclamation, inaugurated a new era by claiming jurisdiction over the continental shelf off the shores of the United States to its outermost seaward limit.

(d) Work by the International Law Commission

The International Law Commission has for some time been considering and seeking the views of states on a territorial waters and a continental shelf doctrine. Draft articles have been circulated to the various states, including Canada, for study and comment.

On the recommendation of the Interdepartmental Committee in 1952 the Government retained Mr. G.F. Curtis, Dean of the Faculty of Law, University of British Columbia, to prepare a memorandum setting out the present position of international law governing territorial waters and examining the manner in which it could best be applied to Canadian waters, taking into account such statements or declarations of policy as may have been made in the past. This memorandum includes a survey of the international legal position, the results of a close study of policy in relation to Canadian and Newfoundland waters, a technical comparison of the physical characteristics of the Canadian and Norwegian coasts and an economic survey of fishing and other activities on the Canadian coast. A summary of the memorandum† (apart from the technical annexes) is attached hereto.

In the course of its study the Interdepartmental Committee sought information and advice from the Departments of External Affairs, Fisheries, Mines and Technical Surveys, National Defence, National Revenue, Northern Affairs and National Resources, Transport, Justice, the Canadian Maritime Commission and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

On November 16, 1955, the Cabinet agreed that a Cabinet Committee consisting of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, together with such other Ministers as might wish to attend, be established to consider policy on territorial waters questions and recommendations that would be submitted on this matter by officials studying the problem. The Committee met on December 6, 1955 and February 28, 1956.

I. TERRITORIAL WATERS

The expression "territorial waters" is ambiguous. In exact use it comprises both the sea areas enclosed by land formations to which the term "inland waters" in strictness applies; and also the marginal belt lying seaward from the coast and the closing lines of inland waters concerning which the expression "territorial sea" is more apt.

(a) Baselines

[Paragraphe non déclassifié./One paragraph was not declassified.]

(b) Breadth of the Territorial Sea

Up to the present time it has been Canada's policy to regard the three mile limit as being applicable to Canada. There is no international agreement on a uniform limit, and the International Law Commission has so far been unable to reach agreement on the point. Beginning in April the Commission is again considering the matter in an effort to decide on an agreed draft article.

The United Kingdom and the United States are traditionally opposed to any limitation on the freedom of the seas, particularly to an extension of the breadth of the territorial sea beyond three miles. Other countries however, particularly since the close of the war, claim wider limits, variously fixed at 4, 6 and 12 miles, the 12 mile limit being claimed by the Soviet Union and its satellites among others.

Canada, as a possessor of extensive coastal fisheries on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, does not share the interests of the United Kingdom and United States in narrowing the territorial sea to three miles. On the Canadian Atlantic seaboard it is necessary in the interest of fishery conservation to restrict fishing by Canadian draggers to areas beyond a 12 mile limit, but as matters now stand foreign draggers are permitted to fish up to the three mile limit.

Canadian fishing interests, therefore, would best be served if the breadth of the territorial sea was 12 miles. However, for Canada this is an ultimate goal, and as the matter is still a subject of international discussion and as the United States and United Kingdom are actively resisting claims to limits beyond three miles, it would appear advisable for Canada to await international developments. After the results of the discussion in the International Law Commission are known, the Canadian position should be reviewed and a decision then made regarding what steps Canada should take.

[Quinze paragraphes non déclassifiés./Fifteen paragraphs were not declassified.]

II. THE CONTINENTAL SHELF

Canada has never made any formal international claim to the continental shelf lying off the Canadian coast. Generally speaking, the shelf on the east coast is quite extensive. On the Pacific coast the shelf is much narrower and in some places is less than a mile in width. The International Law Commission has circulated for study by states a draft article which, in the interests of attaining uniformity throughout the world, suggests fixing the seaward limit of a nation's shelf at the point where the water over the shelf reaches a depth of 100 fathoms. Such a rule would be quite undesirable for Canada because the 100 fathom mark is reached in places on both the east and west coasts of the mainland at points well within the continental shelf as clearly defined by nature.

It appears to the Committee that the placing of an arbitrary depth limit on the shelf as proposed by the Commission is contrary to the whole shelf principle and the premise on which the doctrine rests. On the other hand, in some parts of the world it is difficult to determine limits of the shelf. It would seem that Canada should advocate that a littoral state should have the right to explore and exploit the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil of the whole shelf lying off the coasts of that state to the point seaward where the shelf plunges into the ocean depths, but that, where the outer edge of the shelf is ill-defined, a depth limit might be set such as the 100 fathom mark. Virtually the entire shelf off Canada, except in certain Arctic areas, is clearly defined and this approach would give Canada rights to the entirety.

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has prepared a scientific description of the shelf, together with a chart showing the actual shelf and also the limits of Canada's rights under the Law Commission's 100 fathom rule. As discussion on this doctrine will come up at the United Nations almost certainly in 1956, it is necessary that Canada's policy in this respect be decided as soon as possible.

It is not recommended that Canada make any formal claim to the shelf at the present time along the lines of the United States 1945 proclamation. Under the continental shelf doctrine as proposed by the International Law Commission, Canada would acquire rights to the shelf in any case, and our position would not be strengthened if any claim were put forward at the present time.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

In detail it is recommended that the following decisions be taken at this time.

[Quatre paragraphes non déclassifiés./Four paragraphs were not declassified.]

(e) To decide in principle to the extension of the breadth of the territorial sea to 12 miles as an ultimate goal, but to await the outcome of the deliberations of the International Law Commission on this question at its forthcoming session in April before determining how this policy might be implemented.

[Deux paragraphes non déclassifiés./Two paragraphs were not declassified.]

Continental Shelf

(h) To make no formal claim to the continental shelf pending the outcome of discussions in the United Nations.

(i) To adopt the position that a littoral state should have the right to explore and exploit the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil of the continental shelf to the point where it plunges into the ocean depths, but where the outer edge of the shelf is ill-defined, to agree to the limit being set at the 200 meter mark.

TERRITORIAL WATERS AND THE CONTINENTAL SHELF; POLICY

7. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, as Chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters, submitted a report and recommendations on future policy respecting territorial waters and the continental shelf.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Mar. 2, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 53-56)

8. Mr. Lesage suggested that discussion on the report be deferred until the following week.

9. The Minister of Public Works, who expected to be away that week, felt the recommendation on the breadth of the territorial sea was too weak. Nova Scotian opinion strongly favoured the 12 mile limit and, while this could probably not be achieved, particularly as the United Kingdom and the United States were opposed, nevertheless, it should be asserted at the appropriate time.

10. The Cabinet deferred consideration of the report of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters dealing with future policy on territorial waters and the continental shelf.

TERRITORIAL WATERS AND THE CONTINENTAL SHELF; POLICY
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE MARCH 8)

17. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources reviewed briefly the recommendations of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters. These included the following:

(a) To adopt, in principle, for Labrador and parts of Newfoundland the Norwegian baseline system for delimiting the territorial sea.

[Paragraphe non déclassifié./One paragraph was not declassified.]

(c) If (a) and (b) were accepted, to inform the United States initially, and then the United Kingdom and France after which new maps showing these changes would be published.

[Paragraphe non déclassifié./One paragraph was not declassified.]

(e) To extend, in principle, the breadth of the Canadian territorial sea to 12 miles.

[Paragraphe non déclassifié./One paragraph was not declassified.]

(g) To await United Nations discussion before making any claims to the continental shelf, but to take the position that a littoral state should be able to exploit the resources of the seabed and subsoil of the continental shelf to where it plunged into the depths and to agree to a limit at the 200 metre mark where the outer edge was ill-defined.

The point made by Mr. Winters previously about the 12 mile limit of the territorial sea had been met in the original recommendation.

Negotiations on all these questions would be difficult and delicate. The main Canadian complaint at present had to do with foreigners fishing inside the 12-mile limit. On this matter Canadian interests ran directly counter to those of the U.K. and U.S. who favoured the 3-mile limit. It was of interest to note that at a recent meeting of 21 nations, all except the U.S. favoured a minimum limit of 12 miles. It would probably turn out that in the International Law Commission and at the U.N. itself a large majority would be in favour of a limit of 12 miles or more.

18. During the discussion the following points emerged:

[Deux paragraphes non déclassifiés./Two paragraphs were not declassified.]

19. The Cabinet approved the recommendations of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters for future policy on territorial waters and the continental shelf.

TERRITORIAL WATERS; POLICY

16. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources said the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters had felt some time ago that there would be no point in advising the United States of the government's decision to adopt the Norwegian baseline system for the coast of Labrador and the east and south coasts of Newfoundland and to claim the Gulf of St. Lawrence as Canadian inland waters, because reports had been received from Washington that, at least until the U.S. elections, a very negative reaction could be expected to any approach concerning the gulf. Subsequently, in response to questions in the house, the Prime Minister had indicated in general terms the government policy on the adoption of the Norwegian baseline system and the extension of the breadth of the territorial sea to 12 miles as an ultimate goal. Both the United Kingdom and the United States had a very active interest in these two questions.

The Minister, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, recommended that the U.K. and U.S. governments be advised officially of the Canadian position in the fairly near future. This should be done, however, on the basis that these two policy decisions were simply the most immediate and urgent that had to be taken in preparation for the meeting of the United Nations, and that study was continuing of other aspects of Canadian territorial waters policy. Thus it would be possible to avoid saying anything at this time about the Gulf of St. Lawrence without giving an impression that there were no other questions of policy to come up later.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Aug. 3, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 167-56).†

17. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on Canadian territorial waters policy and agreed,

(a) that decisions of policy already approved be adhered to as setting forth the objectives that the government wished to achieve;

(b) that between now and the meeting of the United Nations, the U.S. and the U.K. governments be advised officially of the Canadian decision to support, during the discussion of the report of the International Law Commission in the United Nations, the adoption of the straight baseline system for the measurement of territorial waters as approved by the International Court of Justice in the Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case and of the 12-mile limit for territorial waters; and,

(c) that nothing be said to any government about the Gulf of St. Lawrence until there had been an opportunity to assess the discussions at the meeting of the United Nations and developments in the United States attitude thereafter.

TERRITORIAL WATERS

Cabinet has now approved the memorandum (of August 3) attached to my letter under reference.

2. While we assume initiative in talks Wednesday will be left to your interlocutor, it will be in order for you (as agreed in Cabinet decision) to inform Elbrick, if necessary in the course of your conversation, that, following up the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons on July 30, the Canadian Government intends to support in the UN (when International Law Commission's recommendations on various aspects of international law of the sea comes up for discussion) the adoption of a twelve-mile limit for the territorial sea. You may explain that Canadian sentiment, particularly in coastal regions, is strongly in favour of a moderate extension of the territorial sea; furthermore, international sentiment seems to favour an extension of the territorial sea. Since, as the International Law Commission has inferred, international law does countenance a breadth for the territorial sea of twelve miles, such a limit generally agreed to might form a basis for a solution to the now vexing problem of states rights in adjacent seas.

3. If Elbrick enquires about our position on baseline system you may also say that, in line with the decision of the International Court of Justice in the Anglo-Norwegian fisheries case and the recommendation of the International Law Commission, we also intend to take the position that the so-called straight baseline system be employed for computing the seaward limit of the territorial sea in appropriate cases.

4. So far as we are aware the only approaches received from the United States Embassy in Ottawa on this matter were those reported in my teletypes 4209 of August 9† and 1176 of August 1†. We would be anxious of course to see your report by teletype of the views entertained by State Department on Canadian position in regard to territorial waters as revealed by Elbrick's conversation with you.

TERRITORIAL WATERS

As I indicated in yesterday's telephone conversation with the Under-Secretary (and as you will see from my following telegram on my interview with Burke Elbrick on territorial waters) it was clearly evident from what USA officials said yesterday that the announcement of Canada's intentions with respect to territorial waters at the coming UN Assembly has caused the USA Government very serious concern. What they are especially disturbed about (and what has caused deep disappointment among USA officials) is the lack of advance consultation between our two governments prior to the Canadian announcement.

2. We should, in my opinion attach the highest importance to advance consultation with the USA in these matters, not only because of our traditional relationship with them and their legitimate interest in Canada's position, but also because of the possible effects that developments in this sensitive area will have on our general relations with the USA. Specifically I am worried about the possibility that recent developments may create difficulties in the way of satisfactory settlement of the many and important boundary waters problem now outstanding between the two countries. I need mention, as examples, only the important negotiations that are anticipated concerning waters flowing across the international boundary²³ and the vexing and difficult problem of dredging near Cornwall Island.²⁴

3. Although the situation created by our announcement was serious enough as of yesterday morning, I was fairly confident then that it could be corrected with some conscientious efforts on our part. Now, however, having seen on the Associated Press wire and in this morning's Washington Post a story from Ottawa (attributed to "authorities" and "officials") that Canada plans to claim the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Hecate Strait and other areas as Canadian waters, I am again disquieted about the effect of these developments on our relations with the USA. In the first place, in my opinion, State Department officials would have considerable justification if they were to think that I was somewhat less than frank in my conversations with them yesterday morning. This, of course, is a matter of some importance for the future conduct of business between the State Department and this Embassy. But what is perhaps even more serious in my view, is that the USA will suspect that without the advance consultation to which they feel entitled, the Canadian Government has taken decisions that have serious implications for their own interests as a nation and for other friendly powers.

4. I have not yet been able to assess fully what the eventual effects of these developments may be, but one thing that seems certain, even now, is that we must be willing to receive USA representations concerning the position we intend to take at the UN Assembly on the question of territorial waters. It would not be surprising to me if the USA were to suggest that the discussions between the two governments should include the Gulf of St. Lawrence and those other areas which have been mentioned in the press.

5. As agreed in our telephone conversation, we have told the State Department that the story concerning the Gulf of St. Lawrence was completely unauthorized and that Canada has no intention of raising the question of the Gulf at the coming UN Assembly. I am not certain whether or not it would be desirable to make an official denial of the stories which have appeared in the press. It may be that since most USA newspapers have concentrated on covering the political conventions the press story will not attract as much attention as might have been expected. However, there is always the possibility that there will be editorial comments later on. We have already seen, in the Richmond Times despatch, an editorial which compares Canada's action on the 12-mile limit and the straight baseline system to Colonel Nasser's action on the Suez Canal. If this editorial (a copy of which we are sending by bag) is an indication of the kind of comment that may be made, we should, I think, be prepared to take some action to put the record straight. I should appreciate your views on what might be done in that regard and also on what further steps might be taken to improve the rather uncomfortable position we now are in with respect to the State Department.

6. You will no doubt have thought already about the serious breach of security that seems to have occurred in connection with this subject on which all official papers that we have seen have borne the security classification Secret, For Canadian Eyes Only.

TERRITORIAL WATERS

My interview with Burke Elbrick which was postponed from the original date of Wednesday August 15 because Elbrick had to be away from Washington that day, took place yesterday shortly before noon. Elbrick was accompanied by Ernest Allister, Deputy Director of the State Department Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs and Ray Yingling, Assistant legal Adviser for European Affairs.

2. The two most important points that emerged from the comments of Elbrick and Yingling were:

(a) The USA Government is seriously concerned and deeply disappointed about the lack of advance consultation between the two governments prior to the Canadian announcement about our intentions with respect to the question of territorial waters at the November session of the UN Assembly.

(b) The USA Government is most anxious to consult with Canada whenever we are ready, prior to the UN Assembly meeting. Arrangements have just about been completed for Yingling to discuss this and related question with Fitzmaurice, Legal Adviser to the UK Foreign Office, around mid-September in London. The USA would like to be able to talk with Canada early in September and they suggested that one or two key officials from Canada and the USA (one of theirs will probably be a fisheries expert) might meet in New York about that time, for discussions which might include Vincent Evans, Legal Adviser to the UK's delegation to the UN. I said in reply that while I did not know whether a threeway discussion would appeal to you, I would pass the State Department suggestion along to you, and, in view of the possible difficulties of timing, ask for a reply as soon as possible. From my point of view it would appear highly desirable that we work out as rapidly as circumstances permit arrangements for discussions on this subject between Canadian and USA officials. I should be grateful if you could let me know whether the idea of a meeting in New York, with or without Vincent Evans, is feasible.

3. Although the interview was conducted in a cordial atmosphere, and although Elbrick and Yingling showed commendable restraint in their comments, they left no doubt that our announcement of July 30 had given rise to very serious concern in the USA Government. As I have already indicated the State Department were concerned most of all about the absence of advance consultations. Their worries on this score, which are in my view legitimate, seem to have been deepened by a report from the USA Embassy in Ottawa which lead State Department officials to think that we intended simply to inform them officially of the position we intended to adopt at the UN, but that we might be willing to discuss our decisions if the USA Government wished. Fortunately I was able to give them some reassurance on that point by referring to the info you gave me in the final sentence of your L-1176 August 1.†

4. In their comments on the question of advance consultations, Elbrick and Yingling indicated that they had the impression that there was some kind of an understanding between Canadian and USA officials that each government would consult the other prior to any public announcement of a change in its traditional policy. (Canada, they said, had always adhered to the 3-mile rule for territorial waters.) Elbrick mentioned that there appeared to be some inconsistency between this understanding and the report they had received from their Embassy in Ottawa.

5. Yingling said that, speaking certainly for himself and he thought for other USA officials who were concerned with these matters, the Canadian announcement had been "like a bolt from the blue". (He referred to the usually cooperative atmosphere that prevailed between Canada and the USA, and the help that our representatives had given them in the past in connection with discussions similar to those that were scheduled for November at the General Assembly.) He went on to say that in this case there had been no intimation that Canada was likely to come out in favour of the 12-mile limit and the system of straight baselines. This he said was a complete and sudden surprise. Although he had been aware that fisheries interests in Canada had been pressing for the adoption of the 12-mile limit he did not know that this problem had been as important in Canada as it now appeared to have been. In his own view, Yingling said, the fisheries aspect was the least important of the many aspects of the territorial sea question. At any rate the record of cooperation between Canada and the USA with respect to fisheries was excellent and served as a good example to the rest of the world. If the fisheries problem was serious in our view, Yingling said, he was confident that a mutually agreeable solution could be worked out.

6. Turning to the Prime Minister's statement of July 30 (which was the basis of our conversations), Yingling said that the original worry of the USA Government was that by virtue of this public announcement the Canadian Government had taken a final and firm position on the 12-mile rule and the baseline system. If this had been the case, he should have been extremely disappointed because it would have meant that any talks between the two governments would have lacked any real point. It now seemed, Yingling continued, that the Prime Minister had left (as Yingling termed it) a "loophole" which seemed to permit of consultations with other interested countries. It had been noted, he said, that apparently there had been discussions with the UK authorities. He mentioned that Canada's decision on territorial waters would, of course, be of concern not only to the UK, the USA and France, but to other members of the Western Alliance, because, as he put it, "of the way in which wars are fought". Yingling's final point was that our announcement had already caused the State Department some slight embarrassment when they were unable to answer an enquiry they had received from the Mexican Embassy about the Canadian announcement of July 30. (The nature of the Mexican enquiry was not revealed.)

7. In reply to all of this, I said that I would readily understand the anxieties of the USA on this question. As their officials would know, the present status of international law on territorial waters was certainly clouded. This and related questions had been subjected to long and intensive study by the Canadian departments concerned and had been considered on two separate occasions by the government. The result of this study and consideration was that which had been outlined by the Prime Minister in his statement to the House of Commons on July 30, namely that when the recommendations of the International Law Commission come up for discussion in the General Assembly, Canada intended to support the adoption of 12-mile limit for the territorial sea and the straight baseline system for computing the seaward limit and the territorial sea. I emphasize that as the Prime Minister had intimated in his statement we would not be appearing at the Assembly without first having spoken to our friends.

8. The USA concern about the possible inflexibility of our position on this question was also not hard to understand. However, there was no point in pretending that the position stated by the Prime Minister was not that which the Government deemed to be in Canada's best interest. At the same time I was confident, I said, that it had always been our intention to consult the USA (and other friendly nations) before we went before the Assembly. The USA Government, I said, had had some experience with the situation in which they had found it necessary to make policy announcements without having had the benefit of consultation with other countries, even when such consultation was obviously desirable.

9. On the question of flexibility in the Canadian position, I drew attention to that part of the Prime Minister's statement in which he had said that he did not wish to say "that there had been a firm decision that may not be varied as a consequence of our conferring with other nations" It appeared from that part of the statement that the way was still open for the USA Government to present their arguments against the twelve mile rule and the baseline system, prior to the meeting of the UN Assembly. If strong counter arguments could be made, I said, I was confident that they would be taken into account by Canada. It seemed to me, however, that in view of the long and careful consideration given to this question in Ottawa, the USA arguments would have to be particularly strong and telling.

10. I then suggested that the USA Government might wish to advance the date (early September) that had been suggested for a meeting between representatives of the two governments. Elbrick replied that the timing would naturally be left to the Canadian authorities, but he emphasized the wish of the USA Government to have discussions whenever we were ready. During this part of the interview Yingling said that his conversations with Fitzmaurice in London would be devoted partly to discussing the tactics USA and UK would use in the General Assembly discussion on the International Law Commission recommendations. It had been intended, in accordance with the usual practice, to have similar advance discussions with Canada as well. At this point he made the suggestion for a three way meeting in New York to which I have already referred. I might emphasize my own view that in view of the circumstances and the serious concern displayed by these USA officials about the future régime of the territorial sea, it is highly desirable for us to engage in pre-Assembly discussions with the USA Government as soon as practicable. The timing of any discussions will, I should think, have to be fitted into the arrangements that the USA have almost completed for their talks in London in mid-September.

11. At the conclusion of our interview it was interesting that Elbrick referred to the visit to the State Department by a delegation of business men and the members of the Chamber of Commerce from Chicago. They had, Elbrick said, made a strong case for an increased diversion at Chicago, but nevertheless in the interest of international harmony and consultation, the State Department had opposed HR3210 and as we knew it had been vetoed. Although there was no firm info available now, it appeared that Canada and the USA would face the prospect of bilateral discussions on this question in the not too distant future. It was evident that in the State Department's view there was a clear parallel between consultation on the Chicago diversion and lack of consultation on the far more important question of territorial waters.

12. In a preceding telegram I have outlined my views on the unfortunate story that appeared in the press today to the effect that Canada will claim as Canadian waters the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Hecate Strait and other areas. The effect of that story, on the State Department (particularly in view of the timing) might well have been to undo whatever good was accomplished through the interview with Elbrick.

TERRITORIAL WATERS; DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUG. 10)

36. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources said the United States was concerned about Canada's announced intention to support the adoption of the 12 mile limit and the straight baseline system for delimiting territorial waters. These U.S. worries were further intensified by a report in the press that, in addition, Canada would claim the Gulf of St. Lawrence and certain other bodies of water as its territorial waters. The U.S. government felt strongly that there should have been consultations with them before Canada publicly adopted such an important position and was most anxious, even at this stage, to discuss these questions before the General Assembly met in November.

As regards the Hecate Strait, it had always been Canada's intention to discuss this particular problem bilaterally with the U.S. This matter was not yet ready to be dealt with but the U.S. authorities could be told Canada intended to consult them directly on it at the appropriate time. On certain waters in the north, such as Amundsen Gulf and Foxe Basin, no action was proposed until more was known of the situation, and views on the whole subject were clearer. However, difficulties would occur in any talks over the Gulf of St. Lawrence because it had been decided in principle eventually to claim it as an inland water. Nevertheless, it could be pointed out to the Americans that, as long ago as 1949, the Prime Minister had said in Parliament that one of the advantages arising from Newfoundland entering the Canadian confederation was that it would then be possible to claim the gulf as an inland water.

There was no doubt that the U.S. and the U.K. were very worried about the extension of territorial waters beyond the 3 mile limit. The former proposed to discuss the matter in the U.K. soon but, before doing so, wished to talk to Canadian officials as soon as possible. Accordingly, a meeting had been proposed in New York about the 10th of September. He suggested that, at this meeting, the U.S. authorities be informed that Canada had decided to support in the U.N. the straight baseline system and the 12 mile limit. It would be unwise, however, to go into details and produce charts to show how the baseline system would work in Newfoundland, for example. This could be left until after the U.N. debate on the whole subject was held and an assessment made of international opinion. France should also be informed at this time what our general intentions were.

37. The Secretary of State for External Affairs added that final acceptance of Canadian policy should depend on U.N. views. There appeared to be little doubt that most countries would have the same opinion as Canada, but Canada would be under great pressure from the U.S. and the U.K. to adhere to the 3 mile limit.

38. During the discussion it was emphasized that Canada had consistently stated that fisheries rights already guaranteed by treaty would be respected and, on that score, neither the U.S., (particularly in relation to the Hecate Strait), nor the French, need be worried.

39. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on the proposed meeting with the United States to discuss territorial waters and on the attitude to be adopted by the Canadian officials at these discussions.

TERRITORIAL WATERS

The following is for your information:

At our request the Secretary of the French Embassy, Mr. Theysset, called on the Department yesterday and was informed officially of the policy (already outlined by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons in his statement of July 30 — Hansard pages 6700-6703) which the Canadian Government proposes to follow in the forthcoming General Assembly discussions on territorial waters. Specifically Mr. Theysset was informed (a) that Canada will take the position in line with the decision of the International Court of Justice in the Anglo-Norwegian fisheries case and the recommendation of the International Law Commission that the so-called straight baseline system be employed for computing the seaward limit of the territorial sea in appropriate cases, and (b) that Canada will support the adoption of a 12-mile limit for the territorial sea. It was pointed out that Canadian opinion, particularly in coastal regions, is strongly in favour of a moderate extension of the territorial sea; furthermore many countries now seem to favour an extension of the territorial sea. The International Law Commission in its recent recommendations had inferred that international law does countenance a breadth for the territorial sea of 12 miles.

2. Theysset referred to the Prime Minister's mention of "historic fishing rights" and asked if this would include French rights under the convention between the United Kingdom and France signed at London April 8, 1904, whereby French citizens are granted the right to fish in territorial waters on the whole of the west coast of Newfoundland and the east coast from the Strait of Belle Isle south to Cape St. John. He was informed that these French treaty rights were envisaged in the Prime Minister's statement.

3. Theysset also referred to the Prime Minister's reference to consultations with the United Kingdom Government (he did not mention the United States) and asked if consultations were taking place. He was advised that we had informed the United Kingdom Government along the lines we were now informing him.²⁵ For your own information talks on territorial waters are to take place next week in New York between Canadian officials and officials of the United States State Department and of the United Kingdom Permanent Mission to the United Nations. Since these talks are secret we did not mention them to Theysset.

4. Theysset referred to a recent Canadian press despatch attributed to "officials", that Canada plans to claim the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Hecate Strait between the Queen Charlotte Islands and British Columbia, and Amundsen Gulf and Foxe Basin in the Arctic. He was informed that this report was unauthorized. He then asked if we should be raising these questions in the United Nations. We replied that we did not think that they would be relevant to the United Nations discussions.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE UNITED STATES ON TERRITORIAL WATERS POLICY; RECOMMENDATIONS

Attached is a report, with appendix, on discussions held in New York with representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States concerning Canadian policy on territorial waters.

In the light of the position of the United Kingdom and the United States, as indicated in the discussions, the following recommendations are submitted for consideration by the Cabinet Committee:

(a) The invitation of the U.S. should be accepted to have an appropriate group of defence officers, together with a representative of the Department of External Affairs, visit Washington to be advised in detail on and to discuss the security and defence implications of a general extension of territorial waters to 12 miles.

(b) The Department of Fisheries should be asked to prepare a report on the relative advantages and disadvantages from the point of view of Canadian fisheries of

(i) continued adherence to the 3-mile limit with general adoption of the "principle of abstention" (see Appendix to attached report); and ²⁵ Le haut-commissariat du Royaume-Uni a été informé de la politique du Canada relative aux eaux territoriales le 23 août 1956.

The U.K. High Commission was informed of Canadian policy on territorial waters on August 23, 1956.

(ii) adoption of the 12-mile limit without general acceptance of the "principle of abstention".

(c) If the security implications of a general 12-mile limit appear to be as serious for the west as the U.S. and the U.K. have indicated, or, even if the security considerations do not appear to be serious, but if it appears that Canadian fisheries would gain as much or more from the principle of abstention as from the 12-mile limit, the government might wish to consider whether to make its support of the 12-mile limit an alternative position; the first being support of the 3-mile rule, coupled with the principle of abstention. If the 3-mile rule plus that principle did not, at a conference on the subject, appear to be receiving sufficiently general support, the government could then consider whether to support the 12-mile rule as an alternative.

[Paragraphe non déclassifié./One paragraph was not declassified.]

(e) No change should be made in the decision of the Cabinet to support the baseline system.

(f) At the forthcoming discussions in the United Nations, Canada should support the U.S. proposal that, insofar as possible, discussion on the substantive recommendations of the International Law Commission should be deferred and that they should become the subject of consideration at a special international conference to be called to draft an international convention on the international law of the sea.

Since the United Nations session is to begin on November 12, and since the question of territorial waters can be expected to receive consideration at an early stage, it is desirable that action on recommendations (a) and (b) (if approved) should be taken at once and that a decision on the other questions of policy should be taken before that date.

CANADIAN POLICY ON CANADIAN TERRITORIAL WATERS
DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S.-U.K. RE 12-MILE LIMIT AND BASELINES

As agreed by the Cabinet at its meeting of August 10, 1956, a meeting of United States, United Kingdom and Canadian officials was held on September 12th in New York, to discuss the announced position of Canada on territorial waters.

I. 12-MILE LIMIT

The U.S. and U.K. took much the same stand. They had been surprised and dismayed to learn that Canada intended to support the 12-mile limit, before there had been an opportunity for consultation with friendly nations which, along with Canada, had traditionally supported the 3-mile limit. There was a fear that such prior announcement had placed Canada in a position from which it would be difficult to withdraw, even when faced with convincing arguments by its friends, and also that support of the 12-mile limit by a law-abiding nation would encourage more volatile nations to make exorbitant claims. It was argued that any advantage Canada might gain by extending the limit of territorial waters would be more than offset by disadvantages both to Canada and internationally, and that any benefit to Canada could be achieved by other means without an increase in the width of the territorial belt. The following arguments were made in support of the U.S.-U.K. stand:

Security

The security argument was the one on which the United States placed the greatest importance in insisting on the 3-mile limit. It was also of first-rate importance to the United Kingdom. Because of the nature of its military operations in war and in peace the United States would gain nothing from a 12-mile limit off its own shores but would be seriously hampered by a 12-mile limit off foreign shores. U.S. naval intelligence and reconnaissance would be greatly hindered, and U.S. pursuit of enemy vessels in war would be rendered more difficult by the existence of larger bodies of neutral water. The movement of large naval forces and of troops would be rendered more difficult, particularly in the Mediterranean and far east. Certain nations might take the opportunity, clothed in legality, to prevent the passage of these forces. In addition, fleet manoeuvres in some areas would be curtailed because very large expanses of the seas were necessary to enable them to be carried out. Military aircraft flying over the extended territorial waters could be similarly restricted.

Navigation

The passage of civil aeroplanes might be hampered because, while there was a formal right of innocent passage in territorial waters, there was no such right in the air space over those waters. The right of innocent passage of ships could be curtailed by unfriendly nations in peacetime.

Some of the major shipping lanes lay close to the shore. Also, vessels had to take bearings and, on occasion, to use visual aids to navigation by coming close to shorelines. This could be rendered impossible or very difficult if the territorial limit were increased to 12 miles. Also, in general it was preferable to have a ship travelling as much as possible on the free high seas rather than in a zone where it was subject to the laws (and possibly the whims) of other nations.

Fisheries Conservation

It was admitted in the discussions that fisheries conservation was a matter which could not be handled by extension of territorial waters, such as an extension to 12 miles. Indeed, the matter, generally speaking, had already been partially solved on both the east and west coasts of Canada and the United States by treaties with other nations involved.

Exclusive Exploitation of Fish Stocks

It was recognized that there would be certain advantages to be derived by Canadian fishermen from an extension of territorial waters and that pressures undoubtedly arose from the interested groups. However, the U.S. suggested that any gains to Canadian fishermen on the east coast by an extension of the territorial limit to 12 miles would be more than offset by the effects of such an extension on the west coast. Because of the shortness of the coastline of British Columbia in relation to the rest of the western coastline of North America, the gain to B.C. fishermen through an extension of territorial waters off their coast would be much less than what they would lose in the long run in being excluded from a similar territorial belt off the other parts of the west coast. As for the east coast, it was suggested by the U.S. that the problem of foreign draggers fishing within the 12-mile could be met within the framework of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention (between Canada and the U.S., U.K., and seven other European countries). It was also suggested that the problem of conservation of fish off Canada's coasts could best be met by the adoption of the International Law Commission's recommendations on fisheries, which recognize the special interest of a coastal state in off-shore fisheries, and the problem of exclusive exploitation of certain stocks of fish could best be met by the adoption of the so-called "abstention principle". (This principle is explained in a memorandum prepared by the Department of Fisheries and hereto attached.)

It was contended that the desire for exclusive rights over off-shore fisheries could not form a valid ground for extending territorial waters since the limit would have to vary with the different species of fish, and different countries could then contend for different limits. The result would be chaos.

It was emphasized that the establishment of a 12-mile limit universally would "kill" the United Kingdom fishing industry. The U.K. representative said he had been instructed to emphasize most strongly the very serious consequences that would result for British fisheries from any general recognition of a 12-mile limit. It should be mentioned, however, that the U.K. has at present not much liking for the "abstention principle" either. The U.S. representative said that if the "abstention principle" were not accepted the United States itself would be forced to extend jurisdiction over off-shore fisheries, but this would not be done by the extension of complete sovereignty, i.e. the extension of territorial waters. The United States was, therefore, pressing the United Kingdom and other friendly states to study seriously the advantages of the "abstention principle". The U.S. representative argued that, in the realm of fisheries, both the U.S. and Canada had more to gain from general adoption of that principle than from a 12-mile limit. There was no chance of getting both accepted. It would be better, therefore, to stick with the 3-mile rule and try to get recognition for the "abstention principle".

International Uniformity in Fixing of Limits

It was argued by the Canadian representatives that a rigid adherence to the 3-mile rule would result, not in its general acceptance as the international rule, but in continuance and extension of the present chaotic and unlimited claims. The Hague Conference of 1930 had failed because of a refusal by the U.K. and the U.S. to recognize the need for contiguous zones for customs and other purposes. If they, and we, tried to stand rigidly at 3-miles it might only mean failure to get any agreement again. There was a chance of agreement on 12 miles; none on 3.

The U.K. and U.S. representatives did not concede this argument. They recognized that the 3-mile rule had lost ground since 1930 but they argued that it still was the only rule with any broad acceptance. If it were departed from there would be no stopping at 12 miles.

The particular requirements of nations in various fields, such as fishing, customs, pollution, etc., could be met by devices such as contiguous jurisdictional zones and fisheries conservation zones. If these devices were not used where a nation had a particular requirement to satisfy, the nature of the requirement could conceivably provide that nation with an argument for extending territorial jurisdiction over its coastal waters to almost any limit. Because of their vital interest in being able to travel the high seas unimpeded, the great maritime nations, although they had an interest in uniformity in the law of the sea, could not secure it by too great a sacrifice of the principle of freedom of the seas. For this reason, in the eyes of the great maritime powers, the problem of the breadth of the territorial sea was not altogether one which could be resolved by simple majorities voting for territorial waters extensions in international forums.

U.S.-U.K. Proposals and Courses of Action

U.S. and U.K. officials understood that Canada did not propose to make a unilateral claim of a 12-mile limit but that the decisions thus far had related to the position to be adopted by Canada in international discussion on the territorial sea. Canada was strongly urged to reconsider its views on the 12-mile limit, particularly in the light of arguments put forward by the U.S. and U.K.; the effect of Canada's support for the 12-mile limit on the policies of other states; and the suggestion that Canada's fisheries problems could be solved satisfactorily by other means. It was proposed that Canadian officials should meet with U.S. defence officials to learn in detail their views on the effects an extension of territorial waters would have on the security and defence of the western powers.

The International Law Commission proposed that its articles on the law of the sea, rather than being settled immediately at the General Assembly, be taken up at an international conference. The United States intended to support this recommendation and hoped that the conference might be delayed until early 1958 to give nations an opportunity to study and consult. It was hoped that discussion on the substance of the Law Commission's articles would be held to a minimum at the General Assembly. The United States hoped that Canada would be prepared to support the idea of a conference to draw up a convention on territorial waters.

II. BASELINES

The U.S. and U.K. accepted the decision of the International Court of Justice upholding the use of straight baselines in appropriate cases, and appeared also to have no objection to similar provisions in the International Law Commission's articles. The Canadian representatives said that it seemed clear that the criteria in the Court decision applied to the B.C. and Labrador coasts as well as to certain other portions of the Canadian coastline. Examination of the Canadian coast to determine the full extent of proper application had not been completed. It was Canadian policy to apply the baseline system where the physical conditions warranted it. The U.S. and U.K. representatives raised no objection to this statement of the Canadian position.

[Deux paragraphes non déclassifiés./Two paragraphs were not declassified.]

The Canadian officials said they would report the substance of the discussions to the government for its consideration.

TERRITORIAL WATERS: RELATIONSHIP OF THE "PRINCIPLE OF ABSTENTION"

In the discussions of September 12, the United States representatives argued that an extension of territorial waters to 12 miles would not give Canadian fishermen as much protection as the adoption of the so-called "principle of abstention".

This principle had its origin in discussions between Canada and the United States preliminary to the negotiations with Japan which led to the signing of the Tripartite Fisheries

Convention for the North Pacific Ocean. At that time consideration was being given to establishing a zone off the Pacific Coasts of Canada and the United States from which Japanese fishermen would be excluded. To protect such fisheries as salmon and halibut, it was realized that this zone would have to extend hundreds of miles out to sea. If this course had been followed, we might have been criticized for locking up food resources which we could not ourselves fully utilize and thus keeping them from other less fortunate countries who were in need of food.

The zone principle was therefore dropped and in its place a new formula was adopted which was eventually incorporated in the North Pacific Fisheries Convention. Under this formula fully utilized fishery resources are reserved for the exclusive use of countries who, by their conservation efforts, have succeeded in developing these resources at a productive level. Under this formula, which has since then become known as the "abstention principle", states not fishing for any resources in recent years are required to abstain from fishing these resources as long as the following conditions are fulfilled:

1. When the resources are being so fully utilized that an increase in the amount of fishing would not result in any substantial increase in the sustainable yield.
2. The continuing and increasing productivity is the result of and dependent on research by the exploiting countries and restraints on their own fishermen.

This principle has been applied in the North Pacific Fisheries Convention to salmon, halibut and herring. Japan abstains from fishing for these resources which are the backbone of our Pacific Coast fishing industry.

The protection which our industry on the Pacific coast thus enjoys could not be achieved by the extension of territorial water limits, even if they were to be extended by many hundreds of miles. This abstention principle, if recognized in international law, would also give protection to our lobster fishery and any other fisheries which in the future may be fully utilized.

In considering this in relation to the exclusion of other fishermen by means of extended territorial waters, it has to be kept in mind that reservation of a certain area for exclusive fishing by the nationals of one country does not guarantee that the stocks of fish frequenting the area will be taken only by the fishermen fishing there. For example, without the protection of the abstention provisions in the North Pacific Fisheries Convention Japan could take a large share of our salmon outside the 12-mile limit. In so far as halibut, the second important fishery on the Pacific Coast, is concerned a large part of it is caught outside the 12-mile zone. On the Atlantic Coast most of the species of fish, except perhaps lobster, migrate freely in and out of the 12-mile limit and could therefore not be reserved to our nationals alone by the mere fact of extending the territorial water limits by nine miles.

The U.S. representatives further pointed out that in the past several years Canada and the U.S. have been working closely in getting the abstention principle included in the International Law Commission's report for adoption by the United Nations General Assembly as part of the international law relating to the high seas. The principle was embodied in the Report of the Rome Conference. Likewise, the Report of the International Law Commission covering the work of its eighth session, which will be submitted to the United Nations General Assembly this fall, has the following on the proposal to include the abstention principle in the Fisheries Articles (p. 105):

"The Commission recognized that both this proposal, the purpose of which was to encourage the building up or restoration of the productivity of resources, and the proposals of some other governments based on the concept of vital economic necessity may reflect problems and interests which deserve recognition in international law. However, lacking the necessary competence in the scientific and economic domains to study these exceptional situations adequately, the Commission, while drawing attention to the problem, refrained from making any concrete proposal.”

The United States representatives were fearful that, since Canada and the United States are the joint sponsors of the abstention principle, it would be difficult to persuade other maritime powers, such as Great Britain, France, etc. to support the principle, if at the same time Canada were to ask for extension of the territorial water limits. The principal argument being used to get this support from countries adhering to the 3-mile limit is that adoption of the abstention principle would in a large measure obviate the demands for extension of territorial waters beyond the 3-mile limit.

Minutes of Meeting of Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

[Ottawa], October 11, 1956

The fourth meeting of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters was held at 3:00 p.m., on Tuesday, October 2nd, 1956, in the Privy Council Chamber, East Block.

Present:

Rt. Hon. Louis S. St-Laurent, the Prime Minister
 Hon. Jean Lesage, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Chairman)
 Hon. L.B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs
 Hon. R.H. Winters, Minister of Public Works
 Hon. James Sinclair, Minister of Fisheries
 Hon. J.W. Pickersgill, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.
 Mr. M.W. Cunningham, Privy Council Office (Secretary)

Also Present:

Mr. F.R. Miller, Deputy Minister of National Defence (in the place of the Minister of National Defence)
 Mr. R.G. Robertson, Deputy Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources
 Mr. J.S. Nutt, Department of External Affairs

CANADIAN POLICY ON THE 12-MILE LIMIT AND BASELINES

Mr. Robertson gave the Committee a brief outline of the discussions that had taken place on September 12th in New York among United States, United Kingdom and Canadian officials on Canada's proposed stand at the United Nations regarding the 12-mile limit and baselines. A full report of these discussions is appended hereto.

In the discussion that followed, the following points emerged:

(a) In regard to the security argument, it was logical and natural for the United States to want to have the territorial waters belt of other nations as narrow as possible. The United States was a great military power which could defend its own shores, with a defence policy that called for moving its naval forces as close as possible to foreign shores. On the other hand, it could be argued that because of the nature of modern weapons of war, in actual practice the difference between 3 and 12 miles was not too important. Rockets, guided missiles and modern aircraft had gone a long way towards lessening the importance of a 12-mile limit. The United States had proposed that Canadian officers should visit Washington in the near future to discuss the implications to the security and defence of the western nations of the extension of the territorial limit to 12 miles. It was recognized that extremely strong arguments and pressure would be applied to the Canadian officials, but, nevertheless, it was desirable that the discussions should take place as proposed. It was thought that, in addition to defence officers, there should be representatives from the departments of Northern Affairs and National Resources and External Affairs.

(b) The United States had stressed the importance of ships being able to use visual aids to navigation and consequently of being able to approach close to foreign shores to take bearings, as an argument against the 12-mile limit. It was pointed out, however, that the use of electronic navigation aids was becoming quite common, and that there was now less need to use visual aids. In addition, there was a general recognition of the right of innocent passage of ships through territorial waters.

(c) It was not completely correct to maintain that fisheries conservation would not benefit from an extension to 12-miles. Certainly in respect of bottom fish, which remained close to the shore, if foreign trawlers were required to fish outside the 12-mile limit greater stocks would be conserved for the Canadian coastal fisheries.

(d) The United States had contended that, in the matter of exploiting fish stocks, Canada would lose more on the west coast than it would gain on the east coast through an extension of the territorial limit to 12 miles. The balancing of the gains and losses was something for Canada to do alone. Although it had been pointed out that the coast line of British Columbia was relatively short in relation to the remainder of the west coast of North America, it should be remembered that Canadian fishing grounds were extremely rich close to the shore. At the present time the Japanese, by a treaty involving the abstention principle that had been actually imposed on Japan, were precluded from fishing east of the 175th meridian, but that treaty had only 7 years to run. In theory, at the end of that time, the Japanese would be able to fish the Canadian west coast up to the 3-mile limit. If Canada had a 12-mile limit by that time, it would have exclusive rights over very considerable stocks of coastal fisheries. Similarly, at the present time the Russians were free to fish for salmon close to the Canadian shores, but they abstained from doing so only because they considered it more economical to fish for salmon not on the high seas but very close to their own shores. The abstention principle was a United States idea which, while good in theory, did not work out satisfactorily in practice. The general character of the main defect was clear from the operations of the International Whaling Commission, where the members adhered to the convention to a greater or lesser degree, but where three active whaling nations had refused to join and were taking whales excessively as they pleased. The abstention principle worked between Canada and the United States in the salmon and halibut fisheries, but largely because there were only these two countries involved, and for their mutual good they had arrived at close cooperation in taking fish and apprehending violators. It was very doubtful if the principle would be effective for general application.

The situation off Canadian shores, whereby foreign trawlers were permitted to fish up to the 3-mile limit and Canadian trawlers were obliged to remain 12 miles out, was becoming intolerable, and giving rise on the part of fishermen to serious pressure for an extension of territorial limits to 12 miles. It would not be surprising if Canadian trawlers, in defiance of the Canadian law, forced the issue by going inside the 12-mile limit to fish.

(e) In the matter of international uniformity in the fixing of territorial limits, it was probable that in the United Nations Canada would find itself a leader in advocating the 12-mile limit, and the position could probably get a majority among the nations. However, it was one thing to have the majority of nations declare for a 12-mile limit and another thing to enforce it, particularly if nations like the United States and United Kingdom would not agree to be bound by the majority decision. It would be embarrassing to have to back down in the face of such opposition. On the other hand, it might be equally embarrassing to attempt to enforce a 12-mile limit on U.S. fishermen.

[Paragraphe non déclassifié./One paragraph was not declassified.]

(f) The possibility could not be ignored that the United States, because of its intense opposition to the 12-mile limit, would use the threat of an increase in the tariff on Canadian fish if Canada adopted that limit. The possibility of an increase in the tariff might become very real if attempts to enforce a 12-mile limit led to difficulty.

(g) It seemed advisable to go along with the idea of having a conference on the law of the sea, if this were proposed in the 6th Committee, but Canada should press for a conference in the Spring of 1957 rather than in early 1958. It also seemed desirable that Canada should make its position on the 12-mile limit known in the United Nations when the matter was considered.

The Committee agreed:

1. That the invitation of the U.S. should be accepted to have an appropriate group of officials, including defence officers and representatives of Northern Affairs and National Resources and External Affairs, visit Washington to be advised in detail on and to discuss the security and defence implications of a general extension of territorial waters to 12 miles.

2. That the Department of Fisheries be asked to prepare a report on the relative advantages and disadvantages from the point of view of Canadian fisheries of

(i) continued adherence to the 3-mile limit with general adoption of the "principle of abstention" (see Appendix to attached report); and

(ii) adoption of the 12-mile limit without general acceptance of the "principle of abstention".

3. That before arriving at a final decision as to the course to be followed by Canada with respect to the breadth of the territorial sea, the Committee should meet again to weigh the security implications to be communicated by the United States to Canadian officials against the Canadian fisheries' interests to be served by an extension of territorial waters to 12 miles.

4. That no change should be made in the decision of the Cabinet to support the baseline system.

5. That at the forthcoming discussions in the United Nations Canada should make its stand on the 12-mile limit and baselines known in brief and should support the U.S. proposal that, insofar as possible, detailed discussion on the substantive recommendations of the International Law Commission should be deferred, and that they should become the subject of consideration at a special international conference to be called to draft a convention on the international law of the sea; but that Canada should seek to have the conference called for the Spring of 1957 rather than early 1958 as proposed by the U.S.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington], November 7, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

Before the Secretary's illness there was under preparation a letter to you from him regarding recent reports that at the coming meeting of the United Nations General Assembly Canada may propose or support acceptance of a general rule for an extension of territorial waters to twelve marine miles. In his absence I am writing you to express the very real concern we in this Government have over this problem. Our primary concern is with respect to the extent to which such a rule would affect the ability of United States defense forces, in collaboration with Canada and other free nations, to carry out their responsibilities in many sections of the world outside of the North American continent, particularly in the Mediterranean and the Far East.

The relationship between an extension of territorial waters and the activities of our naval and air forces has recently been the subject of intensive study by our Department of Defense. Conclusions with respect to the effect of an extension of territorial waters to twelve miles make clear that such a development would have drastic effects in many critical areas of military operation in both peace and war. As you know, our military experts met in Washington on November 2 to discuss this matter. I understand that those discussions prove extremely useful in pointing up security considerations which our Governments should bear in mind in connection with the territorial waters question.

We are not unmindful of the fisheries problems of your country. They have been studied here and discussed with representatives of your Government. As a result, it is my understanding that there is an excellent possibility that solutions of these problems can be developed which would provide equal or more satisfactory results from the point of view of Canada, and even Iceland, than would the extension of territorial waters to twelve miles.

In view of the foregoing we very much hope your Government will find it possible to join with the United States to avoid precipitate action at the forthcoming General Assembly on the territorial waters question. As you know, we feel strongly that the best way of handling this admittedly difficult subject would be through careful consideration of the problem, in all its aspects, at an international conference as recommended by the International Law Commission.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT MURPHY

TERRITORIAL WATERS²⁶

At its meeting of October 2 the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters agreed to accept a United States invitation to have Canadian officials briefed by United States defence officials on the security implications of a general extension of territorial waters to twelve miles. To this end a meeting was held in Washington on Friday, November 2, 1956. The Under-Secretary agreed that I should attend this meeting.

2. The Canadian team was headed by Mr. Gordon Robertson and comprised representatives from National Defence, Privy Council Office, the Embassy and myself. The United States team was headed by Rear Admiral Ricketts, Special Assistant to the Deputy Chief of Naval Operations. There were also present representatives of the State Department, Defence Department and the Air Force.

3. The United States service representatives argued that the universal extension of territorial waters to 12 miles would severely handicap the mobility of sea and air forces of the United States²⁷ particularly in wartime and off neutral shores in various parts of the world including particularly in areas off Korea, Japan and the Philippines, and in the Adriatic, Aegean and Baltic Seas. It was emphasized that the United States would not wish, even in wartime, to violate neutral waters.²⁸ It was therefore extremely important to restrict the area of water which in time of hostilities might be neutral waters. The second argument against a 12-mile limit was that it would seriously hamper surveillance: it would cut down the effectiveness of aerial photography of potential enemy coasts from aircraft flying over the high seas and would also cut down the effectiveness of any anti-submarine patrol system since a 12-mile limit would make it more easy for potential enemy submarines to slip through territorial waters of a coastal state where they would be difficult to detect by air patrols on the high seas. A third point was that universal extension of the territorial limit to 12 miles would hamper a new scheme, which the Navy is studying as an alternative to the United States foreign bases system, whereby sea planes would be employed instead of land based aircraft. Sea planes had the advantage of increased mobility over land planes which required airfields. While there were many lee shores in the world where sea planes could land for refuelling outside the 3-mile limit there were few places in the world where this could be carried on safely outside the 12-mile limit.

4. Following the presentation of the security implications there ensued a general informal discussion of the question of 3 miles versus 12 miles. It was apparent that the United States Navy were quite prepared to see an extension by states of their exclusive proprietary jurisdiction over offshore fisheries provided states were prepared not to extend territorial waters, i.e. the belt of exclusive sovereignty. The State Department representatives could not say that the United States Government would be prepared to support such a solution to the problem but they agreed privately that this might provide an answer to the present wide disagreement concerning territorial waters. It was generally agreed that the root of the problem was fish and that if something could be done to accommodate states' interests in offshore fisheries the desire of states to extend the belt of exclusive sovereignty, i.e. the territorial waters belt, might not be necessary.

5. From a Canadian point of view, since our primary interest in extending territorial waters is to obtain exclusive proprietary jurisdiction over offshore fisheries, it would seem that a 12-mile contiguous zone in which a coastal state might exercise exclusive proprietary jurisdiction over fisheries would be as satisfactory a solution as extending territorial waters to 12 miles.²⁹ In fact it might be a more satisfactory solution since besides satisfying the purely Canadian interest it would at the same time obviate the necessity of our pressing for an extension of territorial waters and would thus enable us to accommodate what appear to be legitimate fears of the United States particularly, and perhaps to some extent the United Kingdom, concerning the security implications of a general extension of territorial waters. Furthermore, in agreeing to pursue such a solution we should not, as we may if we continue to press for an extension of territorial waters to 12 miles, find ourselves expected to give the lead to those states wishing to extend territorial waters which includes a number of states which are making exorbitant claims.

[Sept lignes non déclassifiées./Seven lines were not declassified.]

6. I understand that a report on this meeting will be made in the near future to the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters. There is some urgency in having Government arrive at a final decision on what the Canadian position is to be since I believe the International Law Commission recommendations on the Law of the Sea are to be the first order of business of the Legal Committee at the U.N. Assembly. While it appears that there will be a move to refer substantive consideration of the Commission's recommendations to a diplomatic conference and while the Cabinet Committee with the Prime Minister in attendance has agreed that Canada might agree to referral to a conference, I think it will be desirable in the light of the Prime Minister's statement in the House on July 30, to say a few words about the Government's general position on the 12-mile limit or some alternative proposal which the Government may be prepared to propose.

TERRITORIAL WATERS

You will recall that I mentioned to you the other evening the question of territorial waters. In particular I mentioned that Mr. Gordon Robertson had asked me to ask you whether you thought you might be available for a Cabinet Committee meeting in Ottawa on, say, Friday afternoon or Saturday morning of this week. I understand that your position is that you would not know until the last minute whether in fact you could be available for such a meeting.

2. With your permission, I should like to have Mr. Robertson informed of this situation. At the same time, I should also like to ask whether you would agree that the meeting go on without you if you are unable to attend.³⁰ (Perhaps the Under-Secretary or Mr. Wershof could attend as your representative?) I think it is important that a final decision be made as soon as possible by the Government on the position it is going to adopt on the twelve-mile limit, since it seems the Sixth Committee will be discussing the International Law Commission's report on the law of the sea before the end of this week.

3. It is true, as you know, that the Cabinet Committee at its last meeting agreed that Canada might support a resolution in the General Assembly that the whole question of the law of the sea be referred to an international conference preferably to be held in 1957. At the same time, it was also agreed that the Canadian Delegation should state the Canadian position on the more important issues, e.g., the twelve-mile limit and the straight baseline system, in a general sort of way. I should think that, considering the Prime Minister's statement in the House on July 30, it would be difficult for the Delegation merely to voice its support of the idea of a conference and not take advantage of the opportunity to say in a general way what the Canadian position is on the breadth of the territorial sea and the adoption of the straight baseline system.

4. Assuming this to be the case, we must clearly have a decision as soon as possible and it would seem that if Parliament is to meet next week there would then be little chance of arranging a Cabinet Committee meeting until after Parliament had completed its special session. The Delegation might find itself in a rather difficult position being without final instructions for so long a period. It is for this reason that I have suggested above that you might agree to the Cabinet Committee meeting being arranged for the end of this week (if that is possible) even though you yourself might not be able to attend it.

5. I believe that Mr. McGill is holding for you a Departmental memorandum outlining in a general way the results of the meeting of officials in Washington on November 2 where, in accordance with the decision at the last Cabinet Committee meeting, Canadian officials were briefed on the security implications of a general extension of territorial waters to twelve miles. I am also attaching a copy of the factual report† of the Interdepartmental Committee on this meeting. I understand that Mr. Robertson, in his capacity of Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Territorial Waters, in submitting this report, intends to draw specifically to the Cabinet Committee's attention the suggestion which came out of the Washington meeting that a twelve-mile contiguous zone, wherein a coastal state would exercise exclusive proprietary and conservation jurisdiction over fish, might be acceptable to the Canadian Government as an alternative to pressing in the first instance for an extension of territorial waters to twelve miles. You will note in the Departmental memorandum reporting on the Washington meeting that Mr. Wershof has indicated that he considers this suggestion to be worthwhile considering and you are asked whether you would agree to such a position being adopted by the Cabinet Committee if your colleagues on the Committee were also agreeable.³¹

³⁰ Note marginale :Marginal note:
Yes [L.B. Pearson]

6. I have learned from one of the United States advisers that the Icelandic Delegation may propose a resolution in the Sixth Committee calling for the General Assembly's approval of the extension of territorial waters to twelve miles. The Cabinet Committee may also wish to consider what attitude the Delegation should adopt in the event such a resolution is to be proposed. Even if the final decision of the Government should be to support the idea of an extension of territorial waters to twelve miles rather than to accept, in the first instance, some alternative, such as a twelve-mile contiguous zone, it seems to me that it would not be appropriate for the Canadian Delegation to support such a resolution. To do so would be to prejudge one of the most important questions with which the proposed international conference would be dealing. Therefore, having agreed to support the idea of a conference, I should think we could but abstain on a resolution at this session calling for the extension of territorial waters. Do you agree?³²

7. I have received this morning from both Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, the United Kingdom Legal Adviser, and from one of the advisers on the United States Delegation a copy of the draft resolution calling for an international conference. I understand that this resolution is to be cosponsored by the United States, the United Kingdom and at least a number of Latin American delegations. I have also been informed by the Cuban legal adviser that the majority of the Latin American states are prepared to settle, at this session, for a resolution calling for a conference and to restrict discussion to general statements of position. It would seem, therefore, that unless the Icelandic Delegation puts in a resolution on the twelve-mile limit, a resolution along the lines of the attached draft may prove acceptable to the Committee.

8. One further point concerns the letter Mr. Murphy, the United States Deputy Under-Secretary, has written to you expressing (as I recall) the hope of the United States Government concerning the course of events at the present session on the territorial waters question. It would seem that a substantive reply could only be made following upon the Cabinet Committee final decision on the Canadian position. Do you agree?³³

CANADIAN POLICY ON THE BREADTH OF THE TERRITORIAL SEA

Pursuant to the decision of the Cabinet Committee, Canadian officials visited Washington on November 2nd to hear the views of the United States authorities on the defence and security considerations against the establishment of a 12-mile width for territorial waters. A report† concerning the discussions is attached.

Also attached is a memorandum concerning the fisheries implications of the 12-mile limit and of the "abstention principle".

It is clear from the discussions in Washington that the United States takes a serious view of the defence implications of any general adoption of a 12-mile limit for territorial waters. It seems impossible to argue that the defence implications are not adverse from the point of view of the United States and also of the United Kingdom, although it is not clear whether they would be as serious as the United States contends. However, it was made fairly clear that, no matter what other countries may do, the United States will not agree to or recognize the validity of a 12-mile limit for territorial waters.

Since one of the principal United States and United Kingdom objections to the Canadian proposal is that of defence and since the main Canadian consideration in favour of a 12-mile limit is that of fisheries, it might be desirable to consider whether the fishery objectives could not be achieved without incurring the defence difficulties. Something of this kind might be possible if Canada were to take the position that it would be prepared to support the three-mile limit for territorial waters if general recognition were given to the existence of a 12-mile zone around the coasts of all countries in which the coastal state would have complete and exclusive fishery jurisdiction.

The principle of having zones along the coasts of countries which are broader than the width of territorial seas and within which particular types of jurisdiction can be exercised is not a new one. According to a list prepared by the International Law Commission about 1952 the following are some of the zones claimed by the countries indicated:

³⁴ Note marginale /Marginal note:

In telephone conversation with Mr. Sicotte today I informed him of the decisions of the Minister regarding the questions raised in paragraphs 2 and 5. With regard to paragraph 8 Mr. McGill has agreed to do an acknowledgement. J. N[utt]

"Security" or "Defence" Zone

Argentina (12 miles); Chile (100 km.); Ecuador (12 miles); Greece (10 miles); Iran (12 miles); Poland (6 miles); Venezuela (12 miles).

Custom Zone

12 miles: Argentina, Canada, China, Cuba, Ecuador, Iran, Italy, U.S.A., Venezuela

6 miles: Ceylon, Finland, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Yugoslavia

Chile (100 km.); Colombia (20 km.); France (20 km.); Mexico (20 km.); Norway (10 miles)

Fishery Zone

Argentina (10 miles); Colombia (12 miles); Ecuador (15 miles); Mexico (20 km.); Yugoslavia (10 miles)

It is not clear what authority is claimed in the security or defence zones or in the fishery zones.

The final recommendations of the International Law Commission which are going before the United Nations Assembly this autumn include in the proposals on the "High Seas" the following article concerning which is called the "Contiguous Zone":

"Article 66

1. In a zone of the high seas contiguous to its territorial sea, the coastal State may exercise the control necessary to

(a) Prevent infringement of its customs, fiscal or sanitary regulations within its territory or territorial sea;

(b) Punish infringement of the above regulations committed within its territory or territorial sea.

2. The contiguous zone may not extend beyond 12 miles from the baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured."

The above article would give formal recognition to the fairly general customs zones. It is to be noted, however, that it does not include any provision for fishery control. In its commentary the Commission states that it considered any zone for security or defence would open the way for abuses. It also states:

"Nor was the Commission willing to recognize any exclusive right of the coastal state to engage in fishing in the contiguous zone. The Preparatory Committee of the Hague Codification Conference found, in 1930, that the replies from governments offered no prospect of an agreement to extend the exclusive fishing rights of the coastal state beyond the territorial sea. The Commission considered that in that respect the position has not changed."

While the above comment is discouraging as to the probable acceptance of a proposal that the contiguous zone should include exclusive fishery rights it is possible that some, at least, of the opposing countries would regard this as a lesser evil than 12 miles of territorial waters.

At the present time the recommended articles do include a very limited recognition of the special interest of a country in the fisheries off its coasts. The relevant articles are as follows:

"Article 54

1. A coastal State has a special interest in the maintenance of the productivity of the living resources in any area of the high seas adjacent to its territorial sea.

2. A coastal State is entitled to take part on an equal footing in any system of research and regulation in that area, even though its nationals do not carry on fishing there.

3. If the States concerned do not reach agreement within a reasonable period of time, any of the parties may initiate the procedure envisaged in article 57."

"Article 55

1. Having regard to the provisions of paragraph 1 of article 54, any coastal State may, with a view to the maintenance of the productivity of the living resources of the sea, adopt unilateral measures of conservation appropriate to any stock of fish or other marine resources in any area of the high seas adjacent to its territorial sea, provided that negotiations to that effect with the other States concerned have not led to an agreement within a reasonable period of time.

2. The measures which the coastal State adopts under the previous paragraph shall be valid as to other States only if the following requirements are fulfilled:

- (a) That scientific evidence shows that there is an urgent need for measures of conservation;
- (b) That the measures adopted are based on appropriate scientific findings;
- (c) That such measures do not discriminate against foreign fishermen.

3. If these measures are not accepted by the other States concerned, any of the parties may initiate the procedure contemplated by article 57. Subject to paragraph 2 of article 58, the measures adopted shall remain obligatory pending the arbitral decision."

Possible Line of Action

In the light of the certain opposition by the United States and the United Kingdom, on defence grounds, to a Canadian proposal for a 12-mile limit of territorial waters, the Cabinet Committee might wish to consider whether Canadian policy might take the following lines:

- (a) Canada does not consider that the 3-mile territorial limit is adequate unless, along with it, there is general recognition of a contiguous zone within which administrative controls can be exercised which are considered essential for the coastal state.
- (b) The present proposal for a contiguous zone (Article 66) does not go far enough in that it does not provide for fishery control by the coastal state. Nor do Articles 54 and 55 remedy this defect.
- (c) If it is not possible to secure general agreement on a 12-mile limit for territorial waters Canada is of the view that a satisfactory solution would be general acceptance of:
 - (i) the 3-mile limit for territorial waters, and
 - (ii) a 12-mile contiguous zone in which the coastal state would have the full right to impose customs, fiscal, sanitary and fishery regulations.
- (d) Unless a 12-mile contiguous zone including fishery control is recognized, Canada will support the general adoption of 12 miles as the breadth of the territorial sea.

It has to be expected that (c) (above) would be opposed by the United States and the United Kingdom as to fishery control. However, they could not oppose this solution on the basis of defence. It is possible that the United States might, in the end, be prepared to accept it if they thought that the alternative was pretty general support for a 12-mile territorial limit.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 240-56

Ottawa, November 30, 1956

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

The fifth meeting of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters was held at 12:00 noon, on Friday, November 30th, 1956, in the Privy Council Chamber, East Block.

Present

Rt. Hon. Louis S. St-Laurent, the Prime Minister
Hon. L.B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs
Hon. R.H. Winters, Minister of Public Works
Hon. G. Prudham, Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys
Hon. James Sinclair, Minister of Fisheries
Hon. Jean Lesage, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Chairman)

Also Present

Mr. F.R. Miller, Deputy Minister of National Defence (in the place of the Minister of National Defence)
Mr. R.G. Robertson, Deputy Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources
Mr. M.H. Wershof, Department of External Affairs
Mr. G. Sicotte, Department of External Affairs

Mr. Lesage referred to the meeting of Canadian and United States officials on November 2nd, concerning which a report had been circulated. It was clear that the United States, and also the United Kingdom were very strongly opposed to any general extension of territorial waters to 12 miles because of the consequences of such an extension for air and sea navigation and defence. Because of this position a compromise proposal had been worked out under which Canada would seek to secure its fishery objectives through urging the adoption of a contiguous zone of 12 miles, which would include complete rights of fishery regulation and proprietary rights in the fish within the zone. A memorandum on this proposal had been circulated.

The Prime Minister said it appeared that the proposal would, if adopted, achieve the fishery objectives. He was doubtful, however, whether it was feasible to argue for proprietary rights in fish within the contiguous zone. There were no proprietary rights in uncaught fish even in the three-mile limit of territorial waters. What was wanted was to have exclusive jurisdiction over the fish within the 12-mile zone, including in that jurisdiction the right of excluding fishermen from other States. He thought it would be satisfactory to argue in favour of such a position. If it were not agreed to, Canada could then adhere to the position that had originally been announced — that of favouring the 12-mile limit for territorial waters.

Mr. Pearson referred to the suggestion that Iceland might move a resolution favouring the adoption of the 12-mile limit for territorial waters. The first step would be for Canada to try to dissuade Iceland from taking any such action. If they could not be dissuaded, and if the resolution were advanced, the delegation would have to refer back for instruction as to the course they should take. A resolution had already been introduced in the Sixth Committee in favour of holding a Diplomatic Conference to discuss the Law of the Sea. It had been agreed that Canada should favour such a conference and should press for it to be in 1957 rather than in 1958 as the United Kingdom and the United States had been suggesting. Canada would have to make some statement of policy on that resolution.

The Prime Minister suggested that the statement of policy by Canada should be to the effect that it had become apparent that most States considered it essential to have adequate rights of control in certain essential fields to a limit of 12 miles off their coasts. These fields included customs regulation, sanitary control, and the regulation of fisheries. One way to achieve such measures of control was through the extension of territorial limits, with the complete jurisdiction that it gave, to 12 miles. However, it had to be recognized that such extension on a general basis could have serious repercussions in the realm of navigation and defence. The alternative approach would be the adoption of a contiguous zone of 12 miles to cover the fields referred to. To be adequate, however, the rights within such a contiguous zone would have to be as complete within the fields referred to as they would be if complete territorial jurisdiction existed. In other words, the line of approach in the Canadian statement should be that there were certain essential objectives that had to be achieved, instead of indicating specifically that Canada favoured one way or another of achieving the objectives.

Mr. Robertson referred to the fact that in discussions with the United States and the United Kingdom, Canadian officials had made the point that in addition to fisheries control another essential toward which Canada was working was the achievement of some set of principles that would recommend themselves for general adoption. Possibly the statement should also include some reference along these lines making it clear that a primary interest for Canada was working out a rule of law rather than having a continuance of the present disjointed state of affairs.

The Committee, after considerable discussion, agreed:

(a) That Canada should support the resolution that had been introduced in the Sixth Committee in favour of the calling for a diplomatic conference to consider the Law of the Sea and should seek to have the conference held in 1957, rather than at a later date, if possible;

(b) That a statement of Canadian policy should be made in supporting the resolution along the lines outlined by the Prime Minister, but without making the argument dependent too exclusively or definitely on the Canadian interest in fish; it should be made clear, nevertheless, that Canada would require the rights within 12 miles of the coast to include as complete control over fisheries as would be secured if territorial limits extended to 12 miles;

(c) That the Canadian delegation should try to dissuade Iceland, or any other country, from moving a resolution at the Sixth Committee in favour of the 12-mile limit for territorial waters but that if such a resolution were moved the delegation should seek further instruction as to how to vote on it; and

(d) That any statements or positions by the delegation should be such that they would not exclude Canadian support for the 12-mile limit of territorial waters if at a later stage it appeared that no agreement could be reached on a 12-mile contiguous zone, including adequate fishery controls.

TELEGRAM LL-14

Ottawa, November 30, 1956

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: Your Telegram No. 1364,† 1372† and 1483† of November 21, 22, and 29 respectively and conversation Robertson-Nutt.

TERRITORIAL WATERS

As explained over the telephone Cabinet Committee considered this morning memorandum of the Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee dated November 21 together with a subsidiary recommendation relating to (a) the possible introduction by Iceland of a resolution for adoption of a twelve mile limit and (b) the proposed line of a possible statement of Canadian position in the Assembly³⁵ (based largely on statement contained in page five of Nutt's informal memorandum† of November 25.)

2. Cabinet Committee approved support of U.S. resolution contained in your telegrams Nos. 1364 and 1483 subject however to your endeavouring to enlist support (basically from U.S. and U.K. delegations) for convening of conference of plenipotentiaries during 1957 (see para. 3 of the U.S. draft resolution). Cabinet Committee is strongly in favour of every effort being made to have conference before 1958. If conference cannot (repeat not) be held before 1958 Cabinet Committee would, of course, prefer even late meeting to having substantial discussion at the Assembly now.

3. As regards possibility of Iceland moving resolution referred to above in favour of twelve mile limit, you are to urge Icelanders at once not repeat not to introduce it (Mr. Pearson has indicated he would be glad to telephone Mr. Thor Thors if you consider this would assist in our convincing the Icelanders of undesirability of their moving the resolution). The reasons which you can invoke in your attempts to persuade Iceland will be familiar to you: apart from those mentioned in Mr. Nutt's proposed statement referred to above, there would of course be advantage in pointing out to them the similarity of our interest with respect to twelve mile limit.

4. If Icelandic resolution is eventually introduced, however, ministers here will wish to reconsider our position before decision is taken as to how our vote should be cast. You should therefore in such a case seek instructions.

5. In the meantime we understand you will draft (on basis of telephone talk with Nutt) a statement to be made on Canada's position and will refer it to us for approval.

6. In explanation of the Canadian position the Cabinet Committee wish the argument to be on the basis of the importance for coastal states of having adequate control on essential matters off their coast to a distance greater than three miles. These controls should extend to twelve miles for customs, sanitary regulations and exclusive fishery rights, including in the latter the complete right of regulation and the right to exclude non-coastal fishermen. The question is how best to secure this result. We recognize the difficulties for air and sea navigation from general adoption of twelve mile territorial limit; the alternative line of approach is through a contiguous zone of that width but rights within it must be as complete in the above fields as they would be with territorial limits set at twelve miles. Apart from these essential objectives the other consideration for Canada is the necessity for securing general agreement on a rule of law that can be recognized for world-wide application.
