10. The Icelandic economy is not in a healthy state, and one of the more serious results of a sudden withdrawal of U.S. forces (and the consequent loss of 18% of Iceland's total national income) would be an intensification of this economic crisis. The Icelanders themselves seem completely complacent about these dangers, and one of the aims of your mission might be to warn them of the economic results of the course they seem determined to follow. Another aim might be to bring home to the Icelandic leaders the disquiet felt in all NATO countries about their policies. Already Iceland's foreign trade is relatively more heavily involved with the Soviet bloc than that of Egypt; and the Ministries of Fisheries and Commerce are in Communist hands.

11. If the stalemate continues and the United States Government refuse to negotiate with the present Icelandic Government until, as they say in their Memorandum of August 2, the question of the "status of Iceland in NATO" is clarified, it may be necessary to apply to Iceland, with the consent of the parties, some such procedure for pacific settlement of disputes as has been suggested in the United States Government's reply to the NATO questionnaire on political consultations. We sent you on August 28 a separate Memorandum on this question, which was discussed last week in Washington by the Canadian Working Group and the United States Task Force. No doubt you will be having further discussions on this point in Paris during your Committee of Three talks.

12. The above ideas have not been discussed outside the Department, still less with other Governments, but they may assist you in your talks on Iceland both in Paris and (we hope) in Reykjavik.

MR. PEARSON'S VISIT TO ICELAND

1. Before he left for Paris Mr. Pearson agreed with our recommendation that it would be useful from a NATO standpoint as well as from the point of view of Canadian interests if he were to visit Iceland on his way back to Ottawa towards the end of this month.

2. We have discussed the possibility informally with the State Department and the Foreign Office and they have reacted very favourably.

3. The Minister has now cabled from Paris that Mr. Ronning is also strongly in favour of the visit and could go to Paris this week-end before going on to Iceland to prepare for the Minister's short informal visit. The Minister is willing to make the visit if you agree that he should.

4. I am enclosing a copy of our memorandum to the Minister of August 23 which explains why we consider the Minister should make this visit. Do you agree?²⁵

YOUR VISIT TO ICELAND

Following for the Minister. Begins. We have sent you by bag material† on Icelandic-Canadians which I think will prove useful and we will supplement this with anything else that comes to hand. We will also send you telegrams on the specific questions of Canadian relations with Iceland, and the UK-Icelandic fisheries dispute though I presume the most up to date information on the latter problem will be sent to you directly by Canada House (vide Mr. Robertson's telegram NATO Delegation No. 68 September 11†). On the more urgent problem of Iceland and NATO the following comments may serve to complete the briefs which we gave you before your departure for Paris.

2. The security aspects of the question of Iceland's participation in the work of NATO were again discussed in the Council on September 12 and a generally satisfactory temporary solution seems to have been worked out. It is still dependent, however, on the character of the Icelandic Permanent Representative in NATO, the composition of the Icelandic Foreign Ministry, and the assurance that it operates pretty much as a self-contained unit in the Icelandic Government.

3. But we are not much further ahead with regard to the general problem of Communist or pro-Communist Ministers in the government of a NATO country. This question may indeed be complicated by the recent developments since the Foreign Minister can now claim that Iceland has done everything possible with respect to her security commitments under NATO, and that any further approach to Iceland on the matter by foreign powers would constitute interference in Icelandic domestic affairs. We may have some further clarification within the next ten days which may assist you if you should decide to discuss this ticklish question with the Icelanders.

4. More important probably is the question of principle, and we would hope it might be possible for you to bring home to the Icelanders the extent of disquiet that this action in bringing Communists into the government of a NATO country has aroused. This isolation of the Icelandic leaders from outside opinion does seem to be a vital factor in the situation.

²⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I do agree L. St.-L[aurant]

5. If you consider that you can speak frankly to the Icelanders about this the best way is probably still to indicate that NATO is a "two way street", and that if Iceland expects her NATO partners to look sympathetically on her problems, it will be necessary that she herself reciprocate by fully recognizing her own NATO responsibilities, i.e. both as regards a contribution of some sort to the common defence, and in relation to the presence of Communists in the government.

6. Which Icelanders it would be worthwhile taking the above line with is difficult to decide. It has been pointed out before that it will, of course, be non-Communist leaders both in and outside the Althing with whom it will be most valuable for you to have talks, but the problem is somewhat more complicated than this above indicates. In the first place, it would probably not be of too much value to concentrate on the leaders of the Independence Party, since we already know that they agree with other NATO members on most points. Rather, they need to be convinced of the necessity of solving their difficulties with the progressives and once again forming a coalition in which no Communists participate — but this is obviously not an easy matter for a visitor to discuss with his hosts.

7. Probably the best possibility of success in this area is to be met with in conversations with leaders of the non-Communist parties other than the Independents, since here it would be possible to emphasize the duties and privileges of NATO members in the abstract without mentioning any political changes which would be necessary to fulfill these duties, and yet getting the latter point across. In this regard, Mr. Herman Jonasson, the Prime Minister and Leader of the Progressive Party is probably the most important individual to whom you will be speaking. Mr. Ronning will no doubt have spoken to you about him, but one or two points will perhaps bear repeating. To begin with, it has been said that it was Mr. Jonasson's desire to become Prime Minister before the visit of the Danish King and Queen last spring which was in large measure responsible for his pressing the Althing to vote for a negotiation of the base question before the election. That is to say, Mr. Jonasson hoped that by forcing the issue in the Althing he could force Mr. Olafur Thors out of office and himself form a government. Had he succeeded in this manoeuvre, he would possibly have been able to stave off elections until 1957. It is possible, then, since Mr. Jonasson is apparently not opposed to Iceland's NATO participation in principle (his speeches make this clear) that he could be persuaded that Iceland's NATO responsibilities are more important than his difficulties with the Independents, and that a realliance with them is the only satisfactory solution to Iceland's long-term problems.

8. Whether or not it is possible to convince Mr. Jonasson of this, it does appear that some such development is necessary if Iceland's position in NATO is to remain secure, for unless the Progressives and the Independents are willing to make up it would be difficult indeed to form a government without Communist support, and hence without Communist participation, since it seems unlikely that such support would be offered without something in return. It is, of course, true that an alliance of the Independents and the Social Democrats would have a majority of two seats in the Althing, but there appear to be differences of principle between them which presumably could not be disposed of as easily as those between the Progressives and the Independents, if there is some truth in the view that the differences are caused to some extent by personal reasons.

9. Of course, it will be difficult for you to discuss the above questions openly with the Prime Minister of a host country, but it is nevertheless probable that some such solution will be necessary in Icelandic internal politics before a lasting answer to Iceland's NATO problem is arrived at.

VISIT TO ICELAND⁹⁶

Could you please have the following personal message delivered to the Secretary of State before the opening on Monday of the conversations that the State Department are having with the Icelandic Delegation on the Keflavik base agreement, begins:

Dear Foster [Dulles]:

You may be interested in learning that on my way home from Paris I had a most pleasant, and I think useful visit to Iceland where I was given a very warm welcome and discussed NATO and related questions with the President, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister and others. In this connection your Ambassador and General White were most helpful in briefing me on the current situation in Iceland as they saw it. Incidentally, all the Icelandic leaders whom I met spoke in high terms of your representatives.

I left Iceland convinced of the goodwill of the political leaders (apart of course from the Communists) and of their sincere desire that Iceland should remain a loyal member of the NATO coalition and supporter of the West. They assured me that in this respect they were reflecting the wishes of the great majority of the people of Iceland. Nevertheless, the situation is, I think, one which gives real cause for worry. Politically the present Government is committed to a modification of the existing agreement governing the base. I did my best to emphasize to the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister that the international situation now was such that the importance of this base in collective defence was as great as it was during the emergency of 1951, though the character of the danger may have changed. I feel, however, that while they may appreciate this they are also most anxious to have some modification of existing arrangements which will remove the impression of a permanent military occupation, something which runs counter, of course, to all their instincts and which the Communists naturally are exploiting. Indeed, the problem is almost as psychological as it is political and has its roots deep in the history and traditions of the country.

The political situation is complicated and made more worrying by the fact that the Soviet Union is getting a firm hold on the economy of the Island. If to economic penetration is added, as seems possible, financial help from Moscow for development of resources, the whole Western position and influence on the Island will be prejudiced. Most of those to whom I talked seemed no longer to worry very much about the fisheries dispute with Great Britain now that the Russians are taking their surplus on advantageous terms.

Pearson was in Iceland from September 24 to 27.

On the whole, I was reassured by the good feeling toward the West which I encountered, but worried about a trend of political and economic developments which may well alter that feeling in the long run.

I saw a lot of the new Foreign Minister and consider him to be a man of integrity and sincerity; one whom I feel we can trust. I think you will share this appreciation after you have met and talked with him. He told me that he was going to Washington both in fear and in hope. He most sincerely hopes that the discussions which are beginning will lead to a mutually satisfactory arrangement, but he is afraid that strictly military considerations on the one hand, and Icelandic political difficulties on the other may make that difficult.

Mr. Muccio is, of course, in a far better position to advise you on these matters than I am, but I thought you might be glad to get my observations even if they are based on only a short visit and must therefore be necessarily somewhat superficial in nature.

DESPATCH NO. 29

Oslo, October 9, 1956

ICELAND

For the record and information of some Divisions in the Department, I am reporting briefly some of the interviews that I had with Icelandic officials in preparation for, and during, your visit.

Interview with Prime Minister

2. In a forty-five minute interview with the Prime Minister, he smilingly assured me that Iceland's Western friends need have no fear that Iceland was drifting towards Russia or that Iceland was anti-American. Due to the fisheries dispute with the United Kingdom, he explained that Iceland had been forced to sell fish to the USSR and a number of the Russian satellites. In consequence, Iceland had imported Russian goods. Iceland, however, was "Western" in its sympathies and democratic in its way of life. Iceland wanted to remain allied with its Western friends and desired to increase trade with the democratic nations in preference to the USSR and its satellites. The life of Iceland, however, depended on its fishing industry. If Western nations could not supply the market, Iceland was forced to look elsewhere.

3. The Prime Minister emphasized that Icelanders were not anti-American. American troops stationed in Iceland had behaved as well and better than could be expected, but Iceland feared the impact of American military people on Iceland. It was true, he said, that the American military personnel wore uniforms when they left the base at Keflavik and came to the cities of Iceland for short visits. Many of these military people rented flats and houses which they maintained for their private purposes, especially in Reykjavik. This was due, he thought, to the fact that troops were stationed more or less permanently in Iceland and had not brought with them their families. It was impossible to know how many American troops were on the streets of Reykjavik because they left their uniforms in their rented flats and went about dressed like civilians. Their influence on the Icelandic way of life was, in the Prime Minister's opinion, not good. Icelanders were therefore determined that there should be no foreign troops stationed "permanently" in Iceland during peacetime. Mr. Jonasson emphasized, when Iceland had in the first place consented to draw up an agreement with the United States, Mr. Acheson had promised representatives of Iceland, including the present Foreign Minister, Mr. Emil Jonsson, that American troops would not be stationed in Iceland during peacetime. It was upon this condition that the United States had been given the right to establish bases in Iceland and the people of Iceland had been given this assurance in election campaigns.

4. When I asked the Prime Minister if it was not necessary to permit the stationing of a minimum number of permanent troops for the protection of the air base and the radar stations, he replied that whatever protection might be necessary could be given as effectively by non-permanent military personnel. He stated that Iceland had no objection to permanent "specialists" to operate the complex electronic devices at the air base or the four radar stations. The protection of the base and these stations could be carried out by troops on manoeuvres who rotated from one NATO base to another. Mr. Jonasson gave me the impression that Iceland was prepared to compromise along these lines, but that his government was determined not to have permanent troops stationed in Iceland during peacetime. If there was an attack or a threat of an attack by the USSR, it would be necessary to bring in reinforcements even if the present number of permanent troops were in occupation of the base. In his opinion, troops on manoeuvres, together with the specialists, could bring in necessary reinforcements just as capably as the present type of personnel. He left me in no doubt that his government was determined to carry out the policy of non-permanent foreign troops in Iceland during peacetime.

5. I asked the Prime Minister when he expected negotiations with the Americans to start and if the six-month period for revision of the agreement was considered to have started on August 1 or whether the six-month period would be considered to start only after actual negotiations begin. Mr. Jonasson would give me no definite reply in this regard. He said that the Ambassador of the United States would probably leave very shortly for consultations in Washington and that immediately after your visit the Prime Minister would go to Washington for consultation with Mr. Dulles. His talks would be in the nature of preliminary discussions prior to the commencement of negotiations.

6. The reasons negotiations had not started sooner, Mr. Jonasson said, was entirely due to American hesitation to start discussions on revision of the agreement prior to a satisfactory settlement of the security problems raised in Paris. This conversation was held prior to the more or less satisfactory temporary arrangement with Mr. Hans Andersen, and the Prime Minister was evidently considerably disturbed about the situation. I am certain that neither Emil Jonsson nor Hans Andersen had briefed the Prime Minister in regard to all aspects of the developments which took place in Paris and had put the matter to the Prime Minister in the most favourable light possible to prevent him from making rash decisions. The Prime Minister, however, knew enough about the situation to be considerably ruffled. He said that, since Iceland had no military forces, Iceland was not interested in NATO documents pertaining to military matters. The documents which Mr. Andersen had received had been returned and the few documents in Iceland had been destroyed. The NATO partners of Iceland need have no fear of the security problem as far as the composition of the Icelandic Government was concerned. The Ministers of the Cabinet were independent of each other and the Foreign Minister was under no obligation to inform other Ministers what was taking place in his Ministry with respect to relations with NATO. Mr. Jonasson was most emphatic in stating that, if resolutions were put on paper in the NATO Council denying the Icelandic representative the right to documents or the right to attend Council meetings, Iceland would "withdraw from NATO in one hour". The Icelandic people, he said, could be depended upon to support such action. Mr. Jonasson expressed the hope that the instructions given to Mr. Andersen would be satisfactory and that the security problem would be solved. This would enable negotiations with the United States on revision of the agreement to be started without further delay.

7. In discussing the security situation, Mr. Jonasson expressed the opinion that Icelanders would resent any attempt by other NATO members to bring pressure upon Iceland on account of the composition of the Icelandic Government. Any such pressure, he said, would serve only to bolster up the position of the two Cabinet Ministers to whom other NATO countries objected and give them more popular support than they had at the present time.

8. Turning to the financial situation, the Prime Minister admitted that his Government was considerably worried. They hoped to be able to take remedial action of some sort before the end of the temporary period (to the end of December) during which the spiraling of wages and prices had been stopped. Mr. Jonasson stated that it would have been impossible to have frozen wages even for a short period if the Labour Alliance had not been represented in the Icelandic Government by two Cabinet Ministers. He then went on to talk about the report which had just been given him the day before by a committee of international experts headed by Dr. Polak. I had had a chat with Dr. Polak the previous day and had learned that perhaps the most important measure recommended was action to increase the exchange value of the Icelandic kronor from the present rate of 16.25 to the United States dollar to about 25. This would bring it into closer conformity with its actual value. The Prime Minister was of the opinion that there was much merit in the recommendation. He felt, however, that it would be very difficult to carry it out due to the effect it would have on savings and investments. He added that, while the financial situation in Iceland was not good, it was certainly not as bad as it had been painted. I think perhaps he was referring especially to the warning that had been given continuously by Vilhjalmur Thor, one of the three directors of the Bank of Iceland. Dr. Polak and his associates, however, had found that the situation was not as bad as they had expected to find it. They decided to state the facts as they saw them. The Prime Minister added that, in his opinion, more important than changing the value of the Icelandic kronor was the necessity of encouraging the investment of more foreign capital in Iceland.

9. Before the end of our discussion, Mr. Jonasson again referred to the fishing dispute with the United Kingdom. The fishing ban, he stated, had caused great difficulties to Iceland in the initial period. Icelandic trawlers had for a period of many decades accepted the delivery of fresh iced fish to the United Kingdom market as the most important feature of the industry. The fishermen brought back with them British goods which were less expensive and better than they could obtain elsewhere. Customs officials closed their eyes to this importation of personal goods and the practice was an inducement to fishermen to continue hard and hazardous work. After the ban, Iceland had adjusted itself to the new situation by processing a large portion of its annual catch. Plants were constructed to fillet, freeze and package fish. This had provided employment for Icelanders and greater profits for the fishing industry. Many people engaged in the fishing industry now were hoping that the United Kingdom would not lift the ban. Exports to the United States were increasing and new markets were being developed in Africa. The USSR accepts all their surplus.

10. In regard to the fisheries dispute, I had a short discussion with the new Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Ludvik Josepsson, immediately after the dinner given you by the Foreign Minister at the official residence on the evening of the day you arrived. I was surprised to learn from him that certain Icelandic seagoing trawlers were still interested in delivering fish to the United Kingdom and that the people in Iceland engaged in the fishing industry were not unanimous in their indifference to the reopening of their former markets in the United Kingdom. That Mr. Josepsson should express this opinion to me was a surprise, in spite of the fact that I knew that both he personally and the Communist-dominated cooperatives in Iceland own a number of seagoing trawlers. It is probably due to this ownership that Mr. Josepsson is not as opposed to having the ban lifted as I thought an Icelandic Communist would be.

Interview with the President

11. On the morning of Saturday, September 22, the President and his wife invited me to their official residence, Bessastadir, to discuss details in connection with Mrs. Pearson's and your visit. I expected to stay for ten or fifteen minutes, but the President became so involved in discussing the political situation in Iceland that he kept me for an hour and a half, going over a great deal of ground with which I had been made familiar by others. I was, however, extremely interested in his point of view.

12. The President informed me that he was not proud of what had happened in Iceland nor of the way in which the new government had been formed. He sincerely hoped that the whole question of the air base at Keflavik could be removed from internal politics and that the deciding factor could be the importance of the base to Iceland in fulfilment of responsibilities to Iceland's NATO partners.

13. The President discussed with me the security problem in the NATO Council which he seemed to appreciate very fully. He said to me that he would inform me very secretly that, when he had learned of the Prime Minister's threat to pull out of NATO if Iceland were denied documents or the right to sit in NATO Council meetings, he had told Mr. Jonasson that, if he did not wish Iceland to be regarded as a second-class NATO partner, he should not have employed second-class methods to form a government. The President then asked me to pass on to you the advice that it would be advisable for you to give the Prime Minister, during all social functions connected with your visit, the impression that he was an important personage.

14. The President also commented on the excellent relations that existed between Iceland and Canada. He was most happy to have a visit from you and stated that there was no one in NATO who could do more to help the Icelanders understand the situation than you. In this respect, he also gave a great deal of credit to Mr. Lange and to Mr. Spaak. He expressed confidence in your sympathetic understanding of the situation in Iceland and felt that your visit would be a most useful factor in helping Icelanders to understand the importance of NATO. The Icelandic people, he said, had everything in common with the Western democratic nations and peoples. He was certain that all Icelanders, with the exception of a few out-and-out Moscow Communists, were most desirous of remaining within NATO and identifying their interests with those of the people of the West.

15. In asking me to express to you his welcome and that of Mrs. Asgeirsson, the President said that he did not ordinarily accept invitations to diplomatic dinners, but that he was most happy to have the opportunity to accept the invitation which had been extended to the dinner which Mrs. Pearson and you were giving.

Officer Commanding Keflavik Air Base

16. Prior to your visit, General James White invited me to visit the Keflavik air base. Together with the Ambassador of the United States and the Minister of the United Kingdom, I was shown the main points of interest at the base. We were given the benefit of a lengthy briefing and a frank discussion with the General and his two assistants who are in charge of the Army and Navy units stationed at the air base. The General insisted that the four radar stations strategically located roughly at the four corners of the island could only be manned by people specially trained for this purpose over a long period of years who were subject to army discipline. It was true that Icelanders had been trained for much of the work being done at the air base, particularly the management and operation of the flying of both military and civilian aircraft in and out of the base. It would be an almost impossible task, however, to train Icelanders to operate the radar electronic equipment as Icelandic civilians could not be subject to the rigid discipline essential for continuous 24-hour operation of the four very strategic radar stations. I asked the General if the efficiency of the air base at Keflavik would be seriously affected if military personnel other than the specially trained operators were rotated and made non-permanent according to Icelandic wishes. The General's reply was that, if a sufficient number of the specially trained military personnel operating the complex installations could be permanent, the base would not be too seriously hampered by a rotation of the military defence personnel. In fact, he was certain that the military people involved would be most pleased to have shorter periods of service in Iceland and, if they were forced to adopt such measures, it would boost morale. The General concluded, however, that although Icelandic wishes might be met in regard to their demand for a much smaller number of permanently stationed military people by rotating the personnel required strictly for defence, it was nevertheless a most dangerous principle to start compromising with this Icelandic demand. It would enable Icelanders to state that they now had the Americans on the run and they would never give up until the Americans were completely driven out. "Give them an inch," he said, "and they will not rest until they have taken a mile." He did not think it was any solution to the problem to give in to Icelandic demands. He hoped that Icelanders would be faced with the position that their demands could not be met and that it was their responsibility to NATO to permit the base to continue operation as at the present time.

17. The Ambassador of the United States, Mr. John Muccio, was present during our discussion and stated very frankly to the General that, while it might be militarily desirable to maintain the base as at present without making any concessions to the Icelanders, he feared that it was politically essential to make concessions to the Icelanders in a revision of the present agreement. Mr. Muccio, however, hoped that a compromise could be reached which would not too seriously affect the efficiency of the air base and the radar stations.

The Minister of Education

18. In a discussion with Mr. Gylfi Gislason, I learned that before three portfolios had been given to the two representatives of the Labour Alliance, important responsibilities had been withdrawn from two of these portfolios. When the member of the Communist Party, Mr. Ludvik Josepsson, was offered the Ministry of Trade and Commerce, it was with the understanding that he would not have control of the banks of Iceland. Certain important functions were also withdrawn from the Ministry of Social Affairs before Mr. Hannibal Valdimarsson was granted that portfolio.

19. Mr. Gislason informed me that they had very good evidence that Mr. Olafur Thors, leader of the Independents (Conservative Party), had offered the Communists considerably more to get their support to form an Independent government with Labour Alliance cooperation. It was due to these attractive offers that the Communists were able to make such great demands to the Progressive-Social Democrat coalition. Mr. Gislason said that he was personally opposed to, and afraid of, Communism. He was certain that the number of pro-Moscow Communists in the Labour Alliance were very few, although he admitted that they had great influence. He also stressed the independence of Icelandic Cabinet Ministers to one another and emphasized that the Communists would not in any way influence the present Icelandic Government's foreign policy.

The Minister of Finance

20. At the luncheon attended only by you, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, the Minister of Education, the Minister of Finance, Crépault and me, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Eysteinn Jonsson, who is also very evidently anti-Communist, stated that they had agreed to accept "one and a half Communists in the new government in order to smoke out the Communists". The Labour Alliance, he claimed, was dominated by genuine Communist leaders. The great majority of the supporters of the Alliance, however, were not pro-Communist. He felt that by giving Communists responsibility in the government, the differences between the genuine Communists and those who supported the Communist policies of the Labour Alliance for other reasons would become so acute that the genuine Communists, who never admit that they are members of the Communist Party, would have to show their cards. If they could be thus exposed, their influence could be terminated. Mr. Jonsson did not seem to fear that the Communists might learn of these tactics as he seemed to think that the genuine Communists knew that one of the reasons for offering them positions of responsibility was the hope that the Progressive-Social Democrat coalition could smoke them out. The hope of the Communists was, of course, that they would be able to outmanoeuvre and eliminate the Social Democrats from their influence in the Labour Alliance. From other Social Democrats I learned that the appointment of Hannibal Valdimarsson as the Minister of Social Affairs was a part of the manoeuvre by which they hoped eventually to outwit the Communists.

21. During the discussion, Mr. Eysteinn Jonsson stated that the doors of the World Bank were closed to Iceland. The Icelandic Government was in need of a loan for carrying out certain specific projects. They had been denied a loan from the World Bank on the grounds that the projects were government undertakings rather than private. You mentioned that you would speak about this matter to the Canadian representative. The Minister of Finance emphasized that Iceland was not asking for a gift or outright assistance. They needed a loan. He expressed the fear that, since there was at least one Communist in the Icelandic Government, the USSR might offer financial assistance which it would be difficult for the Icelandic Government to turn down if there were no alternative loan available from the Western nations.

Interviews with Icelandic Businessmen

22. I talked with a number of businessmen in Reykjavik who were most unhappy about having Communists in the Icelandic Government and the efforts of the Government to expel American military forces from Iceland. Two or three of these businessmen, however, said to me that they had told Mr. Oalfur Thors, former Prime Minister and Leader of the Conservatives, that he should stop criticizing the present Prime Minister for having taken steps to stop the spiralling of prices and wages as these measures were most necessary. The redeeming feature, these businessmen thought, of having Communists in the government was that these Communists, without consultation with the members of the trade unions which they dominate, had compelled the workers to accept a government decision which could not have been carried out without serious strikes if the Communist leaders of the Labour Alliance did not share responsibility for this decision.

23. Mr. Gunnar Asgeirsson, of the firm Björnsson & Asgeirsson, is interested in promoting closer trade relations between Canada and Iceland. He believes there is a market in Iceland for more Canadian products. In fact, he believes that the air base at Keflavik could use a number of Canadian products. He suggested that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce should send to the Chamber of Commerce in Iceland publications and literature, especially from firms interested in selling their products to Iceland. Mr. Asgeirsson is a leading member of the Icelandic Chamber of Commerce. He will personally assist any Canadian firm in getting in touch with appropriate Icelandic agents for the sale of their products in Iceland. Another person who could be of assistance in this regard is Thoraldur Asgeirsson, who is a son of the President and an important official in the Ministry of Trade and Commerce. You may wish to refer this matter through the Economic Division to appropriate Canadian authorities.

ICELAND

The Counsellor of the United States Embassy called today and on instructions from his government outlined to me the terms of the aide-mémoire presented to the Icelandic delegation on October 25. The United States, according to the aide-mémoire, were prepared to make the following four offers to Iceland:

(a) The United States were prepared to assist in Iceland's financial needs and would place at the disposal of the Icelandic government a loan of three million dollars. They would wish to enter immediately into discussions of the best ways by which Iceland could be aided financially. The conclusion of this agreement need not necessarily await the successful conclusion of the negotiations on defence. Indeed the financial agreement could be concluded as soon as the United States were satisfied about the probable outcome of the defence agreement.

(b) The United States were prepared to consider accepting all the foreign exchange costs on the Upper Sog Hydro Electric project, though this would be dependent on a proper arrangement being made for the purchase of power for the defence base. The conclusion of this agreement would have to await the signature of the defence agreement.

(c) The United States were prepared to consider the purchase of commodities by Iceland under United States Public Law 480. Provided this was concluded in time the United States would present this proposal concurrently with the defence agreement. A portion of the proceeds could be turned over to Iceland for capital investment purposes.

(d) With regard to longterm development projects, the United States were sympathetic and at an appropriate time would consider the financing of specific projects on their economic merits.

2. The Assistant Secretary of State, who gave the aide-mémoire to the Icelanders, added orally that a good deal would depend on Iceland's willingness to contribute to the defence of the free world, and its readiness to help itself economically. Mr. Hoover also added that the United States were prepared to discuss the development of new markets for Icelandic products outside the Soviet bloc.

3. Mr. Rewinkel asked for Canadian reaction and some indication as to whether we had any plans for aiding Iceland. I said I would prefer to study their proposals first and I will look into the political implications of the U.S. proposals.

4. I should be grateful for your comments and, if possible, some indication of the likelihood of any Canadian aid to Iceland.

ICELAND

It is a little difficult at this time to say exactly what Canada might do to assist the Icelanders. If you feel that something should be said to the U.S. Embassy very soon you might wish to make the following points informally:

(a) So far as direct financial aid is concerned, we have no facilities which would enable us to provide Canadian credits or grants to Iceland (although Canadian exporters to Iceland, like those exporting to any other country, have access to our Export Credits Insurance Corporation where they may be able to negotiate at least short-term credit insurance). We have, however, made the basic eighteen per cent of our total subscription available to the International Bank for lending without any restrictions concerning the use of those funds by the Bank. It might be hoped that Iceland would continue or resume discussions with the International Bank concerning possible assistance for specific projects which the Icelandic Government may have in mind. In this connection you will see from the attached letter† from Mr. Rasminsky that the doors of the World Bank are by no means closed to Iceland, despite the difficulties experienced over an earlier cement plant project. If the Icelanders can put up bankable projects, Canadian assistance might thus reach Iceland through the medium of the International Bank. In addition, Canadian funds might provide temporary help to Iceland through the International Monetary Fund if Iceland were to resort to that institution.

(b) In the trade field our economies are so complementary, that it is hard to imagine any considerable expansion in Icelandic exports to Canada. As the counsellor to the U.S. Embassy will be aware, our import and tariff policies are relatively liberal, and it is open to the Icelanders to make the most of our market if they so desire and if they have suitable commodities available. In this connection you might want to observe parenthetically that, although we ourselves are not entirely disinterested, it would seem rather strange if at a time when an effort is being made to strengthen Iceland's economy, the U.S. Administration were to accept the recommendations of the Tariff Commission for higher duties on ground fish fillets which represent a substantial portion of Iceland's exports to the United States.

2. While I think this is about all that could be said now — and even this should probably be said rather than written — we in this Division think that another attempt should be made to get the Canadian Government to make a concession to Iceland in the Civil Aviation field, which could have some economic value and could bring fairly substantial benefits in terms of political and cultural relations without much cost to us or to the airlines. What we have in mind is the possibility of certain traffic rights being conceded to the Icelandic Air Line at Winnipeg. We shall be putting a letter† through your Division on this subject very shortly. This is not, however, a matter which can be mentioned to the U.S. Embassy until it has been considered by Ministers and a decision has been taken.

3. The only other concession which might be worth investigating has to do with the use by our forces of facilities in Iceland while in transit through that country. You might wish to check with DL (1) to find out whether anything of significance might be done here (e.g., permission for fuel supplies, hangarage and other fees, etc.). We shall send a copy of this memorandum to that Division in order that they might consider the matter.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], November 15, 1956

My Dear Colleague,

You may recall that in March 1956 we exchanged letters† on the question of the possible granting to Iceland of interim air traffic rights at Gander pending the conclusion of an Air Agreement. I understand that at the recent ICAO Assembly at Caracas Mr. Morisset of the Air Transport Board held preliminary discussions with Mr. Hansen, the Icelandic Director General of Civil Aviation, but that the Icelandic authorities have not yet advanced any formal proposals for our consideration.

As you may know the economic and political position of Iceland and indeed even her continued membership in the North Atlantic Treaty have been a cause of very real concern in recent months, both to the United States and Canada. I have recently learned that the United States are prepared to grant Iceland a development loan of $3 million and to consider meeting the foreign exchange costs of a major power project, the Upper Sog Hydro Electric scheme, subject to suitable arrangements being made to supply power to the base at Keflavik; they are also considering the possibility of sale of surplus commodities to Iceland under Public Law 480 and making the local currency proceeds available for capital investment. While I doubt that it would be feasible for Canada under present circumstances to extend direct economic assistance I have been considering what positive steps we could take to aid Iceland and to strengthen the ties linking her to the Atlantic community. When I was in Reykjavik this autumn I was struck by the isolation of the country both from Europe and North America, and the desirability in particular of establishing more direct communication with Canada, especially through that rather concentrated section of our population which is of Icelandic origin. After Norway Canada is indeed the country which has the closest links with Iceland, both by virtue of the part played by Icelanders in the colonization of North America and of the number of Icelanders who have settled here. As you may know the Icelandic-Canadian community have for some time been pressing for the establishment of closer links between this country and Iceland.

I gather that when speaking to Mr. Morisset at Caracas Mr. Hansen mentioned Winnipeg as first choice for the terminus of an Icelandic route to Canada, but that Mr. Morisset endeavoured to dissuade him from this. Mr. Morisset also indicated that we would not be prepared to grant rights at Montreal but suggested Gander, where the Icelandic service to New York could feed Canadian traffic to TCA.

In view of the peculiar position and problems of Iceland which I have outlined above I wonder whether it might not be possible for the Government to adopt a more forthcoming attitude in this matter and meet the Icelandic request to establish a route to Winnipeg. I venture to suggest this even though I am aware of the difficulties which Iceland has been having with IATA, the private international airline organization which we generally would wish to support. It seems to me that this concession, granted as a special case in view of Iceland's peculiar position in NATO, would both assist Iceland in a small way economically and substantially increase her sense of community with Canada at little or no cost to us or to our airlines. I fully appreciate that limitations (e.g. on frequency and capacity) would have to be written into such an Agreement; nevertheless I think the Icelanders would be prepared to accept them as part of the bargain.

I should be grateful to receive your comments on this suggestion and to learn whether you would be prepared to recommend to Cabinet acceptance of a proposal along these lines. I quite realize that this would constitute a certain modification of our traditional policy with regard to the Montreal gateway on Atlantic operations: on the other hand Iceland is a mid-Atlantic rather than a trans-Atlantic country and there are, I believe, ample grounds for treating this as a special case which would not set a precedent for our dealings with other countries.

Yours sincerely,

USA-ICELAND NEGOTIATIONS

With regard to paragraph five of your telegram under reference, USA Embassy here has been informed that Canada is not contemplating direct financial or economic aid to Iceland, although Iceland might indirectly have access to Canadian resources through the IBRD and IMF. In a small way we are doing some things to bring Iceland closer to her NATO partners and the West by providing assistance and promoting exchanges at the technical and cultural levels, and by attempting officially and unofficially to reduce Icelandic feelings of isolation. The recently completed visit to Canada of an Icelandic reforestation expert, a similar visit to Iceland by a tree and shelter belt expert from the Department of Agriculture, and (for your own information only at present) a planned donation of Canadian books to the Icelandic national library are examples of this sort of programme which, while admittedly not operating on the grand scale, will we feel be of some value in increasing Iceland's contacts with ourselves and thus encouraging a somewhat more intimate relationship with her friends in NATO. The Minister's recent visit to Reykjavik has, also, probably had a considerable effect in this direction.

2. For your own information on this subject, consideration is being given to the question of granting Iceland air traffic rights in Canada, possibly at Winnipeg. Also being considered, though as yet in a very tentative way, is the possibility of the RCAF making use of the Icelandic civil airport facilities at Keflavik.

3. With regard to the points made in the U.S. aide mémoire we agreed in general but suggested that their offers of assistance were perhaps too closely tied to a satisfactory conclusion of the base negotiations and that their approach in general emphasized too great an extent the bilateral character of the negotiations. We also made the point that it might be useful if Iceland's economic needs could be discussed tactfully in the NATO Council in the presence of the Icelandic representative, with a view to emphasizing the NATO character of the base and of the negotiations which are now taking place. For example we wondered if the question of finding a broader market for Icelandic products might not be discussed in NATO. The limitations of Canadian action in this field were, however, obvious. These suggestions were made tentatively and at the official level only. Though the question of the Tariff Commission's proposal to raise the tariff on ground fish fillets was not repeat not raised with U.S. Embassy here, you might wish to make mention of it if you are discussing these questions with the State Department.

4. We were also informed that the U.S. was asking for comment on their proposals in all NATO capitals. The only reply known of to date in their Embassy here was from the Germans, who approved in general, said that they would see what they could do to open their markets to more Icelandic products, and also suggested that it might be worthwhile to broaden the base of the discussions by bringing NATO into a more active role. It would be useful for us in obtaining a more complete picture if you could raise discreetly the question of other replies with the State Department and perhaps obtain some idea of the general response to their proposals in other NATO countries.

5. With reference to your paragraph 7, there are no plans for Ronning to be in Iceland while the negotiations are in progress. If the matter is raised again, unless the State Department has some particular reasons which are not available to us for thinking such a visit would be worthwhile, you might reply that we feel that our Ambassador's presence would not be in the best interests of a satisfactory conclusion of the negotiations, since it might tend to make the Icelanders feel that they are being pressured, which is presumably just the approach which should be avoided.

USA-ICELAND DISCUSSIONS RE STATUS OF BASE

You will have seen in the press a report to the effect that the USA-Icelandic discussions on the future status of the base agreement of 1951 which began in Reykjavik on November 19 have been concluded and that a tentative agreement has been reached which is now being reviewed by the respective governments. The New York Times carried a report to the effect that the agreement was a bilateral one which "bypassed" NATO.⁹⁷

2. We therefore asked Ernest Mayer, the Officer in Charge of Northern European Affairs, for an account of the discussions. Mayer emphatically denied that the agreement reached would bypass NATO, although, he added, it was easy to see how the question could be distorted to show that this was the case. He thought that the nature of the agreement reached would effectively disprove the press reports. Mayer also asked us to consider what he was to tell us as being highly confidential and for "Canadian eyes only" at this stage, partly because the agreement is only tentative and partly because a promise was made to the Icelandic Government to keep its nature confidential until that government decided that the moment was propitious to made its contents known. (An article in this morning's New York Times, however, accurately reports the substance of the agreement reached.) At a later stage of the conversation Mayer said that to agree to make this promise seemed reasonable since the Icelandic Government is obviously walking a political tightrope. For the same reason he did not know when the nature of the agreement would be made public; a good deal would depend on domestic developments in Iceland.

3. Mayer said that it was quite obvious that the present government in Iceland had changed its views on the general international picture and the need to maintain defence installations in Iceland. Recent events in the Middle East and Eastern Europe had clearly indicated to them that the present international situation was different to that which obtained when the Althing passed its original resolution. This change of mind was not tacitly admitted by the Icelandic side as they obviously did not want to admit that they had been wrong; nevertheless, it underlay their new approach to the problem and their terms for a settlement, terms which Mayer said were virtually identical to those which emerged as the tentative agreement.

4. In brief the agreement calls for a return to the status quo before the Althing resolution was passed but with one exception. The 1951 agreement continues in full force and effect but the Icelanders wish that their notification to the NATO Council and to the USA to review the 1951 Agreement should still stand. You will recall that this notification called for the beginning of the six months period referred to in Article VII to run from August 1. The Icelanders now propose that this six months period and the further twelve months period should not take effect until further action is requested by either side. Mayer pointed out to us that by means of this exception Iceland need not request a further review by the NATO Council before giving six months' notice of intention to terminate the agreement. Nevertheless, the USA would still have the right to ask for such a review as its right to do so has not been jeopardized nor withdrawn; thus its own and NATO's interest are protected. There is to be no reduction in the size of the USA force presently in Iceland. (Mayer said that the Icelanders even seem disposed to accept an increase in the present level of USA troops in Iceland if this should appear necessary.) This tentative agreement when it has been approved by both sides will be formalized by an exchange of notes. A report will also be made to the NATO Council but not before the agreement is finalized.

5. One further suggestion put forward by the Icelanders was the creation of a high level joint board to deal with policy problems affecting USA-Icelandic defence cooperation. Such a board would probably be represented on the American side by the USA Ambassador in Reykjavik and the Commander of the base and on the Icelandic side by a Cabinet Minister and would supersede the present Defence Council which is a low level board concerned purely with administrative problems. Mayer stressed that this proposal was not a firm one as the Icelanders wished to study it further as would the USA.

6. In commenting on this agreement Mayer said that the State Department was reasonably satisfied with the outcome and he felt confident that on the American side at least it would be approved. The Icelandic proposals were obviously put forward in a manner designed to permit them to save as much face as possible and there seemed to be no good reason not to make the Icelandic Government's task easier. Mayer said also that the Icelandic Government, in addition to having taken note of the altered international situation, had to recognize that the Althing resolution had been voted on hastily and without much consideration; since then, however, public discussion of the issue had led to a definite swing in favour of a continuation of the 1951 Agreement. Mayer declined to speculate on the possible domestic repercussions in Iceland of the agreement once its contents became public knowledge.

7. Turning to the economic side of the discussions Mayer said that these covered much the same ground as the earlier talks in Washington. You may recall that the USA had offered a loan of three millions dollars. The Icelanders asked if this could be increased to four million as a minimum and for a longer term. Mayer said that the Icelandic request has not yet been agreed to but he thought it very likely that it would. On the Upper Sog hydro-electric project the Icelanders spelled out their requirements more specifically than they had previously. Mayer said that here too it will probably be possible to meet Iceland's wishes, provided the defence arrangements work out satisfactorily. On other bilateral economic problems further discussions were held but nothing definite emerged.

8. We went over with Mayer the points contained in your telegram SS-283 November 21. He was interested to have this info as he had not seen any report from the USA Embassy in Ottawa on the subject of what we were thinking of doing on the economic and cultural side. In connection with your suggestion that Iceland's economic needs be discussed in the NATO Council he said that speaking personally he was not too optimistic that the Icelanders would consider such a discussion as likely to lead to any satisfactory action. To their way of thinking NATO has done little for Iceland and Iceland has got little out of it. Very recently, the Prime Minister remarked that NATO was of no help when the UK market was closed to her fish and Iceland had even been criticised for selling to the Soviet Union. Mayer saw no reason, however, why the Council should not have such a discussion, although he thought that the initiative should come from countries such as Canada whose motives would not be suspect; he also thought that if we should decide to take such an initiative it was of some importance to have specific suggestions to put forward. In answer to our question Mayer said that other than expressions of interest they had received no special comments on their own proposals from other NATO governments except from Bonn, the substance of which are already known to you.

9. With reference to paragraph 30 of your telegram SS-283 November 21, we raised with Mayer the question of the Tariff Commission's proposal to raise the tariff on groundfish filets and understood from Mayer that this subject had not figured in the recent negotiations. Mayer added, however, as we are reporting in a separate telegram, that the State Department had recommended very strongly to the President that the Tariff Commission's proposal should not be approved.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 5, 1956

My dear Colleague:

I have your confidential letter of November 15th, suggesting that in view of the very special circumstances connected with Iceland's relationship to NATO, and its desire to establish a direct air communication with the Icelandic centre of population of Canada, around Winnipeg, we should consider allowing the Iceland airline to provide service to Winnipeg.

While fully appreciative of the circumstances connected with the Icelandic relationship to NATO, I am much concerned over the situation that would result if we were to take the action you suggest. By doing this we would be granting the Iceland airline privileges which we have not been prepared to grant either to other foreign airlines or even to our own private airlines; and I fear that such a step would give rise to serious criticism in Canada, as well as endanger our relations with those countries with whom it is important to maintain good relation in the field of aviation. Moreover, we would complicate the domestic political picture by adding fuel to certain local criticism in the Winnipeg area of present government policies regarding aviation, and more particularly concerning the Scandinavian Airlines.

The problems involved in providing protection for Trans-Canada Air Lines in its domestic operations and, to a reasonable extent, its international operations and of keeping a reasonable balance in our bilateral air agreements, particularly with the countries where we wish to exercise traffic rights, are complex. It appears to me that the decision taken by Canada last April, when it agreed that we might negotiate a bilateral air agreement with Iceland in which they would be provided traffic rights at Gander, is fair and reasonable, taking account of all circumstances at the present time. I would hesitate to suggest any change now.

It may be that as we see our way a little more clearly in the matter of direct service from Europe to points in western Canada, it will be possible to re-consider this situation; but for the present I would much prefer to leave it alone.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 31, 1956

My Dear Colleague,

Thank you for your letter of December 5, 1956 in which you explained so fully the reasons why you were reluctant to recommend any change in the Government's policy which would permit the granting to an Icelandic airline of traffic rights at Winnipeg. Although I would have liked to see the establishment of such a link I agree that the current domestic controversy over the position of SAS at Winnipeg does complicate the question and perhaps makes it unwise to contemplate any change in the status quo at the present time.

As I pointed out in my letter of November 15 I would like to make some gesture of friendliness to Iceland. Although the recent tragic events in Hungary and the current intensification of the cold war have had the effect of submerging at least some of the differences between Iceland and her partners the basic fact of Icelandic isolation remains; there is I believe a feeling in the country that Iceland while providing vitally needed defence facilities for NATO has received nothing tangible in return and that her partners are not really concerned about her welfare. The fisheries dispute with the United Kingdom, now happily settled, had during its long duration the effect of forcing Iceland into an unhealthy dependence on the Soviet Bloc for export markets and this dependence continues. Canada is, unfortunately, unable to provide any assistance in this respect, since Icelandic exports are directly competitive with our own in foreign markets.

In the circumstances I wonder whether, in spite of the particular problem of Winnipeg, we might not grant something more than the minimum concession to the Icelanders in the matter of air traffic rights. It does seem to me that today the granting of Third and Fourth Freedoms at Gander is of very limited value to any foreign airlines; from the silence of the Icelanders in the six months since this question was discussed at Caracas it would seem that they also view our offer with very limited enthusiasm. I appreciate the fact that no Canadian airline operates to Iceland and that consequently we are not interested in reciprocal rights; at the moment, however, no Canadian airline is operating into Belgium yet we recently modified our air agreement with that country to permit Sabena to substitute Montreal for Gander. I realize that there is an accommodation problem at Dorval but I would doubt that this would not be insuperable.

In my earlier letter I listed some of the projects for United States aid to Iceland which are under discussion between those two governments concerned. As you are no doubt aware there is some tendency at the moment for Iceland's NATO relations to be strengthened bilaterally with the United States rather than with the Alliance as a whole; this I would consider undesirable and not in the best interest of either Iceland or NATO. In the circumstances I wonder whether as a small gesture to Iceland which could be made at very little real cost to Canada you would be prepared to offer Iceland traffic rights at Montreal rather than at Gander.

Incidentally, as you have doubtless noticed, the political and strategic importance of strengthening Iceland's economy was a major factor in the recent decision of President Eisenhower to reject a unanimous recommendation of his Tariff Commission that customs duties on groundfish fillets be substantially increased. As you will appreciate this decision was of great value to Canadian fisheries. This would seem to be an additional reason why we should by our own actions show that we also recognize the political and strategic significance of Iceland.

I must apologize for returning once again to the question of special assistance for Iceland but as you know this is a matter to which I attach very considerable importance.

Yours sincerely,

[L.B. PEARSON]

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, February 12, 1957

My dear Colleague:

I have delayed my reply to your further letter of December 31st regarding air traffic rights in Canada for an Icelandic airline, to allow time for further consultation between the departments and agencies concerned. I understand that the matter was considered again at the last meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on Civil Aviation but that no agreement was reached by the Committee at that time.

There is a difference between civil aviation interest and the general NATO interests. From the point of view of our policy in relation to NATO, I sympathize with the reasons which you put forward for taking a somewhat more generous attitude towards the Icelandic position. At the same time, from the point of view of civil aviation there is no interest in completing an agreement with Iceland which would grant them access to an important traffic point, such as Montreal; and, in fact, reasons against so doing.

While it is true that we have over recent months opened up Montreal as a traffic point to the important western European countries which operate international scheduled air services even when we do not have any immediate interest to operate reciprocal services, Iceland is in a different position. It is not interested, as was Belgium for example, in operating a service mainly for the sake of providing traffic between Canada and the other country party to the agreement. Iceland is interested in obtaining traffic rights in Canada primarily for the purpose of picking up Canadian traffic which it would move beyond Iceland into Europe; and the earlier record of the Icelandic airlines in operating services of this sort between North America and Europe has had a disruptive effect upon the policy of AITA in the matter of rates and other standards. I would agree, of course, that we could exercise effective rate control and prevent these dangers.

My understanding is that at the last Assembly of the International Civil Aviation Organization, in Venezuela, following informal discussions with Icelandic representatives the matter was left that we would not take any action until a further formal approach had been received from the Icelandic authorities, including indication as to whether they were interested in Gander. On the whole I would prefer to see the matter remain on this basis. On the other hand, if you feel that general considerations of external policy should overrule this point of view or, indeed, should a further request be received from the Icelandic authorities, then probably the best thing to do would be to have the matter taken up at Cabinet level with a view to seeking guidance in resolving the rather divergent interests that appear to be involved.

Sincerely yours,

INCLUSION OF NEW WEAPONS IN THE USA 1957 MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

Following is statement made by USA representative together with proposed press release.
Begins:

USA STATEMENT ON NEW WEAPONS INCLUDED IN FY 57 MUTUAL AID PROGRAM

The USA recently advised certain countries of the new weapons which the USA is tentatively planning to make available for force modernization under the FY 1957 Mutual Security Program. Final agreement on the details of this program, however, is dependent on several factors. Foremost among these factors is the countries' capability effectively to utilize existing materiel and the planned new weapons, including provision of adequate manpower, training and sites. Another important requirement is assurance of security safeguards comparable to those employed by the USA for these weapons.

There follows a list, country by country, of the advanced weapons which have been tentatively allocated under the FY 1957 grant aid program.

	HONEST JOHN BN.	NIKE BN.	MATADOR SQDN.	F-84F ATOMIC CONVERSION KITS
NORWAY	1	1	-	-
DENMARK	1	1	-	-
BELGIUM	1	-	-	-
NETHERLANDS	1	-	-	150
FRANCE	2	-	1	150
ITALY	1	3	-	200
GREECE	1	-	-	200
TURKEY	2	-	-	-

This Mutual Aid Program is in support of the statement made by Secretary Wilson at the December 1956 ministerial meeting. At that time Secretary Wilson stated, "Our belief in the need for the continual modernization of NATO forces is reflected in the USA's FY 1957 military assistance program. We intend to propose a similar program for FY 1958. The ability of the USA to assist in a modernization program for NATO is dependent to a considerable degree on the willingness and the increasing capability of the other NATO countries to provide most of the maintenance support for their own forces. The manner and extent to which modern weapons will be incorporated into NATO forces must, of course, be determined in conjunction with NATO military authorities and with what the countries themselves can afford in their own overall military programs."

Country allocations of the listed new weapons have been made with the advice of NATO military authorities. Within the limits of USA funds and weapons availabilities, the USA program has taken into account to the maximum extent possible the highest priority NATO requirements. It is hoped that in those instances where the capability of forces to utilize equipment was a limiting factor in the FY 1957 new weapons allocations, countries will be able to take the necessary steps to improve their ability to absorb new weapons under subsequent programs.

In addition to the tentative grant aid program as outlined, some of these weapons are being made available on a reimbursable basis to certain NATO countries. It should be understood that the USA, subject to production limitations, stands ready to make such reimbursable offers to any NATO country under approved NATO military requirements.

At the ministerial meeting last December, Secretary Wilson also stressed the importance of developing properly trained personnel in NATO military forces in order to receive and handle the advanced weapons which are being integrated into those forces. The USA can now inform the Council that training in the employment of these weapons will be provided. This training will include training of selected NATO units in the techniques of delivering atomic weapons, using the weapons systems being provided through mutual aid programs. Training will be undertaken with special training devices and, therefore, will not entail possession of nuclear components by the forces being trained. This training program will be in harmony with the priorities established by NATO military authorities and will be carried out under arrangements worked out directly between appropriate military authorities of the USA and the NATO member countries receiving training.

While it is not envisaged that any special security arrangements with respect to this training will be required initially, it is possible that such a contingency might arise at some later date. Text ends.

Press Release

The USA Government today informed the North Atlantic Council of the advanced weapons which are being included in the American Mutual Aid Program for countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation for the USA fiscal year 1957. The weapons include the Honest John and Matador ground-to-ground missiles, and the Nike, a ground-to-air missile. They are being provided, in accordance with NATO military priorities, with the wholly defensive purpose of protecting military and population centers and to deter and, if need be, to repel aggression. The USA representative to the Council described this action as further implementation of the long-standing policy of the USA to include modern and the most effective possible weapons in its Mutual Aid Program.

The USA representative informed the Council that the advanced weapons being furnished under the USA mutual aid program for fiscal year 1957 had been tentatively allocated to certain NATO nations based upon the guidance of NATO military authorities. He made clear that these allocations, of which no details can now be released, would remain tentative pending discussions on measures necessary to the satisfactory absorption of the weapons in the recipient countries' forces. USA law, of course, does not permit transfers of nuclear components for weapons. The USA representative also stated that the USA was prepared to furnish NATO countries with advanced weapons on a reimbursable basis, subject to availability of the desired weapons and other conditions normally surrounding such reimbursable aid.

III. CANADIAN POLICY REGARDING NEW WEAPONS (SECRET)

11. Referring to External Affairs' telegram No. 387 dated 6 March 1957 from NATO, Paris, General Foulkes pointed out that two major problems arose out of the U.S. decisions. First, the whole question of the introduction of new weapons into the NATO Alliance and secondly, the method by which the United States would issue such weapons. Since Canada was not a beneficiary under U.S. mutual aid programmes, it was most desirable that the Chiefs of Staff should consider Canadian policy in regard to the introduction of new weapons, particularly since the U.S. may at a later stage release atomic warheads to its NATO partners; however, such action would require change in the U.S. Atomic Law before implementation was possible.

12. The Chief of the Air Staff stated that insofar as air-to-air weapons were concerned, the relative merits of the MB-1 and SPARROW missiles were being examined. He considered that when fitted to a CF100 aircraft, there was little to choose between these weapons insofar as their "kill" possibilities were concerned when employed against a single enemy aircraft. Relative costs of these two weapons are not yet available and a study is not yet completed as to their relative suitability for employment on the CF105. Nothing had as yet come out of the studies which would justify changing the SPARROW programme, but the studies must be continued. Insofar as the ground-to-air weapons are concerned, considerable research was being undertaken by the U.S. authorities regarding new concepts for anti-aircraft missiles, but he saw no reason to change our policy with regard to BOMARC at the present time. While we should proceed slowly on this matter, the BOMARC guided missile still appeared to be the most suitable air defence weapon for the purpose for which it was designed.

13. The Chief of the General Staff stated that insofar as ground-to-ground weapons were concerned, it was desirable to decide now whether to acquire ground-to-ground weapons without atomic warheads for tactical training in the Canadian Army. Consideration should also be given to the problems of acquiring atomic warheads for these weapons at a later date.

14. The Chief of the General Staff also stated that the Army has been training on U.S. weapons at Fort Bliss, as they had been developed, and as long as we could continue to send personnel to American establishments, it was doubtful whether we could justify acquiring such weapons for ourselves. There were two types of ground-to-ground missiles in which the Canadian Army were interested, i.e. LITTLE JOHN and LACROSSE, but neither of these weapons was as yet available. He suggested that the Canadian Army might initiate discussions with the American Army regarding the problems, financial and otherwise, in Canadian acquisition of one or more HONEST JOHN'S for training purposes.

15. Rear Admiral Rayner stated it was not clear at this time that the "Restigouche" class of escort vessels were capable of carrying a guided missile system such as TARTAR. The whole question was being examined as rapidly as possible. The Navy had a definite requirement for guided missiles. However, it was possible that ships suitable for carrying guided missiles might be at least 500 tons larger than the present RESTIGOUCHE class escorts. The Navy had an interest in torpedoes with atomic warheads and atomic depth charges.

16. The Chief of the Air Staff stated that 1 Air Division was somewhat concerned about its atomic delivery capability. The capability to carry small atomic bombs might be necessary in order to maintain the effectiveness of 1 Air Division as part of the NATO Air Forces in Europe.

17. The Deputy Minister considered that guidance should be sought from SHAPE as to the need for aircraft of 1 Air Division to be used in this role.

18. Mr. Bryce suggested that careful consideration should be given as to whether Canada should support European nations to enter the atomic field. It seemed undesirable for more nations to produce atomic weapons and at some time it would be desirable to formulate a policy as to the number of additional nations which should have atomic capabilities. The United States is already making a distinction between strategic and tactical weapons and it would be sensible if Canada supported U.S. policy in this regard if issuance of tactical weapons was made on the basis that the recipients agreed not to produce any type of nuclear weapons.⁹⁸

19. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff explained to the Committee the controls which had been proposed as part of the "Atoms for Peace" programme. He considered that it might be easier to persuade the NATO countries to accept such controls if the U.S. provided atomic warheads for tactical weapons, which would be kept under U.S. control. He considered it extremely important that the production of new weapons should be standardized.

20. Summing up the discussion, General Foulkes stated, and the Committee agreed:

(a) that Canada does not have an immediate requirement for atomic warheads for new weapons and therefore there was no reason to press for a change in the U.S. law for a period of at least two years;

(b) that the only requirements presently envisaged for Canadian forces are:

(i) an atomic warhead for the SPARROW missile for the Air Force;

(ii) atomic depth charges for the Navy and Air Force;

(iii) LITTLE JOHN and/or LACROSSE weapons for the Army and at a later stage atomic warheads for these weapons.

21. The Committee also agreed that the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, would prepare a policy statement⁹⁹ concerning weapons development in Canada for use by the Minister in answering questions which may arise in the House.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

There has been little preliminary work on the Conference to report in the past few days with most of the visitors preoccupied with Wimbledon, Lords and the Canada Cup.

2. There has been some discussion of plans for the meetings, with emphasis on the desirability of encouraging more free discussion and fewer set speeches. The agenda remains pretty much as indicated. We have been told that it [is] most unlikely that the subject of the Gold Coast will be discussed during the period on July 4 reserved for Commonwealth constitutional questions, but that this period is being retained under this heading as it is expected that Ceylon will raise the subject of its constitutional plans.

3. The Prime Minister of Pakistan called on Mr. St-Laurent yesterday, and he and I lunched with Mr. Nehru, Mrs. Pandit and Krishna Menon. Later in the day the Prime Minister called on Sir Anthony Eden.

4. Mohammad Ali spoke to the Prime Minister about Kashmir but left the impression that he did not intend to raise the subject during the conference but hoped that others might do so. He also mentioned Warsak and expressed their considerable satisfaction with the attitude which had been shown by the Canadians in the discussions last week in Ottawa.¹ He emphasized his interest in the subject and his belief in the importance of our working together in understanding. Sir Anthony Eden also referred to Kashmir but did not specifically ask the Prime Minister to intervene, though undoubtedly he hopes that Mr. St-Laurent will use his influence with Nehru if the opportunity presents itself. It looks as if this subject will be played very much by ear and will be pursued only if an occasion ripens. (Last night Eden told me that he intends to raise the matter with Nehru today. He will then probably discuss it separately with Mohammad Ali and after these separate talks will decide whether it is worth while to try to get the two parties together with himself and possibly Mr. St-Laurent present. Last night in conversation at Buckingham Palace the Pakistan Foreign Minister made a strong plea to me for talks of some kind on Kashmir. He said the Pakistan Government would be reasonable and compromising if only discussions could begin. Contrary to reports from Karachi (Scott's telegram 209†) the subject of Kashmir was not raised at all with Mr. Nehru.)

5. Mr. Nehru spoke a good deal about Soviet policy at lunch on Tuesday. He feels strongly that the Russian leaders are very anxious to establish better relations and that the Western Powers are not doing enough to meet them. We took the opportunity to explain to him something of present thinking in NATO. He said that NATO had served a very useful purpose when it was established and he had had no objection to it. However, he doubted whether it had any role to play in present circumstances. He said that Western leaders were over-emphasizing conflict with the Communists. We had simply shifted from talking about military conflict to economic conflict. What we should talk about was means of cooperation and of ending the Cold War. He spoke also about the Colombo Plan, and seemed to think that we had reached a very satisfactory basis for arranging and providing assistance.

FIRST PLENARY SESSION OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE
JUN 27/56

Following the photographing and opening words of welcome and appreciation the first session of the conference Wednesday afternoon decided to proceed with agenda as suggested, plus item on Pacific questions and Japan, proposed by Holland. It was decided as compromise to issue brief communiqué Wednesday night and Friday night, and then probably only at conclusion. They proceeded forthwith to discussion of relations with Soviet Russia. Eden led off with lengthy statement recounting various aspects of changes in past 18 months and the revelations of Bulganin and Khrushchev. He thought we could believe Russians now do not want a major war and realize that the United States does not want one either, but will continue to develop and maintain major weapons and not accept control on them. They wish to be regarded and treated as a normal great power and are taking steps at home which help to make that possible. On the other hand, they show no disposition to make any concessions on major issues, including Germany. He proceeded to discuss conversations with Bulganin and Khrushchev. After discussion of some details, he went on to say that the UK was now reviewing its policies in various fields in the light of these developments.

2. Eden then called on Nehru who spoke of his visit to Russia and the Bulganin and Khrushchev visit to India. He felt basic changes were taking place in Russia and were coming from below as well as from above. He felt that Russia should be studied as a great power, and on the assumption that a major war was now out of the question. He felt that economic advance was the best assurance of avoiding future conflict and disarmament might contribute effectively to that as well as being desirable in itself. Whatever we think of their motives, we should engage in competitive co-existence as constructively as possible and develop contacts with them, step by step, which eventually may make possible the resolution of even major issues.

3. Eden then called on Mr. St-Laurent, who spoke briefly, saying that we believe a turning point seems to have been reached and the turn seems to have been in the right direction, but we can't tell how far they will go in that way. We should take advantage of the circumstances to settle as many issues as possible. The Russians have not given up, and cannot be expected to give up any of those things they regard as essential to their security, including the development of major weapons right up to guided missiles. If we come to believe a major war is impossible and we can expect to eliminate even smaller ones, it will become very difficult to persuade our people to maintain the heavy costs of defence. As yet, neither side had developed sufficient confidence in the other to warrant it ceasing to develop and maintain its defences. He was glad to hear Nehru's view that the changes in Russia come from the changed circumstances and not just from the top, for that means there is less danger of the change being reversed. We hope there will grow a conviction on the Russian side as well as our side — a conviction that competitive co-existence can become a durable state with which both sides can be satisfied. As yet in North America we have not reached a point where we feel that disarmament based on faith and assurances is sufficient guarantee of our security.

4. At Menzies' suggestion, Eden called upon Mr. Pearson to speak of his impressions of the USSR on his trip there last November. This Pearson did at some length. The substance is familiar to you; the emphasis was on Russian pride in their own achievements, their ignorance of our manner of government, and their blunt warnings regarding our position in NATO and beside the United States.

5. Menzies spoke fairly briefly, expressing scepticism of any Russian change of heart, emphasizing the lack of deeds to confirm their words, and warning of their advantages in waging economic and political warfare against the West in many parts of the world. He felt we should be friendly in our words but not change our policies.

6. Holland followed and largely agreed, expressing view that if the UK reduced its expenditure on defence there would be strong pressure on the Government of New Zealand to follow Britain in this as in all else.

7. Strijdom was inclined to the scepticism of Menzies and expressed grave concern at the entry of Russia into Africa at Egypt. He seemed to see no incongruity in arguing in this forum that Western democratic countries make no effort to influence the form of government in other lands as the Communists do.

8. Mohammad Ali spoke in a fashion that showed his allegiance to democracy and the West and proceeded to express his fears of the economic and political influence of Russia on underdeveloped countries by frequent references to the situation in Afghanistan.

9. Bandaranaike proved a fluent expositor of Ceylon's case. He argued that we could not tell whether the Russians had suffered a change of heart, but we should consider whether such a change is necessary on our own side. More visits, more contacts, more trade would help but we must deal with our own problems effectively and not present the Communists with an opportunity to exploit discontents that we should not tolerate.

10. Lord Malvern, though, of course, just a vocal observer, was invited to speak as usual and did so succinctly, saying that in his federation their Communists came from Britain, not Russia.

11. It is planned to pursue this subject in discussion on Thursday morning.

SECOND PLENARY MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

The meeting on Thursday morning continued with the discussion of relations with Soviet Russia. The detailed official record is being sent forward to you.

2. The meeting opened with a fairly lengthy statement by Mr. Selwyn Lloyd illustrating some of the changes which had taken place within Russia, commenting upon their military policy, referring to the defence expenditure of the United Kingdom, and ending with the following suggestion:

"... How should the democracies respond to this Soviet policy? It seemed clear that they should avoid spending too much of their resources on obsolescent conventional arms and dispositions, and that they should not so conduct themselves as to stimulate the cohesion of the Soviet and satellite countries. An wholly uncompromising and hostile attitude to Russia might tend to unite the Communist countries, just as Stalin's policy had united the Western Nations for their common defence. He agreed, therefore, that it would be mistaken to talk too much of the new developments in terms of a conflict. On the positive side, it was important that the democracies should use every chance through cultural contacts, tourism and trade to help along the processes working for liberalisation in the Soviet Union. They should also show that the democratic way of life was a better form of political expression than a totalitarian régime, and they should give better publicity to their efforts to bring economic aid to the under-developed countries. The cooperation of the Russians should be sought in settling specific international issues, such as the Arab-Israel dispute. Finally it was important to prevent Russia from gaining control of the key areas of the world, and thus preserve her from the inevitable temptation of excessive power".

3. There was then brief discussion of Russian policy in regard to the admission of Japan to the United Nations, raised by Menzies, which was followed by some further remarks by Menzies and Mohammad Ali to the effect that as long as there was danger of limited wars it would be necessary to maintain conventional forces as well as nuclear weapons.

4. Mr. Nehru then intervened with a long and fervent statement suggesting that far too much emphasis was being given to military factors by Western nations in their public discussions of international affairs, which precluded any sympathetic response from uncommitted nations who were more attracted by the manner in which the Russian leaders continuously spoke of peace. While he felt that the Western nations would undoubtedly wish to pursue what they felt were necessary military policies to be able to defend themselves, it seemed better that they should do everything possible to encourage the Russian leaders to follow the paths of international cooperation and non-intervention in the affairs of other nations to which they had publicly committed themselves.

5. At this point Mr. St-Laurent made a brief statement which is accurately recorded as follows in the account of the meeting: "Mr. St-Laurent expressed the hope that the level of armaments would cease to dominate world problems. He feared however that it would be some time yet before it would prove possible to establish a real sense of security which was not based on the power of retaliation. This was, he thought, particularly true of the United States who now regarded themselves as the major target for a Russian attack and feared the rapid Russian progress in the nuclear weapon field. It would take time to reassure American opinion and to halt the impetus of the immense preparations which the Americans now had in hand for defence against thermo-nuclear attack."

6. There then followed a brief discussion about Russian announcements of demobilization of a portion of their armed forces and its relation to what Western nations were doing.

7. Following this a discussion arose over the danger of additional nations embarking upon the acquisition of nuclear weapons. Mr. Nehru in particular expressed concern over this development, and the United Kingdom emphasized their concern over it as well. (This definite expression of the Indian attitude on this matter may be of use to us at this conference or subsequently in discussion with the Indians over our policy in regard to inspection and control of the use of materials and equipment supplied for the peaceful development of atomic energy.)

8. The meeting then turned to a discussion of trade between Western nations and Soviet Russia in which little that was new developed. Sir Anthony Eden expressed (somewhat undiplomatically we felt) concern that the Western nations were getting so little credit for the very large effort that we are making in providing aid to under-developed countries, for example through the Colombo Plan.

9. The meeting went on and concluded with a discussion of a variety of aspects of Soviet policy including a suggestion by Mr. Nehru that there was a possibility of the United States and the Soviet Union coming to some political agreement over the heads of other countries. This possibility clearly gave rise to some apprehension around the table. Mr. St-Laurent concluded the discussion with a short comment which is recorded as follows:

"Mr. St-Laurent agreed that the aim should be to get the Russians to cooperate in reducing tension in the sensitive areas. He was sure that the Russians did not want a global war, but the risk of local conflicts existed and the Russian leaders should be invited to cooperate in alleviating the tensions which might give rise to such conflicts".

THIRD PLENARY MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Sir Anthony Eden proposed the division of discussion of the Middle East into the Palestine problem and general problems of the area. Selwyn Lloyd introduced the former subject with some general comments on the situation expressing doubts about Nasser's intentions and his ability to cope with Soviet infiltration. Mr. St-Laurent asked if we could proceed on the assumption that the Arabs would not seek to eliminate Israel. Lloyd spoke of the difference between the public and private views of the Arabs and said Nasser had told him he had no idea of the power of the refugees. Nehru asked what chances there were for changing the boundaries. If this could be done there was a better chance of a solution. It was probably true that some of the Arab leaders would like a settlement on the basis of changed boundaries but public sentiment was very strong. He said his own vague impression was that Nasser, in spite of nationalist pressure, "was perhaps more reasonable than some others." He said that it was necessary to see this problem in its broader context and referred to divisions in the Arab world.

2. Mr. Strijdom, who spoke quite soberly on the subject, asked if the Three Power Declaration still stood. Lloyd said that in a clear case of aggression the United Nations would have to take action and the United Kingdom would be bound by the Three Power Declaration as well. In case of less overt aggression they would use the 1950 Assembly Resolution calling on both sides to retire.

3. Mohammad Ali said that the idea that the Arabs wanted to wipe out Israel was not in accordance with present trends, although it might once have been the case. He emphasized the need to take into consideration the Arab feeling that Israel was expansive. If the boundaries of the United Nations resolution of 1947 were accepted, the Arabs might agree on settlement provided also there were guarantees against Israeli aggression. In reply to an enquiry by Mr. St-Laurent as to whether he thought the sending of defensive planes to Israel would be helpful, Mohammad Ali said that since the balance of strength still lay with Israel, the sending of planes might make settlement more difficult. Egypt was the most important factor and he believed Nasser was a responsible leader. It was important to seek a solution as soon as possible before one move in the armaments race was matched by another.

4. Both Eden and Lloyd at various times stressed the importance of including the Russians in any proposals for a settlement and of doing so through the Security Council. Mohammad Ali agreed on the Russian role but Strijdom asked if the inclusion of Russia would not frustrate settlement. Eden pointed out the need to avoid a Soviet veto and the fact that the Russians were already involved in the area.

5. Mohammad Ali seemed very anxious to find out if there could be agreement to the 1947 boundaries but Mr. Pearson assured him that there was no chance of Israel agreeing to boundaries which the Arabs had gone to war to oppose.

6. Nehru began the general discussion of the Middle East by speaking of the necessity of encouraging democracy wherever we found it. He thought there was perhaps more of it in Syria than elsewhere. Although he spoke objectively and cautiously, he regretted the fact that the Great Powers had so often found themselves supporting feudal elements. He recognized that outside powers could not intervene in internal affairs but the difficulty was that the popular and liberal elements were discouraged. Selwyn Lloyd had stressed the concrete importance of the economic aspects of the Baghdad Pact. However, if economic help was tied to military alliance it was not appreciated, particularly if this went to help reactionary régimes. He feared that recent developments in the Middle East and possibly the Czech arms sales to Egypt flowed from the military pacts. He recognized that the Soviet Union might not itself have clean hands on the subject of alliances which it criticized.

7. Mohammad Ali, who was also very objective in spite of the delicacy of the subject, recognized that there were great differences in the régimes in the Middle East. However it could not be said that it was the illiberal régimes which were involved in pacts and the liberal régimes which were not. Countries must be left free to work out their own security as they felt necessary and in accordance with their own circumstances. The basic question was whether the pacts were defensive or aggressive. Nehru had seen a lack of consistency in our attitude to the Soviet Union in this area. However it was inevitable that in the present circumstances while many issues were not solved there would remain some areas of conflict with the Russians. We should try to extend the area of cooperation as much as possible and to remove the Russian fears of the Baghdad Pact, but not do so by giving in to everything the Russians asked.

8. The meeting concluded with some talk of Algeria. The most interesting comment was Nehru's exposition of the Indian suggestions for a cease-fire. He showed a good deal of understanding of French difficulties but questioned Selwyn Lloyd's statement that the French could not find any Algerian leaders to deal with. When asked about the French reaction to his suggestions, Nehru said with a smile that these were different in private and in public. Although in public there had been statements that this was a domestic affair of France, in private the French had been appreciative and not at all unfriendly. (Note for Communications) The Minister would like copies of telegrams 883,² 886 and 887 to be in the hands of Mr. Léger on Sunday.

FOURTH PLenary MEETING OF THE COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Eden began the meeting with an offer to talk candidly about Cyprus which was taken up. The British case was stated in familiar terms by Eden, Lloyd and Lennox-Boyd.

²Voir/See Document 493.

Lennox-Boyd was particularly frank in recognizing that for strategic reasons they were unable to follow in Cyprus the colonial policy they followed elsewhere and they very much regretted this necessity. Throughout the emphasis was placed on the intransigence of the Turkish position and the necessity of recognizing this as a fact. Eden said emphatically that the Turks would in no case allow Cyprus to go to Greece. They might use force to prevent this and he would not blame them. Menzies made a strong defence of the strongest British position and Mohammad Ali stressed the strength of Turkish feelings and the hope that no solution would be made without Turkish consent.

2. Some uneasiness was evident in a few questions by Mr. Holland which were not very clear or very well directed. Mr. Nehru seemed doubtful of Lennox-Boyd's statement that the movement for enosis was in no sense a national movement but rather that of a fanatical minority. He reported on his conversation with the Greek Prime Minister when he stopped off at the airport in Athens. The Greeks had told him that they were sure that they could satisfy the Turks with two assurances. They were prepared to give every guarantee to the minority under United Nations supervision and they were prepared to recognize the Turkish fears for their security by guaranteeing that Cyprus would never be used as a military depot apart from its present use for British or NATO purposes. They said that they thought they could reach an understanding with the Turks if the British would only put in a good word on their behalf in Ankara. Nehru emphasized that he had merely listened to what the Greeks had to say and that he did not know whether an agreement along these lines was possible.

3. During the short time left for consideration of "European Security" there was a certain amount of inconclusive conversation about Germany. There seemed to be general agreement that there was no easy solution coupled with doubts as to whether present Western policies were adequate. Mr. Nehru wondered how long a strong Germany would continue in its present alignment. Mr. St-Laurent emphasized that the situation had changed greatly in the past few years and the basis on which Chancellor Adenauer had based his policy might no longer be valid. There was need for a reassessment of the situation. Eden pointed out that the French at the time of the EDC debate had begged the British to strengthen their forces on the continent in order to balance the Germans. However, there were now very few French troops in Germany and no German.

4. Eden asked Mr. Pearson to say something about the work of the Committee of Three. Mr. Pearson said that the principal reason for a new look at NATO was the realization that the major deterrent now was not the NATO forces in Europe but the US strategic airforce. If NATO were to survive it would have to be based on a stronger foundation than fear of Soviet aggression in Europe. For this reason the NATO leaders were exploring along two lines: the improvement of political consultation and the possibilities of economic activity. The Committee of Three were already clear in their minds that in both these fields they should not emphasize the exclusive nature of NATO. None of the members would wish to weaken its association with other international bodies and groups. They thought that it would be a mistake to develop NATO into an agency of economic cooperation and technical assistance although it was a good forum for consultation on these subjects. Heretofore NATO had been preoccupied with defence with negative if essential problems. They hoped now that its aims could be more positive, not merely confined to protection but seeking for conciliation, for finding solutions to our difference with the Soviet countries. When Mr. Pearson spoke of the importance of discussions in the NATO Council before members adopted policies which would affect others, Eden said "I like that" and talked about the need for "some high powered machinery in Paris".

FIFTH MEETING, COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE — RELATIONS WITH CHINA

At Eden's invitation, Nehru opened the discussion with an effective and balanced statement of the case for recognition and acceptance in the United Nations of the Peking régime. There were no unfamiliar arguments which were given with quiet and impressive conviction and his comments on United States policy were very restrained. He spoke also of the situation concerning the off-shore islands, reminding the meeting that when they had last met 18 months ago it had been agreed that it would be best if the islands were evacuated by the nationalists. This however, had not taken place. Although the situation was admittedly quiet, it continued to be explosive. If the Chinese realized that they would achieve nothing by negotiation the situation might become very dangerous again. He took some comfort in the fact that the Geneva negotiations had stretched to 52 meetings, indicating that neither side wanted to break off. He referred to Chou En-Lai's recent offer to negotiate with Chiang Kai-shek and reminded the Prime Ministers that this was not a new offer. Chou had been saying the same thing, at least since Bandung, and even before that had told him personally that he was willing to reach a peaceful settlement with Chiang Kai-shek. It was mistaken to think of China as a camp follower of the Soviet Union. Their relations were friendly and China was getting much help from Russia. However, China stood on her own feet and was very proud. He was convinced that for a considerable period of time at least the Chinese people were so fully taken up with their internal problems that they were not likely to be expansive. India, for her part, had no fear of direct aggression, partly because of the Chinese preoccupation with its internal problems and partly because they did not consider China to be expansionist (possibly, he admitted, because of their internal preoccupations). India had a strong barrier in the Himalayas. They were not afraid and they did not want or need protection from anyone.

2. Mr. Menzies admitted that it was difficult to answer the "juristic argument" made by Mr. Nehru, but he was not very anxious to promote this argument at the present time because it would create difficulties with the United States. He reminded Mr. Nehru that although he said that India had no apprehensions, they nevertheless maintained substantial forces. In reply, Mr. Nehru said that Mr. Dulles, when he was in India, had expressed surprise at the small number of the Indian forces for so large a country. Mr. Nehru said that they had also to recognize that there was a possibility of a general war taking place and India could not be entirely defenceless. He did not think any such war would take place near India because of the Himalayas. Nevertheless, they had a long and difficult frontier to police. Even in British days there were constant incursions of Tibetans, for example. There was a "check post" army, he professed.

3. Mr. St-Laurent said that he had listened with interest and profit to Mr. Nehru. It was the Canadian view however, that feeling in the United States was such that little progress could be made until after the elections. He himself had been much surprised at the strong views which President Eisenhower had expressed to him personally against recognition on moral grounds. The strong feelings of the American people on this subject were not easy to explain but they did exist. A too hasty effort to force a change on them would meet with a strong reaction not only from the administration but also from public opinion and Congress. Though we recognized the incongruity of having the vast majority of Chinese represented by the Nationalist Government, nevertheless the existence of the United Nations with the presence of the United States was a matter of great significance to us and there was a danger that they might actually withdraw if Peking were admitted at this time. It might take some time for the United States to take a different view but we hoped that their present attitude would not persist indefinitely.

4. Eden agreed with what had been said by Mr. Nehru about the offshore islands and with what Mr. St-Laurent had said about Eisenhower's views. The question was what we could do about the American position. He gathered from what had been said that we would all like to bring about the representation of the Peking régime in the United Nations, not because we liked the régime, but because it existed. However, we could do nothing before the American elections and even after that we must go very carefully and see what could be worked out. One thing on which there could be progress was trade. It was ludicrous to have severer controls on trade with China than with Russia. This was particularly bad for Japan and it was in everyone's interest that Japan should be allowed to trade with China which was its only practical outlet.

5. Mr. Holland was likewise much impressed by what Mr. Nehru had said and he thought that if the United Nations was to survive some solution must be found. However he did not know what we could do if Peking would not accept the existence of two Chinas. He would never agree to seeing Formosa and the Nationalists thrown to the wolves. Nothing, of course, could be done before the American elections.

6. Mohammad Ali said that they had friendly relations with Peking and would like to see them in the United Nations. He recognized, however, that not much could be done before the United States elections and probably even in the next United Nations Assembly. In the meantime, they should seek for means of easing relations between the United States and China. He thought that trade offered the best prospects.

7. Mr. Strijdom did not think that the mere fact that China was Communist was reason enough for keeping it out of the United Nations. He agreed with Mr. Holland over Formosa. After the elections in the United States there should be a combined effort to induce the Americans to accept the solution of two Chinas. He agreed with Mr. Nehru about the consequences of keeping Peking out of the United Nations.

8. Among other things, Mr. Bandaranaike stressed the enormous impact of new China on Asia. He considered it anomalous that some members of the Commonwealth recognized Peking and some did not. He did not think that those who did not needed to wait for the United States elections in order to take this action.

9. Mr. Nehru then made some remarks about Formosa. It seemed to the Chinese that this island was more important to them strategically than to the United States. He did not know what the choice of the Formosans would be if they had a choice but no one could say that they had chosen Chiang Kai-shek. There was no democracy in Formosa. The régime continued only because of United States support and its armed strength. There was a strong possibility that the régime would collapse and this would put the United States in a very false position. Peking could take the off-shore islands by force if they wished to do so and the Americans would then face a terrible choice of risking war by defending them or abandoning an ally. He recognized the strength of American feeling on this subject but something should be done to help the Americans themselves out of such a dangerous situation.

10. On relations between China and the Soviet Union he added that whenever he talked to Chou En-Lai about Russian aid, Chou pointed out that China got nothing from Moscow. What they got was loans and assistance they paid for. Whenever he talked to Bulganin and Khrushchev about such questions as Formosa or Indochina, they indicated that they knew about these problems and were interested in them but that these were in the Chinese domain and the Chinese were quite able to look after them.

11. In conclusion there was some discussion of the position of the overseas Chinese. Mr. Nehru seemed to think that a great advance had been made towards solving this problem by the promise that Chou En-Lai had made to the Indonesians at Bandung to force the Chinese to choose their citizenship. He recognized however that the Chinese community would nevertheless remain and might well feel attached to the mother country. He was very careful about making any categorical promises on this subject. Lennox-Boyd, with Singapore particularly in mind, expressed grave doubts about the Chinese-Indonesian arrangement which enabled representatives of Peking to make lists of local citizens. The Chinese in British colonies greatly feared the arrival of consuls or registration agents because they believed that they would then be blacklisted. In conclusion, Nehru told of a North Vietnamese Minister who had asked him how many Chinese there were in India. When he told him, the Vietnamese had said that India was very lucky.

Repeat New Delhi, Karachi, Delegation New York for Mr. Martin (Information).

KASHMIR

Little progress has been made as yet over Kashmir. Eden mentioned the subject very delicately to Nehru when the latter was at Chequers and received merely a forceful exposition of the Indian case. As a result to some extent at least, of pressure from his officials, Eden raised several days ago with Nehru the possibility of discussions. Nehru said he was quite prepared to discuss the subject with Eden or with Mohammad Ali but he was not prepared to do so in London and he was not prepared to discuss it in company with other prime ministers or to be subjected to Commonwealth pressure. (Although he was firm he took the approaches very calmly. Mrs. Pandit has mentioned to us that she found him very much mellowed than previously and less inclined to be upset by criticism.)

2. Mohammad Ali is, of course, disappointed, if not surprised and worried about returning without being able to report some progress or at least some prospect of progress. He is considering speaking with Nehru directly but the British are inclined to dissuade him from doing so. In official circles here there is some nervousness lest Mr. Menzies charge into the subject. In the full meeting on relations with China he made a somewhat provocative reference to India's maintenance of troops, and yesterday during the restricted meeting on defence,³ when Mohammad Ali but not Nehru was present, he referred to the "wretched and teasing" problem from which Pakistan suffered and said with a good deal of feeling that he didn't know why this could not be solved. This reference was probably intended to give some comfort to the Pakistanis and he may not press it further.

3. In spite of rumours which continue to appear, we have taken no initiative of any kind on this subject and, in the circumstances as reported above, think it best not to do so. The Pakistan Foreign Minister called on me yesterday and this fact might revive reports of our activity on Kashmir, but the visit was concerned with their food difficulties and their project for an atomic research reactor concerning which he asked our help.⁴ He did mention Kashmir, but only to impress on me their disappointment that no progress was being made and their increasing difficulties in keeping the tribesmen out of Kashmir. He did not ask for Canadian support in any way, but said that when the matter came before the United Nations we would all have to take positions, so it was a pity that we could not discuss it together here in London. It was all said, however, in accents more of sorrow than of anger. The Pakistanis are not losing any friends here by the restraint they are showing both in language and in manner whenever Kashmir is mentioned. Incidentally, Huq Choudry's view is that only Nehru himself by his emotional obstinacy stands in the way of a fair settlement, something which the other members of his government would welcome. He claims to have received confirmation of this view in a conversation he had recently with a high Indian official.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

The sixth meeting which took place on Monday afternoon July 2 concerning the economic position of the Sterling area consisted primarily of exposition of the position of each of the Sterling area countries. There is no need to attempt to recapitulate in detail what is set down in the official minutes which have gone forward to you.

The following paragraphs note the principal points stressed by the main participants and include a revised paragraph in regard to what Mr. St-Laurent said.

2. In regard to the United Kingdom, Sir Anthony Eden, as well as the Chancellor, took pains to stress the seriousness with which they intend to persevere to keep the total demands on their resources down to a tolerable level and to prevent inflation without domestic controls and without new or renewed controls on imports.

3. Mr. Menzies emphasized the steps they were taking in Australia to prevent and deal with the serious and inflationary situation there and the difficulties they faced because of the federal nature of the country, the large role of private investment in their boom and finally the independence of the Commonwealth arbitration court which has such a substantial responsibility in determining a wage policy.

4. Mr. Holland said New Zealand was getting along very nicely, thank you, living on the sheep and the cows.

5. Mr. Nehru spoke at some length about their five year plan and seemed to reflect a measure of confidence in commencing their second five year plan following results of the first which he described as succeeding beyond their expectations. He was clearly proud of the role being played by the community development schemes in the villages which were helping to achieve what he described as their main need to instill a spirit of self reliance in the men of India.

6. Mr. Louw emphasized the need of South Africa for more private capital from the United Kingdom if possible or from elsewhere.

7. Mr. Mohammad Ali made clear their main problem was under-development and their resources were so limited that what they would be able to do and what they aimed to do would fall far short of what their people expected.

8. Mr. Bandaranaike was more optimistic and described their intentions to achieve a greater diversity of production and trade in order to reduce their dependence on tea, rubber and coconuts. He was also the one who expressed the greatest dissatisfaction with the management of the Sterling area and felt there should be a greater degree of consultation in it.

9. The official minute regarding Mr. St-Laurent's remarks was faulty in a few details and it should more correctly read as follows: Text Begins:

Mr. St-Laurent said that Canada had been somewhat disappointed that the United Kingdom had not found it possible to progress as quickly towards convertibility as the Commonwealth Economic Conference had hoped in 1952. There were a number of concrete issues on which Canada had hoped for more progress, notably perhaps in regard to the new International Wheat Agreement. The Canadian Government did, however, recognize that a real effort had been made by the United Kingdom to carry out policies which made for freer trade, e.g. by the avoidance of further restrictions on imports; they were gratified by the increasing flow of trade and hoped that this would continue. There were still boom conditions in Canada founded largely on a high level of private investment. This gave rise to a large surplus of imports over exports and a corresponding inflow of capital. Some of this was coming from Commonwealth sources which we welcomed but there was some uneasiness in Canada over the fact that ten to fifteen percent of the total investment in the country was being financed from the United States. So far however it had been thought best to welcome all private investors who were prepared to participate in Canadian development. Text Ends. Message Ends.

EIGHTH MEETING COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS CONFERENCE:
SECOND PART⁵

At the request of Mr. Holland some time was devoted to Japan. Mr. Holland had been greatly impressed with the friendliness and sincerity of the Japanese leaders when he passed through Tokyo enroute to the conference and was anxious to make a strong plea for a better Commonwealth understanding of Japan and to convey a message of greeting to the conference which had been entrusted to him by Mr. Hatoyama. He took up most of the discussion with an extensive review of the position of Japan which, although considerably inaccurate and not very profound, was, nevertheless, a sincere and effective plea. After he concluded, most of the other prime ministers confined themselves to a large extent to echoing his sentiments. Nehru and others emphasized the unfortunate effect on Japan of the restriction of its trade with China. Menzies, like Holland, made it clear that although there was in both their countries a good deal of resentment against Japan for its wartime atrocities, nevertheless they were anxious to overcome hatred and accept the friendship which Japan had offered. On the whole there were no words of very special interest in the discussion and remarkably little difference of opinion.

2. After the discussion on Japan, Sir Anthony Eden expressed concern over the position of the Commonwealth forces in Korea. They were anxious to maintain the position that the Commonwealth was involved in Korea, but it was expensive to maintain forces there especially as they had to pay in gold. He wondered, therefore, if the Commonwealth's interest could be displayed in some other way. As it was too late to discuss the matter very thoroughly, and as it did not involve some of those present, Sir Anthony suggested that the problem should be examined by officials of the Commonwealth countries concerned. There has been no suggestion, however, that this examination should take place during the course of this conference.

NINTH MEETING COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS CONFERENCE

Most of this meeting was devoted to consideration of the final communiqué. During a brief period in which the subject of relations with the Soviet Union was resumed, Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Nehru restated their positions along the lines previously outlined.

2. A draft for a communiqué which was somewhat more in the form of a declaration was put forward by Mr. Menzies. It was unfortunately not a very well considered draft, lacking the required elegance and elevation of tone. What was more unfortunate was that it had apparently never been looked at from the point of view of the Asian members or of South Africa. It referred, for example, to "British Commonwealth", forcing Nehru to the embarrassment of having to suggest an alteration. It implied that Soviet policy had been critically examined and was being met with a certain amount of defiance in tones which might have been suitable for the old Commonwealth but showed no appreciation of the Indian or Ceylonese position. Mr. Nehru showed some signs of irritation for the first time during the conference, but he nevertheless made his points with restraint. Mr. Strijdom took issue, on the whole appropriately, with the implication throughout that the Commonwealth was an entity. Mr. Menzies for his part accepted most of these points pretty reasonably. After preliminary consideration the communiqué was left to the experts to discuss in the evening.

3. In conclusion there was some talk about Southeast Asia. Most of the time was taken up by Lennox-Boyd who outlined the recent negotiations with Marshall and his colleagues from Singapore. He paid tribute to Marshall as a brilliant and attractive character who suffered from unfortunate idiosyncrasies. However, he was a "bird of passage" and did not have the support of his colleagues on the delegation. He spoke of Lim Yew Hock as "an admirable man" and expressed complete confidence that the situation in Singapore was now calm and stable. The people of Singapore had settled down with immense relief to make money, an occupation which had been their principal interest for a hundred years, and which had been made possible under the British flag. On the whole, his dealing with the negotiations with Marshall was a reasonable explanation but his manner and his not entirely convincing analysis of the present situation were not very well calculated to win the sympathy of the Asian members present. Mr. Nehru, however, limited himself to a few brief questions. Eden spoke more understandingly about the great regret which the British had in the necessity to maintain emergency powers. They disliked them intensely, but could see no alternative in the present situation.

4. In conclusion, there were a few brief comments on Indochina, but before the discussion got under way it was agreed that this matter might better be discussed among the countries principally concerned. Mr. Pearson reported that he was to have talks with Krishna Menon in the morning, and it was agreed that the Indians and Canadians would also talk with Selwyn Lloyd.⁶

COMMONWEALTH MEETINGS DEFENCE POLICY⁷

A limited meeting to consider aspects of defence policy was held on July 3 and was attended by the Prime Ministers of the UK, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Pakistan and Rhodesia. The UK were careful in references to the meeting to speak of a discussion not of "Commonwealth defence" but of aspects of defence.

2. Eden began with an extensive review of UK thinking on defence. He said the UK were making a general review of their defence policy. It was too early to say what changes of policy would be involved. The basis of this thinking was that the Russians had realized the nature of thermo-nuclear war. At least for Europe the risk of a major war had receded, and the balance of power in conventional weapons was now less important. It should not be argued that thermo-nuclear weapons were not a deterrent because we would hesitate to use them. We must be prepared to do so because we could not win in conventional armaments race with the Russians. The UK was bearing more than its share of the defence burden in Germany. NATO defence concepts needed reexamination. Present NATO military policy was atomic rather than thermo-nuclear. In the new situation conventional forces were required for more limited purpose of dealing with infiltration, to prevent intimidation and give time for aggression to be identified. It was no longer realistic to provide for a long war but rather to assure that the deterrent would be maintained and likewise the carriers for it. However the UK would not take any unilateral action without consulting NATO.

3. Eden then made some remarks of considerable interest in the context of our disarmament policy. He said that we had received a note from the Russians telling us what they intended to do about disarmament in East Germany. If we could meet in NATO and decide what we could do in Germany, he would be prepared to have us make these proposals in our reply to the Russians and indicate our willingness to discuss with them further measures for the relaxation of tension. It was only by producing imaginative policies that we could gain the initiative.

4. In the Middle East and Far East he thought ground forces had a more important role to play. He stressed also the importance of alliances like SEATO and the Baghdad Pact. In Far East he thought that in Indochina there were more prospects of danger than in the Formosa straits.

5. The Chief of the Airstaff (UK) expressed agreement on the power of the deterrent. He and Eden painted a grim picture of thermo-nuclear war and he emphasized that the major factor would be the first sortie. There might or might not be a chance for a second or third sortie.

6. Lord Mountbatten said that the UK chiefs of staff had not yet reached final conclusions in their investigations, but so far they thought that the three countries with thermo-nuclear weapons could reach a stage of saturation when they had more than enough weapons to obliterate each other. When we had this state of saturation then the day of conventional weapons might come again so that one could not say that that day was ended for certain. He did not want anyone to run away with the attractive idea that a few bombers were all that was needed for defence. (There was some concern expressed after the meeting by UK officials on what the First Sea Lord had said, which may account for the fact that his statement seems somewhat modified in the official record.)

7. Mohammad Ali feared that when the day of saturation was reached, local pressures would increase. He illustrated his point by referring to Soviet policy in Afghanistan and its threat to the Baghdad Pact. He expressed some dissatisfaction with the vague nature of the military plans of the Baghdad Pact and on the tendency to stress its economic at the expense of its military aspect. He was most anxious to end the dispute with India so that military actions under the Baghdad Pact would not be misunderstood in India.

8. Strijdom asked whether the Cape Route would be used for supplying the Baghdad countries. Sir Walter Monckton said they hoped to store as much as possible in the area and to send a good deal by air.

9. Menzies agreed with Mohammad Ali that development of nuclear weapons would encourage localized aggression. He seemed sceptical of the theory that an end had been put to the risk of major wars and feared piecemeal advance of China through Southeast Asia. He feared general public pressure to cut down defence expenditure if this was happening in large countries. He wondered if we might not warn the Russians that any minor war they started would lead automatically to a major war. Mountbatten replied that this meant, in fact, telling the Russians that we should all commit suicide together because that was what thermo-nuclear war meant.

10. Mr. St-Laurent asked if it was realistic to suppose that NATO could be maintained on the basis of this concept of total annihilation. Mountbatten said that the chiefs of staff were very conscious of the effect on NATO and they were working on a plan to maintain NATO in spite of a theory which would seem to imply that all those without thermo-nuclear weapons might as well withdraw. He did not say anything about the nature of this scheme.

11. In conclusion, Monckton emphasized that they were not saying that the theory of the deterrent meant that they would no longer need conventional weapons. They were only saying that they would need fewer conventional forces in Europe.

MEMORANDUM FOR RECORD IN LIEU OF TELEGRAMS RE COMMONWEALTH
MEETINGS — SESSION ON NUCLEAR ENERGY FOR PEACEFUL PURPOSES
JULY 4TH, 1956

The meeting was opened by Lord Salisbury, Lord President of the Council, who is in charge of the atomic energy programme in the United Kingdom. He reported on the progress of the general programme which had been outlined at the previous [1955] Commonwealth meeting. It was proceeding largely along the lines then explained and as set forth in the government White Paper on the subject⁸. What was then described as a provisional plan has since been confirmed. They are proceeding first with gas-cooled graphite-moderated natural uranium reactors as the first stage of a nuclear power programme. They regard this type as reliable, economic and safe. They felt the present prospects of this programme were encouraging. The first prototype reactor was now being run-in and will be formally opened on October 17th and followed in six months by another at the same site at Calder Hall. Two more on that site are planned for completion in 1959 and four additional ones nearby which are also hoped to be ready in 1959. These are dual purpose reactors producing power to be fed into their main grids, plus plutonium for weapons. These reactors will also be used for training industrial personnel. Their industry is now preparing tenders to be submitted to the U.K. power authorities for wholly industrial nuclear power stations to be completed in 1961 or 1962. These would be the stations mentioned in the White Paper, which it was hoped to bring into operation in 1960-61. The earlier estimate that each of these stations would have an electrical output of 100-200 MW. now appeared to be conservative: it was hoped that the output might amount to 300 MW. The subsequent programme provided for two more stations to be in operation by 1963, four more by 1963-64 and a further four by 1965. The total output of these stations should amount to about 2,400 MW., or the equivalent of about 4 to 7 million tons of coal a year.

Lord Salisbury said that it is not intended that the United Kingdom would stick to this type of reactor alone. The atomic energy authority is working on seven other types of reactor as well. They had been held up at an earlier stage by a shortage of staff, but that phase is passing. They are making more arrangements now to provide access for industrial staff to the work being done on reactors and a new class of consulting engineers in the nuclear field is now emerging in the United Kingdom.

He went on to speak of cooperation in this field within the Commonwealth, mentioning of course the close relations between the United Kingdom and Canada. He spoke of the agreements for the exchange of information with Australia and India and discussions with other Commonwealth countries on these matters. The United Kingdom felt a special responsibility for contributing to Commonwealth knowledge in this field of atomic energy because they derive their supplies of uranium and thorium from Commonwealth sources. He made brief mention of the U.S. agreement for cooperation which he described as now working well and referred briefly to U.K. participation in efforts to work out the establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency and some cooperation in the atomic field in Europe. He concluded by saying that while the future lines of development in the atomic field must necessarily be speculative, it was already clear that the successful harnessing of the immense resources of atomic power for peaceful purposes would represent the greatest and most enduring contribution to civilization since the discovery of fire.

Sir Anthony called on Mr. St-Laurent who spoke briefly on the Canadian programme. He pointed out that Canada had started early on this subject in cooperation with the United Kingdom and the United States on the military programme during the war. He said that we had a substantial research establishment in this field with one large research reactor operating and another one being constructed which would produce plutonium for sale to the United States. We have also been producing radio active isotopes for some time for various purposes. Now the emphasis is being shifted to the development of reactors for power purposes.

Turning to the question of uranium production, Mr. St-Laurent stated that we have now found large quantities of uranium in low grade ores that can be treated economically in Canada and our production is being expanded and may reach a total of as much as $300 million per annum within the next few years. We are looking forward to the time when this uranium can become an ordinary fuel that will supplement other sources of power. He said our mines producing uranium will have their investments in treatment plants amortized when their contracts run out early in 1962 and should be in a position to produce uranium at prices that will make that form of power competitive with other sources of power.

While we would not have much need for atomic power in Canada, we were constructing a demonstration reactor and working in the field of power production in order to do our part in developing this new science.

Mr. St-Laurent went on to say that Canada was much interested in establishing the new International Atomic Energy Agency and hoped that the Agency would have the effect that uranium could be dealt with as an ordinary commercial product.

He mentioned the joint programme Canada was carrying on with India to construct a research reactor in India and hoped that it would help to strengthen the bonds between the east and the west in a manner that would be useful and productive.

Mr. Louw, on behalf of South Africa, indicated that it was doubtful whether they would be interested in developing atomic power there because of their plentiful supplies of coal, but they were interested in the general development of atomic energy for power purposes because of their production of uranium which was a by-product of their gold mining. He said that it would be valuable in attracting capital for the production of uranium if the secrecy arrangements in regard to uranium production could be relaxed.

Mr. Louw mentioned various details of what South Africa had been doing in research and training in the nuclear field and concluded by stating that his government had just decided to provide funds to build a reactor in South Africa. He said that they were interested in the discussion on the International Agency and wished to be represented on the Board of it.

Mr. Menzies, for Australia, said that they were producing considerable quantities of uranium ore and additional mines were being opened up. He said the extent to which there appeared to be any need for using nuclear power in Australia would depend on the economics of it. Some parts of the country were going to have hydro power and others had ample coal supplies.

He enquired of Lord Salisbury what he saw as the economic future of nuclear power as compared with thermal power and what possibility there would be of buying reactors off the shelf.

In reply, Lord Salisbury said that they believed that hydro power would continue to be the cheapest source, but that they would get power from uranium down to a cost of 0.6 d. per unit in due course. Like hydro plants, the capital costs of nuclear power plants were very high and their running costs were low. He said they had not yet solved the problem of the small reactor. In regard to export of reactors, he thought it might be possible to start discussions next year and perhaps sign contracts for export two or three years later.

Mr. Nehru commenced a fairly lengthy participation in the discussion by saying that the need for atomic energy was likely to be greater in under-developed countries than those which had already developed conventional sources of power. He thought that there were parts of India where atomic power would be of great help and would be cheaper than energy from any other source. He went on to say that India had made some progress in research in atomic energy, that they had already constructed a small swimming-pool type research reactor and were now constructing a much larger research reactor with the assistance of Canada. He stated that it was intended that this large research reactor should be available for training people from other Asian countries.

He expressed concern over several aspects of atomic energy developments. One was the question of what was to be done with the waste products from reactors. He was afraid that these might affect even the oceans. Secondly he wondered if there was any likelihood of getting economical energy from atomic fusion. He had heard that the Russians were working on these processes and he thought it was likely in the long run to provide cheaper energy than fission.

He mentioned also the desirability of the International Atomic Energy Agency becoming an integral part of the United Nations and representing as many as possible of the countries of the world interested in this great field.

He emphasized the danger of this source of energy becoming the monopoly of a few countries when many others needed it. He referred specifically to China and said that he thought China should be participating in the Agency not only so that it would secure information and assistance, but also in order that it would be subject to some international control.

Mr. Nehru also expressed concern over the possible increase in the number of countries that might engage in the production of atomic weapons. He was afraid that the materials and processes that were being developed to secure energy for peaceful purposes might be easily converted to the production of weapons. He expressed alarm that already various countries other than those three now making weapons were talking of producing them — France for example. He thought this great power for peace which had a menace attached to it would need to be controlled and it was necessary to consider just how this was to be accomplished. He supported the removal of secrecy in this field and thought that publicity and full disclosure of information would assist in meeting the dangers inherent in it. Finally he felt that very careful studies should be made and made public concerning the dangerous aspects of radiation.

In regard to Mr. Nehru's question concerning waste products, Lord Salisbury stated that there were two types of waste — one that was highly active and another that was only modestly active. There is not much of the highly active material and it does not constitute a serious danger now. The time may come when it may be more of a problem and it should be watched internationally as well as nationally.

In regard to the use of atomic fusion for energy by the Russians, Lord Salisbury said that he did not think they were ahead of the western nations in this field but that they did not know in fact what the Russians may have achieved.

Lord Salisbury also spoke in regard to the question of other countries producing atomic weapons and said that the U.K. government shared the concern Mr. Nehru had expressed. He thought that one of the reasons the United States had offered substantial amounts of uranium 235 for peaceful uses in other countries was to head off the building of separation plants by other countries, the products of which might be diverted to weapons.

Sir Anthony added that, in regard to the reports of dangers from radiation, the scientists of both the United Kingdom and the United States had reached similar conclusions that there were no serious dangers as yet.

In answer to a question from Mr. Louw concerning the use of nuclear energy for propelling ships, Lord Salisbury said that they were not doing very much in this field but Sir Edward Plowden advised him that they are starting work on it.

Mr. Mohammad Ali spoke briefly on behalf of Pakistan. He said they had just started on a programme of atomic energy work. His country was short of fuel and greatly in need of energy. Though it had some potential hydro electric power, it was tucked away in corners of the country. Consequently they thought atomic energy would be a great boon to them in due course because it could be located anywhere. They had started with a programme of training and were hoping to set up a research reactor. He said they would be grateful for assistance from the United Kingdom, Canada and from India. He said that they had in mind an immediate programme of training and going on to a research reactor and then to power reactors.

Lord Salisbury indicated that he would be glad to talk with Mr. Ali or his officers about this programme.

Mr. Bandaranaike said that owing to their good fortune in having substantial potential sources of hydro electric power, they would not have any immediate need of atomic power in Ceylon. They were, however, an important potential source of monazite and would be interested in developing markets for raw material.

There had been some discussion by the United States of a proposal to establish a reactor in Ceylon but it had now been decided to put this research station in the Philippines. An American team had recently visited his country to discuss whether they would cooperate in an atomic energy project and he thought it was probably this one in the Philippines. He said that they would prefer to collaborate within the Commonwealth in this general field.

Lord Malvern said that his Federation would continue to cooperate with the United Kingdom in prospecting for minerals required in the atomic energy programme and they already had one small uranium mine. They did not expect, however, to engage in any nuclear energy programme in the near future as they had hydro electric power to develop.

In concluding the meeting, Sir Anthony emphasized that the nuclear energy programme of the United Kingdom would only supplement the production of power from other sources for many many years.

He expressed pleasure in the way in which cooperation within the Commonwealth in this field of atomic energy was forging another valuable Commonwealth link.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE — 11TH MEETING; DISCUSSIONS ON COMMUNIQUÉ

The discussion of the final communiqué commenced at the ninth meeting held on Wednesday afternoon, July 4th, at which Mr. Menzies submitted a draft for incorporation. There was a brief discussion that afternoon at which it was decided that mention should be made of the Colombo Plan and of the Council for Technical Co-operation in Africa. It was agreed that there would be a drafting session of officials that evening.

At the evening meeting Mr. Norman Robertson and Mr. R.B. Bryce attended for Canada and went over a draft that had been prepared as usual by the United Kingdom and which incorporated various parts of Mr. Menzies' draft, suitably improved. An agreed revised draft was prepared by those attending the meeting and taken home that night by all concerned. This was discussed at the meeting of Prime Ministers on Thursday afternoon, July 5th. At this meeting Mr. Nehru took a considerable part, and while recognizing that no government could expect that its own point of view on the particular subject would be fully reflected, he thought it was most important to ensure that nothing in the communiqué conflicted with declared policies of individual governments in the Commonwealth. He thought that it was also desirable to avoid statements that would give rise to embarrassing contradictions in interpretation.

There were a number of suggestions of detail which need not be recorded here.

The point of importance in this discussion concerned the question of recognition of Communist China. Mr. Nehru felt there would be justifiable criticism if there was no reference to it in the final statement about the discussions. He thought there was no more vital or urgent issue than the admission of Communist China into the United Nations. He felt that if she had been a member some years ago the course of history might well have been different and, indeed, the Korean war might never have occurred. He said that the régime of Chiang Kai-shek was an exploded myth and that the whole recognition of this government instead of the actual government of China was based on illogicality and unreason. He felt that the continued obstinacy of the United States in supporting this discredited régime created dangers for the United States no less than for other countries. He recognized that nothing would be gained by forcing these issues with the United States at this moment, but he thought that the communiqué should express the view that Communist China should be admitted to the United Nations.

Others, however, demurred at such an explicit proposal and, while agreeing that it would be difficult to avoid any mention of this issue in the statement, thought it should be referred to in rather more general terms.

The officials met again that evening in a drafting session and revised the draft communiqué in the light of the discussion of Ministers that afternoon.

On Friday morning the Prime Ministers again resumed discussion of the communiqué. At this meeting Mr. Nehru suggested that the passage about broadening the membership of the United Nations should include a reference to the need for making the organization more fully representative. Mr. St-Laurent, however, said he felt it would be inappropriate to include in the statement anything that might be construed as committing individual governments in advance to a particular course of action under conditions which could not yet be predicted. This view was supported by Mr. Menzies and Mr. Holland in discussion. Mr. Nehru soon recognized that he could not succeed in achieving his point in regard to an explicit reference to the recognition of China or the admission of it to the United Nations and he yielded gracefully on the issue.

During this final discussion on the communiqué a paragraph was added about Cyprus and sentences about a comprehensive disarmament agreement and other matters were inserted. Lord Malvern expressed his appreciation of the sentence relating to the attendance of the Prime Minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Following this meeting the communiqué was finally revised and issued in the form that was published.⁹

lished the general conditions and agreed principles under which Canada would furnish assistance to these countries under the Plan. Each agreement provided, inter alia, that if goods financed by grants from the Canadian Government were "sold or otherwise distributed to the public" of the recipient country, an amount equivalent to the Canadian Government's expenditures would be set aside as "counterpart funds". These local currency funds were to be used to finance economic development projects agreed upon by the two governments concerned.

2. In addition to these three general agreements, Canada has entered into a number of specific intergovernmental agreements related to particular projects under the Colombo Plan. These agreements define the financial and other responsibilities of Canada and of recipient governments in connection with the individual projects. Following the procedure agreed upon in the general agreements referred to above, these agreements provide that the government of the recipient country will establish "counterpart funds" in local currency for the goods provided by Canada should the goods be sold or otherwise distributed "to the public". In some cases they go further and provide for "counterpart funds" if the goods are transferred to government agencies or to provincial governments.

3. It is possible to distinguish between "real counterpart funds" and "notional counterpart funds". "Real counterpart funds" arise when the goods are actually sold to the public for cash and the current revenues of the recipient governments are increased immediately as a result of the sale. On the other hand when goods are disposed of against some long-term obligation, for instance, an increase in the book-debt owed by a provincial government to a central government, are transferred as an outright grant to an autonomous government operating agency of a provincial government or are distributed without charge or at a subsidized price, the funds are completely or partly "notional" in the sense that either they are reflected in book entries but not in any current cash receipts, or the immediate cash receipts may be less than the amount of "counterpart funds" set aside. "Real counterpart funds" usually, but not necessarily, arise when Canada provides food or raw materials (e.g., wheat, flour, copper and aluminum); "notional" ones when Canada provides capital goods to a central Government and these are then transferred to a Crown Corporation or to a state, provincial or local government (or conceivably also if the transfer were to a private firm which was capable of playing an important role in the country's development and the central Government wished to encourage or support it by allowing equipment to be transferred on a long-term credit basis).

Reasons for Counterpart Funds

4. The setting up of "counterpart funds" was undertaken for a number of good reasons and with a number of objectives in mind:

(1) it would ensure that the current revenues of recipient governments derived from the cash sale of goods provided by Canada would be used for economic development purposes and not to finance ordinary expenditures;

(2) it would provide a useful means by which Canada could devote some of its foodstuffs and raw materials to support the development programmes of the recipient government while ensuring the implementation of the Canadian Government's general policy of having its aid programme associated with capital development projects in the recipient countries;

(3) it was hoped that this procedure might provide an additional incentive for the central governments to require the ultimate recipients of capital goods to make appropriate allowances for the value of such goods in their cost accounting and amortization arrangements; and

(4) it was hoped that, even though the transaction might not bring any new money into the central government currently, those governments might be induced to devote larger amounts to their own economic development than would otherwise be the case.

Objections to Counterpart Funds

5. Some years of experience show that the first two objectives are fully understood, considered worthwhile and readily accepted by all concerned. But they also reveal that the setting aside of "notional counterpart funds" with no objectives in mind other than the third and fourth is objectionable on a number of grounds:

(1) any public relations value which the existence of such funds might seem to have is more than offset by the impression which is created that Canada is seeking to obtain credit for twice the contribution it in fact makes, once when the capital asset is provided and again when the "counterpart funds" are assumed to have been created and allocated;

(2) there appears to be little logic in creating "counterpart funds" for goods sold or transferred to another government or another governmental agency (or even to a private firm which was equally involved in the development programme) when no such "counterpart funds" would have been required if the goods had been retained by the central government and devoted to identical economic development purposes;

(3) it has sometimes proved difficult to find appropriate "uses" for such "notional counterpart funds";

(4) the Auditor-General of at least one Asian country (Ceylon) has occasionally criticized the delays in "using" such "notional counterpart funds" and this has no doubt detracted unjustifiably from the reputation of the national planning agencies and of the Colombo Plan as a whole;

(5) the Canadian Auditor-General has raised questions about methods of computing and accounting for such "notional counterpart funds" to which there cannot be entirely satisfactory answers, given the nature of these funds;

(6) the knowledge that "notional counterpart funds" are essentially fictitious has tended to discredit "counterpart funds" generally and has undoubtedly led to the "real counterpart funds" being given less serious treatment than they deserve.

These objections take on added force when it is realized that the governments concerned take a reasonably sensible view of their financial and economic responsibilities without the cumbersome and irritating introduction of special devices. It might be equally effective and a good deal less troublesome for both the Asian and Canadian Governments if the recipient government were to be asked simply to inform the Canadian Government of the general terms on which it intends to transfer or sell capital goods provided by Canada to other public bodies or to private firms involved in the development programmes. If, on occasion, the manner of disposition did not appear satisfactory to the Canadian Government or if it appeared to be in Canada's interest to have "counterpart funds" set aside even if such funds were "notional", the offer of aid could be withdrawn, the recipient government could be asked to set aside "notional" funds or some other action could be taken.

Recommendations

9. In the light of the foregoing considerations and on the understanding that none of the goods provided by Canada will be re-exported, I recommend, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Finance and of Trade and Commerce, that

(a) "counterpart funds" in an amount equivalent to the Canadian outlay on goods and services, should be set aside in all cases where Canadian aid takes the form of commodities such as raw materials and foodstuffs, or other consumables;

(b) for the future, as a general rule, no automatic request be made for the establishment of "counterpart funds" in the case of capital goods, but the government of the recipient country be requested to inform the Canadian Government of the terms and conditions of any transfer of capital goods to be provided or provided by Canada which it proposes to make in order to allow the Canadian Government to take any action which it deems to be in its own interest, such as requesting the establishment of "counterpart funds" or, perhaps, in the final analysis withdrawing its offer of assistance;

(c) officials of the Departments concerned be instructed to review Colombo Plan agreements already in force for the purpose of bringing them, wherever practicable, into conformity with (a) and (b) above.¹³

Ottawa, November 28, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

AMOUNT OF CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE COLOMBO PLAN
IN FINANCIAL YEAR 1957-58

The Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan for the financial year 1955-56 was $26.4 million. For 1956-57 Parliament approved a contribution of $34.4 million, the additional $8.0 million being intended for expenditures principally in connection with the Warsak project in Pakistan and the Canada-India atomic reactor project.

The basic amount of $26.4 million contributed by Canada to Colombo Plan projects in the past two years has been allocated in approximately the following pattern:

over $13.0 million to India;

over $9.0 million to Pakistan;

$2.0 million to Ceylon;

$1.4 million for the technical assistance programmes; and a limited amount of assistance for the newer members of the Plan in South-East Asia.

The additional $8.0 million approved for the financial year 1956-57 was intended for the following purposes:

¹³ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 28 novembre 1956/Approved by Cabinet on November 28, 1956.

to pay $2.0 million of the $11.0 million which is the estimated additional cost of the Warsak project in Pakistan, and which Cabinet has already agreed to finance; to pay $5.0 million towards the cost of the Canada-India reactor, the total cost of which is estimated to be $7.0 million; and the remaining $1.0 million for the expanded programme of technical assistance to the newer members of the Colombo Plan.

The annual meeting of the countries which are participating in the Colombo Plan is now taking place at Wellington, New Zealand. The Canadian Delegation is headed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is expected that representatives of participating countries will indicate at the Wellington meeting their support for the continuation of the Colombo Plan. To the best of our knowledge, the donor countries of the Plan intend to continue assistance to the underdeveloped countries of the Plan on at least the present scale.

Opinion in Canada appears in most quarters to be favourable to Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan, and there have been many suggestions that Canada should provide increased assistance in this area. Moreover, in the light of the present political difficulties in the Middle East, the Colombo Plan undoubtedly has taken on even greater significance as a means of preserving the ties of friendship and mutual interest among the Asian and Western members of the Plan (Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth alike), and in presenting to the world at large an example of successful co-operation in the field of economic development among countries whose political relationships have been subjected to recent strains.

There are worthwhile development projects in all of the Colombo Plan countries of South and South-East Asia which are in need of outside assistance. In view of the present fluid state of politics and opinion in this area, and in the light of the domestic situation in Canada, however, it does not seem desirable to expand the amount of Canada's present Colombo Plan assistance. At the present time it is considered, therefore, that the total amount of Canadian assistance under the Colombo Plan in 1957-58 should be the same as last year, $34.4 million.

It is difficult at this early stage to make a precise division of an appropriation of $34.5 million among the various countries receiving Canadian assistance, or to projects in these countries. The various possibilities are currently being further investigated by Mr. Cavell, the Colombo Plan Administrator, during a visit to the Asian countries in connection with the annual meeting in Wellington. Cabinet approval will, as in the past, be sought for the projects for each country receiving assistance as these projects are evolved. It is contemplated at the present time, however, that of a total appropriation of $34.4 million, $26.4 million would be used on the same pattern as in the past to finance the cost of projects in India, Pakistan and Ceylon, the technical assistance programmes and a limited amount of assistance to newer members of the Colombo Plan. Of the remaining amount of $8.0 million, $5.0 million would be used to cover additional costs of the Warsak project; $2.0 million would be for the Canada-India reactor; and $1.0 million would be used, as in the present year, for assistance to the newer members of the Plan.

This would mean that there would be about $13.0 million for projects in India in 1957-58, apart from the Canada-India reactor. The Indian Government, in its Second Five-Year Plan, has set out a number of worthwhile and reasonable development targets that they will be unable to fulfill unless they receive very substantial outside assistance. It is expected that Canada will be requested to assist in 1957-58, among other things, the financing of further aerial and ground exploration for minerals and oil, and also to give assistance by supplying commodities such as copper and aluminum.

Discussions with the Pakistan authorities are currently taking place regarding the supply of railway equipment and commodities, and assistance for irrigation schemes. Until there is a clearer indication of the probable total Canadian expenditures for Warsak it is contemplated that the consideration of any major new projects in Pakistan will proceed most cautiously.

The Ceylon capital assistance programme of about $2.0 million annually has been successful and should be continued.

Discussions are under way regarding assistance to projects in the newer members of the Colombo Plan, i.e., Indonesia, Burma, Malaya and Singapore. Among these are an aerial survey of resources in Indonesia, the supply of timber handling equipment and possibly diesel locomotives to Burma and the provision of assistance to technical schools.

There is a continued requirement from Colombo Plan countries for technical assistance, and it is clear that an amount of the same order as in previous years can usefully be spent on this form of assistance.

Recommendations

For the reasons given below, I would recommend that:

(a) Parliament be asked to approve a Canadian contribution in 1957-58 under the Colombo Plan of the same size as in 1956-57, i.e., $34.4 million; and

(b) the Canadian representative at the Colombo Plan meeting in Wellington, New Zealand, be authorized to announce that, subject to the appropriation of funds by Parliament, Canada will make a contribution of this amount.¹⁴

Editorial Note

En octobre 1956, tandis que l'on préparait le mémoire au Cabinet annuel sur les contributions canadiennes au titre du Plan de Colombo, MM. Saint-Laurent et Howe ont demandé à un petit groupe de hauts fonctionnaires d'examiner de près la politique canadienne relative au Plan de Colombo. En sa qualité de président de ce groupe, M. Bryce a affirmé aux hauts fonctionnaires : « [there] was no question about future participation in the programme, but what was desired was a review of its purposes and an indication of whether these purposes were being accomplished ». Ce comité informel constitué par le premier ministre comprenait MM. Bryce, Léger, Bull, Rasminsky, Plumptre, Cavell, A.E. Ritchie et W.R. Martin.

Les membres du comité se sont rencontrés cinq fois pendant l'automne de 1956 et ont convenu de préparer à l'intention des ministres un mémoire portant sur leurs délibérations et les conclusions auxquelles ils étaient arrivés. Les membres du comité se sont réunis de nouveau en avril 1957, pour la dernière fois. Ceux-ci n'ont pas eu le temps de finaliser le mémoire destiné aux ministres, néanmoins le document suivant mérite d'être publié. D'après une série de notes fournies par M. Léger, la première version de ce mémoire a été préparée par M. Martin en décembre 1956, puis révisée à la fin de janvier 1957, sous la supervision étroite de M. Bryce. Même s'il est resté inachevé, ce mémoire représente le premier effort déployé par le gouvernement en vue d'évaluer l'importance et l'efficacité de l'aide canadienne. La correspondance concernant ce premier examen de la politique en matière d'aide et les procès-verbaux des réunions du comité se trouvent dans les dossiers MAE/11038-40 et BCP/C-47.

In October 1956, as the annual memorandum to Cabinet on Canadian Colombo Plan contributions was being prepared, St. Laurent and Howe asked a small group of senior officials to take a close look at Canada's policy on the Colombo Plan. As chairman of this group, Bryce reassured the officials that there "was no question about future participation in the programme, but what was desired was a review of its purposes and an indication of whether these purposes were being accomplished." The prime minister's informal committee included Bryce, Léger, Bull, Rasminsky, Plumptre, Cavell, A.E. Ritchie and W.R. Martin.

The committee met five times during the fall of 1956 and agreed to prepare a memorandum for ministers on its discussions and conclusions. The committee met once more in April 1957 before it ceased to meet. Although it did not have time to finalize the memorandum prepared for ministers, the following document merits publication. Based on a set of notes provided by Léger, the first draft of this memorandum was prepared by Martin in December 1956 and revised in late January 1957 under Bryce's close supervision. It represents an early, if incomplete, effort by the government to assess the value and effectiveness of Canadian aid. Correspondence on this early review of aid policy and the committee's minutes are in DEA/11038-40 and PCO/C-47.

Memorandum by Assistant Secretary to Cabinet

COLOMBO PLAN OPERATIONS

Purposes of Participation

The primary objective of the Canadian government in contributing to the Colombo Plan is political. Basically it is to offer some hope, and to provide a sense of international co-operation, to the ruling and politically effective groups in the Asian countries concerned by assisting governments in sensible projects for economic development that seem likely to show results in the next few years. In doing this we hope to reduce the attractiveness of communism to these groups as an alternative and desperate solution to their problems.

There are a number of other motives for our participation and some convenient by-products which result from active membership in the Plan but these, it should be emphasized, are essentially subsidiary in character. We hope to establish closer connections with the influential groups mentioned which will survive changes in whatever political course the Asian countries may take in the future. We want to maintain and strengthen ties with the Asian members of the Commonwealth. Then there is the general commercial purpose of trying to improve long run trade possibilities by making Canada's name better known, by providing an outlet immediately for some of our products, by training personnel and by teaching Canadian businessmen and consultants how better to handle foreign business in a part of the world where they have had few contacts. Participation also appeals to a fairly widespread sense of obligation to help those not as fortunate as we ourselves are.

To those who have been considering this subject there is no doubt that the main objective remains a sound one and that the lesser motives are worthwhile. Indeed, the reasons for continuing to participate are growing more cogent as time goes on. It is impossible to measure results quantitatively. However, it can be said that our aid has been useful and considered helpful by the recipients, that closer relations with the Asian members have been steadily developed, and that popular support for the plan in Canada has grown.

Extent and Forms of Aid

Since the inception of the Colombo Plan, $162.8 million has been appropriated by Parliament for capital and technical assistance. Of this, roughly $10.2 million has been apportioned for capital aid to Ceylon, $86.1 million to India, $58.1 million to Pakistan and $2 million to other countries. $4.8 million has been provided for technical assistance generally. This money has been distributed between projects in a wide variety of fields including hydro-electric power, transportation, agriculture, education, industry, health, surveys, construction and atomic energy, and occasionally as direct cash grants. The main emphasis has been on the provision of heavy equipment for power generation, locomotives and buses for transportation, commodities which were urgently needed and which generated counterpart funds to meet a portion of the local costs of major projects, engineering services and surveys, and an atomic reactor. This has been the case because, generally speaking, these are the items which appear to be needed most and because Canada is in a good position to provide them. For example, power is fundamental for the development of these Asian nations and Canada has a great deal of experience in this field. Then again, we are peculiarly well fitted to provide such commodities as wheat, flour and certain base metals. Transportation systems in these eastern countries are quite inadequate and Canada has been able to make an effective contribution in improving the available services. Surveys of resources are another essential and we have considerable experience in this work as well. In atomic energy for civilian purposes we are reasonably well advanced compared with many other nations, and for the reasons given at the time, it was considered particularly appropriate that we should provide India with a reactor.

On the whole it is therefore felt that, with one or two exceptions, the assistance which has been provided has been directed towards the right type of project and that its form and content have been generally appropriate. We have contributed in those fields where we best could, having regard to the need, our own availabilities and knowledge and, to a lesser extent, our competitive position.

Selection of Projects and Their Management

Selecting a project often presents difficulties. The pattern of development in countries to which we have given most assistance and in which we are likely to be most interested in the future is pretty well established in the programmes approved or considered desirable by the governments of those nations themselves. We cannot expect to have much influence on them. However, the field is so broad and so much needs to be done within the boundaries of these general plans that there are usually many projects which can be usefully supported or carried out with Canadian aid. An offer of help from Canada does not mean that something new and unthought of will be done, rather it usually affects the timing of a project on the desirable list of things to be done in each of the countries concerned.

In most of the projects with which Canada has been associated it has been necessary to provide assistance in working them out and to exercise managerial functions to a considerable degree. Inevitably this has involved some friction between the local people and the foreign supervisors. How far Canada should go in providing management, the effects of which might well impair the good relations we are trying to foster, is a difficult question. The Warsak project in Pakistan, for example, has led to troubles, which will probably not be serious in the end, but which would be unfortunate if they occurred frequently. Certainly it would seem advisable not to become so intimately involved again. Nevertheless, Canadian management will continue to be necessary for some time to come, depending on the nature of the project and the degree of experience the local people have acquired. On the whole, it is worth risking friction to see that the job is properly done, to help train individuals and perhaps to bring about, even in a small way, better understanding between some Canadians and some people from Asia.

Procurement

Most of the components and equipment used in Canadian sponsored projects have been procured in Canada. This must be the case if domestic support for the Plan is to be strengthened and maintained. It is also usually necessary to order in Canada because closer touch can be kept with suppliers, thus ensuring that deliveries will be on time. This is important if construction of the project is to proceed as planned and remain within the originally estimated levels of expenditure. Whether or not it would have been cheaper to buy certain equipment abroad is hard to say. Each project has to be judged separately and the circumstances in each case differ. It is probably true that, viewing a project as a whole, it is just as cheap to buy in Canada as elsewhere. Occasionally, of course, off-shore purchasing is necessary when the equipment needed is not available in Canada. This happens, for example, in the case of technical schools which are a particularly useful form of aid but which do not involve the expenditure of too much money.

Commodities and Counterpart Funds

Capital projects result in more technical training and a greater intermingling of local people and Canadian advisers than the provision of materials and commodities. Nevertheless, the latter will continue to form an important element in the Plan because they are needed, sometimes desperately, and they give rise to counterpart funds which help to take care of local development costs. The "notional" and "real" concepts of counterpart funds have been reviewed in detail. Subsequently the Cabinet decided that "counterpart funds" would be set aside in all cases where Canadian aid took the form of commodities and items to be sold, rather than used directly in a development project, but that, as a general rule, no request would be made for their establishment in the case of capital goods. Usually it is quite clear that real counterpart funds are devoted to development projects but it would be helpful if they were more clearly identified in national accounts so that their ultimate purpose could be definitely established.

Cash Grants, Loans and Credits

Suggestions have been made periodically that our aid should take the form of cash grants, loans or credits. Cash grants would on occasion probably mean cheaper procurement of capital equipment; they could also relieve the recipient's exchange position and they would simplify administration. On the other hand, they might result in less support in Canada for the Plan, although this would probably depend on whether they were tied to specific projects or sources of supply. It is probably preferable to continue to follow the practices we have established but to keep in mind that such grants are occasionally desirable, e.g. for technical schools in the smaller countries.

As for loans and credits, these can best be left to the international agencies already in the field, despite Russian use of this method of rendering aid. A change in our form of operations now would be very difficult. It would involve us in competition with the institutions who have the facilities and experience; it might result in less bank lending, and there is still lots of scope for this; and it raises the question of collection. It is no doubt true too that in this field Canadians probably prefer to give than to lend.

Administrative Arrangements

This aspect of our Colombo Plan operations remains to be considered and will be reviewed on the return of Mr. Cavell from his current trip in the East.

W.R. M[ARTIN]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

ADMINISTRATIVE ARRANGEMENTS

The administration of the Plan is inevitably complex because at least three departments have a direct interest in it. Colombo Plan aid is a tangible element of substantial proportions in our foreign economic policy. The Department of External Affairs, therefore, is responsible for seeing that the Plan is operated so that the purposes of participation are achieved and that relations with the Asian members are fostered and strengthened. The interests of the Department of Finance in a programme involving $34 million annually are obvious. Because External Affairs is not equipped for the task, supervision of programmes and the placing of contracts are responsibilities of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The fact that these functions are exercised by this Minister also ensures that domestic sources of supply are given every consideration.

The nature of the programme is such that it is impractical to suggest any change in this division of responsibility, nor should the operations be any more difficult to administer than, for example, those of the Department of Public Works, which has to work so closely with user departments and agencies.

There is room for improvement in organizing interdepartmental advice and direction of the Plan. From time to time, reviews of general policy by the deputies of the departments most concerned are desirable. At more frequent intervals senior officials, under the chairmanship of an officer from the Department of External Affairs, should consider the general content of programmes and make recommendations to Ministers on them. To this group should report a different committee, convened by the Administrator of the Plan, which would have as its mandate more detailed consideration of projects, based on the preparations made by the Administrator and his staff.

Finally, with regard to the work of the International Economic and Technical Co-operation Division, it would seem to be desirable to provide for a small number of officers to represent the Administrator in the countries where the main work is being undertaken.

Bref à la délégation à la réunion du Comité consultatif du Plan de Colombo
Brief for Delegation to the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee Meeting

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa, October, 1956]

A. General Orientation: The Colombo Plan is a cooperative venture in the economic development of South and South-East Asia. Anything which contributes to the economic development of the region can properly be discussed in the context of the Plan. Canada is one of the countries involved in this cooperative venture; the countries in the area are, of course, making a much greater contribution to economic development in the area than is Canada or all the other member countries outside the Area. It is therefore not appropriate to speak of donor and recipient nations. The Plan is not an exercise in charity. Nor is it at all appropriate to speak of the Plan as having the negative purpose of countering communism.

The Colombo Plan originated, or course, as a Commonwealth effort, as an attempt by members of the Commonwealth to use the well-trying techniques of consultation for a continuing purpose in the area. The Plan now includes many important non-Commonwealth countries, notably, the United States, which, though it has not joined the Council for Technical Cooperation, is a full member of the Plan. In a sense, however, the Commonwealth membership may be regarded as a nucleus and as one of the reasons that consultation at the annual meetings has become relatively frank and effective.

B. The Main Purpose of the Meeting is to prepare and approve the annual report of the Consultative Committee which is a summary and evaluation of progress in economic development in the area during the past year. Each of the countries in the area is the subject of a separate chapter which each country prepares following a questionnaire drafted in accordance with discussions at Singapore last year. Each draft chapter is considered by a conference sub-group during the preparatory meeting of officials. Canada will serve on the Malaya-Borneo sub-group (Mr. Carson) and on the Indo-China sub-group (Mr. Baudouin).

The general sections of the report (Chapters I and II of the 1955 report) deal with rather non-controversial subjects than do the counting chapters. They attempt to evaluate the development of the area and the work of the Plan in the past year, and to set out general goals for the next year. The delegation will endeavour to see that these chapters in particular present a realistic analysis and offend neither Canadian policy consideration nor the known views of Asian representatives. This section of the report will call for comments at the Ministerial meeting.

The preparation and approval of the annual report is the first item on the agenda of the Ministerial meeting. The other items are: (b) Technical Assistance (see para. G);

(c) Colombo Plan Information Unit; (d) Form of questionnaire; (e) U.S. Proposal for Nuclear Energy Training and Research Centre; (f) Other business.

C. Last Year the two major questions on which the Canadian delegation had to take a position were (a) continuance of the Plan beyond 1957 and (b) the size of the Canadian contribution for 1956-57. As to (a), it was decided to continue the plan until 1961 with a comprehensive review of progress in 1959. As to (b) — Mr. Pearson announced that the Canadian Government proposed to ask Parliament to vote a significant increase in 1956-57 over the 1955-56 allocation. (It was decided later to ask Parliament to vote $34.4 million as compared with $26.4 million in the preceding year). Obviously (a) does not arise this year. As to (b) — the size of the 1957-58 contribution — this matter is now under discussion by Ministers;¹⁵ Cabinet authority will be sought for Mr. Martin to make an appropriate statement at the meeting of Ministers.

D. Aid to Newer Members of the Plan: The question of the scale of Canadian aid to the newer members of the Plan will likely arise at least in talks with delegations from those countries. This year we allocated roughly $1 million out of the additional $8 million voted. This was in addition to the technical assistance they were already receiving out of the $1.4 million set aside for technical assistance to the whole area. The scale of Canadian aid to these countries depends upon the decision to be taken by Cabinet as to the size of Canada's contribution in 1957-58.

E. New Members: This question is unlikely to arise. Briefing prepared for last year's delegation is attached as Appendix A.¹⁶

F. Position of Bureau for Technical Cooperation: Last year's brief is attached as Appendix B.¹⁷ The appointment of Mr. Nathan Keyfitz, of the Canadian DBS, as head of the Bureau has made it of more value. We would not be adverse to see Keyfitz's position strengthened though obviously we should avoid urging this openly.

It may be suggested by the Australians or Americans that the Bureau might become a Colombo Plan Secretariat and that such a Secretariat should review and evaluate development programmes and have some responsibility for awarding priorities to particular projects. If the issue was forced which seems quite unlikely, Canada would prefer to see the role of the Bureau enlarged rather than see a new and separate organization set up. But, in practice, we have a strong preference for mainly bilateral arrangements, and so do the Asian members of the Plan. Further, it would be unfortunate if the staff of such a Secretariat had to be stolen from among the few economic development advisors in the Asian countries of the Plan. We would seek Keyfitz's judgment on the availability of staff from the Asian members.

Still another problem that may arise in this connection concerns the role of the U.N. Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East in the Colombo Plan. Officially, ECAFE has an observer status, and we would oppose any enlargement of their role. Of course, we welcome their comments on economic developments and the many technical problems of aid. C.V. Narasimhan who will represent ECAFE, may tend to forget that he is merely an observer since in the past he has been head of the Indian delegation to the official meetings. Canada would oppose any suggestion that ECAFE should become co-ordinating group for the Plan. As ECAFE is a U.N. agency, such a role would be improper, both from the U.N. point of view and from the point of view of the Plan. However, use should be made of ECAFE's studies and statistics so far as appropriate.

G. Technical Assistance. The Technical Assistance Committee will consider last year's recommendations, review progress in technical assistance, and consider the report of the Council. Last year's report of the T.A. Committee should be studied by the Canadian representative on this committee. It would be useful if Keyfitz could take the chair at this committee — this would help to give Keyfitz and the Bureau a bit more prestige and further, Keyfitz is probably, in terms of personality and competence, the best person to have as chairman.

H. Nuclear Centre in Philippines: It is understood that the U.S. will make only a short verbal progress report on this subject, as the report of the Brookhaven team is not yet available and as there is still a conflict of views within the Administration between those who want a cooperative organization in which the Asians would have a voice, and those who favour a centre virtually controlled by the U.S. (It is likely that before the Brookhaven report is released there will have to be extensive bilateral talks with the U.S. and Canada. When these bilateral talks might take place cannot be foreseen as yet).

I. Statement by Leader of Delegation: In his general statement Mr. Martin will wish to mention the size of the Canadian contribution, the medical mission, comment briefly on major projects now moving ahead (Shadiwal, Dacca-Chittagong, Kulna, Kundah, Canada-India Reactor) and outline what views it will be possible to express on the nuclear centre in the Philippines. The speech will be prepared by the delegation.

J. The Delegation is authorized to state that Canada will undertake to translate into French and reproduce selected Conference documents and the report.

Wellington, December 8, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

DELEGATION REPORT ON THE 1956 MEETING OF THE CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE FOR THE COLOMBO PLAN (PREPARED BY RODNEY Y. GREY)

1. Set out below are comments on various aspects of the 1956 meeting in Wellington of the Consultative Committee for the Colombo Plan.
2. Due to the fact that the most contentious item, the proposal to set up a nuclear centre in the Philippines, had been withdrawn from the agenda at the request of the United States, the discussions in the officials' meeting and the meeting of Ministers was relatively uninteresting and non-controversial. The most useful work was undertaken by the Committee on the Form of the Questionnaire which recast the questionnaire in order to reduce the editorial labours of next year's meeting of officials. The main subject of discussion among officials was the procedure that should be adopted by next year's meeting.
3. Preliminary Working Group: The Preliminary Working Group consisted of representatives of about half the countries in the Plan and for the first two days, although it met, it was unable to work because of the absence of any Asian representative. A number of draft chapters were not available until almost the end of the two weeks of the Preliminary Working Group's existence and those that were available were either far too long or incomplete. The main job of the Preliminary Working Group was to cut down the chapters to approximately the right length; there was very little discussion of more substantive questions which might have emerged. However, the Preliminary Working Group was able to prepare a draft contributions chapter as well as editing all but two draft country chapters. The Preliminary Working Group spent a good deal of time discussing how it would go about its business, in part due to the fact that it was chaired by Mr. Owen Williams of the United Kingdom delegation who seemed unable to resolve minor procedural difficulties quickly. This resulted in a recommendation by the Business Committee, which was adopted by the Ministers, that next year's Preliminary Working Group should immediately resolve itself into a series of working teams who would pass on their work directly to the country chapters working groups at the officials' meeting. The Preliminary Working Group should meet as a group to consider the drafts prepared by its teams. There was a feeling that the Preliminary Working Group this year was hardly a success but that it was worth trying out for another year in its modified form, particularly in view of the fact that the new Questionnaire may produce a few draft chapters of a higher order than this year.

4. The Officials Meeting: At the officials' meeting the main activity was carried on in five committees — the Drafting Committee chaired by Mr. Raju Coomaraswamy of Ceylon, the Business Committee chaired by Mr. J. Moriarty of New Zealand, the Committee on the Form of the Questionnaire chaired by Dr. I.G. Patel of India, the Sub-Committee on Information chaired by Mr. R.G.N. Cavell, and the Sub-Committee on Technical Assistance chaired by Mr. Dexter of Australia.

5. The Drafting Committee discussed a few points of substance arising out of the drafts before it; it was unfortunate that most of its work was editorial drafting which could well have been done by the country chapter groups if there had been more junior officers present who were familiar with the Report and if they had received more guidance from the Questionnaire.

6. The Business Committee concerned itself with arrangements for next year's meeting. The majority favoured an arrangement whereby the officials meeting would have lasted three weeks, the first week of which would be attended by junior officers and would be intended to replace the Preliminary Working Group. However, the United States was unable to accept this proposal despite repeated appeals to bow to the will of the majority and therefore a recommendation was put forward (which was adopted by the Ministers) calling for a Preliminary Working Group to meet for one week rather than two and nominating a series of teams to deal with the country chapters.

7. The Committee on the Form of the Questionnaire radically recast the Questionnaire, particularly in the light of views expressed in the Business Committee by heads of delegations. It is believed that the new Questionnaire will produce a shorter Report with much more emphasis on the processes and pace of economic development in the region and rather less on description of projects and cataloguing of external assistance. This Committee was fortunate in that it was chaired brilliantly by Dr. Patel of India and the success it achieved is largely due to his efforts and hard work.

8. The Sub-Committee on Information: The Information Committee had before it some ambitious proposals put forward by the head of the Information Unit in Colombo, Mr. Chatterjee. The report of the sub-committee (which was noted by Ministers) calls for very slight expansion in the work of the Unit but falls short of the ambitious proposals which were urged on it by Chatterjee and bitterly opposed by the Pakistani delegation.

9. The Sub-Committee on Technical Assistance: This committee recommended to the governments that they give renewed attention to the views set out in the report on technical assistance of last year and they suggested (in paragraph 9(v)) that there be an investigation of the operation of the Bureau. The United Kingdom is making an administrative expert available for a study of the Bureau in Colombo. This is a reflection of the fact that the management of this Bureau is a difficult matter because each member of the staff apparently feels free to consult his national High Commissioner in Colombo when he disagrees with any action being taken by the Director of the Bureau. It seems questionable whether an administrative expert will be able to solve this problem.

10. Meeting of Ministers: During the meeting of Ministers, Mr. Martin made three statements, which are set out as attachments to the minutes of the particular meetings. In his statement on the Canadian section of the contributions chapter, he was able to announce that the Canadian Government had approved the Ceylon Programme for 1956-57 and that it had been decided to ask Parliament to vote $34.4 million to the Colombo Plan for 1957-58.

11. American Agricultural Surplus Disposal Programme: In the American section of the contributions chapter, the draft as put forward by the United States stated that it was a fact that the United States agricultural surplus disposal programme did not affect world prices for the commodities in question. New Zealand, Australia and Canada felt that this statement was objectionable and urged the Americans to delete all reference to the effect of such sales on world prices and markets. However, the Americans insisted that, given the size of the programme, they were entitled to refer to the conditions under which goods were sold to countries in the area. After several adjournments of the Drafting Committee, a form of words was adopted which is not open to the same objection as was the earlier draft and which makes it clear that the sales are carried on under United States legislation which enjoins the President to make the sales without damage to normal United States markets and without unduly disrupting world prices. There is no suggestion in the draft as adopted that these instructions are followed.

12. Asian Regional Nuclear Centre in Manila: We understood that the Americans would make only a passing reference to this subject. However, the bulk of the United States delegate's speech at the Ministers' meeting on the American section of the contributions chapter was devoted to an exposition of the American offer to contribute $20 million to this centre, subject to satisfactory conditions being agreed upon by participating countries. Copies of the Brookhaven [National Laboratory] Report on this proposed nuclear centre were distributed to delegations. The American delegate proposed that a working group be set up to study the problems and difficulties created by this proposal and to make recommendations to governments for their consideration. No action was taken by the Consultative Committee. The initiative therefore rests with the United States to approach member governments to cooperate in such a working group. It was fairly obvious that the United States, anticipating some controversy on this subject, had had it removed from the agenda and that they had decided to introduce the proposal in such a way as to get minimum discussion and maximum publicity. The draft communiqué prepared for the officials by the New Zealand Secretariat contained extensive reference to the American proposal; however, we were successful in having the amount of space devoted to this subject reduced by more than half and having a reference to the Canada-India reactor inserted.¹⁸

13. Arrangements for Next Year's Meeting: The Committee adopted the recommendations referred to above that the Preliminary Working Group should meet for one week rather than two weeks. When this subject was being discussed by Ministers, Mr. Martin suggested that governments ought to consider whether or not it would be appropriate to drop the convention of the host country paying delegates' living expenses. The United States delegate supported Mr. Martin's view; there was no other discussion. It remains to be seen whether the suggestion will bear fruit. It is understood that both Ceylon and Pakistan would prefer to pay delegates' expenses. No decision was reached by the Committee as to where the next meeting would be. In our telegram No. 100 of November 30† we stated that Ceylon and Pakistan were the most likely to offer. Since that time the Japanese have shown more interest, although they recognize that there are a number of Asian countries who would be unhappy at receiving an invitation to go to Tokyo. At the last moment, the Vietnamese decided they would like to issue an invitation and protracted negotiations began between interested countries. The Pakistanis in particular feel that neither Tokyo nor Saigon are appropriate. All delegates felt that the mechanical and administrative arrangements of the conference would be extremely difficult at either of these centres. The matter was left that the New Zealand Government would undertake to consult member governments in the near future and try to resolve the difficulty. It may well be that the United States may come forward with an invitation as the way has now been cleared for them to not pay delegates' living expenses. We have indicated to the New Zealanders our preference for Ceylon, as instructed in your telegram No. EE-383 of December 4, † and we have made it clear to them that we share their view and the view of the United Kingdom and many other countries as to the undesirability of holding the next meeting in Tokyo. Given the strength and logic of objections of a number of Asian countries to going to Tokyo, it would seem unwise to give any support to this suggestion.

14. The Report is to be released in national capitals on January 15 next.¹⁹ One copy of the draft report and documents relating to it are being sent under separate cover. Minutes of the officials meeting and Ministers meeting and reports of the committees referred to above are also being forwarded by air cargo in a separate parcel. Copies of the Report will be forwarded from Wellington to posts in Colombo Plan countries.

COLOMBO PLAN — TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE — EQUIPMENT FOR THE TECHNICAL HIGH SCHOOL RANGOON, BURMA

Towards the end of last year a formal request was received from the Government of the Union of Burma for a quantity of equipment to be supplied under the Technical Co-operation Scheme for a Technical High School that is being built in Rangoon. The school was designed and constructed by United Kingdom firms and will take boys who have completed middle school and teach them for two years in Burmese, English, Algebra, Geometry, Physics, Chemistry, Technical Drafting and one of the following trade courses: building, metal work, machine shop practice, electricity, electronics, automobile or diesel engine maintenance and repair. The yearly enrollment is expected to be from 300-400 students, making the total enrollment for the two-year course 600-800 students. Space for evening classes can accommodate up to 1,000. This school is one of three projected technical institutions (there are already two in operation) designed to meet the manpower requirements of industry in the expanding Burmese economy.

The equipment requested included basic instructional tools and teaching aids in the following laboratories and shops:

1. Science (Chemistry and Physics) Laboratories
2. Surveying Instruments
3. Bricklaying
4. Carpentry and Machine woodworking shop
5. Sheet metal shop
6. Welding shop
7. Blacksmithy shop
8. Foundry shop
9. Machine shop
10. Diesel and internal combustion engine shop
11. Automobile shop
12. General workshop tools
13. Electrical shop
14. Electrical communication laboratory
15. Electrical (power) laboratory
16. Teaching aids

17. Office equipment

18. Library books.

The whole of the request was directed to Canada with the exception of Item 9 as Australia had agreed to supply two complete machine shops, one of which was destined for this school. Preliminary investigations showed that perhaps two-thirds of the request addressed to Canada would represent offshore purchase (mainly U.K.) while one-third could be obtained from Canadian sources of manufacture. The Interdepartmental Group considered this application and noted that despite preliminary indications that a large part of the equipment was not available in Canada, nevertheless the Burmese attached a very high priority to this request as it related to a co-ordinated programme for training needed technical personnel. It was also noted that as part of a recent Russian aid agreement assistance had been offered to the Burmese in building and equipping another one of the several technological institutes which the Government of Burma is anxious to establish. It was determined that the Canadian content might be raised if someone experienced in equipping similar schools in Canada was to examine the possibility of substituting nearly equivalent Canadian items for some of those listed. Advantage was taken of the assignment of Dr. A.E. Cameron, President of the Nova Scotia Technical College, to a technical education mission to Indonesia to have him visit Rangoon for a week early in February. Concurrently the application was being examined by commodity officers in the Department of Trade and Commerce to determine the price and availability of the items.

Dr. Cameron reported that there was an immediate need for hand tools and bench power tools. He felt this form of contribution from Canada would give widespread daily acknowledgment of a Canadian contribution and might set a precedent for the future use of Canadian made goods. Apparently the Burmese have been able to obtain the auto-mechanics shop equipment from the Ford Foundation and Carpenter shop equipment was now available from local sources. The Burmese were also interested in obtaining training facilities in Canada for senior students and for the training of Burmese instructors. They have since requested a Canadian expert to teach at the technical college at Insein to which graduates from this high school would go for further training.

The United Kingdom Government was approached concurrently with Dr. Cameron's visit to Rangoon to determine whether it would be prepared to consider the possibility of supplying some of the equipment items which would originate from United Kingdom manufacturing sources. The Foreign Office subsequently indicated it would be prepared to assign a reasonable priority to the provision of that portion of equipment which cannot be procured from Canadian sources. The Burmese authorities have now submitted a request to the United Kingdom for laboratory equipment, surveying and drawing equipment and machinery associated with a number of the shops.

Dr. Cameron concluded that an effective contribution could be made by Canada through the provision of small hand and bench tools for the whole school and by equipping the sheet metal, tinsmithy and foundry workshops. He pointed out that it would be necessary to supply the whole range of the small tools in order to make a worthwhile contribution even though he recognized this might include some items from non-Canadian sources of supply. Dr. Cameron found the school well designed and making good progress and felt the plans for the training of a cadre of technically qualified personnel were well founded and entitled to a high priority in Burma's economic development plans.

The remaining lists have been closely examined by a specialist in the equipping of technical schools and after certain revisions and amendments (sanctioned by the Burmese authorities in the interests of obtaining a correlated supply of equipment) it has been determined that a homogeneous and effective offer could be made by Canada of equipment valued at about $85,000. Estimates place the overall average of off-shore component at less than 40%. Certain items are of higher off-shore content than others but it would not be possible to work out any substitution increasing the Canadian content that would still make a self-contained contribution. The breakdown is as follows:

Bricklaying	$ 2,936.00
Carpentry	7,300.00
Sheetmetal	13,407.00
Welding	4,304.00
Blacksmithy	15,000.00
Foundry	12,000.00
General tools	25,163.00
Office equipment	2,700.00
Contingencies	2,190.00

The Interdepartmental Colombo Group has considered the request in these terms and has recommended our participation. Equipment requests are normally not required to have Cabinet approval but as this particular one is of some magnitude and contains an appreciable element of off-shore purchase it has been brought forward for Cabinet consideration. This is the largest single equipment request so far received under the Technical Co-operation Scheme. It falls within the terms of the Colombo Plan Vote.

It is estimated that the United Kingdom is being asked to supply equipment valued at about $205,000; the Ford Foundation offer of an automobile shop will run to some $80,000, while the Australian offer of a machine shop may total as much as $200,000.

Recommendation

I would recommend that approval be granted for the purchase and supply of up to $85,000.00 worth of tools and equipment. Procurement where possible to be from Canadian sources of manufacture, and the total average off-shore element not to exceed 40% of the total. Funds to be made available from the technical assistance portion of the Colombo Plan Vote.²⁰

COLOMBO PLAN — TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE — EQUIPMENT FOR THE SURVEY
DEPARTMENT, GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF BURMA

The Government of Burma has submitted a request, under the Technical Co-operation Scheme of the Colombo Plan, for a quantity of scientific equipment to be used by its Survey Department in connection with its expansion into the fields of mapping, photogrammetry and interpretation of air photographs. This request has been endorsed by a Canadian expert, Mr. P.E. Palmer, formerly of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, who served for eighteen months as a Colombo Plan adviser on mapping and aerial surveys to the Burmese Survey Department.

At a recent meeting of the Inter-Departmental Group of officials on Technical Assistance Mr. Palmer emphasized the need for equipment to improve the effectiveness of Government survey activities in Burma and indicated that Burmese personnel would also benefit from the training with this equipment. There are people in Burma qualified in the use of this scientific equipment — it can therefore be utilized immediately for training purposes and for practical work in the processing of photographic material already on hand. The cost to Canada for this equipment is approximately $40,000 which Inter-Departmental Group officials do not consider excessive. Accordingly the Group has approved the Burmese request.

While requests for technical assistance equipment do not normally require the approval of Cabinet it was agreed that since this case involved an appreciable element of offshore purchases the concurrence of Cabinet should be sought before any further decision was taken. The equipment requested includes precision and photogrammetrical instruments, possibly 80-90% of which are unavailable from Canadian manufacturing sources. The Burmese Government has, however, emphasized the high priority of this equipment in its economic development plans, and since the request stems in part from the work of a Canadian expert in the field, I believe that Cabinet should grant its approval. The expenditures shall be made from Colombo Plan technical assistance funds which are already available to the Canadian Government.

Recommendations

I therefore recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance:

That approval be granted for the purchase and supply of up to $40,000 worth of equipment for the Burmese Survey Department as recommended by Mr. P.E. Palmer, procurement where possible to be from Canadian sources of manufacture. The necessary funds are to be made available from the technical assistance portion of the existing Colombo Plan funds.²¹

1956-57 COLOMBO PLAN PROGRAMME FOR CEYLON

Earlier this year the Government of Ceylon, after consultation with the Canadian High Commissioner, put forward in programme form a number of requests for assistance under the Colombo Plan, to be financed from the 1956-57 Parliamentary appropriation. The total cost of the projects included in the programme amounted to approximately $2.5 million. This programme was examined in detail by the Interdepartmental Committee on the Colombo Plan and was reduced to $2.0 million, which is approximately the same size as last year's programme. This $2.0 million includes an allocation of $80 thousand for additional equipment for the Colombo airport which has already been approved by Cabinet (on August 29, 1956).²² The projects which are now recommended to the Cabinet for approval are those described in the following paragraphs:

(1) Continuation of the Aerial Survey. On June 8, 1955, Cabinet approved of a proposal that a Canadian firm should be given a contract to carry out an aerial survey of Ceylon.²³ Authority was given for a contract to be let for the then estimated total cost of the survey, $500 thousand. $200 thousand was allocated out of 1955-56 funds on the understanding that Ceylon would put forward a request in 1956-57 for the remaining $300 thousand with the highest priority in their programme. It would appear that no new Cabinet authority is needed for the allocation of $300 thousand out of 1956-57 funds, but authority is needed for the allocation of a further $36 thousand which it is now estimated will be required in order to make proper use of the information provided by the survey. The additional

²³ Voir/See Volume 21, Document 250.

$36 thousand is required to meet the costs of technical assistance to the Ceylon authorities which can best be provided by the Canadian contractors.

(2) Diesel Locomotives. Canada has already supplied eight diesel locomotives to Ceylon. They now ask that a further two be provided at a cost of $370 thousand. The United States is supplying 15 diesel locomotives this year under its new aid programme. It would appear that the further provision of diesel locomotives would be a suitable Canadian project in view of the pressing need for improvement and expansion of transportation facilities in Ceylon.

(3) Equipment for Agricultural Stations and Schools. Canada has already provided equipment for 35 agricultural equipment shops. Additional equipment is now requested for shop and maintenance facilities for the tractor pools which are being established throughout the food growing areas in Ceylon. The Ceylon authorities originally asked for $150 thousand for this project, but $35 thousand remains unspent from the allocation under which Canada supplied maintenance equipment for the agricultural shops. The Ceylon authorities have been told that Canada would not consider an allocation for the tractor shops of more than $115 thousand, plus the carry-over of $35 thousand.

(4) Auxiliary Power Plant for Fisheries By-Products Factory. The most substantial project carried out by Canada in Ceylon is the Fisheries Cold Storage Plant and Fisheries By-Products Plant. It has now become clear that in order to make the most effective use of this plant it will be necessary to provide an auxiliary power supply to prevent spoilage when the electricity supply is interrupted. The Ceylon authorities consider this plant an urgent necessity. Its cost is estimated at $30 thousand.

(5) Pest Control Units. Ten pest control units have been supplied to Ceylon by Canada as a pilot project and are only part of the quantity originally requested. These units are now considered to have been very successful and the Ceylon authorities therefore request that we provide an additional 10 units at a cost of $27,500.

(6) Electric Transmission Lines for Gal Oya. The original electric transmission line financed by Canada is now nearly completed. The next stage in the development of the power transmission system for the Gal Oya valley (where the Ceylon Government is endeavouring to accommodate and provide employment for population moved from the crowded parts of the Island) consists in the provision of a number of transmission lines to serve various establishments — a paper factory, a primary substation, two municipalities, and a sub-station to feed a further transmission line to an irrigation system power distribution station. It is estimated that the costs of these additional transmission lines would be $400 thousand. This project is recommended, subject to a favourable report being received from a Canadian expert who will shortly be investigating this project.

There are three further projects which involve costs which the Ceylon Government suggests be met by the provision of flour from Canada, the sale of which would provide counterpart funds. These projects are:

(7) Veterinary Building for University of Ceylon. There is no adequate building in which to provide for the teaching of veterinary science in the Faculty of Agriculture in the University of Ceylon at Peradeniya. The earlier course work in veterinary science is taught at the Faculty of Medicine in Colombo. The Ceylon authorities urge that as there is a site available at Peradeniya, where they propose to establish the Science Faculty of the University of Ceylon, and as the need is most urgent for a new veterinary building, the construction costs of a veterinary building be met by counterpart funds to be provided from a gift of Canadian flour. The Ceylon authorities estimate that the total cost of the building might not be more than $41,500.

(8) Local Costs of a Trade School. The Ceylon Government asks that the Canadian Government provide $200 thousand worth of flour, the sale of which would provide funds for the construction of a trade school building. It is proposed to indicate to the Government of Ceylon that the Government of Canada would give sympathetic consideration to a request to provide equipment needed for this school. It is proposed to provide instruction for six major trades: building, woodwork, electrical work, metal work, motor mechanics, and printing. It is anticipated that when the school is in operation there will be about 400 full-time students and 900 part-time students, with about 450 students graduating each year. Given the need for the expansion of technical training in Ceylon, this seems a most desirable project.

(9) Rural Road Construction. Assistance has already been provided by Canada over the past two and one half years to the Ceylon rural road programme to the extent of $700 thousand by the provision of flour which generates counterpart funds. A check has recently been made concerning the amount of these counterpart funds that have been spent on rural road construction by the Ceylon Government, and it is evident that only a small portion remains unspent or uncommitted. A particular feature of the programme is that the Ceylon village population is encouraged to donate labour and land to the road construction. It is estimated that the value of labour and land donations has now reached $500 thousand. The road programme has been an almost entirely Ceylonese-Canadian project from its beginning. The Government of Ceylon, which is determined to push forward with this programme, hopes that it will be continued by Canada rather than by any other country. Present plans call for a further expenditure on rural roads of $400 thousand and it is clear that counterpart funds from the sale of flour are required to finance this construction which could otherwise not be undertaken by the Ceylon authorities.

It will be noted that the Ceylon Government's request for flour to generate counterpart funds to meet local costs for the three projects listed as (7)(8) and (9) above amounts to $641,500, which is slightly less than that provided last year. As Australia is the main exporter of flour to Ceylon, the Australian Government has been consulted and has indicated that it would have no objection to the supply of this flour to Ceylon.

The amount required for all of the above projects totals $2 million (including $80 thousand already approved for additional equipment for the Colombo Airport). A number of other projects have been considered by officials and discussed with the Ceylon authorities but are not recommended for inclusion in the 1956-57 programme for a variety of reasons. Projects which are not recommended include the provision of mechanical handling equipment for the Port of Colombo; equipment for a soil laboratory; the provision of duplicating sets; and the provision of milk collection vehicles and tanks.²⁴

Ottawa, March 21, 1956

COLOMBO PLAN AID TO INDIA

At its meeting on October 19, 1955, Cabinet approved Canadian participation in several small projects in India.²⁵ At that time it was pointed out that only a relatively small amount of funds from the 1955-56 allocation was involved since it was expected that the bulk of the allocation to India for 1955-56 (and some part of 1956-57 funds) would be required if Cabinet eventually approved Canadian participation in a large hydro-electric project at Kundah, in Madras State, which was being investigated by Canadian engineers.

2. This memorandum seeks approval for Canadian participation in Kundah. Additional funds are also requested to meet the increased costs of one of the projects approved on October 19, 1955 — the aero-magnetic survey of Western Rajasthan — and the extension of this aero-magnetic survey to the Uttar Pradesh Province of India.

The Kundah Project

3. The Indian Government have requested Canadian Colombo Plan assistance for the financing of the external costs of the Kundah hydro-electric project which has been included as a high priority project in the Indian Second Five Year Plan. The power from this project will be used in Madras State, one of the most thickly settled and highly industrialized areas in India. This area is already short of power and the Kundah project offers the only source of relatively cheap power which can practicably be developed at this time to meet the rapidly increasing needs which are expected over the next few years.

4. A firm of Canadian consulting engineers has now investigated this project thoroughly and has reported that it is technically and economically sound.

5. Stage I of this project (for which India has requested assistance) will involve the installation of 145,000 kilowatts of power at an estimated total cost of $60 million. Of this amount, the external costs involving equipment which will be required from outside India and the services of a Canadian engineering company (to carry out the design and supervision of the work) are estimated not to exceed $20 million. A precise estimate of external costs cannot be made until there has been more extensive investigation, in cooperation with Indian officials, of the practical possibilities which exist for supplying as much of the equipment as possible from Indian sources (particularly transmission lines). The Canadian engineers are also hopeful that as the project progresses it may prove possible, by altering designs or specifications, to reduce substantially the costs of equipment and materials required from outside India. The balance of the costs in excess of the Canadian contribution to the external costs will be born by India which will thus bear roughly two-thirds of the total costs for Stage I.

6. Subject to satisfactory delivery dates for the equipment it is estimated that Stage I of the project can be in operation by 1961 (one part of the installation could produce power as early as 1959).

7. If approval is granted in principle at this time for Canadian participation in financing the external costs of Kundah now estimated at a maximum of $20 million, approximately $13 million might be allocated for this out of 1955-56 funds, with the balance to be met out of funds to become available in 1956-57.

Increased Estimate for the Aero-Magnetic Survey of Rajasthan

8. At its meeting on October 19, 1955, Cabinet approved the allocation of $125,000 out of India's 1955-56 allocation to finance the external costs of an aero-magnetic survey by a Canadian company of the prospective oil bearing areas of West Rajasthan. Subsequently a Canadian Company, Spartan Air Services, were selected for this survey on the basis of this preliminary estimate although, pending negotiations on the revision of the costs and approval by Cabinet, no contract has yet actually been concluded with Spartan. A more detailed examination of the flying to be carried out and the eventual compilation of data revealed that the amount of $125,000 was not sufficient to cover the total external costs involved in an effective survey. While contract negotiations were still under way between Canadian officials and the company, the latter arranged for personnel and equipment (including an aircraft) to reach India at the end of last year and in the early part of this year. Due largely to unfortunate flying conditions the Indian Air Force were unable to complete preliminary photography (required before the aero-magnetic survey can begin) and the project was unable to start effectively on the anticipated date. As a result of these delays certain standby costs additional to the original estimate have arisen and these, together with the revised estimate described above, now bring the total cost of the project to $175,000. The Indian Government has been informed that we consider a part of these additional costs to be attributable to delays for which they were responsible and negotiations are now taking place to ascertain what part of the standby costs they should bear. In addition to the part of these standby costs which it may prove practicable for India to assume, the latter has also assumed responsibility for all other local costs involved in the project. The Canadian Government has agreed that counterpart funds totalling $50,000 (out of existing counterpart funds resulting from previous Canadian Colombo Plan grants to India) may be used by the Indians to help finance part of these local costs.

9. Approval is sought to conclude a contract with Spartan based on the final estimate of $175,000, on the understanding that Canadian expenditures within this amount may be reduced to the extent that India assumes part of the standby costs referred to in the preceding paragraph.

Extension of the Aero-Magnetic Survey to Include Some Areas in Uttar Pradesh

10. The Indian Government has arranged privately for Spartan to fly a reconnaissance of further potential oil bearing areas in the Gangetic Basin in the State of Uttar Pradesh. If this reconnaissance (which will be carried out without expense to Canada) proves favourable India has requested Canadian assistance in financing an aero-magnetic survey of some 10,000 line miles in the area in question.

11. The external costs of this latter project are estimated at $80,000 if the same personnel and equipment now employed for the Rajasthan Survey can be used to undertake the Uttar Pradesh survey on the completion of the Rajasthan Survey this spring. The mobilization and demobilization costs for the aircraft and personnel would be spread over two projects with considerable saving in external costs of the Uttar Pradesh project. It would therefore be desirable to have an early decision in order to take advantage of these savings.

12. Assistance to India in the survey and development of its oil resources should make an important contribution to the Indian economy. Some assistance for ground surveys has been provided to India from the USSR, but it is generally conceded that improved Western techniques could be used to offset some doubtful advice now being proffered by Soviet technicians.

13. Approval is sought to conclude a further contract with Spartan to finance an extension of the aero-magnetic survey to areas in Uttar Pradesh, if the preliminary reconnaissance proves that such a survey would be desirable and effective. Any standby costs incurred before the start of the Uttar Pradesh project will be met by India.

Recommendations

14. It is recommended that:

(a) Cabinet agree in principle to participation by the Canadian Government in the Kundah project and that the Canadian Government should finance the external costs of this project, estimated at this stage not to be in excess of $20,000,000. The sum of $13,000,000 would be set aside out of 1955-56 Colombo Plan funds to meet part of these external costs and the remainder would be covered by an allocation from funds which Parliament will be asked to approve for 1956-57.

(b) Cabinet authorize the conclusion of a contract between the Canadian Government and Spartan Air Services for an aero-magnetic survey of Rajasthan at a cost of $175,000.

(c) Cabinet agree that, subject to the report of the preliminary reconnaissance being favourable, the Canadian Government should finance the external costs of an aero-magnetic survey in Uttar Pradesh at an estimated cost of $80,000, to be undertaken by Spartan Air Services immediately upon the conclusion of the aero-magnetic survey in Rajasthan.²⁶

DESPATCH NO. 1774

New Delhi, December 5, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

THE COLOMBO PLAN

At this time when we are reviewing Indo-Canadian relations, it seems appropriate that Canada's Colombo Plan association with India should be summarized. This Section summarizes our past association and makes seven recommendations for changes in our present policy.

2. In the six years since the beginning of the Colombo Plan to the end of the fiscal year 1956-57, Canada will have made available a total of about $162 million for use in South and Southeast Asia, for capital assistance and technical assistance.

3. Up to September 30, 1956, about $80 million had been allocated for use in India, and it is probable that another $6 million of unallocated funds will be allocated to India shortly.

4. By next March the Canadian taxpayer will have given India under the Colombo Plan about $87 million.

5. The allocations to India have been used as follows:

PROJECTS WHICH HAVE BEEN COMPLETED OR ARE ALMOST COMPLETED:

(1) The Mayurakshi Power and Irrigation Project	$ 17,500,000
(2) Bombay State Road Transportation System - trucks, buses and automotive equipment	$ 4,365,000
(3) 50 locomotive boilers supplied to the Chittaranjan Locomotive Works	$ 2,080,000
(4) 120 steam locomotives supplied to the Indian Railways	$ 21,400,000
(5) Locust control equipment	$ 135,700
(6) Beaver aircraft and spraying equipment	$ 460,000

PROJECTS WHICH ARE NOT YET COMPLETED:

(7) Umtru Hydro-Electric Scheme (due to be completed April 1, 1957)	$ 3,300,000
(8) Diesel Generators for rural electrification	$ 3,300,000
(9) Canada-India Atomic Reactor	$ 7,000,000
(10) Magnetometer Aerial Surveys	$ 257,000
(11) Kundah Hydro-Electric Project, Madras State	$ 20,000,000
Total	$ 79,797,700

6. Canada has spent almost $3,000,000 under the Colombo Plan for technical assistance. Probably about a third of this has been spent on India. By June 30, 1956, 492 fellows and scholars from Southeast Asia had been trained or were receiving training in Canada, and of these 159 were from India. In addition, 74 Canadian experts have been sent to Southeast Asia under the Colombo Plan. Of these 37 are still in the area, 8 of them being in India.

First Recommendation

7. Canada is technically more advanced than India. We can produce equipment that India cannot. Our techniques are more advanced. Our businessmen, our engineers, are more ready than Indians are to experiment, to break with hampering traditional methods. One of our primary objectives in providing equipment should therefore be to ensure that our equipment is put to the very best use technically. We should use our bargaining position as the provider of capital aid to ensure that the projects in which we participate should, if possible, advance techniques in India. Where, for example, we know that out-of-date conservative methods are being used in India, and that modern and more efficient methods can be used for projects with which we are concerned, we should make certain that the out-dated methods are discarded before we agree to provide the funds for that project. Thus, if our engineers who examined the Kundah Project had informed us that earth dams would serve the same purpose and would be less costly than masonry dams, it might have been possible to ensure that earth dams were constructed rather than masonry ones. We could also have ensured that the area to be flooded by these dams would be cleared of trees before flooding; thus making certain that the reservoir could be used with the maximum degree of efficiency at some future date both for recreation and for commercial fish production. Although the short-term and immediate objective of the Kundah Project is to provide additional hydro-electric power, the Indians should not be permitted to lose sight of long-term objectives or possibilities.

Second Recommendation

8. When in future the Indian authorities suggest hydro-electric projects to us as suitable subjects for Colombo Plan aid, we should request them to suggest two or even three such projects which our consulting engineers could examine to determine which best suited our capabilities and equipment. Our engineers could examine all the projects during one visit to India and provide reports on each which would be available to the Indian engineers concerned. Aside from the technical assistance in terms of unbiased advice, we would probably find the engineers of each project most eager to accept the advice of our consulting engineers in order that their project might be chosen as a suitable objective for our expenditures.

Third Recommendation

9. From the viewpoint of political value, probably one of the best means of providing Colombo Plan aid to this country would be to participate in the search for oil and minerals which is now going on here. The British and United States oil companies have, I understand, so far fairly effectively stifled any possible flow of technical know-how which might assist the Indian Government in its attempts to find oil. The Indian Government as a result has found it necessary to turn to Russia for the provision of such expert knowledge and for the training of Indian nationals. The more aid Canada could provide in oil exploration and development, the closer we would be to attaining two useful objectives. First, it would clearly reaffirm to Mr. Nehru that we are prepared to pursue a policy independent of the United States and the United Kingdom when the facts warrant such independence, and that the policy of the Canadian Government is not dictated by the international oil cartels.

Secondly, it would serve to reduce the dependence of the Indian experts on the advice and assistance of the Russians. It might, therefore, be useful if we were to devote as much as $10,000,000 of our Colombo Plan funds to assist the Indian Government in its oil exploration and development programme.

Fourth Recommendation

10. Another method of ensuring that the most effective use is made of our aid would be to ensure that counterpart funds of a real rather than notional nature come into existence for every dollar we spend on aid to this country. Once counterpart funds are real (actually in existence rather than book entries) it would be easier to channel them into fields where they could be used directly for developmental purposes, preferably to strengthen the private enterprise sector of the Indian economy. All new counterpart funds should, therefore, in my opinion, be placed in a special bank account of the Indian Government which would represent hard cash available for investment within the country. The funds might be advanced to the Industrial Credit and Investment Corporation of India (ICICI) and the Industrial Finance Corporation of India (IFC). They would then be available to private enterprise for developmental purposes. The Indian Government might not welcome this proposal, but it might find it difficult not to agree as it would receive interest on such funds and as it has itself in the past made funds available to both of these Corporations.

Fifth Recommendation

11. Should we participate in future in any project similar, for example, to the recent magnetometer survey of Rajasthan, where the operating firm is a Canadian contractor, we should not attempt to reach a detailed agreement with the Indian Government on the actual operation. The intergovernmental agreement should be a simple, brief one, but its coming into effect should be made dependent on the conclusion of a detailed contract, to be approved by us, between the Indian Government and a designated Canadian company.

Sixth Recommendation

12. One of the problems which the Indian Government encounters when laying its long-term (five-year) plans is that of assessing with a reasonable degree of assurance what funds will be available over the five year period. This problem is less apparent where the funds required are Indian rupees, for the Indian Government can, to a large degree, predict the extent to which these will be available. However, its predictions as to the availability of foreign exchange must of necessity be less accurate. India's requirements of foreign exchange are rising due to its heavy capital investment programme. Within certain limits it can anticipate what its income from exports over five years will be. It cannot, however, estimate with any great degree of accuracy the amount of foreign exchange, or alternatively the value of the goods in place of foreign exchange, which will become available as a result of external aid or loans.

13. We in Canada have declared our intention to continue capital aid up to 1961. We have produced a formula in Ottawa whereby Parliamentary appropriations during any one year are not lost as the result of the fiscal year having run out. We have not, however, produced a system as a result of which we can safely tell the Indian Government that Parliament two years hence will be prepared to vote capital aid funds for Colombo Plan countries at not less than the present level. Bearing in mind the desirability here, for long-term planning purposes, of a definite indication of the funds which will become available over the next five years, would it be possible to consider putting up a request for an appropriation during the next session of Parliament for an amount equivalent to the amount of aid which we now anticipate we will give up to 1961? We could then assure Colombo Plan countries, including India, that the funds would be available for spending at a given amount each year over the period. Such action, especially if the United States were to follow our example, would greatly assist the Indians with their financial problems and permit the planners to plan more accurately and with greater confidence.

Seventh Recommendation

14. I believe it would be wise for Canada to switch from grant aid to India to the provision of a line of credit. The provision of credits would certainly be a method more acceptable to the Indians of providing aid to this country than is the provision of grants. Credit could be provided at a relatively small long-term net expense to ourselves, especially as this country will, in all probability, be in a position to start repaying drawings on a line of credit within eight or ten years. A line of credit might be extended free of interest for the period until repayment by instalments is due to start. A line of credit would be useful to India only if some sort of assurance can be obtained from the World Bank that the loans which it proposes to provide to India will not be reduced as a result. In addition to helping India, any line of credit which we might provide could be restricted to the purchase of products produced in Canada, thereby contributing to Canada's continued full employment during the period of drawing on it.

15. My specific recommendation is that Canada as soon as possible grant India a line of credit of $300 million at, say, 4 1/2% interest on the amounts drawn under the credit. The whole of the credit would be repaid in 20 annual instalments beginning ten years from now. The interest for the first ten years (1957-1967) would be paid out of the Colombo Plan vote and charged to the allocation for India. Thus, if India were by, say, 1972, to have drawn down the whole of the credit, the whole of the allocation for grants normally made to India under the Colombo Plan vote would be used to pay the interest on the credit (4 1/2% on $300 million = $13.5 million). There would be no further grant aid from Canada to India under the Colombo Plan. Up to then part of Canada's aid to India would be in the form of grants and part in the form of interest on that portion of the line of credit which is drawn down.

16. From the information given in my immediately succeeding despatch† on Indo-Canadian trade relations it would seem highly probable that if such a line of credit were established early in 1957 India might almost immediately make the following contracts with Canadian firms:

Diesel Locomotives for delivery during 1957 to 1961 inclusive	$ 50,000,000
Otter aircraft	$ 20,000,000
Electrolytic cells and accessories	$ 5,000,000
	Total $ 75,000,000

17. On all the items listed above, Canadian prices are competitive in the Indian market. The Indo-Canadian agreement establishing the line of credit might indeed provide that it is to be used only for goods of this kind in which Canada is competitive in the Indian Market. (The goods might be listed in an annex to the agreement and provision made for the annex to be amended at any time by agreement between the two governments). Such a stipulation would serve the interests of both India and Canada. It would serve India's interests because India would get more goods from Canada out of the credit if the prices of the goods which it purchases from Canada are competitive. It would serve Canada's interests since the credit would be used to promote the sales to India of products in which there might be a continuing market after the credit had been exhausted.

RE: DISCUSSION WITH ESCOTT REID ON LOAN TO INDIA

I am sorry that you did not get to come along to the meeting with Taylor this morning on Escott Reid's suggestion concerning a loan to India. Unfortunately the calling of the meeting got confused. Léger told me he would do it, but he did not do it very systematically. Consequently there were present Taylor, Plumtre, Ritchie, Reid, myself, and later Rasminsky.

Reid put up the general political case for giving India more assistance in its second five-year plan than was possible under the Colombo Plan and for singling India out if necessary in doing more than for others. He then proposed that we should make a loan to them to cover some significant fraction of the deficit of perhaps $1 billion in their foreign exchange requirements during the second five-year plan. There was some considerable discussion of what these requirements were, with Rasminsky arguing that they were significantly under $1 1/2 billion. Without more information the rest of us could not take part in this.

I had told Reid last night that I thought he could not expect any action within the next six months on the matter and that I felt he would be wise to put his case in longer run terms, which he was doing this morning.

He did not get very much encouragement from Taylor or Rasminsky or Plumtre, nor indeed very much support from Ritchie. Rasminsky pointed out that if some country like Canada loaned them money for particular purposes that might well result in the International Bank lending them less than the figure of something over $400 million that they could probably expect from the Bank otherwise, during the second five-year plan. Several of us opined that they could not get two or three or four times as much by way of loan than they could by way of additional grants under the Colombo Plan without about equal difficulties, and we doubted whether it would really be in India's interest to get, say, twice as much in the way of loan as they might otherwise get in the form of free grants, particularly if a reduction in the International Bank loan was taken into account.

I suggested that the real issue appeared to me to be whether some group of western countries, of which the United States would have to be the leader and Canada might be one, should loan quite substantial sums to India by preference over other countries for more or less political reasons on non-commercial terms, in order to ensure that this second five-year plan was a success. In this case the loans from the group as a whole would have to be large enough to look after India's external requirements during this period in so far as those were not already otherwise covered or could be covered from resources inside, and without loans from the International Bank. The others were inclined to feel that this was the real issue and Reid seemed to recognize that this was the case.

I said that it seemed to me that one could seriously study such a proposal, although I was not familiar enough with the facts and issues to have an opinion as to whether we should be prepared to join in such a consortium. In any case, the real issue in regard to such a joint operation would have to be decided by the United States from whom the bulk of the money would need to come. One could make some argument for the United States as well as ourselves changing the approach to India in, say, 1958 or 1959 from economic aid on a grant basis to a major lending operation appropriate to the new status of India and the stage of India's development.

The argument rested here without our trying to settle any particular attitude to be taken toward Pillai when he puts forward suggestions along these lines at the meeting on Saturday.²⁸

CANADA — INDIA REACTOR PROJECT

I am attaching to this letter a copy† of the draft text which officials in Ottawa consider might serve as a basis for negotiating with the Indian Government the formal agreement for the Canada-India reactor project. Many parts of this text were discussed with Dr. Bhabha when he was in Ottawa and the general financial arrangements have already been established in the exchange of letters between Dr. Bhabha and the Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance.

2. Section 10 of this draft text which concerns the provision of fuel was not discussed with Dr. Bhabha, who as you are aware, rejected the Canadian suggestion that fuel should be provided on a lease basis. You are familiar with the discussions which took place between the Minister and Dr. Bhabha in New Delhi last month. The formula suggested in Section 10 of the draft text has been approved by Cabinet.

3. A draft agreement along the lines of the attached text is likely to be presented to the Indians in the near future. Since the formal inauguration of the project is scheduled to take place in early February, it is obviously highly desirable that formal agreement or near agreement should have been reached before that time. However, before presenting this text to India, officials in Ottawa think it may be preferable to wait until there has been a further opportunity for Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom to discuss more thoroughly the problems involved in the control of fissile materials in preparation for the forthcoming twelve power meeting. It is, therefore, our intention to withhold presenting this agreement for the moment to the Indian Government unless it appears that no effective and relevant discussions are likely to materialize in the next few weeks. At the least, we would, of course, inform the United States and the United Kingdom Governments of how we were proposing to deal with the fuel issue but we are not entirely sure at what stage we should speak to them. We would welcome your comments on this aspect.

4. In the meantime, however, I should welcome your comments in connection with this text, bearing in mind that the formula concerning the provision of fuel has been approved by Cabinet. The other parts of the text have also been initially reviewed by other interested Departments. However, it is possible that some additions or alterations may be suggested before the final text is prepared for presentation to India.

5. Similar letters, together with a copy of the draft text of the agreement, have been sent to our High Commissioners in New Delhi and London.

CANADA-INDIA REACTOR PROJECT

We have noted your comments concerning the draft intergovernmental agreement and the following are our views in the order in which you have put your comments forward in your telegram No. 27:

(a) We would prefer to retain the word "provide" in paragraph one. We consider this along with reference to "contribution under Colombo Plan" accurately describes our role.

²⁹ Non retrouvé./Not located.

The extent to which this project involves a gift from Canada seems to be clear from the agreement as a whole. We would not be able to use the word "give" without a full explanation at this point of India's responsibilities including local costs, freight and insurance etc. which would hopelessly complicate this paragraph. What might be said in a public press release is another matter and it might be appropriate to refer therein to reactor as a gift if Indians agreeable.

(b) Paragraphs four and five have been carefully worked out to outline the general framework for the division of costs some parts of which are elaborated in the annex. We would prefer to retain these paragraphs as worded and accordingly not make the addition to paragraph one which you have suggested.

(c) We accept your suggestion regarding paragraph two however we would prefer to see the word "accredited" retained. Surely the Indians would also wish some qualification of this nature to be in the agreement otherwise the reactor theoretically would be open to itinerant scientists not necessarily accredited by the Government of India or their own government.

(d) We accept your suggestion concerning paragraph three.

(e) As explained above we would prefer to retain paragraphs four, five and six as now worded.

(f) On reflection it is apparent that training may be offered to India under various schemes including the two you mention. We have revised text so that we do not specify how training will be sponsored. We agree to the deletion of the word "operating". "Practicable" should be retained since limitation of some facilities in Canada necessitates a qualification of this nature.

(g) We accept your suggestion concerning paragraph eight.

(h) With regard to paragraph nine unless there is some new development during Grey's visit to Bombay the wording of our draft should be retained. We consider main agreement should make it clear that general supervisory authority will rest with Canadian engineers and contractors. The relations between Shawinigan Engineering and whatever Canadian contractor may eventually be selected will be set out in the contract and it may or may not be possible to reflect in the annex the division of responsibility between the Canadian engineers and Canadian contractor. You will note from the final text which is quoted below that paragraph nine is a slightly revised version of the one which was included in the draft sent to you with our despatch E-970.

2. The final draft text including some of your suggestions is quoted below. It should be transmitted to the Indian Government as soon as possible. As explained in our telegram E-10 of January 6† we are anxious to have the preliminary reaction of the Indian Government before Grey undertakes his negotiations in Bombay. Although we should not convey this to the Indians we also propose to inform the U.S. and U.K. governments of the substance of our proposal as soon as we have a favourable reaction from India.

3. In any discussions regarding the section concerning the provision of fuel you should emphasize the great efforts which we have made to develop a compromise which would not in any way have the effect of delaying the implementation of this project.

4. The annex to this main agreement will be based on the original exchange of letters between Plumtre and Bhabha although there will be some revision of details during Grey's visit. The annex should be a slightly more flexible document than the intergovernmental agreement since it may be necessary to amend it from time to time. We have taken note of this by adding a sentence to paragraph 6 of the agreement.

5. The question which you raised concerning exemption from taxation might be covered in the annex. The annex should also make some reference to customs facilitation for equipment from Canada.

6. There are questions of form concerning this agreement which will have to be settled before signature, as for example the clauses relating to its coming into effect, etc.

7. You may wish to sound out the Indian views about the desirability of registering this agreement with the United Nations. We assume you are also giving consideration to the preparation of a press release which would ensure an effective public presentation of this project.

8. The question of an adviser for Grey will be dealt with in a separate telegram.†

9. Final draft text of the Intergovernmental Agreement for the Canada-India Reactor Project. Text begins.

(1) As part of its contribution under the Colombo Plan, the Government of Canada will provide an NRX atomic research and experimental reactor to the Government of India.

(2) This reactor will be used by Indian scientists and accredited foreign scientists including those from other Colombo Plan countries in South and Southeast Asia.

(3) The Government of India will ensure that the reactor and any products resulting from its use will be employed for peaceful purposes only.

(4) The contribution of the Government of Canada will comprise the external costs of designing the reactor, the reactor hall, all auxiliary service within the reactor hall and the specific auxiliary equipment indicated in the annex. It will also include the external costs of manufacturing or procuring the reactor and the auxiliary equipment indicated in the annex, together with the external costs of the supervision of their installation and erection.

(5) The Government of India will provide the site for the reactor. It will also be responsible for the foundation work, for constructing the buildings and for supplying specific auxiliary equipment set out in the annex. The Government of India will provide all mechanical, electrical, administrative and other services and facilities required at the site. In accordance with normal Colombo Plan practice the Government of India will be responsible for providing local labour and materials as required. The Government of India, following past practices in relation to Colombo Plan shipments from Canada, will also be responsible for freight charges and insurance or replacement in the event of loss of any equipment and materials destined for this project.

(6) The distribution of the various costs between Canada and India will be in accordance with the understanding reached between representatives of the two governments, which is recorded in the annex. It is recognized that as this project progresses it may be necessary by agreement between the two governments to amend the annex on certain points of detail.

(7) The Government of Canada will provide such training as is practicable for the staff of this reactor.

(8) The Government of Canada will provide at the site during the construction period and for the initial period of operation such technical experts as may be required from Canada.

(9) In order to ensure that all phases of the project are effectively coordinated, the Canadian engineering and supervisory authorities responsible for designing and installing the reactor will also supervise all other aspects of the work and will be responsible for the inspection and acceptance of all work undertaken at the site including the erection of the reactor and the construction of the reactor hall. All related auxiliary equipment, and its installation, shall be subject also to inspection and acceptance by these authorities.

(10) It is the intention of both governments that the fuel elements will be secured from Canada. Arrangements for the provision of the fuel elements to India from Canada will be agreed upon by the two governments before the reactor is ready to operate; if an international agency acceptable to both governments has come into being or is in prospect at that time, the terms of such agreement will be in keeping with the principles of that agency. Text ends.

CANADA-INDIA REACTOR PROJECT

We note from your telegram under reference that the High Commissioner in New Delhi will be transmitting to the Indian Government the draft text of the agreement on the Canada-India reactor. We are impressed by the close relation between the Indian agreement and the problem of controls in the Agency. In order that the High Commissioner should have the fullest possible understanding of the relationship we suggest, we are venturing to offer our views of this relationship with the idea that they might in some form be sent to New Delhi.

2. Further study of Bhabha's aide mémoire of November 5 in relation to your own ideas of control, as set out in letter DL41 of January 11,³⁰ lead us to believe that the Canadian and Indian philosophies on control are similar in essentials. Could it then be suggested to the Indian authorities that there was this meeting of minds and that their acceptance of paragraph 10 of your draft text could be made in the light of the interest which the Indian and Canadian Governments share in securing the maximum practicable controls as a means of avoiding the spread of the manufacture of atomic weapons?

3. It would not appear to us to be necessary that anything like the details of Canadian thinking on controls be given to the Indians and there would, of course, be definite objections to doing so at this stage. We would suggest, however, that the Indians should understand that our approach is similar to theirs, and it might be underlined that acceptance of such ideas would involve agreement particularly with the Three Great Powers now in the atomic business, including the Soviet Union.

4. It seems to us to be of great importance that the Indian authorities should regard their own role in relation to the Agency and its control aspects as a contribution to peace and we might wisely err on the side of exaggerating Indian initiative in relation to universal and non-discriminatory controls.

5. Two advantages might flow from such a rapprochement and state of mind:

³⁰ Voir/See Document 423.

(a) that the Indians would be more ready to accept your draft agreement because of the context in which it was set; and

(b) that the Indian delegation at the Washington meeting on February 27 could play an important part in advancing the ideas on controls which we seem to share with them.

6. From what we know at present there may be real difficulties in securing agreement with the Three Great Powers on the kind of controls you have in mind and an active support of this philosophy by the Indians would, it seems to us, be of great advantage. We would underline, however, the importance of having the Indians take such an attitude not so much in support of the Canadian one, as derived from their own original thinking.

7. An incidental but real advantage would be if the conversations which the High Commissioner's office have with Indian authorities produce some evidence of Indian thinking in respect of the Agency and, in particular, the control aspect.

I gave Nehru the draft agreement January 18. He read through it carefully but made no comment except to say that I would understand that on a matter of this kind he would want to consult Bhabha that he would do so immediately and that he would then get in touch with me. Contrary to my expectations the Secretary General apparently had not told him that I had left him copies of the agreement on 16th and that he had already sent copies to Bhabha. I told Nehru this.

2. I spoke along the lines of your telegram and in particular I said that in Section 10 we had made great efforts to develop a compromise which would not in any way have the effect of delaying the implementation of the project.

3. I concluded by saying I was sorry that it had not been possible for a Canadian Cabinet minister to come to Bombay for a ceremony in February in connection with the inauguration of the project. Nehru said that Bhabha had told him that and that his understanding was that the ceremony would not take place until the autumn. He asked me when I thought a Canadian Cabinet minister could be present. I said he could come either on the way to the Colombo Plan meeting in New Zealand or on the way back and that this would presumably be at the beginning or end of October.

5. In reply to your telegram 43 of January 17 I agree it is not necessary for Grey to go to Delhi. I have given McGaughy the instruction in paragraph 2 of your telegram.³¹

Addition of phrase "or be manufactured in India" at the end of first sentence of paragraph 10 would have the effect of allowing India to process fuel from their own uranium if available, from uranium from Canada or possibly from a third source. It would not be our intention to intimate in any way that we are denying the right of India to provide fuel for this reactor from its own sources but we would expect the fuel to be supplied from Canada if India is not in a position to manufacture fuel elements when reactor is ready to operate.

³¹ Notes marginales /Marginal Notes:

Mr. Ritchie: Is Escott taking a bit too much on himself [by] inviting a Canadian Cabinet minister's attendance to Colombo Plan meetings? Should we send a brief memo to Mr. Pearson? [O.G. Stoner]
Mr. Stoner: A short memo to LBP after we have Bhabha's reaction would be appropriate, including reference to possible attendance by one Canadian Cab[inet] min[ister] or another. A.E. R[itchie]

We would be prepared to accept this revision on the understanding that the words "or the uranium for such fuel elements" be inserted after the words "fuel elements" in the first part of sentence 2 of paragraph 10.

2. The revision which we have suggested to sentence 2 should make it clear that agreement between the two governments and the principle of any effective system of control which may be in force would be applicable to either the provision of fuel elements or the supply of uranium to be fabricated into fuel elements in India. We are of course skeptical that India will be in a position in the foreseeable future to carry out their own fabrication of the fuel elements but we appreciate the prestige nature of Bhabha's amendment. In view of his amendment you should also suggest to the Indians that we feel the words "to India from Canada" should be deleted from sentence 2 of paragraph 10. However it is possible that they may object to the deletion of these words since it could be interpreted to mean that India would require Canada's agreement for any arrangements concerning fuel for the reactor regardless of whether the fuel elements or the uranium came from Canada. We have a strong preference for the deletion of the words "to India from Canada" but we would be prepared to reconsider if Bhabha presses strongly for their retention and if he is prepared to accept immediately the remainder of paragraph 10 as now revised.

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

CANADA-INDIA REACTOR PROJECT AND THE CONTROL PROBLEM

I have your letter of January 19th† enclosing a copy of telegram no. 80 of January 17th from our ambassador in Washington in which it is suggested that our High Commissioner in India might initiate discussions with India on the question of the control system for the proposed International Agency.

I consider it would be most unwise to initiate such discussions at this time.³² The language we have used in Section 10 of the Canada-India Reactor Agreement, as it affects the relationship of the agreement to the International Agency, is designed to obtain the agreement of the Government of India to the principle of international control³³ without specifying the nature and scope of that control. It was quite clear from my several discussions with Bhabha that our ideas on this subject are not similar despite the ambassador's impression that such a similarity does, in fact, exist. I have in mind, particularly, the possible control of transactions in natural uranium. Bhabha has expressed the view repeatedly that it will not be possible or practical to subject such transactions to control. If any attempt is made at this time to explore with India the problem of control, this would invariably lead to some discussion of what is intended by the language of Section 10 of the Canada-India Agreement. Such a discussion might very well complicate and even prejudice the successful completion of the negotiations.

I will be glad to enlarge on the opinion I have expressed above if you will phone me.

Yours sincerely,

W.F. BENNETT

CIR PROJECT

Following is the text of letter from Secretary General dated January 31.

"You gave me on January 16 a copy of the final draft of the agreement for the atomic reactor project prepared by the Canadian Government. I sent the copy at once to Dr. Bhabha and invited his comments.

Bhabha has now replied to say that the draft agreement is acceptable to the Department of Atomic Energy subject to the following changes:

(a) Paragraph 2 should be replaced to read "2. The Government of India subject to adequate security clearance will make the experimental facilities of the reactor available to accredited scientists from Colombo Plan countries in South and Southeast Asia and from other countries at its discretion."

(b) The last sentence of paragraph 5 should be changed to read "The Government of India following past practices in relation to Colombo Plan shipments from Canada will arrange for shipment and bear freight charges and cost of insurance of any equipment and materials destined for this project."

(c) The words "reactor hall" in the document will be replaced by "rotunda" wherever they appear.

(d) In paragraph 10 of the draft the words "either manufactured in India or" should be inserted between the words "will be" and "secured" in the second line. Accordingly the first sentence of paragraph 10 will read "It is the intention of both governments that the fuel elements will be either manufactured in India or secured from Canada."

With regard to the proposed substitution of the words "or the uranium for such fuel elements" for "to India from Canada" in the second sentence of paragraph 10 Bhabha comments as follows "The alteration proposed by Mr. Escott Reid is based on a misunderstanding. The uranium for the fuel elements which will be manufactured in India will be provided by ourselves from our own sources. They are not therefore on the same footing as the fuel elements that may be provided from Canada nor can we envisage a provision in the International Atomic Energy Agency which would stop any nation from developing its own fuel elements or attempt to control or check this production unless such checks are applied uniformly to all countries. There is very little chance of such a restriction being accepted by the US, the Soviet Union, or the UK not to mention Canada and the attempt to impose it on some nations and not others will either seriously cripple the Agency or prevent its coming into existence".

CIR PROJECT

Please inform Dr. Bhabha as soon as possible that the following are our comments in connection with the changes to the draft agreement suggested by him as reported in your telegram No. 76.

(a) We would prefer to retain the wording of paragraph 2 which is the same general formula agreed upon by the two Prime Ministers when the Canadian offer was accepted earlier in the year. You should emphasize that we fully appreciate that any use of the facilities at the reactor will be subject to adequate security clearance by the Government of India and that such use must of necessity be at the discretion of the Indian Government. We assume that the word "accredited" conveyed this and you may inform Dr. Bhabha that this is how we interpreted our suggested paragraph 2. On the other hand you should also emphasize that from the beginning we have considered this project in the Colombo Plan context and we hope that the Indian Government will see its way clear to provide such technical assistance to other Colombo Plan countries as may prove practicable. It is our view that the language suggested for paragraph 2 by Dr. Bhabha overemphasizes the security aspects of the NRX reactor (although we fully appreciate that India in practice will exercise, as we do in Canada, strict security arrangements for experimental work carried out on the reactor) and may prove offensive to other Asian countries in the Colombo Plan. Our suggested wording seems to us to provide the Indians with all the safeguards they require without being objectionable to any of the other countries in the area. We are not clear whether the Indian Government follows the same practice as the Canadian Government and acts as its own insurer. If this is the case you should insist that replacement in the event of loss should be retained in paragraph 5. If, on the other hand, the Indian Government proposes to insure this equipment we will accept Dr. Bhabha's revision of the last sentence of paragraph 5 with the following minor change — "the Government of India, following past practices in relation to Colombo Plan shipments from Canada, will arrange for shipment and bear freight charges and will arrange for and assume the cost of insurance on any equipment and materials destined for this project."

(c) We agree with Dr. Bhabha's suggestion to replace the words "reactor hall" with "rotunda".

(d) With respect to paragraph 10 you should inform Dr. Bhabha that the Canadian Government recognizes fully India's right to supply this reactor with fuel produced and manufactured in India. It was not the intention to suggest by our wording that the International Agency might have the effect of stopping any nation from developing its own fuel elements. At the same time you should remind Dr. Bhabha of his earlier understanding with Mr. Bennett that India intended to secure the fuel from Canada unless it was available from its own resources. The following redraft of paragraph 10 in our view recognizes both of these points. "It is the intention of both governments that the fuel elements for the initial fuel charge and for the continuing requirements of the reactor will be supplied from Canada unless India is in a position to provide them from sources within India. Arrangements for the provision of the fuel elements to India from Canada will be agreed upon by the two governments before the reactor is ready to operate; if an International Agency acceptable to both governments has come into being or is in prospect at that time, the terms of such agreement will be in keeping with the principles of that agency."

2. Please tell Dr. Bhabha that we hope the agreement we have now suggested can be accepted by him without further amendments. You may wish to point out that we have shown good faith by getting the engineering and construction phases of this project under way before the formal agreement was signed. It is now obviously in the interests of both governments to conclude this formal agreement as soon as possible.

3. Your suggested annex is now being reviewed in Ottawa and the three documents referred to in paragraph 1 of your telegram No. 81 of February 1st† have just been received from Bennett. We hope to send you our comments on this annex within the next few days.

4. No official decision has yet been taken concerning the desirability of registering this agreement with the United Nations. We appreciate the points you made in favour of registering it. On the other hand registration itself does not give any wide publicity to an agreement since this is a routine procedure. Atomic Energy of Canada see certain difficulties in establishing a precedent at this stage since registration of this agreement would obligate us to register any subsequent agreements for co-operation in the field of atomic energy.

5. We agree that an effective press release should be issued at the time of signature of this agreement. Grey has forwarded a draft press release to Bennett which we assume may form the basis of your discussions with the Indian authorities. We would appreciate clarification on this point.

CIR PROJECT — MAIN AGREEMENT

Following is text of Bhabha's letter of February 14.

"This refers to your letter of February 8, 1956.

Paragraph 1

2. It appears from paragraphs 6 and 8 of your letter that we are both quite agreed on the substance of paragraph 2 of the draft agreement. We would however still like to urge on you the desirability of accepting our draft of this paragraph as given in paragraph 4 of your letter.

3. The word "accredited" does not convey what you say in paragraph 6. In our opinion it conveys that the scientists from a foreign country whom we would consider for admission would have to be sponsored by their governments which would therefore have to take the responsibility for their good behaviour competence etc. This however is a necessary but not a sufficient condition. The country concerned may not be fully aware of the technical requirements required for the job and it would clearly hinder not only our work but the work done by scientists of other Colombo Plan countries if someone not fully suited or equipped were to be admitted to work with the reactor. The final decision in this matter must therefore rest with the Government of India which has the responsibility of seeing that the reactor is operated properly.

4. The reactor is a high powered research tool but at the same time a very delicate one. Despite all safety devices accidents can happen which may put it out of commission for many months and entail a very considerable expenditure on repairs in addition to the danger that may be caused to personnel working with it. As you are aware two such accidents have occurred to the NRX reactor at Chalk River despite all the experience that your own workers have in dealing with it. We cannot therefore be too careful in dealing with the reactor and in the physical security arrangements relating to it. It appears from the first sentence in paragraph 8 of your letter that you agree with our views and we would therefore urge that this circumstance be expressed plainly in the agreement. The phrase "subject to adequate security clearance" was inserted after a discussion with Mr. Grey who fully agreed that as India would be responsible for the operation of the reactor adequate security clearance for scientists admitted to work with the reactor was very necessary and the responsibility for it should be that of the Government of India. I am sure no country conversant with the scientific facts of the situation would take exception to our draft of this clause.

5. We fully appreciate the fact that Canada considered this project in the context of the Colombo Plan and there is every intention on our part to fulfil both in the letter and in the spirit our commitment to make the research facilities of the reactor available to scientists from Colombo Plan countries subject to adequate security clearance. Indeed we propose to admit scientists from neighbouring countries for work with our swimming pool reactor which will be completed in May this year even though there is no commitment on our part with any other country to do so. As far as the Canadian-Indian reactor is concerned we ourselves proposed admitting not only scientists from Colombo Plan countries but from countries farther afield as well. But this last must clearly be at our discretion. The original wording of paragraph 2 is clearly incorrect in that it commits the Government of India to making the facilities of the reactor available to accredited foreign scientists without specifying the countries at all except that the list should include the Colombo Plan countries. You will agree that this formulation is incorrect because it is too wide and does not correspond to what your government or ours has in mind.

6. Due to the reasons given above we would urge on you to consider accepting our draft of paragraph 2 as given in paragraph 4 of your letter.

7. The draft of this paragraph as given by you in paragraph 11 namely "The Government of India following past practices in relation to Colombo Plan shipments from Canada will arrange for shipment and bear freight charges and will arrange for and assume the cost of insurance on any equipment and materials destined for the project." is acceptable to us. We did not wish to include the words "replacement in the event of loss" because the Government of India may not be in a position to replace some of the equipment if it is lost as for example the calandria and would have to depend on Canada to do this. It is clear however that we bear the replacement cost involved in such an accident and this is what the clause as redrafted above now conveys.

Paragraph 10

8. We are also prepared to accept the redraft of this paragraph as given in paragraph 17 of your letter provided the phrase "unless India is in a position to provide" is replaced by the phrase "save to the extent India provides".

9. The object of this alteration is to provide for the contingency that even if India is in a position to provide the uranium fuel elements from sources within India it may nevertheless for various reasons prefer to get some from Canada provided mutually satisfactory terms can be arranged. I am sure your government would also like to consider such a possibility.

10. We therefore propose that paragraph 10 be redrafted as follows "It is the intention of both governments that the full elements for the initial fuel charge and for the continuing requirements of the reactor will be supplied from Canada save to the extent India provides them from sources within India and arrangements for the provision of the fuel elements to India from Canada will be agreed upon by the two governments before the reactor is ready to operate. If an international agency acceptable to both governments has come into being or is in prospect at that time the terms of such agreement will be in keeping with the principles of that agency".

11. If the proposals made above are acceptable to your government the agreement could be signed before my departure for Washington on the 23 of this month."

We have shown February 27 draft to Bhabha in Washington who has suggested following revision of Article II: Text Begins:

Article II

The Government of India will make the facilities of the reactor available to foreign scientists approved by the Government of India, including those from other Colombo Plan countries in South and Southeast Asia.

Text Ends.

2. We have told Bhabha we accept his revision. Will you please make change in text of February 27 draft and pass it to the Indian authorities. Bhabha has asked this be done so that they could "put the agreement into the mill". Bhabha was not in a position to make comments on annex since he did not have his working papers with him. We are asking him however to cable his government that he has reached agreement with us on text of main agreement.

3. Bhabha has informed us that he will be available for signature any time after April 8. He also raised the question of the ceremony at the site and suggested that a Canadian minister might wish to participate in the ceremony after the Colombo Plan meeting next autumn, probably in November. We are not yet in a position to comment on this suggestion but we naturally are hopeful that a Canadian minister will be able to participate in the opening ceremony at the site.

CIR PROJECT

There was one point in the conversation this morning on which I had to take a very firm line though I hope politely. Bhabha is now not satisfied with the final clause of Article XI of the main agreement, that is the clause which provides that "if an international agency acceptable to both governments" in being, or in prospect, the terms of an agreement between Canada and India on the provision of fuel elements will be "in keeping with principles of that agency".

2. Bhabha contended that this formula went further than the corresponding clause in the agreement between India and the United Kingdom which merely provides that if an international agency is established "the parties may by mutual agreement take such steps as they think fit to notify the agency of the existence and terms of this agreement". Similarly, he said the provision went further than that in the agreement between India and the United States on heavy water.

3. Bhabha said that he has always had "misgivings" about this provision in Article XI. These misgivings have now greatly increased as a result of the 12-Power meeting in Washington on the International Atomic Agency. The provisions of inspection and control which are now in the draft agreement are much more distasteful to India than the provisions in the previous draft which had existed when India agreed to Article XI of our draft agreement.

4. He did not want to propose at so late a date a revision of Article XI. What he did propose was that I should be given an "interpretation" by the Indian Government of the final provision of Article XI.

5. It was difficult for me to follow his argument without precise knowledge of what had been going on in Washington, but I gathered that what was worrying him was that the Government of Canada might contend two years from now that the "principles" of the international agency which would be applicable to the terms of an Indo-Canadian agreement on the provision of fuel elements would be the principles which could be deduced from the actions of the Board of Governors in approving or disapproving bilateral agreements between the Board and consuming countries.

6. I said there were four reasons why I was most reluctant to see this question raised now of the interpretation of the final provision of Article XI. In the first place, it had taken us months to reach agreement on this article. As far as I knew the discussions went back at least as far as last October. I had not myself been a party to the drafting of the language of the article, but I assumed that like any such formula it represented an unstable compromise. Secondly, I said that I knew that our people considered that they had gone a very long way to meet Indian wishes when they had accepted the language of Article XI. Thirdly, I hoped very much that we could put this agreement through without getting involved in the differences of opinion which had developed in the Washington conference and which I was afraid had led to a good deal of bad feeling. Finally, I said that if India were now to put forward an "interpretation" of Article XI and to ask for our acceptance of it, I would of course cable this to you immediately, but that I thought it would be unrealistic to assume that we would be able to work out an agreed interpretation in time to sign on Saturday, April 28.

7. I concluded by saying that if, however, India considered it could not conscientiously sign the agreement now without an agreed interpretation, then of course the only course open to India would be to propose an agreed minute. Pillai backed me up on this by saying that it was clear that India could not sign with a mental reservation.

8. Bhabha tried to get me to give my opinion on the meaning of the final provision of the article. I said I was not capable of giving an official interpretation of the provision. Presumably if the constitution of the international agency included a chapter headed "principles" as in the Charter of the United Nations this would define the term "principles" in Article XI. I also said that it did not seem to me that the provision meant that it would be the intention of the Canadian Government to submit an Indo-Canadian agreement to the Board of Governors of the International Agency for their approval. Having gone this far, I then drew back by insisting, with Pillai's support, that nothing I had said could be interpreted as an expression of opinion of the Canadian Government on the meaning of the article.

9. The matter was left by Pillai and Bhabha agreeing that they would discuss further alone and that Pillai would then let me know whether India was prepared to let the matter rest. This Pillai is to do by Monday at the latest.³⁴

³⁴ M. Pillai a par la suite informé M. Reid que l'Inde ne remettait : « the question of the wording or interpretation of Article XI ». 10. I found the whole discussion deeply disturbing as another example of the deep suspicions which India has of either the good sense or the good intentions of the West, and in particular the United States, on atomic energy matters.

New Delhi, April 29, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL

INDO-CANADIAN ATOMIC REACTOR: PROVISION OF FUEL ELEMENTS

You will recall that Article XI of the agreement of April 28, 1956, on the Canada-India Colombo Plan Atomic Energy Project, reads as follows:

"It is the intention of both Governments that the fuel elements for the initial fuel charge and for the continuing requirements of the reactor will be supplied from Canada save to the extent that India provides them from sources within India. Arrangements for the provision of the fuel elements to India from Canada will be agreed upon by the two Governments before the reactor is ready to operate; if an international agency acceptable to both Governments has come into being or is in prospect at that time, the terms of such agreement will be in keeping with the principles of that agency."

2. At the request of the External Affairs Ministry, I called on the Ministry on April 25 to discuss the question of the arrangements for the provision of the fuel elements from Canada to India. My discussions were with Mr. Azim Husain, Joint Secretary of the External Affairs Ministry, and Dr. H.J. Bhabha, Secretary of the Department of Atomic Energy. Mr. Azim Husain was a silent observer on behalf of the External Affairs Ministry.

3. Dr. Bhabha referred to the Aide Mémoire of February 5, 1957,³⁵ which you had given to the Office of the Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa on the subject of the general terms upon which the Canadian Government is prepared to negotiate with other friendly governments for bilateral agreements covering in particular the supply of natural uranium by Canada.

4. Dr. Bhabha drew my attention to the statement in the Aide Mémoire of the intention of the Canadian Government to include in international agreements on the supply of natural uranium "adequate safeguards, similar to those contemplated in Article XII of the Statute (of the International Atomic Energy Agency) against diversion of the uranium supplied and of fissionable products thereof to other than peaceful uses."

5. He said he trusted that this did not apply to the provision of uranium by Canada for the India-Canada Atomic Reactor. In his opinion, the only "safeguard" which was required was the undertaking of the Government of India to ensure that the reactor and any products resulting from its use will be employed for peaceful purposes only. Once again, as in previous discussions, he referred to the agreement which he had made with the United Kingdom authorities which, he said, was an example of the kind of informal arrangement which could be made between Commonwealth countries. He thought that, even if Canada considered that detailed "safeguards" were required in agreements with non-Commonwealth countries, Canada could make an exception for India, and say that it was doing so since India was a Commonwealth country.

6. I suggested that he was putting forward a new sort of "imperial preference", and he agreed.

7. I said to him that I had not lately refreshed my mind by consulting our files on this matter. I found it difficult, however, to reconcile his suggestion with the language of our agreement. Under Article XI of the agreement, Canada and India had undertaken that the terms of an agreement between them on the provision of fuel elements to India from Canada would be in keeping with the principles of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Now he was saying that the only undertaking by the Government of India would be that which India had already made in Article III of the agreement of a year ago. The effect of this would be to give no content to the undertaking in Article XI. This was contrary to the rules governing the interpretation of international agreements.

8. I added that I was unhappy about the proposal which he had made since my impression was that the kind of agreement with India which you are contemplating would include safeguards of the kind set forth in Article XII of the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

9. (Unfortunately, we do not appear to have a copy of the Statute in our files. Dr. Bhabha was good enough, however, to send me a copy the next day.)

10. Dr. Bhabha said that the "safeguards" set forth in Article XII were maxima, not minima. I could not follow him at the time, but on reading the article I assume that, in his opinion, this follows from the provision that the Agency should have the rights and responsibilities listed in the article "to the extent relevant to the project or arrangement".

11. He also contended that the terms "the principles of that Agency" in Article XI of the Indo-Canadian agreement could not be defined until the Board of Governors of the Agency had established a case law.

12. Since at one time he seemed to bridle at any suggestion that India agree to "safeguards", I said that he well knew that the Canadian Government had every confidence in the integrity of the Indian Government. It did not have the same confidence in the integrity of other governments with which it might be negotiating agreements on the provision of uranium. We did not want to set a precedent in our agreement with India which would make it more difficult to insist on safeguards in agreements with other governments.

13. Dr. Bhabha brought up several times in the conversation the Indian contention that it is not equitable that there should be one set of rules applying to one set of nations, and another set of rules applying to nations such as the United States. There should be equality of treatment. For India this was a matter of principle.

14. Dr. Bhabha also referred a number of times in our talk to the fact that India could provide the fuel charges for the reactor from sources within India, and thus avoid the necessity of making an agreement with Canada on the provision of fuel elements. He said that merely to conserve its foreign exchange India might be compelled to set up facilities in India in order to be able to provide itself with its own fuel. In ten years' time India would have at least three atomic power stations of 140,000 kw. capacity. Each of these would require a charge of 250 tons, and the annual consumption of each would be 100 tons. The 300 tons annually consumed by the three stations would cost India about $25 million a year in foreign exchange. While the bill in ten year's time would be about $25 million a year, it would very soon after that go up to something like $75 million a year when the installed capacity of atomic power stations in India would be ten stations of 140,000 kw.

15. I said to Dr. Bhabha that I thought it would be extremely difficult to get agreement on this kind of matter by correspondence. I understood that he said he would be visiting Canada soon. Dr. Bhabha said that he would like to spend a week in Canada during the month beginning September 15, and he would, of course, be visiting Chalk River. He would, therefore, be available for talks on the problem which he raised with me. I assume, therefore, that you will be prepared to discuss the matter with Dr. Bhabha when he goes to Ottawa this autumn.

16. From my general knowledge of international negotiations on a matter of this kind, I suggest that it is essential to avoid if at all possible, a head-on collision on questions of principle. I suggest that you send to Dr. Bhabha before he leaves for Ottawa a draft of the precise agreement which you would like India to sign. There would then be the hope that Dr. Bhabha would find that most of the suggestions which you made were agreeable to him, perhaps with slight modifications. In any event, the differences between the negotiators on the two sides might well be narrowed.

COLOMBO PLAN AID TO MALAYA

The memorandum to Cabinet† recommending that Canada contribute $200,000 toward the cost of Aeromagnetic and Radioactivity survey of Malaya was circulated to Ministers in your absence. When it was discussed briefly at Cabinet two weeks ago, Mr. Harris questioned the propriety of Canada contributing assistance to a dependent territory. The item was therefore deferred until your return. It is now a matter of some urgency that Cabinet consideration be given to this matter as preparations for the survey by a Canadian company are well advanced, and extra costs will be incurred if work cannot begin fairly soon.

2. The purpose of this memorandum is to review various considerations which might be set against Mr. Harris' concern about the propriety of our giving aid to a colony.

3. The Cabinet memorandum states (paragraph 3) "...it is desirable to assist Malaya in carrying out a worthwhile project; Malaya is nearing independence and is anxious to establish links with Western countries, and particularly with other Commonwealth countries". Independence for Malaya has already been publicly promised by the United Kingdom for August, 1957. While it is still legally a colony it has the special status of having been promised independence. Even if we were to take the view that colonies ought not to get assistance under the Colombo Plan but should be looked after by their "mother countries", we might make an exception of Malaya. Further, it is in the field of economic development that the Malayans have already achieved a considerable degree of independence. We have been negotiating with Malayans, not with British officials. Canada has already recognized the approaching independence of Malaya by such actions as your visit to Kuala Lumpur in November, 1955. It will be further emphasized by Mr. Martin's visit next January.

4. We have no reason to believe that other countries in the area would look askance at our furnishing aid to Malaya. Indeed we have reason to believe that it would be welcomed by them. Further, the request offers an opportunity for Canada, not nearly so well-known in Malaya as are Australia and New Zealand, to make her number with this important and strategic territory which within less than ten months will be an independent nation, seeking the support of the West which it is also to our advantage to give.

5. A subsidiary reason for extending assistance is our failure in the eyes of Malaya to accede to its request that we supply an expert to assist in the drafting of the Malayan constitution. If this were to be followed by a failure to consider a request for financial assistance it might have an adverse effect in an area of the world which we are particularly anxious should remain friendly toward the West.

6. The provision of aid to Malaya would not seem to open the way for a host of colonies to request our assistance, partly because there are few dependent territories left in South and South East Asia and partly because Malaya is in a very special position. The provision of assistance to a dependent territory in the Colombo Plan area would also not seem likely to increase the pressure for aid to colonies in other parts of the world anymore than the giving of aid to independent countries in that area exposes us to claims from independent countries elsewhere for assistance from us.³⁶

COLOMBO PLAN — WARSAK — RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

1. On June 13 there was a meeting of the Colombo Group to hear a report from Mr. Hewer, the Canadian Government Engineer (from Defence Construction Ltd.) who is acting as a liaison officer in respect of Warsak and certain other Colombo Plan projects in Pakistan. In Mr. Ritchie's absence, I took charge of the meeting.

³⁶ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

Agreed to in Cabinet today Oct 25 L.B. Pearson]

2. Mr. Hewer reported that there were eight "limiting factors" on the work at the site:

(i) The Pakistanis had persistently failed to supply about 120 men of the foreman type who had been requested as early as five or six months ago.

(ii) Interminable delays were encountered in getting the Pakistanis to provide the local supplies for which they were responsible, under the agreement; indeed substantial quantities of these supplies (e.g. lumber) had had to be moved from Canada.

(iii) Power had not been provided in the quantities agreed, or at the time agreed, and recently there had been an almost complete breakdown.

(iv) The Pakistanis complained about non-cooperation, (e.g. in submission of plans to them) but actually they were non-cooperative themselves and were not shouldering their responsibilities (e.g. Azam, the chief engineer, had only visited the site a couple of times. Hewer had told him what a chief engineer was expected to do but Azam did not change his practices.)

(v) Damage to construction equipment used by Pakistanis was very high and seemed to outrun even what could be expected from relatively incompetent operators; it seemed possible that there was minor sabotage.

(vi) Similarly, pilferage seemed to be unduly high and condoned at high levels on the Pakistani side.

(vii) Housing for Canadian personnel was now adequate (in some cases more than adequate) but had been provided by the Pakistanis only after great delays. Incidentally the Pakistani doctor, that they were providing, was unlikely to stay due to his bad living conditions.

(viii) In some cases the project manager (Morgan of Acres) was not firm enough in making his decisions stick with the contractor (Angus-Robertson); if anything he was too easy rather than too firm with the Pakistanis, despite rumours to the contrary.

3. There was considerable discussion of all these points. In regard to the failure of the Pakistanis to fill foreman-type vacancies, Mr. Hewer said that many of the 100 Canadians in "the colony" had had to turn their hands to types of work that should be done by Pakistanis. The Pakistan authorities had, nevertheless, vigorously objected to having so many Canadians on the site; they had been told that, for every Pakistani who could be supplied for the specified jobs, a Canadian would be released for return to Canada. As for the power failure, new generators had been brought from England and the first would be in operation soon.

4. Mr. Hewer suggested that one of the main reasons behind all the difficulty was that, while top people in Karachi wanted the project to be completed as soon as possible, which had led Canada to press forward and minimize formalities and delays, local labour wanted to spin it out as long as possible.

5. Representatives of External Affairs, including Mr. Cleveland who until recently had been second in command to our High Commissioner in Pakistan, emphasized the general sensitivity of the Pakistanis, and their sense of political isolation at the moment. In regard to Colombo Plan arrangements covering Warsak, it was to be recalled that we had not consulted them (as promised) before appointing the Canadian contractor. (Mr. Howe had chosen Angus-Robertson as the only competent one available.) We had not employed the type of contract they had urged (one with a target date), and we had consulted them rather perfunctorily about the detailed provisions of the contract. In the light of all this, it was more than likely that the Pakistanis considered that the choice of the contractor and the form of the contract were dictated by political interests in Canada. This impression was probably strengthened by reason of the fact that the costs of this project, under the Canadian contractor, appeared likely to be far higher than they would have been if we had agreed to the Pakistani suggestion, at the time Canada undertook to construct the civil works (in addition to supplying machinery and equipment) that the contract should be put out to international tender.

6. I said there were now three possible lines of action. In descending order of unpleasantness they were:

- (a) Canada might withdraw completely;
- (b) we might withdraw partially, allow the project to go to tender, but provide some equipment and materials;
- (c) we might try to patch up the existing arrangements.

I also said that, in view of the history of Warsak, I would not be willing to recommend to Mr. Harris any further increase in the Canadian contribution beyond the present already over-large amount of $36 million. Mr. Finlay Sim, speaking for Trade and Commerce, said he would take a similar position with Mr. Howe.

7. McInnis (External) pointed out that if we followed (a), the project would probably be taken over by Russia; it was conveniently located near the restive border of Afghanistan. It was generally agreed that, subject to Ministerial approval, we should make an attempt to follow course (c) — i.e. to patch up the existing arrangements.

8. At the end of the meeting Mr. Cavell said that he and Defence Construction Ltd. had arranged to meet representatives of Acres, and later Angus-Robertson, during the next two days. It was agreed that our Group should meet again on June 15. It would be necessary to develop a common Canadian view before the Pakistanis (Khaleeli from Karachi and their two senior men from Warsak) arrived in Ottawa next week.

9. On June 14 I outlined the foregoing developments to Mr. Harris, together with a brief sketch of the history of the Warsak Project and how the Canadian contribution had risen, step by step over 2 1/2 years, from $13 million to $36 million. I emphasized that Warsak was technically and economically a very good project but that I was not going to recommend any further increase in the Canadian allocation. I said I would keep him in touch with developments but would appreciate preliminary guidance. Mr. Harris expressed the opinion that, between the lines of action listed in paragraph 6 above, (b) seemed the worst from his point of view. (I remarked that Mr. Pearson would probably consider (a) the worst.) He agreed that officials should pursue line (c) as far as possible.

10. Mr. Sharp told me that, when he had reported to Mr. Howe on the meeting of June 13, Mr. Howe had remarked that, in dealing with people like the Pakistanis, the important thing was to let them feel they were doing everything but in fact to do everything yourself.

11. On June 15, there was another meeting of the Colombo Group. Mr. Johnson, President of Defence Construction Ltd., reported on the situation with particular reference to the discussions that had been held with Acres and Angus-Robertson the previous day. He began by reviewing the difficulties faced by the Contractor and Consulting Engineer on the site, with particular emphasis on the failure of the Pakistanis to supply foremen, etc. — see para 2 above, especially section (a). Unfortunately different members of his staff produced different figures on this point, which in turn apparently differed (as pointed out by Mr. Finlay Sim) from those used by Mr. Hewer three days before; indeed the most recent figures supplied the previous day by the Contractor suggested that many of the vacancies had in fact been filled. Further, in relation to the other main complaint (Pakistani failure to provide local supplies) I was unable to get any specific answer to the question what, in fact, they had supplied.

12. Mr. Johnson then proceeded to make some "recommendations" on behalf of himself, the Supervising Engineer and the Contractor, as follows:

(a) It should be accepted that the Pakistanis were unlikely to supply the 120-odd foreman-type men, and accordingly additional Canadians as required up to this number should be sent over to do the work.

(b) At the same time, a two-year extension of the target date should be accepted. Already, due to the recent non-cooperation of the Pakistanis, a year had been lost, so that the completion date had been automatically extended from 1958 to 1959; and now, on sober reflection, the Contractor considered it virtually certain that a further year would be involved, bringing the target to mid-1960.

(c) The cost to Canada involved in (a) and (b) would approximate $7 million additional. (If the extra Canadians were not sent over, and an attempt were made to worry along under the present exasperating conditions, the target date would have to extend to 1962 and the extra cost would run upwards of $9 million.)

(d) Arrangements should be made with the Pakistanis that the Contractor should be given freedom to buy materials and supplies locally, as required, thus avoiding the interminable delays of Pakistani purchasing procedures. The total amount would be only a quarter of a million dollars (included in (c) above) and the Pakistanis, who feared the impact of Canadian purchasing on their already short supplies of construction material, would get dollars which would ease their exchange position and permit them to replace the supplies used up.

(e) There should be no attempt to renegotiate the covering Agreement with the Pakistanis, which had been signed by Mr. Pearson in Karachi last November. It might not be perfect, but was good enough and should be made to work. (Here I pointed out that at some of the crucial points, e.g. in relation to purchasing of supplies, the Agreement was vague and had become highly contentious; indeed the purchasing practices both of the Pakistanis and of the Canadians seemed to bear little relationship to it. In the interests of amity and cooperation such points should surely be elucidated and agreed upon.)

(b) Finally, expressing a purely personal view, Mr. Johnson stated that neither his Corporation, nor the Consulting Engineer, nor the Contractor were "diplomats". While they were glad to be participating in a constructive programme like the Colombo Plan, basically they simply wanted to get on with their jobs. It seemed desirable that there should be other Government officers, perhaps in Mr. Cavell's organization, who could make improved contacts with the local people.

13. In bringing the meeting to a close, I thanked Mr. Johnson for his review and recommendations, but pointed out that they could scarcely be considered encouraging. The main ones involved substantially more Canadians on the site, a substantially longer period for construction, and substantially more money from the Canadian Treasury. We knew that the Pakistanis were already objecting to the large number of Canadians, whose presence was extremely costly; and that they were already very upset by the loss of a year in the construction time-table; further, I found it difficult to believe that, in the light of the history and present position of this project, Canadian Ministers would be willing to devote more money to it. I noted that, in his report and recommendations, there was no suggestion of any need for remedial action or changed attitudes on the Canadian side. Naturally I did not want to find faults in Canadian engineers or contractors, but it would have helped, in meeting the Pakistanis, if we could have shown some willingness to make adjustments and a disposition to take a bit of whatever blame there might be. No doubt all present would want to think over these points in the few days remaining before the Pakistanis arrived.

WARSAK DISCUSSIONS

There were intensive discussions all last week with Khaleeli. On the whole the atmosphere for these talks was good although the exchanges were frank and marked differences of opinion were brought out. We were able to bring Khaleeli into close contact with senior government officials concerned with Colombo Plan and with the principals of the Canadian consulting engineers and contractor. Khaleeli also had discussions with Mr. Howe who impressed on him the importance which Canadian Government attaches to this project.

2. It is our impression that Khaleeli was honestly searching for solutions to the misunderstandings and differences which have arisen at the site. Since he obviously relied on Azam Khan for his information he may not have been fully aware of the actual position at the site. In our view these talks went a long way towards correcting misapprehensions which exist on both sides and I believe that Canadian Government officials now have a better understanding of Pakistani position.

3. We are repeating in our immediately following telegram† the text of a letter which was given to Khaleeli at the conclusion of our talks and the text of his reply. As you will see certain changes in procedures have been suggested, the most important of which is the creation of a co-ordinating committee at the site over which Azam Khan will preside. For your own information the contractor had some reservations about the creation of this committee but we believe that they are now satisfied that it is a practicable suggestion and that it will lead to improved co-operation. During these meetings we were impressed with the need for giving more prestige and real or apparent authority to Azam Khan. We do not expect this committee to alter the arrangements for the management of the project which are set out in the agreement. On the other hand, we emphasized that the momentum must be restored to the project and that the two governments will have to review the whole position in about nine months time. We were quite frank in pointing out to Khaleeli that it would be extremely grave if new understandings did not produce results.

4. I am also repeating to you the text of a telegram† which we have sent to the Minister in London in which we have suggested the comments which Mr. St. Laurent may wish to make to the Prime Minister of Pakistan in connection with Warsak.³⁷ It would seem desirable for you to call on the Foreign Office immediately and give them a summary of the substance of the exchange with Khaleeli. (You would no doubt agree that it is not desirable to give copies of the text of these letters to the Foreign Office until Khaleeli has had an opportunity to get them back to his people). You might also use your approach to the Foreign Office to point out that Mr. St. Laurent will be speaking to the Prime Minister of Pakistan in London. You might wish to reiterate the serious consequences which would result if the new procedures do not bring about the conditions at the site which are necessary for the successful execution of the project. We attach great importance to the developments over the next nine months and we believe Khaleeli will also be watching the project very carefully during that time.

5. Azam Khan and Manzur Ahmad are staying on for a few more days to discuss specifically the new proposed responsibilities of the chief engineers with regard to local personnel and the handling and safeguarding of stores. We also hope it will prove possible to reach better understandings about housing and an attempt will be made to draw up in as much detail as possible a further list of materials required for the project which will indicate for which items Canada is responsible.

6. We are under no illusions that we have solved the problems at Warsak during the meetings in Ottawa. These can only be solved by active cooperation between Azam Khan and the Canadians at the site. We are hopeful that this can be brought about, partially as a result of these new procedures, but also because Khaleeli will be seeking to encourage this cooperation insofar as he has control over Azam Khan and other factors which are responsibility of Pakistan. We have also urged contractor and consulting engineers to adopt more genuinely cooperative attitude. There are a number of important questions to be followed up which we will be listing in greater detail in a separate letter. We will also be discussing with you the status, responsibility and location of Canadian Government engineer.

COLOMBO PLAN; FURTHER ALLOCATIONS FROM EXISTING FUNDS

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recommended that additional money from existing Colombo Plan appropriations be allotted for telecommunications equipment at the Colombo airport, for the production of additional copies of maps and reports arising from the aerial resources survey of West Pakistan, and for locust control equipment to be sent to Pakistan.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Aug. 23, 1956; Cab. Doc. 173-56†).

10. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It was understood that some consideration was being given to assist India to explore for oil. Such exploration was highly risky venture and no government had been successful in "wildcatting" operations. Furthermore, India had indicated it might nationalize its oil industry if one emerged, and it was questionable whether Canada should provide aid in such circumstances. It was argued strongly, on the other hand, that it would be most unwise to say that Colombo Plan assistance would be refused because the resulting industry would be a nationalized one. Of course, if the project mentioned was not good on its merits that was another matter altogether, and it should not be undertaken.

(b) There would be a good deal of criticism in Canada if government funds were provided for oil exploration in India while most of this kind of work in Canada was financed by U.S. companies. It was much simpler to defend Colombo Plan projects if they consisted of the type of work normally undertaken at public expense in Canada, such as the reactor for India, rather than by ordinary industrial enterprises.

11. The Cabinet approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed,

(a) that, in addition to the originally approved $205,000, $80,000 be allocated from the 1956-57 Colombo Plan vote for equipment for the Colombo airport, and that a contract be concluded with Standard Telephones and Cables Manufacturing Company for an amount not exceeding $285,000 for the provision of the necessary items;

(b) that a further $70,000 from existing Colombo Plan funds be authorized for the production of additional copies of maps and reports as a supplement to the serial resources survey of west Pakistan; and,

(c) that an expenditure of $100,000 from existing Colombo Plan funds be authorized to purchase equipment for Pakistan for use in connection with the locust control project in the Arabian peninsula.

Ottawa, March 22, 1957

My dear Lou [Couillard]:

Frank Pratt, our Chief of Capital Projects, has just shown me some of the correspondence concerning the suggestion that our engineers at Warsak consult with Harvey

Slocombe at the Bhakra-Nangal Project in India with a view to solving the Warsak problems.

That our engineers should have a look at Bhakra-Nangal and what is going on there has long ago been considered to be advantageous and such visits have actually taken place, but I doubt very much if Harvey Slocombe or any other outsider could solve our Warsak problems unless of course we took him on as a consultant so that he could study them, and paid him the very huge fee which he would charge. In the first place India would not agree, and in the second place Harvey Slocombe would probably not agree and there is no doubt but that Pakistan with its present feelings towards India would not only not agree but would take violent exception to any such suggestion.

My own feeling is that very definitely in this matter Pakistan is not India and it is useless to compare the two. All our projects in India have gone and are going extremely well and there is of course a very good reason for this. At the time of partition, India inherited virtually everything which was worth inheriting: the army, the police force, the various engineering bodies, schools, training colleges, etc., with the result that India is away ahead of any other country in South East Asia and, as our Consulting Engineers will tell you, they find for instance that the Madras engineering body is as good as that to be found anywhere.

If one turns to the Atomic Reactor we are building in Bombay, which I saw only a few weeks ago, we have been able there to recruit a type of Indian technician, in considerable numbers, the competence of which group is unheard of in Pakistan. Harvey Slocombe, therefore, at Bhakra-Nangal has been able to recruit all kinds of Indian help which simply does not exist in Pakistan. Poor Pakistan at partition — only about ten years ago — started absolutely from scratch as a new nation, and you do not build up all the services which India has in anything like ten years. The marvel is that Pakistan has done as well as she has seeing that she is short of everything including competent personnel, and as I have said, until saying it again nearly puts me to sleep, it is the weak sisters in South East Asia, of which Pakistan is one, which need our help most.

I say all this in an endeavour to point out that there is no comparison between what happens on a project in India and what happens on a similar project in Pakistan; neither is it, as too many people seem to think, that the Pakistan Government has some diabolical plot afoot to bring about inefficiency at Warsak and in connection with other projects. I would like to ask what sort of chaos would result in Canada were we suddenly, for serious political reasons, to abolish all our Provincial Governments and amalgamate them into two? This Pakistan has been compelled to do within the last two years. The result is that such cooperation as there was between the Central Government and the Provinces has been virtually destroyed. The bringing into being of the West Pakistan Provincial Government, which now contains virtually all the others, has brought about such a volume of problems as would seriously tax the efficiency of a well established country like our own.

Again I repeat that the marvel to me is that Pakistan functions at all, not that she functions inefficiently, but let me say again that this is all the more reason why we should stick with her, help her all we can and not be so upset because she does not function as well as India. We shall go from crisis to crisis in Pakistan simply because these crises exist and will continue to do so until Pakistan becomes a much stronger state than she is now, and this is not going to happen overnight. Surely Canadians are not going to say "this is a difficult project, let's pull out", and surely no one is going to be influenced by the vapourings of inexperienced newspaper men who know nothing of the problems of Warsak and even less of those of Pakistan as a state.

Actually I was very encouraged at Warsak, much has been accomplished, the work is going on, but let no one think that there will not be problems in plenty to solve in the future — there most certainly will. We are engaged at Warsak in the rehabilitation of a people and in helping Pakistan to create a staple tribal belt between itself and Afghanistan and only a few miles away, Russia. Warsak was a good project when we started it and is still a good project. The problems of building it can be licked and are being licked. From the point of view of being really helpful to the people and stability of South East Asia this is by long odds the most important project we have anywhere. We are engaged in helping India to maintain a very considerable stability already attained. On the other hand, we are helping Pakistan to pull itself up over the edge of the cliff of very grave instability. Surely of the two, the latter is the most necessary effort. Grave danger to the peace and prosperity of 85 million Moslems in Pakistan would have very serious repercussions on the whole Moslem world, and God knows, it is inflamed enough already.

No one is more concerned than I am about the problems of Warsak and no one will work any harder than I will to try and solve them and keep them solved, but I do deplore all the talk I hear on my return about Warsak being "a project into which we should never have entered", and Warsak being "a project from which we should pull out", etc., etc.

Yours sincerely,

NIK CAVELL

PAKISTAN'S ATOMIC ENERGY PROGRAMME

We have read with interest your comments on Pakistan's atomic energy programme. Your letter arrived very opportunely, since Dr. Nazir Ahmed arrived in Ottawa for what turned out to be a five day visit beginning on December 3. This visit followed conversations in New York with our Delegation to the Conference on the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency during which Dr. Ahmed expressed an interest in exploring in some detail with the Canadian authorities concerned the ways in which Canada might assist Pakistan's programme.

During his visit here Dr. Ahmed made two trips to the Commercial Products Division of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and a one day visit to Chalk River. On his first day here he spoke to a meeting of officials from various Departments concerned either in Colombo Plan matters or in atomic energy matters, and later during his stay this general discussion was followed up in more detailed talks with officers of Mines and Technical Surveys, National Health and Welfare, the National Research Council and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. On his final afternoon here he reviewed the results of his visit with Ritchie, MacInnes and Kirkwood.

His first and most general concern is to obtain an Atomic Reactor for his programme. His discussions with U.S. officials had revealed that there would be no difficulty in concluding a bilateral agreement with the United States which would cover the provision to Pakistan of a so-called "Swimming Pool" Reactor valued at some $350,000. This relatively primitive instrument is useful for training and of some value for purposes of research and production of radio isotopes. Its value in the latter two fields, however, is limited, and it is of little or no use for work on the testing of materials as a preliminary to the construction and operation of Reactors designed for the production of electric power. Accordingly, Dr. Ahmed would very much like to obtain a somewhat more advanced Reactor, and has particularly in mind one known as the CP-5 produced in the United States. This Reactor is intermediate (intermediate not only in performance but in cost, being worth some two and a half or three million dollars) between the "Swimming Pool" Reactor and the advanced and powerful research Reactor of the NRX type. In brief, it was explained to Dr. Ahmed and to the High Commissioner (who accompanied him in all of his talks in this Department) that it would be contrary to our general Colombo Plan policies to provide capital assistance for a project which would be clearly non Canadian in its general orientation. Hence we would probably not be prepared to contribute towards the purchase of a CP-5 Reactor in the United States, or to provide ancillary equipment for it. In response to his question, we agreed that a request from the Government of Pakistan for assistance in the acquisition and installation of a Canadian NRX Reactor would be considered within the context of our general programme of Colombo Plan assistance for Pakistan but would of course within that context have to compete with other desirable projects for the limited funds available. We referred to Warsak in this connection. We also explained how difficult it would probably be to find qualified Canadian firms capable of taking on such a project along with the other work in the atomic engineering field on which they were already engaged. In view of the cost of the NRX Reactor (in the case of India some $14,000,000 of which about $7,000,000 is expenditure outside India) we do not think it likely that the Pakistan Government will make such a request.

Dr. Ahmed appeared quite satisfied with our answers on these two questions, implying that they were only what he expected. He then went on to speak of other matters where he actually hoped we might be willing to assist him: In the capital field, he had in mind setting up in the near future a so-called "sub-critical" experiment which could be used for training qualified personnel in the fundamentals of Reactor theory and design. For this purpose certain limited quantities of uranium, highly purified graphite and lead would be required, and he hoped that this might perhaps be obtained from Canada. We indicated that we would give sympathetic consideration to a request for appropriate quantities of such materials, of course within the context of our over-all programme of assistance to Pakistan. We also indicated in response to his further questions that we would expect to be able to provide assistance on request in the form of training of technical personnel in the atomic field. In this connection Dr. Ahmed had explored with the Technical Departments concerned the types of training available in Canada, and we believe that arrangements could be made to meet at least a substantial part of his requirements in this area. Unfortunately the field of training in which he is most anxious to obtain assistance, namely training in Reactor Technology is that which it is most difficult for us to provide because of limitations both of space and of security at Chalk River. We did not, of course, indicate the security consideration to Dr. Ahmed, but we did reply that the arrangements for training the Indian scientists to operate the NRX Reactor has been worked out on a special ad hoc basis and might be difficult to duplicate.

Dr. Ahmed was planning to return to Pakistan shortly after his departure from Ottawa. On his return he will discuss the results of his North American trip within Atomic Energy Commission, and the Commission in due course will submit proposals to the Atomic Energy Council for ultimate consideration by the Government of Pakistan for specific forms of assistance which might be requested of the United States and Canada. In due course we may therefore expect to receive through normal Colombo Plan channels, specific requests for assistance along the general lines indicated above. As you will have realized, we will not at the present time, contemplate the provision of more than a limited type of assistance. Dr. Ahmed's plan for the establishment of a "sub-critical" assembly appears to us a useful and desirable first step, one which can probably be carried out even with the limited resources available to him and which will provide valuable training and experience for more advanced stages for the future. The forms of specialized training which might also be provided by Canada would undoubtedly be useful and would not in our judgment involve any over-extension of Pakistan's resources.

We would share your judgment that for political reasons the Government of Pakistan is anxious to proceed as rapidly as possible and in particular to maintain some semblance of parity with India. At the present stage in the Industrial and Technological development of the country such an effort appears to us over ambitious. We have some suspicion that Dr. Ahmed may share this view, although for obvious reasons he is not in a position to say so. It may therefore be that he will personally be quite satisfied to begin with the "Swimming Pool" Reactor and after a few years of experience with it he might then have the nucleus of specialized personnel required for the operation of a more advanced Reactor. He indicated the economic reasons why Pakistan is most anxious to proceed as rapidly as possible to the installation of power producing Reactors, but for a country as little developed as Pakistan it would obviously be a tremendous gamble to take this step based on experience with only one experimental Reactor of the CP-5 type. A much better programme would proceed in three stages rather than two, the first being a period of training with a "sub-critical" assembly and "Swimming Pool" Reactor, the second in a few years time involving work on an advanced research Reactor in Pakistan or elsewhere and only as a third stage the work on an experimental power producing Reactor such as that now being constructed in Canada. If as we suspect Dr. Ahmed himself is realistic enough to see the merits in this more gradual programme, we think it might be useful to give him what assistance we can towards a programme of this type.

REQUEST FROM PAKISTAN FOR CANADIAN WHEAT

I understand that during the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers the Pakistan delegation raised with our delegation the question of the food shortage which is anticipated in Pakistan as a result of a short crop this year. Our High Commissioner in Karachi has also been in touch with the Pakistan Government on this question and we have now received what amounts to an official request from the Minister of Economic Affairs for special Canadian assistance in the form of a gift of wheat.

2. When a preliminary approach was made by the Pakistan Government to our High Commissioner a few weeks ago we consulted officials in the Department of Trade and Commerce, who in turn discussed with Mr. Howe the possibility of Canada providing wheat for Pakistan. Because of the limitation of Colombo Plan funds which are in prospect for Pakistan over the next two years (we expect that almost all of Pakistan's allocation will be required for the Warsak Project and other agreed development projects) Mr. Howe was not enthusiastic about the financing of wheat with Colombo Plan funds. The Pakistan Government has also indicated that they do not wish to divert Colombo Plan funds from vital development projects. On the basis of information available at the time it was also quite uncertain how critical the food shortage was going to be and Mr. Howe did not commit himself to what his reaction might be should you wish to propose that special funds might be voted for famine relief to Pakistan as the Canadian Government did in 1953. Mr. Howe remarked, however, that he was very reluctant to see Canada undertake any arrangements which might be presented in the same light as the United States surplus disposal programmes.

3. We have now had further information of a statistical nature on the anticipated food shortage in Pakistan. I am attaching a copy of telegram number 217† from Karachi which reports on the existing stocks and anticipated crops in Pakistan and on the amount of assistance which other governments (the United States and Australia) have undertaken to provide. However, the seriousness of the situation is far from clear and in this message as in earlier messages it is emphasized that hoarding of wheat throughout the country is partially responsible for the wheat crisis. In paragraph six of telegram 217 there is what amounts to an admission on the part of the Pakistan Government that they will probably not be able to bring the hoarded wheat on to the market until additional stocks have been provided from abroad to restore confidence.

4. We have, on the basis of our earlier discussions with the Department of Trade and Commerce, already indicated to the Pakistan Government that there was not an enthusiastic reaction in Ottawa to the proposal that Canada might provide a special gift of wheat to Pakistan at this time. Since that time however, I believe it has become reasonably certain that there will be substantial hunger and privation in West Pakistan and our High Commissioner has recommended that a sizeable gift from Canada would mitigate this. (He has suggested that this might be on a scale similar to that in 1953 — $10-million).

5. I am consulting you to enquire as to whether you wish to raise with Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris the possibility of asking Parliament for special funds for this purpose. On the basis of discussions with officials in the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance, it is my impression that there are substantial reservations at their level about the provision of a gift from Canada partly because of the hoarding situation, partly because of unwillingness to enter into give-away programmes for wheat and, finally, (on the part of the Department of Finance) because of an unwillingness to see additional financial commitments undertaken at this time.

6. From our point of view the above thinking has considerable validity if the danger of a serious food crisis is being exaggerated; but, if in fact there is a real famine threatening it would be unfortunate if the Canadian Government failed to respond to help another friendly Commonwealth country, especially since others (U.S.A., Australia) are sending gifts. Moreover, the possibility can not be ruled out by any means that the U.S.S.R. will not provide help (whether the danger of a famine is real or simulated), especially since they are purchasing rice surpluses of other countries in the area.³⁸

7. Perhaps before consulting other Ministers you would like us to ask our High Commissioner to approach the Pakistan Minister of Economic Affairs and ask him quite frankly if he considered that a serious famine was in prospect;³⁹ perhaps it might not be indiscreet if Mr. Scott were to point out that the rumours of hoarding were somewhat disturbing to those in Ottawa who were examining the Pakistan request. It would be helpful if we had a frank opinion from the Pakistan Government whether distribution by the army as was undertaken recently in East Pakistan might bring hoarded grain to the market.

8. If you agree with this suggestion you may wish to approve the attached telegram† to Mr. Scott.

PAKISTAN REQUEST FOR A GIFT OF WHEAT FROM CANADA

In our memorandum of August 2† we drew your attention to the fact that Mr. Scott expected to have from the Minister of Economic Affairs a realistic assessment of the situation within a few days. That assessment has now arrived and is contained in Telegram No. 232, of which a copy is attached. Our High Commissioner's own supplementary comments are contained in Telegram No. 236, a copy of which is also attached. In the light of these messages there would seem to be no doubt that the food shortage in Pakistan is serious and that great importance is attached to assistance from Canada. As you will see from Mr. Scott's message, substantial amounts of aid are being provided by the United States, Australia, the U.S.S.R., Communist China and Ceylon. There remains a wheat deficit of about 200,000 tons which Canada is being asked to help in making up.

2. It would seem to me that in view of the gravity of the food shortage in Pakistan and the efforts which they themselves and many other friendly and unfriendly countries abroad are making to meet the situation, it would be most desirable for Canada to help out as well. An offer of assistance from Canada would undoubtedly have substantial value from both a political and humanitarian point of view and would reduce the likelihood that this temporary food crisis will interfere with the progress of Pakistan's economic development. This would seem clearly to be a case in which aid could be provided in the form of wheat without disturbing normal marketings by ourselves or others and without exposing us to the charge that we were resorting to the kinds of surplus disposal practices for which we have criticized the United States.

3. A failure on our part to come to the aid of Pakistan in these circumstances might tend to confirm the reservations which some influential Pakistanis have had about the usefulness of their association with Western countries in the Commonwealth and other organizations — quite apart from the effect which the absence of such wheat shipments would have on the people who are suffering from the scarcity of food.

4. If the Canadian Government decided that it should make an offer now it would appear possible to finance such a gift temporarily out of available Colombo Plan funds which have not yet been committed to specific projects and which are not likely to be tied up until the end of the year. These funds could be replaced by a special appropriation when Parliament next meets. An alternative course would be to use the Governor-General's Warrant since Parliament is not now sitting. I am attaching draft letters† which you might wish to send to the Prime Minister, Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris if you feel that the Government should act on this request for assistance.

5. This question has been discussed with Mr. Sharp in Trade and Commerce and Mr. Plumptre in Finance.

6. Incidentally, the difficulties referred to in these papers are not likely to be lessened by more recent developments in the Sind part of West Pakistan. As you may have seen in a message from our High Commissioner within the past few days, the after-effects of the new floods in Sind may "reach disaster proportions".

PAKISTAN, WHEAT

Following for the Minister.

1. Amjad Ali's message follows: Scarcity of food in both (parts?) of Pakistan is a reality. The harvest of rice and wheat has been poor and much below normal expectation. The short fall in production in West Pakistan is due to late rains which are generally expected in January/February but this year came in March accompanied by hail storms and strong winds. The procurement drive by provincial governments has been a failure in as much as against 600,000 to 700,000 tons hoped to procure, they were able to purchase about 170,000 tons. This failure in procurement efforts clearly establishes non availability of requisite stock in the country. This is further confirmed by high prices of food grains prevailing in the market. If the Central Government enters the market at this stage this may result in an increase in prices of food grains to a level totally beyond the reach of the common man. Moreover, procurement is possible only in earlier stages when food grains are with cultivators. At this stage any action taken, however drastic, by the Central Government to purchase in the market would further frighten populous and everyone will keep a little more than his need.

The employment of armed forces would have a bad psychological effect and would accentuate feeling of scarcity in the country.

The only remedy lies in having sufficient visible stock with the government. These stocks can be created not through domestic procurement but by importing from abroad. With large supplies from abroad the element of fear would disappear and the tendency to keep more than needed would also disappear.

2. Mr. Amjad Ali has supplemented this message with a further note which begins "Africa [sic] mentions that we had previously purchased twenty thousand tons of wheat from Australia as you are aware and now we are purchasing another seventy thousand tons making a total of ninety thousand tons from Australia.

This, I hope, would remove all doubt from the mind of Mr. Pearson of our actual shortage because we would not have spent all this foreign exchange if we were not desperately in need of wheat".

3. My summary of the situation and my recommendations follow in a following telegram.

PAKISTAN REQUEST FOR WHEAT

Following for Minister.

1. It is possible that Amjad Ali's brief message may not fully answer question which I was directed to put to him.

The present telegram brings together elements in situation which we have handled in discussion with Prime Minister Amjad Ali with officials and with diplomatic colleagues.

2. Wheat required for all purposes throughout Pakistan is grown within territorial jurisdiction and handled by West Pakistan Provincial Government. Wheat for Karachi federal areas for armed forces for wheat eaters in East Pakistan and for other purposes previously described to you can only be collected in provinces of West Pakistan by provincial governments and then handed over to Central Government for distribution.

3. In West Pakistan there probably exists enough wheat to feed, though probably at a lower than normal level, those Pakistanis solely under food jurisdiction of provincial governments but allows for no reserve or carry over.

The Provincial Government has not collected wheat necessary for federal needs for following reasons

- (a) a shortfall in wheat crops just harvested
- (b) need for provinces to procure wheat for its own deficit areas ie Boluchistan and former NWFP
- (c) a system of procurement which is not wholly effective.

4. Procurement is not wholly effective and hoarding does exist at a loss and is impossible to estimate. Such hoarding probably consists of two or three bags of grain additional to their requirements kept by millions of small farmers throughout provinces for seed purposes and for speculation in view of scarcity. Such hoarded grain would only come out if imports from abroad were assured or if provinces or centres had a reserve.

5. Amjad Ali told me three days ago that procurement by force would never bring out wheat unless there was an assurance of further supplies from abroad. There is obviously a limit to which centre can exert pressure on provinces moreover resentment would be strong since the Punjabi is a different breed from the Bengali. It should be made clear that the job of the army in East Bengal was that of distribution only. The role of the army in West

Pakistan which we are convinced would not be successful would be procurement a radically different process.

6. Whether actual famine faces West Pakistan I do not know and I do not think any one can be positive on this point in a country where crop and harvest statistics are so imperfect (group corrupt) there would be general food scarcity of a degree which would increase undernourishment and diseases which accompany it. The Prime Minister told me two nights ago that without availability of foreign wheat there is a very grave danger of a shortage which will cause severe human hardship.

7. Failing more wheat from abroad in near future famine certainly faces Karachi and other deficit food areas. Supply here is rapidly moving to zero we are told and real extraordinary measures are being adopted to obtain wheat by diverting cargoes meant for other countries. This is to me the strongest evidence of a shortage and inability to procure more wheat when they are forced to dip into their precariously small reserve of foreign exchange to purchase wheat. I learn purchase of an extra forty thousand tons of wheat is being negotiated with Australia at this moment.

8. Central Government has hoped and planned for the past few years to keep a reserve of 500,000 tons of wheat always on hand to meet such emergencies as now exist. Two years ago such a reserve was available but this has been utilized due to margin of harvests in intervening periods. Such a reserve were available procurement would be very much easier and there would be no incentive to hoard.

The Prime Minister stressed the importance of such a reserve in our conversation and this has been emphasized by other Cabinet members and officials.

USA have promised another 190,000 tons and Pakistan Government understands there is a possibility that a further 110,000 tons may be forthcoming bringing USA wheat provided up to 300,000 tons. Gifts food grains have also been forthcoming from Australia, USSR, China and Ceylon. However real wheat deficit now facing Pakistan Government is in order of 200,000 tons.

The attempted analysis has been thoroughly discussed with Australian and UK High Commissioners who would not I consider differ from it and it is consistent with our talks with Americans.

This Mission was slower than those of some countries in recommending help because we were troubled by same sort of doubt as existed in Ottawa. We now believe that foreign imports promised or hoped for will mitigate effects of a possible famine or at least of a probable shortage which would be exceptionally harmful to health of some parts of population. A contribution from Canada would also assist political stability here and in terms of friendship is highly desirable particularly in view of wheat provided by USA and other countries.

WHEAT FOR PAKISTAN

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, mainly because of unfavourable weather conditions, there was a serious wheat shortage in Pakistan and, on political and humanitarian grounds, it was highly desirable to provide some to her as emergency relief. Pakistan had already been offered wheat by several countries, including Russia and the United States. The latter had agreed to provide 300,000 tons. Of course the U.S. had a very large surplus and was anxious to dispose of it wherever possible so this action was not exceptional. However, there was a genuine emergency. Pakistan had taken all the steps it reasonably could to deal with the situation, but help from abroad still appeared to be necessary if severe hardship were to be avoided. He had originally considered a Canadian contribution of 100,000 tons at a cost of $5 million. After discussing the matter with the Prime Minister, he thought that a gift of $1.5 million worth would be appropriate at the present time, to be charged to the Colombo Plan funds but reimbursed subsequently by a special appropriation. The Pakistan authorities might be informed of this immediately and also told that further consideration would be given to providing an additional amount up to an aggregate of $5 million worth, also to be charged against Colombo Plan funds for Pakistan. In any case, the funds resulting from the sale of wheat in Pakistan should be deposited as counterpart funds for use under the Colombo Plan.

6. Mr. Garson, as Acting Minister of Finance, said Mr. Harris had stated over the telephone that a contribution of $1 million seemed more appropriate. In any event, the two departments concerned should work out the detailed arrangements.

7. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The Pakistan government had made a strenuous effort to establish the country on a sound financial basis but the problems they were encountering were almost insuperable. There was some hoarding of grain but this was inevitable. However, once reasonably adequate supplies were in sight, wheat held on farms would come onto the market.

(b) In considering the size of Canada's contribution, account should be taken of what other countries were doing and of the position of those nations who normally marketed some wheat in Pakistan. Australia, for example, was a steady supplier as a rule. However, she had no surplus at the present time and a Canadian contribution would not affect her export position.

8. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Pakistan's wheat shortage and agreed,

(a) that, in principle, a contribution of wheat not to exceed $1.5 million in value be made to Pakistan; the precise amount and the details of the transaction to be settled by the Departments of Finance and External Affairs in consultation;⁴⁰

(b) that the cost of this contribution be charged in the first instance to the Colombo Plan fund but that a special appropriation be requested at the next session of Parliament to reimburse the fund for this disbursement;

(c) that arrangements be made for the proceeds for the sale of this wheat in Pakistan to be treated as counterpart funds under the Colombo Plan; and,

(d) that further consideration be given later, if it appeared to be necessary, to providing an additional contribution of up to $3.5 million in value as a contribution under the Colombo Plan.

COLOMBO PLAN; ASSISTANCE TO SINGAPORE POLYTECHNIC SCHOOL

21. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recommended that a cash grant of $50,000 be provided from the 1956-57 Colombo Plan vote to assist in equipping a new Singapore Polytechnic School.

The government of Singapore had made available some $2.5 million for construction of the school and was seeking outside assistance for equipment and staff. Cost of equipment for the school workshops was estimated at $810,000. The government of New Zealand was prepared to provide $55,000 for this purpose in the form of a cash grant, as well as some teachers. The Australian government was also prepared to assist but the amount and the nature of the assistance was not yet known.

It was considered that a Canadian contribution could be put to good use.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Nov. 28, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 234-56†)

22. The Minister of Finance pointed out that, up to the present, no cash grants had been made under the plan. The money would be spent by the government of Singapore and, no doubt, most of the goods would be purchased locally. He had no firm objections in this case, if it was considered desirable and the only method suitable, but would not like the action to set a pattern.

23. During the discussion the following points were made:

(a) There were special reasons for this as it was a co-operative action with other Commonwealth states. In Singapore, the Chinese were now taking over much more responsibility and were being tougher towards the communists. This grant would be an encouragement to them.

(b) There seemed to be evidence that the communist government of Red China was becoming more independent of the U.S.S.R. and, in connection with eastern European troubles, was showing sympathy with the Yugoslav attitude. Although it had publicly supported Moscow, this was in not too enthusiastic terms, and observations had been made in support of Yugoslavia and Poland and even of Hungary. A loosening of the ties in the communist empire seemed to be going on and the Chinese appeared to be trying to keep a foot on both sides. It was significant that in the U.N., recently, the Poles for the first time did not vote with the Russians. The Chinese government appeared to have done a very good job in building up the country's economy and morale. It seemed that, although China would maintain a communist government, this would not be under the direction of Russia. It should be noted also that, on the motion at the U.N. not to discuss admission of China, there were twice as many votes against as last year.

24. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed,

(a) that a cash contribution, from the 1956-57 vote for the Colombo Plan, be given to the government at Singapore for assistance to the Singapore Polytechnic;

(b) that the contribution be subject to the condition that the funds would be spent on equipment for a section of the school which would be identified with Canada, and that the equipment would be purchased in Canada to the extent that it was available and competitive in price and,

(c) that the leader of the Canadian delegation at the current Colombo Plan meetings in Wellington, New Zealand, be authorized to announce the terms of the assistance at the Wellington meetings or during his visit to Singapore in mid December.

VISITE DU PREMIER MINISTRE À OTTAWA, 21-23 DÉCEMBRE 1956

PREFACE

Looking at the world situation from New Delhi during the last week of November, 1956, there appear to be three urgent objectives of Western policy. The first is to repair the damage to the North Atlantic Alliance. The second is to repair the damage to the Commonwealth. The third is not only to close the breach between the Afro-Asian world and the West but also to take steps which might in time lead to a common front against Russia and China of the West and the Afro-Asian countries.

2. To the West and to Canada as a member of the West it is essential that all three objectives be attained. It would be neither wise nor prudent to concentrate on the attainment of one to the exclusion of the other two.

3. If, for example, our efforts were to be concentrated on the aim of repairing the North Atlantic Alliance to the exclusion of the other two objectives we might find in less than ten years' time that the Western world had been reduced to a comparatively small territory consisting of a tiny peninsula at the west of the huge Afro-Eurasian land mass, plus North America, Australia, New Zealand and possibly some parts of Central and South America. Indeed in such circumstances North America might not be able to hold even a bridgehead on the continent of Europe.

4. Too close a concentration on repairing the damage to the Commonwealth might result in the adoption of policies which might impede the development of increasingly friendlier relations between India and the United States and this would militate against the attainment of the other two of our three urgent objectives of policy.

5. Similarly, a concentration on the closing of the breach between the Afro-Asian world and the West could result in the United States demanding such sacrifices from its western European allies that the North Atlantic Alliance would be irretrievably weakened.

6. The arguments in a commentary prepared in New Delhi necessarily reflect the atmosphere here. The recommendations in the commentary are directed mainly, therefore, to measures which, in my opinion, are likely to result in a closer union between India and the West and particularly between India and Canada.

7. This commentary is not, of course, the kind of considered careful appreciation which a large Embassy might be able to prepare over a period of many months. The Commentary is based almost entirely on the telegrams and despatches which we have sent from here during the month of November.

8. The commentary is concerned with the meaning of the tragic events of November, 1956, and the opportunities and perils they offer to the Western world. It contains recommendations on how Canada, as a member of the Western world, might help its friends and allies to avert the perils and grasp the opportunities.

ESCOTT REID

CANADA'S POSITION IN INDIA

1. In the years 1943, 1944 and 1945, when the post-war world was beginning to take shape and the international post-war agencies were being created, Canada found itself playing the role of one of the Western Big Three.

2. From Delhi it looks as if the pattern is repeating itself thirteen years later. Once again Canada seems to have been as much pushed by events as by itself to the forefront. Indeed, this time Canada's influence and importance in the Councils of the West may be exceeded only by that of the United States.

3. Mr. Nehru has a very great respect for the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson. He trusts the judgment of both. He looks on both with something close to affection. He considers, to use his highest term of praise, that Canada is "a good country" and the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson "good men".

4. In the nine years since Independence, the strongest link between India and the West has been India's friendship for Great Britain and its respect for the information and the judgment of the Foreign Office and the integrity, the moderation, the sympathy and understanding for India of British Governments whether Conservative or Labour. That has gone now. It will be a long time before confidence is restored.

5. No leader of Western Europe is close to Mr. Nehru. This is true of Mr. Spaak of Belgium and Mr. Martino of Italy, not to mention the Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers of Norway and Sweden. Moreover, Mr. Krishna Menon has poisoned Mr. Nehru's mind against Mr. Hammarskjöld. Mr. Nehru considers that the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand do not belong in the twentieth century.

6. The result is that there are now, so far as I can see, only three Western statesmen in whom Mr. Nehru has real confidence: President Eisenhower, Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson. He might indeed say that these are "the three wise men of the West". His confidence in these three has been immeasurably strengthened by their behaviour during the continuing and mounting crisis of the past four months. When he visits North America in December, he will be talking to the only three Western World statesmen in whom he has real confidence.

7. A great responsibility rests, therefore, on the Indian diplomatic missions in Washington and Ottawa and on the diplomatic missions in New Delhi of the United States and Canada. Unfortunately the Indian Ambassador in Washington has not Mr. Nehru's full confidence and, in any event, he is retiring soon. The Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa is regarded by Mr. Pillai, the Secretary-General of the External Affairs Ministry, with something close to contempt. Mr. Pillai could reflect Mr. Nehru's attitude. The United States Embassy in New Delhi has been without an Ambassador for nine months.

8. Mr. Malcolm MacDonald considers, I think rightly, that there is nothing of importance directly related to the present international crisis which he, as the representative of Great Britain, can now wisely or usefully discuss with Mr. Nehru. The result is that I now find myself in the position in New Delhi where I seem, for the moment, to be the only Western diplomat who is in a position to influence Mr. Nehru's general approach to the crisis.

9. The situation is further complicated because Mr. Pillai, the Secretary-General, who must always be conscious of Mr. Krishna Menon's intrigues against him, says that Mr. Malcolm MacDonald and I are the only two diplomats here to whom he can open his mind and of the two of us, he says he can speak more freely to me.

10. In a period of international crisis such a situation imposes an inappropriate responsibility on the shoulders of the representative of a middle power. The sooner it is ended the better for all concerned. What is required is a long-term, not just a short-term remedy.

11. If Russia should withdraw from Hungary and permit the establishment of independent régimes in Eastern Europe, Mr. Nehru and India will probably consider the Russian aggression against Hungary as a temporary aberration in the same way as we hope they will ultimately come to regard the Anglo-French aggression against Egypt. But if Russia does not act in this way, there is a good chance that wise action by the West over the next four years will result in the Western world and India gradually becoming more and more closely associated in a common effort to restrain the imperialist and expansionist ambitions of Russia and China.

12. The attainment of this objective can be much assisted by a wise and restrained diplomatic campaign by the West. The moderation of the campaign will not mean, however, that it must be conducted solely on the intellectual plane. The first battle of the campaign must be fought on the field of emotion; it must seek to win the citadel of Indian opinion by appealing first to the imagination and the conscience. Only when the governing class in India has been roused by emotion will the scales drop from their eyes for a closer look at the brutal truth of Russian rule. Their minds must thus be stirred and strengthened for the arduous task of intellectual adjustment which will have to precede full alignment with the West. The Western campaign will possibly be a four year struggle, and the Western World should man its outposts in Delhi accordingly.

13. The United States should, for example appoint as Ambassador to India a first rate man who is prepared to stay here for four or five years; who will not hope for early or easy victories; who will neither expect nor want publicity; and who is the kind of American most likely to get on with Mr. Nehru.

14. The United States must not treat its representation in Delhi during the second four years of the Eisenhower Administration as it has treated it during the first four years, when a Chargé has been in command more than half the time.

15. This outpost of the West in New Delhi should be manned for a long campaign. Perhaps it won't take four years to win India to our side against Russia and Chinese expansionist imperialism. It depends on the degree of wisdom, strength and patience — and silence — that the West is able to display in its relations with India even though

Mr. Nehru and his associates will undoubtedly continue to say and do things which will exasperate us. It also, of course, depends on how far Russia and China play into our hands. But it would be unwise for the West not to plan on a four year campaign in India. It will be a campaign in which we must not allow ourselves to be unduly elated over victories in a single engagement nor unduly depressed over reverses. It will be a campaign in which the direct national interests of Canada will coincide with the general interests of the West.

SECTION II

A FRESH APPRAISAL OF CANADA'S NATIONAL INTERESTS IN INDO-CANADIAN RELATIONS

16. The forthcoming visit of Mr. Nehru and Mr. Pillai to Canada makes desirable a searching re-examination of the nature and extent of Canada's direct, immediate and selfish national interests in India. Such a re-examination could provide the basis for a Canadian foreign policy and diplomacy on matters relating to India which would be best calculated to serve the interests of the Canadian people during the next decade of international crisis.

17. India is the world's most populous democracy, the best administered country of any size in Asia, and the most economically progressive state in uncommitted Afro-Asia. Although India is bedevilled by strong divisive forces, the general belief of Indians that economic conditions are improving and are likely to continue to improve, strengthens the forces of Indian national unity against these disruptive influences.

18. Mr. Nehru, himself, is also a great prop to the forces of national unity. He may well remain Prime Minister for another seven to ten years. For the people of India he is a George Washington, a Lincoln and an Eisenhower rolled into one: Washington because he was the leader of the revolutionary struggle for independence, Lincoln because he has the moral appeal of a tormented and sensitive mind; Eisenhower because he is the father of his people.

19. India is already an important industrial power. In another ten or fifteen years its steel production will probably be about twenty million tons a year. This will be much the cheapest steel in the world. It will provide a solid basis for a massive industrial development in India.

20. China and India are the only two possible leaders of the Afro-Asian group of nations. As goes India, so goes virtually all the rest of the non-Communist Afro-Asian group.

21. India belongs to the alliance potential of the West because of its history, its traditions and its interests. India is large enough, strong enough, united enough, and has sufficiently good leadership to be a subject of foreign policy not just an object, as are most of the countries of the Middle East and South and South-East Asia.

22. From this it follows that, for the West, India is the key to the whole of non-Communist Asia between Turkey and Japan. This means that the West will be pursuing its own interests if, over the next four years or so, it devotes to wooing India more resources of thought and of money than to all the rest of non-Communist Asia combined. This will not be a crusade for some quixotic goal, but a shrewd campaign based on hard facts.

23. The stakes for the West are high. If India goes the wrong way, events could be set in train which could result, in ten or fifteen years time, in the West being driven back to a fortress consisting only of a small peninsula at the Western tip of the Afro-Eurasian land mass, North America and possibly Central and South America. This is the goal of Russian and Chinese policy. This is why they devote so much thought and planning to their campaign in India.

24. Canada's direct, immediate and selfish national interests are served by a Canadian foreign policy and diplomacy in relation to India which are best calculated to promote the direct, immediate and selfish national interests of the West — political, economic and strategic.

25. One conclusion to be drawn from this analysis is the necessity of keeping a sense of proportion. We should be on the side of the big battalions if we want the big battalions on our side. In terms of our direct national interests, India, because of itself and of its influence, is more important to us than fifty South Africa's or Portugal's.

26. Moreover, realistic foreign policy is not unlike realistic domestic party politics. Realistic politicians do not disburse much patronage or public works to safe constituencies. They have them in the bag anyway. They disburse none to hopeless constituencies. Durable politicians give most of their favours to doubtful constituencies.

27. Portugal and white South Africa are in a sense safe constituencies for the West. India is a doubtful constituency. Pressure on Portugal to transfer Goa to India, participation in a drive at the United Nations against the evils of apartheid in South Africa, would pay large profits in terms of Canadian national interests.

28. Similar reasoning applies to Canada lending its efforts to those of the United States to persuade, cajole, bribe and bully the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and Portugal to put all their non-self-governing territories in Africa under the trusteeship system of the United Nations, and to give unconditional pledges to grant these territories independence in periods ranging from a few years to twenty years, depending on their state of development. Recent events have speeded up the decline of the power of the United Kingdom and the other colonial powers. They certainly cannot afford any more expensive "dirty wars" in their colonies. Nor can the United States and Canada afford to let them fight hopeless colonial wars. These wars weaken the colonial powers too much and they weaken the West too much in India and in the other uncommitted Afro-Asian countries.

29. The failure of the West to adjust its relations with China to the realities of the existing situation is defensible now only on the assumption that the interests of the West as a whole would be put in greater jeopardy by a violent reaction in the United States than they would be by a continuance of present Western policy. Is this assumption not fast becoming unrealistic? I suggest that a careful weighing of direct selfish interests of the West would result in our finding that the risks of not acting realistically with respect to China sometime in 1957 are probably in the order of magnitude of five times greater than the risks of acting.

30. The application to the Commonwealth of the analysis of direct, immediate national interests discloses that for Canada the Commonwealth is a method of keeping countries such as India as potential allies and of turning potential allies into real allies. This it does by the well-tried methods of exchanging information on international developments, consulting on foreign policy, and co-operating wherever possible in pursuing specific agreed objectives in foreign policy. Hitherto the United Kingdom has used these methods to its own advantage more efficiently than we, or indeed other members of the Commonwealth, have. Has not the time come for Canada to use these methods? Has not the time come for Canada to move away from the concept of a Commonwealth divided between the old and the new members, with all that connotes?

31. I know that the kind of policies set forth above could not wisely be carried out by a Canadian Government unless the Government were able to secure the support of the great bulk of the Canadian people in all sections of Canada. I know also that the task of securing such general support would be arduous. But Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson were able, in 1948, to rally the people of Canada to what Mr. St. Laurent then called a "crusade" for the North Atlantic Treaty. The wholehearted acceptance by the people of Canada of the kind of policies outlined above would constitute no greater revolution in Canadian foreign policy than the acceptance by Canada in 1948 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

SECTION III

THE POSSIBLE LONGER-RUN EFFECTS IN INDIA OF EVENTS IN EGYPT AND HUNGARY

32. Forces have been set in motion in India which, if the West acts with wisdom, could lead first to a decision by Mr. Nehru that Russia is a brutal, dangerous, imperialist power and then, under Mr. Nehru's leadership, to a similar decision by the great mass of Indian opinion. Such a decision could provide the foundation on which might be built in the course of the next few years a union of hearts between the West and India.

33. There is no precise parallel that I can recall in recent Western history to the kind of struggle for their allegiance which is now going on within the minds and hearts of Indians. The closest parallels are perhaps the most obvious, the United States from 1914 to 1917 and from 1939 to Pearl Harbour.

34. In 1914 and 1915 Woodrow Wilson, the great idealist and liberal, the self-appointed voice of the world's conscience, kept reiterating in public that there was no moral difference between the two sides. It was not until the war had gone on for two and a half years that the majority of the people of the United States could be brought to see where their national interests lay.

35. An even closer parallel is the situation in the United States at the time of the collapse of France in June, 1940 when it looked, or so it seemed to those of us who were then in Washington, that the British Isles were about to be occupied. Mr. Roosevelt and his closest associates struggled then against the obvious conclusion that sooner or later the United States would have to embark on war against Germany, and the sooner the better. Slowly, agonizingly slowly to us who were fighting, Mr. Roosevelt's mind first moved to a grudging acceptance of the inevitability of full American belligerency. Then he pushed the United States inch by inch into the war, being careful as he might have said, to "baby" the American people along and never to get out too far in front of them.

36. In this painful period the Western belligerents under the leadership of Mr. Churchill and with their chief spokesman in Washington, first Lord Lothian and then Lord Halifax, were on the whole wise in their dealing with Mr. Roosevelt and the United States. They were impatient with Mr. Roosevelt's failure to comprehend the magnitude of the clear and present danger which the disaster of June, 1940 created for the United States.

37. I remember vividly a long private talk I had with Lord Lothian on one of the worst days of July, 1940. I remember his controlled, but passionate and bitter impatience with the United States. He displayed this in private to carefully selected American politicians, officials and newspapermen but, so far as I can recall, he never displayed it in public.

38. The impatience of the Western belligerents in June and July of 1940 turned to something close to contempt three months later when Mr. Roosevelt in his election campaign promised the "mothers of American boys" that never, never, never, would their boys fight in foreign wars. When Mr. Roosevelt was re-elected there was then the long, painful delay before Lend-Lease was conceived and born.

39. Though the Western Governments were constantly impatient of the United States and sometimes contemptuous, they rightly controlled in public any demonstration of their impatience and their contempt, and they pitched their demands low, adjusting them to what the market would bear. Thus Mr. Churchill in 1941 did not ask for American belligerency, but preached on the text, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job". He knew this would eventually lead to American belligerency.

40. Our argument in 1939 and 1940 was, as I recall it: "The American democracy is wise and sound. We know that it will discover for itself where the national interests of the United States lie. We can only pray it will discover this before it is too late for the United States and for us. But if we try to interfere publicly to speed up this process, we will defeat our own ends."

41. Mr. Nehru, in November and December of 1956, is going through an even worse crisis than that which Mr. Roosevelt went through in June and July of 1940, when he must have known in his heart of hearts that his world had crashed about his ears but he refused to acknowledge it. In November, 1956, Mr. Nehru's world crashed about his ears. In the preceding two months he had suffered shock, pain, anger, because of his belief that Great Britain by its statements and threats and actions which followed Mr. Nasser's nationalization of the Suez Canal, had betrayed its great traditions which are also his traditions. He was encouraged, however, from what seemed at the end of October to be the successful advance of freedom in Poland and Hungary. He must have thought that this demonstrated how right he had been in contending for the past two years that a deep and strong current of liberalization was flowing in Russia; that not only was freedom growing in Russia but that the Russian satellite empire was changing before our eyes into a Soviet Commonwealth of Nations; that this meant that gradually the barriers of fear and hatred between Russia and the West could come down.

42. Then came, early in November, the shock of the barbarous Soviet repression of the Hungarian Revolution. Since then Mr. Nehru has been struggling against recognizing the manifest fact that the Soviet Union has been demonstrated in Hungary to be a treacherous, ruthless, imperialist power, and that the Russia of Mr. Khrushchev and Mr. Bulganin is "the smiler with the knife".

43. Mr. Nehru has been inclined to clutch at any straw in an effort not to recognize this fact. He knows in his heart of hearts that once he does recognize it, he must acknowledge that his world has come crashing down about his ears, and that he must establish Indian foreign policy on a new foundation.

44. In Mr. Nehru's period of torment we in the West must in our own interests display to him the affection, the understanding, the patience — and the firmness in private — which Mr. Churchill and Lord Lothian and Lord Halifax displayed to Mr. Roosevelt, not only in the summer of 1940 but in all the weary months that followed until Pearl Harbour.

45. We must not in the weeks and months ahead try too obviously or too hard to press Mr. Nehru and India. We must give Mr. Nehru time to fight through his own crisis of conscience and we must not expect, though we can pray for, a sudden light on the road to Damascus. Once Mr. Nehru is converted we must give him time to "baby" his people along. We must realize he cannot — he must not — get too far out in advance of his own people.

46. Mr. Roosevelt in 1939 and 1940 and 1941 had ancient grudges and ancient ghosts in the United States to contend against — George III, the famine of the forties in Ireland, the Boer War, the myth that America had been dragged into war in 1917 by the makers of munitions, the picture in the minds of most Americans of England and France as Machiavellian imperialist powers.

47. Mr. Nehru has grudges to contend with in his own heart and in the heart of India which are much more ancient and much more deep-rooted. His path is beset with many more ghosts. His mind is receptive to visual impressions of imperialism and aggression in Egypt. Even if his mind were to receive equally clear visual impressions of imperialism and aggression in Hungary, his mind would do its best to reject those impressions as false to reality.

48. Mr. Nehru subconsciously must know that if he permits his mind to see through a clear eye what is happening in Hungary, his ranging imagination will be stirred by the gallantry of the Hungarian rebels and he will begin to feel not only for them but with them. Being a sensitive man, once he begins to feel for them and with them he will begin to feel a nauseating revulsion against the brutality and treachery of the Russians. From that point on, the barriers which prevent him from bringing his subtle and powerful mind to bear on the far-reaching and distasteful implications for India of what has been happening in Hungary will begin to come down. Once these barriers begin to come down the game in India can be won by the West — if we play our cards well.

49. It is the martyrdom of Hungary which can win India to our side. We must keep the spotlight turned on Hungary. We must discreetly help Mr. Nehru and India to find out for themselves what is really happening there and to see the barbarity of Russia in all its horror. We must help Mr. Nehru and India to see the courage of an old and honourable European nation. First to see their courage, then to mourn over their dead, then to glorify these men whose struggle for national freedom against hopeless odds deserves the tribute of good men everywhere and particularly of the leaders of India who themselves fought for years for national freedom. We must, in company with India, work our way through to the correct answers to the question, "What has happened to what we both had thought was a solidly based trend to liberalization within Russia and in Russia's relations with Eastern Europe and with us?"

50. We must not lecture India, but we should say that we too were fooled about Russia. We must not conduct open propaganda in India. We must in private share with Mr. Nehru our fears, our thoughts, our hopes and our despairs.

51. We have now for the first time since the war a chance to win Mr. Nehru completely to our side. If we win him he can bring along first the educated governing class in India, and then the mass of the people. India's example can be contagious in the rest of non-Communist Asia and Africa. And we need the friendship, the support, the resources and the wisdom of these peoples if we have to face indefinitely, in an age of intercontinental ballistic missiles with nuclear warheads, the implacable hostility of a Russia prepared to subdue by terror all liberal movements wherever the power of its armed forces extends.

52. If we win the full support of the Afro-Asian countries, this would mean that the whole world, apart from China, would be ranged against Russia. This might eventually be sufficient to tip the scales in Moscow between the two groups contending for power there. This might result in the more moderate group being able in the end to defeat the army and the Stalinists and to force the adoption of a policy which might lead to the withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Europe, to the establishment in Eastern Europe of independent governments, and to increased liberalization within the Soviet Union.

53. There is no inexorable destiny about mankind. If we in the West are evil or stupid, the trends which I see in India can be reversed. If we are wise and good, we can create a union of hearts between ourselves and India much earlier than I now dare hope.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

MR. NEHRU'S VISIT

Prime Minister Nehru spent over two hours with Minister on December 23. He was relaxed, forthcoming and showed more than his usual interest in day to day problems. The main topics of discussion are reported under the following headings:

NATO

2. Mr Pearson opened the discussions by referring to the recent NATO ministerial meeting and more specifically to the report of the Committee of Three and the problem raised by the German representative of the impact of the events in Hungary and the danger for the whole alliance of a possible uprising in East Germany. Mr. Nehru showed some interest in the report of the Committee of Three but made no comment of substance.

Commonwealth

3. Mr. Pearson referred to the statement he had made a few days ago to the effect that if fighting had gone on in Egypt the Commonwealth would not have resisted much longer and explained that what he had in mind in making this statement was that the pressures to leave the Commonwealth were great at that time particularly among the Asian members.⁴¹ Mr. Nehru replied that he agreed fully with this interpretation and said that the situation in India was such at that time that the government would have been acclaimed had it given any indication that it was contemplating withdrawing from the Commonwealth. He pointed out that the Pakistanis were quite eager to know what decision the Indians were to take in this respect so as not to be left behind in the event that Delhi would decide to withdraw. (In a broadcast Prime Minister Nehru developed the theme that the idea of the Commonwealth might well be expanded to cover all countries in the world and referred to a "Commonwealth way" of peaceful cooperation and co-existence despite differences.)⁴²

China

4. Mr. Nehru referred to the discussions he had had with President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles on the relations between the United States of America and Communist China.⁴³ He also referred to the conversations he had with Chou En-Lai prior to his departure for North America. Chou En-Lai had complained to him that the Americans had been slow in their reactions to follow up the release of United States prisoners. The President had taken the line that at this stage he could not go any faster in view of the fact that while the public in the United States had pretty well forgotten the miseries of the Second World War their recollections of the Korean War were still vivid and could not yet be discounted. He and the President had agreed that possibly the best course of action would be to try to obtain the release of the remaining U.S.A. citizens now held in China. In turn, the State Department would then lift the embargo on visas for United States newspapermen wishing to visit China. Further contacts between Peking and Washington would be made easier if United States correspondents were given full freedom to report and reported favourably on conditions in China. Mr. Nehru pointed out that there were still some minor difficulties in facilitating the return to the mainland of Chinese in the United States. When pressed by Mr. Pearson he had to admit that those difficulties were "very minor indeed".

5. Mr. Pearson then said that we might be confronted with a pretty serious crisis next year when the question of the admission of Communist China to the United Nations would be raised since more and more member countries seemed to favour the admission of Peking and that this issue was naturally extremely complex in view of the future status of Formosa. Mr. Nehru replied that in his recent talks with Chou En-Lai he had been surprised to find that the Communist leader, contrary to what had happened two years ago, had spent very little time discussing the future of Formosa. In Mr. Nehru's view the problem, as time goes by, is coming closer to what he calls "a natural solution" whereby certain elements in Formosa will show more and more interest, under certain conditions in joining the mainland.

Visit of President Eisenhower to India

6. Mr. Nehru said that he had extended an invitation to the President who told him that he was keen to go to India. No definite dates had been set but reference was made to October or November of next year. Mr. Nehru added that while he had come to visit the President of the United States he wished the President to visit India and see its peoples.

Middle East

7. Most of the discussions centered around the Middle East and here Mr. Nehru set the present problems and difficulties of the region in an historical perspective covering the last fifty years. He developed his well-known theme that the colonial powers particularly the United Kingdom did not have an enviable record in that part of the world and that their policy until the Suez Canal crisis even on petty issues had been erratic. One of the main factors of imbalance in his view was that whatever economic assistance was given mostly through oil royalties fell in the hands of feudal despots who did nothing to increase the well-being of their peoples. The result was that the colonial powers were linked with reactionary elements throughout the Arab world. This greatly facilitated the task of the Soviet Union which in every country became the champion of the "underdog". Of late the situation had been further complicated by the differences which arose mostly over oil concessions between Washington and London. Mr. Nehru said that he knew most of the leaders of the region and did not have a high regard for them. He did, however, make exception for Nasser whom he considered to be honest and eager to accept advice, though somewhat naive. What impressed him most in the whole Arab world was "a lack of vitality". There were no real leaders, no intelligentsia, no organized cadres. Nasser himself did not know where to start in his endeavour to build up a more solid foundation for his régime. He could only rely on the army and his honesty. Oddly enough the only ray of hope for the future seemed to be in Morocco and Tunisia, particularly Tunisia, where the French notwithstanding their many faults had at least created fairly satisfactory conditions for intellectual development among the elite. He had great respect for Bourguiba.

8. Mostly because of the bitterness engendered by recent Anglo-French-Israeli intervention in Egypt Mr. Nehru did not believe that the time was right for a discussion of all outstanding issues. He thought that the questions should be taken in turn and that the settlement of the clearance of the Suez Canal and the future of the canal should be well underway before negotiations leading to a political settlement were undertaken. Mr. Pearson suggested that possibly India could play a very important role in bringing the parties more closely together. Mr. Nehru's reply seemed to be more forthcoming than the attitude he took in Washington as reported in Washington telegram No. 2355 of December 21.† He volunteered the information that he had already instructed Krishna Menon to go to Cairo and discuss the whole problem with President Nasser. He agreed that India might be able to do something in this field without too much fuss and did not demure when Mr. Pearson suggested that India might accept the role of mediator. What he may have had in mind however, at this stage at least, is to use his good offices in a very unobtrusive way. Whether or not he would agree to a more conspicuous role if entrusted to do so by the General Assembly is still unclear.

9. On the future of UNEF Mr. Nehru refused to be drawn out altogether. Mr. Pearson pointed out the seriousness of the situation if for one reason or another the force were to collapse.

Indochina

10. On Vietnam Mr. Nehru was rather lapidary: in his view the parties have reached a permanent state of deadlock.

11. During my conversation with Pillai I left with him a memorandum giving the arguments why in our view the Commission in Cambodia should be wound up at an early date.⁴⁴ The Minister made the same points with Mr. Nehru but did not get any comment. Mr. Nehru was pretty exercised over the situation created in Cambodia by the thousands of refugees from South Vietnam which the Cambodian Government had to feed and house. He had advised the Cambodians to force them back into South Vietnam but was told that if they returned they would be slaughtered.

12. It should not be expected that rapid progress will be made in the winding up of the Commission in Cambodia as a result of the discussion between Mr. Nehru and Mr. Pearson. The Indian Government however is now seized once more and Pillai admitted quite frankly to me that the memorandum left with him would be discussed with Krishna Menon who "was the expert in the matter".

13. Mr. Nehru said that he had taken up with President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles the question of integration of the Pathet Lao into the Laotian Government. He was quite exercised over the fact that the Americans seemed to have signified to the Laotian

See Volume 23, Chapter 4, Part 1, Section C.

Government that they would withdraw all their economic support in the event that important portfolios would be given to the Pathet Lao. Mr. Nehru said that he was quite familiar with this threat since the Laotians had asked India if they could provide them with "something like 28 million dollars" in the event that economic aid from the United States were stopped. Mr. Nehru had told the Americans that what might very well happen were they to take such a drastic step would be that the Laotians would turn to the Chinese, a situation which he was sure Washington would not welcome. He thought that this had made some impression on Mr. Dulles and that they would reconsider the matter. In his view an easy solution would be for the Americans to agree that Prince Souvannavong be appointed Deputy Prime Minister.

14. During his stay in Ottawa Mr. Nehru had a lengthy conversation with the Prime Minister on which we have no report and also spent an hour or so with a few Cabinet Ministers. We will be sending you a report on this the moment it becomes available.⁴⁵

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE IMMIGRATION AGREEMENT WITH INDIA
OF JANUARY 26, 1951⁴⁶

Pursuant to approval by Cabinet on August 9, 1956 of a recommendation by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that discussions be held with the Indian Government with a view to increasing the quota of immigrants admissible to Canada from India, the High Commissioner for Canada in New Delhi conducted negotiations with the Government of India and a figure of 300 persons, double the present quota of 150 persons, was agreed upon. It was also agreed that the quota figure of 300 persons would be equally divided between relatives of residents of Canada (other than close relatives admissible under the Regulations), who would be sponsored by the relatives in Canada, and persons applying for permanent admission from India without sponsorship.

In an effort to counteract claims of discrimination by the Indian Government and by East Indian groups in Canada arising from the inclusion of most Asian and African countries, including India, under Section 20(d) of the Immigration Regulations which is a less favourable category with regards to the admission of relatives than Section 20(c) which applies to all countries of Europe and the Americas, and, in addition, includes Turkey, Lebanon, Israel and Egypt, it was considered desirable to change the form of the Agreement to show that the same classes of relatives were admissible to Canada under the Agreement as if India were included under Section 20(c). The fact is even wider classes are eligible for admission under the Agreement but they are limited by a quota, whereas the countries affected by 20(c) have no quota limitation. The effort to eliminate appearances of discrimination against India has necessitated the amendment of the 1951 Agreement by the revocation of the four operative paragraphs (Annex A) and their replacement with six paragraphs (Annex B). However, the only substantive changes in the amending Agreement are the doubling of the quota and the designation of one-half the quota for sponsored cases and one-half for unsponsored cases.

The undersigned has the honour to recommend, therefore, with the concurrence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, that approval be given for amending the Immigration Agreement with India of January 26, 1951 as outlined above and that the High Commissioner for Canada to India, Mr. Escott Reid, be authorized to sign an Exchange of Notes on behalf of the Government of Canada with the Government of India to this effect.⁴⁷

OPERATIVE PARAGRAPHS OF IMMIGRATION AGREEMENT WITH INDIA
OF JANUARY 26, 1951

(1) In the twelve month period commencing on the first day of January, 1951, and in each succeeding twelve month period thereafter, the admission to Canada for permanent residence of one hundred and fifty citizens of India, including both sexes and all ages, shall be authorized provided the immigrants comply with the provisions of the Canadian Immigration Act.

(2) In addition to the citizens of India whose entry to Canada for permanent residence is authorized in accordance with paragraph (1) above, a citizen of India who can otherwise comply with the provisions of the Canadian Immigration Act may be admitted to Canada for permanent residence if he or she is the husband, wife or unmarried child under twenty-one years of age of any Canadian citizen legally admitted to and resident in Canada and if the settlement arrangements in Canada are shown to the Canadian authorities to be satisfactory.

(3) The provisions of Canadian Order-in-Council P.C. 2115, dated the 16th day of September, 1930, as amended by Order-in-Council P.C. 6229 of the 28th day of December, 1950, shall not apply to citizens of India.

(4) The admission to Canada as non-immigrants of citizens of India shall not be affected by the preceding paragraphs.

YOUR INTERVIEW IN OTTAWA ON JUNE 14 WITH THE PRIME MINISTER OF NEW ZEALAND

You will recall that no one from the Department was present at the meeting held in your office on Wednesday, June 14, with Mr. Holland. Mr. A.D. McIntosh, Secretary of the

New Zealand Department of External Affairs, who was present at the interview made available to us his own report, a copy of which I attach.⁴⁸

This document is, of course, written from the New Zealand standpoint. During your absence at the NATO Meeting, and the Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, it was given limited circulation within the Department and a number of Divisions have expressed the hope that it might be made available on a "Canadian Eyes Only" basis to certain of our missions abroad.

I should be grateful for your comments as to the accuracy of Mr. McIntosh's report of the interview, and also for your opinion as to whether it would be an appropriate document to circulate to our missions abroad on a "Canadian Eyes Only" basis, particularly to those missions concerned with the problem of the recognition of Communist China.

J. L[ÉGER]

P.S. I should add that the document was circulated within the Department minus the first page.

June 14, 1956

The Prime Minister, accompanied by the High Commissioner and Mr. McIntosh, called on Mr. Lester Pearson at 3 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon. The discussion began with a description by Mr. Pearson of the pipeline debate. The pipeline was designed to convey from Alberta to the Eastern provinces, and to the United States, some six hundred million cubic feet of gas per day. Canada was beginning to suffer from a shortage of electricity because the hydro electric facilities could not keep pace with the demand and the use of natural gas for cooking and heating would ease the load. About two-thirds of the gas would be used in Canada, especially North-Western Ontario, and the other two hundred million cubic feet per day would be sold in the United States in pipelines going down as far south as Chicago and Illinois. Canada was lacking in convenient coal supplies and drew much of its needs from the United States — the natural gas would save coal imports and as a result the coal lobby in Congress has been active and instrumental apparently in holding up the finance necessary for the United States company constructing the pipeline.

The matter had, perhaps, not been handled as tactfully in the House as it might have been, but there were special circumstances contributing to an increasingly difficult situation. First of all, the only company which could undertake the task was an American one which was unable to arrange for the immediate finance because, owing to the failure on the part of some Congressional operation to be concluded in time, it did not have a suitable licence. Unless the work was started before the middle of June it could not be completed in time (presumably before the freeze began) and the company therefore said that they could only make a start if the Canadian Government would put up the initial finances before 6 June. The company undertook to repay the advance within ten months; if they failed to do so, then they would forfeit their interest, which would revert to the Canadian Government. Within the prescribed period the money would be forthcoming from the United States to enable them to repay the Canadian loan.

The Opposition knew the deadline and, politics being what it is, they naturally intended to take full advantage of the fact in order to embarrass the Government by holding up the project. Mr. Howe, being anxious to push along with the job and not hold things up, decided that there was no point in running the risk of needless delay and he bluntly said, in introducing the matter, that it would be pushed through and closure would be applied in order to make this possible. The Opposition immediately seized upon and exploited this blunt tactic. This difficult situation was rendered more so by a faulty ruling on the part of the Speaker. He unwisely allowed a debate on breach of privilege on an editorial which criticised himself. Being naturally irritated by its terms he allowed his judgment to be coloured to the extent of allowing to go on all night a procedural discussion which should have been settled by a ruling without any debate at all. The Cabinet were in despair over this. If Opposition members could take one leading article on a breach of privilege issue, the pipeline debate could be protracted indefinitely. The Speaker himself realised his error overnight and next morning he reversed his ruling, stating that he had made a mistake, and that everything that had occurred since 5 o'clock the previous night was null and void and that the debate proper should proceed as from that time. The Government had taken no steps whatever to influence his decision, but no-one would believe that.

The discussion then shifted to the international situation. Mr. Holland began by referring to the Singapore situation, outlining his discussions with David Marshall, and his impressions as to his personality and outlook, and invited Mr. Pearson to give his views. Mr. Pearson did not dissent from Mr. Holland's doubts as to the appropriateness of the Colonial Office's handling of the Singapore negotiations. They were not so skilled at handling this type of explosive political situation in terms of present day nationalistic development. Their approach tended to follow traditional Colonial Office lines. Mr. Pearson felt that their attitude would have been coloured by the fact that the United Kingdom was being knocked around in various parts of the world in a manner which evoked our strongest sympathy. He considered that Singapore by itself was not an entity sufficiently strong or viable to stand on its own. Its future obviously lay with Malaya, since the Malaysians could, if they wished, develop an alternative outlet at Port Swettenham. Because Malaya was more important to Singapore than Singapore to Malaya, they could greatly reduce the bases of its prosperity.

The discussion then turned to the role of the local Chinese and their influence. Mr. Pearson agreed that Singapore as a base could very well become of little value if the local population were hostile. He agreed with Mr. Holland that this was a factor which any country had to take into account, and especially when such a country, like New Zealand which had troops stationed in Malaya, had a vital interest in the security of the area and had stationed their troops there. He said that the public of any country were tending to look twice at the practice and necessity of placing their forces overseas in peace time. He said this whole question of security of bases was becoming a matter of increasing importance, especially to the Americans. Mr. Pearson said that that morning the Defence Committee of the Cabinet had been considering a new development in connection with defence facilities in the Canadian north. He asked that the matter be kept especially secret since there had not been time to consult the rest of Cabinet. The Americans had put it to the Canadians that they wished for a very considerable strengthening of the air forces stationed on the DEW line.⁵⁰ They had said that they would be very happy if the Canadians could undertake the work and the stationing of the necessary squadrons there themselves, but if for financial reasons Canada did not feel able to do it, then they themselves were quite prepared to undertake the work and move in and carry it out immediately. But this matter of the Americans moving in to a foreign country always tended to stir up the local population and, moreover, the public of Canada would be a little nonplussed by the fact that Canadians were maintaining some 120 planes of the type required in Western Europe and 180 were required for this new project. It would be difficult to explain the retention of the Canadian forces in Europe while the larger American force moved into the northwest Yukon.⁵¹ Moreover, the cost was very high; whereas Canada could afford 129 planes, costing [about $350,000]⁵² each, 180⁵³ was beyond their immediate resources. The essential need in stationing troops in foreign countries was, of course, to ensure that that country was stable and friendly, and that is why the Americans are tending to move nearer home. Reference was made to the Icelandic resolution and Mr. Holland commented that from what he had seen in Okinawa it could be taken as certain that the Americans would not get out of a place on which they had spent so much.

Mr. Pearson then turned to the value of Cyprus as a base. He shared the Prime Minister's doubts as to its usefulness in view of the hostility of the local population, and compared it with Singapore. He said that the Cyprus question was causing great concern among the Americans. Only last week Dulles had raised the matter with him and asked whether he could not do something with the United Kingdom Government to induce them to take a more reasonable line. Mr. Pearson had replied that it was very difficult for one of the Queen's Governments to advise another on a vital matter on which that Government felt so strongly. He said that he had found Sir Anthony Eden irrational and emotional on the issue of Cyprus. In his talks with the Russians, Eden had told them with great emphasis that Britain regarded Cyprus as a vital interest because of its connection with the Middle East and with oil, and that Britain would, if necessary, fight to maintain its position. Eden, in fact, is as emotional on the Cyprus issue as Nehru is on Kashmir. There seemed little possibility of getting him to discuss it dispassionately. He said he had been assured by the British that they expected to break the resistance in a few weeks, but he himself was doubtful whether this would be the case. He agreed with Mr. Holland that there might be some degree of British domestic politics in the handling of the affair. They had been determined to make a stand because they had been pushed around so badly in other places, especially in the Middle East. Mr. Pearson compared the attitude of the United Kingdom at the time of Munich. When they had failed to take a stand on Czechoslovakia there had been an immediate violent public reaction, and the British Government of the day had determined thereupon that they would make a firm stand on the next test issue, which was Poland.

Without, therefore, considering the practicability of their guarantee and the implications, they had, in 1939, had to go to war on the issue of Poland.

Mr. Pearson then referred to his discussions at the last NATO meeting with the Greek Foreign Minister, a very good man who had had to resign in the past few days. The Greek had expressed to him his great and growing concern at the deterioration in their relations with the United Kingdom. This was all the more unfortunate because the Greeks had the greatest respect for the British, to whom they owed so much — their liberation last century and their liberation again after the German invasion. He said that the Greeks would be willing to do anything they could to give the British all the base facilities they required, not only in Cyprus after it became self-governing, but, if necessary, in the Greek mainland itself. They would, if it helped matters, make the base problem one for NATO, if it was not possible to deal with the United Kingdom alone. He said it was unwise for the United Kingdom to maintain the view that the Cyprus question was no direct concern to the Greek people; this was simply not the way the Greeks felt about it. Mr. Holland wondered if the matter would be discussed in any definitive way at the London meeting, and he felt with Mr. Pearson that it was probable that the United Kingdom would not wish to have the matter determined as a result of any Commonwealth discussion unless that discussion resulted in decisions in favour of the United Kingdom attitude. Mr. Holland observed that it did not seem to him much use having such a discussion on a contentious issue like Cyprus if the United Kingdom were not prepared to listen and take heed of what people said if that other opinion was a contrary one. Mr. Pearson commented that the attitude seemed to be that the United Kingdom would listen if people were prepared to agree with them, but not otherwise. Mr. Holland felt that in that event there seemed to be no point in having the matter discussed at all and the conference might as well turn to some other subject.

The Prime Minister then referred to Japan and described briefly his impressions of the talks he had had with Japanese leaders. He emphasised that his interpretation of the Japanese situation was that they were desperately anxious for recognition and friendship. They had particularly stressed their desire to get into the United Nations. Mr. Pearson observed that as a result of the recent negotiations with Japan and Russia this seemed to be a distinct possibility. If the Japanese would make limited arrangements, it looked as if the Russians in turn would not veto their admission. It was true, on the other hand, that the Japanese, through Shigemitsu, the other day had stated they would not have anything to do with an Adenauer formula. Mr. Pearson agreed with the Prime Minister as to the desirability for maintaining a friendly attitude to the Japanese. He said that as far as Canada was concerned, Japan was now Canada's third largest customer and they were doing what they could to strengthen ties between the two countries.

On recognition of Communist China, Mr. Pearson said that the attitude in Canada amongst the people appeared to have changed during the past twelve months. There was not the same interest, and not the same popular feeling in favour of recognition. The Canadian Cabinet had discussed the matter and despite quite strong divisions they had come to the conclusion that for the time being they would do nothing about recognition at all, and certainly nothing until after the end of the year and the American elections. He himself, he said, had been in favour of recognition earlier, but he had no desire to cause serious upset with the Americans, and especially on a matter on which the Canadian public were no longer so vitally concerned. He referred to his recent conversations with President Eisenhower,⁵⁴ who, normally the mildest of men, became as worked up and irrational over China as did Sir Anthony Eden over Cyprus or Nehru over Kashmir. The President used a phrase (normally favoured by Walter Robertson) "Chinese hands dripping with blood", and talked of what a terrible thing it would be if the Chinese were recognised and admitted to the United Nations.

Mr. Pearson referred to Mr. Eisenhower's recent statement on neutralism,⁵⁵ observing that it was a somewhat dangerous thing for the President to think aloud to a press conference. Mr. Eisenhower had been worried about the adverse attitude of Congress to appropriations for foreign aid, and particularly in relation to Yugoslavia. In order to try to get a modification of the Congressional attitude, he had tried to prepare the way for some revision of the mounting dislike for Tito on account of his Russian visit, and he had therefore suggested that neutralism was not necessarily a bad thing. This had resulted in a series of protests to Mr. Dulles from the diplomatic representatives of nations whom the United States had been courting and who had had great difficulty in persuading their own people to take the western line. Mr. Dulles, in order to try to correct the position, at Ames in Iowa over the last weekend, had made a statement in quite the opposite direction and had condemned neutralism as out of keeping with the times, and immoral.

In discussing the broadening of the basis of existing military pacts, Mr. Pearson said that he did not think that NATO was suitable for dealing with economic aid. Mr. Holland referred very briefly to the ideas he had been discussing with Mr. McIntosh on the general subject of economic aid, and a new approach to the problem of countering the new Communist tactics. It was emphasised that these views were only tentative, but New Zealand felt it appeared to be unsound now that the direct threat of military aggression had apparently receded, to maintain pacts like SEATO purely on military lines. Obviously military preparations were not sufficient to combat economic penetration and subversion. Mr. Pearson was fully in accord with this point of view. In the course of his comments he referred to the latest British proposals, which had followed their earlier suggestions for a secret meeting in Washington of the NATO powers plus Australia and New Zealand, to discuss meeting the new Soviet threat, especially in the Middle East. He said that Canada had put in a rather unsympathetic reply but that [a] new proposal had been made and it was possible that this new approach be linked up in some way with SUNFED. We explained that for our part we felt that the Colombo Plan fully extended our resources and we were reluctant to commit ourselves to further economic aid. During the course of a brief recital of the subjects which had to be studied for the Prime Ministers' meeting, Mr. Pearson said that his Prime Minister would probably be in favour of Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meetings being held in Commonwealth capitals other than London.

This is only a partial note. If time permits I shall dictate a further section and revise this draft before I leave Ottawa.⁵⁶

EDEN VISIT

Sir Harold Caccia and Evelyn Shuckburgh discussed Middle Eastern affairs with senior officials of the Department. They seemed gratified with the wide area of agreement which had been reached in their Washington conversations on these matters.⁵⁷ Since they confined themselves largely to an account of these talks, there does not seem much to tell the State Department.

2. Following is a summary of the points made by the United Kingdom officials:

Arab-Israeli Dispute

Reference was made to the means by which teeth could be put into the 1950 Tripartite Declaration to prevent a renewal of hostilities.⁵⁸ This would allow for swift action, if necessary, by the Three Powers concerned. On the question of policing the borders, it was recognized that there were practical difficulties in the way of putting an international force into Palestine. Furthermore, such action would probably be politically unwelcome both to the Arabs and the Israelis. A more feasible proposition seemed to be to increase General Burns' staff of observers, so that the truce supervision organization would be able to act more promptly when incidents occurred.

However, the essential problem was to get the Arab and Israeli Governments into negotiations for a settlement. To this end, it had been decided not to respond to Israel's request for large-scale armament to "balance" the Egyptian purchases from Soviet sources. In the circumstances this amounted to a policy of severe constraint upon Israel in order to induce the Israeli Government to make a settlement. It was realized that there was some danger in this of Israel's deciding to take extreme measures but, on balance, it seemed a better course than permitting an arms race. The great question was the assessment of the intentions of Colonel Nasser. He would have to be watched closely. There would be diplomatic and economic moves to keep him from going on the wrong side. If these failed, and it came to be clear that his ambitions ran counter to Western interests, then policy would have to be revised.

Baghdad Pact

The United Kingdom intended to give strong support to the Pact as an encouragement to its friends in the Middle East but would not for the time being push Jordan to join. The United States was willing to give the Pact all support short of actually joining it. Opinion in Iraq in favour of the Pact was now more general than had been the case earlier, because of the benefits that had accrued to that country from membership.

Saudi Arabia

It was hoped that the Saudi Arabians would not take the Buraimi dispute to the United Nations, since in that event it would be necessary to oppose them adamantly and to make public the evidence of Saudi Arabian malpractices which had subverted the arbitration agreement. It was emphasized that to give in to King Saud over Buraimi would be fatal to the relationship of the United Kingdom with Persian Gulf sheikhdoms which control 30 percent of Middle Eastern oil. Loss of this oil would be crippling to the United Kingdom. There was thought to be no real clash of interests between Aramco and the Iraq petroleum company. The United Kingdom could not under any circumstances resume arbitration but the possibility was mentioned, however, of direct talks with Saudi Arabia.

Competitive Co-Existence

3. Sir Anthony Eden referred to fact that Canada and the Commonwealth seemed to get too little credit for their contribution to the Colombo Plan. He suggested that a Commonwealth report might be prepared along the lines of one put out by the International Bank. Mr. Pearson suggested that we might, as the Russians do, emphasize the contribution of certain projects rather than talk less concretely in terms of money value. He suggested that consideration might be given to a proposal whereby all countries involved in aid and assistance projects should clear their activities with the United Nations. This would be purely a clearing process and would not involve interference. The United Nations would issue a report each year and this might show up the small extent of the Soviet contribution. Sir Anthony Eden thought this might be a good idea but seemed more interested in a Commonwealth approach.

4. Mr. Pearson also wondered whether we might not alter the nature of our assistance to take the form of credits as the U.S.S.R. does. This might appeal to a sensitive underdeveloped country more than straight charity. There were, of course, difficulties involved in giving credits at rates different from those offered to other countries. Sir Leslie Rowan said it would be hard for the United Kingdom to adopt such a policy as these countries came to the London markets for loans. However, he knew the Americans were thinking along these lines and he thought it a very good idea if they and the Canadians could do it. Sir Anthony Eden agreed.

5. Mr. Lloyd made a somewhat unenthusiastic remark about SUNFED but the Minister said he thought we should take a fresh look at this project. We shall be communicating with you in greater detail when we have examined the implications of these proposals.

Middle East

6. Sir Anthony Eden began by saying that the situation did not look good. Mr. Lloyd was going to a Baghdad Pact meeting in about a month's time and en route would have a frank talk with Nasser. It was essential to find out what Nasser's intentions were. On the subject of "policing" the area, he had found considerable confusion among the newspapermen. All that the United Kingdom had in mind was a possible increase of the observer force taken from various members of the United Nations, including, of course, Canada. There was no question of Canada being asked to send forces comparable to those in Korea or Indo-China. At his press conference Sir Anthony had reiterated a number of times that it was a matter for the United Nations and General Burns to advise upon.⁶⁰

7. Quite separate from this question was that of guaranteeing the countries against aggression. This was the Tripartite responsibility of the countries which signed the Declaration in 1950 and this responsibility had been reaffirmed in Washington. Mr. Lloyd said that while it was impossible to have anything in the nature of a police force which would prevent aggression, he was interested in the possibilities of increasing the observer force up to one thousand if necessary. He would like, for example, to put two hundred into a certain place where Nasser had indicated the Egyptians might retire and if this proved a success, similar experiments could be tried elsewhere.

8. The situation along the Jordan frontier was better. Real trouble was to be expected shortly on the Syrian frontier if and when the Israelis start to build their canal. Both

See Eden's press conference as recorded in Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 8, Nos. 2 and 3, February-March 1956, pp. 49-52.

Sir Anthony and Mr. Lloyd expressed grave concern over the consequences of the steps likely to be taken in this area by the Israelis shortly and considered it important to have their positions cleared in advance. He implied that an ultimatum should be given to the Israelis about the consequences to them if they started any shooting. Mr. Pearson suggested that the Syrians should also be cautioned.

9. On the question of arms shipments, Sir Anthony and Mr. Lloyd clearly indicated their hope that the Americans would stand firm on exports to Israel. They had no intention of changing United Kingdom policies on the subject. Their problem was that if they sent anything at all substantial to the Israelis the Arabs would go straight to the Russians. Nasser had told them that the orders he had already placed with the Communists were on a once-and-for-all basis. Nasser said he was well aware of Communist intentions and did not wish to get tied up with them. There was reason to believe that he had been under pressure from the army to get better equipment and had done so to protect his domestic position. However, it was difficult to be certain how far Nasser could be trusted.

10. Mr. Pearson said that in considering these issues he always went back to the basic principle that we could not expect the Israelis to behave peacefully while they were surrounded by neighbours dedicated to their destruction. While Nasser and others had privately indicated that they did not intend to destroy Israel they had not said so publicly. It would be a great thing if they could be induced to do so. Sir Anthony said that Nasser had gone a long way to give such an assurance in private after his Guildhall speech. He commented also that the longer the Israelis waited to accept compromise proposals the more they would have to concede.

11. In conclusion Mr. Lloyd mentioned that the United States and the United Kingdom representatives in New York were examining a 1950 resolution (this is presumably the Uniting for Peace Resolution) which would let it be known in advance what exactly would be considered aggression. This had been Mr. Dulles' idea.

12. In his talk to departmental officials Mr. Lloyd was at pains to deny (a) that there were divergencies between the United Kingdom and the United States (b) that the Baghdad Pact had prompted Soviet intervention in the Middle East. The United Kingdom had been surprised at the effectiveness with which Egyptian propaganda and Saudi Arabian money had kept Jordan out of the Pact. He thought a salutary lesson had been learned. The Americans and British, including senior officials of the large oil companies, if not their subordinates, were now agreed on the importance of preventing a clash between their interests in the Middle East. He fully agreed with the Alsop brothers' statement that Russia was "feeling for the jugular vein" of the United Kingdom in the area. Loss of Middle East oil would be crippling to the United Kingdom and Western Europe and, by implication, the North Atlantic Alliance.

13. (In our telegram No. K-222 of February 7 we commented on the views expressed by Caccia and Shuckburgh, which were, of course, substantially those of Mr. Lloyd. We shall be communicating to you later certain observations with regard to what appears to be the United Kingdom policy of constraint towards Israel.)

India and the Security Council

14. The agreement reached the previous day was confirmed to the effect that to counter a possible Soviet move to make India a permanent member of the Security Council, we should have a counter-proposal for two non-permanent members pending a review of the Charter. We might agree to support India for one of these seats. Mr. Pearson agreed to ask our High Commissioner in New Delhi to raise the question frankly with the Indians and suggest that they should not allow themselves to be led into any proposal at this time for increasing the number of vetoes in the Council. (Action has already been initiated on this point).

15. In his subsequent discussions with officials, Mr. Lloyd said he was aware of the problem which might arise over the Commonwealth seat. He also thought there would be general agreement among the non-permanent members against an increase in the number of veto holders. He concurred in the statement made to him by a South African official that the enlargement of the United Nations might reduce anti-colonial sentiment in the Assembly.

Commonwealth Conference

16. In answer to a question from Mr. Pearson, Sir Anthony Eden indicated that the Gold Coast was not expected to be ready for membership in the June conference of Prime Ministers. He thought it would be useful if the "Old Commonwealth" Prime Ministers had some talks in private about this question during the conference. The United Kingdom believed that the South African Government was now reconciled to the membership of the Gold Coast.

17. Sir Anthony spoke briefly about Singapore where he said they were going to have trouble. Marshall was a very good man but would not last. Marshall himself had indicated that he did not expect to survive long and he thought he would be succeeded by a crypto-communist. In that case, he had said that the British would have to take back the governing of Singapore.

18. Sir Anthony said that the High Commissioner for Pakistan had told him just before he left London that they were very worried about the situation in Kashmir because of the indications of Communist infiltration. He had given Sir Anthony the names of certain ministers who were Communists and had said that the Indians were doing nothing about this. It would probably be necessary to talk about Kashmir in June but "out of school". Mr. St-Laurent said that little progress had been made when the subject was discussed privately at the last meeting.

19. In his speech in the House on February 6 Sir Anthony had mentioned the possibility that the Commonwealth conference might "revolve".⁶¹ In his press conference he returned to this theme saying that he thought there was a good deal to be said for a Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting taking place in other capitals than London. Such a step might bring "a new sense of the world wide nature of this organization to which we all belong". Ottawa had very high claims but there were others to which in due course we might give consideration.

European Unification

20. Mr. Pearson referred to the difficulties of the problem, either one had to stand in the way of a genuine movement towards European unity or to support it and thus encourage the setting up of a high tariff union. Sir Anthony and Mr. Pearson agreed that Euratom was a good idea. Sir Anthony said he did not want anything to develop which would affect O.E.E.C..

21. Sir Anthony expressed grave concern over the statement of the German Finance Minister on the refusal to continue contributions to NATO forces. He said that the United Kingdom might have to consider withdrawing a division. The financial problem was very considerable. They could not go on paying if the Germans provided neither forces nor services. However, there would be no sudden withdrawal.

22. In discussion with officials later Mr. Lloyd spoke of United Kingdom fears of a repetition of the failure of earlier Western European plans for integration. In opposition to the French concept of high tariff protection he preferred to see common markets develop through NATO and the OEEC. With regard to the Euratom proposals the United Kingdom would consider some form of association similar to the European Steel and Coal Community.

United Kingdom-Canada Trade

23. Sir Anthony referred to this in his press conference. "We very much want to increase mutual trade". He pointed out that Canadian exports to the United Kingdom were twice those of the United Kingdom to Canada. The United Kingdom wished the trade to grow but to rectify the imbalance and he made a public plea for the sending of Canadian "private enterprise" missions to the United Kingdom. "We understand that the Canadian market is highly competitive but all the same we want to be in the competition and from time to time we want to do very well in it." Both Sir Anthony and Mr. Lloyd said that the downward economic trend in the United Kingdom last autumn had been to some extent seasonal and that January figures on gold and dollar reserves had been better. There was no cause for depression concerning the United Kingdom balance of payments position since it was due to a tremendous upsurge in confidence and investment.

Indo-China

24. Sir Anthony praised the Canadian role both in the House of Commons and at his press conference. Mr. Lloyd at his meeting with officials thought that Indo-China was not likely to be a trouble spot in 1956. Diem would be victorious in the March elections in South Vietnam. The problem was one of consolidation there as well as in Laos and Cambodia. The United Kingdom Ambassadors thought that both Vietnam and the Vietminh need time to re-group their forces. There was no indication for the present of any likely incursion from the North.

Communist China

25. Mr. Lloyd told departmental officials that he had brought back from Washington the conviction that if United Kingdom took the initiative in pressing for Communist China's admission to the United Nations "there would not be any single issue more damaging to the Anglo-American alliance." Sir Anthony reinforced this view at his press conference. Mr. Lloyd thought therefore that the United Kingdom should refrain from pressure in this election year although he did not exclude representations to Washington regarding the China list.

26. Mr. Lloyd had personal and precise misgivings on the United States stand on the offshore islands where the danger of war was implicit. If Communist China attacked the alternative was clear: either the United States would not fight and withdrawal of the nationalist forces would leave the United States in the same position vis-à-vis Communist China, or the United States would fight and a world war might result. He thought that neither the United States administration nor the American public was entirely sure of what they would themselves do if the Communist Chinese attacked the offshore islands and there lay the danger. "This is a game of bluff which can be continued only for a time."

Bulganin-Khrushchev Visit

27. Sir Anthony stated at his press conference that this invitation still stood and Mr. Lloyd stated to officials that the Americans had been in favour of the United Kingdom attitude of letting it stand. Mr. Lloyd said that both the United States and the United Kingdom thought that talks must go on with the Russians "at whatever time and whatever place" as however intractable the discussions might appear results could suddenly and unexpectedly be achieved. He cited the Austrian Peace Treaty. Mr. Lloyd expressed the personal view that the Indians may have come to believe that the Soviet leaders had gone too far in their statements during their visit in November.

Cyprus

28. Mr. Lloyd in discussion with officials rehearsed the dilemma facing the British: how to give self-determination gradually to the Cypriots without abrogating the treaty rights invoked by Turkey. Strategic considerations were the overriding element. While the United Kingdom had the highest regard for principles the issue was not one of morality. There had recently been an encouraging indication that the ethnarchy was aware of growing dissatisfaction among the Cypriots about the continuing state of tension.

Atomic Energy

29. Discussions with United Kingdom officials have already been reported to you in our telegram No. E-213 of February 6.

U.K. WAIVER UNDER THE U.S.-CANADIAN LOANS

We have been informed in the strictest confidence that Mr. Macmillan, Chancellor of the Exchequer, has told Mr. Harris that the United Kingdom is approaching the U.S. Government to discuss the possibility of a waiver of interest payments due around the end of the year on the post-war loan.⁶² Since the waiver provision in our agreement with the United Kingdom is related to that in the U.S. agreement, Mr. Macmillan has enquired whether Mr. Harris would have any objection to the initiation of such discussions in Washington.

2. Mr. Macmillan apparently has also indicated that in announcing the figures for the sterling area's gold and dollar reserves early in December he might wish to mention the fact that consultations were taking place with the United States and Canada concerning the waiver.

⁶² Voir/See Volume 12, Document 807.

3. In reply to Mr. Macmillan's question Mr. Harris proposes to state simply that he would have no objection to consultation taking place between the U.K. and U.S.. He will not go on to comment formally on the wisdom of including a reference to these consultations in the forthcoming gold and dollar reserve statement.

4. Although it may not be surprising that the United Kingdom is contemplating resort to the waiver, the fact that they may do so (and public knowledge of that fact) may have very serious political as well as financial repercussions — especially if, as seems not unlikely, the United States finds itself unable to agree that the waiver should come into operation.

5. Unfortunately, however, in present circumstances most outsiders, especially those who have been involved with the United Kingdom in recent exchanges over the Middle East, would probably be reluctant to attempt to advise the United Kingdom against the proposed course, particularly as they might not feel very confident about the prospects of their advice being welcomed or accepted.

6. The Department of Finance is considering the possibility of speaking privately on the telephone to Mr. Robertson to find out whether he would consider himself in a position to proffer advice to the Chancellor (or possibly preferably to Mr. Butler) and how he judges such counsel would be received. I have said that I thought it would be wise to talk with Mr. Robertson in these terms. In addition, Mr. Coyne is considering the feasibility of discussing the matter on the telephone with Mr. Cobbold, Governor of the Bank of England, since both of them could legitimately be concerned about the possible effects on exchange rates and neither of them has been involved in the recent unhappiness over the Middle East.

7. It seems all the more regrettable that the United Kingdom should be considering this action at this time — and the issuance of a public announcement about it — when we know that the U.S. Administration might well be prepared to adopt a pretty liberal view about sterling area drawings on the International Monetary Fund to tide them over their present difficulties. Such resort to the Fund would produce much more substantial relief or assistance for the United Kingdom and would have at least as salutary effects on confidence in sterling as would any public statement that the waiver was going to be invoked, with a consequential saving of something less than $180,000,000. It is of course true that even if the waiver were granted they might also be able to make the ordinary automatic drawing on the IMF, but it would not seem very likely that they would be allowed to draw the extra amount which senior U.S. officials have been discussing. On balance it would seem to be to their advantage to get as liberal treatment as possible from the Fund and not to take refuge in the waiver. (It is, of course, conceivable that their talk about a possible waiver is not meant too seriously but is merely part of the bargaining for drawings on the IMF. This seems rather unlikely, however, in view of the plans to make an announcement about the waiver as early as the first week in December.)

8. In view of the implications which this situation can have for U.K. relations with the U.S. — and Canada — you may wish to let the Minister know of these developments.

9. Since this is an extremely delicate matter it would seem desirable to put as little as possible on paper about it. Accordingly I am not having any copies made of this memorandum. You may wish to destroy this memorandum when you have finished with it.

POSSIBLE UK WAIVER UNDER US-CANADIAN LOAN AGREEMENTS

Around 10:00 a.m. on November 29 the Minister spoke with the High Commissioner in London concerning the letter which Mr. Harris had received from Pritchard. Mr. Pearson expressed his concern at the possible consequences of such a request at this time by the UK to the US, particularly if the UK might reasonably expect that this request would in the end be turned down. Those who would receive the request in Washington might not welcome it, especially if it appears that it was being made in the knowledge that it almost inevitably would have to be rejected. Any public reference to the fact that a request of this kind was being made would almost certainly produce disappointment and more bad feeling at a later stage when it became known that the request had been refused.

Mr. Robertson seemed somewhat surprised that the UK was proposing to request a waiver under the two loan agreements since officers at Canada House had understood from the Treasury that there was a good deal of optimism about the prospects of getting over the temporary difficulties, however serious those might be. Certain "windfalls" expected during December might go a considerable distance towards restoring the UK's financial position.

Mr. Pearson told Mr. Robertson that undoubtedly people here would be sympathetic with the UK's problems and would be anxious to be as helpful as possible. He did not think, however, that a request to the U.S. for a waiver which could not be granted was the best way for the UK to secure assistance and cooperation.

At Mr. Pearson's request Mr. Robertson indicated that he would explore the matter discreetly with those concerned in Whitehall.

Following for the Minister from Robertson. I saw Roger Makins briefly this morning and gathered that the US had not been approached in the terms of Pritchard's letter to you. Makins took the point about the construction that could be put upon the Chancellor saying: "We are discussing the matter with the US and Canadian Governments." He said that it was now the Chancellor's intention simply to stand on the statement he had made in the House on November 27 ie "no decision has yet been taken as regards the payments due on December 31/56."

2. I was told yesterday not by the Treasury that the UK Government had already approached the German and Swiss Governments about the possibility of arranging a large dollar loan from them. I do not know whether these continental soundings represent something over and above the exploration of dollar credit possibilities referred to in your paragraph 4 or whether they represent an effort to ascertain the possibility of substantial European participation in a dollar credit that might be arranged or negotiated primarily through New York.

UK LOAN WAIVER AND DRAWINGS ON FUND

Following for Robertson. Garner has passed to us two telegrams received late yesterday on these subjects. One gives text of statement which Chancellor proposes to make on Tuesday. Other contains draft letter to Canada regarding the waiver. In his covering letter to Mr. Harris Garner indicates that amount being sought from fund either in cash or as standby is 886 million dollars. Garner's letter expresses hope that we will support request to the fund and that we will indicate now our readiness to grant waiver if USA does.

2. These messages are probably available to you in London.

3. We have been involved in two meetings today with Mr. Harris and officials of Finance and the Bank about our response.

4. Concerning the Chancellor's proposed statement we have suggested to Garner that the sentence in paragraph 10 about our inability to decide until the USA does should be replaced by "The conditions of the Canadian agreement do not call for a waiver unless the interest payment under the USA agreement is waived. We have informed the Canadian Government that on the assumption a waiver is granted by the USA we are also formally claiming a waiver of interest under the Canadian loan." The third sentence in that paragraph would consequentially be changed to refer only to the American Government.

5. In the draft UK letter we have suggested adding to the second paragraph the words "and provided a waiver is granted by the USA in terms of Article 4(c)".

6. Most of today's discussion has been related, however, not to these alterations but to the substance of our position. Unfortunately we shall not be able to say much to the UK immediately although we may be ready to say at least something in the next day or so. Meantime for your own info the following is about the way things stand.

7. On the waiver it seems clear that if the USA accedes a Canadian waiver follows almost automatically although there is some question about who formally determines that the conditions have been met and grants the release and also about whether parliament should as a formality be consulted in some manner. If the USA rejects the request or delays for some time there will be a question as to whether Canada should nevertheless give a waiver and if so in what manner since such a course is not envisaged in the agreement. Ministers here are expected to agree on a statement which can be used after Macmillan speaks on Tuesday to answer inevitable press queries about such a possibility. The draft which will be put to ministers will probably point out that the UK have only asked for a Canadian waiver in the event that one is received from the USA as contemplated in the agreement. It will probably add that the whole situation will be examined on the Prime Minister's return. Such a statement would not preclude the possibility of a voluntary waiver although this implication would probably not be brought out too sharply.

8. Concerning fund drawings all that is being done at the moment is that we are showing an interest to senior USA Treasury officials, asking them what additional info they may have about the UK situation and intentions, and expressing the hope that there will be an opportunity to exchange views with them before final decisions. We are also rather innocently asking Garner to confirm our assumption that as in the past drawings would be made in USA dollars. The truth of the matter is that after a good deal of discussion there was a general inclination to support the UK application even for the second credit tranche if that was what the UK considered necessary. There was considerable doubt, however, that the UK would be wise to press for the full amount if they were bound to be turned down or if vigorous and prolonged controversy was likely to be provoked since either of these might do much political damage and weaken rather than strengthen confidence in sterling. The firmness of our own initially favourable reaction would no doubt be greater if more were known of the substantial character of the proposed UK internal measures. We would also be in a better position to intercede with the USA if we did not have reservations about the possibility of a high proportion of the drawings being taken in Canadian dollars in the present state of our own economy and balance of payments.

9. There will be further active discussions tomorrow. Any info you may receive will be appreciated. You should not however mention points in paragraphs 7 and 8 above [to] the UK or USA.

UNITED KINGDOM LOAN WAIVER AND FUND DRAWINGS

Following for Robertson. In the light of the interest which we had shown in these matters yesterday Mr. Humphrey telephoned Mr. Harris this morning.

2. Concerning the drawings on the fund Mr. Humphrey was not unsympathetic with the United Kingdom position. He was however worried about the possibility that the granting of the second credit tranche might precipitate a "run on the Fund" unless some "spade work" was carried out beforehand. He was now engaged in doing such "spade work", the nature of which he did not describe to Mr. Harris. He indicated that he had discussed the situation frankly with the United Kingdom and that in all probability they would not press at this time for the second instalment of credit unless he was satisfied that his "spade work" had been successful.

3. Regarding the waiver Mr. Humphrey indicated that he had told the British he was not willing to attempt to stretch the present provision of the waiver in an attempt to meet them. He thought if such liberties were to be taken with this provision very serious trouble might result. He has told the United Kingdom however that he is willing to ask Congress for approval of a revised version of the waiver. Mr. Humphrey apparently did not comment to Mr. Harris on the United Kingdom's intentions to hold in escrow the interest payments due on the United States and Canadian loans this month.

4. Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Harris ended the conversation by agreeing to keep in touch with each other on these matters.

5. We consider that this is not too unsatisfactory a situation.

6. Mr. Harris did not mention his misgivings about the possibility of excessive drawings in Canadian currency.

7. While it would be as well not to refer to the Harris-Humphrey conversation we should naturally be grateful to receive your impression of how United Kingdom ministers and officials with whom you may be in touch are taking the response which they are getting from Washington.

UK LOAN WAIVER AND FUND DRAWINGS

Following for Robertson. At a meeting with Mr. Harris this afternoon it became evident that Mr. Humphrey had been a good deal less forthcoming than we had understood from our third hand reports this morning. In particular Mr. Humphrey himself did not undertake to carry out the "spade work" necessary to discourage others from joining in a run on the Fund. Moreover, Humphrey did not receive any undertaking from the UK that if such "spade work" were unsuccessful the UK would cease pressing for the second credit tranche.

2. Another point of interest to you is that Garner has now replied to our query of last evening and has indicated that originally the UK had planned to draw USA dollars, Canadian dollars and German marks. They had since decided not to ask for the marks. They expected that "the greater part" of their proposed drawings would be in USA dollars but Garner was not able to say how large the balance might be which they planned to take in Canadian dollars. Garner added that he understood the question of the composition on the drawings was under discussion with the USA. Needless to say there is some irritation here at the thought that the UK should be consulting the USA about possible drawings of Canadian dollars when there is no evidence that they even would have informed us in advance if we had not raised the question yesterday.

3. Although it is not possible to give you a general assessment of attitudes here at the moment you should know that at least in financial quarters the opposition to drawings in Canadian dollars has probably increased during the day.

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS UNITED KINGDOM DRAWINGS ON THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

The further meetings were held yesterday on this subject in Mr. Harris's office (from 1.30 to 4.30, and from 5.30 to 6.15 p.m.). In the course of these meetings we reminded the group of our concern about the very serious political effects which might be expected to result from any indication that we were imposing a ban on the use of Canadian dollars which we are under an obligation to make available through the Fund on request. Most of the discussion, however, related to the dimensions of the United Kingdom's needs in order to maintain confidence in sterling, and to the effects which possible drawings of Canadian dollars might have on our domestic situation.

2. During the day there were two new developments of which account was taken in these discussions.

3. In the first place the United Kingdom made it clear to us (both through Mr. Heaney and through Mr. Robertson in London) that they definitely do not intend to draw Canadian dollars. This was considered somewhat reassuring by those who had been worried at this prospect. It is of course still possible that the United States authorities may consider that some Canadian currency will need to be drawn in order to ease the financial — or, more likely, the public relations — problems confronting the United States in allowing such a large volume of U.S. dollars to be employed. Mr. Humphrey has, however, intimated that he thinks the United States can handle the full requirement through the Fund without involving other currencies.

4. The second significant development was the report from Washington that the United States (or at least Mr. Humphrey) apparently had concluded that the United Kingdom should be given ready access to the whole of their quota (i.e. $1,300 million plus $236 million representing the original U.K. gold subscription). Apparently if this were to be done some $560 million would be taken in cash (probably entirely in U.S. dollars) and the balance would be held in the Fund available to the United Kingdom as a stand-by credit. Certain questions (the nature of which is not known to us) in Mr. Humphrey's mind still had to be clarified but he apparently felt quite strongly that this more massive support would be better for stemming with certainty any speculation against sterling. Moreover if resources are made available to the United Kingdom on this scale it will be more apparent that the U.K. case is an extraordinary one and other countries will be less able to invoke it as a precedent for starting a run on the Fund. Mr. Humphrey's officials did not fully share his tentative conclusions, but even they agreed that the United Kingdom should probably be allowed to get more than the $560 million total which those officials had been regarding as the limit the day before.

5. After the various discussions yesterday it was Mr. Harris's view that Mr. Rasminsky should go to Washington today for Fund discussions, with three main thoughts in mind:

(a) Not to press the U.S. to accept a larger figure for total assistance to the United Kingdom than the U.S. authorities considered wise.

(b) To support (and to let the U.S. and U.K. know that we would be willing to support) the largest figure which the United States is willing to accept.

(c) To avoid raising the question of Canadian dollars but, if it comes up, to explain our difficulties (e.g. balance of payments deficit, increased indebtedness to foreign investors, and fairly serious inflationary conditions). If the United States or others urged that Canadian dollars be used for some part of the United Kingdom's drawings, Mr. Rasminsky would be expected to be noncommittal. He would indicate that such a suggestion would be a matter for consideration by the Canadian Government. He would be careful to avoid giving the impression that a drawing of Canadian dollars in any amount was ruled out.

6. This seemed to us to be not too unsatisfactory a basis on which to leave the matter for the time being. We could be reasonably cooperative and the issue regarding Canadian dollars would not be prejudiced.

7. This morning there has been the further development that the United Kingdom has now decided to go for the full amount of $1,300 million and the United States has definitely indicated its willingness to support such an application apparently on the condition that the U.K. Government survives the vote of confidence on Thursday. We in turn have told the United Kingdom that we would also be willing to support such a request in the Fund. Rasminsky or Warren has spoken in this sense to the U.K. Executive Director, and Mr. Heeney has also informed the U.K. Ambassador in Washington. They are said to have been very pleased to learn of our support.

8. These latest developments are being kept extremely confidential since there is always a possibility that some other members of the Fund may vigorously oppose the application and might press their own requirements for drawings (e.g. France and India). It would be most unfortunate and would have very serious consequences for sterling if such opposition were to develop on a substantial scale and if difficulty were to be experienced in getting approval of the U.K. drawing. Since the Fund is not now expected to meet to consider the matter before Monday, every precaution is being taken to ensure that this information does not leak and apparently some spadework is being done with the more sensitive delegations to lessen the likelihood of open criticism or opposition at that time.

9. We have not yet informed the United States that we are willing to support the U.K. request. It would not seem to be particularly useful for us to go out of our way to tell the U.S. of our attitude since they themselves are already favourable to the idea. Moreover, the taking of such an initiative by us might appear as an invitation to the United States to urge us to allow Canadian dollars to be used in a large amount. It is expected that Mr. Humphrey will probably call Mr. Harris during the day to let us know their attitude. At that time Mr. Harris will tell Mr. Humphrey that we also are willing to support the request. If Mr. Humphrey raises the Canadian dollar question, Mr. Harris is expected to deal with it cautiously.⁶³

10. As you will see, the situation is developing fairly satisfactorily up to this point. The Canadian dollar problem may, however, still be ahead of us.

"THE WAIVER" — CANADA-U.K. AND U.S.-U.K. LOAN AGREEMENTS

Last week in Paris I talked with Rowan (U.K. Treasury) and then with Overby (U.S. Treasury); subsequently with Mr. Humphrey (Secretary) and later with Mr. Macmillan (Chancellor).

2. According to Rowan, the Secretary and Chancellor had talked about the Waiver Clause shortly after arrival in Paris. The Secretary said that he had taken Congressional soundings which indicated more sympathy than previously towards some amendment of ⁶³ Il n'a pas été possible de trouver la trace d'une conversation téléphonique entre MM. Harris et Humphrey.

No record of a telephone conversation between Harris and Humphrey was located.

the Agreement. He anticipated that an amendment would be acceptable if brief, simple, and not seriously disturbing to the balance of the Agreement.

3. Three possibilities were discussed briefly:

(a) The waiver might continue pretty much as at present but placed purely on a basis of balance-of-payments-difficulties. For this purpose it would be necessary to delete the references to sterling balances in Sec. 6(iii) of the U.S.-U.K. Agreement and make more comprehensive and effective the nature of the certification supplied by the Fund under Sec. 5(b). At present the certification relates, not to the general balance of payments position, but to the relation between current exports and pre-war imports; Rowan claimed that this certification could have been obtained every year since 1950.

(b) The waiver system, under which interest payments are foregone forever, might be superseded by the "bisque" system with its limited number of postponements of both interest and principal at the option of the U.K. This proposal, originally American, appeared as before, with the U.K. mentioning "5, 7, or 10" bisques. There was no discussion of interest on the postponed amounts. The U.K. did, however, express some worries about the effects on confidence of invoking the bisque provision at a time of difficulty; they advanced the idea that they might take all the available bisques immediately so that there would in effect be a five or seven year holiday on debt service. (The final payments would then become due in 2005 A.D. or 2007 A.D.!)

(c) On the invitation of the Chancellor, Rowan tentatively suggested that, as a "constructive move", all interest and principal payments should henceforth be put into a sterling fund to aid underdeveloped countries. Such a fund might be "jointly administered". The U.S. response to this suggestion, Rowan reported, was not very encouraging; the Secretary remarked that he would be very hesitant to put this new suggestion forward at a time when no less than three committees were studying aid policy in the U.S.

4. After the Secretary and the Chancellor had run over these three possibilities, the Secretary suggested that the U.K. should proceed to prepare a paper putting forward its proposals, guided by the Congressional situation he had outlined. The U.S. Administration would try to accept something as close as practicable to whatever the U.K. might propose.

5. Rowan concluded his conversation with me by saying that the U.K. would now be preparing a paper and that this would be presented to Canada as well as the U.S.A.

6. According to Overby, the Secretary-Chancellor conversation followed precisely the lines described by Rowan. Overby stressed the dubiousness of the Secretary about the "aid" proposal. Overby then talked to me about the U.K. proposal for taking all their "bisques" at once; from what he said I gathered, first, that the initial U.S. reaction had not (to my surprise) been adverse and, second, that the U.S. was not in fact planning to charge interest on the postponed bisques so that this would actually provide a financial incentive to the U.K. to take them as soon as possible. I asked Overby to keep us closely in touch with developments and he promised to do so.

7. Shortly after this conversation I received a message from Mr. Harris asking that he should be "put in the position of being able to say at some later date, if asked, that Canada had participated in the discussion of the waiver question in Paris this week". Accordingly I sought brief interviews with the Secretary and the Chancellor.

8. Mr. Humphrey said the U.S. Administration was anxious to do what it could within the limits of Congressional concurrence; but he doubted that the "aid" proposal was a practical one. I pointed out that if legislation were required in the U.S. it would be required in Canada too. Mr. Humphrey immediately volunteered his personal assurances to Mr. Harris, first, that the U.S. would not agree to any U.K. proposal before we had had time to have a good look at it and, second, that he would want to make any adjustments that might be required to accommodate our needs. I thanked him for these assurances. (Overby was present during this conversation.)

9. Finally I talked briefly to the Chancellor; (Rowan had returned to London and no U.K. official was present). He confirmed that the U.K. would now be putting proposals in writing and remarked on the vigour with which the Secretary was pursuing the matter. I pointed out that Canadian as well as American legislation would probably be involved and suggested that the U.K. would accordingly wish to put their proposals to us at the same time and in the same form as to the U.S. The Chancellor readily agreed to this and in doing so referred to the coming Canadian elections. He went on to wonder whether the appropriate channel of approach was Earncliffe or Canada House; he seemed to come down on the side of Earncliffe.

U.K. FINANCIAL AGREEMENTS — WAIVER

We learn from Washington that U.K. ministers are not discussing the revision of the waiver until the week following Christmas but we would wish to acquaint U.K. officials with the views which have been developing here before they take firm positions.

2. The views expressed in this and the following telegram have of course the general concurrence of Mr. Harris but at this stage a formal message from the Minister of Finance to the Chancellor did not seem appropriate or necessary.

3. Our immediately following telegram contains the text of an aide mémoire which we would like you to leave at an early date with the Treasury. It is largely self-explanatory but some comments might be helpful to you. It relates as you will see to the three proposals that were under discussion in Paris.

4. In regard to the first proposal, it is clear that a loan agreement providing as it does for specific amounts to be repaid on specific dates, by a sole debtor to a sole creditor, calls for a more precisely defined escape clause than the general balance of payments provisions of the GATT and the Fund. The kind of negotiated qualitative judgment which is satisfactory in these latter organizations could be most unsatisfactory when transferred to the creditor-debtor relationship, especially where the balance of payments of the creditor as well as the debtor is volatile. It is highly unlikely that the precise criteria which would seem to both parties to be appropriate to write into such an escape clause at this time would maintain their relevance over the 45 years which the loan still has to run. Our present difficulties with the interpretation of the existing escape clause, encountered only ten years after the negotiation of the loan, would seem to bear this out. Incidentally we believe that with the growth of the United Kingdom's exports and imports over the years the terms of Article 4(b) of the Canada-U.K. agreement will become less and less applicable and therefore the protection provided by that escape is a wasting asset.

5. Even if it were possible to work out some manageable escape clause based on balance-of-payments criteria, it is doubtful whether it would be wise to write it into a loan agreement. It could have an unfortunate effect on the collectibility of other loans. (The French have already remarked humorously that they hoped that they would be able to make their usual payment to us at the end of December.) Furthermore, the U.K. might seek to use the fulfilment of any precise conditions which might be written into the loan agreement as proof of their right to use the more general balance-of-payments escape clauses contained in the GATT and the Fund agreement.

6. In regard to the second proposal for postponable bisques, you will have gathered that the U.S. are in fact pushing the U.K. in this direction and we would like to add our weight. It is in the interests of all concerned, and not merely the U.K., that some form of elasticity should be permitted. Moreover this proposal would seem to have the political advantage of lessening the likelihood of periodic wrangles over the facts of the situation. We do not touch on the number of bisques. Actually, we would think that the United States would be wrong to try to limit it to five but that the United Kingdom suggestion for fifteen is unreasonable. As for the question of interest on the postponed interest, Plumtre gathered from Overby in Paris that the U.S. would be willing to forego this and so would we but there is no need for us to put this particular point into play either in London or in Washington.

7. We do, as you will observe, see real objection to the U.K. proposal that they should use all of their bisques at once. We have always held the view, and we believe that you share it, that the principle of elasticity is a desirable one. Further, in relation to the present situation, the U.K. have stated publicly that their basic position is sound, and that the special assistance they have obtained from the Fund is designed to overcome merely a problem of confidence. The taking of all the bisques at once would surely appear as a kind of moratorium, which would not fit in at all with their public argument. Moreover, the introduction of a new period of grace at this late date would surely cause objections in the U.S. Congress and possibly in the Canadian Parliament. It would go a considerable way to upsetting the balance of the original agreement and as you know the Secretary warned the Chancellor in Paris that it might be dangerous to upset this balance materially. It may be that the British will claim that there is some connection between the small number of bisques which the Americans seem willing to contemplate, and the U.K. desire to use them all at once. As far as we are concerned, our objections stand even if there were no more than five bisques.

8. In regard to the third proposal, Rowan mentioned it very briefly to Plumtre on two occasions in Paris, and we have no very clear or comprehensive idea of what may be involved. Plumtre's impression was that it was designed to cover all payments still to be made on the loans, and therefore would amount to cancellation as far as the creditors were concerned. Messages from Washington suggest that this understanding may be wrong, and that the intention is to use the payments for developmental purposes only in years when balance-of-payments criteria could be met or bisque choices were made. If this is the case then the proposal does not make sense, since it would not overcome any balance-of-payments difficulties the U.K. might encounter to substitute unrequited capital exports to under-developed countries for dollar payments to the U.S. and Canada.

9. In any event, we would refer to make our own contribution to the development of under-developed countries in ways which have proved satisfactory, i.e., bilaterally, as in the Colombo Plan, or multilaterally, as in the United Nations. The kind of trilateral scheme envisaged would not leave us much freedom of action. Both the U.S. and the U.K. have their own particular interests in the use of aid, and we very much doubt that our influence would be proportionate to the amount which in fact we would be contributing to the total.

10. We should be grateful to be informed when you have approached the U.K. Treasury.

UK FINANCIAL AGREEMENTS

The following is text of aide mémoire.

THE WAIVER — CANADA-UK AND USA-UK FINANCIAL AGREEMENTS

Careful thought has been given at official levels in Ottawa to the proposals which were discussed in Paris last week for the amendment of the waiver clauses in the Canada-UK Agreement of 1946 and the USA-UK Agreement of 1945.

2. It is understood that all proposals involve elimination of references to sterling balances from the USA-UK Agreement.

3. One proposal which was discussed in Paris was to continue the principle of complete "waivers" of interest in certain years but to replace the present criterion which relates the UK income from exports in the year in question to the cost of imports in a pre-war period. The criterion put forward as an alternative would be one relating to the general balance of payments position of the UK.

4. While it is attractive to suggest that in principle the general conditions of the UK balance of payments should be taken into account it would be very difficult to write such a criterion into an agreement and particularly an agreement intended to last for 45 years. The overall external position of the UK in any year depends on a large number of forces, many of them volatile, including long-term and short-term capital movements, changes in the sterling balances of other countries in the sterling area and so forth. Any assessment of that position must be a matter of judgment and cannot be reached simply by reference to a few identifiable series of statistics. Moreover the judgment must be prospective while the statistics will always be retrospective.

5. A further objection would lie in the fact that the judgment would have to be reached by an impartial authority, presumably the International Monetary Fund. A formal judgment by the fund that the UK was in difficulties in a particular year would no doubt have unwelcome effects on confidence in sterling just at a time when such effects would be particularly undesirable.

6. A second proposal discussed in Paris was that the present waiver provisions should be deleted entirely and replaced by provisions which would permit the UK at its own option in any year to postpone both principal and interest payments until the years immediately following the years covered by the present agreements. This proposal, which has been under discussion before, would seem to have a great deal of merit. It would retain the principle of elasticity which was written into the original agreements but which has been lost because of the impossibility of getting agreement on the interpretation of the clauses in the USA-UK agreement relating to sterling balances. While the use of any form of elasticity might have some adverse reactions on confidence in sterling at the time it was employed, this particular form would seem to be as satisfactory from that point of view as could be devised.

7. This proposal has the further important advantage that it would be more likely than other more complicated or more radical measures to gain acceptance in the legislatures to which it would be put for approval. It could be supported on grounds of retaining the generally desirable elasticity which has been mentioned above and of involving the least damage to confidence; on the other hand it could be pointed out to those who might be reluctant to make particular concessions that whereas the waiver principle involved permanent losses of interest this proposal only involved postponements.

8. There was a variant or interpretation of this proposal which was mentioned in Paris and which has been under discussion in Ottawa. It was suggested that the UK, instead of retaining its postponable "bisches" for times of particular need, should use them all in the years immediately succeeding the revision of the two agreements. If this were indeed the intention the point would have to be drawn to the attention of legislatures and all but the last argument mentioned in the preceding paragraph would fall to the ground. In general the view is held in Ottawa that the principle of elasticity should be retained rather than the establishment of a new "period of grace". Both agreements provided for a period of grace at the outset but it is not clear what justification could be put forward at the present time for a new one.

9. A final possibility which was mentioned in London was that interest and principal payments should be put into a sterling fund designed for aid to underdeveloped countries and under some form of joint administration. It appears that the USA authorities are not inclined to be sympathetic to this proposal. It would, as it is understood in Ottawa, raise considerable difficulties for the Canadian authorities too but particularly in view of the USA position it is doubtful whether further discussions at this time would be fruitful.

UK-CANADA FINANCIAL AGREEMENT OF 1946 — WAIVER

The following is text of letter dated January 3 from Sir Saville Garner to Mr. Harris:

"I have been asked to let you know that the United Kingdom Government has studied with interest the aide mémoire presented by the High Commissioner for Canada on 21st December, 1956. There is general agreement with the arguments contained therein about the disadvantages of amending the present waiver provisions and the advantages of their entire deletion and replacement by a number of options for the postponement of both principal and interest payments until the years immediately following the years covered by the present agreements. The United Kingdom Government has therefore come to the conclusion that the type of amendment to the two loan agreements which would suit it best would contain the following elements:

(i) The United Kingdom would give up the right to the waiver and to this end sections 5a, 5b and 6(iii) of the United States-United Kingdom loan agreement and the corresponding provisions of the Canadian-United Kingdom loan agreement would be deleted.

(ii) In place of waiver provisions there should be provision that the United Kingdom Government at its own option might claim and should be granted a deferment of both the capital and interest payments.

(iii) The number of such deferments or bisques should be nine.

(iv) No interest should be chargeable on the postponed amounts.

It would not be the intention of the United Kingdom Government to use all the available bisques in the years immediately succeeding the revision of the two agreements.

The United Kingdom Government are accordingly putting proposals to this effect to the United States Government. In view of the terms of the Canadian aide mémoire, the United Kingdom Government on these lines to the Canada-United Kingdom loan agreement would be appropriate but they would be glad to have the Canadian Government's views."

UNITED KINGDOM WAIVER

Following for Warren from Hockin.

1. This telegram will confirm a telephone conversation between Plumptre and Warren on January 4.

2. Mr. Harris has received a letter from the UK High Commissioner proposing in general terms certain amendments to the present waiver provisions in the Canada-UK Financial Agreement. This letter, which is dated January 3, 1957, has been sent to you in telegram No. E-16 of January 4.

3. Our thinking in connection with this problem had been communicated to the UK in the aide mémoire presented by Robertson on December 21. Since receipt of the letter of January 3 there have been further interdepartmental consultations. As a result of these consultations we have reached the following conclusions with respect to the specific proposals contained in the letter of January 3:

(1) With respect to the number of deferments — nine seems too many and five too few. Seven would perhaps be a reasonable compromise, but we have not reached any firm conclusion.

(2) We can accept the proposal that no interest be charged on deferred interest payments but cannot accept that there should be no interest on deferred principal payments. Since the British now have the right to claim a complete waiver of interest payments, we feel that it would be too much to ask them to pay interest on deferred interest charges under the new arrangements. However, the present waiver provisions do not permit the waiving or deferment of principal payments. The amounts involved in foregoing interest on deferred capital payments would be very large and we do not think they would be acceptable to Parliament. Since the present interest rate on the loan is two per cent our present thinking is that the interest to be charged on deferred principal payments should also be two per cent.

4. We understand from your telephone conversation with Plumtre that the sentence in the letter to Mr. Harris disclaiming any intention of using all available bisques in the years immediately succeeding the revision of the two agreements does not appear in the letter from the UK to the U.S. We had dealt with this point in our aide mémoire to the UK since we considered it important. We were therefore glad to receive this assurance from the UK. The U.S. will probably want a similar assurance.

5. Now that the UK have written formal letters to the U.S. and Canada, we think it appropriate to seek a fairly detailed exchange of views with the U.S. We would therefore be grateful if you would get in touch immediately with senior U.S. Treasury officials and let them know our views as outlined in this telegram. We would also be grateful for any information you can obtain on U.S. thinking. At this stage we think it important that the exchange of views between Canada and the U.S. should be frank and confidential. We would therefore appreciate the U.S. not passing on our views to the UK. Similarly we would not disclose to the UK any comments the U.S. might care to give us.

6. Some consideration had been given here to the desirability of requesting the UK at the time of the revision of the waiver provisions of the agreement to reiterate in some formal way their intention of proceeding as fast as possible towards a multilateral system of trade and payments. It has been decided that this would not be either feasible or necessary because of the fact that the article in the present financial agreement covering this point will be undisturbed by any revision of the waiver provisions. However we would be interested to hear if the U.S. have any intention of putting a commercial tag, either in general or specific terms, on the revisions. You should not raise the matter with the U.S., but should report to us any thoughts the U.S. may volunteer.

UK-CANADA FINANCIAL AGREEMENT — WAIVER PROVISIONS

On receipt of your confirmatory message, I called yesterday afternoon on Randolph Burgess to indicate how our thinking was developing. Overby and Willis were present. Burgess welcomed the opportunity to discuss the UK proposals with US and readily agreed that the time had come for a frank and confidential exchange of views. He also agreed that pending further consultation between us the UK should not be informed of our respective positions on the various issues.

2. When I had communicated our present views on the nature of the appropriate revisions to the agreements, Burgess said that their thinking was still in the formative stage. Informal soundings were being taken in the Congress, the issues were being examined in the Treasury, but Secretary Humphrey had not yet focused firmly on what the USA response should be and the actual recommendation to be made to the Congress. Accordingly what he might say about the USA position was, for the time being, tentative and conditional.

3. The USA favours the deletion from the agreement of the present waiver provisions, as requested by the UK, and the substitution therefor of a provision under which the UK at its option might claim and be granted a certain number of deferments of both capital and interest. In this connection the USA would like to receive from the UK a statement similar to that contained in Garner's letter to Mr. Harris of January 3 concerning the UK's intention not to use all the available bisques in the years immediately succeeding the revision of the agreements.

4. Burgess was interested in our tentative conclusion that the number of bisques should be seven, and indicated that their thinking was not greatly different on this question. He emphasized, however, that the exact number of bisques which might be appropriate had not yet been decided. Burgess said he had talked to certain senators and had the impression that a figure somewhere between five and nine might prove acceptable. In this connection it was noticeable that the USA officials referred at several points in the conversation to "five or six deferments". It is safe, therefore, to assume that on the USA side five is no longer regarded as the maximum number of bisques which might be granted.

5. USA officials agree with us that no interest should be chargeable on deferred interest payments. As regards interest on deferred principal repayments, their thinking seems to be developing along lines rather different from our own. Here again no decision has been reached, but careful and I would say sympathetic consideration is being given to the UK request that no additional interest be charged. Burgess mentioned that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have difficulty in securing approval from Parliament for a revision of the agreement which involved supplementary interest payments. To charge interest on the deferred capital repayments would mean that the total amount to be repaid by the UK would be increased; whereas under the existing agreement there was a prospect that, through the waiver, the total cost might be decreased. He thought also that from the point of view of presentation of a revision to the USA Congress there was something to be said for a solution which could be explained in the sense that the USA would be receiving in repayment exactly the same amount as under the original agreement — neither more nor less — the only difference being that the repayment would be spread over a longer period. The concern of the officials present to find a revision which could be explained to Congress in simple terms and which would not raise too many questions came out again and again in our talk, and apparently has influenced their thinking about the way in which the deferments should be handled.

6. I gathered that initially the Treasury people had thought that the interest and principal to be deferred in a particular year should simply be repositioned at the end of the existing payments schedule. However, when this idea was examined it was found to conflict with what is regarded here as a basic principle of the agreement — that the interest should be payable on the amount of the loan outstanding from time to time. Thought was therefore being given to an alternative solution which would maintain this principle and the second principle of equal annual instalments. Violation of these principles could be avoided if, when the UK decided to exercise an option, the whole schedule were simply shifted one year ahead. For example, if the UK opted to take a bisque in 1957, no interest or capital should be payable for that year, but the obligation to pay these amounts would accrue in year 1958, and the amounts which would have been payable in 1958 would become payable in 1959, etc. A procedure of this kind would preserve a symmetrical schedule and would avoid the situation which would arise under the other procedure whereby at the end of the existing schedule of repayments, years would follow in which the final instalments might be made up of relatively large interest payments and relatively small principal repayments.

7. If under the above scheme no interest were to be charged on deferred principal repayments, nothing would be involved but a shifting of the whole schedule one year ahead on each occasion a bisque was used. (In effect each bisque year would be a grace year). If, however, interest were to be charged on the deferred principal element, the thought is that the additional interest should be on the amount of the loan outstanding at the time of the deferment; if, the same as the interest payable in that year under the present schedule. This interest could then be spread over the remaining life of the agreement in a way which would be consistent with the principle of equal, annual instalments. Willis said that, although a precise calculation had not been made, he believed the amount of additional interest which would be payable under such an arrangement would be rather more than simple interest at the rate of 2 percent on an actual deferred principal repayment, but about the same as this interest compounded for the period involved.

8. I said I was unaware whether alternative ways of handling the deferments had been considered in Ottawa, but that I would advise you of USA tentative thinking and ask for your reaction.

9. Overby at two points in the conversation threw out the idea that the question of whether or not to charge interest on the deferred principal repayments might be resolved in relation to the number of bisques to be agreed. Thus, if interest were to be charged the number of bisques might be greater, and if it were to be foregone the number might be less. I indicated my understanding of what he was driving at, but volunteered no comment. USA officials are quite aware of the financial disadvantages of foregoing interest on deferred principal repayments, but somehow appear to think that congressional passage of the revision might be easier if this question and the related questions of the rate, and whether the interest should be simple or compound, were avoided. At least that is the impression I have at the present stage. Of course, our position on the interest question will be an important factor and I should be glad to learn with what vigour you wish me to press the view that interest should be paid.

10. A separate question to which attention must be given is the treatment of the 1956 interest which has been paid into special accounts. Overby seemed to think that the happiest solution would be for the UK to pay over this interest and start the revised agreement with a clean sheet. Burgess thought it unlikely that it would be politically possible for the Chancellor, in view of what he has said publicly, now to pay the interest. Here again no decision has been taken on the USA side, but as reported earlier some thought is being given to dealing with this interest by deferment. Such a solution would, of course, raise the question of whether the deferment should be included in, or supplementary to, the number of bisques to be agreed in the revision of the agreement.

11. At the end of the meeting it was agreed that we should keep in the closest touch. Willis has undertaken to advise me of any new developments in their thinking, and we will, in any case, be in touch with each other at least once a day. As regards timetable, Burgess expressed the hope that the necessary decisions could be taken in the Treasury in time to make a recommendation to Congress by the end of next week. Overby and Willis were much less sanguine, and thought the process would take longer.

CANADA-UK FINANCIAL AGREEMENT — WAIVER

I met this morning with the Secretary of the Treasury and Burgess; Ritchie and Warren accompanied me.

2. The Secretary welcomed the opportunity to discuss the waiver question with us and asked me particularly to convey the sense of his thinking to you, together with his good wishes.

3. On procedure Humphrey, like you, believes we should remain in the closest touch as the situation develops and that we should try to keep in step. As he sees the problem, it would be most undesirable to place a proposal for revision of the agreement before the Congress which in the event turned out to be unacceptable. Accordingly, he attaches great importance to the result of the informal soundings now being taken with congressional leaders and key senators, his present endeavour is to ascertain the limits within which the Congress might be prepared to act favourably. Once this is known, he would wish to undertake detailed negotiations with us and with the British with a view to obtaining a mutually satisfactory solution which could be recommended to the Congress and to the two parliaments. In all this Secretary Humphrey showed a real awareness of the relevance of our views and of the action which in due course we might wish to take. At one point he said that if we had any problems about the revision of the waivers I was to let him know "and your position will be our position".

4. As to timing, Burgess told the Secretary in my presence that advice just received from the Hill was to the effect that the legislation should if possible be introduced soon and in advance of certain other legislative items immediately pending. Burgess volunteered that the Treasury might be in a position to make a recommendation to Congress within a week or ten days. I was told that a draft bill (with the key provisions about the number of bisques and the question of interest left blank) had already been sent to the Republican leader of the Senate for a determination, in consultation with the Democratic leader and the Vice President, of the committee which would handle the legislation. I gathered that the odds were now heavily on the Banking and Currency Committee of which Senator Fulbright is the Chairman.

5. The Secretary was very frank in discussing the substance of the waiver question. His basic approach is that in the original contract the UK was given certain rights to relief which, because of the change in circumstances (a reference to the difficulties of making use of the sterling balance provision), were no longer applicable. This being the case, and in accordance with sound business practice, it was desirable to renegotiate the contract in order to carry out the original intent. He confirmed to me that, in this context, it was no part of USA purpose to take the occasion to be generous or otherwise vis-à-vis the UK, but only to agree with them and with us on a revision which would provide in present circumstances the kind of flexibility and relief for which provision was made in the original agreements.

6. Secretary Humphrey was inclined to be less forthcoming as regards the British proposals than earlier conversations with Burgess had led us to suppose. He said there were only two main questions left to decide (a) the number of bisques and (b) whether to charge interest on the deferred interest. He took it for granted that as a matter of equity the creditors were entitled to charge interest on deferred principal repayments. At one point he said he thought the UK would not be getting a bad deal if they were given only five bisques and paid interest on both the deferred interest and principal. He added, however, that the present feeling in the Treasury was that interest on the deferred interest might be foregone. As to the number of bisques, the Secretary again mentioned the range of three to nine as the area of choice. Burgess on at least two occasions talked about seven. The Secretary, referring to our tentative view that seven might indeed be the right number, thought that this might be on the high side. He tends to look at this question from the point of view of the credit which the USA would in fact be extending to the UK. In this connection he referred to a credit of between $700 million and $1 billion for forty years at 2 percent as being a pretty attractive proposition from the UK point of view, and one not without considerable cost to the USA if account were taken of the difference between 2 percent and the present level of interest rates. In response to a direct question, the Secretary confirmed that the USA was indeed thinking in terms of 2 percent simple interest and not of other possibilities which might be more expensive to the UK. Incidentally, I should report that Burgess showed a complete awareness of the fact that the existing waiver (even if it could be interpreted) would only be of value to the UK for a few more years, as thereafter the figure would preclude the Fund from giving the certification required in paragraph 5(b) of the USA agreement.

7. In the course of the conversation, I reminded Secretary Humphrey of the differences in our legislative systems which would permit of rather speedier action in Canada than in the USA once the Government had decided on the legislation to be introduced. I also thought it appropriate to put him on notice that public attitudes towards the revision of the waiver provisions might be somewhat different in Canada than here. In this connection, the Secretary showed complete understanding of the difficulties which could arise, on the one hand if a revision acceptable to Canada turned out to be markedly different from that adopted by the USA, and on the other hand if we appeared merely to follow the action being taken by the USA. He also commented that his position would be extremely difficult if, by any chance, what was recommended to the Canadian Parliament turned out to be less forthcoming than the proposals to be put before Congress.

8. As to the eventual administration recommendation, my guesses at this stage are, first, that the number of bisques will not be more than seven, and perhaps less, and secondly, that 2 percent simple interest will be proposed on deferred principal repayments, but probably not on deferred interest. It is also clear that there is a pretty strong desire on the USA side that the solution worked out for the two agreements should be the same.

9. I should be glad to know whether in the light of this message you wish me to propose any particular number of bisques and whether there has been any change in our preliminary view that interest should be charged on deferred capital. If we have views on questions of substance which are at variance with the apparent direction of USA thinking, I think we will have to register them within the next week before matters have advanced on the USA side to the stage where it would be difficult to introduce changes in their approach.

CANADA-UK FINANCIAL AGREEMENT — WAIVER

1. We were invited yesterday to call on Treasury officials to be informed of USA views on the UK proposals for revision of the agreements. Burgess was detained, and in his absence the USA side was led by Scribner, Legal Counsel to the Treasury and Assistant Secretary (designate). Willis, Arnold and Glendinning were also present.

2. The present USA position is that the waiver in the existing agreement should be replaced by a provision permitting the UK, at its option, five (5) deferments of interest and principal. The 1956 interest which has been paid into "special account" would also be deferred and would be in addition to the five full bisques proposed for the future. In the USA view 2 percent simple interest should be charged both on deferred principal and deferred interest. This interest would be spread over the life of the agreement after each bisque. The deferred amounts of principal and interest would become payable in the years following the end of the present payments schedule (the leap-frog technique).

3. Scribner said it was still not clear which committees would handle the amending legislation, but the strong likelihood was that it would go to the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Now that the USA side has a position they are anxious to proceed quickly in negotiations with us and the British so that the matter can be placed before Congress with a minimum of delay. There is some fear that if Congress is not soon seized of an amending bill the present more or less favourable climate of opinion may change, other legislation might be given priority and there would be extended delay and a danger of congressional inaction. Secretary Humphrey has, therefore, suggested, as a first step, that we and the British negotiators meet with him tomorrow, Thursday, at 2 pm to discuss the UK request for revision and the USA counter proposals.

4. We indicated to Scribner that we would endeavour to ascertain your reaction to their proposals before Thursday, but did not commit ourselves to attend the proposed tripartite meeting. In the course of the discussion we said that you had not yet come to any firm conclusion about the appropriate number of bisques or the interest question. We reminded Scribner, however, of the view of Canadian officials that the revisions should provide a reasonable degree of flexibility over the remaining years of the agreements, and questioned whether five deferments were likely to prove fully adequate. Scribner did not volunteer any particular rationale for the choice of five; it seemed to us to be based on their judgment of what the traffic might bear. While it is difficult to be sure, we believe there may be some room for manoeuvres on the USA side and that we have been given their opening negotiating position vis-à-vis the UK rather than their position of no retreat. For example, Scribner said he thought Congress might well accept whatever recommendation was made by the Secretary because of their confidence that he would make "about as good a trade as you could get". There is also the Secretary's remark to me earlier that we should "all sit down and discuss the problem" which seems to suggest that there is a margin for negotiation.

5. I can see the obvious disadvantages in rigidly tripartite negotiations compared with parallel bilateral negotiations. If in the present of the UK we appeared to be dissenting from the USA position and taking a more liberal or lenient view, the USA might well consider that we were letting the side down. This could have some unfortunate consequences for our general relations with the USA and particularly with the USA Treasury.⁴⁴ On the other hand, if we merely reiterated or supported pretty severe USA proposals, the UK might be quite disappointed and even resentful. It might then be represented not only privately but publicly, in Canada as well as elsewhere, that we have ganged up with the USA against the UK.

6. On the other hand, we have quite properly insisted on a full role in the negotiations. Since the proposed Thursday meeting would be very much in the nature of a preliminary exploratory session, I feel that we should attend while leaving open the question of whether subsequent negotiations should continue on a tripartite basis or be carried on bilaterally. Thorold (who has succeeded Harcourt and paid a courtesy call on me yesterday afternoon) apparently shares Humphrey's view that a tripartite meeting at this stage would save time and would be the best way to start off the negotiations.

⁴⁴ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

I am not impressed by this argument in these circumstances. L.B. P[earson]

7. If you agree that I should take part in the Thursday meeting, I would not expect you to let me have detailed instructions by that time. In fact I would think it preferable for us to listen to what the others have to say and merely to raise questions or make very general comments which would give some intimation of the kinds of principles or criteria which you had in mind. For instance, I might indicate that a principal objective with us would be to work out terms which would preserve so far as possible the intentions behind the original agreement and would be viable for the rather lengthy remainder of the agreement. I might observe that probably none of us would want to find ourselves involved in further renegotiation during the life of the agreement if that can be avoided. We should presumably aim therefore at an arrangement which would, so far as can be foreseen, have enough flexibility to take care of the number of difficult years which might reasonably be anticipated, even on the assumption that sound and sensible economic policies are pursued steadily by the countries concerned. You might also feel that I should ask a question or make a comment which would imply some doubt about the equity of collecting interest on deferred interest charges, since the UK had under the original provision the right to claim a complete waiver of interest payments in the hard years.

8. I think it should be quite understandable to both the UK and USA if we do not attempt to state a definite attitude towards particular parts of the UK request or of the USA counter-proposal at this time. We might explain to the USA Treasury in advance of the meeting that as we had only two days' notice of their proposal, Canadian ministers had not had sufficient time to come to definite conclusions about it: we might assure them that although we shall not be in a position to form a common front (at least for the Thursday meeting), we shall not be presenting a concrete proposal of our own at the meeting. We may, of course, have some questions to raise but shall probably not have an opportunity to make up our minds about the best kind of provision until after the preliminary discussion.

9. It would seem to me that the above would be a reasonable and helpful basis for our participation in the first meeting. I should be grateful for your confirmation of the approach which I have suggested. If you consider that we should express more definite views at this early stage, I assume that you will let me have fairly detailed instructions.

CANADA-U.K. FINANCIAL AGREEMENT — WAIVER

Following from Plumptre: We understand that the meeting referred to in your telegram has been postponed but that you would nevertheless appreciate guidance from this end in regard to the issues raised.

2. You refer to the U.S. proposals as "pretty severe". It is true that they fall to some extent short of the U.S. position as it seemed to be emerging during the past few weeks. Nevertheless we would not be inclined to regard them so harshly as an initial USA position. A proposal involving six bisques (including the 1956 payment), interest at two per cent contrasted with current market levels, and simple not compound interest at that, might be regarded in many quarters as pretty generous. Incidentally we do not follow your suggestion that there is a departure from equity in collecting interest on deferred interest charges; the present exercise is designed to supplant completely the waiver procedure with its forgiveness of interest by a postponement procedure in which there is no presumption that interest ought to be forgiven.

3. Nevertheless we would accept and indeed aim at a final position that was a bit more forthcoming than the initial position taken by the U.S. In particular we think it desirable that there should be an additional one or preferably two bisques (1956 and seven more). As for the question of interest on interest, Mr. Harris feels that there would be a normal presumption amongst Members of Parliament and others that interest would be charged in the same way on both deferred interest and deferred principal and that any distinction between the two would require a bit of explanation; nevertheless he would accept the differentiation (and we do of course know that the U.K. are likely to be very insistent on this). To put our position on bisques and interest in general terms, we can see good reasons for ensuring that the number of bisques available is adequate to meet the real emergencies that may arise, assuming reasonably good conduct on all sides; on the other hand we do not see any reason why the bisques should actually be made financially attractive to the U.K. by converting them into loans at very low cost for the remaining duration of the agreement.

4. One of our reasons for considering the U.S. position as not unreasonable lies in your suggestion that it may contain an element of bargaining. For our part we would also like to take an initial position from which we could give some ground. Ritchie will recall Isbister's feeling that whatever bisque procedure emerged it was sure to be a great deal more useful to the U.K. than the present waiver provisions — in short a pretty valuable "concession" and that it would not be at all in our interests to hand it to the U.K. on a platter. Accordingly if a new tripartite meeting were called (and we have no objection to your attending such a meeting) it would be wise to tell the U.S. in advance quite frankly and fully what our position was in regard to both the number of bisques and the question of interest. Nevertheless we could assure them that in the meeting we would give initial support, in rather general language, to their initial proposal.

5. We had envisaged that in such a meeting the U.S. would probably at the outset explain and defend their proposal and that you might speak next. Your remarks might run along the following lines. You might emphasize the very large measure of agreement which seemed already to have emerged on a matter which had in the past been contentious and troublesome; the bisque system was now completely accepted. Of course the final package could be made up of the various ingredients in rather different proportions: number of bisques, whether 1956 payment was included or not, leap-frog or shunting, interest on deferred principal and/or interest, and finally compound or simple interest. You might indicate that Canada had a reasonable degree of flexibility in making up a package, although of course it would have to be a reasonable one and saleable to Parliament. In commenting on the U.S. proposal you might say that we had not in fact thought of this particular package; in some ways it was a little stiffer than what some Canadians had been thinking of and in other ways somewhat less stiff. In general, however, it seemed to us an acceptable package and well worth discussion. It would not be helpful for us at this stage to put in an alternative and we would very much like to know what the U.K. would like to say on the subject.

6. In addition, the general points made in your paragraph 7 might well be worked into your statement, except for the point in your final sentence on which we have commented above.

7. One final point. Mr. Harris is consulting the Prime Minister on the question whether the detailed provisions regarding bisques, interest, etc. should be precisely the same in the Canadian agreement as in the U.S. agreement or whether the former should be slightly more liberal. We shall be advising you on this matter shortly. In general, as we have already told you, Mr. Harris is disposed to maintain the existing close connection between the two agreements. Further we have reminded him of Mr. Humphrey's remark about the difficulties for the U.S. if by any chance the U.S. provisions appeared more liberal than the Canadian.

CANADA-UK FINANCIAL AGREEMENT — WAIVER

We saw Secretary Humphrey, Burgess and Scribner this morning.

2. At the outset I said that the USA counter proposal had been considered by you and by the Prime Minister. I went on to outline the position to which we would be prepared to go, as set out in Plumtre's message and modified by the info received this morning by phone. I then explained in general terms the considerations which had weighed with us in reaching our conclusions.

3. Secretary Humphrey gave me a careful and sympathetic hearing, and then indicated that our position went somewhat further than he would be prepared to recommend, or thought it necessary to go. He was particularly concerned about our willingness to forego interest on the deferred interest payments. We discussed this aspect of the question at some length and as we did so the Secretary's thinking evolved and, I think, crystallized. He said initially that he would be prepared to consider a greater number of bisques rather than give up the interest, which would represent a not insignificant financial sacrifice and would, he thought, in any event be less useful to the UK than more deferments. Moreover, he considered that the question of interest on interest was pretty marginal from the point of view of the economic strength of the UK and "was peanuts" in relation to the support which had been mobilized for the UK in its current difficulties. To charge interest would be businesslike and not unreasonable; not to do so would be unbusinesslike and would be playing into the hands of the minority in Congress which would be opposing any revision of the agreement. He admitted that this minority was likely to be critical in any case, but thought that failure to charge interest on the deferred interest would place a good deal of ammunition at their disposal and might affect public opinion. Taking as an example the proposed deferment of the 1956 interest payment, Humphrey said that there were those in the Congress who believed the payment was due and should be made promptly and that his task of securing agreement to a deferment would be made much more difficult if interest were not to be charged.

4. It was clear throughout, that the Secretary, while recognizing that the original agreement was intended to give the UK relief in years of real difficulty and while anxious that the new agreement should carry out the spirit of this intent, did not attach particular importance to the fact that the technique chosen in 1946 was to give an absolute waiver of interest due in the years in which it qualified [at one point he referred disparagingly to the agreement having been worked out in "the new deal" era by an administration whose policies were now regarded with a good deal of suspicion].

5. The Secretary finally said that the bedrock position he would be prepared to recommend, and to fight for in Congress, would be seven (7) bisques plus postponement of the 1956 interest payment, with interest to be charged on both principal and interest deferments. We explored his conclusion fully, and I think this is as far as he can be moved. Mr. Humphrey believes the above solution to be as liberal as the UK could reasonably expect; that it would give the necessary degree of flexibility; and would be fair, just and practical.

6. At the beginning of the conversation I made it clear that although we would welcome a solution to which all three parties could agree, we would be not unwilling (although certainly not anxious to do so) to recommend a revision to Parliament which went somewhat beyond the USA position if we considered that the final USA proposal failed to meet what we regarded as the requirements of the situation. At first Humphrey was inclined to the view that no great harm would be done if in the end we went our separate roads. In this connection he referred to our special ties with the UK. However, as our talk continued he moved steadily away from this position. He suggested that if our revision turned out to be more liberal than their own this would cause the Chancellor considerable difficulty in obtaining the blessing of Parliament for a less forthcoming arrangement with the USA. (Incidentally, the USA info is that it will not be necessary on the UK side to pass amending legislation in order to revise the agreement.) Humphrey's main worry, about which Burgess and Scribner were even more concerned, was that divergence between us on the interest question would stimulate the British to press them for similar treatment, that this would involve further delay and that the present occasion when for the first time in three years there was on balance a favourable climate in Congress to the revision of the agreement, would be lost.

In conclusion the Secretary, noting that he had now gone up two (2) bisques said he hoped very much that on reconsideration you and the Prime Minister would find it possible to agree that interest should be charged on deferred interest payments and so permit a common position vis-à-vis the UK.

7. I said that before determining our final position we had been anxious to know how far, in the last analysis, the USA would be prepared to go. I did not volunteer any opinion as to whether or not we would be able to meet their new proposal, and their desire for common solution, but I undertook to consult you at once.

8. Incidentally, Humphrey in the course of his remarks suggested that the British should agree to limit use of the bisques to no more than three in succession. Subsequently he made it clear that he was not thinking of this as a condition to be embodied in the revision of the agreement, but as an understanding or declaration of intention which might be dealt with in an aide mémoire. He said he would not be surprised if the UK had to use bisques this year and next.

9. Humphrey leaves today for a vacation with the President in Georgia and is leaving Burgess and Scribner to clean up the negotiations with the British. He is most anxious that an amending agreement be signed as quickly as possible and that the necessary legislation be introduced immediately. Accordingly the USA side would be very grateful to be informed of our reaction by Monday. They would then propose to call Thorold in and to try to reach agreement with the UK with a minimum of delay.

10. As regards tactics with the British, Scribner's view was that their opening position should be the earlier five-bisque package. Subsequent willingness to raise the number of new deferments to seven (7) would, he thought, make it easier for the UK to agree to the payment of interest on interest. The Secretary opposed this suggestion as being contrary to "the way I like to deal" and "to the way I have always dealt with Harold [Macmillan] and Rab [Butler]". He said that having come to a conclusion he would not want "to haggle". He said he would prefer to tell the British that the original USA view had been that a five-bisque package would be adequate, but that after lengthy consideration and after talking with us they had moved to a seven-bisque solution. This was as far as they could go and it would be for the British to decide whether to accept or reject the proposed revision as it stood.

11. I should be glad to receive your views on the matter of tactics as well as your decision on the remaining question of substance. The problem of tactics is not easy. We will be sending you a later message analysing the possibilities and expressing our views. As to the substance of the interest question, I consider that the Americans are not going to give in, and that the real decision before us is whether we wish eventually to go beyond them and recommend a differing revision to our Parliament with the effects which that could have on the timetable for completing the USA/UK negotiations and action by Congress. This, of course, is a judgement which we here are in no position to make.

UK LOAN AGREEMENTS

Because I had to leave Washington this afternoon for several days, I decided to see the British Ambassador late this morning to put to him, personally and informally, a number of points in relation to the proposals for settlement, which are now to go forward from the USA Secretary of the Treasury and the Minister of Finance. I told Burgess, the Acting

Secretary of the Treasury, of my intention, and he felt that it would be helpful for me to do so.

2. I told Caccia that, as he was aware, we had been discussing the situation actively with the Americans over the past few weeks. I had had two meetings with Mr. Humphrey before he left Washington on February 8. The result of our discussions, would I expected be communicated to him later today or early tomorrow, by Burgess, in the form of a message which he would be asked to send from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. At about the same time it was expected that the Minister of Finance would be sending a message to the Chancellor through Earncliffe.

3. These two messages to Mr. Thorneycroft, I went on, would set out identical proposals for agreement upon amendment of the two loan agreements. It would not be appropriate for me to anticipate the nature of these proposals but I did want Caccia to know, personally, that we regarded them as fair and reasonable in all the circumstances. They were a good deal more liberal than the conditions which Mr. Humphrey had suggested at earlier stages; indeed our discussions with the USA Treasury had, I felt sure, helped materially in modifying the USA position.

4. It was important, I continued, to avoid haggling and in the interest of all three countries that settlement of this complicated and difficult affair should be made promptly while conditions were relatively favourable and also that arrangements made with the USA and Canada should be the same. For these reasons we hoped that the UK would be able to accept the suggestions which would now go forward to the Chancellor from his American and Canadian colleagues.

5. My last point was to assure Caccia that the decision to embody the USA and Canadian proposals in personal messages from the Secretary and the Minister, respectively, should be regarded as in no, repeat no, sense a reflection upon the UK negotiators in Washington. Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Harris had decided to employ the direct approach to Mr. Thorneycroft (for which there was ample precedent in such matters) so as to emphasize their own personal concern and interest in having an early and satisfactory solution in the common interest. Indeed, I thought it not unlikely that Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Harris might supplement their written communications by transatlantic phone conversations.

6. Caccia indicated that he appreciated by speaking to him personally in this way and I think the conversation may prove to have been helpful, although, of course, he gave no indication of what he thought the UK reactions would be. He quite understood the reasons why the subject was being dealt with directly at the ministerial level. He also shared the view that it was most desirable to have the matter settled quickly if possible. He recognized that protracted negotiations would not be helpful in present circumstances.

7. Please deliver copies of this telegram, promptly, to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

CANADA-U.K. LOAN AGREEMENT — WAIVER

Following for your information is text of message Mr. Harris is sending Mr. Thorneycroft through Earnscliffe tonight. (See also my telegram E-239).

Text begins: "On January 3 I received from Sir Saville Garner a letter outlining the proposals of the U.K. Government for amendment of the financial agreement of 1946 between Canada and the U.K. The same proposals were, I understand, put to the U.S. Government.

The two agreements as originally negotiated are intimately connected and contain the same basic provisions. I think there is considerable merit in retaining this element of close similarity in any new arrangements which are worked out. Accordingly, as you are aware, I have been keeping in close touch with the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury in exploring the proposals which you made to us both.

I would now propose that, in place of the present provision in the Canada-U.K. agreement for the waiving of interest, there should be provision that the U.K. Government at its own option would be granted deferments of both the capital and interest payments. The number of such possible deferments should be seven, in addition to the 1956 instalment of interest which would also be deferred in the same manner. The amounts so deferred should be payable in the years immediately following the year in which the last payment is due under the present schedule of repayment. Interest at the rate of two per cent should be paid annually on amounts so deferred.

I believe that the foregoing amendment would be both reasonable and appropriate in all the circumstances and that it would be acceptable in Canada.

I understand that Mr. Humphrey is putting forward the same proposal. I know that he has discussed this matter carefully both with our representatives in Washington and with congressional leaders.

In the light of all these considerations I hope that you will be able to accept our proposal for revision of the agreement.

I would like to raise one other matter. In his letter to me of January 3, Sir Saville Garner stated that it would not be the intention of your Government to use all the available deferments in the years immediately succeeding the revision of the agreement. I was pleased to receive this indication of your intention. It underlines the objective, which I believe to be shared by our two Governments, of reinstating the element of flexibility in the Financial Agreement. With this common purpose in mind, I would hope that you would adopt the same attitude towards the use of deferments in any short period of time throughout the life of the agreement." Text Ends.

Bill C-238, an Act to amend the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act of 1946, was passed by the House of Commons on April 10, 1957, and received Royal Assent on April 12. The Agreement came into force by Exchange of Notes on April 29. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1957, No. 2.

3. We will be bringing along the chart referred to in Sir Anthony's letter on our return, but the chief point of significance is that it shows an area marked "Canada" on the Atlantic side north of a line drawn east to west through Bermuda, and an area marked "Canada" on the Pacific side north of a line that appears to be the 10 degree south latitude line. This Pacific area extends north to include most of the Aleutian Islands and the westerly boundaries are no doubt familiar to the naval authorities in Ottawa. Text of letter begins:

"I believe that when the First Sea Lord visited Ottawa last October, he mentioned to you what a help it would be if a Canada Naval Station could be formed within the worldwide Commonwealth framework of naval stations.

"2. At present we are reorganizing our naval command structure on the America and West Indies Station and we are proposing to create a limited West Indies Station in the Caribbean area. The southern part of the existing A. & W.I. Station will come under the Commander-in-Chief, South Atlantic, and we very much hope that you will be prepared to take over the northern part as a Canada Station. This would be bounded in the Atlantic by the boundary of the home station and a line drawn to the West through Bermuda and in the Pacific by the boundary of the Far East and New Zealand Stations and the parallel of 10 degrees south. The boundaries which we suggest are shown on the attached chart. You will see that we have excluded all the West Indies colonies from the area suggested and Bermuda, too, would remain under R.N. control, but the self-refit facilities would be fully at the disposal of the R.C.N.

"3. It would be appropriate from the Commonwealth point of view if there were a Canada Station just as there are the Australia and New Zealand Stations. We also feel that it is a logical development from the expansion of the R.C.N. and its great increase in size and importance. I hope these proposals commend themselves to you, and I should be very glad to let you have any more details you may require.

"4. Another question which I hope we might cover at the same time is the future of H.M.C.S. Magnificent. I understand that on taking over H.M.C.S. Bonaventure at the end of this year there is the possibility that you will wish to return to us H.M.C.S. Magnificent which has been on loan to the Royal Canadian Navy since 1948. We hope very much that the R.C.N. will be able to keep Magnificent in Canada, preferably, of course, in the active fleet, but alternatively in reserve if you are unable to run her operationally. If Magnificent is returned to us, we shall have neither money nor manpower to maintain her and inevitably in a few years she will rot away. This would be a sad loss to the reserve strength of Commonwealth and NATO carriers." Text ends.

Ottawa, August 2, 1956

Dear Sir Anthony [Eden]:

Since returning to Ottawa, I have had an opportunity to take up with the Minister of National Defence the letter you sent to me in London dated July 1st relating to naval matters.

In regard first to the Magnificent, I regret to say that we are in much the same position as you are. Our Navy will not have either the money or manpower to maintain her, as they feel that they must give higher priority to other ships, once they have acquired the Bonaventure. In these circumstances, it seems better that we should return her to you as planned, even though she will not last for long.

On the other matter, that of our Navy forming a "Canada Station" from part of your "America and West Indies Station", I find that we do not have here sufficient information to understand what the proposal really means. We do not know what responsibilities and obligations you would expect us to undertake in connection with this station.

Our Navy has some knowledge of the peacetime role of your naval units on certain of your stations but not sufficient to be a guide to what our role would be in respect of this new station. They have no information on the functions performed by the Australian and New Zealand Navies in connection with the Australia and New Zealand Stations. Moreover, this Canada Station would include, we understand, no colonies or other territory for which the United Kingdom is responsible, and nearly all of it is contiguous to Canada and the United States, which do not seem likely to give rise to trade or commercial or consular problems requiring any assistance from the naval side.

It would be helpful, therefore, if you could send, either directly or through naval channels, information as to what you would expect of us if we undertook to form the Canada Station that the First Sea Lord has proposed. It would be appreciated if this information could be as specific as possible and related to the nature of this particular proposed station.

Yours sincerely,

London, September 3, 1956

My dear Prime Minister,

In my letter of August 9,† I promised to let you have details of our proposal about the "Canada Station" as soon as I could.

We visualize the main task of the British Commander-in-Chief of a Station as being to maintain British Naval influence and participation in all matters relating to Commonwealth policy. The Commander-in-Chief of the proposed "Canada Station" might, therefore, maintain Canadian Naval influence in the same way.

The kind of activity which British Commanders-in-Chief might initiate would include:

- (a) The protection of Commonwealth lives and property which might be endangered by local disturbances.
- (b) Relief aid to Commonwealth (or foreign) communities affected by natural disasters such as earthquakes or hurricanes.
- (c) Help for Commonwealth merchant shipping in any emergency or distress.

(d) Promoting ties with other countries by Naval visits.

There are not likely to be many occasions on which the emergency tasks, set out above, would arise in the area envisaged for the Canada Station. At the same time, they might arise and we feel that it would be appropriate if the Royal Canadian Navy now assumed responsibility for them. Australia and New Zealand are responsible for these tasks on their own Stations.

Another point is that within the proposed Canada Station, naval reports on merchant shipping, movements and routine information would be sent through the Director of Naval Intelligence, Ottawa. Information from our people in the United States already passes this way and, under the new arrangement, some half dozen British Consular reporting authorities on the Western seaboard of Mexico, Panama, and certain other South American States would go direct to Ottawa. Other general intelligence now dealt with by the Commander-in-Chief, America and West Indies, would also be dealt with by your Director of Naval Intelligence.

I hope that this explanation will make the position clear and that you will now feel able to agree to form the proposed Station.

Yours sincerely,
ANTHONY EDEN

SECRET

Ottawa, January 3, 1957

Dear General Foulkes,

CANADA STATION

We have studied the draft Memorandum for Cabinet Defence Committee on which we were asked to comment in a letter dated December 3 from the Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee. In general I agree that we should do what we can to comply with the U.K. request. The Atlantic area which it is proposed the RCN should take over does not give rise to any particular political problems. The Pacific area, covering coastline of ten Latin American countries, does present, to my mind, political considerations of some importance, to which I shall refer below, commencing with paragraph 6.

2. In the first four paragraphs of the draft Memorandum, which outline the United Kingdom request, I should like to suggest two changes for the sake of completeness:

(a) First sentence of paragraph 3 to read: "... be undertaken by Canada 'within the world-wide Commonwealth framework of Naval Stations' and that this area be known as the "Canada Station".

(b) In paragraph 4, replace "The general responsibilities inherent in accepting this proposal by Canada would be as follows:" by: "The main task of the Canadian Commander-in-Chief of the "Canada Station", as described in a subsequent letter on September 9 from Sir Anthony Eden, would be 'to maintain (Canadian) Naval influence and participation in all matters relating to Commonwealth policy'. Sir Anthony further described the sort of responsibility involved as including:".

3. The remaining five paragraphs of the draft Memorandum are devoted to an examination of the military implications of the U.K. proposal, leading to the conclusion that, from the military standpoint, it has no important advantages or disadvantages, and that the Chiefs of Staff have therefore decided that there are no military objections to accepting the responsibilities as outlined. My comments on these paragraphs are as follows.

4. Paragraph 5 states that the responsibilities outlined in paragraph 4(a), (b), (c) and (d) would not entail any additional (military) commitments for Canada. I feel, however, that 4(a) concerning "the protection of Commonwealth lives and property which might be endangered by local disturbances" is subject to possible misinterpretation. As it stands, it could I think be interpreted as meaning that in certain circumstances the RCN might be expected to land an armed party to protect Commonwealth citizens and property. This in turn implies that Canada might be assuming a military responsibility in the Latin American area which has not hitherto existed or been considered, and quite unacceptable. Our responsibility under (a) should in my view be limited to participation by the RCN in the evacuation of Commonwealth (and other) nationals in an emergency, and should be clearly stated as such.

5. I am also concerned about the possible implications of the suggestion in 4(c) that the RCN would provide help for Commonwealth merchant shipping "in any emergency or distress". For example, the area of the proposed "Canada Station" includes the contiguous waters of part of Peru. That country claims jurisdiction in respect of fishing over an area extending 200 miles off its shores, and Peruvian Naval vessels have, on occasion, seized fishing vessels within that area. This Peruvian claim has not been accepted by most other countries, but pending clarification of jurisdiction in the area, it would be undesirable for the Royal Canadian Navy to accept any responsibility involving or implying the possible protection of Commonwealth fishing vessels from seizure by the Peruvian Navy. I suggest, therefore, that 4(c) be rephrased to eliminate any ambiguity on this point.

6. In addition to the military implications of this proposal, I think that the possible political implications require careful consideration. In Sir Anthony's letters of July 1 and September 9, the phrases "within the world-wide Commonwealth framework of Naval Stations" and "in all matters relating to Commonwealth policy" could, if unexplained, easily lead to a misunderstanding of the role which we were assuming. We would, I think, have to make it clear to the U.K. authorities that we were not anxious to relate these responsibilities to terms of reference such as "Commonwealth policy" or "Commonwealth framework of Naval stations". Certainly I doubt the advisability of adopting the name "Canada Station" or of appointing a Commander-in-Chief for such a station. (In any case, would the East and West Coast Commanders not have to have equal responsibilities in relation to their respective areas?) Furthermore, I think we would have to make clear that, while most willing to confer with the U.K. and other Commonwealth naval authorities on our possible naval activities in the areas involved, we were preserving our freedom to decide on a course of action in given circumstances.

7. This I think is particularly important because the Pacific area concerned covers 10 Latin American countries. We must therefore keep carefully in mind their possible reaction to our naval activities in waters off their shores, which could in turn affect our standing in the whole of Latin America. In Latin America, as elsewhere in the world, we are continually at pains to emphasize that we are free agents and our too obvious participation in a "Commonwealth framework of Naval stations" could easily be misunderstood by Latin Americans.

8. Naval visits provide a good example of the possible difficulties which we must attempt to envisage in advance. I can imagine that we may receive suggestions from the U.K. authorities that it would be desirable for the RCN to visit certain Central American countries. We, on the other hand, have in general followed a policy of not visiting Central America, where as yet we have no diplomatic representation. We have requests on hand with which we cannot at present comply from several Latin American governments, including three in Central America, to exchange diplomatic representatives, and would not want to suggest by a naval visit at this stage that we were giving more favourable treatment to one Central American country than another. Until these questions of diplomatic exchange are resolved, it is, I think, in our best interests to avoid such visits, and we ought to make this clear to the U.K. authorities.

9. In addition, paragraph 6 of the draft Memorandum has a number of political implications, and we would like an opportunity of discussing certain amendments with the Director of Naval Intelligence.

10. Because of the importance of the political considerations relating to this proposal, it seems to me desirable that the submission to Cabinet Defence Committee should be made jointly by Mr. Campney and Mr. Pearson. I should be grateful if you could let me know whether you agree with this. If you agree, I shall be glad to have a new draft prepared in this Department.

11. I am sending copies of this letter to Mr. Bryce and Mr. Taylor since Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris have previously been consulted on this subject.

Yours sincerely,
JULES LÉGER

CANADA STATION

You may recall that you approved a week ago a letter which I then sent to General Foulkes containing this Department's comments on a draft Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee prepared by the Department of National Defence on this subject.

2. Officials of this Department and the R.C.N. met today to consider the attached redraft of the Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee prepared in this Department in the light of my letter to General Foulkes. The main difficulties raised for us by the United Kingdom proposal follow from the inclusion in the proposed Pacific area of the coastline of ten Latin American countries. The meeting was informed that the Chief of Naval Staff had discussed this problem with a number of his officers and had indicated his preliminary approval of a suggestion that, to enable Canada to make a positive rather than a lukewarm reply, we should propose drawing the line on the Pacific side much further north so that it would hit the North American coastline at the border between Mexico and the United States. In this way all ten Latin American countries would be eliminated together with the political problems related to their inclusion in the Pacific area. It was agreed at today's meeting that this suggestion offered a practical and sensible way around the difficulties.

3. It was also agreed at the meeting that we might propose instead of the term "Canada Station" some such designations as "Northwest Atlantic Station" and "Northeast Pacific Station".

4. I should be grateful to know whether you would agree to the further redrafting of the Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee along the above lines, and to its consideration by the Cabinet Defence Committee, assuming it receives the necessary approval of the Department of National Defence, without further reference to yourself.⁶⁶ The Department of National Defence is hopeful that this submission can be considered at the next meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee which, as you know, has been scheduled tentatively for Monday, January 21.

UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSAL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF A CANADA STATION

Your telegram under reference contained the text of a letter from Sir Anthony Eden to Mr. St. Laurent, dated July 1, 1956, containing a proposal that the responsibility for an area in parts of the North Atlantic and Pacific Oceans be undertaken by Canada "within the world-wide Commonwealth framework of naval stations" and that this area be known as the "Canada Station". The letter also proposed that the RCN should continue to operate HMCS MAGNIFICENT instead of returning her to the RN when HMCS BONAVENTURE came into service.

2. Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. St. Laurent subsequently exchanged letters on these proposals, using Earncliffe as the channel. Mr. St. Laurent's letter of August 2 (copy attached) declined the request that the RCN continue to operate the MAGNIFICENT and requested additional information concerning the "Canada Station" proposal. Sir Anthony replied on September 3, a copy of his letter is attached.

3. Since then the "Canada Station" proposal has been carefully considered here. The conclusions reached are contained in the attached memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee which recommends that the UK proposal "for the assumption by the RCN of certain responsibilities in specified parts of the North Atlantic and Pacific Oceans" be accepted with the following changes:

⁶⁶ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

(a) instead of "Canada Station", the areas in question would have some such designation as "Northwest Atlantic Station" and "Northeast Pacific Station";

(b) the southern limit of the Pacific area would follow the parallel of latitude which meets the North American coast at the boundary between the United States and Mexico.

4. This recommendation has now been approved by the Cabinet and it has been decided that the decision of the Canadian Government should be communicated to the United Kingdom Government through the normal diplomatic channel. Would you please therefore do this, in consultation with Commodore Brock, who will be receiving instructions from the Department of National Defence to take the matter up also through service channels.

CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE NO. D-6-57

U.K. PROPOSAL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF A CANADA STATION

Until the end of World War II the British Naval Organization was based on world-wide areas of operational and administrative responsibility known as "Naval Stations". Each station was commanded by a Commander-in-Chief and each station included a major Naval base in Commonwealth or Colonial territory.

2. After World War II the lessening of British Naval influence throughout the world and the necessity for drastic economies prompted the British Government to propose that certain areas in the Pacific be made the responsibility of the Australian and New Zealand Navies, to be known as the Australia and New Zealand Stations. These proposals were accepted by the Australian and New Zealand Governments and are now in effect. The areas of these Stations are shown on the map attached as Appendix "A"†.

3. On July 1, 1956 the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom proposed to the Prime Minister of Canada that the responsibility for an area in parts of the North Atlantic and Pacific oceans be undertaken by Canada "within the world-wide Commonwealth framework of Naval Stations" and that this area be known as the "Canada Station" (see Appendix "A").

4. The main task of the Canadian Commander-in-Chief of the "Canada Station", as described in a subsequent letter on September 3 from Sir Anthony Eden, would be "to maintain [Canadian] Naval influence and participation in all matters relating to Commonwealth policy". Sir Anthony further described the sort of responsibility involved as including:

(a) the protection of Commonwealth lives and property which might be endangered by local disturbances;

(b) relief aid to Commonwealth (or foreign) communities affected by natural disasters such as earthquakes or hurricanes;

(c) help for Commonwealth merchant shipping in any emergency or distress;

(d) promoting ties with other countries by Naval visits;

(e) the administration of the merchant ship reporting organization.

5. The only military advantage offered to Canada in the proposed new Station is the provision of naval facilities at Bermuda, which include berthing space, the use of a fueling installation and some recreational facilities. This is of minor importance as the Royal Canadian Navy is already using these facilities at no cost through informal arrangements with the Royal Navy; the effect of this proposal, if accepted, will be to make the facilities continuously available by formal agreement at no cost.

6. In general, on political grounds, it would appear desirable to do what we can to comply with the U.K. request. However, in its present form it presents a number of difficulties, both political and military, which are outlined in Appendix "B". These relate to the adoption of the name "Canada Station" and to the fact that the proposed Pacific area covers the coastline of ten Latin-American countries.

7. In view of these difficulties, it is considered that the most positive reply which can be made is that the Canadian Government would be pleased to accept the U.K. proposal, as outlined in Sir Anthony Eden's letters of July 1 and September 3, 1956, with the following two changes;

(a) instead of "Canada Station", the areas in question would have some such designation as "Northwest Atlantic Station" and "Northeast Pacific Station";

(b) the southern limit of the Pacific area would follow the parallel of latitude which meets the North American coast at the boundary between the United States and Mexico (as shown in Appendix "A").

8. The Chiefs of Staff Committee considers that there are no military objections to accepting the U.K. proposal with the changes outlined in paragraph 7. Within the boundaries proposed in paragraph 7(b) it is considered that the responsibilities outlined in paragraph 4(a), (b) and (c) would entail no additional commitments for Canada, for even under present arrangements the Canadian Government would undoubtedly provide assistance to Commonwealth nationals or merchant shipping in the proposed Canadian areas in the same way that the United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand Governments would provide assistance for the whole Commonwealth including Canada in the areas for which they are responsible. Insofar as paragraph 4(d) is concerned, this responsibility would be met by the normal training cruises now carried out by the Royal Canadian Navy and no additional commitment is involved. As regards paragraph 4(e), the merchant ship reporting organization in North America has been centred in the Ottawa Intelligence area since before World War II. This organization handles reports of movements and makes possible the control of merchant vessels in war. Canada has been and is responsible in wartime for all North American ports north of the Mexican border.

9. It is recommended that the U.K. proposal for the assumption by the RCN of certain responsibilities in specified parts of the North Atlantic and Pacific oceans be accepted, with the changes outlined in paragraph 7 above.

DIFFICULTIES IN THE U.K. PROPOSAL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF A CANADA STATION

The difficulties in the U.K. proposal are of two kinds — those related to the adoption of the name “Canada Station”, and those arising from the fact that the proposed Pacific area covers the coastline of ten Latin-American countries.

2. As regards the adoption of the name “Canada Station”, this must be considered in relation to the use by Sir Anthony Eden in his letters of July 1 and September 3, 1956, of the phrases “within the world-wide Commonwealth framework of Naval Stations” and “in all matters relating to Commonwealth policy”. If we assume the proposed responsibilities, it is thought that our best interests would not be served by relating them any more closely than necessary to terms of reference such as “Commonwealth policy” or “Commonwealth framework of Naval Stations”, which could easily be misunderstood by other countries such as the United States. The possibility of such a misunderstanding arising would appear to be less if the term “Canada Station” were not applied to the proposed areas of Canadian responsibility and if no Commander-in-Chief were appointed — in fact the east and West Coast Commanders would have equal responsibilities in their respective areas. The avoidance of the designation “Canada Station” would also make it easier for us to adopt the position that, while most willing to confer at any time with the U.K. and other Commonwealth naval authorities on our possible naval activities in the areas of Canadian responsibility, we were preserving our freedom to decide on a course of action in given circumstances. If the Pacific area were to cover Latin-American countries, the above considerations would also apply to our relations with them. In Latin-America, as elsewhere in the world, we are continually at pains to emphasize that we are free agents and our too obvious participation in a “Canada Station” within a “Commonwealth framework of Naval Stations” could easily be misunderstood by Latin-Americans.

3. The ten Latin-American countries involved are Mexico, Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, Ecuador and part of Peru. As it stands the responsibility outlined in paragraph 4(a) might be interpreted as meaning that in certain circumstances the RCN might be expected to land an armed party in one of these countries to protect Commonwealth citizens and property. This in turn implies that Canada might be assuming a military responsibility in the Latin-American area which has not hitherto existed or been considered and which would appear to be quite unacceptable. It is felt, therefore, that if the Latin-American area is retained, our responsibility under paragraph 4(a) would have to be re-stated as follows:

“(a) participation in the evacuation of Commonwealth (and other) nationals in an emergency”.

4. If the Latin-American area were retained, paragraph 4(c) would require some qualification. For example, Peru claims jurisdiction in respect of fishing over an area extending 200 miles off its shores, and Peruvian Naval vessels have, on occasion, seized fishing vessels within that area. This Peruvian claim has not been accepted by most other countries, but pending clarification of jurisdiction in the area, it would be undesirable for the Royal Canadian Navy to accept any responsibility involving or implying the possible protection of Commonwealth fishing vessels from seizure by the Peruvian Navy. Paragraph 4(c) would therefore have to be amended along the following lines:

"(c) help for Commonwealth merchant shipping in an emergency or distress, excepting seizure of fishing vessels for fishing in waters where the jurisdiction is unclear."

5. Paragraph 4(d) concerning naval visits could also give rise to difficulties in the Latin-American part of the Pacific area. For example, we might receive suggestions from the U.K. authorities that it would be desirable for the RCN to visit certain Central American countries. We, on the other hand, have in general followed a policy of not visiting Central America, where as yet we have no diplomatic representation. We have requests on hand with which we cannot at present comply for several Latin-American governments, including three in Central America, to exchange diplomatic representatives, and would not want to suggest by a naval visit at this stage that we were giving more favourable treatment to one Central American country than another. Until these questions of diplomatic exchange are resolved, it is in our best interests to avoid such visits and we might have to make this clear to the U.K. authorities.

6. As regards paragraph 4(e) concerning the administration of the merchant ship reporting organization, we have not received adequate information from the U.K. authorities. However, from what we do know, it appears that this subject has a number of political implications which make it desirable that it be given further consideration before we agree to assume any responsibilities in Latin-American countries of the kind envisaged. For example, we are not clear as to the nature of the reporting organization in peacetime, and precisely how it would function. If the reporting organization consists of private individuals based in Latin-American ports where Canada has no consular representation, it would probably be unacceptable politically, since the Canadian Government would in effect be employing unofficial agents.

RAF FLIGHTS THROUGH CANADA FOR UNITED KINGDOM HYDROGEN BOMB TEST

We have received from Earncliffe an informal request for agreement in principle to flights through Canadian territory by certain aircraft engaged in the forthcoming United Kingdom hydrogen bomb tests scheduled to take place in the Central Pacific in 1957. With the approval of the Acting Minister and Mr. Campney, it was decided to apply the same procedure as that followed in the case of United States Air Force flights of this nature. As a consequence, Earncliffe has been advised informally that aircraft which are not repeat not carrying nuclear components may fly through Canada on the basis of individual flight clearances arranged in the usual way through service channels. The reply went on to say that it was considered that authorization for the transport of nuclear components of atomic or hydrogen weapons should be requested on an individual flight basis through diplomatic channels. It was suggested that if the U.K. authorities wish to do this, the details of the request should be submitted to the Department of External Affairs for consideration by the Government well in advance of the proposed time of flight.

2. Copies of the correspondence have been sent to you by bag. In the meantime it would be appreciated if you would draw this to the attention of the Minister.

UNITED KINGDOM HYDROGEN BOMB TESTS⁶⁷

STAGING FACILITIES THROUGH CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES TERRITORY

As the Canadian Government are aware, the first full-scale United Kingdom tests of megaton weapons are scheduled to take place in the Central Pacific in the summer of this year. A suitable site has been found near Malden Island some 3,000 miles north-east of New Zealand and clear of all inhabited islands. The Australian and New Zealand Governments have agreed to provide various forms of aid and support from Australian and New Zealand territory.

2. The United Kingdom Government are grateful for the authorisation already granted by the Canadian Government for flights through Canadian territory by certain aircraft engaged in the operation. In granting this permission the Canadian Government asked that, if it was desired to transit Canada with aircraft carrying nuclear components of atomic or hydrogen weapons, authorisation for such flights should be requested through diplomatic channels on an individual flight basis.

3. Planning for the transport of components to Christmas Island was originally based on the assumption that all the components would be taken from the United Kingdom to Christmas Island on the east-about route via the Middle East and Singapore, and that some of them at least would go by ship. But events in the Middle East have made it manifestly undesirable to rely upon the use of the east-about route for the transport of highly secret materials, and it is clear also that the components will not be finished in time to be taken to Christmas Island by sea. The United Kingdom Government are therefore anxious to transport the material for weapons by the west-about route using military airfields in Canada and the United States.

4. Attached as an Annex† is a statement showing the flights of aircraft which would be involved in the transport of nuclear and non-nuclear material to and from the testing site, together with an indication of the degree of risk involved. The material would consist of radio-active material outward-bound, samples of radio-active cloud eastward-bound, ordinary high explosive material and certain electronic parts. It will be seen from the Annex that the flights would carry only components for weapons (for assembly at Christmas Island). There is no question of transporting complete nuclear weapons across Canada, and there is no risk of a nuclear explosion of any sort. There is a remote risk of local radio-active and toxic contamination from the burning of certain materials should the aircraft concerned crash and catch fire. The transport of radio-active cloud eastward-bound would involve no danger in any circumstances.

5. It is not possible at this time to provide more exact information about the individual flights than is contained in the Annex; but the United Kingdom authorities would, of course, send full details of all flights, including numbers and types of aircraft, to the Canadian authorities well in advance of the flights taking place.

6. It is contemplated that the aircraft would fly on from Canada to Christmas Island via Travis Airfield at San Francisco and Hickam Airfield at Honolulu, and an approach is being made to the United States Government for these facilities.

7. The United Kingdom Government would accordingly be glad to learn whether the Canadian Government would agree to authorise flights across Canada of aircraft carrying radio-active material in connection with the forthcoming United Kingdom weapon tests, on the understanding that full details of all individual flights would be notified to the Canadian authorities well in advance of the flights taking place. The Canadian Government will appreciate the high importance which the United Kingdom Government attach to this operation as a part of their general defence programme, and the United Kingdom Government very much hope that the Canadian Government will be able to give a favourable reply.

8. If so, there are various details on which the United Kingdom Government would be glad to learn the wishes of the Canadian Government.

(i) Would the Canadian Government wish aircraft carrying nuclear components to use the same military airfields at Goose Bay and at Namao, near Edmonton, which are, by agreement with the Canadian authorities, now being used by aircraft flying for normal reinforcement purposes in connection with the operation and not carrying nuclear components?

(ii) The components would be escorted throughout by scientific officials of the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment and by the R.A.F. crews who would be flying the aircraft; but it would be very helpful if the Canadian Services could provide suitable guard detachments at the military airfields where the aircraft would land for refuelling.

(iii) It is assumed that the Canadian Government would not wish the aircraft to be inspected by Canadian Customs or other authorities, but the United Kingdom Government would be glad to have confirmation of this.

9. It is assumed that flights of aircraft carrying material other than radio-active material (details in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Annex) are covered by the authorisation already granted by the Canadian Government; but details of individual flights will of course continue to be supplied in advance through Service channels.

UK HYDROGEN BOMB TESTS — STAGING FACILITIES THROUGH
CANADIAN TERRITORY

The attached memorandum on the above subject was left by the United Kingdom High Commissioner with Mr. Pearson on January 8. Mr. Pearson told the United Kingdom High Commissioner that the Canadian Government would look into the matter at once, and try to work something out along the lines of arrangements which we had with the United States on similar overflights.

2. The United Kingdom request is for permission to overfly Canadian territory with and to land UK aircraft transporting radio-active material. Their current estimate is that five flights between March 19 and June 6 would be necessary, three of which would be single aircraft flights, and two of which would be flights of two aircraft. The UK submission includes the following assurance: "There is no question of transporting complete nuclear weapons across Canada, and there is no risk of a nuclear explosion of any sort. There is a remote risk of local radio-active and toxic contamination from the burning of certain materials should the aircraft concerned crash and catch fire." High explosive material would be transported as well as radio-active material. An approach is also being made by the United Kingdom to the United States Government for use of US facilities at San Francisco and Honolulu.

3. In our estimation the following points are relevant to our consideration of the United Kingdom request:

(a) A new dimension is added to the safety factor involved in an overflight of Canadian territory. SAC flights of a similar nature have, in the main, been north-south flights. The route for UK aircraft would be right across Canada, with whatever that might mean in the way of passage over settled areas.

(b) The landing in Canada of aircraft carrying nuclear components will have to be faced for the first time. So far as we are aware SAC aircraft carrying nuclear components have not landed in Canada. The possibility of non-scheduled landings will have to be borne in mind.

(c) In handling the UK request consideration will have to be given to precedents which we may be establishing for any later arrangements which we might wish to make with the United States, concerning the overflight by and landing of aircraft carrying nuclear components. In the MB.1 rocket case we have required an exchange of notes with the US, and have set out specifically the conditions under which it may be used over Canadian territory.⁶⁸

(d) There will probably be some requirement for us to consult with the US if the UK aircraft is to land at a field jointly occupied by Canadian and US Services. The UK note mentions Goose Bay specifically, and its use would probably require consultation not only with the RCAF, but with the USAF and the Department of Transport. Use of a field controlled by the Department of Transport would raise problems additional to those which we face in the use of military airfields, since DOT safety regulations are more elaborate than service regulations.

See Volume 23, Chapter 1, Part 2, Section a.

(e) We should perhaps give the same attention to the question of the publicity which may be attached to overflights of this sort over Canadian territory, as we have given to the matter of public relations in connection with the MB.1 rocket case.

(f) It would seem wise to stick as closely to procedures governing the overflight by SAC as we can. The UK flights could be equated to "Y" type flights which require government-to-government clearance of the programme, individual flight plan notification to Air Force Headquarters, and the use of distinctive code words. Use of these procedures would seem to be recommended for reasons both of efficiency, i.e. the use of established channels, and consistency, i.e. as between the UK and US.

4. Heretofore our handling of SAC requests of a similar nature have been dealt with exclusively between this Department, the Privy Council and the Department of National Defence. It would seem to us in this case that this consultation should be extended to include at least the Department of Transport and the Department of National Revenue. Perhaps the Department of National Health and Welfare should also be consulted. I should be grateful to have your views.

5. The United Kingdom request will have to be considered eventually by the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. I should be grateful to have your views before a submission to higher authority is prepared. I think we must assume that the Government would wish to give a favourable reply to the United Kingdom. If that assumption is correct our main task is to be certain that the arrangements which we will make with the UK for the overflight and landings should meet all essential Canadian requirements, and that we should be consistent in our treatment of UK and US requests of a similar type. I should be glad to have your comments on the points outlined above in addition to any other points with respect to the subject which may occur to you. Since there is a certain urgency attached to the subject I should be grateful to have your views in the near future.

UK HYDROGEN BOMB TESTS — STAGING FACILITIES
THROUGH CANADIAN TERRITORY

With reference to your letter of 11 January and confirming our telephone conversation, I would first of all suggest, in dealing with these matters of overflights and the carriage of nuclear components, that special security arrangements be observed and that all correspondence be addressed personally to the addressees. I feel it is extremely important to maintain security on the fact that nuclear weapons are being transported across Canada⁶⁹ as we have had occasions when this matter has been raised as a question in the House of Commons and we have recommended that, on the grounds of security, no answer should be forthcoming.

I have gone into the questions raised in your letter, and I agree with your suggestion that we should deal with this subject in a similar manner to that used in connection with the SAC flights. In this regard I have drawn up a suggested order-in-council and schedules which are identical to those used in respect of the United States authorization except that they deal only with one type of routine flight. I suggest that it would perhaps be advantageous to secure authority in a general way for this type of flight and not just a specific authority for this present series as I understand it is the intention of the United Kingdom to carry out further series of nuclear tests in Australia over the next two or three years. I am sending copies of these papers to the Judge Advocate General to get his advice as to whether this is the most expeditious way of clearing this matter.

With regard to the question raised in para. 3(d), as the United States are going to be approached by the United Kingdom for similar arrangements in San Francisco and Honolulu, it would seem to me to be appropriate to advise them that we are contemplating making arrangements for the United Kingdom authorities to use Goose Bay for this specific purpose.

You have raised the question of including the Departments of Transport and Revenue in this matter. I would suggest that it is for consideration whether it is necessary to bring them fully into the picture on this arrangement. I feel very strongly that as few people as possible should have knowledge of this arrangement and in this way we can maintain security. I would hope that we would be able to use only RCAF airfields for landing and refuelling except in a case of emergency, where I would hope that the RCAF could notify the Department of Transport officials concerned and that the RCAF could arrange to take whatever action would be necessary regarding the security and safety of these aircraft while on the ground without involving the Department of Transport. In a similar way, I would hope that, through the Privy Council Office, we could notify the Department of Revenue each time of the proposed flight and not be required to bring them completely into the picture as to the nature of these flights but only arrange to eliminate the formal necessity of customs clearance. However these are points which I feel could be discussed between Mr. Bryce, the Chief of the Air Staff and yourself.

In regard to publicity, I have already mentioned that we have refused to give information to the House of Commons on this matter and I would hope we can continue to keep this matter secret.⁷⁰

I would suggest that, as soon as I have heard from the Judge Advocate General regarding these proposed procedures which I have outlined in the attached papers,† it might be useful if you could arrange a meeting between Mr. Bryce, the Chief of the Air Staff and myself to go into these other matters and finalize the papers to be presented to the Ministers concerned.

U.K. HYDROGEN BOMB TESTS — STAGING FACILITIES THROUGH
CANADIAN TERRITORY

You have already seen the attached letter of January 16 from the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff on this subject which is a reply to our letter of January 11. We would entirely agree with General Foulkes that a meeting should be arranged between yourself, Mr. Bryce and the Chief of the Air Staff to discuss this matter further. We are not convinced, however, that General Foulkes' letter meets all the points which we raised in our letter of January 11, nor that we would entirely agree with his attitude towards the security of this subject.

2. It seems to us that it is for consideration whether it is vitally important to maintain tight security on the fact that United Kingdom aircraft will be transporting nuclear components across Canada. There is something to be said for gradually acclimatizing the Canadian public to the fact that nuclear weapons can be transported overhead with minimum safety hazard. Of more practical significance perhaps is our doubt that General Foulkes' hope to keep this particular exercise secret is well founded. Presumably the bomb tests themselves will be given a considerable amount of publicity. It seems to us not unlikely that members of the press or Members of Parliament would learn or guess the route of United Kingdom transport to and from the tests. If absolute security is maintained, we may be faced at a later stage with admitting the overflight of Canada by these aircraft and having to make this admission at a time and in circumstances which are not of our own choosing. We find it difficult to believe that there is an element of any real military security in the public knowing that these aircraft have flown over Canada.

3. To a degree this same line of reasoning applies to General Foulkes' unwillingness to consult the Departments of Transport and National Revenue. It may indeed be possible to work out arrangements which would involve very few officials in these Departments, but it seems to us that at least senior officials of both Departments should be made aware in general terms and early in the day of the United Kingdom overflights. Difficulties often occur in attempting to make ad hoc arrangements in an emergency which could be avoided if preliminary arrangements of a general nature had been made.

4. General Foulkes did not offer any comment on one of the points in our letter which we would regard as of primary importance and that concerns what arrangements we should make with the United Kingdom in order that Canadian authorities themselves should be satisfied of the safety precautions which would be taken to prevent mishap over Canadian territory. Perhaps something similar to what was done in the MB1 rocket case would be in order. Nor does his letter indicate whether or not Canadian service personnel will be provided as guard detachments (a suggestion in the United Kingdom note) when the United Kingdom aircraft are on the ground for refuelling.⁷¹

⁷¹ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

RCAF will if necessary [R.M. Macdonnell]

5. It seems to us that in the further meeting which is proposed we should raise the landing question and its implications for our later dealings in similar matters with the United States. This is not to suggest that we should oppose the landing in Canada of aircraft carrying nuclear components, but simply that the Government should be clear in its own mind what it is permitting and of the precedents it may be setting at this time by granting the permission to land which the United Kingdom seeks.

6. If you concur in our idea, that there is perhaps not the need which General Foulkes suggests for such tight security on this question, it might be well to put our views to him in a letter as a separate exercise from such departmental views as might be expressed in the meeting which he proposes.

UK HYDROGEN BOMB TESTS

1. With further reference to my letter of 16 January and our telephone conversation today regarding arrangements being made for the flights of UK aircraft carrying nuclear material across Canada in connection with the hydrogen bomb tests to be held on Christmas Island this summer.

2. In conversation with Mr. Bryce it has been agreed that there has been sufficient progress made in these negotiations to now issue an interim report to the UK in reply to their request for further specific information.

3. It is suggested that the UK authorities be informed that an Order-in-Council with "Secret" appendices has been agreed to and will be approved by the Governor-in-Council by Thursday, 21 February. This Order-in-Council authorizes the Minister of National Defence to direct the flights of the UK aircraft through Canadian air space in accordance with the schedule appended to the Order. This schedule provides for general approval of the programme by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence. It provides further that after approval has been given by the above mentioned Ministers, the individual flights will then be arranged by the Chief of the Air Staff. The Chief of the Air Staff will arrange the following:

- (a) With the Deputy Minister of Revenue for customs clearance of each flight.
- (b) Advise the Department of Transport if landings are to take place at any airfield other than military airfields.
- (c) Be responsible for ensuring safe custody if aircraft land at Department of Transport airfields.

4. The Atomic Energy Control Act of Canada requires that export and import permits be given by the Board before nuclear material can be imported into or exported from Canada. The Chairman of the Atomic Energy Control Board is arranging to issue a blanket permit to cover the UK programme of flights for these tests this summer. This blanket permit would be forwarded to the Deputy Minister of Revenue who will make the necessary arrangements for the custom clearance of each individual flight. As it is not considered feasible to expect all the aircraft to land at the designated port at Goose Bay but some may be diverted to other airfields in Eastern Canada, the Deputy Minister of Excise proposes to issue individual permits for each aircraft to avoid customs inspection and to facilitate the clearance of the aircraft.

5. It will therefore be necessary to finalize as early as possible the general programme of flights and, as soon as is convenient, the specific schedule of flights including approximate dates, description of aircraft, etc. in order that the specific permits may be forwarded to the UK before the flights commence.

6. I would therefore suggest that in order to finalize this arrangement it would be helpful if the UK could provide:

- (a) A general outline of the programme including the overall period and approximate number of flights, so that this could be approved by Ministers on behalf of the government.
- (b) The detailed schedule of flights, including dates, identifications, etc. of the aircraft in order that the process of issuing individual permits could be expedited.

Dear General Foulkes,

I refer to your letters of February 19 and 21† on the subject of flights in connection with United Kingdom hydrogen bomb tests.

I have had an informal talk with Mr. N. Pritchard, Deputy High Commissioner for the United Kingdom, in which I explained the present position as follows.

(a) We wish to have their revised programme of flights in order to submit it for the approval of the Prime Minister and certain other Ministers.

(b) The procedure as regards customs clearance, described in your letter of February 21, was outlined.

(c) Mr. Pritchard was told that a written reply to their original request would be prepared after the general programme had been approved.

(d) We agreed with the United Kingdom that there should be no publicity concerning these overflights.

Dear Mr. McCordick,

OPERATION GRAPPLE

The Department asked us recently to supply an up-to-date statement covering the following aspects of the above operation.

(a) The total number of flights transiting Canada westbound and eastbound in connection with operation Grapple, including an indication of the phasing of the flights; and

(b) A list of the individual flights carrying radio active material, together with firm dates of these flights as far as possible.

I regret that at present we do not have information which will enable us to answer the query at (a) above. We are expecting to get this information in the near future and will of course inform you immediately that we get it.

As regards the query at (b) above, the following is the provisional timetable for the carriage of radio active material by the aircraft involved in the operation:

- (a) 1 Hastings aircraft will depart Lyneham about the 27th of March;
- (b) 1 Hastings aircraft will leave the United Kingdom about the 25th April;
- (c) 1 Valiant aircraft will leave Wittering about the 6th of May;
- (d) 2 Hastings aircraft will leave Lyneham about the 8th of May;
- (e) 3 Hastings aircraft will leave the United Kingdom on the 25th of May;
- (f) It is probable that 1 Hastings aircraft will leave the United Kingdom at the end of May;
- (g) It is also probable that 1 Valiant aircraft will leave Wittering on the 21st of June.

The numbers of the above aircraft are firm (i.e. there will be a total of 10 movements of aircraft carrying radio active material). The dates of their movement are as firm as operationally possible at the present stage.

OVERFLIGHT OF CANADIAN TERRITORY BY SPECIAL U.K. AIRCRAFT

As you know we have been awaiting receipt from Earncliffe of a letter containing a general outline of the proposed programme of overflights of Canadian territory by special U.K. aircraft including the overall period and approximate number of flights so that approval in principle of the programme could be obtained from Mr. Campney, Mr. Pearson and the Prime Minister.

2. We have now received the attached letter in which paragraphs 3 and 4 contain the required information concerning those aircraft which will be carrying radioactive material. There will be a total of ten movements both east and west of such aircraft between approximately March 27 and June 21.

3. The letter does not contain information concerning the total number of flights in the programme, i.e. including those not carrying radioactive material. However we have been informed orally by Earncliffe this morning that the total number of flights, both east and west will be approximately 90-95, commencing tomorrow, March 2, and running through to the middle or possibly the end of July.

4. I understand from Colonel Raymont that Mr. Campney has already indicated his approval of the general programme. I think we can also assume that we have Mr. Pearson's approval in view of the favourable comments which he made to the United Kingdom High Commissioner on receiving the latter's memorandum of January 8, 1957.

5. As the first flight in the programme is scheduled for tomorrow there is some urgency attached to obtaining the approval of the Prime Minister for the programme as a whole.

I shall be grateful therefore if you could, if possible, obtain this approval today and let me know. I shall then inform Earncliffe and the Department of National Defence.

Dear Sir Saville [Garner]:

Ministers have considered the request contained in your Memorandum of January 8 for the authorization of flights across Canada by United Kingdom aircraft carrying radio-active material in connection with the United Kingdom weapons tests in the Central Pacific, and for the use of certain staging facilities in Canada for these and other United Kingdom aircraft engaged in the same task. They have taken into consideration as well the further information concerning the overflight programme, which your authorities have supplied through both civilian and service channels. As a result they have authorized the overflight programme under conditions which are, we understand, acceptable to your authorities.

We agreed, I believe, that as little publicity as possible should be given to these over-flights of Canada. It may not, of course, be possible to avoid some public comment, and I thought that you would be interested in knowing of our plans for handling any enquiries which may be made on the subject.

The Department of National Defence will have the primary responsibility for handling press enquiries. That Department does not propose to give any substantial reply to any press enquiries, unless the subject has first been dealt with in the House of Commons. If questions are asked in the House on the subject the Minister of National Defence will reply in the following sense: "United Kingdom aircraft enroute to Christmas Island have been granted permission to use airfields in Canada as staging bases". In the event that further questions are asked as to whether the aircraft are carrying radio-active material, the Minister's answer will be on the following lines: "The Canadian Government is aware that some of the United Kingdom aircraft involved in the operation may be carrying nuclear components in a state of safety, but if so the components will be in such form as not to constitute any risk".

We shall keep you informed in the event that it does become necessary to make some public statement on this subject. If there is any United Kingdom requirement for a public

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM

9. The Prime Minister said that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom would be meeting with the President of the United States in Bermuda from March 21st to March 24th. On hearing of this, Mr. Macmillan had been invited to come to Ottawa either before or after his conference with Mr. Eisenhower. Mr. Macmillan was unable to do this and Mr. St-Laurent had therefore suggested that he might go to Bermuda instead and hold discussions on March 25th and 26th. This had been agreed and announced in London that morning.

By that time the proposals for the United Kingdom joining a Free Trade Area with a number of European nations would be further advanced and Canada's attitude regarding it more clearly defined. Talks on this matter, in addition to other problems, might therefore usefully be held at the time. He proposed to make a brief announcement in Parliament about the conference.⁷⁴

Mr. Macmillan opened the meeting with a few words of welcome and Mr. St-Laurent replied.

GENERAL REPORT ON ANGLO-U.S. TALKS

Mr. Macmillan said that he thought that, although the details would come out in later discussions on various topics on the agenda, Mr. St-Laurent might be interested in his general over-all impression of the meeting with President Eisenhower. In his view, the few days they had been together were more successful than he had ventured to hope. The reason for this was two-fold. These discussions had been friendly and informal. He felt that he got along with Mr. Eisenhower in a way reminiscent of his past friendship with him. He had been very frank from the very beginning with Mr. Eisenhower and was delighted to find that the Americans were just as anxious, if not more so, to re-establish the former intimate relationship between the U.S. and the U.K. He felt that they have achieved this.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1957, Volume I, p. 1145.

For this result he considers that Mr. Eisenhower was the principal factor on the U.S. side. He was sure that there was a profitable and successful meeting of minds at the top which augers well in the longer term. The real test will be just how effective it is at the working level and in the shorter term. A further test will be how much conviction it carries with the public of both countries. He had been very struck by the way Dulles spoke at the off-the-record press conference and said he would be giving us a copy of the transcript.

Mr. Lloyd then said a few words about the immediate Middle East problems and said they found the Americans agreed that the U.K. and U.S. should be seen to be acting together. The Americans expressed themselves as anxious to work out a common policy. Proof of the pudding, however, must be in the eating.

Mr. St-Laurent observed that it has been his experience that Mr. Eisenhower was quite willing to look into and correct a situation where what is being done is inconsistent with what he said would be done.

À propos of cutting across the more normal channels and approaching Eisenhower direct, Mr. Lloyd mentioned that they had told him that they were very worried about the lack of U.S. co-operation with the U.K. delegation in the United Nations, which had developed even before the Suez crisis.

Mr. St-Laurent remarked that he was convinced that Eisenhower would like nothing better than to have things go smoothly between the Atlantic partners.

ATOMIC QUESTIONS

Nuclear Tests

The U.K. side then suggested that they might say a few words about what could possibly be described as the surprising development of the meeting. This development is covered in Annex II of the U.K. and U.S. communiqué,⁷⁵ and deals with the matter of nuclear tests.

Mr. Lloyd said that there was no doubt that there is a considerable feeling among the public that no country has the right to add to the hazard of radiation. In reality, if tests continue on the same scale as hitherto, they would only add 1/70 to the normal hazard of radiation and thus would not be insupportable.

In spite of public feeling, which was pronounced, the U.K. was not prepared to abandon the use of tests until they have conducted their own series now planned. However, they would like to go some way in meeting the views of the public and were prepared to exercise restraint. The U.S. view was that they did not think that any limitation on tests would be enforceable without very comprehensive international control. This is a new development, although for some time small nuclear explosions might have passed without detection. In the communiqué, the U.S. and U.K. had agreed on three steps — the use of restraint, advance notice of tests and limited observation, if the Soviet Union agrees to do the same. The U.S. regarded this as a concession to the U.K. point of view, bearing in mind the great disparity in the magnitude and frequency of requirements for tests between the U.S. and U.K.

Mr. St-Laurent enquired whether this matter had been discussed in the current meetings of the Disarmament Sub-committee. It was said in reply that these meetings were just getting underway, and it had not come up.

Mr. Pearson remarked that we were in favour of limitation of tests within a comprehensive disarmament agreement, and, if such an agreement were not possible, some form of limitation. The Norwegians, the Japanese and Canadians had put up a resolution in the United Nations on prior registration of tests with that body. He hoped that the U.K.-U.S. announcement would not go counter to our resolution.

During the discussion Mr. Strath indicated it is now becoming less possible to detect not so much the fact that a nuclear explosion has taken place but the yield of the weapon and the amount of radioactive material that had been added to the atmosphere. In the case of smaller weapons, the fission process was used and the fission products released indicated fairly directly the yield and radioactive effects. The large thermonuclear weapons, when detonated, produce their energy both from fission and fusion reactions and since the fusion process does not produce the radio-active products which fission does, one cannot relate the yield so readily to the amount of fission products released. They were now getting bombs that depended more on the fusion process and less on fission. The amount of fall-out can vary enormously in different types of explosions. The less radioactive products there are released, the more difficult it is to detect the effects of the explosion, but also of course the less harmful are the radiation effects. Sampling of the upper atmosphere would be the only possible way of telling the effect of the tests that had been taking place.

Mr. Macmillan said that he looked upon the result of their meeting as contained in Annex II as a self-denying ordinance which could be followed in due course with an East-West arrangement on the same lines. They had had a little difficulty with the Americans over registration of tests because the latter did not believe they added anything to the usual public advance notice.

At this point Mr. Pearson remarked that if we did not make any progress in the Subcommittee, it is going to become increasingly difficult to control atomic radiation if other countries, on their own, developed nuclear weapons.

Mr. St-Laurent observed that there were really two points here — the actual effect that the tests might have, and their psychological effect on the public. It was his view that in regard to the psychological effect, anything that could be done through the United Nations would at least give the impression that some sort of start was being made along the road to progress toward elimination of the hazards of nuclear tests.

There was a short discussion on whether the last sentence of paragraph 5 of Annex II implied that a similar action by the Soviet Union was required before the British and Americans would register future tests as well as to permit limited international observation of them.

Mr. Macmillan said the wording was not entirely clear on this point and that he would find out whether registration was really conditional on the Soviet Union taking a similar step, or whether the reference to Soviet compliance was intended to be restricted to international observation.

Mr. Lloyd remarked that the mutual agreement set forth in Annex II did give the West something more to talk to the Soviet Union about in the field of atomic weapons than had been the case in the past.

Mr. Macmillan explained how welcome the development of Anglo-American agreement as shown in Annex II was to him, as he had been getting many questions at home which it would help to answer. He regarded it as a bit of a move in the right direction on the part of the U.S.

Mr. St-Laurent then observed that it was his feeling that our public would regard it as progress if members of the United Nations agreed on no more tests without registration.

In a brief discussion over the possible reasons why the U.S. had not, up to now, been particularly in favour of some sort of agreement such as presented by Annex II,

Mr. Pearson suggested that the Presidential election campaign might have had something to do with it inasmuch as Mr. Stevenson had stumped very hard on the subject of limitation of nuclear tests and this would naturally inhibit the Republican Administration from following such a policy, for some time at any rate.

The "Fourth Atomic Power" Problem

Mr. Lloyd stated that a major difficulty at the present time is the intention of France to go ahead with a programme for the production of nuclear weapons. Mollet himself was believed not to favour the programme, but the French Minister of Defence had told the U.K. Minister of Defence they had decided to undertake it. France was not readily able to produce the weapon and associated delivery systems on her own. It was said to mean an expenditure of about £200,000,000 per annum, although this figure seemed high. He had received the impression that the Germans would be willing to collaborate with the French in a programme of this nature as they were not permitted, under the Paris Treaties, to produce their own atomic weapons in Germany. How does one stop this development of the possession of nuclear weapons by "Fourth Powers"? The Americans estimated that, with German help, it would take the French about a year to develop simple atomic weapons of kiloton yields, and they could achieve thermonuclear weapons in about five years. Other countries could follow — Sweden most probably, then others — and the thing could spread. The picture is a distressing one, and presents the U.K. and U.S. with a difficult choice. It had been decided, in discussions with the U.S., that neither country would in fact provide assistance to France for this programme. In spite of this, Mr. Pearson remarked, the U.S. seemed willing to provide all the fuel needed for EURATOM, although by so doing, they would indirectly assist a country like France undertaking a military programme based on her own uranium sources.

Mr. Lloyd remarked that the U.S. would be reluctant, for political reasons, to refuse to supply fuel for peaceful programmes even if that were the only practical step to putting a halt to a military programme.

Mr. Howe noted that Canada was now faced with the same problem in regard to France, who had sought to obtain 50 tons of uranium a year from Canada, about 10% of their supply, but they were unwilling to accept control over its use to ensure it did not go into a weapons programme. The problem will arise with any country having a weapons programme.

Mr. St-Laurent wondered about India, and observed that although not very many nations would attempt to carry out a military nuclear programme, it was his view that they would balk at any general prohibition in this regard.

Mr. Pearson wondered whether there was any possibility of the U.S. committing herself to supplying her allies with atomic weapons in return for commitments to undertake no local production of such weapons.

Even with such an inducement, Mr. St-Laurent thought that it would still be difficult for some nations to undertake to refrain permanently from producing such weapons.

Mr. Macmillan explained briefly the arrangement under which atomic weapons would be supplied by the U.S. to the U.K. He typified it as the case of the key in the cupboard. In effect, the atomic warheads were under the direct control of U.S. personnel in the U.K., although the delivery system was under U.K. control and the U.K. would be perfectly free, if they wished, to develop their own warheads for those weapons. He could see no real reason why other NATO countries should not receive weapons under the same conditions.

Mr. Pearson suggested that if they did, perhaps they would agree not to produce the warheads themselves. If we could not hope to succeed in keeping other countries out of the production of atomic weapons, was there much purpose in persisting with the effort to apply safeguards such as those in the International Agency agreement, at least to friendly governments who are going to have a weapons programme themselves?

(This matter was discussed further in a private meeting between Powell, Strath and Dean for the U.K. and Bryce, Léger and Crean.)⁷⁶

Uranium Supplies

Mr. Howe at this point brought up the matter of the supply of uranium to the U.K. and was happy to assure Mr. Macmillan that Canada could take care of all the U.K. future requirements. There had not been any announcement of this but he suggested that it might be a suitable topic to include in the communiqué.

Mr. Macmillan expressed pleasure at this statement and felt that it would be extremely useful to have, and indeed that it should form an annex to the communiqué that would be issued.

Mr. Strath expressed the appreciation of the Atomic Energy Authority for the cooperation it had received in Ottawa.

Mr. St-Laurent remarked that it was the Canadian view that the U.K. plan for the civilian employment of atomic energy represented a service to the world, in that it would be a demonstration that it is a practical industrial possibility to use uranium to generate power for civilian productive purposes.

Mr. Pearson posed the question of what the position of supplying countries was going to be under the International Atomic Energy Agency Agreement.

Mr. Strath remarked that the idea to have a control over the supply of uranium had been accepted but that much remained to be done in working it out.

Mr. St-Laurent enquired whether the U.S. had indicated definitely that atomic warheads would be supplied to NATO nations with the proviso of U.S. control of them?

The answer was that at last December's NATO Council meeting, Mr. Dulles announced that the U.S. would go so far as to provide dual purpose weapons, but had made no reference to the atomic warheads.

Mr. Bryce observed that from recent NATO papers, it would seem that the U.S. had in mind a second stage under which they would provide the warheads to NATO nations for these tactical weapons, once their law permitted it.

At this juncture there was a brief discussion of how the U.S. maintained custody of atomic warheads abroad.

DEFENCE POLICY

Mr. Macmillan thought that, on a very secret basis, he should give a broad picture of U.K. defence policy as it stood today.

When his administration had come into office, he felt that they really had to get a firm hold on defence policy. Of course, it had to be looked at from the point of view of the peculiar U.K. situation of being an island off the continent of Europe with responsibilities dispersed widely abroad. At the time of Korea, the policy really consisted of building up willy-nilly a defence organization to face the imminent possibility of war. Happily the menace of war receded, and in common with other countries, the U.K. had now swung over to the concept of the "long haul". In his view we were now entering a new phase. The U.K. had become a nuclear power, although in comparison with the U.S., a small one. The danger of a massive military attack across Europe had receded and Soviet intentions were more likely to be in the nature of an end run in one form or another, say in the Middle East.

It was a fact that 800,000 men cannot be effectively armed with modern weapons within the scope of present U.K. resources. Those resources, including manpower, were being seriously pressed by trade competition from Western Germany for example. At present the cost of defence represented 10% of their gross national product. It engaged 1/8 of the output of the metal using industries (which themselves produced 1/2 of the U.K. exports), and had tied up 1/2 of the scientific and technological manpower of the nation. If the programme had been carried through as planned at the time of Korea, it would now be costing £2000 million per annum; it would be £1600 this coming year if it were not cut. There was the added factor that with about 50% of the forces overseas, problems arose in the balance of payments. Although economic reasons loomed large, the need to improve the effectiveness of the forces in face of modern warfare played a major role in their present proposals.

The U.K. had decided to make a new approach to the problem, having regular forces composed of career men and equipped with the best and most modern weapons and organized in the most effective way. (This would mean highly mobile forces with adequate air transport instead of relying principally on overseas bases.)

It was their view that the sort of defence they had in mind could be achieved somewhere around 350,000 to 400,000 men and this would, over a period of years, enable them to do away with national service. On the other hand, if they could not get enough volunteers for these forces, they would have to carry on with national service, but that would mean that the Armed Services would have to be around 500,000 men. They would employ more civilians in administration, pay, ordnance, etc.

This new approach would not in any way constitute a retrenchment from their world responsibilities. They would contribute to the general defence of the west with the possession of nuclear weapons. They would continue to develop and extend their bomber force as their delivery system. They were going to continue research of ballistic missiles, but they had arranged with the U.S. to obtain intermediate range ballistic missiles, rather than try to produce them. By this arrangement they would obtain the missiles five years earlier than by developing and producing such weapons themselves.

It was a plain fact that it would not be possible to defend the U.K. in the next war. The British people realize this and accept it with their usual phlegm. Eight or ten thermonuclear bombs would put them out. They would therefore not plan to try to have enough fighters to defend the island but just the bases of the deterrent striking force. Manned aircraft can no longer really provide a defence against bombers, and against ballistic missiles they have no chance at all.

At the same time they were furthering the development of a guided weapon air defence system.

They planned to have a central reserve of army forces in the U.K. This was to be a really well-organized reserve, supplied with enough air transport to be really mobile. This would reduce the need for stationing forces in overseas territories. The stationing of troops abroad was unpopular, not only in the territories in which they were located, but with the troops themselves. They would still maintain small forces in certain dependencies as an aid to the civil power. They had, however, learned that nationalism and static formations overseas are not compatible. For example, they would eventually be getting out of Libya and would be reducing their contributions to the budget of that country (though they hoped the U.S. would take it over). To protect their vital interests in the Arabian Peninsula and the Persian Gulf, they would maintain land and air forces based on Aden, with a strategic reserve in a base in East Africa, frigates in the Gulf, and a Naval carrier task group. They would continue to support the Baghdad Pact and SEATO. In the case of the former, their contribution would be a light bomber force armed with atomic weapons based on Cyprus. They would have no land forces in the area. In Southeast Asia, they planned to maintain their air strength, but reduce their land forces in Malaya. The Hong Kong garrison would be reduced to that required to keep law and order.

In the case of NATO, their new approach to defence had the danger of being represented as a weakening of U.K. power, but Mr. Macmillan felt that it would, in the long run, be appreciated as simply a good form of rationalization of forces. It would be a more hard-cutting force, and not so overblown. At present they had too much staff and tail.

In Germany, the British Army of the Rhine would be reduced from 77,000 to 50,000, re-organized into one armoured and five infantry brigade groups, which in their view were far more suitable for modern warfare than the present organization.

Actually the "teeth to tail" ratio under the current system was 55 fighting men to 45 in support thereof. Under the reorganization, this would be changed to 65 — 35. As a result, the effect of the cuts on the real fighting strength will be small.

The Navy had the advantage that they were always able to recruit, and it was his intention to capitalize on this. He felt that the Navy should be modernized and be given real tasks to carry out. The number of ships declared to SACLANT would be reduced, but in point of fact this was only a paper reduction as the vessels were obsolete under the conception of major war today. Their Naval forces would henceforth be organized around the carrier. He felt the Phase II concept of the Forces at present was an illusion and very expensive.

Mr. Macmillan observed that quite a number of people are going to be upset over their plan for reorganization. In particular it would affect those who think more of numbers than of efficiency. In France, for example, Mr. Mollet thinks this way. His view is that the more British subjects, including dependents, there are in a position of danger, the more assurance there would be of U.K. assistance. Adenauer is likely to take it very badly as he is fighting an election over conscription.

At this point Mr. Howe interjected some remarks on the subject of the fantastic duplication of effort and expenditure of money going on in the development of new weapons in Canada, the U.S. and the U.K. Would it not be possible to have a study group recommend how development work should be allocated? Mr. Macmillan indicated some sympathy for this concern.

Mr. Lloyd continued with a review of the recent negotiations in London.⁷⁷ It was wrong for anybody to have the impression that the U.K. had suddenly confronted WEU and NATO with a fait accompli. They had really suggested as long as 18 months ago that something would have to be done along this line and asked that a reappraisal should be undertaken. He then reviewed the original U.K. proposal to reduce their forces on the continent by 27,000 in about a 12-month period and the reduction of the second tactical air force by about 50%. He mentioned SACEUR's comments on phasing of reduction, the possibility of rotation of air squadrons and the retention of the strategic reserve in Germany. He pointed out that as far as the first comment that SACEUR made, the U.K. had been willing to agree. In 1957-58 they would reduce their forces in Germany by 13,500 and these personnel would be mainly administrative and anti-aircraft units. They agreed to examine SACEUR's second proposal. The third one was very difficult. However, just a few days ago, they had agreed to re-submit to WEU in October the question of the second 13,500. In doing so, they made it pretty clear that in their view 8,500 would have to be withdrawn but the location of the 5,000 balance would be gone into sympathetically.

Noting the reduction in the second tactical air force, Mr. St-Laurent enquired whether this meant that SACEUR would expect other nations to make up the gap. In reply, it was suggested that SACEUR's plans for the future and the fact that the Canberra light bomber force is to be armed with atomic weapons would make up for the reduction in the second tactical air force, in addition to the creation of the medium bomber force in the U.K. which would be in support of NATO.

Mr. St-Laurent continued with the observation that one peculiar difficulty which we have had to face is that we have forces in Europe at all, in view of the problem of manning the Warning Lines in Canada. It seems peculiar to many Canadians for us to have our men in Europe, while the Americans have about the same number in Canada. There was the real difficulty that these Americans are stationed, by nature of the Early Warning System, in remote places where populations are small and therefore the American impact upon them is considerably greater than it would be in established larger communities in Europe or elsewhere. However, the defence of the American bases of the retaliatory force was a necessary part of NATO's tasks and must be balanced against the need for Canada to station token forces in Europe.

Mr. Macmillan, in rounding up the discussion on this item, remarked that President Eisenhower's own reaction to the U.K. force proposals was very favourable, and he had said that they would produce more effective forces than the U.K. had at the present time.

COORDINATION OF RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Macmillan thought that there would be advantage in going back to the item which Mr. Howe had raised earlier on the subject of coordination of research and development. He felt it was silly for so many to try to do the same things. He expected that there would be some loosening now of the U.S. restrictions in the nuclear field. It surprised Sir Richard Powell to hear Mr. Howe's remarks applied to conventional weapons, as they thought that there was a very thorough and frank exchange between the U.K. and Canada on this matter.

Mr. Howe said that this is true in respect of information and it applied particularly to research rather than to development, where exchange of information did not prevent duplication of effort. Mr. Lloyd noted that they find the same difficulty even as between their services; the fact that coordination in development was not as close as it might be was due principally to "the requirement of the customer".

Mr. Macmillan noted that there is of course a currency problem and Sir Richard referred to different engineering standards. Mr. Howe felt both of these difficulties could be overcome.

Mr. Lloyd said they were endeavouring to get more common action in WEU on both development and production of weapons. The U.S. liked the idea and had agreed to consider an exchange of lists of projects on which information could be passed to WEU partners.

This part of the discussion was completed by Mr. Macmillan saying that they would look into the matter of coordination of development very carefully and see what could be achieved in this area.

Mr. Pearson reverted to the matter of U.K. reduction of forces and observed that the WEU resolution in one paragraph indicated that the common problems called for common solutions in NATO. He hoped this would not lead to others endeavouring to reduce their forces without any gain in efficiency, basing their action on the British case.

Mr. Lloyd said that he had no doubt that other WEU countries might try to use the U.K. reduction of forces as an excuse to do so themselves and that SACEUR and others would just have to be tough about it.

Mr. Pearson remarked that he was afraid that the wrong kind of chain reaction could result in a weakening of the position of the West vis-à-vis the Soviet Union; in Germany becoming too strong relatively to other Western European powers; and in difficulties at home for North American governments in maintaining forces in Europe. It was noted, however, that if the Algerian question were solved, and the French forces there brought back to Europe, there would be a better balance, and countries such as Belgium, which was devoting only 3.9% of its gross national product to defence could not really defend reductions in their efforts on economic grounds.

Mr. Macmillan noted that in the meetings with the Americans, the latter had agreed to provide the U.K. with the "Corporal" missile, which had a range somewhat like a gun. The U.K. will own the missile but its atomic warhead would be under U.S. control. The U.K. would also be provided, probably through aid funds, with the "Thor" or "Jupiter" intermediate range ballistic missile, as soon as it became available from American production. Its atomic head would likewise be under U.S. control in the U.K. The U.S. had stated that this would be provided either through lend lease or some other way which would not involve the U.K. initially in debt. These missiles would be a tremendous help to the U.K. in its programme.

The meeting by now was coming close to its end and Mr. Macmillan asked about the warning lines in Northern Canada. Mr. Howe explained briefly what was involved in the DEW, the Mid-Canada and the Pinetree Lines, which would give as much as 4 hours warning to the Strategic Air Command. It was noted that the Americans would now like to have certain types of bases behind the more northerly warning lines which, if we did not want to build them, they would only be too happy to do themselves.

In the course of Mr. Howe's remarks the estimated cost of the CF-105 was placed at $3 1/2 million.

It was agreed to meet the next morning shortly after 10 o'clock at which time items 5 and 8 dealing respectively with the Middle East and the U.N. would be discussed.

Tuesday Morning, March 26th, 1957

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Macmillan opened the meeting with the suggestion that the two Foreign Secretaries might give their picture of the short-term situation in the Middle East and then carry on to the longer-term.

Mr. Lloyd first dealt with the Gulf of Aqaba. He said that in their meetings with the Americans, it had been agreed that there should be consultation on this subject with the other maritime powers. They were in favour of securing an advisory opinion or decision from the International Court. They were agreed on the necessity to secure freedom of passage through the Straits of Tiran pending such an opinion or decision. In the United States view, UNEF should stay in Sharm al-Shaikh and the United Kingdom had suggested to Israel it should not be provocative there. There was no doubt that legal adjudication must come some day. The Americans had been asked what steps they would take if there was intervention by Egypt with U.S. shipping through the Straits. The reply had been that they would contemplate the "use of a task force". It was his understanding that the Egyptians do not have any intention at present of interfering with shipping in the Straits and Saudi Arabia's recent noises in the direction of interference could pretty well be considered just that, as they had no effective force to employ. Mr. Pearson remarked that there was some story that the Saudis were purchasing heavy cannons from Spain to mount on the channel.

Mr. Lloyd then dealt with the Gaza Strip. He said that Mr. Dulles had sent to the U.S. Ambassador in Cairo a strong message for Mr. Hammarskjöld to stiffen him on the matter of Egyptian intentions to resume responsibility in the Strip. Dulles had said that any Egyptian resumption of responsibility must be only nominal and that UNEF must have control of internal security. Before proceeding further on this subject, it would really be necessary to await the results of Hammarskjöld's visit to Cairo. If the Egyptians insist on going back into the Gaza Strip, the point would of course arise as to whether UNEF should be withdrawn. It was apparently Mr. Dulles' view at the beginning of the talks that the main problem was rather how to stop the Israelis attacking Egypt if the Egyptians return to the Strip.

Mr. St-Laurent remarked that it might be unwise to make any public pronouncement about any balance which might be achieved in the Gaza Strip. It was his view that if no one talked about it, the Egyptians would be quite happy to have control in Gaza undertaken by somebody other than themselves.

Mr. Pearson reported that Mr. Hammarskjöld had taken a strong position on the matter of internal security. Without control of this, it would be difficult if not impossible for UNEF to carry out its functions on the demarcation line. Mr. Hammarskjöld, he understood, was going to put this to Nasser as the view shared by the bulk of the Advisory Committee. If the work of UNEF were to be made impossible by Egypt and Israel, it would be impossible for Canada to remain in UNEF. He reported that the Egyptians had their suspicions of Canadian purposes (because of the link with the Western "imperialists") which were perhaps somewhat heightened in view of the large Canadian part in the composition of UNEF, and in addition some of the Afro-Asians ascribed nefarious reasons for Canada's participating in it. Should UNEF have to leave, Egypt and Israel would of course be face to face. Fearing this, Egypt might be a little more cooperative. The Indians had made noises about withdrawing from UNEF if the force were in any way to take on the complexion of an army of occupation. In their view, UNEF was the guest of Nasser and should leave at his command. It is the Canadian view that the force must be able to work properly but in order to do so it must be given every chance. He was sorry that the Americans had not in the end delivered Mr. Dulles' message referred to above to Mr. Hammarskjöld, as the latter in his talks with Nasser would be under great pressure. It was the Canadian view that the Egyptians have by virtue of the armistice agreement the same right now in the Gaza Strip as before the Israeli invasion. Mr. Pearson went on to say that the first ideas about UNEF taking over the full administration of the Gaza Strip had been unrealistic because of the vast amount of work that would have been involved. It would be satisfactory from our point of view if UNEF could secure the control over internal security.

Mr. Lloyd said that General Burns had taken up a plan to divide the administrative functions in the Strip with Egypt. This information he had obtained in a late telegram which went on to say that Hammarskjöld was returning the next day to New York and might want to reconvene the General Assembly so as to present a full report. Mr. Pearson observed that the Advisory Committee would have to meet before that was done. Mr. Lloyd continued a quick reading of the telegram which he had just received on this matter.

The Canal

Mr. Macmillan observed that McCloy was on his way out to Cairo. Mr. Lloyd enquired what could be done to keep Hammarskjöld in Cairo until he received an answer on interim management of the Canal. Mr. Pearson explained that Hammarskjöld had no mandate to negotiate on this matter and probably all he could do would be to receive a counter-proposal from the Egyptians and then return to New York with it. Mr. Macmillan enquired what should be done if Nasser took a completely obstructionist view. Mr. Pearson replied that so far the Advisory Committee had nothing to do with the arrangements following the clearance of the Canal. On the other hand, he would certainly prefer to have the Committee work on Mr. Hammarskjöld's report rather than have the General Assembly seized of it. He then went on to explain something of the way the Committee actually worked. It was Mr. Pearson's view that if Mr. Hammarskjöld came back with a depressing report, the Committee could suggest that the matter be passed on to the Assembly, which in turn could invite Egypt to cooperate to the maximum extent. Indeed, we could probably get through the Assembly our type of resolution at that time if Egypt were really shown to be recalcitrant. Mr. Lloyd remarked that he thought that Mr. Dulles would feel more in favour of the Canadian type of resolution now than he had before. Mr. Pearson reviewed the points which Mr. Lodge had expressed to him at the time they were contemplating the Canadian resolution.

Mr. Pearson then enquired whether President Eisenhower had said what would happen if the Israelis moved again into Gaza or if Nasser requested UNEF's withdrawal. Mr. Lloyd reported that Mr. Eisenhower still regards the tripartite agreement as operative, that is to say that there would be consultation amongst the parties, but the President had not been specific in saying that he would contemplate military action. Mr. Macmillan then observed that our main interest at this time was not to have a flare-up there again. Mr. Pearson thought that it would be possible to come to an arrangement over Gaza which would give the appearance of Egyptian control, but that on the other hand it was clear that Israel has no desire to have UNEF on its side of the border. Israeli obduracy on this point was unfortunately a good card for Nasser. Mr. Lloyd said that they were trying to do their best in Tel Aviv to get the Israelis to accept UNEF on their territory, and thought it would be helpful if the Israelis could agree even to letting UNEF in at only one or two places. Mr. Pearson again remarked that the Israelis have no great desire to see UNEF kept in Gaza but would like to see its departure come about as the result of Egyptian action. Mr. Lloyd agreed that the Israelis do not think much of UNEF because they are convinced that it cannot keep down the Fedayeen raids and of course its presence would prevent their reprisal system which they consider most useful. Mr. Pearson noted on the other hand that Mrs. Meir had told him that the Israelis had never said that they would not accept UNEF on their side of the border in due course.

Mr. Macmillan then gave the following brief summary. On the Gulf of Aqaba they were in favour of obtaining a decision from the International Court on the subject of the right of passage. He observed that together with the Americans, they had a strong mutual interest in keeping the situation there quiet so as to prevent precipitate Israeli action. There did not seem to have been much progress in the matter of the Canal. He wondered about the purpose of McCloy's visit, and what financial aspect he was going to investigate. Was it tolls? Mr. Lloyd then raised the subject of Krishna Menon's visit to Cairo. Mr. Pearson said that according to Krishna's own account, he had not been unhelpful in his talks with Nasser. Mr. Macmillan said that when Menon passed through London, he had mentioned that he thought that Nasser at this stage should present a prospectus setting out the terms on which the Canal should be opened once again to traffic.

Mr. Lloyd enquired what should be done if Mr. Hammarskjöld came back without a prospectus on the use of the Canal. He pointed out that Italian shipping had already started to pass through the Canal and the owners were paying their tolls directly to the Egyptians. Mr. Pearson enquired what U.K. shipping would do. Mr. Lloyd said that U.K. registry ships were not likely to start to use the Canal very soon for technical reasons of routing, etc. It would be at least two or three weeks before they could do so. Moreover the Gulf of Suez may still be mined. It was certainly unfortunate that the Canal clearance had in fact been completed before some agreement over its use had been reached with the Egyptians. The only fresh idea which the U.K. had devised was a system under which ship owners might pay full tolls to the Egyptian company, while at the same time the equivalent of half the tolls would be taken from Egyptian sterling balances in London and placed into a special account. In other words, for every £2,000 paid to the Egyptians as tolls, the British would extract a fine of £1,000 from the Egyptians' sterling balances. The Americans thought that they might do the same thing, possibly even "fine" the Egyptians a full 100%.

Mr. Macmillan enquired whether Mr. Hammarskjöld would go out again to Cairo after consultation in New York. Mr. Pearson thought that he would not do so without a much clearer mandate. Mr. Pearson then observed that he thought it very unlikely that Nasser would accept the Four-Power proposal on the Canal. Mr. Lloyd said that the original proposal might now be refined by having the full amount of the tolls paid to Nasser if he undertook to pay half of them over to a designated agency. Mr. Pearson wondered whether Mr. Hammarskjöld knew of this possible concession. Mr. Macmillan said no, that they were going to keep it as a possible bargaining factor in the event that Nasser gives a highly unsatisfactory reply to the Four-Power proposal. Mr. Lloyd then remarked that the idea of a boycott was really a non-starter, as it could not be effective. The Panamericans, Liberians, Greeks and Italians, for example, would not conform. Mr. Macmillan said that he would like to ensure that, on Mr. Hammarskjöld's return to New York, there would be consultation between him and the U.S., the U.K. and Canada as to what he should do next. Mr. Pearson observed that when Mr. Hammarskjöld returns, he should talk to the representatives of the Four Powers who had put forward the Canal proposal (the U.K., the U.S., Norway and France) before, or rather than, talking to the Committee about the operation of the Canal.

Mr. Lloyd then summarized the discussion by saying that the question of the Gaza Strip would probably eventually get to the General Assembly, and that of the Canal to the Security Council. Of course the debate in the Security Council might well end with a Soviet veto. Mr. Pearson said while that was possible, it should be remembered that last time the Canal was before the Council, progress had been made in private talks amongst the members. Mr. Lloyd thought that perhaps in their meeting they should have got the Americans to agree "not to fudge it" if the matter came up in the Council. It remained to be seen just how far the U.S. would go with firmness.

Mr. Lloyd then asked what could be done in the way of executive action at this time. Could anything be done in Cairo today? Mr. Pearson said that there was an Advisory Committee meeting at 3 o'clock and that we would have a report about it around 6 o'clock. Mr. Lloyd then went on to enquire how the Security Council could deal with the Canal and it appeared that the Council could act on it as the follow-up on the rejection of the six principles.

Mr. Macmillan then made a further brief summary. He said that on Mr. Hammarskjöld's return, he should report to the Four Powers in respect of the Canal, that the U.K. and U.S. should consider together whether to take Mr. Hammarskjöld's report on that subject to the Security Council, or whether it might be more advantageous to exert some further financial squeeze on Egypt or, on the other hand, offer Nasser a bribe of some sort so as to get him to come to a settlement.

Mr. Lloyd said that the Egyptian memorandum of the other day was not too bad as a first gambit. On the other hand, it could not be considered very good if it were to be their last stand. Mr. St-Laurent then observed that it was quite possible that Mr. Hammarskjöld may come back from Cairo with the Egyptian view that they now own the Canal, that they are prepared to keep it open in accordance with the terms of the 1888 Convention, that the height of tolls which they will charge would be reasonable, and while they might retain a reasonable profit, they would still set aside a reasonable amount for operation and development. Mr. Macmillan said that such a suggestion could probably be accepted in the short-term, but that it would perhaps be wise to continue pressing for something better for the long-term. Should we cajole or bully Nasser? Which way will the U.S. play? What mechanism should be employed to do this effectively? Mr. St-Laurent asked whether the alternative was not to have Egypt accept some form of right for the users having something to say on the amount to be expended on the up-keep of the Canal. Mr. Macmillan observed that in a case like that, he was sure that the Egyptians would not want the users represented in the form of governments, but rather in the form of ship owners. Mr. Pearson then suggested that perhaps it would be best to postpone this part of the discussion until we heard further from New York and Cairo. Just before leaving the subject, Mr. Lloyd wanted to make the point that they were reluctant to introduce SCUA into the affair at this stage as Egypt was apt to reject it at present.

Mr. Macmillan then suggested that the meeting might get on to the longer-term questions in the Middle East. There was some suspicion amongst the public in the U.K. that the U.S. wanted to replace the U.K. in its influence in the Middle East. He had been happy to learn that President Eisenhower clearly did not consider this to be the U.S. desire, and that he did not accept the theory that U.K. influence was through in that part of the world. After all, British influence was still there. The Persian Gulf was steady. Nuri remained in power. The Eisenhower Middle East doctrine was fairly obscure but the Americans had undertaken to discuss with the U.K. how it would be applied to the area. Eisenhower had observed that what was really needed was a proper joint staff study on the longer-term joint influence and objectives of the two countries in the Middle East. It would be unwise to let the French know about this, as it would be better to keep them out of such a study. The American announcement of adherence to the Military Committee of the Baghdad Pact was important, but it must be understood that they do have a general tendency to back all the horses.

Mr. Lloyd said that the Americans had been pleased with Saud's visit to Washington. Saud was in a rather difficult position and he had to watch his step carefully. He had a problem about Egyptian penetration and then there were the Palestine refugees. It was the view of the Americans, as well as of the U.K., that a rapprochement between Iraq and Saudi Arabia was necessary. It was the U.K.'s hope that Jordan would end up with Iraq and Saudi Arabia supporting it. Jordan should be kept as an independent state out of the hands of Egypt and Syria. Mr. Pearson enquired whether the Americans had talked about the long-term prospects of Israeli-Arab settlement. Mr. Lloyd said that generally the Americans believed that if UNEF could be kept in the area and on both sides of the demarcation line, the resulting pacification might enable results to be achieved piecemeal. Mr. Macmillan then observed that it was very hard to know exactly what the Americans will do when it comes down to a point. There was then a brief discussion on what was happening in Syria. In brief, nobody really knew.

Mr. Lloyd then stated that the U.S. were quite ready to accept the idea of having international guarantees for new pipelines in the Middle East, that is, guarantees in the form of a treaty between Iran, Iraq, Turkey, the U.K. and the U.S. Mr. Macmillan said that, in view of the enormous cost involved in the construction of pipelines in the Middle East, it would be a great advantage to have some sort of "1888 convention" on pipelines which he hoped would have better results than the one on the Suez Canal. Mr. Lloyd said it would be foolish to encourage the Israelis in any way to build a big pipeline from Elath to the Mediterranean coast, as it was quite possible that it might be one without oil. Mr. Pearson observed that as far as he knew the French were backing not only the little one now under construction, but also the projected big one. It was Mr. Lloyd's view that oil from Iran for such a pipeline might not be available in the future if heavy Arab pressure were to be brought to bear on that country.

Mr. Pearson then suggested that there might be some discussion on the subject of arms to the Middle East. Mr. Lloyd said that they had asked Mr. Dulles how long the current UN resolution putting an embargo on arms shipments to the belligerents was to last. Was it until the whole situation was wound up in a final settlement? The U.K. had been interpreting the operation of the resolution very strictly vis-à-vis Israel, so as not to give the Soviet Union an incentive to supply Egypt further. Probably this stratagem would not be successful, but the U.K. wanted the Soviet Union to be put in the position of being the first to break the embargo. On the other hand, the U.K. had to bear in mind that it would be unwise to do anything which might drive the Israelis, who were now fairly relaxed, back to the state of tension which had existed previously on the matter of arms. So the U.K. would probably have to have let up a bit on the strict observation of the resolution fairly soon.

Mr. Pearson thought that Mr. Hammarskjöld, and particularly Mr. Bunche, did not trust the Israelis. They had reasons for this view but it was unfortunate. The result was that Mr. Hammarskjöld was put in the position of appearing really to be in touch with one side only in the dispute.

Mr. Pearson enquired whether the U.K. and the U.S. had had any discussions about refugees in Gaza and in Jordan, and all the Ministers wondered how long it would be possible to go on supporting 700,000 people in that area through UNWRA. Mr. Lloyd mentioned that to his knowledge Nasser had stated that he had offered to re-settle 50,000 refugees but they themselves had refused his proposal, preferring to stay in Gaza with their grudge.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Macmillan then suggested a discussion about the United Nations. He expressed in warm terms his thanks to Mr. Pearson for all the understanding and assistance which the latter had given to the U.K. last fall. He said the question in U.K. minds was how to make the United Nations more effective.

Mr. Pearson said that he knew about the U.K. worries in this regard, and these were worries which Canada shared up to a point, but beyond that point Canada was not in complete agreement with the U.K. The addition of new members, in which Canada had played some part, had really been inevitable, so he was not going to express regrets about it. After all, these new members were not all on the debit side and we had managed to get in some helpful countries such as Japan, Ireland, Italy and Austria.

It was true that the Afro-Asian group could, if they worked together, block any resolution in the Assembly, but by the same token our side can make up one-third to act as an Assembly veto also. The Afro-Asians did not in practice really work together as a bloc and the experience of the last Assembly proved this. It was believed that the more respectable members of the Afro-Asian group did not want to form a bloc. Group activity would be a problem as long as each state had one vote but on the whole, Mr. Pearson felt that the record of the General Assembly was not too bad. In this regard one's judgment about the actions of the General Assembly depended, he thought, really on one's view of whether it should or should not have intervened at all last fall. The debate on Algeria had not been unhelpful and, in his view, the one on Cyprus had not done anybody harm. It would be desirable if there were more responsible membership. He knew that the U.K. felt that recent experience indicated that there was a double standard of morality in the Assembly.

Mr. St-Laurent asked whether this double standard was not the most worrisome feature of the Assembly. The General Assembly could only recommend and some governments did not pay any attention to its recommendations. The result could be that those governments which wanted to practise good international behaviours were at a disadvantage.

Mr. Pearson added that while every member could accept or reject a recommendation of the Assembly, nevertheless in some cases acceptance was not an unmixed disadvantage. Some governments might welcome the advice they received as a solution to international matters which were causing them domestic difficulties. While the resolutions on Hungary could not be implemented, it was a good thing to have passed them and to have brought world opinion to influence the situation in some way at least. The double standard was pretty well a fact of life.

Mr. Pearson said that the basic trouble at the last General Assembly was that the U.K., the U.S. and France could not work together. In many eyes the prestige and leadership of the U.K. had suffered a reverse. When these countries could not work together, the General Assembly lacked leadership.

Mr. Pearson said that it would be desirable to use the Security Council once more on matters with which it was supposed to act. If these could be returned to the Security Council, it would be just that much better for the General Assembly. It was our hope that it would be possible to continue to use the General Assembly for the purposes for which it was originally set up but this could not be done without Anglo-American leadership in the Assembly.

Mr. Lloyd said that we all realized, of course, that the United Nations was with us and that we had to work with it and through it. Nevertheless, there was public criticism of the double standard which had developed. He felt that this arose through the reluctance of a great power, i.e. the U.S., to come out with a firm policy. In their talks with the Americans they had made the point as strongly as they could that the U.S. should not "leave it all" to the United Nations. Mr. Pearson agreed that this concept of leaving it all to the United Nations was the best way of destroying the United Nations. It seemed to him, however, that recently such an attitude with regard to the Middle East just happened to suit U.S. policy. It would be quite a different thing in the case of anything that happened in Latin America or the Far East.

Mr. Macmillan noted the recent American passion for majorities and how seeking for such 2/3 majorities for resolutions resulted in leaving the Secretary-General in an equivocal position. Mr. Lloyd said he thought that Mr. Hammarskjöld recently had been unjustly criticized and Mr. Pearson remarked that he thought Mr. Hammarskjöld's main fault was that he accepted such equivocal jobs. Mr. Macmillan observed that it would be desirable in the future to try to force the U.S. to have a definite policy in the United Nations with regard to the Middle East.

Mr. Pearson said it was true that the good old days when the U.K. and the U.S. could work up a practically automatic 2/3 majority had gone. The only answer now was to work harder at securing support. It could be done and he thought that something could be accomplished with the more responsible and respectable members of the Afro-Asian group. There was then some discussion about Mr. Lodge.

Mr. Lloyd said that during their talks he found that the U.S. did not think new countries should be accepted as members of the United Nations, as it were, at once. They tended to the view that such countries should go through a period of probation on the outside to prove their peace-loving character. The U.K. could not possibly take that view with regard to her ex-colonies. Mr. Pearson suggested that such a view would tend to force these new nations into the Arab-Asian bloc and it was important to avoid this. There was a brief discussion on the activities of Krishna Menon and his role in endeavouring to create a cohesive Arab-Asian bloc.

Mr. Macmillan enquired rhetorically whether Germany would forever continue not to be a member of the United Nations. Mr. Pearson indicated that the case of Germany was analogous to that of other divided countries, none of which were in the United Nations. Mr. St-Laurent said "none except Ireland". (Laughter). Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Pearson agreed that this idea of probation was undesirable. Mr. St-Laurent observed that it was worth quite a lot to have ex-colonies come quickly into the United Nations and by our behaviour there to show that we were a good group to work with.

In regard to tactics at the United Nations, Mr. Pearson agreed that any suggestion of building up a formal Western bloc would not be wise. Mr. Lloyd observed that while there was, of course, a European group at the United Nations, they tried to keep it of such a composition that any appearance of its being a NATO group would be avoided. This was really a group for consultation purposes rather than voting. Mr. Pearson agreed that was so and that we also had a Commonwealth group for the purposes of discussions. On the other hand, the Afro-Asians were beginning to build up a very formal sort of organization for their group, complete with a chairman, etc. Although this had disadvantages from our point of view, it also had some advantage, since experience showed that the more responsible members of that group were able to modify or even to suppress some of the wilder types of resolution to which the Afro-Asians might be led, for example sanctions against Israel.

Mr. St-Laurent remarked that in spite of being unwieldy, the General Assembly had been instrumental in keeping the situation from getting worse in the Middle East. So far, it had prevented a renewed flare-up and had kept things from going too far. Mr. Macmillan said that while this was quite true, he was alarmed about the possible results which could arise should Nasser throw UNEF out of Egypt and be obdurate about the problems of the Gulf of Aqaba, Gaza and the Canal. Mr. Pearson said that if Nasser took that kind of obstructionist position, a condemnatory resolution could probably be secured in the Assembly which would facilitate the use of the right kind of national foreign policies to meet that situation. In short, it was easier to act with economic, diplomatic and financial measures in the Middle East, given the blessing of the Assembly. Mr. Macmillan evinced some interest in Mr. Pearson's remarks at that point. Mr. Lloyd said that British public opinion just would not stand another bad situation in which the U.N. was stricken with apparent paralysis. Mr. Macmillan observed that he would like to see a strong, honest resolution voted on in the Assembly even if it did not achieve a 2/3 majority and even though Nasser could not be made to comply with it.

EUROPEAN ORGANIZATIONS — "THE GRAND DESIGN"

Mr. Lloyd opened the discussion on this subject by saying that, in his view, the situation now required a closer association of the various European organizations and he referred to the statement that he had made at a recent NATO meeting on this issue. He spoke first in regard to the necessity of closer relations between WEU and NATO. It was undesirable that these should be two separate clubs. WEU should not develop too much political autonomy outside NATO. For this reason he had made the suggestion that WEU headquarters be shifted from London to Paris and he had been surprised that this was turned down by the other members of WEU. Apparently the Germans preferred to lay emphasis on WEU because the U.S. was not in it, while the Italians were influenced by the supra-national European concept. Perhaps too they hoped that the control of armaments would be continued by WEU rather than by NATO, with its American partnership.

Mr. Lloyd went on to speak about his ideas concerning a common assembly for these European organizations. He thought perhaps it should be organized like the U.N. Assembly, with a number of committees that would deal with various fields of activities. There might, for example, be a military committee, but it should not report to the plenary sessions for that would embarrass the neutrals in the assembly. Nevertheless such a military committee might provide an opportunity for the Parliamentary representatives to discuss defence matters in the general context of the assembly. Other committees might replace the Council of Europe and some might deal with cultural affairs. Another committee might discuss the reports of OEEC and other economic affairs. All the countries concerned could be members of the assembly but would choose the committees on which they wished to sit.

There would be difficulty in formulating in words the relations of the U.S. and Canada to such an assembly, though it should not be difficult to develop an effective and acceptable practice for that relationship.

Broadly speaking, the U.S. thought this concept had some appeal. In particular, they had shown a desire to be present at discussions of European defence matters, which were of vital interest to them.

Mr. Lloyd said that the U.K. had produced a working paper on this matter which, without being overly optimistic, he felt would be worth developing further. It was important that such an organization should not be exclusive, if the U.S. and Canada wished to participate in it.

Mr. Pearson said that the general principles of what was proposed seemed sensible, but it should not be developed in a manner that would encourage U.S. continentalism. He thought there should be some way of associating the U.S. and Canada with it. He had sensed an increasing feeling that European countries must develop more in the way of common policies on European questions and must endeavour to integrate their various European institutions.

ATTITUDE TOWARD GERMANY AND THE SATELLITES

Mr. Lloyd opened the discussion on this subject by saying that he was worried about the case of the West in regard to German unification and its relation to the West. This was important because of its bearing on the German elections. In the interest of Western unity, it was highly desirable that Adenauer should win the elections, although the alternative would not be as bad, he thought, as it may have looked from time to time. It was difficult to adopt a public approach which could be maintained consistently and prove popular in West Germany itself. He cited as an example a recent speech by Mr. Gaitskell about taking troops out of Germany. The basic line that the West was following was to propose free elections in each part of Germany and a free choice for the Germans in regard to their own future. Russia, on the other hand, was arguing for the "preservation of social gains" which meant the retention of Communism, and elections only by agreement between the two parts of Germany.

The policy of the Western countries had never been fully understood in Germany and even the Summit Conference in Geneva had not been too helpful. The U.S., the U.K., France and Germany had had a working party of officials drafting up a policy and the means of its presentation. Its work had just been concluded in Washington and would be resumed as required. The results of its work will be reported to NATO.

Mr. Pearson pointed out the difficulty of developing a more attractive policy in this field if no new elements could be introduced into it. While Mr. Lloyd agreed with this observation, he could not see what changes in substance could be made at this time. Mr. Pearson enquired whether they planned any contact with the Russians on this major issue. Mr. Lloyd said that he had no doubt that the Russians would make some proposals public before the German elections. He thought at some point it would be necessary to see the Russians but Adenauer was against any meeting with them before the German elections. The new British Ambassador in Moscow had seen Gromyko, but had achieved nothing on this subject in discussions with him. Mr. Lloyd concluded on Germany by saying that in the recent discussions the Americans did not themselves seem to have any new ideas on this subject of German-policy and did not wish to meet with the Soviets on the matter at this time.

Mr. Lloyd said that he had talked to Mr. Dulles about the attitude toward the satellites, saying that efforts should be made to penetrate the Iron Curtain with ideas, but not to stir anyone up to revolution. He had found Mr. Dulles sympathetic to this point of view.

Mr. Pearson noted that he had had a number of talks with the Poles at the United Nations and found them sympathetic but seriously worried about the recrudescence of Stalinism. He felt that the West should continue to be as forthcoming as possible in dealing with the Polish government, without going so far as to endanger its position by too much identification of it with the West. He noted that Canada has recently sold a substantial amount of wheat to Poland on credit and might well be in a position within some months to return to Poland some of the national art treasures that had been left in Canada. The attitude of the Polish population in Canada was now becoming more favourable to the Polish government.

FAR EAST AND CHINA TRADE

Mr. Macmillan said that he had raised the topic of China with the Americans and in doing so explained that there were, from the U.K. view, two aspects of it: (a) the constitutional or U.N. membership aspect; and (b), the trade or strategic control aspect.

He had explained to the Americans that as time went on it was becoming more and more absurd that Communist China was not a member of the U.N. It was true that at home the feeling about the constitutional aspect was not as strong as public criticism in connection with trade controls on exports to China. Although the Americans and themselves were unable to come to any appropriate mutual agreement on the matter, Mr. Dulles and Mr. Lloyd had drawn up a paper of understanding which at least clearly indicated each other's views.

Mr. Lloyd, in explaining the approach they had taken with the Americans, remarked that up to now the U.K. had taken the initiative in furthering the principle of a moratorium on China's membership in the U.N. On the second aspect, they had suggested to the Americans that both governments should draw up a coordinated list of prohibited goods. It would be applicable not only to China but also to the rest of the Soviet Bloc. They did not find the Americans too receptive to this idea inasmuch as the latter were determined still to have a Chinese differential on the prohibited, limited and watch lists.

Returning again to the matter of membership, Mr. Lloyd said that logically the de facto régime in China was entitled to a seat. On the other hand in the U.S., should China be seated, there would be strong pressure on the government to leave the U.N. The Americans had told them there would be a serious risk of Congressional reaction and that that was a continuing problem for them which gave no grounds for hope in the future. The Americans had explained that the U.S. had two fronts. The Atlantic front had considerable depth because it comprehended not only the Atlantic Ocean but also the countries of NATO. In contrast, the Pacific front had very little depth at all and really consisted only of a few island outposts in the Far East. To yield the seat in the U.N. to Communist China, apart from the effect it would have on the voting structure in the U.N., would undoubtedly bring about an eroding of the strength of the island screen. To some extent the U.K. could appreciate this view inasmuch as they have their worries over the position of Hong Kong.

Referring to the trade question, Mr. Lloyd said that the U.K. could not continue to tolerate the differential and he thought that they had convinced the U.S. of that fact. For example, what really was the difference between sending tractors to the Soviet Union which would reach China in due course, and sending them to China in the first place? He went on to say that the immediate national problem for them was the moratorium, as it might be upon us from week to week in subsidiary bodies of the U.N. Until now, the U.K. had justified their support of the moratorium on the ground that until enough agreement had been reached among members for Chinese admission, to do otherwise would bring too much of a strain to bear upon the workings of the U.N.

Mr. Pearson noted that, when the subject came up in the last General Assembly, 24 had voted in favour of admission and that was not as many votes as had been expected. He thought that there was no problem with regard to subsidiary bodies of the U.N. and that it could in any case be held off until the next General Assembly, as membership in subsidiary bodies was first decided in the Assembly. The situation should be reviewed just before the next General Assembly, as it was his view that China's membership could not be held off much longer. Of course Canada had not yet recognized Communist China de jure. He felt that the West had been fortunate to get away with the last Assembly vote on membership.

Mr. St-Laurent explained that the problem of Communist China did not concern Canada in the same way it did the U.K. There was not much real public concern in Canada on the subject. There were, of course, two views: some people would be unhappy and extremely critical over the admission of China to the U.N., while there would also be some who would express their satisfaction at the outcome. Actually it was more convenient for the Canadian government if the question did not arise just at this time.

On the trade question, too, Canada was in somewhat different position because her trade with China was not of comparable importance to that of the U.K. He thought that the watering down of the embargo would have little effect on our trade.

Mr. Howe observed that Canada always maintained an open border with the U.S. If Canada were to become a backdoor for trade with Communist China, he thought that there was no doubt that she would get in trouble with her American friends. He was not enthusiastic about trying to press beyond the distance the U.S. is willing to go in this matter. When one came down to brass tacks, he really saw no reason for the China differential. Because of the nature of her exports, the China List was for all practical purposes a complete prohibition for Canada. He was not in favour of opening the trade side without diplomatic representation in China. However, if others could arrange it, Canada would be happy to have an agreed common list.

Mr. Lloyd remarked, and he said that he had told the Americans this, that it was his feeling that ever since the Hungarian affair the force of political pressure at home on the membership question had lapsed somewhat but on the trade front it was still heavy.

Mr. St-Laurent said he wished the U.K. all possible luck in endeavouring to arrange with the Americans to reduce the list of prohibited exports to China as, of course, the outcome might possibly be of advantage to us in regard to increasing exports from Canada to China.

Mr. Lloyd said that the fact that political pressure in the U.K. had reduced as far as seating China was concerned had been received by Mr. Dulles with some relief, and that the latter had told him that this would make it easier for the Americans to deal in some way with the trade aspect. It was peculiar to see, on the one hand, the U.S. buying practically the whole of the hog bristle output of Communist China via Japan with apparently no qualms on the part of the American public, and on the other hand, considerable opposition from the U.S. to the U.K. wishes to sell 50 tractors to China.

Mr. Pearson said that he had felt for some time that American public opinion against the recognition of Communist China was not as great as Washington indicated; the opposition really centred to a significant extent in the China lobby and Mr. Walter Robertson. He thought that the U.S. could get away with more than they were willing to let on.

This discussion was concluded by Mr. Macmillan remarking that the matter of China's membership in the U.N. could not be held up very much longer.

TRADE QUESTIONS

Common Market

Mr. Howe opened the discussion by saying that we were interested in the possible effects which the establishment of the common market would have on agricultural products and on European customs tariffs and restrictions. He recalled with pleasure the visit last year to Ottawa of Mr. Thorneycroft who had been very helpful in explaining to us European thinking at that time. It was his view that if, upon the establishment of the common market, we could hold the access for agricultural and other products which we already have in Europe, the net result would be satisfactory to us. He would like to know, however, how the outlook was now in that regard.

Mr. Macmillan said that when he had been in Washington last September, he had expressed the dilemma in which the U.K. would find itself should the common market be established. The U.K. realizes that it could do one of two things: (a) join it in a free trade area with all the future risks of competition and with the advantages of a larger base for markets; or (b) keep out of it and deal with it as a whole, subject to its tariffs. He explained that, in the U.K. conception, the free trade area is one for manufactured goods, within which tariffs on such goods would gradually be reduced. All the European nations regarded agriculture as a thing apart. Whatever they might say, it was his impression that these countries would do everything possible to protect their agriculture. If the result of establishing the common market were simply to enhance the productivity and the competitive position of German industry, he felt that all U.K. markets in and outside Europe would be in danger. In order to head off that outcome, the U.K. had made the proposal of associating itself with the common market through a free trade area.

The U.K. was very concerned about the way things had been developing recently. As far as agriculture in the common market was concerned, the members seemed to be intending to have some kind of control system, and he thought that the result might be something to which both Canada and the U.K. would have objections. The French were particularly in favour of this as they were a high cost agricultural producer. They faced the choice of either protecting their high cost production or trying to reach a solution through devaluation, but the latter course would in itself be disastrous because wages in France were coupled with an automatic index clause. He thought the French were trying to use the mechanism of the common market to secure every possible advantage and thus avoid the necessity of really tackling their domestic problems. The proper economic solution was to a large extent politically impossible for them. Some concessions which had been made to France at least were supposed to be temporary and related to the nature of their social security system. U.K. manufacturers were concerned lest these temporary concessions would end up as permanent, built-in advantages for France. Generally, U.K. manufacturers were prepared to take the risks of competition but the less well-organized were not happy about the prospects.

Mr. Macmillan reported that two days before the signing of the common market treaty, the French had persuaded the Germans and others to include the overseas territories. This presented the U.K. with another serious problem. It could result, for example, in bananas produced in a French possession entering the market with a great advantage over the traditional British product from the Bahamas. If the common market in which the overseas territories were included were to have a relatively low tariff for such imports, it would be tolerable but if the level of tariffs were, say, 20% or 25%, there would be a big problem for U.K. overseas territories.

The great question was whether the common market would result in a trading structure designed to increase trade within the area and thus reduce costs, while having a moderate level of tariff on imports from outside, or whether it would be a high-cost producing area sheltering behind a high tariff. Until the O.E.E.C. report has been received and negotiations undertaken, one cannot tell whether it is profitable for the U.K. to press on with its plan for the free trade area. The terms of the treaty were not yet known and it was not clear whether in fact the spirit is protectionist or otherwise.

Mr. Howe said Canada would be very disturbed if the common market was a high-cost one surrounded by a high trade barrier. He hoped that if the colonies came in to the common market they would be right in, and the tariff would be the same all around including the colonies. GATT will have a lot to say about this. The establishment of a common market will upset the whole trading world in many ways.

This part of the discussion ended with Mr. Macmillan observing that it was his opinion that the Germans had given in to the French on the inclusion of overseas territories on Chancellor Adenauer's direct instructions.

U.K. Trade with North America

Mr. Howe opened this subject by expressing Canadian appreciation of the increasing level of U.K. exports to and imports from North America. This favourable development had, in his view, come about principally because the U.K. in recent years had had more goods available to export; he believed this trend would continue. He thought, however, that he should point out that in this trade there were growing Canadian irritations about little things. For example, the U.K. had import restrictions on such Canadian exports as canned salmon and lobster, canned fruit, apples and cheese. It irritated the Canadian exporter that permits were required for these products when in fact we had not in all cases been able to fill the quotas available to us. It was his view that if the U.K. did away with permits on these products, it would not cost the U.K. much. Demands were made in Canada from time to time for import quotas and the U.K. was cited as an example of what is acceptable. It was not possible to go on forever with an open market on one side and restrictions on the other.

Another thing which was bothering Canadian exporters was the U.K. restrictions on the import of chemicals from Canada while these were allowed in from Germany. We were interested particularly in pentaerythritol and polyvinyl chloride, as examples where restrictions had been re-imposed against us after being removed.

He hoped that the Continuing Committee of officials that deal with Canada-U.K. trade could be given a little latitude to do something about such causes of irritation. He concluded by saying that Canada would be glad to do something on its side to make their life happier in the U.K. in regard to matters of this kind.

Mr. Macmillan agreed that these small but bothersome problems should be looked into at the May meeting of the Continuing Committee.

The Caribbean

Mr. Macmillan said the problem of the West Indies was to meet their desire to be free yet to have more economic aid. Perhaps some sort of joint economic development plan could be developed and he thought this might be discussed with Canada because of its great interest in the area, and then perhaps with the United States.

Mr. Howe said the West Indies represented a handy market, although not a big one for Canada. Exports to the West Indies had been on a token basis for a long time and Canada is always complaining about our trade difficulties there. Canada would only want to consider aid to the area in connection with arrangements for trade with it. Canada would like to get the same sort of freedom of trade that she had in the area before the war. In his view it was a matter of trade and aid rather than trade or aid. (In so far as the Americans came in, Canada would prefer to see them in for aid rather than trade.)

Mr. Macmillan observed that broadly speaking all the islands of the West Indies have in the past drawn on the U.K. for assistance and they would accordingly claim that upon becoming independent, they ought to have some sort of Colombo Plan for a period of 5 or 10 years. He thought that the West Indians would need realistic advice from those whom they respected to acquire the right perspective in this matter.

Mr. Pearson suggested that it might be possible to bring the West Indies into the Colombo Plan in some manner and a little of the aid given through the Colombo Plan could be diverted to the West Indies. The educational value of West Indian participation in a broader plan of that nature with other countries would be substantial.

Mr. Howe observed that if a trade agreement which would re-establish pre-war conditions of free trade could be signed by Canada and the West Indies, he thought that considerable private Canadian investment would be made in that area.

Mr. St-Laurent said that if we could have a trade agreement which resulted in a greater exchange of goods, this would increase contacts between the two areas and heighten Canadian interest in the West Indies. It would thus be easier for the government to contemplate giving some assistance to the long-term buildup of their economy on the grounds of long-term Canadian self-interest.

Mr. Macmillan felt that if a Colombo-type plan was developed for the West Indies, all kinds of other people in the general area, such as Haiti for example, would want to come in to it.

Mr. Pearson said that he thought that, perhaps, would be so if a separate plan for the West Indies was devised, but if the West Indies were merely to be included in the existing Colombo Plan, it ought to be much easier to keep out other aspirants.

Mr. St-Laurent was not quite sure he agreed with that view. Technical assistance and private investment might well be enough to look after their needs. Canada already provides a subsidized steamship service to the West Indies which had been undertaken to support our export trade. Something of this nature might be continued.

It was understood on both sides that the matter would be studied further.

Travel Allowances — Dollars for Visitors to Canada

Mr. St-Laurent opened the discussion on this item by saying Canada had in mind the indirect and intangible benefits to be derived from an increase in visits of the people from the U.K. to Canada. Increased personal contacts could not fail to enhance the friendly feelings and relations of our two nations.

Mr. Howe added that we were not thinking of this item as a matter of trade, but it seemed odd to find the U.K. permitting the expenditure of $200 million for travel to the Continent while restricting the expenditure for travel in dollar countries to $14 million.

Mr. Macmillan gave a brief review of the categories of people who were eligible for travel allowances to North America and said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would keep this subject under review and give it a high priority. Fares across the Atlantic were pretty high and relatively few people could afford to go. At this moment the danger of a sudden increase of expenditure under a more relaxed travel allowance system would not be great because already the trans-Atlantic travel facilities were heavily booked for this summer. However it would not be right to take this step of relaxation just after having made emergency financial arrangements with the U.S. in regard to their loan.

COMMUNIQUÉ

At this time a draft communiqué was discussed, amended in a number of particulars and then approved for issue to the press.⁷⁸ (It had been decided that the Prime Ministers and their colleagues would meet the press jointly at 6.30 that evening.)

CYPRUS

(A brief discussion on this subject had taken place, in the absence of the Prime Ministers, at the end of the morning session.)

Mr. Macmillan commenced this subject by saying his government were now worried about its real value in a defence programme such as he had described. He gave a brief history of the Cyprus problem, emphasizing that there were two aspects to it — the international and the internal. The international aspect was currently in the hands of Lord Ismay who was trying to see what could be done through NATO conciliation. Turkey and the U.K. had agreed to this approach; Greece had not but now might be reconsidering it. He thought that as far as the internal situation was concerned, the Radcliffe Report had provided a good basis for settlement. The terrorist campaign was reaching exhaustion. Makarios was known to be the chief inspirer and supporter of the terrorist campaign and if he said to stop, it would. They had made him an offer, but the U.K. had not really decided what to do when they received his reply which was likely to be in the form of a counter-proposal.

On the longer-term issue, Mr. Macmillan thought that unless it was of great value to be U.K. for the purpose of their participation in the Baghdad Pact or NATO, it was his view that some way should be found to extricate the U.K. from the island. The Cypriots derived two advantages from the present arrangements: they were British subjects, free to enter the U.K. at will, and they enjoyed a relatively high standard of living on Cyprus by comparison with those on the Greek Islands. It was possible that when they became self-governing, the Cypriots might decide to retain this high standard of living which their connection with the U.K. made possible, rather than to ally themselves through Enosis with Greece.

Mr. Macmillan said that there had been some willingness on the Turkish side to accept partition as a solution. He thought that it was an advance that NATO was moving into the picture and that the terrorist campaign was slowing down. As a result, he thought there might be a time in the next few months when a more constructive approach of some form might be possible. He observed that up to now it had been the view of his military advisers that full administrative control of the island was an absolute necessity for their purposes. By now this opinion had been modified and probably an airbase under British control would be sufficient.

Mr. Pearson said that it would be a great advantage if the U.K.'s own interest led it to a solution that would be acceptable to the others involved. Cyprus in the present circumstances had been seized upon by those who wished to be mischievous as a stick with which the beat the U.K.

See Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 9, No. 4, April 1957, pp. 131-132.

Mr. Lloyd observed that the Turks are the substance of the Western strength in that area, and it was necessary to find an answer to the Cyprus problem that would not weaken the very favourable Turkish orientation towards the West.

Mr. Macmillan said that partition was not an impossible solution. Mr. Pearson said that a recent discussion with Averoff made him feel the Greeks were quite worried about partition.

Mr. Macmillan concluded the discussion by saying that they would keep Canada in touch with their thinking on the Cyprus problem.

KASHMIR

Mr. Lloyd opened by remarking that what the Indians were saying about the U.K. in connection with Kashmir was not true. Over the last few months, the U.K. had tried very hard to hold the Pakistanis back rather than to encourage them in their attempts in the Security Council to force a solution to this dispute.

Mr. St-Laurent observed that he thought that the Indians did not really believe that the U.K. had espoused the Pakistani cause in the dispute, but they would rather discuss that than the merits of their case.

Mr. Macmillan said that a quarrel with India would be a very grave and disturbing eventuality. Much was at stake as far as the British were concerned. They had considerable investments in India and enjoyed much friendship with its people. If Nehru in anger or folly tried to turn India away from the West it would be tragic and dangerous for us. On the other hand Pakistan was vital to the Northern Tier alliance and to SEATO. The U.K. were faced with a very difficult situation by this quarrel over Kashmir. If at all possible, he would like Canada to take advantage of any opportunities which might arise to see what could be done to develop a solution to the Kashmir issue. He wondered if, on the one hand, the Pakistanis would give up their sentimental claim to the Vale, India would, on the other hand, agree to help Pakistan on the river question and possibly give them a territorial concession in the Punjab.

Mr. Lloyd suggested that the logical solution would be for Pakistan to keep what it has, for India to keep Jammu and for both countries to have a condominium over the Vale for a 10 year period. He did not think, however, that a logical solution such as this would now be acceptable to either side.

Mr. Pearson said that the Indian view was that any solution which would disturb the status quo would give rise to serious communal strife throughout the sub-continent.

Mr. St-Laurent added that Mr. Nehru used much the same argument three years ago, when speaking to him on Kashmir, and had been quite forthright in telling him that Westerners had no real understanding of the Eastern mentality on this delicate issue.⁷⁹

Mr. Lloyd observed that a plebiscite in the Vale would amount to a vote on the Koran and that the danger of a spread of communal strife would be very real. Mr. Pearson thought this argument on communal strife could not be dismissed. It was his impression that it suits the book of some Pakistan political leaders to keep the Kashmir issue alive for domestic reasons.

Mr. Macmillan said that there were two problems: first, whether it was possible to find a solution; and second, how Western nations should proceed in the U.N. so as not to exacerbate the situation. He felt that the Pakistanis would not be satisfied until they got the matter into the General Assembly for discussion. Mr. Pearson understood the Soviet ⁷⁹ Voir/See Volume 20, Document 438.

Union had abstained in the crucial vote in the Security Council so as to keep the dispute out of the General Assembly because it seemed most likely that if it were to go to the Assembly, the Afro-Asian group would have split on religious lines.

Mr. Pearson said that he had hoped that after the Indian elections the problem might become a bit easier of solution but just a few days ago Mr. Nehru had made a violent speech on the subject.

Mr. Macmillan wondered what line the U.K. should take when the Security Council again discussed the dispute. Mr. Lloyd thought that there really ought to be a plebiscite at some stage. Mr. St-Laurent observed that he was not sure that the Indians really wanted to maintain a source of friction between India and Pakistan. On the other hand, he believed that Nehru wanted Kashmir in India and will discuss every side issue rather than the merits of holding a plebiscite, which would be sure to go against him.

Mr. Lloyd asked if Canada would use its influence with the Indians to assure them that the U.K. had not put up Pakistan to go to the Security Council. Mr. Pearson reported that Canadians have already tried to do just that. He thought that in time the Indian suspicion of U.K. action in this regard would disappear.

In continuing the discussion, Mr. Pearson remarked that the new Pakistani Prime Minister was an astute politician and that he could make the Indians very uncomfortable over the issue of self-government for Kashmir. Sir Saville Garner thought that Suhrawardy is more likely than any of his predecessors to be the sort of man with whom Nehru could in due course make a deal.

There was a brief discussion upon the nature of the relationship between the conduct of the Kashmir dispute in the Security Council and the Indians' helpful initiative on the final resolution on Cyprus in the last Assembly.

Mr. St-Laurent said that with regard to Mr. Lloyd's request, Canadians could talk with Nehru about the apparent Indian views of the U.K.'s part in the matter but could not talk to him about the merits of the Kashmir issue.

At the conclusion of the meeting, Mr. St-Laurent expressed appreciation for the hospitality and convenient arrangements provided to the Canadians who had come to Bermuda for the meetings, and Mr. Macmillan said that he and the others from the U.K. were grateful to Mr. St-Laurent and his colleagues for coming to Bermuda for these discussions.

THE FOURTH ATOMIC POWER PROBLEM

Sir Richard Powell, Mr. Strath and Mr. Dean had a further discussion this morning with Mr. Bryce, Mr. Léger and Mr. Crean.

2. The United Kingdom Representatives described the approach which the French Minister of Defence had made to Mr. Sandys and the discussion which they had had with Admiral Strauss and other members of the United States Delegation. It was clear from this that while the gravity of the problem was fully recognised, neither the United States nor the United Kingdom had at present any firm idea how it might be solved or indeed whether it was capable of being solved at all.

3. The United States did not wish to give any active assistance to Fourth countries so long as there was any hope of an effectively controlled disarmament agreement. They were not, however, prepared at this stage at least, to use sanctions such as denial of access to supplies of nuclear material for civil purposes, in order to induce Fourth countries to abandon any plans they might have for making nuclear weapons. Nor did it appear that they yet had any firm policy for supplying such countries with nuclear weapons produced in the United States.

4. The Canadian Representatives explained the difficulties in which they might find themselves in dealing with requests from Fourth countries for supplies of uranium. They already had an immediate problem in relation to France.

5. It was agreed that the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments should keep each other informed of developments in this matter, on which it was obviously desirable that there should be a community of view.

6. The Canadian representatives indicated their intentions to discuss the Fourth Power atomic problem with the U.S.

7. The United Kingdom Representatives agreed to explore further the feasibility of exercising some measure of control over the problem through W.E.U., but doubted whether this would be acceptable to the United States.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH AN AWAKENING AFRICA

We have been giving some thought to the implications for Canada of recent and future developments in the continent of Africa. While it would be premature to say that we have reached any conclusions, you may wish to know of the lines along which we have been thinking.

The decision to study these African problems has been hastened by the following events:

(1) the publicly announced undertaking of the United Kingdom Government to grant independence to the Gold Coast by the end of 1956 and subsequently to Nigeria (1958) and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (1960-62). The Under-Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations told me when he was here in October that it was the intention of the present United Kingdom Government, during the life of the existing parliament, to grant independence to these three African territories (and also to the Federation of Malaya and the British Caribbean Federation). Although the timetable for its independence may be set back by the growth of separatism in the North, there is little doubt that the question of the Gold Coast, at least, will be raised at the Prime Ministers' Meeting in June and that the Prime Minister may be asked to define the Canadian position;

(2) the declining influence of the United Kingdom and the dangerous possibility that the U.S.S.R. may increase its influence in north-east Africa and the Middle East. The withdrawal of the British from the Canal Zone and from the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan has created a power vacuum similar to that created when the British withdrew from the North West Frontier of what was then India in 1947. Indications are that the U.S.S.R. may be able, for various reasons, to take swifter advantage of this withdrawal than they were of the earlier one;

(3) the growing strength of the anti-colonial powers in the United Nations, recently increased by the addition of six new anti-colonial members, when the proposal for the admission of new members secured acceptance. While many of these powers have shown an inclination in the current General Assembly to be more responsible than in the past, and some (e.g. Iraq and Pakistan) have been markedly anti-Soviet, nevertheless the opportunities which their growing strength gives to the U.S.S.R., at little or no cost to itself, to propagandize, meddle and generally make trouble in the African area, are considerable;

(4) the emergence of new independent African nations in the British territories may make things difficult for the French, Portuguese and Belgians. We wonder whether the speed at which the United Kingdom proposes to proceed with political emancipation, particularly in West Africa, may not inspire nationalist agitation in territories where the French, Belgians and Portuguese have attempted to impose a political "quarantine" until such time as there is a solid economic and social base for political participation by the native population. In addition to the possible immediate consequences of a lack of co-ordination at the policy level in the dependent territories concerned, the differences in timing and methods of the four colonial powers could cause serious frictions among the administering powers and their allies;⁸⁰

(5) finally, the necessity for the West to put forward some imaginative plan of aid and welfare for an emergent Africa, which may have the effect both of holding the line against Communism in Africa and removing from the West the taint of colonialism. While Canada should probably not take the lead in putting forward any such plan, our views would be listened to with interest because we have no axe to grind. At the same time admission of Nigeria and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland to Commonwealth membership gives us practical reasons for expressing an interest in the wider problem of economic aid and technical assistance to the African continent as a whole.

Two problems are involved: the specific question of our relations with the Gold Coast and West Africa, and the more general question of the programme of aid for Africa.

Gold Coast

We think that consideration should be given to the establishment, not later than the fiscal year 1957-8, of a Canadian mission accredited to the Gold Coast. This accreditation might later be extended to include the Federation of Nigeria. Our reasons for making this suggestion are as follows:

(1) the colony may very likely be independent by the end of 1956, or at the latest by mid-1957, and its application for membership in the Commonwealth will then be sponsored by the United Kingdom. Presumably we would not wish to oppose it. South Africa, the only Commonwealth member likely to oppose it, has recently indicated (elliptically) that it is prepared to consider the possibility of co-existence with "black" nations on the African continent (Mr. Strijdom's speech of August 1955);

(2) establishment in the area is strongly recommended by our High Commissioner to the Union of South Africa, who visited the Gold Coast and Nigeria in the summer of 1955 and learned at first-hand of their development;

(3) the British are concerned lest, when they depart, Indian influence (represented by the very able Indian Commissioner in Accra, Raja Rameshwar Rao, formerly Commissioner in East Africa) may become paramount. They fear that unless members of the "old" Commonwealth publicly show their confidence in the newest member, it may be attracted to neutralism. We may not share the concern of the British, but what is perhaps more important from our point of view is the possibility that Soviet may supersede British influence in the area of West Africa;

(4) the symbolic importance of the Gold Coast as the first all-African negro independent nation to emerge from colonial status will not be lost on the rest of Africa, nor on the anti-colonial nations or the Soviet Union. The experiment will be watched with care and we should not appear reluctant to accord the Gold Coast recognition and to establish relations with it;

(5) a mission in Accra could probably do something to promote trade in the West African area in general. The Gold Coast is high on the Trade and Commerce priority list, though they have told us informally that they first wish to undertake a thorough economic survey;

(6) the Governor of the Gold Coast believes that when self government comes there will be "a rush" to establish diplomatic missions there. India and the United States already have missions doing information and political work, and several other countries have trade offices. The Italians and Germans have applied for permission to establish diplomatic relations;

(7) when the Volta River multi-purpose project (in which the Aluminum Company of Canada is a participant) gets under way in 1958, or early in 1959, it would be useful to have a Canadian representative in the Gold Coast to guide the inevitable publicity into favourable channels and also to handle the consular work attendant upon the influx of an expected 500 Canadian technicians and their families.

Against this it might be argued that with our limited resources in personnel and money, we ought to go slow in West Africa and concentrate in areas more seriously menaced by Communism, such as South East Asia, where we also have considerable experience. Africa, except Egypt and French North Africa, stands perhaps lower on our priority list.

On the other hand, there are undoubted advantages in establishing relations with British West Africa. We show Africans and anti-colonial powers that we have confidence in the Africans' ability to govern themselves and to fulfil the conditions for membership laid down in the United Nations Charter. We also proclaim to the same group of people that we are free from prejudice by accepting Africans as full and equal members of the Commonwealth as and when they become independent and their membership is sponsored by the United Kingdom. We also provide ourselves with a listening post and opportunities for gathering first-hand information in an area of increasing importance, and one which may be used to counter both Communist propoganda and the anti-colonial nations; an area where Canadian representation is non-existent.

We cannot, of course, assume that because we greet emergent African colonies as equals and proffer them technical assistance or capital aid they will necessarily stay with the Commonwealth, or with the West. It may be, so strong is the force of nationalism in Africa and Asia, that Europeans (including Canadians) operate at a disadvantage as friends of former colonial powers. The U.S.S.R., as the under-developed country that developed itself and as the country whose colonialism, though existent, was decently cloaked behind the mountains of central Asia, may have the last word. Nevertheless, to do too little may be to ensure that the U.S.S.R. will have the last word.

Aid to Africa

We now come to the wider question of aid and welfare for emergent Africa generally. Perhaps the most effective immediate form which such aid might take is technical assistance, though capital aid will be required on an increasing scale, particularly after the achievement of independence by some of these areas. While there may be some attractiveness in emphasizing the role which the Commonwealth can play in helping its potential future members in this part of the world, it is perhaps unwise to suggest that an aid programme should be limited to either Commonwealth donors or potential Commonwealth recipients. The co-operation of non-Commonwealth colonial powers in Africa must be secured if the full benefit is to be obtained from external economic aid to this region. Moreover the need for a reasonably balanced economic development throughout the entire area is a principle that should be recognized at the outset of any attempt to promote greater economic and political stability in the regions in which we are particularly interested. Serious consideration must also be given to North Africa as well as the underdeveloped areas of the rest of the continent with which this memorandum is chiefly concerned.

If we assume that there would be benefits in enlarging participation in an aid programme beyond the Commonwealth, we must then determine whether it would be prudent to seek to develop a programme similar to the Colombo Plan which includes both Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth countries (as donors and as recipients). Such an approach could exclude the U.S.S.R. from participation in this particular programme but it is too much to hope that such exclusion will keep the U.S.S.R. out of mischief in these countries through other channels. A more likely development would be the initiation of an "aid race", in which perhaps the U.S.S.R. is already away and running with their offer of economic aid to Egypt. The success of a programme of the Colombo Plan type depends on the willingness of the donor countries to make substantial resources available. We must ask ourselves whether the threat in Africa is sufficiently compelling or recognized to prompt most Western countries, including Canada, to contemplate contributions on an effective scale, given the uncertainty about other demands which may be made on our resources.

An aid programme involving many of the Colonial Powers might be less suspect and perhaps more readily effective if it were sponsored at this stage by the United Nations. While we should not overemphasize the impermeability of the United Nations umbrella, there is much to commend providing assistance through the United Nations and its related institutions, particularly during the transitional stage when many of these areas will be preparing for autonomy. There are a number of existing United Nations resources which can be profitably employed to help the underdeveloped areas of Africa. The technical assistance programmes of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies could do much more than they are at present if the Colonial Powers would make fuller use of their facilities. For its part, Canada could make a particular effort when asked by the United Nations or its agencies to find experts or to provide training places for dependent territories in Africa. Although we cannot earmark our financial contribution for use in particular areas, we might give consideration to increasing our participation to UNTAB by say, $200,000 a year, stressing that this increase was prompted particularly by the needs of Africa (to which we would hope that a large part of these funds as well as a portion of our basic contribution would be devoted). Through close co-operation with the United Nations technical assistance authorities it should be possible to organize requests and deal with them in such a way that there would be prior agreement on particular experts for these countries and that most of these would tend to be selected from Canada or other Commonwealth countries. This would also mean that Iron Curtain personnel would not be likely to participate to any extent, if at all.

The International Bank provides an existing source for capital assistance and a number of loans have already been made to United Kingdom or other Colonial territories. The International Finance Corporation will soon come into operation and provide a further source for external capital assistance.

We should not lose sight of the increasing pressure in the United Nations to create a special fund for economic development. These pressures may prove to be irresistible. In fact, Canada has agreed to participate in the work of an ad hoc committee to examine further the practicability of establishing a SUNFED. When we determine our position with respect to SUNFED, which it may not be possible to delay more than a year or two, it will be worth remembering that this type of fund could constitute a useful source for capital assistance to the territories of Africa, particularly after they have achieved autonomy. A SUNFED, of course, would be under very strong lobbying pressures and since we cannot earmark our own contribution it might be difficult to ensure that funds were not granted to states less worthy or needy than the African territories. If we take an active part in the preparation of the arrangements and criteria for SUNFED and in its operation, we may be able to help ensure that projects in Africa receive sympathetic consideration. The creation of a SUNFED might also make it more difficult for the U.S.S.R. to carry out unilateral aid programmes since they would be under some compulsion to use the mechanism of a SUNFED which has been promoted in the United Nations by many of the countries which the U.S.S.R. is interested in wooing.

If it should not prove possible or desirable for an effective SUNFED to come into existence, a Colombo Plan type of programme may prove desirable and feasible at a later stage. However, it is impossible to forecast at this time the other demands which may be made on Canadian resources in several years' time when most of these territories will have achieved statehood. It is to be hoped that funds on an appreciable scale will be available to enable aid from Canada and other developed countries to be effectively mustered to help these new countries in their early and crucial stage of development. While we must keep these objectives in mind, we can perhaps avoid the unnecessary risk of creating false hopes among the peoples of Africa if, at this time, we stress that the fullest use should be made of facilities and resources which now exist under the United Nations and which, with modest increases, would appear to be fairly adequate for the immediate needs of the African territories during the next few years.

We have, finally, to consider the general question: "How high should Africa (apart from its Commonwealth associations and our possible commitments to the British) rank on our list of priorities?" On humanitarian grounds and in terms of the resources which are available to be developed and their potential contribution to the world's economy, aid to Africa should rank at least as high as any other region. However, in so far as we may have an interest in allocating technical and financial aid to underdeveloped countries in such a manner as to prevent them from being infiltrated by the Communists, and to counteract any bad tastes left by the colonial era, Africa may not have as high a priority as Southeast Asia and the Middle East. The relevant priorities of all of these areas will have to be weighed very carefully as we plan our aid programme and we should not lose sight of the fact that factors which affect it are constantly changing to at least a partial degree. An aid system related to the broad base of the United Nations permits the respective priorities of areas to be continually re-examined.

Obviously a good deal of consultation between interested countries, particularly potential donors, will be required if we are to take positive steps to provide more aid to Africa. In addition to participating in the general discussions on this question in ECOSOC and in the United Nations we should perhaps be ready to engage in informal but frank discussions with other Western countries. Because of the implications of the Afro-Asian Conference at Bandung and because of our desire to maintain a high degree of co-operation with the Asian countries we might also wish to discuss this question at an early stage with some of the more important Asian Colombo Plan countries. India is known as an active mischief-maker in Africa, but it may be a reasonable risk to assume that if she were associated with these discussions she might be less mischievous and more co-operative than if she were excluded.

CONCLUSIONS

Gold Coast

Consideration should be given to the establishment, not later than the fiscal year 1957-8, of a Canadian mission accredited to the Gold Coast, a dual accreditation to Nigeria possibly being arranged later. In reaching a final decision, the position occupied by Africa in any system of priorities involving our limited resources in personnel and money, and the potential threat to the area of Communism should be taken into consideration.

Aid to Africa

The least suspect and most readily effective form of aid would appear to be that sponsored by the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies. Although we cannot earmark our contribution for use in particular areas, we might give consideration to increasing our participation in UNTAB. There are also possibilities in SUNFED, despite the strong lobbying pressures to which it would be subject when and if created. If SUNFED does not come into existence, a Colombo Plan type of programme might prove desirable and feasible at a later stage.

With the possible establishment in West Africa, we should consider how high Africa might rank on our list of priorities and weigh its qualifications carefully against those of Southeast Asia and the Middle East.

ADMISSION TO COMMONWEALTH MEMBERSHIP: GOLD COAST (GHANA)

The prospect of independence for the Gold Coast in the near future raises again the question whether some procedure should be adopted for admission of new members to the Commonwealth, instead of their attainment of self-government making them ipso facto members, as has been the case in the past. The attainment of independence by the Gold Coast will provide a test case, as it will be the first African-governed state to become eligible for Commonwealth membership, and its treatment will set a precedent for that of other African states as they emerge.

2. In the past no exception has ever been taken to a new member. The only possible ground for other members refusing to accept it would have been that it had not in fact been granted full self-government. The Canadian Government at first hesitated over Ceylon, owing to doubts as to the effect on its independence of the agreement on bases and external affairs which it would be expected to sign; but these doubts were resolved on further study of the agreement, and no objection was raised.

3. A general election will be held in the Gold Coast on July 17, 1956, to determine whether Prime Minister Nkrumah's constitutional proposals have the support of the electorate. The United Kingdom Government has announced that it would accept a motion calling for independence within the Commonwealth, passed by a "reasonable majority" in the new Legislature, and then would be prepared to declare a firm date for the attainment of this purpose. This timetable makes Gold Coast independence early in 1957 (under a new name, "Ghana") a realistic prospect.

4. In announcing these plans, the Secretary of State for the Colonies made explicit reference to the supposed basic principle that, while the granting and timing of independence is the responsibility of the United Kingdom, admission to full membership in the Commonwealth requires the consent of all the existing members. This alleged principle is a new thing in Commonwealth procedure which has never been tested, though at the time of the admission of India and Pakistan Canada was disposed to feel that some means should be devised to get the consent of all members. The dilemma is that, if any criterion for membership other than the attainment of self-government is imposed, either the other members would have to say to the United Kingdom: "You must continue to govern this dependency instead of liberating it as you wish to do", or they must advocate the creation of a limbo within the Commonwealth, to which states would be consigned which the present members do not wish to associate with — a limbo consisting of independent states which are within the Commonwealth but not members of it. It is difficult to believe that any self-respecting state would remain within the Commonwealth on such terms.

5. Preliminary consideration of the whole problem at the forthcoming Prime Ministers' Meeting seems desirable.

6. No specific procedure for admission of the Gold Coast has been proposed. However, the United Kingdom Government is publicly committed to supporting its claim to membership, and is plainly intent on securing agreement to admitting the Gold Coast simultaneously with the achievement of independence. To this end, Canada, Australia and New Zealand have been kept fully informed, on a private basis, about constitutional developments in the colony. It has been felt that undue emphasis on, or publicity about, the transition to independence and full Commonwealth membership would intensify South African opposition to admission of the Gold Coast. The position of the Union, however, has become less intransigent in recent months. Prime Minister Strijdom and the Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Eric Louw, have both made public professions of their Government's desire to have friendly relations with non-European governments in Africa; and there is now hope that the Union will assume an attitude of at least tacit acceptance of the claim of an independent Gold Coast to membership in the Commonwealth. The views of Australia, New Zealand and Asian members are not expected to conflict with those of the United Kingdom.

7. It thus appears that Canada should not oppose entry of the Gold Coast to full Commonwealth membership. Failure to admit the new state might be interpreted as the erection of a "colour bar". This would tend to disrupt the Commonwealth and impair its moral stature, and would reduce its effectiveness as a bridge between East and West. On the positive side, the influence of other Commonwealth Governments within the Commonwealth framework could be important in helping to steady the new African nation and guide its government in its novel responsibility for the country's external relations.

8. Canada perhaps has a special opportunity and obligation in this respect, since it is less clearly associated than some other Commonwealth countries with racial attitudes which appear reprehensible in African eyes. It might prove to be appropriate and desirable for us to take the initiative in supporting United Kingdom sponsorship of the Gold Coast for full Commonwealth membership if the matter is discussed in London. At the same time, we should be careful to reserve our right to consider each succeeding case on its merits as it arises.⁸¹

TELEGRAM K-1036

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

MEMBERSHIP OF GOLD COAST IN COMMONWEALTH

The Prime Minister received the following letter from Sir Anthony Eden before leaving London, Begins:

"As you know, there will be a general election in the Gold Coast during the present month. If the present Prime Minister of the Gold Coast, Dr. Nkrumah, is returned, we know that he will introduce a motion calling for full self-government within the Commonwealth. The United Kingdom Government are committed to give effect to such a motion if it is passed by a reasonable majority. The main opposition party favour the calling of a conference to frame a new constitution, if they obtain a parliamentary majority in the forthcoming election, but they intend that this conference should report before the end of 1956; and their intention is that thereafter the United Kingdom Parliament should be asked to grant self-government within the Commonwealth. It is known that Dr. Nkrumah would like to see full self-government by March 1957; the opposition will not wish it to be more than a few months later.

"It seems practically certain therefore that before another of our meetings can take place the Gold Coast will have achieved full self-government, and the question of membership of the Commonwealth will need to be decided; delay in returning a definite answer on the latter point would arouse speculation and suspicion in the Gold Coast, and I am sure we ought to avoid this if possible.

Ghana was not discussed at the prime ministers' meeting.

"On the other hand there are objections to making any reference in the final communiqué which will be issued after our present meetings to any discussion of Gold Coast affairs. However vague the reference may be, it could be regarded as an attempt to influence the forthcoming elections in the Gold Coast. If, however, we are to be faced before our next meeting with the question of Commonwealth membership for the Gold Coast, then it will be very convenient if something could be placed on record now as to the views of existing members.

"My colleagues and I in the United Kingdom Government are convinced that the Gold Coast should on attaining full self-government be admitted to Commonwealth membership. I trust that you will share this view.

"I am therefore writing to you, and concurrently in similar terms to the other prime ministers of member countries, in the hope that in reply to this letter you will be able to record your agreement in principle to acceptance of an application for Commonwealth membership from the Gold Coast on the assumption that self-government is reached. In that event and assuming that the other prime ministers also agree to what is proposed, I should hope it would only be necessary for me to send you and them a message by telegram when the question of membership had been raised and had become actual. This would invite formal concurrence to inform the Gold Coast Government that, with the coming into effect of full self-government, the Gold Coast would also be accepted as a member of the Commonwealth." Letter ends.

2. The Prime Minister proposes to ask Cabinet to approve the following reply to the letter but before doing so would be glad to have your views. It would be helpful also to show the proposed reply informally to the C.R.O. in case they wish to make any comments. We expect to clear the reply next week and forward it immediately. Letter begins:

"I am grateful to you for your letter of July 3rd and welcome this report of the progress which is being made toward full self government in the Gold Coast. I thank you also for sending me a copy of the letter to you of July 5th from the Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa and of your answer of July 11th.

"I have discussed with my colleagues here the conditions you specify and the further steps you propose in your letter to me and they find them satisfactory. Of course, it is difficult to give specific commitments in regard to a situation which is unlikely to occur for some time but I feel quite certain that, when I receive your message that the appropriate stage has been reached for a formal decision about the admission of the Gold Coast to Commonwealth membership, the Government of Canada will be prepared to agree." Letter ends.

MEMBERSHIP OF THE GOLD COAST IN THE COMMONWEALTH

Mr. Robertson has now had a chance to examine the draft of your letter to Sir Anthony Eden on this subject, and has also discussed it with the Commonwealth Relations Office.

The only change suggested is one that arises out of the fact that the Gold Coast has now had its general elections with a result which indicates that independence will soon be granted and membership in the Commonwealth soon requested. Therefore, the phrase "a situation which is unlikely to occur for some time" may not be accurate, and the final sentence of the reply might be altered to read, "Of course, it is difficult to give specific commitments in regard to a situation in advance of its occurring, but I feel quite certain etc."

The Commonwealth Relations Office indicated that a reply in the terms of your draft would be helpful and that all the Prime Ministers' replies except that of the South African, which you have seen, were along the general lines of our draft.⁸²

to Prime Minister*

Ottawa, March 28, 1957

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

May I, on behalf of Mrs. Prudham, my daughter Catherine, members of my staff and myself, thank you for giving us the privilege of representing Canada at the ceremonies inaugurating the new State of Ghana, formerly the Gold Coast.

It was a voyage of discovery for us all, marked by a great deal of colourful pageantry, especially during the official ceremonies.

We arrived at Accra on Saturday, March 2nd, after having spent three days enroute, including a one night stopover in the Azores and one night in Dakar, French West Africa.

The morning we left Ottawa it was 5° below zero at Uplands and when we arrived in Accra it was nearly 90° above, and there was little variation in temperature during our visit in Ghana. In the daytime it was usually 90° above and at nights 80° above, with 80 to 85 percent humidity throughout.

As is usual, local residents apologized for the climate, stating that it was unusually hot.

Our hosts, the Government and people of Ghana, were most hospitable. Our official party was lodged in Government-owned bungalows and our aircrew, numbering fourteen, were billeted with the military.

Two representatives of the C.B.C. and four newspapermen, Pierre Chalout of Le Droit, J. McCook of The Ottawa Journal, R. Taylor of the Toronto Star and A. Holland of the Toronto Telegram, were lodged at the University in Legon suburb.

Four new cars were assigned to the official party, and the newsmen as well as the aircrew were also provided with transportation. With each car there was a university student acting as an aide, as well as a uniformed chauffeur.

Dr. O. Ault, of the Civil Service Commission of Canada, and Mrs. Ault, who preceded us to Ghana by four or five weeks, were most helpful in assisting us to adjust ourselves to the tropical way of life and in meeting people of significance.

Dr. Ault, as you probably know, has been conducting a survey of the Gold Coast for the United Nations, related to the Africanization of the Civil Service. Dr. Ault and his wife are a very cosmopolitan couple and seem to inspire confidence wherever they go. One evening during our stay in Ghana, they were guests of a civilian family, sharing their hospitality and native food, even though Dr. Ault was suffering at the time from a characteristic tropical ailment.

On our first day in Ghana we travelled to the site of the proposed Volta River power development. We were guests of Dr. and Mrs. Grimes-Graeme. Dr. Grimes-Graeme represents the Aluminum Company of Canada in that country. We also had as travelling companions Sir Robert Jackson, Chairman of the Volta River Project Preparatory Commission, and Mr. Peter Scott, a representative of Sir William Holcrow and Partners, a firm of Consulting Engineers connected with the proposed undertaking.

At the present time the economy of Ghana is based largely on the production of cocoa, which has been subject to rather violent price fluctuations in recent months. The Government and the people of Ghana look upon the Volta River Project as the main hope for industrializing and developing their economy. As the Prime Minister himself has said, "No man can stand for long on one leg. It is not wise for this country to continue to rely on a 'one-crop' economy".

After our visit to the dam site, and having talked with the men concerned, I am convinced that the estimate they have made of the cost of the project is a realistic one, including a wide range of contingencies. I have a bulky report of the Preparatory Commission's findings in my office. I understand that the present estimated cost is $630,000,000.00. This figure is considerably higher than the original estimate which constituted the initial basis of negotiations involving the Aluminum Company of Canada, the British aluminum interests, the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Ghana.

Everyone with whom we discussed the matter, seemed satisfied that the Volta River Project would be self-sustaining and self-liquidating. At present one bauxite deposit is being developed in a limited way for export. There is another bauxite deposit located near the proposed dam site. In addition to this construction of a dam and smelter, a railway line is required in order to transport the bauxite to the source of electric power.

One of the important benefits of the Volta River Project could be the irrigation of the Accra plain. At the present time this area is semi-arid, with very little forest cover. The irrigation of this plain would make possible the development of scientific agriculture, including the large-scale cultivation of tropical fruits, such as bananas, grapefruit, pineapples and oranges. Coffee and rubber can also be produced in the area.

Undoubtedly the project would result in increased employment in the country, as well as an increase in its exports. An incidental but important effect would be the reduction of the tropical scourge called "river blindness" by limiting the amount of swiftly moving water in which the disease-bearing organisms thrive. Whole communities adjacent to the rivers are affected with blindness caused by a parasite that thrives in fast running water.

The Volta River dam, when constructed, would submerge 2,310 square miles, of which only 75 square miles has heretofore been under cultivation of any kind. It is anticipated that the project, including the earth fill type of dam, would require seven or eight years to complete and would ultimately produce 600,000 kilowatts of power.

A Government pamphlet also states that the new lake created by the dam would extend some 300 miles and would produce more fish than is presently harvested along the coastline of Ghana.

As a prerequisite of this development, the Government of Ghana is constructing a new harbour and port facilities at Tema, about fifteen miles from Accra. This port area is presently served by a new railway line which eventually will be extended to the site of the proposed aluminum plant and power development.

During our visit to Ghana I had opportunities to meet many Government people. I must say that I was very much impressed by the ability, sincerity and apparent good judgment of the Prime Minister of Ghana, Dr. Kwame Nkrumah. He was called upon many times during the Independence festivities for speeches and on any occasion that I heard him, his remarks were most appropriate and moderate.

Dr. Nkrumah's senior Cabinet Ministers, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Gbedmah; the Minister of Trades and Labour, Mr. Botsio; and the Minister of Communications,

Mr. Casely-Hayford, played important roles in the various events of the Independence celebrations. Mr. Gbedmah, who is a rival of Mr. Botsio for second position in the Government, impressed me as having a good deal of ability and from what I could gather in conversations with him, he has good judgment.

Although the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trades and Labour, all experienced imprisonment by the British during the agitation leading to the granting of self-government, these men do not seem to harbour any resentment or rancor against the British. They regard themselves as crusaders, but see their crusade as a movement directed against African colonization in general, rather than against Britain specifically. These leaders were quick to admit that when the celebrations were over, independence would bring with it great responsibilities.

I read Dr. Nkrumah's autobiography which gives a very good insight into the man's character, as well as of the whole struggle for independence.

During our stay in Ghana our party, including my own staff, Dr. Ault, Mr. McInnes and our aircrew and newsmen, had excellent opportunities to talk to people in all walks of life. I think that, collectively, we got a fair cross-section of public opinion.

Among those with whom we talked were British civil servants. I understand that the Government of Ghana has made a definite and fairly generous cash offer to compensate non-Africans who decide to retire from their present positions within the next two years. Some of these officials expressed to us their desire to come to Canada, but are faced with currency exchange conditions that make it difficult for them to bring sufficient cash resources with them to secure re-establishment anywhere in the dollar area.

I made a point of visiting with other members of the party, the City of Kumasi, located 170 miles inland by road from Accra. There I called upon the Asantehene who is virtually the King of the Ashanti people, numbering about one million. The Ashantis and their leaders are in accord with the central government on one point: they are in favour of independence. However, they seem to consider that their interests are not identical with the people living in the Accra area. Undoubtedly, the big task of the central administration will be to deal with the problem of keeping the country united. However, it is interesting to note that the C.P.P. (Convention People's Party), which forms the Government of Ghana, holds six of the twenty seats in the Ashanti country and the Northern Territories. In the country as a whole, the C.P.P. has seventy-one seats plus one Independent supporter, as against thirty-two seats for the opposition N.L.M. (National Liberation Movement).

Since the C.P.P. came to office and under the interim constitution, great strides have been taken in modernizing educational facilities. As yet, only ten to fifteen percent of the people are literate; the Government has spared no effort or expense in the construction of university buildings, which are beautifully designed and modern in every way. A very impressively built Kumasi College of Technology, Science and Arts, has been completed, designed to eventually accommodate a total of 1,000 students. At present, however, this institution is understaffed and difficulty is being experienced in recruiting enough students because so few possess the required academic qualifications.

There is also at Kumasi, a splendid new 500-bed hospital that appears to be very well equipped. However, there are only fifteen part-time doctors on its staff and there is a shortage of trained nurses as well. My impression is that there exists a woeful shortage of skilled personnel to serve in the fields of education, public health and the civil service.

My visit with the Asantehene at Kumasi was a most interesting experience. He has the reputation of being a difficult man to approach and usually speaks to visitors through an interpreter. On this occasion, however, he received us personally in his lavishly furnished drawing room.

At first the Asantehene was rather uncommunicative, but I was able to draw him out by asking about his Ashanti territory and its people. I mentioned that I had been shown the well, located several hundred yards from the fort in which British forces were besieged by the Ashantis in 1900, and that I had been informed on how the chivalrous Ashantis had allowed the British to leave the fort every evening to go to the well. This reference appeared to please the Asantehene and he responded by telling us about his people, the size of his territory, supplemented by a few caustic remarks about the recent election. I asked him if he travelled much and he replied that his travelling was mostly confined to his own Ashanti territory. I suggested that he come to Canada sometime. Perhaps unfortunately, the local African newsman attached great importance to this remark of mine. In Accra the following day, the daily papers gave considerable space to the fact that the Asantehene had been invited by me to come to Canada. I am told that Prime Minister Nkrumah expressed some concern over the incident. As a result, Dr. Ault called upon the Prime Minister and explained the circumstances of the so-called invitation. He reported that the Prime Minister no longer feels any concern. It seems that in the local political arena, the Government is trying to retain the support and goodwill of the Asantehene but, at the same time, to persuade him to reduce his traditional powers and position to a supporting role in the new State. Evidently there was some apprehension that we had given the Asantehene too much of a buildup.

While I was in Kumasi, Mrs. Prudham in Accra spoke and officiated at the opening of a fair which was under the sponsorship of a women's organization similar to our Women's Institute.

During the last two years the Government of the Gold Coast, in preparation for the Independence observances, built a luxury hotel, consisting of 100 rooms. It is a beautifully designed structure that would do credit to any capital in the world. It seems that these people place great emphasis on material evidence of their progress. The Government has also constructed a State House in which the State Ball was held. It is most attractively designed and expensively draped. The building was very suitable indeed for the State Ball at which was served a buffet dinner for nearly 3,000 guests, but I heard remarks that it might be difficult for the authorities to find a use for the State House after the Independence events.

At the State Banquet, where representatives of 65 countries were accommodated in the huge dining room, the Commonwealth representatives were seated at the head table on either side of Her Royal Highness, the Duchess of Kent, the Governor-General and Lady Arden-Clarke and the Prime Minister. The Canadian representatives had an honoured position as representatives of the Senior Member of the Commonwealth outside the United Kingdom. One sour note of the evening was the rapidly circulated rumour that Mr. Nixon was disgruntled because he did not have a place of honour. He sat at a side table not far from the position of honour, but his seating was evidently the result of an alphabetical arrangement. This incident seemed to bother the Right Honourable R.A. Butler more than anyone, as he mentioned it and voiced regrets whenever he spoke to me, but I am convinced no slight whatever was intended by the Ghanaians. If there was any embarrassment I am sure it was caused inadvertently. Mr. Nixon certainly tried to spread American goodwill, but there were casual remarks about his too obvious and zealous methods.

One thing noticeable during our entire visit was the friendly feeling displayed on all sides towards Canada. Wherever we went we were cheered as soon as the people caught sight of the Canadian ensign and the name of our country on the car.

We took particular care during and at the end of our stay in Ghana to be generous in the matter of gratuities to aides, car drivers and others serving us during our stay. I do feel that our Canadian delegation left in Ghana a feeling of goodwill. I feel that all members of our Canadian group conducted themselves with credit to Canada, and the spirit of willing teamwork prevailed throughout.

We arranged a dinner for the Prime Minister and his chief Cabinet Ministers, Mr. Gbedmah and Mr. Botsio, as well as for two or three senior civil servants and other officials of the Government and representatives of business. On this occasion we presented the controversial painting and silver cigarette boxes, suitably engraved with the Canadian crest and a tribute to Ghana. We also presented a library of books to the Prime Minister and a separate set of books to the University. We gave the Minister of Education suitably engraved maps of Canada for distribution to the schools.

On this same dinner occasion, I read out the statement you gave to the House of Commons on March 6th, Ghana's Independence Day.⁸³ This was very well received by the Ghanaians and they enjoyed several chuckles over your suggestion that they would doubtless receive unsolicited advice from other Commonwealth countries. I emphasized also that they were beginning to travel the same road as we in Canada had travelled, and that we both belonged to the Atlantic community of nations. I then asked all present to rise and drink to the health of our Queen.

I may say that the Prime Minister and his Colleagues were particularly pleased over your announcement that Canada would establish a mission in Ghana as soon as possible.⁸⁴

I found that Ghanaians generally place great stress on the fact that their country is a member of the Commonwealth. Undoubtedly they will resent any attempt by Britain to give leadership or direction, in view of the fact that they have just broken away from colonial ties. In my opinion, this circumstance places a great responsibility on other members of the Commonwealth, perhaps more especially on Canada.

I believe that the Commonwealth and the Western World, as well as the Ghanaians themselves, are fortunate that this experiment is taking place in Ghana where the population is not excessively large and where the country is relatively self-sufficient in natural resources. Also, they have no racial problem other than intertribal rivalries.

Our party had opportunities to talk to representatives of other African countries and found that the experiment in Ghana is being watched by the entire continent of Africa. Successful self-government in Ghana, in my view, will be of the utmost importance in determining the trend of the political future of Africa.

I have returned to Canada impressed with the fact that the political leaders in Ghana sincerely desire to co-operate with the Commonwealth and the Western World, and that we, in Canada, should give them moral and other support. It is important that the leaders and people of Ghana continue to feel that their association with the Commonwealth means something more than belonging to a social club — in other words, that there are definite practical advantages as well.

Should they become disillusioned or convinced that we are not really interested in their destiny, then there is grave danger that Ghana will be attracted to the other camp. If this happens, I believe the interests of the free world will be jeopardized in all Africa. Indeed the Russians were on hand in Ghana and were very aggressive. I think that they showed very poor judgment in their high pressure methods to force the Prime Minister and his advisors to enter into a treaty with the promise of financial aid. We learned of this through Sir Robert Jackson, who has the confidence of the Prime Minister and the Government.

Incidentally, while in London, on our return journey, I had the opportunity to talk to some officials of the Commonwealth office and stated that, in my opinion, it would be wise to leave Sir Robert Jackson in Ghana, especially during the transition period. He is personable and a very clever man and, I believe, his influence in that country is very important at this time.

Since our return to Canada, we have heard and seen criticism in some quarters for the meagre nature of our gifts to the leaders and people of Ghana, but I don't believe that the Government leaders themselves felt that way. I have already described these gifts in some detail. The total value of these amounted to about $1,200.00 and I think it would have been a mistake had we tried to compete with Russia or other nations in this matter of gifts. I believe that what we do from now on is vastly more important.

I have referred to the goodwill we from Canada felt towards us and our country while we were in Ghana. In this regard I would like to describe something of what occurred at a dinner given by us to our African aides on the eve of our departure for Canada.

At this dinner we presented the aides with generous gratuities in aid of their educational expenses and, also made gifts of engraved brooches and cuff link sets. We also expressed in words our deep appreciation of their services. One of them, S.K. Attipoe, spoke in reply to our presentations and I feel that some of his remarks are worth repeating:

"We have been very happy", he said, "to serve our Canadian friends to the best of our abilities. Now has come the time of parting. For you it is a time of joy — because you are returning to your homes, to those you love and to the friends with whom you work. But for us it is a sorrow — because we are losing your companionship and your inspiration".

"When I was assigned to work with the delegation from Canada, I cannot tell you how thrilled I was. I was thrilled for many reasons, because you in Canada were the first to obtain self-government within the Commonwealth. You can be a mighty bridge between yourselves in America and us who are the latest within the Commonwealth to attain full freedom — yes, a bridge also perhaps between the West and all the peoples of Africa and Asia."

I wish to pay tribute to the representative of External Affairs who accompanied us, Mr. Graham McInnes. He was tireless in his efforts in connection with the arrangement of details or our activities, both before and bring our visit in Ghana. He also interviewed representatives of various countries desirous of learning more about Canada.

I am sure you would be interested to know of the gracious and generous nature of the hospitality extended to all members of the Canadian party by the Government of Ghana. No effort was spared to make certain that all members of the Canadian party were comfortably housed and nourished.

On our return journey we stopped at Dakar, where our entire party were guests of the High Commissioner for French West Africa. Although we had some language difficulties, it was a very profitable and memorable evening.

On our second night we stayed at Gibraltar, where the Prudham family were guests of Governor and Lady Redman.

We stayed in London over the week end of March 16th. There our own High Commissioner and his assistants, Mr. and Mrs. S. Pierce, favoured us with a luncheon.

As the weather over the Azores turned bad and appeared likely to remain so for several days, we came home by way of Iceland where our needs were attended to by the American Air Force.

At Goose Bay we were guests of the R.C.A.F. officers in their quarters. I cannot speak too highly of the conduct and efficiency of our 'NORTH STAR' Air Force crew who were indeed Canadian "ambassadors of goodwill".

The Press and C.B.C. representatives were very co-operative and since our return, Mrs. Prudham and I have had the entire party to our home for dinner. This gave us the opportunity to exchange impressions gathered from our various points of vantage on the trip.

There were a number of amateur photographers in our party, most of whom took pictures in colour. I have had many requests since my return to Ottawa from Members of Parliament, including Opposition Members, for descriptions of our trip to Ghana. If time permits, I hope to show some of our pictures in the Railway Committee Room.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE PRUDHAM

GHANA: SOME NOTES ON POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC PROBLEMS:
SUGGESTIONS FOR A CANADIAN POLICY

Introduction

The careful organization and the éclat marking the Ghana Independence Ceremonies as well as the atmosphere of extreme good will on all sides were evident to those who visited Accra. The suspension of political and personal disputes, as well as the flattering court paid to the new nation of Ghana by senior representatives from nearly all the nations and dependent territories of the world, tended, however, to overshadow the exceptionally rapid (some would say too rapid) pace at which the new nation has moved towards its freedom and the unsolved problems with which it must now deal. It is astonishing to recall that less than six years ago the Prime Minister, Dr. Nkrumah, was in jail together with some of the principal members of the present cabinet of Ghana. As recently as six months ago serious doubts were entertained in the Colonial Office as to whether it would be possible for Nkrumah's CPP (Convention People's Party) and the Ashanti sufficiently to compose their differences in time to make Ghana an independent nation that would be both politically stable and economically viable.

2. These misgivings, and their accompanying strains and tensions, were of course masked during the Independence Celebrations during which, at a cost of £ 3 million, a remarkable demonstration of efficiency and unity was created. Nevertheless they remain; and now that the hand of the British has been withdrawn and the steadying influence of the Governor General, Sir Charles Arden-Clarke, is shortly to be withdrawn, the next six months or so will prove a critical testing time for Dr. Nkrumah and his party. Specifically, they will have to tackle certain acute political, internal, economic and administrative problems outlined below (paras. 9-34). They will also have to decide whether or not to taste more of the heady wine of Pan West Africanism or of Pan Africanism generally, and the extent to which they are going to permit extreme left wing and anti-West tendencies to gain any control of government policy.

3. The next few months are also likely to prove a testing period for the West in its relations with Ghana. Ghana is at present oriented towards the West, but over-caution, hesitation, or an attitude of patronage on the part of the West may tend to make this orientation change. There is at present, however, no reason to count Ghana as a solid member of the Arab-Asian bloc. Its economic and political interests rest either with Black Africa, or with the Atlantic.

The Speed of the March to Independence: Nkrumah and Arden-Clarke

4. We heard the view expressed by certain United Kingdom civil servants, but also by politicians and intellectuals in the Ashanti, that the march toward independence had been too swift. Much of this may perhaps be dismissed as a mere longing for the dear dead days. It was suggested to us that Arden-Clarke, a man of very firm and vigorous personality, having taken the risk of treating with Nkrumah in 1951, was also determined to crown his lifetime of colonial service with the achievement of independence for Ghana. (Similar charges, involving the heightening of personal prestige, were also made against Earl Mountbatten in the days leading to the Independence of India.) There may be some truth in this; on the other hand, Nkrumah owes, and is aware that he owes, a great deal to the steadying influence, firm hand, and above all the robust common sense of Arden-Clarke.

5. The political role of Nkrumah himself, so far as one can see, has been during the past five years without any element of dubiety. That is to say, while never departing from the political goal of complete independence for Ghana which he has kept constantly and consistently in view, he has worked within a constitutional framework, and the march to independence, at least since the riots of March, 1949, has been attended with singularly little violence. Nkrumah, strikes one as a man of inflexible purpose, but flexible as to tactics; and while excited at, he does not give the impression of being intoxicated by the prospect of Pan-Africanism under Ghanaian leadership. Having secured his people their freedom, he is now dedicated to the task of improving their economic lot which, while markedly superior to that of India, is still abysmally poor by our standards.

6. We heard it said that had it not been for the high price of cocoa in 1951-1954 and the stick to beat the United Kingdom which this dollar-earning capacity gave to Nkrumah, the British would have delayed independence by perhaps as much as ten years. In this they would have found powerful allies in the Ashanti, a semi feudal society the role of whose paramount chiefs is broadly analogous, in microscopic form, to that of the maharajahs and nawabs of undivided India. All this, however, is might-have-been. The price of cocoa was high and this not only enabled Nkrumah to pile up a surplus of close to £ 230 million for his Cocoa Stabilization Fund, but at the same time to embark on a highly necessary and perhaps, in this context, not too overly ambitious programme of economic and social betterment for his people.

7. One of the things that strikes one about Accra, Kumasi, Koforidua and the smaller centres is the large amount of money which has been put into the improvement of roads and railways, the building of schools and hospitals, housing projects, health and sanitation measures, and rural mass education. It seemed to us wholly to Nkrumah's credit that he should have chosen to spend his money that way rather than follow the arbitrary and personalized role of President Tubman of next door Liberia whose £ 2 million U.S. subsidy has been largely frittered away on uneconomic and irresponsible projects. The test comes now with the fall in cocoa prices.

8. It would thus appear that the pace towards independence has indeed been breathtaking, granted the extraordinary mass appeal of Nkrumah's party, which could not be withstood. At the same time, once Arden-Clarke had advised the British Government to grasp the nettle by treating with Nkrumah when, while in jail, his party secured an overwhelming electoral majority, the rest followed naturally. Now that the country is independent, serious but not insurmountable problems remain.

Political Problems

(a) Regional Separatism

9. Undoubtedly the most tricky problem is the working out of some kind of reasonable relationship between the broadly conservative tribal, and hierarchical society of the Ashanti, and the radical populist movement on the coast represented by the CPP. To the leader of the opposition, Professor K.A. Busia, the initials of his National Liberation Movement mean liberation for the Ashanti from the tyranny of the arrivistes represented by Nkrumah and the CPP. Prior to and during the 1956 elections, animosity between the two reached serious proportions. There were accusations on the part of the CPP that the Asantehene and the paramount chiefs of the Ashanti were using their semi-feudal power to prevent legitimate electioneering by the CPP in the Ashanti. There were also counter accusations from the NLM that city toughs from Accra, Sekondi and Cape Coast known as "Verandah boys" had used, with Nkrumah's connivance, strong arm methods in the Ashanti. Though feeling seems to have died down, it at one time ran high. It had the regrettable effect, among others, of alienating the intellectuals from the CPP. Most of them are now to be found in the NLM whose leader, Dr. Busia, is professor of Sociology at Ghana University. Nkrumah's personal representative in London, Joe Appiah, husband of the former Peggy Cripps, found Ashanti family connections conflicting with his political loyalties, and is now an MP for the opposition.

10. On the other hand, in the 1956 elections, the CPP did gain eight of the twenty-one Ashanti seats, and this constitutes no mean minority. When we were in Kumasi, we listened to a lengthy and heated argument between the National Chairman of the NLM, Baffuor Osei Akoto and the leader of the CPP in Ashanti, Joe Manioo. It seemed to us that there were very real differences of opinion but that if they were capable of being discussed in this disputatious but friendly fashion, they were also capable of being solved, granted good will and a reasonable degree of statesmanship on both sides.

11. It will not do, however, for the CPP to continue to make rather crude political gestures such as the building in Kumasi of a £ 2 1/2 million hospital which cannot be effectively operated because of the critical shortage of trained doctors and nurses. In the same way, Dr. Busia may have to recognize that while he is a first class intellect, his political appeal is restricted. Nkrumah reaches down to the masses and the strength of his party is that it is a mass party with simple slogans and election cries. It may be that some of the heady strength of the CPP may turn sour if the steep fall in the price of cocoa causes a slowdown of the developmental programme. Similarly, there may also be a realization on the part of Nkrumah that it is the Ashanti that grow the bulk of the cocoa and that their position needs protecting and the cocoa farmers more assiduously courted. On the other hand, one can also hope that the very real strength demonstrated by Nkrumah, not only in the colony where he secured all the seats, but in Ashanti (see para 10 above), may cause the Asantehene and the lesser chiefs to pause before being unnecessarily obstructionist.

12. It was the threat of the possible deadlock with the chiefs that led the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Labour, Nkrumah's two chief deputies, to fly belatedly to London in February for further negotiations with the Colonial Office. As a result of this meeting, further undertakings were given regarding the safeguards written into the draft constitution, and now approved by the National Assembly of Ghana. The safeguards which are contained in paragraphs 25-40 of the Constitution provide for the establishment of Regional Assemblies and Regional Councils of chiefs. These, it is hoped, will provide a safety valve both for the strain of discontent still existing, and for the exercise of the power of the hereditary Asantehene and the tribal Asanteman Council. The safeguards also include a provision that constitutional amendments require a two-thirds majority in the National Assembly and also a majority in two-thirds of the Regional Assemblies. However, this carefully constructed system of checks and balances is not likely to work unless it is honoured in the spirit as well as the letter both by Nkrumah and by the Opposition. On the whole, from our observations and the discussions which we had, it would seem likely that in the interests of both sections and for the good of the new nation as a whole, statesmanship is likely to prevail. But again, this may depend to some extent on the success of other separatist movements (see para 13 below) and the struggle for power now going on within the hierarchy of the CPP.

13. Another separatist movement which came to a head at the time of the Independence Celebrations is that of the dissident minority in Togoland which voted against its inclusion in Ghana. Bloodshed ensued and a detachment of armed police had to be sent into Ho, the capital of Togoland, to put down disorders. Insofar as the separatist movement is sponsored by the Ewes, Nkrumah has a good political answer ready. With the incorporation of Togoland into Ghana a considerable body of Ewes have now achieved unification; all in fact save those remaining in French Togoland. It may be that Nkrumah will decide to damp down separatist tendencies in his own section of Togoland by suggesting that Ewe agitation be turned toward securing the eventual incorporation in Ghana of their Ewe cousins from Lomé. Nkrumah also faces opposition of a milder form from the Muslim speaking Northern Territories whose one and a quarter million people have 26 seats in the Assembly and which are now with the opposition. But on the basis of a CPP representation of eleven seats from the area he seems capable of dealing effectively with this threat.

(b) The Struggle within the Party

14. From the standpoint of the West and of Nkrumah, a further political difficulty seems to lie in the streak of irresponsibility which may be detected in the lower echelons of the CPP, and which in our observation extends to the personality of the Minister of Works, Mr. N.A. Welbeck. It receives fuel from that section of the party led by Mr. Botsio, the Minister of Trade and Labour, whose line is strongly pro-socialist and who, while not precisely anti-western, is not necessarily friendly to the West. Several of Nkrumah's minor advisers appear to have not merely strong socialist but also crypto-communist tendencies and backgrounds. The most sinister eminence grise whom we encountered in Accra was Geoffrey Bing, a former United Kingdom Labour MP who holds extreme left wing views and who is reported to be one of Nkrumah's close advisers. On the other hand, Sir Robert Jackson, Chairman of the Volta River Preparatory Commission, stands very high in Nkrumah's councils and has recently had his term extended, at the Prime Minister's personal request, for an additional eight months to one year.

15. Much may depend on the outcome of the struggle now going on between Mr. Botsio and Mr. Gbedemah for the deputy leadership of the party, which carries with it the post of Deputy Prime Minister. At present the struggle between them has only been postponed because of the Independence Ceremonies. Both men have been associated with Nkrumah since the early days and were in prison with him in 1951. It seemed to us that Botsio had more popular appeal and political shrewdness, but that Gbedemah, who is Minister of Finance, would be the indispensable man so far as Nkrumah is concerned in persuading the West of the responsibility of his government towards the prospects of foreign investment. He struck us as very capable and alert and a good administrator. We gained the impression that while, from an emotional standpoint, Nkrumah may feel closer to Botsio, he recognizes that he needs Gbedemah even more. Should Gbedemah's influence decline, this would perhaps be a serious matter for the West — and for Ghana.

(c) African Nationalist Movements

16. That Nkrumah has ambitions for a West African Federation is no secret. He states so in his autobiography [The Autobiography of Kwame Nkrumah] published on March 6. At his press conference in Accra on March 7 he said that the West Africa Federation is "a favourite idea of mine and one that lies very close to my heart". So long as this meant that he would use his influence and his on the whole highly responsible example, to encourage and also to steady such politicians as Dr. Azikiwe and Mr. Awolowo of Nigeria and to bring Sierra Leone and Gambia forward towards independence, this is all to the good. Sir James Robertson, the Governor of Nigeria, told us that Awolowo, of the Western Region, was possible Prime Ministerial timber but that he would "never trust" Azikiwe, of the Eastern Region. In the light of Azikiwe's categorical triumph at the recent Nigerian election, this is interesting. However, should Nkrumah entertain ambitions to be himself Prime Minister of a West Africa Federation, this might not only involve him in conflict with his colleagues in Nigeria (which compared with Ghana's five millions can muster close to 35 millions of whom perhaps 15 millions are politically mature); it might also lead him to neglect necessary economic tasks at home for the pursuit of grandiose ambitions in the area.

17. Nkrumah also has definite aspirations to be a leader of independent Africa, and insofar as this might lead to his urging emergent African territories to follow his example, this again is healthy. He stated at his press conference that he would like to call a conference in Accra of all the independent African countries, not excluding, he added with a smile, South Africa "if it would do any good". He would include Morocco, Tunis, Libya, Egypt, the Sudan, Ethiopia, Liberia, and Ghana.

18. In both private and public statements Nkrumah has expressed a strong preference for the Commonwealth connection and for an Atlantic orientation. On March 7 he said, "It is not in my mind that we should ever be a Republic within the Commonwealth, but if the country were to force me to go to that, then it is the furthest that I will ever go. At present we are a dominion within the Commonwealth". He added, "I am an internationalist. I am not against any race or creed but I am [for] a principle, the principle of anti-colonialism". He had frequently said in his autobiography and elsewhere, that it is better to be free and mismanage your affairs than to have them managed for you by someone else and not to be free. It is this curious combination of sober constitutional responsibility and a burning passionate belief in the right of the African to freedom that makes his appeal so powerful.

Economic Problems(a) Fall in Cocoa Price and the Development Programme

19. The principal economic problem now facing the government is the drain on its carefully husbanded reserves which will result from the fall in the price of cocoa on the world market. It is at present down from a 1954 high of over .70 cents a pound to a 1957 low of .23 cents a pound. This year Nkrumah has had to dip into the Cocoa Stabilization Fund in order to bring the farmers the guaranteed price. But the government is also committed to a programme of economic development and social welfare mentioned in paragraphs 6-8 above. While both the cocoa subsidy and the developmental programme can probably be carried on concurrently for a brief period, there is clearly a limit to this. If the cocoa farmer is not paid his subsidy there may be political discontent in the Ashanti; if the developmental and social welfare programme is halted there may be discontent throughout the country and particularly in the former Coast Colony from which the Prime Minister draws his principal support. This dilemma Nkrumah hopes to solve by broadening the base of his economy. The chosen instrument for this purpose is the Volta River Project (paras 21-27 below).

20. The developmental plans have in general been responsibly conceived: e.g. the single arch bridge across the Volta River linking Togoland by road for the first time with the rest of the country; the new railway line linking Takoradi directly with Accra; the development of the new port facilities at Tema; small country hospitals in the Northern Territories; cocoa scientific research stations; campaigns against the anopheles mosquito and the tsetse fly; mass education in rural areas. There have been one or two examples dictated perhaps by the necessity for political boondoggling (e.g. the £ 2 1/2 million hospital at Kumasi) or by considerations of national prestige (the States House and the Ambassador Hotel in Accra).

(b) The Volta River Project

21. It is not the purpose of this paper to analyse the economic and financial implications of the project, especially since the report of the World Bank team is expected shortly. However, a layman may perhaps be permitted two general observations:

(1) Whatever one may think of the project it is, so far as Nkrumah and his cabinet are concerned, their chosen instrument. They claim to have examined all other possibilities for broadening the base of Ghana's economy and reducing its heavy dependence on the fluctuations of the world's cocoa market, and to have come up with the Volta Project.

(2) The Volta River Preparatory Commission in conjunction with the United Kingdom consulting engineers, Sir William Halcrow and Partners, has been engaged for the past four years in an exhaustive examination of the engineering, administrative and social problems connected with the project. These are available in three massive five hundred page volumes. Associated with the investigation have been the representatives of the United Kingdom government, the Ghana government, Aluminium Limited, and the Aluminum Company of Canada, which keeps a permanent representative in Accra, Dr. R. Grimes-Graeme of Montreal. The whole project is under the energetic and imaginative chairmanship of Commander Sir Robert Jackson, KBE, who is well known to the Department.

22. A visit to the site was paid by the Canadian party under the leadership of Mr. Prudham. While little can be gained by laymen from such a visit, one does get a general sense of the seriousness with which the work is being pursued and the amount of preliminary surveys into rock blasting, soil hardening, river levels, etc. that have been undertaken. Those to whom we spoke seemed convinced that the project was economically and technically feasible. Indeed, the Report of the Commission published in July 1956 states that it is technically sound and could be constructed successfully and operated competitively. Mr. Prudham, with long experience in the construction business, gave it as his opinion that the project was "well engineered". Preliminary work in the construction of a railway to the bauxite mines, the siting of the proposed smelter and the creation of a new port of Tema is already under way. As is generally known, the proposal is to build a dam at Ajena on the Volta to form a lake of 3,300 square miles, the fifth largest in Africa, and to produce power for the operation of a smelter which would be fed from indigenous bauxite found in two outcrops, one within fifty miles of the dam, the other within 125-150 miles. This bauxite has been surveyed and reserves are reputed to be massive. The lake would also be used for irrigation, fishing, reforestation and to supply subsidiary power to the cities of Ghana.

23. There seems to be some doubt as to the costs of the project; each time these are submitted they are higher. While this is an experience which we have all had in helping under-developed countries, there is something to be said for knowing the worst earlier rather than later. Recent estimates put the total cost of the project at about $650 million. Of this, $200 million would be spent for the power development, $220 million for the smelter plant, and the remainder for the port, railway, communications, housing, etc. It is proposed that two fifths of the capital be furnished by Ghana with the remainder, representing the cost of the equipment and materials, coming from external sources. In view of the large sums involved and the considerable economic and political risks, the potential participants are proceeding with caution before making any final commitment. It has now been proposed that the World Bank, of which, together with the International Monetary Fund, Ghana is shortly to become a member, make a loan to assist in financing. We gained the impression that everyone concerned was waiting on the Bank's report, and that unless it were favourable the participants would hesitate to act.

24. We were told in some quarters that the figure of $650 million was a "safe" figure, or a "careful" figure. This was not to suggest that it was in any way inflated, but that it contained prudent allowance for contingencies of various kinds which, should they not be realized, could considerably reduce the cost of the project. On the other hand, delay in starting the project would presumably increase the costs. It is estimated that it will take eight years from the starting date before the project is in full operation.

25. Insofar as one can judge from discussing the matter with cabinet ministers, senior civil servants and British civil servants in Ghana, the scheme, while ambitious, is not grandiose. The suggestion that "a little country like Ghana" should not embark on a project larger than Kitimat becomes irrelevant, provided the participation of such major producers as Aluminium Limited and Alcan is assured, for such a development can then take place wherever there is bauxite, power and nearness to world markets, and so long as the world demand for aluminum continues to increase.

26. Politically, as well as technically, the project seems to be very much sounder than the Aswan Dam, over half whose water, we were told, would be lost in storage by evaporation. Unlike Egypt, Ghana is very friendly to the West, is at present publicly committed to the West, and to friendship with the United States. It is a member of the Commonwealth. It has and expects to continue to have an Atlantic orientation. Its natural markets have long been with the United States, United Kingdom and Western Europe.

27. The possibility of blackmail or of playing off the West against the USSR may exist, but on Nkrumah's record it seems unlikely. He is, it is true, passionately devoted to the cause of the freedom of dependent peoples in Africa; but he is equally passionately devoted to the economic and social betterment of Ghana, and he sees the Volta River Project as the best way of doing this. He would be likely, on balance, (and this will be even more so if Gbedemah wins out over Botsio for the Deputy Prime Ministership) to set aside or delay other cherished political schemes in order to see the Volta River Project through.

28. The decision to retain the services of Sir Robert Jackson for a further eight months to a year (see para 14 above) may be due in part to a realization that western donor nations will tend to sit back and watch during the six months following the independence of Ghana; but it is probably also due to a belief that to retain this dedicated and expert civil servant is one of the best ways of convincing the West that Ghana is responsible and creditworthy.

29. Another way of doing this would be not to insist on too rapid Africanization of personnel or of product in respect of the new industries now being developed by the government, and to assure those firms operating in Ghana, such as the United Development Corporation, and the United Africa Company that they will not be taxed out of existence.

30. It is perhaps worth pointing out that a kindred obligation may rest on the West, if it wishes to retain the friendship of the first independent black African nation and to help it to maintain its close connection with the West so that other African nations, as they emerge, will not fall into the orbit of the USSR or of the Arab-Asian Group. In this context, it would appear advisable for both private enterprise and government in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, to give very serious consideration to the possibility of participation with Ghana in the development of the Volta River Project. Such an expression of confidence would in itself have the effect of discouraging any irresponsible elements, and Ghana would set an example to the rest of emergent Africa, which would in turn tend to keep it with the West.

Administrative Problems

(a) Public Service

31. The main administrative problem facing Ghana is that of overcoming its weakness in the technical and administrative cadres of the civil service. This weakness is deplorable. Of the existing United Kingdom Colonial Office staff in Ghana, 330 opted on March 12 to accept the £ 8000 settlement in lieu of career and thus to leave the service by March 1959. Only the dedicated are remaining, together with the politically acceptable (certain civil servants from the Northern Territories and the Ashanti will probably have to go despite their own wishes because they are now politically unacceptable to the left wing of Nkrumah's own party). This has further thinned the existing cadres of African trained civil servants.

32. Dr. Orvill Ault of the Canadian Civil Service Commission, who has been in Ghana for the past three months as head of the United Nations technical assistance mission on manpower requirements, has made a detailed survey of this problem for the United Nations, and his findings will be made available, on an informal basis, to the Canadian Government on his return. Pending the receipt of his report it is perhaps only necessary to say that glaring gaps, not only in the first rank but also in the second, were visible to the Canadian party in External Affairs, in the Prime Minister's Office, in the Police, the hospitals and technical institutes. In the latter certain courses (for example in mechanical engineering) have had to be abandoned because there were not sufficient students. This reflects a serious situation at the high school level which in turn is the result of a failure to date to make education compulsory. Until the results of the mass education and literacy campaign begin to be felt, civil servants and technicians, even those of modest attainments, will be hard to come by. The next ten years will be critical and the suggestion has been made (by Mr. Norman Robertson) that Canada could perhaps help best in this field by establishing a diplomatic mission which would in fact act as a bilateral technical assistance centre between Canada and Ghana.

(b) Corruption

33. The government acted smartly to implement the findings of the Jibowu Commission, which found that funds of the Cocoa Marketing Board had been used to support the electoral campaign of the CPP. It may well be found that the system of "dash" (similar to what we have encountered as "baksheesh" in Pakistan) is indigenous to Africa. If so, this should not be taken too tragically; but there may come a point at which, if Nkrumah cannot control it, "dash" might adversely affect the development of technical services and the extent to which private enterprise could operate in Ghana.

34. Finally, in its economic and administrative contexts, we noticed that the Commonwealth appeared to mean a great deal to Ghana. The Ghanaians spoke of it all the time and seem to regard it as natural that its members should help each other. Most people, even quite senior civil servants, regarded the Colombo Plan as a Commonwealth affair and were unaware that non-Commonwealth countries, including the United States, were associated with it. They tended to assume that upon applying, they could become members of the Colombo Plan. When informed that this was restricted to South and South East Asia their reaction was: why not change the name?

Leading Personalities

35. Although Ghana is in no sense a Liberia, it is nevertheless true that, as in many underdeveloped countries where democratic institutions are in fledgling form, leadership tends to revolve around personalities. Some notes on some leading personalities may not therefore be out of place.

Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, the Prime Minister

36. Dr. Nkrumah gives an impression of easy affability bordering at times of diffidence, but one senses beneath this an inflexible purpose. In converse with Europeans, his passionate nationalism appears to be well clothed by the social niceties, and even by a certain absent-mindedness. In the presence of Africans, however (and this was notable at 12.15 a.m. on the night of Independence when he spoke to a hushed crowd of 50,000), his tense, controlled emotionalism has a most profound effect. What is remarkable about Nkrumah is that having created a populist instrument to back up his unshakable conviction that Ghana must be free, he has proceeded at all stages by constitutional methods. At the same time, he treads a tight rope since he is balanced between (a) the left wing malcontents of his own radical party with dreams of communist affiliations, of kicking out western enterprise, and promoting Pan Africanism, and (b) the strong hereditary and elective ties and the semi-feudal attitudes of the paramount chiefs. Taking Nkrumah at his word both in public and in private, one foresees the likelihood that he will pursue a middle-of-the-road socialism at home, will live up to his economic responsibilities, will promote African independence wherever it is possible, and will continue to be oriented towards the West.

Kojo Botsio, Minister of Trade and Labour

37. From Nkrumah's autobiography and also from what one saw of the two men in Accra, it would appear that there is a stronger emotional affinity between them than between Nkrumah and Gbedemah. Botsio, who took a post graduate course in education at Oxford, and who has been Nkrumah's constant companion for the past eight years, appears to have imbibed more radicalism in the United Kingdom than Nkrumah did in the United States. He is a strong socialist, a shrewd politician and not averse, one feels, from the possibility of providing circuses, should bread ever be absent.

K.A. Gbedemah, Minister of Finance

38. Mr. Gbedemah has also been associated with Nkrumah since his return to the Gold Coast in 1948. During the period when Nkrumah was in jail, Gbedemah, because his sentence was shorter, was responsible for organizing the CPP and apparently did a highly professional job. In contrast to Nkrumah, Botsio, Casely-Hayford, Hutton-Mills and others, his background is entirely African. He gave us the impression of knowing Africans and their problems very well and also of being a capable administrator with an understanding of the political implications of finance. While imbued with the nationalist spirit, now that Independence has been achieved, he seemed to us to have a degree of responsibility and common sense which should serve Ghana well in the next critical years. Although he lacks the academic background, it is perhaps not fanciful to describe him as bearing a relationship to Nkrumah similar to that which Deshmukh bore to Nehru in the days following the Partition of India. It is to be hoped that, if the struggle for the position of Deputy Prime Minister between Botsio and Gbedemah is resolved in favour of the former (as seems possible) Gbedemah will nevertheless be given fuller authority over the non-political side of the government so that he may become a sort of economic czar.

A.E.A. Ofori-Atta, Minister of Local Government

39. This minister comes from a well born family of chiefs, the Ofori-Attas, who live on the border of the old coast colony and Ashanti. He offers a useful bridge between the paternalistic society dominated by the chiefs and the rootless radicals of the coast. He struck the Canadian party as tough, shrewd, and capable. He is definitely a "strong" man and interested in the economic future of Ghana; the Secretary of his Department is passionately devoted to co-operatives, and is persuading his minister toward a like interest.

N.A. Welbeck, Minister of Works

40. Welbeck was director of propaganda for the CPP before he became a cabinet minister. He struck the Canadian party as opinionated, and verging on the irresponsible. He boasted privately that now that he was Minister of Works he knew what the people wanted and knew where to place government funds. This seemed a thinly veiled reference to the possible use of his Department for political purposes. On the other hand, we were informed that his influence with Nkrumah and the upper echelons of the CPP is small. This is certainly to be hoped.

Sir Emmanuel Quist

41. The Speaker of the Legislative Assembly is a figure of immense dignity and authority. We were told that during the critical days of the development of the breach between the CPP and the NLM as well as the closely fought arguments with the British, Quist's prestige was so high that his mere presence in the House ensured the suppression of the unruly and the preservation of decency and decorum. Quist is now in his sixties and may soon retire. It is possible that he might be, not the next, but the next but one to Sir Charles Arden-Clarke as Governor General.

Sir Charles Arden-Clarke

42. The part played by the Governor General of Ghana in effecting a smooth transition from colony to independent nation has already been mentioned (see para 3 above). The relationship between himself and Nkrumah has been firm and fruitful and both would probably acknowledge that they owe much to each other. At Nkrumah's request Sir Charles became the first Governor General; but at his own request this is to be for a period of a few months only. It is understood that his successor will be an Englishman for the first term but that his successor may in turn be a Ghanaian (para 41 above).

The Asantehene

43. Both the Asantehene's position and his attitude towards Ashanti are equivocal. He is the Paramount Chief of the Ashanti and therefore, through the strange mixture of heredity and election whereby the "stool" or symbol of chieftainship is transferred, is a strong paternalistic and feudal overlord of almost a million Ghanaians. Being a chief, he has kept in the background and his behaviour has been technically correct; but there is no doubt that he has looked with disfavour upon Nkrumah as an upstart and that he regards the pace of development as far too rapid. It was his influence in the Asanteman Council of chiefs which made it essential that the safeguards mentioned in paragraph 11 above should be inserted in the Constitution. The Chief Regional Officer for Kumasi, who has been his United Kingdom adviser, will presumably retire following Independence. It remains to be seen whether his other advisers, who include such mercurial and evasive personalities as Joe Appiah will be as responsible. It is here, rather than in the Northern Territories that both the opportunity and the need for statesmanship are greatest. The Asantehene is sixty-five; provided he were left with the symbols and trappings of power, he might be willing to compromise with Nkrumah.

Problems for the West

44. Politically the next six to eight months will be critical in Ghana. It is during this period that the separatist difficulties with the Ashanti and the Ewes must progress toward a solution and that the attitude of the government toward either a stern attack on economic tasks, or the pursuit of nationalist and Pan African will-o-the-wisps will become evident. On the whole, the experience of the Canadian party leads us to believe that the former course is the more likely (granted the personalities of Nkrumah and Gbedemah) provided that the West does not hold aloof in any spirit of implied censure. If this happened, the rewards would be reaped by irresponsible left-wing malcontents in Ghana and by the Soviets abroad. Further, the example which Ghana can give to other emergent African countries would be seriously impaired. As an index of increasing responsibility and also of the tremendous hold which Nkrumah has over the masses, one may note that the famous political slogan, S.G. NOW, which was chanted effectively throughout Ghana during the period 1951-56 has been given a new content. Nkrumah announced a few weeks ago that, as self-government was about to be achieved, S.G. NOW would henceforth mean not "self-government now" but "serve Ghana now". The new emotional content of the phrase has kindled great enthusiasm among the masses. If Nkrumah tells them to "serve Ghana now" and if, as a result of doing so they see tangible rewards, then the future of Ghana is unclouded.

A Canadian Policy Toward Ghana

45. It is suggested that Canadian interests might best be served by the following steps:
- (1) The opening of a diplomatic mission in Ghana, under a High Commissioner, September 1957 would not be too soon.
 - (2) One of the main tasks of this mission would be to aid the flow of technical assistance from Canada to Ghana, principally in such fields as: civil service administration; social welfare work; economics; experts in external affairs and manpower selection; highway engineers; forestry experts. (These tentative suggestions are subject to confirmation or otherwise by Dr. Ault's report).
 - (3) Our technical assistance could continue to flow through UNTAB, but funds should be made available to have assistance also extended bilaterally.

(4) The possibility should be raised of a capital aid component within a technical assistance framework, such as the proposed school of tropical medicine, the need for which was outlined by Dr. Nkrumah in his address at the opening of the new national assembly of Ghana on March 6.

(5) Finally, if the World Bank report is favourable to the Volta River Project, we might give consideration to extending capital assistance to Ghana in respect of it.

ASSISTANCE TO THE FEDERATION OF THE WEST INDIES

You will recall that in June, 1956 you received an Aide Mémoire, under a personal letter from the U.K. High Commissioner, following up a conversation he had with you concerning economic assistance to the Federation. A copy of the Aide Mémoire is attached.†⁸⁵

2. As a result of the U.K. approach it was agreed that a comprehensive study of Canada's relations with the West Indies should be undertaken. Senior representatives of all departments concerned have been meeting as the "Caribbean Group" and a good many papers have been produced by interested departments. The third and most recent meeting of the Group was held late in February. While no final recommendations have as yet been agreed for consideration by Cabinet, you will no doubt be interested to learn about the direction in which the Group is moving.

On a July 16, 1956 memorandum, which commented on the British aide mémoire and informed the minister that interdepartmental discussions on aid to the West Indies were about to begin, Pearson wrote: "I hope this can be pressed forward ... I am extremely interested in this idea and hope that something can be done."

3. Capital aid. There has been general agreement that a distinction should be made between Capital Aid and Technical Assistance. Finance and also Trade and Commerce have warned against embarking upon a Capital Aid programme which could easily become a bottomless commitment and which might imply willingness on our part to underwrite the Federation's economic viability on a continuing and long-term basis. It is pointed out that although the U.K. has stated that it would expect to carry the major burden, it is naturally anxious to promote the concept of "burden sharing". (Exact figures as to the size of the U.K. burden are not available but their capital and technical assistance, in the form of grants and loans, apparently exceeds £4 million annually, or £8 million if aid to British Guiana and British Honduras is added.)

4. The Group has considered that the special problems and circumstances which have justified capital expenditure in Asia under the Colombo Plan apply only to a very limited degree in the Caribbean. Moreover, were Canada to agree to a Caribbean Plan, we could well expect to receive requests from other areas of the world (and indeed from other countries in the Caribbean area itself) which have needs fully as urgent and claims quite as deserving. In any event we have been handicapped through lack of firm information about the capital assistance needs of the Federation and the sort of priorities which it would put on these needs: we have not been able to advance considered proposals for a capital assistance programme for the Federation.

5. As a consequence there is emerging a consensus that such Capital Aid as may be provided to the Federation should be in the form of a once-and-for-all project in which the extent of our commitment could be defined and limited in advance to the fullest extent possible. In line with this approach broad support has been given to the suggestion that we should provide one or two new, small (1500-1600 dwt. tons) cargo-passenger ships which would be built in Canadian yards, at a cost of approximately $2 1/2 million each. Such a project, it is thought, would be appropriate to the needs of the Federation, and for historical and other reasons could suitably be offered by Canada.

6. The Group, however, have not committed themselves to such a recommendation pending a study of probable operating costs for the ships. Some members have expressed the fear that even if such ships were presented as a gift, the Federation or its agents could not operate them other than at a loss and hence (a) the Federation's financial deficit, inevitably appreciable for several years since its revenues are to be strictly limited by the terms of the Constitution, would be further increased; (b) the U.K., with continuing financial responsibility for the Federation, might have to shoulder a still heavier burden; and (c) Canada might find that the extent of her commitment was not so definite as had been supposed and we might have to consider a request for operating subsidies for the ships.

7. The factual study of costs referred to above has been completed but has not yet been considered by the Group. The study estimates that each ship would operate at an annual loss of $175,000 to $250,000 depending on the extent and regularity of its services. Too little is as yet known about the likely size of the Federation's revenues to measure the significance of such deficits. It is clear, however, that the operating deficits would be burdensome, particularly since it is known that the Federation's revenues will not be high; we understand that the likely inadequacy of these revenues is giving some cause for concern about the Federation's future.

8. Technical Assistance. Canada already extends technical assistance to the British West Indies, but on a very limited scale. (The greater part of this aid is provided indirectly through our contribution to the U.N.) The Group would probably be disposed to increase the amount of our direct technical assistance and to arrange for some planning and organization of it. It is considered that technical assistance is peculiarly well adapted to the Federation's needs and that it could be offered on a continuing basis since it is not likely to involve an excessive expenditure of funds. Projects to which assistance could usefully be directed would be in the usual sort of fields: Agriculture, Fisheries, Marketing, Health and Sanitation, Higher education, Radio broadcasting and other forms of communication. The limit of such assistance is more likely to prove physical than financial, having in mind our Colombo Plan and U.N. commitments, the limited availability of our training facilities, and the scarcity of suitable experts in some fields. In any event, no cost figure can be put at this time on an expanded technical assistance programme by Canada.

9. The "umbrella" for the extension of aid. It has been apparent that the Group would wish to recommend aid on a bilateral basis rather than as suggested by the U.K. "in association" with them and perhaps other countries. The views of the majority of the Group concerning an implied commitment for long-term and probably substantial expenditures have already been mentioned. The further point has been made that if a Colombo type programme were adopted, Canadian aid would be overshadowed by the level of U.K. aid.

10. There has of course been no desire on the part of the Group to offer advice to the U.K. (in reply to their request) on the question of consultations with Commonwealth and other countries including the U.S.A. regarding an economic assistance programme for the Federation. We informed Earnescliffe informally last July, at the suggestion of the Group, that we saw no objection to such consultations taking place.

11. Although we understand that the U.K. has in fact not yet approached other countries, it is not unlikely that she may eventually do so. Should the replies be such that a joint programme is eventually established, it is probable that some forum would be developed, perhaps along the lines of the Consultative Committee of the Colombo Plan. We have pointed out to the Group that Canada would find it difficult to stand aloof from such a Group. And yet our only basis of participation would be an unspectacular programme of technical assistance (our once-and-for-all grant having already been made). The probability of such an organization being established, however, is not thought to be very great at least in the foreseeable future. We have as yet no indication of probable U.S. views about a Caribbean Plan. We understand that they have always been careful not to do anything which might be interpreted as interference in the U.K. colonies. The American programme in the Caribbean as a whole, largely technical assistance (the bulk in Haiti, Cuba and the Dominican Republic) was about $4 million in 1956.

12. The Caribbean Group will meet at an early date to formulate recommendations and to agree upon the nature of our reply to the U.K. approach. As things now stand it is probable that the Group will suggest extension of a once-and-for-all grant, perhaps of ships, on a strictly bilateral basis. (The constitutional aspect is being studied — it is not certain that we could deal directly with the "Federation"). I think, however, you will agree that it would be unnecessarily blunt to inform the U.K. that, while we are prepared to offer aid to the Federation, we would not wish to do so in association with them.⁸⁶ Perhaps it would be preferable to state that we would be happy to associate with them — and with such other countries as have expressed to the U.K. their willingness to contribute — in a limited programme of technical assistance. We would add that we were planning to extend capital assistance on a bilateral basis and would inform the U.K. of the sort of aid we are prepared to make available.⁸⁷

Yes [L.B. Pearson]

13. Before discussing this sort of reply with the Group, we would wish to have your views on it and on the larger issues raised by the U.K. approach.

14. As you know, the Prime Minister last week answered a question from Mr. Balcom (Halifax) by saying that the "development of the Federation" was under study.⁸⁸

CANADIAN AID TO THE WEST INDIES FEDERATION

In my memorandum of March 12 last I reported on the inter-departmental discussions which had been held on this question. You concurred in the view that something more was needed by way of aid to the Federation than a once-for-all gift (possibly of ships) and the continuation of technical assistance (which has been small and ad hoc).

2. We have been thinking about the matter further, and, in the light of the discussion which took place at and in connection with the Bermuda Conference, I submit the following proposals. We have not considered in the memorandum the larger question of the expansion of the membership of the Colombo Plan or of assistance to the new Commonwealth and other nations; the question of aid to the West Indies Federation is more immediate and, of course, a reply has to be made to the United Kingdom note of last June.

3. It may be assumed that with the setting up of the Federation, and the lessening of United Kingdom participation in the affairs of the federating colonies as they move closer to full independence, it is desirable that Canada play a somewhat larger role in that area. There are commercial ties between the BWI and Canada, particularly the Maritime Provinces, of long standing and continuing importance. These commercial ties, coupled with tourism, have resulted in many close personal contacts by Canadians with West Indian affairs, probably closer than with any other Commonwealth territory aside from the United

I am not too happy about this. I agree that we haven't got sufficient elements to come to a firm recommendation but I am afraid that we may be forgetting some of the wider political implications connected with the future of the Federation both within & without the Commonwealth. In due course, U.K. influence is bound to disappear; is it in our interests that it be replaced more or less in toto by the U.S.?

Pearson répondit./Pearson responded:

I agree entirely with your preoccupations. My feeling is that we may have to accept some special responsibilities — which might also be opportunities — in the West Indies. The alternative is, of course, the "Yankee dollar" without any political brakes this time.

Kingdom. No doubt this, in part, has occasioned the approach to Canada by the United Kingdom as well as the more informal approach by some of the political leaders of the Federation.

4. Thus, we have been asked by the United Kingdom if we are willing to "associate" ourselves with them in extending aid to the Federation. We have also been asked by the United Kingdom if Canada could join with other Commonwealth countries, and possibly with the United States and other countries in a "joint programme" of economic assistance. It can be assumed that BWI and the United Kingdom have real hopes of help from Canada.

5. Canada, of course, shares the concern of the United Kingdom — as does the United States, no doubt — that, as the West Indies moves toward independence it should develop strong free institutions and a democratic way of life. The vast distances which separate the various units of the Federation, the uncertain strength of the Federal Government, the significant differences in income between the various Units, are only the most important of the difficulties which will face the Federation. But the democratic development of the Federation, while not assured, may at least be assisted if the older Commonwealth countries, and perhaps the United States, show an active and friendly interest in West Indian problems and help them find solutions to their more pressing economic needs.

6. Further, it would seem undesirable from Canada's point of view, if the vacuum caused by the decline of the United Kingdom influence and participation in the affairs of the area should be filled by the United States alone. For this reason, if for no other, Canada should be prepared to undertake some of the tasks which until now have been carried out by the United Kingdom.

7. In summary, it may be said that Canada has a real interest in fulfilling the hopes of the BWI and the United Kingdom — the importance of our commercial relations, which we hope to improve, our concern that the Federation develop free institutions, and our concern with the continued strength of the Commonwealth — all these reasons argue that we should not disappoint these hopes.⁹⁰ Indeed, if some form of aid is not forthcoming from Canada, we will give the impression that we are indifferent to the relationship of the West Indies — and other potential new members — to the Commonwealth.

8. West Indies officials have made it clear that, on their side, they must have economic and technical help from other countries. If the Federation is to be a success, they must exploit their resources more fully, and they must raise the level of technical skills. While, as compared with the Colombo Plan countries, standards of living in some of the wealthier islands appear high, there are some islands in the Federation which would certainly be classed as depressed; generally incomes per capita are substantially lower in the Federation than in the more developed countries of the Commonwealth. There is, of course, a significant flow of private investment from Canada and the United States to the Caribbean — rather more, as far as Canada is concerned, than to the Colombo Plan countries. Though in terms of human needs the West Indies are less worthy of economic aid than some parts of South Asia, yet there is no doubt that the economic and technical needs of the West Indies are real and pressing. Without outside help the economic progress of the islands and the economic and political development of the Federation will be slow. (Annex I sets out a record of conversations between Canadian officials and two Ministers from St. Kitts and Nevis; it gives an indication of the sort of needs (and requests) for help which are likely to be encountered in the Islands.)

⁹⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
I agree L.B. P[earson]

9. If it is agreed that the needs of the Islands for transport, social welfare facilities, communications, and technical training are real, and that Canada has an interest in giving some help to meeting these needs, it may be useful to review the possible methods or techniques of making a Canadian contribution, and the nature of such assistance.

10. First, as to methods:

(a) One could conceive of Canada undertaking to give a direct annual grant to the budget of Federation.⁹¹ This is the technique which the United Kingdom uses for the bulk of its aid. From the Canadian view, it is obviously inappropriate. For one thing, it has an unpleasantly "colonial" flavour — we would not wish to adopt the West Indies as a dependency or pensioner. Second, it would be most difficult, if not impossible, for Canada to exercise the kind or degree of control over the spending of such funds that seems to be required and this would involve a radical departure from established Canadian financial principles and practices. Finally, such a grant would hardly serve the broad Canadian (and West Indian) interests set out above, for this form of aid would not lead us to a more active role in the area; there would be little to show for our effort except a figure in the annual budget.

(b) An alternative method would be a regular contribution to a joint development fund, in association with the West Indies, the United Kingdom, and possibly other countries.⁹² The main objections to this form of aid, from a Canadian point of view is that, like a grant to the annual budget, it does not provide for effective Canadian control over funds voted by the Canadian Parliament. Nor would such a fund ensure that aid provided by Canada would maintain its Canadian identity.

11. If these two methods, or something along these lines, are obviously unsatisfactory, there remains aid of a more bilateral character. The forms or nature of aid extended on an essentially bilateral basis are examined below.

12. Experience with aid programmes indicates that they can be conceived of in broad terms as "technical" aid and "capital" aid.

13. Technical assistance, in the form in which it is now carried on under the Colombo Plan, contains four elements:

- (a) The provision of the services of experts;
- (b) Training in Canada for students, technical and administrative personnel;
- (c) The provision of training equipment needed to make full use of the experts being provided; and
- (d) The provision of buildings and the equipping of schools, etc., which our experts feel are necessary and which provide the expanded facilities for long-term programmes of technical education and economic development.

14. For purely administrative reasons, we generally think of aid under (d) above as coming from capital aid funds. Our experience has shown that our practice of buttressing our largely "technical" (training) assistance programme with related capital aid has made the former a good deal more successful. Officials of the BWI have already indicated that they need this broader type of technical help from Canada — they need advice in the development and use of their resources, in marketing techniques, in public administration, the organization of public health and welfare schemes and the provision of educational facilities of all kinds at all levels. Their needs seem genuine and urgent, particularly in the poorer islands, which are chronically depressed and whose dissatisfactions will impose a severe strain on the Federation.

15. While considerable study on the spot would be required to get an accurate idea of the scope for such a programme, and of the costs involved, it can be estimated that the sums which could usefully be spent would rise from around $100,000 a year at the beginning to say $1 million when the programme was in full operation, and might then start to taper off before the end of a period of perhaps ten years. A balanced programme could be developed within whatever sums are authorized, but the above figures are suggested as being in line with the amount which could be used and would be within Canada's capacity to provide. It should be mentioned that to the extent that local currency expenditure by Canada is required, there might be some scope for the provision of Canadian commodities to be sold in the islands, to provide counterpart funds. (In Ceylon, Canada is financing the building of a technical institute and laboratories through the provision of flour.)

16. A question which may be raised about such a technical assistance programme is, will Canada be able to supply the necessary experts? Although difficulties are being experienced in recruiting suitable people for Colombo Plan assignments, it is likely that there are many experts who are unwilling to go to Asia but would be quite willing to go to the West Indies; a Caribbean programme would tap a supply of experts not available for the Colombo Plan. Further, some experts, who have gained experience under the Colombo Plan but who would not return to Asia, might be willing to do a second term abroad if they were offered posts in the West Indies. Second, the cost per expert or per trainee of the Caribbean programme would be less than under the Colombo Plan: transport costs to the Caribbean, which are a considerable element of total costs under the Colombo Plan, particularly when families accompany experts, would be about one-sixth of transport costs to Asia. As far as administration in Canada is concerned, the existing facilities of the Technical Co-operation Service for both experts and trainees would be available.

17. A fundamentally bilateral programme could emphasize capital aid on a continuing basis rather than technical aid. A continuing capital programme could no doubt be carried on in the fashion of our Colombo Plan capital aid scheme — this involves Canada choosing particular projects to aid and maintaining operating control over purchasing and personnel. Compared with the Colombo Plan countries, however, the need for substantial capital aid in the West Indies is not great. A continuing capital programme, moreover, would probably require larger sums than Canada would be prepared to make available. The poorer islands could absorb substantial sums, and, given the problem of avoiding inter-island jealousies and the need to make Canadian aid evident and widely dispersed, a programme involving upwards of $2 million annually would seem to be indicated. This seems difficult to justify in terms of needs and commitments elsewhere and in view of the fact that there is already a sizeable flow of Canadian private investment to the area. Private capital may be expected to provide much of the industrial development in this area which in South Asia must be provided by Governments. These privately financed industrial developments should, in turn, provide revenues for the expansion of basic services, albeit at a slower rate than if substantial funds could be made available by Governments now. In summary, it seems doubtful that a continuing capital aid programme in the West Indies is justified, or feasible, unless Canada was prepared to spend substantial amounts.

18. An alternative form of bilateral capital aid would be to undertake a substantial once-for-all project. The main attraction of this form of aid is that it appears to involve only a firm and limited commitment. The second attraction is that one particular capital project would meet a real economic and political need of the West Indies — namely, the provision of a ship or two to meet the necessity for an inter-island shipping service. Aid to shipping would be in keeping with Canada's traditional ties with the West Indies, which were based on Canadian east-coast shipping and trade, as reflected in our pre-war trade agreement with the BWI. Perhaps more important, ships would make a real contribution to the strength of the Federation, in that it would help tie the scattered islands together. Further, the contracts for the proposed ships would be welcomed by Canadian east-coast shipyards. It has been suggested that two ships of 1,500 tons each be provided, costing $2 1/2 million each. These would be able to provide an inter-island service of the desired frequency. Unfortunately, they would operate at a deficit of about $300,000 to $500,000 per annum, (depending on the number and frequency of ports of call) about one-tenth, we guess, of the Federation's budget. The ability of the West Indies to meet this deficit needs to be investigated. Further investigation would also be required of the need for two ships and the proposed frequency of service, bearing in mind the growth of air travel facilities within the area. Possibly one ship, which would involve a deficit of the order of $150,000-$250,000 per year, would be sufficient to meet the West Indies' most important requirements and would not impose too heavy a burden on current revenues.

19. In any event, it would not be wise to assume that the gift of one or two ships — large as the gift will be — will ensure that we will not be asked for other types of aid. Although these requests might be held off for some indefinite period of time, they could not be ignored for long. The West Indies needs are real, and their financial resources inadequate. They will appreciate how real our interest is in the success of the Federation: like Oliver Twist, they will ask for more. It is worth considering then if we would not be wise to plan now for a limited amount of money spent on a broadly-based technical assistance programme as suggested above.

20. If, for purposes of discussion, it was decided that Canada would make available $10 million over the next ten years, expenditures might take the following pattern:

Year	One Ship	Technical Assistance
1	$2,500,000	$ 100,000
2		300,000
3		500,000
4		800,000
5		1,000,000
6		2,000,000
7		1,200,000
8		1,000,000
9		400,000
10		200,000
	$2,500,000	$7,500,000
		TOTAL: $10,000,000

Alternatively, a gift of two ships, costing $5,000,000, would enable the technical assistance programme to rise to around $750,000 at maximum, but this would not enable any significant Canadian contribution to building costs etc., and to projects of any great size.

21. If these ideas carry your judgment we shall try to obtain the concurrence of other departments concerned.⁹³ You may also wish to discuss these proposals with your colleagues. The plan would be to reach agreement inter-departmentally on a memorandum to Cabinet recommending that officials be authorized to explore these matters with BWI officials in due course, and to reply to the United Kingdom note. In the reply to the United Kingdom note we might suggest that we would be prepared to carry out our technical assistance programme under the general guidance of a Canada-United Kingdom-BWI Board. This would enable us to give a more positive reply to the United Kingdom note which emphasizes their interest in Canadian participation in a "joint programme". (Some thoughts on how such a Board might operate are set out in Annex II.) Matters have progressed to the stage that, if Canadian officials are to enter into discussion with BWI officials, they should be empowered to say that the Canadian Government is prepared to ask Parliament at the next session to make funds available for a ship or ships and for the initial expenditures of a continuing technical assistance programme.⁹⁴

Department of Trade and Commerce

Mr. Baskerville, Department of Immigration

Messrs. MacInnes, Malone, Grey and MacLean of the Department of External Affairs

After welcoming Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Southwell to Ottawa and discussing briefly the background of their visit, the Chairman invited the Ministers to address the group.

Mr. Bradshaw referred to the past Canadian interest in the British Caribbean Colonies and stated his hope that this interest was to continue, and indeed to increase as the colonies developed politically. He noted that the economies of the British Caribbean colonies were by no means strong or diversified; economics, he feared, may prove the weak spot of the proposed West Indian Federation. While the economies of Trinidad and Jamaica were considerably stronger than those of the other islands, taken as a whole he felt the Federation had "nothing to brag about". There was, Mr. Bradshaw suggested, a general appreciation of these difficulties and a realization that the Federation, if it was to survive, would require scientific and other advice. It was hoped that some of this assistance would be provided by Canada.

Mr. Bradshaw described some of the educational difficulties confronting St. Kitts (and the neighbouring islands of Nevis and Anguilla) and of the particular fields in which Technical Assistance would be most valuable. Experts were required in the fields of agricultural development, government finance, and fisheries. There was also a need for secondary school teachers.

Mr. Bradshaw also described the proposed capital projects for the three islands; all of these projects, it was emphasized, were urgently required and there was little or no possibility of interesting private investors in undertaking them. Projects for which it was hoped Commonwealth Development or other funds would be available included:

(1) Lengthening of the existing airport runway to "Viscount" standards, and the improvement of other airport facilities. (It was hoped that when these improvements were completed T.C.A. could be persuaded to use St. Kitts as a flag stop.) Estimated cost, $1,400,000.

(2) Construction of a customs, post office and internal revenue building in order to cope with greatly increased business.

(3) Installation of additional electric generating capacity in order to improve commercial opportunities (the construction of a cold storage plant was cited as an example). Estimated cost $510,000.

(4) Replacement of the present obsolete telephone system by an automatic system. Estimated cost $500,000.

(5) Pasture and crop improvement for the island of Nevis, where productivity was much lower than in St. Kitts. Estimated cost $200,000.

Mr. Bradshaw pointed out that there was an additional capital project which was urgently required: the construction of a modern hospital as a replacement for the ancient, wooden structure now in use. It was hoped that $1,000,000 of the required $2 1/2 million could be borrowed at a low interest rate from the sugar industry's price stabilization fund. Mr. Bradshaw expressed the hope that Canada might provide the additional funds required.

In conclusion Mr. Bradshaw mentioned his hope that the Canadian National Steamship Company could arrange to have their ship, the West Indian, make a monthly call at Nevis.

The Chairman thanked the Ministers for their frank statement of the Federation's needs and problems, and both he and Mr. Plumtre emphasized that Canada would continue to be interested in the development of St. Kitts and her neighbours. A specific request for economic assistance would be carefully considered though they thought it only right to warn Mr. Bradshaw and his colleague that it was unlikely that either the request for a C.N.R. steamship call at Nevis or a capital grant towards the construction of a hospital could be met. It was stated that many of the present island calls of the C.N.R. ship could be made only at a loss, but that the losses resulting from a monthly call at Nevis would be still greater. Furthermore, the Ministers were informed that, while our current study of possible assistance to the West Indies Federation was not yet complete, it was very likely that we would wish to channel any available aid through the Federal Administration, where the need for support and assistance was thought to be most urgent.

NOTE ON A CANADA/UNITED KINGDOM/BWI TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE BOARD

While the Technical Co-operation Service in the Department of Trade and Commerce is available for the administration in Canada of a BWI technical assistance scheme, it would be desirable to examine devising some technique of administration in the BWI other than relying on our diplomatic or trade missions.

It is suggested that a United Kingdom/Canada/BWI Board be set up, possibly including a United Nations representative, and a United States representative, if the United States proposes to give aid to the Federation and if it was prepared to submit its technical aid programme to the direction of such a Board. The Board might consist of part time national representatives; it would meet infrequently to give general guidance, to assign broad priorities, to formally confirm applications for training scholarships, etc. The day-to-day administration of the programme would be in the hands of a small permanent professional staff. There seems to be no reason why, under such a system, Canada could not maintain an adequate degree of control over the use of Canadian experts, the allocation of training places in Canada, and the expenditure of Canadian funds. Canada would have appropriate representation on such a Board, and the Technical Co-operation Service would retain significant control over the Canadian contribution.

The reasons for using a Board as outlined above may be summarised as follows:

- (1) The administration of technical assistance programmes is now becoming professionalized; use should be made of such professional skills by having a permanent staff.
- (2) Diplomatic and trade missions are ill equipped to administer these programmes; they tend to interfere with the proper work of such missions.
- (3) It would be desirable to set up a device which would provide a form and a forum for co-operation between the United Kingdom, Canada, and the BWI, and particularly, between the United States and the other interested countries rather than letting all programmes develop independently. The need for co-ordination is real.
- (4) It would enable us to give a fairly positive reply to the United Kingdom, which, presumably is anxious to have Canada "associate" with the United Kingdom in the Caribbean.

BRITISH WEST INDIES FEDERATION; CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

21. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted a memorandum from Mr. Pearson which said that, with the establishment of the new British West Indies Federation and the lessening of United Kingdom participation in the affairs of the federating colonies, it would be desirable for Canada to play a larger role in the area. The U.K. had asked if the Canadian government would be willing to be associated with them in extending aid to the new federation and, in addition, informal approaches had been made by a number of the political leaders of the proposed federation. It was naturally desirable that the federation develop strong free institutions and a democratic way of life, and this could be assisted if the older Commonwealth countries, and perhaps the United States, helped the federation find solutions to their more pressing economic needs. In addition, it was undesirable, from Canada's point of view, for the vacuum caused by the decline in U.K. influence to be filled by the U.S. alone.

Compared with the Colombo Plan countries, standards of living in parts of the West Indies appeared high. Nevertheless, there was no doubt that the capital and technical needs of the federation as a whole were real. Aid could take the form of a direct grants to the budget of the federation, or, alternatively, be provided through a regular contribution to a joint development fund. However, both these methods would appear to be inappropriate for a number of reasons, including the lack of effective control over the funds voted, and the absence of identification of the aid as Canadian. It would appear preferable that any programme should consist of "technical" and "capital" assistance. Technical assistance might be provided in a manner similar to that under the Colombo Plan. As regards capital, it could be expected that considerable amounts would be provided through private investment. However, a substantial outright grant on the occasion of federation might be desirable. A particularly useful field in which this could be used was shipping. A gift of $2.5 million would suffice to provide the right type of ship to help improve the inter-island transportation service and make a real contribution to strengthening the federation as such. However, operating deficits would be a problem and would necessitate subsidies. Another problem was the high cost of supplying a ship from Canadian yards.

The Canada-West Indian Trade Agreement would have to be re-negotiated, but this would take some time and it would be undesirable to delay consideration of an aid programme until it could be appraised within the context of a new agreement.

Mr. Pearson recommended in the memorandum:

(a) that certain decisions in principle be made for the provision of aid during the five-year provisional period of the federation's constitution;

(b) that officials undertake discussions with representatives of the federating colonies, with a view to formulating specific proposals for consideration of the Cabinet and in these discussions certain specified considerations should be kept in mind; and,

(c) that the U.K. be advised that the government would be glad to exchange information on the question of providing aid to the federation.

(Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, April 10, 1957 — Cab. Doc. 82-57†)

22. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) From the trade point of view, it was highly desirable to assist the new federation.

(b) The possibility of providing a direct subsidy should not be ruled out. It was important to Canada that the federation should hold together and succeed as such, but it would be in some danger of bankruptcy and might need financial aid to get established. Moreover, we should treat these people as our equals who could decide on matters for themselves.

(c) The Colombo Plan approach was strictly a one-sided programme of help and was perhaps not suitable for the West Indian problem. If there were a new trade agreement, it would be easier to justify subsidizing the federation because this would strengthen it, which would be in Canada's best long-term interests. It was argued, on the other hand, that direct bilateral assistance, as provided by the U.S. for many countries, was resented and would not be apt to be appreciated in the West Indies. It had been pointed out to the U.K. Prime Minister at Bermuda last month that Canada's primary interest in the Caribbean was trade, and assistance to the area could best be justified as an investment in future trade.

(d) The West Indies resented the present Canadian immigration arrangements and would welcome a quota agreement similar to those with India, Pakistan, and Ceylon. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration indicated this would be proposed once the federation was formed. It was not in our interest or to the advantage of the West Indies to encourage large scale immigration to Canada. On the other hand, Canada should do everything possible to encourage trade, particularly the export of fish.

(e) It would be desirable to encourage the new federation to come within the Canadian monetary system.

(f) It was desirable not to take definite decisions at this time but to authorize discussions to proceed. There would be great dangers in paying fiscal subsidies to the new federation, which should be carefully considered. It would also be desirable to defer discussion of the nature and scale of assistance until Mr. Winters as well as Mr. Pickersgill could be present.

23. The Cabinet noted the memorandum of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on proposals to assist the economic development of the new British West Indian Federation, and agreed that the officials concerned be authorized to discuss the subject with representatives of the federating colonies and explore what forms of aid would be most suitable, on the understanding that such discussions would imply that Canada was prepared, in principle, to consider giving aid to the federation.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 58-56

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN NATIONAL (WEST INDIES) STEAMSHIPS, LIMITED.

On March 30th, 1954, the Minister of Transport informed the Sessional Committee on Railways and Shipping that if the operation of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited continued to result in serious deficits consideration would have to be given to abandonment of the service.

Subsequently, on January 4th, 1955, the Chairman and President of Canadian National Railways wrote to the Minister of Transport to the effect that the steamship company could be liquidated without the introduction of new capital provided that the depreciated value of the ships could be realized. Mr. Gordon contended that if the government wished the service to be continued, the vessels should be transferred to the Crown and operated by the steamship company on an agency basis.

At the request of the Minister of Transport, the continued operation of the steamship service was considered by the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy which recommended that a sub-committee consisting of officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, External Affairs, Finance and Transport and the Canadian Maritime Commission be formed to devote further study to, and report their conclusions on, the future of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited.

The sub-committee's report, in which the Departments concerned concur, notes that:

(1) In the thirty-five years prior to the inauguration of the Canadian National service in 1929, the Canadian Government spent nearly $6 million dollars in subsidizing shipping services to the British West Indies.

(2) During the 26 year period ending 1955, the cumulative deficit from the operation of the service by Canadian National was approximately $3.3 million.

(3) Dependable scheduled shipping is vital to Canadian trade with the British West Indies.

(4) A gradual increase in trade with the British West Indies coincident with population growth and industrial development may be foreseen.

(5) The Canadian National can retain and perhaps increase its share in the carriage of the trade.

(6) The Canadian National is succeeding in efforts to reduce operating costs and to develop new sources of revenue.

(7) Annual losses should be no higher than $200,000 over the next five years.

The report recommends that Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships be permitted to carry on its operations on the present scale and with the present fleet for a period of at least five years, and, in view of the relatively small operating losses anticipated for this period, recommends against the proposed transfer of the fleet to the Crown for operation by the steamship company on an agency basis.

The Minister of Transport, therefore, recommends that Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited continue in operation with its present fleet for a period of at least five years from 31st December 1955, such deficits as may occur from the operation to become a direct obligation of the Government, provided that the question of the operation of the service after December 31st, 1960 shall be subject to review; and, further, that the Government reject the proposal for the transfer of the vessels to the Crown for operation by Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited under an agency agreement.

CANADIAN NATIONAL (WEST INDIES) STEAMSHIP SERVICE; CONTINUANCE OF OPERATION

40. The Minister of Transport said the question had been raised as to whether or not the operations of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited should be continued in spite of the repeated deficits incurred on this service. The President of the Canadian National Railways had proposed that, if the government wished the service to be continued, the vessels be transferred to the Crown and operated by the company on an agency basis.

The question had been considered by a sub-committee of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy, which had recommended against the proposed transfer and had proposed that the present service be continued for a period of at least five years.

The Minister recommended the approval of the conclusions reached by the sub-committee.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.
(Minister's memorandum, March 6, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 58-56).

41. During the course of the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) A gradual increase in trade with the British West Indies could be expected as a result of population growth and industrial development, as well as the relaxation of restrictions on dollar imports.

(b) Dependable scheduled shipping was vital to Canadian trade with the British West Indies.

(c) A new and more dynamic management of the company was reducing operating costs and developing new sources of revenue.

(d) Annual deficits were getting smaller and should not exceed $200,000 over the next five years.

(e) Announcement of the decision should be made by the Minister of Transport to the House of Commons Committee on Railways and Shipping.

42. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Transport on the operations of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, and agreed,

(a) that the proposal for transfer of the vessels to the Crown for operation by Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, under an agency basis be rejected;

(b) that Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, continue in operation with its present fleet for a period of at least five years from December 31st, 1955, and that such deficits as might occur from the operation be met from parliamentary appropriations; and,

(c) that an announcement of the decision be made by the Minister of Transport to the House of Commons Committee on Railways and Shipping.

749.

DEA/14020-W-1-1-40

Note

Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], February 18, 1957

THE CANADIAN IMMIGRATION POLICY TOWARDS THE WEST INDIES

1. Until June 1955 prospective immigrants from the West Indies could come to Canada provided:

- (a) they had already secured employment here beforehand;
- (b) they were sponsored by a close relative already in Canada;
- (c) they were considered to be "exceptional merit" cases.

Attached is a table† showing, by ethnic origin, the number of immigrants from the West Indies for the years 1938-1955 inclusive. It would appear that during this period a total of 6,971 were admitted as immigrants through the above-mentioned criteria. The ethnic origin of these persons was as follows:

4,275	British
1,239	African
1,221	European
184	Semitic
30	East Indian
13	Chinese
3	North American Indian
6	Unknown Extraction
6,971

No statistical records are maintained of persons departing from Canada, and we cannot ascertain, therefore, how many West Indians have left this country after having been landed as immigrants.

2. As can be seen from the above breakdown and from the table, immigration from the West Indies is overwhelmingly white, and this white exodus from the West Indies has been particularly heavy since 1946-47. This fact would tend to corroborate reports that since practical steps were taken at the Montego Bay Conference of 1947 to implement the proposal of federation, the white population in the smaller islands of the West Indies, and especially in the so-called "plantation" islands, has been gradually falling off. Through sheer weight of numbers, the Negroes are naturally bound to keep control of the leadership of the larger political entity now coming into being.

3. Regulations concerning the admission to Canada of coloured, or partly coloured, persons have been slightly relaxed in recent years, which accounts for the increase in Negro entries since 1950 (see table). For instance, some of the Canadian nursing associations have signified their willingness to grant registration to qualified nurses from the West Indies, and many of our hospitals are now accepting student nurses from that area. When there is reasonable evidence that their services are acceptable in Canada, entry is authorized of the qualified nurses for permanent landing, and of the student nurses with the prospect of permanent landing if they should desire to remain after the completion of their training.

4. But the most noteworthy alteration concerning coloured immigration from the West Indies, has been the decision made by Cabinet on June 8, 1955 to admit, on an experimental basis, 100 domestics during that year.⁹⁵ Seventy-five were to be selected from Jamaica and 25 from Barbados. These domestics were to be admitted as immigrants and required to sign an undertaking to remain at domestic work for at least one year. Selection was to be confined to single women in the age group 21 - 35 years. This scheme met with such success that on March 29, 1956, Cabinet approved a recommendation that it be extended for one year and that the number of West Indians admissible as domestics be increased to 200, to be selected as follows: 100 from Jamaica, 40 from Barbados, 30 from Trinidad and 30 from British Guiana. While these persons are living up to their agreement to engage in domestic work for at least one year after arrival, many of them are said to be of a superior type with other qualifications and are expected eventually to establish themselves in other occupations. Persons who have entered Canada under this new arrangement will, of course, after a certain lapse of time, be allowed to sponsor their close relatives as immigrants to Canada. Although no discussions have been held concerning further continuation or extension of the scheme, the probabilities are that it will be retained for at least another year, although whether the number of admissible persons will be increased or the areas from which they are now selected added to, is not known.⁹⁶

5. Over 1,000 West Indians were landed as immigrants during 1956, more than during any one year since 1938. Although this figure has not yet been compiled by ethnic origin, the liberalization, as outlined in the foregoing paragraphs, of the regulations concerning the entry of coloured people, is believed to be largely responsible for this increase.

On 14 March 1957, Cabinet agreed to extend the scheme to allow an additional 230 domestic servants from the West Indies to immigrate to Canada in 1957.

Whether this liberalization will continue would, however, seem to be doubtful. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration has this to say:

"It has been the long standing policy of this Department to restrict the admission to Canada of coloured or partly coloured persons. As you no doubt are aware, the Canadian public, apart from certain minority groups, is not favourably disposed towards any significant increase in the coloured population. This is partly due to the fact that Canadians are not accustomed to seeing coloured people occupying positions which would place them on a social and economic level with their white neighbours. ... It is fully appreciated that the various West Indian Governments would welcome any change in our immigration policy which would ease restrictions on the admission to Canada of citizens of West Indian countries. However, our immigration policy is based on the principle that Canada desires to foster the growth of the population by the encouragement of immigration through legislation and vigorous administration to ensure the careful selection and permanent settlement of such numbers of immigrants as can be advantageously absorbed into the national economy. On the other hand, immigration must not have the effect of altering the fundamental character of the population and Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens".
