We spoke this morning to Andersen of the Icelandic Delegation. He does not repeat not propose to submit any resolution to the Committee. He said, however, that there had been a suggestion (and we assume it came from some of the Latin Americans) that the 20 Power Resolution (Norway has joined the sponsors) now before the Committee calling for a conference be amended to include a provision which would call on the conference to take cognizance of the special interest of a coastal state in exercising exclusive jurisdiction over the living resources of the sea in that area contiguous to its coasts. Andersen asked what we would think of such an amendment. We said, of course, that we agreed with the principle enunciated. We thought, however, that such an amendment dealing with a matter of substance might not be appropriate for inclusion in a procedural resolution calling for the convening of a conference.³⁶ In our view, the presence of coastal states at the conference would ensure that the principle would be taken into account by the conference and is in fact already included and recognized in the International Law Commission's recommendations. An attempt to include such a statement in the resolution, we thought, would give rise to a considerable amount of disputation in the Committee. If the suggestion were proposed and defeated, this would be an unhappy initiation for the principle. While we thought that we would be unable to oppose such an amendment if it were proposed, nevertheless on balance we thought it would be unfortunate if it were proposed. Our final attitude on such a proposal can only be decided in the light of an actual proposal.

2. Andersen said that he would have to make it clear that his delegation considers that the International Law Commission's articles should be considered here and now by the General Assembly, although he agrees that the idea of a conference will probably receive almost unanimous support. He is rather anxious that his delegation should not appear uncooperative and stubborn but in the context of the recent agreement with the UK wherein Iceland has agreed to await the outcome of consideration of the Law of the Sea in the UN before pressing its maritime claims, he has no alternative but to advocate consideration by the UN now. In the alternative the Icelandic delegation would, of course, favour an early conference, but because he thinks that the way of handling the Commission's report is through the General Assembly rather than a conference Andersen said he would have to abstain on the vote for the 20 Power Resolution. He also mentioned that voting for the conference would tie his government's hands in respect of any action that it may wish to take between now and the conference. He did not say specifically however whether his government proposed to take any further unilateral action regarding jurisdiction over off-shore fisheries.

3. We informed Andersen that we would like to see the conference held in 1957. He, of course, agreed the sooner it were held the better. He thought that two months would be sufficient time in which to hold the conference and agreed with us that it would be feasible to hold it in the fall of 1957, say August and September. He has some views on where the conference should be held. He said he had heard suggestions emanating from the USA and the UK delegations that it might be held in Tokyo. He was opposed to this because he thought that a conference held in Tokyo would not repeat not be as widely attended as one held in Geneva or some other suitable European capital. He thought it was important to ensure that the conference was as widely attended as possible in order to ensure votes of those states which would, as he put it, favour the underdogs. We take it a European venue would be preferable to Tokyo. We should be grateful for your comments, particularly on the availability of Geneva say in August and September of next year. New York we think would be out of the question because there would be danger of overlapping with the regular session of the General Assembly in September.

4. Although there is apparently some talk in political circles in Iceland which contends that Iceland should exercise exclusive jurisdiction over off-shore fisheries over the continental shelf, Andersen said that Iceland would be prepared to accept a rule granting to the coastal state exclusive jurisdiction over fisheries with a 12 mile contiguous zone measured from straight base lines. We have also heard that the Mexicans consider that the west coast Latin American states would be prepared to settle for such a rule.

LETTER NO. 42

New York, December 21, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION'S DRAFT ARTICLES ON THE LAW OF THE SEA — CONSIDERATION BY THE LEGAL COMMITTEE OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The general debate on this question concluded on December 17 with sixty-one representatives having spoken.

2. For the most part delegations restricted their remarks to expressing their views on the twenty-three power draft resolution (A/C6/L385) to call an international conference and to a general statement of position on matters dealt with by the Report of the International Law Commission. These general statements of position gave prominence to the question of the breadth of the territorial sea and the related question of jurisdiction over off-shore fisheries.

3. The Soviet bloc, in addition to commenting on the breadth of the territorial sea, argued that piracy ought not to be considered as being capable of being committed by private individuals only but should be considered as being capable of commission by governments (e.g., the "Franco rebels" and the "Chiang Kai Shek clique"). They also stated that they could not subscribe to the provisions for compulsory arbitration in the International Law Commission's articles on fishing. India raised the question of the right to use the high seas for thermo-nuclear tests. Afghanistan, Austria, Bolivia and Nepal asked that the interests of non-coastal states be not overlooked. A number of states commented on particular articles of special concern to them, e.g., Liberia commented on the provisions regarding nationality of ships, Portugal on the right of one state (India) to encompass the territorial waters of another state (Goa), Venezuela on the rule regarding estuaries (the Orinoco) and the recommendation regarding the delimitation of territorial waters between two states (in the environs of the Gulf of Paria), Egypt on the right of visit of warships regarding the slave trade and so on.

4. Positions regarding the breadth of the territorial sea ranged from that of such states as the U.K., U.S., France, Netherlands, Denmark, which maintained that the three-mile rule is a valid rule of international law, to that of the Soviet bloc and some Latin American states (Venezuela, Chile, Peru, Ecuador), which contended that a state should have the right to determine within reasonable limits the breadth of its own territorial sea. India's view was that the outside limit might be twelve miles within which states would have the right to set their limits. Many states argued that one rule could not be applied to all countries.

5. There was virtual unanimity in the view that the coastal state has a special interest in the living resources of the sea in areas contiguous to its shore and a good deal of agreement that if this question were separated from that of the territorial sea and solved, the problem of the breadth of the territorial sea would virtually be solved. The suggestion has been made that the proposed conference first consider questions on which general agreement can be reached leaving the thornier questions, particularly the breadth of the territorial sea until the end. This seems a reasonable suggestion. It would be unfortunate if the lack of agreement on the breadth of the territorial sea should prejudice the Conference at least enunciating those principles and rules upon which general agreement is possible. Also if agreement can be reached on some régime for fishing the solution of the problem of the breadth of the territorial sea will at least be facilitated.

6. The U.S. and U.K. argued that the recommendations of the International Law Commission on fishing gave adequate recognition and protection to the interests of a coastal state on off-shore fisheries — under these articles the coastal state could, if necessary, regulate off-shore fisheries, subject to its being supported, if challenged by a fact-finding board and subject to its not discriminating against foreign fishermen. The U.K. suggested that where the fishing of a coastal state was being adversely affected by foreign fishermen, a prior right of appropriation might be recognized for the coastal state but that there was no justice in preventing foreign fishermen fishing off foreign shores where local fishermen just did not take advantage of the maximum yield. (This suggestion goes somewhat further than the International Law Commission's articles in meeting the positions of coastal states).

7. Some Latin American states (Chile, Peru, Ecuador in particular) argued that economic necessity required that they be able to regulate off-shore fisheries having regard to the areas in which the various fish occur. They did not intend, they emphasized, to interfere with the freedom of navigation nor, for that matter, did they desire to exclude foreigners; they claimed to be concerned only with the right of regulation. They argued that the solution had to be worked out on a regional basis.

8. There was virtually no support for the idea we broached of a contiguous twelve-mile zone in which exclusive fisheries control might be vested in the coastal state. Ireland suggested the idea might be worth exploring and New Zealand hinted that the suggestion might have possibilities. However, it was quite clear that delegations were more intent on setting out their governments' present thinking than on proposing compromises. (We have heard from a member of the U.K. delegation that a number of delegations (unnamed) have suggested to them privately that the Canadian proposal may be worth considering.) Obviously there must be give and take or the conference will surely fail. This point was urged by Professor François, who has been rapporteur of the International Law Commission in its study of this problem, in a statement at the end of the General Debate, underwriting our and other delegations' plea that states approach the conference in a spirit of compromise. François made some rather broad suggestions regarding compromise on the breadth of the territorial sea which were not far removed from our suggestion for a contiguous zone in which states might exercise exclusive fisheries jurisdiction.

9. Iceland agreed that there must be a zone wherein a state has exclusive fisheries jurisdiction no matter what the zone is called. It was suggested that the proper solution is not an arbitrary limit to be applied to all states. There was a further suggestion that Iceland may be aiming in the long run at exclusive jurisdiction over fishing over the continental shelf. At any rate Iceland considered the coastal state should be the judge of the extent of its jurisdiction.

10. Only one state offered to retreat from its present position: Greece, now a six-mile adherent, agreed to accept a three-mile limit if neighbouring Mediterranean states would do likewise.

11. It seems quite clear from the debate that the freedom of seas for navigation is generally conceded to be important. The "three-miler's" claim that an extension of the territorial sea would impinge upon this freedom and the "more than three-miler's" contend that it does not and anyway, there is the right of innocent passage in the territorial sea. Clearly, however, the crux of the problem is fish. A solution to this problem will probably not result in general acceptance of the three-mile territorial limit, since states which have already proclaimed the twelve-mile limit will be reluctant for reasons of pride or fear or contrariness to retrench. However, if the fishing problem can be solved, undoubtedly the question of the breadth of the territorial sea will be relatively easier to solve.

12. The problem is to resolve the right of the coastal state with the right of the non-coastal fishing states. The International Law Commission recommendations provide a basis of such a compromise, though it appears that most coastal states with off-shore fisheries wish to have an unfettered right of regulation in areas contiguous to their coasts extending in some case out two hundred miles. Between these extremes and the International Law Commission recommendations, our proposal, taken with the International Law Commission articles, might provide some basis for agreement on the other hand. The United Kingdom suggestion mentioned in paragraph 4, when taken with the International Law Commission's articles on fishing, could provide the basis for a flexible régime on fishing, which would take into account the special interest of the coastal state, and indeed make provisions for safeguarding this interest, but at the same time would safeguard the fishing interests of other states.³⁷

Washington, December 22, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

I thank you for your letter of December 6† on the current discussion in the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly on the International Law Committee's report on the law of the sea.

We were, of course, most happy that your Delegation took a stand in favor of the three-mile limit of territorial waters. But I should be less than frank if I did not tell you that your Government's position favoring a contiguous fishery zone has raised serious questions. It is a cause of very real concern here.

Meanwhile, passage seems assured for the resolution sponsored by the United States and other countries for a world conference on the subject of the law of the sea.

We shall, I hope, have an opportunity to talk over the fishery question in the near future.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT MURPHY

II. HISTORIC FISHING RIGHTS

Mr. Nutt suggested that it would be advisable to develop a reply that could be given to representatives of governments who were expressing interest in the meaning of the term "historic fishing rights" that the Prime Minister had referred to in his statement in the House of Commons on July 30, 1956.

The Committee, after discussion, agreed that External Affairs officials should take the following line in replying to such inquiries:

There being no question at the moment of a unilateral extension of territorial waters, or exclusive fisheries control, we consider it premature to discuss the question of 'historic fishing rights' in particular cases. We assume that fishing interests in general will be taken into consideration during negotiations for a general Convention at the forthcoming International Conference on Territorial Waters in 1958. If at any time there were to be a question of unilateral action by Canada, then, as the Prime Minister inferred in his statement of July 30, 1956, in the House of Commons: 'we should certainly wish to discuss the question of fisheries with States which have fisheries interests in the areas which might be affected'.

III. INTERESTS OF FRANCE IN CANADIAN TERRITORIAL WATERS

The Committee discussed a letter dated February 13, 1957,† from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Chairman, dealing with enquiries from the French Ambassador to Canada regarding French interests in Canadian territorial waters. Concerning the Canadian position which the French understood calls for a possible extension of territorial waters from 3 to 12 miles, the Ambassador had made three points:

(a) Presumably the rights of French fishermen, under the Convention between the United Kingdom and France signed at London, April 8, 1904, would not be affected as a result of such an extension.

(b) It would be necessary to determine the boundary between French and Canadian territorial waters in the vicinity of St. Pierre-Miquelon if territorial waters were extended 12 miles in order to avoid an overlap.

(c) If territorial waters were to be extended to 12 miles, it was considered that a Franco-Canadian agreement would be desirable to clarify the position concerning points (a) and (b) above.

The Committee agreed that a reply along the following lines should be given to the French Ambassador:

(a) It was not intended that the rights of French citizens under the Convention between the United Kingdom and France, signed at London on April 8, 1904, should be affected by any possible extension of Canadian territorial waters.

(b) In the event of an extension of Canadian territorial waters it would be desirable to reach agreement on the boundary between Canada and St. Pierre-Miquelon in the waters separating them.

(c) The Government of Canada would be pleased to discuss these two questions with the Government of France when this became necessary.

IV. INTERESTS OF GREAT BRITAIN IN CANADIAN TERRITORIAL WATERS

The Committee recalled that some months previously the High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom had asked if any thought had been given to the status of United Kingdom fishing rights off the Newfoundland and Labrador coasts, and if it was the intention to respect the historic fishing rights of a non-foreign state, such as the United Kingdom and perhaps Ireland, that, in the nature of the case, could never have been confirmed by treaty.

The Committee, after discussions, agreed that the question ought to be mentioned to the United Kingdom authorities on a suitable occasion, but that we should not take the initiative now in broaching the question to them. It was expected that a suitable occasion would arise early this summer when it was contemplated that the High Commissioner would be asked to pass on to the United Kingdom authorities an advance copy of the Canadian Government's comments on the International Law Commission's recommendations on the Law of the Sea. However, should the High Commissioner be approached by interested officials, then there would be no objection to his making an explanation. The Committee considered that the point to be made, at least initially, was that the Canadian Government had no knowledge of any United Kingdom fishing interests off the east coast of Canada that might be affected by an extension of Canadian territorial waters to 12 miles or, alternatively, the establishment of Canadian control over fisheries in a 12-mile contiguous zone. If the United Kingdom Government raised in specific terms the possibility of some recognition for whatever rights, either present or future, it might consider it had in areas off the east coast of Canada that might be affected by an extension of territorial waters, they should be told that the matter would have to be considered by the Canadian Government.

POLITICAL CONSULTATION IN NATO — ALGERIA AND CYPRUS

1. It has been suggested that the North Atlantic Council should discuss the Cyprus dispute and the Algerian question; and that if member states are not prepared to discuss these problems which involve the vital interests of certain members and of the alliance as a whole, there is not much point in pursuing political consultation in NATO. As you know, there has been a general reticence in NATO to tackle questions involving dependent territories. However, there is some evidence that the administering powers may not be content much longer to leave these urgent problems outside the field of political consultation. It, therefore, seems an appropriate time to take stock of our attitude toward political consultation in NATO and how our interests would be effected by a discussion of Cyprus and Algeria.

2. The purposes of political consultation in NATO are, generally speaking, to reinforce and consolidate the unity, effectiveness and prestige of the alliance and, where possible, to concert action on common problems in order "to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area." The question is: would these purposes be served by considering in the North Atlantic Council the international problems and difficulties which certain member states are encountering in their dependent territories? To answer this question, it is necessary to consider the significance and implications of such specific problems as Cyprus, Algeria and Goa, and it at once becomes apparent that no precise criteria could be established for determining what political problems should be the subject of consultation in NATO. Consequently it is necessary to examine each particular problem on its merits and to ascertain how far consideration of it in NATO would serve the main aim of political consultation — the strengthening of the alliance.

3. An analysis of this context of the two immediate problems of Cyprus and Algeria may serve not only to illustrate the difficulty of delineating definitive criteria for political consultation but also as a preliminary exercise in assessing the boundaries beyond which NATO should not seek to exert political influence.

4. Attached to this memorandum are two papers which present a few ideas on the subject of Algeria, and the question of Cyprus.³⁸ With regard to Algeria I had come to the tentative conclusion that NATO should not discuss Algeria in order simply to note the nature of the situation, but should only take up the question if it were believed that there was something that NATO as a whole could do. Specifically, we should not take the lead in pressing for consultation in Algeria unless we were prepared to present some ideas on the subject and to back them up. And this might in the long run mean economic and military involvement by Canada in North Africa.

5. At the same time NATO is to all intents seized with the problem because of the French attempt to secure a declaration of NATO support for their policies. And the French have agreed to include Algeria as part of the item "Review of the Current International Situation" at the next ministerial meeting. I do not think that this kind of semi-consultation on a matter which NATO can hardly ignore will help towards a solution of the problem, but we may have to accept it as a pis-aller.

NATO AND THE QUESTION OF ALGERIA

The attitude of the French Government toward NATO political consultation in Algeria is not clear. Mr. Wilgress has pointed out that the French are very sensitive to outside interference on this question because of the large French population in the territory and the contention that it is part of metropolitan France. Nevertheless, there have been suggestions in the National Defence Committee of the French Assembly that the nation's NATO role should be redefined to take into account the strategic importance of North Africa and the contribution France is making by maintaining law and order there. Recently, when the French Representative explained to a secret session of the Council the reasons for further substantial withdrawals to Algeria of French troops which had been committed to NATO, he emphasized that events in Algeria are closely related to developments in the Middle East and that, coinciding with the lessening of East-West tension and the reorientation of Soviet tactics, the French action would not seriously imperil European security. There has been no disposition on the part of the other NATO members to have a full-dress discussion on Algeria, but the Supreme Allied Commander Europe has recently stressed the desirability of discussing the grave situation which arises out of both the strategic importance of Algeria and the extent to which the situation there is sapping the strength of NATO defences in Europe.

2. What would be the probable outcome of political consultation on this problem? At this stage in the development of NATO, the outward solidarity and internal unity of the alliance are very important and unless there are other overriding considerations it is not desirable to introduce problems which would tend to weaken or divide NATO. A thorough airing of the Algerian question would give France an opportunity fully to explain her position and her policies, and it might ameliorate some of the frustration which France must feel at having to handle alone and outside NATO a situation so vital to her national interests and the stability of the North Atlantic area. The United Kingdom and other members that administer dependent territories might share this French satisfaction to some extent. On the other hand, Norway, one of the most outspoken advocates of close political consultation in NATO, has made quite clear that it is strongly opposed to NATO becoming involved in any way in the Algerian problem, and there are other members that have had misgivings about French North African policy (e.g. United States, Denmark, etc.). There is also a real danger that a discussion on Algeria might lead to recriminations against France which would only exacerbate the situation.

3. The next question is whether political consultation on Algeria would increase the effectiveness of NATO. There are certainly strong arguments which can be advanced concerning the strategic significance of this territory, and action to remedy the military situation in Europe caused by the withdrawal of French troops can hardly be discussed realistically without reference to Algeria. Moreover, the loss of Algeria would be a severe blow to France and the French economy and would decrease the effectiveness of that country as a NATO member. It would also probably make the retention of U.S. bases in Morocco very difficult. It can also be argued that constructive French policies in North Africa have been, at least in part, a consequence of international pressure and that a little more applied indirectly through NATO might lead toward some solution to Algeria. Nevertheless, the latter is an extremely theoretical and tenuous contention, and it is difficult to see how political consultation on this question could contribute really substantially to the effectiveness of NATO as an organization for collective defence and the preservation of peace and security.

4. There is also the question of the prestige of NATO. As you know, there have been a few insinuations (particularly from Egypt and India) that NATO is supporting the French campaign of military repression in Algeria and that, at the very least, members of NATO are condoning the despatch of French forces and equipment to be used in the suppression of nationalism in North Africa. Although steps have been taken to refute these inferences before they gained credibility, the suspicions have lingered and have been maintained to some extent by Portuguese suggestions to the effect that NATO support would be forthcoming in Goa and that NATO should form the nucleus of a crusade to preserve the political status quo in Europe and Africa. To the Asian-African nations, Algeria is a clear cut question of colonialism. It was a major international issue at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly. Whatever the outcome of political consultation on this subject in NATO, therefore, it is likely that the prestige of the alliance would suffer severely in Asian-African eyes from being characterized as an organization active in the perpetuation of colonialism. Although we should not cringe before the big stick of anti-colonialism, I wonder whether we should wilfully expose NATO, at this time, to the full fury of fanatical nationalism and racism. Even though the talks are in theory secret, I presume it would be difficult to keep at least some mention of them from becoming public.

5. If NATO were to discuss the situation in Algeria without the principal powers having well in advance some clear idea of what they expected to gain from it, and with the express approval of France, there is a danger of a number of countries criticizing the French, and the latter then asking for explicit support, perhaps material as well as moral, in their campaign to pacify the country. Though the French up to now have been frank in stating that they thought Algeria was purely a French problem, and all they wanted from their allies was political support, they might, in the light of general NATO concern over the effect of Algeria on the European sector of NATO, seriously ask for our assistance. The suggestion might also be made that the North American members should make up the gaps in Allied Command Europe.

6. I should, therefore, like to suggest that we delay any move to discuss French North Africa in the Council (except possibly in the manner the French have suggested, as part of the item "Review of the Current International Situation"), until we can thoroughly explore some ways by which the problem of French North Africa can become a matter openly recognized as a concern of the whole alliance.

7. I for one find it very difficult to think of anything very concrete which NATO could do, certainly not with regard to Algeria alone since the French are very insistent on the special position of Algeria as a part of metropolitan France, and are suspicious of the ambitions of other powers in this area. We would, therefore, have to talk of French North Africa as a whole. The French may think they can give independence to Morocco and autonomy to Tunisia without moving in the same direction in Algeria, but this seems to be highly unlikely.

8. The problem essentially is that French North Africa is vital to the position of France as a great power. At present it can only be maintained by a military and economic effort, which over a long period will be impossible for France to maintain except by abdicating her position in Europe. Therefore France must either have outside help, or make a compromise in Algeria comparable to those made in Tunisia and Morocco.

9. The continued strength and prestige of France are equally vital to NATO, as are the bases, man-power and resources of French North Africa. It is, therefore, as essential to NATO as it is to France that a solution be found quickly, one which will at the same time preserve French strength, and the co-operation of the North Africans.

10. The French having come a very long way in the last year in Morocco and Tunisia should not, in my opinion, be pushed too hard by NATO to make compromises in Algeria. They will reach the decision that this is necessary in due course by themselves. However, if it is felt that NATO must intervene, then we have the alternatives of either helping the French morally and materially to suppress the revolt and to maintain their position in French North Africa, or of putting pressure on the French to give autonomy to the Algerians and at the same time of assisting both the North Africans and the French to adjust economically and politically to the new situation.

11. I imagine we would be disinclined to consider the first alternative, particularly when the French themselves cannot make up their minds what kind of a régime they want to give to Algeria. As far as the second is concerned, could the NATO powers not tell the French now that they recognize the importance of French North Africa for the alliance as a whole, that they commend the French for the measures they have already taken, and that they would be prepared to assist the whole area in the event that the Algerians agreed to work out with the French a plan for the gradual acquisition of self-government? This could take the form of economic assistance, and I think we ought to recognize that economic aid is possibly more essential to retain this vital area than it is in, say, Burma. Politically, we could try to persuade the French to move with the times in Algeria, at the same time counselling the North Africans to accept a compromise formula. We could agree to support Morocco as a candidate for membership in the United Nations, and possibly consider some form of eventual association with NATO. I think a programme along these general lines might help the French, and at the same time be acceptable to the North Africans by showing them that they were dealing with the alliance as a whole and not just the French, particularly if an imaginative economic scheme was also dangled before them.

12. We ought in theory at the same time to tell the French that NATO could not give them any material support if they were not prepared to compromise in Algeria, but this would be pretty difficult to do. We have to remember the serious internal problems of the French in having to deal not only with the Arabs but also with their own nationals in Algeria. All this ought to be explored pretty carefully with the interested countries.

13. To conclude, I do not think that political consultation on Algeria without a definite programme would serve to strengthen NATO. However, if the present situation, where more than 200,000 French troops are attempting to contain about 15,000 rebel guerrillas, should change in such a way that a real threat to NATO security arose — if, for example, Egyptian support of the rebel cause became active intervention — military necessity might outweigh the political objections.

FRENCH NORTH AFRICA, NATO AND WESTERN MEDITERRANEAN DEFENCE

1. During the next two or three weeks the French Government hope to conclude Conventions with the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments which will define the new relationship of "interdependence" between these independent countries and France. These Conventions are intended, in accordance with the terms of the Protocols establishing independence, "to define their co-operation in the domains in which they have common interests, particularly in matters of defence and foreign relations". From a NATO point of view, the most important feature of the current negotiations is the future relationship to be established between France and her former North African territories. All partners in the Western Alliance have a keen and perhaps a vital interest in the maintenance of United States Strategic Air Command bases in Morocco. There are also a number of subsidiary defence interests of NATO countries, including at the present time the naval base at Bizerta and some facilities near Rabat for RCAF air gunnery training, which would be lost if Tunisia and Morocco should fail to agree upon mutually satisfactory defence arrangements either with France, with NATO, with the United States, or with some new grouping.

2. Of no less importance, is the future political orientation of Tunisia and Morocco. The question is whether economic dependence and the beginnings that have been made in Western political, economic and social institutions will prove strong enough to resist the pulls of religion, race and tradition towards Cairo and the Arab League. That is a contest Paris alone is, in our opinion, likely to lose, unless she has the courage to follow in Algeria the logic of her policies in Tunisia and Morocco, and unless she has the practical help — and not merely the moral support — of her principal Western partners.

3. While we have at present little information on the course of the current negotiations between France and Tunisia and Morocco, we already know from public and private statements particularly of Tunisian Government leaders, that the chief obstacle to reaching a satisfactory settlement on "interdependence" with France is the situation in Algeria. M. Bourguiba, the Tunisian Prime Minister, has recently stated that he would be unable and indeed unwilling to prevent assistance reaching the Algerian rebels from Tunisia, and he has not ruled out Tunisia permitting training facilities and refuge for Algerian rebel bands. In our opinion it is not too much to say that the future relationship of both Tunisia and Morocco with France and with the West will depend upon the success of the French Government in applying a liberal solution to Algeria within the present year which will set Algeria upon the same road towards independence as has been piloted by Tunisia and Morocco. For legalistic arguments about the differences in status between Algeria and the rest of North Africa are becoming increasingly irrelevant in terms of North African (and United Nations) policies.

4. We shall not discuss in this paper the future status of Algeria and the possibilities of the French Government pursuing successfully a policy which, as M. Pineau told the Ministerial meeting of the Atlantic Council earlier this month, might make provision for the separate co-existence of Moslem and French communities in Algeria. Certainly there seems little prospect of reaching a solution without involving either the downfall of the French Government, a civil war in Algeria with the French colons, or a policy of active repression directed against almost the entire Arab population of Algeria by most of the French Army — about 400,000 of them. To that extent, therefore, we may be justified in anticipating that satisfactory bilateral defence arrangements between France, and Tunisia and Morocco will not be negotiated, or, if they are, their future will be precarious, depending chiefly on Algerian developments.

5. It is for this reason that we have begun to wonder if a multilateral approach to the problem might not be more fruitful. No doubt the United States will give first priority to securing its own base rights through a bilateral agreement with Morocco. But from the broader point of view of maintaining a defence relationship between Western Europe and Morocco and Tunisia, we should perhaps examine the possibilities either of a NATO link or of a Western Mediterranean Pact.

6. From the point of view of the future of NATO, and from the point of view of the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments, I can see many more disadvantages than advantages in trying to bring Tunisia and Morocco into NATO. As the French have recently told us, the Scandinavian members of NATO would be strongly opposed to the admission of the North African countries. No doubt other members of NATO who look for the continued exclusion of Spain³⁹ would also oppose them. Indeed an Atlantic "Community" which included Tunisia and Morocco would be a very strange paradox.

7. The political difficulties for the Tunisian and Moroccan leaders would be at least equally great. In spite of M. Bourguiba's statement last month indicating that he would be open to an invitation from NATO, we must take into account the pressures which will be applied from Cairo to frustrate any such move — and these pressures are bound to become more effective the longer an Algerian solution is postponed. We can anticipate that within a month most of the Arab States will be represented in Rabat and Tunis and that, probably at the next session of the General Assembly, the two countries will be installed as members of the United Nations and welcomed into the Afro-Asian group in New York.

8. While I hope that our analysis proves to be unduly pessimistic, the only remaining possibility would appear to be a Western Mediterranean group which, because of its multi-lateral character, might prove more acceptable to the Tunisians and Moroccans than bilateral agreements with France, and, because it would be outside of NATO, less objectionable to the Arab States. Such a grouping would obviously have to include France, Tunisia, Morocco and Spain — the latter because of the unification of Morocco and Spanish Morocco as an independent state foreseen by the Spanish-Moroccan Protocol of April 7. If Algeria were ever to become independent, it would also be a member of such a grouping. Because of Gibraltar and Malta, the United Kingdom might wish to be included; and because of its bases in Morocco, the United States would almost certainly come in too, for both the United States and United Kingdom have important strategic interests in the area.

³⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I agree L.B. P[earson]

In these circumstances, Italy and Portugal might round off the Western Mediterranean Pact.⁴⁰

9. Such a Pact, outside of NATO but including NATO members, would form the counterpart in the Western Mediterranean to the Balkan Alliance. If it could be negotiated, it would have an important bearing on the future development of NATO and therefore might also be considered in connection with the studies of the Committee of Three. One of its more attractive features is the possibility which it would give of fitting Spain into some multilateral Western defence agreement without including Spain in NATO. It would put on a multilateral basis not only the defence arrangements with what used to be French North Africa, but would also place in a larger and possibly more useful framework the Spanish-American, the Portuguese-Spanish, and the Portuguese-United Kingdom agreements. But the chief virtue, as we see it at present, is that there may be more hope by this device of maintaining effective defence, political and economic ties between the principal members of the Atlantic Alliance and the immensely important North African territories. For only by means of strong bonds freely negotiated by representative governments can Western Mediterranean sea communications and North African air bases be assured, to say nothing of the importance of North Africa in terms of the coming struggle for the allegiance of the emerging peoples of Africa.⁴¹

10. Since a Mediterranean Pact was originally proposed by the Spanish Government, they would no doubt welcome the type of arrangement we have in mind. The original Spanish proposal (put forward informally to Marshal Papagos during his visit to Madrid in November, 1954) would have included all the states bordering on the Mediterranean including the Arab states and would not so far as we know, have included the United Kingdom or the United States. A Western Mediterranean Pact, including the United Kingdom and the United States and excluding the Arab states, Greece and Turkey, would, therefore, be a very different proposal, but one which I think has a much better chance of success. From the first, the Greeks were notably unenthusiastic about the Spanish proposal which they saw as weakening their connection with NATO and diluting Mediterranean defence with a number of incompatible elements, based on geography alone rather than common interest and traditions. Judging from this reaction, which was, I believe, largely shared by the Turks, I think we can take it that neither the Greeks nor the Turks would regret their exclusion from a Western Mediterranean Pact.

11. Nevertheless, the idea is sufficiently close to the original Spanish proposal that the Spanish Government could be encouraged to take some credit for the suggestion and thus make a contribution to its present objective of rehabilitating itself in the international community.

12. Both Gibraltar and Tangier would present difficulties. The United Kingdom Government is already thinking of revising the international statute governing Tangier, so that this question will probably come up for international negotiation in any case within the next year.

13. As for Gibraltar, the deadlock on the question of sovereignty remains as complete as ever. However, provided the Spaniards were content to let the sovereignty issue rest, they might receive some satisfaction by means of an international defence agreement which might provide for joint use of military installations such as Gibraltar in time of war.

⁴¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

I agree [L.B. Pearson]

14. A Western Mediterranean defence treaty might, therefore, contribute to a solution of both these international issues, at least in their defence aspects.

15. Perhaps the main objection to any proposed regional defence arrangements for this area is that regional defence pacts are going out of fashion. The United States administration has been taken to task, both by its foreign and domestic critics, for placing too heavy an accent in its foreign policy on regional alliances for purely military purposes.

16. Both the Arabs who look to Cairo for leadership, and to a lesser extent the Russians, would be bound to react to the formation of a Western Mediterranean Pact which would so seriously cut across the ambitions of Colonel Nasser for leading the Arab Nationalist revival throughout the area from Casablanca to the Persian Gulf.⁴² In his eyes such a treaty would be no more welcome than the Baghdad Pact. It is also possible that it might upset the Russians to such an extent that they would refuse to go through with their promises of cooperation in the pacification of the Middle East. (Certainly the French have found no sympathy in Moscow for their Algerian difficulties.)

17. In addition, the Indians and other Asians would suspect that any Western Mediterranean Pact including North Africa was a cover for the return of "colonialism" to territories which France had found itself unable to hold alone. While these disadvantages would have to be weighed against the possible advantages of a Western Mediterranean Pact, Arab and Asian reactions might be somewhat mitigated by adding an economic section to the treaty. This might even go beyond the economic provisions of the Baghdad Pact, although this is not an altogether happy analogy.⁴³ Certainly some way will have to be found for the continuation of Western European and particularly French capital development and economic assistance for Tunisia and Morocco. For the next few years, Tunisia and Morocco are almost bound by the established trade patterns to rely heavily on France to bridge the fiscal gap in their economies. And the dependence is not all one way. Last year French trade with North Africa (imports and exports) was twice as large as her trade with Germany and three or four times her trade with the United Kingdom.

18. As an indication of the minimum scale of the effort required, the French Government has budgeted about $225 million for economic assistance for Tunisia and Morocco next year. No doubt foreign help would be welcome in carrying this burden or increasing the pace of development, especially since private investment from France has virtually dried up. The Spanish-American Agreement of 1953 already provides for United States assistance to Spain in economic development in exchange for military facilities to be developed by the United States on Spanish territory for their joint use. A similar pattern may be followed by the United States in the prospective negotiation with Morocco. An economic section to a Western Mediterranean Treaty could, therefore, be an integral part of the military arrangements as well as providing a more palatable document than a pact dealing only with military arrangements. It might, for example, provide for the accession to the economic portion of the Treaty of potential donors who had no direct defence interests in the area but recognized the need to strengthen Western ties with North Africa in every possible way.⁴⁴

19. In any case, a regional pact of this character outside of NATO might provide a better vehicle for economic assistance to Morocco and Tunisia than any arrangements which might be devised under NATO or bilaterally with France.

20. By treating the defence and economic development of the Western Mediterranean region as a separate problem outside of NATO, the Atlantic powers would be free to develop the political aspects of the NATO alliance in a way which would be much more difficult if Spain, Morocco and Tunisia were to be brought into NATO. At the same time, such regional arrangements might make it unnecessary to apply surgery to the present NATO structure, with all the painful difficulties which this would entail. The only change that would be required in the text of the North Atlantic Treaty — and then only if Algeria were included — would be a revision of Article 6 which at present refers to the NATO area as including "the Algerian Departments of France".

21. Since Canada would presumably not be a member of a Western Mediterranean Pact, our only justification for raising the suggestion would be your role as a member of the Committee of Three. The development of the Western Mediterranean in the next ten years will be bound to have a major effect not only on the future of France as a Great Power, but on the character and potentialities for growth of the Atlantic Community and NATO as an institution.

22. It is potentially of the greatest importance for the Western countries to establish the friendliest possible relations with the emerging North African States. If this can be done chiefly through the perpetuation of a special relationship with the French, well and good. No doubt bilateral Conventions of a sort will be negotiated and ratified. The French can be expected to cling with great tenacity to their special position in North Africa, for economic as much as for defence reasons, and would not welcome multilateral arrangements unless they themselves had clearly failed bilaterally. They will not be willing to acknowledge failure quickly. But if the principal NATO powers, including France, find during the next year that a multilateral treaty relationship would produce a more effective link between the Western States and Tunisia and Morocco than anything that can be negotiated bilaterally covering defence and economic aid, then it should be examined.

23. Colonel Nasser's reactions would, of course, have to be taken into account. He could probably accept bilateral defence arrangements but react vigorously to any Pact which he might interpret as challenging his leadership of the Arabs. So far, however, the Tunisian and Moroccan leaders have shown no disposition to follow his leadership. Potentially, Tunisia and Morocco — and perhaps in the future Algeria as well — could provide the West with the same kind of bridge with the Arab world as the Asian members of the Commonwealth have given us during the past ten years with the emerging countries of their region. The other side of the coin is that a Western Mediterranean Pact would help to prevent the emergent Arab States of North Africa from drifting out of the Western sphere.

⁴⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Congress would be the USA difficulty here! [L.B. Pearson]

I hope, however, to deal in greater detail with this question in a separate memorandum discussing the possibility of establishing diplomatic relations with Tunisia and Morocco.⁴⁵

24. If you think a Western Mediterranean Pact is an idea worth adding to the collection of suggestions to be examined by the Committee of Three, you may wish us to send a circular telegram to our NATO missions inviting their comments before your trip to Washington on June 9.⁴⁶ If you wish us to do this, I should be grateful for any comments you may wish to make on the suggestion as it has been sketched out in this preliminary paper. I should think that in any case the viability of the idea would depend chiefly upon whether it interests Mr. Dulles — and this in turn may depend upon the outcome of the current negotiations between the French and the Tunisians and Moroccans, although in the long run it may hinge more directly upon the evolution of Algeria.

UNITED NATIONS INTERVENTION

On May 19 the French Ambassador telephoned Mr. Holmes before leaving for Halifax to say that he was sending us a memorandum on the Afro-Asian initiative in suggesting that a Special Session of the General Assembly be convened to consider the Algerian question. Mr. Lacoste asked us to give the memorandum, which is attached, the same consideration as if he had presented it himself.

2. The memorandum stresses the great importance which the French Government and French public opinion attach to securing the support of their friends in opposition to United Nations intervention in “the pacification of Algeria”.

Draft Note to Embassy of France

The Department of External Affairs acknowledges the French Embassy's memorandum of May 19 concerning the possibility of United Nations intervention in the Algerian question. The Department wishes to assure the French Embassy that the Canadian Government would oppose a request to convene a Special Session of the General Assembly to consider the question, and would be prepared to give full support to French opposition to this proposal.

2. The Department of External Affairs also realizes that the Afro-Asian group of Delegations in New York may be using their tentative request for a Special Session as a means of securing commitments of support for the inscription of the Algerian question on the agenda of the next regular session of the United Nations General Assembly. The Canadian authorities will welcome continued close consultation with the French Government on this question.

ALGERIA IN THE UN

I was called to see M. Guy Mollet at the Hotel Matignon this morning. Our conversation lasted about half an hour.

2. On behalf of his Government the President wished me to inform the Canadian Government that he considers the coming debate before the UN on Algeria to be vital. He gave me three copies of his statement of January 9 together with an English translation and I am sending copies by bag.⁵⁰ He drew attention to what he considers the most important part of that statement, which reads as follows: "World communism makes a point of encouraging, even of unleashing, the most fanatical nationalism provided of course that none breaks out in the Soviet sphere of influence. It benefits from periods of acute nationalism. They are frequently characterised by political anarchy or startling social retrogression which create ideal conditions for its propagation. It should not be forgotten that communism is one of the external buttresses of the Algerian rebellion which it uses to gain a foothold in Algeria. Are the democratic nations going to out-bid each other for the promotion of nationalism? Would they not do better to demonstrate that it is possible to deliver the peoples of all these countries from all forms of oppression without the need for them to have recourse to isolation? Is not the task they must assume that of saving the peoples in their charge from the economic waste of passing through the stage of narrow nationalism?"

3. On this point he made the following comments: it is well known that, according to what they call the "déterminisme historique", the Soviets believe that the best way of spreading communism among the peoples of Africa is to develop within these various peoples a blind sentiment of nationalism, that it is only when this nationalism has reached its paroxysm that the Soviet influence can best be brought to bear so that communism can establish itself. He added that he doubted whether all the friends of France understood the problem from that angle.

4. He expressed to me in very clear terms the probable results of a UN vote against France:

⁵⁰ Pour une description du discours de Mollet, voir Affaires Extérieures, vol. 9, N° 5, mai 1957, p. 160. For a description of Mollet's speech, see External Affairs, Vol. 9, No. 5, May 1957, p. 160.

(1) His Government could be defeated in parliament. (This is admittedly a possible consequence — but another is that the resurgence of nationalism and anti-UN feeling, to which Mr. Mollet later referred, might operate to reinforce the government in its independent stand against France's Celtics). (2) An anti-American feeling would develop together with an anti-United Nations and NATO movement, with the result that a new French Government, reactionary in character, would advocate complete neutralism. Moreover, he said, such an unfavourable vote by the UN would encourage not only the Algerians but the supporters of the Algerian rebels, with the consequence that a regular war would follow. Even if the French Government were not prepared to have recourse to war, Frenchmen in Algeria (over one million) would organize themselves and fight the war with or without the support of continental France. While an extreme nationalism will develop in Algeria, another form of extreme nationalism will develop in France which will be a threat to all international agreements signed by France. (These consequences may seem pessimistic but they are a measure of M. Mollet's appreciation of the intensity of French feeling on the Algerian issue.)

5. M. Mollet supported his argument about the incompetence of the UN by referring to Article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty, which specifies that an attack against the territory of Algeria will be considered as an attack against France itself. After having read this article, M. Mollet said that the position of Algeria with regard to France is identical with the position of Alabama with regard to the USA.

6. On the tactics that France might follow should a vote intervene against her, M. Mollet said that the French delegation would leave the Assembly and therefore withdraw from participation in the present session. (We have the impression from reports of M. Pineau's interviews in the USA and speculations from other sources that the position may not be as rigid as the Premier suggested. The temper of the Assembly and of the French at the time will be influential in dictating the extent of the withdrawal). He went on to say that he has time and again fought against his own people to limit the scope of the gesture of disapproval because many of his own supporters would wish France to leave the UN altogether. M. Mollet added that if his Government is not prepared to go that far, his successor might. (This sounds to me like the over-emphatic pleading of someone living too close to an impending calamity. This extreme has up to now only reached the public ear from Poujadistes and Senator Duchet, Secretary General of the Moderates).

7. I told M. Mollet that I would convey his views to my Government.

ALGERIA — M. MOLLET'S STATEMENT

Although its implications are still being examined our first reaction to M. Mollet's statement on Algeria is one of mild disappointment. For example we think it unfortunate he did not feel able to give more precision to the French Government's plans for ensuring the freedom of the elections to follow the cease fire and the subjects of negotiation following those elections. Emphasis of the permanent and organic ties between France and Algeria also seems to reduce the chances of achieving the first step of a cease fire. While we appreciate that internal political considerations which influenced the formulation of the statement our point of focus is the forthcoming UN debate and we feel that the atmosphere of the debate would have been improved by greater elaboration of the first two points mentioned above.

2. De Menthon of the Quai d'Orsay has laid stress on the domestic importance of the statement and has said that the French Government is playing down the UN aspect of the Algerian question. However this hardly seems likely to dissuade the Afro-Asian group from introducing a condemnatory resolution in the plenary session. We of course hope that such a resolution can be avoided but on the assumption that some resolution will come out of the debate we would be happy to see a resolution along the lines mentioned in paragraph 3 of Washington telegram No. 96 of January 14,† i.e. taking note of the French statement, expressing the view that there are good prospects for progress and stating that no Assembly action is required.

3. In any event we would hope that the categorical terms in which M. Mollet denied UN competence to consider the Algerian question would not require the French Government to act precipitately as regards withdrawal of its delegation from the Assembly.

4. You may at your discretion use these observations in commenting on M. Mollet's statement to the Council. You should however make it clear that these do not necessarily represent our final views, as they have not been cleared with the Minister in New York. In addition we hope you will make it clear that although we feel that a difference in emphasis in M. Mollet's statement would have been helpful we recognize and appreciate the sincere efforts the French Government is making to produce an equitable and lasting solution for the Algerian problem.

ALGERIA — MOLLET'S STATEMENT

As we mentioned in telegram 37 January 9 this item was placed on the agenda for a private meeting of Council on January 16 in order that member governments could comment on the text of Mollet's policy statement on Algeria which had been circulated by the French representative.

2. The American representative stated that his government is studying the Mollet statement very carefully and in addition Pineau and Dulles at their meeting on January 11 discussed it, including "its UN aspect" and common objectives and tactics to be followed in that organization. The USA consider the Mollet statement "to be a useful exposition of the French approach to this difficult problem", and "a useful start to reaching a solution". Perkins also stated that the French and American delegations at UN will consult in order firstly, to avoid "inflammatory resolutions" being presented, and secondly, to avoid resolutions condemning France for its policy in that area.

3. We made a short statement along the lines indicated in your telegram under reference, emphasizing the points outlined in paragraphs 1 and 2.

4. The Dutch representative made an interesting statement in which he emphasized that NATO's specific interest in the problem is the strategic position of Algeria on the southern flank of NATO where there is now a series of weak though vociferously nationalist states which are possibly susceptible to Soviet machinations. In conclusions, Van Kleffens expressed the hope that any solution to the problem will also be in accord with NATO's strategic interest in that area.

5. The Belgian representative asked two questions: firstly, what were the possibilities and implications of election results which would reject the "présence française" in Algeria and, secondly, can the "présence française" remain in Algeria without the sympathy and assistance of Tunis and Morocco. The French representative could only give personal views on these questions and indicated he might go into them further later on. Parodi thought that these problems constituted the calculated risk involved in French policy which aimed at the establishment of a cease fire in which truly free elections could be held without the danger of terrorism and reprisals. French policy is predicated on the premise that peaceful coexistence between the European and the Muslim communities is accepted by both sides. If this ideal proves to be unattainable, the French Government may have to reconsider its policies. Parodi remarked that the French population in Algeria are determined to stay in that country and are capable of doing this by force if necessary. With respect to the second question, Parodi reviewed the history of the area, underlining that Algeria had no tradition of independent status such as Tunis and Morocco and expressed the hope that there is some sympathy for the French position in those two countries.

6. At the end of the discussion Parodi again stressed French concern with UN discussions of Algeria and asked that representatives of NATO countries to the UN should consult in New York.

ALGERIA

This question is now likely to come up in the First Political Committee at the beginning of next week. I understand M. Pineau is returning to New York for the debates probably together with M. Joxe, the Secretary General of the Quai d'Orsay, who was here last week and in Washington for preliminary soundings.

2. We are not yet in a position to provide much info to supplement the reports on probable French tactics, which you have received from Paris and Washington. That the French will be under heavy fire goes without saying and their vote with Israel against the General Assembly resolution on Israel's withdrawal from Sinai on Saturday will probably not help them. A forecast of things to come was given in the Special Political Committee yesterday when the representative of Morocco compared at some length and bitterness the racist policies of South Africa and those of the French in Algeria.

3. From talks we have had with the French it is still clear that they have not finally decided on tactics, and I presume the delegation is awaiting word from Pineau. The delegation thought they would lead off with a long speech (4-5 hours was mentioned), giving a complete exposé of the French position. The delegation does not, repeat not, think they will walk out of the Committee at the end of their speech, but realize the decision on this depends on political factors.

4. We must clearly do all we can to help the French, who, however, do not make this task very easy. We would have to vote against any wildly anti-French resolution. We will do our best to support a more modest resolution along the lines of paragraph 3, telegram 96 of January 14 from Washington.⁵¹

Since you are in a better position than we to estimate both French and Afro-Asian tactics in the Algerian debate, we shall attempt to offer at this stage only a few comments on your telegram under reference and the probable character of the debate.

2. We would assume that the Afro Asians would probably attempt to secure a two thirds majority for a resolution which would have three main components: (a) some sort of general declaration (perhaps similar to past resolutions on Tunisia and Morocco) to the effect that Algeria should become independent, without specifying when; (b) following such a declaration an agreed cease fire; and (c) negotiations between the French and representative Algerians.

3. Although we could presumably consider supporting sections (b) and (c) of such a resolution, I doubt whether we could support (a) without upsetting the French. If we retained some credits with Paris — and if we decided to use it — although to my knowledge this has never been done on the Algerian issue either in NATO or bilaterally — we might try and help them towards a sensible and liberal solution. This might include encouraging the French to make some general declaration regarding the eventual independence of Algeria as a basis for a cease fire and a negotiated interim constitution.

4. We have been impressed by Bourguiba's case for aiming at an eventual North African federation which would include Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria and possibly Libya. Such a federation might keep this area oriented towards the West either through bilateral agreements with France covering economic aid and defence or, if that is unobtainable, through some multilateral arrangement which would be more acceptable politically to North African opinion and would still keep the area from drifting into Nasser's orbit, or Moscow's. I told Lacoste last week that such a development might help them in this predicament and should not be discarded off hand.

5. With this in mind we have been wondering whether it would not be prudent to go as far as we could in the direction of supporting the French during the forthcoming debate in spite of their record in Algeria and our own disposition to facilitate the evolution of dependent peoples towards self-government. Clearly, so long as the Mollet Government is strongly supported at home on their Algerian policy in the U.N. as seems indicated by the results of the Paris by-election of January 13 and recent French Assembly vote of confidence in the Government, they will not be too worried by U.N. disapproval nor much influenced by other expressions of opinion outside of France. Until the Algerian debate on the U.N. is over, we would doubt the usefulness of making representations to the French about the direction and application of their Algerian policy. The most we can do for the time being is to try to persuade the French Delegation to take a moderate stand in the First Committee and avoid the temptation to win acclaim at home by any impulsive, if temporary, walk outs. To state their case and then sit out the debate regardless of what may be said would, it seems to us, be most likely to win sympathy and support for the French position in the Assembly and thus contribute to defeating more extreme resolutions which the French could not accept. In our opinion, the type of resolution outlined in paragraph 3 of Washington telegram 96 January 14 is probably the best that can be expected and could be supported. More extreme proposals are, it seems to us, almost bound to lead to the development in France of the anti-USA, anti-U.N., and anti-NATO sentiments of which M. Mollet has specifically warned us and the emergence of a narrow and bitter nationalism both in France and in Algeria. While we do not share M. Mollet's fear that the Communists would probably replace the French in Algeria, we do recognize the danger that France, feeling herself isolated on a question which is fundamentally of national prestige but which the French consider as national survival, might adopt a very ugly attitude towards all international organizations to which they belong.

6. If, on the other hand, saner counsels prevail, in New York, Paris and North Africa, there are some indications that Eurafrikan cooperation which is so important to the very existence of NATO could be a reality even before the attainment of Algerian independence. Towards the end of M. Mollet's statement of January 9 he referred to the mutual benefits of close cooperation between Europe and Africa, saying "The Franco-African unit will not be a closed entity. It is France's wish that countries like Tunisia and Morocco should freely associate with it in order to benefit from the advantages of common accomplishments, and especially from the Sahara's contribution. We should speak not so much of a Franco-African as of a Eurafrikan unit. France is negotiating at this time with her European partners for the organization of a vast common market, to which the overseas territories will be associated. All of Europe will be called upon to help in the development of Africa, and tomorrow Eurafrikan may become one of the principal factors in world policy".

7. The above statement does not go as far as Bourguiba's federation but perhaps gives up an opening for expressing views on the kind of multilateral relationship which might successfully tie North Africa and the Sahara to the Atlantic or West European community provided the principal of eventual Algerian independence were accepted by France. The next phase would then be the development of that voluntary interdependence between Western Europe and North Africa which is at present an economic and military necessity but a political impossibility.

8. The logic of our analysis is, therefore, to do all we can, as you say in your telegram under reference, to help the French with a view to using our credit later and in private to promote a reassessment in Paris of their North African policy which is at present dangerously split between the consequences of a liberal policy towards Morocco and Tunisia being followed by a largely repressive policy towards Algeria.

9. The chief difficulty we foresee in this type of approach, especially in the light of telegram 83 January 26 from Paris,† is that after the U.N. debate is over there is probably no one in the present French Government who would pay much attention to our representations until the present policy of Lacoste has been proved inadequate. As an alternative to the suggestions above, therefore, you might like to consider speaking to Pineau yourself during the next day or two and explaining frankly the difficulties we found in supporting France on Algeria although we have the greatest admiration for what they had done in Tunisia and Morocco and for their forward looking "loi cadre" of last summer (aimed at avoiding in the rest of French Africa some of their mistakes of omission in past policy for North Africa). You might say that if he could give us even the most informal and private assurance that the French Government, in spite of what it must say publicly at present, has in mind the necessity for an agreement which would involve interdependence between France and Algeria possibly in some sort of treaty framework which would include Morocco and Tunisia as well, then we would feel much easier in our minds in giving France all the support we could in the forthcoming debate. Such representations might, I think, be more effective than any we might make after the event, either bilaterally or through NATO. I cannot help feeling that the French themselves must sooner or later come to the conclusion that only by means of some such general dispensation for a North African Federation can they hope to salvage reasonable protection for French citizens anywhere in the area.

I have studied your message with interest. While I agree with much of the analysis, I find it difficult to see how we can play a very forward role either with the French in the UN, or afterwards in Paris, to persuade them to modify their Algerian policies. As you say, Mr. Mollet has hinted that the ultimate aim of France is to develop a Franco-African, or a Euroafrican unit. This process would come slowly, inevitably, and primarily from a French realization of political, military and economic realities. I do not think any country is in a position to put pressure on the French to accelerate this process. Indeed my feeling is that this would be misunderstood and resented in Paris.

2. In this connection I think your message tends to underestimate the strength of French feeling on this question, and indeed the real importance to France of Algeria. I do not believe it correct to say, as you do in your paragraph 5, that this is a question "fundamentally of national prestige". It is surely a good deal closer to the truth to say that it is not far from being a question of national survival. Certainly, the loss of Algeria would finally destroy French pretensions to be a great power, might completely disrupt its political system, and deal a shattering blow at what remains of their morale. This is of supreme importance not only to France but to all of us.

3. I do wonder if the statement earlier in paragraph 5 that the French "will not be too worried by UN disapproval nor much influenced by other expressions of opinion outside of France" is accurate. I have had the impression that, on the contrary, the French are going to follow this debate very carefully and in particular will attach the greatest importance to the position adopted by Canada and the USA. If we abstain, or give only lukewarm support to the French on this question, coming on top of the position we were obliged to adopt on Suez, then I think there may be a considerable revulsion of feeling in France against the Transatlantic Alliance. We may argue that we need not be too worried since the French must remain in the Alliance but we should not underestimate the strength of irrational emotion in a crisis of national pride.

4. The question will not now come before the First Political Committee before February

4. There is still no news of a resolution, or the plans of the Arab Asians. Most delegations have been too absorbed in disarmament, Kashmir and the Mideast to concentrate on Algeria. Although it is therefore a little premature to speculate, if a resolution along the lines assumed by you were to come forward, we would in my opinion have to vote against it. Any other action would mean Canadian support for a move implying direct Assembly intervention in French domestic affairs, and would provoke precisely the reaction from the French we must at all odds avoid. I realize this is a difficult decision to have to take, and we and the USA must risk a certain bad feeling on the part of the Arabs if we do not abstain on this issue.

5. I shall send you later a draft giving the general lines of a statement we might make in the debate, depending, of course, on the way it develops.

Lacoste came in to see me today to seek clarification of the Canadian statement on Algeria made at the private meeting of the NATO Council on January 16. He told me that the Canadian representative had spoken immediately after the USA representative and they had been struck by the contrast in tone of the two statements. As reported from their people in Paris, Lacoste said, the Canadian representative had expressed the fear that the affirmation that "la présence française" would be maintained in Algeria might tend to hinder the realization of a cease fire.

2. I said immediately that I was fairly sure we had not referred in our instructions to our NATO Delegation to "la présence française" nor in these terms. I have since confirmed that this was the case (our telegram S27 January 15) and there is indeed no indication in the report of our NATO Delegation (telegram 82 January 16) that they made such a point. Both these telegrams were repeated to Candel New York.

3. Our guidance telegram to our NATO Delegation was drafted on the assumption that a fairly frank exchange of views on Algeria was desirable at the private meeting of the NATO Council on January 16. Presumably the USA Delegation had received instructions to be less forthcoming and more polite and I imagine this, rather than any difference in our positions, accounts for the difference in tone between the USA and Canadian statement. Certainly I would not like to feel that we were less understanding to the French than the USA in these matters, either in private in NATO or in public in the Assembly.

4. Perhaps if you decide to speak to Pineau as we suggested yesterday you might try to clear up any misunderstanding that may have arisen based, I feel, partly on the fact that we and the French use a different vocabulary in talking about North Africa, as their reference to "la présence française" indicates.

A further complication in the discussion of this problem at the present session, which I did not mention in my previous message, is the interaction of the simultaneous consideration of Algeria and the Mideast problem. If we can make any progress on the latter before Algeria comes before the First Political Committee on Monday, then our specific worry — retaining what prestige we have with the Arabs in our efforts at mediation — will not immediately arise. But if there is no solution, then it is likely that support of the French, even of a pretty negative sort, by us would help to dissipate our attitude of impartiality.

2. I am not suggesting that we should modify our basic policy on the Algerian problem. I am just bringing this fact to your attention as a further proof that we will have to be prepared to make our tactics pretty flexible in the First Committee, and keep a close eye on the developments in the Mideast negotiations.

I had a conversation today with the French Foreign Minister, chiefly about Algeria and the Mideast. His remarks on the latter question are incorporated in a separate message† reporting on today's developments.⁵²

2. M. Pineau confirmed that he intended to make a very full "exposé" of the French case on Algeria and would participate in the debate. His delegation would not participate in the voting of a resolution as that would imply acceptance of the competence of the UN.

3. I said that we would like to help as much as we could and would make a statement which we trusted his delegation would find useful. He said that would be very helpful. I asked if there was anything specific in the form of a resolution which their friends could put forward in order to forestall a condemnatory resolution.

4. He said that they had worked out a form of words which would be acceptable to them, which he proceeded to read to us. The gist of it was that the Assembly noted the declarations of the various delegations in the Committee, expressed the hope that a peaceful and democratic solution would be worked out, and deleted the item from the agenda.

5. I gather this draft has been discussed with the Americans and we will attempt to get the exact text. I told M. Pineau we would have no difficulty in supporting a resolution of this sort. He seemed mildly optimistic that they would get through the debate without too serious difficulty. What they cannot accept is a resolution which would condemn France or include mention of UN mediation.

This morning I gave Lacoste a copy of our NATO Council statement on Algeria on January 16. I think he is now convinced that the Canadian position on Algeria is no less sympathetic and understanding than that of the USA. In our minds there is, and I feel should be, a distinction between the kind of political consultation appropriate for private meetings of the NATO Council and a delegation position for the General Assembly. As far as I can see the USA representative on the NATO Council did not make this distinction. If we cannot feel free to state something of our real thoughts and concerns in a NATO context, and if, as you say, no allied country is really in a position to put any pressure on the French in this matter, then I wonder whether it is worthwhile discussing Algeria in NATO at all.

2. So that there should be no misunderstanding I think I should add that we have not been suggesting a forward role for the Canadian Delegation in regard to Algeria at the General Assembly either in private, or still less in public. I agree that for the reasons you have given it may not be wise to tackle the French privately with even such a mild question as we had suggested on the assumption that the Americans had probably said as much to M. Pineau when he was in Washington.

3. I am not sure, however, that I entirely follow your deductions about Algeria being a matter of national survival for France. This is an argument that the French have used with us for years, first in regard to Tunisia and Morocco, then Indochina, and now Algeria. Although French power has declined with the loss of some of her overseas territories, France is still France. If, as seems quite possible, considerations of national prestige prevent the French Government from displaying sufficient realism in time, it seems to me quite likely that France will lose the chance she still has to salvage a pro-French orientation for the whole North African area. The very large number of French citizens in Algeria certainly complicates this problem for French statesmanship but our impression is that it could still be solved, at least more satisfactorily than it will be if repressive policies are continued indefinitely and gestures in the direction of a political solution come too little and too late. Nevertheless, as you say, we cannot expect (and probably at present should not try) to persuade the French Government to act from a purely rational assessment of their situation.

4. As you point out in your telegram 417 January 31, just received, the interaction between the Algerian and Mideast debates will require flexible tactics and quick decisions which may have to be taken without consulting us. By the same token, your draft statement (your telegram 421 January 31†) may require last minute changes but we shall try to send you any suggestions we may have as quickly as possible.⁵³

European: The Algerian rebellion which has been a drain on French men and resources since November 1954 has emerged after discussion for the second time in the U.N. with no clearer prospect of solution than when it began. The Algerian item was inscribed on the General Assembly agenda towards the end of 1956 by a number of Arab and Asian delegations and debate commenced in the U.N. Political Committee on February 4 with a lengthy and lucid exposition of the French point of view by M. Christian Pineau. This exposition, M. Pineau insisted, was a matter of grace for France could never agree that the U.N. had any competence in this, a purely domestic French problem.

For the Canadian statement in the First Committee delivered on February 8, 1957, by Pinard, see Statements and Speeches, 1957, No. 13.

2. Basically the French case is that the rebellion is not a national uprising but the work of an extremist minority who are using the threat of massacre to cow the Moslem population while receiving military and psychological support from other Arab countries — mainly Egypt. M. Pineau rejected the demands of the Arab-Asian group that France negotiate with the rebels for a cease-fire and accept the principle of self-determination and Algerian independence. In place of this he repeated the substance of M. Mollet's declaration of policy on January 9: Cease-fire, free elections within 3 months to be followed by negotiations with elected representatives on the future status and organization of Algeria. The future status has not clearly been defined but in essence the French Government have in mind a régime which would permit the greatest possible amount of autonomy for Algeria while retaining for France powers to ensure that the European minority in Algeria would not suffer discrimination and that Algeria would remain closely linked with France.

3. A resolution introduced by 18 Arab and Asian delegations calling for a negotiated cease-fire and the recognition by France of Algerians' right to self-determination was defeated as was a milder resolution proposed by Japan, Thailand and the Philippines.

4. The Canadian delegate supported the French position, arguing that the Algerian problem was in fact a French domestic affair, that progress towards a solution of the problem would not be served by passing resolutions unacceptable to the party mainly concerned, and that France should have an opportunity to show her good faith (as demonstrated in other parts of Africa) to work out an equitable solution together with the Algerian people.

5. In the end a resolution inspired by France but proposed by a group of Latin American countries and Italy was adopted. This resolution merely noted situation in Algeria and the discussion which had taken place and expressed the hope that a solution would be found in conformity with principles of the U.N. Charter.

6. Reaction in France to the outcome of the debate has been delight bordering on jubilation. However there has not yet been any indication of a reduction in rebel activity in Algeria. Restricted

Now that the Algerian item has been disposed of for the current session,⁵⁴ I would like to make a few general observations.

2. Some of the more striking features of the debate were the relative moderation of the speakers, with the exception of the Syrian; the attempt by the Soviet Bloc, taken up by some of the Arabs, to identify NATO with colonial repression in Algeria; and the unfortunate division into two fairly distinct blocs — Western Europe plus the Americas and the Old Commonwealth on the one side, and the Afro-Asian bloc plus the Communist countries on the other side. No matter what might have been done to avoid some of the bitter procedural wrangling the result would certainly have been approximately the same. When it came to a showdown the countries of NATO and in general the Western world felt obliged to stand by France.

3. There are a few lessons, I think, which we might learn from this. In the first place I think the French will have to retreat a little from their firm insistence on competence. By participating in the debate up until the last moment they have in fact to a large extent accepted the right of the Assembly to discuss the Algerian problem. In my opinion it would have been preferable to work from the beginning for a moderate resolution which would have incorporated many of the features of the Japanese resolution, rather than to attempt tactics aimed at preventing any resolution receiving a two-thirds majority. The French were no doubt satisfied with the display of futility given by the United Nations in the First Political Committee since they never wished for the adoption of any resolution. But I think it would have been better for France, for the friends of France, and for the United Nations, if an attempt had been made from the beginning to work out a compromise which would have been acceptable to all sides. In the end, and with bad grace, they had to accept this in Plenary.

4. The second point is that when the chips are down we have no alternative but to support France in this question, and this means a dangerous drawing of lines between East and West and the identification of NATO with colonial wars, something we have always attempted to avoid. Unless the Algerian war is brought to a successful conclusion, or the French succeed in so modifying their policy that the Algerian nationalists are satisfied, then I think we will have to adopt other tactics, and I suggest it is not too early to start thinking about them now. If we are unable to persuade the French to adapt their policies to face the realities of their political and economic situation, then I think we ought to go on to the offensive in order to try to blur the divisions now existing between East and West.

5. When one examines the Russian (and Soviet) record in Central Asia, they have in fact carried out a policy not dissimilar to that of France in Algeria. The Arab Delegation in the recent debates spoke passionately about the destruction of the great Arab state of Algeria by the French in 1830. In fact Algeria was hardly any longer a part of the Arab or even the Ottoman world. They are at the same time completely blind to the destruction by the Russians of the really great centres of Islamic culture in Bokhara and Samarkand. Like the French in Algeria the Russians not only conquered the Central Asian Islamic states, but set out to colonize them with Russians, to destroy the bases of the indigenous societies and to russify their peoples. There are two differences. The first is that the Central Asian states were contiguous to Russia and therefore the "overseas fallacy" has not come into place; the second is that the Russians were infinitely more ruthless in their destruction of the local social and political systems. As a result, there is no distinctive native society in Central Asia today. You will recall that the Head of the French Socialist Delegation which visited Central Asia last summer reported that the great mistake of the French in North Africa was to maintain the local social fabric, if they had followed a policy similar to that of the Russians, they might have avoided their present difficulties.

6. I had the impression during the debate on Algeria that the Russians entered cautiously into fray and then largely because they thought the risk was worth taking because of the passions aroused by this problem among the Arabs and the opportunity of identifying the NATO powers with the "dirty war". I am sure they have constantly had in the back of their minds the danger of some country eventually raising the question of the Moslem populations of the USSR, and I think that the time has come when we must seriously consider passing to the offensive on this question. The Soviet argument will be precisely the same as the French, that is, that the United Nations has no competence to discuss this area since it is a legal part of the Soviet Union and the peoples thereof have chosen by a free vote to remain part of the Union. However, it should not be beyond the possibilities of our respective Foreign Offices to work up an argument which would embarrass the Russians or at least lead them to intervene with less enthusiasm in debates of this sort. It will be a long, hard pull to detach the Arabs and Asians from their single-minded fixation about Western colonialism. We will never do it by talking about Soviet colonialism in Eastern Europe. Our only hope of success is by concentrating on areas where the Russians have conquered and suppressed Asian cultures.

[Ottawa], March 14, 1956

THE CREATION OF A SPECIAL CAPITAL AID FUND
UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

As you are aware, officials of this Department have been reviewing very thoroughly the implications for Canada of the proposal to create a new United Nations Aid Fund (sometimes called SUNFED). We have come to the general conclusion that Canadian support of a fund of this nature (which we would hope could be shaped into an effective mechanism) would be desirable at this time as part of Canada's general foreign aid activities.

2. Last week at a meeting at which I presided, we met with senior officials of the Department of Finance, the Bank of Canada, and the Department of Trade and Commerce to discuss the role which Canada should play in relation to the forthcoming debates in ECOSOC and in the United Nations concerning the establishment of such a fund. Prior to this meeting we had circulated a paper suggesting that the creation of a United Nations fund must now be given serious consideration by Canada and the other Western countries. (I am attaching a copy of this paper which sets forth very briefly the reasons why the creation of a United Nations fund now looms so important in our thinking.) Officials of Finance also distributed a paper sketching the kind of fund which they considered would be most appropriate if one were to be established.

3. On the basis of the discussion at this interdepartmental meeting I am confident that the reasoning which is contained in our paper concerning the desirability for creating a United Nations fund was accepted by officials of other departments. More precisely I believe that the Department of Finance is prepared to look quite sympathetically on the idea of a Canadian contribution to some international fund under the United Nations. Indeed I believe officials of that Department are prepared to recognize the desirability of Canada taking an initiative in approaching the other countries traditionally opposed to the creation of a United Nations aid fund (United States, United Kingdom, Australia) and possibly an approach to other developed countries who have given support in the past in the United Nations and elsewhere to various proposals to create an international aid fund (France, The Netherlands, Belgium and one or two others possibly including Germany). The purpose of these approaches would be to explore the possibility of a more positive answer on the part of the developed countries to the increasingly strong case for a United Nations aid fund. Several of the main countries concerned are not in too good a position themselves to take the initiative this year even if they were so inclined (e.g. the United States because of the election and the United Kingdom because of financial difficulties). Canada is probably the best placed to do so.

4. We did not reach a firm understanding with Finance officials about the figure which should be recommended to Ministers for our contribution to the proposed fund or for a total programme covering Canada's contributions both to the Colombo Plan and to this fund. Finance officials took the position that some reduction in our bilateral aid programme (i.e. Colombo Plan) should be made when we begin to contribute to a United Nations fund.⁵⁵ They consider that the present level of our Colombo Plan contribution is exceptionally high on account of special temporary factors (i.e. the atomic reactor and the increased cost of Warsak) and that in later years some reduction would be appropriate. They also feel that we should reserve the right to make shifts subsequently as between Colombo Plan and the international fund within a fixed total contribution in accordance with our assessment of the relative effectiveness of the two programmes as instruments for aiding the under-developed countries.⁵⁶ They did not suggest what total figure they had in mind but implied that it might be only slightly larger than our Present Colombo Plan figure. In that event our Colombo Plan contribution would be reduced by about the amount of any subscription which we might make to an international fund.

5. For our part we do not consider that our objectives in aiding the under-developed countries would be fully met if we agreed at this stage to participate in a multilateral aid programme entirely, or even largely, at the expense of our Colombo Plan operations.⁵⁷ However, I believe that our differences with Finance relate primarily to the definition of the "normal" level of Canada's Colombo Plan contribution after the requirements which gave rise to the recent increase have been met. We acknowledged that the eight million dollar increase this year and the corresponding increase over the following year or so were largely attributed to special temporary requirements (and we included Warsak and the reactor in that category but not the additional million dollars for the "new" countries). We questioned, however, whether in the absence of these particular requirements the figure would have remained at $26.4 million this year. We suggested that there might have been — and might be in the future — very substantial general reasons for a larger contribution. We did not know what the right figure for our "normal" contribution should be. That could only be decided by Ministers. Whatever the correct figure was — and we suggested that it was a good deal higher than $26.4 million — that figure should not be cut in order to release money for the proposed international fund. Our contribution to the latter should be additional to whatever is considered to be our appropriate regular contribution under the Colombo Plan.

⁵⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
one vote? [L.B. Pearson]

⁵⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
yes [L.B. Pearson]

⁵⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I agree [L.B. Pearson]

6. On the question of the amount which might be contributed to a United Nations fund the differences did not appear to be so pronounced. In our discussions Finance officials spoke of a figure of $7 to $8 million in each of the first two years or $15 million over the two years combined as a Canadian contribution to the initial capital (with an implication that subsequent annual contributions might be somewhat less). This was based on a total fund of approximately $200-250 million annually (of which the United States might be expected to put up about $150 million). Our own feeling was that this total represented a bare minimum for an effective aid fund and we should realize that, for example, a fund of this size would provide limited scope for a fully adequate volume of additional external aid to India during the second five year plan (when she will require about $300 million a year beyond anything now in sight). Although we did not say so at the meeting we would be inclined to think that an initial contribution of $14 or $15 million spread over the first two years, and annual contributions of $10 million thereafter would represent a not unreasonable Canadian share in a fund of this minimum size.

7. In the light of this preliminary discussion at the official level you may think it desirable to attempt to reach an early understanding with Mr. Harris and the Prime Minister concerning the Government's attitude towards the proposed fund. In this connection you will appreciate that we shall have to move quite quickly if we expect to influence the decisions of other governments concerned (and, incidentally, if we hope to prevent the Russians from appearing to be more constructive than ourselves on this subject in forthcoming United Nations meetings).

8. It cannot be said that the desirability or inevitability of such a fund is universally recognized even now. For instance, the United States Administration — whose participation would be almost essential — appears to be still rather cool towards the idea of any United Nations arrangement of this sort, although that view might be altered fairly quickly if other respectable governments were to show concrete interest in the project (or, of course, if Mr. Stevenson or Mr. Bowles were to attempt to make an issue in the election campaign out of the "failure" of the Administration's policies in the under-developed countries).

9. The opportunities for affecting the attitudes of others towards this project will come fairly soon and if we are anxious to promote it some decisions, at least in principle, will be required very shortly if we are to take advantage of those opportunities. The earliest and best occasion for making some impression on the United States Administration will come during the talks which you and the Prime Minister will be having with Mr. Dulles and President Eisenhower in a fortnight's time.⁵⁸ After that we shall be expected to give some intimation of our position at the meeting early in May of the United Nations Special Committee concerned with this subject. There is therefore little time to be lost.

10. I would have thought that it was possible to take a position on this proposal (and on our future Colombo Plan contributions) which would meet most of the objectives which you have in mind while at the same time not offending seriously against Mr. Harris' desire to keep expenditures down (and not requiring him to accept that the figure reached by our Colombo Plan Vote in 1956-57 represents a "normal" contribution). You might wish to discuss with him something along the following lines:

(a) For reasons of the kind set out in the attached paper referred to earlier in this memorandum we should support and actively encourage the establishment of a United Nations fund for economic development on as sound and efficient lines as we can devise and as others can be persuaded to accept.

⁵⁸ Voir Volume 23, Chapitre premier, 1^{ère} partie.
See Volume 23, Chapter 1, Part 1.

(b) We should aim at the establishment of such a fund in the fiscal year 1957-58 with the expectation that it would be in full scale operation by the end of that year or during the subsequent year.

(c) The Canadian Government should decide now that from the beginning of 1957-58 and for a period extending at least four years thereafter, subject to the appropriation of funds by Parliament, it will devote a minimum of $40 million a year to the Colombo Plan and this United Nations fund combined.

(d) With respect to the Colombo Plan, our contribution in 1957-58 would be $34.4 million, in 1958-59 would be $31.9 million and in each of the two following years would be $30 million. (The basis for these figures is explained in the Annex† to this memorandum.)

(e) Our contribution to the international fund would therefore be $5.6 million in 1957-58, $8.1 million in 1958-59 and $10 million in each of the two subsequent years. (The first two years mentioned would cover the period when the fund was accumulating its initial resources and our contribution to its initial capital would therefore be $13.7 million.)

(f) The appropriate scale of contribution to these two programmes in subsequent years (if it is decided to continue the Colombo Plan beyond mid-1961) would be determined in the light of the situation existing at that time, with a presumption that the total would continue to be about $40 million per annum.

(g) A decision to contribute at this rate to these particular programmes after 1957-58 would not preclude consideration of special requirements which might arise outside those programmes and which it might be politically important for Canada to assist (for example, expenditures related to the Jordan Valley Scheme or to the settlement of the Canal Waters dispute between India and Pakistan, or to the various other projects mentioned in a memorandum which is being provided to you separately in response to your request for suggestions of things that might be done with $100 million in carrying out our general foreign policy and "implementing" Article 2).

11. It would appear to me that an understanding on these lines would enable us to play a constructive — and even decisive — role in the discussions relating to the proposal for a United Nations fund.

12. Needless to say there are many features of the proposed fund which will require careful consideration before we get into detailed negotiations with other countries. For example, do we want the Russians in or don't we? Should the fund be related in some way to the Technical Assistance Board or the International Bank? Should contributions be on a voluntary basis or should they be assessed by agreement among the participants? In addition to disbursing its own monies should the fund also perform certain functions in connection with bilateral aid programmes (at least maintaining records of assistance supplied by one country directly to another)? These various aspects will of course be examined intensively by officials over the next few weeks. It would appear, however, that substantial progress on these details and on the project as a whole is dependent on agreement in principle being reached at an early stage by the Ministers concerned.

*NoteMemorandum*CREATION OF A SPECIAL CAPITAL AID FUND UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The question of the creation of a United Nations capital aid fund has been under consideration in the United Nations and ECOSOC for over five years. Despite the atmosphere of confusion or suspicion that has surrounded the debates on this subject in the past, the creation of a United Nations capital aid fund must now be viewed as one of the major questions facing Canada and other western countries both in relation to our activities within the United Nations and in relation to our policies for aiding the under-developed countries.

2. In assessing the importance that this issue has now assumed, the following factors should be considered:

(a) the recent entry of sixteen new members (many of them under-developed countries) into the United Nations;

(b) the growing impatience of under-developed countries (including many of the new members) in the United Nations at the delaying tactics which have been employed by the western countries in these debates. This impatience is likely to be exploited widely by the USSR bloc in the forthcoming sessions of ECOSOC and the United Nations as evidence of the West's opposition to the creation of a multilateral capital aid fund;

(c) the emergence within the next few years as independent states of a number of areas traditionally associated with the western world and in some cases with the Commonwealth in particular (Nigeria, the Gold Coast, Malaya, etc.); and the increasing requirements of these areas for external assistance which must be largely provided during the initial years of their development in the form of grants;

(d) the evidence that for many of the under-developed countries, grants are required to supplement and render more effective the programmes of the International Bank and the International Finance Corporation (this view is supported by the President of the International Bank);

(e) the limited resources which now exist (under bilateral programmes) for aiding many of the uncommitted countries in the Colombo Plan area (Burma, Indonesia) and in other critical parts of the world (the Middle East);

(f) the evidence that the USSR are now prepared to provide its own special form of economic assistance to many of the under-developed countries and to represent both inside the United Nations and in the countries concerned that western programmes are purely "self interested" and do not recognize many of the special needs of the under-developed countries, particularly those which are so far uncommitted in their alignment in the cold war;

(g) the interest which is being displayed in NATO (partially in relation to Article 2) and in OEEC, concerning the importance of economic aid to under-developed countries as a response to the Soviet economic offensive and more positively as evidence of the interest of western associations in the welfare of the under-developed countries;

(h) the desirability of mobilizing the resources of western European countries (Germany, Belgium, The Netherlands, etc.) who are relatively well disposed and capable of providing economic aid to under-developed countries;

(i) the progress of a number of under-developed countries which in the past have been virtually incapable of absorbing more than a very limited amount of foreign capital to a point where capital grants to carefully selected projects can have highly beneficial effects on their economies; because of the increasing tempo of technical assistance which is being provided to under-developed countries both under the Colombo Plan and United Nations programmes, it is reasonable to assume that the ability of under-developed countries to absorb capital aid will increase rapidly over the next few years.

3. In the past, countries that might be regarded as potential contributors (including Canada) have generally been reluctant to enter into discussions within the United Nations which might involve any commitment about the immediate establishment of SUNFED. As a result, the potential contributing countries have not so far taken an active part in the shaping of any proposals for a capital aid fund. Of consequence, some of the claims put forward by the under-developed countries and their supporters (e.g. the Scheyven Report)⁹⁹ have often been extravagant or ill considered. The special committee which will meet in New York on May 7th to consider replies to the SUNFED questionnaire will presumably give many of the contributing countries an opportunity to participate in discussing the structure of a capital aid fund in a practical and constructive manner.

4. While the SUNFED which has been developed by Mr. Scheyven is not considered by many of the contributing countries to represent an efficient and sound basis for considering the establishment of a special capital aid fund, the Scheyven Report does point out most of the considerations which should be borne in mind in determining how an international capital aid fund should be set up. For example, the Report discusses the relative merits of grants versus loans, loans repayable in local currency, the use of commodities to create counterpart funds, and the use of grant aid in certain circumstances to cover local as well as external costs of projects. However, many of the conclusions which are reached in the Scheyven Report are not those which will command much support in the potential contributing countries:

5. In the simplest terms three possible types of capital aid fund might be set up within the United Nations:

(a) a separate special fund (this does not have to be necessarily the SUNFED recommended by Mr. Scheyven) might be created. It is, of course, a fund of this nature which the under-developed countries, themselves, would support and which the Netherlands, Belgium and others have been pressing for over the past few years. The Scheyven Report mentions $250 million a year as the amount which might be desirable for such an agency. The report suggests, however, that a lesser amount of between $150 and $200 million (which is about the rate of the International Bank's annual lending) would enable a number of essential projects to be undertaken in the under-developed countries;

(b) the association of a capital aid fund with the International Bank along the lines of the relationship between the Bank and the International Finance Corporation;

⁹⁹ Au cours de la neuvième session de l'Assemblée générale, un comité composé de neuf experts internationaux fut nommé afin d'examiner la structure, les fonctions et les responsabilités éventuelles d'une agence spéciale de l'ONU chargée du développement économique. Le comité, présidé par M. Raymond Scheyven, soumit son rapport en mai 1955. Voir Nations Unies, Documents officiels de l'Assemblée générale, dixième session, Supplément N° 17 (A/2906).

The 9th General Assembly appointed a committee of nine international experts to examine the possible forms, functions and responsibilities of a special UN agency for economic development. Chaired by Raymond Scheyven, the committee submitted its report in May 1955. See United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Tenth Session, Supplement No. 17 (A/2906).

(c) the association of a more modest capital aid fund with the United Nations Technical Assistance Board which would enable that body to make capital expenditures in support of their technical assistance programmes. The amounts involved in this approach would be presumably much lower than the figure recommended in the Scheyven Report.

CANADIAN REPLY TO UNITED NATIONS QUESTIONNAIRE CONCERNING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

In the past, several proposals have been put forward within the United Nations for the creation of a Special Fund for Economic Development. At the Eighth General Assembly of the United Nations Canada voted for a resolution which approved the principle of the eventual establishment of a fund for economic development within the United Nations on the basis of savings resulting from a world-wide reduction in armaments. At the Tenth General Assembly of the United Nations (1955) the Canadian delegation reaffirmed this approval in principle but stated to the Assembly that in the view of the Canadian Government reductions sufficient to justify a diversion of funds to projects such as the Special Fund might well have to await measures of disarmament resulting not merely from a relaxation in international tension — which could prove temporary — but from an agreed programme of world-wide disarmament. Subsequently the Canadian delegation supported a resolution (which was unanimously adopted after considerable negotiation and revision) that appealed to governments to review their respective positions as regards extending their material support to a fund in accordance with changes in the international situation and other relevant factors, both national and international. The resolution invited member states to transmit to the Secretary-General of the United Nations their views as definitely as possible concerning the establishment, role, structure and operations of a special fund on the basis of a questionnaire prepared at the Tenth General Assembly for circulation to member governments.

2. Over the past two years the number of countries which originally joined with Canada in opposing the immediate establishment of a special fund has been declining. At the Tenth General Assembly the only countries which were prepared actively to oppose the establishment of a fund were the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Canada. On the other hand, the pressure from all the underdeveloped countries for the creation of such a fund was growing and a second group of countries, made up largely of Western European states, had swung over to a more active support of the proposal. (Some of the Western European states such as the Netherlands, in fact, have been supporters of the proposal for several years). With this change in attitude there is a possibility that the special fund might be established even against the wishes of those countries which now actively oppose it. Countries of the West will wish to give special attention to the questions which are now relevant in considering the importance and usefulness of a United Nations aid fund. The increasing needs of the underdeveloped countries and the position of the West in the new situation involving competitive co-existence with the Soviet Union should be carefully examined in determining the attitude which Canada will wish to adopt in relation to the discussions for the creation of the fund.

3. In the past, countries that might be regarded as potential contributors (including Canada) have generally been reluctant to enter into discussions in the United Nations which might involve any commitments about the immediate establishment of a special fund. As a result, the limited group of countries which opposed the immediate creation of SUNFED have not so far taken any active part in the shaping of the proposals for a capital aid fund.

4. In view of the growing likelihood that some sort of fund will be set up in the not far distant future, the time seems to have come when Canada should play an active part in the detailed discussions regarding its possible nature and scope. In particular, the Canadian Government should, at this stage, send a reply to a questionnaire drawn up and approved at the last United Nations General Assembly. A copy of the proposed reply which has been drawn up by officials from the Departments directly concerned is attached.

5. The replies to the questionnaire from all member states will be considered and analyzed by an ad hoc committee which will meet in New York on May 7. This committee is made up of 16 countries including Canada. Mr. A.F.W. Plumtre, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance, will be the Canadian representative. During the meetings of that committee an opportunity will be given to the various delegations to participate in discussing the structure of a capital aid fund in a practical and constructive manner, but no commitments about the immediate establishment of the fund will arise at that meeting.

6. The approval of Cabinet is sought for the attached Canadian reply to the United Nations questionnaire. Since it seems desirable that Canada should now assume a less negative attitude than in the past, our earlier reservation that the establishment of the fund should await a universally accepted disarmament plan is not repeated. In the general statement of position in our reply it is simply stated that the Government's final decision regarding a fund of the type now under consideration will depend in large measure on whether it is satisfied that the organizational and administrative arrangements are such as to lead to efficient operation and that the fund would command sufficient financial support to enable it to operate effectively.

7. The questionnaire is, of course, primarily concerned with matters of form (organizational and operational procedures). The more substantial questions concerning the establishment of a special fund are likely to be discussed at the Summer Session of ECOSOC. Cabinet will be consulted again in advance of that meeting concerning the position which Canada will adopt.

REPLY TO THE UNITED NATIONS QUESTIONNAIRE ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

General Statement of Position

The Canadian Government has in the past supported a special fund in principle but has opposed its immediate establishment. The Canadian Government's final decision regarding a fund of the type now under consideration would depend in large measure on whether it was satisfied that the organizational and administrative arrangements were such as to lead to efficient operation and that the fund would command sufficient support to enable it to operate effectively.

In replying to the present questionnaire the Canadian Government has attempted merely to set out certain principles which in its opinion should be taken into account if a special fund is established and in preparatory work which is undertaken working towards the eventual establishment of a fund.

All the particular suggestions put forward below are subject to this general statement of position.

Replies to Questionnaire

Question 1: What, in the expectation of your Government, will be the role of a special fund for the economic development of your country?

Answer: The Canadian Government does not expect that a special fund will play any part in the economic development of Canada.

Question 2: What is your opinion as regards the nature of contributions to the operational budget of the special fund?

Answer: The Canadian Government considers that appropriate arrangements should be agreed upon among potential contributors for the initial provision of adequate operational funds. Subsequent contributions should be voluntary. All contributions should normally be made in convertible currencies.

Question 3: What is the opinion of your Government about the initial sum which should be collected before the special fund starts its operations?

Answer: The Canadian Government considers that something like $250-million, mostly in convertible currencies, should be an immediate prospect before an effective fund of the type now under consideration should be set up.

Question 4: What does your Government think about the special fund making grants-in-aid and loans and under what terms and conditions?

Answer: The Canadian Government is of the view that aid extended by the special fund should normally be in the form of grants. If any loans are made they should be on terms comparable with those on which capital is available from the IBRD except that they would be repayable in local currencies rather than in the currencies in which they were made.

Question 5: What is the opinion of your Government about the relationships between the special fund, on the one hand, and the United Nations and the specialized agencies, on the other?

Answer: The special fund, while having independent international legal status should be a specialized agency of the UN and it should establish close working relationships with other UN specialized agencies and organizations and in particular with the International Bank and the Technical Assistance Board. In the establishment of the special fund every effort should be made to coordinate its activities with those of other existing international organizations on a basis which would avoid duplication of functions.

Question 6: What should, in the opinion of your Government, be the structure (governing bodies and management) of the special fund?

Answer: The structure of the special fund should be made up of a General Council, an Executive Board and a Director General.

The General Council would be composed of all member states and should meet biennially. Among other functions it would perform the following:

- (a) Elect the members of the Executive Board;
- (b) On recommendations of the Executive Board approve the administrative budget of the special fund and review its basic policies;

The Executive Board, consisting of major contributors and other members of the fund, would be elected on a basis which would ensure efficiency of operation, equitable allocation of resources, and continuing financial support. The main functions of the Board would include the following:

- (a) A review of the administrative budget of the special fund before passing it on to the General Council for approval;
- (b) The selection of the projects which the special fund should finance from among the applications for assistance. It should also determine the terms and conditions of such financing.

The Director General should be appointed by the Executive Board and be an ex officio member of it. The Director General should be the administrative head of the special fund and would assume all the duties normally connected with such a post.

Question 7: What should, in the opinion of your Government, be the methods and mechanism for the appraisal of projects submitted by Governments?

Answer: The Canadian Government considers that each request for assistance should be submitted directly to the special fund by the Government of the country seeking assistance. The Canadian Government would expect that extensive use will be made of the facilities of the IBRD, the TAB and other international agencies as appropriate to appraise the projects submitted to the special fund. Adequate procedures should be established to assure that resources are allocated equitably and efficiently to meet the most important and urgent needs of the underdeveloped countries, having regard, of course, to the fact that such needs may also be met by funds from other sources. (See reply to question 8.)

Question 8: Any other suggestions your Government may have regarding the structure and functions of the special fund.

Answer: The Canadian Government has the following additional suggestions to make:

FUNCTIONS OF THE SPECIAL FUND

In addition to helping to finance the cost of the social-economic infrastructure of underdeveloped countries, the special fund should:

- (a) Upon request, assist in various ways the arrangement of bilateral aid programmes, in particular by assisting countries which have bilateral aid programmes in selecting projects or in administering their programmes; and

(b) Facilitate the co-ordination of aid programmes by collecting and disseminating information, in particular by publishing, annually, reports on the aid supplied by each of its members — whether that aid is supplied bilaterally through some other international organization, or through the special fund.

SPECIAL UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT;
 CANADIAN REPLY TO U.N. QUESTIONNAIRE

28. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on proposals made in the past in the United Nations for a special fund for economic development. At the last meeting of the General Assembly a resolution was unanimously adopted inviting nations to reply to a questionnaire on the establishment and role of such a fund. Ever since the question was first mooted, Canada had consistently opposed a special fund. However, pressure was increasing and there was a possibility that a fund might be set up despite Canadian wishes. In determining Canada's attitude on this matter, the increasing needs of the underdeveloped countries and the position of the west in the new international atmosphere should be carefully examined. It was, perhaps, time that Canada should play an active part in discussions on the details of the plan and should reply to the U.N. questionnaire. Answers from all countries were to be analysed at a meeting in New York at which Canada would be represented. It seemed desirable now to assume a less negative attitude and to state that the government's final decision on a fund of this type would largely depend on whether it was satisfied that the administrative arrangements would lead to efficient operation and that the fund would command sufficient support to enable it to operate effectively. The question of whether a special fund would, in fact, be established would be discussed at the Economic and Social Council meetings in the summer, prior to which the Cabinet would be consulted.

Proposed answers to the eight questions in the U.N. questionnaire were submitted.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, April 18, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 92-56)

29. Mr. Pearson added that he would be willing to defer transmitting the answers until the United Kingdom and the United States had submitted their replies. It was difficult to answer the questionnaire especially as attitudes both here and abroad were changing. An effort had been made to be cautious but Canada could not, in his view, remain completely negative.

30. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The answer to question 4 which concerned use of the fund for both grants-in-aid and loans, was disturbing on two grounds. It would mean establishing another organization to do something which the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development was already doing. Secondly, it introduced the principle of accepting repayment of loans in local currencies — something which had always been refused in answer to representations made in Parliament on direct Canadian aid abroad. To these objections, it was said that the reply did not come down directly in favour of loans. It was nonetheless desirable to reduce international assistance in the form of grants by use of loans, even if these were not commercially sound in the accepted sense. Less stigma was attached to assistance of this kind.

(b) If the fund were established, foreign aid, regardless of the form in which it was given, would be increased. However, at least the figures mentioned for SUNFED were far below what was being suggested in the N.A.T.O. forum.

(c) In addition to further aid, there would be the added expense of maintaining and operating another U.N. agency which was undesirable in itself. The International Bank could be used for the purposes envisaged. This would mean an amendment to the U.N. Charter.

(d) Another way of administering the programme might be through an increase in the size of the Technical Assistance Board, thus obviating the necessity of a separate organization.

(e) It would seem unnecessary to contribute to SUNFED if other countries did not do so.

31. The Cabinet deferred decision on a proposed reply to the U.N. questionnaire on the establishment of a special United Nations fund for economic development, submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, pending further consideration of the answers by the Minister of Finance; it being understood that any reply would not be transmitted until the United Kingdom and the United States answers were presented.⁶⁰

Projet d'une note pour le premier ministre

Draft Memorandum for Prime Minister

SPECIAL UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT (SUNFED)

On May 3 Cabinet approved a set of answers by Canada to a United Nations questionnaire concerning the form and functions of a proposed Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED). The Canadian reply did not definitely commit Canada to contribute towards SUNFED, but at the same time it dropped the reservation which Canadian representatives had expressed on previous occasions, that our contribution to such a Fund would have to wait for savings resulting from the general acceptance of a world disarmament plan. Our reply stated, however, that the final decision of the Canadian Government "would depend in large measure on whether it was satisfied that the organizational and administrative arrangements were such as to lead to efficient operation and that the Fund would command sufficient support to enable it to operate effectively".

2. Our present approach to SUNFED is based on the belief that aid through a United Nations channel would be more acceptable to the uncommitted countries of South-East Asia and the Middle-East than aid offered through bilateral arrangements; that it could be a valuable and non-contentious channel for assistance to the emerging African members of the Commonwealth; that it would attract resources for assisting underdeveloped countries in addition to the resources now available under the various bilateral programmes, and would probably draw contributions from Western European countries such as Germany, Netherlands, Belgium and the Scandinavian countries which have not developed to any extent bilateral assistance arrangements with underdeveloped countries; that it would be wise to try to divert Soviet offers of assistance through United Nations channels; and that in the long run it is logical and proper that a United Nations agency should play a large role in the administration and operation of an international economic assistance programme. SUNFED is not regarded by the Departments in Ottawa which have been studying the question as a substitute for the Colombo Plan, the various bilateral assistance programmes now operating, or the United Nations technical assistance programmes, although it might take over parts of the existing programmes, and some of the contributions now being made to these programmes might be diverted into SUNFED. Basically, however, SUNFED would represent a net increase in the amount of assistance available to underdeveloped countries for development purposes.

The Canadian reply to the questionnaire was reconsidered and approved by Cabinet on May 3, 1956. The revised version simply deleted the second sentence in the answer to Question 4 and removed much of the detail concerning the proposed structure of a new aid organization from the answer to Question 6. To this answer, it also added the following sentence: "However, certain dangers must be kept in mind from the outset, particularly the dangers of unduly multiplying staff, and unduly increasing the sessions of the board and the general meeting." For the revised reply, see Cabinet Document No. 103-56.

3. Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have been unenthusiastic about SUNFED. The United Kingdom still considers SUNFED should await reduction in armament spending resulting from an international agreement on disarmament. The United Kingdom considers that without this reduction in armament spending, it cannot do more by way of assistance to underdeveloped areas than it is already doing by contributions to its colonial development schemes, the Colombo Plan and the United Nations technical assistance programme, and through the outward flow of private United Kingdom investment. The major obstacle to the early establishment of SUNFED, however, is the reluctance of the United States to put part of its assistance contributions into United Nations or multilateral programmes. There is not yet any indication of a basic change in the United States attitude, although certain influential Americans, including Mr. Cabot Lodge, Jr., have recently come out in favour of making a larger part of United States assistance funds available to United Nations programmes.

4. India, Pakistan and Ceylon have, of course, actively supported the early establishment of SUNFED. Mr. Nehru in a speech to the House of the People on March 29 referred in sceptical terms to the motives behind bilateral aid, and went on to say: "I attach a good deal of importance to this proposal for SUNFED because it will bring about gradually and completely, I hope, a different relationship between the giver and the taker which will be advantageous to both....".

5. The question of the establishment of SUNFED is to be discussed again at the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Economic and Social Council in Geneva (Twenty-second Session: July 4-August 10). ECOSOC will have before it a report prepared by an ad hoc committee of representatives of sixteen countries, including Canada which met in New York during May to examine the replies from governments about the functions and organization of SUNFED (should it be established) which most member countries (but not yet the United States nor the USSR) have submitted in response to the United Nations questionnaire. The ad hoc committee confined itself to analyzing and summarizing these replies. There seems to be fairly general agreement among those countries which have replied that the fund should initially be in the neighbourhood of $250 million, although it is widely considered that SUNFED might begin operations with less than this amount. There is a variety of opinion about whether those funds should be available as grants-in-aid or as loans, and about whether loans of the Fund should be at normal or at subsidized rates of interest. There is general agreement that SUNFED should operate in close consultation with other established United Nations Organizations, particularly the International Bank and the Technical Assistance Board.⁶¹

6. In the absence of a more positive attitude by the United States, United Kingdom and the USSR, it is difficult to envisage a very fruitful discussion emerging at the forthcoming ECOSOC meeting. The whole question of assistance to underdeveloped countries is a very live one, however, and there have recently been a number of proposals both inside and outside United Nations meetings for increasing the amount of capital available for development purposes in underdeveloped countries and extending the technical assistance programmes of United Nations agencies. At the recent Ministerial meeting of the NATO Council M. Pineau suggested that the NATO countries should propose the establishment of a United Nations agency to operate an international economic development fund and urged special efforts for countries which have not been receiving their share of available economic assistance. In this regard, countries with limited administrative facilities are undoubtedly encountering real difficulties in mapping out and administering their development programmes. You may recall that Mr. Pearson in a speech to the Red Cross in Toronto in April, suggested consideration of a "United Nations Professional and Technical Civil Service" to assist underdeveloped countries in drawing up and pursuing their development plans.⁶² This suggestion was taken up by Mr. Hammarskjöld in a speech at McGill University on May 30⁶³ and linked to the proposals of M. Pineau. It is likely to be pursued at forthcoming meetings of United Nations bodies, and obviously merits careful consideration.

E.C.O.S.O.C.

The very interesting attached memorandum prepared by Mr. Plumtre was referred to me by Mr. Ritchie.

2. This memorandum confirms our impression that the West as a whole may be underestimating the importance of ECOSOC and in particular of the role it can play in meeting the Soviet effort to expand their influence in non-committed areas. We have been right to attempt to play ourselves a more positive role than in the past, but we are operating within fairly strict limitations, financial and constitutional. It is clear, as Mr. Plumtre suggests, that any effective lead must be taken by the U.S.A.

3. It may be that, for a while, both the U.S.A. and the U.K. cannot develop the required new policies: we can discuss in Washington and London what could possibly be done, in a positive way, when we make our preparations for the resumed session and for the General Assembly. I wonder, however, whether a slightly more understanding approach on the part of the U.S.A. and the U.K. might not yield interesting dividends, even if both have to live with their present major policies. As our delegation has shown in the course of two sessions of ECOSOC, if a genuine effort is made to understand the problem of the underdeveloped countries, ideas may emerge which are helpful to those countries and yet generally compatible with our own requirements.

4. It is a pity that the U.K. representatives, in particular, should be so preoccupied with their financial worries that the wealth of their experience as tacticians and as experts on the substance of the issues involved seems to be largely unused.

5. It is important to bear in mind that the U.S.A. and the U.K. attitude is equally too negative in the semi-political and social fields dealt with by ECOSOC: without undue concern we are losing ground, for instance, in debates concerning human rights and self-determination on the apparent assumption that all will be right if we can hold our own in the statistical, the population commissions and similar technical bodies.

6. There is need, therefore, for fresh U.S.A. and U.K. leadership in the various fields of ECOSOC operations and, pending the development of new policies, for a more understanding and positive approach on their part of the aspirations of the less developed and newly established States. Anything we can do to encourage this will be useful. This is based, of course, on the assumption that we ourselves will continue to send well prepared, integrated and dynamic teams to ECOSOC meetings.⁶⁴

SOME GLOOMY THOUGHTS AT THE END OF ECOSOC ON SUNFED, INDUSTRIALIZATION AND PRIMARY PRODUCTS

Dag Hammarskjöld opened the Summer Session of ECOSOC with a strong appeal for measures to achieve greater stability in markets and prices for primary products. He pointed out that since the war economic progress in the industrialized countries had far outstripped progress in the underdeveloped countries, that the latter depended on primary products for their livelihood, that wide fluctuations of primary products prices continued despite the maintenance since the War of high levels of employment and demand in the industrialized countries, that these fluctuations seemed far wider than required to correct basic economic maladjustments, that they produced serious economic instability in the countries concerned, that this undermined political stability, and that the economic support provided by all aid from abroad could be wiped out by relatively small reductions in export prices.

I agree very strongly with Messrs Plumptre and Cadieux. The West suffers a great many defeats in the U.N. not from Western stinginess but from stuffiness. With the Americans it comes from political confusion and naive economic conceptions; the British suffer from plain Foreign Office rigidity of mind, the constant view that underdeveloped people are "tiresome" (the F.O.'s favourite adjective) and at best an irresistible compulsion to lecture the unwashed. The Canadian attitude frequently combines the worst of the British and American attitudes — extreme economic simplicity along with the complacent view of the nouveaux riches that the poor are that way because they won't work hard. We need more faith and more recklessness more than larger appropriations. J.W. H[olmes]
Le monde se remet de maux économiques alors que les médecins à son chevet n'y entendent rien, et pour cause ... J. L[éger]

2. Throughout the Session, the underdeveloped countries sang variations on three themes: SUNFED; industrialization; and a better deal for primary products. They got support, indeed leadership, from USSR, and Czechoslovakia, with Yugoslavia doing a very clever job of running interference. These countries sponsored SUNFED, not as a body to supplement the World Bank by supplying "social infrastructure" but as a channel for supplying their own machinery presumably their own technicians to help industrialize the underdeveloped countries. Industrialization — diversity — would relieve underdeveloped countries of complete dependence on primary products; they could all grow big and strong like Russia. As for the primary products themselves, these three countries proposed and supported a new world-wide organization which would be concerned with trade of all types; GATT, they said, facilitated trade by lowering tariff barriers against manufactured goods amongst free enterprise countries but it had nothing whatever to offer to other types of countries which faced other types of obstacles in marketing other types of products. After talking in this vein for some time they backed away, for the time being, from the new world trade body and, full of sweet reasonableness, gave strong support to the three U.N. Regional Commissions; if only these three could get together somehow, new possibilities would open up for inter-regional trade — and a new multilateral platform would be built from which the USSR could paddle its bilateral trade agreements, seemingly so much more secure than the fluctuating commodity markets of the free world.

3. Against these attractions from the East, what did the leaders of the West have to offer? On SUNFED, the U.S. repeated parrot-like that they could consider this project when internationally agreed disarmament released some funds; they then gave a long Republican lecture on the virtues of private capital investment. The U.K. said that they were already being very "generous" (it was their word) to under developed countries and could not afford anything more at present. Indeed they were so poor that it was doubtful whether they could support any expansion in U.N. activities in any direction. On industrialization, the U.S. had nothing particular to say beyond reiterating the virtues of private enterprise. The U.K. painted a sombre picture of the dangers and pitfalls awaiting those who ventured along the path of an industrial revolution, and urged them to take it very slowly and cautiously. In regard to primary products the U.S. made a sotto voce reference to their preference for a commodity-by-commodity approach as opposed to any sort of omnibus arrangements (e.g. a World Food Reserve). The U.K. proclaimed the same doctrine fortissimo, apparently untroubled by their absence from the International Wheat Agreement. They then proceeded to distinguish themselves from everyone else by voting in splendid isolation against a resolution providing for a modest review of existing international machinery. Finally, both the U.S. and the U.K. declined to serve on the admittedly misguided and misbegotten U.N. Commodity Commission (CICT).

4. Fortunately underdeveloped countries realize that the U.S. and U.K. are in real life much more cooperative, and the USSR much less, than they make themselves appear at such a conference. Hence there was no rush towards the Eastern exit. But, surely, the U.S. and U.K. cannot afford to ignore for long how much more attractive the Eastern exit has been made to look than the Western.

5. It does not follow from this remark that the U.S. and U.K. have to buy the particular packages that are nowadays being peddled. These include: a SUNFED in the form evolved by two U.N. committees of experts; a possible U.N. specialized agency to foster industrialization; and, in the field of primary products, various types of machinery including the proposed world trade organization, the aggrandizement and partial fusion of the three U.N. regional commissions (ECE, ECLA and ECAFE) and the unlovely U.N. Commodity Commission (CICT). What is necessary is not that these particular leads should be followed but that some leads should be given.

6. It is to the U.S. that the West must look for leadership. Others can only prod, preach and persuade. However, one or two observations may be useful as a basis for discussion.

7. In the field of industrialization, the West should certainly not go overboard to try to meet the wishes — often scarcely more than whims — expressed by various underdeveloped countries. (I recall an Indonesian once asking if we would help them under the Colombo Plan to set up a motor-car factory.) In spite of Eastern blandishments, we must try to persuade the underdeveloped countries to maintain a sense of realism and sound economy. And actual Western performance in regard to industrialization has been good, not merely under bilateral programmes, which are never very popular in U.N. circles, but through multilateral agencies:— the World Bank, the new IFC, and the U.N. technical assistance programme. It is my impression that what is needed is continuing emphasis on and support for these agencies combined with sympathetic talk (as opposed to condescending lectures) in ECOSOC and the Assembly and a willingness to go along with some not-too-useful Secretariat studies of particular problems.

8. SUNFED presents the U.S. with special problems. It presents the Russians with not dissimilar ones but they say they support it and then add that they are really talking about something quite different! The question immediately arises: what can the U.S. support in this line of country? Here I would make two comments, one positive and the other negative. First, something attractive might surely be made out of various Canadian suggestions — Mr. Pearson's Red Cross speech, his "blueprint" idea at Warm Springs, and the two proposals in the Canadian Government's reply to the SUNFED questionnaire. Second, there is a real danger that, just as the USSR would try to use SUNFED as a means of exporting Russian machinery, so the U.S.A. would try to use it as a means of disposing of farm surpluses; we must be on our guard against both.

9. It is the field of primary products that I regard as at once the most important and the most difficult. It is the most important because it lies at the basis of the stability — economic stability and hence, particularly in Asia, political stability — of the underdeveloped countries. It is the most difficult because proposals cut across the normal free forces of supply and demand in world markets, and are accordingly particularly unsavoury in Republican nostrils. Further, the behaviour of the U.S., so good in many other fields, leaves so much to be desired in this one; indeed their assiduous efforts to stabilize their domestic markets for their own primary products so frequently lead them to upset markets for the primary products of other countries.

10. One can only ponder what Washington, surrounded by a sea of U.S. inhibitions, might find least impossible. It would be my own estimate that quite a bit might be accomplished if U.S. could be persuaded to pay more than a whispered lip-service to the commodity-by-commodity approach to possible stabilization in the field of primary products. This means, I suppose, some positive U.S. initiative in some of the many international commodity study groups combined with a willingness, if agreement emerges, to embark on two or three stabilization plans, on the pattern of the Wheat Agreement or otherwise.

11. If there is anything in these ideas — or other ones — they might be put forward in due course to the U.S. either informally by officials or at the next Canada-U.S. Ministerial meeting or both. They might possibly be put on the table for discussion in NATO.

SUNFED

The usual pattern of UN consideration of SUNFED is already emerging even though the item itself will not be reached for at least another week. The Latin American delegations have already submitted a Draft Resolution AKKC 2/L 296 of January 9 which requests the Ad Hoc Committee to prepare a draft statute for a proposed special fund in anticipation of its early establishment. The Arab-Asian group is privately circulating another draft resolution which requests the Ad Hoc Committee in addition to preparing a statute also to submit a preliminary outline of operations for the first period of SUNFED's activities to the 24th Session of ECOSOC. The Arab-Asians had hoped to prepare a joint draft with the Latin Americans but the latter group rushed its resolution in first. In this situation the USA and UK delegations are prepared to take a strong stand against any decision which would anticipate the early establishment of SUNFED and involve the drafting of statutes. Our general position with regard to the drafting of statutes has been made known to the interested delegations. We propose as a tactical measure to remain on the sidelines for the time being, and have not yet thought it desirable to suggest that we could support or prepare any alternative text.

2. However, we had a meeting today with the UK and USA delegations at which possibilities for avoiding an acrimonious clash on SUNFED in the Committee were discussed. We suggested that our conversations with the Latin American delegations and in particular Brazil suggested that those delegations were not prepared to compromise as easily as at some previous sessions of ECOSOC and of the General Assembly and that they might be prepared to see something of a showdown discussion on the SUNFED item. Similarly it was clear that the Arab-Asian Bloc led on this issue by Egypt were less inclined to conciliation now than they were even at the 22nd Session of ECOSOC. If the USA and UK positions remained rigid there was therefore a likelihood of a much more open difference of opinion on SUNFED at this session than at previous UN meetings and a vote in which the UK and the USA and perhaps Australia and NZ were more or less isolated — a situation which the Canadian delegation would regret. The UK position has become if anything more financially rigid than in previous years. The USA position still remains the same as at other UN meetings.

3. Both the USA and the UK delegations thought that they would be quite prepared to have an initial exchange of views in the Committee with the underdeveloped countries on the basis of the Arab-Asian and Latin American tentative drafts. They agreed however that it would be desirable to prepare as soon as possible an alternative resolution which could be brought forward at the appropriate moment. We do not necessarily share the view that a perhaps bitter exchange between the USA and UK and the under-developed countries would be profitable or desirable prior to consideration of a compromise draft of some kind but it appears as if the underdeveloped countries really want a battle and that the USA and UK are almost looking forward to the fray.

4. We agreed however to prepare a draft of a resolution which would emphasize the need to build on the Ad Hoc Committee's report as discussed in paragraph 24 of Chapter II(2) of the commentary.† You will recall that the resolution setting up the Ad Hoc Committee included amongst its tasks the preparation of "such conclusions as clearly emerged from the above analysis". (The analysis is of course the analysis of the views contained in government replies to the SUNFED questionnaire.) When the Ad Hoc Committee completed its preliminary report the conclusion section was regarded as inconclusive to say the least. The UK and USA would be prepared to participate in an effort by the Committee to draw more general and more ambitious conclusions. We gather also that both would be willing to see a request circulated by the UN for a statement of the contributions which governments would be prepared to make to the fund. We had of course already advised the US delegation of your views on this question and took this opportunity of repeating them. We argued that most governments would find it impossible to make any commitment concerning their contribution in the absence of agreement on the nature of the fund to which they would be contributing or on the amount and nature of the contributions which other governments would be prepared to make. We understand that the UK and US delegations would be glad to state that they would not repeat not be able to make a contribution to SUNFED at the present time and would welcome a general realization of exactly what resources might then be available for SUNFED. The USA representative suggested that one way around this difficulty would be to ask governments to answer this question on whatever assumptions they saw fit to make. We considered this unrealistic.

5. (We were told incidentally of the difficulties which the USA administration has had in making any reply to the SUNFED questionnaire. It appears that a draft reply or statement on SUNFED of an extended and definite nature has been prepared and widely circulated within the US government. At present however it concludes with a sentence on which the USA Treasury insists to the effect that the USA is not willing to consider any further modifications of the position set out in the paper. The US State Department has refused to submit this reply to a UN body in a manner which would suggest that there was no further room for discussion or modification of the USA position. The US Treasury refused to remove the offending sentence and there the matter rests.) The USA delegation believe that the USA could not participate in any statute exercise now and could withdraw from the Ad Hoc Committee if that body undertook the task.

6. We have therefore prepared a very rough outline of a resolution which might carry the UK and USA even in the present difficult circumstances. We are not sure how our draft would be greeted by the underdeveloped countries. However the Indian and Indonesian delegations have private doubts, as do some of the Latin Americans, about the usefulness of drafting statutes at the present time. Certainly it would be opposed by the USSR and its supporters (with the possible exception of Poland) since as you will recall the Soviet Bloc was against even the limited conclusions contained in the interim Ad Hoc Committee report. The USSR would probably be willing to vote irresponsibly for the drafting of statutes but we believe their position could be made very difficult by a resolution such as we have drafted which would envisage further discussion of the principles as yet unsettled on which any draft statutes would have to be based.

7. It would be undesirable in the USA view apparently for the Ad Hoc Committee to attempt to reconcile the difficulties which would emerge in more ambitious conclusions. If the Committee is to reconcile these conclusions and produce a set of principles on which SUNFED might be established then to the USA this would not be much better than an attempt to draft statutes. There might be something to be said however for asking the Ad Hoc Committee not only to set out in detail the inconsistencies between the various points of view on SUNFED but also to produce a consistent general pattern for a proposed special fund. We judge that the USA might eventually go along. We would therefore be grateful for your comments on this question and on the following rough draft at an early stage so that we could give any text you approve to the USA and UK for the consideration of their governments prior to its possible submission. Text begins:

(Some standard preambular paragraphs followed by something along these lines) Noting that Resolution 923 (x) established an Ad Hoc Committee to analyze the replies and comments of governments transmitted to the Secretary General concerning the establishment, role, structure and operations of a Special UN Fund for Economic Development.

Recalling that the report of the Second Committee to the General Assembly, Document A/3065, provides that the task of the Ad Hoc Committee would be to prepare a summary of the views submitted by governments an analysis of those views and such conclusions "as clearly emerged" from the above analysis.

Noting further that the interim report of the Ad Hoc Committee on SUNFED emphasizes that the conclusions contained in that report should be read in conjunction with replies of governments and the statistical analysis of those replies and should not be read "by themselves".

Recognizing that the conclusions contained in the Ad Hoc Committee's report are primarily statistical, do not take into account the diversity of opinions put forward, and that some of the features of the general pattern of the special fund which emerges are not fully consistent with each other.

Recognizing also that governments were not expressly requested to indicate to what extent they would be prepared to give a special fund financial support and therefore generally did not deal with this question in their replies to the SUNFED questionnaire.

Requests the Ad Hoc Committee in its final report to the 23rd Session of Economic and Social Council:

(1) to expand the section on conclusions in the interim report taking into account such factors as the diversity of opinions put forward and the absence of replies from some governments including some of the major potential contributors

(2) to prepare a general pattern of a proposed special fund on the basis of government replies the features of which would be consistent with each other ("as a basis for any future draft statute" might later be added if necessary).

8. We do not hold very strongly to the wording which we have set out above. We would be grateful however for your views on whether language of this kind would be acceptable for Canadian sponsorship. You will note that we have not included in the operative paragraphs the UK and USA suggestion that the Secretary General might be asked to circulate an additional request to member governments for info on the type and extent of the financial support which they would be willing to give to a special fund using such assumptions as might be considered necessary in each case.

9. We have not mentioned your thinking on the subject of a compromise proposal to any other delegations than the UK and the USA at this stage.

SUNFED

In the light of the continuingly negative USA attitude on SUNFED we have felt some concern at the possibility that our efforts to produce compromise resolutions at this or other UN meetings, and to lead the USA towards an eventual position in which that country might be able to contribute to a SUNFED, were in vain and therefore to some extent unnecessary. If, in fact, the USA would never contribute to a genuinely multilateral UN fund or to some variation of this idea then there may be something to be said for the Brazilian suggestion that we avoid maintaining false hopes and bring the exercise to a conclusion.

2. We therefore approached the USA delegation for their analysis of the ultimate prospects for the eventual approval of some kind of SUNFED by the USA.

3. We were reminded that the USA had gone on record as being in favor of some form of SUNFED upon the attainment at world-wide disarmament. However, USA officials have said privately and Walter Kotschnig has said publicly in an informal UN meeting with representatives of the underdeveloped countries that the disarmament issue is not the real basis for the USA position since the financial magnitudes involved are so different, the USA contribution needed for the initial establishment of SUNFED being only in the nature of one hundred million dollars.

4. If some measure of world wide disarmament is in fact attained then the USA position on SUNFED would certainly be more difficult. However, in the current political situation it seems unlikely that there will be a sufficient degree of world wide disarmament to make a basic change in US policy on SUNFED possible on this ground alone.

5. Therefore, if we assume

(a) that world wide disarmament is unlikely, and

(b) that whether it is likely or not the USA does not regard this condition as determining then the real basis for USA opposition to SUNFED must lie elsewhere.

6. The history of the USA contribution to the expanded program of technical assistance suggests that in fact the USA Congress is not prepared to make a substantial financial contribution over which it would lose control to any UN body. The USA Administration has been successful in maintaining its present contribution to the expanded program of technical assistance only by obscuring the multilateral nature of the expandable programme and by securing a minimum set of safeguards against the use of the USA contribution for political purposes of which the US Congress might disapprove.

7. There has been, however, a good deal of change in the USA government with regard to USA policies on multilateral aid. The Milliken and Rostov analysis⁶⁵ has done some good and the conversion of Ambassador Lodge and we are told "of some other USA officials" has also helped. The fact remains, however, that sufficient USA government officials, particularly in the Treasury, are opposed to an even modified SUNFED that the idea at present has little chance of success.

8. When we asked our USA colleagues what conditions they thought would have to be fulfilled before a change of heart by the USA government officials concerned could be expected, their reply was, it had been hinted to them from highly placed sources, that the USA would have to reconsider its position if many representative countries showed a willingness to subscribe hard cash for some version of the SUNFED idea.

9. This analysis explains the suggestion which our USA colleagues have made that the Secretary General might circulate an additional request to member governments on the type and extent of the financial support which they would be willing to give a special fund (see paragraphs 7 and 8 of our telegram under reference). Our informant thought that it would be possible for a change of heart to take place within the USA Administration if it was confronted with a situation in which many of its allies and friends were prepared to meet commitments to support a special fund. Of course this type of argument has been made by USA officials in the past. It appears to reflect a willingness which Washington has shown in the past to treat ideas with much greater respect if other countries are prepared to support them financially.

10. In this connection our USA colleagues have recently repeated what we had heard from Paul Hoffman and others that the USA was considering the possibility of substantially increasing its contribution to the expanded programme of technical assistance in order to implement some of the ideas in the "new look" paper.

11. We thought you might like to have this info in considering the draft resolution contained in our telegram under reference.

12. Incidentally, the AF 49-Asian group has now submitted a resolution contained in Document A/C.2/L 300 of January 14 which follows the pattern mentioned in our paragraph 1 of our telegram 136.

SUNFED

For the reasons given in your instructions, we cannot support the draft resolutions prepared by the Latin American group and the Arab-Asian group. We find it difficult to understand what these countries hope to accomplish by submitting at this time a resolution requesting the preparation of a draft statute for the proposed special fund. If the resolution is adopted, the U.S., the U.K., Australia and New Zealand (in other words, the main and some of the main potential contributors) would refuse to participate in the exercise at all. It is very doubtful whether we would be prepared to participate since we consider that such an exercise without the U.S. would be not only futile but dangerous. We are wondering whether the intention of the Latin-American and Asian groups in introducing their resolutions is, as you have intimated earlier, to place the U.S. in a position where it is forced to declare, without qualification, its unwillingness to support or participate in SUNFED and thus result effectively in postponing indefinitely further consideration of SUNFED. We are unable to judge whether they are resorting to a kind of blackmail or are genuinely losing interest in SUNFED. In any event, it is difficult to see how we can play any useful role as mediator.

2. With regard to the suggestion made by the U.K. and the U.S. for a statement of the contributions which governments would be willing to make to the fund we think that a request by the U.N. would be pointless and uncalled for. It would almost seem that the U.S. and U.K. attitudes are motivated by petulance or a desire to provoke a show-down. If this is so, it is again unclear how Canada could play a role as mediator. You are aware of our position on pledging a contribution before assurance of a U.S. contribution and knowledge of its probable size.

3. Our direct interest in SUNFED is not sufficient to warrant vigorous efforts on our part to keeping the idea of SUNFED alive if the main potential donor and receiving countries are prepared to have it shelved. We do not, on the other hand, welcome the prospect of a showdown on SUNFED at this session which would divide the Assembly into the haves and the have-nots, with the Soviet Union standing untouched on the sidelines.

4. You are in the best position to decide to what extent you can play a useful role as mediator in the present situation at the Assembly. You may consider it would be useful to point out to some of the underdeveloped countries that it may be too early to assume that the U.S. position on SUNFED is rigid and that yet a little more patience would be in their own interest. You might advise the U.S. delegation that a showdown on SUNFED at the present Assembly would benefit no one except the Soviet Union and should be avoided if at all possible. If you find that there remains some prospect for compromise your best tactic would seem to be the one that you have adopted i.e., broadening the role of the Ad Hoc Committee. In connection with the draft resolution which you have prepared, we have the following comment to make: (a) the preamble and first operative paragraphs are satisfactory; (b) with regard to the second operative paragraph, we doubt very much whether it will be possible to prepare on the basis of the replies submitted one general pattern for the proposed special fund. Indeed, we question whether it is desirable. The replies reveal some basic differences and their reconciliation would prove difficult and require a considerable amount of negotiation. We do not think that the Ad Hoc Committee should be the forum for such negotiations at this stage. Nor do we think that any mention of the work of the Committee as constituting a basis for a future draft statute should be made. This would imply an intention to draw up statutes and would lessen freedom in negotiating the statutes. As an alternative to your paragraph 2, we suggest a paragraph which would request the Committee to (i) prepare a paper showing the alternative general patterns for the proposed fund which emerge from the replies to the questionnaire; (ii) list the main points of differences between these alternative patterns; (iii) and in so far as possible, list the advantages and disadvantages of each of the alternatives.

SUNFED

On January 18 the USA delegation in the Second Committee comprising Paul Hoffman, Stibravy, and Finger met Senator Croll, Pollock, Miss Bowlby, and Hadwen for a further discussion of SUNFED.

2. Mr. Hoffman has obviously been campaigning vigorously in Washington for some modifications of the USA position on UN economic aid programmes. We gather that there had been a recent meeting to which Lodge, Humphrey of the Treasury and Dulles had been present, at which Hoffman had urged the need for a change.

3. As Stibravy said, the problem is primarily psychological. The word SUNFED in USA government circles means a woolly type of UN organization for which the USA would put almost all the money to be used as the underdeveloped countries saw fit for possibly wasteful projects. Washington also fears that once a SUNFED were established, the USA would be committed to contributions in perpetuity.

4. Senator Croll commented that the USA was not the only country that had a position on SUNFED based at least partly on emotional considerations, many of the underdeveloped countries were so firmly committed to the SUNFED dream without any very clear-cut idea of what the dream involved that they would not easily abandon their long held positions.

5. Hoffman described the basis upon which the USA delegation in New York was endeavouring to promote a change in the present USA position. Officially no such change, he said had yet taken place, but he felt that some progress had been made since Washington had at least agreed to listen to new ideas. Hoffman had secured approval from Washington to make the type of approach which he was making to us. The USA delegation was having individual meetings with all the Western European countries (with the exception of Spain and Portugal) and also with Australia, NZ and Japan.

6. Hoffman was now suggesting to Washington that a modest UN capital aid fund could provide the means of stimulating much greater total expenditures on economic development. The UN could accomplish some desirable objectives even better than a bilateral USA programme. Hoffman did not minimize the difficulties which such a fund would face including serious political pressures which would hamper its operations, but appears to have concluded that the advantages of a UN fund as part of the machinery for economic aid would outweigh the difficulties. Hoffman considers that the possibility of establishing a UN capital aid fund would be encouraged if the idea could first be tried out on an experimental basis. Congress might also be more receptive if it could be demonstrated that the proposed fund would contain appropriate safeguards against abuse and to ensure that funds provided be used efficiently. The objectives of any UN capital aid fund would be the same as the SUNFED about which there had been so much discussion, but some way would have to be found of presenting the proposal in a fresh context.

7. Hoffman feels that he has broken the absolute hostility in Washington to the establishment of a UN capital aid fund and that it was not impossible for the USA eventually to make a contribution.

8. The USA delegation believes, however, that there is no chance of any action in Washington with regard to SUNFED before the end of this General Assembly and would welcome any proposal which we might put forward along the lines of that discussed in paragraph 4 of your tel under reference. This would be one way of avoiding a showdown between the developed and the underdeveloped countries in which the USSR would be the only winner. The USA position for the purposes of the present Assembly remains as before and therefore flatly opposed to participation in any statute drafting exercise. The USA delegation believes that to force a vote on the drafting of statutes at the present time might well produce an absolute rigidity in Washington and endanger any progress which might be made by the USA delegation in New York and the various committees investigating economic aid programmes towards support for some part of US economic aid funds being used for multilateral assistance through the UN.

9. Hoffman has apparently finished one round of discussions in Washington and will shortly embark on a second. During his first round and at the meeting mentioned earlier in this message Humphrey of the Treasury has said that he understood that the USA would be the only major contributor to a proposed UN fund. Lodge and Hoffman had protested this statement and cited Canada as one of the countries which might be willing to contribute if the USA contributed and if the proposed fund organization appeared to be effective. Humphrey had replied that he understood Canada would not repeat not contribute. This was one of the reasons for which Hoffman had arranged a meeting with us.

10. We suggested that Mr. Humphrey appeared to have been misinformed and that our position was very much that which had been described by Messrs. Lodge and Hoffman. In fact, Pollock went on to say that when the Canadian reply to a SUNFED questionnaire had been drafted and approved by Cabinet, his department had supported the document with the clear realization that provided the conditions set out in that document were met (in particular those regarding broad support and satisfactory organization) Canada would eventually be asked to consider a contribution to SUNFED from the resources which it could make available for international economic development assistance. Hoffman asked whether on a preliminary and informal basis we could give him some rough quantitative figure of the amount of help which Canada might be able to give to a UN capital development fund in which the USA participated. The USA for its part, and for purposes of asking this question was prepared to suggest that a USA contribution of about 40 percent of the total subscription might be appropriate. The UK, which had already been approached in the same manner as our delegation, had appeared sympathetic to the USA suggestions, but might find it difficult to give any specific answer in the light of their current economic difficulties. The UK government had instructed that no additional UN financial commitments should be made by its delegation. The Netherlands delegation, which has also been approached in the same vein, has stated that its contribution would be based on the percentage contribution which the Netherlands makes to the International Bank and the expanded programme of technical assistance.

11. Hoffman then gave us the following notes entitled "Broad Lines of an Experimental UN Multilateral Development Fund", which run as follows: "1. A fund for basic capital development such as dams, roads, agriculture improvement, etc. 2. Weighted voting along the lines used in the IBRD. 3. Coordination with IBRD, IFC and UNTAB to assure no overlapping, make possible integration of projects and avoid financing projects that could be financed by existing agencies. 4. Sufficient degree of convertibility to assure the multi-lateral nature of the programme. 5. Provision for denying aid to countries which UN has ruled to be in serious violation of international standards of behaviour."

12. This was the basis on which his delegation was discussing possible USA participation. We did not volunteer any substantive comments ourselves on this outline beyond suggesting that the first four points were ones which you had taken into consideration in preparing our own reply to the Ad Hoc Committee's questionnaire on SUNFED. They were the kind of principles which we were willing to consider. The fifth provision we suggested would be particularly difficult to spell out in a statute and will involve comparison for example, between the international standards of behaviour as viewed by the UN in such different cases as the South African race relations issue and the aggression of Communist China in North Korea. Presumably, however, assistance would be made available through any proposed UN fund in line with current UN practice to "members of the UN and of its specialized agencies". We would gather that the fifth provision has been very hurriedly drafted without much consideration being given to its general political significance. Doubtless, however, the USA would expect some type of assurance concerning the political conditions on which contributions were made to the fund and assistance provided by the fund, similar to those which we now have for the expanded programme of technical assistance.

13. The USA delegation realized that considerations of parliamentary procedure and financial accountability would make formal decisions concerning a possible scale of contributions difficult for governments, even on the very broad lines for a UN fund set out in their five points. Hoffman does however hope that the Canadian authorities could give an estimate of the general size and conditions of a possible Canadian contribution which might be recommended to ministers for a UN fund. We noted that in the past our practice had been to relate the size of our contribution in one way or other to that which was made by the USA and other major contributors. We also noted that in reaching such decisions, Canada has in the past also weighed the general political factors both national and international involved in deciding on the appropriate burden it could assume in international financial undertakings and the benefits to Canadian interests.

14. On this understanding, we agreed to ask you for as early an estimate as possible on the nature, size and conditions of a Canadian contribution to a UN capital aid fund based on the premises which the USA has roughly drafted. We intend, when your comments are received, to refer again to the Canadian reply to the SUNFED questionnaire and to suggest that the various statements which Canadian representatives had made on this subject be drawn to Mr. Humphrey's attention. In general, we believe that the USA delegation is endeavouring with some success to produce a change in the USA position on SUNFED. We believe that this approach should be encouraged and we hope you will be able to provide us with a statement of the Canadian position in the near future.

15. In the meantime, it is unfortunate that we must approach the current SUNFED debate which may well begin by the middle of next week without any way of publicly holding out hope for a change in the USA position. We are, however, encouraged by this recent development to proceed with the drafting of a compromise resolution along the lines of the commentary and your telegram E83 of January 17 and hope to be able to join with other delegations, including the USA delegation in persuading underdeveloped countries that it is in their own interest to avoid a final clash on SUNFED at this session.

SUNFED

The following countries were represented at the meeting anticipated in paragraph 4 of our telegram under reference which was called by the USA delegation: Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, NZ, Japan, Belgium, Netherlands, Switzerland, Italy, France and the UK (Australia was asked but was unable to be present).

2. Hoffman, referring to his general approach to this subject with which you are familiar, began the meeting by emphasizing that it had been called largely on his own personal responsibility. He drew attention to the backing which his ideas have had from Lodge. Hoffman mentioned, however, the concern which Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey has expressed recently at the size of the USA budget. When the USA referred to the necessity for a reduction in defence expenditure before any fresh international economic aid commitments were accepted, this was not Hoffman said, "mere conversation". Hoffman himself had nevertheless become convinced of the possible value of a multilateral economic aid fund under the UN.

3. Hoffman mentioned the difficulties which he and Lodge have faced in Washington in answering the question "what countries besides the USA would contribute to a UN capital aid fund"? We do not need to repeat Hoffman's supporting argument which was similar to that which he had used at the informal meeting reported in our telegram 270 of January 19. Hoffman did, however, emphasize the dangers involved in establishing a UN capital aid fund. It was possible he suggested that an unsuccessful attempt to administer such a fund would have disruptive rather than helpful consequences for the UN.

5. After describing the conditions on which the USA would insist before participating in a UN fund, Hoffman expressed the hope, as a basis for discussion, of an eventual USA contribution of 40 to 50 percent of the total received from all governments. He suggested that an experimental fund might be set up with $100 million. He seemed less confident at this meeting than on earlier occasions, and even referred to an early change in the USA government's position as "unlikely".

6. The French delegation then put forward its solution to the SUNFED deadlock at this session. (Hoffman had emphasized that the USA would remain strongly opposed to any statute drafting exercise and that no change in the USA position would in any case be possible before the end of the 11th General Assembly). The French delegation was considering the possibility that the Secretary General together with the regional economic commissions might be asked to prepare a draft programme of projects which SUNFED might undertake. He anticipated Secretariat examination of these projects together with a study by the Ad Hoc Committee on SUNFED of the type of assistance required to meet these projects.

7. Hoffman replied that he thought there had been too much confused thinking about SUNFED and that even if there was only a little money to distribute discussion of UN capital aid might cease to be theoretical. Like ourselves the USA is, of course, opposed to any survey of needs or any preparation of projects in advance of a general decision to make additional economic aid funds available.

8. The Netherlands delegation was grateful to the USA delegation for its initiative and viewed it "positively". However, the Netherlands was committed to the present SUNFED concept and would find it difficult "to shift" and believed that whatever was done would have to be acceptable to the receiving countries. The Netherlands was in general agreement with the draft USA basic principles (which a USA representative admitted were not "tactful") but thought that there would be some difficulty about weighted voting and considered that $200 to $250 million would be required even for an experimental exercise. Mr. Hoffman commented that he thought it would be difficult to raise $100 million, and that it was most unlikely that a USA contribution of more than $50 million could be anticipated. He expressed the hope for a more definite response from Netherlands.

9. The UK delegate referred with some asperity to the difficulties of other countries in adjusting to rapid changes of USA policy and said he hoped the same situation as that which had arisen concerning the IFC would not occur again. The UK hoped that if the USA did decide to make a contribution it would do so on definite conditions and that if these conditions were not implemented would withdraw.

10. The Belgian representative thought that a new capital aid fund need not necessarily be entirely within the UN framework. He foresaw difficulties however, if it were to be established on a limited basis. This limitation would have to be functional or regional which could create serious difficulties for the underdeveloped countries. He thought that whether the fund started with $100 million or $250 million it would still be an experiment with the probability that governments would find themselves committed for the future whether the experiment was successful or not. He also asked how the fund could be replenished.

11. In reply Hoffman referred to the early estimates of $29 billion as needed from the USA for the Marshall Plan and of the eventual contribution of $13 billion. He also referred to the multiplier effect which even the relatively small UN fund could have in promoting local expenditure on economic development.

12. The German representative spoke on the respect in which Mr. Hoffman was held in Germany and said that he would recommend a response from the government of the Federal Republic of Germany in the hope that new forms of UN economic aid activity would result. He referred to the possibility of duplication between any proposed fund and existing agencies to which the USA delegation replied that a number of agencies could frequently participate usefully in large projects.

13. The Italian representative thought that if an experiment were successful contributors would be expected to participate indefinitely, and if the experiment were a failure it would be said that this had been caused by too modest a beginning. In reply Hoffman referred to the success of the UN technical assistance programmes and also to the fact that governments were unlikely ever to channel any major part of their economic aid resources through the UN. He suggested that even if the project were a success not more than $300 or $400 million would be available for use through UN channels.

14. As the meeting ended Senator Croll complimented Mr. Hoffman on his Marshall Plan record and remarked that there were even greater difficulties facing UN capital aid programmes to the underdeveloped countries than those which had been encountered in providing assistance to Western Europe. Senator Croll said that Mr. Hoffman's proposal would be referred to the Canadian government for consideration.

15. The USA delegation tells us that Hoffman's earlier ideas for a Marshall Plan approach to UN programmes of assistance to underdeveloped countries have been "placed in cold storage" in Washington. Neither Hoffman nor his staff are optimistic about their chances for securing a change in USA policy on the basis of this most recent approach but hope that their efforts together with the recommendations of the various USA committees now discussing USA economy aid generally will at least cause a reassessment of the USA position. We are sending by bag copies of the speech which Hoffman made in the Second Committee on January 30 which certainly did not suggest any early change in USA policies.

SUNFED

Our immediately following telegram† contains the text of an Afro-Asian, Latin American thirty-nine sponsor joint resolution [A/C.2/L.315] which replaces the two separate resolutions contained in documents A/C.2/L.296 and L.300. You will note that the Ad Hoc Committee would be asked to prepare a draft statute and also to consider further steps for the early commencement of the operations of SUNFED.

2. In his statement on January 30, copies by bag, Hoffman, after referring to current world tensions, stated that "The USA is not prepared to assume a long term commitment to make resources available to a new global development fund". He continued "The USA delegation has consistently taken a position that to attempt, at the present time, to define the organization of such a fund in any precise manner is premature. In our view the time to undertake this task will have arrived when the creation of an international development fund becomes a practical possibility". Hoffman referred to the likelihood of disillusionment if an attempt were made to draft statutes and said that his delegation would vote against the resolutions in documents L.296 and L.300 and we are told the new joint text. Moreover, he added "under existing circumstances the USA will not be able to participate in drafting the statutes of the proposed fund should this resolution be adopted". The phrase "under existing circumstances" was added at the last minute at the urging of the State Department which feared that a completely unqualified statement implying the intention of the USA to withdraw from the Ad Hoc Committee if that body were asked to draft statutes was not desirable.

3. Hoffman went on to say, however, that "we are prepared to give the closest consideration to any suggestions which delegations may have regarding the possibility of additional preparatory work by the Ad Hoc Committee". Hoffman concluded by stressing the important assistance being made available to the economic development of the underdeveloped countries both inside and outside the UN, and stated "for our part we shall continue to give this the very high priority which it deserves and we shall continue our search for new and possibly more effective ways appropriate to existing circumstances of assisting underdeveloped countries in the future".

4. Also, on January 30 the French delegation, in a surprise move, announced its support for the drafting of statutes and went on to make what many delegates took as a pledge of the equivalent of fifteen million dollars for SUNFED, calculated apparently on the basis of France's UN assessment. After the meeting we asked our French colleagues for clarification of this offer and will forward to you copies of the French statement when it is available. In the meantime we were told that this statement had been made with full Paris clearance and without, evidently, any prior discussion with the USA or the UK. The French delegation appears, therefore, to have committed itself to the position of the underdeveloped countries on this issue. It is possible that this decision is related to the approaching debate on Algeria. Our Netherlands colleague asked the French delegation whether the French contribution would still be forthcoming if the proposed SUNFED attached special priority to the implementation of projects in Egypt and was given a Gallic shrug as an answer. This action which follows assurances in the past that France would not participate in a statute drafting exercise without the USA and UK will certainly make it difficult to hold the line on statutes.

5. The USSR delegate on January 31, approved an Indian suggestion that the fund could begin with as little as one hundred million dollars, supported the establishment of the fund "at once" and thought contributions should be made in cash or in equipment.

6. We are preparing a brief contribution to this debate which may end on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week. Our intervention would consist largely of a paraphrase of the opening paragraphs of the Canadian reply to the Ad Hoc questionnaire on SUNFED and of the paragraphs in the instructions together with an argument on general grounds against the desirability of drafting statutes now.

7. A number of other delegations including Mexico, Denmark, Argentina, Japan, Brazil, Ireland, Italy and Turkey have suggested enlarging the terms of reference of the Ad Hoc Committee as an alternative to the drafting of statutes and under present circumstances we are happy for the time being to let other delegation take the initiative on the basis of the text we have prepared.

8. We redrafted our tentative compromise resolution as suggested in your E83 of January 17 and gave copies ten days ago to the USA and UK delegations only with a request for comments. The UK has told us that they will be largely guided by the USA in this matter and that our draft presented no real difficulty. The USA has suggested two minor amendments with which Washington believes the draft would have "possibilities". The first is to omit the reference in operative paragraph one to "including some of the major potential contributors". The argument is that this language would "point the finger". Secondly the USA suggests omitting item three of operative paragraph two and expanding item two to read "the main points of difference between these alternative patterns and the implications of these differences". Our original language, it is suggested, would require representatives on the Ad Hoc Committee to favour some of the various alternatives. After consultation we accepted these amendments and have shown our draft to our Danish colleague who had expressed a willingness to put something like it forward. We will probably encourage our Danish colleague to act as the sponsor of a draft resolution, which might be submitted early next week. Some members of the Afro-Asian group and the Latin American group are already beginning to have second thoughts about a statute drafting exercise without the USA and UK and in due course the voices of moderation may increase in number and volume. There is however some impatience on economic aid subjects at this session of the General Assembly as a consequence of the difficult political debates, and until now a majority of the underdeveloped countries seem willing to face a showdown on this issue.

9. It is difficult to anticipate exactly the type of resolution which will emerge from these discussions. It is probable, however, that we will eventually have to vote on language which in one way or another calls for the drafting of statutes. We are, of course, quite clear from your telegram E83 of January 17 and from the commentary that we cannot support a resolution to this effect. Conditions may change somewhat before the Committee takes up resolutions but we believe that only the USA, the UK and Australia would definitely vote against a resolution calling for the drafting of statutes. Belgium, Italy, Ireland and perhaps NZ would probably abstain. The present NZ position is that while NZ considers that it would be a mistake to draft statutes, the underdeveloped countries would doubtless take a decision to do so on the basis of what they consider to be their own interests. If they decided to draft statutes and if no other alternative draft resolution is available NZ would abstain. There might also be some abstentions from the Scandinavians but there would be a certain Afro-Asian, Latin American, Communist and European majority.

10. Perhaps a vote of this kind can be avoided. We are certainly doing our part to prevent it but we may need your instructions on short notice. Although in the past our position has been more forthcoming than the USA we would, in the light of recent developments, propose to vote with that delegation on this item unless we hear from you to the contrary or unless there are changes of position particularly by the UK and Australia, in which case we would contemplate the desirability of abstaining rather than join the USA in an isolated stand. Abstention would be difficult to justify, however, when there are such strong general grounds for opposing the drafting of statutes particularly if the USA and UK do not participate. As we propose to say in our statement it would be difficult to prepare any useful statutes at all when there has been no agreement as yet concerning the principles on which statutes would have to be based.

11. We have also been asked informally whether Canada would withdraw from the Ad Hoc Committee if the USA and the UK withdrew. We have replied that we would hope this situation would not arise and were prepared to cooperate in preventing it. We have said that we would regard USA participation in any proposed UN capital aid fund as essential. We have also said that you have not commented on this hypothetical question and that we believe you would prefer not to do so in the present situation.

In your telegram under reference you asked for information concerning the nature size and conditions of a possible Canadian contribution to a United Nations capital aid fund which could be given to Hoffman of the US delegation. We take it from your messages concerning your conversation with Hoffman that he wishes to have this information in order to back up his efforts to persuade the authorities in Washington to adopt a more sympathetic attitude toward the SUNFED proposals and in particular to counter the arguments advanced by the US Treasury that the United States would be the only substantial contributor to the fund.

2. You will appreciate that particularly in the light of the present US position it is not possible for us to foresee or speculate on the nature of a decision concerning a Canadian contribution to a United Nations capital aid fund which Cabinet may decide to take. We also consider that the time and circumstances are not opportune for asking Cabinet to give further consideration to the question of Canadian support for the fund. In the circumstances we consider you should reply to Mr. Hoffman by referring to the opening paragraphs of the Canadian reply to the SUNFED questionnaire, and in particular the paragraphs which read as follows:

"The Canadian government has in the past supported a special fund in principle but has opposed its immediate establishment. The Canadian government's final decision regarding a fund of the type now under consideration would depend in large measure on whether it was satisfied that the organizational and administrative arrangements were such as to lead to efficient operation and that the fund would command sufficient support to enable it to operate effectively.

"In replying to the present questionnaire the Canadian government has attempted merely to set out certain principles which in its opinion should be taken into account if a special fund is established and in preparatory work which is undertaken working towards the eventual establishment of a fund."

3. You should then go on to say to Hoffman that the time is not ripe for formal consideration of a contribution to SUNFED and that consideration could not be expected to be given to this matter for the next 6 or 8 months. If however the United States were to announce its willingness to participate in a multilateral fund for the financing of economic development, Canada would consider within the time limits mentioned above the desirability of making a contribution.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON SUNFED

This telegram contains the text of a compromise resolution on SUNFED which has been negotiated by the underdeveloped countries with the USA and other delegations and which may come to a vote this afternoon (February 20) but will certainly be considered on February 21. The USA accepts this present text as do other Western delegations and we propose to vote for it. We have discussed the instructions to the Ad Hoc Committee which it contains with the Secretariat and believe that useful consideration of the SUNFED proposal could take place on the lines suggested.

2. It is proposed that the Ad Hoc Committee on SUNFED meet immediately after the conclusion of the General Assembly to decide on a programme of work, assuming that this resolution is passed.⁶⁶ The Committee would then recess perhaps until after the 23rd Session of ECOSOC to allow the Secretariat to prepare appropriate drafts.

3. The text which follows is still to be submitted to the entire group of 39 sponsors of the "statute" resolution. If this group does not accept the compromise text we will be back where we were before. We expect, however, now that the process of negotiating towards a compromise text has begun, that in the final analysis a resolution acceptable to both the USA and ourselves, and the less developed countries, will emerge. Text begins: Economic Development of Underdeveloped Countries: Question of the Establishment of a Special UN Fund for Economic Development. Draft resolution.

The General Assembly, Convinced that an expanded flow of capital to underdeveloped countries, by contributing toward the growth of their economies, would serve the cause of peace and help toward the attainment of greater prosperity in all countries, Mindful of the growing desire for increased action by the UN in the field of financing economic development, especially for the financing of nonself-liquidating projects, Recalling that the establishment of such a special fund has been under close study by the General Assembly for a number of years, starting with its Resolution 520(vi) and that various special committees and experts have submitted their views on the question, Having examined the interim report submitted to the twenty-second Session of the Economic and Social Council by the Ad Hoc Committee set up by the General Assembly in pursuance of its Resolution 923(x), Taking note of Resolution 619 A(xxii) of the Economic and Social Council which expressed the hope that, at its Eleventh Session, the General Assembly will consider what further steps may help to promote the early establishment of a special fund for economic development, Noting the strong views expressed by many member states that the establishment of a special fund should not be further delayed, Recognizing, however, that a number of other States, have stipulated certain conditions which must be met before they could be prepared to participate in such a fund,

⁶⁶ Note marginale :Marginal note:

Hudon is consulting Plumptre. [W.F. Stone]

1. Commends the Ad Hoc Committee for the work it has accomplished in preparing the interim report;
2. Renews the hope expressed in Resolution 822(ix) that a special UN fund for economic development be established as soon as practicable;
3. Requests the Ad Hoc Committee, on the basis of the views expressed by governments in their replies to the questionnaire annexed to Resolution 923(x), the previous resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Economic and Social Council relating to the establishment of a special fund, the reports of previous special committees and groups of experts, and the suggestions made during the Twenty-second Session of the Economic and Social Council and the Eleventh Session of the General Assembly; (a) to set forth the different forms of legal framework on which a fund may be established; (b) to indicate the types of projects which might be financed by a UN economic development fund; (c) to submit to the Twenty-fourth Session of the Economic and Social Council, along with the final report requested by the General Assembly in its Resolution 923(x), a supplementary report prepared in accordance with instructions (a) and (b) above;
4. Authorizes the Ad Hoc Committee, for the purposes outlined in para 3, to invite governments which have submitted views to the Ad Hoc Committee, to reappraise these views in the light of the comments submitted by other governments where such reappraisal might assist towards reducing the number of alternative patterns that the Ad Hoc Committee would need to take into account in its supplementary report;
5. Further authorizes the Ad Hoc Committee to append to its final report any related suggestion or proposals for the provision of economic assistance to underdeveloped countries under the auspices of the UN which governments may wish to put forward;
6. Requests the Economic and Social Council to forward to the Twelfth Session of the General Assembly the final and supplementary reports of the Ad Hoc Committee, together with any recommendations on further steps which could help promote the early establishment of an international economic development fund within the framework of the UN;
7. Invites member governments and the Secretary General to provide the Ad Hoc Committee with all necessary assistance.⁶⁷

⁶⁷ Note marginale /Marginal note:

I told Hadwen it was agreed here that a resolution of this kind, supported by the U.S., could be supported.

It seems that the Ad hoc committee will not be reporting to the 23rd Session of ECOSOC next April, but to the 24th session in July. The SUNFED item may therefore come off the agenda of the 23rd session. W.F. S[tone]

AD HOC COMMITTEE ON SUNFED

In a welter of political confusion created by a series of uninformed Soviet reservations to the report, the Ad Hoc Committee on SUNFED at long last completed its work on Wednesday, May 22. We are forwarding to Ottawa two copies of the minutes of the thirty three meetings of the Committee which were held beginning March 11/57 and May 22, together with copies of the sections of the supplement to the final report which will now be edited for presentation to the 24th Session of ECOSOC and the Twelfth General Assembly. The edited version is expected within a week and will contain, in addition to a few substantive changes in the introduction, a long footnote in which the Soviet and other delegations reserved their positions on some of the views (for example on membership) analyzed in the report. Together with our USA, UK and French colleagues we prepared some additional sentences for this footnote emphasizing that the Committee was not asked or expected by the General Assembly to comment on the substance of views expressed by governments or experts.

2. Although Mr. Plumptre, Mr. Hudon and Mr. Stone are familiar with the way in which this Committee has been working we consider it desirable to emphasize the length, frequency and intensity of the meetings which have been held. The political pressures in the UN concerning SUNFED are so great that every word in the final report was, as the minutes will show, disputed at length. Some delegations endeavoured to make the Committee's work closer to something in the nature of a statute-drafting exercise but as the report also shows they were prevented from so doing.

3. It seems clear that UN consideration of the SUNFED proposal has reached a point of no return if its flight is continued along the routes established by previous ECOSOC and General Assembly sessions. The SUNFED concept, considered as a large-scale general purpose economic development fund directly under the auspices of the UN, has been analyzed to a faretheewell. No delegation with whom we have spoken can envisage any further resolution in ECOSOC or the General Assembly calling for continued study of SUNFED. There may be those who consider that this latest report by the Ad Hoc Committee serves no useful purpose. We believe, however, that in the light of the effort which has been put into the current text (for which the USA delegation deserves a major part of the credit), the work of the Committee has been useful. It will be possible to document the argument of those delegations which believe that without USA and UK support, (and there appears to be no possibility of a change in USA and UK views), a SUNFED of the kind discussed in this document is not practicable.

4. In preparation for the 24th Session of ECOSOC it will be necessary to consider in what terms this report is to be discussed. It will certainly not be possible for a resolution which merely "takes note". It seems almost certain in the light of the participation by the Egyptian and USSR representatives in the Committee that either one of these delegations will propose a resolution calling the drafting of statutes for SUNFED. Such a resolution would certainly be opposed by the USA the UK and by ourselves. The history of the International Commodity Trade Commission has, however, served to demonstrate to a number of delegations, particularly those from Latin America, that UN bodies without the USA and the UK cannot be expected to function successfully. It will be difficult, however, for many under-developed countries to refrain from supporting a proposal to draft statutes for SUNFED, a dream to which they have been so firmly committed for so long. In this situation any reasonable alternative will be generally welcomed.

5. Because of the volume of the discussions held in the Ad Hoc Committee we do not propose to prepare a detailed analysis of the background to the documents which the Committee has produced. However we would be glad to do so on any particular point if you wished. The report does not necessarily have much meaning except as the basis for drafting the statute of a SUNFED. We do not anticipate that in present circumstances Canada would be interested in such an exercise.

Editorial Note

La délégation canadienne n'a pas rédigé son évaluation ordinaire de la 11^e Assemblée générale. À l'interne, le ministère des Affaires extérieures s'est servi du Chapitre 1 (Examen général) de sa publication annuelle Le Canada et les Nations Unies, 1956-1957, Ottawa : Imprimeur de la Reine, 1957, pp. 1-5. Le commentaire suivant sur le rôle des Nations Unies, rédigé par John Holmes, présente une réflexion franche sur les travaux au cours de l'Assemblée et leur signification au sens large. (Il est possible que ce document ait été révisé le 18 mars avec les commentaires de Pearson, mais on a trouvé qu'une petite partie de ce texte.)

Bien que le document de Holmes semble avoir été préparé à l'origine pour alimenter des discussions au ministère, il a été terminé juste au moment où Robertson faisait parvenir de Londres son troublant télégramme concernant la préoccupation croissante des Britanniques à l'égard des Nations Unies. Par conséquent, les travaux de Holmes et les télégrammes en provenance de Londres et de New York ont constitué la base d'un document préparatoire sur les Nations Unies que Saint-Laurent a apporté avec lui aux Bermudes en vue de sa rencontre avec Macmillan, en mars 1957. Ces quatre documents, qui reflètent assez justement le point de vue du Canada vis-à-vis des Nations Unies au milieu des années 1950, sont reproduits ci-dessous. Le rapport de la rencontre de Saint-Laurent avec Macmillan est reproduit au Chapitre 4.

The Canadian Delegation did not prepare its regular assessment of the 11th General Assembly. For its own internal use, the Department of External Affairs relied on Chapter 1 (General Survey) from its annual publication Canada and the United Nations, 1956-57, Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1957, pp. 1-4. The following comment on the "Role of the United Nations," which was drafted by John Holmes, contains a frank reflection on developments during the Assembly and their broader significance. (This paper may have been revised on March 18 with contributions from Pearson but only a very short fragment of that text was located.)

Though Holmes' paper appears to have been prepared primarily to generate intra-departmental discussion, it was completed just as Robertson sent his own disturbing telegram to Ottawa from London on growing British concern about the UN. Consequently, Holmes' work and the telegrams from London and New York became the basis of a briefing paper on the UN that St. Laurent took to Bermuda for his March 1957 meeting with Macmillan. These four documents, which reflect fairly fully Canada's view of the United Nations in the mid-1950s, are reprinted below. A report on St. Laurent's visit with Macmillan is reprinted in Chapter 4.

THE ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS

So many questions have been raised of late as to the value of the United Nations that it is necessary to consider the work of the Eleventh Session of the Assembly in the light of these criticisms. The criticism of the United Nations comes, for the most part, from Europeans, but is widely echoed in Canada. The core of the criticism is the belief that the United Nations is increasingly dominated by a majority of African and Asian countries allied from time to time with the Soviet bloc and Latin America, which is irresponsible in its attitude to international relations, dominated by an irrational hatred of Western countries, and unwilling to pay for the wide-ranging economic measures which it sponsors. It is said that this situation is growing continually more acute, that the crisis was accentuated by the admission of a large number of new members (for which Canada was largely responsible) and that, because of the expected admission of new members from the formerly dependent territories, it will soon be entirely out of hand.

If the situation in the United Nations is as described, then a good case can be made for abandoning it as an instrument of international policy. That there is a considerable element of truth in the charges could hardly be denied. It is important, however, to determine whether this charge is absolutely or only relatively true. In the United Kingdom, to some extent, and in France, to a much greater extent, there are those who believe that this charge is absolutely true and that the only sensible policy is to resign from or boycott the United Nations or ignore it on all important issues. On the other hand, if one considered that these charges are only relatively true, the answer is presumably to try to avert these tendencies by reforming the United Nations Charter or its practices, or by revising national policies and tactics to suit new situations. The reason that it is vitally important to determine the seriousness of the disease is that the logical policy to pursue as a result of the first diagnosis is the one best calculated to make any reform or revision impossible. To be more specific, the policies being advocated and the tactics to some extent practised by the French and to a lesser extent by the British and some other European states in the past Assembly, are those which widen the breaches, intensify the bitterness and solidify a majority antagonistic to the best interests of the West. If the United Nations is to be abandoned, then this doesn't matter. If it is not, then we and our allies must pursue policies which, without sacrificing essential interests, prevent the establishment of a malevolent majority as a more or less permanent feature of the United Nations.

The composition and the voting rules of the United Nations Assembly are certainly not ideal. It is easy enough to portray as absurd an arrangement by which Luxembourg, Laos and the United States have one vote each (and the Soviet Union has three). No government could be run democratically on such lines — although the U.S. Senate has comparable features. What matters, however, is not the theoretical possibilities but the use to which the votes are put in practice. As for the resolutions passed at the Eleventh Session there were many which were futile, some that were silly, and some that were unfair, but it would be hard to prove that any of them were dangerous or extreme. There were many extreme speeches and many irresponsible and malicious draft resolutions, but the resolutions which secured the requisite majority were almost invariably the product of compromise. The picture which has been built up of the Assembly ordering civilized powers to give up their territories or hand over their treasure is based more on an oral impression of the noise than a careful scrutiny of the proceedings. It arises also from an erroneous conception of the Charter and the powers of the Assembly. The Assembly is not a government, and it is less important, therefore, that its voting powers should be based on the same rules as those of a government.

It is undoubtedly embarrassing and to some extent harmful for countries to be censured by a majority vote or to be requested to take steps which they will not take, but one can easily exaggerate the damage that is done. It is regrettable, of course, that certain countries like South Africa, which may well deserve some censure, get more than their fair share of it while worse offenders escape. It is not true, however, that the Western powers are the only ones who suffer. There is a good deal of vigorous criticism of the Communist states, and Asian states have taken a good deal of blame over Kashmir, West New Guinea and certain issues of human rights. Nevertheless there certainly is an anti-colonialist bias which is unjust. For good reason, this rankles, but it should not be seen out of proportion.

A brief glance at the debates and decisions of the Assembly on a few outstanding items in the agenda of the last Assembly hardly seems to warrant a charge that the Assembly behaved dangerously or fanatically:

(1) Algeria

Next to the not unrelated matter of the invasion of Egypt, it is the Assembly's "interference" in Algeria which has driven the French to extreme conclusions on the role of the United Nations. This year, however, the Assembly produced a mild, if not banal, resolution on Algeria, which the French accepted and which was approved by all members except the Soviet bloc which abstained. The French very wisely altered their previous tactics and tried to come to terms with the Assembly by sitting in on the debate and participating with moderate and reasonable statements, in which they were able to make their own case more widely known. As a result they heard, in addition to a certain amount of strong criticism of their policy, many tributes by Asian and African countries to the French contribution to civilization. Unfortunately, this sensible approach was almost vitiated by the intervention at the last moment of some "old school" tacticians on the French Delegation. These misguided operators frustrated the sincere efforts of certain Asian countries to produce a compromise resolution, irritated and embarrassed their friends, and forced a series of sharp procedural resolutions which produced, for almost the first time in the Assembly, a clear division between the white and non-white countries. The members of the French Delegation who engineered these manoeuvres, instead of regretting the nature of the vote, seemed inclined to enjoy the triumph. It was the Asian Delegations who expressed anguish at this division and worked hard to produce a compromise resolution which would patch over the wound. In the end this compromise was almost unanimously accepted in Plenary. While neither side was entirely happy, neither side was entirely unhappy with the results. The final resolution in fact served the best purpose which a U.N. Assembly can serve. It allowed members to blow off a certain amount of steam and eventually to compromise, thereby producing an atmosphere most conducive to fruitful negotiations between French and Algerians. The lesson, however, seems clear that the French served their own interests best when they were seeking to be cooperative with the Assembly rather than fighting against it. They have, after all, made in Morocco and Tunisia more drastic concessions than the Assembly even demanded of them when those countries were under discussion, and France has been strengthened rather than weakened thereby.

(2) Cyprus

The general satisfaction with the conclusion of the Algerian debate had its effect when Cyprus was subsequently discussed. The British, like the French, had agreed this year to put their case to the Assembly rather than deny its right to take any interest. The debate was far from one-sided and served in fact to expose the fallacy of some of the more extreme positions. Although the Greeks, the Turks and the British insisted that they could not accept any compromise, they were quite happy in the end to accept a harmless resolution produced by Krishna Menon who, in spite of his irritation at British policy over Kashmir in the Security Council, played a moderate and constructive role in this debate. It is interesting to note that at no time during this debate was any serious consideration given to ordering the British out of Cyprus, deciding on Enosis, or presuming to settle the Cyprus question. It is noteworthy also that on this issue as well as on that of Algeria, the Soviet Delegation took no very active part. They made their set speeches about imperialism, but they were not very active either in the Committee or behind the scenes, a negative position which may be attributed to their sensibility about precedents for United Nations intervention in Hungary.

(3) West New Guinea

On this other "colonial" issue, the results were somewhat different. A resolution supported by almost all the Asian and African countries as well as some South American countries and the Soviet bloc, secured a majority in Committee but did not secure the requisite two-thirds majority vote in Plenary and therefore lapsed. The reason there was no compromise resolution in this case, like those on Cyprus and Algeria, was that the African-Asian resolution was itself a mild one which simply asked the Dutch and Indonesians to negotiate. The Dutch spoke firmly but moderately and reasonably, and they undoubtedly profited in goodwill from this approach. The Australian intervention, on the other hand, was more provocative and raised more anti-colonial storm than did the Dutch themselves. No decision was taken by the Assembly and therefore no requirement was made of the Dutch to take any action at all. The intervention of the United Nations, therefore, did not, because of the provisions of the Charter, result in any interference with the rights of a Western country. It is doubtful, furthermore, whether the debate which took place fanned the flames of anti-colonialist nationalism any higher than they would be driven through the usual channels. It should not be assumed that these colonial issues would not exist if the United Nations did not.

(4) Disarmament

The debate on this subject ended in unanimous agreement on a purely procedural resolution after a somewhat routine discussion. While there is clearly not very much agreement among the Great Powers on the substance of this question, they do agree that although this subject must be considered within the framework of the United Nations, the Assembly is no place for serious discussion. The Russians started off with a propaganda attack, but they subsided quickly and stuck to an understanding reached with the Americans before the debate that there would be no examination of the substance of the subject and it would be referred again to the Sub-Committee. These annual exercises on disarmament cannot be said to advance the cause of disarmament very far, but they don't hinder its progress either and they do keep the subject warm. This year the Assembly proved a useful forum in which to push the Great Powers towards more serious consideration of limiting nuclear tests, a move we assisted. There is much to be said for the practical arrangement by which the responsible powers work on disarmament in private but are subject in the Assembly to pressure and approval by other nations.

(5) SUNFED

In the Economic Committee, the underdeveloped countries pressed very hard for the establishment of a United Nations fund for economic development in spite of the opposition of the United States, Canada and the other countries which would have to supply most of the funds. The division on this subject was not clear-cut as the underdeveloped countries were supported by such countries as the Netherlands and France. The pressure put on the wealthier countries over such issues in the Assembly may be considered irresponsible. They are certainly annoying. It is probably better, however, that this fundamental issue of economic aid should be debated in a U.N. body with everyone, including the Russians, forced to speak up than to simmer in press and propaganda. There is, of course, no question of any country having funds legislated out of it by an Assembly majority.

(6) Trusteeship Questions

The debate on trusteeship questions again showed the usual regrettable tendencies. Countries which cannot govern themselves criticize the British, French and other administering powers, and the Soviet bloc makes propaganda. This is very hard for conscientious administering powers to take, but it is questionable whether their real interests are affected. Along with the criticism there was also praise, more than usual. During the debate on British Togoland, the United Kingdom received warm praise from all quarters (including a fulsome speech by Krishna Menon) for its policy in West Africa. The French, for almost the first time, made a concession to United Nations sentiment by offering a considerable extension of self-government in French Togoland. Although this concession was criticized as not going far enough, it received a great deal wider support than the French have had in the past in this Committee. It was a concession, furthermore, which, it would seem to us, strengthens rather than weakens the French Union.

The above issues were, of course, not so important as the questions of Hungary and Egypt, which were on the extraordinary agenda. It is primarily for the handling of these issues that the United Nations has been accused of ineffectiveness and double standards of behaviour.

It is not possible yet to pass a final judgment on the actions of the United Nations over the Egyptian crisis. One can expect, however, a fundamental difference in approach to this question on the part of the British and French on the one hand and ourselves on the other. If one assumes that the invasion, if allowed to proceed, would have resulted in the overthrow of Nasser and his replacement by a well-disposed régime, the establishment of international control of the Suez Canal and progress towards a solution of the Palestine question, then one inevitably considers U.N. intervention a mistake and the act of the majority wrong. The Canadian view, however, (and undoubtedly the view of a large number of official and unofficial people in the United Kingdom) is that the invasion could accomplish none of these objects and the sooner it was stopped the better for all concerned, including in particular the British and the French themselves. To us, therefore, the United Nations intervention was a blessing. It could not have been performed by any other agency. Intervention by the other Great Powers on their own would have had disastrous results. Any effective action outside the United Nations would have required collaboration between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., but such collaboration was feasible and acceptable only when diluted within a U.N. majority. For this reason alone, therefore, we should consider the United Nations role to have been essential. Whatever happens now, one grave crisis was overcome by action which could only have taken place within the United Nations. Subsequent efforts to move from pacification to a permanent solution may or may not succeed, but even if they do not, it is not thereby proved that the action of the United Nations in November 1956 was wrong.

The role of the Assembly majority became much more questionable later on when the effort to secure an equitable basis for Israeli withdrawal was the issue. It is undoubtedly a handicap to have an Assembly with a disproportionate number of members committed to a bias. This awkward fact has made it very difficult to achieve a solution and has contributed to a messy and unsatisfactory policy which has not yet got us out of the woods. The situation itself, however, is complicated, and it is unwise to assume that it could be handled with ease if the U.N. could only be ignored. Would we be better off without UNEF or the Secretary-General? Would there be a role in extra-United Nations activities for Canada, Norway and the other lesser powers who alone have played a constructive role in the whole business? The only feasible alternative is the imposition of a solution by the joint action of the United States and the U.S.S.R., and this kind of action has always been a nightmare of the European countries. Such collaboration might be a very good thing, but it is inconceivable at the present time, and furthermore it would raise as many problems as it would solve unless it took place within the United Nations where the interests of all other nations could be watched. Instead of hankering after worse alternatives, it would be more sensible to make the best of the Assembly as it exists, by making the best possible use of U.N. machinery and accepting the world as it now is as a fact to be borne not to be sighed over.

It has frequently been alleged that the Assembly showed a double standard of morality in its attitude towards the U.S.S.R. over Hungary, towards India over Kashmir and towards the United Kingdom, France, and Israel over Egypt. Undoubtedly there is a question of double standards of morality involved, but the issue is confused if we blame the United Nations as a body rather than its members who are recalcitrant. The Assembly in fact showed the same standards towards the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, France and Israel. It requested them to get out of Hungary and Egypt respectively. The Russians refused, and the other members complied. It is somewhat indiscriminating to place the blame for this varied response on the U.N. Assembly. There were demands for sanctions against the U.S.S.R. and against Israel from different quarters within the U.N. and the accusation of double standards could be laid against individual delegations for the arguments they used. As yet, however, the Assembly has not taken any action of this kind. Some of the popular confusion on this issue probably arises from a belief that the United Nations sent a force to push the British, French and Israelis out of Egypt but did nothing to get the Russians out of Hungary. U.N.E.F. was, of course, in no sense an army to drive out invaders; it was an instrument to assist in stopping the fighting — an instrument which was not unwelcome to the invaders. If such a force could have played a role in Hungary, the Assembly would have been only too happy to send it.

It is, of course, unfortunate that the United Nations could not save Hungary. It does not necessary follow, however, that, because it could not save Hungary, it should have refused to take steps which it could take to restore peace in the Middle East. This pretty obvious fact has unfortunately been obscured by President Eisenhower's fumbling statements about two wrongs not making a right, in which he befuddled an issue of practical policy with moral values which were not applicable.

To attack the United Nations as an institution for failing to save Hungary is misleading. The attack is based to some extent on the erroneous impression that the African-Asian group refused to condemn Soviet action in Hungary after having denounced the British and French over Egypt. It is true that some members of the group were slow to recognize the nature of Soviet aggression and inclined to suspect a deliberate effort to divert their attention from Egypt — an attitude which is not surprising in the heated circumstances. When it was clear to them, however, what was happening, the great majority denounced Soviet action categorically, and the "hard core Arabs" abstained. All the non-Arab Asians supported the final American resolution on Hungary, except India, and India abstained out of pique because the Americans had refused to join in a slightly milder resolution the Indians had co-sponsored and one which itself offered no comfort at all to the Russians. The Indian position was certainly unsatisfactory in many respects, but it was not pro-Soviet. It is true that Krishna Menon opposed denunciatory resolutions and tried to get the U.N. to promote a negotiated settlement, but it should be borne in mind that he took the same attitude over Egypt. The Indians often used their influence in the African-Asian group to curb those who wanted resolutions which denounced the British and French and demanded extreme actions. The Indians were on the whole consistent in the views which they had insisted on first during the Korean negotiations, that the U.N. should concentrate on bringing the parties together and setting up possibilities for face-saving agreements rather than on condemnation. This policy was, of course, obscured and often nullified by the preposterous behaviour of Krishna Menon.

The reason the U.N. did not save Hungary was that it could not, not that it would not. There is no point in blaming the Charter of the U.N. or the methods of voting in the Assembly or the Security Council for this failure. The fault lies in Soviet policy and the international balance of forces. The world as it exists in reality does not cease to be the same world when it is reflected in the mirror of the United Nations. To alter the Charter to suit our theories of international justice without any recognition of the big, blunt fact of the Red Army would be suicidal. The U.N. did not create the unhappy balance of forces in the world any more than it created anti-colonialism. If we want to solve these problems we have to go to the roots of the problems themselves, not seek to pull down the United Nations as an institution. The United Nations could not as an institution drive the Russians out of Hungary by force and it could not have persuaded any of its members to do so on their own. However, it did what it could. It provided the U.S.S.R. with every reasonable opportunity to reach a negotiated settlement and offered its good offices. If there had been any disposition to find a way out, the U.N. would undoubtedly have been as helpful as it was in Indonesia or Korea, for example. What it was able to do was to mobilize public opinion, to make the nature of Soviet aggression clear to the world, and to put the Russians morally on the spot. It did not thereby clear Budapest, but it served some useful purpose.

The attitude of many uncommitted countries on Hungary was undoubtedly influenced by the debate in the U.N. in a way that it would not have been affected by controversial press reports and private propaganda. Furthermore, there was a notable effect on the position of the Soviet Union in the United Nations. Their great opportunity to lead a powerful anti-colonialist crusade in the wake of the events in Egypt was cut short, and the Soviet Delegation was undoubtedly embarrassed and inhibited on many issues. The Russians were neither very aggressive nor very effective on such issues as Cyprus and Algeria and, in spite of their habitual disregard of consistency, displayed sensitivity on issues which provided precedents for interfering with national sovereignty. This adverse effect on Soviet prestige is, of course, attributable primarily to the fact of Soviet policy in Hungary itself rather than to the U.N. debate, but the latter intensified the impact. The U.N. may also have had some effect on Soviet policy. It is possible that the original Soviet decision to withdraw from Hungary could be attributed in some part to nervousness about U.N. action, although this could not be proved. The argument that the Russians don't care about international opinion is, of course, not true. They gave every indication of worrying greatly over the international reaction to their actions in Hungary and to have been very reluctant for this reason to do what they eventually did — not on moral grounds but because of the adverse effect on their prestige and therefore their diplomacy. It might be argued, therefore, that although U.N. pressure did not save Hungary it came close to doing so. Certainly its chance of doing so was not helped by those who invaded Egypt at the same time.

Something of the same can be said about Kashmir. The U.N. has not yet solved this question, although it may have prevented a disastrous war in 1948. However, it has had an effect on public opinion. The intransigent position taken by India in the Security Council at the same time as the questions of Hungary and Egypt were on the agenda undoubtedly reduced Indian prestige and influence in the Assembly. It is not necessarily a good thing for the U.N. that Indian influence should be reduced, but it is good that member states should suffer the consequences of their own policies. The Indians, like the Russians, became more cautious about precedents for U.N. intervention and the right of self-determination. It would be too much to say that U.N. disapproval has sufficient influence in Moscow or Delhi to alter policy, but the possibility is not to be ruled out in the long run.

The principal cause of worry over actions of the U.N. Assembly is the belief, frequently expressed, that the West can no longer command a majority and that control of the Assembly has passed into the hands of the "Afro-Asian bloc". It is frequently suggested or implied that this "Afro-Asian bloc", in alliance with the Soviet bloc, dominates the Assembly's actions. There is, of course, an element of truth in these statements, but when this element is exaggerated it leads to erroneous conclusions. It is quite wrong to suggest that the Africans and Asians, with or without the Soviet bloc, dominate the Assembly. If they all vote together they can prevent a vote being passed by the required two-thirds majority. Their power at its strongest, therefore, is a power not to impose but to frustrate. They were not able to secure a two-thirds majority, for example, for their moderate resolution on West New Guinea, a "colonial" issue on which the lines were pretty clearly drawn. It was not, as is often supposed, the Africans, Asians and Communists who forced the Assembly to take action against the British, French and Israelis. Those members were only part of an enormous majority which included Latin American and Scandinavian countries and the United States. What has happened is not that the Africans and Asians now control the Assembly but merely that the Western Great Powers no longer have the easy and automatic domination of the Assembly which they had in the past. It by no means follows that the West is now automatically frustrated in its efforts to secure a two-thirds majority. It is necessary, however, for it to work harder to do so; to make a few concessions and to try a little more earnestly and tactfully to win the support of the uncommitted countries.

The task may become even harder with the accession of new countries like Ghana, Malaya and others which could upset the balance further. It is by no means foreordained, however, that these countries will swell the strength of a hostile bloc, and it is most important that they should not be driven into this position. With proper treatment they can be depended upon to support the West on crucial issues if the Western powers treat them properly and give due consideration to their views. Most prospective new members are countries with anti-colonial biases but also with strong political and cultural ties with Europe and America and sound economic reasons for maintaining those ties. We can assume that these member nations are lost and uncivilized powers whom we must fight and keep in their place; or we can attempt to collaborate with them, bearing in mind that they have strong feelings on anti-colonial issues but are by no means antagonistic to the legitimate interests of their Western friends and patrons.

The fact is that there is no "Afro-Asian bloc". As the Representative of one of the more orthodox Bandung Powers at the United Nations said to a member of the Canadian Delegation, "The Afro Asian bloc does not exist but many European countries are doing their best to create it". These countries themselves are careful to speak of their "group" not their "bloc", and there are few groups within the U.N. which are less united and disciplined. The disunity of the group is a fact which should dispel some of the exaggerated fears of the Europeans. It is a fact, however, in which many of the Asian countries, like members of the Commonwealth, find cause for satisfaction.

For the Western powers, however, to gloat over this disunity and give the impression that it is their determined policy to break up the African-Asian group just as we should like to break up the Soviet bloc is extremely unwise and produces precisely the wrong effect. The Arab-African-Asian group as it now exists is not necessarily a bad thing at all. There is a good deal of evidence that as a group it has exerted a moderating influence on its members. It is true that the association of these countries has given a new sense of power and confidence to nations which were acutely aware of their minority position in the past and which suffered not infrequently from a somewhat arrogant use of their majority in the Assembly by the European countries. With this increased confidence, these countries have become more aggressive on colonial issues but there are hopeful indications as well that they have also become more responsible.

It is wrong to think of the African-Asian group as a conglomeration of angry nations whipped to fury by Krishna Menon. While the Indians have undoubtedly at times stirred the group to anger, they have also led it in the direction of compromise. It is wrong also to think of this group as being dominated by India. India is undoubtedly the most influential single member, but the only countries which follow it at all faithfully are Ceylon, Burma and Indonesia, and even they went their own way on the Hungarian and some other issues at the past Assembly. The Japanese were feeling their way at this Session, but their influence, which was increasingly felt, was in the direction of compromise with the West and away from nationalist extremism. The strength within the group of the neutralists has undoubtedly been weakened by the admission of Japan, the somewhat independent line taken by such new Asian members as Laos, Cambodia, Nepal, the firm stand taken by Burma over Hungary, the flexible attitudes of Morocco, Tunisia, Libya and Lebanon and the more effective diplomacy of the SEATO and Baghdad powers — particularly Iran and Thailand. The patterns within the group continue to shift. On the subject of Israel, Iraq took an extreme "anti-colonial" position but on the subject of Hungary Iraq sided vehemently with the West. These shifting patterns are undoubtedly healthy. Provided groups do not become disciplined blocs they can be a good thing rather than a bad thing for an Assembly which has grown almost out of control. The threat to the Assembly may be the threat of anarchy rather than the threat of bloc voting. In this situation there is a good deal to be said for having fluid and overlapping groups who try to organize their thinking and put forward their view through spokesmen.

The aim of the West, therefore, should be not to fight the African-Asian group and thereby solidify it but to show a friendly interest in its workings, maintain the closest bilateral relations with all its members and make sure that it remains pretty much what it is. If this policy is followed, then the occasions will be few when the group will vote solidly with the Russians and their friends. There are very few members of the group who want to team up with the Communists against the West. When the French frustrated the efforts of the Asians to produce a compromise on Algeria and forced a vote on racial lines, it was the Asian spokesmen who expressed dismay. This sort of thing, from which the West has most to lose, need not happen unless the West accepts the defeatist position that the U.N. is a menace, that the Nations of non-European race are lost souls, and that our only wise course is to defeat and humiliate them on every issue — an attitude which was expressed all too frequently in European delegations. (Attached is a copy of an article in the January 26 issue of The Economist which analyses the voting in the so-called "Bandung bloc" on certain important issues).

It is frequently said that although the African-Asian countries are not a solid bloc, nevertheless on colonial issues like the invasion of Egypt, the terms of a settlement with Israel, or the control of the Suez Canal they will all vote together alongside the Soviet bloc. This is probably quite true, but one should not overlook the fact that the Assembly is a political body, not a voting-machine. What is forgotten is that there is negotiation before a vote takes place. Although the Asian-African will, in the end, support Egypt on matters relating to Palestine or Suez or similar issues, they are by no means agreed in their views on Egypt's rights. Many of them have worked hard, and will undoubtedly continue to find compromises and to persuade the Egyptians to accept sensible proposals. They will not willingly vote for extreme resolutions if we collaborate with them in advance to find alternatives. They realize the economic, political and military strength of the Western powers and the futility of trying to impose their will on the West in the United Nations. The West should not and does not have to concede everything to the Africans and Asians to gain their support. If it is firm and reasonable and uses elementary tact in its diplomacy, it can find many allies among the Asians and Africans on even the most difficult colonial issues.

This unhappiness with the present state of the United Nations has inspired a good deal of talk about abandoning the United Nations or acting outside it. This talk is based on a belief that Assembly decisions will be dictated inevitably by a majority in a body in which voting does not correspond to power and responsibility. This belief is justified in principle, but, as is suggested above, there is less evidence than has been assumed that the Assembly does make irresponsible use of its power. This belief is based to some extent also on an unreal and literal conception of the U.N. as a world government. Taking action in the U.N. by no means necessarily means submitting a straight issue to an Assembly vote. It really means conducting one's diplomacy within the framework of the U.N. There are all sorts of ways in which this can be done. During the last session we have seen the value of the U.N. Assembly as a place where responsible people from all interested countries can congregate quickly in formal and informal sessions. Here they work out their resolutions and negotiate for support, acting in and out of the Council Chambers, making use of the Secretary-General and exploiting all the various possibilities presented by this flexible institution. It would have been infinitely more difficult to get out of the mess in which we found ourselves last November if those with power to act had not been gathered together in New York. In such a situation there must be intense diplomatic activity. That this would be more effective outside the U.N. than inside would be hard to prove. It is true that one works in the U.N. under the shadow and threat of a majority which is not necessarily a legitimate one. Nevertheless, the composition of the Assembly does reflect the attitude of countries throughout the world and this attitude is an important factor in international relations at the present time even if it ought not to be the determining factor. With effective diplomacy this majority is not simply based on the counting of delegates' noses. The larger powers, because they are powerful, influence the voting of the smaller powers. During the six weeks before the Israeli withdrawal from Egypt, there was probably a majority in the Assembly which wanted sanctions against Israel. However, the issue was never presented to them for decision. The influence of the U.S. and other countries was sufficient to prevent the Assembly from taking this action. The members recognized the fact of power and the impossibility of taking action without U.S. support. They knew that diplomacy was going on behind the scenes and a solution might be forthcoming which would be more or less satisfactory and which they could not oppose.

This question of whether or not to work within the U.N. has been confused both by the friends and enemies of the U.N. Both have tended to portray the U.N. as a "deus ex machina", a kind of extra-planetary body with a life of its own independent of national states. The enemies see it as a body which interferes intolerably with relations among states on the basis of highly questionable moral principles over which right-thinking nations who should continue to run the world have no influence at all. Supporters of the U.N., on the other hand, tend to regard it as a body on which they can cast their burdens and thereby simplify the problems of national policy. This latter has been the unfortunate implication of many recent American pronouncements, and it has been these announcements which have most justifiably stimulated anti-U.N. feelings among Europeans. The U.S. Administration not only talked foolishly about letting the U.N. determine its policy, but it also tended in crucial moments to act as if it believed this were possible. During the worst days of the Middle East crisis the U.S. displayed almost no initiative in the U.N. It seemed quite unaware of the fact that turning to the U.N. means turning up in New York with some well thought out proposals, negotiating vigorously with other countries in New York and Washington and all over the world, producing plans, schemes and compromises of all kinds. Instead there was a tendency just to sit back and let the majority decide on any proposal which happened to pop up. It was this aspect of American policy rather than the American expression of its intention to act through the U.N. which can be most justly criticized by other countries. Such a policy did, of course, place the onus on Canada and other countries with more flexible policies and a better understanding of the needs of the moment and undoubtedly strengthened the prestige and influence within the U.N. of Canada, the Scandinavian countries, Yugoslavia, Japan, Mexico, Iran and other countries which, although hardly to be described as neutral, nevertheless act with some independence and on the strength of reasonably good relations with the various groups within the U.N. This development is by no means unhealthy for the U.N. but there is, of course, a limit to what can be accomplished by middle and small powers without the backing of the U.S. in particular and of the other Great Powers as well.

Diplomacy and negotiation away from New York and outside the Assembly or the Security Council need not be considered incompatible with or disloyal to the U.N., provided, of course, that it is within the spirit of the Charter and is not conducted on such a scale that it affects the prestige of the international body. If NATO, for instance, were to arrange a settlement of the Cyprus issue, such an action would be carrying out the wishes of the Assembly as expressed in the recent resolution on Cyprus. A settlement of the Algerian question by direct negotiation between Frenchmen and Algerians, with or without the assistance of other countries would be similarly carrying out the wishes expressed by the Assembly on Algeria. No-one expects the Assembly to thrash out the terms of such a settlement, any more than they expect an Assembly Committee to work out the details of a disarmament agreement. It has become fairly clear from the last Session that when issues such as Algeria or Cyprus are brought to the Assembly all the Assembly can do is to give its moral blessing to a settlement, to create the right atmosphere for a settlement or, of course, to put moral pressure on those who refuse to negotiate. In the light of the precedents set, it is not likely to go any further. It cannot impose a settlement. These must be achieved by bargains struck outside the formal meetings.

One important recent example of a settlement reached completely outside the U.N. was the Indo-China Armistice Agreements reached at the Geneva Conference of 1954. Given the desperately unfavourable situation at the time, the Geneva Agreement were undoubtedly a good settlement, or at least a good bargain, and would seem therefore to be valuable evidence for those who believe in by-passing the U.N. Furthermore, one reason that the agreement was reached was that the composition of the Conference was sensible. It included only those who were deeply involved. If the Conference had been set up by the U.N. Assembly, the participants would undoubtedly have included India and perhaps some other countries which are looked upon as interfering busybodies. The Korean Conference on the other hand, which took place simultaneously under U.N. sponsorship, was absurdly composed and failed utterly. It is doubtful, nevertheless, if one should reach any firm conclusions on the basis of this Conference. The Indo-China Conference had to be held outside the U.N. in order to include Communist China. Presumably this necessity is temporary. The addition of a few less influential countries at the conference table would probably not have affected the end result. Krishna Menon appeared in Geneva anyway and was active behind the scenes, not unhelpfully. When the Russians, Chinese, British and French agreed on a settlement, no other important country in the U.N. was likely to object. As for the Korean negotiations, it failed primarily because there was no basis for compromise at the time. The Geneva Conference, furthermore, took place in an international society bolstered by the framework of the U.N. It differed very little from negotiations conducted within the U.N. framework and, if China could have taken part, the same Conference might well have proceeded in exactly the same fashion under U.N. auspices. It followed the pattern of conferences under the sponsorship of the U.N., and it is doubtful if it could have taken place in a world without an international organization and without the habits of association and negotiation developed in the U.N. It is one thing to have an occasional successful conference or diplomatic manoeuvre outside the United Nations from time to time. It is another thing, however, to try to do so in a world without any international organization or one in which the United Nations is a cipher.

The above arguments seem to lead to the following conclusions. The U.N. exists and has existed for ten years, during which time it has struck deep roots in the customs and in the emotions of the nations and peoples of the world. Its mere existence is a fact which cannot be overlooked. We can wish it had never been created but it would serve no useful purpose to do so. Whether we like it or not we must work with and through it. Unless there should be a great catastrophe it is unlikely that any major country, except possibly France, could withdraw from the U.N. If we stick with the U.N., then we should make the best of it. We can try to reform it, if not its Charter at least its practices, and we can and should resist certain trends. However, our influence will be much more effective if we seek not to weaken and denigrate the U.N. but to support, strengthen and develop it. The cynical attitude which has grown up about the U.N. serves only to accentuate the trends which are deplored. The U.N. can become an irresponsible body dominated by irresponsible countries hostile to the West and exploited by the Soviet Union, but it need not become that kind of body. The way for us to prevent such a development is to pursue an active diplomacy within a U.N. framework and to exert far greater efforts than in the past to win the understanding and sympathy of the countries of Asia, Africa, South America and even Eastern Europe. The desire within the French and British Governments to find solutions to their present troubles outside the U.N. is an illusion, because there is no reason to believe they would fare any better. The problems arising from the transformation of empire and the passions aroused thereby are the product of historical processes not the United Nations. The United Nations provides in fact the only framework within which this transformation has a chance of taking place with the most peace and the least pain. The tendency to find the solution to the admitted faults of the U.N. Assembly by frantically rounding up temporary majorities to defeat the Afro-Asians and to look upon the latter as irredeemable enemies can prove disastrous. At worst it could wreck the U.N.; at best it could isolate further within the United Nations, France, the U.K. and Western Europe generally and reduce their strength and prestige. None of these developments is in the Canadian interest and we should use all our influence to persuade the British and French to look on the U.N. with better perspective. One of the most urgent needs of the United Nations is the revival of British and French influence — a view which many Arabs and Asians confessed during the past Assembly. Their behaviour in withdrawing from Egypt did a great deal to improve their position, but they cannot improve it further if their policy is not clearly set in the direction of supporting and working with the United Nations — not blindly, of course, but with the intelligence and discrimination for which they have been noted in the past.

FUTURE OF UN — UK ATTITUDE

We have reported on several previous occasions the reservations about the UN held in the Cabinet and by some officials in the Foreign Office of this country. Among many Conservative Members of Parliament and in corresponding sections of public opinion resentment of the UN has hardened into hostility. We were told last autumn that French and UK ministers had considered circumstances in which they might withdraw from the UN. A Foreign Office official has since told us that there have also been discussions along these lines with a number of other European Foreign Ministers. While the conclusion has apparently been that as things are withdrawal would be impracticable, the continuation of the UN seems to be regarded as a regrettable necessity.

2. Mr. Macmillan is reported to have referred privately to the UN as "this Frankenstein which we have created".

⁶⁸ Voir/See Document 195.

3. As you know, the UK has placed "the future of the UN" as first item on the agenda for the Macmillan-Eisenhower talks in Bermuda. It is also expected to figure in the talks with Mr. St. Laurent.

4. Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick, Permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office until his retirement a few weeks ago, tended to be critical of the UN in virtually all its aspects. We understand that under his impetus and leadership a group of senior officials have been meeting occasionally during recent months to consider the advantages and disadvantages of the world organization and what should be done about it.

5. The conclusions of this study group were that the processes of the organization were calculated almost inevitably to do harm to "European" or "Western" interests in virtually any of the major types of issue with which it might deal.

6. We have had a number of discussions during the past few months with various Foreign Office and CRO officials regarding the UN. In our immediately following telegram† we will summarize some of these conversations and comment on certain aspects of the UK attitude, which seems to us based in part on faulty and inadequate analysis, and to a significant extent coloured by irrational if not entirely surprising emotions. The sweepingly adverse conclusion about the UN, though it can be plausibly argued, is in our view exaggerated, seriously one-sided, and ill-considered from the point of view of UK and European interests.

7. Certainly the UK attitude toward the UN is likely, unless modified, to deepen rather than heal the underlying differences with the USA, which has a very different approach to the UN. It might also be likely, if persisted in, to undermine rather than to rebuild UK prestige among other nations.

8. If, however, through discussions at Bermuda and later, the UK is to be talked out of their negative and adverse attitude toward the UN in general, it will be important for us not only to understand the depth of the underlying attitudes and worries which affect UK thinking on this subject, but also to appreciate such legitimate grounds as there are for UK and European concern. We should also consider what constructive measures may be available to lessen this concern, and to improve the practical working of the organization in the interests of Britain and Europe as well as other areas.

9. In our telegram 1775 13 December we reported and analysed as sympathetically as we could a number of aspects of the unfavourable UK assessment. One notable feature was concern at what the Foreign Office calls a built-in double standard, as evidenced in the UN's contrasting attitudes and efficacy regarding the Middle East, Kashmir and Hungary. The Foreign Office also considers, not without some justification, that on virtually any colonial issue the operation of the UN is bound to prove detrimental.

10. Again, the UK has been concerned at what it considers a dangerous tendency on the part of the USA in recent months to abdicate policy formation and leadership to the UN, and under Lodge's influence to sacrifice many other considerations to the search for a two-thirds majority at almost any price. (There is, of course, something in both these complaints.)

11. Above all, the Foreign Office analysis is based on the view that as a result of its expanded membership the West is no longer able to expect a two-thirds majority in the General Assembly for any significant and reasonable proposals. Not only the dangerous ambiguity of the formulae for UNEF's role and other aspects of the UN's Middle East activities, but also the "anodyne compromises" on Algiers and Cyprus are cited as evidence of the ineffectiveness of the Assembly. Meanwhile the very processes of Assembly debate exacerbate passions.

12. There is, of course, considerable substance in these Foreign Office points, though they hardly seem exhaustive or conclusive enough to support a drastic conclusion that the UN has now ceased to be useful. Indeed the practical recommendations that the Foreign Office has made, as a result of its analysis, may seem somewhat of a non-sequitur. We understand that there has been a considerable mellowing in the Foreign Office attitude toward the UN in the past two months. But a few days ago a meeting of senior officials, chaired by Hoyer Millar (and attended, we understand, by Sir Pierson Dixon) gave approval to a brief on the UN for the Bermuda meeting.

13. The main conclusions of this brief, as it now stands, are in the words of a Foreign Office summary that:

(a) Owing to the unsatisfactory composition of the General Assembly, every effort should be made to deal with international disputes outside that forum, either by means of bilateral negotiations or, where appropriate, through collective security organizations such as NATO, SEATO, and the Baghdad Pact;

(b) If the matter has to go to the UN then it should, wherever possible, be referred to the Security Council rather than to the General Assembly.

14. The Foreign Office brief also suggests, quite sensibly, that in such cases as may be referred to the UN there should be, before any such decision is taken, careful joint consideration between the UK, the USA, and, where appropriate, other Western governments, as to the possible results of any such reference to the UN, and as to the tactics that would be followed.

15. Our enquiries have made it clear that the UK recommendation that where the UN must be used questions should be dealt with in the Security Council rather than the Assembly had not, repeat not, been thought through, thus far at least. The UK preference for the Security Council seems to spring entirely from a rebound against the General Assembly. Specifically, it does not represent any UK desire to seek to arrive at compromises with the Soviet Union. Indeed, as we have reported separately in other connections, the two recent UK studies on the Middle East and the European situations respectively have concluded that it is neither practicable nor desirable to try to arrive at any overall modus vivendi with the Russians, either in Europe or the Middle East or both together. While these conclusions differ from those tentatively reached at the departmental level in Ottawa, they are based on careful studies and seem to be firmly held. When we suggested to the Foreign Office the apparent inconsistency between these conclusions and their recommendation regarding the Security Council, the officials concerned have admitted this. The inconsistency springs in part from the fact that different departments of the Foreign Office have been concerned, and though most conclusions have received top level approval they do not seem to have been thoroughly digested or co-ordinated. A more fundamental reason for the inconsistency is however that as suggested in my immediately following telegram the UK analysis regarding the UN springs in significant degree from emotion and pique rather than objective analysis.

17. It is, therefore, quite possible that the UK may not even try to make its new UN policy stick when it comes to the point of dealing with actual cases. We understand, for example, that the Foreign Office has recently considered whether it would be desirable to try to transfer consideration of the Middle East situation (Gaza, the canal or the straits of Akaba) from the Assembly to the Security Council, and that the Foreign Office conclusion is that this would not be desirable under present circumstances, even if it were practicable. One reason seems to be that in the state into which things have got much reliance must be placed on the Secretary-General and that such a transfer of control to the Security Council would make more difficult the possibility of the Secretary-General taking constructive initiatives to bring about satisfactory solutions. Whether this particular UK conclusion against using the Security Council on the current Middle East problems is wise or not, it does seem to illustrate the inadequacy of the general theoretical considerations regarding the UN which the UK will be putting forward at Bermuda.

THE ROLE OF THE UN

We have not had too much opportunity to study the draft memorandum of March 16 on this subject but in view of the time factor I thought you might like to have some random comments. We have kept in mind London telegram to you 499 March 18 on the same subject.

2. We agree with the main arguments and conclusions in the memorandum. Our comments might suggest some shift of emphasis. We believe in particular that the UK, France and the small number of European countries who consistently follow them, instead of forsaking the UN should try to recover their position of leadership in the organization. They will not accomplish this by wringing their hands deploringly about the increased voting power of the Afro-Asians. Probably what is required most is an adjustment not only in the policies but in the attitude of these West Europeans as regards UN matters. Before the recent influx of new members the Western Europeans, allied with the USA and the Latin Americans, were able to dominate the General Assembly in almost every field. They controlled the clear majority of votes and for the most part they were concerned with scoring voting victories over the USSR. They were also concerned, of course, with keeping colonial issues from becoming too troublesome. These ends were accomplished without too much difficulty and without requiring any major adjustment of policies at the UN.

3. Not only the influx of new members but the rapidly changing balance of world power, with resulting changes in the policies of the two Great Powers, have produced new patterns in the General Assembly. The shift from cold war to co-existence has tended to break up the voting alliances which formerly followed pro-western policies. The increase in the number of Afro-Asian members has made it more difficult to suppress colonial issues. Western Europeans, particularly colonial powers, have found themselves more and more on the defensive, a position which they heartily dislike because it is such a reversal from their previous role at the Assembly.

4. All this was particularly true at the Eleventh Session. The situation was made much more acute because of the Middle East crisis. The Anglo-French action, taken outside the UN and indeed in complete disregard of allies and close associates, shattered the pro-western faction and provided the Afro-Asians with an easy opportunity for dominating the Assembly. They were the best organized, or perhaps the least disorganized, group at the Eleventh Session. This factor helped to produce what we regard as the myth of the invincible blocking third.

5. We agree entirely with what the departmental memorandum has to say about the lack of cohesion among the Afro-Asians. Many of them have insisted that they should not be referred to as a group or a bloc. Some of them have complained about the methods used by their Afro-Asian colleagues to dominate the group and to create false impressions about its attitude on many issues. There was evidence at the Eleventh Session that there were strongly opposing factions and more than one attempt to control the majority through the use of more selective Afro-Asian meetings (not unlike the old Commonwealth gatherings).

6. In addition, it is worth remembering that the Eleventh Session was the first for about a third of the Assembly membership. A lack of experience in UN affairs on the part of the new members undoubtedly contributed to the confused situation in which the Assembly frequently found itself. Many of the new members searched in vain for leadership from older members. The traditional leaders of opinion, the UK, France, Australia and NZ, were more or less in disgrace; the Western Alliance was sharply divided; and the USA, the Scandinavians and Canada were too busy patching cracks and improvising solutions to give much thoughtful advice to the new arrivals. Nevertheless some of the new delegations like those of Japan, Ireland and Tunisia, gave a good account of themselves. It would not be unrealistic to suggest that with experience many of the new members will be better able to provide the kind of balance which is necessary if the Assembly is to make a useful contribution to international relations. By the same token the Eleventh Session should not be regarded as the shape of things to come.

7. The memorandum speaks about the "element of truth" in the charges that the Assembly is dominated by an irresponsible and implacably hostile Afro-Asian group, which is willing to exact the maximum benefit from the UN without sharing in the obligations and especially the financial burdens. Viewed from the point of view of the Western Europeans and particularly the Colonial powers, these charges have foundation but only in a relative sense. Surely it is not "irresponsible" for countries like India and Indonesia to act in support of colonial peoples pressing for self-government. It would be a betrayal of their national tradition for the Indian and Indonesian governments to act otherwise. Nor was it "irresponsible" for Iraq, on the Middle East issue, to be more Arab than the Egyptians for Iraq has its own problems vis-à-vis the Arab world. What Western representatives really mean when they charge that the Afro-Asians are behaving "irresponsibly" is that the Afro-Asians, following the path of self-interest, have ceased to support or have weakened their support for Western policies. This tendency was all too apparent at the Eleventh Session as the departmental analysis of the Middle East and Hungarian debates reveals. In this regard the memorandum leans a little too far in the direction of Anglo-French disillusionment with the UN and does not give enough recognition to the fundamental fact that national self-interest is the strongest motivating force in the UN as elsewhere.

8. It is just this national self-interest which operates against any consistent system of bloc voting in the Assembly. Even at the Eleventh Session when the Afro-Asians appeared to have the upper hand, there was evidence of a growing realization among the group that group decisions could frequently clash with national interest. The Indians for example, were opposed to the Afro-Asian draft resolution containing sanctions probably because they realized that if non-compliance with UN resolutions should be the basis for sanctions, India might conceivably be faced with them on some future occasion. In the economic field the Afro-Asians demonstrated their awareness that their economic well-being was ultimately more dependent on the West than on the USSR. Even in the field of human rights, where the Afro-Asians have traditionally behaved "irresponsibly", there was some realization that extravagant claims might some day rebound.

9. A similar process has been taking place among the Latin Americans who in the past have been regarded as a solid voting bloc. At the Eleventh Session (as at the Tenth) there were frequent divisions in the Latin American vote. These occurred because a growing number of the Latin Americans have shown a desire to pursue not group but national policy at the UN. In our view some Latin American States, like Brazil, Colombia, Argentina and Peru, have at recent Assemblies shown a disposition to be more responsible and more reliable members of the UN than some of their European counterparts whose "responsibility" was unquestioned in the past.

10. The trend in the Latin American group away from group policies and group tactics is encouraging. It is a process that is likely to develop more rapidly in the so-called Afro-Asian group. The breakup of these large groups would ultimately benefit the UN because it would put a premium on the effective promotion of sound policy rather than on sentimental group action. In these circumstances majorities in the Assembly, and consequently recommendations of the Assembly, would be the result of responsible leadership in support of wise policies. The Western Powers are best equipped to deal with this kind of situation. What is needed is a determination to win Assembly support, not though the domination of voting blocs but by skillful and wise campaigning both on the Assembly floor and behind the scenes. There is sufficient evidence that this could be done if the Western Powers, whose flexibility in these matters is far greater than that of the Soviet Bloc, could adjust themselves to the new situation and make a concerted effort to meet it.

11. When we consider the "abandonment" of the UN, we are hard-pressed to recognize real alternatives. Presumably if the world powers ceased to pursue international objectives in a world organization, they would try to promote them through regional groups. Temporarily this might give a boost to such organizations as the Bandung Conference, the Organization of American States, NATO or a closer integration of European States. Clearly, however, in this nuclear age the States of the world could not confine themselves to these regional compartments and there would probably develop a system of liaison among the regional organizations. The real alternative is not to scrap the UN machinery but to make it work more effectively. Whether this can be accomplished within the scope of the existing Charter is perhaps the fundamental question. For the time being the Charter must remain as it is, with the possibility of only minor amendments. Nevertheless there is scope for improving the work of the UN, and particularly the General Assembly, within the existing framework.

12. With all its shortcomings the UN manages to fulfil some of the purposes for which it was established. We may bemoan that for eleven years the UN has discussed with practically no progress the question of disarmament, but the very fact that this discussion has taken place represents an improvement over a secretive arms race. The constant communication between the Western Powers and the USSR on this all-important subject is no small safeguard for peace, just as the discussion in the Assembly, however emotional, of colonial issues has operated as a safety valve. This discussion has not brought about any real detriment in the areas affected. The annual sessions of the Assembly may be an exhausting, frustrating and disillusioning experience but after the tumult of debate it can always be said that we have gained something of value out of our association here with other delegations, who with the observers can now be said to represent the whole world. Without this annual get-together, and even with its irritations, we are bound to conclude that there would be greater misunderstanding, fear and tension in the world than now exists.

Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Macmillan in Bermuda*

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], March 22, 1957

THE ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS

It is expected that Mr. Macmillan will raise the question of United Kingdom dissatisfaction with the United Nations. He will probably argue that recent events have shown that the interests of the Western powers are frustrated in the United Nations by a group of nations hostile to the interests of the West and that it is necessary therefore to reduce the importance of the United Nations in international diplomacy and find solutions outside the United Nations. He might even talk of withdrawal as a last resort. Mr. Macmillan will probably express particular concern over the Eisenhower doctrine of leaving issues for decision by the United Nations.

2. The concern of the U.K. over recent action by the United Nations is understandable, but it appears to be to some extent an emotional reaction rather than a clearly considered analysis of the role of the U.N. as an institution. These views are held even more strongly by the French. It is desirable that the British and French should be persuaded from their present position, which is doing harm to the United Nations and to themselves and gravely reducing Western strength and influence. In discussing the subject with Mr. Macmillan, it might be advisable to admit our own concern over trends in the U.N. and to recognize the unsatisfactory nature of the institution and a good deal of what it does. As a solution we should advise an effort to reform the practices of the U.N. and a vigorous policy within the U.N. rather than a policy of hostility towards it. The basis of our argument might be that the situation in the U.N. is not as black as it has been painted, that the U.N. is here to stay and cannot be ignored, that it is an illusion to look "outside the U.N." for better procedures, and that the tendency on the part of the United Kingdom and other European countries to withdraw from, ignore or deplore the U.N. serves only to increase their own isolation and to encourage the tendencies which we both regret.

3. One difficulty, of course, in discussing the matter with the United Kingdom is that our different attitudes arise to a considerable extent from our different estimates of United Nations action last autumn. If the U.K. still believes that U.N. intervention to force their withdrawal from Egypt was a bad thing for world peace and if we continue to believe that that intervention saved world peace, then it is inevitable that our opinions on the actions of the U.N. Assembly would differ. We might find ourselves closer together, however, on the difficulties arising from the Assembly's dealing with the Israeli withdrawal and its approach to a Middle East settlement. The Canadian argument here might be that the fault lies not so much in the U.N. as an institution as in the weak diplomacy of its members, particularly the United States.

4. If the cynical attitude of the United Kingdom and France towards the U.N. seems to us regrettable, the unreal idealistic conception of it described recently by President Eisenhower is equally regrettable and just as dangerous. It is based on an apparent failure to realize that the United Nations is an association of the nations as they exist and not a body above and beyond the real world with rules of its own and supreme power. Our general views on the U.N. might be listened to more sympathetically by the U.K. if we make clear our dissatisfaction with recent American attitudes to the United Nations.

5. The following are a few of the arguments which might be used with Mr. Macmillan.

(1) The voting position within the Assembly is not as bad in practice as it appears in theory. The so-called "Afro-Asian bloc" is not really a bloc at all, and most of its members have not yet reached the stage where they would wish it to be. There are many sub-groups and cross-currents within the group and the majority of its members are by no means hostile to fundamental Western interests. Most of them are also reluctant to be associated with the Soviet bloc and are unhappy about the way in which the European countries all too frequently push them into that position. There is good evidence that the group has acted just as often as a brake on its more extreme members as it has inspired them to anti-colonial excesses. It is more likely to be a moderating and helpful influence if the European countries cease to treat it with hostility and suspicion and work more willingly with its members. (An analysis of Afro-Asian voting in an article in The Economist is attached as an appendix.†)⁶⁹

(2) The United Nations Assembly is not a voting-machine. It is a forum for active diplomacy. Although the Afro-Asians, the Latin Americans and the Soviet bloc may be disposed or obliged to take "anti-colonial positions" in a vote, they can usually be persuaded to collaborate in the securing of compromise proposals in advance of a vote.⁷⁰ The power and influence of the larger countries and of those countries which make intelligent use of their influence goes a long way to cancel out the effects of a system by which all states of whatever size have equal votes. The heresy of the U.S. is to say that issues can be left to the U.N. and act as if they believe this to be true. Member states and large powers in particular must conduct a very active diplomacy in the Assembly, not just allow the Assembly to vote on any motion which pops up. U.S. influence in the Assembly was largely responsible for putting off a resolution on sanctions against Israel which a majority of countries wanted. Nevertheless, if they had used their influence more actively still, they might have persuaded the Assembly to adopt resolutions which would have clarified the issues associated with Israeli withdrawal and forestalled the difficulties we now experience.

(3) It is illusory to believe that better solutions to problems can be found outside the U.N., because we cannot recreate the world as it existed before the U.N. was established. Any attempt to solve the problems of the Middle East, whether inside or outside the U.N., would be faced with the same brute facts of Soviet military strength, Arab nationalism, Asian-African anti-colonialism, and the geographical situation of Egypt. The only basis of a settlement of the Suez and Palestine questions outside the U.N. would be either a bilateral deal between the United States and the Soviet Union or a deal between the United States and the Arab countries, neither of which would, we assume, be very attractive to the United Kingdom and France. The other alternative, British and French military intervention in the area, is one which we never thought practical and which even the British would presumably now recognize to be no longer practical. The U.N. Assembly, whether we like it or not, does to some extent at least reflect the world as it exists, even though its voting system is not in accordance with the reality of power.

⁷⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

Not the Soviet bloc [L.B. Pearson]

(4) The U.N. need not be looked upon as an institution for preventing diplomacy but rather as an agency for assisting diplomacy with a great many varied and flexible methods at its disposal. Within the U.N. framework, we have in the past produced all kinds of commissions and commissioners, truce teams and observation forces which have helped to stop fighting and prevent wars. Although there are differences of opinion on details, it would surely be agreed that the Secretary-General and UNEF have played important roles in seeking a solution for present crises. Such commissions can be set up outside the framework of the U.N. but we know, as in the case of Indo-China, that they suffer eventually from not being responsible to any effective international body.

(5) The last assembly has illustrated that Assembly action on certain controversial issues is not as frightening as might have been expected. The decision of the U.K. and France to participate in debates on Algeria and Cyprus helped rather than hindered their positions. In both cases, the "defendants" were able to define effectively their own positions and thereby take the wind out of the sails of some of their more extreme opponents. The debates on the whole were moderate and ended in resolutions which did not represent any extensive international infringement on national sovereignty. They produced rather an atmosphere of better understanding which, in the case of Cyprus at least, seems already to have promoted possibilities of agreement. There was no suggestion that the Assembly should itself try to work out the details of settlements and submit them to the vote of the members. The possible role of the U.N. in such questions as these is not to impose the exact terms of a settlement but to urge or inspire negotiations. This may or may not be a good thing, but it is not as dangerous as has been suggested. Within the framework of the U.N. it has always been accepted that there should be negotiations in the corridors, by diplomatic channels and by all sorts of methods in and out of New York. If solutions can be found, therefore, to such problems as Cyprus, Algeria, Palestine and the Suez Canal by these methods, there is no need to antagonize members of the U.N. by asserting that these are taking place outside that body. In most cases this would be no more than the U.N. Assembly has requested the parties to do.

(6) Anti-colonialism was not created by the U.N. It existed in a virulent form in the United States and other countries long before the U.N. existed and it could be argued that it would be more violent if its advocates could not blow off a certain amount of steam and learn some habits of responsibility in the U.N.⁷¹ We recognize fully that it is much harder for the U.K. than for us to bear the taunts of the anti-colonials and to listen to useless advice in the Fourth Committee. Perhaps, however, because we can discuss these matters with the critics more easily, we may have a more objective impression of their true attitude to the U.K. It seems to us that the U.K. has a much better reputation among Asian and African countries for its "colonial" policy than it realizes. The tributes paid to the U.K. during the debate last session on Togoland are evidence of this goodwill. However they may like to criticize, most anti-colonial countries recognize that the Commonwealth provides the best model for the development of colonial territories and it has great prestige among them.

(7) The argument that the U.N. displays double standards needs precise examination. It is not true to say that the Assembly was softer on the Russians over Hungary than it was on the British and French over Egypt. It is not true either that the Africans and Asians supported the Russians while they were attacking the British and French. Some of them showed some initial hesitation over Hungary because they were doubtful of the facts and suspected (not without some justification) that the British and French were using Hungary to divert attention from the Middle East. In the end, however, all except the hard-core Arabs denounced the Soviet action in clear terms and told the Russians to withdraw. The difference in standards was displayed not by the Assembly but by the nations which were requested to withdraw. It can be argued, of course, that although the double standard may not be intentional on the part of the Assembly the same effect is achieved by the fact that some nations accept U.N. decisions and some do not. The Charter, however, provides clearly that countries are protected by the veto in the Security Council from being forced to accept decisions against their national interest and in the Assembly by the fact that the Assembly has no power to force any member to take any action. The British and French, furthermore, did not withdraw from Egypt simply because of the high standard of their loyalty to the U.N. They did so because they did not have the support of their major allies and the undivided support of their own people.

⁷¹ Note marginale /Marginal Note:

(8) The United Kingdom might, because of its suspicion of the Assembly, argue that issues should go back to the Security Council. It can be pointed out to them of course that the question of their invasion of Egypt need not have gone to the Assembly if they had not used their veto in the Security Council. Furthermore, it would be unwise to think that the Security Council would take very different decisions so long as the Soviet Union backs every extreme Arab demand. Nevertheless, there is something to be said for going back to the Security Council where the kind of active diplomacy which is needed within the U.N. is for the time being at least not inhibited by a large and difficult majority.

(9) The troubles with the Assembly during the last Session were to some extent the result of the decline of British and French influence. The Assembly will be a healthier body if the British and French resume an active policy and take the places they were intended by the Charter to fill. On the whole, the restrained and somewhat reticent policy of the U.K. during the last Assembly was wise under the circumstances. They knew they were unpopular, and they avoided provoking those who felt sensitive. It was the view of the Canadian Delegation that by the end of the Assembly the U.K. and to a lesser extent the French had gone a long way to restore their position. Asian and even Arab representatives told us privately that they regretted the decline of British influence and hoped it would be restored. They contrasted favourably British and French response to the U.N. with that of Israel and the Soviet Union. The British cannot of course regain their position in the U.N. if they follow a policy of minimizing its importance. However, they can do so if they use their energies, their imagination, and their diplomatic skill in making the best use of U.N. machinery and cultivating the best possible relations with the Arab-Asian group rather than consolidating it by antagonism. There is good reason to believe that the position of the U.K. as a great power and a strong and respected influence in the world could be re-established very quickly in the U.N. It is not likely to prosper if they sulk in limbo.

(10) In addition to the political aspects of the U.N. it is possible that some reference might be made to the economic and social work of the U.N. and the Specialized Agencies. It has been the view of our Delegations in recent meetings of the Economic and Social Council that the West was in danger of reducing its influence by a lack of imagination in its policies in these bodies. Many Western delegations, and this is perhaps particularly true of the U.K., have tended to adopt a rather unsympathetic schoolmasterish attitude towards the under-developed countries. The latter do put up a great many hare-brained proposals and make impossible demands which cannot be accepted. There is perhaps nothing much more we can do in the way of sponsoring new international institutions which will channel more air or finance through the U.N., but our position might become more palatable if a little more tact and diplomacy were used and somewhat more understanding shown to countries which are struggling with difficult economic problems and rudimentary administrative services. In the field of human rights, furthermore, our somewhat superior and legalistic attitude might be modified. Whereas most Western countries are concerned with the serious constitutional problems to be considered in subscribing to human rights, we should not assume that the efforts to produce a covenant have the same position in the eyes of all countries. For many of these people it is not as ridiculous as we tend to assume to subscribe to human rights which do not exist at all in their countries. It does not necessarily mean that they are hypocritical, it means in many cases that the progressive elements in the country wish to have these human rights established as goals to which they can aim. Although the work in the Third Committee may seem aimless and purposeless to us, it is for many enthusiasts in the newly self-governing countries the most important work of the United Nations. Cynicism on our part will serve only to drive them towards the Russians.

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE 21ST
SESSION OF ECOSOC — NEW YORK, APRIL 17-MAY 4, 1956⁷²

Canada has this year begun a third term of membership on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, having been elected last year to replace Australia. Our earlier terms were from 1946 to 1948 and 1950 to 1952.

Cabinet approved the general instructions on April 19, 1956. R.A. MacKay was appointed head of the Delegation. For a list of the principal members of the Delegation, see Yearbook of the United Nations 1956, New York: Office of Public Information, United Nations, 1957, p. 530.

2. While ECOSOC has not unexpectedly fallen short of the original hopes for its role in the solution of major international problems, especially in the economic field, we have based our continued support on the conviction that, under United Nations auspices, definite programmes for alleviating the economic conditions of the under-developed countries in particular can be undertaken and effective discussions concerning social inequalities can be held. The United Nations economic assistance programmes have had constructive economic results, and on the social side, world criticism through the medium of the United Nations has not been without influence even on the major powers.

3. Canadian delegations at Council sessions have consistently stressed the necessity for realism in tackling the wide range of existing economic and social problems and for careful selection of projects on a basis of practicability and urgency. We have made a useful contribution towards finding sensible compromises and helping to reduce over-ambitious schemes to manageable proportions. This useful task of preventing the undesirable, combined with our more positive role in the specialized agencies themselves, could, however, give the impression of a negative attitude towards the Council's work, particularly on the part of the under-developed countries in the economic field, and of the anti-colonial powers in the field of human rights.

4. ECOSOC is one of the prime means for promoting co-operation and collaboration among the nations of the free world in economic, social and humanitarian fields. However, with increased participation by the Soviet Bloc in the work of the Specialized Agencies and its bid for the favour of under-developed areas, the Council can no longer be looked upon as a preserve of the Western powers. It can be expected that the concept of competitive co-existence will be carried by the Soviets into the arena of ECOSOC. They will probably no longer resort to unconstructive propaganda, but develop the more factual and cogent attitude initiated last year. Such tactics must be anticipated and countered, and may call for more constructive action taken jointly by Western democracies towards economic and social progress.

5. Canadian policy remains basically unchanged: to improve the relations between under-developed countries and the more industrialized countries of the free world. Very often the objectives of both groups are the same, differing only in means and methods and it is on these that both sides should concentrate. So far, our policy has been adequate on the whole, but circumstances are now different in the U.N. and it may be that our policy may have to be adapted to achieve the same effect. This does not mean that additional expenditure or, on the other hand, that no additional expenditure will be required. Often, for instance, in the field of human rights, embarrassing proposals can be suitably amended if constructive alternatives are suggested at the appropriate moment. It may therefore be necessary for Canadian delegations in the future to take an interest in certain matters at an earlier stage and that an attempt to influence proceedings should be made sooner. In many instances, the problems are theoretical in nature and no expenditure is involved. It cannot be assumed that in these fields influence is necessarily related to financial commitments.

6. The Canadian delegation should accordingly seek opportunities to recommend to the Government how Canada might best achieve our broad objectives in relation to both economic issues and social and human rights matters which may arise in the changed circumstances of future meetings. On proposals which we must vote against but which are close to the hearts of under-developed or anti-colonial countries, the Delegation should also, within the limits of its instructions, show its understanding and sympathy by taking as constructive a part as possible in the debate. The Delegation should continue to urge restraint and compromise on contentious issues and strive to retain the goodwill of countries for whose favour and understanding we are competing, bearing in mind that their emotional demands cannot be answered simply by logic or the application of the yardstick of practicability. The Delegation should of course keep in mind the necessity of the closest co-ordination with the United States and the United Kingdom, and the financial limitations established by Cabinet on particular issues. This instruction should not be interpreted as authorization to propose or support new expenditures. It is a general guidance to problems as they arise, with the intent that the Delegation's approach be as objective and positive as can be, both to proposals which cost nothing and to those which involve funds. If there are financial implications, the matter should as usual be referred to Ottawa.

7. The Delegation should do what it can to prevent irrelevant and time-consuming propaganda debates. However, should East-West difficulties emerge and the USSR attempt to exploit issues for their propaganda value, the Delegation should not hesitate to make adequate reply in collaboration with other Western Delegations.

8. While a better balance appears to have been struck between ECOSOC on the one hand and the Specialized Agencies on the other, the Delegation should be alert to any indications as to how the present arrangement is working. This vital question of the co-ordination of the activities of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies as a whole is to be examined at the Council's 22nd Session this summer.

9. A consequence of the admission of new members to the United Nations will be a pressure to enlarge the membership of ECOSOC, and Canada will be expected to accept some responsibility for working out the techniques for this change. While there are economic and administrative disadvantages to an increase in the Council and its Functional Commissions, the reasons for our initiative last year are also valid for ECOSOC — the political advantages and the assumption that the organization would be more effective through being more representative. Increases of some sort moreover appear to be inevitable. We are prepared to support immediate increases of three in the size of each of the 3 Functional Commissions whose membership (15) is now smaller than that of the Council itself (18). We would wish to keep any increase in the Council to the minimum and to maintain a balance between the advanced and under-developed countries. It would be preferable to consider an enlargement of the Council in the wider context of the Charter Review. However, although an expansion of the Functional Commissions would make it possible for some of the new members of the United Nations to participate in ECOSOC's work, they will very probably not be content to delay membership on the Council itself until the results of the Charter Review Conference have been implemented. The question of enlarging the Security Council moreover raises such difficult political issues that there is much to be said for giving way on the question of enlarging ECOSOC at an earlier date, in the hope that other more difficult questions of Charter Review may be postponed. The Delegation should make generally known its sympathetic interest in these increases but should take no initiative beyond attempting to bring the United Kingdom, United States and France closer to our point of view. It should seek further instructions on any specific proposals.

10. At present the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) consists of the 18 members of the Social Commission plus 8 members chosen by direct election. If the Board were divorced from the Social Commission and were made entirely elective, Canada and other major contributors such as Australia and New Zealand would be better able to maintain their seats and more frequent election of other countries seriously interested in UNICEF would make it more responsible and effective. The pressure caused by countries seeking membership on the Social Commission would also be eased by eliminating those which do so as a means of securing or maintaining their representation on UNICEF. Our representations to this end to the United States, France and the Commonwealth countries have been favourably received. The Delegation should support and possibly co-sponsor this proposal.

13. These are several important questions in the economic field of particular interest to Canada which will not be dealt with by the Council until its 22nd Session this summer. Our policy in regard to one of these, the Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED), is at present under review.

14. Attached as an Annex is a brief review of some aspects of ECOSOC's development.

ECOSOC

At the beginning of Canada's third term on the Economic and Social Council, after three years absence, it may be helpful to re-examine Canadian policy during our earlier terms (1946-1948 — 1950-1952) and to assess the work of the Council since then.

Canadian policy at the San Francisco Conference of 1945 was based on the belief that no international organization for the maintenance of peace and security could be adequate which did not include effective machinery for dealing with the world's major economic and social problems. The Canadian Delegation took an active part in drafting the section of the Charter on economic and social co-operation. Canadian amendments were aimed at increasing the authority and position of ECOSOC and defining its relationship with the Specialized Agencies, in order to strengthen its position as the body charged with co-ordinating the activities of the Agencies. Our early attitude to the Council was that it provided the positive, constructive means of implementing the social, economic and humanitarian purposes and principles of the Charter.

By the end of 1948, when we completed our first term of membership, the spirit of hope and the strength of purpose which underlay our original attitude to the Council had weakened perceptibly in the face of its apparent inability to promote the solution of fundamental problems. Our experience from 1950 to 1951 made it difficult not to become even more skeptical about the importance of the role which ECOSOC was capable of playing in the amelioration of major international problems, particularly in the economic field.

At the fourteenth session in 1952, however, previous programmes and plans were consolidated and a new and encouraging trend was established. There was much less acrimony and fewer exchanges of bitter propaganda between the Communist Bloc and other countries, and while the divergence of views on a number of basic issues has persisted, there has been little acute controversy in the meetings of the Council and its committees, particularly during the nineteenth and twentieth sessions in 1955. The practical work of ECOSOC has correspondingly benefited. However, the agenda of the 21st session provides plenty of opportunity for the Soviet Union to exploit issues for their propaganda value.

The functioning of the Council has been greatly improved as a result of a general review, which was carried out during the past two years, "of the development and co-ordination of the economic, social, and human rights programmes and activities of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies as a whole". There has been greater concentration upon the attainment of limited objectives and a more practical approach which has significantly reduced the duplication, overlapping and misdirection of effort which the complex organizational structure tends to promote. Much credit is due to the Secretary-General Mr. Hammarskjöld, under whose chairmanship the Council's Administrative Committee on Co-ordination has been playing a useful role. It is to a considerable extent due to his personality and popularity that the Specialized Agencies have shown a greater willingness to co-operate, and a better balance has been struck between the Council and the Agencies. The present arrangement seems to be working well, but caution should be exercised in carrying the process further in the direction of centralized control of the Specialized Agencies. It will be necessary to examine in this light proposals by the United States, which favours centralization under the Council, in which it is in a stronger position than in any one Agency. It should be borne in mind that the Specialized Agencies are in fact autonomous, with separate constitutions and larger memberships than ECOSOC or the United Nations. The role of ECOSOC, as the central and responsible body, is one of co-ordination; while it can make recommendations to the Specialized Agencies, its resolutions can be taken by the Agencies as permissive rather than mandatory. It is however too soon to say whether the present arrangement is the best possible one and our new term will give us an opportunity to determine whether in fact the balance has been adjusted adequately in favour of ECOSOC. While respecting the constitutional position of the Agencies, we should be on guard against their isolationist tendencies and the resultant higher expenditures, and should seek means to improve coordination.

The record of the Council, while not spectacular, shows considerable progress and some worthwhile accomplishments. Among these are its work on refugee questions; the valuable work of some of its Functional Commissions, especially the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, the Social, the Statistical and the Population Commissions; the initiation of steps leading to the creation of UNICEF; its initiative in calling the World Health Conference which led to the establishment of WHO; the formulation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Genocide Convention; the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance; the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency; the International Finance Corporation and, most recently, the preparatory work towards the establishment of SUNFED; continuing supervision of operational programmes in the above fields, and numerous technical services, studies, surveys and seminars.

It is hard not to be cynical about the many idealistic resolutions, conventions and programmes sponsored by countries which do little or nothing to implement them or to correct social, economic and racial inequities at home. Among their mixed motives, which include sincere idealism, there is sometimes a political intent which is often related to anti-colonialism in both its forms, economic and political. Two examples of this are the draft International Conventions on Human Rights and the "right of self-determination of peoples and nations", both of which moved from the Human Rights Commission through ECOSOC to the Social Committee of the General Assembly. We should be alert to this aspect of ECOSOC as a body where camouflaged political issues are introduced as a more convenient way of obtaining political ends than in the political committees or plenary sessions of the General Assembly. In other words, we should attempt to determine the real nature of the issues involved and endeavour to have them referred to the competent organizations.

Because of its limited membership and the fact that on most issues Western democracies control a bare majority of the votes, ECOSOC has served as a brake on contentious or ill-advised proposals originating in the functional commissions or the General Assembly, where the under-developed or newly independent countries are in the majority. Attempts to keep such items out of the political arena of the Assembly in this way have however resulted in a feeling that ECOSOC is the tool of a minority. Everything possible should be done to dispel such apprehensions, which on occasion have prompted the majority in the General Assembly to bypass the Council by giving directions to the Council's subsidiary organs, the functional commissions. Such a practice, while understandable, is improper and detrimental in that it undermines the competence of one of the main Councils of the United Nations. Without prejudice to the General Assembly's and the Council's legitimate interest, it is however desirable to assign to the Specialized Agencies issues which afford opportunities for political propaganda in ECOSOC and the United Nations, but essentially require technical consideration for their solution (the examination of Forced Labour by ILO is a good example).

There will in all probability be an attempt to redress the balance of votes in the Council in favour of the Asian African and Latin American countries by proposing an increase in membership of the Council. Some justification for this can be found in the increased membership of the United Nations as a whole. It can be expected that the United States and others who, like ourselves, stand to lose by such a change, will be obliged to give away in the end. One proposal, discussed among the Latin-American states, that two councils be established, each of 18 members, to deal separately with economic matters and social matters, is unacceptable and has apparently been dropped. It would mean unnecessary duplication in cost and time and would destroy the essential co-ordination which has been evolved. Experience in the Council has underlined the interdependence of economic and social progress; economic and social problems cannot be effectively treated separately, let alone in two separate councils. A second proposal is that the Council's membership be increased from 18 to 21 or 24. While it would be desirable to consider such a major amendment to the Charter in the wider context of a conference on Charter Review, it is improbable that the new members of the United Nations will be prepared to wait till then. We would do well to take as positive an attitude as possible on an earlier expansion, short of openly initiating such a proposal.

If, as seems certain, there will inevitably be some increase in the membership of ECOSOC, there will be nothing gained in fighting a rear-guard action against it. In this question and others where the undesirable is unavoidable in view of the number of new, underdeveloped or anti-colonial countries, we should determine our position as far in advance as possible and cash in on the goodwill of these countries by supporting their aspirations, without of course overdrawing our account of goodwill with the developed countries close to us.

While an increase in the membership of ECOSOC would require an amendment to the Charter by the General Assembly, the Council is competent to increase the membership of its functional commissions. From the point of view of the new members of the United Nations, this is an urgent matter, since they will not be able to take part in any of ECOSOC's work until at the earliest after the next General Assembly, unless room is made for them on the Functional Commissions by the Council at its forthcoming session. Without taking the initiative ourselves, we should attempt to have the major western powers agree to an immediate expansion by three of each of the three commissions whose present membership (15) is less than that of ECOSOC, (Transport and Communications, Statistical and Population Commissions).

ANALYSIS AND SURVEY OF 21ST SESSION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL*General*

The 21st session of ECOSOC was businesslike and the atmosphere, for the most part, cordial. Basic differences between Communist and non-Communist states nevertheless came to light in the debate on forced labour and on two occasions when the wording of "members of the United Nations and/or of the specialized agencies" in regard to conventions and invitations to conferences was challenged by the USSR as being too restrictive. Behind the scenes, Arab-Israel differences intruded into the consideration of some purely technical questions by the Egyptian and Pakistani delegations. The Yugoslav delegation, partly because of the personality of its delegate, was very active, with the apparent intention of playing a mediating role. This was the first Council meeting attended by the Indonesians, who did not seem too sure of themselves and tended to consult closely with the Soviet delegation. The French delegation, which was headed by political representatives, seemed on the one hand pre-occupied with the vested interests of French specialists and scientific organizations and on the other, with a desire to ingratiate itself with the less developed countries at the expense of other Western delegations.

While Soviet objectives were obscure, it was noted that all Soviet bloc countries emphasized two themes: the possibilities for fruitful trade with less developed countries; and the value of regional economic commissions and interregional cooperation.

In addition to representation by various specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, observers were present from Australia, Belgium, Chile, Colombia, Haiti, The Philippines, Poland, Venezuela and from three new members of the United Nations, Bulgaria, Hungary and Rumania. The latter three did not fail to find occasion to make statements in plenary session.

The three new members most interested in election to the Functional Commissions all obtained one seat — Austria (Narcotic Drugs), Italy (Human Rights) and Spain (Social Commission). Bulgaria, Rumania and Hungary were also elected respectively to the Transport and Communications Commission, the Statistical Commission and the Narcotic Drugs Commission. The Indonesians, although they applied for many Commissions, did not obtain a seat because of the lack of available Asian seats.

The question of the expansion of ECOSOC and the membership of its Functional Commissions was not raised officially during the session.

Useful ground work was done on three aspects of power production in relation to economic development, namely, water resources, the application to economic development of atomic energy, and other new sources of energy. Although this was the first session in which Canada had participated since 1952, the Canadian Delegation played an active role, particularly on the items dealing with industrial development and the improvement of industrial productivity, with international cooperation on cartography, the United Nations Children's Fund, and international cooperation with respect to water resource development.

In carrying out its general instructions (memorandum to the Cabinet of April 12, 1956) to take as positive a stand as possible, the Delegation was able to develop close contact with the less developed countries and to prove the thesis that a constructive contribution to the work of the Council could be made without necessarily incurring heavy financial commitments. This was facilitated by the inclusion in the Delegation of two specialists in economics and cartography, Dr. O.J. Firestone, Economic Adviser, Department of Trade and Commerce, and Mr. W.H. Miller, Director, Surveys and Mapping Branch, Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Both in committee (with Dr. Firestone as Rapporteur of the Working Group) and in plenary, the Delegation contributed substantially to the drafting of a resolution on industrialization which was unanimously adopted. A Canadian resolution on cartography, co-sponsored by Ecuador, was also approved unanimously. The Delegation also co-sponsored a resolution, adopted unanimously, on atomic energy as a factor in economic development.

The Council noted favourably the report submitted by the Chairman of the Executive Board of UNICEF and approved unanimously a Canadian resolution (co-sponsored by France) providing for the divorcing of the Executive Board of the Children's Fund from the Social Commission and for the direct election to the Board of all its 26 members, 18 of which had previously sat on the Board by virtue of their membership on the Social Commission.

In the elections to the Functional Commissions of the Council, Canada was re-elected to the Population Commission by a unanimous vote. While we were not standing for election to the Commission on the Status of Women until 1957, Canada was given two write-in votes. Canada is at present a member, in addition to the Population Commission, of the Statistical Commission (second year of term) and the Executive Board of UNICEF.

In its statements, the Canadian Delegation drew special attention to the need for co-ordination between the specialized agencies and the United Nations and for an increased use of facilities made available through the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance.

Role of Canadian Delegation

General instructions to the Canadian Delegation at the 21st session of ECOSOC were to continue Canadian policy of endeavouring (1) to improve relations between the less developed countries and the more industrialized countries of the free world. In carrying out this objective the Delegation was instructed (2) to play as practical and constructive a role as possible even on proposals against which it might eventually be necessary for the Delegation to vote. (3) The Delegation was also urged to keep in mind the necessity of close co-ordination with the United Kingdom and United States Delegations and (4) to keep in mind the financial limitations on Canadian support generally applicable to U.N. programmes. (5) Finally, the Delegation was instructed to avoid propaganda debates but to reply as necessary to the Soviet Delegation if East-West differences emerged.

A survey of the role played by the Canadian Delegation might therefore begin with an analysis of the extent to which it was possible to fulfill each of these basic instructions.

It would not be possible to say that the Canadian Delegation had been able at the 21st session to improve the relations between the less developed countries and the more industrialized countries of the free world very much. These relations remained virtually unchanged. There is considerable lack of sympathy displayed by the less developed countries for the United States position, the U.S. being suspected of having political motives for every practical step which it proposes. The United Kingdom remained under its colonial cloud throughout this session. However, it is fair to say that the Canadian Delegation was at least partly responsible for preventing a worsening in these relations. On several occasions it was possible to suggest compromises which would avoid the necessity of a vote against an unacceptable resolution. There was little difference in substance between the Canadian Delegation's approach to the problems and the positions taken by the United States and the United Kingdom.

There was however, a good deal of difference in the manner in which the Canadian Delegation approached its role, as will be noted later in considering the part played by other delegations. The wisdom of entering into discussion preparatory to the adoption of resolutions on difficult subjects, and even taking part in the preparation of these resolutions instead of waiting until such time as the resolutions came before the plenary session or subsequently appeared in the General Assembly, was most apparent. For example, industrialization will be discussed at the eleventh session of the General Assembly and it will be very much to Canada's advantage to recall the role which we played in the preparation of the resolution on industrialization during the 21st session of ECOSOC. Even on such items as road transport, slavery, forced labour, and most obviously on the enforcement of foreign arbitral awards item, there was something to be said for the explanation of the Canadian constitutional difficulty in dealing with fields which would require legislation solely or partly within the competence of Canadian provincial administration. There is no doubt that Canada's position as a major contributor to the U.N.'s financial resources made the Canadian voice in ECOSOC much more respected than would have been the case if we were not a major financial contributor. But influence in ECOSOC is not measured entirely by cash contributions. There is, after all, no substitute for personal ability or teamwork in a delegation. The United Kingdom Mission in New York has told us that their delegation has reported to London in favourable terms concerning the role which was played by the Canadian Delegation at the 21st session. Judging from this and from comments received from other delegations during and after the completion of the session, the contribution made by the Canadian Delegation was considered constructive and helpful in achieving some positive results even within the limitations imposed by instructions from national governments. For the Western nations these limitations were in most cases quite extreme.

It is fair to say that the Canadian Delegation played a constructive role in the meetings. The Delegation prepared and promoted some resolutions and had some influence on the final preparation of all the items on which the Delegation was prepared to make a positive contribution. However, the Canadian Delegation did not promote compromise merely for the sake of compromise. When conciliation was attempted it was merely as a means of producing a more workable and useful result. This same comment could hardly be made, for example, of the Yugoslav Delegation which sometimes, on questions other than economic, attempted conciliation merely for the sake of conciliation and whose efforts were sometimes, therefore, a little bit purposeless and one could almost say vain.

The Canadian Delegation was able to maintain close and friendly relations throughout the meetings with the United States and the United Kingdom Delegations. In view of the size and experience of these two delegations, it was sometimes surprising that they were not better informed of the feelings of the members of the Council. Canada demonstrated that a measure of independent initiative could in the end bring positive results in line with Western thinking without at the same time prejudicing our relations with the less developed countries. In some instances when common sense and instructions counselled us to do so, Canada took an attitude quite different from that of the United Kingdom and the United States. For example, we were obliged to abstain on the U.S. amendment on UNICEF and attempted to resist, perhaps not very effectively, the patronizing attitude which from time to time the United Kingdom Delegation seem unconsciously to adopt.

So far as financial commitment was concerned, the total financial responsibility which was accepted by ECOSOC and which the Canadian Delegation approved was not large and may be financed almost entirely from existing resources. At the conclusion of the meeting, however, when the financial implications of the actions taken by the Council were discussed, the Canadian Delegation entered a reservation to the effect that countries would not, of course, be prevented from discussing the costs of the U.N. programmes approved at the 21st session in other U.N. bodies.

The Canadian Delegation was one of those whose attitudes made cold war propaganda debates less frequent at this session of ECOSOC than they had been at previous sessions and in other United Nations bodies. The Chinese Delegation found it necessary on several occasions to make provocative statements and the U.S. Delegation did not hesitate to do so on the forced labour and slavery items. No other delegation made speeches of a cold war nature and the USSR Delegation appeared to reply only when attacked. On the question of the wording which is to be used in issuing invitations for U.N. conferences or in determining eligibility for membership in U.N. bodies (members of the United Nations and/or the specialized agencies) there was a sharp exchange during the UNICEF debate in which the Canadian Delegation refused to accept USSR criticism of this wording as restrictive and undesirable.

One of the general preoccupations of the Canadian Delegation was to ensure that where possible opportunities were given to the new members for a constructive role in ECOSOC. Each of the new members who were seriously interested in the functional commissions was elected to one commission. There was not from any delegation support for the idea of enlarging the commissions now 15 members to 18 as an interim measure. Delegations seemed prepared to wait for the general revision of ECOSOC structure which is likely to be made at the General Assembly this fall. The admission of new members, however, produces a personnel problem for delegations in that it is much more difficult to maintain contact with other delegations and, when necessary, to obtain their support now that the number of U.N. members has increased.

U.N. Secretariat

The role played by the U.N. Secretariat was exceptionally valuable on the operational side. The meetings ran very smoothly, the documents and translation services being excellent. Some complaints were made about the 'lateness' of issuance of some ECOSOC documents, with the United Nations Secretariat pleading 'domestic difficulties'. The Secretariat moreover from time to time endeavoured to lead or direct ECOSOC discussions generally unsuccessfully but at some times contrary to the intentions of some delegations. For example, the Secretariat was not always helpful when it came to a resolution of apparent conflict between U.N. agencies and in cases where spheres of responsibilities required delineation.

President and Chairmen

The Chairman, Hans Engen of Norway, proved himself very able, objective and strong. Mr. Said Hasan of Pakistan was a reasonably satisfactory Chairman on the Economic Committee and Dr. José Vicente Trujillo of Ecuador.

Other Delegations

The 21st session contained much more political interest than had been expected and was much more active and useful than anticipated. Perhaps the best way of describing the political interest would be to sketch the role played by the delegations with which the Canadian Delegation was closely concerned during the meetings.

The United States Delegation was unfortunately bound by very rigid instructions vis-à-vis the communist countries. It was instructed not to vote for any communist candidate for any of the Commissions and the U.S. Delegation seemed unwilling to consult beforehand with the USSR or Czechoslovak delegations on any issue. As suggested earlier in this memorandum the U.S. is suspected, even when it puts forward a reasonable and practical suggestion, of having ulterior political motives. In particular, there were signs of irritation between the U.S. Delegation and the Pakistani Delegation. The Latin-American Delegations, however, seemed ready and anxious to follow the U.S. lead, except perhaps in electoral or organizational problems. However, in private discussions Latin-American Delegations appeared to be quite willing to raise questions about the real motives of the United States, particularly in the economic field. The U.S. Delegation also seemed to have rather difficult relations with the U.N. Secretariat. The U.S. and U.K. Delegations, and especially the latter, were both out of favour with the Secretariat. Moreover, it was apparent that the less developed countries tend to put cotton wool in their ears when these delegations speak. Both delegations suffer because the less developed countries believe that they are regarded by the U.S. and U.K. as inferior, and their resentment and suspicion constitutes a formidable barrier which neither the U.S. nor the U.K. Delegations seems really concerned to knock down.

The United Kingdom Delegation seemed very much on the defensive, and further seemed to depend very heavily on positions prepared well in advance. There is something to be said for a delegation brief which is not too rigidly binding. On a number of occasions the U.K., by relatively minor changes in their position, could have avoided being placed in an isolated and invidious stand. For example, and this is a very small point, the U.K. Delegation have apparently been instructed to press for the ECOSOC opening date of July 3 as originally envisaged and to oppose postponement for a week. It quickly became obvious that the majority of delegations would prefer a week's postponement of the opening date of the 22nd session, and the United Kingdom lost some very minor atom of goodwill by sticking to the original date long after it became clear that this date was unacceptable. Both the U.K. and U.S. Delegations seemed to find it difficult to abandon a prepared position even when they knew they would be out-voted, and even when the position was not one of overriding importance, of financial significance or even of major political content. These two delegations just seemed to hold on too long, and when a last-minute change became necessary, to lose much of the goodwill that could have been gained by a more flexible attitude. The U.K. Delegation seemed to get along well with others but faced a good deal of difficulty with the French Delegation.

The USSR Delegation was the worst of all in holding rigidly to positions prepared in advance. Every USSR delegate seemed to be speaking from a prepared text on most occasions. The USSR advance preparation for the meetings was brilliant but, as so frequently happened when the position changed very rapidly, they did not have very much to say. Furthermore, there were only one or two people on the USSR Delegation who were able to discuss and negotiate with other delegation officers. These few were, however, of high calibre and on a number of procedural matters the USSR Delegation made a contribution. But on the whole it was difficult for the USSR to make its presence felt on many issues. Their delegates made a habit of leaving the conference room directly after the conclusion of a meeting and failed thereby to get the benefit of the informal exchanges of view around the meetings which are so helpful. The USSR Delegation was on the whole very reasonable. For example, in the elections it insisted on a geographical proportion of seats but also supported the candidates of the Western countries. Since the session, A.A. Fomin the USSR Delegation emphasized to members of our Permanent Mission that his country and Czechoslovakia had been responsible for the election of two Western countries, Ceylon and Belgium, which received only 10 votes in the election to functional commissions and which would not have been elected without USSR support. The USSR Delegation tried to act as a leader of the less developed countries but was not very successful in so doing mainly because its motives continued to be suspect by a number of countries. There were exceptions to this, and they included Indonesia and Egypt. A further reason that the USSR has not so far gained the leadership of the less developed countries is that it apparently cannot give all the aid it hints at giving and the less developed countries know this. Nevertheless the USSR was able to add to the suspicions of Western motives already bothering the less developed countries and was sharp enough to hit two notes in tune with less developed desires: (1) the need for speed and (2) an emphasis on aid through trade. The USSR Delegation, as expected, was prepared to embarrass the developed countries on occasion and to support the idea of increased trade with the less developed countries and of making greater use of regional U.N. institutions.

It is not necessary in this summary to do a separate section on the Czechoslovak Delegation, which acted exactly and entirely as an extension of the USSR Delegation. There were several cases in the Economic Committee of the Czech obviously taking his cue on voting from his Russian colleague.

The members of the Egyptian Delegation were able and active. It endeavoured to play the role of leader of the less developed countries which India would have played had that country been on the Council. In this respect it suffered from competition with the Pakistan Delegation which also wanted to play this same role. The Egyptian Delegation also was anxious to prevent Israel from getting any advantage out of ECOSOC proceedings. The Egyptian Delegation was also over self-consciously less developed and somewhat arrogant in the use of the power which lies in the hands of the less developed countries to influence the positions of the developed countries. For example, the Egyptian Delegation thought that a resolution which was supported by two less developed countries should automatically be considered ahead of a resolution which was not sponsored by the less developed countries no matter what other considerations there might be.

Said Hasan of the Pakistan Delegation made his usual semi-effective contribution. In plenary, however, he promoted a number of ideas which were quite unrealistic. For example, he supported regional training centres and regional studies on river basin development even though his Egyptian colleague was very much opposed to such studies lest they make foreign intervention in Arab-Israeli water disputes more likely.

Except for Brazil the Latin-American Delegations as a whole seemed confused and were relatively ineffective on economic questions. On social questions they tended, however, to be more vocal and effective. Argentina gave evidence of intention to demonstrate that a change of government indicated a change of heart. One of the major preoccupations of the Latin-Americans was to continue the useful work of the Economic Commission for Latin-America and to preserve its de facto autonomy.

The Netherlands made its usual effective and helpful contribution. On the economic side, however, while both the Netherlands and Norwegian Delegations made one or two statesmen like contributions, both appeared over-willing to go along with the Secretariat and to placate the less developed countries without a reasonable effort at hard sense. The Norwegian was very stubbornly opposed to the Canadian position on industrialization and continued so even after the Yugoslavs and others had reached a compromise with us.

The Greek Delegation seemed to be determined to side on all issues where the word "colonial" was mentioned with the Afro-Asian bloc against the developed powers, and was even prepared on some occasions to vote with the USSR. The Greeks resented the successful efforts of the United Kingdom to have them replaced on the Human Rights and Narcotic Drugs Commissions. However the fact that Greece was replaced by a new European member took some of the sting out of this development. Greek-United Kingdom relations at the meetings were correct but there was almost no contact that we could see between the two delegations.

The French Delegation seemed to be irresponsible and willing to sacrifice the United Kingdom and the United States in the interests of gaining recognition from the less developed countries. The Canadian and French Delegations got along well together in most instances. The UNICEF resolution, for example, was referred to as a "French Canadian" resolution. The officers of the Permanent Mission, Turpin and Epinat, were faced with real difficulties as the result of the arrival of a large delegation containing political figures from Paris. This delegation seemed preoccupied with all questions of status and tended to be sensitive to any suggestion that France was not being treated as a world power.

The Yugoslav Delegation attempted to fulfill the role of conciliator and mediator particularly between East and West. It played, however, a fairly constructive and reasonable role at the meetings. Its senior members at least were outstanding in ability. It certainly did not behave as a satellite, and one got the impression that from time to time the delegation was taking up a position different from that of the Western delegations and the Soviet delegation merely because it was different, although this may have been due to the desire of the Delegate in the Chair to be heard. The Yugoslavs appeared to be practical as distinct from theoretical communists who are prepared to abandon dogma for efficiency. The Yugoslav effort was somewhat similar to the efforts pursued by the Canadian Delegation; in fact, on procedural points the Yugoslav Delegation was in many cases the most astute delegation in making compromise suggestions which would speed up the business on hand, particularly in the Economic Committee. Perhaps the Canadian contribution was more significant in matters of substance rather than on procedures. On the economic side, it seemed clear that the Yugoslavs have a purpose and are quite effectively making haste slowly towards achieving it; namely, SUNFED. The Yugoslavs on ECOSOC were dynamic and experienced enough to be the spearheads of the less developed countries and wise enough to give the appearance of compromise and reasonableness when they had added as much as they could for the moment to the pressures being developed for their purpose.

The Indonesians seemed to be rather lost, and to look to the USSR Delegation for a lead. In any case they voted the party line ticket frequently. It was remarkable, however, how closely the Indonesians and the Dutch Delegations seemed to work together from time to time. In spite of the fact that the ECOSOC session was held during a period of considerable difficulty in Indonesian - Netherlands relations, this was not in the least obvious at any time during the meeting.

"Under-Developed"

While maintaining its close contacts with the developed countries, the Canadian Delegation made a point of working closely with the less developed countries, who for their part appeared to appreciate these approaches and to seek them. During the meetings the Canadian Delegation was taken with the French translation of "developed" and "under-developed" and adopted the phrase "less favoured" (moins favorisé) and "more favoured" as more satisfactory words than "developed" and "under-developed". On second thought, however, we believe the terms "less developed" and "developed" a fairer description and suggest they in future be standard usage, as in this report, rather than "favoured" and "less favoured".

Conclusion

In ECOSOC it is necessary to promote the most reasonable possible solution to the problems which come before the Council. Sometimes, in order to achieve the more important objectives set for the Delegation, it pays to give in on small points that less developed countries feel very strongly about. Compromise should not be sought for compromise sake, but where compromise yields the best results all possible patience and efforts should be exerted to achieve it provided, of course, that such compromises are reconcilable with the instructions given to the Delegation attending the meetings. Another element of importance is flexibility. It was interesting to observe, for example, the extent to which statements made during Council meetings at the 21st session were able to influence the thinking of member delegations. Perhaps one of the reasons was that not many delegations had come to the session with fully prepared briefs with lines of instruction which had been hardened before they could be tested in the light of further information obtainable from the U.N. Secretariat or greater knowledge of the feeling of member delegations on particular issues. A reasonable speech or statement taking account of these two factors made in the plenary or committee meetings appeared on several occasions to have a useful and often moderating effect.

The major issue, non pareil, to emerge from this session is that of making existing and potential resources satisfy the impatience of the less developed countries for economic advance. If we are to come out of this central struggle with our flags still flying we must:

(1) strengthen the confidence of the less developed countries in our sympathy and friendship;

(2) convince them that we appreciate their desire for speedier economic development than that experienced by the West;

(3) convince them at the same time of the need for a realistic assessment of what can be done at any given moment, including a frank and revealing exposition of why it is in reality never possible to fit existing means to potential needs at any moment;

(4) continue the effort to make the less developed countries see that a hard-headed and business-like approach to the questions of co-ordination and priorities is to their own best advantage;

(5) continue to search for imaginative and constructive new thoughts, even if only on procedural questions, which might serve to take at least some of the place of the material aid sought by the less developed countries.

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE 22ND SESSION OF ECOSOC — GENEVA, JULY 9 TO AUGUST 10, 1956⁷³

General instructions to the Canadian Delegation at the 21st Session of ECOSOC (memorandum approved by Cabinet on April 12, 1956)⁷⁴ were to continue Canadian policy of endeavouring (1) to improve relations between the less developed countries and the more industrialized countries of the free world. In carrying out this objective the Delegation was instructed (2) to play as practical and constructive a role as possible even on proposals which it might eventually have to oppose. The Delegation was also (3) urged to keep in mind the necessity of close co-ordination with the United Kingdom and United States Delegations and (4) to keep in mind the financial limitations on Canadian support generally applicable to U.N. programmes. Finally, the Delegation (5) was instructed to avoid propaganda debates but to reply as necessary to the Soviet Delegation if East-West differences emerged.

2. In carrying out these instructions the Delegation was successful in developing close contact with the less developed countries and in proving the thesis that a constructive contribution to the work of the Council can be made without necessarily incurring heavy financial commitments.

3. The 22nd Session of ECOSOC will be a heavy and delicate one. From our participation in the past session, it has become clear that the major issue with which we are faced in the economic and social field is that of making existing and potential resources satisfy the impatience of the less developed countries for economic advance. On the one hand we have to operate within fairly strict constitutional and financial limitations; on the other, we face a developing Soviet bloc campaign to increase communist influence wherever possible and the impatience of less developed countries which in some cases have recently

The delegation was led by P.A. Cardin, Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and then R.A. MacKay, the Permanent Representative, for the resumed session. become independent and are determined to achieve quick economic and social progress. This central struggle has been taken into account in the detailed guidance on particular items at the end of this memorandum.

4. The Delegation should continue to point out that the reputation of the U.N. and the support which it can command for larger and more vital projects could be damaged out of all proportion if it were to duplicate the work of other organizations or was engaging in activities the value of which was not readily apparent even though the money and number of personnel involved might be very small. The Delegation should not hesitate to point to specific instances of duplication which might arise out of the proposals for extending the activities of the U.N. which are put before the Council. Whenever possible, the various proposals arising from the agenda have been examined in relation to one another rather than each one separately, in order to ensure that the Delegation has an overall picture of the issues before the Council, and also to help it in establishing the relative merits and priorities of the various proposals and in discerning those areas where it might show some flexibility.

5. It is recognized that, even with careful and scrupulous attention to priorities, the activities and responsibilities of the United Nations may be expected to grow somewhat from year to year, and the Delegation should take this into account. It is not possible, from the point of view of finance, administration or personnel, to accept all the proposals, even the worthy and constructive proposals, that are put forward in the Council from many quarters, but carefully calculated concessions, or even initiatives may prove wise, both politically and financially. In this regard the Delegation must use its own discretion, within the guidance laid down in this memorandum, and seek further instructions if important departures seem to be required.

6. As mentioned above, Soviet tactics in relation to less developed countries will be particularly important. In the social field, the Soviet bloc will probably continue to go along with such requests as are made by the less developed countries. For Canada, for constitutional reasons these requests are not easy to handle, but it is clear that mere abstention is inadequate. Whenever possible, the Delegation should explain in detail the Canadian position, even if in the end Canadian participation is unlikely. In such cases it may yet be possible for the Delegation to make a useful contribution on some aspects of the discussion, either in a positive fashion or in advocating the removal or revision of any objectionable features. The Delegation can do much to increase its influence if it is in a position to display appreciation for the problems and the objectives of the countries which are directly concerned. It may well be also that in certain cases constructive alternatives acceptable to Canada can be devised. In this field careful planning may yield interesting dividends and Canada and the other Western countries are in no position to miss any opportunities which may present themselves for protecting and improving their position.

7. In the economic field Soviet representatives follow a more cautious but nonetheless successful course. They manage to give the impression that they understand the problems of the less developed countries, that they have a special contribution to make and that their resources and know-how will be brought to bear to assist. Compared to Western contributions the Soviet effort is much smaller, and yet the communist countries are almost suggesting that they have invented the idea of assistance and that their operations nearly match those of the West. While a cold war contest on this issue is not intended, the Delegation should, if the occasion arises, put things in their true perspective and underline whenever appropriate the creative character of Western economic development methods.

8. Obviously Canadian and Western tactics in coping with the Soviet approach to economic and financial issues will be more effective if they are developed against a background of understanding and friendly relations with the delegations of the less developed countries and particularly if Canada and the West generally can take a positive attitude concerning some of the agenda items in which these countries are more particularly interested. In any case, it is most important that the Soviet bloc should not succeed in its aim of persuading the less developed countries that their interests are better understood and protected by the Soviet bloc, that the Soviet bloc is and will be doing more for them and that the Communist methods are more effective.

9. There is thus no change in policy, but rather a continuation of the policy and tactics followed by the Delegation at the 21st session. Nor is it anticipated that at the 22nd session there will be decisions called for which have heavy financial implications. The following paragraphs deal briefly with some items of a relatively contentious or important nature.

Communist Membership Problems

10. The Delegation should oppose the participation of non-member Communist régimes in U.N. bodies or activities. Should technical grounds be brought forward which warrant special consideration, instructions should be sought from Ottawa.

United Nations Refugee Fund Executive Committee

11. The UNREF Executive Committee, a standing committee of the Council, is composed of 20 elected members. As we have made a sizeable contribution and the meetings could be covered by our delegation in Geneva, we would be very willing, if other members so desired, to serve on the Committee whenever a vacancy occurs. The Delegation has been instructed to mention this in its statement during the debate on the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Canadian Chairmanship of Co-ordination Committee

12. The Co-ordination Committee is a sessional committee of the Council consisting of representatives of all ECOSOC members. A proposal made by the United States State Department and supported by the United Kingdom Permanent Mission in New York that Dr. G.F. Davidson, Deputy Minister of Welfare and member of the Canadian Delegation, should stand for election to the chairmanship of the Committee appears to be receiving general support. Despite the extra burden it will involve, it was held desirable that we take on this chairmanship, in that it will enable us to play a more active role in influencing the work of this important Committee. It was agreed that Dr. Davidson's name be brought forward in the absence of any other agreed candidate, and the support of all members of ECOSOC has been sought. The United States Delegation will propose, and the Pakistani Delegation will probably second his nomination.

Technical Assistance

13. The Delegation will support a gradual approach towards the creation of a corps of international experts to serve for long periods in the technical assistance field within the present structure and arrangements of the United Nations technical assistance programme. Reference to the desirability of considering the creation of an international technical and professional civil service have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Mr. Hammarskjöld and others. The Delegation will indicate its continuing support for the present kind of technical assistance programme which has been increasingly proving its value to the under-developed countries and to relations between them and the rest of the world. The Delegation would be in a position to intimate at its discretion that, if an appreciable number of major contributors (other than the U.S.A. which is already well out in front) indicate between now and the General Assembly their willingness to increase their contributions, it will be prepared to consider recommending to the Canadian Government that its contribution towards the present kind of programme be increased.

Industrialization

14. The less developed countries have been calling for greater emphasis in United Nations Assistance Programmes on industrial development. Following a lengthy debate on this subject at the last Session of ECOSOC, the Secretary-General has proposed that the forthcoming Session authorize some minor staff increases and the employment of consultants so that the Secretariat could produce some studies of problems of industrialization in less developed countries. Although the Secretary-General's proposals involve relatively modest expenditures, his plans are not altogether satisfactory and the Delegation will endeavour to have them altered to avoid duplication of work already being done in this field by other international organizations, including private groups, and to make sure that the work done by the Secretariat will be of practical benefit to the less developed countries.

SUNFED

15. The United States is still withholding its consent to participate in a multilateral United Nations programme to provide capital for assistance to less developed countries through the proposed Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED). The United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand are holding back as well, although most of the western European countries are favouring the plan. It is doubtful, in these circumstances whether ECOSOC will be able to take any important further steps toward bringing SUNFED into existence at this Session. There is a danger, however, that the less developed countries may try to force the pace at this Session, although it seems certain that the United States will not change its position before the presidential elections next fall. The Delegation has been authorized to state, in any debate on this matter, that the Canadian position remains as described in our answer to a United Nations questionnaire in early May. This reply, which was approved by Cabinet,⁷⁵ stated that Canadian participation in SUNFED would depend in large measure on whether the organizational arrangements made for it were such as to lead to efficient operation, and on whether the Fund would command sufficient support for it to operate effectively.⁷⁶

a very interesting report but not too encouraging. L.B. P[earson] been rather "disappointing", our Delegation suggests that it may have had salutary effects by inducing more restraint in the debates and more soberness in the minds of the delegations of the less developed countries.

The most disturbing fact recorded by the Delegation is the lack of "ideas" on the part of the great powers. The failure of the United States and of the United Kingdom to provide the leadership which is generally expected from them is of particular concern to us, even though on this occasion it afforded opportunity for the Canadian Delegation to play a constructive role particularly in the promotion of compromises on several controversial issues.

The Delegation makes the disquieting suggestion that the Great "Western" Powers' attitude may have reflected a fundamental lack of interest in, or support of U.N. activities, at least in the economic and social fields. Whether this is so or not, it would seem desirable to find means of preventing Western leadership from going by default. The U.S.S.R.'s apparent failure to exploit more fully this "power vacuum" may provide the West with a breathing spell in which to examine its position and, possibly, regain the ground it has lost.

The Delegation's conclusion is that "in the absence for the moment of great power leadership and willingness or ability to make further sacrifices for the sake of U.N. programmes", a Middle Power like Canada might be able to seize the initiative. Such a decision, however, as the delegation realizes, would depend on the two following premises:

(a) that we are prepared and able to make greater contributions, financial and otherwise, to U.N. economic and social programmes; and

(b) that we can enlist the active interest and support of the Great "Western" Powers.

We will consider carefully what we can do to fulfil the first of these two conditions but in the meantime it may be desirable to try and impress on the Great "Western" Powers, particularly the U.K. and the U.S., the need for a more liberal assessment of the role of U.N. in economic and social affairs.

Against this background, the possibility that Dr. Davidson may be nominated for the Presidency of ECOSOC for 1957 becomes more important, particularly in view of the good name he has made for himself at the last as well as at earlier sessions of the Council.

It is also of interest to note the Delegation's implied recommendation that future delegations continue to be composed of relatively senior members representing the various departments concerned.

The problem of the financial implications of actions of ECOSOC (pages 8 and 9 of the report) is currently the subject of consultations between this Department and the Department of Finance and new draft instructions for our future ECOSOC delegations will in due course be submitted for your approval.

GENERAL REPORT ON THE 22ND SESSION OF ECOSOC

The 22nd session of ECOSOC was an unexceptional session. It has been described by our French colleagues as "un tournant", a personalized ECOSOC which did not walk straight ahead but paused, reflected and slightly changed direction.

At the close of the 21st session many delegations expected that the 22nd session would be one of the most important in recent years. Extensive discussions resulting in major long-term decisions were anticipated. In fact, the 22nd session of ECOSOC was subdued. It was overshadowed, for example, by the coming General Assembly at which many important issues, the industrialization study and SUNFED will be the subject of full debate despite prior consideration by ECOSOC. The possibility that the next General Assembly might take new action on old subjects because of the recent additional membership was also in the minds of delegations from the under-developed countries in particular. Furthermore, the United Kingdom placed an unusually heavy emphasis in its statements on the necessity for economy and coordination by ECOSOC and by the General Assembly in approving economic and social programmes. The shadow of the United States elections also had a depressive effect on the 22nd session. The "Forward Look" document, which was expected to produce an analysis and re-direction of the U.N. technical assistance programme, was given only very cursory consideration for this reason.

In spite of these tendencies, or perhaps because of them, the debates in the Council tended to be more realistic and practical at this session than they had on previous occasions. The set speeches in plenary were often of a very high standard although invariably read from prepared texts. There was considerable interest in the problems of coordination which produced the best debate in plenary and an intense and useful discussion in Committee. The Social Committee which was finished first proceeded with unexpected despatch to unanimous and reasonable decisions on almost all the problems before it. The Economic Committee, though under a most inept Chairman, accomplished some useful work and did not produce any major disputes between the developed and the under-developed countries although a division on SUNFED was avoided only with great difficulty. The Technical Assistance Committee accomplished more than any other committee in the form of improvements in the existing U.N. machinery for promoting economic development.

The proceedings suggested that the discussion of economic and social issues in the U.N. in the past has resulted in a better appreciation of the practical and financial limits of U.N. programmes on the part of some delegations, even from the under-developed countries, and on balance it is probable that the soberness of the 22nd session may come to be regarded as its most successful attribute. There was, in addition, much less futile argument over procedure than has been the case at previous sessions and there were certainly fewer East-West propaganda exchanges, members being prepared to deal with the subjects before them in a forthright fashion.

Politics

Political considerations, as usual, pervaded all the actions of the Council. In general, however, the Council's proceedings were not characterized by cold war attitudes as in previous U.N. debates, but represented a more civilized struggle in which the communist countries appeared determined to woo rather than to bludgeon their way to success. On only one occasion was there a real old time propaganda exchange, and that on the subject of the Poznan riots to which the United States referred in unnecessarily provocative terms, thereby stimulating communist replies in kind. On a few other items, there were brief exchanges such as the decision of the Secretary-General to decline a contribution to the technical assistance programme from East Germany, and again on the last day when there was a final U.S.-U.S.S.R. flair up caused by the circulation of a U.S. Note regretting the closing of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees in Shanghai due to communist Chinese pressure. On the whole these were mild in substance and subdued in delivery. Aside from its routine, and this time quite brief, speech on the representation of China, the USSR delegate did not even formally raise such issues as the membership of Outer Mongolia in ECAFE (which had caused great difficulty at the Tokyo meetings of ECAFE), or the membership of East Germany in E.C.E., when the reports of the regional commissions were considered. This was all the more surprising since the Council passed resolutions providing for increased status for Japan and West Germany in ECAFE and ECLA respectively.

The Suez issue, which erupted with dramatic suddenness midway during the session of the Council tended therefore to overshadow cold war issues. It was raised by the United Kingdom incidentally to the debate on the flow of private capital. The French strongly supported the British position, the Dutch, the Norwegians and Canadians giving some aid and comfort. The U.S. Delegation, which was without instructions until the last minute and was then told to "go cautiously", also gave some support. The Western Powers made an unsuccessful effort to restrict discussion to the effects of Egypt's action on world confidence and on the flow of international private capital. The Egyptian Representative, however, insisted on dealing with the legal and political aspects of the issue, but on the whole his interventions were in relatively temperate language compared to the statements emanating from Cairo. The subsequent relations between the Egyptian and French and U.K. delegations remained correct but strained. The last day of the session was marred, however, by a satirical speech by the French delegate concerning the Suez issue to which the Egyptians replied bitterly referring to French and U.K. actions as "leading to war".

A few other political issues gave rise to brief exchanges. The Greek Delegation on several occasions mentioned the Cyprus issue in the Social Committee, and even addressed some questions on the subject to the United Kingdom Delegation. That delegation replied briefly to these proddings, but would not be drawn into a political debate and the Greek Delegation seemed content merely to have stated its case. The Indonesian and Netherlands Delegations had a brief dispute over how the U.N. should refer to Netherlands New Guinea, both sides stating their position for the record but without much bitterness. There was little opportunity for the Arab-Israel question to come to the fore, nor did any major Indo-Pakistan differences emerge. Pakistan was, however, hesitant to support moves for increasing the scope and authority of the regional commissions and it has been suggested that this may be caused by supposed Indian influence in ECAFE. An interesting though minor political sidelight developed out of the narcotics debate on Afghanistan's request to produce opium for export. Pakistan and Iran strongly opposed this action by the U.N., but the USSR, which made sympathetic noises, nevertheless took no overt action in support of Afghanistan's claim.

The President's reported comment that this had been "perhaps the most harmonious session in the Economic and Social Council's ten year history" may have been an unduly flattering summary. Certainly all was not sweetness and light, but it would appear doubtful whether political exchanges seriously hindered the work of the Council at the 22nd session.

The Canadian Catalytic Contribution

Against this background the Canadian Delegation played one of the most active roles of any of the delegations. Broadly speaking, the delegation's role, as defined by its instructions, was that of holding a watching brief. On matters of substance, it had little scope for taking initiative since there were few issues of major immediate short run interest to Canada. However, there were numerous occasions when a practical or compromise solution seemed to be needed and when such a solution had the best chance of success if it came from a delegation which had no real quarrels with anybody. On several items the delegation found itself in the position of an "honest broker" whose function it was to reconcile opposing views. The delegation was more effective in this respect because of its relatively senior composition representing various departments concerned which made it possible to adapt the brief to unexpected circumstances.

Of particular interest was the relative bankruptcy of ideas on the part of the great powers. The Chinese Delegation, which for ECOSOC purposes is still regarded as one of the "greats", made little positive contribution to the meetings. The French Delegation rode some private hobby horses but seemed to wander irrationally amongst the forest of resolutions, here and there chopping down a tree without any particular reason or apparent general purpose except that of maintaining its position as representing one of the great powers. The United Kingdom contribution was negative, partly, but only partly, on financial grounds, and at times seemed politically unwise. The U.S. Delegation on occasion took the initiative and on almost every subject had a draft resolution under the desk which it sometimes endeavoured to unload on other delegations. For domestic as well as external political reasons, however, its initiatives were restricted to relatively inconsequential suggestions. Some of its proposals were not only unhelpful but even misguided, such as the idea that the Secretary-General might circulate the members of the U.N. for an indication of the fields in which they would welcome private capital investment. In the Economic Committee the U.S. representatives had little to contribute and in the Social Committee their interventions were uninspired. In the Coordination Committee while in some cases they put forward instructive ideas, their record was on the whole disappointing, involving too many minor resolutions. One field in which the U.S. Delegation made a constructive and, in the final analysis, politically successful contribution was in the Technical Assistance Committee. A sincere desire to defend the programme and to improve it (admittedly in one case so that it would not be so vulnerable to Congressional attack), resulted in some worthwhile resolutions for which the U.S. Representatives on this Committee were to a considerable extent personally responsible.

The general lack of constructive leadership by the Great "Western" Powers may have been based on a fundamental lack of interest in, or support for, U.N. activities. They seemed to be continually on the defensive and unable or unwilling to regard ECOSOC as providing opportunities for participation in developing U.N. programmes. From their point of view it is considered to be a body which must be prevented from doing more damage and incurring more expense than absolutely necessary. This point of view was most clearly shown in some of the U.K. interventions, which however qualified, left an impression of reluctance to support greater U.N. activity in the economic and social fields. Some U.K.

speeches tended to be abrupt and ill-prepared by advance consultation and in consequence frequently caused resentment. A possible explanation of U.S. and U.K. diffidence in the Council is that a number of delegations seemed to lie in wait for both countries. The Indonesians and the Egyptians, seemed highly suspicious of U.K. and U.S. motives in general. The Pakistani representatives who were generally pro-Western also seemed ready upon occasion to speak critically of the U.S., particularly in the SUNFED discussion.

In this situation it is strange that the USSR did not endeavour to profit from the "power vacuum" in ECOSOC. The USSR Delegation did not seem to have firm instructions based on an understanding of the problems before ECOSOC which would enable it to take very definite positions on controversial problems even when it was of advantage to do so. Few of the Russians spoke English or French which further hampered their delegation. One felt, indeed, that the USSR was represented by a "third" team.

The Canadian Delegation therefore found itself from time to time pushed into a lime-light which it neither sought nor wished. For example, the Canadian Representative introduced a ten-power compromise resolution on SUNFED largely because the resolution was too strong to be introduced by the U.S. and too weak to be introduced by anybody else. In some respects our position at the 22nd session as at the 21st session was similar to that of Yugoslavia, although at opposite ends of the political spectrum. A Canadian function is often to water down the extremists at the blue end of the spectrum — and the U.K. and U.S. certainly took some extremely negative positions at this session, whereas the Yugoslav problem was that of watering down the extremists at the red end of the spectrum, — not a particularly difficult task at this session since the communist representatives were relatively quiescent. Canada even co-sponsored with Yugoslavia, that well-known supporter of the democratic freedoms, a series of amendments to a human rights resolution in an effort to break a deadlock. For a variety of reasons this precedent is unlikely to be the fore-runner of many joint Canada-Yugoslavia approaches to ECOSOC problems.

The major contribution of the Canadian Delegation was thus made towards the increased effectiveness of ECOSOC in general, rather than in any specific field. Our chairmanship of the Co-ordination Committee, brought credit to the delegation. The delegation also chaired a working group on the food reserve item and acted as a liaison between groups of delegations working out other resolutions in both the economic and in the social fields (e.g. on SUNFED). The delegation cooperated closely with the U.S. and the U.K. and was successful occasionally in protecting those delegations from immoderate Council action, and even, as in the case of the U.S. and a resolution on human rights, from their own immoderate action. The delegation differed with the U.S., on the food reserve item and opposed the U.K. plans for changing the function of the Coordination Committee.

However, the delegation was authorized to bring forward some useful proposals. It introduced a resolution on the TAC providing for a study of the possibility of long-term contracts for experts as part of the technical assistance programme. The Secretary-General's suggestion, however, that an International Civil Service be established in the public administration field, (which was related in some respect to Mr. Pearson's ideas), did not get very much support at the meeting. The delegation itself did not comment either for or against the Secretary-General's ideas. Other delegations did, the U.K., U.S., Netherlands, Indonesia, Yugoslavia and France appeared to oppose the idea partly on the grounds that U.N. activity of this kind might be resented by the ex-colonies as well as by the colonial powers as a reflection on their administrative capacities. There seemed to be a reaction against what some misconstrued as a new and unwelcome type of U.N. imperialism. The Pakistan Delegation was the only one which commented at all favourably on the possibility of an international civil service as envisaged by the Secretary-General.

The Canadian Delegation also mentioned in a speech in Committee the desirability of considering some action in the future on "the clearing house" concept, to which Mr. Pearson has referred, but decided to defer any positive suggestion until soundings had been taken as to whether the major countries now providing bilateral aid would be willing to support U.N. activity in coordinating information on such programmes.

When the conference reached the concluding stages, Canada voted for all the resolutions except in two cases when it abstained. An abstention was registered on a resolution providing for an increase in expenditure for technical assistance in the public administrations field largely because the expenditures involved were planned under the U.N. headquarters budget instead of under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. The other abstention referred to a resolution involving additions to the strength of the U.N. statistical office where our objection was to the form in which the financial provision for the extra costs were made. In both cases, however, the delegation supported the general principles involved, objecting mainly to the manner in which they were being implemented. This record results from considerable delegation activity in order to ensure that the resolutions finally put to vote were acceptable to the Canadian authorities.

Other Delegations (not elsewhere discussed)

There was no open split at the meetings between the developed and under-developed countries. Members of the Council seemed to approach the problems coming before it increasingly in a sense of partnership rather than separate groups of haves and have nots. The under-developed countries, particularly Pakistan, and even Indonesia and Egypt, in spite of their suspicions of the U.S. and the U.K., seemed frequently willing to act with restraint. The Yugoslav Delegation, for example, promoted a standby resolution on SUNFED in the interests of helping to preserve a possibility of U.S. participation. The Egyptian Delegation created difficulties on the SUNFED resolutions but made a helpful intervention during the currency utilization debate in the TAC.

There was considerable emphasis on the part of the delegations from under-developed countries on the importance of commodity price stabilization since, as the Secretary-General stated in beginning the debate on the world economic situation, a fairly minor fall in the prices of new materials could undo all the good that was done by foreign economic aid. No delegation specifically opposed the bilateral concept of economic aid. Indeed both Pakistan and Indonesian representatives spoke favourably of bilateral programmes in the TAC. It may well be that the serious difficulties which arose in connection with utilization of some local currency contributions to the technical assistance programme may lead some delegations to look with greater favour on bilateral programmes. The U.S. delegation commented privately that under no circumstances would their country participate in a SUNFED programme which would have anything like the same difficulties that the technical assistance programme has had in using unconvertible currencies. The SUNFED concept, however, is still very vigorous, as demonstrated in a bitter address from the Pakistan Representative, and a forthright and impatient address by the Netherlands Representative on the subject. Difficult debates on SUNFED can be anticipated in the General Assembly, but there was a general recognition of the importance of securing the participation of the major contributors, particularly the U.S., which was encouraging.

USSR Delegation

The USSR Delegation took very little part in the meetings. What interventions it made emphasized the importance of regional U.N. activity, particularly in the commodity field. The USSR also stressed the need for speeding the industrialization of the under-developed countries sometimes out-manoeuvring the Western developed countries in their efforts to promote, on the basis of their own experiences, balanced economic development. As a result of communist urging it seems possible that some of the under-developed countries have begun to return to the over-emphasis on industrialization which characterized their early post-war development programmes. The Russian Delegation also strongly supported the regional commissions and interregional cooperation probably because in these commissions the USSR is able to exercise a greater influence than it is in the United Nations General Assembly bodies. This is particularly true of ECAFE and of ECE. When the USSR was not supporting regional trade expansion, it was promoting a nebulous world trade organization which appealed to those under-developed countries which still recalled the broad promise of the I.T.O. Another USSR emphasis was on what they termed "practicality", i.e. that the United Nations should soon begin to proceed from study programmes to direct assistance. In this respect, however, the USSR did not show any signs of financial irresponsibility.

In general, the USSR Delegation appeared to make its interventions in such a way as to undermine, so far as possible, the confidence of the under-developed countries in the United States and the United Kingdom. The USSR Delegation chose to support those proposals which would make the West most uncomfortable. The Czechoslovak Delegation was also used for this purpose, both delegations voting for all practical purposes as one. (Incidentally, the USSR Delegation and its followers appeared to be successfully promoting Russian as a working, as well as an official, language). The USSR Representatives seemed anxious to have closer relations with the Canadian Delegation and on at least two occasions suggested that the delegation discuss issues with them in advance of the formal Council meetings.

U.N. Secretariat

The Secretary-General played an important role at the Geneva meetings, placing special emphasis on the importance of improvements in the international commodity trade field and bringing forward several interesting ideas for the consideration of ECOSOC. The Secretary-General, however, is reputed to have been dissatisfied with the discussion on the world economic situation at the 22nd session and to have decided that it might not be necessary or useful for him to participate in next year's debates if of the same calibre.

Carlson, the Head of the Economic Division, was particularly active and constructive. Dr. Keenleyside was an effective and friendly spokesman for the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration. Within narrower limits Humphrey of the Human Rights Division was a valuable member of the Secretariat. It was the opinion of the Canadian Delegation, however, that some difficulties could have been avoided had the Secretariat been willing to assume greater responsibilities. The difficulty was that some of the Secretariat interventions were far from helpful, e.g. those of Phillippe de Seynes. De Seynes showed great sensitivity to any discussion, e.g. on decentralization, which in his view reflected on the administrative powers of the Secretary-General. Of particular interest were the generally presumptuous activities of Dr. Gerta Blau of the FAO. Dr. Blau made a most irresponsible intervention in the Economic Committee proceedings designed to undermine ICCICA. There was apparently no basis of government decision for her intervention. The FAO representatives played a difficult role with regard to the world food reserve item (Dr. Blau, it must be admitted, at one point made an able intervention) and assumed a very arrogant attitude towards delegates. The ILO representative likewise made a most unfortunate attack on the Netherlands Delegation but otherwise the representatives of the Specialized Agencies participated in the debate uneventfully.

In general, however, the Secretariat, particularly from U.N. headquarters, whether from fear or diffidence, did not make as much of a contribution as its individual members are capable of making. The gain from general secretariat participation in the proceedings of ECOSOC would be greater than the loss which results from sometimes unfortunate secretariat actions and speeches. On balance, therefore, there is much to be said from avoiding a repressive attitude towards the secretariat which might inhibit its members unduly from bringing forward constructive ideas.

Finance

The Delegation was concerned at the frequency with which it felt called upon to make financial reservations at the 22nd session and at the confusion which appeared to exist in the Council generally concerning the relationship between the Economic and Social Council and the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly. A preliminary memorandum was prepared on this subject which is designed to explore the possibility of finding a way of protecting the position of the Canadian Representatives on the Fifth Committee while at the same time making it possible for the Canadian Delegation to ECOSOC to support useful initiatives without unnecessary qualifications. The U.S. and U.K. also make such qualifications which tend to dissipate such confidence and support as they can mobilize. This situation might well be discussed by Canada and the U.K. and the U.S. before the next ECOSOC session. The subject may well be a separate agenda item in 1957 at the 23rd and 24th sessions to ensure that there is a full discussion of the financial position and responsibilities of ECOSOC.

Specialized Agencies

The relationships between ECOSOC and the specialized agencies may well have been improved by the conduct of the debate on the reports of each agency in the Co-Ordination Committee. Certainly the ground for greater coordination of the programmes of the specialized agencies and of U.N. headquarters has been prepared.

Regional Commissions

There was no active support for an African Regional Commission, due to the opposition of the colonial powers which would be concerned, or for a Middle East Regional Commission because of difficulties over Israeli membership which the Arab states would not countenance. The reports of ECAFE, ECE and ECLA were given a limited general discussion at the 22nd session. The activities of ECE are strongly supported and endorsed by its members on the Council as are those of ECAFE, ECE and ECLA by the Asian countries and by the Latin American countries. It has become therefore difficult for ECOSOC to do more than comment generally on the programmes of those three Commissions which, except for ECE, are expanding rapidly in size and cost. One of the major issues on which the Council will face increasing difficulty in the future is that of determining the extent to which U.N. programmes should be decentralized to the Regional Commissions.

Conclusion

After the 22nd session was over the President, Ambassador Engen, referred to it as a "standstill session". The Canadian Delegation considered that the meetings while unproductive of dramatic advances, nevertheless, resulted in a thoughtful reassessment of some problems and programmes, which will be of value in increasing the usefulness of the Council. However, if the Council is to promote further improvements in world economic and social conditions through U.N. programmes, if it is to satisfy, even partially, the increasing and changing requirements which the under-developed countries continue to present, and if it is to fulfill the role assigned to it by the United Nations, then future sessions will need to produce more practical results than did the 22nd. In the absence for the moment of great power leadership and willingness or ability to make further sacrifices for the sake of U.N. programmes, it may well prove desirable for a Middle Power like Canada to play an important role in promoting a more effective role for Europe. Such a decision would, of course, depend on Canada's own ability to make greater contributions both financial and otherwise to U.N. economic and social programmes, and on the possibilities which exist for reenlisting the active interest and support of the Great Powers.

CONFIDENTIAL. CANADIAN EYES ONLY. IMPORTANT.

23RD SESSION OF ECOSOC

At a recent interdepartmental meeting, held to review Canadian attitude on UN economic and social programmes, serious concern was expressed over the widening rift in ECOSOC between the industrialized and under-developed countries, particularly on the controversial issues of capital aid and commodity problems. It was agreed that preconference consultations with certain members of ECOSOC, including our Commonwealth and NATO partners, and such under-developed countries as Yugoslavia, Indonesia and some Latin American countries might help to give us a better understanding of the various conflicting positions at ECOSOC and perhaps pave the way for more reasonable and less doctrinaire and rigid attitudes on either side.

2. Canada is not in a position, particularly in this pre-electoral period, to undertake new major initiatives nor does the agenda of the forthcoming session include many concrete topics of discussion, except perhaps for the secretariat's programme on industrialization.

3. There might be some advantage, however, even at this late date, in reviewing the situation with appropriate officials, in Washington, London and Paris as well as with friendly UN missions of member countries of ECOSOC in New York, to ascertain whether our concern over ECOSOC is shared by other representative countries. I should therefore be grateful if you would seize an early opportunity to raise the matter with your colleagues in other friendly delegations, using the following notes as a basis for discussion.

4. Present position in ECOSOC. It is natural that divisions and divergences of opinions and approach should exist on questions which affect the economies of both exporting and importing countries, either of capital or of primary products. There is a growing danger, however, that the Soviet member countries, led by the USSR, may be successful in exploiting for their own ends these differences and the divisions they engender. In recent years, Soviet countries have been participating more actively in ECOSOC discussions, and although their delegations have not been too troublesome, their efforts are obviously designed to gain credit as champions of underdeveloped countries, particularly in the fields of industrial development and international trade. If the present situation is allowed to develop unchecked, the West is in danger of losing much of its influence in ECOSOC, which is the main forum — an important one in the context of the UN — in which the less developed and industrialized countries meet.

5. During its present term on ECOSOC, and particularly at the last two sessions of the Council in 1956, Canada has found it necessary to play the role of mediator on a number of issues and our delegations have on several occasions been able to reconcile divergences of view between the “have” and “have not” countries. Something more is needed, however, to restore Western influence in the Council.

6. Our delegation to the 22nd Session of ECOSOC deprecated the lack of “ideas” and leadership on the part of the USA and UK and suggested that they did not perhaps regard ECOSOC as providing opportunities for participation in developing UN programmes in the economic and social fields. The French delegation played a more active part, but some of the initiatives it took seemed to be primarily directed towards asserting the position of France as one of the Great Powers and on occasion caused embarrassment to its Western colleagues by acting without consulting them.

7. In the present international context, the main responsibility for maintaining Western influence in ECOSOC would appear to rest upon the USA, because of the latter’s resources and position. The intervention of the UK and France in Egypt and the economic stresses which have resulted from it for the time being have probably limited the ability of these two countries to play leading roles at ECOSOC, although their experience and prestige remain valuable assets. In general the contribution of Canada and other NATO countries is likely to be most effective if it can be made in support of that of the major Western Powers, particularly the USA.

8. What is required to redress the situation in ECOSOC is perhaps not so much ambitious new programmes or initiatives as greater understanding and sympathy for the aspirations of the less developed countries (particularly on the part of the USA and the UK). The immediate need is for a change of attitude rather than for greater financial contributions, and for the Western countries to co-ordinate their effort at ECOSOC and develop, mutatis mutandis, a more forthcoming approach to the problems of the less advanced countries. While we recognize the importance of co-ordination and economy at ECOSOC (and in the specialized agencies as well) some of the Western countries may have been too prone to consider the Council as “a body which must be prevented from doing any damage and incurring more expense than absolutely necessary”. Between negative cautiousness and the other extreme of unchecked liberality there should be room for a more reasonable position. For instance, it should be possible for Western countries on occasions to support certain marginal projects proposed by under-developed countries which while not conforming with stricter Western standards of practicability and efficiency may reap wider economic and political benefits.

Conclusions

9. You will be in a better position to decide to what extent you can use the above remarks in your consultations. The primary purpose of consultations in Washington, London and Paris is to propose mutual consideration of steps we might take to improve the situation in ECOSOC. With respect to other members of ECOSOC with which consultations will be undertaken in New York we are interested in letting them know that we take their views seriously, wish to take them into account in formulating our own views and would like to find out what items are of particular concern to them and the reasons for their interest. We are particularly interested in the views of under-developed countries on such problems as industrialization, land reform and co-operatives: items which are included in the agenda.

10. You should not raise on your own the question of SUNFED. It is under discussion in an Ad Hoc Committee of the UN. If others raise it, you should refer them to our reply to the questionnaire⁷⁸ where the government's position is clearly stated. We are not in a position to take any steps ourselves at the present time to encourage the establishment of SUNFED, nor to encourage other countries to support proposals for its establishment. We shall, however, play as constructive and useful a role as we consider realistic in the work of the Ad Hoc Committee.

11. Consultations with USA, UK and France will be undertaken by our missions there. I should be grateful if at your discretion you would consult along above lines representatives of such other member countries of ECOSOC as Brazil, Indonesia, Mexico, the Netherlands, Pakistan and Yugoslavia.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 74-57

Ottawa, April 2, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE 23RD
SESSION OF ECOSOC — NEW YORK, APRIL 16 TO MAY 3, 1957

1956 marked the tenth anniversary of the Economic and Social Council and the 22nd Session which was held last summer was, according to its President, Dr. Engen of Norway, "more characterized by pausing and reflection than by decisive action". There were, however, grounds for concern over the apparently widening rift in the Council between industrialized and under-developed countries.

The agenda of the 23rd Session of ECOSOC is comparatively light and contains few items of major importance from a Canadian point of view. The primary task of the Canadian Delegation will therefore be to continue to take an active interest in the discussions of the Council with a view to assisting it to reach constructive decisions without embarking upon new programmes which would involve the commitment of substantial additional financial resources.

The most pressing need is not for ambitious new programmes or initiatives but for greater understanding and sympathy for the aspirations of the less developed countries on the part of the more highly developed Western countries. The Canadian Delegation may therefore again be called upon to play a mediatory role, recognizing the need both for restraint by the less developed countries in demands for United Nations activities and also for a less rigid and doctrinaire approach by the more advanced countries in order to avoid extreme divergences of view between the "haves" and the "have nots" and the exploitation of such divisions by the Communist bloc. While certain proposals advanced in ECOSOC may seem unrealistic by North American standards, less developed countries may attach a great deal of importance to them. The Delegation should accordingly be prepared on appropriate occasions to continue to consider certain marginal projects which involve relatively minor expenditures but may produce wider economic and political advantages. At the same time, the Delegation should continue to keep a watchful eye on the financial implications and the co-ordination of the Council's activities. It need not, however, stress the limitations in Canada's ability to make more substantial commitments, the reasons for which are now generally well appreciated, but might rather stress the need for more effective utilization of available resources.

Subject to the limitations imposed by Canada's federal constitution, the Delegation should be prepared to support and participate in worthwhile United Nations activities in the social and human rights fields. Progress made in these areas could relieve pressure for more ambitious operations in other fields.

Economic Development

Under this item the Council will be required to consider United Nations activities in the fields of industrialization, land reform, co-operatives and possibly international commodity problems. The Secretary-General will present a progress report on studies being undertaken regarding industrialization; he will present a second survey of land reform measures in member countries, based on replies to a questionnaire; a study will also be presented concerning forms of assistance which might be provided by governments to encourage co-operatives, and the fields in which co-operative forms of organizations are most suited. The Delegation should encourage and support constructive and realistic proposals which may be conducive to real progress in these fields, particularly in areas which are in a stage of early development.

If, as appears likely, an item is introduced concerning international commodity problems, the Delegation should indicate Canadian support for the development of sound international measures, on a commodity-by-commodity basis, to promote greater stability of trade.

The Delegation should be guided by the Canadian reply to the U.N. questionnaire on SUNFED. We are not in a position to take any steps at the present time to encourage the establishment of SUNFED, or to persuade other countries to support proposals for its establishment. As the 11th General Assembly requested the Secretary-General and the Ad Hoc Committee on SUNFED to submit comprehensive reports to the 24th Session of ECOSOC, the question of SUNFED should not be considered at the 23rd session and the Delegation should oppose any attempts to raise it.

Expansion of ECOSOC

At its 11th session the General Assembly decided to postpone to the next session consideration of the various proposals for the expansion of the main organs of the U.N., including ECOSOC. Canada should not sponsor proposals for expansion. However since Canada took the initiative in 1955 in enlarging the membership of the United Nations, the Delegation should be prepared to support recommendations for which there is general acceptance looking towards reasonable and balanced increases in the size of the four functional commissions of ECOSOC whose membership (15) is at present smaller than that of the Council (18) (viz: the Transport and Communications Commission, the Statistical Commission, the Population Commission and the Narcotic Drugs Commission).⁷⁹

REPORT ON THE SESSION JULY 3-16, 1956
OF THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

PART A

The Disarmament Commission met from July 3 to July 16 1956, to consider the report (DC/83 of May 4, 1956) of the Sub-Committee on its discussions in London, March 19 to May 4, 1956. The report included the various proposals, working papers and other documents submitted during the Sub-Committee's session, together with the verbatim record. An interim report of progress after about six weeks of discussion by the Sub-Committee had been envisaged by the Disarmament Commission at its meeting on January 23, 1956.

2. At the Sub-Committee session last Spring, although at first there appeared to be some flexibility in the positions of the main parties, the various shifts which occurred in these positions resulted in no real progress. It appeared, however, that the delegations of the Soviet Union and the United States were thinking along similar lines in their approach to the problem on disarmament, that is, both seemed to be in favour of seeking agreement on measures which could be implemented in the immediate political circumstances. The United Kingdom and to a lesser extent, France, were also prepared to seek agreement on a first stage of disarmament although, as the authors of the Anglo-French working document of March 19,⁸⁰ they continued to seek a definition of the ultimate goals of disarmament, most of which could not be attained until there had been a marked improvement in international relations. Canada, without abandoning any of its ultimate objectives, urged the desirability of reaching an agreement, however limited, which could serve as a basis for further agreement not only on comprehensive disarmament but on broader political issues.⁸¹

3. The main difference between the Soviet Union and the Western Powers was that, whereas the Soviet Union proposed conventional disarmament, within a three year period and without political settlements, down to levels formerly proposed by the Western Powers (1.5 million for China, USSR and United States, 650,000 for France and the United Kingdom) for a comprehensive programme, these reductions were not related to any measures of nuclear disarmament. The Soviet Union did, however, restate its traditional position on the prohibition of nuclear weapons and said that this could be the basis of either a simultaneous agreement or one which could be "facilitated" by the agreement on conventional disarmament. The Soviet Representative stated categorically that the two should not be linked, in the sense of being dependent upon one another. In varying degrees the position of the Western Powers was that however limited the agreement might be, it must contain both nuclear and conventional elements and, if this agreement were to be implemented in the present political circumstances, the levels to which forces should be reduced would be considerably higher than those formerly proposed for the final stage of disarmament (2.5 million for China, USSR, United States; 750 thousand for France and the United Kingdom). As in the past, moreover, the Western Powers, continued to insist that effective inspection and control was essential to the implementation of any agreement on disarmament. The Soviet proposals of March 27 on control were considered inadequate and in particular the Soviet position on aerial inspection.⁸²

5. In these circumstances the Sub-Committee talks ended in a deadlock. In terms of propaganda the Soviet Union assumed the position that, while it was ready to proceed with practical measures of disarmament, once more the Western Powers had demonstrated their lack of desire to reach agreement; once more they had withdrawn in the face of Soviet acceptance of Western proposals. The position of the Western Powers was that the Sub-Committee should continue to search for an agreed solution based on the four-power declaration submitted to the Sub-Committee on May 4, 1956.⁸³

6. On May 14, the Soviet Union announced unilateral reductions in its armed forces by 1.2 million men. This move had been expected since the time of the Soviet proposal of March 27, 1956. The announcement was coupled with a disparagement of the proceedings in the Sub-Committee. This attack reflected the views which Mr. Khrushchev had expressed privately during his visit to the United Kingdom. The Soviet attitude seemed to be that the Sub-Committee had outlived its usefulness and, apparently in accordance with that view, Mr. Bulganin on June 6 addressed separate letters to seven members of NATO urging them among other things, to follow the example of the Soviet Union in making reductions in armed forces and armaments.⁸⁴ In spite of these signs of Soviet impatience about the Sub-Committee, it seemed most unlikely that the Soviet Union would try to either have it dissolved or have its membership enlarged.

7. Both sides approached the recent session of the Disarmament Commission with the intention of improving their propaganda position, in preparation for the eleventh session of the General Assembly. The Soviet Union had its various "offers to meet the West" and its unilateral reductions, in short, action on disarmament rather than diplomatic dialogue. The Western Powers could point to the inadequacy of Soviet proposals on control, the absence of nuclear measures in the latest Soviet proposals of March 27 and the need for an agreement based on sound principles.

Western Solidarity

8. The four Western Powers of the Sub-Committee were greatly concerned about maintaining a solid front in the face of a Soviet propaganda position which was admittedly strong. In the Sub-Committee the Soviet Representative had shown little disposition to exploit the obvious differences between the Anglo-French position and that of the United States. Nevertheless those differences helped to weaken the Western stand, both as a negotiating and a propaganda position. In an effort to reach common ground for the Western partners, the United Kingdom circulated, a short time before the opening date of the Disarmament Commission, a plan for partial disarmament which included both nuclear and conventional elements. This plan was considered unacceptable as a basis for the Western position in the Commission, because it contained new elements and because there was insufficient time for the four to reach full agreement on it. Accordingly, it was not pressed by the United Kingdom.

9. The United Kingdom then fell back on the four-power declaration of principle of May 4. Arriving in New York a week before the Commission session began, Mr. Nutting canvassed the opinions of the majority of members (Australia, Belgium, Cuba, Iran, Yugoslavia and, of course, his three Western colleagues on the Sub-Committee). As a result of these consultations it was agreed that the Western Four should submit a draft resolution which urged the Sub-Committee to continue its search for an agreed solution, "paying due regard" to the principles of May 4. Mr. Nutting proposed to submit this draft resolution (Doc. DC/87 of July 3) at the first meeting of the Commission, although Mr. Martin urged him to wait until the discussion had developed and M. Moch expressed a preference for a simple procedural motion. Mr. Cabot Lodge had at first been in favour of a procedural move but was persuaded to support Mr. Nutting's approach.

10. Early in the discussion in the Commission it was clear that the four-power draft resolution would have the support of 10 members of the Commission, although the Representative of Australia was anxious to strengthen it. He had firm instructions to see that the Commission did something more than merely apply a rubber stamp to the Sub-Committee's report. The Representative of Yugoslavia favoured the Western principles as a basis for an eventual agreement on disarmament but he was anxious to promote early agreement on initial steps and particularly those which would not require political settlement as a pre-condition. These ideas were embodied in the Yugoslav draft resolution (Doc DC/92 of July 10). Attempts were made, with some measure of success, to incorporate the Yugoslav ideas in the four-power draft resolution. The negotiations between the Western Four and Yugoslav Delegation were abandoned however, when the Soviet Union announced that it was prepared to accept the United States figures of 2.5 million and 750 thousand for the levels of forces and the Great Powers.

11. The same move, on the part of the Soviet Union, caused the Western Four to have second thoughts about pressing the four-power draft resolution to a vote. Mr. Nutting, arguing that the situation had changed considerably (the Soviet position was not as inflexible as it had appeared) since the tabling of the four-power declaration on principles of May 4 and since the submission of the joint draft resolution on July 3, strongly recommended that all the proposals before the Commission be referred to the Sub-Committee for study. It was envisaged that the Sub-Committee could examine in detail the shift in Soviet policy implied in Mr. Gromyko's statement on July 12. Mr. Martin and M. Moch supported Mr. Nutting; neither of them had been too enthusiastic about the four-power draft resolution. The United States Delegation, however, was not prepared to change its position merely because Mr. Gromyko had appeared to change his. Mr. Lodge and Mr. Wadsworth argued that the so-called Soviet acceptance of United States figures for the levels of the Great Powers was no real concession and, in the light of the conditions which had been attached to that acceptance, there might be no real change in the Soviet position. In any event, if the Western Powers were not to press their resolution to a vote, the press in the United States would treat the matter as a diplomatic victory, through cheap propaganda, for the Soviet Union.

12. The United States Delegation could not be dissuaded from this point of view, notwithstanding considerable efforts on the part of the other three Western Delegations. After a lengthy consultation it was agreed that Peru, on behalf of the Western Four, would submit a draft resolution (Doc. DC/97 of July 16), prepared by the United States Delegation, which in its preamble would take note of the various proposals and statements made in the Commission and refer specifically to the four-power declaration of principles, and which would ask the Sub-Committee "to study these propositions at the appropriate time" and to report to the Commission which would then examine the various resolutions and proposals "already presented to it or which shall have been presented between now and its next session". This draft resolution was a combination of ideas which M. Moch and Mr. Nutting had advanced. The United States' Western partners reluctantly agreed to support this procedural resolution, which would clearly have the support of at least ten members of the Commission.

13. When the Peruvian draft was presented in the Commission on July 16, Mr. Gromyko reacted vigorously and rejected it as being wholly one-sided. Before the meeting M. Moch had informally discussed the situation with Mr. Sobolev and as a result, had proposed in the Commission, before Gromyko's rejection of the Peruvian proposal, that the authors of various proposals might meet during a brief recess to see whether a procedural text acceptable to all could be drafted. This suggestion was supported by Mr. Gromyko and the Yugoslav Representative, who was clearly disappointed by the Peruvian text. M. Moch made no effort to consult his Western partners about this variation of agreed tactics. The result was that when the proposal for a recess was put to a vote, it was not carried because of a three-way split in the vote. (Belgium, Canada, United Kingdom and United States voted against it.) M. Moch obviously angered by the refusal of his Western partners to make even a show of trying to reach an agreed text, complained bitterly about the rejection of the proposal for a recess. This clear rift in the Western ranks did much to undo the tactics followed throughout the Commission debate and greatly reduced the value of the voting victory which the United States desired.

Soviet Position

14. Mr. Gromyko's first major intervention on July 3 was not very effective as propaganda. The Soviet Union had some strong talking points; there was the superficial argument that every time the Soviet Union agreed to accept proposals made by the West, the Western Powers withdrew from those proposals; there were the unilateral reductions which the Soviet Union had announced and which it was carrying out, notwithstanding the failure of the discussions in the Sub-Committee and the apparent reluctance of the Western Powers to follow suit; there was the traditional Soviet position on nuclear disarmament and the prohibition of tests; the Soviet Union could even claim to have broadened its approach to the questions of control. Moreover, there were obvious differences among the Western Four which could have been exploited not only to divide them but to show the impracticability of the Western position as a basis for negotiation. Mr. Gromyko used most of the arguments at hand but not as effectively as he might have done. He seemed to have no interest in driving wedges between the Western partners.

15. His second major intervention on July 12 was more effective, although it contained obvious distortions and was too reminiscent of Soviet cold war speeches. The Soviet Delegation made a point of requesting a meeting of the Commission at a time when it had been previously agreed that no meeting should be held. This clearly added emphasis to what Mr. Gromyko had to say. After a lengthy attack on the Western Powers for blocking the solution of the disarmament problem, an attack which dealt with Western policies in all areas, Mr. Gromyko pointed the way out of the impasse by summarizing what the Soviet Union was proposing on disarmament.

16. He made four main points;

(a) The Soviet Union proposed to conclude an agreement on the unconditional prohibition of weapons of mass destruction, the elimination of all stocks of atomic bombs and cessation of their production. It proposed to conclude an immediate agreement on the immediate cessation of all tests of atomic and hydrogen weapons. Whether separate agreements were being proposed was not clear but the implication of Soviet proposals and statements in the Sub-Committee last Spring is that separate agreements might be concluded.

(b) The Soviet Union favoured a considerable reduction of the armed forces of the Great Powers. Since "our partners do not agree to this", Mr. Gromyko said, the Soviet Union "agrees that the level of armed forces will be established now for the Soviet Union, the United States and China at the level of 2.5 million each; for the United Kingdom and France 750 thousand men each; for other countries no more than 150 thousand to 200 thousand men each; in order that as a second step the armed forces of the United States, the People's Republic of China and the Soviet Union should be reduced to the level of 1 million to 1.5 million each and those of the United Kingdom and France to 650 thousand men each." Armaments and military expenditures would be reduced "correspondingly".

(c) The Soviet Union wanted an effective control over the prohibition of atomic weapons and reductions in armaments and armed forces. Mr. Gromyko then summarized the Soviet position on control as proposed on March 27.

(d) As an interim measure the Soviet Government called anew on all powers to accept the "Draft Declaration of States regarding Measures to Strengthen Universally Powers of the Security of Peoples" (Doc. D/C88 of July 3). This draft declaration had been tabled by

Mr. Gromyko on July 3 and in essence was a reiteration of earlier Soviet proposals that the powers concerned renounce the use of atomic and hydrogen weapons and, in general, the use of the threat of force. It was probably tabled as a direct counter to the four-power draft resolution.

Further comment on the Soviet position is contained in the Assessment — Part B of this report.

Canada's Position

17. The Canadian position was reviewed in some detail in a statement by Mr. Martin in the Disarmament Commission on July 5 (the text is contained in Doc. DC/PV 53). Mr. Martin emphasized once again Canada's apprehension that, if steps were not soon taken to check the spiralling development of nuclear weapons, including their means of delivery, the powers concerned might shortly find themselves in a situation in which it would be no longer practicable to implement an effectively controlled programme of disarmament. In that era of "push-button" weapons the dangers and anxieties of the present would be greatly magnified. Mr. Martin argued, as the Canadian Representative had done in the Sub-Committee, that a start on disarmament should be made at once and in immediate circumstances; that however limited the agreement might be, it would have a significant psychological and political effect which could lead to more complex agreements not only on disarmament but on broader political issues. Expressing guarded welcome to their unilateral steps toward conventional disarmament, Mr. Martin urged the Soviet authorities to join in an agreement which would include nuclear elements and, in short, to demonstrate that the repudiation of Stalinism at home had its counterpart in a less distrustful and more constructive attitude toward the problem of international disarmament.

18. This statement was warmly welcomed by all members of the Commission except the Soviet Representative. It received wide and favourable coverage in the press. In another intervention on July 13 (DC/PV 59) Mr. Martin commented on the problem of nuclear tests which had been raised in detail by Mr. Krishna Menon. Mr. Martin referred to the study in Canada of the effects of atomic radiation and urged that national studies of this kind should be co-ordinated closely with the work of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation. He expressed Canadian support for some form of limitation of test explosions of a military nature, preferably within the context of other measures for disarmament under effective control.

19. Behind the scenes the Canadian Delegation worked strenuously to maintain solidarity in the Western ranks. This was a continuation of the role which Canadian representatives had played during the Sub-Committee session in London. The aim was to reconcile as far as possible the differences in approach among the Western Three. At the Commission Session, as indicated elsewhere in this report, Mr. Martin was mainly concerned with bridging the gap between M. Moch and Mr. Lodge. Unfortunately although some success was achieved in the informal consultations among the Western Four, all efforts at reconciliation were largely offset by M. Moch's sudden and emotional outburst in the closing minutes of the session.

Other Positions in the Commission

20. The Yugoslav position was perhaps the most interesting among the non-members of the Sub-Committee. The Yugoslav Representative favoured the four-power principles but he was concerned about the emphasis on political settlements (Sub-paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Draft Resolution). The Yugoslavs believed that the emphasis should be on the need for an immediate agreement on measures which could be implemented at an early date. They were ready to accept the United States figures for force levels in the first phase; they believed that some nuclear measures should be included from the outset, and particularly the cessation or at least the limitation of nuclear tests; reduction in military expenditure should also be part of the agreement. The Yugoslavs worked strenuously to bring about some accommodation between the opposing points of view. They seemed genuinely disappointed when the Peruvian text was pressed as the procedural motion designed to meet the situation in the Commission. Throughout the proceedings the Yugoslav Representative showed no disposition to side with the Soviet Union and privately dismissed the Soviet draft resolution as worthless.

21. The Australian Delegation was most anxious to have a debate in the Commission which would provide some direction to the Sub-Committee when it reconvened. It was to some extent the result of Australia's efforts that a full and useful discussion did take place. The Western Four and the Soviet Delegation were encouraged to give a complete disclosure of their positions and the Australians and Yugoslavs responded by giving clear views of non-members of the Sub-Committee. Dr. Walker's main statement on July 9 was well balanced and thought-provoking and demonstrated that the problems of disarmament are not confined to those of the principal members of the Sub-Committee. The Australian amendment served to round out the four-power draft resolution.

22. Among the remaining members of the Commission the Representative of Iran was the most helpful contributor. His replies to Mr. Gromyko and his support for the Western position were well-timed and to the point. As in the recent Security Council proceedings, Dr. Abdoh's conduct in the Commission has further enhanced his stature among missions in New York.

23. The Indian intervention on the whole was disappointing. Mr. Menon had not taken the time to prepare his case well and his remarks were largely a repetition of what he and other Indian representatives have said in past United Nations discussion of this subject. Some of his arguments in favour of a "suspension" of nuclear tests had substance but he failed to back them up with authoritative scientific opinion. Likewise the ideas he advanced for bringing about an armaments truce were not as unrealistic as he made them sound. In addition, he argued briefly but not convincingly in favour of direct negotiations in the interests of the whole world between the United States and the Soviet Union and in favour of an enlargement in the membership of the Commission and its Sub-Committee. Comments on Mr. Menon's intervention were confined to his remarks on the suspension of tests. Taken as a whole the answer was that the need to organize a system of limitation on tests was real but the best scientific advice today indicated that the problem was not as urgent as some advocates of prohibition or suspension proclaimed. M. Moch's immediate reply to Mr. Menon was particularly effective.

PART B

Assessment

24. The broad propaganda attack in Mr. Gromyko's statement of July 12 was dealt with effectively and almost immediately by various members of the Commission. His proposals on disarmament were, however, not directly answered, largely because the Commission was not the forum for the detailed debate on them. It was, moreover, necessary for the Western Powers to study this statement carefully, and particularly the remarks concerning the reduction of armed forces, to see whether Mr. Gromyko had announced a shift in policy or was only making a further manoeuvre to strengthen the public position of the Soviet Union.

25. As a propaganda exercise, the debate in the Commission produced no clear cut advantage to either side. The Western Powers had their voting victory but at the expense of irritating the Soviet Delegation, alienating the Yugoslavs and provoking M. Moch to differ sharply and indignantly with his Western partners. The Soviet Union added substance to its claim to be willing to discuss all aspects of disarmament and to meet all proposals put forward by the West. Mr. Gromyko was, however, unable to answer convincingly the Western protestations about the inadequacy of the control measures proposed by the Soviet Union.

26. On substance the new element in Mr. Gromyko's statement was the section on the reduction of armed forces. The Soviet proposal of March 27 made no mention of stages but merely listed measures which "shall be carried out in 1956-58". There was reference to "gradual reduction" in armaments and armed forces to the levels proposed, that is 1-1.5 million for China, the Soviet Union and United States and 650 thousand for the United Kingdom and France. The size of the annual reduction should be "subject to further agreement". It is not clear whether the Soviet acceptance of the figure 2.5 million "as a first step" is an altogether new proposal or whether it is merely an elaboration of the "gradual reduction" to which the March 27 paper refers. The linking of the acceptance with the "second step" in reductions to the levels proposed on March 27 suggests that there may be no substantial change in the Soviet position. This is substantiated by the linking of the acceptance of 2.5 million with the figure 150-200 thousand as the level of the armed forces of other states. According to the March 27 proposals the level for other countries would be determined at a world conference. Mr. Gromyko's remarks could imply that the passing from step to step (he avoided the word "stage") would be an automatic procedure, that is, without the safeguards which were contemplated in the Anglo-French plan. This was one feature of the March 27 proposal which was criticized by all the Western representatives in the Sub-Committee talks last Spring. Equally objectionable, from the Western point of view, was the absence of a nuclear element. It is true that Mr. Gromyko has re-stated the traditional Soviet position on nuclear disarmament, including the banning of test explosions, but he seemed to adhere to the position taken on March 27 that conventional and nuclear disarmament should be separated for the purpose of reaching earlier agreement. All these factors suggest that Mr. Gromyko's remarks add up to little more than clever propaganda. This seemed to be the conclusion reached by the United States Delegation, at least their preliminary one.

27. Mr. Nutting made much of the change which Mr. Gromyko's remarks implied; this meant that the Sub-Committee should be reconvened soon to examine their full implication. (The United Kingdom position has been that the USSR will not be interested in serious negotiation until May next year when its strength in conventional armed forces is expected to be roughly that of the United States. However, it is important in Mr. Nutting's view to keep the Soviet Union "in check" on every move.) M. Moch tended to support Mr. Nutting although he was less enthusiastic about an early meeting of the Sub-Committee. Whatever the implication of Mr. Gromyko's remarks, it seems clear that if the Western Powers are to make good their case for an agreement on disarmament rather than unilateral reductions, they must be prepared to explore by negotiation, either in the Sub-Committee or elsewhere, every avenue opened by the Soviet Union. It does not follow however, that the Western Four should precipitate a new meeting of the Sub-Committee. Quite the contrary, they should prepare themselves carefully for the next encounter with a view to presenting a solidly united front to the Soviet Union and to exposing fully the hollowness of the Soviet position, if Mr. Gromyko was only making propaganda.

28. In a sense the recent Soviet moves are much more than propaganda. The Soviet Union may not be interested in reaching agreement on a comprehensive programme of disarmament; it may be opposed to any agreement which involves a complex system of inspection and control; but recent moves, like the unilateral reductions of the superficial acceptance of the Western proposals, are designed to do more than merely to evade Western pressure for an agreement on disarmament. Just as the previous Soviet position on the prohibition of nuclear weapons was aimed at weakening Western strength in nuclear weapons, the current emphasis on conventional reductions is designed to wreck NATO with the ominous consequences this would have for the German question. Moreover, the Soviet proposal to ban nuclear tests is designed to appeal to those genuinely anxious about the effects of atomic radiation and to win general sympathy for the Soviet position on disarmament. By all these moves the Soviet Union hopes to compel the Western Powers, reacting to the pressure of public opinion, to adopt measures of disarmament although on security grounds they might be reluctant to do so.

29. For this reason the Western position in the Sub-Committee and elsewhere should not be simply a matter of propaganda. Complex arguments on inspection and control and on the effects of atomic radiation are far less effective as propaganda than announcements about reductions in armed forces and armaments. The best counter to the Soviet position would be a sound proposal which can be easily understood, which takes into account the world's anxiety about nuclear arms development, which has some prospect of early implementation and which the Soviet Union might have difficulty in rejecting, particularly if it has behind its propaganda screen a real interest in reaching some measure of agreement on disarmament. (It might be significant that Mr. Gromyko announced in the closing minutes of the Commission's debate the Soviet Union's "favourable attitude" to the Yugoslav draft resolution.) Accordingly the Western partners should now seek to evolve a first stage plan which they could all endorse whole-heartedly which could be implemented in immediate circumstances and which might stand on its own until broader agreements, on disarmament and other political questions, could be reached.

LIMITATIONS ON TESTS OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

A complete prohibition of tests of all kinds of nuclear weapons, standing alone, would present a number of substantial problems. It would raise Soviet political objections if its control were to be effective. It would involve technical control difficulties which might never be disposed of to the satisfaction of the United States. It might well be opposed by our combined Chiefs of Staff. And it would in all possibility be firmly opposed by the United States and the United Kingdom.

An agreement on the limitation and regulation of test explosions would partly or wholly avoid each of these objections. Satisfactory forms of control can be envisaged which should not involve either political objections on the part of the Soviets or major technical difficulties or an elaborate administrative structure. Limitations relating to size and frequency of explosions should not be open to the same objections on the part of our combined Chiefs as total prohibition. The United Kingdom and the United States have expressed themselves in favour of limitations in certain conditions. And the objectives which would be served by Canadian support of total prohibition of tests can equally well be achieved by a policy of limitation.

Potential Biological Hazards

You will recall that there was no widespread concern over the radiation effects of test explosions until the incident in March 1954 when a Japanese fishing boat some 200 miles from the blast was showered with radioactive fall-out. Only a few days after that event Prime Minister Nehru, speaking in the House of the People, called for "some sort of what may be called "standstill agreement" in respect, at least, of these actual explosions, even if arrangements about the discontinuance of production and stockpiling must await more substantial agreements among those principally concerned". This initiative was followed by declarations in a similar sense in which India participated with other governments including Burma, Ceylon, Egypt, Indonesia and Pakistan as well as at the Bandung Conference. Other expressions in favour of the cessation of tests took the form of parliamentary resolutions in as varied places as Japan and Iceland. In the 1955 British general election the Labour Party included in its platform a policy of seeking agreement on the prohibition of tests.

Concern over the possible effects of radiation from test explosions inspired India's request to the General Assembly last year to consider the effects of atomic radiation. This fact was somewhat concealed by the far more general United States agenda item with which it was combined. Indeed, General Assembly resolution 913 (X) which established the Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation refers only indirectly to the effects of test explosions when it mentions radioactive fall-outs in the preamble. The Scientific Committee met in March and evolved its initial programme and circulated requests for specific data. It is to meet again in October to consider the reports received. According to our representative, the Committee has got away to a good start and is functioning satisfactorily. It may therefore be expected that in due course it will produce useful data and guidance.

In the meantime, it may be recalled that there have been a number of expressions of opinion on the hazards of radiation, both official and unofficial. The two sets of views on the whole tend to differ for the reason that the official statements have been particular, having been based upon the measured radiation levels in specified locations following explosions which have already taken place. The unofficial views tend to be general and to be projected from calculations as to the possible future effects of repeated tests over a span of several years or of warfare involving thermo-nuclear weapons (the unofficial alarm about the effects of warfare received unexpected support this month from the evidence given in the United States Senate Armed Services Committee that thermo-nuclear war would involve "hundreds of millions" fatalities).

It would appear, however, that the biological problem is by no means confined to the hazards of weapons tests. Indeed, the reports of both the United States National Academy of Sciences and of the British Medical Research Council which were published last month, suggest that weapons tests constitute only the most spectacular part of the problem of radiation hazards. Among the other aspects of constantly growing importance is, for example, the problem of the disposal of radioactive waste generated in large quantities by nuclear power stations.

The best scientific opinion, which we will proceed to verify to the extent possible from Canadian sources, seems to support the thesis expressed by M. Moch in the Disarmament Commission to the effect that, although the hazards should not be minimized, the risks are not immediate and if tests continue at the present rate even for an indefinite period the increase in radioactivity would be negligible.

Prohibition of Tests and Prospects of Nuclear Warfare

It is worth noting that the concern over thermonuclear test explosions has an emotional and political character of its own. Perhaps because the first atomic bomb test, as well as several subsequent series, was conducted in the continental United States, such lesser explosions were not regarded as posing a separate problem from the general question of how to achieve an effectively controlled prohibition of atomic weapons.

Suggestions that a limitation or even a prohibition of tests would have a serious impact on the general problem are to a considerable extent ex post facto rationalizing of a sentiment which had its origins in alarm over the biological and more particularly the genetic effects of large scale hydrogen tests. While the present British attitude indicates that there is some substance to the view that a ban on large scale tests would inhibit production as far as non-thermo-nuclear powers are concerned, it is at least doubtful that the prohibition or limitation of tests would seriously impair the weapons programmes of the United States or the Soviet Union. On the other hand, it would appear that to some extent and at any rate temporarily a complete prohibition of tests would assist in dealing with the "Fourth-Country Problem".⁸⁵ However, although competent scientific advice in this matter must still be sought, it seems reasonable to suppose that the protection against the emergence of new nuclear powers afforded by such means would be of diminishing value with the passage of time.

Political Advantages of a Limitation Agreement

The foregoing considerations could be somewhat elaborated but perhaps sufficient has been stated to suggest that a limitation on nuclear tests or even their prohibition is not likely to make any appreciable practical contribution to the elimination of either the possibility of atomic warfare or the potential biological hazards of radiation.

However, arguments of this nature are of little avail in the public domain. The very real fact remains that there is widespread alarm about radiation and particularly about radioactive fall-out. That alarm is unlikely to be allayed by closely woven reasoning. Some kind of action is required and it can be effective if it is directed to the root of the alarm, namely large scale hydrogen explosions.

An agreement on the limitation of the size and frequency of test explosions would hardly fail to have a great psychological effect despite the absence of any real practical purpose. It cannot be contested that at the present time the Western Powers are on the propaganda defensive in this matter. The attack has been pressed with increasing vigour by the Asian and African groups in the United Nations as well as by the Communist members. A majority of the new members may be expected to adopt similar attitudes. With the passage of time a negative policy seems likely to enjoy waning popularity and support which ultimately may be confined to the NATO members, and perhaps not all of them, the "old" Commonwealth members, some Latin American States such as Brazil and Cuba and a few scattered others. Should the matter be raised in the General Assembly in the form of a specific agenda item, it is quite possible that the majority would endorse a recommendation in favour of the complete prohibition of tests. This is a factor to be taken into account in considering whether a policy favouring a limitation agreement, even in isolation, may be desirable.

There is in addition the prevalent attitude that disarmament can advantageously be approached through a series of partial agreements. Once embarked upon this course, as we are now, it does not seem wholly appropriate to hold to a position for alleged bargaining purposes (which may be less real than imaginary) if there are no inherent objections to a particular agreement.

Objections

Against such a policy the principal arguments are that the United Kingdom, for reasons given below which may be temporary, and the United States, for less clear reasons, are opposed. Both assert, with slight variations, that an agreement on limitations is acceptable only in the framework of an agreement which would also prohibit the production of additional nuclear weapons and provide adequate controls. The burden of their argument is that in the absence of a broad agreement on nuclear weapons, they are forced to work on their development in the interests of their own security and that of their allies and of the non-Communist States in general. A question which doubtless only they can answer to their own satisfaction is whether a limitation on the size and frequency of the test explosions which would satisfy the Afro-Asian alarm would materially affect their weapon development programmes. Having drawn a conclusion in this matter, they would then have to judge whether whatever effect was involved was sufficient to justify opposition to substantial and growing criticism in and out of the United Nations. We should perhaps reflect upon whether it may be desirable to raise these considerations with them with a view to a better comprehension of the basis of their positions.

It may well be the case that neither the United States nor the Soviet Union would find themselves greatly inconvenienced by a limitation now on the size and frequency of explosions. However, the United Kingdom Government have repeatedly made clear their determination to proceed with an hydrogen bomb test in the coming year. It is a matter for consideration whether it would be desirable for Canada to pursue a course which would have the appearance of tending to frustrate that policy.⁸⁶ However, this inhibition may well cease to have importance after the British experiment and the British may be prepared to anticipate their own success.

Canada has, of course, ample area for the conduct of even substantial explosions. However, a limitation agreement which aimed at confining tests to the metropolitan territories, which might easily turn out to be the desire of the South-Asian group, might cause considerable embarrassment to the United Kingdom and perhaps France which we would wish to avoid.

From the strictly Canadian point of view, the general position of the combined Chiefs of Staff is that in the absence of a comprehensive agreement on nuclear weapons, it is not advisable to foreclose the possibility of Canada developing and producing nuclear weapons. A partial agreement which prohibited further production without providing satisfactory guarantees against sudden attack would make us dependent on the United Kingdom and the United States for the supply of what may shortly become the mainstay of aerial defence. It is not inconceivable that Canada may wish to experiment with small-scale nuclear weapons for interception. These considerations do not seem to constitute a direct reason why Canada should have objections to a limitation on test explosions which was directed towards regulating their size and frequency.

⁸⁶ Voir aussi, Chapitre 4, 3^e partie, section c(iv).
See also Chapter 4, Part 3, Section c(iv).

The Problem of Control

The techniques of detection are perhaps not adequate to ensure that all minimum explosions are registered but they are certainly satisfactory in the upper ranges. Thus there would be no technical difficulty about the bases for control. Specifications relating to the size and frequency factors could be established in the light of data collected by the United Nations Scientific Committee.

It occurs to me, furthermore, that an agreement providing for the limitation and regulation of nuclear tests might call for the setting up of some kind of an agency to serve as a clearing house for notices concerning further tests and for reports as to compliance with the provisions of the agreement. In order to avoid discussions whether a particular test had been within agreed limitations it may be necessary to provide for independent measurements to be made or, if this is not practicable, for some scheme whereby both sides could be satisfied that such tests as had been carried out had not violated the provisions of the agreement. Thus Soviet scientists might be allowed to observe U.S. tests and vice versa. It is possible therefore that an agreement on the limitation and regulation of tests might enable us to make a modest start in setting up some kind of control machinery either bilateral or multilateral. This is a point which we propose to explore farther with service and scientific experts if you agree.

As to U.K. plans for additional tests, it is possible that before an agreement could be negotiated on limitation and regulation, their current programme calling for large scale explosions may have been completed; if not, the agreement could presumably allow for one or two exceptions to the specified maxima on the grounds that the U.K. should be allowed to protect their investment and that one or two more large scale tests would not seriously increase the radiation danger.

The important point to bear in mind and one which I wish to stress particularly is that, unless the manufacture and use of nuclear weapons can be prohibited — and this could not be done unless most elaborate control and inspection machinery could be set up — a complete ban on nuclear tests would allow an unscrupulous State to improve its present weapons of mass destruction by carrying out small scale tests which cannot be detected. For this reason, and until agreement can be reached on the elimination of nuclear weapons, the U.S. and the U.K. have to be allowed to pursue their weapons research and development if they are not to be caught by surprise. Our proposal is merely therefore that this process should be kept within certain bounds which are susceptible of control, bearing in mind popular concern over the effects of large scale explosions.

Conclusions

To sum up, there appear to be more advantages than disadvantages to a policy of support for an agreement on limitation of test explosions in respect of their size and frequency. The timing of any announcement to this effect, however, could advisably be postponed until the United Kingdom have conducted their experiment unless pressure should arise in the General Assembly, in which case the timing might well require reconsideration. In the interim, if you agree that the political advantages envisaged justify such a course, we would seek the detailed views of the Combined Chiefs on the military aspects and scientific opinion as appropriate. Should the response from these sources be along the lines we now anticipate, it might then be proper to seek to persuade the United Kingdom and the United States to modify their position that an agreement on limitations is acceptable only in a broader framework.

LIMITATIONS ON NUCLEAR TESTS

The Chiefs of Staff Committee on October 3 considered recommendations concerning limitations on nuclear tests and as a statement of national defence policy agreed:

(a) That, inasmuch as the defence of the NATO Area is dependent on the use of atomic weapons, Canada should support the continuance of the minimum tests necessary to ensure that the use of these weapons will be effective; and that there may be a requirement in the foreseeable future for the testing of such weapons by or on behalf of Canada for use in the defence of North America. It is unlikely that the testing of such weapons by or on behalf of Canada in the next five years would substantially increase the amount of radioactivity present in the atmosphere.

(b) That an annual world limit for atomic test explosions would be acceptable provided any such limit meets the defence requirements of NATO without endangering public health throughout the world. Information available in Canada indicates that it may be possible to set an annual world limit which would meet these two requirements.

(c) To the principle of each nation reporting at a reasonable length of time beforehand to an international committee the time, place and expected yield of all atomic explosions; and to the committee checking subsequently to the best of its ability on the accuracy of the report.

This paper was considered at an informal and exploratory interdepartmental meeting on October 5 between External Affairs, National Defence and National Health and Welfare with a view to initiating the development of recommendations for an agreed Canadian policy. While nothing firm emerged from this meeting, the reasons for the absence of concrete result are of substantial interest.

It became much more clearly understood that quite apart from the international political pressures in favour of the prohibition or at least limitations of test explosions, there may well be a case on medical and general health grounds for early action on test explosions. The technical considerations which support this view are necessarily tentative, incomplete and controversial. The variables relate both to estimates of the quantities of radioactive products which have been added to our environment by test explosions and to opinions on the levels at which either the somatic or the genetic hazards become serious. However, it would appear that according to the more conservative views, i.e. those which set the quantity of radiation added at a high figure and the danger threshold at a low figure, the point has already been reached at which nuclear explosions should cease. Even the more "optimistic" group would set this point only a few years in the future. Such judgements are, of course, based on the thesis that any adverse effects on human beings, whether present populations or future populations, should be avoided.

National Health and Welfare would prefer not to adopt a position immediately on these matters. During the next three or four weeks there will be a series of conferences — of Commonwealth experts in London beginning on October 9, of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada in Washington about October 18 and of the United Nations Scientific Committee in New York beginning on October 22. All these conferences are concerned with the effects of radiation and it is hoped that from them will emerge fresh and more soundly-based estimates as a result of a pooling of data and their common evaluation.

The root of the National Defence position is that only atomic weapons, perhaps of a very large size, can provide effective defences for Canada against certain forms of atomic attack now in process of evolution. More generally, they have in mind the need to maintain the continuing effectiveness of the deterrent in the hands of the United States and the United Kingdom. For both these reasons they consider that Canada has an interest in the continuance of tests on the necessary scale. And because of the lack of original Canadian data on the effects of nuclear explosions, they are inclined to think that we should go along with any specific recommendations from the United States and the United Kingdom.

National Health and Welfare appears to have had in mind the need, in approaching a policy on test explosions, to take into consideration the requirements of other departments, especially National Defence. One result of the meeting was to give them a better appreciation of the problems confronting the Chiefs of Staff in this matter.

National Defence apparently hitherto have regarded limitations on tests as having no appreciable intrinsic merit from the point of view of any necessity to safeguard general health in Canada and the world at large. They seem to have thought that the only pressures which had to be met were in the international political sphere. The meeting appeared to impress them with the need to give greater consideration to radiation hazards as a proximate problem in framing their policy. Thus point (b) in the conclusions of the Chiefs of Staff may be reconsidered by them when there is more complete information available.

We hope to review the question in November in the light of the information emerging from the various technical meetings on radiation. In the interim, it would be difficult to frame a general statement on limitation which would go beyond what you have already said publicly and even more difficult to participate in any detailed negotiations. However, our most recent information on the intentions in Washington and London does not suggest that there is likely to be any consultation among the Four Powers on disarmament prior to the General Assembly. The delay may therefore be acceptable. It should still be possible to evolve a reasonably specific policy endorsed by all the departments concerned before the beginning of the Committee discussions on disarmament in the General Assembly.

DISARMAMENT

Ivor Pink of the UK Delegation mentioned to us today the brief discussion on disarmament which has taken place in Washington between the UK, the USA and the French and gave us the text of the memo quoted below. He stressed that this memo represented at the moment only his own views since he had not yet had an opportunity to have it considered by the Foreign Office or by the Foreign Secretary. He said that the USA Delegation has agreed to a UK request for further discussions on disarmament in the near future in New York. Such discussions would include the USA, France, UK and ourselves. Following is the text of the memo mentioned above.

As a result of Anglo-American discussions in Washington on November 19 the State Department have suggested that Western comments on the Soviet statement of November 17 on disarmament should be coordinated between delegations in New York.

It is therefore suggested that in any speeches by ministers or statements by the delegations of Canada, France, USA and UK, the following points might be covered.

1. The Western Powers are always ready to consider any constructive disarmament proposals. The proper place for such discussion is the specialist bodies established by the UN for this purpose — the Disarmament Commission and its Sub-Committee. Experience last year at Geneva does not suggest that high level conferences, such as are now suggested by the Soviet Government, are likely to prove effective.
2. The new Soviet statement is a transparent attempt to divert attention from brutal repression of the Hungarian people's bid for freedom. This is shown by the way their disarmament proposals are sandwiched in the middle of a long statement composed chiefly of threats and propaganda.
3. There is not much that is new in the Soviet proposals. For the most part they are "the mixture as before". They are obviously designed to disrupt NATO while making no attempt to remove the political tensions which have made such defence organizations necessary.
4. The hypocritical nature of the proposals is shown by the revival of the demand for the elimination of the world's stockpiles of nuclear weapons, following closely on the announcement of another Russian test explosion. The Russians know that this is quite unrealistic so long as there is no known method of detecting hidden stocks of nuclear weapons.
5. The only step forward is the grudging acceptance of the principle of aerial inspection as part of the system of control. But the Russians only say that they are "prepared to consider the question of employing aerial photography" within an area 800 km east and west of the present demarcation line in Europe "provided the countries concerned give their consent". Since the USA and the Soviet Union would be outside the area, as defined by the Soviet statement, this plan would provide no guarantee against a surprise attack, which was the purpose of the original proposal as put forward by President Eisenhower in Geneva. It would also seem designed to perpetuate the present division of Germany and of Europe. In any case, this suggestion only forms part of a package deal containing other totally unacceptable elements.
6. Apart from the apparent concession on aerial inspection, the Soviet statement is as vague as ever on the crucial question of effective international control. Nov30/56. Ends.

DISARMAMENT: SOVIET PROPOSALS

Soviet disarmament proposals as published in New York Times November 18 have now been circulated by Soviet Delegation as an Assembly document and will no doubt form basis of Shepilov's statement in general debate within next few days.

2. As a result of consultations in Washington and New York plus NATO consultations in Paris, Western Delegations here may shortly have basis for a common line in discussion with press and other delegations. While we appreciate difficulty for UK and French delegations in reacting moderately to Soviet propaganda attacking their actions in the Middle East and threatening Western Europe, we would still prefer a less belligerent expression of Western position than that contained in UK draft given us by Pink (our telegram under reference).

3. From our soundings of delegations here we are convinced impact of Soviet proposal should not be under-estimated. We shall have to explain our case carefully if we are to avoid Soviet rebuttal that every time they make an advance towards positions previously taken by Western Delegations, we retreat. Although only aerial inspection part of Soviet proposal is much of a concession, and their package as a whole is unacceptable, they will present their proposals as middle alternative to previous "all or nothing" approach. Senior Soviet member of Secretariat yesterday told Frey of Secretariat that their proposal was a response to Moch's appeal at July 10 meeting of Disarmament Commission for some kind of partial scheme. Moreover, records of Geneva Conference last year can be cited to show Eden's support for demilitarization and reciprocal inspection of Central Europe on either side of East/West line and USA interest in a European security system linking some NATO and Warsaw Pact Powers. Privately we can also recall USA consideration of similar ideas last spring.

4. However we interpret significance of arrogant Soviet threats in preface to their disarmament proposals, they recall to many delegations here the revival of the Molotov touch. They do not want the world to mistake their disarmament proposals as indicating weakness in their position but underline the fact they hold a shotgun at Western Europe, balancing the strategic air command threat to their heartland.

5. One substantial advance in their position is acceptance of limited aerial inspection in addition to other measures of control (cross roads inspection, etc) which they proposed some eighteen months ago. It is, however, unclear when, as well as where, aerial and other inspection would be introduced, i.e., at beginning, middle or end of two year period.

6. Emphasis on liquidation within two years of foreign bases is in line with old proposals but calculated to have wide appeal at present Assembly, especially to enlarged Afro-Asian group. We take it that their proposal would require withdrawal of foreign forces from Germany and Eastern Europe within two years. Once again they seek neutralization of Germany without reunification and exert pressure for westward withdrawal of NATO forces to parallel any eastward withdrawal of Soviet forces from satellites they may have to carry out in accordance with October 30 policy declaration and precedent of Polish-Soviet accord. Obvious implication is readiness to consider a European security treaty involving NATO and [EETO] countries under which security guarantees could be exchanged as requested at Geneva and in Soviet reply to German note of September on reunification. Perhaps complementary Soviet proposals on German reunification will follow before next year's elections in Germany. (German Delegation's reactions are being reported separately).

7. Even if Soviet Summit Conference proposal is rejected, we may anticipate a Soviet or Indian inspired move in the Assembly to add India to the Disarmament Subcommittee. Our only feeling here at present is that we should leave the pros and cons of this debate to others. From what USA/UK Delegations have already said to us, they would clearly wish Canada to remain a member of any enlarged subcommittee which might have to include not only India but a Latin. Canada would be in a very difficult position if India were added to the Subcommittee and from our own point of view it might be better if we withdrew in favour of India, but I see little point now in crossing these bridges and still less point in worrying about keeping Canada on the Subcommittee for prestige reasons. We can surely take the position that at the present stage of disarmament negotiations it is preferable to keep them within the UN framework in spite of Russian efforts to transfer them elsewhere.

8. Apart from our public position, the most urgent question is to produce some positive Western alternative proposal instead of merely pointing out loopholes and shortcomings in the Soviet proposal. I think, if you agree, we should make representations in Washington immediately in this sense. The USA must bear the prime responsibility for bringing forward concrete new proposals. In view of our need of USA support on Middle Eastern and other urgent matters, we should not press them too hard on what is for the moment a secondary question, but I hope they are working on it and it may be helpful to those in Washington, who feel as we do, if we let them know how we feel.

9. With reference to Washington's telegram 2117 November 20,† we think it is probably too late to pursue bilateral consultations as planned. It might be more effective for a USA/UK/France/Canada working party to consult in New York, as agreed by the UK and USA Delegations, or in Washington if senior people are more available there.

A NEW LOOK AT LIMITATION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

It is, I think, a pity, especially in the light of Soviet proposals, that Western Powers cannot quickly agree to ban or at least limit tests. Our info here is that UK and French Governments would be prepared to limit tests for at least a year along the lines of Nutting's statement in July and mine in August.⁸⁷ It seems fairly well established that USA Government had planned to announce some such proposal until Stevenson outbid them in the presidential campaign but it may be possible for them to go back to it before placed on defensive by India, Japan (if she is admitted) and Afro-Asians generally, who will demand abolition of all tests and cite strontium 90 worries as India has done already. I therefore propose to refer to this question in my general debate speech along lines of notes prepared in the department.⁸⁸

2. I realize of course Canada cannot take the lead in this matter but I also feel that it would be irresponsible of us to remain passive much longer merely to avoid embarrassing the USA.

DISARMAMENT

You will have seen the Minister's opinion in Candel Telegram 1359 about the urgency of producing some positive Western proposal, you should make immediate representations as he suggests. It seems to us that in effect this will amount to adducing these fresh reasons for the United States informing the other Western members of the Sub-Committee of the general contents of their plans even if the detail has yet to receive final adjustment and approval. You might also observe that information on the United States plan might easily have an important bearing on the Minister's remarks on disarmament in his main statement in the General Assembly.

2. It seems to us that the principal point is that the Soviet Union once again has succeeded in seizing the initiative in disarmament at least from the propaganda point of view. Disarmament undoubtedly is a secondary issue as compared with the Middle East and Hungary but in our opinion it ranks high after them. We think it important that a clear indication soon be given that the Western Powers are preparing proposals. However, we would hope that such an announcement could be followed shortly by action and for this reason we are anxious to see the proposals before such an announcement is made. We are becoming increasingly apprehensive that the United States may judge it expedient to present their proposals in the Assembly before there is an opportunity of receiving their partners considered reactions. Quite apart from the tactical difficulties in the subsequent disarmament discussions which might result from such action there is the broader consideration of the additional setback which would be given to the restoration of general Western solidarity.

3. The idea of a series of bilateral talks may have to be discarded at this stage. We would accept immediately any system of consultation which might be proposed to begin exchanges of view without delay. This attitude applies also to the question of location but we can see advantages in making New York the center.

LIMITATION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

As you know we have been trying for some months to evolve a positive policy on nuclear tests. We have been handicapped seriously in two ways. First National Defence has been unable to make an appreciation on its own account as to how pressing the military necessity is to continue tests on either thermonuclear or atomic weapons. In this respect they and we in turn have had to rely largely upon the statements unsupported by full access to the technical facts available to the United States and the United Kingdom. Secondly Health and Welfare has had to base its advice to us on incomplete evidence and conflicting judgment of authoritative scientists regarding the degree of the immediate health and future genetic hazards. We had hoped for helpful guidance from the material collected by the United Nations Scientific Committee but their data still seems inadequate for drawing firm conclusions.

2. Our point of departure has been Minister's statement in the House. There is also the existence of wide political demand concentrated in but not confined to the nations of Africa and Asia that the hazards inherent in nuclear tests be eliminated. It seems to us that it is reasonable and defensible to maintain our position that the total abolition of tests can only be brought about as a part of a broader disarmament agreement. Having in mind the absence of any attempt on the part of either the Asian or Communist members to draw political conclusions in the Scientific Committee we are inclined to think that a proposal that priority now be given to the discussion on a limitations scheme might go far to meet this general demand.

3. With regard to making suggestions as to the nature of a limitations agreement we doubt that there is enough firm information available to form a judgment. However if you think it desirable to give some indication of what might be a reasonable objective we suggest you might mention the possibility of the atomic powers setting as a self-denying ordinance some annual or other periodic limit on the volume of radiation to be generated, perhaps as an interim measure which could be reviewed after a few years in the light of the data on radiation hazards which the United Nations may by then have gathered. For the present we would be reluctant to advise any less indefinite statement.

4. We think that a suitable statement might be phrased along the following lines. "Although we have received from the Scientific Committee the Assembly established last year whatever comfort we can draw from the absence of alarming conclusions on its part, it does not seem to me that we would be justified in regarding the future with equanimity. In my view the United Nations should give close attention to the question of nuclear tests and I can assure you that we will seek to ensure early and serious consideration of the matter. It seems to me that any agreement is likely to partake of the nature of a compromise. We must be guided by two considerations: we must try to meet whatever may be competently estimated as the requirements of the objective scientific situation and we must enable the needs of defence in a dangerously divided world to be given reasonable satisfaction. Because both of these are indefinite quantities there can for the present time be no facile and final solution. And I do not think we can hope to find a satisfactory arrangement, even of a temporary character, which fails to take into account either consideration. So long as the nuclear powers continue to conduct tests at their own discretion there will be widespread agitation to change the situation, but so long as the proposed solutions exaggerate the importance of one of these two factors and wholly neglect the other they are unlikely to provide an acceptable basis for negotiation. If we consider what we may hope to achieve in present circumstances, I think we may all conclude that we should try to help the nuclear powers in the first instance to agree that they should set, as a self-denying ordinance, some annual or other periodic limit on the volume of radiation to be generated by test explosions. There would have to be some agreed method of allocating quantities between the powers concerned. To maintain confidence there would also have to be some arrangements for notification of the proposed tests and for their verification — and this need not in my view give rise to insuperable difficulties. A system along these lines might serve for the near future during which it might be reviewed from time to time in the light of the data on radiation hazards which the United Nations Scientific Committee will be gathering. It would be my hope that in due course this interim measure would be supplanted by a disarmament agreement which would deal in a more definitive way with nuclear weapons as well as other aspects of disarmament."

NORWEGIAN PROPOSAL RE LIMITATION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

You may wish to take up the Minister before his return to New York the question of whether he might give positive support in his own statement in the general debate to Mr. Lange's proposal yesterday for registering and perhaps limiting nuclear tests.

2. We had already received from the Department notes for the Minister's statement which in some respects go further than Lange although they are less specific as to the reasons which impel us towards limitation of tests. Lange is only suggesting as a first step UN registration, presumably so that major explosions would not accidentally coincide. However, he hints at scientific worries that strontium 90 may be cumulative in vegetation and therefore in human food. These worries which I believe are being examined by Canadian experts now, would add weight to the case for not only registering and spacing out test explosions but limiting them to an agreed maximum yield where fall-out is likely. Such a proposal might at least be put forward as an extension of Lange's suggestion, with the idea that the powers concerned give it a try for a limited period of say one year.

LIMITATIONS ON NUCLEAR TESTS

I have discussed your suggestions with the Minister. He agrees that more specific references to the scientific reasons for proposing limitations are likely to lead to extensive and inconclusive debate between non-experts. You will note in my memorandum of November 24† to the Minister, of which a copy was forwarded by Cadieux to Holmes, that competent scientific opinion is on the whole less alarmed now than it was a few months ago. This was the Department's impression throughout the discussion on November 23 with the radiation experts who also in their summing-up stated specifically that this was the case. However, we are doubtful of the desirability of doing more than pointing to the absence of conclusions on the part of the United Nations Scientific Committee. This seems to us to void the argument that immediate prohibition is required for health and genetic reasons. It sets the stage for the acceptance of limitations as a prophylactic which they were unlikely to receive if offered as a palliative.

2. A trial period of a year seems to be unduly short. The planning and preparation of tests is a lengthy procedure which might take longer than such a trial period. Our idea is to link up limitations as an interim measure with a later agreement on disarmament. In principle this seems preferable to an isolated arrangement.

3. The Minister's view is that it would be desirable to hold to the main lines laid down in our Telegram No. 658 of November 27. Those notes should, however, be adjusted to fit into the context of the debate with suitable references to Mr. Lange's remarks. Our draft strikes a balance between what the Defence and Health authorities regard as desirable which satisfies them both. Any considerable departure from the substance of those notes and in places even the adjustment of the adjectives might make advisable a new discussion of the text with those two departments.

DISARMAMENT

At the request of Matheson, Governor Stassen's Special Assistant in the field of disarmament, we called at the Executive Offices today and were given copy of an informal memo which reads as follows:

"The USA is prepared to consult with Canada with the objective of reaching agreement on a further initiative in the disarmament field. Such initiative should include both conventional and nuclear armaments.

(1) The importance of providing against great surprise attack is a continuing feature of USA policy. The USA is prepared to negotiate the progressive installation of an inspection system with air and ground components, and each step of such an installation should add to the mutual security against great surprise attack. This is considered to be of special importance to the North American continent in safeguarding against the direct outbreak of major war. In conjunction with the progressive installation of such an inspection system the USA is prepared to make concurrent initial reductions in conventional armaments to the first stage force level of 2 1/2 million and 750,000 as a basis for measurement.

(2) Under a disarmament system the USA further suggests that an effort be made to assure that projecting objects through outer space would be exclusively for scientific and peaceful purposes. Toward this purpose tests of such projection should be reciprocally opened to international participation and an inspection system to verify the fulfillment of the commitment should be included.

(3) In the nuclear field it is suggested that a target date be proposed to the USSR after which, under effective inspection and control, future production of fissionable materials would be used or stockpiled exclusively for non-weapons purpose under international supervision.

(4) States possessing nuclear weapons would make transfers of agreed equitable and proportionate increments of fissionable materials in long term sequence from previous production over to international inspection and supervised non-weapons purposes, as an integral part of the arrangement contemplated in para (3). Thus it would be contemplated that the total of nuclear weapons stockpiles in the world would be gradually reduced and the nuclear threat would be lessened.

(5) Subsequent to the agreement and implementation of paragraphs (3) and (4), inseparable therefrom, and under an inspection system to assure the fulfillment of the commitment, both nuclear and thermonuclear test explosions would be limited and controlled."

2. Matheson explained that copy of this informal memo had been given to UK Embassy officials here yesterday, and to the French, each of whom had been asked to secure their government's comments and to be prepared to discuss the substance of the memo on a bilateral basis with the USA authorities at an early date. The UK discussions may be speeded up by the fact that Ivor Pink, who is with the UK Delegation in New York, is at present in Washington and will be discussing this informal memo with Stassen's group.

3. Matheson said that Mr. Stassen, who is primarily responsible for the conduct of these negotiations, had not come to a final decision about future procedure, and has thought it best to leave this matter open for exploration with the other three Western members of the Subcommittee. It is, therefore, hoped that in addition to any questions or observations on the informal memo which we may wish to put forward, and in addition to any new proposals of our own in this field, we will also discuss in the first instance with the USA the procedural aspects of the problem. We drew Matheson's attention to the recent discussions in New York (Candel Telegram 1539 December 3)† and indicated as a personal view, that a decision with respect to procedure could best be taken in the light of knowledge of the basic USA position. Matheson said that no final decisions on the USA side had been taken on either the timing of the next meeting of the Disarmament Commission or as to whether or not such a meeting should be preceded by a meeting of the Subcommittee. They would welcome our views on this point, as well as a substance.

4. Matheson was under instructions from Governor Stassen not to discuss the detail of the informal memo until the government's concerned have had the opportunity of studying the paper and the substantive discussions which the USA would like to hold here in Washington can take place. His only comments were to underline the phrase "progressive installation" in subparagraph (1), the reference to a proposal for a specific target date in subparagraph (3), and to emphasize that the provisions of paragraph (5), while regarded as "inseparable" from agreement and implementation of paragraphs (3) and (4), was not dependent on the full implementation of paragraph (1). Matheson commented on the Norwegian proposal for limitation of tests by saying that it was still the USA view that limitation proposals should only be put forward if they did not serve to mislead public opinion and if it could clearly be demonstrated that they would not mean any reduction in security. Perhaps the most interesting point in the memo is paragraph (2) relating to the control of the use of and testing of "projecting objects through outer space", presumably an obscure reference to the problem of missiles, including the ICBM.

5. Apart from this point which is new and important, our first reaction is that the lengthy labours of the USA authorities in this field have produced surprisingly little. You will, however, wish to examine these proposals in detail, and when your comments and views have been formulated, I think it would be useful to consider sending a qualified department representative from Ottawa or from New York to Washington for the substantive discussions which are envisaged.

6. We shall keep in touch with the UK and French Missions informally on this matter.

DISARMAMENT

Our examination of the United States proposals in the department and in the working group has raised several questions, the answers to which will affect our ultimate position. General queries are whether this informal memorandum is to be understood as presenting a first stage proposal or all the disarmament measures which the United States expects to consider in the foreseeable future; whether the five points constitute a package; and whether there are supplementary papers to be received along the lines of the "resolutions to be adopted" and "things to be signed" mentioned in Permis Telegram 662 of August 29.†

2. Our broad reaction is that the proposals are unimpressive. It seems to us that whether the criterion is negotiability or propaganda value, they leave considerable room for improvement.

3. Most of the merits of the scheme from the point of view of negotiability seem to be concentrated in the first point. Since the submission of the Eisenhower proposals we have inclined to the opinion that there was only a remote possibility that the Soviets could be persuaded to agree to mutual aerial reconnaissance unconnected with measures of disarmament which they consider important. We therefore welcome the readiness to link up the aerial inspection system with disarmament measures.

4. It is not clear whether both the air and the ground components of inspection would be required from the outset. We can see a political advantage if the time of the beginning of aerial inspection is intended to be negotiable. We have in mind that it might be dispensable in the initial period when information on forces, military installations, etc. would be exchanged prior to the beginning of reductions. We are as anxious as any to see aerial inspection begun and therefore would regret what may be an unnecessary insistence on its being the very first measure which might prevent its attainment at all. It seems to us that the Western Powers should consider whether they could be satisfied if flights unrestricted as to area and frequency could be achieved by the time the first stage force levels were reached. Possibly an intermediate stage could be along the lines of the Soviet proposal for aerial inspection astride the dividing line in Europe. We assume that the United States will insist on verification from the outset of the size of forces, armaments and budgets and of their reduction through ground inspection of the "objects of control" and that they will wish a ground control post scheme to be in operation at an early date. We would think it proper to continue this insistence on the effective positioning of ground inspection officials before any reductions are begun and perhaps before any disclosures are made. In their March 27 proposals the Soviets seemed to concede this point.

5. It does not seem easy to devise any very precise relationship between the progressive installation of the inspection system and the execution of the first stage reductions. We wonder whether the United States envisages something more elaborate than setting a period for the development of the control system according to specified phases and providing that by the end of the period the agreed force levels should be reached.

6. These are the main questions which occur to us in connection with the first point of the memorandum. We consider the progressive concept to be a practical one which could be developed into useful and negotiable specific proposals. However, we would like to be given rather more detail of what the United States has in mind.

7. The meaning of point two was obscure until your telegram 2270 arrived. One remaining question is whether artificial satellites are intended to be included as well as the ICBM. We also wonder whether this point is an essential component or only an additional suggestion which might be negotiated separately. We are doubtful of the desirability of making a first stage agreement dependent upon the settlement of this new problem. However, it appears to be a matter on which we could hardly raise objections if the United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union were prepared to agree.

8. In approaching points three and four we must pay due attention to the implications of the views held in National Defence as to the possible future needs of the air defences of Canada. On these points also much will depend upon the sort of detailed scheme which is contemplated. The approximate timing envisaged for the target date is regarded in National Defence as being of critical importance. Another factor is whether provision would be made out of existing stockpiles by the United States for nuclear weapons to be made available to Canadian operational control if the need should arise.

9. The scheme appears to offer one procedure for bringing about a substantial reduction in the stockpiles of nuclear weapons. However, it seems to us that it is likely to impress the Soviets as designed to prevent them from overtaking the nuclear lead of the United States and to retain throughout the indefinite period of the agreement the present relative superiority of the United States. This kind of reflection leads us to wonder whether a scheme for proportional reduction in the nuclear field will be any more palatable to the Soviets than the Soviet proposals for proportionate reductions in armed forces were to the West. The logical consequence of this thought is to wonder whether the United States has already considered and rejected the possibility of a system of levels for nuclear stockpiles comparable to the system of levels for armed forces and whether they have a position based on such concepts prepared to which they could retreat, thereby making the show of a concession.

10. In the working group it was suggested that as point four raises so many problems for the defence authorities, assuming that the reduction programme is intended to be continued until a low level is reached, and since in its present form it seems likely to be rejected by the Soviets, consideration might be given to omitting it or at any rate to modifying its terms.

11. As you are aware, we are not convinced of the necessity to make limitations on test explosions dependent upon agreement on other measures in the nuclear field or even in the conventional field. We continue to hold that the complete cessation of tests requires a broader framework. However, perusal of the public statements of the United States authorities, including the White House release which you summarized in your telegram 1917 of October 25,† does not reveal any persuasive arguments showing that limitations cannot safely be considered separately and in advance.⁸⁹ The United States views on this matter conveyed in paragraph four of your telegram 2259 appear to us to reflect an approach which is the opposite of that which we consider advisable and even necessary. It seems to us that the onus lies on the United States to show that a limitation agreement standing alone would mislead public opinion and lead to a reduction in security. In brief, the conditions for limitations laid down in point five do not seem to us to be either necessary for security reasons or desirable for political reasons.

12. These are our preliminary comments. However, there is a general need for clarification and we would wish to give our position a comprehensive review after you have secured further detail.

13. To assist in preparing for your discussions with Stassen's office Captain Ellis is ready to proceed to Washington. You will also note from Candel telegram 1646 of December 10† that an officer will be available from New York. Would you, therefore, ascertain about when our phase in the bilateral talks is likely to begin.

14. On review this telegram appears to convey a more negative attitude towards the United States proposals than is the case. They do seem to contain points which correspond to some in recent Soviet proposals. Moreover they appear to give emphasis throughout to the progressive concept and to avoid rigidity in the order of events. We are hopeful that their clarifications will show that a useful common initiative can be launched on this basis.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

We have been considering the sort of approach which would be appropriate at the Commission meeting on December 20. It seems to us that it would be desirable to do what we can to ensure that the proceedings are brief, non-controversial and confined to the formal action of approving the usual form of report.

2. Since the Soviet proposals of November 17 were issued as an Assembly document they are not at present formally before the Commission. It may therefore be possible, unless the Soviets dwell upon the proposals at length, to dispense with extensive remarks about them.

3. Our present inclination is to think it might be sufficient to make the following points.

(a) The Commission and its Sub-Committee have pursued the recommendation of the General Assembly that priority be given to such disarmament measures as are now feasible. Proposals for first stage agreements have been submitted and this approach, which appears to be a practical one, should in our view be continued.

(b) Canada would have welcomed continuation of the negotiations in the Sub-Committee following the July session of the Commission. However, the circumstances were unfavourable and probably little has been lost by the failure to resume discussions then. We are hopeful that the Sub-Committee will reconvene shortly after the Assembly.

(c) We presume that the Soviet Union will wish to have its November 17 proposals examined in detail in the Sub-Committee and we reiterate our readiness to participate in such an examination. Our broad preliminary views on these proposals have already been presented in the Assembly. We see little profit in elaborating at any length upon them in the Commission at this stage.

(d) To the extent that the Soviet proposals mark an acceptance of the principle of aerial inspection, we consider them to reflect an advance on part of the Soviet Union towards acceptance of the other matter for which the Assembly has recommended priority, namely confidence building measures such as mutual aerial inspection.

(e) Among the specific matters to which we hope it will be possible for the Sub-Committee to give its attention is the question of limitations on nuclear test explosions.

4. It seems to us that a short statement covering these points could be made without waiting for the Soviets to show what tactics they intend to follow. However, as they requested the meeting they might well be prepared to speak first. Should they devote much attention to their own proposals it would be proper for you also to give them more time. The broad lines of the suggestions in our telegram V-651 of November 22† should serve the purpose again. In any event, we are inclined tentatively to consider that a positive attitude should be taken only towards their proposal concerning aerial inspection.

5. We would be interested in any indications you may receive as to the approach contemplated by other Commission members.

6. We will be giving further study to the possibility of saying something about reductions of the forces in the NATO and Warsaw Pact areas as an indication of our willingness to see positive aspects in the Soviet proposals. We will also be considering what might be the appropriate course in the event of the submission of a Soviet draft resolution as hinted in Washington telegram 2291 of December 13.†

MEETING OF THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

We thought it would be useful to explore with Stassen's office USA views on the shape and aims of the Disarmament Commission meeting December 20. Matheson of Stassen's staff told us that the meeting would be attended by Lodge with Stassen at his side. They expect that the Soviet Union will make the initial statement, since they requested convening of the Commission, and the USA Delegation then expects to make a brief statement dealing with the Western position and picking up any rebuttal points arising from the Soviet statement.

2. Matheson said that the general expectation was that it would be a short meeting and was not expected to last beyond the 20th. He confirmed their understanding that there might be a Soviet resolution, probably cast in the form of a General Assembly resolution. The expectation is that the Commission will refer the matter of disarmament to the First Committee.

3. While seeing Matheson, we thought it would be useful to outline our own approach to the meeting on the basis of your telegram to Permis under reference, and Matheson commented that we appeared to be thinking on very similar lines. We also raised the point mentioned in your telegram VV-12 December 13† with your suggestion as to the best way of handling the USA proposals in the light of the spate of publicity they have been given in the USA press. Matheson's explanation of this publicity may be of some interest. The first story which appeared was by Frye in the Christian Science Monitor of December 4 which may have originated through a leak on the part of the congressional elements of the USA Delegation in New York, although he could not, of course, be sure of this. This story was followed up by Singer's report in the Washington Post which was the subject of our 2270 December 10.†

4. This Singer story was almost a rewrite of the Frye article. Neither story was authorized or inspired by "administration" sources. As a result of their publication, however, a "background" press briefing was held (we would guess by Stassen) on a not-for-attribution basis, in an attempt to clarify matters. This only resulted, however, in an even greater flow of newspaper articles, many of them of a highly speculative character.

5. Matheson seemed to think well of your suggestion that it would be desirable for the USA to do no more in the Commission than confirm the existence of the new proposals which are to be presented in the future, and we reminded him that we hoped there would be no further disclosures of details of the USA proposals pending the Western consultations now in progress. Matheson confirmed that no reply had yet been received from the Soviets on the suggestion for renewed sessions of the Subcommittee.

6. As a foot note to the foregoing report on "background press conferences", your attention is drawn to the report of a statement by General Gruenther in today's New York Times in the following terms:

"He reviewed some of the inadequacies of the North Atlantic forces and described as "not helpful" the publicity given to a reported new USA plan for disarmament negotiations with Moscow. He recalled that the plan had been reported while the North Atlantic Council was meeting in Paris.

"However, when the name of Harold E. Stassen was mentioned as a source of the disarmament story, General Gruenther quickly declared he had not referred to the President's disarmament adviser."

7. We have meeting with Stassen and his staff on December 19 to seek clarifications concerning the USA proposals on the basis of the questions raised in your telegram VV5 December 12, and will send further report following our discussion.

DISARMAMENT; USA POSITION

In addition to the substantive points covered in my separate messages rising out of our discussions today with Stassen and his group, I thought it would be useful to obtain some idea of USA thinking on the procedural aspect. The question of the meeting today (December 20) of the Disarmament Commission was covered in our 2329 December 18. The only additional point which Stassen made today was that the USA did not, repeat not, intend today to refer to their new proposals. They expected to limit themselves to a general expression of willingness to continue to explore the problem of disarmament.

2. For the immediate future the USA lay great stress on the bilateral approach as affording the best means of exploring possibilities and examining difficulties with each of the Western partners and of developing a common framework of ideas for later presentation through diplomatic channels to the Soviets, and then for discussion in the Sub-Committee. Since each government has special problems of its own, this, in Stassen's view, is a better procedure than to try to deal immediately on a Four Power basis. As soon as the necessary measure of agreement had been reached, Four Power conversations would be held. The USA had no firm ideas at this time of where or when such Four Power discussions should be held, and would welcome any views which we might wish to put forward. Stassen agreed that the method and timing of any approach to the Soviets would be a matter for Four Power consultation.

3. So far as our own special position is concerned, and particularly with reference to our developing views on the subject of limitation of test explosions, Stassen indicated that the USA side would welcome any suggestions or views on this subject which we might wish to put forward to them in direct discussion. They hoped that they would have the chance to hear our views and discuss them with us before any further public elaboration of them; only in this way would it be possible to develop a position which the Four Powers could support in common. I think you will agree, therefore, that, when our substantive bilateral talks begin, we should be put in a position here to develop as fully as possible our ideas on this particular aspect.

4. At the conclusion of the meeting, we raised with Stassen the general question of whether the international climate was more or less favourable than that which existed in the spring of this year for some progress in disarmament. Stassen replied that recent developments in Eastern Europe had certainly intensified the Cold War, and thus made the prospect of serious negotiation on disarmament more remote. It was equally true, however, that the strength of the resistance in Hungary had indicated serious weaknesses within the Soviet Bloc, a factor which could tend toward a greater willingness on the part of the Russians to seek some way out of the present impasse. Stassen observed that the Soviet proposals of November 17 had been presented after the outbreak of the disorders in Hungary. Further, they had made specific reference to the forces of NATO and of the Warsaw Pact, terminology which had not previously appeared in Soviet communications. The possibility, at any rate, of some shift in the Soviet position was not to be overlooked, and the USA, for its part, intended, therefore, to probe the Soviet position thoroughly and patiently. At this stage it was not possible to make any confident assessment of the significance of the Hungarian development in relation to disarmament prospects. But, Stassen reminded us, we had had little prior notice of the Soviet decision to withdraw from Austria or to return the Porkkala base to Finland. In such circumstances, Stassen concluded, the West should maintain a position which would permit us to take full advantage of any shifts in Soviet disarmament policies.

5. In our judgment it would be premature to minimize the prospect of significant movement in the USA position on disarmament, at least until our bilateral discussions get underway and we have more evidence. Indeed, our meeting yesterday with Stassen (who incidentally is now reliably reported to be staying on as the President's principal adviser in this field) leads us to believe that the USA position has now been modified in several respects, of which perhaps the most important is a degree of flexibility in regard to the implementation and extent of aerial inspection and an apparent willingness to explore more fully and in private the significance of the latest statement of the Soviet position. Furthermore, the effort to cope with the vast problem of long range missiles at this relatively early stage is another evidence of the seriousness of USA intentions in this field. Nevertheless, it remains perfectly clear, that the USA will only move forward on disarmament if they are convinced that at each step in the process their defensive capacity and that of their friends relative to that of the Soviet Bloc is not thereby impaired.

DISARMAMENT

The Disarmament Commission met this morning (December 20) and in half an hour agreed without a vote to adopt a draft report submitted by the Secretariat which took note of the third report of the Sub-Committee (DC/83 of May 4). This report together with the records and relevant documents of the meetings of the Disarmament Commission would be transmitted to the General Assembly and the Security Council for their consideration.

2. The following documents were listed in addition to the third report of the Subcommittee:

(a) DC/PV.51-DC/PV — Verbatim records of the meetings of the Commission in July and December 1956;

(b) DC/84; DC/86 to 88; DC/90 to 92; DC/95 to 98. These documents contain various communications and draft resolutions submitted to the Commission from May 19 to July 25.

3. Before the meeting this morning Dixon held an informal meeting of the representatives of Belgium, Canada, France, Iran, UK and USA. Protitch was also present. Dixon reported that in discussions with Sobolev it had been agreed that the meeting of the Commission would be purely procedural and that no questions of substance would be raised. Dixon pointed out that the Australians wished to make a brief statement reaffirming their belief that the Commission should continue to play an active role in the development of the disarmament question and should not confine its activity to procedural meetings.

4. Other representatives and Protitch at this meeting confirmed that this was their impression of the Soviet attitude. It was agreed that Sobolev should be allowed to speak first. Lodge said that if Sobolev raised any points of substance we should then consider whether to have a recess before proceeding with the discussion.

5. In fact the meeting proceeded even more quietly than expected. Sobolev made a brief and perfunctory statement about the need for the General Assembly to reconsider the whole question of disarmament. He referred to the importance of the subject and to the "well-known" Soviet proposal of November 17. He stated that the Assembly discussion should take place without undue delay and that therefore he had no objection to the report drafted by the Secretariat.

6. Walker also supported the draft report but expressed regret at the "meagre" performance of the Subcommittee during 1956. He stated Australia's opinion that the July meeting of the Disarmament Commission was worthwhile and referred in particular to the "realism" demonstrated in the Canadian position. He hoped that this spirit would continue in the forthcoming Assembly discussion of disarmament and in the expected meetings of the Subcommittee in 1957.

7. Peru supported the draft report. Lodge made a brief statement in which he made a passing reference to aerial inspection and in which he expressed hope that the Subcommittee could resume its consideration of the important proposals before it in March. Yugoslavia referred to the useful discussion in the Commission in July and expressed disappointment about the Subcommittee's performance in 1956. With the important new proposals before it, however, there was room for hope that the Subcommittee could make progress during the next year. He called for a maximum effort to this end. Broustra (France) supported the draft report and reaffirmed the French opinion that progress in disarmament would lessen international tensions.

8. We had prepared a brief statement along the lines suggested by you. However, since none of the speakers raised directly any points of substance and since there was a clear understanding by all concerned to minimize the discussion, I decided not to intervene. Belgium, China, Cuba, Iran and the UK made no comment either.

9. After the meeting Hill of Australia asked us whether we could give him any elaboration of our attitude on nuclear tests. He referred to what the Canadian representative had said in the general debate. We gathered that he had been instructed to obtain a detailed explanation of the Canadian position on the limitation of tests. We described the Canadian position in the general terms in which it has been stated publicly and promised to seek more detailed info from you. Hill conveyed the impression that to some extent the Australian attitude might depend on that adopted by Canada. Accordingly we shall be glad to have from you any further elaboration of the Canadian position which you think could be passed to the Australians.

DISARMAMENT

The account of your discussions with Stassen is greatly heartening and encourages the expectation that representations made in bilateral exchanges will be given serious consideration. It appears that we can be satisfied to pursue the consultations bilaterally without pressing for an early four-power meeting. In any event, as you will have seen in London telegram 1794 of December 18 †, the British might face representation problems. However, we probably should remain sensitive to the degree of Stassen's readiness to consider and accept suggestions.

2. One general question which remains unclear is where the United States position is firm and where it is flexible. Your telegrams suggest that Stassen has considerable authority to negotiate on matters of relative timing in such important areas as the beginning of certain control measures and the execution of reductions on both the conventional and nuclear sides. Yet he seems to have little discretion on the timing of limitations on nuclear tests which seems of rather less direct importance to the national security.

3. We are no less prepared than the United States to accept as a cardinal principle the proposition that no disarmament move should impair the defensive capacity of the West relative to the Soviet Bloc. However, assuming that the Soviets have a comparable attitude, it seems that our practical guide should be the proposition that no plan should be devised in such a way that it would weaken the posture of one side with respect to the other. We have the impression that Stassen is more inclined to accept this latter thesis than some authorities in Washington have been in the past. We wonder how prevalent this view may now be in the Pentagon and the Atomic Energy Commission.

4. It appears desirable to bear in mind the possible significance of the Soviet proposals of November 17 when considering the United States proposals. We took note of the apparent readiness of the Soviets for the first time to discuss their relations with the satellites. However, we must remember the origins of the Warsaw Pact which did little in a practical way to enhance Soviet Power. There is a possibility that the Pact was erected partly with a view to negotiating NATO out of existence and thereby substantially weakening the West.

5. Even in the new circumstances in Eastern Europe we are inclined to doubt that liquidation of the Warsaw Pact would materially diminish Soviet Power. For, of course, it is not the Pact itself which is significant but the presence of Soviet troops on satellite territories and the satellite armies, both of which contribute to the defense in depth of the Soviet homeland. Moreover, events in Hungary and Poland suggest that a Soviet move to modify the Warsaw Pact to effect a partial withdrawal of Soviet troops from the satellites, and/or to accept some limitations on the disposition of Soviet troops in the satellites may eventuate without any matching action on the part of the NATO Powers. It seems to us that in approaching the Soviet suggestions regarding disarmament in Europe we should beware both of making an unnecessary political concession and of refusing a technical or military concession which would facilitate substantial readjustments in East Europe.

6. We gather that the United States has in mind discussing the Soviet proposals privately with the Soviets. This would appear to be in keeping with the proposed procedure of direct talks to introduce the United States plan to them. It might be advisable before that event to arrive at common views which would be more elaborate than those which are likely to emerge from the discussions in the North Atlantic Council. This is perhaps a matter which is especially appropriate for Four-Power discussion.

7. For the present we have no particular ideas about the place or time of the Four-Power talks. We suspect that these are questions which will tend to resolve themselves as the discussions progress.

8. The particular points arising out of your discussions are being dealt with separately. With regard to limitations on tests you would wish to know that the Norwegian views were mentioned in the North Atlantic Council on December 20 and the subject will be on the agenda there in early January. You will also have seen in Candel telegram 1811 of December 20 the reference to this question. In view of these requirements as well as your own we will develop considerations which we trust will facilitate discussions in Paris and New York as well as in Washington.

USA DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS

Mattheson of Stassen's Office has given us a further informal memo, dated December 27, which is based on the questions raised in connection with their earlier memo by the British, French and ourselves.

2. The text of this informal memo is as follows:

"Informal Memo

"The USA is consulting with the UK, France, and Canada with the objective of reaching agreement on a further initiative in the disarmament field. Such an initiative should include both conventional and nuclear armaments.

"1. The importance of providing against great surprise attack is a continuing important feature of USA policy. The USA continues to lay great emphasis on the implementation of President Eisenhower's Geneva "open skies" proposal together with Premier Bulganin's proposal for ground control posts. The USA is prepared to negotiate now the progressive installation of a combined air and ground inspection system, each step of such an installation adding to the mutual security against great surprise attack. As part of the system to provide against great surprise attack, blueprints showing the location of major military installations could be exchanged on a progressive basis prior to the effective positioning of inspection to verify such disclosures. In any inspection system, it is the USA view that some aerial component must be present from the beginning for verifications of disclosures and reductions.

"2. Mindful of the emphasis placed on "no control without disarmament and no disarmament without control", the USA has given special and continuing study to this matter. The USA is prepared to negotiate a method for the progressive installation of an inspection system with air and ground components concurrent with initial reductions of armed forces and major conventional armaments. The initial reductions in major conventional armaments would be measured by the previously proposed first stage force levels of 2,500,000 and 750,000 men. Disclosures of major conventional arms and armed forces could be made prior to the effective positioning of air and ground inspection to verify the disclosures. The USA proposes no rigid, precise timetable for, or relationship between, the installation of such inspection and such initial reductions, except for the insistence that the inspection must be adequate at each step to safeguard security in the total posture of remaining armaments and armed forces. Likewise, the USA is not flexible to negotiation on force levels for "other powers". The USA does not itself propose to go below a 2,500,000 men force level prior to further major political settlements.

"3. In the nuclear armaments field, it is suggested that a target date should be proposed to the USSR after which, under effective inspection and control, future production of fissionable materials would be used or stockpiled exclusively for non weapons purposes under international supervision. "non weapons purposes" is defined by the USA to mean "not for explosive devices". For example, fissionable materials may continue to be used in atomic energy power plants which have defense significance for production or propulsion.

"4. States possessing nuclear weapons would make transfers of agreed equitable and proportionate increments of fissionable materials in long term sequence from previous production over to internationally inspected supervised non weapons purposes, as an integral part of the arrangement outlined in numbered paragraph three above. In this manner it would be contemplated that the total nuclear weapons stockpile of each nation in the world would be gradually reduced and the nuclear threat correspondingly lessened. While it is recognized that past production of fissionable materials cannot be checked with sufficient accuracy, the best possible check on existing stockpiles plus effective inspection of future production of fissionable materials would give an adequate base for determining equitable, proportionate transfers to non weapons purposes. Reductions would be made on a long term basis over many years with full regard for free world security interests. A long term schedule of transfers would not be laid down in advance because of the possibility of error in estimating existing stockpiles and because of the impossibility of predicting future major political settlements.

"5. Subsequent to the agreement and implementation of numbered paragraphs 3 and 4 above and inseparable therefrom, and under an effective inspection system to assure compliance with the commitment, both nuclear and thermonuclear test explosions would be limited and eventually eliminated. Apart and separable from this, the USA would be willing as a first step to consider international registration and limited observation of such tests.

"6. The USA further proposes that under a disarmament system an effort be made to assure the objective that projecting objects through outer space would be exclusively for scientific and peaceful purposes. Towards this purpose, tests of such projections should be reciprocally open to international participation, and an inspection system to verify the fulfillment of the commitment should be included. "Outer space objects" defined to include artificial satellites and long-range, supersonic missiles which transcend the earth's atmosphere. The purpose outlined could not be achieved outside a comprehensive disarmament system.

"7. The USA suggests that any disarmament treaty should include a safeguard clause that would provide for giving of notice for partial suspension of, and withdrawal from the disarmament treaty in the event of violation, and for an initial procedure to announce intention to give such notice if violations do not cease.

"8. The substantive points in the USA informal memo are not inflexibly or precisely linked to each other except as generally indicated. They may or may not be fitted into the previous USA first stage plan submitted last March. They may all be initiated prior to further political settlements. The objective is to secure agreement at this time on those first steps that might be taken in the world as it is prior to further political settlements."

3. You will of course be examining this memo closely and comparing it with the answers which Stassen gave to our questions (our telegrams 2345,† 2346† and 2347 December 20). It appears to us at first glance to contain a good deal of info already reported to you. Many of its points are either amplifications or clarifications of points which were not too clear in the original memorandum.

4. There are, however, several points which appear to us either to be new or stated for the first time in the context of the new USA proposals. In numbered paragraph 1, the progressive principle is applied to the exchange of blueprints. In numbered paragraph 3 "non weapons purposes" is defined as "not for explosive devices". This is generally in line with USA thinking when the matter came up during the conference which set up the International Atomic Energy Agency. In numbered paragraph 5, it is stated that the USA "would be willing as a first step to consider international registration and limited observation" of both nuclear and thermonuclear test explosions. This would appear to be the first result of their consideration of Lange's proposal and appears to mark a definite advance. In numbered paragraph 7, it is indicated that the USA is prepared to accept a safeguard clause providing for notice of suspension or partial suspension of any disarmament treaty. This point is not new in that it appears in previous proposals but is stated here for the first time in the present connection.

DISARMAMENT DISCUSSIONS IN THE ASSEMBLY

Following is the section on objectives and tactics prepared for inclusion in the supplementary commentary article on disarmament. Begins

2. Since the new United States proposals may be expected to develop shortly into the basis for a useful agreed initiative it would appear desirable to seek so to influence the course of affairs in the Assembly as to assist in making the prospect of negotiation attractive to the Soviet Union by doing what is possible to improve the atmosphere and avoiding any action likely to cause deterioration. In general it would be our hope that the debate could be made as brief and non-controversial as may be possible in the presence of eighty representatives. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the role of the Canadian Delegation should be a passive one. Indeed, if there is to be a reasonably smooth transition from the Assembly debates to the meetings of the Sub-Committee (which will take place in March if the Soviet Union concurs in the proposal made during December) it will be advisable to take steps to minimize the likelihood of the introduction of irresponsible proposals which might serve to hamper future negotiations. The problem may be briefly described as the avoidance of a vacuum in leadership which might constitute an invitation to mischievous initiatives. It would appear that Canada is on the whole better situated to provide suitable leadership in the direction of moderation than the other Western members of the Sub-Committee and has the advantage of that membership over other possible contenders.

3. It is unlikely to be easy to recruit an enthusiastic following for the thesis that this is a good time to be patient and to refrain from promoting specific substantive proposals. We can perhaps in our capacity as cognoscenti emphasize privately to influential delegations our view that the United States plans ought to enable serious progress to be made if circumstances should be favourable. However, it is probably necessary to have some matter on which we can display a positive and constructive attitude without the necessity of it leading on to a substantive resolution. It would appear that following on the statement made in the general debate the appropriate question for positive treatment is that of nuclear tests.

4. Taking as a basis the considerations set forth in the foregoing section on this question, it would appear that the guiding principles should be (a) that no far-reaching proposal and certainly not an isolated prohibition is justified by the present state of information as reflected in the report of the Scientific Committee (b) some provision relating to nuclear tests might be included in a first stage agreement or even concluded separately and in advance (c) the question cannot be ignored and if recommendations are made by the Assembly as to the course of discussions in the Sub-Committee suitable priority could be allowed to the problem of nuclear tests.

5. In this matter it would be proper for the delegation to recall the statement in the general debate and emphasize the seriousness with which Canada views the question. We are prepared to acknowledge that the situation can be regarded as anomalous when nations are exposed to effects of possibly far-reaching importance resulting from the actions of other nations about which they are not consulted and against which they have no protection. However, it is necessary to have a sound basis for taking action and for the present we accept the opinion that there is no immediate cause for undue concern about those effects. Moreover, the tests are a manifestation of world tensions and the problem cannot be solved by isolated attempts to prohibit them. The root causes are to be found in the major political issues which prompt governments to look to their defences in every way possible and to develop their power as a deterrent against attack. We are hopeful, however, that some start on the problem can be made and we welcome the suggestions of the Foreign Minister of Norway which reflect an approach not unlike our own. In this matter as in other aspects of disarmament it is perhaps the better part of wisdom to strive for what can be attained at the present rather than to debate vainly about objectives which in current circumstances are beyond the realm of feasibility.

6. With regard to the sort of draft resolution to emerge from the debate of the Committee we are inclined to think that the objectives we have outlined can be achieved by an essentially procedural resolution which would take note of the report of the Commission and request it to continue to work through the medium of the Sub-Committee. There might be an advantage in including from the outset the recommendation that priority in consideration should be given to a partial programme for implementation in present circumstances and to measures to guard against the danger of surprise attack and in addition to the problem of nuclear tests. We would not wish to see specific reference under any priority list to the Soviet proposals of November 17. Such exclusion could be based on the grounds that priorities should be given to problems rather than to proposals. For this reason we would favour a rather different formulation for the priority projects from that of resolution 914 X of December 16, 1955 in order to facilitate exclusion of the Soviet plan. At the same time we see no real objection to reference being made in the preamble to the fact that the Soviet Union submitted proposals on November 17. Such a reference might be made in connection with references to the various proposals presented in the Sub-Committee and to possible future proposals.

DISARMAMENT

Late this afternoon (January 8) we had a talk with Stassen, Lodge and officials of the USA Delegation concerning the tactics which the USA proposed to adopt in the discussion on disarmament in the First Committee. This debate is scheduled to begin on January 14, that is, after the Hungarian question has been reconsidered in plenary. During the course of today Stassen met separately with the UK and French representatives.

2. This morning Pink informed us about the tactics which Stassen was proposing. Apparently he had in mind to introduce at the outset of the debate a draft resolution on substance with particular reference to the new proposals of the USA. (The USA draft resolution is contained in my immediately following telegram.†) The UK Delegation reacted vigorously to Stassen's suggestion that a resolution on substance should be introduced. The UK argued in particular:

(a) A USA draft resolution on substance would be an open invitation to the USSR and to any other delegation which might wish to introduce proposals of substance. This would greatly complicate the debate in the First Committee and might jeopardize the prospects for a useful discussion in the Sub-Committee;

(b) Even if competing resolutions on substance were not introduced, there would almost certainly be strenuous efforts to amend the USA draft. There was no certainty that all amendments could be voted down; this had proved difficult at previous sessions and this year the voting would be complicated by the large increase in membership;

(c) There were some parts of the USA draft which the UK in present circumstances at least could not accept and it would be obliged to make this clear in the Committee debate. Detailed discussion of substance would at this stage inevitably produce divergences in the positions of the Western partners. These might be harmful to the subsequent negotiations in the Sub-Committee;

(d) There was no assurance that the USA draft resolution would command the support of an overwhelming majority in the Assembly and in view of the differences among the Western partners there might be some difficulty in organizing the necessary two-thirds majority. In any event, there was no particular advantage in having a voting victory based on West European, Latin American and Old Commonwealth support with possible additions from Baghdad Pact and SEATO Powers;

(e) There had been indications that the USSR was prepared to accept an essentially procedural resolution referring various proposals of substance to the Sub-Committee. This did not mean, however, that there should not be a full exposition in the First Committee of the various points of view. The USA it was hoped would make a full statement of its new position.

Pink said that these arguments were urged strongly and he hoped that France and Canada would adopt the same attitude.

3. Last evening Zamyatin had indicated briefly to us that the USSR would be content if the debate should wind up with a procedural resolution. Today we cross-examined him more closely and ascertained that the USSR's position on substance would depend largely on the attitude adopted by the USA. We were left with the impression that the USSR was not anxious to press to a vote any resolution on substance and that the Soviet Delegation might not even follow their traditional course of submitting a draft resolution as a basis for discussion. Zamyatin said that the USSR would give a full explanation of its position, based largely on the proposals of November 17, but in the form of statements in committee. The Soviet Delegation expected that the real discussion on substance would take place in the Sub-Committee which Zamyatin said was likely to meet in March. (He had been so informed by the Secretariat).

4. In view of this Soviet attitude we were even more persuaded that the USA should reconsider its plan to introduce a draft resolution on substance. Our conclusion in this regard was substantiated by remarks which various members of the USA Delegation made. It appeared that Lodge, the State Department advisors and even some of Stassen's group were not in favour of submitting the draft resolution, the idea had originated with Stassen and there was some suggestion that his view was not strongly held. Accordingly we saw advantage in expressing to Stassen our reservations about the introduction of a resolution on substance.

5. This we did when we met with the USA group this evening. We were shown the draft resolution and draft statement which Lodge proposed to make at the outset of the debate in the First Committee. This text is contained in a separate telegram.† It was clear from what Lodge and Stassen said that the statement could be made without necessarily introducing the draft resolution. The statement contains a restrained and persuasive explanation of the new USA proposals. We think it would be a helpful introduction to the debate on disarmament and we said as much at the meeting. Without going into too much detail we expressed a preliminary reaction against submitting the draft resolution. We reported on what Zamyatin had said, a report which seemed to interest Stassen considerably. The main USA concern seemed to be that some other delegation, possibly the Indians, might move a formal proposal on substance and take away the initiative which the USA might gain if it should submit its draft resolution at the beginning of the debate. Stassen inquired specifically whether we knew what the Indians proposed to do in this regard. He also wished to know what Canada's reaction might be if a separate proposal should be made on nuclear tests. We referred to public statements which Canadian representatives had made on this subject and to the attention which this question was attracting in Canada. We gave no direct answer to Stassen's question.

6. Lodge proposed that the Western Four should meet at the USA Office on January 9 at 5 o'clock. The purpose was to try to reach agreement on tactics. We had suggested to the USA group that the Four might consider the possibility of introducing a procedural resolution. Accordingly, after the meeting with Stassen we spoke to Ramsbotham about preparing a text which we could show to the USA Delegation. Ramsbotham said that Moch had been very forceful in arguing against the introduction of the USA draft resolution. There seemed to be every reason therefore that UK, France and Canada should stand together against Stassen who would be likely to give up his idea. Ramsbotham doubted whether we could prepare on short notice the kind of procedural resolution which would be necessary to satisfy the Committee. It was the UK view that this resolution should be introduced toward the end of the debate. He agreed, however, that the Western Powers should give immediate attention to its preparation.

7. The UK Delegation are already spreading the notion that the debate in the Committee should give a full airing to the various ideas about disarmament but should not be directed toward any resolution on substance. All shades of opinion are being encouraged to express their views fully. The UK intends to intervene on several occasions and about various proposals. They will try to stimulate a discussion in principle without too much attention to details which they will urge should properly be left to the Sub-Committee. (Because of Cyprus the UK are anxious to prolong the disarmament debate at least to the end of January). They will stress that the Sub-Committee is to meet shortly after the end of the Eleventh Session.

8. Unless we hear from you to the contrary we shall use our influence tomorrow to dissuade Stassen. Before the meeting with him we shall try to ascertain what the Indians have in mind as regards the Committee debate on disarmament. Our impression is that if Stassen can be assured that the USSR and India will not make formal proposals of substance, he will agree that the USA draft resolution need not be pressed in the Committee. One additional argument which the UK used on Stassen was that the Soviet Government had changed its attitude toward the proceedings in the Sub-Committee and that in particular Gromyko was anxious to resume his private conversations with Stassen. This was calculated to have particular appeal for Stassen who in the First Committee must share the stage with Lodge.

DISARMAMENT

This evening the representatives of the Western Four met at the USA Office. We had heard earlier in the day from the UK Delegation that Stassen had decided to drop his idea of submitting a draft resolution on substance. The USA Delegation intended, however, to initiate the debate by making the statement which we sent you on January 8.

2. At the meeting today Lodge enquired whether there were any comments on the USA draft statement. Noble had nothing to say about the statement but he restated the UK arguments against submitting a resolution on substance. Moch supported this UK position and made a few comments about paragraph 7 of the draft resolution. These comments were designed to demonstrate the kind of difficulty which might arise if the resolution should be pressed in the Committee. Moch had only one comment about the USA draft statement; he pointed out that France had over one million men under arms and therefore could not subscribe at the moment to the level of 750,000 as a basis for measuring armed forces and military expenditures; this figure could be used however as a yardstick for conventional armaments, because the reservists, now serving in the French forces, were not equipped with weapons which would normally fall within the category of conventional armaments to be reduced. The USA Delegation agreed to make the slight revision which would be necessary to take this French attitude into account.

3. I supported the position which Noble and Moch had taken concerning the introduction of a draft resolution on substance. I expressed warm support for the USA statement and suggested that it would help to set the proper tone for the debate in the First Committee. I reported on conversations which we had with officials of the Indian and Yugoslav Delegations:

(a) Lall told me that without committing his delegation he favoured the idea of a procedural resolution to wind up the debate in the First Committee. He promised to discuss the matter with Menon and to let me have his views;

(b) The Yugoslavs said that they would probably restate their proposal that the Sub-Committee should seek an early agreement on partial disarmament. They were not sure whether a resolution on substance would be submitted but they left us with the impression that they could be dissuaded from doing so, if most of the other delegations concerned were similarly inclined. The Yugoslavs agreed that a procedural resolution might be the best means of concluding the Committee's debate.

4. The USA Delegation apparently accepted the general view that the substantive part of their draft resolution should not be submitted. Lodge specifically asked us not to circulate the original draft because if it should be leaked to the press, the position of the USA Delegation would be made difficult. Lodge will send a copy of the USA statement to Menon and will discuss it with him on January 11. He will also outline for the other members of the Disarmament Commission the USA position. He and Stassen were considering whether they should talk privately to Kuznetsov. We all agreed these tactics were sound.

5. In these circumstances there is room for hope that the First Committee debate on disarmament will be orderly and useful. Protitch told us today that Belaunde might wish to make some formal proposal but that this could probably be headed off. We gathered that the Australians, who have frequently pressed for more positive action, will go along with a procedural resolution. We are therefore reasonably optimistic. The debate is still scheduled to begin on January 14 even though the Hungarian question might be disposed of tomorrow. Lodge suggested today that the by-election to the International Court and the question of expanding the Security Council could be used to keep the plenary session occupied on Friday.

DISARMAMENT

The Norwegians showed us today a translation of a message which they have received from their Foreign Office giving them instructions about a proposal for the registration of test explosions of nuclear weapons. The text of the Norwegian message is contained in my following telegram.†

2. The Norwegians wanted our views about the proposal and about the tactics for presenting it in the First Committee. They asked, among other things, whether Canada would be prepared to co-sponsor a draft resolution which might be submitted separately concerning registration of tests. They proposed, however, to discuss the question with the USA Delegation before proceeding farther. This discussion will probably take place tomorrow.

3. We gave our preliminary view that the ideas set forth in the Norwegian telegram were well developed and might form the basis of a separate initiative during the disarmament debate. Such an initiative might have the effect of forestalling more drastic proposals concerning nuclear tests. We welcomed the fact that the Norwegians would be discussing the matter with the USA Delegation and we explained briefly the discussions which had taken place during the past two days among the Western Four.

4. We emphasized that the USA Delegation had first intended to submit a draft resolution containing their new proposals on disarmament but that they had been persuaded by their three Western partners not to introduce a proposal on substance. We said it was our impression that the Soviet Delegation would follow the same course and that in these circumstances there was some hope that the debate in the First Committee would end with a procedural resolution referring the proposals made to the Sub-Committee. It was our understanding that the USA Delegation was preparing a draft resolution to meet the procedural requirements.

5. We explained that this did not necessarily mean that Canada would not support Norway in a separate initiative. Before making any commitment, however, we would have to seek the views of the Canadian authorities in Ottawa and we would prefer, in addition, to know the USA reaction to the Norwegian proposal. We pointed out that the USA draft resolution of January 7 contained a paragraph about a system of registration of nuclear test explosions, (paragraph 8?). The Norwegians were not aware of this although they had been told by USA officials in Washington that consideration was being given to the inclusion of such a provision.

6. We discussed briefly the tactics for taking an initiative along the lines proposed by Norway. The Norwegians were under the impression that a USA resolution would be introduced on January 14; we said this was likely to happen later in the debate. Accordingly there was no immediate urgency about drafting a resolution on registration. There might be some advantage in waiting to see how the debate developed, in particular to see whether there would be any drastic proposal on tests. If this should be likely to happen, the USA might be better disposed to having the Norwegian proposal put forward as an alternative. We and the Norwegians agreed, however, that it was important to obtain the USA reaction to the whole idea as soon as possible. The Norwegians will let us know the result of their talk with the USA Delegation.

7. We shall be glad to have your views on the Norwegian paper as quickly as possible. You might also let us know whether you think a separate proposal should be made and whether Canada could be associated with it. It is quite possible that the USA Delegation will try to have a reference to the Norwegian proposal included in the procedural resolution which the USA is preparing. This might not be sufficient for the purposes of the Norwegian Government, which is under considerable pressure at home. We should have to see whether some satisfactory formula could be evolved.

8. On the other hand it might be quite acceptable to the USA to have this separate proposal introduced on the subject of tests. It might prove to be an escape valve for a number of delegations, which have been pressing for action on tests, rather than an invitation to others to make proposals of substance. The main aim would be to have the USA Delegation give the Norwegian's proposal serious consideration. In view of the recent pressure on the USA to drop its own resolution, the Western partners might have to tread warily in approaching the USA Delegation about any new proposal of substance.

The Norwegian Delegation gave us today the following draft resolution which they are considering. They are also discussing this draft with the UK and USA Delegations and they would not intend to table it until there has been ample time to consider it carefully. Text begins.

"The General Assembly

Recognizing that there is a strong desire among people of all nations that steps be taken to safeguard against radioactive contaminations of man and his surroundings by increased uncontrolled atomic activity.

Recommends that the States concerned and particularly those on the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission give particular and urgent attention to the question of establishing, as a step preliminary to other disarmament measures, a system for registration with the UN of such nuclear test explosions as will cause measurable radioactive fall-out outside the country directly concerned.

Requests the UN Secretary General and the UN Radiation Committee to cooperate with the States concerned in the establishment and operations of such a system with a view to keeping the total actual and expected radiation-situation in the world under constant observation."

DISARMAMENT

This afternoon we met with the USA, UK and France to consider the question of a procedural resolution. We had before us the UK draft (our telegram 139 of January 11†) and some USA suggestions for making it more comprehensive. Stassen said that they were afraid that the UK resolution gave an impression of more agreement than actually existed. The USA would also have difficulty with the recommendation in paragraph ten of the UK resolution that the Subcommittee should give particular attention to the possibilities of achieving an agreed limitation of nuclear test explosions as a first measure in reducing the nuclear threat.

2. After some discussion it was agreed that a meeting of officials of the four delegations tomorrow would try to produce a new draft on which all four might agree.

3. Stassen and Lodge made it clear that they were shocked and disappointed by Kuznetsov's intemperate statement today. They had met privately twice with Kuznetsov and Sobolev to compare notes on disarmament, and the Russians, while speaking fairly frankly about the rest of their proposed statement had given no indication at all that there was to be this attack on the new USA Mideast policy.

4. Moch raised the question of seeking Soviet co-sponsorship of a procedural resolution and said that he thought the Russians were feeling very isolated and would welcome an opportunity to discuss the terms of a procedural resolution that they might cosponsor with the Western members of the Subcommittee as in 1954. Moch recognized that the circumstances were not very propitious for associating the USSR with the Western Powers as cosponsors of an Assembly resolution and there seems to us little likelihood that this is a serious possibility at this Assembly. Stassen and Lodge both made it clear that after today's statement they would not go out of their way to consult privately with the Soviet Delegation and we got the impression that, in view of the Mideast debate in Congress and the Hungarian situation the USA was, understandably, not much interested in cosponsoring a resolution with the USSR.

5. When the Western Subcommittee members have agreed on a procedural draft resolution the USA will probably press to have it tabled as soon as possible in order to have something to set against the two Soviet draft resolutions submitted today.

DISARMAMENT — NORWEGIAN DRAFT RESOLUTION

Skaug and Engen of Norway called on the Minister this afternoon and asked our co-sponsorship of their resolution. They said they were prepared not to press the resolution to a vote if it turned out that there was general support for a purely procedural resolution and there were good reasons for not insisting on a vote. However they were anxious to register their views on the subject firmly and were inclined to think that there was certain to be insistence, by the Russians, the Indians or others, on a resolution of some kind on tests.

2. Mr. Pearson expressed our support in principle and said he would let them know, after he had had a chance to talk with our other colleagues, whether we could sponsor it. He thought there was a good deal to be said, if we went ahead, for having the Japanese co-sponsor, as they were in a strong moral position to lead Asian opinion on this subject. The Norwegians agreed.

3. Subsequently, in a talk with Lodge, Mr. Pearson spoke of this conversation. Lodge did not dissent and he recognized that a Norwegian-Canadian Japanese resolution in sensible terms might prove useful alternative if wilder proposals were inevitable. However, he still was hoping that we would get away with one procedural resolution and none of substance and asked us to delay a decision.

4. The First Committee will not meet until Wednesday afternoon. If, as seems likely, a plenary session is called on Thursday to discuss Israeli withdrawal from Egypt, there may be little further discussion of disarmament for days.

Extract from Weekly Divisional Notes

1. DISARMAMENT

United Nations Division: On January 25, the First Committee concluded its Disarmament debate and adopted unanimously a resolution sponsored by the five members of the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission, Canada, France, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States, and by seven others, Australia, Brazil, El Salvador, India, Japan, Norway and Yugoslavia. The resolution requests the Disarmament Commission to reconvene its Sub-Committee at an early date and to give prompt attention to the various proposals which have been submitted, a number of which are specified, and to the various views expressed in the debate; it recommends that the Sub-Committee make a progress report by August 1, 1957; and it invites consideration of the advisability of a special session of the Assembly or a general disarmament conference when progress justifies such a meeting.

At the opening of the debate the United States representative outlined proposals which are to be presented to the Sub-Committee when it meets in March in London. The six points emphasized in the statement were to the following effect:

- (1) After an agreed date all future production of fissionable materials should be used or stockpiled for non-weapons purposes under international supervision.
- (2) When effective control of future production of fissionable materials exists, nuclear test explosions could be limited and ultimately eliminated. In the interim there might be advance registration and limited international observation of all tests.
- (3) Conventional arms and forces should be reduced, using as a basis of measurement for the first stage the figures of 2,500,000 for the United States and the Soviet Union and 750,000 for France and the United Kingdom, under an effective inspection system which concurrently would be established progressively.
- (4) To ensure that future developments in outer space are devoted only to peaceful purposes, the testing of such objects as intercontinental missiles and artificial satellites should be under international inspection and participation.
- (5) To provide against surprise attack there should be progressively installed inspection systems including mutual aerial reconnaissance and ground control posts.
- (6) An international agency for the regulation of armaments should be installed concurrently with the beginning of the programme.

The Soviet Union representative emphasized the importance of the Soviet proposals of November 17, 1956. He also introduced three draft resolutions. The first proposed the immediate cessation of nuclear tests; the second called for the convening of a special session of the Assembly on the question of disarmament; and the third proposed the enlargement of the Disarmament Commission to include Egypt, India, Poland and a Latin American country and of the Sub-Committee to include India and Poland.

Canada, Japan and Norway co-sponsored a draft resolution which proposed that the Sub-Committee should give particular and urgent attention to the question of establishing as a preliminary step a system for the registration with the United Nations of nuclear test explosions. It further proposed that the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation should cooperate with the states concerned in the operation of such a system with a view to keeping the total actual and expected radiation in the world under constant observation.

The debate was on the whole free from acrimony. Interest was principally directed towards the new United States approach, the provisions concerning Europe of the Soviet proposals of November 17 and the question of nuclear tests. On this last matter substantial support was expressed for the joint draft resolution of Canada, Japan and Norway. At the conclusion, by agreement among the sponsors, other draft resolutions were not pressed and the twelve-power procedural resolution, which had been evolved in extensive private discussions, alone was put to the vote. DISARMAMENT

The following are our suggestions for a memorandum to Stassen concerning nuclear tests. Begins:

The fundamental Canadian attitude towards nuclear tests was outlined in the general debate on December 5. Briefly stated it is that the complete cessation of tests can only be accepted as part of a comprehensive disarmament programme but that a separate agreement on limitations could be reached as an interim measure pending such a broader agreement.

2. The basic components of a limitations agreement might in our view be (a) a limit on the volume of radiation generated by test explosions over specified periods which might be about five years, (b) a system for the allocation of quotas within that total and (c) provision for the advance reporting of intended tests and a simple verification arrangement which might be merely the granting of an accepted international status to the existing national monitoring systems. Within this framework specific plans could be elaborated on the basis of the information which is available only to the nuclear powers.

3. It is not the intention of Canada to make further public statements which would go beyond what was said on December 5 until there have been discussions with the United States, the United Kingdom and France or until there is substantial additional evidence from scientific sources. The initiative which Canada has taken in this matter is compatible with our broad policy of seeking, particularly in the United Nations, for ways to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the new nations of Asia and Africa without impairing the interests of other friendly governments. It is evident that these nations as well as others are exposed by the sovereign acts of the testing powers to whatever may be the degree of hazard involved in the radiation generated by tests. The only recourse these nations have is to the United Nations. It appeared to us to be desirable to make some response to a demand which has been growing for nearly three years in order to have an opportunity of moderating and guiding the direction of that demand.

4. In joining with Norway and Japan in the sponsorship of the more restricted proposition of a system of registration, we took into consideration the influence which Japan would have in Asia for the acceptance of this arrangement as an initial measure. A first agreement on this basis would receive Canadian support. However, we consider it desirable to explore fully the possibility of going somewhat further and reaching an agreement on limitations.

5. On the basis of the advice available in Canada, we do not feel able to take a dogmatic attitude about the stage at which the radiation released by test explosions may become a health or a genetic hazard. However, because of the lack of agreement among scientists about future possibilities it appears desirable to us to set some bounds to acts whose effects are irreversible as far as is known now. Moreover, the average measured incidence of radiation throughout the world appears to have been substantially exceeded at times in certain areas and this has to be taken into consideration. Nevertheless, we are prepared for the present to be guided by the views of those experts who maintain that the hazards are not serious if the present rates of testing are not exceeded.

6. When the Canadian position was under consideration great weight was given to the necessity of ensuring that our principal allies are not impeded from maintaining an effective deterrent or from developing interception weapons, particularly for air defence. From this point of view we have not seen persuasive objections to a separate advance agreement on limitations.

7. The foregoing reflects our approach to point five of the revised United States memorandum of December 27, 1956. We think there are no differences over the conditions for eventual elimination of tests or over registration as a possible first step. However, we would like to understand more fully the United States position on limitations and the security and political considerations which led to its adoption.

8. With regard to the text of the memorandum we would welcome an indication of how the word "implementation" is to be understood, having regard to the statement that "reductions would be made on a long-term basis over many years". The other point on which we seek elaboration in this matter is the general nature of what would be regarded as "an effective inspection system" for an agreement on limitations of tests.

DISARMAMENT

We agree that the imminence of the negotiations with the Soviet Union makes it desirable to go beyond the seeking of clarifications and to take some more positive position. However, we trust you will leave Stassen with the impression that we are hopeful of receiving further elucidations of their present line of policy.

2. The problem of assessing the underlying assumptions of the United States memorandum arises in part out of the blanket reservation placed on their proposals and positions prior to July 1955. While there were always tacit reservations in the sense that those positions were not binding until written into an agreement, previously it was reasonable to assume that positions were still held unless notice was given to the contrary. Such assumptions now do not appear to be warranted.

3. Moreover, we imagine that the various "task forces" which have been at work under distinguished leadership during recent months have done valuable work which may have modified some of the earlier premises of the United States. We presume that the United States memorandum is a distillation of the product of the labours of these groups. However, its terms are so terse that it is open to interpretation on the basis either of the former United States positions requiring, for example, far reaching powers and discretion for a control organ or of a substantially revised attitude of a less doctrinaire nature. As you are aware, it was not possible for several months prior to December to gain any inkling of how United States policies were developing. We therefore think it most desirable to take the fullest advantage of the present readiness of Stassen and his group to expound their policies and the rationale behind them.

4. It has not been our thought that a firm blueprint on all points need be developed. However, it has appeared to us to be both possible and desirable to exchange ideas and preferably to agree among the four on something more specific than the United States memorandum before entering into negotiations in the Sub-Committee.

5. Although we have presented many questions and requests for clarification, we are in principle quite prepared to proceed on the basis of the United States memo as hitherto explained. We trust that you will make it clear to Stassen that we find the proposals generally acceptable and appreciate the readiness he has shown to include suggestions in the version of December 27.

6. The principal remaining difficulty was indicated in paragraph eight of our telegram VV-5 of December 12. Stassen's attitude, as outlined in paragraph seven of your telegram 2346 of December 19,† is logical enough and would be satisfying if we, like the United States, had in existence the basis for proceeding with the manufacture of the necessary weapons in the event of an ultimate breakdown of a disarmament agreement. However, it would be desirable for you to reiterate that our defence authorities remain concerned that weapons which the United States regards as indispensable for its continuing defence should not become inaccessible to Canada through the acceptance and implementation of a disarmament agreement in combination with a United States policy of not furnishing such weapons to other governments.

7. The second important matter on which we have reservations is the timing and conditions of limitations on nuclear tests. Presumably Noble raised this question during his talks and possibly the difference in this respect may be diminishing. The best course may be simply to present the memorandum on this subject which you have prepared.

8. We have inferred from your previous telegrams that the United States contemplates presenting to the Soviet Union something rather more elaborate than a revised version of their memo. In considering what might be done, it occurred to us that something along the lines of the memo might serve to present the outline of the main processes of disarmament over the course of some years and that it might be supplemented by something more specific relating to the measures which might be included in a first stage plan. We have accordingly drafted two papers† to indicate in a positive way the sort of submissions to the Soviet Union we think it would be desirable to agree upon. These papers are being transmitted to you separately.

9. Both of these papers are of a tentative nature although they have the concurrence of the Defence Department. They are not the only versions of what we would be prepared to support. The variations from the United States text in the first paper are largely directed towards achieving greater clarity. Both papers should be read in the light of our exchanges with you. We would be happy to see the second paper developed and enlarged but did not feel able to make a fruitful attempt before receiving some intimation of the present United States thinking on control, which all agree to be the central cause of disagreement.

10. If you think it appropriate to convey the texts of either or both of these papers to the United States you should make it clear that to a considerable extent their preparation was an exercise in the understanding of their memorandum.

DISARMAMENT

At our meeting yesterday Stassen answered some of the points raised in the two informal memos and in the list of questions which we had recently submitted to his office.

2. On the question whether the USA would be prepared to reach an initial agreement confined to the conventional field, his answer was yes, provided such agreement were sound in itself and likely to lead on to broader agreement. It should be an agreement which would to some extent increase mutual security and certainly one which would not decrease security. The first step which the USA would like to see taken in the nuclear field would be the setting up of inspection on production of fissionable materials which could halt the build up of weapons stock piles.

3. He also confirmed that "non weapons purposes" in the latest USA proposals does not exclude nuclear power plants of defence significance and propulsion units for military aircraft or naval vessels. They were thinking primarily of explosives. He added, however, that the USA did not exclude the possibility of some later and separate agreement which might cover military propulsion units.

4. On the question whether under the latest USA proposals existing stock piles of fissionable materials could be used for modernizing weapons or developing new weapons his answer was an unqualified yes. On this point, he went on to make it quite clear that the USA did not envisage any physical controls or inspection on stock piles on past production of fissionable material. Under the USA proposals he said fissionable materials would be in two parts:

(a) Current production and production which had been transferred to non weapons purposes.

This part would be controlled.

(b) Previous production which would not be under control.

The use made of the second part would be entirely up to each nation possessing it. Since effective controls on the second part were not technically possible, the USA would not wish to attempt to have any controls.

5. We raised the question how the amount of transfers to non weapons purposes could be worked out in the absence of any accurate check on past production. He replied that we should have to depend on the report of each country on what it has produced and on our best estimate of the amount of its past production. We would be in a better position to make such an estimate when we have in operation a system for inspecting and controlling current production. He added that in the USA view the nation with the largest amount of past production would make the largest annual transfer although no precise formula for calculating such transfers had been worked out.

6. He also commented on the meaning of "implementation" in connection with the proposals that limitation of nuclear test explosions is possible only after implementation of the agreement to use future production of nuclear materials solely for non weapons purposes, and of the agreement on transfers from past production to non weapons purposes. Implementation in respect to the cut off from weapons uses means getting the inspection apparatus in place ready to operate; implementation in connection with the transfer means the reaching of agreement on the formula for transfers and perhaps the completion of the first slice of transfers.

7. He then commented on the proposal for registration and limitation of tests. He said that the Canadian, Norwegian and Japanese initiative in the Assembly had been constructive and suggested that it had helped to get this rather sensitive matter past the 11th Session of the General Assembly. He said that while their study was continuing the USA still regarded it as unsound to accept limitation of tests in advance of an agreement limiting the nuclear threat. He pointed out some serious difficulties of any limitation plan which did not involve a substantial control apparatus. For example, long range monitoring such as is now carried on, might reveal the fact of an explosion but would not allow us to judge accurately the scale of the explosion, although this latter point would be essential in connection with any scheme for limitation of explosions. There would also be a political difficulty if a claim about an explosion were based only on national monitoring. Unless there were some form of international inspection we would have claims and counter claims about explosions which would not improve international relations and might increase tension. The requirements for advance registration might be of some assistance but would not meet the need for short range monitoring.

8. He added, in connection with tests, that in any event, USA plans for the next stage of testing would be limited to their Nevada field and implied that they would be on a relatively small scale.

9. At this point I outlined briefly the two new Canadian papers mentioned in the final paragraph in your telegram V67. I made it clear that these were tentative and provisional and that they were intended to some extent to clarify the USA proposals and to determine whether we were interpreting these proposals in the same way as the USA. I also reiterated the concern of our defence authorities that nuclear weapons should not become inaccessible to Canada through acceptance of a disarmament agreement in combination with the present USA policy of not furnishing such weapons to other countries. Stassen's reply on this point was to the effect that nothing the USA proposed on disarmament would be inconsistent with their defence policies and that the Defence Department was closely associated with all decisions on disarmament proposals.

10. I then left the two Canadian papers with Stassen and he said that he would be in touch with us again when they had studied them. These papers seem to us to be a very useful and clear statement of the main current disarmament proposals and we had decided that on the whole it would be more effective to leave them with Stassen for study rather than merely to outline them orally. The versions left with Stassen were slightly altered in accordance with the phone conversation with Campbell today, and Captain Ellis will be taking back to Ottawa this weekend copies in their final form.

11. Although we had deleted from the second paper the reference to the Soviet proposal for a limited air inspection zone in Europe and also the reference to the Arctic, I mentioned to Stassen that in our view such proposals might be part of the progressive installation of the open skies plan on a geographic basis.

12. In the light of what Stassen had told us earlier in the meeting it seemed certain that the USA would not accept the clear implication in both these papers that stock piles of past production would have to come under control and inspection. Nevertheless, I thought it useful that Stassen have the papers in this form in the hope of eliciting a more specific and detailed statement of the USA position. We also asked for any further detail that could be made available in response to our earlier memo on controls.

DISARMAMENT — U.S. PROPOSALS

Following for Johnson. We consider the U.S. proposals to offer a generally acceptable basis for common initiative and Stassen has been informed to this effect. He has also been informed on the points we continue to find obscure and on those where we hope some changes may be possible to meet our views. We had hoped and expected that by now a further revision of their memo in Washington telegram 2393 of December 29 would be available. Since this is not the case it may be useful to review briefly the points in that draft which are of most concern.

2. The most important point derives from the view of the Department of National Defence that nuclear weapons are likely to offer the most suitable means for providing for our air defences in the North. Under the U.S. proposals following the target date mentioned in their point three the present nuclear powers would retain substantial stocks of nuclear weapons for an indefinite period while other powers would have at best little scope for equipping themselves similarly because all future production would be devoted to non-weapons purposes. It is clear that there are great advantages in measures to ensure that nuclear weapons do not fall into irresponsible hands and that the nuclear powers are limited in number. Nevertheless, our defence authorities are concerned that weapons which the United States regards as indispensable for its future air defences should not become inaccessible to Canada through the acceptance and implementation of a disarmament agreement in combination with a U.S. policy of not furnishing such weapons to other governments.

3. It is the Minister's view that it would be undesirable to oppose this aspect of the U.S. plan because of contingencies perhaps ten years in the future for which satisfactory arrangements can in all probability be made in the intervening period. There are mounting pressures to change the U.S. legislation and it is reasonable to suppose that some kind of liberalization will not be too far behind the plans for equipping NATO forces with dual purpose weapons. However, it would be appropriate for you to keep up the pressure on this question using substantially the formula in the last sentence of the preceding paragraph.

4. The second important point on which we differ with the U.S. proposal is the stage at which limitations could be imposed on nuclear tests. The basis for a memorandum on this question which was handed to Stassen is in our telegram V54 of January 30 and his answers are in Washington telegram 297 of February 9.† Our examination of this reply and his earlier remarks on the matter in Washington telegram 2346 of December 20 leave us with the impression that Stassen is still under the shadow of Stevenson's presidential campaign speeches.

5. It should already be sufficiently clear to Stassen that our general purpose in advocating a limitations agreement at the present time would be to ensure that the rates of testing which have hitherto prevailed are not exceeded. This position is based on the reports of the British Medical Research Council and the U.S. Academy of Sciences after extensive consultations with the radiation experts of National Health and Welfare whose views rest upon both a series of international conferences on radiation last fall as well as their discussions with the Chalk River experts on biological hazards. Stassen has at no time indicated that the U.S. intends to exceed these rates or desires to retain full freedom to intensify their testing programme. We trust that they have no such intention or desire since competent scientific opinion is not prepared to give reassurances about the health and genetic hazards if radiation is generated more rapidly than at present.

6. We find the difficulties he raises about the kind of controls which would be necessary for ensuring observance of a limitations agreement to be bordering on the disingenuous when they are set alongside the apparent U.S. position that existing stockpiles should be exempt from control. Our broad concept of the appropriate control has been that some form of international status could be accorded to existing monitoring systems to minimize the kind of controversies he mentioned.

7. Because Canada has publicly held the position since last July that limitations on tests need not await a broader disarmament agreement, it would be very difficult for us to endorse paragraph five of the U.S. memorandum as now drafted. That paragraph would be acceptable with the deletion of the words "limited and" from the first sentence. However, we would prefer to see a more positive turn given to the reference to registration. We would also like to have a reference to limitations included. It may be that the redraft contained in our telegram V68 of February 6† would be acceptable to the U.S. if the words "not later than the target date" were to be omitted.

8. The next point which has been exercising us relates to the apparent intention of the U.S. to exempt existing stockpiles of nuclear materials and weapons from physical controls. Our telegram V109 of March 1† and Washington telegram 530 of March 6† refer. We agree that the impossibility of ensuring the detection of all stocks creates difficulties. It may be the case, although on this question we have reservations that any system for international accounting of the quantity location and movement of existing stocks would do little good. However, we see a real distinction between the problems of the nuclear control system and the problems of protection against surprise attack.

9. It seems to us that the implication of the U.S. position is that international inspectors could be barred from entry into certain facilities in an airfield complex on the grounds that those facilities were for the storage of nuclear weapons. This was the main point we had in mind when expressing our doubts in telegram V109 that the weapons which would be of the greatest significance in a surprise attack should be outside the control system. The consequences of such a policy for the nature and extent of the powers of inspectors with respect to other weapons and facilities seem to us to be very considerable.

10. In this connection you will observe that in the U.S. memorandum of August 30, 1955 outlining the plan for implementing the Eisenhower proposals (Annex 20 to the second report of the Sub-Committee) it is clearly stated that "weapons and delivery systems suitable for surprise attack" should be disclosed and "verified and maintained under surveillance".⁹⁰ This paper, incidentally, postdates Stassen's reservations on previous proposals.

11. It may be that we have not yet fully comprehended the U.S. position on this aspect of control. The foregoing point was not elaborated in our telegram V51 of January 28† which was the basis of a memo to Stassen because we had taken it for granted that particular attention would be given to nuclear weapons in the system for protection against surprise attack. Our difficulties arise in part from the fact that we have been given only occasional and partial indications of the present U.S. theories of control despite the best efforts of the Embassy in Washington to extract their views.

12. Until the whole matter of control can be clarified it is our hope that whatever may be written into a document or stated by any of the Western representatives will be as ambiguous and obscure as possible on the subject of the functions of the surprise attack protection system with regard to existing nuclear weapons and stockpiles. Special obscurity would seem to be desirable in connection with the meaning of disclosures and their verification.

13. The foregoing summarizes our concern on the three principal points. An additional minor matter is that we think it would be preferable to omit from a summary outline of substantive proposals to be embodied in an agreement any reference to procedures for nullifying that agreement. We think this is a standard clause and would prefer to see point seven deleted.

DISARMAMENT — NUCLEAR TESTS

Following for Johnson. It is the Minister's view that you should press hard on the subject of tests in the Sub-Committee and not be deflected too easily from this purpose by any reservations on the part of your colleagues. It would therefore appear desirable in your opening statement to make it clear that the Canadian Delegation fully expects that the Sub-Committee will respect the unanimous resolution of the General Assembly and give prompt attention to the various proposals listed in that resolution including the joint proposal of Canada, Japan and Norway. This incidentally is an additional reason for our opposition to refusal to discuss any part of the Soviet Union proposals.

2. In order to cement our alliance with the United Kingdom on this question it might be appropriate to indicate that Canada noted with satisfaction Nutting's statement in the Commission last July relating to the British readiness to approach the question of limitations on tests separately if a broader agreement should not be possible. Following Eden's statement on similar lines a fortnight later the Minister stated in the House our support for the British position.

3. It would perhaps be fitting to outline briefly the rationale behind our attempt to promote limitations. On the health and genetic side our scientific advisers have accepted essentially the conclusions of the reports of the British Medical Research Council and the United States Academy of Sciences, namely that no serious somatic or genetic danger according to the present state of knowledge is to be expected if the rate of testing which has hitherto obtained is not exceeded. Such reassurances, however, are not forthcoming in connection with increased rates in the generation of radiation. We therefore consider that, as an interim measure pending either advances in knowledge of radiation effects or more far-reaching disarmament agreements, it would be desirable to ensure that the present rate of testing is not stepped up.

4. On the other hand as a practical matter we recognize that there are valid reasons in a divided and mistrustful world for the powers possessing nuclear weapons to ensure through tests that those weapons are as effective as possible. Our own interests are directly served by the effectiveness of the deterrent to aggression which the nuclear arsenals of our allies provide and by the development of nuclear defences against aerial attack. Therefore we do not propose and, indeed, we oppose the complete cessation of tests except as a part of a disarmament agreement which would provide measures to diminish the threat of nuclear attack.

5. There appears to be no widely accepted scientific reason for insisting on a substantially lower rate of artificial generation of background radiation. It can hardly be argued that the needs of defence programmes would be materially impeded if tests could be continued at substantially the present rates. It accordingly seems to us that it should not be difficult for the powers concerned to agree to meet both the objective scientific situation and the reasonable requirements of defence. In our view neither the extreme of immediate and complete cessation of tests nor the retention of full discretion by the testing powers is satisfactory since one neglects defence needs and the other the warnings of competent scientific opinion. Canadian representatives have therefore been advocating and will continue to advocate early limitations on nuclear tests within a broad framework if possible and separately if necessary.

6. We would think it advisable to keep some argumentation in hand for a later stage and in your opening statement something of about the foregoing dimensions should be adequate. However, it would probably be as well also to suggest how discussion of this matter might in our view be ordered in the debate. We hope that the general discussion of the United States and Soviet Union proposals will promise that the basis for an initial agreement exists and can be developed into an international instrument in the months immediately ahead so that at least a partial plan for disarmament might begin to be implemented perhaps early next year. We assume that any such agreement would include provisions relating to nuclear tests and accordingly that the question would be dealt with in the general discussion. However, should it prove, despite the best efforts of all concerned, that the basis for even a very limited disarmament agreement cannot be found in this session of the Sub-Committee the Canadian Delegation would expect the other delegations to be ready to consider whether something could be agreed in the matter of nuclear tests.

7. You might also inform the Sub-Committee that we contemplate laying before it at the proper time a document relating to nuclear tests which will, we hope, reflect the views of Japan and Norway. (In this matter it would doubtless be desirable to reassure the United States that we intend in this paper to stay within the policies to which we are already publicly committed and that we hope our action will continue to have the effect of moderating the demands for more extensive action). We think it would be desirable to be imprecise in your statement as to whether our paper will be concerned with limitations or registration and whether there might be two papers. We have in mind consulting the Japanese and Norwegians concerning the contents of a paper on registration and also preparing a paper on limitations. We presume that there is no great urgency about the production of texts because of our expectation that the appropriate time for their submission will be fairly well on in the session.

8. We regret the lateness of the arrival of this material but trust that it will suffice for a passage on tests in your opening statement. As indicated above we plan to provide in good time further debating material and one or two papers which might be submitted. In the interim, during the discussion of the United States and Soviet Union plans, as we see it, our purposes should be served adequately by brief reference to our known position on tests in connection with the relevant clauses of those proposals.

9. We would welcome your observations on the contemplated tactics and on the type of additional material which you think would be useful both for private consultations with your Western colleagues and for the Sub-Committee discussions.

CONFIDENTIAL

NUCLEAR TESTS

Conversations which Mr. Johnson has had in London with the British, French and U.S. representatives make it unambiguously plain that no support will be forthcoming from any of the three for a proposal for limitations on nuclear tests. As Mr. Johnson notes in his report (London telegram 531 of March 19† attached) the British are having second thoughts and the Government seems about to alter their position. The reason appears to be that they have encountered serious technical difficulties in trying to work out schemes for the control of limitations.

On the other hand the idea of registration of tests apparently will receive general Western support.

The question arises whether in the face of this total absence of prospective support it is worthwhile attempting to promote in the Sub-Committee at this session any scheme for limitations on tests. It would appear that the British have now adopted the U.S. attitude that quite an elaborate control system would be essential. It has been our understanding, after our departmental discussions with National Defence, that no elaborate control system for limitations would be necessary because of the ease of detection of all except relatively minor explosions. Mr. Stassen has, however, mentioned in London a United States belief that a country setting out deliberately to do so could conceal quite large test explosions. He has suggested (London telegram 536 of March 20† attached) that the United States might send a technical expert here to outline in detail the U.S. difficulties on limitations and is proposing this to Washington. It seems to me that it would be helpful to our understanding of the U.S. position if this were done. Indeed, I infer from Mr. Johnson's two messages that it may have been Sir William Penney's recent access to this kind of information which has affected the British position. If you agree that we should take advantage of Stassen's suggestion you may wish to authorize the attached telegram† advising Mr. Johnson that we appreciate the offer and would be happy if such an expert could come here in the next few days.

Quite apart from what may be gleaned from an expert regarding the technical considerations there is the political question of the desirability of pressing for limitations in the face of solid resistance on the part of the U.S., the U.K. and France. I am reluctantly moved to accept the conclusion that little can be accomplished for the present in the Sub-Committee by insistence, particularly as we had had in mind relying upon the U.K. for technical as well as political support. In the expectation that in these circumstances you would wish to relieve our London delegation of what is promising to become a difficult and unrewarding burden I have put a suitable passage in the telegram accepting the offer of the expert.

It does not seem to me to be necessary as yet to decide whether or not further statements should be made, by way of general advocacy, of limitations in the Sub-Committee. If the United States sends their expert here that matter can perhaps be decided after consideration of the political and strategic importance of the technical information he conveys.

At any rate we can take some satisfaction from the suggestion for a four-Power working party in London which would endeavour to produce a proposal on registration of nuclear tests and from the circulation by the U.K. and U.S. of papers on this subject. These developments will, I think, enable us to discharge whatever obligation we have towards the Japanese and Norwegians arising out of our co-sponsorship with them of the draft resolution on registration as well as to take some modest step towards setting bounds to the potential hazards from rising levels of radiation.

DISARMAMENT — NUCLEAR TESTS

For Johnson. In the expectation that nuclear tests might come up first we have been pressing on with this topic. We have no definite word yet about the arrival of the U.S. expert. Pending consideration of such technical revelations as we may receive we have no grounds for recommending a change in the policy we have been following with regard to limitations. However, as indicated by the Minister in telegram V-156 of March 21† active pursuit of that policy in the Sub-Committee should for political reasons be suspended for the present, although we realize that you are thereby left in a somewhat difficult position.

2. Statements made by the British at Bermuda in connection with concealment of tests appear to go rather beyond Stassen's remarks mentioned in your telegram 536 of March 20.† They are even more difficult to reconcile with Matteson's remarks noted in your telegram 553 of March 21.† The indefinite state of our technical information and the varying assessments of its importance are additional reasons for suspending advocacy of limitations.

3. If there should be any remarks from Zorin about your silence on this question it would appear satisfactory to state that the general Canadian position was put forward by you at some length on March 21 as well as in the General Assembly and that so long as the Soviet response is wholly negative there seems to be little profit in more detailed elaboration.

4. With regard to registration the outline given in our telegram V-169 of March 22† was accepted in the working group. In view of the request in your telegram 575 we will send you a paper along these lines if possible later today.

DISARMAMENT — NUCLEAR TESTS

For Johnson. Our immediately following telegram† contains the text of a draft working paper on the registration of nuclear tests. It takes into account the U.K. and U.S. papers and the Norwegian material in Candell telegram 117 of January 10† and follows the line of our comments in telegram V169 of March 22.†

2. You will note that despite the U.S. attitude reported in your telegram 575 of March 25† this draft retains the concept of advance notification of the estimated yield in fission products which would be of international concern. It seems to us that if registration is not to degenerate into a charade there must be some serious information submitted. The estimates suggested in points F to K of paragraph four represent the kind of meaningful information in which the international community has a legitimate interest. If such estimates are refused the dominant opinion seems likely to be that such information is concealed because of its alarming nature and not because of military security considerations.

3. We cannot lightly abandon the attempts to ensure that registration proposals which deal with more than places and dates are put forward. It was our impression that the Norwegians did not give up their desire to advance a more substantive proposal nor the Japanese theirs to press for a vote in the Assembly until there was an intimation that the matter would be given constructive attention in the Sub-Committee. Having had an active part in the New York negotiations we must strive for a plan with real substance if only to maintain our credit.

4. If the U.S. holds a strongly negative view on the question of an estimated yield in terms of fission products perhaps they would agree to an estimate in terms of equivalent kilotons which we understand might be more acceptable from the point of view of military security. In such an event the estimates in points H to K might be presented in percentages or in some other indirect way. However such a system would be less satisfactory than the use of absolute terms.

5. Should the provisions for submission of such information in any form be rejected we must reserve the right to advise our co-sponsors of the kind of proposals we have advanced. The problem of how to convey the negative attitude of our partners in the Sub-Committee to our co-sponsors was raised yesterday in our telegram V182.†

6. The working paper is however intended to be suggestive rather than definitive. In addition to insisting on the necessity of including real information in the registration process we would like to see maintained the idea in the introduction concerning the desirability of international arrangements to assist testing powers in the exercise of their responsibilities. We hold no special brief for paragraphs nine and ten which are adapted to our context from the U.K. paper. However it seems to us that paragraph eight which also comes from the U.K. paper is logical and appropriate.

7. In our final review of this draft paper we have taken into consideration Longair's two memoranda in your telegrams 588† and 593† of March 28. We have also borne in mind Matteson's private observation to you about not being too easily deterred. Having retreated on the question of a proposal on limitations concerning which our policy was not reached hastily or frivolously but after extensive consideration in the light of the best scientific and military advice available to us, we trust that this paper will receive careful attention. We quite understand the difficulty of repeatedly urging views at variance with those of your colleagues. However this particular matter is of more than transient importance and worth pressing.

CABINET DOCUMENT 76-57

PROPOSAL FOR ZONES OF AERIAL INSPECTION

The Canadian Representative on the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission of the United Nations has reported on a possible plan for progressive aerial inspection which was outlined to him by Mr. Stassen, the United States Representative. Mr. Stassen has asked whether the Canadian Government could approve that part of the plan which deals with the North American continent, and, if so, whether the Canadian Government would consider taking the initiative in introducing it in the Sub-Committee.

The proposal calls for the establishment in a first stage disarmament agreement of zones of aerial inspection which would then be expanded as disarmament progressed. The two zones suggested as first steps are:

(a) A North American and Asian zone extending from the North Pole to 45 degrees north latitude, and from 120 degrees west longitude to 150 degrees east longitude;

(b) A European zone extending from the North Pole to 45 degrees north latitude, and from five degrees east longitude to 30 degrees east longitude.

The accompanying map† shows that on the North American continent zone A would include the whole of Alaska, part of the Yukon and North West Territories and all but the south-east corner of British Columbia, and would extend approximately as far south as Portland, Oregon. On the Siberian side it would extend approximately as far west as the port of Magadan, including the whole of Kamchatka and the eastern end of Siberia, and as far south as the latitude of the tip of Sakhalin Island. Zone B would include virtually all of Scandinavia but exclude the United Kingdom. Its western boundary would proceed south on a line running close to Amsterdam, Brussels and Dijon to a point somewhat south of Lyons. On the east it would run on a line slightly west of Leningrad and Kiev to a point a short distance south and west of Odessa. It would thus include all or part of most of the countries of Central Europe but would designedly exclude Moscow, Paris and London.

The United States does not regard the definition of the above zones as rigid or finally decided. The plan is flexible as to the details of the exact definition of the zones, which could be adjusted if that were thought necessary to protect Canadian interests. They have been designed, with a view to protecting security, to include the major forward bases and staging areas at the two points at which the Western Powers and the Soviet bloc come into closest contact. The U.S. did not consider it realistic to propose including such important areas in the U.S.S.R. as Kamchatka without going as deeply into Canadian and U.S. territory as they have suggested.

If the question of subsequent zones should arise, the U.S. attitude is that a sound balance should be maintained on both sides, perhaps in an additional zone in the Arctic or an expansion of the European zone, or by inviting the Soviet Union to put forward its own suggestions.

Aerial inspection in the two proposed zones would begin simultaneously with the commencement of armament reductions and the operation of other controls. The development of aerial inspection would follow the natural progression of establishing bases in the two areas, providing inspecting aircraft and personnel, setting up a monitoring system by the host country, etc.

No special plan for ground inspection and control in the proposed zones is envisaged, as the concept of geographically unlimited ground inspection would apply to these areas as it would to the territories of all signatories to the agreement. Indeed, eventually ground inspection might be less detailed in the areas covered by aerial inspection, as the latter would provide great security against surprise attack and thus reduce the importance of minor violations.

The United States would not wish the above plan to be put into operation until the Soviet Union has agreed to a world-wide limitation of conventional forces (at the 2-1/2 million man level for the U.S., U.S.S.R. and China and 750,000 for the U.K. and France) and armaments, and until there is agreement on geographically unlimited ground inspection.

Our military advisers are agreed that any plan for aerial inspection would result in greater intelligence benefits for the West than for the Soviet Union; this is particularly true of a plan which would include the Chukotski district of the Soviet Union, as it contains important forward bases which would be of the first importance in any assault in North America. The present plan appears more realistic than further attempts to secure the full and immediate application of President Eisenhower's "open skies" plan, which would begin with aerial inspection of the entire home territories of the United States and the U.S.S.R. It also appears to have better balance and to be more acceptable to the Soviet Union than an earlier suggestion for aerial inspection within the Arctic Circle.

I conclude that Canada would have more to gain than to lose if the proposed plan were put into operation. I would further hope that the proposals, if accepted by the Soviet Union, would provide a dramatic and yet sound step towards substantial disarmament by initiating measures for the development of mutual confidence.

I am doubtful of the advisability of the Canadian Representative assuming the responsibility for the introduction of this proposal. Many technical questions are likely to arise which it would be necessary for the U.S. Representative to answer. However I regard the proposal as sound and am of the opinion that it would be desirable to co-sponsor it.

I therefore recommend

- (a) that that part of the plan which relates to North American be approved; and
- (b) that co-sponsorship of the plan in the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission be authorized.⁹¹

These two recommendations were approved by Cabinet on 4 April 1957. Cabinet added that "the proposal as a whole should be discussed in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization before being put forward in the Disarmament Sub-Committee."

DISARMAMENT NUCLEAR TESTS

Following from Johnson. A brief review of this subject may help in the re-assessment of our position made necessary mainly by developments in the UK attitude.

2. The UK position as we understood it until sometime last month was that there might be a separate scheme for limitation (but not cessation) of nuclear test explosions in advance of other disarmament measures. It was apparently the UK view that elaborate control would not be needed. Long range monitoring outside the boundaries of the USSR, would be adequate. Sometime before the Bermuda Conference UK officials began to hint at new technical difficulties which made control much more difficult and made a separate agreement on limitations seem unlikely. The main technical difficulties seem to be (a) the size of the bang, that is the megaton equivalent force of the explosion, is no longer a reliable guide to the amount of dangerous radioactive fission products produced. Therefore a limitation scheme based on the megaton equivalent of the explosion (apparently the only practical criterion if long range monitoring is to be relied on) is no longer satisfactory since it would not distinguish between clean bombs and dirty bombs; and (b) other methods of measuring fission products (at long range) limitation, such as attempts at direct measurement of the amount of fission products distributed around the world are slow and inaccurate. It might take a long time after a test had been detected to make any estimate of the additional fission products of general international concern and it would then be impossible to demonstrate indisputably that any increase was due, for example, to a Soviet test rather than to some other test. (Close or diagnostic analysis of the explosion or weapon is of course ruled out of our original limitations scheme).

3. A further technical argument, namely that some tests might not be detected at all, seems to be relevant more to the Soviet proposal for complete cessation than to the scheme for limitations. Tests which were too small to be detected might nevertheless make valuable contributions to a country's military knowledge.

4. The Anglo-American Bermuda communiqué⁹² was interpreted by the UK Disarmament Delegation as public recognition of this new situation, i.e., a shift in UK policy away from their earlier support for a separate and relatively simple limitation scheme. There seemed to be no suggestion that the USA had made any concession on tests at Bermuda. While the communiqué endorsed the idea of registration of tests both the UK and USA had already done this publicly before Bermuda. Registration and limited international observation are both explicitly part of the current USA proposals on the whole nuclear problem as tabled by Lodge in the General Assembly on January 14.

5. The subsequent explanations of the communiqué given in the House of Commons by the UK Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary⁹³ and in the Sub-Committee by Noble somewhat soften the first explanations of the communiqué which we had received here. The official view now is that the communiqué does not necessarily rule out an agreement of limitations separately from other disarmament measures, but only stresses that because of the new technical difficulties the necessary control of a limitations agreement is much more difficult than had originally been envisaged. Canada of course had never suggested uncontrolled limitations. Our statement in the General Assembly on December 5 referred to verification and I think that we had not spelled out publicly the amount of control needed, although we had I believed privately shared the earlier UK view that long range monitoring would be sufficient.

6. In his talks with us from the first appearance of the Anglo-American Bermuda communiqué, Stassen has taken the slightly less rigid line adopted by UK ministers on their return. He has stressed that the communiqué meant that limitation was not possible in the absence of more general nuclear control arrangements. He said this did not necessarily mean in the absence of other measures of disarmament, although nothing Stassen has said would be inconsistent with the public USA policy that limitation of tests can come only as part of a more general agreement on the control and production of nuclear weapons and on transfers to peaceful uses from past stockpiles of fissionable materials. Our Embassy in Washington has now been given an interpretation of USA thinking, which is somewhat more rigid than Stassen's or than the public explanations of UK ministers, but which is almost identical with the first explanations of UK officials here.

7. Our assessment of the whole limitations argument has an important bearing on the way in which we formulate our proposal for advance registration of tests. As I understand it the USA arguments against requiring detailed info on the fission products to be produced by the tests (as required in the Canadian working paper on test registration) are essentially the same as the arguments relating to the feasibility of a limitations scheme without extensive controls. It would not be possible to know within a wide margin of error, and in any case not until a considerable time had elapsed, whether the info on fission products registered by the USSR was accurate or honest. I believe that the USA case, which, of course, we may reject, is not that they are now demanding verification of the registration scheme but that they had always intended, as in the past, to do their best to verify Soviet test explosions. Their only additional argument is that it is not helpful to include in the registration, info which in the absence of short range inspection may well be extremely misleading and inaccurate.

8. In any case we expect to receive the considered views not only of the USA authorities but of the UK and France. The validity of any objections which may be raised and in particular of claims that our working paper on registration would give away military secrets must be judged in the first instance by our own experts in these fields who have the necessary scientific and technical competence.

9. A final consideration which may have some relevance is that Stassen has often remarked that if the USSR showed any interest in proposals for limitation or other schemes going beyond a very simple registration, the USA would be prepared to give very careful consideration to any Soviet proposals. I feel that the USA, not unrealistically, pays greatest attention to the bilateral Soviet-American aspect of the disarmament negotiations. They are anxious that any change in USA policy which might be regarded as a concession should be reserved if possible for use in bargaining with the USSR and should be advanced if possible only in return for some Soviet concession. The fact that to date the USSR has shown no interest in test limitations has undoubtedly worked against any flexibility in the USA position on this subject.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Johnson. We have sent by bag a memo† summarising developments at this session on conventional disarmament and our telegram 673 April 5 sums up developments dealing with proposals on test explosions of nuclear weapons. This message will complete a general survey to date of this session of the Sub-Committee.

2. Attention has focussed on the possibility of agreeing on a first-stage or partial disarmament plan. The formal Soviet proposal⁹⁴ tabled on March 18 is a comprehensive plan going much farther than anything the USA could agree at the present time, but the Soviet Delegation has not ruled out a partial agreement.

3. Such a partial agreement would presumably have to include the following elements (1) some conventional disarmament (2) something dealing with nuclear weapons (3) some provision on tests of nuclear weapons (4) some provision for reduction and limitation in special zones, particularly a zone in Central Europe (5) measures on control and inspection including at least a beginning of mutual aerial inspection.

4. When the various national positions on each of these subjects are examined it would appear that unless important further adjustments are made we are still a considerable distance even from the moderate goal of a first-stage agreement. Nevertheless there is a greater impression of serious negotiation, particularly between the USA and the USSR, and (at least on the part of Moch and Stassen) a greater feeling that some agreement might actually be reached than I think we have ever experienced before in the Sub-Committee.

5. The following are some of the important remaining differences:

(1) Conventional Disarmament. The USSR insists that the Western Powers must agree in advance to second-stage reductions down to the level of 1 to 1 1/2 million for the largest powers and 650,000 for the UK and France. Stassen has so far been unwilling to make any definite USA commitment below the first-stage generally accepted by everyone of 2 1/2 million for the largest powers and 750,000 for the UK and France. This discussion is rather unreal so far as the UK is concerned, since the publication of its White Paper on defence indicating a level of forces already below the first stage and a planned level (within a few years) much below the second stage. Stassen has agreed to consider a commitment for a second-stage reduction by 15 percent or its equivalent in armaments and has implied that there would be some corresponding reduction in armed forces. Zorin has rejected this in the terms in which it was offered as a "concession" since he does not want to have to make any Soviet concession in return for "a step halfway back to a former USA position" but he has indicated to Stassen that he regards it as an important move. Therefore, as between the USA and the USSR the gap may have narrowed on this point. (The UK and France have objected to any flat percentage cut in armaments — but the USA and the USSR do not seem to think this is a difficult issue and it can probably be worked out. Our own impression is that Stassen is not very impressed by the significance of any direct comparison between the amount of conventional armaments of the UK or of France, and the armaments of the USSR).

(2) Nuclear Disarmament. At least on the record there is a wide gap in this field between the USA and the USSR. The USSR still proposes complete prohibition and elimination of nuclear weapons, prohibition of use, except in accordance with recommendations of the Security Council, and complete prohibition of manufacture of nuclear weapons. They would also propose that no country allow its nuclear weapons to be located outside its own frontiers. The USA proposal leaves intact present stockpiles of nuclear weapons and weapon-grade fissionable material (except for eventual transfers to non-weapons uses at a rate which would leave USA nuclear strength substantially unimpaired for any foreseeable period). The basic USA proposal is that after a specified early target date, future production of fissionable materials would be used exclusively under international control for non-weapons purposes and that after this there would be gradual transfers from past stockpiles to internationally supervised non-weapons uses. The USA say that their proposals go as far as the possibility of inspection and control permits. The USSR demands, in effect, measures which are uncontrollable but which should be undertaken as a moral obligation.

(3) Tests of Nuclear Weapons. The USSR demands either complete cessation of tests or a temporary suspension of all tests. They have shown no interest whatsoever in schemes for limitation of test explosions or for advance registration of tests. The USA has also shown very little interest in test limitation or in any system of test registration which goes seriously beyond present USA publicity arrangements. The USA proposal on tests is essentially for complete cessation of tests after acceptance and implementation of the main USA proposal for controlling future production of fissionable material and for making transfers. The USA has not been precise as to the timing of cessation, but it seems that it could come after the implementation of the control on future production for non-weapons purposes and at the point when agreement has been reached on the beginning of the transfers. Our impression is that in the process of bargaining with the USSR on these nuclear measures, the USA would be prepared to advance the timing of complete cessation. The attitude of both the USSR and the USA on nuclear tests probably reflects the fact that control of cessation of tests would be simpler than control of limitation. Stassen has said that a relatively small number of units with proper equipment in the USSR could ascertain whether an agreement on cessation of tests was being honoured. To police a scheme for limitation of tests would apparently require close investigation at the scene of the explosion of a sort not likely to be acceptable to the testing powers. It therefore seems that the only proposal on tests likely to be acceptable both to the USA and to the USSR in a first-stage agreement is the complete cessation of tests. This, in turn, is dependent on the USSR's accepting the general nuclear proposals of the USA and giving up its demand for the more extreme Soviet nuclear proposals, i.e. complete prohibition and elimination in spite of the absence of effective control.

(4) Special Areas or Zones of Reduction and Limitation of Armaments and Armed Forces. The general impression of the Western Sub-Committee members seems to be that the USSR will not accept a global disarmament agreement which does not prescribe some particular reductions of forces in the NATO and Warsaw Pact area. Neither Moch nor Stassen seems to accept the rather extreme position adopted by the recent Four Power Working Group in Washington (USA, UK, France and Germany), i.e. that special arrangements for education of forces in particular areas have nothing to do with disarmament and cannot be discussed in the disarmament Sub-Committee. We have not yet reached this item on the agenda, but Moch and Stassen have both indicated that in their view it is not — repeat not — unreasonable for the USSR to link such proposals for reducing forces in Germany or in the NATO Warsaw Pact area, or for security arrangements in this area should not be discussed in the disarmament Sub-Committee as separate or independent proposals, but only if the USSR regards such proposals as elements in a disarmament agreement. (Neither Moch nor Stassen has spoken to this effect in the Sub-Committee and our impression of their view is obtained from a number of passing references to this subject in the Four Power meetings. Both have probably been expressing personal opinions on this subject rather than definite government policy.

(5) Control. Stassen has endeavoured to reassure Zorin on the extent of control that the USA would require in a first-stage agreement. He has stressed that it is now the USA view that the control measures need not begin before the beginning of measures of reduction. In the past Western countries have demanded that the control apparatus be in position ready to operate in advance of actual disarmament and the Russians have always indicated fear that after the control apparatus had engaged in a certain amount of legalized espionage the agreed disarmament might not take place. Stassen has also specifically repudiated the far reaching detailed controls on fissionable materials set forth as part of the Baruch plan. He has stressed that the USA now believes in a "moderate" degree of control for a first-stage agreement, although it would have to be sufficient to give reasonable assurance that the measure are actually being carried out.

6. The control in the first stage in the USA view would, however, have to include, as part of the prevention of surprise attack, ground control posts unlimited geographically, and a beginning of mutual aerial inspection. Stassen has repeatedly indicated that the real USA concern is still to have warning against major surprise attack. If the USSR can be gradually opened up to aerial inspection (with, from the beginning, widely dispersed ground control units as proposed by Bulganin) the USA is not greatly concerned about minor violations of actual disarmament measures. Stassen has therefore studiously avoided all the old disarmament talk about what could happen in button and glass factories. He does not care, provided the USA would have adequate advance warning of any major Soviet attack. It is of course part of this thesis that if a major attack cannot be prepared in secret it will not take place. The USSR has not in any way receded from its recent more favourable position on control, i.e. admission of control elements with unimpeded access to objects of control in time to inspect on the spot the disarmament measures agreed upon. The USSR has also accepted the principle of aerial inspection and Stassen has privately made a counter proposal to the USSR suggestion of a zone of 800 kilometers each way from the dividing line in Germany. Stassen's counter proposal is a somewhat different zone in Europe, as well as a zone including portions of Soviet Siberia and a strip in North America which would take in Alaska, part of the Canadian Northwest Territories, part of British Columbia and part of the Northwestern American States. The Russians are still studying this. Stassen has made it quite clear that he no longer insists on the complete Eisenhower open skies plan at the beginning.

7. The comments above deal with disarmament on a subject by subject basis. The following assessment of the attitude of each member of the Sub-Committee may be of interest.

8. USA and USSR. It is our impression that the USA and the USSR are both seriously interested in reaching some agreement. Many of the Soviet statements dealing with nuclear weapons suggest that they are anxious to reach an agreement which would preclude development of nuclear capabilities by or in any additional countries; they may have in mind particularly the possibility of nuclear weapons in German hands and they might even hope to prevent Chinese possession of nuclear weapons. The USA is no doubt interested in reaching an agreement which would begin the opening up of the USSR to inspection before the development of Soviet long range missiles which would tend to make obsolete the whole USA position on preventing surprise attack. The USA of course proposes control on development of such missiles to ensure they are used only for peaceful purposes. So far the USSR has responded to this only in a context of complete prohibition of nuclear weapons. Both countries probably have in mind also the difficulty of distinguishing use of tactical atomic weapons from use of bombs, and the growing tendency to equip forces with tactical atomic weapons.

9. The tone and manner of exchanges between the USA and Soviet Representatives has been one of courteous and reasonable discussion. They have had, almost daily, private conversations on which Stassen apparently reports fairly fully to his Western colleagues. Both countries are obviously concerned mainly with one another and only very secondarily with the other members of the Sub-Committee; thus Stassen has implied in Western meetings that there is little point in his Western colleagues pressing him to make changes in USA policy which they think might improve the general Western position. While he considers all such suggestions carefully, he has made it quite clear that USA concessions are too valuable to be granted except to extract reciprocal concessions from the USSR. He has therefore shown little real interest, for example, in proposals for limitation or substantial registration of nuclear tests and has often remarked that so far there has been no Soviet interest in these subjects. The USA and the USSR both realistically enough have their gaze fixed on each other and the important moves of each are made almost solely with relation to the reaction of the other Great Power.

10. UK. The UK attitude at this session has reflected some of the confusion in current UK policy and perhaps the present phase of disenchantment with anything related to the UN. Before the talks began they repudiated their earlier proposals for a preliminary agreement on limitation of test explosions without on-the-spot control. Partly as a result of public opinion in the UK they have now reverted to at least an appearance of proposing test limitation but with extensive control which would probably make the policy unacceptable to both the USA and the USSR. Their official position on conventional disarmament is hardly consistent with their defence White Paper. Unlike earlier disarmament meetings the UK Delegation has not played a leading role.

11. France. The position of the French Delegation is somewhat similar. While there is no doubt of Moch's personal sincerity and seriousness about disarmament, the French Delegation has for the first time lagged behind the USA Delegation. In the past Moch has eagerly sought compromise between the USA and USSR and his activities were often viewed with some suspicion by the USA Delegation which feared he was too ready to give away essential USA interests. At this session in the Western meetings we have repeatedly seen Moch urging on Stassen the need for caution in adjusting the USA position in ways likely to bring it nearer agreement with the USSR. The interesting spectacle of a French Socialist lecturing a Mid-West Republican on the danger of too much trust in the Russians is not a bad illustration of the change which has taken place in the Sub-Committee negotiations. It is true that Moch would not admit that France has in any way backed down on disarmament proposals. On every possible occasion he reiterates French support for the comprehensive Anglo-French plan; but it is clear to everyone that this plan will never be accepted either by the USA or the USSR, and his very cautious attitude (probably on instructions from his Government) to the more limited proposals which Stassen makes which have at least some chance of acceptance by the Russians must be taken as reflecting some real French reluctance to reconcile themselves to a limited, essentially Soviet-American Agreement. The essence of the French fear is probably that an agreement satisfactory to the USA, i.e. one which opens up the USSR to some American inspection and gives the USA assurance against the danger of surprise attack, could still leave the USSR overwhelmingly powerful on the ground in Europe. But a frank American answer would probably be that no plan can alter the fact that the USSR is a great power and France is not.

12. Canada. Canada's position in the Sub-Committee is also conditioned by the basic fact that the most important negotiation must be between the USA and the USSR, and that in matters directly affecting their national security neither of these Great Powers is likely to pay much attention to advice from smaller allies. In the meetings of the Four we have strenuously supported the Canadian proposals for a substantial scheme of test registration and for a limited agreement on test limitations. In the next phase of the Sub-Committee's work after Easter we shall have to decide whether to press ahead with these ideas even if they are strongly opposed by the USA. It is somewhat difficult for a country which does not have large armed forces and has no nuclear weapons at all and, therefore, carries out no nuclear tests, to take a public position on these issues strongly at variance with the views of a major ally. On the test question, for example, we should probably be dependent on the USA even for the necessary detailed technical info on which to base a plan even though this plan were not acceptable to the USA. There are clearly definite limits to what we would want to do in such circumstances. Similarly on such subjects as missiles and rockets or even reduction of conventional forces and conventional armaments, we would necessarily be in the rather unsatisfactory position of making proposals which affect other people's weapons and forces and have only very slight direct impact on Canadian forces and weapons. The position is different, of course, in respect of schemes for European security and zones of limitation. Any views we wish to put forward on such questions stem from our position in NATO and we should, of course, have no hesitation in advancing them vigorously.

13. In conclusion, all of the Western members of the Sub-Committee must consider carefully the extent to which they wish to maintain Western unity vis-à-vis the USSR in the Sub-Committee meetings. Although the USA is far from inflexible in its attitude and many adjustments in their position can be obtained privately in the Western meetings, in the last analysis the price of Western unity in the Sub-Committee must be recognition of the leading role of the USA in the negotiations with the USSR which will determine whether or not any agreement can be reached.

DISARMAMENT — NUCLEAR TESTS

Following for the Minister. Discussions on Tuesday with a highly qualified team of experts from Washington have given ourselves and the Department of Defense improved insight into the USA position on nuclear tests. From these talks it would appear that the technical difficulties about verification of compliance with a limitations agreement are not so much the reason for as the justification of opposition to a separate preliminary agreement on limitations. However there are practical difficulties about detecting reliably the fact that tests including relatively large ones have been carried out. In other respects also the USA position is not without very substantial foundation and it is apparent that they have weighed general political as well as military and security considerations carefully before adopting the view that limitations should only be promoted as part of a larger agreement. With some reason, however, they give their first attention to the effect a limitations proposal might have on their position vis-à-vis the Soviet Union.

2. Having in mind the absence of any display of interest in such partial measures on the Soviet side as well as the negative attitude of the USA and the change in the UK position, we have been considering how best to develop the statement made by Mr. Pinard in the Assembly on December 5. You will remember that that statement suggested that the General Assembly "should try to help the nuclear powers in the first instance to agree that they should set as a self-denying ordinance some annual or other periodic limit on the volume of radiation to be generated by test explosions". It went on to refer to allocation of quantities between the powers concerned and to the need for verification.

3. It would not appear to be necessary for Canada to embrace the USA-UK argument about technical difficulties in order to effect a transition from our idea of an agreed "self-denying ordinance" to the idea of unilateral restraint advocated in the USA-UK Bermuda communiqué. It would seem possible to make such a change in emphasis by attaching the blame to the Soviet Union for the need to turn towards unilateral declarations because of its unwillingness even to consider such an agreement. In so doing it would probably be advisable to recapitulate the December 5 argument that in present circumstances any arrangements concerning nuclear tests "must enable the needs of defence in a dangerously divided world to be given reasonable satisfaction" while efforts are made "to meet whatever may be competently estimated as the requirements of the objective scientific situation" with respect to health.

4. The second round of discussions in the Sub-Committee on nuclear tests is likely to begin shortly. If in your view it is desirable to make the above shift in emphasis at this stage, it would be convenient for Mr. Johnson to make the move in the next few days. We are inclined to consider such a move to be suited to developments and think that it could be effected now with a minimum of emphasis on whatever temporary retreat from principle may be involved. Indeed, it should be possible so to phrase the statement as to convey the idea that we would prefer to see the undertaking of self-restraint recognized in an agreement and that our support for an appeal directed to the Soviet Union to make a declaration similar to those of the USA and UK is prompted by our often stated desire to find a practical way of making some start on the problem.

5. If you agree that events indicate that this transition might be made and that the present circumstances are favorable, you may wish to consider instructing Mr. Johnson to act along the lines indicated above.

6. The problem of a proposal in the Sub-Committee on registration is rather less easily dealt with. On the one hand it is clear that Norway, Japan and other interested countries regard information on the radiation produced by tests to be the raison d'être of registration. They are most unlikely to be impressed by a proposal to publish through the UN little more than the place and date of future tests. On the other hand our conversations with the experts have made it clear that in the USA view the publication of estimated yield in fission products when set against Soviet reading from their long range detection instruments would or might convey to the Soviet Union an undesirable amount of intelligence concerning USA progress in developing a "clean bomb". Whatever may be the justification for this fear, it is apparent that for the present at least the USA is most unlikely to be dissuaded from its refusal to do anything which might facilitate Soviet estimates of their technical accomplishments.

7. It would appear that we have pressing upon us a choice between (a) co-sponsoring some USA-UK proposal which may well be submitted within the next few days which would make no provision for registering estimates of fission products; (b) promoting by ourselves, conceivably with French support, a proposal which would call for the registration of such estimates; and (c) doing neither and trying to explain this apparent retreat once again in terms of Soviet intransigence.

8. Neither (a) nor (b) appears to be attractive. The terms of the resolution we co-sponsored with Japan and Norway implies even though it does not state that there should be information provided on radiation. It seems to us accordingly that in this matter we might consider neglecting the principle of Western solidarity in the Sub-Committee. However, it does not seem profitable to go so far as to underline our differences by making counter proposals, especially as they are unlikely to command the support of any of the testing powers. We then seem to be left with the problem of putting the best face possible on a not very strong position. If you concur in this brief analysis of the present situation you may wish to consider whether alternative (c) might be followed by Mr. Johnson.

9. Our partners in the Sub-Committee should be prepared to accept the difficulty of our situation. It is after all in part a result of our successful effort in the Assembly to counter the Soviet proposal for cessation of tests and divert attention towards partial measures. We might indeed express support for the US-UK approach as a first move while indicating that we would have preferred a scheme which would go further.

10. It may not be quite so easy to maintain our position with respect to other interested powers although the Norwegians at least appreciate the difficulties which we face in promoting in the Sub-Committee policies at variance with those of our partners. However, it would not appear to be unduly difficult to contrive a statement which would serve to justify the absence of any specific proposal on our part.

11. The basic ingredients of such a statement might be the following:

(1) Arrangements concerning nuclear weapons whether they concern their manufacture, stock piling, use, or testing must be acceptable to the powers which possess them.

(2) Other powers may attempt to persuade the nuclear powers to take certain steps but it is necessary in the first place to have a receptive audience.

(3) Two of the nuclear powers have indicated their readiness to consider arrangements for the registration of nuclear tests.

(4) However the Soviet Union has shown no sign of willingness even to consider such proposals.

(5) It would therefore appear that the initiative which we took in the Assembly with Norway and Japan has proceeded about as far as is possible in the present circumstances.

12. We do not look upon the suggestions in this telegram as ideal. However, the course of discussions in the Sub-Committee would appear to require us to adopt positions in the very near future on both limitations and registration. The main merit of the somewhat unheroic ideas we are submitting is that they would enable us to avoid undesirable and unfruitful public conflict with the USA and UK without overt retreat from the principles and position which we have been advocating. We may send you some further suggestions as to steps we might take.

13. It may be that this matter will not arise in the Sub-Committee before Monday, May 6, because of attention given to the new Soviet proposals for a partial agreement. It might therefore be possible for Mr. Johnson to discuss these matters with you in Bonn before you take a final decision.

DISARMAMENT — NUCLEAR TESTS

Following for the Minister. As noted in paragraph 12 of our telegram under reference we will present here some further suggestions arising out of our discussions with the USA experts.

2. You will recall that the conversion of the UK to the USA point of view regarding a separate and preliminary agreement on limitations left us in the unenviable position of advocating for our two principal allies a course which they opposed on a matter in which they were in a better position than we to form judgment. At that stage you decided that for the present there was nothing to be gained by continuing to promote a scheme for limitations in the Sub-Committee and Mr. Johnson was so advised. However, the idea of a separate limitations agreement was merely rendered dormant rather than regarded as a policy to be abandoned.

3. One conclusion we would draw from our discussions with the USA experts is that the dormant state should continue until there is a material change in circumstances and that a further review should be made of the objective scientific desirability of such a policy and its probable reception in the near future among non nuclear powers. It is essential, of course, to ponder further the military, security and technical considerations elaborated by the USA. However it would appear that a prior question to be examined is whether the reasons which led us to advocate limitations as a separate agreement continue to have the same force as they did a year ago. In this novel and rapidly progressing field it seems essential to keep abreast of up-to-date information and competent opinion on radiation effects and the significance of the fission products produced by testing. The recently concluded session of the UN scientific committee on the effects of atomic radiation may have provided some basis for a fresh assessment. We contemplate seeking the counsel of our radiation experts shortly for these purposes.

4. Pending a general review as above, we are not prepared to recommend a change in policy to the extent of endorsing all the conditions for limitations which are proposed by the USA. Among the factors affecting the decision would be an assessment of the importance of the technical difficulties of verifying compliance with provisions for limitations. The USA experts discussed frankly the causes of error and failure in their long range detection methods and the stratagems which might be followed by a government seeking to conceal explosions. Their exposition carried conviction but the problem remains of assessing the facts and relating the possibilities to whatever situation may exist following the present session of the Sub-Committee.

5. In the matter of registration, when urging the publication of estimates of fission products we have again found ourselves at variance with our principal allies. Our telegram under reference mentioned the USA concern to avoid measures which might facilitate Soviet estimates of their technical accomplishments. They have in mind among other reasons that it is much easier for the Soviet Union to approach their test areas (for example by submarine) than for the USA to approach the Soviet testing grounds. We understand that the USA will hold to their position until they can expect some concession in return from the Soviet Union. Consequently despite the lack of Soviet interest in registration, the USA does not appear prepared either to advance or to subscribe to a proposal for the registration of estimated yield of fission products outside the context of some larger agreement.

6. We are inclined to the view that if the second round of discussions in the Sub-Committee starts with nuclear tests, there is little likelihood of immediate progress on this question as it is one on which the USA and Soviet Union are far apart. However should advances be made on other topics such as conventional reductions and aerial inspection where the outlook is somewhat brighter, there might be a later reversion to the test question. In that event some of the present USA and Soviet policies might be modified and we might consider whether it would be appropriate to put forward in the Sub-Committee a suggestion that a registration scheme including provision for fission products estimates should be implemented in advance of whatever other agreement may be in the making.

7. In the meantime it is not necessary to accept completely all the USA contentions in order to conclude that they have solid grounds for their attitude on registration, that they are well placed to decide when and how it should be modified and that public importunity on our part would be unavailing and might even be unhelpful in the over all negotiations.

DISARMAMENT — NUCLEAR TESTS

Following from Johnson. I discussed your telegrams V291 and V298 with the Minister today. He considers that if and when the subject of nuclear tests is again discussed in the Subcommittee, we must maintain our position on registration in terms which would comply with the joint Canadian-Japanese-Norwegian resolution. The Minister considers that paragraph 2 of that resolution implies that the info given on registration must contain some estimate of the fissionable material released in connection with any test explosion. He left it to me whether this should be done in a statement for the record only or by the introduction of a formal paper.

2. As we are now in the process of considering the Soviet memo on partial disarmament agreement,⁹⁵ I suggested to the Minister that perhaps this was not the appropriate time to place the blame on the USSR for lack of progress in devising an acceptable registration scheme. I might say in the Subcommittee that it is still possible that a solution of the problem of tests might be agreed to as part of a more general agreement but point out that, in the absence of a more general agreement, we maintain the position taken in the General Assembly — namely that something should be done to achieve the objective, as stated in the Joint Resolution, of “keeping the total actual and expected radiation in the world under constant observation”. This would enable us to hold in reserve arguments alluding to Soviet intransigence until a more appropriate time, for example in explaining, if necessary, failure to reach a more general agreement.

3. If the Subcommittee proceeds in the next few days to a separate discussion on the subject of tests, therefore, I shall try to take the more positive line indicated above but I shall get into the record a statement of our position based on the joint resolution. I may also table a paper on registration along the lines of our draft registration paper but I wish to give this matter more thought.

4. The Minister gave his general approval to the procedure outlined above.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Johnson. In my telegram under reference I gave a general survey of developments in the Subcommittee up to April 17. In this message I propose to continue that survey up to the adjournment of the Disarmament Subcommittee from [April] 6 to May 27, under the following headings: (a) the Soviet memo tabled in the Subcommittee on April 30, though shown unofficially to Western Delegations on April 25; (b) registration of tests; (c) limitation of tests; (d) repercussions of the disarmament talks in West Germany; (e) miscellaneous questions; and (f) prospects of agreement.

2. Soviet Memo of April 30. In my telegram 854 April 27† I gave a summary of the Soviet memo, and in my Telegram 900 May 1† I indicated the advances made towards the Western position in the new Soviet memo and also the gaps which still remain between the Soviet and Western positions. For convenience I am summarizing here the main differences between the Soviet proposals of April 30 and Western position:

(a) Levels of Forces. There is now general agreement that in the first stage the armed forces of the larger powers should be reduced to 2.5 million and those of the UK and France to 750,000. A very important difference has, however, developed between the positions of the USA and the USSR on further reductions. The USSR insists that any agreement which would reduce forces to 2.5 million and 750,000 in the first stage must also include a second stage reduction to 1—1.5 million for the greater powers and 650,000 for the UK and France. This requirement offers no difficulties to France or the UK, but Stassen refuses now to make any commitment with regard to a second stage reduction. Zorin argues that because the USA requires only very small forces for its continental defence to allow troops levels of 2.5 million men would permit the USA to keep large forces stationed abroad. In fact, Zorin went so far as to say privately to Moch that when the USSR called for 1—1.5 million men in the second stage they had in mind one million for the USA and 1.5 million for the USSR. Zorin justified this difference on the grounds that the USSR covers a much larger area and is surrounded by hostile military blocs. Moch however did not take these remarks of Zorin's seriously.

(b) Conventional Disarmament. On a first stage reduction the positions of the USA and the USSR are not far apart. Stassen speaks of a 10 percent reduction whereas Zorin calls for a 15 percent reduction. Stassen has however recognized that percentage cuts would not affect all countries in the same way and presumably he would be willing to consider other formulae for other countries. Percentage reduction is strongly opposed by the UK and France. Moch argues that the USSR, in contrast to France, has a large quantity of surplus equipment. If hostilities broke out the armed forces of the USSR could be quickly increased to use this surplus equipment. He insists that the level of armaments must be tied to the level of forces by means of a points system under which each type of weapon would be allotted a certain number of men. Further details of these positions are given in the memo prepared by Captain Ellis which was sent to you under cover of my letter 838 May 14.†

(c) Nuclear Disarmament. Here the gap between the Soviet and Western positions is very wide. The USSR insist on the following: (a) an immediate suspension of all nuclear tests; (b) a solemn undertaking to renounce from the outset the use for military purposes of nuclear weapons of all types including aerial bombs, rockets etc. and (c) an understanding by all parties that they would make every effort to reach an agreement providing for the elimination of nuclear weapons from the armaments of states, cessation of their production, and the destruction of their stockpiles. The USA position is of course, that at an early stage in a disarmament agreement there would be prohibition of the manufacture of fissionable material for weapons purposes. Some time after this cut-off date all tests of nuclear weapons would be prohibited. After the cut-off date the USA would agree to some arrangement whereby the nuclear powers would transfer to peaceful uses fissionable material from their weapons stockpiles. Stassen, however has made it quite clear to the other Western Delegations, (a) that the USA has no intention in the foreseeable future of reducing stockpiles of nuclear weapons to zero; and (b) that USA would wish to safeguard their rights after the cut-off date to refabricate old bombs into new ones with a reduced radioactive content, to make large existing bombs into small tactical and air defence weapons, and to take such steps as would be necessary to ensure that their stockpiles of bombs were ready for use. (See my telegram 984 May 9.†) Moch has made the French position clear on several occasions in the Subcommittee. France would forego its right to make nuclear weapons, but only on condition that the present nuclear powers agreed to stop the manufacture of nuclear weapons. Hence, France will not agree to prohibition of tests unless it is linked to the cessation of manufacture of fissionable material for weapons purposes.

(d) Control. Stassen has not expressed himself in any detail on the Soviet proposals for a control system. Moch and Noble have however stressed a number of inadequacies in the Soviet proposals. Partial control is of course appropriate to an agreement for partial disarmament, but partial control means all necessary controls and not "whittling away" at important objects of control or functions of the control organ. Thus, the Soviet proposals are unsatisfactory in so far as they leave out provisions for permanent control and unimpeded access to all objects of control, which were present in their previous proposals. Similarly, their plan is inadequate because it places ground control posts at air bases only in a later stage in disarmament. Again, the Soviet proposals are unsatisfactory because they call for ground control posts in almost all the territory of the Western Powers, while leaving vast areas of the Soviet Union untouched.

(e) Aerial Inspection. The history of this concept in the Subcommittee is unusual. Stassen has never tabled in the Subcommittee any specific proposal for zones of aerial inspection. He did however mention privately to Zorin and to other members of the Subcommittee, USA "concepts" of zones of aerial inspection which would include an area in Europe, and another on both sides of the Bering Straits. The European zone would include a sector between the Pole and 40 degrees north latitude and 5 degrees east and 30 degrees east; the Bering Straits zone would include an area between the Pole and 40 degrees north latitude and from 150 degrees east to 120 degrees west. The American proposals first came before the Subcommittee in the Soviet memo tabled by Zorin on April 30. Zorin referred to the zone suggested by Stassen, and suggested alternative areas on behalf of the USSR. In Europe the USSR proposes a sector bounded on the west by zero meridian, on the east by longitude 25 degrees east, on the north by latitude 54 degrees north, and on the south by latitude 39 degrees 38 mins. north. The area in the Far East and North America would include all of the Soviet Union east of longitude 108 degrees east and all the USA west of longitude 90 degrees west. (Presumably this area also includes all of Alaska.) Stassen has not made any adverse comment in the Subcommittee on the zones suggested by Zorin but both Moch, Noble and I have all stated frankly that we consider that the zones are one sided and favour the Soviet Union unduly. Privately, and with his Western colleagues only, Stassen has discussed the possibility of a compromise proposal which would involve shifting the European zone suggested by the Soviet Union 2 1/2 degrees east and some distance north. He has also suggested that more Soviet territory in Asia might be included if we offered either the part of Canada between Alaska and the State of Washington, or part of the Arctic region of Canada.

(f) Regional Arrangements. The Soviet Union propose that USA, French and British troops in Western Germany and Soviet troops in Eastern Germany should be reduced by 1/3. They also urge that the same powers should reduce their forces in the territories of the NATO and Warsaw Pact countries. The gap between the USSR and the Western positions on these two questions is not easy to define because there is some doubt both as to the Soviet position and the Western position. It is not clear from the new Soviet memo whether their proposals on these two questions are conditions of a partial disarmament agreement or a goal to be achieved later. Moreover, I am not sure how far in the Western view proposals for the thinning out of troops in the two Germanies or in the NATO and Warsaw Pact countries is dependent on German reunification. Moch and Noble have both been at pains to declare that the Disarmament Subcommittee is not competent to discuss these questions. Stassen has made no comment beyond saying that obviously if American troops were substantially reduced, the reductions would probably be felt in all areas where it had troops. On your instructions I have said that since any disarmament agreement would be likely to have special repercussions in particular areas, including Europe, it would be appropriate to consider whether special regional provisions should be included in such an agreement, but that it was not the business of the Subcommittee to find solutions for the major problems affecting such regions as Europe, the MidEast, the FarEast, and other areas.

(g) Foreign Bases. In its new proposals the USSR suggests that it should be agreed which bases should be abolished within the first one or two years. It is not really clear if the USSR are insisting, as they did in their previous proposals that all bases should be abolished within two years. Stassen has not commented on this provision in the Subcommittee.

3. Registration of Tests. The Canadian-Japanese-Norwegian proposal for advance registration of tests has on a number of occasions been rejected by Zorin. He regards any system of registration as a retrograde step which would in fact have the effect of legalizing and justifying tests. Noble and Stassen have both said publicly that they favour advance registration together with limited international observation of tests. Stassen has told us privately that in any system of registration the USA could not agree to give estimates of the amount of fissionable material released in a test. Noble has also spoken in the same sense privately. In the Subcommittee he has said that the UK could not give any info which would reveal military details of the type of bomb being used in tests beyond that which could be learned by observers at the test site. I made it clear in the Subcommittee that the system of advance registration recommended by Canada, Norway and Japan envisaged the provision by the testing country of data concerning the fission products involved in any tests. The gap between the Canadian position and that of the UK and USA has so far not created difficulties because of the uncompromising attitude taken by Zorin towards the whole scheme.

4. Limitation of Tests. At the beginning of the Subcommittee meetings I reaffirmed the Canadian position stated by Mr. Pinard in his December 5 statement to the General Assembly, that we should hope that the nuclear powers would be able to agree in the first instance that they should set, as a self-denying ordinance, some annual or periodic limit on the volume of radiation to be generated by test explosions. The USA and British position is that any system of limitation of tests would require substantial inspection and control. They therefore disagree with the premise upon which the Canadian suggestion is based, namely, that a system of limitation would to a large extent be self-regulating. In a paper tabled by Noble which gives the British view on tests it is recommended that a committee of experts be set up to consider possible methods of limiting nuclear test explosions, and to investigate the requirements of effective supervision over an agreement to limit such explosions. Moch would agree to any system of limitation concurred in by the nuclear powers, but he has told me privately that he agrees with the UK-USA position that a fairly elaborate control system would be required. Again the difference between the Canadian position and that of the USA and the UK has not created difficulties because Zorin has been as scornful of limitation proposals as of registration proposals.

5. Repercussions in Germany. It is perhaps desirable in order to keep the record clear to state that no suggestions for demilitarized zones on either side of the dividing line in Germany have been made by Stassen in the Subcommittee, in the regular meetings of the western delegations, or privately to me. As I mentioned in paragraph 2(e) above, Stassen did, of course, mention privately to the other four delegations on the Subcommittee the concept of a zone of aerial inspection in Europe which would include both West and East Germany and other countries as well. I understand that West Germany does not object in principle to a zone of inspection which would include other countries as well as West and East Germany as long as it is not coupled with the demilitarization of zones or a thinning out of forces on either side of the demarcation line. Hence the recent German anxieties cannot be laid at the door of the Subcommittee.

6. Miscellaneous Questions. In addition to the main subjects listed above Stassen has discussed from time to time a number of other matters which he thought might have to be dealt with in framing a partial agreement, e.g., limitations on the export and import of arms, the international movement of troops, and the nature and functions of a preparatory commission. The other delegations have not yet commented on the details of these proposals.

7. Prospects of Agreement. An analysis of the recent Soviet proposals and a comparison of them with existing Western positions gives little ground for optimism that a partial disarmament agreement can be reached when the Disarmament Subcommittee resumes its sessions. Why then does Stassen continue to be "cautiously optimistic", and why do American journalists, no doubt briefed by Stassen or his delegations, reflect his optimistic attitude? I think that Stassen's optimism is mainly based on his opinion that each of the Soviet proposals is negotiable. Zorin has in fact made contradictory statements. He has said in the Subcommittee, and more forcefully in private talks with Moch and Noble, that in the Soviet view a partial disarmament agreement must include as indispensable elements (a) cessation of tests of nuclear weapons at the outset; (b) an undertaking at the outset not to use nuclear weapons; (c) an agreement now to reach a second level of forces at 1—1.5 million for the USA and the USSR and 650,000 for the UK and France. If Zorin's words are taken literally then, of course, a partial disarmament agreement would not appear likely. On the other hand, Zorin has said in the Subcommittee and privately that it is now up to the Western Powers to state which Soviet proposals they can accept and which they reject, and to submit counterproposals in the place of those they reject. He has thus given the impression that the Soviet position on all proposals is not inflexible and is subject to negotiation. Stassen has apparently seized upon this latter statement to the exclusion of the former and more than once has stated it as his belief that the Soviet memo of April 30 should be considered as a "hard bargaining beginning to serious negotiations".

8. Perhaps a sounder ground for optimism is that although the present USA proposals, in particular those in the nuclear field, are not attractive to the Russians, they do fear the entry into the nuclear weapons club of other countries, and particularly Western Germany and France. France, and I believe Western Germany as well, have declared that they will not enter the nuclear arms field if a stop is put to the nuclear arms race. Hence, the acceptance of the USA proposals, or some modification of them, by the USSR would prevent the entry into the nuclear weapons field of France, Germany and no doubt other states as well. The key question is to determine what price the USSR will pay to achieve this goal. Only time and patient probing will provide the answer to this question.

10. It is clear that if any progress is to be made when we resume our discussions, concessions will have to be made on both sides. Until we have some idea of the nature of USA thinking it will be very difficult for us to make recommendations as to the sort of concessions the West might make in return for Soviet concessions. Stassen has told me that he will be ready to make his recommendations to the President some time next week. He has given his Western colleagues no indication of the nature of his recommendations. He has, however, promised to keep us informed both through our embassies in Washington and through his delegation here. I would therefore think it would be of great value if our Embassy in Washington could keep in close touch as possible with the State Department on these matters during the next ten days, in order to supplement what we may learn at this end, and to facilitate the transmittal of any new info to you in Ottawa.

11. Although Stassen is optimistic that he will be able to return to London by May 27 with new proposals, he has warned us that President Eisenhower might not be able to make decisions by then on all the proposals put before him. The President might reasonably require further time for consideration of some of them or that further studies be made.

12. A final observation which should be made on the Subcommittee meetings is the attitude of the chief negotiators, Stassen and Zorin. So far they have conducted the negotiations with a minimum of propaganda and abuse. Stassen sees Zorin frequently outside the Subcommittee for private talks. On several occasions the two delegations have lunched together. As a result there has so far not been an unpleasant or strained incident in the Subcommittee. Procedural points which can often cause endless delay have as a rule been settled privately in advance by Zorin and Stassen.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

New Delhi, January 11, 1956

Dear Jules [Léger],⁹⁶

As you know, the next conference of UNESCO is going to be held here this autumn. I write you this personal letter because I am very worried about the way in which this conference may go unless the Foreign Ministers of the principal Western countries realize that the conference is likely to provide an important battleground in the struggle between Russia and the West for this part of the world.

2. My impression is that most of the principal Western⁹⁷ powers have taken at UNESCO conferences in the past half dozen years or so a generally unenthusiastic, negative and unimaginative line. If they should take that kind of line at the New Delhi conference, then the Russians can score an important victory.

3. The Western powers will, I am afraid, take at New Delhi the same sort of line they have taken in the past, or at least one not far enough removed from it, if their policies on UNESCO are based on the sort of considerations on which their policies have been based in the past. Western policies on UNESCO have to be lifted out of their old context and subjected to a searching re-examination. If this re-examination is to be sufficiently searching, it must, I think be done not by those who have dealt with UNESCO in the past but at a high level and in the first instance by those who have been dealing with the cold war struggle against the Soviet Union, particularly the struggle for this part of the world.

4. I may, of course, turn out to be entirely mistaken about Russian intentions to use the UNESCO conference in Delhi as a battleground in the struggle for Asia. I do urge, however, that the only safe assumption for the West to make is that the Russians do so intend. At the International Trade Fair here they showed how capable they are of using a trade fair as an opportunity for scoring a victory over the United States and the United Kingdom in the battle for men's minds in South and Southeast Asia. The Bulganin-Khrushchev visit provided another example of Soviet cleverness in this part of the world. Unless the West is careful the Russians can score another resounding victory at the UNESCO conference here.

5. This UNESCO conference in Delhi is the first full-dress conference of a specialized agency to be held in India. It is probably the first such conference to be held anywhere in this part of the world. It should be considered therefore in this light and not as if it were just another boring meeting of another boring specialized agency held in Geneva.

6. I do not need to develop at length with you the reasons why it would be dangerous if Western policy at the UNESCO conference were negative, unimaginative and based mainly on budgetary considerations. The Russians could ask for nothing better. It would immensely assist them since it would serve further to convince Asian "neutralists" that the West is interested only in armaments and that it is materialistic, selfish and parochial and is not interested in trying to break down barriers between nations and peoples or in sharing with the peoples of the underdeveloped countries Western knowledge, education, science and culture.

7. The important thing I suggest is for the members of the Western delegations to come here with an agreed, imaginative and positive programme for expanding the work of UNESCO, particularly in fields of special interest to India and other countries of this area. The adoption by UNESCO of such a programme might well mean an increase over the next two to four years of 50% or even 100% in the budget of UNESCO. This would mean for a country like Canada an annual additional charge of $150,000 a year or $300,000 a year. I know it will not be easy to persuade Cabinet to agree to such an increase but I do suggest that it would be a modest price to pay for what could be a highly successful offensive against the Soviet Union and Communist China.

8. In spite of the fact that I lack direct knowledge of UNESCO, I have been rash enough to set forth in a note attached to this letter some suggestions about the possible content of the Western programme at the New Delhi Conference. These are nothing more than suggestions of the kind of thing the West might do at the conference to demonstrate that it is anxious to learn from the science and culture of this part of the world and is anxious to assist in helping this part of the world to learn from the culture and science of the West and from its educational processes.

9. It is not only, of course, a matter of the West deciding in advance on a positive and imaginative policy for the UNESCO conference in New Delhi; it is also a matter of the Western countries sending to Delhi first-rate delegations carefully selected to carry out Western policy at the conference. Each delegation should therefore include one or two people with shrewd political sense as well as eminent leaders in science, education and culture. They should be the kind of people whom Indians in the fields of education, science and culture would want to meet. They should be the kind of people who will want to travel around India and learn from India.

10. It would be useful if as many members as possible of the Western delegations could arrive in India a month or so before the conference. They could spend this month travelling in India, Pakistan and Ceylon and studying the projects in this area which UNESCO is helping. They should, if at all possible, stay on in India for a month or so after the conference either to travel or better still to do specialized jobs of technical assistance.

11. I have so far dealt with the general problem of Western participation in the UNESCO conference. I have not particularly referred to Canadian participation.

12. As you can well understand, however, I am even more worried about the possible Canadian position at the conference than about the Western position in general.

13. In the past, as the report of our delegation to the last UNESCO conference pointed out, we have taken a somewhat "negative" approach to the programme and the budget of UNESCO and "because of our limited knowledge of UNESCO and its activities" our participation in UNESCO conferences has been "based more upon the budgetary implications of the programme than upon the usefulness of the projects". If we should take, at the conference in New Delhi, a negative, unimaginative attitude based mainly upon a desire to keep the budget down, we may lose in this country a fair amount of the good will and respect which we have laboriously built up over eight or nine years.

14. So far as our own delegation is concerned, the kind of people I would like to see on it are W.A. Mackintosh, Wilder Penfield, Omond Solandt, Arthur Lismer, G.V. Ferguson and Donald Creighton. Mackintosh would be a first-rate advertisement of Canadian culture as the most scholarly of our university presidents. He would also be the best possible Canadian representative in discussions of the social sciences at the conference. No one could be better than Solandt on all matters connected with atomic and nuclear energy. Arthur Lismer has worked in the past two years on getting together an exhibit of children's art for Shankar's exhibition in Delhi. G.V. Ferguson would represent us admirably in discussions on the free flow of information. Donald Creighton could represent our historians.

15. There is one issue of paramount importance which I have left to the very last. One thing the West must certainly do is to ensure that China is represented at the New Delhi conference by Peking and not by Formosa. The West would look too absurd if at a first class conference held in Asia on problems of special interest to Asia it refuses to permit 600 million people of Asia to be represented.

16. I am sorry to trouble you about this because I know how busy you must be with many matters of more immediate and pressing concern to Canada. I do hope, however, that you will be able to give some thought to this question, that you can start a re-examination of Canadian policy going, and then use our influence in London, Washington, Paris and so on to try to get them to make similar re-examinations. There may be a stage at which it might be advisable to have Western policy at the UNESCO conference in New Delhi discussed by the NATO group in Paris.

Yours ever,
ESCOTT REID

UNESCO CONFERENCE AT NEW DELHI 1956

SOME SUGGESTIONS ON THE PROGRAMME OF THE WESTERN DELEGATIONS

1. The Western delegations might propose that the work which UNESCO is now doing to disseminate the visual arts and music of South and Southeast Asia and to translate the classical and modern works of this region should be greatly expanded. Specific proposals should be made. Western representatives should emphasize their interest in and respect for the culture of this region — its art, music, dancing, philosophy and so on — and the desire of the West to acquire greater knowledge, understanding and appreciation of this culture.

2. The French might develop at Delhi the kind of ideas they put forward at the Geneva meeting of Foreign Ministers in November for encouraging the freer flow of information, ideas and persons between the Western world and the Soviet Union. Each of the Western countries should be prepared to support the French and come forward with constructive ideas of their own. The objective would be to demonstrate on Asian soil that it is the Russians and not the West who maintain the iron curtain and are afraid of competitive co-existence.

3. At the last UNESCO conference the underdeveloped countries put forward a resolution on the establishment of an educational, scientific and cultural fund and this resolution was passed by a substantial majority even though vigorously opposed by the United States and other large contributors. Instead of opposing this proposal at the next meeting the Western countries might work out in advance an agreed, sensible, generous proposal for a development fund which they would be prepared to support at the New Delhi conference.

4. Western Government might seek the advice of Western medical experts on the drafting of a proposal for an expert examination by UNESCO of non-Western systems of medicine starting with the ancient systems of South and Southeast Asia. The argument which Western delegations could advance at the conference could be that Western medicine stands in great need of drawing upon the wisdom and resources of these ancient systems of medicine. (It has recently been stated that Western medicine is only beginning to use a drug for the treatment of nervous disorders which has been used successfully in India for centuries. Is it not possible that this drug might have been discovered many years ago if Western medicine had been more interested in examining the merits of the two ancient Indian medical systems?)

5. The West might urge an acceleration of the research work being done by UNESCO on the arid zone of the world and on the humid tropical zone, on the social implications for South and Southeast Asian countries of industrialization and urbanization, and on the training of teachers in "fundamental education" in countries such as India.

6. Western delegations might support a special intensive programme for assisting India in the establishment of modern methods of language teaching. The emphasis should not be on the teaching of English but on the teaching of the national language, Hindi, and the dozen or so principal regional languages. English would also benefit by such a programme.

7. The West might urge an extension of the work which UNESCO is already doing to help eradicate racial discriminations in the world. Western ideas on this, as on other subjects, should be carefully thought out in advance. It is not a matter of Western delegates giving pious, platitudinous sermons on the text of all men being brothers but of Western delegates putting forward precise, workable suggestions on how UNESCO might help its member states in their struggles to eradicate racial discriminations on their territories. Because the United States can be particularly proud of what it is doing to eradicate discriminations against its Negro citizens, the United States might usefully take the lead in this question.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, February 29, 1956

Dear Escott [Reid],

In my interim acknowledgement† of your letter of January 11 concerning the UNESCO Conference I told you that we were considering your proposals and that I would give you a fuller report of the results. It is still too early to say that we have results but you may be interested to know how our thinking has moved, influenced as it has been by your very thoughtful letter.

Everyone seems to be agreed that the UNESCO Conference to be held in New Delhi cannot fail to be other than a battleground for the soul of Asia! In any event, our thinking is based on this assumption.

As you are well aware, budgetary considerations play a large part in our lives and I can see immense difficulties confronting us if we were to try to reverse our traditional stand in UNESCO. I do not think that this stand has been entirely unreasonable considering the nebulous character of the UNESCO field of endeavour and the shameless way in which some member states have tried to exploit it, not merely for national interests but even for personal. We shall, however, if it is not too platitudinous to say so, examine all proposals on their merits. We are even considering the possibility of making a proposal or two ourselves.

We agree with you that Western delegations should come to New Delhi with an agreed, imaginative and positive programme. We shall discuss with our friends the possibility of increasing UNESCO's activity in India but I am sure the Government would insist on proceeding from proposals and their justification to the request for an increase in the UNESCO budget rather than agreement in advance to spend more money on projects later to be identified. Moreover any increase in the total UNESCO budget would be reflected proportionately in the assessments on all member states, many of which could not absorb or would not accept any increase. In short, the budget has almost reached the saturation point. It will largely fall to the members of the delegation, of which you may well find yourself one, to see that our activities in budgetary committees devote themselves to the task of getting the best value for the money available rather than creating the impression that our main concern is to save money.

Concerning delegations, our present feeling is that we should select from the agenda, a few subjects on which Canada can be expected to have some useful contribution to make. We should then choose our delegates from among the best experts we have in these fields. If we find we have an outstanding expert available for which no suitable subject exists, we should be prepared to consider placing an item on the agenda for his special benefit.

The question of travelling around India is a difficult one inasmuch as first-rate people are not likely to have too much time at their disposal and funds for this sort of travel are extremely difficult to come by. We will, however, explore the possibilities. Your suggestions for the Canadian delegation are all interesting and will be considered in the light of the agenda and our special interests.

In spite of the line of reasoning which prompts the suggestion, the idea of Communist China's being represented at the conference is, for many reasons of which you are aware, not likely to materialize.

In line with your suggestion, we are approaching some of our friends in NATO to explore the possibility of dividing the UNESCO field to some extent and to agree on some general common attitude. The objections to bringing NATO as an entity into this particular operation are very obvious but I do agree that useful preparations could be undertaken by NATO delegations in Paris.

Information Division, which is already devoting a good deal of time to preparations for the UNESCO Conference, will be keeping you regularly informed on each step as it is taken.

I might also refer to your letter of February 2† and the suggestion that we undertake some sort of cultural activity in India. Although there is little likelihood of arranging yet another exhibition of Eskimo Art, we are exploring other possibilities. I am not too hopeful that we will be able to launch as ambitious a manifestation as we would like to but we shall try to provide something, subject, as ever, to the availability of funds. If we can time it to precede or coincide with the UNESCO conference, so much the better.

Yours sincerely,
JULES LÉGER

Le secrétaire d'État aux Relations avec le Commonwealth du Royaume-Uni au premier ministre

Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of United Kingdom to Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL

[London], July 2, 1956

My dear Prime Minister:

I think I should take the opportunity of your presence in London to mention to you a matter which, in my view, may prove to be of some importance for the development of Commonwealth relations in the short term, namely the Ninth Session of the U.N.E.S.C.O. General Conference which is due to meet in New Delhi in November 1956.

It will be a matter of prestige for India and also for Pakistan and Ceylon that this Conference should be a success. For the United Kingdom and for Canada I should judge it to be equally important that we should convince our Asian friends that we are going to do our best to help them make the Conference a success. And if we have to say things with which they do not always agree (and the United Kingdom may certainly have some unwelcome observations to make) I hope we can do our best to convince them that we have good reasons for the line which we shall be taking.

David Eccles has it in mind to suggest as a general theme for the Conference the subject "Freedom for the Mind". He thinks, and his other colleagues and I agree, that if we do not put forward some acceptable general line for discussion, the Russians (whose first effective General U.N.E.S.C.O. Conference it will be) may take the initiatives with less welcome results. I suggest that our officials should keep in touch over the development of our ideas, and that we do our best to take a line in New Delhi which is broadly acceptable to us all and for which we can lobby support.

Secondly, there is the Budget. The United Kingdom view is that a constructive and progressive programme should be worked out for U.N.E.S.C.O. within the limits of the existing Budget or at as small an additional costs as possible. You will appreciate that we cannot possibly support substantial increases in the Budget, of which we bear so large a share. Moreover, we regard many of U.N.E.S.C.O.'s projects as a waste of money, and we are determined to do our best to steer the Organisation into more practical channels. On the other hand, we recognise that the Asian Commonwealth countries will be sensitive over this matter. In their desire to put Asia on the map, they may well suggest many schemes, the cost of which will be borne by others. And I foresee that one of the most difficult of all our tasks will be to obtain approval for those schemes which are economic and practical, without causing unnecessary offence or giving the Russians a stick to beat us with. Here too, I suggest that our officials should keep in close touch between now and November.

There is also the question of elections to the Executive Board of twenty-two members, and of possible increases in its membership. On the question of increases we have not yet decided our policy, but we think they should be restricted to a minimum, and that in determining them the legitimate interests of Asia must be considered. As regards elections to the Board we are mainly concerned with the six country seats which are coming up for re-election. I imagine that both India and Pakistan are likely to stand again, although both Governments have recently told us that they have not yet made up their minds. It had occurred to us that it might do much to encourage the legitimate pride of our Asian Commonwealth friends if Ceylon also were elected to the Board this year. I should be interested in your views on this. Is Canada herself interested in election this year?

Lastly, as regards consultation. We have not yet extracted from the Americans any clear idea of their views on the Budget, and there are to be conversations with American officials in the next few days. We intend to keep in the closest touch with your Government upon the Budget and all other questions of policy between now and the Conference, and I suggest that a preliminary exchange of views at the official level might take place as soon as we have had a first talk to the Americans.

Meanwhile, we shall take any opportunity there may be of mentioning this matter to Nehru, Mohammed Ali and Bandaranaike on the lines sketched out above. You may like to consider whether to put in a word also.

I am sure you will be glad to hear that David Eccles has decided to lead our delegation himself; and I hope you for your part will feel able to see that some of your best men in this field are available for the Conference.

I am writing similarly to the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, July 12, 1956

Dear Lord Home,

The Prime Minister has passed on to me your letter of July 2 concerning the Ninth Session of the Unesco General Conference which is to meet in New Delhi in November.

I was very much interested in your views, the more so because we in Ottawa have been thinking along very similar lines ourselves. I agree that we must do our best to convince our Asian friends that we are as anxious as they to make the conference a success even though we may not always be in agreement on specific proposals.

There is no doubt that the Russians will take every advantage of the platform which the conference will offer to appeal to the mind of the Asian peoples. Consequently, for our part, we need to have not only as sympathetic and interested an attitude as possible towards Asian interests in Unesco matters, but also we should be prepared to bring a positive and imaginative approach to the discussions. The more, therefore, that we can consult together both before and during the conference the easier it will be to advance those ideas which we have in common. We have in fact already given some thought to ways and means of coordinating Western resources for this purpose. One suggestion that had occurred to us, but which we have not followed up, was that informal and confidential discussions might be held between like-minded delegations in Paris. Regardless of this possibility, however, we would certainly welcome exchanges of views and officials of my Department will be glad to keep in touch with your High Commission in Ottawa. At the same time you may wish to convey to Mr. Robertson the outcome of any talks your officials may have with the Americans and with other Commonwealth representatives in London. I shall of course inform our High Commissioners in Commonwealth countries along the same lines.

On the question of the programme and budget, it will, as you suggest be a difficult problem to reconcile our need to keep budget increases to a minimum with pressures for projects which, though of questionable value themselves, are nevertheless important in the eyes of the Asians. As our analysis of the Proposed Programme and Budget progresses it would be most helpful to exchange views about the best lines to be followed in connection with many of the projects.

The suggestion of a general theme for the Conference on the subject of "Freedom for the Mind" is an interesting one and we should be glad to have a further indication of how it might be developed. Apart from introducing it in the General Debate we are not certain how it could be applied in discussions on various aspects of the detailed programme.

We have not as yet reached any conclusions on the desirable size of the Executive Board, nor have we information about all the countries that may stand for election to the vacant seats apart from requests for support from Belgium, Israel and Venezuela. We ourselves have no interest in adding the name of Canada to the ballot this year.

I was delighted to hear that David Eccles has decided to lead the United Kingdom delegation. Difficult as his job will be I know he will handle it with distinction. We are just now lining up our delegation and intend to make it as strong and effective as possible.

The Prime Minister and I are most grateful to you for bringing your views to our attention. If you have had an opportunity of discussing Unesco with Nehru, Mohammed Ali and Bandaranaike we should be most interested in learning something of their thinking.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

à la neuvième session de la Conférence générale de l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'éducation, la science et la culture, New Delhi, 5 novembre-5 décembre 1956*

*Extract from Commentary for Delegation to Ninth Session of General Conference of UNESCO,
New Delhi, November 5-December 5, 1956*

[Ottawa], October 15, 1956

Introduction

The ninth General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) will be held at New Delhi, India, from November 5 to December 5, 1956. This will be the first major United Nations conference to be held in Asia, which gives the Conference a special political significance which is further heightened by the fact New Delhi will see the Soviet Union for the first time in a position to play its full part in the Organization's activities.

2. For UNESCO itself the General Conference marks the end of a transition period inaugurated as a result of agreement reached at the Eighth Session in 1954 on the need for remodelling UNESCO's programme. The Ninth Session must try to assess the extent to which the hopes of the Eighth Session have been fulfilled during the transitional years of 1955 and 1956. Its primary task will be to maintain not only the principle but also the practice of concentrating the Organization's major activities within fewer fields and reducing those marginal activities which dissipate its resources out of proportion to the results obtained. The years 1957 and 1958 should therefore mark the beginning of a new era in programme planning and concentration of resources.

3. It will be the Canadian delegation's responsibility to assist in getting UNESCO well off on this new course. Experience suggests that this will not be easy. The political context of the Conference, already mentioned, will do nothing to simplify the task.

Historical Background

4. Canadian representatives participated with delegations from 46 other nations in drafting the Constitution of UNESCO in 1945, and the first General Conference of the Organization convened in November 1946 at Paris. In its early years UNESCO's energies were directed toward post-war rehabilitation. In Canada, the Canadian Council for Reconstruction through UNESCO (C.C.R.U.) was established to provide fellowships and scholarships for educators and scientists to study in this country, to collect books for the restoration of libraries and to offer direct aid to individuals and institutions in war-devastated countries. UNESCO's programme of rehabilitation having been largely completed, the C.C.R.U. terminated its activities in 1951 and surrendered its charter in 1953.

5. Meanwhile, in 1948, the first Director-General of UNESCO, Julian Huxley, was succeeded by Dr. Jaime Torres Bodet, of Mexico, an international authority on mass education. Then the aim was for UNESCO to concentrate on the eradication of ignorance and illiteracy in under-developed countries, and on other urgent problems of a specific nature. Substantial steps in this direction were taken during the next five years. Technical experts on education were despatched to Asia, Africa and Latin America. Fundamental education teacher-training centres were established at Parzcuaro, Mexico, and Sirs-el-Layyam, Egypt. Research on compulsory education and educational techniques was initiated. On the whole, however, the relatively small resources of the Organization were dispersed over what the interested Canadian authorities considered to be much too broad a range of activities; the results were correspondingly disappointing.

6. At the sixth General Conference the Canadian delegation, together with others interested in a concentrated programme consisting of a limited number of practical projects, succeeded in obtaining approval of a resolution requiring the assignment of priorities to all proposed projects. At the seventh General Conference in 1952, this resolution was partially implemented and a programme and budget were approved. The Director-General resigned when the Conference did not approve the expanded budget which he had presented. An extraordinary session of the General Conference was called in July 1953, and Dr. Luther H. Evans, former Librarian of the United States Congress who had a background of administrative ability and experience, was elected Director-General. In his speech of acceptance Dr. Evans said:

"... UNESCO is groping for the best modalities of action to achieve peace and progress through education, science and culture, and in this it has made surprising progress in seven years; we must concentrate on the objective of determining conscientiously what type of activities and what methods and procedures are fruitful and give them priority over others ..."

Review and Reorientation

7. The new Director-General instituted a comprehensive survey of UNESCO and its programme, and the Secretariat of the Organization cooperated closely with a working committee of the Executive Board in the preparation of recommendations for a remodelled programme. Surveying the present situation, the committee listed UNESCO's outstanding accomplishments —

- (a) It had strengthened and fostered international collaboration between specialists in many disciplines;
- (b) It had launched an international attack on such outstanding educational and scientific problems as illiteracy and restoration of the world's arid deserts;
- (c) It had focussed public attention on paramount problems which are the basis of world peace and the progress of mankind.

8. The Committee reported: "These are not inconsiderable achievements and UNESCO has no cause to be ashamed; to them must be added many other lesser results, more narrow in scope but each useful within its own limits; publications, radio programmes, films, exhibitions which have made their mark; reconstruction and relief activities.

9. "But no one, least of all those who know UNESCO best, would pretend that it has achieved all that it should have achieved or made the full impact on world opinion it should have made. If its action has sometimes been timid and fumbling, directed toward irrelevant or secondary aims, all too limited in relations to the problems to be solved, to what defects in the Organization's structure and programme can these shortcomings be attributed?"

10. In the Committee's opinion, some of these defects were:

- (a) The complete confidence of governments of member states had not been won and effective national commissions had not been established in many countries;
- (b) There had been a failure to enlist the interest of the world's intellectual leaders and a failure to gain public sympathy;

(c) Too much importance had been attached to abstract and general problems and too little action had been taken to meet urgent and immediate needs. Too much had been attempted with too limited resources.

11. With these achievements and inadequacies in mind, the working committee of the Executive Board proposed that the future programme of UNESCO be reconstructed in two phases of operations:

(a) Continuing general services — These would include all forms of international collaboration: clearing house documentation and information activities; promotion of international conferences and seminars; formation of international conventions and regulations; technical advice to the United Nations and other Specialized Agencies; and all of the other present activities which service the continuing requirements of member states;

(b) An action programme on specific problems — This programme would consist of a very few major projects (probably four or five) initiated by UNESCO, and others undertaken at the request of member states. The problems and projects should be specific and local, not general. For example; a major project on education might place special emphasis on primary education in South East Asia; or adult education in Latin America; or education of women in the Middle East. There would not be one project embracing all of these problems. Each project would be precisely defined in terms of the countries or regions during any given programme.

These proposals went a long way toward meeting Canadian view of what UNESCO should be and should attempt.

Transitional Years 1955-56

12. When UNESCO's Executive Board considered the proposed programme and budget for 1955-56 and the report on remodelling the programme of the Organization, it suggested that 1955-56 should be a transitional period.

13. Unfortunately, apart from an improved presentation, the all too familiar pattern of previous years was repeated in the 1955-56 programme and budget: a widely diversified programme of far too many indefinite and indecisive projects seriously overextending the limited resources of UNESCO. Such a programme could not reasonably be considered a transition to concentration on a few major projects.

14. The Director-General did not appear to have been able to break down the resistance of Secretariat officials and of the array of advisory committees of individual experts who were more concerned with the prerogatives of their respective disciplines than with the real needs of member states or urgent international problems within UNESCO's competence. It remained for the General Conference of 1954 to design a concentrated transitional programme which would serve as a firm base from which to launch the remodelled programme this year. In this it was moderately successful so far as it has been possible to assess results although there still remains a fatal tendency to proliferate projects.

15. Further general comments on the 1957-58 Programme and Budget and on Canada's attitude toward UNESCO are to be found in this Commentary under Agenda Item No. 7.⁹⁸

39TH SESSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE,
GENEVA, JUNE 6-28

The ILO has been going through a troubled period ever since the USSR returned to the organization in April 1954. Shortly afterwards, Byelorussia and the Ukraine joined the ILO. There are now nine communist countries in the ILO — Byelorussia, Ukraine, Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Yugoslavia and the USSR. Romania is becoming a member shortly. The total ILO membership as of the end of December 1955 was 70. The only condition which United Nations members have to meet is that they formally accept the obligations of the ILO constitution. The Soviet Union first joined the ILO in 1934 (about one month after the United States came in). It played an inconspicuous part until the end of 1939 when the ILO Governing Body ruled that its membership was already at an end because of its expulsion from the League of Nations. The USSR began to show an interest again in the ILO shortly after Stalin's death and came back in 1954. Since then the problem which has disturbed the ILO has been the status of communist employer and worker delegates, — should communist countries have the same right as capitalist countries to send tripartite representation to the ILO?

2. The protest from many western employer and worker delegates against recognizing communist employer and worker credentials is upsetting the ILO very much. The unique tripartite representation at the ILO requires each member country to furnish two government delegates, one employer delegate and one worker delegate. It is argued by employers and workers from the west that the employer delegates from communist countries are in fact government officials, and that the communist worker delegates do not belong to organizations having the free right of association. However, it should be noted that the present ILO constitution gives to governments the responsibility of appointing and selecting all delegates. Article III (5) states that the non-government delegates should be chosen "in agreement with the industrial organizations, if such organizations exist, which are most representative of employers and work people, as the case may be, in their respective countries". Therefore, there is nothing in the ILO constitution to warrant excluding persons nominated to represent the work people or the managerial element in countries with communist, socialist, or fascist systems of government.

3. In 1954, the ILO Credentials Committee examined this problem thoroughly and the ILO Conference accepted its findings which were that the Soviet employer and worker delegates should be admitted. The Credentials Committee pointed out that there was nothing in the ILO constitution to prevent the acceptance of these delegates. The votes on these issues were: For seating Soviet bloc employer delegates, 105 for, 79 against, with 26 abstentions; for seating Soviet bloc worker delegates, 93 for, 83 against with 30 abstentions. The Canadian government delegates abstained, while the Canadian employer and worker delegates voted against.

4. Opinion in the ILO was so inflamed that early in 1955 the Governing Body set up a three-man committee (Sir Arnold McNair, former president of the International Court of Justice, who was designated Chairman of the committee, Mr. Pedro de Alba, former president of the Mexican Senate, and Mr. Justice Cornelius, judge of the Federal Court of Pakistan) to study and report on the "Freedom of Employers and Workers Organizations" in all ILO member countries. The committee's voluminous report was published in March 1956.

5. This issue of the status of communist employer and worker delegates is such a contentious question at the ILO (though the United States employers are the only group which has threatened to leave the ILO) that the Governing Body has adopted the following tactic in handling the McNair Report: there will be an exchange of views about its findings at the June 1956 Conference, but no decisions will be taken or resolutions adopted which might prejudice the full debate at the Governing Body's November 1956 meeting; then the June 1957 Conference will debate it fully.

6. The McNair Report is rather inconclusive since to some extent there was a split in the committee with Lord McNair and Mr. de Alba submitting the majority report. Also it is generally recognized that the appointment of the committee was a stalling move by the Governing Body which hoped not only that the report would show the complexities of the issue and thereby discourage hasty and ill-considered solutions, but also that given more time, competitive co-existence would somehow get the two opposing camps used to each other's company. The important points about the McNair Report are:

- (a) its stress on the universality of the ILO;
- (b) its illustration of the degrees of government control over employer and worker groups in many countries (not only in the communist countries). Governments can suspend or cancel registration of employer and worker groups without any application to a court of law, in at least 20 ILO member countries;
- (c) its pointing out that there has been a big swing to government participation in economic activities over the last 20 or 30 years; it refers many times to the growth of the "public sector" in commerce and industry. (Canada has 13.2% of its civilian labour force in this public sector; U.S.A. 10.5%; Sweden 15%; Australia 20%; U.K. 22%; Turkey 28%; Israel 33%; USSR 100%);
- (d) its comments that in leading industrial countries there is not much opportunity for government domination and control, and the growing participation of governments in economic matters has not weakened employer groups.

7. Officials of this Department and the Department of Labour have met to discuss this ILO problem and agree that:

(a) the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies should be representative of all political philosophies and economic systems; whether or not we like a particular system, be it communist, socialist free enterprise or syndicalist, it should be in ILO. This position seems to follow from our action in working for the admission of the 16 new members of the United Nations;

(b) the present ILO constitution does not define the genus of economic systems which will send employer and worker delegates to ILO meetings; in fact, the constitution gives to governments the over-riding authority and responsibility for appointing and selecting employer and worker representatives. All governments, though they naturally soft-pedal this point, favour this principle of predominant government responsibility;

(c) the employer and worker delegates from western countries are acting unwisely, though understandably, in trying either to exclude the communist representatives or to amend the ILO constitution, since the ILO was never intended to be a club exclusively reserved for private enterprise economic systems. Any attempt to amend the ILO constitution would probably fail, but if it did go through, the result would be not only the exclusion of the communists but the exclusion of employer and worker representatives from other countries, notably those with authoritarian forms of government;

(d) the tripartite system of representation is essential⁹⁹ to the effective functioning of the ILO. All member governments support tripartite representation. Canadian worker and employer organizations support this principle too;

(e) pushing the communist countries out of the ILO or trying to demote them to "second class membership" with only government delegates¹⁰⁰ will not induce them to change their economic system since it is firmly entrenched and producing, in some cases, spectacular results.

8. Since 1954, the United States employer group has taken a position on the extreme right. Recently the U.S. administration has been trying to get Congress and the Senate to raise the U.S. contribution to the ILO. The Senate agreed to do so but only if the ILO would take away the vote from the communist employer and worker delegates.

9. The Canadian employer group, according to the Department of Labour, is not as far to the right as its United States counterpart. While the Canadian employer and worker groups have voted against seating the communist groups in the ILO, they are rather wary of espousing measures which might either break up the ILO or result in its becoming restricted to private enterprise economies. It is thought they would be receptive to ideas and suggestions from quarters other than United States employers. If they could be persuaded to adopt an independent position, there might be some hope of working out a Canadian position on which government, employer and worker delegates could all agree.

10. Will you let me know if you agree¹⁰¹ with our point of view, particularly that outlined in paragraph 7. Also would you have a word¹⁰² with your colleague, the Minister of Labour about this? While the Deputy Minister of Labour has tried in speeches before the Manufacturers Association and Chambers of Commerce to stress the usefulness and accomplishments of the ILO and its representative and universal quality, it seems to me that government officials can go only a limited way, and the government will have to take over now and give a lead to Canadian workers and employers about the universality, as opposed to the exclusiveness, of the ILO, and the value of the tripartite system. Since the ILO Conference opens in Geneva on June 6, any public statement which might be made around that date, would I think have an enhanced value.

LETTER NO. DL-41

SECRET

Reference: Your Tel. No. 2053 of Dec. 16, 1955, and your memorandum of Dec. 15 concerning the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Control Problem.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

We have studied with interest the report in your telegram of December 16 on the latest tripartite discussions, and your memorandum on the control problem, which sets out in detail some of the considerations which were in our minds when we drafted the Memorandum to Cabinet† which we discussed with you earlier. In the following paragraphs we shall outline some tentative views which you might try on your British and American colleagues, "on a personal basis", and for the time being only orally. We do not believe it desirable that they should have a "Canadian paper", at least until their own papers are forthcoming, and we should be grateful if you would consult with us before giving them our views in writing.

2. We think it would be desirable if you were to start by stating that although the Canadian Government is fully seized with the importance of developing a system of control to ensure that atomic resources intended for peaceful applications are not clandestinely diverted to the production of weapons, this, in its view, does not diminish the necessity of continuing to seek with vigour a solution to the basic problem of disarmament, working through the Disarmament Commission and its Sub-Committee as appropriate.

3. Our general aim in the forthcoming negotiations is to seek, support and participate in an effective control system, provided that in our judgment it is widely enough accepted and sufficiently effective to have a reasonable prospect of success (cf. paragraph 14 of Memorandum to Cabinet), and, of course, protects legitimate Canadian interests. You could then go on to outline our views on the control problem as follows.

4. Our views are based on certain assumptions, which are set forth in the next paragraph. These assumptions are the best we can make at the present stage and we believe they will be substantiated as negotiations proceed. Nevertheless we recognize that our views would have to alter if, in one way or another, our assumptions did not prove to be well-founded.

BASIC ASSUMPTIONS

5. We believe that the development of a generally acceptable control system must proceed from the following assumptions:

(a) member nations will not be willing to surrender sovereign rights unless such a surrender applies with equal force to all members, and unless all important eligible countries become members;

(b) under present conditions Canada and the other countries supplying uranium to the United States and United Kingdom for their weapons programmes could not accept any limitation of the right to continue to do so;

(c) so long as the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR continue to make nuclear weapons certain countries (e.g. France) will not be prepared to undertake obligations which would preclude them from doing likewise.

ANALYSIS

A. Control of Norwal Uranium

6. It is clear that most nations producing uranium will be directing it into two channels; the American, British or Soviet weapons programmes on the one hand, and world-wide non-military requirements on the other. The question which then arises is what, if any, conditions should the producing countries stipulate as a prerequisite to making uranium available to other nations for peaceful purposes. The Canadian view is that the only realistic approach to this question is to recognize from the first that any scheme involving a system of "double standards", whereby some countries could obtain uranium for their non-military programmes without inspection and where other countries could not, would be unacceptable. In other words, if uranium for peaceful uses is to be made available under the aegis of the Agency, and if this in turn involves acceptance of Agency controls, then all material to be used for peaceful purposes by any country, big or small, would have to be provided under the aegis of the Agency.

7. If this analysis is correct, then clearly the question of the degree of control to be imposed through the Agency is entirely dependent on what the principal atomic powers themselves are prepared to accept. The United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union will have to lead the way by indicating the degree of control which they are prepared to permit the Agency to exercise over their non-military programmes. It is reasonable to assume that the principal producers of uranium will then follow suit and at the same time require other nations receiving materials from them to do likewise. It should be emphasized that, in our opinion, if the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR are not prepared to accept Agency control over their non-military programmes, then the principal uranium-producing countries like Canada could neither accept Agency supervision of their own programmes nor with justification seek to impose similar restrictions on other nations wishing to obtain uranium from them.

B. Control of U235

8. The difficulty and cost of producing U235 is so great that the countries currently possessing separation plants should be able to impose controls, irrespective of the existence of the Agency, which would be likely to remain effective for some time. However we anticipate that if power reactor development favours the use of enriched fuels, other countries or groups of countries (e.g. a European atomic power pool) will wish in due course to establish separation facilities of their own, and we doubt that they will be prepared to give any pledge that such plants would be used solely for peaceful purposes unless the present possessors of such plants would do likewise. We should be greatly surprised if France, for one, did not take this position.

C. Processing Facilities

9. As indicated above we believe it will be easy for countries supplying U235 effectively to insist that receiving nations agree to have the material reprocessed after radiation in plants belonging either to the country of origin or to the Agency, but we do not think the same is true in the case of natural uranium except under the circumstances set out in paragraph 6 above. However, even if it did not prove possible to develop a control plan through the Agency it might be advantageous for the Agency to operate reprocessing plants for use by member countries on a voluntary basis, since economic compulsions would favour their use and might accomplish a measure of control that proved unattainable by political means.

CONCLUSIONS

10. You might sum up your remarks to your American and British colleagues by saying that we are convinced from our experience in negotiating with the Indians on the NRX reactor and from our discussions at the Tenth General Assembly during the debate on the Atomic Energy Resolution that the effectiveness of control accomplished through the Agency will be directly proportional to the degree of control which the United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union are prepared to accept over their non-military programmes. This poses the obvious question: "What specific controls, if any, are they prepared to accept?"

11. You might conclude by referring to the view expressed at your last meeting (paragraph 6 of your telegram of December 16) that if the Soviet Union did not join the Agency, or refused to cooperate, controls would be undesirable since countries would then turn to the USSR for assistance rather than accept Agency supervision. Much the same argument would in our opinion apply if any politically significant nation or group of nations found the plan unacceptable, since, apart from the political animosities it would create, in the long run it would only serve to encourage the development of uneconomic uranium deposits and processing facilities outside the control of the major powers or of the Agency. Furthermore we doubt that the Soviet Union would long be able to resist the temptation to exploit such a situation to the disadvantage of the Western powers. It is for this reason that we stated at the beginning that our support for a control system is qualified by the proviso that it should be widely enough accepted and sufficiently effective in nature to have a reasonable prospect of success.

Washington, January 31, 1956

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference: Our telegram 158 of Jan 27/56.†

Repeat Permis New York No. 17.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

In order that I should be in a position to express Canadian views at the tripartite meeting beginning on February 6, I shall in this telegram run over the main aspects of the meeting and ask for instructions to the extent that they are not presently available. I should be grateful for your prompt reply.

2. As we understand this meeting, it is essentially to enable the three governments most intimately concerned with the development of the Agency and the subject with which it is concerned, to exchange views and make the best possible preparation for the larger meeting on February 27. I assume that while the tripartite meeting should by this exchange of ideas clarify the subject to some degree, we cannot expect immediately neat solutions or, necessarily full agreement. The timing of the meeting will allow for reference to governments and — while this has not been discussed — possibly a further informal talk on one or two of the points involved after they have been re-examined.

3. I would not necessarily expect that the Three Powers would enter the twelve-power meeting with identical views. We can, however, hope not only to achieve understanding of each others ideas, but also to find room for re-interpretations and compromises which would be satisfactory to all three. I am sure, however, that the value of the tripartite discussion should not be judged wholly on the extent to which complete agreement on all points is achieved.

4. It has been tentatively agreed here that the subjects for discussion on February 6 shall be the "differences in viewpoint" listed in the background paper for the preparatory meeting of November 14 (your telegram DL-1977 of November 23). These are:

- (a) Composition and manner of selection of the Board of Governors of the Agency.
- (b) Extent of authority of the General Conference.
- (c) Requirements for initial membership in the Agency.
- (d) Relationship of the Agency to the United Nations.
- (e) Procedures for approval of budget and proration of operating expenses.
- (f) Extent to which a system of inspection and control will be incorporated within the Agency statute.

5. The Indian views on the Board of Governors as described in your telegram DL-141 of January 26† would, presumably, be discussed under the first item listed. We have already corresponded on this matter and share your views.

6. The Pakistan proposal for enlarging the negotiating group could, as you suggest in your telegram DL-156 of January 27,† be discussed at the tripartite meeting. The views expressed to us were not only given with apparently greater vigour, but also differed in substance from those expressed to you by Mr. Baig. In the argument put before us there was no suggestion of bartering a claim for inclusion in the negotiating group for a promise of support for a seat on the Board of Governors. The Pakistani appeal to us was based on more general principles and explicitly did not necessarily involve the inclusion of Pakistan itself. As we pointed out in our telegram 148 of January 26,† we felt that the most practical argument was that the underdeveloped countries would be more likely to support a draft coming out of the Washington meeting. Largely for this reason, I am inclined to the view that the Pakistani proposal should be given careful examination, but would welcome your comments.

7. A further matter which is naturally not listed in paragraph 4 above is the relationship to this subject of the negotiations concerning the CIR project. You will recall that it was the intention to keep the United Kingdom and United States informed on this subject. So far we have done nothing more than to say that the negotiations were proceeding in such a way that there was good reason to expect a satisfactory result. We should, however, be glad of a paragraph from you indicating what could now be said of these negotiations.

8. It is clear that of the six subjects suggested for discussion at the tripartite meeting, that of control is the most significant and, in fact, possesses an overriding importance. The decision on control will affect the whole concept of the Agency and will undoubtedly influence the decision on the other items. I assume that the Canadian position on control is that set out in your DL-41 of January 11, and that our position should be based on this in the discussions at the meeting.

9. We do not as yet have much indication of what positions will be taken by either the United States or the United Kingdom. We can expect from the latest discussions, however, that the two countries will not be far apart on their ideas for control of U235 and probably we could go along with them. The further question is whether or not the Agency should attempt the control of natural uranium. That is important from our point of view and neither the United States nor the United Kingdom have declared themselves on this. At this stage it is difficult to anticipate what to expect from the United States and the United Kingdom.

10. Although it will be difficult at this time to take a firm decision on the composition of the Board of Governors, I assume that our position is to support a board not differing greatly from that of the draft statute. Undoubtedly the position of the uranium-producing countries on the board could be supported more strongly if control by the Agency were based on raw materials as advocated by us. As suggested in your draft memorandum to Cabinet (dated December 1/55), we should support the following principles for the Board of Governors:

(a) The size of the Board of Governors should be kept as small as possible to facilitate efficient management of the Agency.

(b) Membership on the board should be weighted in favour of nations which are going to have to provide the resources of atomic materials and technical knowledge.

11. On the question of the extent of the authority of the General Conference, it seems to me that, consistent with our ideas given above, we should support a strong Board of Governors and should resist any attempt to give greater powers to the General Conference. It would seem undesirable to attempt to give the General Assembly of the United Nations some or all of the functions belonging to the General Conference of the Agency.

12. It is doubtful that much discussion will take place at the tripartite meeting on the relation of the Agency to the United Nations. I assume, however, that I should base our position on the draft memorandum to Cabinet, and that with regard to the Security Council we should accept a wording to the statute that would simply require the Agency to observe and carry out any direction given to it by the Council within the field of the Council's jurisdiction under the United Nations Charter.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

I agree entirely with your analysis of the purposes of the tripartite meeting as expressed in paragraphs 2 and 3 of your telegram. As you say, clarification of the views of the three governments most intimately concerned with the Agency is an essential step in preparing for the February 27 meeting, even though we cannot expect immediately neat solutions or necessarily full agreement. My comments on the specific problems to be discussed follow:

Extent to which a System of Inspection and Control will be Incorporated within the Agency Statute

2. As you point out the question of control is the most significant of the subjects to be discussed, and a satisfactory resolution of this issue is of over-riding importance to Canada. Our basic position is as set out in our DL-41 of January 11, but in your remarks on this subject I think it would be well to give added emphasis to our principal concern, perhaps along the following lines

(a) We assume that the United States and United Kingdom consider that acceptance by the purchaser of some form of control is required as a condition of sale of natural uranium.

(b) If this assumption is correct, then in our opinion the only hope of accomplishing such a purpose would be by way of a control system developed under the aegis of the Agency. We do not believe that exporting nations could successfully apply controls of the type envisaged on a unilateral basis. If Canada, for example, were to attempt to do so we would undoubtedly face competition from other producers who might not share our scruples as to the end use of the material, and who might not consider it necessary to stipulate any conditions to ensure that it was not diverted to military purposes. In addition, it must be remembered that uranium is widely distributed throughout the world and that, if the present producers impose onerous or unacceptable conditions, a good many nations might decide to develop their own sources of supply even if this did not make economic sense.

(c) Canadian authorities have an open mind as to the extent of the control measures required, but they do not wish to see an attempt to develop a control system which includes natural uranium as well as fissionable material under the aegis of the Agency go by default, and subsequently find Canada in the position that her "atomic allies" expect her unilaterally to insist upon the acceptance of controls by other states as a condition of the sale of uranium to them. Canada believes that an attempt to impose controls by this means would prove unrealistic and ineffective, and undoubtedly would damage her position as a potential major supplier of uranium and adversely affect her relations with other countries.

3. As you will have seen from our exchange of telegrams with New Delhi, we still have not reached agreement with the Indians on the text of the paragraph in the Canada-India reactor agreement concerning the provision of the fuel elements. However, in developing our position on the control problem I think you might support our arguments by referring to our experience with the Indians. The main points are that India will not accept the fuel on a loan basis, will not give an undertaking to return irradiated rods to Canada for processing, and on principle insists on reserving the right to provide the uranium from Indian sources and to manufacture the rods itself.

4. In your 171 of January 28† you point out that control of United States and United Kingdom non-military installations, as provided in the plan developed in our DL-41, would require a large inspectorial apparatus, would make no direct contribution to security, and would serve only to maintain the principle that all countries are to be treated alike. For this reason you suggest that something less comprehensive and partaking more of the nature of a token acceptance of inspection by the three major atomic powers might be sufficient for our purpose.

5. It seems to us that the question is not whether it is sufficient for our purpose, but whether it will satisfy the other members of the Agency. The point we have been attempting to make the United States and United Kingdom appreciate is that whatever the extent of the control measures they seek to have others accept, they must be prepared to accept themselves. If a scheme involving only token acceptance of inspection by "the big three" can be sold to the other members of the Agency we would have no objection, but we would be greatly surprised if they bought it.

6. It is reasonable to assume that the United States and United Kingdom will not be far apart on their ideas for control of U235 and that probably we can go along with them. It might be useful to bring out for discussion the implications of two remarks by Gerard Smith, as reported in your telegram No. 117 of January 21.† He said first that the United States would be prepared to subject its bilateral agreements to Agency control, and second, that it would like to see the Agency take the position that it would not assist any country that had a weapons program. If interpreted literally this position would negate the United States-United Kingdom bilateral agreement. We are sure that this is not intended, but it points up the necessity of considering very carefully the relationship of bilateral agreements to the Agency. It also has a bearing on Smith's argument that under the system proposed by Canada a country could receive raw materials for a peaceful program and thereby be free to utilize its own uranium for a weapons program.

7. In the course of considering this matter recently we have been coming to the view that perhaps we should propose that all members of the Agency should agree that all transfers for peaceful purposes of reactor components and other "atomic hardware" and provision of technical assistance and services, as well as the supply of natural uranium and fissile material, would be carried out only under the aegis of the Agency and would be subject to acceptance of Agency control by the recipient.

Composition and Manner of Selection of the Board of Governors

8. The Canadian position on this matter is as outlined in paragraph 10 or your 186. Nevertheless I think there should be tripartite consideration of minimum concessions which may have to be made to the view shared by so many nations that the existing proposal is unsatisfactory and, indeed, unacceptable.

9. I am sympathetic to your concern over the Pakistani representations and agree that the matter should be discussed. Nevertheless I am impressed with the difficulties which would arise if we attempted to meet their point. To open up the list again would lead to demands for representation from the Scandinavian countries, Africa (no doubt both Israel and the Arabs), South America, and Asia. The Soviet Union would no doubt insist on the inclusion of one of its satellites and the United States might parry by proposing the Philippines. When the dust settled I suspect that the Pakistanis would still consider their point as not having been met.

Relationship of the Agency to the United Nations

10. I agree that your position should be as outlined in paragraph 12 of your 186. Incidentally, you will by now have seen telegram No. 55† from New York reporting on the purported content of the Secretary-General's paper on this subject. It might be useful to discuss at the tripartite meeting what tactics we should follow if the Secretary-General pursues this tack when he convenes the Advisory Committee.

Financial Questions

11. Our general position with respect to financial matters is the same as for all international activities of this kind in which we participate. Financial questions are so dependent on the resolution of some of the more fundamental problems, such as control that it is not proposed to make any detailed comments at this time. In any case a representative of the Department of Finance is on the delegation and will be available to give advice.

12. There is one point which might be raised under this heading. The draft statute deals with arrangements for the Agency to acquire fissionable material and to make it available to countries receiving assistance. It does not provide for a circumstance which in our opinion is much more likely to occur, i.e. a bilateral transfer of such material under the aegis of the Agency, but not involving the Agency financially. Perhaps the appropriate sections of the draft statute should be revised to reflect this.

Other Questions

13. I have no comments to make on the extent of authority of the General Conference or on the requirements for initial membership in the Agency except to say that I agree with your understanding of our position on these points.

DESPATCH NO. 222

Washington, February 13, 1956

SECRET

Reference: Your telegram No. DL-209 of February 3, 1956.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

Although you will be hearing directly from Mr. Bennett and Mr. Barton, it will perhaps be useful if we give you a report on the tripartite discussions that have taken place in Washington during the past week.

2. On Monday, February 6, a full meeting was held with Ambassador Wadsworth in the Chair. Both Admiral Strauss and Commissioner Libby of the Atomic Energy Commission were present and Sir Roger Makins represented the United Kingdom. Wadsworth immediately asked me to open the discussion. I began by suggesting that the United Kingdom position paper (our telegram No. 209 of February 3†) be taken as the basis of discussion for the meeting since it was the only paper that was available. I then proceeded to outline the principal features in the Canadian attitude at some length, emphasizing our conclusion that the objective of control by the Agency should be peaceful uses and that the Agency's operations should not be directly aimed at weapons programmes. I said that we felt the extent to which a control system could be imposed would probably depend in considerable degree on what controls the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR would accept in their own peaceful installations.

3. Sir Roger Makins said that he recognized the special position of Canada but he thought that the aim of the control of the Agency should be as stated in the United Kingdom paper, namely, to prevent the manufacture of nuclear weapons by countries other than the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR. He pointed out the difficulty of distinguishing between a peaceful and a military programme in countries that had both and said that the United Kingdom would, therefore, have difficulty in accepting inspection of its own peaceful installations. He went on to point out that although the United Kingdom had admitted in their paper the possibility that they might agree to a system of auditing with inspection in their own purely civil projects, they certainly were not enthusiastic about this prospect and had not considered it very seriously. Sir Roger said the Agency should have authority to control bilateral agreements and suggested an amendment to the Statute to give the Agency the necessary powers (Annex 1†).

4. On the United States side, Admiral Strauss then presented his views. After some general remarks pointing out that President Eisenhower had had some degree of weapon control in his mind when he made his speech on the Agency to the United Nations, he said that a mutual inspection of United Kingdom and United States peaceful atomic developments would have little value and would in fact be meaningless. He thought there should be some middle ground between making the renunciation of a weapons programme a condition for joining the Agency and divorcing weapons completely from the consideration of the Agency. He thought it should be possible to get countries other than the U.S., the U.K. and the USSR to renounce atomic weapons for a period of years — say five — and this would give the Disarmament Commission further time for study of the problem. Commissioner Libby also spoke on the United States position but did not contribute much. He emphasized that the prospect of obtaining U235 would be a great incentive to countries to accept controls and he pointed out that an attempt to impose universal controls might add an appreciable factor to the cost of nuclear power. He also mentioned the difficulties of inspecting homogeneous reactors.

5. There was considerable further discussion which did not do a great deal to clarify the positions of the three countries. Unfortunately, Wadsworth did not follow our suggestion and use the United Kingdom position paper as a basis of discussion. As a result the meeting adjourned with the impression of a greater measure of agreement than in fact existed.

6. That this was true was immediately evident at a working level meeting held on Tuesday morning, February 7. We found at this meeting that, because we had suggested the United Kingdom paper as a basis of discussion, it had been assumed that we accepted the paper as a statement of our own position. The working level meeting then proceeded to discuss at considerable length the relative positions of the three governments and we were subject to questioning from both the United States and the United Kingdom about our view that Agency control should be confined to peaceful uses and should be universal. As a result of this meeting, the State Department representatives agreed to draft a paper comparing the positions of the three countries. This paper as prepared by the State Department is attached as Annex 2.† When it was subsequently submitted to the full meeting, I objected to the presentation of the Canadian position and, as a result we have promised to produce a short paper outlining our attitude on control. The State Department paper is particularly interesting to us giving some indication of United States thinking. It adds nothing to the picture of the United Kingdom position given in their original position paper.

7. A second full meeting was held on Tuesday afternoon with all of the principals present except Admiral Strauss and Commissioner Libby. This meeting started with a discussion of the State Department summary of the positions of the three countries (Annex 2). I attempted again to make clear our views on the object of control by the Agency. As mentioned above it was agreed that we should prepare a short paper setting out our position. It was also agreed at this time that the technical representatives should get together to exchange views on the technical implications of a control scheme and to discuss whether it would be useful to continue technical discussions on control along the lines of the meeting at Geneva.

8. At this stage the United States representatives gave us a paper on the "Preliminary Positions for United States Delegation at the Twelve-Nation Meeting to be convened in Washington". This paper is attached as Annex 3.† It does not go very far to make the United States position on controls clear but it is interesting as indicating the United States attitude on certain other aspects of the Agency's operations. It defines the United States position on contribution of U235. It gives an indication of how the United States might handle bilaterals in relation to the Agency, and it suggests that the United States would foot the bills for a strong inspection system if other countries would accept it. After this short discussion on the control problem the meeting went on to consideration of the other items on the Agenda. The results of these discussions are summarized in the last part of this report.

9. At the close of this meeting, I brought up the question of enlarging the negotiating group as suggested by Pakistan (your telegram DL-156 of January 27th). It was apparent that both the U.S. and the U.K. representatives considered this a dead issue. The State Department and the Foreign Office have independently told the Pakistanis that the composition of the negotiating group was settled at the time of the General Assembly debate and they did not think it would be possible to reopen the question at this time.

10. At the technical discussions on controls it was disclosed that both the U.S. and the U.K. have studies in progress to assess the technical requirements of a control system. The AEC has a contract with the Vitro Corporation to make an Engineering Study of the requirements of an adequate control system. In addition the Argonne Laboratory is studying the application of the tracer techniques that were suggested by the U.S. at the Geneva meeting on Controls. The U.K., for their part, admitted that they were worried whether it was technically possible to maintain a control that would eliminate all chance of diversion and said that they have set up an exercise at their Windscale plant in which one group of employees simulates a diversion and a second group attempts to detect it. Neither the U.S. nor the U.K. studies have been completed and it will probably be from three to six months before any conclusions are reached.

11. It came out also in the technical discussions that the U.K. are having second thoughts about the requirement that enrichment in U235 should be limited to 20%. They pointed out strongly to the Americans that a requirement of this nature was certain to irritate the European nations and would undoubtedly be interpreted as a discrimination designed to give U.S. and U.K. a commercial advantage. They said that, while they felt it would be desirable to make some limitation of this nature, they did not think it wise to spell it out as a declared policy since this would only lead European nations to go all out to develop their own sources of fissionable materials. The U.S. representatives were unconvinced and seemed to be determined to stipulate clearly in advance that the Agency should have at its disposal no significant quantities of U235 enriched to more than 20%.

12. At these discussions we were also given a report prepared by the AEC on "Inspection and Control under an International Agency" (dated December 9, 1955). Copies of this paper have been taken to Ottawa by Mr. Barton and Mr. Donald Watson of AECL. The study is based on the assumptions put forward previously by the U.S. at Geneva. From these assumptions an assessment is made of (a) the feasibility of controlling an operation which has received assistance from the Agency and (b) the feasibility of inspecting a country to detect clandestine operations. Since even the U.S. are not now seriously contemplating that the Agency should undertake overall inspection of a country, the second study is of only academic interest. Study (a), however, is pertinent and it should be noted that the AEC have estimated that the inspection of a moderately sized chemical plant requiring an operating staff of 200 people would require an inspection staff of 40 people of whom between one-third and one-half would be technical. The U.K. representatives agreed with this estimate and all present recognized that the task of finding suitable personnel for inspection teams of this size would be almost insuperable. The AEC representative said, however, that the cost of inspection of this magnitude would not be economically prohibitive.

13. This series of meetings and the discussions on control have served to clarify the problem and have given some indication of the attitudes of the three countries towards its solution. It is apparent that there is still considerable difference between the three governments on how the problem should be approached. Neither the U.S. nor the U.K. are disposed to accept the Canadian analysis of the situation and to consider seriously our proposed solution. The U.S. are not prepared to consider any suggestion that they should agree to inspection of their own facilities and, although the U.K. admit such a possibility in their position paper, they did not give any indication during the discussions that they had seriously taken this into consideration in their plans. The indications at present are that the U.S. will go into the Agency negotiations on the assumption that they can persuade other countries to accept the controls they seek to impose by the inducement of assistance, particularly of U235. The U.K., while realizing that such an approach is more likely to encourage countries to develop their own atomic resources in order to avoid controls, will nevertheless probably go along with the U.S.

14. The following are some notes on other items of discussion:

(i) Composition of the Board of Governors

Both the U.K. and the U.S. have produced specific amendments to the provision in the Statute covering the Board of Governors. We attach these as Annexes 4† and 5† respectively.

The U.K. have been impressed by the chorus of dissent against the privileged position given to the uranium producing countries and therefore have increased the criteria for inclusion in category 2 and have added an additional member to this group. Behind the increase in members is the desire to provide a place in this group for India. The U.S. are unhappy about this arrangement since it would leave Brazil as the only state in the negotiating group not included in the first Board.

The U.S. amendment leaves the total membership of the Board at sixteen but increases the number of members in category 3 at the expense of category 2. The State Department felt that the uranium producers were over represented and have therefore given greater weight to the elected members. They also think that it is necessary to name the First Board without assigning categories since they do not see from precedent how any of the negotiating states can be excluded. The U.S. pointed out that if members in category 2 were not allowed to succeed themselves, all the uranium producers would be sure to serve frequently on the Board.

The U.K. representatives object that naming the First Board without any categories might make it difficult to insist on categories for subsequent boards and that it would be impossible to accommodate all the negotiating states in categories 1 and 2 of the U.S. formula. For their part, the U.S. do not like the U.K. amendment because it does not give sufficient weight to the elected members.

During the discussions on the Board, the question of the Interim Board and its relation to ratification of the Statute was raised. It was apparent that the reasons for designating both an Interim and a First Board were not too clear and that it would be necessary to reconsider the relations between the provisions in the Statute for entry into force of the Agency and for the Interim Board. The State Department are to study these problems and are to let us have some further suggestions.

(ii) Authority of the General Conference

The State Department felt that it was necessary to concede something to the agitation for more authority for the General Conference and, accordingly, they have studied the Statute to see what powers could be given to the Conference without seriously interfering with the principle that the Board should be the effective operating organ. The points on which the U.S. would be prepared to increase the power of the General Conference are listed in Annex 6.

There was no serious objection to any of the suggestions made by the U.S. and the other delegations agreed to consider them. During the discussions on these suggestions Mr. Plumptre pointed out that the Budget portions of the Statute would undoubtedly become increasingly important in the future and that it might become advisable to have two or even three budgets covering such aspects of the work of the Agency as administration, operations and inspection. If this were so, it might not be appropriate to have all three budgets go to the General Conference for approval. The meeting felt that this suggestion had a great deal of merit and it was agreed that it would be extremely useful if Mr. Plumptre would write a paper outlining his views on how the Agency budget should be handled.

(iii) Relationship with the U.N.

There was some discussion at the meetings on the relationship of the Agency with the U.N. and the State Department presented a paper making some suggestions (Annex 7†). However, in view of the changed position arising from the Secretary-General's draft paper it is hardly worthwhile to say anything on this subject at this time.

15. It was decided that another full tripartite meeting would be held on February 16th to review again the positions on Control Policy and to see if a decision could be reached on the tactics for the Conference beginning February 27th.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY — CANADIAN VIEWS ON INSPECTION AND CONTROL

Text Begins: The Canadian Government believes it is essential that the positive aim of peaceful development be kept in the forefront in negotiating for the establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The Agency should not merely provide materials, "know-how", and "hardware" under its own auspices but should attempt to so set the world atomic stage that, over the long run, there can be the maximum exchange and trade in these things with the minimum danger that they could be diverted from peaceful to military purposes.

¹⁰³ Le rapport de Washington concernant cette réunion n'a pas pu être trouvé.
The report from Washington on this meeting was not located.

2. It is agreed that one of the primary purposes of the Agency is to divert interest and effort from military to peaceful programmes. It follows therefore that universality of membership is essential. The subsequent comments are predicated on this principle.

3. It is the Canadian view that the object of instituting an inspection and control system under the International Atomic Energy Agency should be to ensure that atomic resources intended for peaceful purposes, including technical knowledge and assistance, reactors and equipment, and fertile materials, as well as fissile materials, are not diverted to military purposes.

4. The system of control and inspection would be of real importance in deterring member nations from embarking upon or furthering weapons programmes, in a number of practical ways:

(a) To the extent that it furthered the application of atomic energy to peaceful purposes it would safeguard against its being used for the production of weapons;

(b) It would be a viable system, increasing in size and significance as peaceful atomic energy programmes developed throughout the world (in contrast with a system limited in application to nations "receiving assistance", which would decrease in size and significance as more and more countries became self-sufficient);

(c) Agency inspectors would derive useful knowledge of other activities in the course of their inspection on installation and operation of peaceful establishments;

(d) The Agency would build up useful statistical information concerning national supply;

(e) The system might have value as a working model for possible extension to cover atomic weapons control.

5. Control under the aegis of the Agency could only be effective if all politically significant nations were members of the Agency and agreed to abide by the terms of the control régime established by the Agency. It follows, therefore, that the control plan should not embody features which would be so objectionable, either politically or technically, that they tended to drive some nations outside the pale of the Agency. If the negotiating governments attempt to impose in one way or another the retention of the present atomic weapons monopoly as their major objective, it will be exceedingly difficult to convince some nations that they stand to derive sufficient benefit to accept such an infringement upon their sovereignty, particularly at a time when it is becoming obvious that very shortly modern air defence systems, both in Europe and North America, will rely primarily on the use of atomic defensive weapons.

6. The problem of atomic disarmament is an exceedingly complicated and difficult aspect of disarmament generally which the United Nations Disarmament Commission is dealing with through its Sub-Committee. The introduction of this problem into the negotiations to establish the Agency can only cause trouble.

7. The Canadian authorities believe that a number of countries will not be prepared to accept controls unless all members of the Agency are prepared to do so. In their opinion, refusal of contributing countries to make a gesture towards acceptance of control may prejudice some nations against joining the Agency, or at the very least may jeopardize the successful application of a control system.

8. The Canadian authorities also believe that in order to achieve the necessary degree of universality, bilateral agreements should be subject to the inspection and control régime of the Agency. The establishment of a "separate but equal" régime outside the Agency will detract from the importance of the Agency and the incentive of individual governments to obtain assistance under its auspices. In this connection it must be borne in mind that, while at the present time there are only a few countries which are in a position to provide assistance either in the form of materials, equipment or information, this situation is sure to change. For example, it is now evident that some of the countries of Western Europe which may initially seek assistance through the Agency will at a not too distant date be in a position to provide assistance to other countries.

9. It is primarily for these reasons that the Canadian authorities consider that from the outset of the negotiations to establish the Agency the emphasis should be on the positive aspect of measures to facilitate the application of atomic energy to peaceful purposes rather than on the negative aim of seeking to prevent the establishment of further weapons programmes. At the same time they believe that an inspection and control system along the lines suggested above would make an important indirect contribution to the accomplishment of the latter purpose. Text ends.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

On February 27, 1956, a twelve-power conference "of experts at the working level" will convene in Washington to consider the text of the draft statute for the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency. Representatives of the following nations will participate:

Australia	India
Belgium	Portugal
Brazil	South Africa
Canada	United Kingdom
Czechoslovakia	U.S.S.R.
France	U.S.A.

2. The Canadian delegation will be headed by our Ambassador in Washington, and will include the President of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and a representative of the Department of Finance.

3. The principal points at issue are as follows:

- (a) the extent to which a system of inspection and control will be incorporated within the Agency statute;
- (b) the composition and manner of selection of the Board of Governors;
- (c) the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations.

4. Attached to this memorandum is a paper setting out the detailed considerations which have led to the following recommendations.

Recommendations

5. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation to the twelve-power conference of "experts at the working level" considering the draft statute of the proposed International

Atomic Energy Agency should pursue the following aims, as developed in the attached paper:

(a) to seek and support the most effective control and inspection system for which it is possible to obtain general agreement, so as to facilitate the peaceful development of atomic energy throughout the world with the minimum danger that such development will be diverted to the production of weapons;

(b) to seek to obtain agreement on a Board of Governors for the Agency based on the following principles:

(i) the size of the Board of Governors should be kept as small as possible to facilitate efficient management of the Agency;

(ii) membership on the Board should be weighted in favour of the nations which will have to provide the resources of atomic materials and technical knowledge;

(c) to seek to obtain agreement that the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations should be that of a Specialized Agency, or failing this, that the functions assigned to the General Assembly do not exceed those which normally would be vested in the Economic and Social Council; in regard to the Security Council the Statute of the Agency should simply require it to observe and carry out any direction given it by the Council within the field of the Council's jurisdiction under the United Nations charter.¹⁰⁴

In December 1953, speaking to the United Nations General Assembly, President Eisenhower proposed the creation of an "atomic pool" to further the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes throughout the world.¹⁰⁵ There followed a protracted period of negotiations which resulted in the production of a "draft statute" to provide for the establishment of an International Atomic Energy Agency. The draft was prepared by the United States, in consultation with the United Kingdom and Canada in the first instance, and subsequently with Australia, South Africa, France, Belgium and Portugal. The selection of this group of powers, apart from the United Kingdom, France and Canada, was determined by the fact that they all have contracts to provide uranium for the United States and the United Kingdom.

2. In the summer of 1955, the United States, with the co-sponsorship of the other powers listed above, circulated the draft statute to all government members of the United Nations or the Specialized Agencies with a request for comments in order that they might be taken into account in the preparation of the final version of the statute. Attached as Appendix "A"† is an outline of the main features of the draft statute.¹⁰⁶

3. At the General Assembly last autumn a resolution was adopted which noted with satisfaction that substantial progress had been made toward the establishment of the Agency, and among other things welcomed "... the extension of invitations to the Governments of Brazil, Czechoslovakia, India, and the USSR to participate as Governments concerned with the present sponsoring Governments" in the further negotiations.¹⁰⁷

4. Immediately following the debate in the United Nations the United States issued invitations to the other members of the group of twelve nations mentioned above to participate in a conference "of experts at the working level", which has been arranged to convene in Washington on February 27, to discuss the draft statute. It is intended that the Canadian delegation to this conference will be headed by our Ambassador in Washington, and include the President of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and a representative of the Department of Finance.

5. From the discussions in the United Nations and from the comments on the draft statute submitted by governments it is evident that the principal points at issue are as follows:

(a) composition and manner of selection of the Board of Governors of the Agency;

(b) relationship of the Agency to the United Nations;

(c) extent to which a system of inspection and control will be incorporated within the Agency Statute.

In the following paragraphs each of these points will be discussed briefly and the position stated which it is proposed that the Canadian delegation should take at the February meeting mentioned above. Item (c) is considered first as it raises problems of the greatest concern to Canada.

Extent to which a System of Inspection and Control should be Incorporated within the Agency Statute

6. It has been the Canadian objective to have developed under Agency auspices a control plan under which uranium could be freely marketed for peaceful purposes throughout the world with assurance that it could not be diverted to the production of weapons. To accomplish this purpose it was considered that all politically significant nations would have to be members of the Agency, and that the peaceful programmes of all members would have to be subject to Agency control and inspection procedures.

7. At tripartite talks with the United States and United Kingdom, just concluded, the United States made it clear that in two important respects they were not prepared to accept the Canadian concept:

(a) The United States was unprepared to accept Agency supervision of its peaceful atomic programme on the ground that since it already had atomic weapons, such inspection would be meaningless. The United States representatives were unmoved by the argument that only in this way could acceptance of inspection be made politically palatable to other countries.

(b) The United States reserved the right to make bilateral atomic agreements with other countries outside the aegis of the Agency, but would undertake in such cases to require acceptance by the recipient country of a control régime not less rigorous than that imposed by the Agency. Canadian and United Kingdom officials argued that the making of bilateral agreements outside the Agency would detract from the importance of the Agency and from the incentive to individual governments to obtain assistance under its auspices. The United States position was that it was not prepared to tie its atomic assistance programme completely to the Agency, at least until it had some idea of how effective the Agency might prove to be.

8. Initially, the United States position at the tripartite talks was that the Agency should not give assistance to any country with a weapons programme, and that all countries except the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR should undertake for a five-year period not to initiate a weapons programme. The Canadian representatives made it clear that in their opinion proposals of this sort would be unacceptable to other nations, and that in any case they should be considered in the context of disarmament and not the peaceful uses of atomic energy. In the end the United States accepted the Canadian arguments and decided to drop this approach.

9. The United Kingdom position in these discussions was intermediate between those of the Canadian and Americans. Both United Kingdom and United States officials had as their primary objective the maintenance by "the Big Three" of the nuclear weapons monopoly, but the United Kingdom agreed with the Canadian view that bilateral agreements should be made subject to Agency inspection procedures, and recognized that in order to make inspection of their programmes acceptable to other nations it might have to make a gesture in this direction itself.

10. At the conclusion of the tripartite talks the United States tabled certain amendments to the draft statute for the Agency which it intends to bring forward at the twelve-power meeting on February 27. These amendments provide for the operation by the Agency of a physical security system and strict accountability procedures which would apply to any atomic facility for which assistance had been provided under Agency auspices.

11. Both the United Kingdom and Canadian representatives said that these amendments seemed generally acceptable, subject to changes in detail. The Canadian representative added however that the Canadian authorities were doubtful that this limited concept would provide adequate control over natural uranium. Such being the case, it should be clearly understood that Canada reserved the right to make uranium available to other nations under whatever conditions seemed to it to be appropriate.

12. Our Ambassador in Washington has summarized the present situation in the following terms:

"There can be no doubt that the position now taken by the United States and the United Kingdom, and which, I presume will be supported at least tacitly by us, should simplify quite appreciably the negotiations at the twelve-nation conference. The control policy adopted does not require any group of countries to give up any essential rights. The United States are not asking any commitments about weapons programmes and they themselves have retained a free hand in bilaterals. The controls are firmly tied to assistance so that a country always has a choice between acceptance of controls and rejection of assistance.

Unfortunately, however, it is difficult to see how such an approach can result in either a strong agency or an adequate control system."

13. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation to the twelve-power conference should seek and support the most effective control system for which it is possible to get general agreement, so as to facilitate the peaceful development of atomic energy throughout the world with the minimum danger that such development will be diverted to the production of weapons.

Composition and Manner of Selection of the Board of Governors

14. The section in the draft statute dealing with the Board of Governors has two controversial features. First, it weights the total membership of sixteen in favour of the five most advanced atomic powers (United States, United Kingdom, USSR, France and Canada) and the eight principal producers of raw materials, by a provision that ten of the members shall be selected from these two groups (five from the first and five from the second), and second, the procedure for selection will tend to make the composition of these two groups self-perpetuating. These features, or some variant of them, have been considered essential in order to ensure that the nations which will have to provide atomic materials will have some measure of control over the activities of the Agency. The only alternative would appear to be the adoption of a system of weighted voting, but this has been rejected after much study as impractical.

15. There is, however, one anomaly which it would appear necessary to correct. Under the current plan all of the group of twelve negotiating powers except India and Brazil are assured of seats on the first Board under the two categories mentioned above. This difficulty could be met by providing that all twelve nations should be appointed to the first Board. Thereafter the problem would be resolved by selection as provided in the statute.

16. It is anticipated that the main objections to the current provisions for the Board of Governors will be as follows:

(a) the USSR will argue that the nations holding permanent seats on the Security Council should have permanent seats on the Board of Governors;

(b) some, if not all of the principal producers of raw materials will press for permanent seats instead of selection on a "five out of eight" basis;

(c) India will seek to have the present system replaced by one involving election "on an equitable geographical basis", thus greatly increasing the number of seats likely to be held by the atomic "have-not" nations.

17. It is proposed that the Canadian delegation should seek a solution based on the following principles:

(a) the size of the Board of Governors should be kept as small as possible to facilitate efficient management of the Agency;

(b) membership on the Board should be weighted in favour of the nations which are going to have to provide the resources of atomic materials and technical knowledge.

Relationship of the Agency to the United Nations

18. The draft statute merely provides that the Board of Governors with the approval of the General Conference may enter into an agreement establishing an appropriate relationship between the Agency and the United Nations. However, it is well-known that the original group of sponsoring nations, including Canada, believes that the relationship should be that of a Specialized Agency.

19. In the course of the debate at the General Assembly this autumn it became evident that a number of nations, and in particular India and the Scandinavian countries, favour "a closer relationship". The USSR believes that questions "falling with[in] the competence of the Security Council ... should be turned over by the Agency for decision by the Security Council".

20. It is recommended that in the first stage of the discussions the Canadian delegation should continue to uphold the Specialized Agency relationship. In the event that it develops that some concession to the demand for a "closer relationship" is necessary, the delegation should seek to ensure that the functions thereby assigned to the General Assembly do not exceed those enjoyed by the Economic and Social Council in relation to the Specialized Agencies, and in regard to the Security Council the Statute of the Agency should simply require it to observe and carry out any direction given it by the Council within the field of the Council's jurisdiction under the United Nations Charter.

Ottawa, September 12, 1956

CONFERENCE ON THE STATUTE FOR THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY CONFERENCE

On September 20 there will open at United Nations headquarters in New York a general conference to discuss and, it is hoped, to approve a statute for the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency. Representatives have been invited from all countries members of the United Nations or a Specialized Agency, and it is expected that some eighty national delegations will attend. Canada will be represented by Mr. M.H. Wershof, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and active head of the Delegation, and Mr. W.J. Bennett, President of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

2. The Conference will have before it a proposed statute prepared by a twelve-power "working level conference" which met from February 27 to June 28 in Washington. Canada was a member of that preparatory conference; the instructions given to our Delegation at that time, and the background of the plan for the proposed Agency, are set out in a memorandum to Cabinet of February 20.

3. Although there were reservations by various countries on individual articles, the proposed statute was unanimously approved by the preparatory meeting for submission to the forthcoming Conference. It is based fairly closely upon the earlier draft referred to in that memorandum, and the comments then set out and the instructions then approved may still be regarded as generally applicable. At the conclusion of this memorandum there are recommended certain objectives which it is considered that the Canadian Delegation should pursue at the forthcoming Conference. These are based on those approved last February, but are modified to take account of certain developments during and since the preparatory meeting, developments of which some account is given in the intervening paragraphs below.

4. There is now considerable evidence that most governments, including that of the USSR, wish to see the Agency come into existence and are likely to join it provided it does not differ too drastically from what they individually might prefer. Subject to points of difference discussed in more detail below, the present draft is generally acceptable to those governments (comprising a most influential group) which participated in the preparatory conference, and in particular is satisfactory to those powers with which Canada has been closely associated during the preparatory period. This is not to say that there have not been substantial concessions made to the views of others by all parties. On certain points it was not possible to reach unanimous agreement; in such cases individual governments entered reservations to the majority decision, and will no doubt re-open debate on these points at the forthcoming conference. It is to be hoped, however, that decisions will be reached on such points which can be accepted by all governments concerned, so that the Conference may conclude with the signature by all delegations of an agreed statute to be submitted to governments for ratification.

5. The most important present differences of view relate to:

- (a) the composition of the Board of Governors,
- (b) "the sovereign rights of states" in relation to the Agency,
- (c) the relationship of the Board of Governors to the General Conference,
- (d) the control and inspection provisions,
- (e) financial arrangements, and their impact on the scope and organization of the Agency, and
- (f) membership in the Agency.

The USSR has entered reservations on each of these points, and India on the composition of the Board of Governors and on the control and inspection provisions.

6. Perhaps more difficult than the negotiation of the other twenty-two articles taken together was the attempt to reach agreement on the composition of the Board of Governors. In the course of protracted discussions the western powers made substantial concessions to the concept, advanced by India and the USSR, that the Board should be based upon the principle of geographical representation. The formula finally adopted in the draft reflects a reasonable compromise between this concept and the western preference for functional representation, and unanimous agreement despite the Indian and Soviet reservations was very close. It is hoped that the present formula will be accepted by the forthcoming Conference, since a number of the western countries have indicated that it represents their maximum concession; failure to agree on this article could have very serious consequences for the success of the Conference.

7. It is not unlikely that the Soviet position on "the sovereign rights of states" and its wish to assign to the General Conference a greater measure of authority vis-à-vis the Board of Governors are designed primarily to gain credit in the eyes of underdeveloped or uncommitted countries. It is not expected that these reservations will give rise to great difficulty, but the Soviet insistence on the observation of "the sovereign rights of states" has not been clearly explained and there may be some effort to use this slogan to weaken the control system. India has opposed the extension of the controls (as provided in the draft) to source materials (i.e. natural uranium and similar items). It may well be that a number of other governments will join in this opposition, and it might therefore not be possible to obtain acceptance of effective control arrangements extending to natural uranium. It is apparently generally accepted, however, that adequate controls should be provided for "special fissionable materials", i.e. enriched uranium and plutonium. The Canadian Delegation, in view of Canada's interest as a major producer of natural uranium, will follow carefully these points relating to controls. Enquiries concerning the possible purchase of uranium from Canada are becoming increasingly frequent, and it will no doubt be necessary for the Canadian Government soon to consider its policies in connection with the marketing of uranium abroad. While that question will raise a number of major problems not relevant in this context, the Agency pattern of controls on international transactions in atomic materials will be an important factor in determining our position on the export of uranium.

8. At Washington, Canada stressed the importance of sound financial procedures and effective organizational arrangements as a prerequisite for the development and successful operation of an Agency capable of discharging the important responsibilities to be entrusted to it. To this end the Delegation supported establishment of an organization with adequate scope and financial resources. At the same time, recognizing the need for prudent management and responsible financial direction the Canadian Delegation sponsored statutory provisions designed to ensure effective and economical administration, equitable sharing of costs and responsible financial control. In particular, the relative powers of the Conference and the Board of Governors were carefully defined so as to give the Board adequate influence to ensure effective operation and sound growth.

9. The main financial article in the present Statute is based on a Canadian draft, and the Delegation to the forthcoming Conference should seek to preserve its essential features.

10. The USSR has held out strongly for membership in the Agency and a seat on the Board for Communist China. This was of course vigorously opposed by the United States, and the draft adopted by majority decision (while not specifically excluding any country) would render it difficult or impossible for Communist China to have an application for membership approved. While a number of delegations did not fully agree with the United States on this question, there appeared to be fairly broad support for the view that the establishment of an essentially functional body was not the appropriate forum for the resolution of this controversial and important political question. The present formula, therefore, by implication defers the question of Communist China's accession until such time as that government may be admitted to the United Nations. Nevertheless it is to be expected that this question may be hotly debated, and Canada may once again have difficulty in taking a satisfactory and defensible position.

11. Recommendations

It is recommended that the Canadian Delegation to the Conference on the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency should work for the establishment of an International Atomic Energy Agency along the lines proposed in the present draft Statute, and in particular should be guided by the following objectives:

(a) to seek to obtain agreement on a Board of Governors for the Agency based on the following principles:

- (1) The size of the Board should be kept as small as possible, consistent with (3) below, in order to facilitate efficient management of the Agency.
- (2) The Board should be sufficiently independent of the General Conference of the Agency to permit effective operation.
- (3) Membership on the Board should be so distributed that, while the concept of geographical representation is properly reflected, the Board shall nevertheless be sufficiently responsive to the views of those governments which will have to make available atomic materials and technical knowledge to provide for responsible conduct of the Agency's affairs.

(b) to seek and support the most effective control and inspection system for which it is possible to obtain general agreement, so as to facilitate the peaceful development of atomic energy throughout the world with the minimum danger that such development will be diverted to the production of weapons.

(c) to seek the adoption of sound financial procedures and organizational arrangements which will contribute to effective action and sound growth.

(d) to attempt to avert a major division of the Conference, should the risk appear serious, on the question of Communist Chinese membership; this to be attempted:

(1) on the one hand, by seeking support from those favourable to such membership for the view that the United Nations itself rather than the Conference is the appropriate forum in which to settle the question of China's role in major international organizations, and

(2) on the other hand, by attempting to obtain from those opposing such membership agreement to accept a non-committal formula which will be as little offensive as possible to the supporters of Communist Chinese membership.¹⁰⁸

CONFERENCE ON THE STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY
AGENCY — NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 20-OCTOBER 26, 1956

SUMMARY

The Conference on the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency opened at United Nations Headquarters in New York on September 20, 1956. It was convened by a group of twelve powers (Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Portugal, South Africa, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States), which had prepared a draft statute at a "Working Level Meeting" held in Washington during the spring of 1956. The draft was prepared, and the Conference to consider it convened, in accordance with an invitation in a resolution unanimously adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in the autumn of 1955.

2. The Conference in plenary session debated general concepts relating to the Agency for some two weeks, and then in Committee of the Whole went through the draft Statute article by article. This consideration in Committee was completed on October 22, and on October 23 in plenary session the Conference unanimously approved the final text of the Statute which is attached as Annex I.¹⁰⁹ The signing ceremony took place on October 26, on which date representatives of seventy countries were in a position to sign. Signature on behalf of other countries whose constitutional processes required some delay was expected to take place in following weeks. Signature of the Statute was subject to ratification by governments, and the Statute will come into effect when instruments of ratification have been deposited with the Government of the United States by 18 countries, of which three must be drawn from among Canada, France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. In the meantime a Preparatory Commission, consisting of the twelve together with six others (Argentina, Egypt, Indonesia, Japan, Pakistan and Peru) elected by the Conference, will carry on preliminary arrangements for the establishment of the Agency.

BACKGROUND

3. The general proposal for an International Atomic Energy Agency was put before the United Nations by President Eisenhower on December 8, 1953. The essence of that proposal was that there should be established an international agency designed to assist all countries in developing and exploiting the peaceful uses of atomic energy, to which all countries could turn for help and through which the countries able to do so would be able to make available their knowledge and techniques, materials and equipment with effective safeguards to prevent their diversion to any military purpose.

4. Annexed to this report are the Cabinet directive to the Canadian Delegation to the Conference (Annex II) and a list of the members of the Delegation (Annex III).† The accredited Canadian representatives were Mr. M.H. Wershof, QC, Assistant Under-Secretary of State and Legal Advisor in the Department of External Affairs, and Mr. W.J. Bennett, OBE, President of Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. and of Eldorado Mining and Refining Ltd., with the former serving as Chief Delegate.

5. In preparatory discussions in Ottawa it had been recognized that certain aspects of the Conference would be of special importance. Points to which particular attention was given included the question of Chinese representation, the composition of the Board of Governors for the proposed Agency, the financial arrangements for the Agency and the problem of safeguards to be applied to the assistance provided by it. As it turned out, agreement was readily reached in a manner fully in accord with Canadian interests on the first two points. Consideration by the Conference of the financial arrangements for the Agency gave rise to some difficulties, for reasons to be considered in more detail later in this report, but agreement was eventually reached without a major conflict of views. The question was nevertheless of considerable importance to the Canadian Delegation, as Canadian representatives had been largely responsible for the drafting of the principal financial article of the Statute and were therefore actively involved in discussions relating to it. The problem of Agency safeguards, and their possible extension to transactions in which the Agency would not in itself be directly involved, was undoubtedly the most important, the most difficult and the most controversial question faced by the Conference. It was also, of course, a problem of special concern to Canada as a prospective major exporter of natural uranium. Both because of Canada's interest in the matter and because of its importance in the work of the Conference, it engaged more of the time and efforts of the Canadian Delegation than any other problem. The statutory provisions on this question which were eventually agreed involved certain concessions by all those countries particularly concerned, but are considered fully and effectively to provide adequate safeguards in complete accord with Canadian interests. There is no doubt that the unanimous agreement achieved on this matter must be regarded as a successful outcome to complex and difficult negotiations.

6. Canada had been actively associated with the proposal for the establishment of the Agency from the beginning, and in earlier international discussions directed to this end and particularly in the preparation of the draft statute had worked in close cooperation with the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom as well as with the Governments of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, France, Portugal and South Africa. This group of nine like-minded countries maintained close working contact throughout the preparatory negotiations and the Conference itself. Canada was also in close contact during the preparatory period with India and the Soviet Union, and during the Conference itself with India. These two latter countries, together with Czechoslovakia, differed in their approach from the nine Western countries on a number of important points. Especially on the question of safeguards, Canada's effective working relationship with India proved of great value in helping to bridge the gap which separated the Western countries from India and the Soviet Union. Finally, while France played a very inactive part indeed in the preparatory work and in most of the Conference, the achievement of a satisfactory compromise on the problem of safeguards was the result to a substantial degree of an initiative jointly undertaken by France and Switzerland, and in this connection also the close relationship between the Canadian Delegation and the chief French representative (who was at one time a senior member of the research staff of the Canadian atomic energy project) was of great value.

7. On this problem of safeguards the opposition to the Western point of view was led by India, with the Soviet Union supporting the Indian position but not playing an active part in the discussions. Members of the Canadian Delegation, and no doubt the chief Indian negotiators also, were very conscious in these discussions of their implications for the Canada-India Reactor Project where the arrangements to be made for the provision of the fuel elements would be directly affected by the safeguard provisions eventually adopted for the Agency. The fact that the provisions finally adopted included effective control of source materials, and were accepted by India, should be helpful in the resolution of the differences which remain unsettled in connection with this particular Indo-Canadian matter.

THE COURSE OF THE CONFERENCE

Framework of the Agency

8. Following the unanimous election of Ambassador Muniz of Brazil as President and Ambassador Winkler of Czechoslovakia as Vice President (an arrangement which had been agreed in preliminary negotiations among the principal powers concerned) the Conference in plenary session debated in some detail the general concepts underlying the Agency and the broad implications of the provisions of the draft Statute. Positions taken in these opening statements were fully in accord with expectations. The Soviet bloc, firmly supported by India, Yugoslavia and many of the Asian countries, argued at great length that the Conference would suffer from the exclusion of Communist China and that the Agency would be incomplete and not fully effective until Communist China should be admitted to membership and to a seat on the Board of Governors. India led the same group of countries in an attack upon the control provisions of the draft statute, alleging in particular that they would give the Agency far too great power to interfere in the atomic programmes and hence in the economic development of countries receiving assistance from the Agency. The argument was advanced that the imposition of unduly burden-some or offensive controls would impede or even defeat the primary purpose of the Agency by forcing the countries most in need of assistance from it to refrain from accepting such assistance. The third main theme emerging in the general debate, in the speeches of underdeveloped countries including the Latin American countries, laid heavy emphasis upon the possibilities which the Agency might afford for the provision of assistance to such countries at little or no cost to themselves. A number of representatives from a variety of countries opposed the provisions of the draft Statute concerning the composition of the Board of Governors and the relative powers to be assigned to the Board and to the General Conference, but all but the most irresponsible recognized to a greater or lesser extent the force of the argument put forward by the twelve powers that on these points a delicate balance had with great difficulty been achieved in Washington and that regardless of its merits the success of the Conference would be gravely threatened if that balance were to be disturbed.

9. When the Conference moved into Committee to examine the individual articles of the draft Statute the first main debate, and the first significant amendment, arose in connection with Article III dealing with the functions of the Agency. The general lines of debate reflected the points of view expressed in the plenary discussions of which mention has been made above. The Latin American countries pressed for a statutory provision that the Agency would establish a "World University of the Atom"; although the proposal may be revived in future, this demand was successfully resisted as far as the Statute is concerned. The important successful amendment to article III was proposed by Thailand (whose representative, incidentally, contributed effectively to the work of the Conference in a number of intelligent and useful interventions) with the encouragement of the United States, and was designed to permit the extension of Agency safeguards not only to bilateral or multi-lateral transactions outside the Agency but, at the request of the country concerned, to individual national programmes. It was not seriously suggested by anyone that this provision would have immediate application, but it was generally regarded as valuable in the opportunity which it afforded for the ultimate evolution of the Agency system of safeguards into a universal system which could provide the means for contributing to or possibly even for carrying out a future general agreement on the control or elimination of atomic weapons. An amendment to Article XII, which would have achieved the same purpose, was not pressed by India following the adoption of Thailand's amendment to Article III.

10. The next main debate arose in connection with Articles V and VI, dealing respectively with the General Conference and the Board of Governors. Minor adjustments were accepted to enhance at least in form the role of the General Conference, but no change was made in the provisions of the draft Statute relating to the Board of Governors. These provisions were accepted with a readiness which is surprising when the difficulties encountered on this problem in Washington are recalled; it appeared, however, that the Conference had taken to heart the warnings of a number of representatives (including not only the Western powers but, significantly, India and the Soviet Union as well) that tampering with this matter could threaten the success of the Conference.

11. Considerable attention was given to Article XI dealing with Agency projects, but the points of significance related either to financial arrangements or to safeguards and can be better considered in connection with the articles primarily devoted to those two matters.

Safeguards

12. Article XII, setting out the provisions for safeguards, took more of the Conference's time than any other article, and ultimately represented unquestionably the major achievement of the Conference. The handling of this article was of such importance that it is discussed in greater detail in Annex IV, and it is sufficient here to indicate the general lines of the discussion.

13. The two features of the safeguards article as drafted which were attacked by those who considered them too extensive were, respectively, the requirement that controls should apply without formal distinction to both "special fissionable materials" (in practice plutonium and uranium 235) and "source materials" (natural uranium and thorium), and the assignment to the Agency of authority to control the future use of special fissionable materials produced in Agency projects.

14. Of these two points, the one which most concerned the delegations leading the opposition to the draft article was that relating to disposition of fissionable materials produced. Their original position was that the Agency should not have any authority to control such future use, although they admitted from the outset that the Agency should be in a position to control the utilization of special fissionable materials which it might supply to a country. When it became clear that there would be no agreement upon arrangements which would exclude the Agency from control of fissionable materials produced in an Agency project, India and its supporters shifted their ground somewhat. In the first place, they considered that countries concerned should have the right to determine for themselves the peaceful uses to which such products might be put. In the second place, they wished to have it clearly established in the statute that the country concerned could subsequently withdraw such materials for uses which it might determine following their initial deposit with the Agency. On the tacit understanding that the Agency should have a consultative role in the determination of the peaceful uses to which countries would apply fissionable materials produced in Agency-assisted projects and explicit provision in that such uses would be subject to continuing Agency safeguards, the text eventually adopted met the substance of the Indian position on these points. This agreement was achieved at the last moment, after matters had reached a point where the difference in substance was not great but where political entrenchment was apparently so deep that agreement on language would involve too great a loss of face for one party or the other. This apparent deadlock was broken on the initiative of the Swiss representative, who persuaded the French representative to join him in working out and presenting a compromise text which both sides eventually found acceptable. The senior U.S. representatives at the Conference were sympathetic throughout to the efforts to reach a compromise, but encountered considerable difficulty in persuading authorities in Washington that it was worthwhile to make concessions of language on the condition that points of substance were not lost. Canadian representations to the senior U.S. authorities concerned were apparently of considerable importance in persuading them to accept this point of view.

15. Following agreement in private consultations among the delegations principally concerned on the provisions governing the use of special fissionable materials produced, attention reverted to the earlier point concerning the application of controls to source and special fissionable materials used in Agency-assisted projects. Here the Indian representative was eventually persuaded to accept the language of the draft statute subject to clarifications by Western representatives, particularly in a final statement by the Canadian Delegation, to the effect that, while the Agency must control source materials, these powers would be exercised only to the extent necessary to ensure accountability for the fissionable materials which might be produced from the source materials in question.

16. The successful acceptance by the Main Committee of these agreements was jeopardized at the last moment by an irresponsible insistence on the part of the Syrian representative that he must press to a vote a sub-amendment distinguishing between source and special fissionable materials. The Conference was temporarily thrown into some confusion and a brief adjournment called jointly by Canada and India. Following a few minutes of informal discussion with the principal delegations, we made a blunt statement that the Syrian sub-amendment was totally unacceptable to Canada and the delegations closely associated with it and if pressed would threaten the unanimous agreement which had appeared to be in sight. The Syrian representative then yielded to the Chairman's appeal not to press his sub-amendment.

17. A number of speakers paid tribute to the major contribution of the Swiss and French Delegations, and to the spirit of compromise and the genuine desire to reach agreement of the other delegations particularly concerned. Several speakers referred in particular to the helpful role played by the Canadian Delegation, and the senior Indian representative significantly mentioned Canada by name without reference to the United Kingdom or the United States. This constituted a public recognition of the fact that the Canadian Delegation had been more willing than the other two to concentrate upon substance and had used its influence with the two great powers to persuade them to give up points of wording on which they appeared to have some feeling that their prestige might suffer.

18. During the debates on controls, the Indian Delegation proposed, obviously for reasons at least in part political, that a clause might be added prohibiting provision of assistance by the Agency to any country conducting or planning an atomic weapons programme. The Indian Delegation did not press this suggestion to the point of submitting a proposed amendment, and no action was taken on it by the Conference. Governments will no doubt wish to consider the matter further and the suggestion may become significant in connection with the different and somewhat broader problems of disarmament.

Financial Arrangements

19. The financial arrangements proposed in the draft Statute submitted to the Conference owed much to the efforts of Canadian representatives during the drafting conference in Washington. They were designed to ensure prudent and responsible financial administration on the one hand, while on the other hand providing sufficient flexibility and adequate revenues for the Agency to be able to carry out an effective programme in fulfilment of its principal objective of assisting countries to develop the peaceful uses of atomic energy. These features, and the means whereby they are to be achieved, were completely retained in substance in the Statute as adopted by the Conference.

20. The acceptance of these financial arrangements required very considerable efforts on the part of the Canadian Delegation, in the first place because Canada was regarded as their sponsor and was therefore expected by the other drafting powers to carry the main burden of their defence. The financial provisions, moreover, were subject to pressure from two sides. The Canadian Delegation played an important role in finding a moderate course between the extreme position of some delegations led by the U.S.S.R., which urged a very restrictive financial line, and the tendency of the underdeveloped countries to press for financial provisions which would have exaggerated the eleemosynary features of the Agency. The intermediate Canadian position was based on the desire to ensure that the Statute as a whole would be cast in terms which would encourage acceptance of those features, including particularly the provisions for safeguards, which are of special importance to Canada. Real acceptance of the implications of these features on the part of countries likely in the future to require uranium for their atomic programmes will be of great value in connection with the marketing of Canadian uranium. This position required careful political handling, as the U.S.S.R. manoeuvred skilfully in an attempt to present a restrictive financial position in terms designed to convince the underdeveloped countries that these restrictions were essential to the protection of their interests. It fell to the Canadian Delegation to combat this manoeuvre by demonstrating that the wording of Article XIV as drafted and as finally adopted would permit the development of a more effective and dynamic Agency programme.

21. Because the provisions of the financial article are complex, and because the pressures against them came from opposite sides, tended to cancel each other out, and permitted the adoption of the financial arrangements virtually as presented in the draft, it is not considered necessary to discuss these points in greater detail in this report. An analysis of the effects of the financial provisions and of the debates and negotiations relating to them is set out in Annex V, † prepared by the financial adviser [S. Pollock] to the Delegation.

Legal and Related Questions

22. No serious difficulties were encountered on the various articles relating to the signature, ratification or amendment of the Statute. There was, however, a debate on the article dealing with the settlement of disputes in which the real issue, somewhat obscured by confusion of language, related to the question of compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. The Latin American bloc led its customary assault on the concept that there should be statutory provision for the compulsory submission of disputes between members to the Court. They were unable to carry their case, but the language of the Statute as drafted and as adopted did not perhaps specify as clearly as it might that such compulsory jurisdiction is in fact provided for.

CONCLUSION

23. The Statute as approved is considered to be fully in accord with Canadian interests and with the directive for the Canadian Delegation attached as Annex II. Indeed, the Conference was even more successful from the Canadian point of view than might have been hoped, in that on the point of greatest importance to Canada and of greatest difficulty in the negotiations, namely the question of safeguards, there was not only approval of provisions fully meeting Canadian requirements but there was unanimous support of these provisions. This fact will be of value extending well beyond the operations of the Agency itself and greatly facilitating specifically Canadian interests in connection with the marketing of uranium.

24. The Statute was signed on October 26, 1956 on behalf of Canada by Dr. R.A. MacKay, Mr. W.J. Bennett and Mr. M.H. Wershof. The question of its ratification now becomes a matter for consideration by the Government.

CONFIDENTIAL

THE PROBLEM OF SAFEGUARDS

The draft Statute presented to the Conference provided inter alia, that, with respect to any Agency project or other arrangement where the Agency is requested by the authorities concerned to apply safeguards, the Agency shall have the right and responsibility "to the extent relevant to the project or arrangement, to require the maintenance and production of operating records to assist in ensuring accountability for source and special fissionable materials"; and "to approve the means to be used for chemical processing of irradiated fuels and to specify disposition of any special fissionable materials recovered or produced as a by-product, and to require that such special fissionable materials be deposited with the Agency except for quantities authorized by the Agency to be retained for specified non-military uses under continuing Agency safeguards."

2. These provisions were attacked in the opening plenary debate and in the subsequent discussion in committee by a wide number of countries. Indeed, there had been reservations on these provisions entered by India and the USSR when the draft Statute was prepared in Washington. In substance the objections to these provisions focussed upon two different points. It was stated to be unnecessary and undesirable that the Agency should have the same extensive control powers in relation to source materials as it was assigned in connection with special fissionable materials, and it was argued that the authority given to the Agency to specify disposition of fissionable products, to require their deposit with the Agency if it saw fit, and to hold a veto upon retention for non-military uses by the country in which they were produced, would permit it to interfere unduly in the economic development of states which might become economically dependent upon the use of atomic power.

3. The first significant development on this matter in the course of the Conference came when the French representative in effect dissociated himself from the other Western countries who had insisted that all of these powers were essential for the safeguards to be effective. He took the view that, as source materials were not in themselves dangerous and as it would not in practice be either necessary or possible to apply to them controls of the same degree of stringency as would be necessary for special fissionable materials, there should be a distinction in form between source materials and special fissionable materials as far as controls were concerned. Indeed, it was learned that his instructions called for him to oppose any controls on source materials, but he did not consider such an extreme position a possible one and in public statements took a position mid-way between that and the unlimited controls on source materials called for by the draft Statute. He also argued in informal discussions that it was unreasonable to require controls upon "future generations" of fissionable products of Agency-assisted projects, i.e. fissionable materials produced in a project utilizing fissionable products of an Agency-assisted project.

4. With this partial support from France, and with the outspoken approbation of the USSR, Yugoslavia and a number of Asian countries, the Indian Delegation, led by Dr. Homi Bhabha, launched a vigorous attack upon these features of the article dealing with safeguards. He was somewhat mollified when it became clear in informal negotiations that the Western countries did not in fact consider necessary as stringent controls as a literal interpretation of the passages quoted above from the draft statute would permit. It was readily agreed by Western representatives, for example, that controls upon source materials would certainly be less extensive than those applicable to special fissionable materials, would in all probability be negligible at the mining and refining stage, and indeed up to the stage where source materials had been irradiated in a reactor would probably amount to little more than a system of accounting supplemented by occasional inspection to permit verification of accounts. It was also readily accepted that within reasonable limits a country which had received Agency assistance in establishing a reactor project should have the right to decide the future peaceful use which might be made of plutonium produced therein. The most protracted and complicated negotiations took place on this latter point, since difficulties arose as soon as efforts were made to specify what significance, if any, should be attached to the concept of "reasonable limits". On the one hand, India and its supporters declared themselves unable to accept a situation in which the Agency would have any formal veto upon a peaceful programme which a recipient country might wish to undertake with the use of fissionable materials produced in an Agency-assisted project. On the other hand, technical advisers in the United States and UK Delegations were most unwilling to leave entirely to the country concerned the decision as to what peaceful use could be made of such materials.

5. In the course of negotiations the particular passage in the draft Statute (Article XII, Paragraph A-5) was subjected to many redrafts by both sides, with the two positions differing only slightly in substance and coming progressively closer on language. Because some slight difference of substance still remained, however, it had not been possible to reach agreement by the end of the week in which the Committee stage of the Conference was supposed to conclude. On Friday afternoon, October 19, after consultations with a number of the principal delegations concerned, the delegations of France and Switzerland submitted a new draft for this passage which fell mid-way between the two positions upon which the negotiating parties had apparently frozen. The Canadian Delegation, privately encouraged to do so by senior officials of the US Delegation, stated that this new proposal deserved serious study and moved that a vote on the question be deferred until after the week-end. The vote on this article had been scheduled for October 19.

6. Over the week-end the Canadian Delegation first satisfied itself that the Franco-Swiss text with a few very minor modifications would be acceptable to Canada. It then helped to persuade the US and UK Delegations, the US readily and the UK not so readily, that they could agree. There remained, however, the important question of whether US authorities in Washington would be prepared to concur. The Chief US Delegate spoke to Mr. Dulles about the matter and also to Admiral Strauss, his deputy spoke to Under-Secretary Hoover, and on his request Mr. Bennett of the Canadian Delegation also spoke to Admiral Strauss. Mr. Bennett's representations were apparently of great effect upon Admiral Strauss as coming from a man whose experience and judgment in the field of atomic matters he highly respected. The US Delegation informed us on Sunday evening that they had received Presidential authority to conclude a compromise text based upon the Franco-Swiss draft.

7. Further consultations were required to bring into line the Delegations of the UK and certain other Western countries which were suspicious of the Franco-Swiss language. At the same time discussions were held between US and Canadian authorities with the senior Indian negotiators, following up and supplementing earlier talks between France and India. Eventually agreement was reached among all concerned except Australia to accept a slightly modified version of the Franco-Swiss text. Australia declared itself unable to accept because time had not permitted the receipt of fresh instructions, and accordingly abstained on the vote.

8. As a subsidiary element in this agreement, the Indian representatives agreed to accept the Western language concerning source materials with a minor addition designed to clarify the point that the controls on source materials would be applicable only to those used in an Agency-assisted project. This agreement depended upon clarification being provided, in the record, of the limitations which it was generally agreed would in practice apply to the use of the control powers over the source materials. By agreement among all concerned this clarification was given in a statement by the Canadian Delegation.

9. Before the votes incorporating these various agreements were taken, a final effort was necessary in order to head off an irresponsible Syrian attempt at the last moment to distinguish for control purposes between source and special fissionable materials. Having provided the explanation required by India of how controls on source materials would be applied in practice, the Canadian Delegation undertook the task of bluntly informing the Conference that to reopen this question as the Syrian sub-amendment would do would undermine the whole pattern of agreement which had been achieved.

10. There is no doubt that the Canadian contribution to these extensive and difficult negotiations was an important one. Mr. Bennett's approach to Admiral Strauss was highly significant, possibly essential, in permitting agreement to be reached. The influence of members of the Delegation in discussions with the UK, with France and with India also contributed to a considerable extent. In this connection it might be pointed out that throughout the Conference the role played by the UK Delegation was less effective and less enlightened than might have been expected; this is undoubtedly attributable at least in part to the fact that the chief UK Delegate, Sir Pierson Dixon, was almost entirely preoccupied with the Suez crisis, and the conduct of UK activities in the Conference was left to less qualified representatives. The senior representatives of the US, and in particular Ambassador Wadsworth, made a most favourable and effective impression upon all delegations including our own; their performance, however, suffered from a lack of flexibility since they had on any change to persuade the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, which is usually unsympathetic to an internationalist approach, that compromise on wording would not involve a concession of substance. Hence, at various stages, there tended to be a significant difference of viewpoint between Mr. Wadsworth and other State Department representatives on the one hand and Admiral Strauss and the technical advisors provided by the AEC on the other. This divergence of view is, of course, of long standing and did not arise only in connection with this Conference; it remains to be seen whether it will limit or cripple the major contribution which the US should make to the work of the Agency, a contribution upon which the Agency will very largely depend for its success.

RATIFICATION OF THE STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

Mr. Howe has agreed that as a matter of urgency the Government should put itself in a position to ratify the Statute of the Agency at a time to be chosen in consultation with other friendly governments; I understand that you are therefore prepared to raise this question with your colleagues at the Cabinet meeting of Thursday, March 21. Officials of the Department of Finance are briefing Mr. Harris on the matter, impressing upon him the desirability of ensuring that Canada should be in a position to act promptly as circumstances may require. I believe you wished to have a note to refresh your memory of the issues involved.

The consistent Canadian position, re-affirmed on several occasions by Cabinet, has been that the successful establishment of the Agency will be of significant benefit to us. It should provide effective machinery for international cooperation, and if governments should so decide for international assistance, in the development of a major new industry of which the world expects great things. The Agency's programme should render more rapid and widespread the development of markets for uranium for constructive peaceful uses, a matter of direct interest to Canada as a major exporter of uranium. It is scarcely in question that the Agency should be vigorously supported and that Canada should play an active role in it.

The Statute signed last October 26 makes appropriate provision for an Agency suitable for these tasks, and for effective Canadian participation. In particular, it provides in effect that Canada should be one of the five countries designated for more or less permanent membership on the Board of Governors. This arises from the general recognition of Canada's advanced position, one might almost say "great power status", in atomic matters.

The Statute will come into effect, and the Agency into existence, when instruments of ratification are deposited by eighteen signatories provided three of these are from among the five countries referred to, namely Canada, France, the U.K., the U.S., and the U.S.S.R. The Preparatory Commission, of which Canada is a member, has set August 19, 1957, as the target date for convening the first General Conference of the Agency. Whether this target can be met is of course not yet known, but any substantial postponement would be unfortunate since it is considered that there would be great difficulties in holding the General Conference coincidentally with the General Assembly. These difficulties would be in part administrative (availability of translators, etc.), but perhaps of greater importance would be the problem for many less developed countries of providing representation in view of the fact that their only representatives experienced in the subject are in their U.N. Delegations. If the General Conference is not completed by late September, therefore, either this problem would arise or alternatively there would have to be a postponement until the spring of 1958. The latter possibility would involve a serious loss of momentum and political initiative, and either alternative would disappoint many of the countries whose good will towards the Agency it is most desirable to secure.

It is therefore important that as many western countries as possible should ratify in time for a General Conference in August or September, both to permit the early establishment of the Agency and to prevent the U.S.S.R. from dominating the Board of Governors and the first General Conference. The U.S.S.R. has already ratified, and will have little difficulty in rounding up among its friends the fifteen other ratifications necessary to bring the Statute into effect provided two from among Canada, France the U.K. and the U.S. shall have ratified. These four have agreed to maintain close consultation on timing in order to guard against this possibility, but they will not be able to delay so long that the U.S.S.R. can accuse the west of holding up the implementation of a major western political initiative. Hence it is important that all four of these countries should be in a position to act at the time of their choice, without the risk of being held up by delay on the part of one of their number.

Delay to the point where the rest decided to go ahead would be most serious, as the members of the Board of Governors must be designated by the Preparatory Commission sixty days before the General Conference, and a country must have ratified prior to that date to be eligible for designation and hence for membership on the Board. It will be necessary to ratify before the General Conference is convened in order to have a vote at that Conference.

U.S. and U.K. officials were most distressed to learn that Canada had no definite timetable for ratification. The U.S. representatives declared that the U.S. would not consider bringing the Statute into force unless Canada, the U.K. and the U.S. at least were in a position to take up their membership on the Board. They indicated that the State Department would wish to approach the Canadian Government (probably through the U.S. Ambassador in Ottawa) if Canada's situation should remain indeterminate for long. For their part they hoped for U.S. ratification by May 1, and were confident that it would be obtained no later than May 15. The U.K. expected no delay, and French representatives have indicated that they expect ratification in May or early June. Accordingly the Canadian position is of great importance. It might be added that a number of other governments are looking for early ratification by Canada; Austria, the prospective host country for the Agency headquarters, has recently formally expressed the hope that Canada will see fit to ratify promptly.

The Department of Justice has confirmed that ratification by Canada would require no new legislation or amendment of existing legislation, nor will any immediate expenditure be involved; accordingly the Government need only decide when it will act. Presumably, in view of the fact that questions have been asked in the House about the Government's intentions with regard to ratification, it would be desirable to provide a prior opportunity for expression of Parliamentary views. There appears no reason to expect that these will be controversial or extensive, and an opportunity for their expression might be provided either by the introduction of a simple resolution of approval of the Statute or alternatively by a Ministerial statement under the estimates of the Government's intention to ratify. The latter method might be simpler taking account of the crowded timetable for the Session.¹¹⁰

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNITED NATIONS
1957 EXTRA BUDGETARY PROGRAMMES

You will recall that in the October 3 draft of our submission to Cabinet on this subject, we recommended the following contributions (the figures in brackets are the increases over our 1956 contributions):

ETAP	$2,000,000	($200,000)	UNREF	$200,000	($75,000)
UNICEF	$ 750,000		UNRWA	$500,000	(no increase).

On October 12 we had a meeting with Finance Department officials (Mr. Plumptre and two others) to discuss this draft submission.

At that meeting Mr. Plumptre noted that Mr. Harris has no great enthusiasm for this sort of programme, though he recognizes that some increases are necessary. Mr. Plumptre then told us what Mr. Harris' reaction in Cabinet on Thursday, October 18, is likely to be, but he emphasized that the views he gave us were not necessarily binding on Mr. Harris.

(1) ETAP and UNICEF: Our draft submission of October 3 recommends a total increase of $300,000 for these two. Mr. Plumptre said Mr. Harris was inclined to think that a total increase of $200,000 was enough. This total could be given either to ETAP, or split up evenly with $100,000 to each one.

¹¹⁰ Lors de sa réunion du 28 mars 1957, le Cabinet a convenu de présenter au Parlement une résolution appuyant le Statut de l'Agence internationale de l'énergie atomique. La résolution a été adoptée le 12 avril 1957. Voir Canada, Chambre des Communes, Débats, 1957, volume III, pp. 3682-3683. L'instrument de ratification du Canada a été déposé le 29 juillet 1957.

At its meeting on March 28, 1957, Cabinet agreed to introduce a resolution into Parliament approving the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The resolution was passed on April 12, 1957. See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1957, Volume III, pp. 3513-3515. The instrument of ratification of Canada was deposited on July 29, 1957.

We have not changed our submission on these two programmes as a result of our discussions with Finance Department, and are continuing to ask for $200,000 more for ETAP and $100,000 more for UNICEF. With regard to the UNICEF increase, I think you know that Mrs. Sinclair has asked for no increase at all, but wants to be sure that we give no less than in 1956, which was $650,000. In fact, Mrs. Sinclair does not know (since she is away from the office because of illness) that you wished us to increase our contribution. We suggest, therefore, that if money has to be saved somewhere, we take the $100,000 off UNICEF rather than off UNRWA.

(2) UNRWA: Mr. Plumptre said that Finance Department would like us to give $400,000, that is a cut of $100,000 from the 1956 contribution. We are somewhat loath to suggest that this is the fund where we could save money. Also, it could be that the Arabs, remembering Canada's recent decision to send planes to Israel, would look on our saving $100,000 at the expense of Arab refugees as a very definite and unmistakable sign that we were on the side of Israel. We rather doubt if the saving of this much money would be worth the possible unhappy repercussions from the Arabs. Hence our suggestion, as mentioned in (1) above, is that, since UNICEF would be quite satisfied and content with no increase, that we save money there rather than in the UNRWA programme. We have therefore kept our original recommendation for a contribution of $500,000.

(3) UNREF: Finance Department will go along with our recommendation for $200,000 but they want to attach two conditions (a) that we strongly urge other countries to make a similar increase and (b) that we tell the High Commissioner that we will contribute at the rate of $200,000 for the last two years of his four-year (1955-58) programme and then stop. We pointed out to Finance Department that it was unlikely the problem of the hard core of camp refugees would be wound up in four years, and it was improbable that the present shortfall of over $3 million could be recouped in the last two years of the 1955-58 programme. We were able to quote from very recent figures put out by the High Commissioner's Office that if Canada were to contribute at the U.N. scale we would be giving considerably more than $200,000.

The general feeling at the end of the discussion with Finance Department was that we should increase our contribution to about $240,000 for 1957 (with the 1958 contribution at about $250,000) on the understanding that at the end of the four year (1955-58) programme, the problem would be virtually wiped out.

After thinking this problem over, much as we would like to get $240,000 in 1957 and $250,000 in 1958 for UNREF, we are rather chary of taking this windfall because we fear that there may be many thousands of refugees under the High Commissioner's mandate at the end of 1958. If there are, we might then have serious difficulty with the Department of Finance if we wanted to get a contribution for 1959. We rather think it would be better to get the smaller amount ($200,000) with some informal understanding that the matter could be re-examined near the end of 1958 to see if the problem were by then really a manageable one so that the programme could be wound up. It seems unlikely to us that the four-year (1955-58) programme will clear up the refugee problem and we do not want Finance Department to get any false impression that it will be all over by 1958. We have therefore kept to our original recommendation of a contribution of $200,000 to UNREF.

We attach, for your consideration, the October 16 draft of our Submission to Cabinet at its meeting on October 18. We should like your views so that we can put it in final form.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 202-56

Ottawa, October 18, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNITED NATIONS EXTRA-BUDGETARY PROGRAMMES

This submission is concerned with Canadian participation in and contributions to the following programmes:

United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to Under-Developed Countries (ETAP)

United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF)

United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA)

2. This multilateral technical assistance programme, through the provision of experts and the training of technical personnel, provides a valuable and necessary addition to other efforts being made to assist the economically less well-developed countries of the world. The programme contributes to the stock of technical knowledge available to the recipient countries, aids appreciably in promoting mutual understanding between peoples, and reflects the continuing belief of the participating countries in the value of concerted international co-operation as a means of raising the standard of life for those in the particularly needy areas. Especially in a period when proposals for establishing much larger programmes of assistance under the United Nations are more or less in suspense, and other aspects of the commercial and economic policies of some of the major western countries do not offer much encouragement to the less developed countries, ETAP provides evidence to the under-developed countries of genuine interest in their welfare. The existence of this modest but effective programme also has a restraining influence on the promoters of some of the more ambitious or less realistic economic projects in the United Nations. In the case of Canada and other members of the Colombo Plan, it supplements and helps to make effective the assistance being provided under that Plan.

3. ETAP has broad public support throughout the world. During the sixth financial period (1956), a total of 71 states pledged approximately $28,756,543 (U.S.). Canada's contribution was $1,800,000 which represented an increase of $300,000 over 1955. The United States pledged $15,500,000 if all other governments together put up an equivalent amount. We have been advised by the Chairman of the Technical Assistant Board that at least 17 countries will announce this year substantial percentage increases in their pledges to this programme; among these countries are The Netherlands, 15 per cent increase to approximately $900,000; Switzerland, 50 per cent increase to approximately $350,000; Argentina, a restoration of the dollar value of its contributions for 1956 and 1957, raising its total for these years to the peso equivalent of $360,000; Mexico and Chile, an increase from 50 to 100 per cent. Although both the United Kingdom and France previously indicated a desire to expand their assistance to the programme, it now appears likely that in view of their present economic difficulties, which have been seriously aggravated by the Suez crisis and the Algeria situation, these two countries may not be able to go beyond their 1956 contribution. Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Brazil, and New Zealand will probably be increasing their contributions.

4. If the programme is to continue to fulfill its important purposes, it is inevitable that its requirements must increase. A study recently prepared by the Technical Assistance Board has summarized ETAP programmes since their beginning in 1950, and has given an appraisal of the changing needs and problems to be faced. It has stressed that if the gap between living standards of the less-developed lands and the more advanced countries is to be narrowed, it will be necessary to increase the existing service and broaden the scope of future operations of the programme. The study has examined these prospects in terms of "a limited advance" of a fifty million dollar programme or a "broader perspective" envisaging a scheme covering an expansion of services to a possible one hundred million dollars. An increase in U.N. technical assistance up to the lesser figure might meet the bulk of urgent and new requests within the administrative scope, at present, of the programme, while the higher figure would provide for an enlarged programme extending the range of the services of the U.N. specialized agencies. The Canadian Government has not, of course, committed itself in any way to the analysis of conclusions of the report which are to be discussed further at later meetings. However, the case made in this report for at least a significant increase in the total effort would seem to have some relevance to the appropriate size of Canada's contribution in 1957, especially as there now appears to be little prospect for early agreement on the establishment of SUNFED.

5. Canada has gained a high reputation for what it has already done for this multilateral endeavour, and a Canadian [H.L. Keenleyside] is Director-General of the U.N.T.A. Administration which looks after an important part of ETAP. Canadian spokesmen have repeatedly stressed the desirability of using United Nations machinery for providing or supervising aid to the less developed areas. We have also expressed interest in seeing a start made on at least the nucleus of an international career service for this work. It would seem appropriate that the Canadian Government should continue to occupy a prominent position in ETAP's programme, and that Canada should support it within the bounds of financial capabilities and priorities.

6. It is therefore recommended that Canada should at this time make a small increase in its contribution to ETAP from $1.8 million to $2 million (an increase of $200,000). When Cabinet approved last year's contribution, it authorized the Delegation to state that, subject to Parliamentary appropriations, support of at least the same general order of magnitude for the years 1957 and 1958 would be provided if the programme continued to be broadly supported by others. This assurance of at least a similar contribution was given so that United Nations agencies and the recipient countries could plan their programmes with more certainty and effectiveness. It is recommended that a similar commitment be given this year with respect to 1958 and 1959.

United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF)

7. UNICEF was created in 1947. Two hundred and eighty-three (283) UNICEF-aided projects are now in operation in 95 countries and territories of Asia, Africa, the Middle East and Latin America. Countries receiving aid must equal or better the contributions allocated to them. UNICEF is regarded as a well-administered organization and its programmes are carried out effectively. There is no doubt that the Fund has done much to enhance the prestige of the United Nations.

8. In 1956 UNICEF's target budget was $20 million. As of the beginning of August 1956, 59 governments had contributed $6,441,000, and in addition the United States had pledged $9.7 million, with the proviso that the United States contribution could not exceed 57.5% of total contributions. It is expected that in the remaining months of 1956 sufficient contributions will come in to bring the total of contributing governments to over 70 and the total contributions up to at least the $7.6 million which is needed to match the United States pledge. Contributions from some other countries in 1956 were: France, $785,000; Australia, $566,000; and the USSR, $500,000.

9. The Canadian Government has contributed just over $10 million to the Fund since it began in 1947, and in addition voluntary contributions to UNICEF from private Canadian sources have amounted to more than $1.5 million.

10. For 1957, it seems likely that the Fund will set $21 million as its target budget. The United States has pledged $10 million for 1957 with the proviso that its contribution may not exceed 50% of total 1957 contributions. This will mean that other governments must give $600,000 more than was needed for matching the U.S. contribution in 1956. It is suggested that Canada's contribution to UNICEF in 1957 be increased to $750,000 (this would be $100,000 more than our last year's gift). This amount would represent about 1/14 of the United States pledge of $10 million.

United Nations Refugee Fund (UNREF)

11. Since the end of the Second World War, the number of refugees in Europe (a refugee is defined as a person who has left the country of his normal residence because of fear of persecution) has been reduced, either by emigration or re-establishment, from 2.2 million persons to approximately 300,000 persons. Most of these 300,000 refugees are in Austria, Germany, Greece and Italy. About 70,000 of them are still living miserably in refugee camps, and some of these are sick, aged or physically handicapped persons. In addition, about 14,000 refugees of European origin in China come under the High Commissioner's mandate.

12. The General Assembly of the United Nations in 1954 authorized the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to undertake a more comprehensive programme over a four-year period (1955-58) to achieve a permanent solution to the refugee problem, while continuing to provide some emergency aid in destitute and problem cases. The United Nations General Assembly commended this 1955-58 refugee programme, and asked governments to support it. In the last few weeks NATO has also considered the plight of refugees in Europe, and may be requesting NATO members to take an increased interest in the programme and give more aid to try to solve this festering European problem.

13. UNREF's target budget for 1956 is $4.4 million (for 1955 it was $4.2 million, and for the whole four years it is $16 million). There was a shortfall of $1.6 million in meeting the 1955 target figure and the Secretariat of UNREF managed to overcome some of this shortfall in government contributions by getting a non-governmental group in Europe to raise $1 million for refugees. (The Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees was awarded in 1955 one of the Nobel Peace Prizes.) It is expected that there will be an even greater shortfall in meeting the 1956 target budget, although the Secretariat of UNREF is again trying very hard to obtain voluntary donations from non-governmental sources.

14. Canada contributed $125,000 to UNREF in 1955 and the same amount in 1956. Pledges or contributions from some other countries were: France, $131,000; Denmark, $72,000; Belgium, $160,000; The Netherlands, $360,000; Sweden, $116,000; U.K., $280,000; U.S. $1 million.

15. In deciding on Canada's contribution for 1957, it would be appropriate to increase Canada's contribution to $200,000 because of the following reasons: (1) UNREF in 1955 began a broader and more comprehensive programme; (2) many of the refugees would like to emigrate to Canada, but are not acceptable as immigrants; since there is continuing pressure on North America to take some of these refugees (the United States deflects some of this pressure by making very large grants to the operational budget of the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration and supporting with large amounts of money the U.S. Escapee Programme), it would be fitting, since Canada pays nothing to ICEM's operational budget, for Canada to make a larger contribution to UNREF's programme; (3) it is becoming increasingly evident that the refugee problem can only be overcome by placing more emphasis on schemes for economic integration of refugees in their present countries of residence; (a) the bulk of the refugees which are the concern of the High Commissioner are located in Europe, and therefore the main burden of financing the programme falls on western European countries, U.S.A. and Canada; (5) the High Commissioner for Refugees needs more money for emergency aid for refugees since those still living in camps are getting older, some are losing their work skills, and some their will power; and (6) the U.S.S.R. is increasing its efforts to induce refugees who become discouraged to return to their country of origin and if these efforts succeed, the U.S.S.R. will achieve an important objective for communist propaganda. When making this larger contribution to UNREF we should strongly urge other members of the United Nations as well as the non-governmental agencies which are associated with ECOSOC to increase their aid so that the High Commissioner's four-year target can be met.

United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA)

16. The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) was established by the United Nations in December 1949. It was intended to provide relief and temporary employment for some 950,000 Arab refugees who had fled their homes in Palestine during the hostilities following the establishment of Israel, until such time as they might exercise the choice between repatriation or resettlement with compensation. In January 1952 the Assembly approved a three-year programme of relief and rehabilitation which envisaged the expenditure of $50 million for relief and $200 million for "reintegration". However, the hope that the refugee problem could be solved in three years, through the repatriation of some, and the compensation of others, along with their integration into the economies of the areas where they had taken refuge, did not materialize. Far from being able to transfer funds from relief to rehabilitation as previously authorized, the Agency had to be empowered at the seventh and eighth Assemblies to do the contrary. And on December 4, 1954, the General Assembly of the United Nations extended the mandate of the Agency for five years, that is, up to June 30, 1960.

17. That the dimensions of the problem are not diminishing is shown by the Director's 1956-57 budget in which he makes provision for relief services for 910,000 refugees and states that the total is expected to rise by over 30,000 by the end of the period. Of the total, about half are children under 15. Of the $200 million fund for rehabilitation authorized in January 1952 (not all of which has yet been pledged) up to June 30, 1956, about $30 million had been spent, half on educational measures which had not been given so important a place in the original scheme. Large expenditures on resettlement projects have not yet been made but it is expected that during the next budgetary period over $75 million will be either spent or committed for two major projects. (The total rehabilitation budget for the period is $102 million.) In practice, the annual contributions have been used for the relief programme and the rehabilitation fund has been dwindling while the costs have enlarged. When the expected major expenditures are made, it will be desirable for Canada as one of the important supporters of UNRWA to consider whether a contribution earmarked for rehabilitation should be made.

18. The cost of maintenance of the refugees at a subsistence level has been about $27 per capita per year. The Arab Governments who have refugees within their borders have urged that efforts be made to increase and improve all the Agency's services to the refugees. Those governments have contributed, partly in cash and partly in services and direct contributions to the refugees, substantial amounts having regard to their resources. In the year 1954-55 such contributions on the part of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria were reported by those governments as being valued in excess of $2.5 million.

19. In the past the Canadian Government has contributed to the Palestine Refugee programmes of UNRWA and its predecessor (the United Nations Relief for Palestine Refugees) a total of $4,570,929 and for the past three years has contributed $500,000 annually. (Last year it was provided that $300,000 of the Canadian contribution should be used for the purchase of Canadian wheat. At the request of the UNRWA Director the credit was used for flour under arrangements worked out with the Department of Trade and Commerce.) Canada voted in favour of the establishment of the Agency and in favour of the extension of its mandate to 1960. Canada has been the fourth largest contributor among the non-Arab states. The other major contributors and their approximate totals are:

United States	$153.7 million ($16.7 million for 1955-56)
United Kingdom	42.5 million ($ 4.5 million for 1955-56)
France	11.5 million (511,428 for 1955-56)
Australia	1.6 million (112,500 for 1955-56)
New Zealand	1.1 million (140,000 for 1955-56)

20. At the present time, because of the administrative problems involved under a fiscal year ending June 30, the Agency proposes to change its fiscal year to correspond to the calendar year. The effect of this will be to extend the Agency's present budgetary period from twelve to eighteen months, i.e. 1 July 1956 to 31 December, 1957.

21. The refugee issue has become one of the most important political factors in the Palestine problem. The maintenance of the refugees on a reasonably satisfactory basis is an essential element in the maintenance of peace and stability in the Middle East. The final solution of the refugee problem remains bound up with such political issues as the definition of the borders of Israel and the recognition on part of the Arab States of Israel's right to existence. The refugees are reluctant to take any action which might prejudice their "right" to repatriation or compensation. However, there is some possibility that the proposal for an international loan to Israel to enable her to pay compensation may yet provide the key to a partial solution since Israel admits the obligation. Developments along these lines together with the extension of the areas of cultivable land through a more rational use of water in the Yarmuk-Jordan Valley and Sinai would enable a substantial resettlement programme to go forward. Among the considerations which impede Israel from approaching a refugee settlement separately is the fact that Israel has relatively few bargaining counters and the compensation matter is an important one. Israel may therefore be expected to make specific proposals only in return for a substantial move on the part of the Arabs. At the present there are few indications that the Arabs in the near future will be prepared to make the key concession, which is the recognition of the State of Israel, or another important conciliatory action. There is therefore little hope that the refugee problem will not be a continuing charge for some years.

22. A reasonably generous annual contribution is one of the few direct measures which Canada can take to assist in maintaining some measure of peace in the Middle East. The cessation or even the reduction of the Canadian contribution, particularly in the present circumstances, could hardly fail to have adverse repercussions since Canada is widely regarded in that part of the world as one of the wealthier members of the international community.

23. Despite the increase in UNRWA's relief budget, it is not recommended that Canada's annual rate of contribution be raised since the main factor in the increase is an expected rise in commodity prices rather than an enlarged programme. It is suggested that Canada should continue its support of UNRWA at the annual rate followed for the past three years, i.e. $500,000, which in the event of the extension of UNRWA's budgetary period would mean $750,000, and that a suitable proportion of Canada's contribution should be in Canadian commodities, for example wheat or flour.

IT IS THEREFORE RECOMMENDED:

ETAP

(1) that authorization be given to announce the Government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution of $2 million to the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for 1957, and

(2) that the Canadian Government undertake, subject to the annual voting of funds by Parliament, to make a contribution of at least a similar order of magnitude to the 1958 and 1959 programmes, on the condition that the programme continues to receive the broad support of other United Nations member countries.

UNICEF

(3) that authorization be given to announce the Government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution of $750,000 to the United Nations Children's Fund for 1957;

(4) that authorization be given to announce the Government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution of $200,000 to the United Nations Refugee Fund for 1957; and that other countries and agencies be urged to increase their assistance to UNRWA so that the High Commissioner's programme can be fulfilled.

UNRWA

(5) that authorization be given to announce the Government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees at the annual rate of $500,000 for its financial period 1956-57 ($750,000 in the event that extension to 18 months of its next fiscal period is approved);

(6) that the UNRWA authorities be encouraged to use these funds as far as possible for the procurement in Canada of commodities, for example wheat or flour, required by the Agency for its operation and

(7) that the question of a Canadian contribution to the rehabilitation programme of UNRWA be deferred.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO U.N. EXTRA-BUDGETARY FUNDS

You may remember that when this was discussed in Cabinet last week [November 1] Mr. Harris read a memorandum from his officials saying that the figures in our memorandum were different from those which he had been shown by his officials, and as a result you agreed to postpone the discussion on this item.

On hearing of this incident Mr. Plumptre made enquiries as to what figures were involved; he discovered that Mr. Harris' secretary had given him in error our memorandum of last year on the same subject. Mr. Plumptre wanted us to know that there had been no misunderstanding on their part and that he was fully satisfied that we have not changed the figures which we had discussed with Department of Finance officials.

As you know, our submission to Cabinet was approved with only one change, i.e. UNICEF was reduced to $650,000 (the amount we gave in 1956) while we had recommended that our contribution be $750,000 for 1957.

I also attach Mr. Harris' letter† to you of November 5 in which he tells you of his regret about the misunderstanding concerning the figures at the November 3 Cabinet meeting.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME — 1956-57

1. Cabinet approval was given on December 7, 1955,¹ to certain matters regarding future policy and the continuance of the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme, but at a reduced level, with increasing emphasis on content, which, while fitting in to the Canadian defence and production pattern, will be of important assistance to the urgent needs in Europe.

2. During the discussion, the suggested level of the 1956-57 programme emerged and provision has been made in the Department of National Defence Estimates for 1956-57 for a Mutual Aid Programme of $143 million.

3. The attached detailed programme for 1956-57 provides for:

(a) the estimated carry-over on approved items of "direct production for Mutual Aid" and, under the same category, the amount of $2,985,000 to maintain minimum production of cannon powder, flashless cordite, rifle powder, composition "B" and 3"50 empty shell;

(b) the estimated Canadian contribution for Infrastructure, Military Budgets and carry-over on the production of crypto-materiel;

(c) new items of equipment acquired since March 31, 1950, planned for transfer by the Services (in addition to certain items carried over from previous programmes), are:

Sabre V Aircraft

Sabre II Aircraft — Spares support for third year, plus commitment for fourth year spares

4. The proposed offer of Sabre V Aircraft will include the initial range of spares, ground handling equipment, training aids, publications and technical representations.

5. Pursuant to Cabinet approval of December 7, 1955, the amounts programmed for "equipment acquired prior to March 31, 1950", for the Army $8,000,000 and Air Force $1,000,000, represent the estimated costs likely to be incurred in making this equipment available as Mutual Aid.

6. As there is considerable advantage in obtaining recommendations on allocation of equipment from the Standing Group early in the fiscal year, it is recommended that new offerings of Canadian Mutual Aid should be made at the earliest possible date, and that the programme for 1956-57 be approved on the basis referred to above and as detailed in the attached appendices.²

DISPOSAL BY RECIPIENT NATIONS OF EQUIPMENT RECEIVED FROM CANADA
AS MUTUAL AID

1. Canada does not retain title to equipment that it transfers to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as Mutual Aid. It is understood by the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization that this equipment is supplied under Canadian legislation designed to increase the individual and collective capacity of NATO to resist aggression.
2. From time to time, nations which have received Mutual Aid have informed Canada that the equipment is no longer needed for their Forces and have asked Canada's advice with respect to its disposal. Where the equipment was believed to have a continuing useful purpose within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Canada has suggested that the approval of the Standing Group be sought as to disposal arrangements. In other cases, Canada has agreed to the recipient nation's cannibalizing the equipment or disposing of it as scrap.

3. Canada is not in a position to police the use and disposal of equipment provided through its Mutual Aid Programme to its NATO partners. However, in view of the length of time that has elapsed from the commencement of Canada's Mutual Aid Programme and the fact that new and later types of equipment have become available in greater quantities, there are likely to be more frequent instances where equipment received from Canada as Mutual Aid is no longer needed by the recipient nation or in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as a whole.

4. In the circumstances, it would be useful if a general statement on the subject were made in the North Atlantic Council or advice given to the individual nations who have received Canadian Mutual Aid.

5. The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, provides that the Governor-in-Council may specify the terms and conditions, if any, that shall apply in respect of the transfer of Mutual Aid.

6. I therefore recommend that the Governor-in-Council be asked to establish terms and conditions with respect to the use and disposal of all material and supplies transferred under the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme, to provide as follows:

(a) that title to the defence equipment or supplies pass from Canada to the NATO nation to which it is transferred as Mutual Aid;

(b) that the nation receiving the defence equipment or supplies accept responsibility for use of the equipment so received to strengthen the capacity of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to deter or resist aggression;

(c) that, when the defence equipment or supplies are no longer needed for that purpose by the receiving nation, the receiving nation be responsible for consultation with the appropriate NATO authorities to determine if this equipment or supplies are needed by any other party to the North Atlantic Treaty, and, if so, to offer them to that nation under the same terms and conditions with respect to their use and disposal as they were supplied to that nation by Canada;

(d) that, if the defence equipment or supplies are not needed by any member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for use in the defence of the NATO area, the receiving nation be responsible for rendering them unusable as military equipment prior to their disposal.

7. Occasions may arise where friendly nations outside the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would wish to acquire defence equipment and supplies available for disposal which would be prohibited by the above terms and conditions. It is believed that, should such a situation arise, the receiving nation would consult Canada and no reference need be made to this possibility in the general terms and conditions. If Canada were sympathetic to disposal of the material as warlike stores outside the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, it would be necessary to request the passing of an Order-in-Council to authorize an exception to the general terms and conditions.⁴

1. The Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions have examined a mutual aid programme for 1957-58 totalling $130,000,000, based on the application of the principles applied in determining the 1956-57 programme, as set out in the attached appendices.

2. The proposed programme provides for:

(a) the estimated cost of the aircrew training programme, based on the gradual reduction of trainee intake with the ending of the three-year commitment for NATO aircrew training, together with the estimated costs of training aircrew for Norway, Holland and Denmark, less the token payments that will be made by these countries for this training. No cost is included for training of German pilots as the extra costs in this connection will be met by payments from Germany;

(b) carryover on present items of direct production for mutual aid. No provision has been made for new programme;

(c) continued payment of freight on shipments to Turkey;

(d) estimated contributions for infrastructure and military budgets;

(e) equipment that can be made available from stocks of the Canadian services.

3. The Panel noted that during the examination of the Canadian Annual Review, emphasis was placed on the need by certain European countries for naval ships and high performance aircraft. Assistance of this type has therefore been included in the programme, consisting of four minesweepers, ten Bangor coastal escort vessels, twenty-five T33 aircraft and a share of the costs of CF/100 aircraft should these aircraft be sold to Belgium. Additional offerings include 90 mm AA guns together with fire control equipment and 40 mm AA guns and ammunition.

4. It is recommended that the 1957-58 Estimates should provide for expenditures not exceeding $130,000,000 on mutual aid, based on the programme outlined on the attached appendices. As there is considerable advantage in obtaining recommendations on allocation of equipment early in the year, it is also recommended that new offerings should be made at the earliest possible date.⁵

FUTURE INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAMMES

On December 7, 1955,⁶ the Cabinet approved in principle a further three-year NATO Common Infrastructure Programme to cover the requirements for the years 1957 to 1959, inclusively.

⁶ Voir/See Volume 21, Document 157.

2. For the past few months the North Atlantic Council has had this programme under consideration. The Military Committee recommended a programme amounting to £325 millions; £265.8 millions for SACEUR and £57.2 millions for SACLANT. It was clear from the start that few countries, if any, would accept a programme of the magnitude proposed by the Military, due to:

(i) The backlog from previous programmes (£700 millions approved). Up to March 31, 1956, £300 millions had been spent and £430 millions authorized up to December 31, 1955;

(ii) The doubtful feasibility of adding further large commitments to already heavy backlog; and because

(iii) Large increases in national contributions to infrastructure could only be achieved at the expense of other military commitments of high priority.

3. After considerable discussion in the Council and a further review by the Military of their requirements, the Permanent Representatives, subject to the Reservations of the German, Italian and Norwegian Representatives, approved a four-year £225 million infrastructure programme to include £19 million for that part of the 1956 £38 million infrastructure programme in Germany not covered by that country's contribution and a contingency fund of 10%. The programme would be subject to annual review and revision as necessary in relation to its physical progress. It is expected that the German, Italian and Norwegian Representatives will withdraw their reservations and approve the programme. In telegram 1225 of August 3rd (a copy of which is enclosed) Mr. Wilgress has confirmed the size and details of the programme as approved by the Council and reports on the reservations held by Denmark, Germany and Italy.

4. The Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions had previously agreed that Mr. Wilgress could approve in principle, subject to Ministerial consideration, a three or four-year infrastructure programme of the magnitude of £225 million on the assumption that a satisfactory cost-sharing formula will be worked out.

5. The over-all programme as approved by the Council calls for a German contribution of 13.77% to the annual programmes. This would reduce Canada's share from the present 7.13% to 6.15% for each annual slice.

6. Mr. Wilgress has requested that he be informed of the Cabinet's decision on the programme approved by the Council before the Council meeting scheduled for August 14.

7. This Department is recommending to its Minister that he concur with Mr. Harris and Mr. Campney in the view that the Cabinet give favourable consideration to the four-year £225 million NATO Common Infrastructure Programme approved by the North Atlantic Council.

FUTURE INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAMME

We confirm that the future infrastructure programme approved by Council (subject to German, Italian and Norwegian reservations) is of the magnitude of £225 million spread over four years subject to annual review and revisions as necessary in relation to its physical progress. The £225 million will include £19 million of the £38 million 1956 German infrastructure programme and 10 percent will be set aside as a contingency fund. The German contribution to each annual slice will be 13.77 percent.

2. On the question of cost sharing, as we reported in our telegram 1206 of July 31,† we made a statement in Council that we would not contribute more to the future infrastructure programme than our present percentage proportionately reduced by the German contribution, that is 6.15 percent. The USA and the UK took the same position. As you know, the Danish representative had earlier stated that his government could only agree to contribute £4 million to the future infrastructure programme. The Italian representative reiterated his statement made previously in Council that the Italian government would not contribute more than £6 million to the future programme. Other representatives indicated in agreeing to the programme outlined in paragraph 1 above that they did so on condition that their respective rates of contribution to the future programme would not be increased relative to their present rates.

3. Council took note of all these statements on the cost-sharing formula without commitment. However we consider the point has now been made that should the discussions on cost sharing not reach a satisfactory conclusion the overall size of the programme will have to be reexamined but the fact remains that aside from the German contribution the question of the cost-sharing formula has not been decided but has been left open for future discussion which presumably will proceed on the basis of the statements outlined in paragraph 2 above.

4. Concerning the positions of the delegations mentioned in paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference, these are as follows:

(a) Denmark: They have served notice that they will not be willing to contribute more than £4 million to the future programme for the reasons outlined in our telegram 1163 of July 23.† Our USA colleagues are of the opinion that when the cost sharing discussions start Denmark is likely to prove amenable to persuasion to change their position. However, whether this is correct or not is very difficult to say.

(b) Germany: The German reservation was placed, as you assumed, pending authority from Bonn to accept the UK proposal. The German Delegation tells us that they feel that Bonn will accept the UK proposal if all other members accept it.

(c) Italy: From conversations with the Italian Delegation we gather that the Italian position is not yet clear. They maintain they can only afford a contribution of £6 million and that they would have preferred an overall total for the programme which would have made this sum of £6 million a more reasonable percentage on the part of Italy. However, the Delegation realizes the difficulty of holding out against the majority opinion for a £225 million programme and they are awaiting instructions from Rome.

(d) Norway: The Norwegian Delegation tells us that they proposed a percentage of 16 percent for Germany to increase the German percentage as much as possible towards a more reasonable figure. However, they feel that their authorities will not insist on the 16 percent and are confident that they will be able to lift their reservation.

FUTURE INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAMME

Cabinet Defence Committee agreed today, August 13 that, subject to considerations mentioned below, Canadian approval be given to a £225 million pound common infrastructure programme spread over four years, including a ten percent contingency fund.

2. Considerations brought to attention of Cabinet Defence Committee were as follows:

(a) Of the 38 million pounds required for the 1956 German programme, 19 million pounds would be provided by the German government, the remaining 19 million to be included in the £225 million ceiling.

(b) The German contribution to future infrastructure programmes will be 31 millions, that is 13.77% of the annual programmes, reducing Canada's share from the present 7.13% to 6.15% for each annual slice.

(c) The above proposals leave open for future consideration the question of a cost sharing formula, except for the German contribution, and Canadian acceptance of these proposals is conditioned by the fact that Canada will not consider contributing to the future programme beyond our present percentage reduced proportionally by the German contribution.

(d) Cabinet approval will be sought on any cost sharing formula which may ultimately be recommended.

INFRASTRUCTURE — COST-SHARING

The above subject was placed on Council agenda for this morning's meeting with the notation "oral statement by the Chairman". In introducing the subject, Lord Ismay stated that it was his intention to ask Council to consider the question of procedure. He pointed out that a new agreed formula was needed before the end of November and suggested that discussions should be initiated at once in view of possible delays and difficulties. It was his view that the simplest method of approaching the problem would be to accept the German contribution as a basis and after deducting this from the total agreed programme, to divide the balance proportionately among member countries. Following these remarks, Lord Ismay invited representatives to indicate their views as to the acceptability of this method of procedure.

2. The USA representative stated he understood the Chairman to mean that the present percentage contributions of all countries would be proportionately reduced after account had been taken of the German contribution. In agreeing to this procedure he observed that the suggestion reflected his government's position as previously stated. Representatives of the following additional countries also agreed with the proposed procedure: Portugal, Norway, Netherlands and Canada. Representatives of the following countries gave a qualified acceptance:

Luxembourg — stated that while the outcome of the proposal was not acceptable, if the majority accepted he would inform his authorities;

France — agreed to take the suggested procedure as a starting point but stated that with a smaller proportion of the future infrastructure program to be executed in France, his authorities felt a further reduction in their contribution would be equitable;

Belgium — would agree to the proposed procedure if agreed to by all.

However, in the event that the cost-sharing basis was to be rediscussed, he would ask for a review of his government's contribution relative to other Benelux countries; other representatives as follows were more negative:

Turkey — pointed out that in Slices IV(b)-VII, when twenty per cent of the infrastructure work was in his country, their contribution was 2.03 percent. In view of the fact that under future programs only fourteen percent of the work was to be done in Turkey, his government was prepared to pay 1.5 percent. However, he finally agreed to ask his authorities to consider further the proposed procedure following the Chairman's remarks pointing out that reductions granted to one member must inevitably mean that some other member's contribution would have to be increased.

Italy — in no position to accept the proposed method in the absence of instructions.

Greece — while no instructions, the representative observed his position was probably like that of Italy.

Denmark — made a statement to the effect that his government intended to ask for a revised contribution.

3. The German representative confirmed acceptance of their previously stated agreement to a contribution of £50,000,000. Following this round of statements the Norwegian representative humourously observed that if contributions were to be revised his government would no doubt consider itself one of fifteen exceptions which wanted a reduction.

4. Council agreed that representatives should report the foregoing statements of position to their governments and the Chairman stressed the fact that in the event that the proposed procedure was not accepted, it would be necessary to consider setting up some subordinate committee to develop a new formula. He stated that any such new formula would not be likely to differ greatly from the one which would result from his proposal. We would appreciate receiving any instructions or comments you may care to make before September 26 when Council will further consider the question of procedure.

INFRASTRUCTURE — COST-SHARING

1. It seems clear to us that the procedure suggested by Lord Ismay is the only acceptable solution to the cost-sharing problem. The last agreement on cost-sharing was reached only after all countries agreed to compromise in the interest of the Alliance. Each country ended by accepting to pay more than what it thought was its just share, and as every country has its own particular problems we fail to see how this balance of compromise can be changed without imposing further strains on the Alliance. We feel that our position in the present balance is already stretched to the extent that it is inequitable; we would not wish to compromise any further. Moreover, it appears from your reports of the discussions in Council that if the United States contribution is revised, it will be in a downward direction. In these circumstances we believe that considerations of equity would necessitate a further reduction in our contribution. It should be made clear to the Greek, Danish, Italian and Turkish Delegation that the upsetting of the present balance would seriously compromise not only the common infrastructure programme but also add to the difficulties facing the Alliance.

2. We are of the opinion that the problems or difficulties mentioned by the four dissenting countries do not warrant re-opening the cost-sharing negotiations. Firstly, in the case of Greece we consider that a contribution of 0.87% is already below her capacity to pay relative to her European partners. In explaining the position taken by his government, the Greek representative mentioned that the proposed decrease would be temporary; since expenditures under the new programme will not commence until about two years, the present temporary period should be over by then. The Greek authorities should also bear in mind the fact that their host country charges under Slices IV(a) to VII have been alleviated by recent decisions of the Council (e.g., local utilities, diversions); should they remain adamant in their present position, it is possible that Council might be reluctant to approve the application of its decisions on local utilities, etc. to future programmes. This could prove more expensive to Greece than a difference of 0.27% in her contribution.

3. The position taken by Italy was to be expected. Indeed you will recall that in the last cost-sharing negotiations Italy finally agreed to compromise after having obtained some assurance from SHAPE that Slices V to VII would include substantial works in Italy. As a result of the new posture approved by Council the relation between total works for Italy and total Italian contributions to infrastructure has been upset. The Italian government is probably trying to re-establish this relation. We could not agree that this national consideration warrants re-opening the cost-sharing negotiations. The present Italian contribution is not only very much out of line with her user interests, but also below her capacity to pay relative to her European partners. Furthermore, under Slices III to VII total infrastructure works in Italy amount to about £80 million while total contributions by Italy to these programmes are estimated at approximately £38 million. If member countries' contributions to common infrastructure had so far been based on the geographical distribution of infrastructure works, Italy's contribution would have been considerably higher under all previous cost-sharing agreements.

4. In regard to the position taken by Denmark we realize that it stems to a large extent from the domestic political situation in that country. We believe, however, that there are important considerations offsetting this factor. Firstly, the overall Danish defence effort is small relative to that of the other countries of the Alliance. Secondly, Denmark's capacity to pay relative to her European allies does not justify the proposed reduction in her contribution. Finally, the favourable position of Denmark under Slice III more than offsets her net contributions to subsequent programmes.

5. As for Turkey, we are inclined to question the balance of payments arguments put forward by the Turkish representative. In any event the amount of foreign exchange involved is only marginal, representing a very small element in the overall balance of payments. Under Slices IV(a) to VII works in Turkey amount to about £76 million while Turkish contributions to these programmes is approximately £9 million. Because of the high U.S. and Canadian contributions, NATO common infrastructure provides Turkey with appreciable sums of dollars.⁷

109TH MEETING OF CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE APRIL 19, 1956

ITEM III: REDUCTION OF NATO AIRCREW TRAINING

At a meeting of the Standing Group last fall, General Foulkes stated that NATO aircrew training under the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme would come to an end with the intake year 1957-58. This was substantially in line with statements made by Mr. Campney in the House of Commons on July 14, 1955, and at the NATO Ministerial Meeting last December.⁸ These declarations were not based on a Cabinet decision to terminate the aircrew training programme, however, but rather on the absence of Cabinet authority at present for its continuation after 1957.

2. At its meeting, the Chiefs of Staff Committee considered a draft Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee in which the need for funds to finance the additional regular force air defence squadrons and bases was related in part to the proposed reduction or termination of the aircrew training programme after 1957. Our departmental representative at the meeting pointed out that, while there might be valid reasons for reducing or terminating the programme, the proposal to do so was of sufficient importance to require consideration, on its merits, in a separate submission to the Cabinet Defence Committee. As a result, the attached Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee was prepared in the Department of National Defence.

3. The Memorandum recommends that approval in principal be given to terminating the present Canadian NATO air training scheme upon completion of the 1957-58 period. I understand that the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, is anxious to obtain this decision now so that he may announce it at the meeting of the NATO Military Committee in Paris on April 27. General Foulkes is due to leave Ottawa for Europe on April 21.

4. The second recommendation is that approval be given to an examination with the military authorities of Norway, Denmark and The Netherlands, of arrangements to train a limited number of their aircrew in Canada after 1957.

5. I would be reluctant to recommend that you support these recommendations at this stage. In the first place, the problem has been considered only from a military standpoint. There has been no opportunity for it to be considered by an appropriate inter-departmental committee, such as the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, or even for adequate study of it by the interested civil departments. As I understand that officials of the Department of Finance support this view, Mr. Harris may possibly say something along these lines at the meeting.

6. In the second place, there has been no adequate exploration of the possible repercussions through our missions in the countries concerned. Without such exploration, it is difficult for this Department to judge accurately what the political effects of a reduction of the Canadian contribution to the NATO aircrew training programme might be, either on the Alliance as a whole, or on those NATO members who have been relying on Canadian facilities to give their future pilots the type of comprehensive training required by NATO standards. As regards the impact on the Alliance as a whole, it would seem to be most desirable, where possible, to adhere to the principle that major decisions affecting the Alliance should not be irrevocably taken and announced unilaterally, but that there should first be an opportunity for consultation between Members through appropriate channels. As regards the effect on individual members, it would be difficult to accept, without exploration of the political implications, the statement that only Norway, Denmark, and possibly The Netherlands, will need training facilities in Canada after 1957. It is obvious, for example, that great care should be exercised not to create unnecessary friction with Greece at this time, in view of the uncertainties of that country's position in the Alliance. (As it happens, we received last week from our Ambassador in Athens a telegram† reporting on a request by the Greek Chief of Air Staff for information on whether vacancies will be offered to Greece in the 1957-58 Canadian aircrew training programme and, if so, how many. Mr. MacDermot gave us to understand that the Chief of the Air Staff intended in future to take up all available places for NATO aircrew training offered by Canada.) The possible susceptibilities of the Turkish authorities should also be examined carefully.

7. It occurs to me that there might be some advantage in seeking from SACEUR a formal statement of his views on the most desirable future arrangements from the point of view of the Alliance as a whole, which could be referred to in discussions with the various national authorities concerned. The present memorandum includes as an appendix an estimate by SHAPE of the air training requirements after 1956, but on future arrangements for meeting these requirements it quotes only an informal report by General Gruenther, which was presumably intended for Canadian eyes only.

8. In the light of these considerations, I recommend that consideration should be given to deferring a decision on this question to enable a submission to be put forward following appropriate consideration by all departments concerned. It is possible that the conclusions of such a submission would not differ greatly from those of the present memorandum, but at least all relevant considerations, including the impact of such a decision on our relations with the countries of NATO, would have been taken into account. In addition, I think there should be consultation, through both political and military channels, with the authorities of all interested Governments, concerning their needs for the training of aircrew after 1957.

9. Alternatively, if it is felt that a decision should be taken now, to enable General Foulkes to make a statement to the Military Committee, I suggest that this decision should be to the effect that the NATO authorities be informed officially that the Canadian Government has decided to terminate the present aircrew training programme with the 1957-58 intake year, but that the Canadian authorities are anxious to consult with the authorities of the interested Governments, concerning their needs for the training of aircrew after 1957.

REDUCTION OF NATO AIRCREW TRAINING

Introduction

1. The NATO air training agreement, covering a three year period, ends with the intake year 1957-58. This training plan had for its aim the initial manning of the front line aircraft of the countries concerned and it would appear that this goal will be reached by 1957. Appendix "A"† indicates SHAPE's estimate of this position.

2. Canada has played a major role in this achievement and by 1957 will have trained sufficient pilots to man 80% of the operational forces assigned to SACEUR. The NATO Council has now agreed that maintenance of force goal is a national responsibility, and it would appear that aircrew training to meet attrition falls into this category.

3. This matter has been discussed informally with the Supreme Allied Commander, and General Gruenther reports as follows:

(a) "upon completion of the 1956-57 training programme, Turkey, Greece, Italy, France, Belgium, and Portugal will be manned at acceptable aircrew levels. In addition these countries have in being indigenous training programmes which are capable of replacing their aircrew attrition; and

(b) at the same time period, Norway, Denmark, and Holland will be manned at acceptable aircrew levels, but there will be a continuing requirement for replacement of attrition losses. Neither Norway nor Denmark have established indigenous training programmes. Holland possesses an indigenous training programme, but it is apparent that the aircrew production will not meet all attrition requirements. Based on the above there is a continued long range requirement for training to support attrition replacement for Norway and Denmark and for overcoming the annual deficit forecast for Holland. The approximate magnitude of these annual deficits are Norway — 80; Denmark — 60; Holland — 30.

(c) Because of the adverse weather conditions in the northern countries and the small number of students involved, it is not considered feasible to establish indigenous air training facilities in the Scandinavian countries. Such action would be disproportionately expensive for the return achieved and could only be accomplished at the expense of some other military activity of importance to the NATO defence effort. The continuance of training in North America appears to be the most satisfactory solution. Even if Canada is unable to continue the present arrangements on a reduced scale, I would recommend the continuation of training in North America on the basis of separate bilateral arrangements."

4. The Chiefs of Staff have given this entire matter careful study and consider that it would be advisable not to renew the existing Canadian NATO air training scheme on the completion of the 1957-58 period and to investigate, instead, the possibilities of making bilateral arrangements with Norway, Denmark and perhaps Holland for a limited number of students who could be fitted into the RCAF air training system without the requirement to maintain additional and special facilities for this purpose. To assist NATO countries to increase their air training self-sufficiency, consideration should also be given to the preparation of further mutual aid programmes. Such aid programmes might include the provision of Harvard trainer aircraft which will become surplus as a result of curtailment of training in Canada, and the possible provision of advanced T33 jet trainers for those countries required to operate advanced flying units.

Saving

5. The acceptance of this proposal to reduce NATO aircrew training in Canada will result in a manpower saving of about 495 officers, 1870 airmen, 580 civilians, and an annual financial saving of about $31,000,000 comprised of personnel and aircraft operating costs. These savings are urgently required to apply against the costs and manpower requirements for the RCAF in its air defence build-up in Canada.

Recommendations

6. The Chiefs of Staff recommend, and I concur, that approval in principle be given to:

(a) terminate the present Canadian NATO air training scheme upon completion of the 1957-58 period;

(b) investigate with the military authorities of Norway, Denmark and Holland arrangements to train a limited number of aircrew who can be accommodated in the RCAF air training system without involving additional facilities.

 II. ADDITIONAL REGULAR FORCE AIR DEFENCE SQUADRONS AND BASES; REDUCTION OF NATO AIRCREW TRAINING
 ...

As regards the question of NATO aircrew training, the original agreement would end with the intake year of 1957-58. However, the plan, which had as its aim the initial manning of the front-line aircraft of the countries concerned, would appear to have reached its goal by 1957. Canada would, by that time, have trained sufficient pilots to man 80% of the operational forces assigned to SACEUR. The NATO Council had agreed that maintenance of force goals was a national responsibility and it would appear that aircrew training to meet attrition fell into this category. SACEUR felt that, with the exception of a small requirement for Norway, Denmark and Holland, the other countries which had benefited from the Canadian programme were capable of replacing their aircrew attrition. The Chiefs of Staff considered it would be inadvisable to renew the existing Canadian-NATO aircrew training scheme on the completion of the 1957-58 period and thought instead that possibilities should be investigated of making other arrangements with Norway, Denmark and perhaps Holland for a limited number of students who could be fitted into the R.C.A.F. training system without the requirement for special facilities. They also felt that consideration might be given to the preparation of further mutual aid programmes to assist NATO countries to increase their air training self-sufficiency. Such programmes might include Harvard and T33 jet trainers which would become surplus as a result of curtailment of training in Canada. The proposal would result in a manpower saving of about 495 officers, 1870 airmen and 580 civilians, and an annual financial saving of about $31 million. These savings were urgently required to apply against the costs of the air defence build-up in Canada. He recommended that the Canadian NATO air training scheme be terminated upon completion of the 1957-58 period and that investigations be made with a view to training a limited number of Norwegian, Danish and Dutch personnel in Canada without involving additional facilities.

Explanatory memoranda had been circulated.

(Minister's memoranda, April 16, 1956 — Documents D2-56 and D3-56†).

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he had no desire to question the necessity for new squadrons in Canada but to meet the added costs by the abandonment of mutual aid aircrew training might be difficult and embarrassing. There were political considerations in the proposal which should be taken into account and he hoped that the proposal to reduce mutual aid in this manner to find some of the money for increased facilities at home would not be approved until he had further time to study the matter. This was another stage in the dilemma of balancing continental and European commitments. If we could not undertake both, it might well be that we would have to withdraw from Europe, but this should be done gradually and with the minimum political disadvantages. He would not like to see a decision to reduce NATO aircrew training taken until its implications for NATO had been fully considered. For example, the Cyprus question would probably be discussed at the next NATO Council meeting in a few days' time and at this very moment Greece had requested, through our Ambassador in Athens, a number of vacancies in the air training programme. He was not arguing against the proposition as such, but before a decision was taken he wanted to "prepare the way" with the other countries involved.

7. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The programme had been a successful one but the job had in fact been done. Certain countries who had training facilities had reduced them while continuing to send personnel to Canada just because ours were available. Furthermore, not all the vacancies were being filled and the cost of the plan was exceedingly high. Except in the case of Norway and Denmark and, to a lesser extent, Holland, the continuation of training of aircrew for other NATO countries did not now seem necessary.

(c) If mutual aid were to be continued the programme would be much more useful if the money were spent on aircraft and equipment to be transferred abroad rather than on continuation of the aircrew training programme.

8. The Committee deferred decision on the proposals to provide additional Regular Air Force defence squadrons and bases and to reduce the NATO aircrew training programme pending further examination interdepartmentally of their implications and the conclusion of the NATO Ministerial Council meetings being held in Paris next month.

REDUCTION OF NATO AIR CREW TRAINING

Following for Macdonnell from Léger: After Foulkes had given background to the Heads of Missions⁹ meeting of National Defence thinking on the problem (based on their memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee of April 19) the Minister said that no doubt government would be willing to accept the recommendation to reduce air crew training but what was at issue was how best to do it so as to minimize undesirable political reactions among our allies.

2. Comment from Heads of Missions brought out that reactions would be of three main kinds:

(a) Political impact on solidarity of NATO — this was particularly an important consideration in the case of Greece at a time when its NATO ties are a matter of political controversy;

(b) Financial, particularly possible impact on foreign exchange positions in the case of United Kingdom and Turkey;

(c) Psychological in that the air crew training, particularly in the Scandinavian countries and in Holland, represented the most publicized and popular form of Canadian mutual aid.

3. In summing up the discussion the Minister emphasized that further consideration would have to be given both to the best way of putting this decision to our NATO allies and explaining it; for instance, it would have to be stressed that Canada had only reached a decision because of advice from SACEUR that air training crew requirements in Canada (apart from Norway, The Netherlands and Denmark) had been reduced and that Canadian resources involved were more required for the defence of the nuclear deterrent which was a NATO common interest. As to the way it might be presented, it might initially be put to the next meeting of the NATO Military Committee and subsequently discussed in the Atlantic Council to avoid any impression of Canada taking a unilateral decision. It might also be made clear that Canada was willing to discuss the possibility of some bilateral air crew training arrangement with any NATO country where special difficulties arose, even in addition to those countries mentioned in National Defence memorandum of April 20.

4. I suggest that these points should be given attention by divisions concerned preparatory to having the whole matter considered at meeting of the Panel on Economic Aspects of the Defence possibly next week.

Dear General Foulkes,

I should like to refer to our talks in London about the proposed reduction in the NATO air training programme.

2. You will recall that at that time Mr. Pearson expressed the view that, if this form of Canadian mutual aid to our NATO allies is to be reduced, very careful consideration would have to be given as to the best means of putting this decision to our allies and of explaining it. In particular, the Minister thought that it should not be presented as a unilateral decision but as a result of consultation in the Military Committee and in the Council. He also expressed the view that it should be explained that this decision follows as a result of a review of air training requirements by SACEUR and is necessitated by the prior requirements of the use of Canadian resources in the defence of the nuclear deterrent located in North America which is of NATO common interest. It was further the Minister's view that we should make it clear to our allies that we are willing to consider any special case of hardship which may arise from the reduction of the air training programme and try to make provision for it within the RCAF air training programme.

3. You will recall that the Cabinet Defence Committee, when they considered this matter, postponed decision pending further examination of its implications inter-departmentally. There are of course considerable financial implications in addition to the diplomatic and political implications referred to above. For instance, it will need to be considered whether any special bilateral arrangements made for countries like Norway, Denmark and Holland would be financed out of mutual aid funds or not.

4. I propose, therefore, that this question should be considered at an early meeting of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence with a view to agreeing on recommendations to the Cabinet Defence Committee which would take into account the non-military as well as the military implications of this proposal. I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Bryce and to Mr. Taylor for their comments.

Dear Mr. Léger:

Thank you very much for your letter of 8 May, in which you suggest that the proposed reduction in NATO Air Training be referred to the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence.

Following our thorough discussion with the Heads of Missions in London, at which the general impression was that, provided arrangements were made for special cases such as Norway, Denmark and Holland, the main problem as far as the NATO nations were concerned was the manner of presentation to the various countries, I had felt that the question of principle was no longer in doubt. However, as there are perhaps some aspects of this problem which might be usefully discussed, such as whether the Norwegian, Dane and Dutch participation should be charged to mutual aid, it might be advisable to have a meeting of the Panel.

I have spoken to Mr. Bryce and expressed the view that we are quite prepared to have this matter placed before the Panel provided it can be considered without undue delay. I would suffer some embarrassment if a decision is not reached within a reasonable time as you are aware that I have already talked to most of the Chiefs of Staff concerned, and particularly with the United Kingdom Chiefs, whose main concern now is getting an early decision.

Since our meeting in London, I have been giving some thought to the type of approach and it appears to me that, if and when a Government decision is reached, we should agree on a draft message to be sent to the Heads of Posts and at the same time a similar message to be sent to Mr. Wilgress so that he can fully explain this matter to the Council. It was also my purpose to arrange an early meeting of the Military Representatives in Washington so that I could discuss this matter fully with them in order to avoid any chance of a misunderstanding of either our purpose or our ultimate aim.

I have asked Mr. Bryce to arrange for an early meeting of the Panel and further suggested that the problem of mutual aid of F86's to Germany and the question of requesting additional support costs from the Germans should be discussed at the same time. I hope that you will agree to putting this question of the F86's to Germany on the agenda.

Yours sincerely,

I. REDUCTION OF NATO AIRCREW TRAINING

1. The Chairman remarked that there had already been some discussion of this matter in the Cabinet Defence Committee and among officials. He invited the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff to review the situation for the Panel.

2. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff said that Canada had been engaged in aircrew training for NATO since 1949. For the first few years it had been provided on an annual basis, but in 1953 the Standing Group had asked Canada to accept a three-year commitment in order to assist member countries to attain their Lisbon goals, and the Government had agreed to do so. The last training class under the three-year commitment would begin in mid-1957, and end in mid-1958. At the end of this period, three courses would be open to Canada: the training program could be continued on its present scale, it could be continued on a reduced basis, or it could be terminated except for the admission of a certain number of candidates from NATO countries with special training problems, which could be fitted into the RCAF training program. The third course seemed preferable, because the program had, under present conditions, outlived its usefulness and the money, manpower and airfields involved could be used in the creation of three new operational squadrons urgently required for the defence of the deterrent in North America. Simply reducing the scale of the NATO aircrew training scheme would not be an acceptable solution, since heavy overhead costs and the commitment of RCAF training personnel would continue, and the airfields urgently needed for operational squadrons would still be unavailable. Termination of the scheme would also obviate the difficult problem of deciding which candidates should or should not be accepted into a reduced training scheme.

3. General Foulkes reported that the Standing Group had been consulted, and had agreed that if there was to be a reduction in our NATO effort, that reduction should take place in the field of aircrew training. SACEUR had agreed with this view, and had indicated that all countries except Norway, Denmark and Holland had an aircrew training system that provided them with attrition replacements. Neither Norway nor Denmark had the necessary training facilities, and it would be uneconomical for them to undertake such programs. Holland possessed an indigenous training establishment, but it was inadequate to meet her requirements for attrition replacement. SACEUR had urged that if Canada were going to terminate the NATO training program, bilateral arrangements should be made with these three countries to meet their special problems. General Foulkes said that the present scheme had not been designed to provide for attrition replacement, but the special problems of Norway, Denmark and Holland deserved consideration, and could be met within the regular RCAF training program.

4. The Deputy Minister of Finance asked what the saving to Canada would be if the present program were terminated.

5. General Foulkes replied that in addition to the benefits that would result from the freeing for RCAF use of airfields and training personnel, the financial saving would be about $36 million, or $31 million if attrition replacement for Norway, Denmark and Holland were still provided for at Canadian expense. The present cost was about $75,000 for each candidate trained, and the overhead charges were so great that there was a loss of $20,000 per candidate for spaces which nations left unfilled at the last moment. This wastage, and that occasioned by the return of national service personnel to civilian life after they had been trained, was very serious. In order to force nations to be more selective in choosing candidates, both quantitatively and qualitatively, it might be desirable in future to charge them a part of the training cost, say $10,000 per student. This would ensure that we would get more value for our money, and would prevent nations from indulging in such practices as offering the training in Canada as prizes, as Greece wished to do. If nations were also charged for vacancies left unfilled they would be forced to make a more realistic forecast of their space requirements.

6. Mr. Ignatieff said that External Affairs did not question the argument that the money and manpower now committed to NATO aircrew training could be better used elsewhere. External Affairs was, however, concerned about the political implications of the proposal. The position of the Greek government in relation to NATO was, for instance, very precarious, and there was a danger that any action by another member country that Greece could consider a snub might precipitate her withdrawal from the Alliance. In addition, Canada should avoid giving the impression that she was acting unilaterally in reducing her NATO commitments, because it would weaken the argument we had been making in the Council about the importance of political consultation. Recent unilateral actions by member countries, particularly by France, had been very damaging. The importance of political consultation within the Alliance was more obvious than ever as a result of the last meeting of the Ministerial Council. At the London meeting of Canadian Heads of Mission in Europe, it had generally been agreed that the termination of aircrew training in Canada would not create any very serious difficulties in European member countries, provided that special arrangements were made for Norway, Holland and Denmark. It had been pointed out, however, that the action contemplated would have to be explained very carefully to the countries concerned. It would be necessary to stress that Canada was only transferring her effort from one sector of the common NATO effort to another, and that the decision had been taken in the light of consultations with SACEUR.

(Document ED 2-56†, Notes on the London Meeting of Canadian Heads of Mission in Europe, and Document ED 3-56, letters between the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, dated May 8 and 9, 1956, had been circulated.)

7. General Foulkes said that he had prepared two alternative draft messages, one of which might be used to instruct Heads of Mission on how to explain the termination by Canada of the air training scheme, if Cabinet Defence Committee approved the proposal. Alternative "A" provided for a special additional paragraph to be included in the messages to Norway, Denmark and Holland, indicating that Canada recognized the special circumstances of those countries and was willing to make bilateral arrangements with them for the training of a limited number of pilots; alternative "B" would inform all countries involved that Canada was not renewing the program, but on the advice of SACEUR, had agreed to accept a limited number of potential pilots on a repayment basis from Norway, Denmark and Holland, which had special problems, if they could be fitted into the RCAF Air Training Plant.

(Draft message to Heads of Mission regarding the Expiration of the Canadian NATO Air Training Scheme, Proposals "A" and "B" were circulated, to be Documents ED 4-56† and ED 5-56,† respectively.)

8. In the course of further discussion, the following main points emerged:

(a) The United Kingdom might make an attempt to be included in the list of countries requiring special consideration, because they would have to re-open training schools if they could no longer have aircrew trained in Canada. The RAF was, however, aware of, and sympathetic with, the Canadian position, and although the Treasury might object to the financial strain, it could be argued that the U.K. did not have a very strong claim to special treatment. Only a relatively small portion of the RAF was directly under NATO Command, but the U.K. was, nevertheless, sending to Canada as trainees many personnel who ultimately served in other RAF units. Furthermore, U.K. training costs were lower than those in Canada. However, the provision of some training aircraft by Canada as mutual aid might ease the U.K. position. Whatever was done for the U.K. in the way of providing special treatment should arise as a result of U.K. initiative.

(b) Of the two draft messages, alternative "B" was preferable, because it provided a clearer and franker method of explaining the proposed Canadian decision to European member governments.

(c) It would be desirable for the Canadian position to be explained simultaneously in the NATO Council, in NATO capitals and in the Military Representatives Committee in Washington, if this could be arranged.

(d) The principle of charging nations for aircrew training in Canada, in order to prevent wastage and keep the number of applicants at a minimum number required, was a good one, but Canada should be prepared to negotiate the charge downwards for countries which might be faced with hardship. Some countries had a serious dollar shortage, and for this reason it might be considered whether Canada could accept local currency.

9. The Panel:

(a) endorsed the proposal made to the Cabinet Defence Committee that the NATO air training scheme should not be renewed after the completion of the 1957-58 period, but that Canada should investigate with Norway, Denmark and Holland arrangements to train a limited number of aircrew who could be accommodated in the RCAF training program;

(b) agreed to suggest that in principle a charge should be made to nations for training spaces in the RCAF program;

(c) noted the desirability of explaining as well as possible these decisions and agreed that External Affairs and National Defence should prepare a message to Heads of Mission along the lines of draft alternative "B" submitted by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff;

(d) agreed that the Secretary should prepare a report† to the Cabinet Defence Committee on the discussion of the proposal in the Panel.

REDUCTION OF NATO AIRCREW TRAINING

Following meetings of Canadian Heads of Missions in Europe held in London early last May, question of reduction of NATO aircrew training was carefully reviewed here with other departments interested. As a result of these studies Cabinet Defence Committee decided on Wednesday June 13

(a) that the three-year air training scheme for NATO pilots and navigators, which expires in March 1958, will not be renewed;

(b) that possibility of arrangements should be investigated with the military authorities of Norway, Denmark and Holland to train a limited number of aircrew who could be accommodated in the RCAF training system without involving additional facilities;

(c) that consideration would also be given to any special difficulties which might arise;

(d) that this decision will be explained simultaneously to the NATO Council, to the Standing Group in Washington and to the governments of our NATO allies.

2. To ensure uniformity in the statements of explanation to the Standing Group, to the NATO Council, and to the NATO governments, the text of a message of guidance to Heads of Mission concerned will be found in my immediately following telegram.

3. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff is planning to deliver this message to the Military Committee (including Standing Group representatives) in Washington on Tuesday, June 19. I would therefore appreciate if you would explain, preferably between now and Tuesday, June 19 (for CANAC Paris, to the Council) (for other Missions: to the governments to which you are accredited) this decision along the lines of the message of guidance. You should inform the department when you have done so, and let us have any comments or reactions which this announcement may have given rise to.

REDUCTION OF NATO AIRCREW TRAINING

Following is text of message of guidance:

Text begins:

"Canada has been assisting the NATO nations in air training on a year-to-year basis since 1950. In 1953, on the recommendation of the Standing Group, the Canadian Government agreed to train pilots and navigators from NATO countries, at the rate of 1200 trainees per year for a three-year period commencing in 1955. The purpose of this training was to assist the NATO nations to reach their force goals and maintain their air forces until such time as national air training schemes could be set up. It is recognized that the Canadian NATO air training programme has been one of the most constructive forms of Canadian mutual aid contributions to NATO and by 1957 Canada will have trained about 2750 pilots and 2450 navigators.

2. As this commitment is nearing its terminal date under existing arrangements, the Canadian authorities have sought the advice of the Supreme Allied Commander to ascertain if sufficient pilots have been trained to man the operational forces assigned to SACEUR, bearing in mind that the force goals agreed to at Lisbon have been considerably reduced. The Supreme Allied Commander agrees that, upon the completion of the 1956-57 training programme, the NATO nations except Norway, Denmark and Holland will have sufficient pilots to man the aircraft which are available at acceptable aircrew levels, and that, in addition, most countries have in being indigenous training programmes which are capable of replacing aircrew attrition. The Canadian Government therefore believe that the purpose for which this air training scheme was set up has largely been achieved and that the stage has now been reached where the airfields, the manpower and associated facilities could be put to other and more urgent uses in the interests of NATO.

4. You should point out that it is the intention of the Canadian Government to convert the facilities now being used for NATO air training to provide some elements of three additional fighter squadrons to be established in Canada to assist in the defence of the deterrent nuclear capability located in North America. It is felt that these additional squadrons will be a considerable contribution towards the purpose of NATO in preventing war.

5. The Government realizes that the cessation of NATO air training in Canada will require other nations to augment their present air training systems and make certain adjustments to the present defence programmes, and is prepared to give consideration to assisting any NATO nation in augmenting its own facilities, either by provision of additional training aircraft or, if it is desirable, by training of instructors or specialists required for these purposes. Further, if the timing of this proposal creates undue hardship, the Government is prepared to review any such cases.

6. In particular, while it is the intention of the Canadian Government to close down the NATO Air Training Plant as such, on the advice of the Supreme Allied Commander that it would be uneconomical for Norway and Denmark to set up special air training facilities for the limited number of pilots they require and that the limited air space available in Holland restricts air training, the Canadian Government are investigating as to whether a limited number of potential pilots from these three countries could be trained within the RCAF Air Training Plant. If it is found that there is a limited capacity available, vacancies within the range of 100 to 150 a year will be offered to these three countries on a repayment basis to cover the additional expense of accommodating these candidates in the RCAF Air Training Plant, the exact amount to be charged to be arrived at in bilateral discussions." POSSIBLE CONTRACTS FOR MAINTENANCE OF CF-100'S IN BELGIUM

Following is the text of a letter from Mr. Howe:

My dear Colleague:

Avro Aircraft Limited are currently negotiating with the Belgian Government for the sale of a quantity of CF.100 aircraft.

I would appreciate it if you would instruct our Ambassador in Belgium to communicate with the Belgian Government and to inform that Government that, in the event an agreement is concluded for the sale of the aircraft, the Canadian Government, since it feels that only one CF.100 repair and overhaul facility would be necessary in Europe, would be prepared to consider entering into an agreement with a suitable firm in Belgium to handle overhaul and repair of CF.100's being operated by the Royal Canadian Air Force in continental Europe.

If appropriate arrangements for repair and overhaul work in Belgium could be made, I would expect that some jigs, tools and fixtures could be made available by the Canadian Government for the use by the selected Belgian firm on repair and overhaul for Belgian account. I would also anticipate that plans and technical information respecting the CF.100 aircraft which are owned by the Canadian Government could be made available to the selected Belgian firm.

2. I should be grateful if you would transmit Mr. Howe's message to the Belgian Government.

SALE OF CF-100 TO BELGIAN AIR FORCE

Following for Ignatieff: U.S. Ambassador has just informed me that he had received confirmation (AI 137 of February 16† from Air Attaché to CAS refers) that U.S. Air Force categorically refuses to release on security grounds MG2 Fire Control System to Belgian Air Force.

2. As negotiations between Avro and Belgian National Defence had blessing of Canadian authorities, I fear that collapse of said negotiations over matter of security clearance sure to have serious political repercussions. Furthermore the intimation that they are second grade members of NATO will have been so brutally borne on them that they may take the view that unless most modern aircraft is made available there is not much point in re-equipping their air force as they have been pressed to do in NATO.

3. I gathered from my talk with U.S. Ambassador that USAF are critical of Avro and/or RCAF for not making sure that clearance would be given before offering CF-100 complete with MG2 to Belgium. Be it as it may I think situation warrants high level representations through State Department and/or SHAPE to USAF. As purpose of Belgian Defence Minister's visit to Canada (he will let me know the date of his visit on March 4), is primarily to discuss or conclude purchase of CF-100, Mr. Campney, not to mention myself, in most invidious position.

4. Is there possibility of USAF releasing effective fire control system whilst withholding security clearance of some of its most sensitive component devices.

1. As a result of AVROe Canada campaign to sell CF100 aircraft to NATO countries you perhaps know that there have been protracted discussions between USAF-RCAF Staffs on the problem of releasing MG2 fire control system in CF100 AW fighter to friendly foreign governments — particularly the Belgians. I understand the present position to be:

¹¹ Note marginale /: Marginal Note:

I find this all very disturbing. L.B. P[earson]

(a) On military security grounds you do not wish to release the MG2 in its present form at the present time.

(b) You may reconsider the matter after the current Eglin evaluation of CF100 MkIV is completed.

(c) You are willing to make available another "Suitable fire control system" for installation in the CF100 or alternatively you are willing for your staff to discuss with our technical officers and the Hughes Company the possible modification of the present MG2 to make it "suitable" for release to Belgians.

(d) You had no objection (subject to certain specified restrictions) to the short operational assessment of the CF100 with its MG2 system made recently in Canada by a Belgian Air Force team of four officers.

2. I would like to assure you of the desire and intent of the RCAF to support fully your military security restrictions and we have been particularly careful during the Belgian visit not to discuss or demonstrate any of the sensitive features of the MG2 system.

3. I would have preferred to let the matter rest until completion of the Eglin Field evaluation of CF100 now in progress but I am now informed that USA authorities require the Belgians to decide and made a firm proposal to purchase CF100 AW fighters by end of March if they are to be assisted in the matter by US MDAP funds. Naturally the Belgians do not wish to make a firm commitment without knowing definitely what fire control system they would get.

4. SHAPE pressed us hard to provide CF100s squadrons for RCAF Air Division Europe and I had hoped that by now you might have some preliminary report from USAF Eglin Field evaluation which would confirm the view that the contribution to all weather air defence which the CF100 will be able to make to West Europe is well worthwhile. Against the higher speed threats, however, this contribution depends on the collision course capability. The fact that the MG2 has such a capability has been published in Aviation Magazine Interavia Dec 55 Popular Science Dec 55 and Canadian Aviation Mar 56. Consequently this is common knowledge to the Belgians and others.

5. CF100 aircraft could be made available to the Belgians from Canadian production about the same time that our four squadrons in Europe are to be re-equipped with the CF100 — that is Jan to Aug 1957 — so that the fire control system would be in use in Europe from that time or in any event.

6. My technical advisors state that the MG2 can have its advanced ECM refinements readily removed by substituting the old fixed frequency transmitter-receiver for the new tunable magnetron and substituting the old electrical synchronizer for the new common synchronizer now in use. Would you be prepared to release such a modified or "sanitized" version of the MG2 for the particular purpose of providing the Belgian Air Force with CF100 all weather aircraft if you are still not prepared to release the MG2 in its present form. Understand they want about sixty aircraft.

7. If this proposal to sanitize MG2 in your opinion is not adequate may my staff accept USAF offer to meet with your staff and the Hughes Company to determine what would be practical and acceptable.

8. Apart from military considerations, this added production by AVRO and Orenda Engine Co. will greatly assist to support their facilities during the difficult changeover period from current type to our new supersonic CF105 and its PS13 engine which are of direct concern to North American defence.

9. Our position is delicate because of Belgian pressure and because for the reasons stated in paragraphs four, five and eight we would not be averse to the CF100 going to Belgians. The AVROe Company has been aggressive in its attempts to sell and to this end I understand they have had discussions with USAF authorities. As a result AVRO has led the Belgians to believe that security obstacles could be resolved if they made a firm commitment. At no time however has the RCAF given the company any assurances whatever beyond the official view expressed by USAF to our Mission in Washington. We made it clear to the Belgians that although we would facilitate their evaluation of the CF100 within the limits of specified security restrictions nevertheless the financing and any relevant details of any transaction which the Belgians contemplate making for the procurement of CF100 aircraft from Canadian sources is clearly a matter which the Belgians must work out with the USA authorities. The various factors which I have outlined together with the impact of your decision concerning the release of a fire control system makes it appropriate for the decision to be announced to the Belgians by you and not by us.

10. Mr. Spinoy the Belgian Foreign Minister is coming to Canada early this month and will raise the CF100 situation with Canadian Government. We understand from Canadian Embassy in Belgium that collapse of negotiations for procurement of CF100 over matter of security clearance would likely have political repercussions and might lead Belgians to feel that they are rated as second grade members of NATO and unless most modern all weather fighter is made available to them there is not much point in their providing an all weather element in their air force as they have been pressed to do in NATO. Therefore I urgently require your suggestions as to how we should conclude this problem and in the event that you decide against making the MG2 system or a sanitized version of it available to the Belgians, whether you will undertake to acquaint them with your decision.

SALE OF CF-100 TO BELGIUM

Following for Ignatieff: Substantive part of letter just received from Minister of National Defence follows:

“À l'occasion de leur visite aux installations de la firme AVRO Aircraft à Toronto les officiers de la force aérienne belge ont été particulièrement impressionnés par le développement de l'industrie aéronautique canadienne et par ses belles réalisations. L'avion de chasse tous temps CF-100 Mark 5, qu'ils ont eu l'occasion d'examiner et d'essayer en vol, leur a laissé une impression favorable par ses qualités mécaniques et techniques mais surtout par son remarquable système de contrôle de feu.

Le gouvernement belge a reçu de la firme AVRO Aircraft une offre pour la fourniture d'avions de chasse tous temps du type CF-100 Mark 5. Mais avant de pouvoir prendre cette offre en considération il faudrait que la Belgique soit assurée qu'au cas d'un marché éventuel l'avion qui lui serait livré sera muni du même équipement électronique que le type qui a été expérimenté par ses délégués lors de leur visite à Toronto.

Pour des raisons qui sont en dehors de sa compétence la firme AVRO ne peut pas donner cette assurance. C'est pourquoi Monsieur l'Ambassadeur il me serait extrêmement agréable d'en obtenir la confirmation par le Gouvernement du Canada.

En ce qui concerne plus spécialement l'armement du CF-100, il est actuellement envisagé d'équiper cet avion avec des projectiles guides air-air, ce qui augmentera encore dans une large mesure l'efficacité de cet avion de chasse. Si le choix de la Belgique s'orientait vers l'adoption du CF-100 Mark 5 pour ses unités de chasse tous temps, l'assurance peut-elle être donnée que les CF-100 de la force aérienne belge seront admis, au moment voulu, à bénéficier de ce perfectionnement?" (Text ends).

2. At dinner March 8 Minister told me that he had decided to recommend to his government purchase of CF-100 on condition that it could be obtained complete with MG2 mounted. He added that he would confirm this in writing early this week.

3. On March 11 however Minister was informed by USA Ambassador that the termination date of MDAP offer to help in financing re-equipment of Belgian Air Force had been extended from Mar 31 to May 31 to permit evaluation of Javelin and Vautour. This extension I am sure is at the bottom of change in his approach. From having said on March 8: "We are prepared to buy if MG2 released", he wrote on the 14th: "If we decide to buy would MG2 be released?"

4. I have kept my USA colleague informed of developments in this matter. He told me that he in turn has reported back fully to State Department on course of negotiations. He has also pointed out to the State Department that in his view there would be political repercussions if release of MG2 to Belgium were refused. (See paragraph 2 of my telegram under reference).

CF100'S FOR BELGIUM

1. You will recall that I discussed with General Gruenther the provision of CF100's for Belgium and the security difficulties which were being encountered with the USAF, and that I left with General Gruenther an aide mémoire† outlining our position, in which we recommended that the USAF should:

- (a) agree to release the MG-2 fire control system; or
- (b) agree to a sanitized version of the MG-2.

2. General Gruenther was very surprised to hear about this matter and he agreed that he would get in touch with General Norstad, who was to arrive in Washington on Thursday, 15 March, and ask General Norstad to immediately get in touch with the USAF on this subject.

3. On 19 March the Chief of Air Staff brought in a copy of a telegram† dated 17 March, which he had just received from the Pentagon (copy attached). You will note from this telegram that the U.S. position has hardened considerably and they will not agree to release the MG-2 system to any nation not directly concerned with the defence of North America, although previously they had stated that they were prepared to release this MG-2 equipment to the United Kingdom. You will further observe that they are not prepared to accept our suggestion of a sanitized version of the MG-2 and do not appear to be very enthusiastic about working out an alternative fire control system.

4. As a result of this telegram I called General Gruenther in Washington yesterday morning (20 March) and acquainted him with the situation. He informed me that he had had a word with General Norstad in Washington on Friday and that General Norstad was going into the matter very thoroughly and he hoped to see him in the afternoon, and he would also visit the Pentagon and discuss this subject with the officers concerned.

5. General Gruenther called at 1700 hours yesterday and informed me that he had gone into the matter very thoroughly with the USAF and that he regretted to say that the position outlined in the attached telegram should be considered as a final decision. He pointed out that the officers with whom he had been talking considered that we in Canada agreed with the security aspect of this problem. I pointed out that as this fire control system was a U.S. development we of course would have to be satisfied with the U.S. assessment of the security, and that our concern was more one of the effect such a turn-down would have on Belgium and on the smaller nations in NATO, and we were a bit disappointed that the USAF had allowed us to go so far, including their agreement to a Belgian team coming to Canada to assess the CF100. While Gruenther did not say so in so many words, I gathered from his conversation that the U.S. security authorities had not expected this deal to go as far as it has, and did not really expect that the security aspect would have to be faced. The USAF have suggested that the Canadian Government should inform the Belgian Government. I suggested to General Gruenther that we would quite likely pass this "hot potato" back to the U.S. Government for them to turn the Belgians down.

6. I am informing External Affairs, as I understand Mr. Pearson wishes to have a full record of this matter in his brief in case it arises during his visit to White Sulphur Springs. I am also suggesting to External that they should notify Mr. Hébert in Brussels so that, should Mr. Spinoy suggest coming to Canada, our Ambassador could inform him of the difficulties, emphasizing that of course the RCAF will be only too ready to try to work out with the USAF and the Hughes Company an alternative if this is satisfactory to the Governments.

7. I am also informing the Department of Defence, Production because of Mr. Howe's interest in this problem.

PROPOSED SALE OF CF-100 AIRCRAFT TO BELGIUM

I attach a copy of the message from the CAS to the United States CAS which was originally referred to you under my memorandum of March 13. I also attach a copy of General Foulkes' memorandum of March 21 for Mr. Campney, which reports further developments on this disturbing matter and covers a reply from the U.S. Chief of Air Staff to A/M Slemon's message. Finally, I attach for convenience of reference copies of telegrams No. 33 of March 1 and No. 41 of March 15 from our Ambassador in Brussels. The latter telegram gives the text of a letter received from the Belgian Defence Minister.

2. From these various documents the points set out below emerge clearly:

(a) The Belgians would be interested in buying CF-100s, but only if they are equipped with the MG-2 or an equivalent fire control system.

(b) There is little or no hope, following the failure of A/M Slemon's and General Gruenther's attempts, of persuading the U.S. military authorities to abandon their firm objection on security grounds to releasing such fire control equipment to the Belgians.

(c) The Belgians have been allowed to believe that this equipment would be available to them if they decided to purchase, since the USAF agreed to having a Belgian technical team visit Canada to assess the aircraft as equipped with the MG-2 system.

(d) The USAF does not appear prepared to accept the responsibility of informing the Belgians of their position.

(e) That position, resting on the thesis that the equipment is so sensitive an element in the defence of North America that it should not come into the hands of those not directly engaged in North American defence, is difficult to defend when all concerned are aware that Canadian CF-100 squadrons with that equipment will be operating in Europe in a role not very different from that of the Belgian Air Force.

3. This difficult position is one which you may wish to discuss with Mr. Dulles (and you might wish to show him, or give him, copies of the CAS to CAS messages). You might refer to the tendency apparent in NATO recently for the smaller European countries to feel that they were being left out on current technical and military developments, a tendency which NATO's recent multilateral defence discussions were in large part designed to overcome. The implication that Belgium is a second class member of NATO will be a bitter pill not only for the Belgians but for other NATO countries, which will undoubtedly learn of the matter in no time. The political consequences for NATO of this case will inevitably be most harmful.

4. It is unlikely that it will be possible to persuade Mr. Dulles to seek to overcome the objections of the USAF to releasing this equipment, although it is probably worth trying. I would suggest, however, that you concentrate your efforts on persuading him that it is in the United States' interest to inform the Belgians themselves of their position, and to explain the reasons for it. In a matter which will undoubtedly damage political relations between Belgium and the United States in any case, it would seem very strange to the Belgians if the United States were so apparently indifferent as to leave the explanation to a third party — which on this particular problem is all we are.

5. In the meantime we have warned the Ambassador in Brussels to be very cautious in this matter, and propose to take no further action (despite General Foulkes' suggestion) until we receive further instructions from you.¹²

PROPOSED SALE OF CF100 TO BELGIUM

Following is text of message sent by Chairman, Canadian Chiefs of Staff, to Deputy Minister National Defence after discussion with the Minister and Hébert. Begins:

Mr. Pearson and Mr. Hébert are concerned regarding CF-100 deal with the Belgians. Mr. Hébert has been informed that a team from AVRO are about to arrive in Brussels in a few days with new proposals re CF-100's. Mr. Pearson and I agreed today that no new proposals should be made to the Belgians which are not in line with the latest US views on security. We consider that it would only cause serious embarrassment if new proposals are made by the company which do not carry the judgement of the USAF. Suggest that you or Slemmon should have a word with the company and urge that a clarification of the security position should be secured before any further negotiations are made by the company. I suggest that Slemmon should forward to Wurtele in Brussels the details and implications of the compromise fire control system which has been worked out between the US, Canada and the Hughes Company so that he can discuss this with the Belgian technical authorities. I have suggested that no further negotiations should go forward pending the solution of the fire control problem. Mr. Pearson agrees that any further negotiations by AVRO would create serious complications.

¹² La note suivante, écrite à la main, était jointe à ce document./The following hand-written note was attached to this document:

Mr Ritchie: Mr. Pearson spoke to Mr Dulles about this at White Sulphur Springs. Mr. Dulles had never heard about it and was very upset at the Pentagon's attitude. He could not understand a situation in which those who were providing fighter cover for the U.S. forces would not have the best equipment. He wants to take it up with the President. I understand that the matter is being looked into in Washington. J.W. Holmes

For the record of Pearson's conversation with Dulles on this subject, see Volume 23, Chapter 1, Part 1.

2. I carefully explained to the Chief of Staff of the Belgian Air Force the reasons for the security difficulties and this is fully appreciated on the service level. They are fully aware that we cannot press the US to release US security matters.

3. From my discussions in Paris and here I have the impression that the Belgians might buy CF-100 aircraft without the fire control system in the hope that this will be provided at a later date if there was some compensating financial gain. Consideration should be given to this type of problem as a mutual aid item. It seems to me to make more sense to help somebody that wants to help themselves than some of the things we are now doing. This would also help us with the difficulties we may get into with AVRO in the next few months.

4. Will you inform the Minister and the CAS. No other problems as yet.

POSSIBLE SALE OF CF100 TO BELGIUM

At his request I called on the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Spinoy, yesterday. This was in accordance with a promise which he gave when I called on him with Morley on March 23 that he would see me before making a decision regarding choice of all-weather fighter for the Belgian Air Force.

2. He began by telling me that his advisors could not recommend the purchase of the MG4-equipped CF100. However, since the French had asked for additional time to draw up a proposal in connection with their bid to sell the Vautour to the Belgian Air Force he had decided to postpone announcement of the final choice until mid-July.

3. He then turned to a consideration of the damage that the NATO cause in Belgium might suffer as a result of the USAF decision to withhold MG2 from Belgian Air Force. He maintained further that when this refusal became known — and he could see no way of avoiding an ultimate disclosure — the knowledge that Belgium had been the object of discriminatory treatment would have a serious effect on the attitude of other European members of NATO towards the Alliance. It would be impossible for them to escape the conclusion which is being forced on Belgium that there are two classes of NATO members.

4. An announcement that the Belgian Air Force had selected another type of aircraft — the Javelin or Vautour — would not let him off the hook. Belgian parliamentarians, as we have already reported to you, are alive to the problem of re-equipping the Belgian Air Force and, Mr. Spinoy told me, some opposition members are very well informed about available all-weather aircraft and the equipment with which they are provided. (The merits of the MG2-equipped CF100 were widely advertised in the daily press). Consequently, no matter what choice of aircraft is announced Spinoy will have to face a barrage of penetrating questions regarding the types of aircraft considered. During any such questioning it will be quite impossible to be evasive. To reply for example that MG2 was so sensitive that it had to be reserved for the defence of North America would be too transparent a dodge since the opposition members specializing in defence matters are sure to know sooner or later that RCAF CF100's in Europe were equipped with this device.

5. He concluded by asking me once more to submit his views to you because he feels strongly about this unhappy situation. I have no doubt in my mind that these representations were made to me after the matter had been discussed in Cabinet.

6. In discussion which followed I had to admit that his misgivings had already occurred to me and been reported to you. As his concern was centered on discrimination between air forces operating on the continent I enquired if the equipping of RCAF CF100 squadrons in Europe with MG4 instead of with MG2 would remove the sting of discrimination and with it the embarrassment to his government. While he did not admit it in so many words he gave me the impression that he was gratified at hearing the idea expounded by me in this form. It has obviously been on his mind for some time and I am inclined to think that it may even have been considered at Cabinet level.

7. Having regard to the new responsibilities you have assumed in respect of NATO and to the Canadian Government's desire to strengthen the bonds of the North Atlantic Alliance might I urge that this problem be re-examined. It is conceivable that the political benefits of an act of self-denial on our part might outweigh a certain diminution of the operational effectiveness of the Canadian CF100's in Europe.

8. In spite of what Mr. Spinoy told me about his advisors' recommendation (see para 2 above), I believe that if we could offer the Belgians an aircraft identical to the one we are providing to our own squadrons he would choose it in preference to either the Vautour or Javelin. I am convinced that for him and probably for Cabinet it is very much a question of saving face.

9. When I was about to take my leave he said that he would be grateful if I could let him know before Friday June 22 whether you were prepared to have another look at this problem.

10. As probably a wild suggestion, if the USAF remain adamant, could not the RCAF equip the CF100's in Europe with MG4 while holding in readiness in situ MG2 devices which I am informed can be substituted for the MG4 in a matter of an hour or so. Furthermore as General Foulkes suggested to me in London last month it is not inconceivable that the MG2 might be downgraded in a year or so. In that event the Belgians could be informed that the MG2 was at last available to them as well as to the RCAF in Europe.

POSSIBLE SALE OF CF100'S TO BELGIUM

I do not think that the suggestion made by the Ambassador is a practicable one as it involves giving less than the best possible equipment which we possess to the RCAF in Europe. Politically this would be impossible to defend in Canada. Nevertheless, I have great sympathy with the Belgian position in this matter. I think that we should make it quite clear to the State Department in Washington that the responsibility for any effect which the U.S. decision on this matter may have on NATO cooperation and unity lies in Washington and not in Ottawa. The Belgian position, which apparently will have to be made public, seems to me to be an entirely defensible one, namely that they cannot accept an aircraft with inferior equipment as part of a NATO force which would include other planes of the same type but with superior equipment, and carrying out the same responsibilities. These responsibilities, incidentally, in the case of trouble, would presumably include the protection of the ground troops of the country which refuses to allow the MG2 to be used in Belgian planes for that purpose.

CF-100 AIRCRAFT; POSSIBLE SALE TO BELGIUM

27. The Minister of National Defence reported that the A.V. Roe Company had, for some time, been trying to arrange a sale of 72 CF-100 aircraft to Belgium. This would be an off-shore purchase transaction involving the use of U.S. funds. The sale had been delayed because the fire control system in the CF-100 was installed under U.S. license and the United States, for security reasons, had so far refused to allow the system in other than the U.S. and the Canadian air forces. The U.S. had now decided to release this equipment which would mean that, not only would AVRO be in a position to sell CF-100's equipped with the system, but that U.S. aircraft companies manufacturing a comparable type of aircraft, the F-89, would also be keenly interested in the proposed sale. The F-89 costs slightly less than the CF 100 and it was probable that the Belgians, even though they had been negotiating with AVRO, might buy in the U.S. unless some inducement was offered to purchase in Canada. This might take the form of an offer to provide the first year's spare parts, including engines, as mutual aid. The cost would be approximately $12.5 million. If life-time spares were considered, the cost would be $17.5 million.

The U.S. Secretary for Air, with whom he had discussed the matter and who was being most helpful, quite understandably had to extend the release of the fire control equipment to aircraft manufactured in the U.S. as well as in Canada. Mr. Quarles thought, however, that he might be able to explain a Belgian purchase of CF-100's to American manufacturers by pointing to the fact that the Canadian government was providing an element of mutual aid and that the whole transaction was thus a three way U.S.-Belgian-Canadian co-operative effort.

The Minister had also discussed the question with the Minister of Defence Production who was in favour of providing some concessions though he felt they should not be too attractive. It had to be kept in mind that if a sale in the manner proposed were made, other countries in N.A.T.O. might also request similar treatment for the purchase of aircraft here.

28. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Even though the mutual aid appropriation had been reduced it was going to be difficult to find projects eligible for assistance this year. There was not much equipment in stock available for the purpose and new offerings would have to come from current production.

(b) It was unlikely that other countries would be able to make similar arrangements, particularly as the U.S. would not want to allocate its funds in this manner in the future.

(c) Assisting Belgium to purchase CF-100's would be in accordance with the request of N.A.T.O. authorities to Canada to provide mutual aid so that member countries could acquire high performance aircraft.

29. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the possible sale of CF-100 aircraft to Belgium, and agreed, in principle, to such a sale by A.V. Roe Company and also that an offer be made, in addition, to provide spare parts for the aircraft, including engines, as mutual aid from the existing appropriation; the Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Acting Minister of Defence Production to conclude the necessary arrangements.

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, December 3, 1956

Dear Ralph [Campney],

This is to confirm our telephone conversation in which I told you that the United States Air Force would release the Canadian Government (RCAF) to make available to the Belgian Government for use by the Belgian Air Force the MG-2 Fire Control System used in your CF-100 aircraft. This release would be effective for first aircraft deliveries to the Belgians on July 1, 1957, and would be subject to the following conditions.

1. The Canadian Avro plan of September 1956 for the maintenance and security of the CF-100 weapon system would be substantially followed.

2. The Belgian Government will not release classified information to a 4th government without the approval of the U.S. and Canada.

3. The Belgian Government will afford to the classified information substantially the same degree of security protection afforded to it by the U.S. and Canada.

4. The Belgian Government will not use the classified information for other than military purposes.

5. The Belgian government will, in accordance with the provisions of an agreement with the Canadian Government, respect any private rights such as patents, copyrights, or trade secrets which are involved in the information.

6. The Belgian Government will exercise extreme caution to prevent the aircraft from flying over Russian or Satellite areas where compromise might occur through forced landings.

7. The electronic countermeasures capability will be removed.

As I am sure you understand, the delivery of CF-100 aircraft to the Belgians would involve the "off-shore procurement" of these aircraft by the U.S. Government for grant military aid to the Belgian Government. This aspect of the matter would be handled by the U.S. Department of Defense (International Security Affairs).

I have discussed the matter with Assistant Secretary Gordon Gray and Deputy Assistant Secretary Perkins McGuire, and believe your proposition would be in best channels if put to Mr. McGuire. Quite possibly you will have an opportunity to discuss it with Mr. Wilson or Mr. Gray while you are together in Paris.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely,

DONALD QUARLES

*Minister of National Defence

Ottawa, December 5, 1956

Dear Donald [Quarles]:

In consequence of my recent telephone discussions with you, I have again looked into our position with respect to making CF 100 All Weather Fighters available for Belgium. I find that by diverting some aircraft now scheduled for delivery to the R.C.A.F., the AVRO Aircraft Company of Canada could commence making aircraft available for Belgium immediately, without adverse affect on R.C.A.F. needs. If such early delivery of CF 100's is beyond the capacity of the Belgians to absorb, the Company, without diverting from R.C.A.F. deliveries, can commence regular delivery to Belgium from their production line commencing about May 1957 and by adjustment of their production rate could complete deliveries of upwards of 70 aircraft by July 1958 or earlier.

It can be expected that the Belgians will require training for some of their aircrew and technicians on the CF 100 in Canada before being in a position to accept these aircraft which are new to them and, therefore, it is likely that July 1957, which you suggested as being a possible date for provisional security release of the fire control system, would satisfy Belgian requirements for aircraft delivery as well as for security release.

In any event, as has already been explained by the R.C.A.F. to the U.S.A.F. and to your staff at a conference in Washington on October 11, 1956, the R.C.A.F. and AVRO are prepared jointly to institute procedures for the logistic handling of the MG-2 fire control systems in CF 100's held by the Belgium Air Force in the same manner as is done for the CF 100's held by R.C.A.F. Squadrons in France and Germany. These proposed measures would safeguard the security aspects of the fire control system until such time as U.S.A. authorities decide that all security restrictions could safely be removed.

We understand that the Belgians desire to acquire about 70 Mark 5 CF 100's. These aircraft delivered by AVRO to the R.C.A.F. in Canada now cost about $565,000 each. This price includes sales tax which is understood to be not applicable to export sales. However, it is reasonable to expect that delivery and logistics support to Europe would involve the AVRO Company in increased handling costs, etc., which would be reflected in the sale price. Consequently, an amount of about 40 million dollars would possibly provide Belgium with about 70 CF 100 aircraft.

The above figures do not include the cost of spare parts, the total for which might be of the order of an additional 25 to 40 per cent of the aircraft cost, depending on the quantity of spares to be provided. In this regard, I might say that if the U.S. Government, assisted or not by the Belgian Government, undertakes to purchase these aircraft, the Canadian Government would be willing to assume about 25 per cent of the costs. For contractual convenience it might be appropriate for Canada's contribution to be the provision of the spares themselves. On this basis, and assuming costs to be of the rough order of magnitude of those above mentioned, the Canadian Government would expect to pay somewhere between 10 and 12 million dollars as its share.

The above mentioned cost estimates and other data have been produced within my own Department because, for obvious reasons, I have felt it would be unwise to bring the AVRO Company into these considerations at this time. In due course, however, the Company will have to be consulted with respect to detailed questions of cost, etc. Furthermore, I would point out to you that the Canadian Government's offer to contribute to the extent above mentioned is contingent on an early decision being reached by the U.S. and Belgian Governments. This condition is made necessary by the fact that the rate of production of the CF 100 by the AVRO Company must almost immediately be stabilized for a variety of reasons. One of these is the impact which this aircraft programme will have on the programme for the CF 105 supersonic fighter which succeeds the CF 100 and which is also being made by the AVRO Company of Canada.

If we can reach agreement on the proposal outlined in this letter I feel that either an appropriate U.S.A. or Canadian authority, or both, should present a concrete proposal immediately to the Belgians for their early and final consideration. Your views on this would also be much appreciated.

It is my understanding of our conversation that the further development of this proposal would be by the agency headed by Mr. Gordon Gray; you might, therefore, forward to him a copy of this letter so that he will be aware of the Canadian Government's position in this matter.

Please accept my thanks for the interest and help which have been forthcoming from you personally in this matter.

Yours sincerely,

[R.O. CAMPNEY]

1. At Mr. Howe's request the following message is being sent you for urgent action:
Begins;

Please advise the Belgian Government (Mr. Spinoy) that the CF-100 Mark V all-weather night fighter equipped with the MG2 fire control system can be made available to them as of July, 1957. You should further advise that the release date on the MG2 is concurred in by the Americans. There would be some arrangements which would have to be made in order to provide reasonable protection for the security of the fire control system but these should not be difficult to arrange.

If the Belgian Government wishes to procure CF-100 Mark V aircraft from Canadian sources, it should, if American financial assistance is expected, notify the U.S. Government of its choice of aircraft. We are not authorized to speak on behalf of the American Government and do not know whether such assistance will be forthcoming. For your own information and not to be transmitted, as this is primarily a matter between Canada and the U.S., the Canadian Government has indicated to the U.S. Government that in order to make this transaction easier for the U.S. Government, the Canadian Government would be prepared to assume approximately 25% of the cost for about 70 aircraft.

As you will appreciate, because of a number of reasons, time is of the essence. Ends.

SALE OF CF-100 TO BELGIUM

1. M. Spinoy was delighted to receive the information contained in your telegram, the substance of which I passed to him on December 21. Copy of my letter† to M. Spinoy was sent to you by bag leaving here December 21.

2. During our interview, I sensed that M. Spinoy derived a measure of personal satisfaction on learning that the MG2 had eventually been released to Belgium, presumably because he felt responsible for having persuaded the USA authorities that to withhold it from a NATO ally would have serious political repercussions. This satisfaction was heightened by the fact that only the week before, in Paris, General Norstad had told him that the device would not be released until June 1958.

CF-100S

In course of informal conversation with USA Ambassador last evening I got definite impression that the Military Aid Group in Brussels are hard at work to obtain Belgian order for their Scorpion all-weather fighter aircraft.

2. I gathered that to meet our offer the USA MAG have now told the Ministry of National Defence that the delivery date of the Scorpion has been advanced from July [1958] to the last quarter of 1957. In addition they are also offering cooperation and assistance in training both aircrews and groundcrews and other facilities respecting maintenance and repair of engines mounted on Scorpion. USA Ambassador implied that the only inducement that they have not been able to match so far was that contained in telegram E153 of December 30, 1955 regarding an agreement with a suitable firm in Belgium to handle overhaul and repair of CF-100s operated by both the Belgian Air Force and RCAF in Europe.

3. I avoided giving USA Ambassador any hint concerning this last offer as I am still without a reply to paragraph 3 of my telegram 74† of May 10 1956 when I asked whether or not the offer still stands. For that reason I have also carefully avoided raising that matter again with the Belgian Ministry of National Defence.

4. Another fact which may influence decision of the Belgian authorities is the question of price. As far as I have been able to gather the Scorpion is being offered at a price somewhat below $600,000 while, to my knowledge, the original price at which we offered the CF-100 has not been lowered, namely $650,000. I think the stage has been reached in these negotiations when the Belgian Government should be informed that the Canadian Government is prepared "to assume approximately 25 percent of the cost for about 70 aircraft" and that the original cost of aircraft would thereby be reduced by 25 percent.

5. It is clear to me now that the time has now come when, if we are anxious to sell the CF-100 in competition with the Scorpion, we will have to adopt some of the ruthless sales methods that the Americans seem to be using now. It is regrettable that, as a result of an apparent lack of frankness on the part of the USA, the Belgians should now be treated to the unedifying spectacle of two NATO partners fiercely trying to outbid each other for this AWX order.

6. As you stated in your telegram DLDL[6]64 December 20, time is of the essence and I should appreciate learning without delay what steps I can now take unless an effective agreement can be reached, at this late date, at a high level between Washington and Ottawa.

7. I gathered the impression that the USA Ambassador feels quite unhappy and uneasy about the turn that these negotiations have taken.

CF-100'S FOR BELGIUM

There is set out below a memorandum for your guidance prepared jointly by the Deputy Ministers of Defence Production and of National Defence and approved by Mr. Howe.

Text begins:

MEMORANDUM FOR CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO BELGIUM
RE POSSIBLE SALE OF CF 100'S TO BELGIUM

In view of the many changes in the picture over the last few months, the following sets out the Canadian Government's position at the present time with regard to the possible sale of CF 100's to Belgium.

It is understood that the Belgian Government will examine jet all-weather fighter aircraft from both the United States and Canada before deciding which plane to purchase. It is further understood that Canada will be asked to supply detailed information on the CF 100 for comparison purposes and an approach is being made by DND to the USAF to ascertain if the secret air proving ground report on operational suitability of the CF 100 can be released to the Belgians. In the meantime, the confidential report on the same subject can be given to the Belgians. In reviewing the different aircraft, Belgium will undoubtedly ask Canada for further technical information and performance records. The Department of National Defence is prepared to arrange a special demonstration of the CF 100 at one of our bases for the Belgians and is working out the details with AOC Air Division.

While this comparison of various aircraft is being made, it has been decided that the Canadian Government should not press the CF 100 sale too hard. Meanwhile, no further approach to the U.S. Government by Mr. Howe is planned. The main objective of the Canadian Government is to keep this to a three-way deal between Belgium, United States and Canada, and not to allow ourselves to be manoeuvred into a position where the Americans would back out of the deal and say that, if the Belgians want CF 100's they should deal only with Canada and if they want Scorpions, they deal only with the U.S. In other words, the Canadian Government does not want to have to pay more than the 25 per cent agreed to with the Americans as our share of Mutual Aid, in order to help the Americans sell an off-shore purchase to Congress.

At the time we discussed this point with the Americans, the U.S. Government was thinking of paying the full cost of 70 aircraft but felt it would be difficult to do this for planes manufactured outside their country when they themselves had similar aircraft, i.e., F 89 D in inventory, particularly with the very difficult budgetary problems facing them. It was on the basis of the U.S. paying 75 per cent and Canada 25 per cent of the total cost that we agreed to participate in the financing. Whether the 25 per cent would necessarily apply to spares or to some other cost was not determined. Later, Mr. Campney in a letter to Mr. Quarles reaffirmed Canada's contribution of 25 per cent of the total cost, whether or not the United States are assisted by the Belgian Government. We understand that the Americans are waiting for Belgium to advise the U.S. officially which aircraft they wish to purchase before considering just what the funding arrangements will be. Therefore, should the Belgians choose the CF 100, we do not know which items of cost our share of the financing would cover nor whether or not it would actually reduce Belgium's contribution if it is decided that they are to participate in the financing. However, regardless of the uncertainty as to the details of our participation, for reasons given above the Belgians should not, at this time, be advised that Canada has agreed to participate in the financing of the sale of CF 100's.

In discussing the possible sale of CF 100 aircraft to Belgium, the following points of which you may or may not be fully aware, should be noted:

1. It is in order to discuss with Belgium the fact that the CF 100 with the MG 2 fire control system will be available as of July, 1957.

2. The Canadian Government will honour its commitment to repair CF 100 airframes in Belgium if suitable arrangements can be made by the Department of Defence Production with a Belgian facility.

3. The suggestion has been made that Canada should give financial assistance for the purchase of spare parts. As pointed out above, we do not know whether our share of the financing will be for spare parts or not; therefore, no comment should be made on this point.

4. If the sale goes through, MG 2 fire control systems on CF 100's sold to Belgium would be repaired in Canada, in accordance with the US requirements on this point. It is not the present intention of the Canadian Government to set up a facility for this work in either the U.K. or continental Europe.

5. The Canadian Government would give favourable consideration to the use by Belgium, at their expense, of existing Canadian or U.K. repair and overhaul facilities for airframes (until Belgian facility could be set up); engines; and fire control systems.

6. The RCAF are prepared to consider helping the Belgians with the necessary aircrew and ground crew conversion training to enable the BAF to set up their own training organization.

For your information Mr. Quarles and the senior staff in the Pentagon have been most understanding and helpful in making it possible for the CF 100 to be offered for Belgian consideration. Text ends.

CF 100'S FOR BELGIUM

Following for the Minister:

To my consternation I learned yesterday for the first time that the MG2 to be supplied to the Belgians is not identical to that in use by RCAF in Europe, the difference being the replacement of a tunable magnetron and an antichaff synchronizer by less sensitive components (foregoing from CAS21† received at CJS London on January 12).

2. When I conveyed the contents of your DLDL664 of December 20 to M. Spinoy I had no knowledge of these limitations and therefore no reason to mention them to him. Consequently I am afraid that M. Spinoy is convinced that what was being offered to the Belgian Air Force was an MG2 identical in all respects with that in use by RCAF in Europe. I feel certain that anything less, however inconsequential operationally would not be politically acceptable to Spinoy and to the Belgians.

3. Unless you can tell me that the USAF have been persuaded to lift their restrictions on these two components, I feel that I must make a clean breast of this to M. Spinoy before evaluation tests are carried out at Canadian Air Division because it is almost inevitable that these modifications to MG2 will become apparent to the Belgians during any such tests. It is my view that if I have to tell M. Spinoy that the Canadian and Belgian MG2 will not be identical, then the CF100 deal will be off.

4. I do not see how I can avoid facing this issue beyond Friday, January 25 and this is only possible because I shall be in Luxembourg for most of next week.

5. Smye of Avro, who is in Brussels, spoke last night of these matters by long distance telephone to Golden of Defence Production.

CF-100'S FOR BELGIUM

I have set out below the text of an answer to your telegram which has been proposed by the Deputy Ministers of National Defence and of Defence Production. Mr. Pearson is in New York, where your telegram was repeated for him. I am repeating this message to New York in order that he may send you direct any comments he may have.

Following is DND-DDP proposed reply:

1. Your information re MG2 system released by USAF for Belgian consideration is correct. There is no possibility at this time that we will get USAF to release these sensitive components for Belgians. The operational effect of withholding release is small and the components can be easily incorporated if and when released.

2. Any MG2 equipment in US aircraft that may be considered by Belgium in competition with the CF 100 will not embody these components either; therefore the choice between Canadian and US aircraft will not be affected.

3. There is no need for you to advise M. Spinoy of the substitution of less sensitive components in the MG2 system. This is a technical and security matter and should be left to the US to justify to the Belgians.

[Washington], March 28, 1957

DEPUTY MINISTER'S MEETING WITH MANSFIELD SPRAGUE, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, (I.S.A.) ON TUESDAY, MARCH 26TH, 1957

This meeting was attended by Mr. Sprague's top advisers including former Assistant Secretary Pike, now occupying a deputy's position in Sprague's organization. The others included William Leffingwell, Special Assistant, and Brig. Gen. John S. Guthrie, the European Regional Director for I.S.A.

This meeting, which discussed the status and procedure of the projected purchase by Belgium of jet interceptor aeroplanes, proved to be extremely interesting and, it is hoped, will result in early clarification of the situation.

Sprague obviously did not know too much about the matter as he has only recently been appointed. It did not take him long however, to get to the heart of it.

In response to the Deputy's statement of his understanding of the formal position, i.e. that the B.A.F. had indicated that they were evaluating the CF-100 preparatory to a decision on which aeroplane they would nominate, the Americans revealed that they had no information on which, if any, aeroplane the Belgians had decided upon.

On the informal side, the Deputy said that there were all sorts of odds and ends, including a report that Gen. Norstad had informed the B.A.F. that the Canadian-built CF-100 was the logical choice for the B.A.F. Gen. Guthrie then said that on their net they had it informally that the Belgians may be thinking in terms of none of the aeroplanes they have been looking at but rather a "more advanced interceptor with a guided missile capability."

The subject was then pursued on the assumption that the Belgians would nominate the Canadian aeroplane. The D.M. outlined briefly the schedule position at A.V. Roe and the fact that in order for a Belgian order to help out in the scheduling on the CF-100 Mk. 5 and the CF-100 Mk. 6, it would be highly desirable if the Belgian situation was clarified. In the discussion which followed Leffingwell outlined the interest of the U.S. Department of Defense as being involved with arrangements with the Belgians which included the acceptance by them of a U.S. obligation to accept a number of British-built Hawker Hunters. It was on this basis, according to Leffingwell, that the U.S. Department of Defense had accepted, in principle, the furnishing of 64 jet interceptors of Belgian choice through the channels of Mutual Assistance and under the Department of Defense off-shore procurement program. In reply to a direct question from the Deputy Minister, it was clearly admitted that the Mutual Assistance arrangement with the Belgians was directly linked to and contingent upon acceptance of other obligations by them.

Pike asked the question, "Assuming that the Belgians nominated the CF-100 what, if any, participation would the Canadian Government be willing to take on by way of relieving the U.S. of all or part of the financial burden?"

Mr. Golden referred to the conversations between Messrs. Campney and Quarles and the general understanding he had that out of these and other conversations had grown the concept that the U.S. might pay for the aeroplanes in flyaway condition and Canada might "pick up the tab" for the initial spares provisioning which, according to various estimates, would run something in the order of 25% of the whole bill. In following this up, Pike assumed that the way it might work would be that the U.S. Government would place an order for the CF-100's and for the spares provisioning required, and some arrangements could be worked out with the Canadian Government on a reimbursement basis to cover their participation.

The Deputy Minister said that the position on funding and kindred areas had never been clear to him. However, it would seem from the discussion that the onus for trying to bring matters to a head was firmly on the shoulders of the Americans. Sprague agreed and queried as to whether they had received any word from Norstad on the position. If they had not he thought it advisable for Norstad's advice to be sought immediately.

On the funding side, there seemed to be general assent to the premise that it would be the United States Government which would handle funding and supply arrangements for the Belgian aeroplanes from whatever source, including Canadian, on exactly the same basis as other Mutual Assistance programs. This concept would seem to effectively preclude such arrangements as the B.A.F. negotiating direct with A.V. Roe, etc.

The Deputy pointed out that naturally there was really no role for the Canadian Government in this matter of supply and supply arrangements and that, indeed, it would be improper for the Canadian Government to become involved. He pointed out that it was difficult, if not impossible, to keep the interested commercial contractor, in this case A.V. Roe, from entering into the picture, but that the statements and commitments of A.V. Roe were not those of the Canadian Government.

During the discussion it was apparent that the American group felt that Gen. Norstad's voice, if raised, would be a powerful one. There was also the feeling that within the context of the NATO defence of Europe Norstad would be in favour of aeroplanes as soon as possible which would rule out the alleged Belgian concept of more advanced interceptors equipped with missiles. Gen. Guthrie, when asked what the U.S. attitude would be if the Belgians insisted on a more advanced aeroplane, replied by saying that he thought this would change the rules of the game completely and he doubted if the U.S. Department of Defense would continue its obligation in the Mutual Assistance area under these conditions.

While there is some skepticism as to whether the Belgians really will designate an aeroplane, the consensus of the group was that the ball was in their court and that they should take immediate steps, particularly through Gen. Norstad, to try to prod the Belgians into a decision.

SALE OF CF100 FOR BELGIUM

M. Spinoy, the Minister of National Defence, called me in today to tell me that on Friday of this week he will be informing USA Embassy here that the Belgian Air Force has chosen the CF100 to equip their AFX Squadrons. The question of numbers was not raised.

2. He promised to let me have by Thursday morning a memorandum† confirming this decision and outlining the advantages he was led to believe would accrue to Belgium as a result of choosing this particular aircraft. Text of memo will be cabled as soon as received. These incidental benefits he read out to me hurriedly from a letter written by AVRO following visit of Curtis and Morley to this country in 1956 to induce the Belgians to decide in favour of the CF100. They include establishment of repair and maintenance facilities with a Belgian firm and the granting of rights to manufacture rockets in this country under license. I was not, repeat not, given to understand that the Belgian choice of the CF100 was contingent upon the granting of these supplementary advantages. He did say, however, that arising out of this choice the Belgians will expect help from RCAF for the conversion of aircrews and of ground mechanics. They are under impression that they will receive assistance in the provision of spare parts, possibly through mutual aid.

3. I recommend that this matter be kept from the press at least until the Belgians decide to release it or, better still, until a joint press release can be arranged.

For Bonn: The Minister will no doubt be interested at this happy turn of events.

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, May 28, 1957

Dear Mr. Minister:

Reference is made to your letter of 5 December 1956 to Secretary Quarles pertaining to your proposals for furnishing CF-100s for Belgium.

I am pleased to inform you that in accordance with a Belgian request of May 3, 1957, for three squadrons of all weather aircraft, the United States has decided to furnish Canadian built Mark V CF-100 aircraft to Belgium. The total Belgian requirement is for fifty-three (53) aircraft constituting unit equipment for three squadrons at a strength of sixteen (16) aircraft per squadron plus five aircraft for command support. The desired delivery schedule is: the first squadron by end of CY 1957, the second squadron by mid CY 1958 and the third squadron by the end of CY 1958.

On the basis of your offer to participate in the Belgian all weather aircraft program to the extent of twenty-five percent of the total cost, we propose the following joint action. The U.S. Government would procure all fifty-three (53) aircraft at a unit price of 587,600 U.S. dollars (565,000 Canadian dollars). In addition, the U.S. would provide under the Military Assistance Program 20,000 2.75" FFAR rockets valued at 920,000 U.S. dollars for maximum operational employment of the CF-100 during the first fourteen days of combat. The total U.S. contribution would thus be 32,062,800 U.S. dollars (30,829,615 Canadian dollars). The Canadian Government on its part would then provide, prior to or concurrently with the aircraft, all other support in the amount of approximately 10,687,600 U.S. dollars (10,276,538 Canadian dollars). This support would include for one year: initial spares for the aircraft and associated equipment, organizational, field and depot support equipment, training equipment, technical representatives, and flying and technical training for the Belgian Air Force. The total cost of the joint program would be 42,750,400 U.S. dollars (41,106,153 Canadian dollars). If, after the requirements other than aircraft are finally determined, the total cost of the program is more or less than 42,750,400 U.S. dollars, the U.S. Government and Canadian Government would share the final total costs on a 75%-25% cost sharing basis. The rate of exchange of U.S. dollars to Canadian dollars would be 1.04 U.S. dollars to 1.00 Canadian dollars.

Since three Governments will be involved in this program, we believe administration could be simplified if Canada would act as the agent of the United States in implementing the program. We propose to procure aircraft through the Canadian Commercial Corporation (CCC) in accordance with existing CCC agreements between our respective Service Departments except that payment arrangements will be as proposed above. The formulation of lists of ground handling equipment, initial spares, and training equipment, and arrangements for aircraft delivery, technical representatives, flying and technical training, and financing of any contract maintenance which might be required would be subjects for mutual agreement between the Canadian Government and the Belgian Government. It is understood that the support furnished by Canada to Belgium would conform to the normal support provided by Canada under its Mutual Aid Program.

The restriction on release of the MG-2 Fire Control System remains as stated in Secretary Quarles' letter of 3 December 1956. In connection with this program, we are again reviewing the desirability of releasing the tuneable magnetron and the anti-chaff synchronizer mentioned in paragraph seven of the above letter. In the event that we should at a later date release these two items, you will be advised. To facilitate Belgian capability for maintenance of the Fire Control System beginning 1 July 1958, when the system will be releasable to them on a classified basis, Belgian students may begin MG-2 training by Canada on 1 January 1958, provided reasonable care is taken by Canada to prevent release to Belgium prior to 1 July 1958 of detailed drawings which might compromise the system.

United States assistance to Belgium would be furnished pursuant to the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, and would be subject to the terms and conditions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Agreement between the United States and Belgium which entered into force March 30, 1950, and the supplemental agreements signed January 7, 1952 and November 17, 1953. When the equipment furnished by the United States is no longer needed for the purpose for which originally made available, Belgium would pursuant to these agreements, offer to return it to the United States. At this time the Governments of Canada and the United States would agree to an arrangement for redistribution of the aircraft and support equipment in the interest of mutual security or for other disposition or repossession consistent with the equities of our two Governments.

If the above proposed plan of action is acceptable to you, we would propose that this letter together with your reply of acceptance constitute an arrangement between your Ministry and the Department of the Air Force as to terms under which the U.S. Air Force can immediately initiate offshore procurement contractual arrangements with CCC representatives. We hope to obligate funds for this program prior to 30 June 1957.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. DOUGLAS

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], May 31, 1957

Dear Mr. Secretary:

In the absence of Mr. Campney from Ottawa, I am replying to your letter of May 28, 1957, on the subject of provision of CF100's to Belgium.

The plan of action set out in your letter concerning the furnishing of 53 Mark V CF100 aircraft to Belgium together with a quantity of 2.75" FFAR rockets and other support for the aircraft is acceptable to me. Your letter together with this reply shall constitute an arrangement as to the terms under which you may immediately initiate contractual action with Canadian Commercial Corporation representatives for the procurement of the CF100 aircraft.

The basis of converting U.S. dollars to Canadian dollars set out in the third paragraph of your letter is, I understand, for the purpose only of converting the 25% Canadian share based on your contribution of $32,062,800 U.S. dollars to Canadian dollars, that is $10,276,538 Canadian. To the extent that Canada's costs, which will be in Canadian dollars, are more or less than this figure, the difference will be shared on a 75% United States-25% Canada basis.

We will proceed with the completion of aircraft delivery arrangements, ground handling equipment lists and other details that will be subject to mutual agreement between the Canadian and Belgian governments. When we have worked out in detail the support to be provided by Canada, we will send you the details and estimated costs.

I have noted your agreement to entry of Belgian students into MG-2 training by Canada beginning January 1, 1958, contingent on reasonable care being taken so that detailed drawings which might compromise the system are not released prior to July 1, 1958, and that you are again reviewing the desirability of releasing the tuneable magnetron and the anti-chaff synchronizer. We will take the agreed steps to comply with the security restriction on the release of the MG-2 fire control system.

Under Canadian law, the title to defence equipment furnished as Mutual Aid passes to the recipient nation which undertakes responsibility for its use to strengthen the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as well as certain obligations with respect to disposal when it is no longer required for that purpose. To conform with our respective laws, it will be necessary for the United States to deal with redistribution or disposition of the aircraft and support furnished by the United States when that question arises, and in the event any of the support provided by Canada is available for redistribution or disposal, it will be dealt with in accordance with Canadian law and procedures. I am sure this will work out satisfactorily.

It has not been the practice in Canada to issue press releases with respect to specific Mutual Aid transactions of this kind, but, if you wish to do so, we will follow suit in this case and, in that event, I think it would be desirable to coordinate the timing and the information given in the releases of the United States, Canada and Belgium. I would appreciate your views on this matter. It is our policy to advise the Standing Group of the content of our Mutual Aid programmes and I assume you would have no objection to our doing so in this case.

I am indeed pleased that the discussions that have taken place on this matter have culminated in these satisfactory mutual arrangements in the support of the objectives of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Yours sincerely,

MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME, 1956-57; POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF 75 SABRE V
AIRCRAFT TO GERMANY

31. The Minister of National Defence said the N.A.T.O. Annual Review Committee had recommended, in December last, that the best contribution Canada could make at the present time was the provision of high performance aircraft as mutual aid.¹³

A mutual aid programme of $143 million had been provided for in the estimates for next year. Included in it was an item of 75 Sabre V aircraft. When the Minister was in Paris, he had discussed with the N.A.T.O. military authorities where these aircraft might be sent, and had been advised that the most suitable destination was West Germany. The United States defence authorities had been consulted and had agreed that this would be desirable. It had also been suggested to German officials that they might usefully visit the Air Division in Europe to study the operations and characteristics of these aircraft. Meanwhile, Canadair had been trying to sell F86s to Germany and he understood the German government would soon be calling for bids from Canadair on the F86 and from the United Kingdom on Hunter aircraft. He was most anxious to keep any possible sale quite separate from a mutual aid transfer. In particular, he wished to avoid the European agent of Canadair suggesting that mutual deliveries would be provided if Germany bought some planes directly from Canadair. In the circumstances, if it was thought desirable that the 75 Sabre Vs be transferred to Germany, he would have the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff discuss the matter with the Standing Group in Washington, and ask the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn to raise it officially with the Germany authorities.

The Minister circulated a memorandum on the detailed mutual aid programme for 1956-57. This included an estimated carry-over of direct production items of $3.75 million and a new programme to maintain facilities of $2.98 million; contributions to infrastructure and military budgets of $16.9 million and $1.5 million respectively; N.A.T.O. air crew training of $53 million and equipment acquired before and after March 31st, 1950, with a total of $64 million, (the most significant item being the 75 aircraft, valued at $39 million).

32. During the discussion it was emphasized that it would be highly inappropriate for a private company to intimate that it could influence the government's decisions on mutual aid transfers.

33. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the proposed transfer of aircraft to Germany, and agreed that, provided the N.A.T.O. Standing Group agreed, 75 Mark V F86 aircraft be transferred to West Germany as part of the 1956-57 mutual aid programme.

MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME, 1956-57; POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF 75 SABRE V

(PREVIOUS REFERENCE FEB. 2)

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the N.A.T.O. Standing Group had recommended that the 75 Sabre Mark V aircraft, included in the Canadian mutual aid programme for the next fiscal year, should be transferred to West Germany. It was not known whether the Germans would accept this offer but, if they did, Canadair would try to sell as many more of these planes as it could to the German government. This might well lead to charges that the Canadian government had made a deal with Canadair and was becoming involved in a big way in the arms exporting business. Such criticism, however, would appear somewhat ludicrous, particularly as the transfer was in aid of a N.A.T.O. partner and had been recommended by the highest N.A.T.O. military authorities.

4. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the N.A.T.O. Standing Group had recommended that 75 Sabre Mark V aircraft, included in the Canadian mutual aid programme for 1956-57, be transferred to Germany.

MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME 1956-57

8. The Minister of National Defence recommended that the detailed mutual aid programme he had previously submitted be approved.

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, when the standing group had agreed to the transfer of 75 Mark V F86 aircraft to Germany, he had immediately instructed the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn to make a formal offer to the German government. At almost the same time, the German Minister of Finance had announced that Germany would not make any more contributions towards the cost of N.A.T.O. forces in that country. This would mean an added annual burden to the United Kingdom of £80 million and to Canada of $1.5 million. The U.K. were most upset about this and proposed to take the matter up with Chancellor Adenauer. Apart from the financial implications, it was politically unwise to give Germany mutual aid at a time when she appeared to be breaking an agreement. The matter was further complicated by the possibility of Germany buying some F86's from Canadair instead of Hunters from the U.K. In the circumstances, he had instructed the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn to defer making an approach to the Germans at this time.

A disturbing piece of news had come to his attention to the effect that Canadair was discussing sales of F86's with Saudi Arabia. The company had been told firmly that no export permits for such sales could possibly be expected.

10. The Cabinet,

(a) approved a mutual aid programme for 1956-57 of $143 million, as submitted by the Minister of National Defence; and,

(b) agreed that the offer to West Germany as mutual aid of 75 Sabre Mark V aircraft, included in the programme, be deferred for the present.

Ottawa, February 9, 1956

Dear General Foulkes,

The Canadian Embassy in Bonn have reported that at least two German newspapers have recently made critical editorial comment on the exclusion of Germans from Canada's NATO Air Training Programme. Attached you will find a translation of an editorial† which appeared in Hamburg and Augsburg papers on January 16 and 18, respectively. Both newspapers are described as "independent" in politics.

2. This kind of comment raises, it seems to me, two questions. First, whether there is any guidance we can give to the Canadian Embassy in Bonn in dealing with such critical comment; and secondly (and this is really tied to the first question) whether the time has not come to seek a reconsideration by Ministers of the Cabinet Defence Committee decision of November 12, 1954.¹⁵

3. Since this decision was taken several new developments have occurred which might justify reconsideration of this matter by Ministers. In particular, German rearmament in pursuance of the Paris Agreements and under NATO auspices has now got under way and as a contribution to that rearmament the Cabinet is considering the transfer of Orندا-equipped F-86 aircraft under Canadian Mutual Aid. The use of Canadian military aircraft by the Germans for their defence would inevitably draw attention to the problem of training the aircrew required for their operation. Moreover, there is the general but I think very important political consideration that the Germans are likely to interpret the exclusion of German airmen from Canada as an indication that we consider them to be merely second-class members of NATO. Particularly in view of the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Federal Republic and the Soviet Union it has become increasingly important for us to demonstrate to the Germans that we regard them as full and equal partners. I understand that the Federal German Republic is making arrangements with the United States to provide for the training of German aircrew. It may be that these arrangements will fully cover German requirements. Nevertheless, I believe that for the political considerations I have mentioned it may be desirable that Canada should be in a position to offer some training facilities to Germany or at least to let it be known that we would sympathetically consider such a request from the German authorities if it were made through the established channels. Whether the Germans took advantage of the offer or not, any suggestion of discrimination against them would be removed.

4. I should therefore like to have your comments: (a) on any guidance which might be given to the Canadian Embassy in Bonn on the German criticism of the statements alleged to have been made by a spokesman of the Department of National Defence, and (b) on the desirability of making an early submission to the Cabinet Defence Committee of a recommendation to reconsider their decision of November 12, 1954.

Ottawa, February 20, 1956

Dear Mr. Léger:

Thank you very much for your letter of 9 February in which you draw to my attention editorial comment in German newspapers on the exclusion of Germans from Canada's NATO Air Training Programme. I was shocked and surprised to read these two editorials because I have not seen or heard anything of this kind in Canada.

I have had a thorough search made in this Department regarding press comment on Canadian participation in German pilot training and I find that there was an article by ¹⁵ Voir Volume 20, les documents 261 et 164./See Volume 20, Documents 261 and 264.

Frank Swanson published in the Ottawa Citizen on 5 January, 1956 (copy attached). Another comment was made by Arthur Blakeley in the Montreal Gazette on 18 January, 1956, which comment is attached. You will observe that there has been no suggestion that Canada would be unwilling to train pilots; in fact the whole tenor of these remarks is that there is no reason why future pilots of the new German Air Force should not be trained in NATO air training schools in Canada.

As a result of this I asked the Director of Public Relations to informally discuss this matter with Mr. Klaus Neumann, correspondent for the German Press Agency in the Press Gallery. Mr. Dumsday reports that during his conversation Mr. Neumann stated that the editorials appearing in the German newspapers as supplied by the Canadian Embassy in Bonn were distortions of a news story he had filed with his Agency. He stated that the portion of his story on the possibility of German aircrew training in Canada credited to "an official spokesman" followed much the same line as in the attached story by Frank Swanson in the Citizen. The portion regarding "unpleasant public relations" to such a training scheme was based on his (Mr. Neumann's) own opinion following conversations "in public circles" in Ottawa. The papers concerned had obviously developed the "unpleasant public reactions" theme to the extreme and most of it, particularly the last two paragraphs, was not supplied by Neumann. Mr. Neumann further said he wanted to make it very clear that none of this "public reaction" material came from government circles, as he did not want to spoil his "good relations" with National Defence and other departments.

I think you will see from the tenor of the two articles appearing in the Canadian papers and the statements made by Neumann that there is no connection between the editorials which appeared in the German papers in Hamburg and Augsburg and the remarks of any spokesman of this Department.

In regard to the second suggestion you have made, of the desirability of an early submission to Cabinet Defence Committee to consider offering training vacancies to Germany, I would point out that it is not our practice to offer vacancies to any country but to offer a group of vacancies to the Standing Group and for nations to put in their applications to the Standing Group for training spaces. So far the German representative on the Military Representatives Committee has not made any request for vacancies. As you are aware, the United States has announced its plan for training the Germans. The bulk of them will be trained in Europe and only a few specialists are being brought to the United States.

I would further add that we have already had some informal discussions with the Standing Group on the reduction and the eventual closing down of the NATO air training scheme in Canada as our authority for the expenditure of funds on NATO air training expires in March, 1958. We have already proposed to the Standing Group that after June, 1957, we would hope to restrict air training in Canada to those NATO nations who have no air training systems of their own and by 1958 to close down the NATO air training scheme. Therefore I would not consider it practical or profitable to suggest, at the same time as we are giving notice of closing down the air training scheme in respect of the countries already training pilots in Canada, that we start training German pilots. If, as a result of the proposed offer to deliver F86's to Germany as mutual aid, the Germans require some limited training of technicians on F86's, we would hope to do this in Germany but this would be treated as a special case.

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], March 2, 1956

SUPPORT OF CANADIAN FORCES IN GERMANY AND TRANSFER OF AIRCRAFT
AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

I attach a draft† memorandum to Cabinet which has been prepared in the Department of National Defence on the subject of the support of Canadian forces in Germany and the transfer of aircraft as Mutual Aid to Germany. This memorandum is intended to clarify the Government's position on the offer of 75 F-86's as Mutual Aid to Germany and to suggest the position Canada should take with regard to the negotiations with the Federal Republic of Germany on support costs for forces stationed in Germany.

2. You will recall that we have had in mind the impact of the offer of F-86's on the Canadian service interest in having financed additional capital costs for Canadian forces in Germany. We also were concerned lest the combined effect of the gift and the possible sale of F-86's by Canadair would deprive the United Kingdom of significant export earnings of Hawker Hunters and possibly give rise to the necessity of our contributing through NATO to the support of the United Kingdom forces in Germany.

3. You will see that the memorandum suggests that the Three Powers be informed of our general position including our intention to offer Mutual Aid before any offer is made to the Germans. This advance consultation would lessen the likelihood of any objection from the United Kingdom at a later stage. Moreover, the fact that we are offering F-86's without any strings attached should remove any impression that we are using the offer to get business for Canadair which might otherwise have gone to United Kingdom manufacturers.

4. With respect to the question of our own capital costs in Germany, the arrangement proposed would seem to be the most suitable one for ensuring that appropriate costs would be met in a manner consistent with our general relations towards Germany. As you will see, it is proposed that bilateral talks should be arranged with Germany on this subject if there is no objection from the Three Powers.

5. An assumption underlying this memorandum is that the Canadian Government would be prepared to continue paying the maintenance costs of Canadian forces stationed in Germany. This attitude also would seem to be in keeping with our relations with Germany as an independent country and a member of NATO.

6. This memorandum has been the subject of fairly prolonged consultation with the Departments of National Defence and Finance and since the recommendations in paragraph 6 appear to safeguard the major interests of this Department in this matter, I would recommend that you agree.

7. I should be grateful to know if you concur in the attached memorandum.

8. The negotiations between the Federal Republic and the United Kingdom, United States and France are to begin shortly, if they have not already begun, and our Ambassador in Bonn has asked whether or not Canada will be participating in them. I consider that it would be helpful to Mr. Ritchie to know what recommendations are being considered by Ministers and I attach for your signature, if you agree, a telegram† to him containing this information.

J. L[ÉGER]

P.S. I should add that there is still a possibility that the Department of Finance may wish to alter the language of some of the recommendations in order to bring out even more clearly that our offer of Mutual Aid is not tied to any obligation on the part of the Germans to place commercial orders for fighter aircraft in Canada.¹⁶ We feel that there is no implication in the present draft that our Mutual Aid offer is subject to any such condition but if Finance succeeds in getting this point made more explicitly, we consider that such a revision would be acceptable — or even possibly desirable — from the point of view of this Department.¹⁷

SUPPORT OF CANADIAN FORCES IN GERMANY AND TRANSFER OF AIRCRAFT
AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

1. The Canadian Ambassador in Bonn has informed us that preliminary negotiations on the question of funds for the support of NATO forces stationed in Germany have begun between the United Kingdom, the United States, France and the Federal Republic of Germany. He has reported that it is evident that these negotiations will be protracted, difficult and bitter, and he has stated that it might be preferable for Canada to avoid becoming directly involved in them.

2. Since November, 1951, when Canadian Armed Forces were assigned to NATO command in Western Europe, Canada has been paying for the operation and maintenance costs of her forces stationed in Germany. The accommodation for these forces (camps, airfields, etc.), except Married Quarters and Schools, has been financed in Germany entirely from "occupation funds" and "support funds" made available by the Government of the Federal Republic to France, the United Kingdom and the United States. Married Quarters and p.s. and I don't fully agree with the first sentence of para. 4. The present policy of paying in full the maintenance costs of Canadian Forces has been welcomed by the Germans &, I think, by the Americans. It has not facilitated the position of the French and the U.K. in their dealings with the Germans. J. L[éger]

Schools for dependent children have been provided by the Federal Republic under a rental guarantee agreement.

3. There are certain capital facilities required for the Canadian Forces in Germany which have not been financed from the support funds currently being made available to the United States, United Kingdom and France by the Federal Republic for the period ending May 5, 1956. These capital facilities include the additional accommodation at the airfields at Zweibrucken and Baden-Soellingen required for the All-Weather Fighter Squadrons which are to be located there and estimated to cost in total $1,557,000. Additional married quarters would be desirable to accommodate some of the 1,000 plus families of Canadian servicemen who cannot be accommodated in the present housing, as well as dormitories for single school teachers who are now occupying married quarters. Some increase in the schools may also be necessary. It is believed the costs of the housing, etc., would be in the order of $5 million, which, on a rental basis similar to that for the present housing, would involve $500,000 a year guaranteed for five years.

4. The present Canadian policy of paying in full the maintenance costs of Canadian Forces stationed in Germany has worked to Canada's advantage in its relations with the other governments concerned. If this policy is continued, and it would appear desirable in the circumstances of the present negotiations that it should be, Canada's interest in the negotiations with the Federal Republic respecting the support of the forces will be confined to obtaining the funds necessary for the capital facilities required by the Canadian Forces in Germany.

5. The financing of the essential capital requirements of the Canadian Forces in Germany could possibly be arranged, as an alternative to seeking an allocation from support costs, by entering into bilateral arrangements with the Government of the Federal Republic to have that Government construct the necessary facilities. It would be opportune to suggest bilateral discussions for this purpose at a time that an offer of F-86 aircraft to the Federal Republic is made. The offer of these aircraft to the Federal Republic has been discussed with and approved by the Standing Group.

6. I therefore recommend, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance, that:

(1) Canada should inform the governments of France, United Kingdom and the United States, through their representatives at Bonn:

(a) that Canada has decided to offer 75 F-86 aircraft to the Federal Republic of Germany as Mutual Aid;

(b) that while the Mutual Aid offer would not have any special conditions attached to it, Canada would suggest to the Federal Republic, at the time the offer is made, subsequent bilateral discussion of the provision of accommodation at the airfields at Zweibrucken and Soellingen necessary to the stationing of CF-100 squadrons at these fields and any other accommodation that may be needed by the Canadian forces located in Germany. In the event that the Federal Republic was receptive to bilateral arrangements of this character, Canada would seek no assistance from any funds allocated to support costs;

(c) Canada prefers to leave to the three Powers the negotiations with the Federal Republic concerning a further German contribution to the support of NATO forces stationed in Germany. Unless satisfactory arrangements have been made for bilateral discussions of the provision of Canadian accommodation needs, Canada would wish to have assurance that if funds for the support of the forces are provided, consideration will be given to allocating to Canada funds for the construction of the necessary facilities to accommodate CF-100 squadrons at Zweibrucken and Soellingen, estimated to cost in the order of $1,600,000, and other essential accommodation if any should be required by Canadian forces during the period for which funds for the support of the forces are made available. Canada would be prepared, in these circumstances, to continue the present Canadian policy of paying the maintenance costs of Canadian forces stationed in Germany.

(2) The Canadian Ambassador at Bonn be instructed, after the action outlined in 1 above has been completed:

(a) to offer to the Federal Republic of Germany 75 F-86 aircraft as Canadian Mutual Aid during the fiscal year 1956-57;

(b) provided that no objection has been received from the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States, to propose that the provision of accommodation required by the Canadian Forces in Germany be discussed on a bilateral basis.

SUPPORT OF CANADIAN FORCES IN GERMANY AND TRANSFER OF AIRCRAFT AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

29. The Minister of National Defence said that negotiations between the United Kingdom, France, and the United States on the one hand, and the Federal Republic of Germany on the other, over funds for the support of N.A.T.O. forces in Germany would likely be difficult and the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn felt it would be preferable for Canada to avoid becoming directly involved.

Canada paid for the operation and maintenance costs of its forces in Germany. Accommodation, in the main, had been financed from funds made available to France, the U.K., and the U.S. and some married quarters and schools had been rented direct from the Germans. Capital facilities, amounting to about $1.5 million still remained to be provided, and additional housing to cost about $5 million would also be desirable. Canadian interest in the present negotiations should be confined to obtaining the funds necessary for these added capital facilities. Alternatively, bilateral arrangements might be made for the Federal Republic to construct the necessary facilities, and the proposed offer of F86 aircraft might present a suitable opportunity to suggest discussions on the subject.

The Minister recommended, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance, that the U.K., U.S., and France be informed that Canada proposed to offer 75 F86's as mutual aid to Germany, that bilateral discussions would be suggested for the provision of added capital facilities in Germany, and that Canada preferred to stay outside of the discussion on support costs, though, if nothing resulted from the bilateral talks, Canada would expect to receive a share of the funds allotted for the support of N.A.T.O. forces. He also proposed that when these matters had been discussed with the countries mentioned, the F86's be formally offered to Germany, and that bilateral talks be held with the Federal Republic on the extra facilities and accommodation needed for the forces.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, March 6, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 59-56).

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs agreed that it would be useful to discuss these matters with the French, British and Americans. It would be desirable, however, before making a final decision on the F86 offer to see what the reaction would be from these preliminary talks. The British might be very annoyed at a substantial offer of mutual aid to Germany at a time when that country was particularly prosperous and not bearing her fair share of the common N.A.T.O. defence. The proposal was sound from the defence point of view but that had to be balanced against any political embarrassment that might occur. The instructions to be given in these matters should therefore be appropriately modified.

31. The Cabinet approved in principle the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence on the attitude to be adopted regarding the negotiations for the support of Canadian forces in Germany and the transfer of F86 aircraft as mutual aid to Germany; it being understood that the United Kingdom, the United States, and France would be informed that Canada was now considering the offer of 75 F86 aircraft to Germany as mutual aid and that Germany would not be advised of this offer until such time as the discussions with the U.K., the U.S., and France had been held.

SUPPLY OF F-86 AIRCRAFT TO GERMANY

In accordance with your suggestion we have asked our Missions in Washington, London and Paris to endeavour to expedite the receipt of comments on our proposed offer of these aircraft, in the light of discussions currently taking place with the Germans on support costs. So far no definitive comments have been received and Washington has expressed doubt that United States views will be available by the time Cabinet meets. London in an interim reply indicates difficulty in defining the United Kingdom attitude on the related problem of Canadian accommodation in Germany.

Although we can understand the reluctance of the Departments of Trade and Commerce and National Defence to delay this offer further we would hesitate to agree to proceeding before we have the views of the three powers, particularly as we have already implied that we would await their reaction before going ahead. Recent reports from Bonn indicate a strong preference in the German Air Force for Canadian Sabre aircraft and a considerable likelihood in consequence that Canadair will be successful in making a sale. Such an order would undoubtedly be welcome. If, however, it appeared that we were using our Mutual Aid to attract this business (which might be the impression created if we now go ahead without waiting for reactions), we might expect rather severe criticism from the United Kingdom on the grounds that we were subsidizing our aircraft exports and depriving them of orders which they might have secured on a competitive basis. Not only will the United Kingdom be concerned at the loss of orders for its aircraft industry as such, but must also consider the effect on its general balance of payments position and on its need for Deutschmark exchange in the event of curtailment and possible cessation of German support payments. Our own trade with the United Kingdom might be affected.

There has been very little time since the Cabinet decision for our missions to obtain the views of the three governments on this rather difficult question and for the reasons given above I would hesitate to recommend action until these views have been ascertained. If the offer were made and the United Kingdom subsequently raised objections it would be difficult to avoid the implication that it was intended at very least to encourage subsequent purchases of similar aircraft from Canadair.

SUPPLY OF F-86 AIRCRAFT TO GERMANY

We have now received word from Paris, London and Washington on the reaction to our proposed offer of aircraft to the Federal Republic and the concurrent suggestion for bilateral negotiations with the Germans on provision of accommodation for Canadian forces. Our Embassy in Paris has been informed that the French Government has no objection to our offering the aircraft, but the United Kingdom and the United States doubt the desirability of taking the action we propose at this time.

The Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations has informed our High Commissioner that the United Kingdom Government have no objection to bilateral negotiations between Canada and Germany or to our offering the aircraft, but expresses the fear that it might embarrass them in their current negotiations were our own discussions to be initiated during the early stages of those negotiations. The United Kingdom Government suggest a postponement of our approach for a month, or six weeks at the most, and undertake to inform us as soon as their negotiations have developed sufficiently to enable us to proceed without embarrassing them. The State Department, while expressing appreciation of our considering the offer of aircraft to Germany has asked us to delay making the offer for a month or two. They are afraid that if we offer the aircraft at this time the German position on support costs may harden still more and the Germans may proceed to request additional equipment from the United States, who would be unwilling to supply it at this time.

In view of the reaction of London and Washington I would recommend that both the offer of aircraft and the proposal for bilateral negotiations be again postponed until they can be made without embarrassment to the Three Powers. While I am not impressed particularly by some of the United States reasoning about the likely German reaction to our offer I think it would be embarrassing were we to proceed to disregard their views.

If Ministers are reluctant to accept postponement for an indeterminate period, especially in view of the increasing likelihood of German purchase of Canadian aircraft on a commercial basis (which, though not directly connected with our offer is nevertheless a consideration which cannot be disregarded) it might be desirable to set a definite date, say May 5, for making the offer and proposing bilateral negotiations. I would propose in this case that we inform Paris, London and Washington of our intention.

If in the opinion of Ministers this delay is too long, consideration might be given to offering the aircraft on an earlier date, perhaps on April 20 and delaying proposing bilateral negotiations until later.

The objections raised by London and Washington relate solely to the timing of our proposed action, not to its substance, and since the offer of the aircraft is to be unconditional there is no particular reason why the proposal for financial negotiations has to be made simultaneously. Our bilateral negotiations might be expected in any event to derive some benefit from the fact that we were providing aircraft to Germany as mutual aid.

The above courses (which have not been discussed with other Departments) have been outlined for your possible use in case this question may be raised by some other Ministers at tomorrow's Cabinet meeting. If the matter is not brought up, we would propose to consult interdepartmentally on some agreed recommendations to the various Ministers concerned within the next week or ten days.¹⁸

AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

In the light of the information received about the apparent deadlock in the support costs negotiations and of the views expressed by London, Paris, and Washington on the possible impact of our offer of mutual aid and proposal to open bilateral talks for the provision of additional accommodation for Canadian forces, we have decided:

(a) to take no further action in the making of an offer of 75 F86 aircraft as mutual aid at least until the week of May 7 when the matter will be further considered; and

(b) to consider also at that time the question of bilateral talks.

2. We should, therefore, like to be kept informed of developments in the support costs negotiations and of any change in the views on our proposals. In particular we should like a report by May 6th on a re-check of the attitude of the various governments.

TRANSFER OF AIRCRAFT AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY AND SUPPORT
OF CANADIAN FORCES IN GERMANY

We have, as you know, informed the United States, the United Kingdom and France of our pending mutual aid offer of 75 F86 aircraft to West Germany. The three Powers have also been kept informed of our intention to open bilateral talks with the Germans for the provision of additional accommodation for Canadian forces in Germany. The reactions of the United States, United Kingdom and France that a Canadian initiative at an early stage in the multilateral support costs negotiations which they had underway with the Germans might embarrass them, were taken into consideration in our deferment of the offer and of the bilateral approach. However, now that the principal sending States (US, UK, France) and some of the others have, as a result of the breakdown of the multilateral negotiations, entered into bilateral talks with the German Government in an effort to obtain what they can for the support of their national forces in Germany, we see no reason any longer to defer taking action.

2. Cabinet has agreed that you may now proceed to offer to the West German Government 75 F86 aircraft equipped with the Orenda engine to be supplied as Mutual Aid during the fiscal year 1956-57.

3. This offer is being made on the recommendation of the Supreme Allied Commander and with the concurrence of the Standing Group. As you are aware the matter has been discussed with United States authorities and it has been agreed that if this offer is accepted, Canada and the United States will work together to arrange a satisfactory procedure to ensure that the United States and Canadian air programmes do not conflict.

4. Details of the timing of deliveries, provisions of group handling equipment, supplies of spare parts, etc., will have to be worked out if and when the German authorities indicate that they accept this offer.

5. It is of the utmost importance that there should be no publicity about this matter until the offer has been made and reported to the Atlantic Council.

6. Canadian policy has been, and no departure is intended in this case, that no strings or conditions be attached to Mutual Aid offers. The offer of 75 F86 aircraft is to be made on this basis. We are, however, anxious to reach an early solution to the financing of the additional capital facilities required by our forces in Germany. These facilities consist of additional accommodation at the airfields at Zweibrücken and Baden-Soellingen needed for the operation of the all-weather CF-100 fighter squadrons to be located there, and the accommodation is estimated to cost a total of $1,557,000. (It is no longer our intention to raise the question of additional married quarters as we propose to provide these through a rental guarantee agreement along the lines of the one already in effect). Therefore, the only outstanding capital accommodation consists of the airfield requirements.

7. We should like to repeat that no conditions are attached to the Mutual Aid offer, and it is to be made entirely separately of any representations you make on behalf of our capital requirements. These requirements we should like to see financed by the German Government considering that our past capital needs in Germany in support of the common NATO defence effort have been met from funds made available by Germany to its NATO allies as provided for in the Finance Convention and a protocol to the Paris Agreements. It may be well to remind the Germans that since 1951 when Canadian forces were stationed in Germany, their maintenance and support have been paid by the Canadian Government at no cost to the Germans.

8. We should like you to make the Mutual Aid offer as soon as convenient after receipt of this telegram. We are anxious to receive an early indication from the Germans as to whether or not they accept the offer, and you might let them know that an early expression of their views would be appreciated. Please let us know when you have made the offer.

9. We leave to your discretion when to take up the question of our capital requirements. It might be convenient when you are making the Mutual Aid offer to mention that there is an outstanding matter concerning capital requirements for the Canadian forces that you would like to discuss at an early mutually agreeable date. On the other hand, should the atmosphere be particularly receptive when talking about the F86s, we see no harm in discussing the other matter so long as care is taken that the Germans are not led to believe that the meeting of our capital requirements is a "quid pro quo" for obtaining the aircraft or that the two questions are in any way connected. You could mention also that you propose to take up in the near future the question of an additional rental agreement to cover further married quarters accommodation.

10. The following are the particulars of the capital accommodation required at the airfields in question:

We have been informed that Mr. Redpath of Canadair is planning to go to Bonn almost immediately to discuss the possibility of selling a quantity of F-86 aircraft to the German Government. After discussion with US Trade and Commerce have advised Canadair that it would be most unwise from their point of view and ours for Redpath to become involved in negotiations with the Germans before we have received Germany's acceptance of our offer of F-86's under Mutual Aid. Canadair have also been told that even in discussions with the Germans at a later stage they should avoid any impression that our Mutual Aid offer was linked in any way with the placing of commercial orders subsequently with Canadair. As you know, we feel that it would be very unfortunate if the Germans or the U.K. were to conclude that our offer was connected with the promotion of sales of Canadian aircraft.

2. Redpath will probably nevertheless proceed to Bonn but we understand that he will not engage immediately in negotiations directly with the Germans. He will certainly not expect assistance from you before you receive instructions from us in the light of the German reply to our Mutual Aid offer. At that time we may authorize you to provide him with introductions and other kinds of assistance normally regarded as appropriate in connection with the activities of representatives of any Canadian commercial firm.

F-86 AIRCRAFT AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

My telegram 153 from Air Attaché to CAS contains the Air Attaché's report of a conversation which he had on June 2 with the German Chief of Air Staff. This interview was arranged at the request of the German authorities to discuss military and technical aspects of our Mutual Aid offer.

2. As you will see the German military authorities are reluctant in terms of the combat effectiveness of the German Air Force in 1958 to accept offer. However no decision has yet been reached by the German Government and it is quite possible that the financial, political over-all defence considerations involved in turning down the offer may in the end prevail with the German authorities to make them decide to accept it. Meanwhile as you will see from the Air Attaché's report the Germans are asking the Department of National Defence for figures on the cost of maintaining the F-86's in spare parts and introducing them into the German Air Force. It is likely that these figures will play an important if not decisive part in determining the German answer. If the German military authorities can show that the maintenance of the F-86's and the provision of spare parts is likely to prove a very costly item they will probably use this as an argument with the Finance Ministry against acceptance of the offer. I suggest that we should be careful to state to the Germans that they represent Canadian experience of cost of spare parts replacement and that we are not repeat not in a position to estimate what the cost to the Germans may be.

3. One disconcerting feature of this whole business is the indication from the German service authorities that it is the American offer of F-100 aircraft that has been decisive in making them recommend against the acceptance of our F-86 offer. We have shown our Air Attaché's report on his conversation with the German Chief of Air Staff to an official of the United States Embassy here, pointing out that the German reluctance to accept our Mutual Aid offer would doubtless puzzle the authorities in Ottawa who had been proceeding on the assumption that the offer made on the recommendation of SACEUR with the concurrence of the Standing Group and after discussions with the United States authorities would be gratefully accepted. He maintained that there was no real overlapping in Canadian and United States aid repeat aid programmes. He confirmed however that the Germans have recently been advised of the availability in 1958 on a procurement basis of F-100 aircraft although they have known for some time that these would be likely to be available to them. In addition he stated, the Americans will probably offer Germany 150 F-100 aircraft free of charge by substituting the equivalent dollar value of the aircraft, F-84's etc., covered by the Nash commitment. In 1958 (as now) the Germans will have available more aircraft than pilots. Our F-86 offer, if accepted, will therefore mean a reduction in the flow of United States aircraft supplied as Mutual Aid and/or on a procurement basis. Nevertheless the Germans might prefer F-86 aircraft in 1958 to the F-84 type.

4. The United States official added that in his opinion the German Air Force might well find that their own plans would have to be altered when the Canadian offer was considered in terms of its political, financial over-all defence implications. In the latter context the use of F-86 aircraft (as opposed to F-100 aircraft) need not necessarily imply a reduction in the military effectiveness of the German Defence Forces in 1958. Funds released which might otherwise be spent to procure F-100 aircraft could be applied against the real financial gap in the German defence build-up. He was inclined to guess that if logistic costs were not excessive the Germans would in the end accept our offer.

REPORT ON THE MUTUAL AID OFFER OF 75 F-86 AIRCRAFT TO GERMANY

Following a decision of the Cabinet on May 24, the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn was instructed to offer 75 F-86 aircraft to the Federal Republic of Germany as part of the Mutual Aid programme for 1956-57. Furthermore, Mr. Ritchie was instructed to take up with the German authorities the question of the financing by the German Government of certain additional capital facilities at two airfields in Germany occupied by the Royal Canadian Air Force, required for the operation of the CF-100 All-weather fighter, making it clear that the second matter was not dependent on the first.

2. The formal approach to the German authorities was made by the Ambassador on May 26, and since then the Germans have had under consideration the offer and the request for capital facilities. The granting of the request is related to some extent to the outcome of the bilateral discussions between the Governments with forces stationed in Germany and the German authorities on the continuation by Germany of the payment of "support" costs. (Canada pays for the maintenance of its own forces in Germany, but the capital requirements for the forces have, in the past, been met by "occupation" and "support" funds made available by Germany to the United States, United Kingdom and France.)

3. Since making the formal Mutual Aid offer, the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn has reported on the developments which have taken place. While the Germans have expressed their appreciation of the offer, they have told the Ambassador that its acceptance raises a number of important questions. They have explained that the German Airforce is still at the planning stage and must be confined to the limitations laid down in the Paris Treaties. For this reason the Germans will not be in a position to accept deliveries of aircraft before 1958, and it is their hope to equip their new Airforce with the best aircraft available for the purpose at that time. The United States has made a Mutual Assistance offer of F-100 aircraft which will be available to the Germans in 1958. This aircraft is of a more recent design than the F-86 and the German authorities appear to be leaning towards building their fighter strength around this type. However, no firm decision has been reached by the Germans and it is not expected that they will make a formal reply to our offer until all the factors are carefully considered. One of these factors is the cost of maintaining the F-86. This information and answers to other questions of logistics will be supplied to the Germans.

F-86 AIRCRAFT AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

Redpath of Canadair called June 7. Although he had planned busy itinerary of visits in Bonn, he has been most co-operative and will refrain from asking contacts with German officials while our offer is being considered. He expressed regret that German Treasury cannot now be informed of long term credit arrangements which Canadair can offer for purchase of Sabres Mark VI. He is apprehensive that USA and UK aircraft firms will be making sales proposals while Canadair must defer its contact.

2. You are no doubt aware that there seems to be widespread knowledge of offer both here and in United Kingdom. Information given to governments apparently has resulted in uncomfortably large number of people aware of offer. Although I think German officials will be discreet it would not surprise me if press picked up and published this information from one source or another. Moreover there would remain some residual risk that even if Germans do not accept offer there might still be newspaper stories which would scarcely be welcome. Perhaps some thought should be given to the line to be taken in this eventuality.

3. We are not in a position here to do more than guess as to the ultimate decision of the German Government with respect to our mutual aid offer. The Americans here (who incidentally tell us that the Federal Republic's plan for an airforce buildup may be by no means as inflexible as the Germans themselves would lead us to believe) do not seem to be able to make any reassuring comments it could of course be true that as the Canadian offer was made on the recommendation of SACEUR and after consultation with USA authorities (we seem to have no information as to the extent or form of this consultation) the Americans are under some obligation to see to it that our offer is accepted and acceptable. Certainly the Americans should be anxious to ensure that USA military programs for Germany whether in the form of grants or procurement assistance do not cut across our own effort in this sphere. You may wish to consider discussing with State and Defence Departments in Washington the present situation as I think greater coordination between USA and Canadian programmes could be more effectively achieved by instructions from Washington to USA representatives here. In any event at a minimum the American MAAC Group here should be authorized to discuss our offer with the Germans and help persuade them of the desirability of accepting it.

F86 AIRCRAFT AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

The following RCAF estimates are based on Canadian experience in maintaining one squadron of Sabre F86 aircraft:

- | | |
|---|--------------|
| (a) Initial cost to cover special ground handling equipment, tools, test equipment, but not standard items such as refuellers | $195,000.00 |
| (b) Spares including 6 months pipeline plus one year's consumption | $890,000.00 |

These costs do not include P.O.L. or other costs not peculiar to Sabres. They do not include engine or airframe overhaul which amount to approximately $500,000.00 based on cost of having this work done in the U.K. They do not include provision of factory technical representatives which RCAF estimates to be $60,000.00 per year per wing base of 75 aircraft.

2. It is emphasized that the above costs are for one squadron of 25 aircraft flying at the recommended SHAPE rate for one year. As we do not know what the German plan for operation of these aircraft might be we are using this squadron unit as basis of calculating costs.

3. The government is prepared to have you enter into negotiations with the German authorities for the supply of the above items, (a) and (b), of spares support as additional Canadian Mutual Aid (see paragraph 4 of our DL-144 of May 24) for one year if you consider that the maintenance costs are presenting a difficult situation to Germany and you think that the provision of these spares additional to the engines might favourably influence the Germans into accepting the offer. The factors considered by the government in taking this view were that the U.S. MDAP practice has been to include these items as Mutual Aid and it has been the Canadian practice in providing Mutual Aid aircraft to the U.K., Greece and Turkey. On the other hand, the German position differs from that of these other countries in that Germany should be able to support its own rearmament costs to a much greater extent than the other recipients of F86 aircraft as Mutual Aid.

MUTUAL AID F-86 AIRCRAFT

As we considered that the provision of the spares might favourably influence the German decision with respect to our Mutual Aid offer (your paragraph (4), I informed Scherpenberg of all of the additional spares which would be provided. The Air Attaché also informed Panitzki. Both expressed gratitude at our sympathetic understanding of their problem and promised an early decision regarding the acceptability of our offer.

2. If the Federal Government accepts our offer it is my understanding that the whole transaction should be recorded in an exchange of notes with the Foreign Office.

3. I assume that if our offer is accepted a statement will be made in the House along the lines of that contained in your telegram DL149 May 28.† (Incidentally while the emphasis in that statement on the re-equipping of Canadian squadron may be considered desirable from the Canadian point of view it would not likely provoke the best reaction here where the need for the most modern equipment has been underlined.) I hope that you will be able to let me have the complete text of the statement together with an indication of the time that it is to be delivered.

MUTUAL AID F-86'S OFFER

Our two following paragraphs contain comments by National Defence on your telegram No. 167:

"In the circumstances, it might be desirable to advise the Ambassador that the consultation that has taken place is that of which he is aware as a result of discussions between himself and the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, last December and the various telegrams on this subject that have passed between Ottawa and Washington. The purpose of this consultation was, in the first place, to assure ourselves that the United States had no objection to the offer of these aircraft as Mutual Aid and this was cleared by Mr. Wilson following the discussions that took place at the ministerial meeting of which the Ambassador was informed by the Chairman. Subsequently, the offer was cleared with the State Department and Mr. Ritchie, as I have noted above, is aware of the telegrams on this subject.

2. We have at no time desired more than an exchange of information on this subject to assure ourselves that this offer would not conflict with U.S. plans. Consequently, this consultation does not in any way involve the Americans in an obligation to see to it that the offer is acceptable nor would we wish to involve them in such an obligation. They are aware of the facts and any decision to urge the Germans to accept this offer is a matter which rests solely with them. We do not, therefore, consider that it would be desirable to seek through Washington the insurance of instructions to their MAG representatives in Bonn."

3. In the light of these comments, and taking account of the proposal contained in our telegram No. DL 167 of June 15, we have concluded that it would not be advisable at least at present to make an approach in Washington. Equally, of course, it would now be redundant to propose to the US that there should be joint consideration of the spares and ground handling question.

"Understand that Federal Government will accept our offer. Assume formal exchange of notes could be unclassified and that you would not object to a suitable press release being issued by the German Foreign Office."

2. This indication of probable German acceptance has been welcomed here. Departments concerned have been consulted and Messrs. Howe, Campney and Harris see no objection to issuance of suitable press release by German Foreign Office. We also have no objection to proposal that exchange of notes with German Foreign Office to confirm and accept the offer should be unclassified.

3. We are, however, advising Bonn separately that this exchange should not be so worded that it could be construed as a formal intergovernmental agreement. We are instructing the Embassy to phrase their letter to the Foreign Office in accord with the formula which we use in other NATO capitals in officially submitting an offer of Mutual Aid, so that the form of this offer shall be in no way exceptional.

4. If you and the Prime Minister see no objection to these proposed arrangements (which of course depend upon the expected German acceptance being confirmed), you may wish to inform Bonn directly and repeat your telegram to us for information.

MUTUAL AID — F.86 AIRCRAFT FOR GERMANY

Any announcement at this stage of the supply of aircraft to Germany might well have unfortunate repercussions in the UK and elsewhere feelings in this country are strong on the support agreement, the results of which have just been announced,¹⁹ and the Times of this morning accused Germany of discrimination against Britain. If at this moment it was announced that Canada was making a substantial and generous gift to the Germans and if this were at the same time seen in some quarters as a move to cut British aircraft out of the German market, some bitter things might be said. I have in mind also that such an announcement coming at about the same time as the announcement of the intention to discontinue the air training plan would raise questions about Canadian policy.²⁰ I very much hope, therefore, that the press releases will not be issued in Bonn and that we can postpone an announcement until the matter can be handled to produce a happier impression.

F-86 MUTUAL AID FOR GERMANY

Owing to delays in transmission we have not yet received London's telegram 883 to which you make reference so that we are not in a position to appreciate the considerations involved. I think I should emphasize however that it would be very difficult at this stage to take action vis-à-vis the Germans to delay announcement of the offer and resultant publicity. I have an appointment with Foreign Minister Brentano on Friday July 6 to exchange notes. The Germans are apparently anxious to give formal significance and considerable publicity to this exchange.

2. The situation here is that after rather prolonged and difficult negotiation the Germans have eventually come round to acceptance of the offer. This has involved changes in their planning for their airforce structure which have now been agreed. Any move on our part which suggested that we were contemplating reconsideration of our offer would have most prejudicial effect on Canadian German relations.

3. In view of preparations for exchange of notes on July 6, should appreciate your early instructions.

MUTUAL AID — F-86'S FOR GERMANY

Following for the Minister:

As pointed out in our telegram No. E-179 of July 1, the procedures now proposed have been worked out taking the fullest possible account of U.K. sensibilities. As the Ambassador in Bonn has indicated, the deferment of an announcement could give rise to serious misunderstandings on the part of the Germans (and perhaps others) concerning our intentions. We are, moreover, not clear how a deferment could lead to a significantly "happier impression" in the U.K. without extending for a period so long as in all probability to compromise our position on Bonn completely. On the whole we believe that the present arrangements might be allowed to stand, but that the Ambassador in Bonn might suggest to the Germans that it would assist us considerably if the matter were presented as a normal Mutual Aid transaction (rather than as a special event) as it is our intention to do here.

2. If a brief delay (say a week or so) in the public announcement would be helpful in London, our Ambassador in Bonn might suggest such a deferment to the Germans even though the exchange of notes were to take place on schedule on July 6. Such a delay should presumably govern as well the timing of a statement in the NATO Council.

3. If you are in accord with these views, you may wish to advise the Ambassador in Bonn directly.

MUTUAL AID F-86'S FOR GERMANY

I exchanged notes† with Foreign Minister Brentano this morning on the provision of F-86's as Mutual Aid for Germany (text of notes will be forwarded to you by air bag).²² Brentano expressed the warm gratitude and appreciation of the Federal Government for this gift and asked me to convey to the Canadian Government the deep appreciation of the German Government.

2. I explained to Brentano that it was our practice first to inform the North Atlantic Council of our Mutual Aid contribution before any public announcement was made. I added that I understood that the next meeting of the Council would be on Wednesday, July 11, and that the Canadian representative would communicate this information to the Council on that occasion. I therefore requested that no public announcement should take place in Bonn until Thursday, July 12. Brentano said that he quite understood the situation and the German announcement would be delayed until July 12. In this way we shall have obtained the brief delay referred to in paragraph 2 of our telegram under reference.

3. I confirmed this programme on the telephone with John Holmes in London and I understood that he would clear it with the Minister.

F86's — MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

You may wish to see the Air Attaché's telegram 196 of July 12† to the Chief of Air Staff headed "Implications of acceptance of F86 offer". As you will observe, it has emerged from his preliminary informal conversations with the German Air Force that we may expect requests from the Germans for (a) participation by German pilots for training on Sabres from January to mid-summer 1957; and (b) pretty extensive technical training facilities for German Air Force personnel in the use and maintenance of the Sabre aircraft. In paragraph 4 of your telegram DL173 of June 22† you referred to the political and other implications of training German air crew (but?) state that it would be inappropriate for us at this stage to express any unwillingness to give consideration to a request from Germany for training facilities in connection with the offer of F-86's. So far no formal requests have been received from the German authorities for any training facilities and this eventuality has only come up in conversation with the Air Attaché. It is to be anticipated, however, that requests of the kind mentioned above may be forthcoming. I should, therefore, be grateful to have any preliminary indications which you can give me of our probable attitude towards such requests. I have little doubt that in terms of good relations with the German Air Force and also of the need of the German Air Force for training on Sabres, any such training facilities we could properly afford the Germans would be justified. However, these views ignore the wider policy implications from the Canadian point of view which you are, of course, in a better position to assess than we are here.

TRANSFER OF AIRCRAFT AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY AND SUPPORT OF CANADIAN FORCES IN GERMANY

I received today from Professor Grewe of the Foreign Office the attached Aide Mémoire† (office translation) signifying the agreement of the Federal Republic to meet the costs of the additional capital accommodation required at the RCAF airfields at Zweibrucken and Baden-Sollingen necessary for the operation of the all-weather CF-100 fighter. Professor Grewe stressed that while our request for the financing of the capital facilities was not really regarded by the Germans as a request for an allocation of support costs, any announcement of German agreement with us would probably be included in the announcement which would be issued when the negotiations with the Belgians had been concluded. (Incidentally, the Belgians are still demanding 122 million DM — as an appropriate percentage of the U.K. share — while the Germans are equally insistent that the amount to be paid to Belgium should be 118 million DM, the appropriate percentage of the U.S. share.) In the meantime the Foreign Office would wish us to give no publicity to the arrangements which have now been worked out.

2. You will note that the Aide Mémoire points out that the Federal Republic will include in the Federal budget an amount up to DM 6.585 million to meet the construction costs of the installations to be constructed at Zweibrucken and Baden-Sollingen. This is the DM equivalent (calculated at the rate of 4.20 DM to the dollar) of the 1.568 million Canadian dollars which we estimated to be the cost of the additional construction. Additional points made in the Aide Mémoire, together with my comments, are as follows:

(a) The German share of the cost of the new installations is regarded as a "non-recurring payment" and in accordance with agreements recently concluded with other Sending States the Federal Government considers that paragraph 4, article 4 of the Finance Convention can no longer be applied. This provision is similar in substance to provisions contained in the replies to the United States and the United Kingdom (and we believe to other Sending States). In the case of the reply to the Americans (my letter 526 of June 18†), the Foreign Office spoke of concluding negotiations with the United States on the basis of article 4, paragraph 4 of the Finance Convention.

(b) The Federal Government undertakes to institute all appropriate parliamentary and other measures required for the implementation of the agreement. Professor Grewe told me that it was unlikely that the agreement reached with us or the agreements reached with the other Sending States would be presented to the German Parliament for approval. They would, however, be tabled in the Budget Committee of the Bundestag next fall. I should be glad to receive your views as to how the German contribution is to be absorbed. Presumably the Department of National Defence could make arrangements to go ahead with the necessary construction on the expectation that re-imburement will be made up to the amount set out in the German Aide Mémoire.

(c) The Aide Mémoire expressed the Federal Government's "hope" that Canada will support Germany in the Status of Forces negotiations and ensure that a settlement is reached which, (1) takes into account the sovereignty of the Federal Republic, and (2) does not contain provisions less favourable than those contained in stationing agreements respecting other NATO countries. Similar requests were not included in the Aides Mémoire exchanged with the British and the Americans, although according to the Foreign Office they were contained in separate communications addressed to the Ambassadors of other Sending States in Bonn.

(d) The Aide Mémoire also stresses the importance which the Federal Government attaches to the joint infrastructure programme and particularly to an apportionment of costs based on "principles which have hitherto been applied among older member countries". Again this provision was not included in the Aides Mémoire handed to the other Sending States but instead was contained in separate but related communications.

3. The Foreign Office have told us that no formal reply from us is expected to their Aide Mémoire.

4. It is, I think, worth reporting that the Canadian Mutual Aid offer, combined with our rather modest request for financial support for the Canadian forces in Germany (and also the alleged announcement in Ottawa that Canada was waiving its share of support costs) seems to have created a very favourable impression, at least among German authorities in Bonn. At least five strands of recent evidence would seem to support this contention:

(a) German officials have obviously taken a good deal of pleasure in informing us that the Federal Republic is prepared to meet our full airfield capital requirements. The amounts to be provided to the other Sending States have been arrived at only after prolonged, complicated and often bitter negotiations. Unlike our own, the original requests of all of the other Sending States were whittled down considerably before agreement was reached.

(b) The Foreign Office have been most anxious to ensure that an adequate amount of publicity resulted from our Mutual Aid offer and I believe that in the circumstances we can be reasonably content with the press coverage which accompanied it. In making the announcement the Foreign Office were most anxious to ascribe a relatively high DM value to the Mutual Aid offer; you will recall that the German release pointed to the value of the gift as "more than 150 million DM".

(c) There is, as has been reported separately, a new-found determination on the part of the German Air Force to at least consider seriously the procurement of the F-86 Mark VI aircraft in Canada. You will recall that when our Mutual Aid offer was first broached the Foreign Office were most anxious to ensure that its acceptance involved the Federal Republic in no obligation, implied or otherwise, to purchase additional equipment in Canada. In retrospect I believe that the Germans were honestly suspicious over an unsolicited offer to them of a substantial Mutual Aid contribution with no strings attached. While the U.S. Government has been exceedingly generous in making available military equipment and services to support the German defence build-up, the German authorities have found that the acceptance of an American gift — let alone the acceptance of procurement assistance in the U.S. — is extremely complicated indeed.

(d) In the NATO Status of Forces Conference the German delegate enthusiastically referred to our housing agreement as evidence that Canada had accepted a principle that there should be payment for land which is used for non-military purposes. You will remember, however, that, as reported in our letter No. 614 of July 10,† the Canadian delegate rejected the contention that the housing agreement implied any acceptance by the Canadian Government of such a principle.

(e) As I have reported in a separate communication† today, we were told recently by an official of the Finance Ministry to delay until further notice any action on the letter from the Finance Ministry seeking rent on housing which is being taken over by the Brigade upon release by the Belgians enclosed with my letter No. 614 of July 10. The Finance Ministry official implied that because of our recent generous attitude vis-à-vis the Federal Republic the provisions of this letter might have to be altered.

5. It would, I think, be a mistake to read too much into these recent developments or to consider them all as manifestations of unadulterated gratitude on the part of the Germans. No doubt the Germans for their purposes are happy to hold us up as an example in their negotiations with the other Sending States — a development which understandably is not likely to be in our own long-term interests. It is also possible to conclude that certain German officials seem to have found in our apparent attitude new significance in the phrase "Mutual Aid" as contained in Article III of the North Atlantic Treaty.

For Chief of the Air Staff from Air Attaché Bonn.

Had a lengthy conference yesterday afternoon with General Kammhuber and planning staff. They are really in difficulties about meeting pilot commitments to NATO and I explained our position but said we were most anxious to help within our resources. They have been working long hours trying to find a solution to an almost impossible situation. USAF training system in the USA completely filled with their own trainees plus WGAF cadets for USAF Mutual Aid aircraft. USAF training stations here filled to capacity with WGAF refresher pilot training for USA Mutual Aid aircraft. WGAF training stations designed only to cater to WGAF normal attrition rate after initial build-up completed. But WGAF must have approximately an additional 400 trained if force level promised under Paris Treaty is to be met.

Found during discussion Kammhuber almost baffled by problem and trying to act decisively under direct orders from the Chancellor who he saw yesterday. Evidently told to do something with no expense spared if necessary. Found, too, staff almost naive about how to do things in time and eager for advice and suggestions. Advanced some suggestions for thought in preparation for arrival of Air Commodore Patriarche which included allocation of at least one German station as centre point for Sabre technical training and later use as the build-up got under way for a Sabre OTU. A station will be allocated. Was asked if you could possibly see your way clear to provide training facilities for even a limited number of refresher pilots who might man in stages aircraft at the Sabre OTU beginning by mid-summer 1957.

Explained our position regarding complete training courses for cadets and then was told Germany prepared to meet full cost of training all the approximately four hundred required if there was some way we could manage it. Question.

Would it be possible to re-open a school or schools on a short term basis, two to three years, to deal only with the German requirement? Germans would like intakes to commence April 1957 and first output available summer 1958. Would there be time to prepare between now and first intake April/May 1957?

These discussions led to the question of aircraft. Was asked again about advisability as well as availability of Sabre Sixes. Stated that it seemed to me highly desirable in view of the trained manpower they would have available by 1958 and that aircraft could be produced on schedule as required by any plan we might work out together. Kammhuber finally convinced and decision then taken on the spot to order one complete wing of Sabre Sixes with reserves and complete normal back-up spares and spare engines. I was asked to place the order or convey the message to Canadair. Explained it really should reach Canadair through their own DDP. The order was issued then and there to begin negotiations to sign a letter of intent and contract. Further conversation then revealed distinct possibility of an order for one or more wings further if all went well.

Must explain what I mean "if all went well". Kammhuber said he had what was in effect a blank cheque from the Chancellor. He said what would be the use of having a large number of Sabre Sixes if he had no pilots to fly them when he took delivery of them in 1958 and later. Was prepared to pay full cost of training aircrew requirement and wanted it done in Canada if possible since graduates would be flying Canadian aircraft. But said finally that if we could not help him in this regard then he didn't know what they would do but it might be a mistake to buy Canadian aircraft. Gave me the impression of a man in deep trouble trying to meet the wishes of his Chancellor and the condition, if you like, of no German paid for training facilities no purchase of Canadian aircraft was not in his view a tough attitude but a practical one.

Believe Patriarche should be informed in Washington of this development but cautioned not to discuss it there. Definite order for Sabre Sixes exists now if some way has been devised to meet aircrew requirement. Believe provision would lead to further sales not only in the day fighter field but in others. Would regret sale passing to USA if news of proposition got to them and they offered training facilities on a cash basis before you had taken your decision.

This new development discussed fully with Ambassador. An early decision would be very much appreciated by WGAF and us and if possible during visit of Patriarche in order that he can, if it is an approval in principle, discuss details.

F86'S — MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

1. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, has now let us have his preliminary views on the problems of assisting the German military authorities in training pilots for the F86 aircraft they have accepted as Mutual Aid. General Foulkes points out that at this time it is only possible to let you have his tentative views for your own personal information as these problems are undergoing an active investigation by the RCAF. He assures us, though, that it is the desire of the Department of National Defence that everything possible will be done to assist the German Air Force in its programme to introduce Sabre V aircraft. However, until the extent to which assistance will be required is known, it is very difficult to give a complete outline of the plans of the Department of National Defence.
2. The present tentative plans are that the United States Air Force should be approached to ascertain whether they will undertake the commitment of training the German pilots up to the standard of jet training in the establishments which have been set up in Germany by MAAG. In this regard Air Commodore Patriarche, the Chief of RCAF Training, will proceed to Bonn this week-end to discuss with you and with MAAG the German requirements and how these can be met. After Patriarche has ascertained the requirements and the views of MAAG, he will then visit Washington to find out whether the United States are agreeable to training German pilots up to wing standards provided Canada will carry out the special F-86 training.
3. The training of technicians is a much more straightforward matter in the opinion of National Defence, and Patriarche will discuss this in Bonn as General Foulkes understands that arrangements can be made to have some of the training done with the Air Division. National Defence is also exploring whether it would be advisable to make an additional air force officer who has detailed knowledge of jet air training available to assist Edwards in his negotiations with the Germans.
4. In regard to training F86 pilots, General Foulkes has asked the air force to work out two different plans. The first plan would be to bring the German pilots, on completion of wings standard training, to the RCAF training establishment at Chatham, N.B. to complete their training on F86 aircraft in the same school as is now used by the RCAF. A second proposal would be to set up a temporary school in Germany by taking some of the equipment and some of the personnel from Chatham and carrying out the training on one of the airfields in Europe, with some help from the Air Division. Both the Minister of National Defence and General Foulkes favour the training being carried out in Europe if at all possible but they want to investigate the implications, particularly the cost, of this type of a venture before putting it up to ministers for agreement.

5. It is hoped that the Chief of the Air Staff will be visiting overseas in the latter part of August and the early part of September and the CCOS is suggesting that the CAS should arrange to call on the Chief of the German Air Force and perhaps make arrangements for a visit to the Air Division so that they can discuss the German requirements and reach tentative decisions on the best way of providing assistance to the Germans. As soon as the RCAF can come up with these alternative plans, General Foulkes hopes to get Mr. Campney's tentative concurrence and at that time they will put forward their tentative plans to the Cabinet Defence Committee or if that is not possible Mr. Campney will discuss them with Mr. Pearson.

6. In transmitting these views to you, General Foulkes has asked that we stress that these are only tentative plans, and that while he is desirous of keeping you completely in the picture, he would not wish the plans to be disclosed to the Germans in any way until such time as he can get at least tentative approval.

F-86 MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

Air Commodore Patriarche who returned to Ottawa last night will be able to inform you fully of the conversations which he and the Air Attaché have been having with the German service authorities on the possibilities of Canadian contribution to training.

2. Air Commodore Patriarche and I saw Lt. General Kammhuber yesterday for a general talk on this subject in the course of which the General emphasized:

(a) that the possibility of German purchases of F-86 Mark VI depended on the provision of training facilities by Canada which would be paid for by the Germans if necessary;

(b) that the UK Government would be willing to supply such training facilities if Canada was unable to do so. (The Air Attaché considers that the implication of this statement is clearly that the Germans would then switch to the purchase of Hawker Hunter planes instead of Sabres.

(c) Lt. General Kammhuber expressed a strong personal preference for training taking place in Canada rather than in Germany. I indicated my surprise at this attitude. However, the Air Attaché has learned from Kammhuber's Chief Lieutenant that this preference may not be final and determinative though may be very difficult to overcome;

(d) Lt. General Kammhuber laid great emphasis on the necessity for as rapid a decision as possible as to whether Canada would be able to undertake to provide the requested training facilities. He explained this attitude by saying that Chancellor Adenauer was pressing for a decision on the buildup of the German Air Force in the very near future (doubtless the Chancellor is influenced in this attitude by his desire to be able to prove to the USA Government that Germany is pressing ahead with rearmament and thus to influence them against any decision for the reduction of USA forces in Germany). The Air Attaché's information is that the German Air Force feels it must decide on what make of fighters to buy within the next two weeks.

3. I made no commitments with regard to the possibilities of Canada meeting German requirements apart from expressing general sympathy with the German position and willingness to be as helpful as our resources permitted.

4. The advantages for the Canadian economy and aircraft industry of the purchase by Germany of three to four hundred aircraft is obvious. It is also apparent that you will wish to consider the implications of this at the policy level, having in mind many factors including our NATO relationship. I should be grateful to have your views.

5. Patriarche's paper covering a proposal made to WGAF states I am in agreement. While it is certainly true of the general approach, owing to Patriarche's rapid departure I was unable to see the paper until today and I have certain reserves on points in detail particularly with regard to paragraph 2 in its reference to German force level and use.

I. AIRCREW TRAINING FOR THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

1. The Minister of National Defence said that the Federal Republic of Germany had indicated it might purchase up to 400 F86 Mark VI aircraft provided Canada assisted in the expansion of the German Air Force by training up to 400 aircrew as pilots. The Germans had indicated that they were prepared if necessary to pay for this training and wished it to commence in April, 1957.

This training could be accomplished either by using the R.C.A.F. plant in Canada or by transferring the necessary personnel and equipment to establish an organization in Germany for the purpose. If done in Canada, the training could commence in October, 1957 and the first group would graduate in November, 1958 and the last in April, 1959. It might even be possible to commence training prior to April, 1957 by filling vacancies caused by short-falls in R.C.A.F. aircrew recruiting or NATO allocations.

The effect on the R.C.A.F. of following the first course to accept 400 trainees in Canada would delay the presently planned reduction in Training Command by approximately eight months and would delay the build-up of the Air Defence squadrons recently approved. Training in Germany would not only delay the reduction in Training Command by more than eight months but it would also be much more complicated due to weather conditions in Germany, the fact that airfields might not be available and that even if they were, they might require considerable modification, the complications in sending service personnel abroad, and a number of other factors. The R.C.A.F. would prefer to have the programme undertaken in Canada and the German Air Force would undoubtedly prefer this course. Although the curtailment of NATO training had already been announced to our partners in the alliance, there should be little difficulty in explaining the Canadian position and the reasons for training these German aircrew here.

The Chiefs of Staff recommended that approval in principle be given this training and that negotiations be opened with Germany leading to a bilateral agreement between the two countries to make the necessary arrangements. He concurred in this recommendation.

The Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions had considered the matter and were agreed that on economic and military grounds it would be much preferable if the programme were undertaken in this country. One of the factors which impressed the Panel was that if, following the next election in the Federal Republic, the new German government should decide to change German policy in this connection just when facilities were being established and R.C.A.F. personnel had been moved to the continent, a good deal of difficulty would occur. If the training were done here, however, and the then German government should decide not to have Canadians training its aircrew, the programme could be brought to an end relatively easily. The Panel also thought that an order for up to 400 aircraft would maintain employment in a large section of the aircraft industry at a time when it would otherwise be considerably reduced.

Explanatory memoranda had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, August 9, 1956 — Document D16-56†; Memorandum, Chairman, Panel of the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, August 9, 1956 — Document D11-56†).

2. Mr. Campney added that the cost to the Germans would be roughly $20 million, subject of course to negotiation. SHAPE was strongly in favour of Canada meeting the German request.

3. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It appeared quite likely that Germany would order these aircraft in Canada provided that we undertook to train their pilots.

(b) If the German government were to cancel the order at some future date there should be no expense to the Canadian government. In other words, the government would not underwrite this contract.

(c) The fact that training in Canada would produce German airmen as much as a year sooner than if the programme were undertaken in Germany was noted. The whole development would be of substantial support and significance to NATO.

(d) The training arrangements would be made on the clear understanding that this was not an extension of Mutual Aid to Germany. It was hoped to make a bilateral agreement with Germany which would have no reference to the agreements to be made with Norway, Denmark and Holland who would be paying a nominal charge for each of their pilots trained here at the conclusion of the NATO aircrew training programme.

(e) Deliveries of the F86's would commence on December 1st of this year and conclude in two years' time. The value of the order would be roughly $150 million. In addition, there would be substantial savings to Canada in overhead costs at Canadair and Orenda Engines Ltd., meaning in effect savings on defence orders, and employment of skilled personnel would be maintained.

(f) It was noted that the Cabinet as a whole had discussed the proposals briefly and felt there would be no serious domestic consequences if the training were undertaken in Canada. It had authorized the Committee to settle the question.

4. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the training of aircrew for the Federal Republic of Germany and agreed to recommend that negotiations be opened with the Federal Republic for the training in Canada, at German expense, of up to 400 aircrew as pilots provided the Federal Republic agreed to purchase up to 400 F86 Mark VI aircraft in this country.

TRAINING IN CANADA OF GERMAN AIRCREW

Cabinet Defence Committee considered today August 13 question of training of German aircrew. It agreed that the German Government be informed that should it decide to buy F86's in Canada, the Canadian Government will be prepared to enter into negotiations with the German Government looking to the training by the RCAF in Canada of up to 400 German aircrew as pilots, depending on number of aircraft purchased, this training to be at German expense.

2. The Minister of National Defence will leave Ottawa for Europe towards the end of August and will be prepared to enter into preliminary discussions with the Germans on this matter on September 3 and 4 if Germans agree.

3. I would appreciate it if you would pass the substance of the above decision on to the German Government at the earliest opportunity and let us have any comments or reactions on their part which this decision may give rise to.

1. The Panel had for consideration a draft Communication to the German Foreign Ministry (Document ED-8-56†) and a Memorandum on Financial Implications of German Air Training in Canada (Document ED-9-56†).

(These two documents had been circulated).

2. The Chairman said that the Panel should consider the tone of the draft Communication to the German Foreign Ministry rather than its form. Referring to paragraph (g), he said that it was intended to give sufficient latitude for negotiations based on a ratio of approximately one trainee for one Sabre VI aircraft.

3. The Panel agreed that this ratio would be a reasonable basis of agreement.

4. General Foulkes said that the Memorandum on Financial Implications of German Aircrew Training in Canada was to justify our requirement for payment by Germany of our out-of-pocket expenses. It was desirable to make it clear to the Germans that they were being treated in the same manner as the other NATO partners. The Germans would enter the air training system just as early as vacancies could be created and the Germans would be trained at our expense as long as other NATO students were attending the courses. The charges to the Germans would only include the additional cost of operating the system beyond the time it would have closed down but was now being kept in operation for exclusive German training.

5. The Chairman said that if we accept $21 million as the costs of training 400 pilots, the cost of training one pilot will amount to $50 thousand. Compared to the figures in the United States and Britain this was a bargain price.

6. General Foulkes pointed out that the purpose of this training scheme was to encourage the sale of aircraft. Canada's attitude towards Germany should be the same as towards other NATO partners. The cost figures should contain an element of Mutual Aid but Canada should not offer Germany terms that would be more favourable than those offered to other NATO members. The figures must be low enough to show an element of Mutual Aid so as to offset any criticism by the U.K. that Canada's intentions were based entirely on business motives. On the other hand, the figures must not be so low as to make other NATO countries feel that special concession was being made for Germany. He suggested that if 400 trainees were sent to Canada, a charge of $12 million should be demanded.

7. The Chairman was of the opinion that Canada should not engage in any bargaining with Germany. A figure should be agreed on and submitted as a flat rate. Germany would have before them the British figures and they should know therefore whether Canada's figures were acceptable.

8. The Panel agreed:

- (i) that the cost of training 400 pilots would amount to $12 million;
- (ii) that Canada would not engage in any bargaining on those figures;
- (iii) that Canada's representative in Germany should be informed as soon as possible of the costs of training so that the negotiations could be begun; and
- (iv) that no publicity of this air training scheme be given until the NATO Council had been notified.

9. Mr. Macdonnell said that he thought Mr. Ritchie, Canada's representative in Germany, had sufficient personnel to carry on negotiations. If the need arose for further technical assistants, they could be sent over.

10. A/C Patriarche said that already Germany had raised technical questions of training. Some of their requests involved extensive modifications of the air training plan already outlined. He was of the opinion that Germany should be held to the initial proposals.

11. The Chairman was of the opinion that the broader question should be resolved first. After agreement had been reached on how much the training programme would cost and how many trainees would be sent to Canada, the more technical problems of training could be resolved by experts.

12. The Panel agreed:

- (i) that at present no one would be sent to Germany to assist Mr. Ritchie;
- (ii) that a telegram should be sent immediately to Germany stating that $12 million would be charged to cover "out-of-pocket" expenses to train 400 pilots and stating that no publicity should be given to the air training scheme until the NATO Council had been advised of the agreement with Germany; and
- (iii) that Holland, Norway and Denmark would be asked for a token payment of $5 thousand for each of its candidates to the attrition training programme.

Bonn, August 17, 1956

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: Your 214 Aug 16† for Chief of the Air Staff from Air Attaché Bonn.

Thank you for your prompt reply to my 242 August 15.† Info contained very important for discussions held this morning with General Kammhuber.

General Kammhuber had been thinking in terms of the firm commitment he had made to me for the purchase of 100 sabre sixes and his request to me that you consider training 400 aircrew in Canada at German expense. The factor therefore in his mind had been four to one. Your calculations based on one to one therefore came as a shock and when your method of arriving at the factor was explained he and his planning staff were left feeling that there was no room in the manning figure on which you had based your calculations for pilots going on leave, being sick or other circumstances beyond the control of a force commander.

Kammhuber's key planning staff all veterans of the EDC planning team who had been working closely with NATO since 1952. All were aware that NATO forces are manned where possible at the rate of one point five pilots per aircraft. This seemed to them a reasonable factor and did allow for leaves, sickness, etc. and insured that first line aircraft were manned at all times.

General Kammhuber enthusiastic about prospects of your allowing pilots to be trained in Canada and enthusiastic about possible purchase of any flying Canadian sabre sixes. Cost of training would appear to be no problem. Cost of aircraft no problem. Main worry to man aircraft by NATO target date. Would be grateful if you would reconsider the one point one factor with a view to increasing it to one point five. If you cannot agree to this figure before arrival of team of specialists and Minister this will be a major point in discussions and negotiations.

During lengthy talk with Kammhuber managed to get him to make firm commitment to purchase 200 sabre sixes complete with spares if you would agree to one point five factor. In addition would agree to payment for training of pilots to fly 75 gift aeroplanes.

Using the one point five factor proposition resolves itself to this — 200 aircraft 300 pilots. 75 gift aircraft 112 pilots totals purchase of 200 sabre sixes with spares 41 pilots trained in Canada at German expense.

Minister of Defense Herr Blank and his Deputy Dr. Rust unavoidably out of Bonn until approximate weekend of September 9. General Kammhuber anxious to proceed with planning details with RCAF planning team you spoke of as soon as possible and if the one point five NATO factor can be applied to this problem anxious to put up the proposition for German Government approval immediately. Mr. Campney may not wish to visit Bonn if he cannot see Herr Blank or his deputy but perhaps could arrange to approve agreements at the end of his European tour. General Kammhuber available in Bonn from now until Farnborough then available once more if Minister or his representative feels signing of final papers requires his presence.

German staff officers from training section meeting with Air Division Staff Officers Zweibrucken next week to discuss details of technical training. Latest thought is that a limited number of T33 trained officers may become available for conversion training in Air Division by April-May 1957 and German Air Force would hope to take delivery of small number of sabre fives by that time.

Would hope you would consider one point five factor request with sympathy for Germany staff feel they are on firm and accepted ground in advancing it.

Reduction from possible purchase of 400 aircraft to 200 explained by General Kammhuber by difficulty in manning 400 plus 75 gift aircraft at the rate of one point five pilots per aircraft and training load in available training systems. In addition stated his hope that Canada might have a newer and better day fighter by 1960 and his intention that when this present commitment to NATO had been met to buy the new and up to date fighter from Canada if it was available. He felt that to load his air force up with 400 sabre sixes which might be considered obsolete in 1960 would be unwise whereas 200 would allow his air force to gather experience and build muscle to cope with the trials of the future.

For Chairman Chiefs of Staff Ottawa, General Foulkes from Miller (Information).

Minister met with General Kammhuber today and discussed latest German proposals which were that the Germans would purchase 225 sabre sixes which together with the 75 Mutual Aid sabre fives represent a sabre force of 300 aircraft from which a front line force of 225 aircraft could be mounted. Using the SHAPE criteria of 1.2 pilots per seat this represents a trained pilot requirement of 270. The German plan calls for in-putting 360 trainees to produce this number of pilots and this figure is close enough to our wastage experienced that we felt that we should not haggle about it. This plan appears to be a sound one both as to numbers of aircraft and pilot requirements and is as far as the Germans can go at this time. Minister has indicated to Kammhuber that he is prepared to recommend this size of training commitment to his colleagues on his return to Canada. Kammhuber was very pleased with this info. No discussion of costs was undertaken by either side.

As Mr. Campney's stay in Ottawa will be very short when he returns it would be useful if you could get government reaction to this proposal prior to our return so that it can be settled if possible before Minister's departure for Vancouver. CAS should see this message as I have asked Air Force people here not to duplicate it to him.

 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUG. 15)

8. Mr. Lapointe, as Acting Minister of National Defence, said the Minister of National Defence was now discussing in Germany the related questions of purchase of aircraft by the Federal Republic and of training German aircrew in Canada. Mr. Campney had reported that Germany would buy 225 F-86 Sabres which, together with the 75 Sabres to be delivered as Mutual Aid, were considered sufficient for one division. In turn, the Germans had requested that 360 pilots be trained by Canada. Having regard to wastage in training, an intake of this number would produce sufficient pilots to man the 300 Sabres. He recommended that the previous negotiating authority be amended to allow discussions to continue on the basis of Canada training 360 aircrew, on the understanding that an order of 225 Sabres would be placed with Canadian industry.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Acting Minister's memorandum, Aug. 31, 1956; Cab. Doc. 174-56†).

9. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The question of payment for the training had not yet been brought up with the Germans, but it was proposed that a price be set which would approximately cover the out-of-pocket expenses of the Department of National Defence for continuing the present N.A.T.O. air training scheme in existence to meet these German requirements.

(b) It was possible that sales of CF-100's might be made to Belgium. The fire control equipment in the most up-to-date of these aircraft was installed under license from the United States which hitherto had been reluctant, on security grounds, to see it on aircraft operated by countries other than themselves and Canada. However, it appeared that the U.S. objections to sales to Belgium of CF-100's fitted with this equipment might soon be waived provided proper security arrangements could be made.

10. The Cabinet noted the report of the Acting Minister of National Defence on the discussions with Germany concerning sales of F-86 aircraft and training of German aircrew in Canada, and agreed that the negotiations be continued on the basis of Canada training 360 aircrew, provided an order for 225 Sabres was negotiated by Germany with Canadian industry; the financial arrangements to be agreed between the Ministers of Finance and of National Defence.

TRAINING IN CANADA OF GERMAN AIRCREW AND PURCHASE BY GERMANY OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT

Text is given below of note for earliest submission to German Government containing proposal to train in Canada 360 German pilots to RCAF wing standard on understanding that Germany will purchase 225 Sabre aircraft in Canada. Cabinet decided on September 6 that negotiations to this effect be initiated and that financial arrangements for the air training should be agreed between Ministers of Finance and National Defence. These Ministers have agreed that the charges made to Germany for the training should be based on the estimated cost of maintaining the air training establishment for the additional period of 8 or 9 months when it will be used exclusively for German training.

2. You should explain to German authorities that the sum of $12 million consists of the estimated out-of-pocket expenses involved in prolonging the operation of the air training establishment but does not include any charges for overhead and therefore involves a considerable element of what is in effect Mutual Aid in the charges made in connection with this proposal, as the estimated cost of training a pilot in Canada is in the neighbourhood of $75,000. For your information, we are accepting the overhead costs but not charging for them; they will be borne by RCAF and will not appear in our accounts as Mutual Aid.

3. Details of the entry schedules, physical standards, etc. will be processed through military channels as soon as the agreement is approved. The smooth operation of the scheme would undoubtedly be assisted if Germany would arrange to station a suitable liaison officer in Ottawa at the earliest convenient time, a point which you might mention to the Foreign Ministry.

4. In the near future, probably next week, General Foulkes expects to obtain the concurrence of the Standing Group in this bilateral agreement, but you should proceed with the submission of the note on the assumption that this concurrence will be forthcoming. We will ask Mr. Wilgress to make an announcement in the NATO Council as soon as possible after agreement with the German Government has been reached, and immediately following this step, we propose that a statement be released to the press simultaneously in Bonn and Ottawa. As soon as German acceptance of the proposal has been received would you please notify both Mr. Wilgress and us. We will take up separately with you the question of the press release, whose wording and time of release we will ask you to coordinate with the German authorities.

5. For your information, we consider it urgent that this matter be handled with the maximum possible despatch, since the timing of the placing of a German order for Sabre aircraft is of considerable significance to Canadair Limited, as you possibly have already gathered from Mr. Notman. If you have not already done so, it would be profitable to discuss the situation with him. The German authorities should be requested to give a letter of intent to Canadair at the same time as they accept our proposal.

6. The text of the note to the German Foreign Minister is as follows: Begins: "Excellency,

It is the understanding of the Government of Canada that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany intends to purchase 225 Sabre VI aircraft in Canada from Canadair Limited and consequently desires that the Government of Canada make available to trainees of the German Air Force certain pilot training facilities from within the resources of the Royal Canadian Air Force to accommodate an intake of up to 360 student pilots.

The Government of Canada will in the near future have fulfilled its commitments to provide aircrew training to assist in the build-up of the air forces of certain of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty and recently decided to divert facilities now employed in this way to purposes related to the defence of North America within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty. However, the Government of Canada, being aware of the urgent problems facing the Government of the Federal Republic in building up its air force and having in mind the intended purchase of Canadian aircraft by the Government of the Federal Republic, has recently reviewed its air training plans and is prepared to postpone the closing down or diversion of certain air training facilities now employed in NATO aircrew training for a period sufficient to implement the proposal contained herein for the provision of pilot training for the German Air Force.

The Government of Canada wishes to emphasize that if this proposal is accepted its implementation will result in a delay in the formation of additional operational squadrons which the Government of Canada has agreed to establish. The appropriate NATO military authorities will be requested to concur in this delay if the proposal of the Government of Canada is accepted by the Government of the Federal Republic.

The Government of Canada is prepared to accept German trainees in the present NATO air training scheme as soon as vacancies occur from the completion of the training of other NATO candidates, and is also prepared to prolong the operation of the present NATO air training establishment for the period necessary to complete the training of the 360 trainees provided the Government of the Federal Republic reimburses the Canadian Government for the additional costs of maintaining this establishment for the required period of time. The Canadian Government is prepared to determine in advance the amount to be reimbursed as $12 million.

The detailed terms and conditions of this offer of training by the Government of Canada are shown in Appendix "A"† to this note. These are based upon the practice developed in the training of other NATO pilots in Canada.

Insofar as they are not inconsistent with this proposal, the provisions of the agreement between the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty regarding the status of their forces, signed on June 19, 1951, shall govern the relations between the Governments of Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany as receiving and sending states with respect to members of the German Air Force present in Canada pursuant to this proposal and the status rights and obligations of such Force and its members.

If the foregoing is acceptable to the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, I propose that this note and your reply to that effect shall constitute an agreement between our governments, to become effective on the date of your reply.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration." Text Ends.

7. Appendix "A" is going forward by air bag. In view of the urgency of this matter, you should not await the arrival of the appendix in order to submit the note but if necessary explain to the Foreign Minister that the appendix will follow shortly. In connection with the appendix, you should stress that its terms are based on the practice developed in Canada for the training of pilots from other NATO countries.

PURCHASE OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT BY GERMAN AIRFORCE AND TRAINING OF GERMAN PILOTS IN CANADA

We have as yet received no reply from the Foreign Office to our note of September 17. I saw Hallstein on October 1 (the Foreign Minister is away ill) and impressed upon him once again the need for a speedy decision on the part of the German Government. He promised to do his best to expedite the matter.

2. Meanwhile Dr. Rust of the Defence Ministry and General Kammhuber continue to assure the Air Attaché and Davis of Canadair that we should have no cause for concern as there will be no difficulty in the Parliamentary Committee when this matter comes up for approval and thereafter it should be possible to proceed rapidly with the intergovernmental agreement and the order for planes. The Defence Ministry claim that their draft of an interim reply to my note of September 17 was sent to the Foreign Office last week and are at a loss to explain what they consider Foreign Office delays. No doubt part of the delay is due to bad coordination between German government departments which has been conspicuous in their handling of this matter. At the moment it is not clear whether we are to expect an interim reply to our note or whether, if the Parliamentary Committee approves the project at its meeting on the 4th or 5th of October, we may then expect a final reply which would constitute an intergovernmental agreement with subsequent arrangements for notification to NATO and for simultaneous public announcement as we had foreseen. At that stage Davis hopes that either a letter of intent or the contract itself for the purchase of the planes would be signed. Some element of doubt remains as to the timing and procedure which the German authorities intend to follow and Davis of Canadair is getting somewhat nervous in view of the fact that Canadair have apparently delayed the dismissal of 400 employees who would otherwise be supernumary and have gone forward with orders for raw materials necessary if the purchase is to go through. They have taken these steps on verbal assurances from the Defence Ministry and are naturally anxious to have something in writing as soon as possible. Davis has made it clear to the Defence authorities that delay in signing a letter of intent or contract may involve delay in delivery dates of planes in Germany.

3. Meanwhile the whole question of German defence orders is being much discussed in the press and in political circles here. The government is being strongly criticized not only by the opposition but by Dr. Jaeger CSU Chairman of the Bundestag Defence Committee, for its reported decision to place orders amounting to approximately DM 3,300 million for American armoured vehicles, tanks and self-propelled guns. Criticism has been along the lines that a strategic reappraisal should be extended to armaments and these American weapons are already obsolescent and will be obsolete when finally delivered. Despite optimism of the Defence Ministry that the proposed order for F-86's will go through the committee smoothly there remains in our view some possibility that it might also become controversial politically in view of the present tendency to criticize the Defence Ministry's procurement programme. Surprisingly enough there has so far been no leakage in the press here regarding the order for F-86's but it would not be too surprising if some leakage did occur after the debate in the Parliamentary Committee.

PURCHASE OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT BY GERMAN AIRFORCE

I have today received an undated note under Brentano's signature which constitutes an interim acknowledgement of my note 100 of September 17. The note repeats the operative part of my note and continues: Text Begins:

To my regret the final and concrete answer cannot yet be delivered, as it requires the prior approval of the Bundestag and the budgetary approval of the Finance Ministry. However, because of the urgency, I should nevertheless like to inform Your Excellency now that the Federal Defence Ministry, under the proviso of the required approval, especially that of Parliament, agrees to the proposal and also intends to purchase the 225 aircraft of type Sabre VI. The Defence Ministry will begin the necessary preliminary work following agreement between the appropriate German and Canadian agencies, including the firm of Canadair.

In the circumstances I may assume that it is your opinion, too, that publicity in the German and Canadian press about this anticipated agreement should only occur after the official approval of the German Bundestag.

The Defence Ministry is engaged in taking steps without delay to fulfil the above-mentioned provisions.

As soon as these provisions are met I shall not fail to transmit to you a final answer which then, in accordance with your proposal, would form part of an exchange of notes. Text Ends.

2. Although the possibility of some hold-up cannot yet be excluded, I think this authoritative statement of the positive intentions of the Defence Ministry is encouraging.

3. In connection with your telegram DLDL 285 of October 2† you will note express German request that publicity be avoided until approval has been obtained here for agreement. I would hope that Financial Post could hold off for at least one more week.

CANADIAN-GERMAN AIRCRAFT AND TRAINING AGREEMENT

Despite regular and maintained efforts over past weeks we cannot ascertain when conclusion of agreement is likely. There is an uncertainty among government financial authorities whether funds for purchase of aircraft and costs of pilot training can be committed by approval of Bundestag Defence Committee or would require approval of plenary Bundestag. Committee has already taken favourable note of General Kammhuber's plan for German Airforce including purchase of Sabre VI aircraft and pilot training in Canada. Probably Committee's formal approval could be obtained as soon as detailed plan is presented to it on paper. Approval of plenary Bundestag might take considerably longer, however, not repeat not because of any foreseen position but because of problem of getting it on parliamentary agenda and passed before, perhaps, months have passed. Today an interdepartmental meeting of officials concerned could still not repeat not agree on the required parliamentary procedure.

2. With reference to possibility of Mr. Campney's statement on Monday I am afraid it is clear that we cannot expect conclusion of agreement so soon.

3. Although impossibility of getting authoritative info on prospective timing for agreement is most frustrating, I can see no repeat no reason to doubt that German Government has every intention of proceeding with the purchase of Sabres and training of pilots whenever the ceiling of red tape lifts. Canadair people here are satisfied with progress of contract negotiations and German Airforce is as impatient as we are to get on with it.

4. I will let you know about prospects for concluding agreement as soon as I can, with confidence, do so.

AIRCRAFT PURCHASE AND AIR TRAINING AGREEMENT

Text Begins:

"Excellency

I have the honour to refer to my communication of October 3, 1956, in which I took the opportunity to inform you of the German intention, provided the required approval was obtained, to acquire 225 aircraft of the Sabre VI type in Canada.

Since I have just been advised that on December 7, 1956, agreement was reached about the text of an appropriate purchase contract between representatives of the Federal Defence Ministry and the Federal Finance Ministry on the one side and representatives of the Canadian firm on the other and that the formal procedure for the signature of this contract presumably would take only a few more days, I am in the position to inform you that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany gratefully accepts the proposal of the Canadian Government to train Germany student pilots in establishments of the Royal Canadian Air Force under the conditions set forth in your Note number 100 of September 17, 1956, and in Appendix "A" attached to the Note.

I have the honour to confirm that this Note in conjunction with your aforementioned Note number 100 of September 17, 1956, and with Appendix "A" of the Note constitutes an agreement between the Government of the German Federal Republic and the Government of Canada which enters into effect on the date of this Note.

I take the opportunity to express the satisfaction of my government the conclusion of this agreement which will contribute to the further strengthening of the friendly relations between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany in the spirit of the Atlantic cooperation. Accept, Excellency, renewed assurances of my highest consideration. Brentano" Text Ends.

MUTUAL AID TO TURKEY; SHIPPING CHARGES ARREARS
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE SEPT. 29, 1955)²³

11. The Minister of Defence Production recalled that it had been agreed to pay shipping charges on mutual aid sent to Turkey after September 29th, 1955, but decision had been deferred on payment by Canada of the unpaid charges on cargoes shipped prior to that date. These amounted to $424,000. Because of Turkey's difficult financial position, the shipping lines involved had not been able to obtain payment. If the arrears were now paid by Canada, however, these lines would be prepared to accept a 10 per cent reduction on past freight and give a reduction from the new higher rates prevailing after January 1st of the present year. Accordingly, he recommended, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, that 90 per cent of the arrears in freight charges amounting to $381,000 be paid for mutual aid cargoes shipped to Turkey before September 29th, 1955.

12. The Cabinet approved the joint recommendation of the Ministers of Defence Production and National Defence and agreed that payment of $381,359.98 be authorised from mutual aid funds in full settlement of arrears of freight charges on mutual aid cargoes shipped to Turkey prior to September 29th, 1955.

RE-EXAMINATION OF ARTICLE 2 ACTIVITIES IN NATO

Two general conclusions seem to emerge from the re-examination of Article 2 activities which has been taking place in NATO and in certain national capitals, including Ottawa. The first is that a firm conviction exists in at least some member governments, and in some considerable sections of parliamentary and public opinion in nearly all NATO countries, that much more needs to be done to strengthen the diplomatic, cultural and economic ties between member countries, particularly in the light of present Soviet policies. The second general conclusion is that very few practical proposals have been put forward in responsible quarters as to how this might be done within the existing framework of the Organization (which no person in a responsible position has yet suggested altering in any radical way).

2. There are of course many indications of the widespread feeling that a new impetus and to some extent a new course are required if the alliance is to retain its effectiveness. The recent speeches of Mr. Gronchi, Dr. Adenauer and MM Mollet and Pineau come to mind at once in this connection. General Gruenther and Lord Ismay both emphasized this theme at the recent SHAPE commemoration. Semi-official groups such as the NATO parliamentarians and non-official bodies such as the Atlantic Treaty Association, together with a considerable section of the press, have sounded the same note. The U.K. permanent representative suggested to the Council that consideration of what might be done to further the aims of Article 2 should become a major NATO objective for 1956, comparable to the 1955 objectives of bringing Germany into NATO and bringing about a meeting at the summit. More recently we have learned that Mr. Dulles intends to declare publicly the readiness of the U.S. to "join equally in exploring the possibilities" of NATO achieving a new creative approach to its problems.

3. Despite this widespread and possibly growing sense of urgency, however, specific proposals by governments have been few in number and rather vague in content — as, indeed, they have been since the inception of NATO. You will recall that the Permanent Representatives were instructed in December "to examine and implement all measures" conductive to the closer cooperation envisaged in Article 2 and to consider further the proposals made by Ministers in the course of the discussion.²⁵ So far, the most concrete action taken was that proposed by the U.K. Government (on the suggestion of the Atlantic Treaty Association) which led to instructions being given to the Secretariat to prepare a factual study setting out briefly what member governments have done or are doing to give practical effect, by whatever means, to the intentions of Article 2. While this study will not attempt to indicate what additional action might be desirable, it is possible that the process of consolidating the information may point to some fields which would repay further study. It is the hope of the U.K. authorities that the study will form the basis for a political reply by Ministers to recent Soviet statements of policy. The text is not yet available.

4. It may be helpful to recall briefly the other proposals and suggestions which have been made in the Council in recent months, without confining attention too narrowly to Article 2.

(a) General Implementation. The only specific proposal put forward in December was that of Mr. Beyen (Netherlands) that a body be established within NATO to deal with the economic aspects of Article 2 and to foster cooperation between member countries. This proposal was never discussed in Council, although Lord Ismay said that he disliked the idea because he considered Article 2 activities essentially a responsibility of the Council, and the Turkish Permanent Representative said he thought it might be useful to set up such a body. The French Permanent Representative suggested that national NATO associations might be asked to consider how Article 2 should be implemented. (The Atlantic Treaty Association has in fact taken a thoroughly realistic and responsible attitude on this matter. The suggestion recalls Mr. Wilgress' more limited proposal,²⁶ made personally to you last summer, that the continuing body of NATO parliamentarians should look seriously, with governmental advice and information, into the question of the possible implementation of the economic provisions of Article 2, as a preparatory step leading ultimately, if all went well, to governmental action.)

(b) Political Cooperation. Your own suggestions were the only ones put forward in December: that Ministers should continually ask themselves whether the Permanent Representatives were being given the necessary authority and whether the results of their work were being fully used, that more restricted meetings should be held at Ministerial sessions of the Council, and that more time should be devoted by Ministers to the communiqué.²⁷ The U.S. permanent representative later made two specific proposals: that the Council should issue brief communiqués identifying some of the questions considered at its weekly meetings, and that groups of Permanent Representatives should make a series of visits to other NATO capitals in connection with non-military activities. No action has been taken on either proposal. Recently the Germans have given notice that Mr. von Brentano will make proposals at the May meeting concerning machinery for political consultation. German newspapers have reported that one of the main aspects of his proposals will be a request for the coordination of all political and diplomatic moves of NATO countries which might affect their relations with the Soviet bloc. It may be presumed that he has German reunification and disarmament principally in mind, but no details are available yet as to how he proposes to ensure such coordination. Meanwhile, the Permanent Representatives have steadily increased the scope of their political discussions, and are now having papers prepared on recent trends in Soviet policy, on Soviet economic penetration in underdeveloped countries, and on the new Soviet five-year plan.

(c) General Economic Cooperation. There seemed to be widespread agreement at the meeting in December that member governments should use NATO for developing the principles which should guide them individually and as members of other specialized organizations, while avoiding duplication of function. Among the general suggestions made at that time were yours for periodic discussions at Ministerial meetings on the economic situation and on international economic relations, Mr. Beyen's for a strengthening of links between NATO and OEEC at the Council level, and Mr. Martino's for agreement on the proposed common European market and on collective action to develop the economically weak countries of the alliance. No concrete action has been taken to follow up any of these suggestions, although there will of course be discussion on certain economic matters at the meeting in May.

(d) Economic Assistance. There was strong support at the December meeting for the idea that member countries should intensify their assistance to the underdeveloped and uncommitted countries. Suggestions included Mr. Pinay's that NATO should study the possibility of proposing to the U.N. a world plan for underdeveloped countries, Mr. Beyen's that members should give greater support to the SUNFED proposal, Mr. Martino's that members should examine how best to coordinate their resources for this purpose, and Mr. Theotokis' that NATO countries might engage to purchase surplus raw materials from underdeveloped countries. Only two specific proposals have been made subsequently. The German permanent representative suggested the establishment of an international organization, not confined to NATO countries, for the coordination of economic measures with a view to assisting underdeveloped countries through the development of trade. The Italian permanent representative formally proposed that the exchange of information between member countries on their economic assistance activities should be systematized through NATO, and that a body of consultants should be constituted to advise the Council on the best methods of solving assistance problems.

(e) Cultural and Information Activities. Several Ministers made general references in December to the need for a more constructive and coordinated presentation of the principles and policies of the Atlantic community, but specific proposals were limited to M. Pinay's for a "psychological action committee", Mr. Beyen's for a body assisted by experts to extend and coordinate NATO's activities in regard to information, and Mr. Theotokis' for a propaganda section charged with foreseeing possible Soviet moves and suggesting ways of forestalling them. None of these suggestions has since been elaborated or submitted to the Council for consideration, and only the Italian permanent representative has said that he saw much merit in them. Mr. Wilgress thinks it unlikely that they will be pursued at the May meeting. The U.K. permanent representative said that he regarded them as impractical in that they did not resolve the difficulty of finding the proper propaganda themes that might be developed on a NATO scale. In addition to this basic difficulty, it is clear that most governments — including those few which have some kind of central coordinating machinery in the information field — regard information policy as essentially a national responsibility, and look on NATO in this context not as an executive but as a consultative agency. At the same time it should be remembered that the budget of the NATO Information Service has been increased this year from about $165,000 to about $280,000, largely because of the support for certain practical projects by U.K., U.S. and Canadian representatives. The Information Committee under Mr. Wilgress' chairmanship has also conducted a useful exchange of views and information on the structure and activities of Communist front organizations and on the effects of recent exchanges of visits between East and West.

5. As this summary shows, the Permanent Representatives can point to very little in the way of practical achievement on the various proposals made at the last Ministerial meeting. Basically, no doubt, this reflects the recognition by governments that Article 2 is primarily a commitment by each individual member to give effect to certain principles, which need not (as your Committee of Five pointed out in 1952) be expressed "always and immediately in institutional terms". If, however, the Atlantic Community concept is really as vitally important as we have hitherto considered it to be, and if the measure of progress is the extent to which public opinion and governments react to political events in an Atlantic way, then the record of the past seven years strongly suggests that the emphasis should more than ever be placed on the essentially political functions of consultation and presentation. Governments must not only consult on questions of common concern, but must be seen to have consulted, and the results of their consultation (except where security considerations or the possibility of complications in other areas of the world preclude) must be made public with the maximum impact upon public opinion. It is in this context that we should consider how the methods of consultation and presentation might be improved.

6. The conclusion to which Mr. Wilgress has been led is that the Council itself is ill-equipped to "examine and implement" all measures conducive to closer political, economic and cultural cooperation. He believes that a fresh effort should now be made to try to establish within the Organization some appropriate machinery where projects can be discussed and a confrontation of views can take place at the working level, leaving to the Council its traditional function of general policy supervision. This might be done either by setting up a new body charged with the study of current proposals or by broadening the terms of reference of existing committees and establishing in the Economic Division a small research section able to cope with Soviet and Western economic developments.

7. This analysis by Mr. Wilgress seems to me to be on the right lines. Essentially what is required is an enhancement of the authority of the Council, so that its voice can be heard and its influence recognized, accompanied by an improvement in the structure of its committees and working groups where the views of governments are examined and if possible reconciled. This would require no amendment to the Treaty (which charges the Council with the consideration of matters concerning the implementation of the Treaty and authorizes it to set up subsidiary bodies as may be necessary); it would be a logical extension of the development which has already taken place in the Organization; and it would seem consistent not only with the views which the Canadian government has expressed in the past but also with the views which have been expressed from time to time by the U.S. and U.K. authorities.

8. In considering how the authority of the Council could be enhanced, attention might first be directed to methods of improving consultation and presentation at the Ministerial sessions, along lines which you have already suggested on more than one occasion. It may be that with the increased importance now attached to non-military consultation, Ministers from other member countries will be more inclined than in the past to consider favourably some increase in the length of these sessions and a somewhat greater degree of informal and frank exploration of policy. There has already been agreement on your suggestions about the drafting of the communiqué at the forthcoming meeting. As regards the Council in permanent session, you might wish to consider the advisability of agreeing, as a first step, to the suggestions recently put forward by the U.S. permanent representative, i.e. the issuing of brief communiqués identifying some of the questions considered at its weekly meetings and occasional visits to other NATO capitals. You might also wish to consider whether to raise with your colleagues the question of an eventual change in the type of permanent representation on the Council.

9. Experience has demonstrated that discussions in the Council tend to be diffuse and inconclusive unless its members are considering some specific and carefully formulated proposal or statement on which they have been able to obtain clear guidance from their governments. It is important, therefore, that the committees and working groups which are set up to draft such papers should be constituted in the most effective way possible and should be in the closest touch with thinking in the various national capitals. It is perhaps worth recalling in this connection that although the Committee of Five recommended at Lisbon in February 1952 that its functions should be transferred to the full Council, since it was found impossible to make real progress without further consideration of the problems by all NATO members, by September of that year Lord Ismay was suggesting the formation of an Article 2 Committee, and you proposed — and the Council agreed — that working parties be set up to deal with such matters, each at a high level with a Permanent Representative as chairman. It was as a result of this decision that the Working Group on Social and Cultural Cooperation (later the Committee on Information and Cultural Relations) was formed under the chairmanship of the Canadian Representative.

10. It may be, as Mr. Wilgress has now suggested, that some extension or adjustment of this machinery is required. Without in any way excluding this possibility, we have been wondering whether the most practical and immediately effective way of strengthening the committee structure might not be to suggest to the Council that it assign several specific matters of common concern to working groups of officials drawn for the most part for this specific purpose from the national capitals. Such groups need not, and indeed should not, if they are to be of the necessary calibre, contain representatives from all the NATO countries. The idea is rather that they should be formed on the basis of special competence and experience in the subjects with which they will be concerned, much as the working groups of the three Western powers were formed before the two Geneva conferences. On the other hand they should certainly include some representation from the smaller NATO countries, and it should be understood that the results of their deliberations would be submitted to the whole Council for its consideration. I am of course aware that on politically delicate subjects the larger powers might find it difficult to agree to such a procedure, but I think there is enough merit in the idea to warrant further exploration of its possibilities. Merely as an indication of the sort of subjects we have in mind, I might mention German reunification (on which I am sending you a separate memorandum†), the Saar problem, Cyprus and the future political relations of North Africa with the members of the alliance. I should be glad to know whether you think the idea is worth developing with a view to discussing it in Paris.

POSSIBLE COMMENTS FOR USE OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION WHEN ECONOMIC QUESTIONS ARE DISCUSSED AT NATO IN THE LIGHT OF NEW TRENDS IN SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY AND OTHER FACTORS

This paper will be concerned with the significance of the new trends in Soviet Foreign Policy only insofar as they are related to the essential considerations which the Canadian Delegation will wish to bear in mind when the North Atlantic Ministers examine at the May meeting the possible extension of non-military cooperation within the Alliance.

2. The various delegations may differ in their assessment of the growing economic strength of the Soviet Union and of the extent to which this will enable the Soviet bloc to carry out an effective economic offensive directly against the Alliance (particularly in special strategic areas like North Africa) and indirectly in the uncommitted underdeveloped countries. The latter programme may be relatively small in scope at this time but the expansion envisaged in the Sixth Soviet Five Year Plan holds out the prospect of an increasing potential in terms of capital, equipment and technicians to implement a much more ambitious scheme.

3. Possibly the first consideration that individual governments represented in the Alliance should bear in mind in the face of Soviet economic expansion, is the need for each to make a frank and careful inward-looking examination of its own prospects for continuing economic stability and progress and the degree to which it may expect to have resources, both human and material, available to back up a sustained programme of assistance to the underdeveloped areas of the world. In Canada the main interest should continue to lie in balancing the maintenance of economic stability and advancement at home and of course the maintenance of adequate security arrangements with doing its part in providing underdeveloped countries with the volume of resources which they can effectively absorb in strengthening their economies and improving living conditions.

4. It is not to be expected that NATO Ministers will dwell at length on the comparative vigour and soundness of the economies of their own countries. Nevertheless the public in each of these countries and in other parts of the world will inevitably be making comparisons between the rate of development in NATO countries and that which is now under way or contemplated in the Soviet Union. So far Soviet internal economic expansion could be regarded as in part a response to the continuing challenge of the free countries, particularly the United States. In Canada the development of our economy has proceeded with remarkable dynamism although not at as high a rate as the USSR. For Canada this has meant not only industrial expansion as in the Soviet Union but an increasingly satisfactory standard of living as opposed to the Soviet plan which promises little respite for its people in the near future. However, we shall have to work hard to keep ahead, and in some instances reasonably serious corrective measures may be required. The determination of the Soviet to surpass the West in technical achievement has important significance for Canada and other members of NATO. The West will find it difficult to meet on a comparative basis the proposed advances in technical education, particularly in the training of technicians and scientists, which the Soviet hopes to achieve in its next Five Year Plan. The extent to which we will be able to fill our needs for technicians both for domestic economic development and for a sustained technical assistance programme must be a cause for some concern in all NATO countries. It will be important to ensure that our educational and training facilities and opportunities are adequate to meet these requirements.

5. While such considerations are not likely to form an active part of any discussions by NATO members, they underlie many of the assumptions on which any new co-operative action in non-military fields will have to be based. Given this we might now consider what specific suggestions the Canadian Delegation may wish to explore at the meeting.

Economic Relations of NATO Members With One Another

6. The formula envisaged in Article II for economic co-operation among NATO countries and for the avoidance of conflicts in economic policies has not been invoked to any extent largely because most of the questions affecting the economic relations of NATO countries with one another can be more appropriately and effectively discussed in other wider international bodies. The view that NATO should discuss economic questions mainly in direct relation to defence programmes has also tended to be generally accepted. However, some of the European countries may decide at this meeting to make rather forceful comments (in terms of the impact on their own economies) on the trade policies of North America particularly the United States. Discussions of this nature may be encouraged by the remarks of the Secretariat in their preface to the Survey of Article II Activities (C-M (56) 45). In this Survey it is noted that three lines of thought suggest themselves:

(a) That we should see whether there are some practical questions in the field of Article II which are not dealt with adequately elsewhere, and which might be handled within NATO without detriment to our work in other agencies. In this connection, it is important that member countries put forward positive suggestions for action.

(b) That we should discuss within NATO, with all the frankness which has characterised our discussion of military issues, the general lines of policy on subjects which come under Article II. This does not necessarily mean that we have to reach complete agreement on those subjects within NATO. But we can at least try — as suggested by the Canadian and other Ministers at the meeting in December last — to thresh out our differences as far as possible so that we can put forward a reasonably common line of approach when we discuss practical issues in other organizations.

(c) That we should be able to announce publicly from time to time that we have discussed these questions and thereby demonstrated our interest in these non-military problems.

7. From our own point of view it is possible that Denmark may use this opportunity to raise the question of Canadian butter disposal policy, although in fact our limited and cautious butter disposal operations cannot be said to have done our European allies any significant damage so far. The United States is of course open to criticism on a considerably broader scale. In the past we have opposed discussion of these questions on the grounds that they should be dealt with in bodies where producers and consumers are more widely represented. However, a number of economic questions of internal concern to the Alliance are mentioned in the Survey and it may not be possible or desirable to deny some of the Europeans the right to at least make reference to difficulties arising out of the commercial policies of other members. You will have seen (in his speech to the Associated Press Convention) that Mr. Dulles came out in a much more forthright fashion than before in favour of more intimate cooperation on non-military questions.²⁸ He made particular mention of European integration. (We shall give you a separate note on this subject). His speech may be regarded by the European countries as a promise of wider discussion of economic questions than is practicable or desirable.

8. In looking at possible ways of maintaining the internal economic strength of NATO and its immediate periphery (e.g. North Africa) perhaps some consideration should be given to special economic assistance (beyond mutual aid) for some of the underdeveloped regions within, or on the periphery of, the NATO area, particularly North Africa. If such special assistance were found to be desirable in the common interests of NATO after an examination of the problem it might be necessary to consider whether it might prove possible for some part (say 10% — about $10 to $15 million annually) of our mutual aid should be in the form of non-military assistance to meet essential needs of such special areas. Any suggestion of this kind of initiative would have to be carefully discussed in advance with National Defence and Finance in the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence.

Relations of NATO Countries with the Uncommitted Underdeveloped Areas and Countries of the World

9. A discussion of Western aid to the underdeveloped countries may occupy a fair amount of the Ministers' time (particularly since we know that delegations such as the Germans and the Italians have specific proposals in mind). The following points seem to us to be the ones which the Canadian Delegation may wish to raise:

(a) The main object in providing assistance by the West should be the provision of adequate resources to strengthen their economies, improve their living standards, and leave them with the freedom of political choice.

(b) We should not necessarily agree that the recent flurry of Soviet activity has overshadowed the less-publicized aid which has been reaching them over the past few years from the West. We might possibly note that these Soviet activities in the field of aid or trade may not work entirely to our disadvantage since they may frequently increase the resources of the underdeveloped countries. We should stress, however, the importance of maintaining our own proven bilateral programmes of aid at an effective level and point to Canada's decision to continue our support during the second planning phase of the Colombo Plan and our intention to increase our programme this year by about 30%.

(c) It is worthwhile remembering that the recent Soviet activities, in so far as they are easing the marketing arrangements of some of the primary commodities of the underdeveloped countries, makes it particularly important that the surplus disposal policies of the Western countries (and, of course, the United States is the chief country in question) do not unduly aggravate the export difficulties which the underdeveloped countries are facing.

(d) Should Germany, France or the Netherlands suggest that no machinery exists by which they can join in these efforts, we can remind them of the small but effective contribution which Norway has provided directly to India under the general auspices of the United Nations. If some of the Europeans press to join the Colombo Plan we can only indicate that the wishes of the Asian countries will in large measure govern our own views towards increasing the membership of the Plan.

For the full text of Dulles' speech, see United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXIV, No. 879, April 30, 1956, pp. 706-710.

(e) If the question of new machinery for co-ordinating or channelling aid to the underdeveloped countries is raised there are several lines of thought which the Canadian Delegation might wish to raise:

(1) Any new machinery should be outside NATO and developed in such a way that the NATO label is not applied to the aid;

(2) The United Nations offers the best opportunities for new international machinery. It is generally recognized the aid from the United Nations would be more acceptable to the underdeveloped countries themselves than bilateral or other narrower programmes; it also reduces the possibility that some of the underdeveloped countries (particularly in the Middle East), which have not displayed the same sensitivity as the uncommitted countries in South and South-East Asia, will be likely to consider that Western offers of aid in reality improve their own bargaining position and that rewards are actually being held out to them on political grounds regardless of real need. You may wish to remind the other ministers of your earlier suggestion that the developed countries freely exchange the "blueprints" of their economic assistance. This is, of course, largely a step towards the co-ordination of aid (which, if accepted by the U.S.S.R., would tend to put their own efforts in a less conspicuous light). There are various ways in which this function might be undertaken, but the discussions regarding them should more appropriately take place in the United Nations (e.g. ECOSOC). Some of the programmes which are now being explored by the International Bank and various donor countries (e.g. Aswan Dam, Canal Waters) may provide a practical opportunity to establish gradually some new United Nations machinery which would give the latter organization an increasing role in the systematizing of aid. This type of co-ordination is not, however, an alternative for increasing the resources of the underdeveloped countries. Co-ordination without more resources will not meet the need. Presumably under the United Nations additional resources can probably best be made available by the creation of a special aid fund with adequate financial support to ensure its effective operation. If you expect that you will wish to emphasize this aspect you may wish to have a further word with the Minister of Finance before the NATO meeting.

(3) There undoubtedly will be a tendency to suggest the creation of new machinery to review economic questions of interest to the Alliance. The Italians have already made one such proposal. Others have proposed a more modest arrangement. President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles have acknowledged in recent speeches that the time had probably come for a review of U.S. foreign aid policies at least by a distinguished group of U.S. personages. For our part we have taken the line that the creation of a high-powered body under NATO, of the sort envisaged by the Italians, would be a mistake and would give rise to serious misunderstandings at home and abroad concerning the intentions of the various NATO Governments. We have tended to the view that where further activity by NATO is required in connection with specific subjects in which NATO countries have a common interest it would be best to establish small working groups of government officials responsible to the Council. It is appreciated, however, that this device, while probably suitable for dealing with specific practical problems, may not meet the need which some feel for a broad and constructive appraisal in the context of the Treaty, of economic relations among NATO members and of the interests of the members of NATO in the economic development and progress of the less developed parts of the world. In a separate paper consideration is given to the establishment of special working groups to review specific subjects and to the creation of a high level non-governmental group of consultants not attached to the NATO Council to examine economic relations among members and the interest of North Atlantic countries in the advancement of the underdeveloped countries.

(f) It may be desirable to include in the communiqué some reference (which would have to be very carefully drafted) to the interest of NATO countries in the welfare and progress of the less-developed countries. Mr. Dulles' speech on April 23 suggests that he may have to say a few words after the meeting to justify his promises for greater interest in non-military questions. A carefully worded communiqué might avoid offending the sensitive uncommitted countries and might also reduce the possibility of other less sensitive countries assuming that aid in the future will be provided on a basis which would improve their bargaining position and which would hold out promise of rewards on political grounds regardless of real need. In our opinion any communiqué should be simply an indication that NATO countries as developed countries are deeply conscious of the problems facing the underdeveloped areas and that they will seek to play their part, as they have in the past, in separate bilateral arrangements or in joint co-operative programmes with the underdeveloped countries which may be in effect or contemplated in other international bodies.

Direct Economic Relations Between NATO Countries and the Soviet Bloc

10. The new trend in Soviet foreign policy may create an atmosphere which will have a special significance for trading relations between NATO countries and the U.S.S.R. or the countries in its bloc. It may be expected that very tempting offers may be held out by the Soviet in return for either stronger political links with some of the European NATO members or securing commodities or equipment which their expanding economy requires. It is to be appreciated that some commercial exchanges with the Soviet may have substantial advantages on balance for individual Western countries and it would seem reasonable to take advantage of these opportunities if there is no security risk involved. However, insofar as any of the items which the Soviet are seeking may be of strategic importance, it is to be hoped that no NATO country will enter into any firm agreement with the Soviet bloc without consulting with its partners. Otherwise, by tempting one member of NATO after another the Soviets might bring about that fragmentation of our system of export controls which they are undoubtedly anxious to achieve.

11. Trade between the West and China may have to be viewed in a somewhat different light, particularly since there has been a growing recognition of the difficulties involved in enforcing an effective system of controls on the trade of many items now on the China list but not on the European list. This may not be an opportune time to review these different lists. Some rationalisation of the two levels of control may, however, have to be considered before very long if our control system is to continue to command support and to remain effective.

DEVELOPMENT OF NON-MILITARY FORMS OF COOPERATION IN NATO

Following up our discussion with you yesterday about what kind of new approaches might be made in the field of non-military cooperation in NATO, especially as regards Article 2, I submit for your consideration a draft of a telegram to Washington, repeated to London, Paris Embassy, NATO Paris and Bonn.

2. You will see that the emphasis in the draft is on seeking to follow up the train of thought started by Mr. Dulles in his speech yesterday when he suggested that the time has come to "consider whether its (NATO's) organization does not need to be further developed, if it is adequately to serve the needs of this and coming generations. If that be the common desire of the NATO member nations, the United States will join eagerly in exploring the possibilities which now beckon us forward."

NON-MILITARY COOPERATION IN NATO

We were, as you know, very much interested by Mr. Dulles' emphasis, in his speech on April 23 to the Associated Press Convention, on the necessity for a new creative approach to the problems of the alliance, and particularly by his statement that the United States will join eagerly with other member nations in exploring the possibilities of further developing NATO, if that be the common desire, to serve the needs of this and coming generations. This statement, coming as it does at a time when there is a widespread feeling that a new impetus and to some extent a new course are required if the alliance is to retain its effectiveness, and shortly before a ministerial session of the Council which is to be devoted entirely to non-military subjects, cannot fail to be encouraging to those who believe, as we do, that a strengthening of the political and other ties uniting the member countries is urgent and important. At the same time it is bound to increase the public expectation of some tangible results from the forthcoming meeting, which might recoil if those expectations were unfulfilled.

2. The fact that Mr. Dulles gave the other governments advance notice through the Council of his intention to speak along these lines underlines the importance which he attaches to his initiative. It is not at all clear to us, however, what specific action he expects to follow — whether, for example, he anticipates that the European nations will make proposals as they did in the formative stages of the European recovery programme, or whether he himself may have some suggestions to make to the Council, perhaps as a result of the study of activities related to Article 2 which we understand has been in progress for some time in the State Department. Any indication you may be able to give us before the meeting of his intentions or expectations would of course be very much appreciated.

3. We have ourselves been reviewing various suggestions, including those made at the December ministerial meeting and in the discussions which have taken place since that time between the Permanent Representatives, in the hope of reaching some conclusions as to what further practical measures might be taken by the Council to strengthen the unity and effectiveness of the alliance. Our general conclusion is that the main emphasis must continue to be on the essentially political functions of consultation and presentation — the former in order to ensure, so far as possible, that the policies of governments are based on a common view of the interests of the Atlantic community, and the latter in order to make it clear both to the peoples of the NATO countries and to other peoples and governments that such consultation is an effective and continuous reality. In our view, therefore, the important task at this time is to enhance the authority of the Council, so that its voice can be heard and its influence recognized, and simultaneously to extend or adjust the structure of its committees and working groups dealing with specific problems which are recognized by the governments as of common concern. We do not believe that on balance there would be any advantage in having NATO assume functions which are now being handled in other organizations with wider membership, nor do we believe that public and parliamentary opinion in most member countries is prepared at this time to support any radical extension of NATO's responsibilities, particularly as concerns the implementation as distinct from the formulation of policy. In brief, we consider that the contribution which NATO can now make to the strengthening of political, economic and cultural ties lies essentially in the consultative rather than in the executive field. In the longer term, however, we do attach importance to the encouragement of critical discussion of the idea of the Atlantic community by leaders of parliamentary and public opinion in order to clarify it and to reach a larger measure of agreement as to what is needed and wanted to assure the aims of the North Atlantic Treaty. In this connection we are thinking primarily of such bodies as the Atlantic Treaty Association and the Conference of Members of Parliament from NATO countries.

4. It is in the light of these general conclusions as to what is practicable at this time that we have been giving preliminary thought to two specific suggestions. We have not reached any decision yet as to whether it would be desirable to put them forward even tentatively, in the Council, but we believe that there is sufficient merit in them to warrant at least discussing them informally with our friends.

5. The first suggestion is related to the economic aspects of cooperation between member countries, about which a number of proposals have already been made in NATO discussions. It is, briefly, that the Council should record its concern with economic relations among the member countries, point to the long-standing and friendly interest of the North Atlantic countries in the economic advancement of the less developed parts of the world, welcome the public discussion which has been taking place on these matters in the NATO parliamentary groups and elsewhere, and indicate the willingness of member countries to facilitate the establishment of a group of outstanding non-governmental authorities to examine these questions afresh under the auspices of the Conference of Members of Parliament from NATO countries.

6. One of the considerations which has led us to think of a re-examination of the problem under these auspices is that such a group, if of sufficiently high calibre, might well produce some new ideas which would be taken seriously by the Council and by member governments, without of course committing them. Another is that it would tend to build up parliamentary and therefore public support for whatever steps it may in fact prove possible to take towards an increase of economic collaboration among member countries. A third is that the Standing Committee of NATO Parliamentarians has already decided to undertake a somewhat similar study without governmental assistance, in preparation for the Conference of NATO Parliamentarians to be held in Paris in November. The knowledge that these broad fields were being explored under the aegis of such an informal and essentially non-governmental body would be less likely to cause concern or uneasiness on the part of outside countries than would the initiation of a similar study by a high-powered group of experts or consultants appended to the Council.

7. The second suggestion which we have been considering has to do with those subordinate bodies of the Council in which the views of governments are examined and if possible reconciled prior to consultation on policy in the Council itself. It seems to us that if the Council's authority is to be enhanced, more care needs to be taken to ensure that problems of common concern to the alliance — and this applied particularly, perhaps, to complex political problems — are considered as carefully as possible at the expert official level. We recognize that a common view on the nature and extent of the Soviet threat has to a large extent developed through such exchanges of information and views in bodies like the Working Group on the Trends of Soviet Policy and Working Group on Comparison of Economic Trends, as well as in the Committee on Information and Cultural Relations. The extension of this detailed and joint examination to other problems of common concern to the alliance would, in our view, be desirable. We are inclined to think that it could be done effectively, however, only if there were a willingness on the part of the member governments, not only to agree to the submission of these problems to joint study, but also to agree to make available for limited periods and for these specific purposes some of their experienced national officials. As an indication of the kind of subjects we have in mind, I might mention German unification and the political implications of economic assistance to areas specially threatened by Soviet penetration which are of strategic importance to NATO.

8. I should be grateful if you take an early opportunity of discussing these suggestions informally with appropriate officials of the State Department (or Foreign Ministry) emphasizing that they are as yet tentative and undeveloped, and that we are anxious at this stage only to have some indication of how they might be received.

GENERAL REVIEW OF NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING MAY 4-6

This NATO meeting which is the regular springtime conference of Foreign Ministers of NATO countries will be held May 4 to 6. It will be concerned only with problems of cooperation in non-military fields. There are no military items on the agenda.

2. NATO is obviously faced with some critical problems which threaten the solidarity and effectiveness of the alliance. These problems arise partly from causes internal to the organization but others arise from external causes. First, the alliance faces certain serious inter-member disputes which, if allowed to develop, will put a strain on the solidarity of the alliance. These include in particular the dispute between the United Kingdom and Greece over Cyprus; the differences between France and Germany over which should have priority — the efforts to reach a general agreement with Russia, including disarmament, or German reunification; the deterioration of the French position in North Africa, and the emergence to independent status of Morocco and Tunisia; the exacerbation of our relations with the Arab world; and the desire of Iceland to terminate its bilateral agreement with the United States.

3. I do not expect that there will be a discussion of the Iceland problem at this meeting because the matter is being allowed to stand pending the elections in Iceland next June. However, I do not see that a discussion can be avoided on the other four problems; indeed, if political consultation is to serve any useful purpose between the allies, I do not think that a discussion should be avoided. The British have told us that they are strongly opposed to NATO intervention in Cyprus and as a result we do not propose to initiate the discussion on this question. It seems improbable, however, that the Ministers can avoid a serious discussion of a question which is of vital importance to the alliance and I for my part think it would be a mistake if we were simply to gloss over a decisive problem in the Council.

4. This also applies to a certain extent to the question of French North Africa which takes the form, first, of the very great strain imposed on France economically and militarily of putting down what is rapidly becoming a civil war in Algeria; and, secondly, the rapid emergence of Morocco and Tunisia to independence. Morocco especially is of real importance to the alliance and we must make sure that it remains friendly to the West. I am going to suggest, therefore, that we should examine very carefully this question and especially the form of the future relations of NATO with these two vital areas.

5. I do not think that just "washing NATO dirty linen" even in private will of itself help to find solutions to these difficult problems and I would hope that the Ministers might agree to refer some specific assignments to small working groups to try and work out some proposals which could be studied by governments before the next Ministerial meeting probably in December.

6. The problems facing the alliance from external causes, mainly stem of course from the current changes in Soviet policy which we will be examining carefully on the basis of studies prepared in advance by the Permanent Council and the International Staff. The impact of these changes on the alliance may be said to fall partly in the psychological field and partly in the substantive field. Psychologically I suppose the visit of Bulganin and Khrushchev to the United Kingdom, and particularly their encounters with British crowds in Birmingham and with the Labour Party, may have served some good purpose in the interests of the West, if only to bring out into the open some of the more explosive views which I was treated to in private by Mr. Khrushchev in the Crimea. (His implied threat of missiles with H-bomb warheads capable of being launched against any part of the world may particularly serve to remind the public of the dangers of letting down our guard.)

7. But in the psychological field I think it is also important not to overlook the current efforts of the Soviet Union to appeal to the uncommitted countries and neutralist opinion in the NATO countries, particularly in order to discredit NATO. I think therefore that it will be especially important at this meeting to consider how the current Soviet propaganda campaign can best be met through a consistent and concerted information policy. I may have something to contribute in this discussion which I gather I may be asked to lead off. I am in touch with other Ministers particularly interested in this subject and especially M. Spaak who is concerned about the public presentation of NATO aims in the light of the Soviet propaganda offensive.

8. From a substantive point of view the meeting will examine the current Soviet efforts of expansion by political and economic methods, especially in the uncommitted and under-developed countries of Southeast Asia and the Middle East. In this connection, the Soviet techniques of economic penetration through aid and trade policies are bound to come up for discussion. I propose to follow the approach which I discussed with the External Affairs Committee that NATO should be regarded as an appropriate forum for discussion of such problems but not for executive action. NATO intrusion into operational activities would cut across existing international bodies whose membership is more appropriate to such functions and would especially conflict with the United Nations which should be the overall coordinating body in international aid activities just as GATT is in matters concerning trade. If there is a strong feeling on the part of other Ministers to go further and consider specific aid proposals to counter Soviet economic penetration in areas of special strategic concern to NATO such as the Middle East, I would propose that this be made a matter for further study and reference back to governments.

9. So much for the general approach to the more important matters to be considered at the meeting. As to the specific items on the agenda, there will of course be the usual report by the Secretary-General on the activities of the organization since the last Ministerial meeting. This will be Item I.

10. Item II will be "The Review of the International Situation in the Light of Current Developments". This discussion will be mainly concerned, as I have suggested, with current trends and implications of Soviet policy; and some of the contentious issues now plaguing the alliance to which I have referred will also come up for consideration. As a sub-head of this item there will be a discussion of the "political and economic questions arising from current Soviet tactics" and I have already indicated the approach which I propose to follow, especially if the question of aid is introduced into the discussion.

11. The third item concerns "The Extension of Non-military Cooperation between NATO Countries". This of course includes not only political consultation but a review of Article 2 activities generally. Here I suppose the most important development to be taken into account is Mr. Dulles' encouraging speech to the Associated Press luncheon in New York on April 23 in which he gave some encouragement to the idea of further developing the non-military forms of cooperation in the alliance and exploring further possibilities under Article 2. As you know, we have already had several studies on these matters since the Ottawa meeting of the NATO Council in 1951. These have been conducted mainly by the Permanent Council and the International Staff but they have not yielded much concrete results. I cannot help feeling that if only to assure parliamentary as well as public opinion generally that everything that possibly can or should be done to strengthen the ties — political, economic and social — of the alliance is being done, consideration might be given to inviting a group of outstanding consultants to make a review of this field. The consultants would have to be outstanding people who would command respect of the stature of Paul Hoffman of the United States or Sir Oliver Franks of the United Kingdom. We might consider approaching somebody like Graham Towers or Dr. McIntosh. To ensure that governments should not be committed in advance of full consideration of the findings of such a group, I wonder whether it would not be worth considering asking the conference of members of Parliament of NATO countries, which in any case is due to meet in the fall, to sponsor such a study, perhaps in collaboration with the Atlantic Treaty Association. Governments would then be free to accept or reject the advice given in whole or in part. At the same time, this kind of study might have a greater impact on public opinion than further efforts through governmental or inter-governmental agencies. This is an approach on which I would hope to consult other Ministers before the meeting and especially Mr. Dulles whose initiative in this matter should not be left, in my opinion, without appropriate response by the other members of the organization.

12. Finally there will be the discussion on information policies to which I have referred and the preparation of the communiqué. I think that there will be general agreement that what the Council reports about its discussions will be just as important, or even more important perhaps, in some ways than the discussions in the Council themselves. Especially, public opinion will, I believe, look for some evidence that efforts are being made by NATO to close its ranks in the face of the new and in some ways more dangerous challenge presented by the current Soviet tactics and policies.

APPRECIATION OF NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, MAY 4 TO 5

I think it might be useful to record some impressions of the recent Ministerial meeting, not only as a record of what was in many respects a most important and interesting meeting, but also to point to some of the more apparent weaknesses in NATO and its procedures in connection with the study by the Committee of Three which was launched by decision of the Atlantic Council.

APPRECIATION OF NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, MAY 4 TO 5

It had been recognized before the meeting took place that the Foreign Ministers of NATO would address themselves principally to the consideration of what should be done to further the aims of the North Atlantic Treaty through the development of its non-military activities. Mr. Dulles' speech to the Associated Press in New York on April 23 raised hopes that the cooperation of the United States, if not its leadership, would be forthcoming in exploring the possibilities of developing new ties and relationships between the allies. In the event, the present state of the alliance and its future development in the non-military field proved to be the most important issue around which discussion revolved at the meeting.

2. Mr. Dulles' frank assessment that the alliance "had reached a critical moment in its life" and his insistence that any strengthening of the non-military forms of cooperation should not be at the expense of the military effort so long as the military capability of the Soviet Union, especially in modern weapons, continued to grow did not go unchallenged by the European members of the alliance. They found his views altogether too pessimistic and M. Spaak did not hesitate to say so in his usual forthright language. Pineau — who may have sensed in Dulles' remarks criticism of France in particular — also demurred at Dulles' gloomy but realistic analysis.

3. This reaction, which seems to have been shared by most of the European partners, may have been due in part to the fact that Mr. Dulles did not submit any concrete proposals as to how the concept of the Atlantic community might be further developed and the solidarity of the alliance strengthened. He was emphatic that "there was a time when the Atlantic community could find adequate basis for cohesion in fear — we cannot find cohesion except in a more positive, more dynamic, association". But all that he and the United Kingdom also were able to offer in working towards this end was the proposal to establish a committee of three Ministers "to advise the Council on ways and means to improve and extend NATO cooperation in non-military fields and to develop greater unity within the Atlantic community".²⁹

4. Mr. Dulles, however, made a useful contribution by pledging the full and earnest cooperation of the United States to this study, which, he insisted, should be a searching and thorough one; and by pegging out a few guide lines for further thinking on the subject of what NATO should and should not do in the non-military field. Thus, for instance, he put into bold relief the problem of how far the allies might be prepared to go in restricting their freedom of action by prior consultation on political matters of common interest such as East-West trade or cultural exchanges with the Soviet Union. In the economic field he raised the question of what relationship should exist between NATO and such bodies as OEEC whose membership included a number of neutrals who would object to having the OEEC made an instrument of NATO policy. In the matter of international economic aid he thought NATO should avoid having its trademark put on any aid which might be given to uncommitted countries who might resent such an indirect association with NATO. As regards the relationship of NATO to the U.N., he suggested that NATO should go very carefully in creating, or appearing to create, voting blocs there. This would cause special difficulties for the United States, since the Administration had assured the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate when recommending the approval of the North Atlantic Treaty that NATO would not be used to form a bloc for voting purposes in the U.N. as this would cause trouble for the United States in other regional organizations such as the Organization of American States.

5. This assessment of the present state of the alliance and where it should go in the field of non-military cooperation brought to light not only the hesitation of the United States and other members in embarking upon any bold new ventures without a very careful survey of the ground in advance, but also brought some of the weaknesses of the alliance and of the internal position of some of its most important members. For instance, M. Pineau was frank in admitting both the weakness of France as a result of the deterioration of its position in North Africa and also because of the internal political situation in France itself. The French Foreign Minister was therefore moved to make an appeal to the other allies to understand the position of his Government on the question of improving its relations with the Soviet Union and to trust its loyalty to the alliance. He recalled that France was more directly menaced than some other NATO members by the threat of subversion since 25 per cent of the electorate, although not necessarily Communists, voted for the Communist Party. As a result, the French Government was under greater pressure to give proof of their peaceful intentions in order to satisfy their own public opinion which had been contaminated by the Communist Party. This may explain the emphasis laid upon such matters as disarmament on which M. Pineau said he had no greater delusions as to the Soviet position than any other ally, as well as on the question of aid to under-developed countries. The very sensitivity of M. Pineau on this matter of East-West relations seemed to most of his colleagues to be closely connected with the forthcoming visit which he and his Prime Minister are to make to the Soviet Union in further efforts to establish their peaceful intentions.

The three ministers were Pearson, Lange (Norway) and Martino (Italy).

6. Actually M. Pineau both in the communiqué³⁰ and in the discussions demurred at references to the primary necessity of maintaining the military strength and vigilance of NATO upon which Mr. Dulles had laid so much emphasis. This, however, brought some sharp rejoinders from his colleagues, especially M. Spaak and Dr. von Brentano of Germany. The latter explained the political difficulties which would face his government in accepting a communiqué with emphasis on rapprochement with the Soviet Union and its satellites so long as that country continued to block the reunification of Germany. Certainly, nothing that Mr. Selwyn-Lloyd was able to tell the Council about the visit of Messrs. Khrushchev and Bulganin to the United Kingdom seemed to justify any change in attitude on the part of NATO in the course of vigilance and preparedness which had been asserted in previous discussions on East-West relations.

7. Mr. Dulles' emphasis on the continuing nature of the Soviet military threat also disclosed a significant difference in approach, between the United States and France at any rate, to the general question of East-West relations. While Mr. Dulles said very little on the question of disarmament, M. Pineau left no doubt that the French Government attached the greatest importance to the recent Russian moves on disarmament, and ventured the thought that these may have given sufficiently the appearance of concessions as to constitute another significant propaganda victory for the Soviet Union. This apparently was at least the impression created in some sectors of French public opinion. While Mr. Dulles sounded notes of caution on cultural and other exchanges between East and West, M. Pineau again thought that the West had nothing to lose in taking advantage of the recent changes in Soviet Policy to encourage such visits. There was in France considerable curiosity to find out what was actually happening in Soviet Russia. This curiosity had to be satisfied, and unless responsible citizens were given the opportunity and the means to help meet this need for information, the task would remain the monopoly of the French Communist Party, with obviously unfortunate consequences. Unless the French Government could assure the considerable portion of French public opinion favouring rapprochement with the Soviet Union that obstacles to peace and understanding did not come from the Western powers, but from the Soviet Union, the Leftist force in France might well come to the conclusion that the solution lies in a popular front government. It was precisely in order to prevent such development, M. Pineau pointed out, that the French Government was placing so much stress on its desire for peaceful cooperation, although, he added, he realized that the same problem did not probably exist in other countries of the Alliance.

8. It was recognized that NATO would have to show more flexibility and imagination in developing non-military activities if it was to hold its own with the Soviet bloc in competitive coexistence. The Council, however, showed little enthusiasm for M. Pineau's proposal to meet the new situation by establishing a new body in the U.N. for the promotion of the economic development of the under-developed countries and for the coordination of international economic assistance. The Council preferred to accept the more limited proposal submitted by the Italian Foreign Minister which went little beyond reiterating the terms of Article 2 and instructing the Permanent Representatives to examine economic problems with the assistance of a committee of technical advisers. There was very little if any support for the idea that NATO could or should play an effective role as an executive or planning body for aid to under-developed countries.

9. Actually the Council demonstrated that perhaps the most fruitful field for consultation lay in the exchange of information on political problems of common concern rather than economic. A good example was M. Pineau's explanation of the French difficulties in North Africa, in which he drew a sharp distinction between the situation in Morocco and Tunisia, where the French Government had been able to come to terms with responsible representatives of the national movements, and in Algeria, where no such responsible group was at present available or in prospect with which negotiations could be undertaken. However, M. Pineau made it clear that it was the intention of his Government to enter into negotiations for a peaceful solution in Algeria provided they found some reliable group with whom they could do business. This could not be done, however, without first holding free elections and in the meantime military operations had to continue in order to restore order. The aim in Algeria apparently was to establish a basis of co-existence between European and non-European elements of the population through the establishment of some federal system of government which would make it possible to safeguard the interests of minorities.

10. There was also a useful presentation of the problems in the Middle East by Mr. Dulles and the Turkish Foreign Minister and of the Far East by Mr. Dulles, both of which stressed the continuing dangers of Soviet and Chinese Communist penetration by indirect methods in peripheral areas and the need therefore to strengthen counter measures through existing regional security organizations such as the Baghdad Pact and SEATO, both of which were also developing non-military activities to cope with the new forms of Communist threat.

11. However, this exposé of political problems was not developed into really useful consultation because insufficient time was allotted to permit a full exchange of views. A valuable discussion for instance might have taken place had there been time on the problems raised for a number of member governments in regard to the shipment of arms to the Middle East. The Greek Government, for instance, wanted to consult other governments on the granting of transit rights for the shipment of aircraft both to Egypt as well as to Israel. Failing to get any advice on his dilemma the Greek Foreign Minister reserved the right of his Government to take whatever course seemed expedient and indicated that they could not assume responsibility if the decision of the Greek Government had undesirable consequences for their allies.

12. This meeting in fact, more than any of the preceding Ministerial meetings, demonstrated some serious defects in the procedures of the Council, defects which require urgent remedy if political consultation is to be made really effective. Despite the fact that the Canadian Government, prior to this meeting, as on other occasions, had urged that at least three or four days should be allotted to discussions, the Chairman (Foreign Minister of Iceland) in opening the meeting indicated that the discussions would have to be concluded within two days. As a result not only were the most interesting discussions which developed necessarily superficial, but also there was little or no opportunity for the Foreign Ministers to consult one another in private between the formal Council meetings. There was more evidence, however, than at previous meetings that Council members were impatient at the lack of time for discussion and were anxious to correct this situation.

13. Another defect in procedure which became apparent was the lack of adequate consultation between governments in preparation for the meeting. Thus no advance notice had been given of the United States intention to set up a Committee of Three Ministers, nor of M. Pineau's plan for economic development. Indeed, M. Pineau's plan, although not available to delegations before it was launched in the Council, was made simultaneously available to the press for obvious propaganda purposes. Likewise, the proposal for the establishment of the committee of three was given to the press of the world under the sobriquet of a new "wise man" exercise together with the names of the Foreign Ministers to be nominated before the proposal had been properly discussed in the Council and despite the appeal of the Canadian delegate to keep the matter in confidence to permit proper consultation with the governments concerned as well as within the Council.

14. Another evident defect in Council procedure is the relative infrequency of Ministerial meetings. Thus public expectation is allowed to build up that something dramatic is bound to emerge whenever Ministers meet. An artificial importance is therefore attached inevitably to the communiqué. A more regular attendance by Foreign Ministers at regular permanent Council meetings, especially when questions arise requiring consultation at the highest level between member governments, would remove this pressure for the Council periodically to burst into print through manifestos, and would make consultation on a confidential basis easier and more effective.

15. Summing up, the Ministerial meetings just concluded brought into sharp relief the fact that the prospect of developing effective cooperation in NATO non-military fields depends partly upon improvements in Council procedure; but even more upon member governments taking NATO more seriously as a main agency for their international consultations. It depends also on whether member governments are really serious in exploring and developing new ways of holding the alliance together in the face of the changed international environment. The procedural problems can probably be dealt with without any major change in the structure of NATO and without revision of the Treaty, although these possibilities cannot be ruled out altogether if it is found that the effectiveness of the alliance as a political instrument cannot be obtained without more drastic alterations of its basic instrument and structure. The will to develop NATO into something more important more vital is something that cannot be brought about without procedural changes.

16. The main substantive issue remains to be settled, whether the alliance can successfully adapt itself to a changing international environment in which the cohesive effect of imminent military danger has declined to the point where something more is necessary to ensure close and effective cooperation between member governments in the field of policy. The meeting in Paris found no solution to this issue and gave no ground for complacency or comfort that any such solution will be easy to find. Nevertheless insofar as the discussions revealed weaknesses of the present state of the alliance and offered, through the study of the committee of three, an opportunity to review and re-examine its basic requirements, the Paris meeting served a valuable purpose.

COMMITTEE OF THREE — QUESTIONNAIRE

Your thinking is evidently rather similar to ours. We agree that it would be desirable to clarify at the outset what the political aims of the alliance should be in the new international environment before considering the best way to achieve these aims through strengthening NATO in the non-military fields.

2. We have considered the useful ideas that you put forward and have prepared in the broadest terms a draft on the introductory section on political aims which is contained in my immediately following telegram. This embodies many of your ideas and even your words.

3. In the light of this statement of aims, the central tasks of the Committee of Three in the non-military field would appear to include the following main areas:

(1) to recommend to the Council ways and means by which the internal solidarity and unity of the NATO alliance may be strengthened;

(2) to recommend to the Council ways and means by which the relationships of interest and understanding between NATO, and non-NATO governments including the "neutral" and "uncommitted" countries may be strengthened;

(3) while maintaining and developing its strength as a coalition of free states to recommend to the Council ways and means of regaining the initiative by restating NATO's peaceful purposes, and by developing measures by which advantage may be taken of any genuine Soviet willingness to reduce tensions and achieve a durable basis of "competitive co-existence" and ultimately of genuine cooperation with the Soviet world.

4. We would propose to follow this up with some suggestions for a preliminary questionnaire which, together with the statement of aims, you might explore with your Italian and Norwegian colleagues together with Lord Ismay's cooperation in the preliminary work for the June meeting of the Committee of Three.

5. We agree entirely with Lange's view reported in your telegram number 794† that it is desirable for the Committee of Three to develop lines of definite policy on which they could ask the views of the Foreign Ministers but this need not hold up the preparation of some basic questions which will need to be included in any case in any questionnaire. If some preliminary work therefore could be completed before the June meeting, the Ministers could then have some point of departure if they agreed to use this questionnaire method in their consultations with other Governments.

THE POLITICAL AIMS OF THE ALLIANCE

(1) The Development of the Atlantic Community. Before attempting to put forward concrete proposals to strengthen the alliance, we should be clear in our own minds what are the objectives which we are trying to achieve. The avowed long-term aim of the Governments of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as set out in the Preamble of the Treaty and Article 2 is to create an Atlantic community. This implies a permanent association of free countries for the protection and advancement of interests they have in common, extending beyond a temporary military alliance. The problem is to consider how to tighten the alliance and prevent centrifugal forces from sundering it.

(2) Closer Political and Economic as Well as Military Cooperation among Members of the Alliance. In their competition with the Communist bloc of States the Western nations must demonstrate beyond doubt the superior quality and staying power of Western institutions and civilizations. This means that NATO has to attain and maintain military, political and economic power not only equal to but superior to that of the Communist nations through better organization of its intellectual and material resources, its technology, its industrial capacity and its skill. The problem is therefore how to attain the closest possible cooperation among the members of the alliance in order to meet the increasing competition from the Soviet bloc.

(3) Peaceful Change. If the Western nations are to compete against the Communist nations and their revolutionary doctrine, they must demonstrate that they do not oppose social change, economic experiment and political reorganization. They must set an example in the preparation of dependent peoples for eventual self-government. On the other hand, the member governments must maintain sufficient strength and political stability to enable peaceful change to proceed by mutual agreement and voluntary cooperation against the challenge of violent revolution. Considering that NATO includes all the major colonial powers of the West except Spain, it is necessary to see whether the governments of the Atlantic community can adopt a reasonably consistent and defensible position in regard to peaceful change, which will make it apparent that NATO is not just an organization for the protection of the status quo. Member governments should also be prepared to continue to use their wealth and technical know-how to raise the standard of living of under-developed and uncommitted countries. This does not, however, necessarily mean that the governments should undertake to use NATO for economic assistance and development plans.

The question is how to find a common approach to the problem of peaceful change in the international community.

(4) The Development Within the Atlantic Framework of Larger Political and Economic Units in Europe. Two wars have demonstrated the weakness of small nation states as they exist in Europe and have caused their citizens to look to larger units to make their political role more effective. The polarizing effect of the competition between the Soviet Union and the United States has accelerated this process. The attempts at integration, although hitherto unsuccessful should be recognized as intended to bring vitality back to European political and economic life and NATO should encourage these efforts at developing larger political and economic units among European nations especially the development of the Western European Union, or other forms of European integration. The problem is how to create political, economic and cultural unity in Western Europe, within the broad framework of the Atlantic association.

(5) Harmony Between NATO and the Rest of the International Community. NATO's interests and influence are not confined to the NATO area. While bringing their own interests into harmony therefore, member governments should also try to ensure that they do not conflict with the broader interests of the rest of the international community, particularly in the maintenance of international peace and security and in working towards safeguarded disarmament. NATO should stand for full cooperation with all members of the international community on the basis of rules of conduct generally accepted by all nations and in respect of basic human rights and should invite the Soviet bloc to accept the same standards as a basis of living together as a cooperative and not just as a co-existing member of the international society. The problem is how to establish NATO's relationship with the U.N. and other international organizations as well as with the Soviet bloc which will ensure that NATO's aims and policies particularly in the maintenance of peace and security are understood and the military system of the alliance is justified.

THE POLITICAL AIMS OF THE ALLIANCE

Some of the language concerning integration in Section (4) of my telegram might be taken as implying that all well-intentioned schemes of European integration should be encouraged by NATO. It would not appear to be prudent for NATO to give such a blanket blessing to all such projects without some examination of the merits of the different schemes which have been put forward. Accordingly I would be grateful if you would revise the last part of that section along the following lines in order to reflect my thoughts more accurately:

"The attempts at integration, although hitherto unsuccessful, and still facing considerable difficulties, should be recognized as intended to increase the vitality of European political and economic life. NATO should take a sympathetic interest in such movements and should encourage them where it is evident that they will effectively strengthen Europe and not impair relations within the alliance. The problem is how to promote political, economic and cultural unity in Western Europe within the broad framework of the Atlantic association."

SUMMARY OF BRIEFS — DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON WITH MR. DULLES

This memorandum attempts to bring together the principal points which have emerged in our preliminary departmental studies of the problems facing the Committee of Three. In view of the implications of the work of the Committee of Three and the preponderant role of the United States in the alliance, your discussions with Mr. Dulles obviously have great importance.

2. One of the principal elements of the study of the Three Ministers is to determine and report on how far the various members of the alliance are prepared to go in strengthening the non-military aspects of NATO and in maintaining the unity of the Atlantic community. It is also essential for the Ministers to diagnose accurately the present weaknesses and difficulties of NATO before prescribing specific remedies. For these reasons it is assumed that the main purpose of the present visit is not to present solutions at this stage, but rather to explore informally with the United States authorities how their own thinking on this whole problem is developing and what kinds of action they themselves contemplate being able to take to assist the Committee of Three in its difficult task.

3. The following comments, which are based on the detailed papers contained in the brief, it is hoped will be of assistance in your discussions:

A. Method of Work

No special comments supplementary to our memorandum of June 6† would appear to be required under this heading. See item 9 in your brief.

1. Background and Aims of Committee of Three Study

Under this heading the most important question would appear to be to determine as clearly as possible the limits which in the American view should apply to the study. From Mr. Perkins' visit it appears that Mr. Dulles considers that the Committee members should not limit themselves to a re-examination of NATO in its non-military aspects, but should consider the general position of "the West" in the face of the new challenge presented by the Soviet emphasis on competitive co-existence. In addition to the limitations of time at the disposal of Ministers, there is the question of the authority of a sub-committee designated by NATO to establish contact with and comment on the many regional and multilateral organizations which would be affected in any broad overall study.

4. Such a clarification, however, should bring out a clear indication from Mr. Dulles of the nature of the weaknesses and of the difficulties which face NATO and the various institutions of the Atlantic community at the present time (there is a brief† on some of the comments at the last Council session).

5. The point of departure in the paper on the background and aims is that the new developments in the Soviet Union are based upon a continued reliance by the Soviet Union on modern armaments and vast forces, coupled with new and more varied methods and a more flexible diplomatic and economic approach. NATO must develop initiatives with this more flexible and more complex Soviet policy firmly in mind.

6. Under these circumstances what are the central tasks of the Committee of Three? It is suggested that in the overall framework of the non-military field, these tasks are fourfold:

- (i) to define the political aims of the alliance in the light of current Soviet tactics;
- (ii) to recommend to the Council ways and means by which the internal solidarity and unity of the NATO alliance may be strengthened;
- (iii) to recommend to the Council ways and means by which the relationships of interest and understanding between NATO, and non-NATO governments including the "neutral" and "uncommitted" countries may be strengthened;
- (iv) while maintaining and developing its strength as a coalition of free states to recommend to the Council ways and means of regaining the initiative by re-stating NATO's peaceful purposes, and by developing measures by which advantage may be taken of any genuine Soviet willingness to reduce tensions and achieve a durable basis of "competitive co-existence" and ultimately of cooperation with the Soviet world.

7. The paper on NATO and the U.S.S.R.³¹ takes the view that the unity of the NATO alliance will depend upon our willingness to avoid rigid defence positions and take the initiative with the Russians for the settlement of outstanding East-West problems. The paper suggests that possibly the institution of the Council of Foreign Ministers could be revived, but not before there has been a clarification of the aims of the West with respect to such problems as the Middle East, German reunification, disarmament and European security.

2. Political Aims of the Alliance

8. A preliminary statement has been prepared as a basis for the discussion of the Three Ministers in Paris (see particularly Ottawa telegrams No. DL-519 of May 29 and No. E-527 of May 31 to the Delegation in Paris). This draft sets forth the following problems:

- (i) to consider how to tighten the alliance and to prevent centrifugal forces from sundering it;³²
- (ii) to attain the closest possible cooperation among the NATO members in order to meet the increasing competition from the Soviet bloc;

³¹ Voir Volume 23, Chapitre 3, 6^e partie, section C.

See Volume 23, Chapter 3, Part 6, Section C.

³² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

This should be a task of the Council not an aim of NATO. [L.B. Pearson]

(iii) to find a common approach to the problem of peaceful change in the international community, and to make it apparent that NATO is not just an organization for the protection of the status quo;

(iv) to develop and strengthen the movements towards political, economic and cultural unity in Western Europe within the broad framework of the Atlantic association;

(v) to consider how to establish NATO's relationship with the United Nations and other international organizations, as well as its long-term relationship with the Soviet bloc, with the aim of ensuring that NATO's policies in the maintenance of peace and security are understood and that its military system is fully justified.³³

Mr. Dulles' views on what the aims of the alliance should be in the present context would be most useful.

3. Atlantic Community and Other Possible Relationships

9. The present problem of the structure and composition of the Atlantic community seems to involve primarily NATO's Mediterranean flank.

10. The problem of the Middle East is now as much a matter of concern as was the problem of Western Europe when NATO was founded. How can NATO contribute to stability in that area, the security of which is so vital to the peace of the NATO area? Certainly political consultations on developments would be useful. It has also been suggested that the various forms of Soviet action in the area should be studied with a view to developing counter-measures. Even if final action takes place in other agencies, e.g. the United Nations, use of NATO as a forum for considering and planning main lines of policy would be advisable.

11. It is also necessary to examine the implications for NATO and the Atlantic community of the emergence of newly independent states in the Western Mediterranean area. You may wish to discuss privately with Mr. Dulles the ideas set forth in the memorandum in the brief dealing with French North Africa, NATO and the Mediterranean system.³⁴ This memorandum proposes that consideration might be given to the establishment of a Western Mediterranean grouping outside the framework of NATO which would include Tunisia and Morocco with the participation of governments with particular interests in the area, notably the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Spain and Portugal. The suggestion is that such a pact outside of NATO but including certain NATO members would form the counterpart in the Western Mediterranean to the Balkan alliance. If it could be negotiated, it would have an important bearing on NATO's future development, would resolve certain present pressing problems (i.e. the position of Tunisia and Morocco), and perhaps certain future problems as well (i.e. the problems of Algeria and of the relationship of Spain to NATO).

4. Political Consultation

12. Here the aim is clearer than the precise methods required to achieve it. The aim is to develop the closest possible coordination of the foreign policies of individual NATO governments on all matters of common concern to the alliance in order to strengthen its cohesion. The means must be based upon the development of a continuous interchange of information and views between member nations which still retain their ultimate freedom to

³³ Note marginale /Marginal note:
another task [L.B. Pearson]

³⁴ Voir/See Document 337.

differ and to negotiate their differences. When the NATO Treaty was before the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, as the memorandum[†] in the brief indicates, a restrictive interpretation was placed upon the concept of "consultation". In practice, however, although NATO consultation has developed along less restrictive lines, it still falls short of using NATO as an effective forum for consultation. It would be worthwhile to sound out Mr. Dulles on the following main principles:

(i) consultation in the form of informal exchanges of information between allies should be regarded as a normal and continuous diplomatic practice;

(ii) no NATO government should adopt a firm policy on major matters of concern to the whole alliance without early and previous consultation with other members of the alliance;

(iii) after such consultation has taken place, each member government should, in determining its own policy, take fully into account the views of other members, particularly those more directly concerned;

(iv) in all matters having to do with the basic question of NATO-Soviet bloc relationships, the aim should be to develop an agreed framework of general policy and, where practicable, an agreed basis with respect to national policies on specific issues.

13. As a major power in the alliance with global interests, it is essential to know how far the United States is prepared to go in developing political consultation within NATO.

14. At the same time there are certain limitations which will have to be observed if NATO is not to overtax its capacities, and avoid duplication in matters which are being dealt with, or can be dealt with more effectively in the United Nations, or through other processes of consultation. Consultation on a NATO basis should observe the following guide posts:

(a) NATO consultation should not be on an exclusive basis, in matters where the interests of others are also affected.

(b) NATO consultation is not intended to replace the use of regular bilateral or multilateral diplomatic channels, but to supplement them; the special obligations of the major Powers on certain issues, as well as their responsibilities to NATO, should be kept in mind.

(c) NATO governments are members of other associations, e.g. the Commonwealth, O.A.S., Messina Group, and procedures for inter-group consultation must always be borne in mind.

(d) Individual NATO governments should take steps to ensure that their actions and attitude in these other bodies do not conflict with NATO objectives, and vice versa.

(e) NATO is not a "bloc"; it is a framework of obligations and a pattern of procedures which assist its members to carry out their obligations towards one another under the Treaty, towards other governments with whom they are associated for other purposes, and towards the continuing challenge of the Soviet "bloc" which is the main reason for NATO's existence.

(f) On the assumption that political consultation in NATO should aim at the closer co-ordination of the foreign policies of NATO governments the willingness of certain NATO governments to introduce into NATO subjects for them domestically difficult, should be matched by the willingness of the other NATO Powers to accept the logical consequences, corresponding to their responsibilities and powers, of such concerted discussion.

(g) While NATO should not complete with or take the place of other international bodies with accepted responsibilities and machinery to conduct those duties effectively, presumably "operations" by NATO would be confined to those fields which, like the military field, are clearly the responsibility of "NATO as such".

(h) It might be borne in mind that the distinction between the military and the non-military aspects of NATO should not always be too closely drawn. Unlike other international organizations — the U.N. for example — the North Atlantic Council has available to it the combined military wisdom of the Western powers. If, therefore, the Council were examining a question such as the attitude to be taken towards the Cyprus question or the problems of disarmament, it could with advantage have before it military “appraisals”. To carry this point a step further: the Council, if discussing Cyprus, would start by examining a standing group paper on the strategic importance of Cyprus to NATO.

Special Problems (Disarmament; Cyprus)

15. It is suggested that in discussing the question of disarmament it should be made clear that we are not proposing that the disarmament problem be removed from its United Nations context and the Sub-Committee to the NATO forum, and that the NATO members of the Sub-Committee would be put in a difficult position if they were obliged to clear their policies at all stages in NATO before taking up positions in the Sub-Committee. At the same time, there is scope for NATO reviewing this problem of disarmament from time to time, particularly in connection with the implications of Soviet moves and propaganda positions.

16. On the question of Cyprus, the important point, it is suggested, is that in raising the question whether NATO can properly and usefully discuss serious internal conflict such as the Cyprus question, the Committee of Three is not itself intervening in the dispute or proposing any specific solutions. Nor is it contemplated that the Committee itself should have any “operational” functions in respect of the Cyprus dispute. In this connection, you will wish to bear in mind Mr. Robertson’s latest report from London (telegram No. 748 of June 7†) in which he states that he cannot find any evidence to support press reports that the United Kingdom Government is considering consulting NATO in connection with Cyprus and recommends that we should continue our present policy of non-interference in the current mood of United Kingdom Ministers. The problem of Cyprus in the context of the Washington discussions, therefore, is raised as an illustration of the kind of problem which NATO cannot ignore if the coalition is to avoid being weakened by serious internal problems.

17. Finally, and of great importance in this field, it is important for NATO to adopt an enlightened approach on the broad lines of the colonial problem, and to avoid being identified as the last-ditch defender of the “status quo”. This is a problem which could divide the colonial (i.e. the European powers in NATO) from the non-colonial powers (Canada and the United States), and is one on which a frank indication of United States views would be most important. In blunt terms, if we are to urge a “liberal” policy on France over Algeria, or the United Kingdom over Cyprus, what are we ourselves prepared to do to share in the responsibility?

5. Economic Cooperation

18. The economic brief† contains the following elements:

(1) The broad approach represented by GATT and the International Monetary Fund is most likely to strengthen NATO countries and eliminate conflict between them. NATO governments, therefore, should do what they can to make these organizations more effective.

(2) NATO should undertake periodic discussions on general or particular aspects of the current international economic situation and in particular should provide a forum for consideration of Soviet economic activities in various fields, even though such discussion might not necessarily lead to coordinated or agreed policies.

(3) We should welcome OEEC activities not inconsistent with the broad approach referred to above and play a more active part in these activities.

(4) Mr. Wilgress suggested:

(a) New U.S. initiative on convertibility with fresh provision of credit as the main inducement; and

(b) U.S. and Canadian full membership in OEEC.

On (a) it is doubted that even a substantial fresh credit (in addition to the stand-by credits the IMF will in any case make available) would induce the laggard countries to move forward. Lack of reserves is not a principal obstacle in most cases. On (b) the brief questions the wisdom of a North American initiative which might change the present European character of OEEC and lessen its value to Europeans. At the same time it is indicated that both Canada and the United States might be prepared to examine sympathetically a general move in this direction, only if there is a clear indication from the European members that this would be desirable.

(5) The U.S. and Canada should keep fairly open minds on Messina plans and similar regional arrangements until we can study latest version, and until we know the results of the present U.K. re-appraisal.

(6) The U.S.S.R. has put forward proposals in ECE for all-European economic cooperation, probably with the intention of weakening OEEC and NATO. NATO countries should consider how to react to this new offensive.

6. Social, Information and Cultural Activities

19. There may not be time to cover this particular field fully. The suggestion in the brief,† however, is that a careful examination should be made of the Reinink report which has been before the Council for some time and which contains many suggestions in these fields, particularly relating to informational and cultural activities. What is required here is a selective approach to weed out proposals which are impracticable and to develop those which show greatest promise. It would also be interesting to learn whether the United States considers that NATO should play a more active part than hitherto in the field of "psychological warfare", including in this field informational programmes directed particularly to the Soviet Union and the satellites, as well as providing within NATO countries and possibly in other areas fuller information programmes to counteract Communist propaganda.

7. Parliamentary Representation

20. The brief† argues that the time has come to widen the basis of public support and understanding of the aims of the alliance by increased participation of parliamentary associations. The Council of Europe is primarily a European organization and contains member states which are not members of NATO. Further it is limited by the terms of its constitution from actively discussing military problems. For these reasons, the emphasis in the brief is on giving a more active role to the NATO Parliamentary Conference which exists by creating a NATO Parliamentary Assembly. It is suggested that such an Assembly might hold a joint meeting with the Council which could be addressed by representatives of member governments and the Secretary-General. This would not be to the exclusion of strictly parliamentary meetings which could precede or follow the joint meeting. Foreign Ministers (in certain cases they might even head their national delegations to the parliamentary assembly) could participate in the joint meeting which could be immediately followed by the regular Ministerial meeting of the Council. By a careful scheduling of the timetables, such meetings with the parliamentary component might be held immediately preceding the December "Annual Review" meetings. The further suggestion is made that parliamentary advisers might be attached to NATO delegations in the same way as our own practice and that of the United States in connection with the United Nations Assembly.

21. It may be that the Council of Europe, which is not regarded as a particularly effective organization, would be substantially improved by the adhesion of representation from the United States and Canada. Possibly, the parliamentary delegations from these two countries could develop some closer association with the Council of Europe in the non-military fields which need not cut across the proposal for fuller Parliamentary representation in its relationship to the NATO organization and the NATO Council. This requires further study.

8. Relationship to Regional Agencies and to the United Nations

Regional Agencies

22. There should be a careful look at the various European agencies now devoted to different aspects of integration and functional cooperation to determine whether any re-arrangement is possible to produce greater efficiency in their operations and to ensure that their work is not incompatible with broader Atlantic interests. We have already commented on the problem of the Council of Europe under heading No. 7, and the economic agencies are referred to under heading No. 5. Within the responsibilities of the Committee of Three it may be possible to examine the role of these various regional agencies, and to make suggestions for bringing at least some of them into a closer relationship with NATO. The objective should of course not be to create an artificial uniformity, and it may well be found at the end of the study that the operation of these different experiments in closer association provides for a much needed flexibility. At the same time, any steps that can be taken to make the present "alphabet soup" more meaningful for the average citizen in the countries concerned is well worth exploring.

NATO and the United Nations

23. One of the major questions on which Mr. Dulles' views will be of interest is NATO's relationship to the United Nations.

24. Three papers† are attached in the brief dealing with the following subjects: the possible submission of reports by NATO to the U.N., the advisability of discussing U.N. issues in NATO, and the problem of the settlement of internal disputes through procedures similar to those contained in the Charter. On the first question of reports, it would seem that in the first instance such reports could only be related to NATO's non-military functions, and it is premature to envisage such reporting until these functions are further developed. On the second question, it is suggested that it would be helpful to exchange views between individual NATO governments on U.N. matters of common concern and, when the opportunity presents itself, to harmonize the views thus expressed as well as to promote consideration by NATO of the kind of action within the United Nations which would best serve the interests of the Atlantic community as a whole. It is not, however, envisaged, in view of the different political and regional problems which face individual governments, that the effort should be made to create a NATO voting bloc, nor is it proposed that there should be indiscriminate discussion of all U.N. items. The basis of such consultation should be the tests of whether or not the matter is of common concern to the members of NATO, and whether such consultation can serve a useful purpose.

25. Perhaps the most important question is whether NATO should develop machinery for the settlement of its internal disputes or disputes between individual NATO governments and third countries. In other words, is specific action required to provide machinery for the implementation of the general undertaking contained in Article 1 of the Treaty? The Organization of American States is a regional organization under the terms of the Charter, and specific procedures are incorporated both in OAS treaty arrangements and in the practices of that organization providing for peaceful settlement of disputes. It is worth considering whether NATO should attempt to establish its position as a regional agency, and if so whether NATO members would be willing to accept the legal and procedural obligations for prior peaceful settlement implied by such a decision. The memorandum which deals with this problem concludes that even if NATO were to establish machinery for the settlement of disputes between members in accordance with the terms of Article 8, this would in no way limit NATO's action to take measures for collective self-defence.

26. Short of action to convert NATO into a regional agency, it is possible to envisage agreement being reached between the members of NATO which would involve the acceptance of special machinery within the organization itself for the mediation, conciliation and arbitration of disputes between members. One step could be taken immediately to relate NATO to U.N. machinery: e.g. special declarations by NATO countries under Article 36(2) of the Statutes of the International Court establishing between themselves a special obligation to submit either all or certain particular legal disputes. Thus NATO countries could claim that through their organization, special use was being made of the main Charter arrangement for the peaceful settlement of disputes.

27. Whether NATO should turn itself formally into a regional agency would depend first on the setting up within NATO of machinery for the pacific settlement of local disputes. According to Kelsen,³⁵ there can be no regional agency or arrangement without such machinery. The NATO countries would therefore have to find out first whether they would be prepared to make such arrangements. It would be very important to examine whether there are any prospects of establishing procedure say for conciliation or arbitration.

28. If machinery for the pacific settlement of disputes were to be established, then NATO could consider whether it should arrange to be formally recognized as a regional agency operating under the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter. The advantage in such recognition is that it would very largely meet the criticism that NATO is in opposition to the Charter: furthermore, should the Warsaw Pact be similarly registered, the way might be prepared for a revival of the Security Council as an effective enforcement agency. The disadvantage is that in the event of an attack against a NATO country, an argument could be made in the U.N. that the NATO countries could not provide assistance unless prior approval had been obtained from the Security Council. It can be argued that Article 51 is overriding and that nothing in Chapter VIII could interfere with the operation of a collective defence arrangement, but there is room for argument.

29. Since Mr. Dulles has already spoken of the possibility of NATO as a regional agency, it might be as well to let him make the running on this subject and, while agreeing that NATO should seek to find ways of settling disputes between its members at an early stage, to leave the precise methods by which this might be done for subsequent study.

Such a study to be effective would have to be sparked by the U.S. because of its atomic role.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE — PRELIMINARY VIEWS OF MR. DULLES

1. Mr. Pearson met with Mr. Dulles and Senator George in a cordial and informal atmosphere, first at an embassy lunch and later at a two hour meeting in the State Department. At lunch, at which Mr. Knowland (Majority Leader in the Senate) and Senator Green (Senator George's successor, as Chairman of Foreign Relations Committee) were present, the Minister outlined his plans to meet with his colleagues, Lange and Martino in Paris on June 20 to 22 and the programme of work he hoped might be followed. The present talks were intended to find out in an informal way for the information of the committee how far the USA were prepared to go in extending NATO cooperation in the non-military field. He was not in a position to speak for his colleagues. The report, if it were to have practical results, had to be based on what member governments, especially the USA, the UK and France, were willing to do to support the task set by the Atlantic Council at its last meeting. The three ministers were acting as rapporteurs of the Council. He hoped that the report might be drafted by the end of October and then submitted to governments for a first reading at a meeting possibly in New York or elsewhere in the USA in November after the presidential elections. It was particularly important to have the support and active cooperation of the USA in the reappraisal of NATO.

2. While Mr. Dulles had invited Mr. Pearson to make some general remarks at the lunch on the aims of the study, he reserved USA comments until the meeting at the State Department at which Senator George, Livingston Merchant, George Perkins, and Senior State Department officials were present. Mr. Dulles said he was willing to have the discussion proceed on the basis of the list of questions contained in your message under reference. He also gave Mr. Pearson a general written statement† of his own views on the future of NATO. Mr. Dulles said that he regarded the task of the Committee of Three as one of "utmost importance". President Eisenhower's appointment of Senator George indicated the high importance that the President attached to the task.

3. Method of Work. Mr. Pearson outlined in more specific terms the programme and procedures which he intended to suggest to his colleagues at the Committee of Three as he had sketched them at the embassy lunch. He emphasized, however, that the procedures and timetable may have to be changed in the light of the consultations in Paris and circumstances as the study proceeded. One of the methods he had in mind might be to circulate questions to explore the views of member governments. Some of these questions had been incorporated in the list submitted to the State Department in advance.

4. Background and Aims. Mr. Pearson in answering Mr. Dulles' comment reminded him that at the last ministerial meeting he had suggested that the committee should interpret the terms of reference in no narrow sense. Mr. Dulles, in indicating the limits of action which the USA administration contemplated setting on this NATO reappraisal, cautioned that these were only preliminary views as Senator George was occupied in his present Senate duties until mid July and the task force set up to study USA views had not yet gotten underway. Generally speaking the scope of the study could be broadly interpreted but should aim to build on the present NATO structure. The USA study was proceeding on the assumption that, while different instruments might be considered for giving expression to the development of the Atlantic community, present USA thinking was that the NATO Council was perhaps the best agency on which to build. In extending non-military cooperation the machinery was flexible, NATO had become a "household word" in the USA and it was difficult to dissociate military from non-military activities. They were considering further alternative possibilities, including the idea of USA and Canada joining the Council of Europe which had the advantage of parliamentary representation. However, the preliminary thought was that the Council had declined in prestige because of discursive tendencies. Consideration was also being given to a possibility of a Super Council on a Ministerial level with a number of subsidiary agencies for military and non-military cooperation but this idea was also not thought to be practical. (At lunch reference had been made to the hearings on the Atlantic Union in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and despite the apparent enthusiastic support given to the idea of General Gruenther, it was clear from the remarks of Senator Knowland that all that was intended was a completion of the record through hearings both pro and con and that the committee was not expected to issue any report and the proposed resolution.)

5. Aims re Soviet Bloc. On the question of whether NATO should recognize itself as a frankly anti-Soviet alliance or should work separately for a détente, Mr. Pearson particularly asked USA views regarding the possible role of NATO in negotiations with the Soviet Bloc. Dulles replied that, while NATO members should not regard themselves as constituting an anti-Soviet alliance but rather as a community cooperating for their own good and for the rest of the international community, the task of negotiation should be reserved for certain governments. The Council was not an appropriate instrument for negotiation although the governments most directly concerned could consult with their allies through the Council. The Council could not as a corporate body become involved in negotiations. Senator George agreed with the suggestion that negotiations should be left to Heads of States although attitudes of NATO members should be examined through the Council.

6. Statement of Political Aims. Mr. Dulles suggested that the report might be prefaced by a statement of the reasons for the reappraisal and the conclusions about problems confronting the alliance. This kind of an approach had been in mind when they had drafted the general statement given to Mr. Pearson. Any attempt to restate the political aims of the alliance would give rise to constitutional difficulties for the USA as the Administration might have to go back to Congress for their approval. In any case the preamble of the North Atlantic Treaty would suffice. Senator George in agreeing pointed out that the report might indicate that certain new activities would seem to fall within the purposes of the Treaty as originally drafted; it would be better not to try to amend it. Mr. Pearson explained that he was not contemplating so much an amendment to the Treaty as an elaboration of how the purposes of the alliance could best be achieved in the present changing international environment, particularly in preserving its unity.

7. Mediterranean Problems. Mr. Dulles queried the desirability of setting the Mediterranean political problems aside in a special category for examination as distinct from other political problems which would have to be considered under "political consultations". Mr. Pearson explained that this had been done because of the immediate urgency of certain Mediterranean problems and their implications for NATO, especially in cases of Algeria and Cyprus. The NATO needed to examine the role of what an organization based on the Atlantic concept should be towards the series of difficult problems developing in the Mediterranean. What should be the attitude, for instance, of the organization to the countries now acquiring independence, particularly Morocco and Tunisia. Mr. Dulles doubted whether the Committee of Three in their report should go beyond indicating what these problems were and leave solutions to be worked out through political consultations. Thus, these problems might be listed as illustrative of types of consultations which should be developed on political problems within NATO, and had been so dealt with in the USA general statement.

8. Political Consultations. Mr. Pearson referring to the different types of consultations that might be developed in NATO thought it was important at the outset to know how far the major powers, and particularly the USA, were prepared to go. Mr. Dulles said that in his opinion there were two main categories of questions: (a) worldwide policy matters which did not affect NATO members more directly than other members of the international community and; (b) those matters in which NATO members were more directly affected than other members of the international community. Under category (a) he cited for instance Formosa and the USA attitude to Kashmir. While the USA position might have important repercussions for NATO members other countries were even more directly concerned. To undertake an obligation to consult in NATO would duplicate or reduce the consultative procedures of the UN as well as other regional organizations such as SEATO. Therefore under (a) the USA would not think it advisable to regard themselves as under any compulsion to consult even to the extent of exchanging views. However, as in the past, Mr. Dulles would be prepared to expound USA policies and have questions asked on the basis of such statements in order to promote what he called "a more sympathetic attitude towards USA policy". As regards category (b) matters directly affecting the NATO area and therefore of direct concern to member governments, procedures for consultation could and should be worked out. Some of the more important subjects on which the USA Government believed such consultations might take place had been listed in the USA paper. This included first and foremost the unification of Germany, as the policies on this issue directly affected the defence of Western Europe. He thought that there should be an effort to establish a common policy on German unification. It was extremely important also to develop common lines of policy on specific issues in relation to North Africa since as Mr. Pearson had recalled Algeria was part of the area.

9. Colonial Problems. Mr. Dulles doubted the practicability of arriving at any general NATO position on the colonial problem. USA had no clear view at the present, but were inclined to think that the matter should be treated in terms of specific cases such as Cyprus or Algeria which presented certain distinctive aspects of the colonial problem of direct concern to NATO members.

10. East West Relations. Mr. Dulles referred to current efforts of the Soviet Union and Communist China to try to make deals with individual allies in order to disrupt the unity of the alliance. He thought that consultations should take place in the Council regarding the responses to Communist initiatives before action was taken. For example, he had been inclined to consult on the invitation to the USA Chief of the Air Staff but in view of the rather precipitous response of the UK and France to similar invitations, the USA had decided to go ahead and accept. The timing of offers now being made of various kinds from the Soviet Bloc had to be dealt with with caution with a view not only to their impact on domestic opinion but also on the public opinion of allied countries where a substantial part of the electorate fell under Communist influence. Mr. Pearson added that it was not only important what allied governments did but also what they said.

11. Adequacy of Present NATO Machinery for Consultation. Mr. Pearson suggested that in considering how consultation should be conducted he hoped that governments might agree to set an example by making consultations function without even waiting for the Committee of Three to report. It was better to show how consultations worked by example than by prescription in a report. For instance, if the USA attached importance to consultation on the unification of Germany why not start consultations on this problem without delay. Mr. Dulles in stating that ministerial meetings were too brief, emphasized that they were all that he or any other Secretary of State could manage. He had been under criticism also for being absent from Washington on conferences of this kind. The main question therefore seemed to him to strengthen the permanent machinery. He stressed that the USA administration had complete confidence in its present Permanent US Representative, George Perkins (who was present at the meeting). Dulles said they were considering providing more depth to their representative by making senior officials from the State Department available for discussions on specific topics. As regards German unification, Mr. Dulles said he was receptive to the idea of undertaking consultations so that the German Government could feel that the German Government desired this. In short Mr. Dulles did not see any reason why radical changes should be made in the existing machinery.

12. Limits on USA Action in Consultation. Mr. Dulles said that consultation presented a difficult problem to the USA in trying to reconcile effective consultation with allies with quick decisions. He cited the President's reply to Bulganin's first message on disarmament to show how important it was in some instances not to allow consultation to act as a brake on effective action. Since the USA in this case knew through previous consultations on disarmament roughly what the attitude of principal allies were on the issues raised the President undertook to make a quick reply to obtain the maximum psychological effect. He suggested that consultations should not be regarded as an end in itself but only as a means to strengthen and unify the alliance. NATO should avoid becoming enmeshed in what he called "a web of procedures" which might only strain the unity of the alliance. This important end might be served by intimate bilateral talks between governments which would provide a better foundation for spontaneous consultation on matters of common concern. The USA, Mr. Dulles said, "would be willing to go as far as any other country with comparable responsibilities" in the matter of consultations; he added, "even further". Mr. Dulles added, however, that with its worldwide responsibilities, it was, in some cases, more difficult for the USA to consult than it was for other countries and it was important for allies of the USA to bear in mind that as the USA often bore the brunt of the result of their actions, they should likewise keep in mind the importance of consulting the USA before taking action.

13. Specific Settlement of Intermember Disputes. Mr. Pearson asked whether Mr. Dulles could throw any light on views which he had expressed about applying OAS type of machinery to NATO for the settlement of intermember disputes or upon the suggestion that NATO might become a regional organization under the terms of Chapter 8 of the UN Charter. Mr. Dulles thought no conclusion had as yet been reached in the USA studies but tentatively the ideas were that (a) it was important that there should be progress in this field since Western Europe particularly had been the source of so much international trouble and had been plagued by disputes and (b) because the enlargement of membership in the UN made the UN the less attractive place for dealing with disputes between members of the alliance because of the increasing influence of the Asian-African nations and (c) that the Charter enjoined members of the UN to use regional as well as bilateral arrangements for settlement of disputes before appealing to the multilateral UN machinery. He was unable to offer further proposals at the present time. Senator George strongly counselled against the establishment of any new machinery which would involve political problems for the USA in having to go back to Congress for possible amendment of the North Atlantic Treaty. He suggested that for the time being at least intermember disputes might be dealt with under "political consultations".

14. Economic Consultations. Mr. Pearson suggested that it was difficult to draw a clear distinction between political and economic aspects of policy questions on which NATO might consult. There seemed to be a fairly general agreement that NATO should not become an operating agency which would duplicate or compete with other international agencies such as GATT or OEEC but it was important to decide what kind of consultation should take place on economic questions and what the relationship of NATO should be to other agencies in the economic field. Mr. Dulles said that there was no sense at all in turning NATO into an operating agency in the economic field. He was increasingly concerned, however, that the rapid economic development going on in the Soviet Union in contrast to some countries of Western Europe would put the Soviet Union into a very strong competitive position in relation to the rest of Europe. This would have important political repercussions. It was also necessary to realize that the Soviet system was not operating under the stimuli of economic profit so much as political profit. One of the measures necessary to counter Soviet competitive advantages would be a greater measure of economic integration of Western Europe. Western Europe might well be destroyed as effectively by the Soviet economic challenge as by military aggression. Mr. Dulles said that USA would be prepared to consult on the broad economic factors which bear upon the future of Europe through NATO. They are also prepared to consider on their merits the various initiatives of European integration particularly the Common Market, Euratom and the Coal and Steel Community. The USA particularly regarded with disfavour practices and cartelization as tending toward weakening the economies of Western Europe.

15. Relation to OEEC. Mr. Dulles was not fully familiar with the implications of present associated membership of USA and Canada with OEEC. Mr. Merchant and Perkins pointed out the difficulties which would arise through full membership for the USA because this might imply acquiescence in residual discriminatory practices followed by European members in relation to the aid area. The OEEC had been designed to advance the European interests of its members. For these reasons both Merchant and Perkins maintained that the present relation of Canada and the USA should be retained.

16. Economic Aid. Mr. Dulles referred to what seemed to the USA a strong desire of some of its allies to use NATO as an instrument for multilateral economic aid activities on the assumption that perhaps more aid might be channelled in this way to NATO countries. The fact was that Congress was becoming increasingly allergic to multilateral aid where UN or NATO were concerned in handling USA aid; if anything there was preference for UN. In any case it was questionable whether it was desirable to have a NATO label put on economic aid to countries. Senator George went further in saying that Congress preferred bilateral arrangements for channelling USA economic aid since the UN through enlargement of its membership gave the USA voice a diminishing weight in controlling aid programmes. Mr. Dulles suggested that at least UN had the advantage over NATO of sterilizing aid and dissociating it from political and military implications.

17. Parliamentary Representations. Mr. Pearson asked what views had been developed on using parliamentary support for NATO activities particularly through the NATO parliamentary associations. Mr. Dulles said that this had proved to be an illusive and difficult problem. Some consideration had been given to the inclusion of Congressional members on NATO delegations but there were obvious difficulties and no specific ideas had been developed.

18. Need for Reexamination of NATO Military Structure and Strategy. Mr. Pearson recalled that, while the terms of reference referred only to non-military activities, the development of unity was obviously closely related to the development of a generally acceptable military strategy. Mr. Merchant who was speaking for the State Department (as Mr. Dulles had by this time withdrawn to keep an appointment at the White House) said that while he could agree with the general proposition, he would hope that reference to the military aspect would be kept to a minimum in the report, for this was a bad time for reexamination of military strategy. Procedures for consultation between individual NATO members had been recently established and perhaps it might suffice in the report if some general attention were given military implications in connection with political consultations. This particularly referred to giving advance notice to allies before substantial changes in military contributions were made, as for instance, the shifts made by the French Government of their troops to North Africa.

19. Use of American Experts in Special Studies. Both Perkins and Elbrick agreed that it would be desirable to use experts in preparing first drafts of the report since they would not be under the disadvantage of operating under national instructions. They agreed that the Committee of Three should feel free to call on unofficial experts in the USA.

20. Further Followup Procedures. Mr. Pearson said that, while it would be difficult for him to undertake to have any further informal consultations with the USA Government after the Committee of Three had started their work, he would welcome any suggestions or ideas from Washington as their studies progressed. He also might arrange to have Ignatieff come down for further exploratory talks after the Committee of Three meetings in Paris had concluded. He made it clear, however, that he could not undertake to clear any part of the report with Washington during the course of its preparation but that he and his colleagues would bear in mind the views and suggestions of member governments.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE; IMPRESSIONS OF USA POSITION

Our telegram under reference confines itself to an account of your conversations in Washington on Monday June 11, with the Secretary of State, Senator George and others. Over the weekend you also had an opportunity of talking with a group of State Department officials on June 9 and with a group of American journalists on June 10.

2. In this telegram I shall attempt to record briefly the main impressions we received of the present position of the USA Administration with regard to the matters covered by the terms of reference of the Committee of Three.

3. To a limited degree there was an encouraging indication of common ground. This was perhaps most evident in the discussions of economic aspects though it was also evident that the Administration believe in principle in more consultation. It was also satisfactory to know that the Administration is broadly satisfied with the present mechanism and is more than doubtful that any radical changes in that regard would be helpful. Some limited clarity was found on the previously generalized reference to the OAS. Mr. Dulles indicated no desire to make artificial distinctions between political, economic and military aspects of NATO.

4. There are obviously, however, severe limitations upon the extent to which the government here would be willing to support the development of NATO beyond its present sphere of activity. In the discussion at the State Department on June 11, Dulles on a number of occasions stated frankly that the Administration would not accept any proposals which would involve going to Congress for additional authority. In this he was supported completely by Senator George. So, for the period of the Congress at any rate, we may be quite sure that any recommendations of the Committee of Three which, for the USA, would require legislative sanction of any sort would not be supported by the Administration.

5. Apart from these "congressional" limits to USA action it was quite evident from our discussions that Dulles placed quite severe geographical and procedural limitations upon the extent of effective political consultation in NATO which the USA would be willing to accept and support. It was, I think, particularly significant that Dulles laid considerable emphasis upon the "web of procedures" and the brake upon essential speed in decision which excessive consultation might involve (paragraph 12 of our telegram under reference).

6. A more specific impression which we had derives from that portion of the discussion recorded in paragraph 14 of our telegram under reference. Unless the European nations are induced to unite, their division would inevitably bring economic and political disintegration under Soviet competition. This of course is no new theme for Dulles. Nor was it by any means clear precisely what means he would adopt to prevent or reverse, this progress. But it was evident that this remains a strong motivation in USA policy.

7. Our impression of the extent and depth of American thinking on the "non-military" aspects of NATO was amply confirmed. That is to say, Mr. Dulles himself (and the same is true of his senior advisers) is at a very early stage in his consideration of what could and should be done to strengthen the unity of NATO. This emerged very clearly from our meetings and was admitted frankly by the Secretary at his press conference, yesterday, June 12. In fact the USA have only just begun, at the top levels, to examine seriously the steps by which NATO might move from the general to the particular in this field. Perhaps the best evidence of this is the statement which Dulles himself composed and of which he gave you a copy when you were here. (Ignatieff has taken several copies of this to Ottawa with him.)

8. While there was confirmation of the desire of the Administration for "making NATO more than a mere military alliance" we have had the impression that not only were the means of achieving this ill-defined but that the USA have not given adequate attention to the problem of how to reconcile the strengthening of NATO on the one hand with the cautious pursuit of a détente on the other. Clearly from Dulles' paper they are still thinking of NATO primarily in terms of an anti-Soviet alliance. This of course is one essential objective but it remains to think out the place and role of NATO in the world as it now is.

9. In his press conference of June 12 the Secretary of State answering the question on his views on the development said in part "We have a very able group of officers within the Department of State who are studying the problem from a technical standpoint". Perhaps the last phrase was hastily used but at best it does not suggest the position of the role that NATO should play. The "very able group of officers" is for the most part at a junior level and from indications that came to us after your departure we gained the impression that the group was looking hopefully for another lead from the Secretary rather than feeling free to plunge into the rethinking which we would like to see.

10. Both encouraging and somewhat discouraging evidence emerged from your conference here. We are hopeful, however, that the series of questions you put and on which the value of the meetings so much depended will lead to fuller and more realistic study here of the problem before your committee. Furthermore, the lack of precision in USA thinking to date does not by any means imply that the new enthusiasm here for a stronger NATO may not have important results for the alliance.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE — PRELIMINARY VIEWS OF MR. DULLES

The detailed and rather depressing account of Mr. Dulles' views was intended for your own information only. An impressionistic account more calculated to encourage our NATO partners in their efforts to produce new ideas and practical suggestions for the Committee has been prepared and will be used to brief Heads of Missions from NATO countries in Ottawa. I also propose to report to Lange and Martino when we meet next week. In the meantime, you might tell your Norwegian and Italian colleagues that we have briefed the Norwegian and Italian Ambassadors at Ottawa and that I intend to give a full account of my talks to their Foreign Ministers next week.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE — IMPRESSIONS OF MR. DULLES' VIEWS

The most important purpose of the visit to Washington was to assure the Committee of Three of the support of the United States Government for the task which the Committee had been charged by the Atlantic Council to advise on ways and means to improve and extend NATO cooperation in the non-military fields and to develop unity within the Atlantic community. It is of course important that all members should give support to the work of the Committee in the tangible form of contributing new ideas and practicable suggestions; but because of the position of the United States both in the Alliance and in world affairs, it is particularly important that this support should be forthcoming from Washington. There was no doubt as to the keen interest and support which Mr. Dulles has for this reappraisal of NATO. He said that he regarded the task of the Committee as one of "utmost importance". The interest and support of the President was demonstrated by the appointment of Senator George to the job of providing leadership for the U.S. studies of NATO problems.

2. However, the views on the United States position are still in a formative and tentative stage. Senator George will be fully occupied with his duties as Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate until Congress adjourns. Mr. Julius Holmes, who is to be senior staff member on the task force which has been set up to do technical studies on various NATO problems, will not return to Washington from his present duties at Rabat until sometime in July. In the meantime, a staff of some 7 or 8 officials has been assembled to start the work of preparing technical studies.

3. From the preliminary talks with Mr. Dulles, it was clear that the United States agreed in principle that there should be a development of consultation between member governments on matters of common concern. As Mr. Dulles pointed out, this was already being done on political problems and it was a question of developing further ground which had already been broken through increased usage and improved methods. He did not see the necessity for any radical changes in NATO machinery for this purpose. One suggestion which he put forward, for instance, was that each government should send their highest experts on any given problem who would be in a position to know intimately the thinking of his government to assist the Permanent Representative on the Atlantic Council in the discussion of political problems and in the exchange of views with his counterpart from other governments.

4. But the translation of the principle that governments should consult more on matters of common concern obviously creates difficulties for all member governments and especially for the United States with its greater burdens of international responsibility. In particular, as Mr. Dulles put it, there is the problem of trying to reconcile the obvious desirability of bringing the greatest measure of harmony between the policies of member governments through consultation, particularly in matters which more directly affect members of the Atlantic community than other members of the international community, and preserving a sufficient degree of flexibility to enable quick and decisive action to be taken where this may be required. He suggested that, from this point of view, it was necessary to avoid the laying down of too rigid procedures for consultation. It was also necessary to bear in mind the special United States responsibilities in world affairs.

5. In the field of economic policy, Mr. Dulles suggested it was difficult to draw too fine a distinction between the political and economic aspects of policy issues. It was obviously desirable, however, that the economic policies of member governments, insofar as they were of direct concern to the Treaty area, should also be the subject of consultation.

6. Insofar as operating mechanisms in the economic field were concerned, it was the United States preliminary view that there were enough instruments already available, such as OEEC, EPU, GATT, IMF, etc. There would therefore seem to be no room or occasion to create a new operating agency specifically within NATO. It was also Mr. Dulles' view that the U.N. was a more suitable instrument for channelling international economic aid to countries outside the Treaty area.

7. Mr. Dulles spoke of his special concern about the rapid economic development going on in the Soviet Union and the challenge which its rapidly developing industrial system represents, particularly to the European members of the community. This problem, he thought, should be the subject of study and consultation and he spoke in sympathetic terms of the several initiatives which had been taken to strengthen the economies of Western Europe through measures of integration, such as the Coal and Steel Community and Euratom. In short, as regards the economic field, Mr. Dulles fully realized the difficulty of drawing any artificial distinction between political and economic as well as, for that matter, defence aspects of NATO problems. All these aspects, if they concern members of the Atlantic community more directly than other nations, should be embraced within continuing consultations between member governments.

8. To sum up, the United States attitude to the study of the Committee of Three at this stage is formative and tentative and can only be stated in very general terms. However, the whole field is being explored in technical studies which, as they develop, will be of help to the Committee. There was no doubt at all as to the importance attached by the United States to the study and its will to cooperate with the Committee.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE — ECONOMIC ASPECTS

Rasminsky, Ritchie and I had an hour's discussion at the CRO this morning with Garner, Caccia and various other officials including representatives of the Treasury. We indicated the kinds of economic questions which we understood you had planned to raise with Dulles on the basis of your DL 989.† We were disappointed at the response of the UK officials who seemed to have no particular ideas about NATO's role in this field and were obviously obsessed with the suggestion which they had made earlier through Earncliffe for some special non-NATO consultative arrangements on "countering" Soviet economic activities. Most of the conversation was taken up with this suggestion.

2. They did, however, indicate that they regarded our idea of periodic NATO discussions on international economic matters as having been accepted by the Council in December. They seemed prepared to go along with it, but intimated that many such matters might better be discussed in the OEEC. In any event they would use their OEEC people for such discussions (as they had now decided to do in connection with the Italian project for bringing economic experts into certain NATO Council discussions).

3. They also thought that in a limited way exchange of intelligence about Soviet economic moves might take place through NATO. They consider that this exchange should not be very detailed or go far partly because of the lack of security in NATO and partly because some NATO countries (eg Greece and Turkey) would not be able to do much with such information. They agree with what I gather is the general view that NATO itself should not take on any executive functions relating to economic assistance programmes.

4. They appeared to think it appropriate for NATO to take an interest in European integration projects but they (as in the discussion in the continuing committee) refrained from expressing any UK views on these projects.

5. They thought it would be quite in order for your committee to examine the effectiveness of broader international arrangements (eg the GATT and Fund) which had a bearing on the position of NATO in the world and on relations among NATO countries. In fact they considered that there was no limitation on the scope of your enquiry (provided of course the Committee did not recommend that all NATO countries should support SUNFED or other specific international ventures).

6. The talk on the UK proposal for coordination of activities to counter, or anticipate, Soviet economic manoeuvres was rather depressing. We indicated misgivings about it somewhat on the lines of your telegram E872 of June 12 1956.† The UK officials did not however appear to be moved by our reasoning. For our part the doubts which we had about the practicability or wisdom of the proposal were not removed but were confirmed by the UK exposition. The UK officials appear to have been chastened by the Aswan Dam episode and after a period of what Caccia described as "self-criticism" have concluded that an arrangements of the sort now proposed might enable them to deal with any similar cases in the future in a more orderly manner. When we mentioned Iceland's present difficulties as an example of a situation of concern to NATO from the point of view of Soviet penetration they argued that the kind of arrangement which they envisaged would help in dealing with such a case. They were not at all clear on just how such machinery would be helpful or why it would be necessary in this instance, when it is already open to the UK and US to consult directly on an ad hoc basis and bring in other interested countries as the occasion may require.

7. In view of the number of times that this consultative proposal has been mentioned to us by UK officials over the past few days and in view of their apparent imperviousness to counter-arguments it would seem clear that they are wedded to the idea for one reason or another. The importance which they apparently attach to it is rather difficult to understand especially since they claim that they would expect it to affect only a very few projects. We feel that it might well discolour western aid activities as a whole and would not really be effective in the process. The UK officials seem to be under the illusion that new machinery, of either a formal or an informal character, would in some manner serve as a substitute for additional resources which they do not consider themselves able to put up.

8. Judging by our talk this morning at the official level you probably should not count on deriving very much inspiration on any economic aspects of your assignment from your discussions with the UK.

COMMITTEE OF THREE — TALKS WITH FOREIGN OFFICE

Foreign Office views were given to me in a talk with Selwyn Lloyd on Sunday night, followed by talks in greater detail at the Foreign Office with Caccia, Hood and Steel on Monday. The oral presentation was supplemented with a paper which Lloyd allowed me to see setting out UK views on the future of NATO. All this material is summarized under the heads set out in your message under reference. On the whole the UK views are fairly well developed on what they want and what they do not want in the development of consultation, both on political and on economic matters. To that extent the talks were definitely useful. More detailed studies are still, of course, in a tentative stage.

2. Method of Work. The UK views were of course, considerably affected by their interest or, as the Foreign Office put it, their "blind determination" to proceed with their NATO military reappraisal this summer.³⁷ They would therefore definitely like to have a ministerial meeting as soon as possible, but not later than September, if the reappraisal is to be launched under the umbrella of the Committee of Three review of replies from member governments (which I am proposing to my colleagues on the Committee when we meet). As to the content of the report, they do not see the Committee being able to go deeply into the substance of NATO problems, but believe that member governments should be given advice on the principles on which NATO should work under conditions of competitive co-existence and an attempt made at defining the areas of consultation and improved methods. In the first instance at least they believe the report should be in the form of confidential advice to member governments, although they realize that it will probably be necessary to publish at least parts of the report.

3. Background and Aims. They agree that a statement of aims of the Alliance might be useful in the introduction to establish that the Alliance, though defensive, on the military side stands for positive political aims, though such a definition might be difficult to agree upon.

4. Political Consultation. Like Dulles, Lloyd believes that it is impracticable to try to lay down any general obligation to consult in advance or prescribe rules as to what specific subject allies should consult about. Likewise, they are again trying to lay down rules for the settlement of disputes between members and believe that the aim should be rather to try to prevent disputes from arising by continuing consultation on matters of common concern which would enable allies to take into account possible objections raised by other members directly concerned. To try to introduce formal procedures on O.A.S. lines might tend to disrupt unity, rather than to promote it. They also believe that the rule of unanimity should be preserved as regards placing issues in dispute formally on the agenda of the Council but not exclude informal consultation particularly between parties most directly concerned on inter-member differences. On occasion NATO intervention might be limited to "good offices" to work out differences outside rather than inside formal meetings of the organization.

5. As to areas of discourse, since NATO, in the UK view, should (a) aim primarily at continued U.S. involvement in Europe and (b) continued German adherence to the west, the subjects on which members of NATO should seek to develop a community of view and identity of policy should include matters (a) relating to the external threat to which NATO is exposed, ie, action and policies of the Sino-Soviet Bloc, and (b) those which would help strengthen the Alliance internally so that it is better equipped to meet the external threat.

6. Adequacy of present NATO machinery. Certain changes in NATO procedures are believed to be required, particularly: (a) improvement in the Council's working methods, especially through more frequent use of restricted sessions and better planning of the Council agenda, including its agreement well in advance to enable better briefing of Permanent Representatives. (b) Improvement of representation of government views, including not only improvement of the calibre of representation on the Permanent Council (like the State Department they do not believe that more frequent ministerial meetings are practicable) but also improve briefing of representatives by improved procedure within the home governments; they also agree with the State Department about top level experts attending on an ad hoc basis. (c) Improvement of security, which the UK Government believe is essential if more and better consultation is to take place; this involves not only preventing leaks to the press but also safeguarding communications between permanent representatives and their home governments (this is recognized, of course, to be an especially delicate problem).

7. Limitations on Consultation. The UK see three main limitations:

(a) Even when governments consult the Council in advance it would be with a tacit reservation which, on occasion, would have to be stated explicitly that "national interests remain paramount"; they would be prepared, however, to accept sacrifices of national interest in small matters and expect others to make similar sacrifices, but governments should be quite frank on this issue to promote mutual confidence and dispel misunderstandings.

(b) Timing. Like the State Department the United Kingdom believe that in certain instances the taking of effective action in the protection of important interests may not permit full consultation through the Council.

(c) Security—particularly the points made in the preceding paragraph on leaks to the press and security of communications.

8. Economic Cooperation. The bulk of UK views have been more fully reported in Robertson's message 802 June 15, 1956, reporting his talks at CRO, and Ritchie will have this material in greater detail. Briefly the UK position seems to be to place main emphasis on exchange of information about the Soviet economic threat and its political and economic implications. Also they would like to see discussions of economic matters with a defence slant. The areas on which NATO economic work might be improved would include:

(a) Comparative studies of the future course of Soviet internal economic development and internal economic development of NATO powers.

(b) Studies and discussion of the lay-out of economic resources of NATO powers appropriate to competitive coexistence.

COMMITTEE OF THREE

The three ministers met privately this morning. Mr. Pearson opened up the talks by reporting on his conversations with Mr. Dulles in Washington and Mr. Selwyn Lloyd in London.

2. The three ministers then talked about the proposed procedure and method of work. Both Mr. Lange and Mr. Pearson discouraged Mr. Martino from his idea to have the three ministers visit Washington together. Mr. Pearson pointed out that such a visit could hardly be made to Washington without the ministers going to all NATO capitals and this, it was agreed, is impracticable.

3. As for future procedure of work, the ministers agreed that the questionnaire should be prepared as soon as possible with a view to circulating it to other NATO governments. It is hoped to obtain the replies from governments towards the end of August or the beginning of September. The replies would be sent to the NATO Secretariat and to the three members of the Permanent Council; they will be processed for the three ministers who would come back to Paris at that time. The ministers envisage spending perhaps a couple of weeks in Paris in September and follow more or less the TCC procedure. In other words, instead of the Committee of Three visiting other capitals, the other NATO governments would be invited to send representatives to Paris to discuss with the Committee their replies to the questionnaire and the broad content of the report.

4. It is envisaged that the report could subsequently be submitted to the Permanent Council at the beginning of November. One or two, or even the three ministers, could be present when the report is tabled in the Permanent Council. It was thought this would be preferable to a special ministerial session.

5. The report would be submitted to the December ministerial meeting for approval and it is hoped to have two extra days added to the normal December ministerial meeting in order to allow for a full discussion of the report.

6. The above mentioned time-schedule has been tentatively agreed upon by the ministers but it is understood that it should be kept flexible and changes made if necessary.

7. Mr. Pearson's impression is that the real reason why Mr. Martino wanted the three ministers to meet privately in the absence of any advisers or members of the international staff is that he wished to express disappointment over the attitude of the Council regarding the establishment of the Committee of Economic Advisers. Mr. Martino read the text of the communiqué adopted at the last ministerial meeting and said that the resolution adopted last May could not be construed as to mean that the body of experts would be constituted only to discuss one economic subject. Mr. Martino also made the point that the Permanent Council should be given more authority to discuss political matters. This was countered by Mr. Pearson's remark that, in his opinion, if there were any weakness in political discussion within the Council this, perhaps, was more attributable to governments. Otherwise, Mr. Martino did not come up with any specific proposals.

8. Mr. Lange brought up the question of the rumoured changes in United Kingdom defence policy but I understand Mr. Pearson has been reporting to you on his conversations in London and here on this subject.

9. Mr. Martino gave to Mr. Lange and Mr. Pearson a memorandum† prepared by the Italian Foreign Ministry which constitutes the Italian version of the proposed questionnaire. We shall be sending the text of this memorandum by bag. Mr. Lange, for his part, brought along a revised draft of our own papers on the political aims of the Alliance and the questionnaire, which does not depart greatly from our own.

COMMITTEE OF THREE

The three ministers met Thursday morning to discuss the questionnaire to be sent to NATO governments and the programme of the Committee of Three. It was decided that the introductory section on political aims of the Alliance should be retained, although this part will not be circulated to the governments along with the questionnaire. Our own paper, with the minor amendments made by the Norwegians, will be used as a basis for this section.

2. While the ministers saw no difficulty in reconciling the contributions of the three to the political section of the questionnaire, they considered in detail the economic section of the Italian questionnaire, which is pretty far-reaching, and agreed to set up a working group to reconcile the Italian, Norwegian and Canadian texts. Mr. Pearson also suggested, and this was approved by his colleagues, that the questionnaire itself should be as concise and specific as possible but that explanatory notes might be prepared on the various questions to be sent separately to the governments through the Permanent Council. In this way, governments will have, in preparing their replies, fuller information as to the meaning and implications of some of the questions. This will make it possible to illustrate the type of problems that the Committee had in mind in putting forward their questions. It will also make it easier to eliminate certain of the more controversial Italian questions.

3. It was clearly understood that in putting forward the questionnaire, the governments concerned were no more committed than any other member government and would be in the same position as others not represented in the Committee as to the replies they return.

4. Mr. Lange referred to the forthcoming meeting of the Atlantic Treaty Association in Milan on September 11, 12 and 13 and suggested that Lord Ismay write to the Secretary of the Association informing him that the Committee of Three would welcome any suggestions that they may wish to offer regarding the development of non-military activities in NATO, particularly in the information and cultural fields. This suggestion was accepted and it is possible that Mr. Martino may have the opportunity of meeting the group.

5. Mr. Pearson suggested that it might be advisable to set a target date for the submission of replies to the questionnaire by the various NATO governments. It was agreed that governments should be asked to report by August 30. The replies will be communicated to the NATO secretariat and the three interested ministers, who tentatively agreed to come to Paris on September 10 for an approximate period of two weeks. During the first week, they will discuss the national replies with the representatives of the interested governments and the second week will be used to study the contents of the replies and the structure of the report. It was thought that it might be useful for the three ministers to send advance teams to Paris to help the Secretariat process the replies for the ministers.

6. Mr. Pearson raised the question as to whether anything useful could be done before the replies to the questionnaire started coming in. He said, in this connection, that special experts' studies might have to be prepared on specific technical subjects which the ministers might wish to have explored. He suggested that thought might be given to appointing two or three consultants as special members of the Secretariat to be seconded to the Committee of Three. The subjects that were mentioned were NATO's relationship with OEEC, GATT and other specialized agencies in the economic field and a study of the possible role of NATO in the field of technical education. Mr. Pearson mentioned, in this connection, the name of Professor Lincoln Gordon of Harvard University as a possible appointee.

7. Mr. Pearson then discussed the general organization of the report of the three and outlined his own views, which were shared by his colleagues. He envisaged the content of the report as follows:

- (a) An introductory section dealing with the political aims of the Alliance based mostly on the Canadian Norwegian papers, with some additions taken from the Italian memorandum;
- (b) A section which would outline what has been done in NATO since its establishment in the non-military fields to be prepared by the Secretariat;
- (c) A third chapter dealing with functional problems on the adequacy of the present NATO machinery to deal with the non-military activities of the Alliance. (It was agreed that this section could be written on the basis of comments received from member governments without waiting for the replies to the questionnaire.)
- (d) A fourth section dealing with political consultation within NATO based on the replies received from governments;
- (e) A section dealing with NATO's relationship to other international organizations, including OEEC, the U.N. and Specialized Economic Agencies;
- (f) A section dealing with social, information and cultural activities;
- (g) Finally, a section containing the recommendations of the Committee of Three which, of course, would be the last one to be prepared but on which work could be started after the September meeting.

8. At the end of the meeting, Mr. Martino said that there might be some advantage in talking to non-NATO governments which are members of OEEC in order to dispel any impression that NATO might interfere with the work of the organization. Mr. Martino also asked whether such talks could take place with Spanish authorities. The ministers agreed that there would be no objection to telling other governments informally what the Committee of Three was trying to do.

9. The ministers finally agreed that some study might be made of the machinery used in other international organizations (for instance, in O.A.S.) for the settlement of disputes between members. Such a study, to be prepared by the Secretariat, would not be concerned, of course with policy but would be restricted to an outline of procedures that have proved useful in another context.

MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE OF THREE WITH PERMANENT COUNCIL

The Committee of Three met with the Permanent Council on the morning of June 22. Following introductory remarks by Mr. Martino as Chairman of the Committee of Three, Mr. Pearson outlined the work of the Committee to date and its proposed schedule, noting that the Committee had kept in touch with each other and with other governments prior to its present meeting. The timetable outlined in our telegram under reference was then explained to the Permanent Council and emphasis was placed on the opportunity for consultation with the Committee of Three in Paris during September either by individual governments or by the Council. In noting that the Committee's report will be submitted to the December ministerial meeting, Mr. Pearson expressed the hope that all governments will come prepared to spend sufficient time to consider the report in detail.

2. Following an explanation of the questionnaire which should be issued by approximately June 25, Mr. Pearson outlined the proposed structure of the Committee's report which we have already forwarded to you in our telegram under reference. With respect to Section 2 of the report, he suggested that a frank statement of NATO's record on specific points of political consultation should be made to serve as a background for the Committee's recommendations in the final section. He also repeated his view that the report may find that it is the will of governments to use the present machinery of NATO that is lacking rather than there being a need to change that machinery significantly. With respect to economic studies, he emphasized the need for NATO members of OEEC to reassure their non-NATO colleagues in that organization as to NATO's intention in that field.

3. Mr. Pearson also mentioned that a very small secretariat for the Committee of Three has been formed with the help of the international staff but pointed out the possibility that the Committee may recommend the employment of one or two highly specialized persons for particular studies. We mentioned this point in our telegram under reference.

4. During the question period the United Kingdom Representative suggested that the Committee presently working on a report of non-military aspects of NATO should continue its work and submit the final product to the Committee of Three. The latter confirmed that this would be most helpful.

5. In answer to a question from the United States Representative, Mr. Lange confirmed that it is not the intention of the Committee of Three to circulate the answer of each government to the questionnaire to the other NATO members but rather to convene in Paris in September to discuss individual answers with the government concerned. Mr. Lange repeated Mr. Pearson's earlier suggestion that governments may wish to send special representatives to Paris for that purpose.

6. The Belgian Permanent Representative made a fairly lengthy statement complete with statistics to support his request that the Committee of Three make a survey of the shortage of technically trained personnel in NATO countries. He suggested the possibility that NATO might convene the appropriate educational authorities to discuss the matter and make recommendations concerning the orientation of studies for scientific students and their later employment, and perhaps also some means by which NATO could establish a standard of equivalents between the university degrees conferred by individual member countries. Mr. Lange emphasized the interest of the Committee of Three in this matter and pointed out that it is included in the questionnaire. With respect to Mr. De Staercke's suggestion of a meeting of educational authorities, the Committee of Three are considering an alternative and possibly simpler procedure whereby one or two fully qualified experts would be asked to make a study for NATO. Mr. Lange also pointed out that OEEC had studied the matter and had made a number of useful recommendations upon which governments had not acted. Mr. Lange concluded by indicating a number of ideas that the Committee of Three had been considering, such as the possible application of certain infrastructure principles to the encouragement of scientific training. Finally, he indicated that the questionnaire will ask for comments on the desirability of a centre of Atlantic studies which might take the form of a civilian NATO Defence College.

7. In conclusion, Mr. Martino asked that member governments treat the questionnaire as a secret document.

COMMITTEE OF THREE

The ministers had a last meeting Friday afternoon to consider the draft questionnaire prepared by the working groups and gave it their approval. Several amendments were introduced and the revised text of the questionnaire is now available and is being sent to you by today's air bag.

2. After having approved the questionnaire the ministers discussed a few additional points which it might be of interest to report.

3. Mr. Lange said that he would wish to give supplementary information regarding some of the questions contained in the cultural section of the questionnaire, and it was agreed that the three Permanent Representatives will prepare a memorandum incorporating such supplementary information which the three governments see fit to submit on some of the points covered by the questionnaire. A footnote to that effect will be added to the questionnaire.

4. In the covering note to the questionnaire it will be indicated that the answers the governments will give to the questionnaire are only meant to serve as a basis for consultation which the Committee of Three will wish to have with governments in September. The covering note or the supplementary memorandum will also refer to earlier NATO reports made on the subjects of the enquiry such as the Pearson Report and other related documents. A list of these documents is contained in the "position" paper given to us by the Norwegian Delegation, copy of which you already have.

5. Mr. Lange, in the course of the discussion, also referred to a letter of June 2 which he received from the International Federation of Trade Unions enquiring as to whether they could be useful in any way to the Committee of Three. He said that the real intention of the letter is to enquire whether NATO would give to IFTU a consultative status similar to that which is granted to certain international organizations by the U.N. Mr. Pearson remarked that IFTU is not a NATO organization but one with wider membership, including non-committed countries. It was finally agreed that the ministers would look into this matter again, in September presumably, when they discuss, in the light of the replies received from governments, what further steps NATO could take in the information field. The question of granting consultative status to certain organizations might then be discussed.

6. Baron Bentinck then raised a few questions of procedure with particular reference to the task with which the Secretariat will be entrusted regarding the Committee of Three report.

7. He understood that the first section dealing with the political aims of the Alliance would be written by the Canadians. The second section dealing with what NATO has done since its establishment in the field of non-military operations should be prepared by the Secretariat. Mr. Pearson elaborated slightly on the type of study that is envisaged. He said that it would be useful if the Secretariat were to prepare a list of all the political and economic subjects discussed in NATO so far and what decisions have been taken with regard to these questions. He would think that, for instance, it would be possible to differentiate between political questions that came up in Council for information only, for information and action, for information with a view to achieving coordination of policies, etc.

8. Baron Bentinck confirmed that the sections of the report dealing with political consultation, economic cooperation, information and cultural activities, would all be dealt with by the ministers on the basis of the replies to the questionnaire. The two other questions that were given to the Secretariat to deal with were a study of the advantages and disadvantages of NATO becoming a regional organization under Article 52 of the U.N. charter, and a study on the machinery used in various international organizations for the settlement of inter-member disputes with special reference to OAS.

9. The ministers then discussed briefly the proposed appointment of consultants to help the ministers in their work. It was agreed that the terms of reference for these studies to be undertaken by these experts will be worked out by the three Permanent Representatives. Mr. Lange said that he would discuss further the question of who might undertake a study of the technical and scientific education survey that he has in mind and the possible terms of reference for that study. He will be in a position to send information shortly to his Permanent Representative on these points. It was generally agreed that the experts will be receiving a generous daily allowance during their stay in Paris.

10. Before the meeting broke off, Mr. Pearson said that the ministers should agree among themselves not to see any individual or representatives of organizations as members of the Committee of Three. Of course, this will not preclude individuals or organizations to make submissions in writing to the ministers.

11. In my immediately following telegram,† I am sending the contents of a paper prepared by the Secretariat summarizing the various decisions reached by the ministers during their meetings in Paris relating to procedure and the future programme of work of the Committee of Three. This paper should be read in conjunction with our previous reports on the work of the Committee of Three.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 160-56

[Ottawa], July 30, 1956

COMMITTEE OF THREE QUESTIONNAIRE

The NATO Committee of Three Ministers have circulated a Questionnaire preparatory to the drafting of a report which is to contain recommendations on ways and means to strengthen NATO cooperation in the non-military fields. In response to this Questionnaire, it is proposed to express substantially the following as the views of the Canadian Government.

(1) Political Questions

2. In addition to the special type of consultation envisaged in Article 4 of the Treaty if the territorial integrity or political independence of one of the members is actually threatened, it is necessary to prevent the threat to the unity of the Alliance as well as to the security of member states developing by the further development of effective procedures and habits of consultation.

3. To this end, member governments should be prepared to accept and act upon certain principles of consultation, especially the following:

(a) should accept the responsibility of informing the NATO Council of any political development in any area which may affect significantly relations among member governments or between NATO countries and the Soviet bloc;

(b) should recognize the right to raise any subject of common concern to NATO for discussion;

(c) should endeavour not to make political declarations significantly affecting the Alliance or other members without prior consultation through the Council;

(d) should seek to develop their national policies in the light of the interests and views of other NATO governments as expressed in consultations;

(e) should not adopt firm policies on matters of concern to the whole Alliance without advance consultation.

4. It is recognized that such consultations would have to take into account the following limitations:

(a) should not apply to minor modifications of policy but major changes;

(b) should not prejudice the need for prompt action in the case of real emergencies;

(c) should not carry with it any formal obligation for members to consult allies on matters which may be of common concern but not of great importance nor to change plans or intended policies in the event that they do not carry the best judgment of all member governments;

(d) should not lead to action constituting interference in the domestic affairs of any member government and should not extend beyond discussion to direct intervention unless there is agreement among the members on the need for such action or intervention.

5. The types of consultations envisaged would include:

(a) discussion in the NATO Council informally and privately on any matter which any member or the Secretary-General considers of general interest or common concern to the Alliance;

(b) providing and exchanging views on material for appreciation of current political developments;

(c) consulting with other members with a view to arriving at a general consensus in the light of which member governments would draw their own conclusions and determine national policies;

(d) consulting in certain defined fields for common concern to coordinate lines of policy and agreed action.

6. While informal consultations are still the best means of settling disputes or differences between member governments, consideration might be given to acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court in justiciable disputes subject to the U.N. Charter provisions and also to whether specific measures of conciliation and arbitration might be adopted in the case of political or non-justiciable disputes.

7. Support is given to greater use of national NATO parliamentary associations, including the holding of a joint meeting of the Parliamentary Conference, such as the one to be held in November of this year, with the NATO Council.

(2) Economic Questions

8. The practice of consultation on economic matters in NATO should be clarified and in some instances extended along the following lines:

(a) Discussions of the economic position of member countries should continue to be carried out through the annual reviews of NATO (where particular attention is devoted to the economic implications of the NATO defence program) and of the OEEC; in addition any member may be free to ask the attention of NATO to be directed to any special economic difficulty which might prevent it from discharging its full role in the coalition.

(b) On the principle that individual members should follow policies which show a real regard for economic interest of other members, any member may ask NATO to direct its attention to a situation where serious economic conflict between members has occurred or appears imminent. In the discussion of such problems it should emerge whether their solution may be best undertaken in other international bodies or in NATO itself.

(c) NATO should not, however, take over any of the functions of existing international agencies where most of the questions in the economic field of interest to NATO members can be dealt with most effectively; nor should NATO become an agency for the formulating or carrying out of trade or aid policies on behalf of its members.

(d) There should be exchanges of information and views within NATO and bi-laterally between NATO members on Soviet bloc aid and trade policies and their significance, so that member countries may take this into account in determining their own individual aid or trade policies.

(3) Cultural Questions

9. NATO activities might be improved for the more effective use of available resources by concentrating on a number of possible projects not already covered by other organizations such as:

- (a) the establishment of a common research institute for Atlantic Community studies;
- (b) the possible reorganization of the NATO Defence College;
- (c) an increase in exchanges of students, workers, service personnel;
- (d) the possibility of coordinating measures for the recruitment of scientists and other specialists to help meet competition from the Soviet bloc in the technological field.

(4) Information Questions

10. More effort might be made through NATIS as well as through the better coordination of national information services to make NATO policies better known and understood, both inside and outside the NATO area, and better coordination in information directed towards the Soviet bloc. The terms of reference and resources of the NATO Information Service might be reviewed to this end.

(5) Organizational and Functional Questions

11. While there is no need for any structural changes in NATO to accomplish the foregoing, a number of modifications in procedure designed to strengthen the habit of intergovernmental consultation should be considered, including the following:

- (a) more frequent participation of Foreign or other Ministers in Council meetings;
- (b) strengthening the role of the Secretary-General, particularly in using informally his good offices in disputes as well as in directing political consultation by making him Chairman of the NATO Council instead of the Vice-Chairman as at present;
- (c) strengthening the permanent representation to the Council, including more frequent use of high-level experts for preparatory work in advance of Ministerial meetings and for special studies, such as on the German problem.

12. I should be grateful to be authorized by my colleagues to submit replies to the Questionnaire of the Committee of Three substantially on the basis of the above views.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION; COMMITTEE OF THREE QUESTIONNAIRE

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the N.A.T.O. Committee of Three Ministers had circulated a questionnaire preparatory to the drafting of a report on methods of strengthening N.A.T.O. cooperation in non-military fields. The questionnaire was divided into five parts and sought answers on a number of political, economic, cultural, information, and organization questions. He submitted an outline of the views it was proposed to express on behalf of Canada.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, July 30, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 160-56).

9. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) On the political side the answers appeared somewhat idealistic in their approach. There might be reasons on security grounds for not fully disclosing to N.A.T.O., on occasions, national views and information on certain subjects. In reply to this it was noted that, amongst other limitations, it was proposed that consultation would not prejudice the need for prompt action in an emergency. However, it was proposed that every national decision of importance, likely to be of significance to other N.A.T.O. members, would be discussed beforehand.

(b) On the economic questions it could be said that the proposed answers were realistically negative. N.A.T.O. should not enter into this field but the work of economic cooperation should continue to be done through existing agencies such as the O.E.E.C., G.A.T.T., the International Bank etc. The replies were not intended to lead to the impression that pressure should be applied to the United States to adopt better creditor policies. Nor was it intended to encourage Europeans to work towards an "infrastructure" programme of a civil nature.

(c) It was questionable whether support should be so clearly expressed for national N.A.T.O. parliamentary associations. If the report of the committee were strongly in favour of this, annual meetings of parliamentarians in Europe could be expected. This section of the replies might be omitted. On the other hand, most of the N.A.T.O. European nations attached great importance to fostering parliamentary support for the organization as a way of strengthening it in non-military fields. This particular answer could, however be re-considered.

10. The Cabinet approved the outline of the replies to the N.A.T.O. Committee of Three questionnaire, as submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, subject to his reconsideration of the answer on N.A.T.O. parliamentary associations and related matters.

TELEGRAM 1458

Washington, August 8, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

CONSULTATIONS ON NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE QUESTIONNAIRE

1. The Canadian group had two meetings with the USA task force yesterday, Tuesday, August 7, during which views were exchanged on the main points raised in the questionnaire.

2. The USA task force were most forthcoming in explaining USA positions, and we reciprocated. The exchanges of views were therefore very valuable. Holmes made it clear, however, that their draft replies, a good portion of which were read to us, had not yet been considered at any senior level. They did not give any indication of whether their proposed replies were likely to be acceptable to Dulles. They expect in any case some delay in clearing their draft with the Secretary of State and gave us to understand that the submission of their replies to the Council might be a few days late.

3. In general their approaches to the questions were substantially the same as our own, and in no place was there a divergence of substance. Actually, except for three special proposals to which we refer briefly below, the USA and Canadian drafts appear surprisingly similar in approach particularly in their approach to consultations in NATO. On economic as well as political questions the USA draft answers were remarkably forthcoming, although in the economic field they would generally expect the possibilities of existing specialized agencies to be exhausted before resort to NATO.

4. On the economic section the USA views were generally very close to ours although they may be placing somewhat greater emphasis on the need for increased consultations in NATO in connection with meetings of other bodies such as ECE, COCOM, CHICOM, and GATT. They would not, however, envisage such consultations except when major issues of importance to NATO were involved. Generally the economic portion of the USA draft reply favours the broad multilateral rather than narrow regional approach. They are not, incidentally, contemplating full membership in OEEC.

5. The main difference of emphasis on the cultural and information sections seems to lie in the greater availability of funds in the USA for this type of activity. Contrary to what we had expected, they did not unduly stress the need for NATO to expand its activities in the field of psychological warfare.

6. With regard to the organizational and functional questions, they reflected Mr. Dulles' earlier reluctance to commit himself to more than two brief ministerial meetings a year. We were in agreement, however, about extending the role of the Secretary General in the field of political consultation, although there was some diffidence about our suggestion that the Secretary General should be kept fully informed in advance of the views of member governments. (See our reply to question 3, Section V.)

7. The following is a brief summary of the three new proposals at present contained in USA draft replies:

(a) On political question 4, dealing with intermember disputes, the task force will recommend the appointment of a committee composed of three or five Permanent Representatives with the Secretary General as ex officio member and acting chairman. The purpose of the committee would be to take cognizance of any situation which might contain the origins of an intermember dispute which the parties themselves could not reconcile. The committee would be concerned chiefly with procedure and would function very informally. It would be entitled to approach NATO governments which might be involved in a potential dispute. Parallel to the committee would be a panel of arbitrators made up of eminent NATO jurists available at all times if and when the parties concerned are prepared to bring their disputes to them. The USA argument is that if such a panel existed, governments might be more readily induced to use it. The committee could act on any dispute (including economic cases if they were regarded as disputes and if other purely economic bodies were not capable of disposing of them), regardless of origin and of juridical character. To encourage the use of this new machinery a resolution would be proposed for adoption in Council by which member governments would agree to attempt solutions of the disputes within the NATO community before taking them to other international organizations such as the UN. Beyond acceptance of such a general resolution, use of NATO machinery for peaceful settlement would not be mandatory in governments.

(b) On organizational and functional question 1, dealing with effectiveness of consultation in the Council, the task force have in mind the appointment of a ministerial delegate who would serve as primary liaison man between the permanent representative and his government and as a backstopper at home for the permanent representative. The task force envisages that this ministerial delegate would not be a career official (civil servant) but a minister, although they recognize of course that this is a matter to be decided by each government. The delegate might go to Paris say every six weeks, and would be sufficiently authorized to speak for his government to facilitate decisions on the spot, even on important issues. With this arrangement, ministers would not have to meet more than twice a year. The task force appreciate that while this suggestion might be highly desirable from their point of view it may not have the same advantages for most of the European members and each country would of course have to be left free to determine how it might best be represented.

(c) On organizational and functional question 6, concerning the position of NATO as a regional organization, the USA legal experts are adopting the position that NATO is a regional organization in the sense of the UN Charter although it has never been declared to be so nor has acted as such. The USA legal reasoning is that an organization does not have to fall within Article 51 or 52 but merely has to exist or function under these articles. As a result there is already a legal obligation on the part of NATO to report to the UN under Article 53, although this would arise only in the unlikely event of enforcement action by NATO. We were given to understand that this position is similar to that taken by the USA with regard to the OAS.

8. Some minor modifications would appear to be desirable to the Canadian draft replies to the questionnaire, particularly in the light of our discussions with the State Department and some suggestions will be submitted to you when Rae and Crépault return. A detailed report† of the discussions has also been prepared.

9. As I have had an opportunity to discuss the text of the third draft with Ignatieff, Rae and Ritchie and have made my views known to them, I shall not be sending you any written comments as requested in your telegram DLDL 95 of August 1.†

NATO — COMMITTEE OF THREE QUESTIONNAIRE
REPLIES BY THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

PART I — POLITICAL QUESTIONS

Introduction:

The Canadian Government is in favour of more effective political consultation among the members of NATO in accordance with the principles outlined below in answer to the questions on this subject.

2. Close and continuing consultation on political matters of common concern is the essence of any durable alliance of free states. In an alliance as vital to the security of its members and to the peace of the world as NATO, such consultation is of prime importance. NATO is today faced with three important problems on the political plane: the need to maintain the unity of the alliance during a period in which international tensions may be less severe than in recent years; the need to develop policies which will strengthen the relationships of interest and understanding between NATO and non-NATO countries, including those of the "uncommitted" areas; and the need to provide a progressive basis of action for the Western world in the face of the continuing and complex challenge of international Communism. The first step in meeting these needs, in the view of the Canadian Government, is to provide for more effective political consultation. This is necessary in order to eliminate any unnecessary divergence of views and actions among members, to give a greater unity and cohesion to the alliance, to widen the area of understanding between NATO and the emerging governments and peoples of the less developed areas of the world, and to pave the way for taking constructive political initiatives vis-à-vis the Soviet bloc.

3. The North Atlantic Treaty makes specific reference to consultation only in the obligation set forth in Article 4 by which the parties "will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened". This is a specific obligation which relates exclusively to a direct threat to any of the parties. In practice, however, as the report of the 1951 Committee on the North Atlantic Community C8(D)/6 indicates, the habit and practice of consultation have extended beyond the special "emergency" situations envisaged in this provision of the treaty to cover wider areas of common concern. This is a necessary and sensible development. Although special attention must be paid, as explicitly recognized in Article 4, to matters of urgent and direct importance to members of NATO, and to "emergency" situations where it is obligatory for members to consult in the light of a threat, it is equally important to exchange views and to consult before the threat develops, and, indeed, to consult in advance in order to prevent the threat from developing at all. If NATO were to avoid consultation until the threat becomes actual, it would not be acting in the sense of its primary responsibility of protecting the mutual security interests of all its members. By the steady and persistent, if gradual development of effective procedures and habits of consultation, while recognizing that the ultimate responsibility for final decisions at present rests with national governments, NATO can best achieve an effective basis for developing a common foreign policy for the alliance in important areas of common concern.

(Question 1) It might be useful to consider the desirability of laying down certain basic principles as guidance for political consultation on matters of common concern, such as the following:

- (a) The Council should be kept fully informed of any political development in any area which may affect significantly member countries or the Alliance as a whole.
- (b) The duty of informing the Council at an early stage of such developments should be accepted.
- (c) The Council should normally not be requested to take decisions or adopt resolutions of political importance without having had the opportunity to consider the matter in the light of all available information.
- (d) Member governments should endeavour not to make political declarations significantly affecting the Alliance or its member nations without prior consultation through the Council.

It would be of interest to know the view of member governments on this proposal, with a statement indicating to what extent the above-mentioned principles are acceptable.

4. (Answer) The statement of basic principles which might guide Member Governments in regard to political consultation in NATO is generally acceptable to the Canadian Government which therefore replies in the affirmative to each of the four principles formulated in Question 1. It is considered that two further basic principles might be added to the foregoing in the following terms:

- (e) No NATO government should adopt a firm policy on important matters of concern to the whole alliance without early advance consultation with other members of the alliance.
- (f) When such consultation has taken place on a NATO basis on important matters of common concern, member governments should seek to develop their national policies in the light of the interests and views of other NATO governments as expressed in these consultations.

5. In order to make these principles operative, the Canadian Government believes that there should be a clearer understanding among member governments as to what is meant by "any political development in any area which may affect significantly member countries or the Alliance as a whole". As a basis for discussion, the Canadian Government suggests that the primary areas of common concern to member governments in the political field include the relationships between members of the Atlantic Community, and between NATO countries and the countries of the Soviet bloc. The principal reason for seeking to improve and extend NATO cooperation in non-military fields at the present time is the need to adapt NATO to meet a new Soviet challenge which involves increased political and economic pressures in addition to the existing military threat.

6. Although the habit of political consultation in NATO has been growing in recent years, it has not, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, been growing with sufficient rapidity to justify any complacency in present circumstances. Now more than ever before NATO needs to aim at the closest possible coordination of the foreign policies of member governments on all important matters of common concern to the Alliance in order to strengthen its cohesion, and to harmonize the military, political and economic policies of its members. In particular, the Soviet Union is clearly seeking to enter into bilateral negotiations with members of the Alliance to serve its own interests, and it would therefore in principle be desirable for members of NATO to consult on such matters. The NATO Council is the forum best suited for accomplishing both these aims on the basis of carefully thought out principles, but without trying to establish a hard and fast code which would be the antithesis of the flexibility of procedure which is required. What is needed above all is the will to consult.

7. In stressing the need for more effective consultation, it is not intended that NATO should be the instrument for general consultation on minor or less important modifications of policy, which would be impracticable and unnecessary, but rather that consultation on this basis should be reserved for major and important policy developments of common concern to the Alliance. In the last resort the determination of whether minor or major matters are at stake must rest on the judgment of the governments principally concerned. Similarly, it must be recognized that the obligation to consult in NATO on appropriate matters, must not prejudice the necessity for quick action in any real emergency. Here too there will also be an area of judgment involved as to what are the essential elements of a "real emergency". Judgment in both the above situations should not be based on narrow national considerations alone.

8. One of the ways of retaining flexibility and removing some of the inhibitions which at present limit the scope of political consultations through NATO, would be to have it clearly understood that acceptance of the principles of NATO consultation, while essential, does not carry with it any formal or specific obligation for member governments to consult their allies on all matters of common concern, nor to change any of their plans or intended policies in the event that they do not carry the best judgment of all other member governments. It is in this light that we believe that an acceptance of the restrictions outlined in reply to Question 3 below would do more at the present time to encourage the practice of political consultation than agreement in principle to more far-reaching proposals that would in practice be bound to create difficulties and delays.

(Question 2) To what extent and under what circumstances is your Government prepared to participate in the following types of consultation within NATO?

- (i) Informal exchanges of information;
- (ii) Preparation of common appreciations in the light of current developments;
- (iii) Consultations with the aim of arriving at a general consensus as a basis for determination or guidance of individual government policies;

(iv) Consultation with the aim of arriving at agreement on specific policies or courses of action.

9. (Answer) The Canadian Government would:

(i) willingly participate in informal discussions in the NATO Council of any matter which any member — or the Secretary General — considered of general interest or common concern to the Alliance, given adequate warning for preparation whenever possible;

(ii) participate in providing material for such common appreciations of current political developments as the Council felt it desirable to prepare, normally by means of Secretariat studies for the Council's consideration and subsequently for the information of member governments;

(iii) consult with its allies through the Council with a view to arriving at a general consensus in the light of which member governments would be better able to draw their own conclusions and determine their individual policies;

(iv) consult in certain defined fields of common concern (as explained in greater detail in reply to the next question) with the aim of arriving at agreement on coordinated policies in these specific fields.

10. The main obstacle to more extensive political consultation in each of the four fields mentioned in this question, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, is the inadequacy of security which has too often characterized NATO's political discussions in the past. An improvement of security is essential if recommendations aimed at increasing the effectiveness of NATO consultation are to be implemented. Secondly, a closer observance of discretion with the press would greatly facilitate a more rapid and complete exchange of information through the NATO Council on important matters of policy of common concern. With increasing security and mutual confidence, there will be a greater inclination to discuss delicate matters frankly in the Council at as early a stage in the formulation of national policies as possible, and preferably before firm positions have been taken publicly by member governments. Without them, it will be difficult to make any real progress.

(Question 3) What should be the basis for determining the matters of common concern which might be the subject of consultation under the four headings listed above, and what should be regarded as the factors limiting such consultation, such as respect for liberty of action of each member government and the non-universal character of NATO?

11. (Answer) No rigid formula can be set out in advance, in our view, beyond the general suggestions outlined in response to Questions 1 and 2 above, as criteria for the selection of matters of common concern appropriate for the various types of consultations listed under the four headings in Question 2. The following comments are, however, relevant.

(i) Although discussion should not lead to action which would constitute interference in the domestic affairs of any member of the Alliance, this limitation should not be interpreted in any narrow or legalistic sense. NATO is not, in our view, an operating but a coordinating agency in the political field. For this reason consultation should only extend beyond discussion and exchanges of view if all members of the Alliance agree on the further measures to be taken. We would, however, recommend that the Council recognize the right of any member to raise any subject of common concern to NATO for discussion, even when it may be possible that unanimity does not exist on the holding of such a discussion; there should in other words be no veto — even informally — on NATO discussions. On the other hand, not only is intervention excluded, except when there is general agreement that NATO action is required and appropriate, but it will be found more useful for discussions of contentious matters to be held as at present in either restricted or private sessions of the Council.

(ii) NATO appreciations of current political developments should not hesitate to record controversial minority opinions; otherwise these documents will tend to reduce themselves to a "lowest common denominator".

(iii) In view of the high degree of integration achieved in the military forces of NATO and the obvious fact that the fate of all members of the Alliance is inextricably linked, the NATO Council should aim at providing the basis for working towards a common foreign policy for the Alliance in important matters of common concern. While consultations with the aim of arriving at a general consensus may not pre-determine national policies, nor are member governments obliged in every case to consult through NATO before deciding their own policies, member governments should seek to develop their national policies in the light of the interests and views of other NATO governments as expressed in these consultations.

(iv) In connection with consultation aiming at agreement on specific policies or courses of action, the useful limits of such NATO action should be borne in mind. In view of the frequent need for prompt action, joint exercises (such as the preparation of replies to the Bulganin letters on disarmament) should be confined to seeking a basis of agreement on principles and attitudes, and should not extend to detailed drafting by representatives of 15 governments which is likely to make for delays and even irritations.

12. It is desirable for the maximum possible agreement to be reached through NATO on specific issues. Nevertheless, the Council as long as it is composed of the representatives of sovereign states cannot commit its member governments to common policies. In cases where agreement on specific policies or courses of action is sought, the Council has to proceed by way of recommendation to governments. To share in such consultation places a general responsibility on all governments to see to it that full weight is given to such recommendations in arriving at their final decisions and policies.

13. The Canadian Government is therefore convinced that a considerable expansion in the NATO Council's functions in the field of political consultation is both possible and desirable even without any constitutional change. The essential principle is that no NATO government should adopt a firm policy on important matters of concern to the whole Alliance without early advance consultation with other members of the Alliance. Any tendency, for NATO consultation to be on an exclusive basis, in matters where the interests of others are affected, should be resisted. NATO consultations will usually supplement rather than replace consultations through other international organizations and through normal diplomatic channels. The special obligations and responsibilities of the major powers on certain issues (e.g., German reunification) should be kept in mind; but NATO should not be by-passed on matters of concern to all members. (The discussions in the Council before the Geneva Conferences last year were good precedents, and could be carried further in future.)

14. In all NATO's political consultations and discussions, most of which we would assume would take place in restricted or private session, it will be necessary to give constant and careful attention to the impact of Council communiqués and of the actions and public statements of NATO members on public opinion, not only in NATO countries but the world over. We should strive to be more aware of attitudes and reactions in the "uncommitted" countries for whose allegiance or sympathy the USSR is now making strenuous efforts. NATO is not, and must not appear to be, merely a military alliance of the "colonial" powers and their supporters. For these reasons NATO political consultations should not be preoccupied exclusively with the protection of the security of the Atlantic area and the maintenance of the unity of the Member States, but should reflect greater concern for improving the position of the Organization in all parts of the world, by taking, wherever real opportunities exist, forward looking initiatives in developing common lines of policy vis-à-vis the USSR, instead of merely consulting on how to react to Soviet initiatives aimed at destroying the cohesion of the Alliance. The future of NATO, in our view, will depend on the extent to which NATO governments bring themselves to accept and act upon this more positive role for the Organization in the political field.

(Question 4) To what extent can NATO assist in the peaceful settlement of inter-member disputes and differences? In view of the provisions of Article 1 of the Treaty, should procedures of conciliation and peaceful settlement of disputes, similar to the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter and other international agreements be adopted by NATO?

Peaceful Settlement of Disputes

15. (Answer) In an association of free and sovereign states, divergences of view and even disputes between its members are to be expected. This is merely the reflection of the fact of political change and development. What is important is that such divergences and disputes should be settled in a timely way and through orderly and peaceful procedures so that the Alliance should not be weakened. In dealing with such problems, the members of NATO have undertaken by virtue of Article 1 of the Treaty "to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means". So far as disputes between members of NATO are concerned, as in the case of disputes between members of NATO and other governments, it is recommended that every effort be made to apply this undertaking to the settlement of disputes which now weaken the Alliance or which may threaten to do so in the future.

16. In the first instance, the parties to such differences or disputes should make every effort themselves to achieve settlements through direct discussions, and should invoke formal international machinery and procedures as a last resort, and only when these direct efforts have failed. The Canadian Government further recommends that NATO Governments which have not already done so should consider whether they can agree to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court without or with a minimum of reservations, in all justiciable disputes among themselves, subject to the provisions of the United Nations Charter. It is thought that such a provision for the settlement of judicial disputes between NATO members would contribute to the unity of the Alliance and would strengthen the links between NATO and the United Nations.

17. It is also suggested that members of the North Atlantic Community should investigate the possibility of setting up in advance additional machinery for peaceful settlement including conciliation, mediation and arbitration so that political or non-justiciable disputes which threaten to impair the unity of the Alliance would be subject to previously agreed and accepted general procedures of settlement. In this connection, the role of the Secretary-General in tasks of conciliation is of importance (See Part V, Question 3).

18. It is recognized that if the practice of consultation can be further developed, it should be possible for NATO countries to harmonize their policies, and thereby to reduce, if not to eliminate altogether, serious divergences in their policies; reliance on formal provisions for the settlement of disputes would to that extent decrease. On the other hand, even with the development of a closer sense of community, member countries must recognize that adequate provisions for the peaceful settlement of their disputes, to be employed when necessary, constitute one of the important requirements of a strong alliance.

(Question 5) Should NATO give more formal recognition to parliamentary associations and the Parliamentary Conference and what should be the relationship between the Council and these parliamentary groupings?

19. (Answer) The Canadian Government believes that closer contact between parliamentarians of the NATO countries through NATO Parliamentary Associations and occasional meetings can be an important means of increasing public understanding of NATO and widening the basis of its support.

20. The Canadian Government believes, however, that there is a danger in attempting to form prematurely any formal NATO Parliamentary Council. Unless there were a clear understanding that such a Council was purely advisory in character, it might attempt, with resulting confusion, to supervise and control the work of the executive agencies of NATO, the members of which are responsible to governments, and only in that sense to parliaments. There is also the risk that parliamentary meetings of this kind, purely advisory in character, may get into the habit of passing resolutions that cannot be implemented and may, therefore, weaken in the public mind the position of the NATO Council.

21. Both the above difficulties can, of course, be overcome, and in referring to them here it is not intended to minimize the value of occasional meetings of NATO Parliamentarians as an important means of assisting the development of the Atlantic Community.

22. The Canadian Government suggests the following steps to bring NATO Parliamentary Associations into closer relationship with the Council of NATO:

(a) That the Council instruct the Secretariat to place the facilities of NATO headquarters at the disposal of Parliamentary meetings and to give all possible help with arrangements for such meetings.

(b) That Parliamentary meetings might be addressed by invited representatives of member governments, by the Secretary-General, by the Supreme Commanders, and perhaps by other senior military officers, followed in each case by a discussion period. In this way the parliamentarians would obtain a full report on the state of the Alliance and the problems before it, which would provide them with the information on which to hold useful discussions.

(c) That while any Parliamentary meeting might submit a report of its discussions to the Council, for the present it should be discouraged from addressing resolutions to the Council.

PART II — ECONOMIC QUESTIONS

23. The Canadian replies to the economic questions take the form of a general statement although throughout this general statement there is a parenthetical reference to the essential part of the Canadian reply to each specific question. In addition, material referring to specific questions may be found in the following paragraphs of the attached statement:

(Question 1) Does your Government consider that closer cooperation between member countries of NATO within the specialized organizations to which they belong and the establishment of closer relations with such organizations, would represent the most suitable means for promoting greater unity in the economic field between member countries? (See paragraphs 26, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37).

(Question 2) In this connection, as regards the OEEC, does your Government consider the participation of the United States and Canada as merely "associated members", to be adequate? (See paragraphs 31 and 32).

(Question 3) Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty states that the parties will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies. Does your Government think that the activities of other organizations, in particular the OEEC, is sufficient to discharge the responsibilities of NATO countries in this respect? To what extent does your Government consider that NATO could assist in the conciliation of economic conflicts arising between member countries? (See paragraphs 26, 27, 38, 39, 40.)

(Question 4) Does your Government feel that NATO may have some interest in developing public works for civilian use, as has been done in the military field? (See paragraph 28).

(Question 5) Does your Government consider that NATO should take an active part in the economic development of underdeveloped regions within the NATO area or would it be preferable that NATO should limit itself to the appraisal of the political importance for the Alliance of development programmes to this end? (See paragraphs 29, 34, 45, 46).

(Question 6(a)) Does your Government consider that NATO has a vital interest in promoting the economic development of underdeveloped countries outside the NATO area? If so, bearing in mind the non-universal character of NATO, what action in assisting under-developed countries does your Government consider can appropriately be carried on by NATO countries to achieve the necessary objectives and what coordination can be furnished within NATO? (See paragraphs 43, 44).

(Question 6(b)) Does your Government consider that the Statutes of existing and planned international financial agencies give them sufficient flexibility to enable them to operate suitably under present political conditions and to meet the requirements of the situation with which NATO is now confronted? (See paragraph 34).

(Question 7(a)) Does your Government feel that NATO should consider measures to counter and neutralize Soviet commercial practices which do not conform to the principles by which Western countries carry on their normal trade and financial relations with one another? (See paragraph 41).

(Question 7(b)) Does your Government feel that NATO should consider measures to meet the competition of the Soviet Bloc in the field of contracts for public works in politically sensitive areas? (See paragraph 44).

(Question 8) What suggestions can be derived from the experience in the economic field of other regional organizations with a view to the possible application of this experience to other geographical areas? (See paragraph 35, 45, 46).

(Question 9) Does your Government consider that it would be in the interests of the Alliance for the NATO countries to consult together when certain important questions are coming up for discussion in international economic bodies in which the Soviet Bloc is represented? (See paragraph 37).

(Question 10) Are there any other specific economic subjects or classes of subjects of general concern to NATO which are not now being adequately considered in other agencies and which might be discussed usefully in NATO? (See paragraphs 37, 41, 43).

24. (Answer) The Government of Canada attaches great importance to a strengthening of the economic foundations of the NATO alliance. To maintain an adequate defence position in the face of the continuing Soviet threat, the members of the alliance must contemplate devoting a large proportion of their resources to military purposes over a long pull. To be in a position to do so, while at the same time satisfying the legitimate claims of their populations for higher living standards, and providing for dynamic growth of their economic structures by setting aside adequate amounts for investment, it is essential that the output and productivity of the members of the alliance should be maintained at the highest possible levels; and that there should be sufficient flexibility to meet and successfully counter those aspects of the Soviet economic offensive which threaten to subvert the purposes of the alliance.

25. To accomplish the economic objectives set forth in the preceding paragraph, it will be necessary for the members of the NATO alliance to make use of all the means at their disposal: there is no simple line of approach, no simple change in the machinery or functions of NATO, which will increase the total amount of resources at the disposal of the members of the alliance. This will require the constant and continuing efforts of the individual members in the management of their own internal affairs, in their relations with each other both within the NATO organization and outside it, and in their relations with other international organizations. While in the opinion of the Government of Canada, NATO can play an important part in these matters, certain other international organizations more specifically organized for economic purposes, can, in carrying out their own functions, help the NATO countries (along with their other members) to strengthen their economies.

26. The importance of domestic economic policies in determining the level of output and productivity of the members of the alliance is basic. This is not to underestimate the important role played by the generous economic assistance made available to some of the members of the alliance by the United States or the contribution made by the International Bank, the I.M.F. and the O.E.E.C. But, without adequate internal policies, even this assistance would not have produced the results referred to.

27. The Annual Reviews carried out by NATO and the OEEC provide an opportunity to comment on the economic position and development of members. It is the view of the Canadian Government that these complementary reviews should be continued. Each organization pays attention to particular phases of economic matters and it would seem desirable to maintain this division of labour over this (or indeed any other) function now performed by the OEEC.

28. While NATO should have a proper concern for the internal economic position of its members and is directly concerned with the economic aspect of defence policy, it should not, in our opinion, act as an agency for formulating and carrying out trade or other economic policies on behalf of its members. Thus, the Canadian Government would not consider the arrangements which have been made for constructing certain military works of common interest as applicable to public works for civilian use (Question 4). Even in the case of military infrastructure it has been generally recognized that allowance should be made for any elements which were adaptable to civil use and which therefore had economic value for the host countries. Where more than one government has an interest in a particular civilian project, no doubt arrangements can be made between the Governments involved, as has happened, for example, between the United States and Canada in connection with part of the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project. It is difficult, however, to imagine a strictly civilian public works project which would be of direct interest and value to all or the bulk of the NATO countries. In the absence of projects of this type, there would not seem to be a parallel between civil public works in the NATO area and military works which have been carried out for the benefit and use of the armed forces of all NATO countries.

29. Nevertheless, it remains true that NATO as a whole has an evident interest in the economic development and progress of the individual members. The Annual Reviews provide an opportunity for each of the members of NATO to inform itself on conditions in the other NATO countries and on any difficulties which those countries may be experiencing. Undoubtedly (Question 5) the member governments would wish to discuss and consider sympathetically special economic difficulties brought to the Organization's attention by a member when the difficulties are an obstacle to that member playing its proper part in the coalition.

30. The Canadian Government wishes to emphasize the view that other international organizations can continue to play an important part in strengthening the economic position of NATO members and there would be no advantage to be derived from attempting to have NATO take over their functions.

31. It is the opinion of the Canadian Government that, in its present form, the OEEC plays a dual role of great value in the Atlantic Community (Question 2). In the first place, it is basically and essentially European although it is also intended to assist progress towards a broader multilateral trading system. It facilitates, through its many boards and committees, an exchange of information and a consideration of policies over the whole area of European production, trade, and finance. While some of its members can reach closer and more binding arrangements amongst themselves in particular economic fields, e.g. the European Coal and Steel Community, the OEEC facilitates the type of European economic cooperation and integration that is practicable for most European countries in most fields. At the same time, through its associate memberships, this essentially European body embraces the whole of the Atlantic Community. Through its continuous operations and intimate atmosphere, it contributes materially to the elimination of economic conflict and the encouragement of economic collaboration amongst the signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty. In this regard, it may be desirable to supplement the work of OEEC, from time to time, by economic discussions in the North Atlantic Council as indicated below. It may also be desirable to strengthen the participation of the United States and Canada in the work of OEEC, even if the nature of their association remains unchanged.

32. If the members of OEEC decided, on some future occasion, to invite Canada and the United States to become full members, the Government of Canada would consider such an invitation very seriously and sympathetically. At this stage, however, it seems desirable to observe that, with Canada and the United States as full members, the OEEC would cease to be an essentially European body, and that some of the momentum and drive towards cooperation amongst Europeans might be diverted into other channels and other bodies. Further, there are certain actions of the OEEC, of a regional character, which Canada can accept as an associate member but to which, as a full member, it might be difficult to give the formal agreement that would be required under basic rules of unanimity. Presumably the United States would be in a somewhat similar position.

33. It is the view of the Canadian Government that the economies of the NATO countries will be strengthened by steady progress towards the broadest possible system of multilateral trade and freer payments, for such a system involves the most productive and economic use of the resources available to the free world. In this system it should prove easier to avoid debilitating economic policies within the NATO Alliance and to minimize friction in the relations between members of the Alliance and other countries, thereby reducing the effectiveness of the Soviet economic offensive. For these reasons, the Canadian Government is convinced that the economic strength of the members of the Alliance will be enhanced by the increasingly effective application of the GATT and Fund principles.

34. The Canadian Government is a member of all the various specialized agencies of the United Nations and attaches great importance to their work. With improvements which may be introduced from time to time to meet changing circumstances, these organizations are capable of contributing substantially in their special fields to the creation of the kinds of conditions which the NATO countries have an interest in bringing about within the NATO area and throughout the world. The Canadian Government would not propose any alterations (question 6(b)) in the statutes of such bodies as the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank, which have shown a considerable capacity to adapt themselves to the requirements of the situation but would hope for the maximum participation in them by NATO members. It is worth recalling that of the $2,500 million loaned by the International Bank since its inception, nearly $1,100 million has gone to members of NATO, and a further $675 million to associated monetary areas, and of the $1,200 million of Fund resources made available, $600 million has gone to NATO countries and a further $160 million to associated monetary areas. It may be expected that the newly created International Finance Corporation will also operate in a sufficiently flexible manner to enable it to function effectively in its field.

35. By playing an active role in these organizations the members of NATO individually can probably make a more constructive contribution to the solution of the wide range of problems with which these agencies are concerned than would be possible on any other and more limited basis. Questions relating to trade, finance, health, food, and communications are not primarily of a regional character. The unity of the members of NATO would not seem to require exclusively NATO arrangements for dealing with these subjects. The more fully the NATO countries are able to discharge their responsibilities as members of the broad international community the more healthy and durable will be their own association.

36. The Canadian Government considers that it would be proper and useful for NATO countries occasionally to publicize the constructive role which they are playing in the specialized agencies of the United Nations. It might be well for other countries and for the citizens of our countries to realize just how much the NATO countries are doing to promote economic cooperation through the established agencies. It would not, however, seem appropriate for NATO itself to enter into any formal relations with the individual specialized organizations (Question 1).

37. Turning finally to the functions which NATO itself might appropriately carry out in the economic field there are, in the opinion of the Canadian Government certain important functions for which the Organization is well qualified. Reference has already been made to the legitimate interest of NATO in the economic position and development of its members, and to the opportunity afforded by the Annual Review in this connection. It may also be recalled that the Government of Canada took initiative in NATO in December 1955 to suggest that the Council discuss from time to time matters of general economic policy, particularly insofar as the policies followed by one member of the alliance may have adverse effects on the economic position of others. It would not be anticipated that such discussions in NATO would normally give rise to specific recommendations for action, but they would serve the useful purpose of leading to greater awareness of the impact of one country's policy in some particular respect of the economic strength of its allies, and might in this way have a real influence on policy. Such discussions might also have a bearing on the views which the individual members of the alliance expressed in other international bodies. It would seem desirable (Question 9) to leave it to the discretion of individual NATO Governments or the Secretary-General to determine whether, in addition to any consultations which may be taking place formally or informally elsewhere, it would be advantageous in particular cases to have some consultation in NATO before important economic questions are discussed in other international bodies, including those where the Soviets are represented. The way should certainly be left open for such consultations if any country or the Secretary General sees merit in them in relation to particular issues.

38. It is obviously of great importance to the strength and cohesion of the alliance that its members should avoid serious conflicts in their international economic policies (Question 3). The prospects of keeping to a minimum such conflicts among NATO members or between them and other friendly countries would clearly be greatest as the members of NATO approach most closely to a freely and efficiently functioning system of non-discriminatory trade and payments over as wide an area as possible. Equally, it is essential that any exceptional measures to promote exports or to dispose of surpluses should show a real regard for the interests of other countries, and should be designed to avoid interference with their normal commercial activities, and, in particular, not to create opportunities of which the Soviets can take advantage to the detriment of NATO.

39. If policies for one reason or another deviate from these general objectives, member countries should appreciate that almost inevitably the likelihood of friction in relations among them will be increased thereby. Economic conflict and political and defence cooperation are not easy to reconcile.

40. Despite the best efforts of the members of NATO, serious conflicts in economic policies may arise. In that event, the members should be prepared to deal with such problems in the appropriate manner and in the most suitable place. Often the GATT or Fund may be found to be the most effective instrument, or in other instances the OEEC. Occasionally it may be desirable for such matters to be raised in NATO itself, a possibility which was recognized in the memorandum already mentioned which the Canadian Delegation submitted to the Council in December, 1955. Whatever the appropriate mechanism (and that can probably best be determined by the countries involved in the particular case) the countries concerned in NATO should be willing to consult together when such conflicts occur or appear imminent.

41. The recent shift of Soviet emphasis to economic activity in its attempt to increase its influence among uncommitted countries is clearly a matter of great concern to NATO. NATO can play an important role in collecting and analyzing information regarding such activities and should act as a forum for the discussion of their significance, so that NATO governments may take appropriate action if any action is required (Question 7(a)). The Canadian Government feels that NATO should concern itself with any Soviet commercial activities which might affect the security of individual NATO members, or endanger the economic position or political independence of underdeveloped countries in whose welfare NATO has a substantial interest. The Exchange of information within NATO concerning such practices should bring to light cases on which all or some of the NATO members would think it desirable to consult. Arrangements already exist, of course, for regular consultations among NATO countries on Soviet purchases of strategic materials from sources within the area covered by the membership of COCOM and CHICOM. In connection with other aspects of Soviet economic activities the exchange of information should give rise to rapid and effective action by countries most directly interested and consultation in any case where concerted action seemed appropriate. While there may be cases in which it would be prudent for interested NATO countries to go out of their way in order to compete with the Soviet bloc (for example, in making purchases or sales at special prices or lending on exceptional terms), NATO countries should not allow such Soviet moves to disorganize generally the existing Western arrangements for purchasing and marketing goods or making loans.

42. In connection with trade or financial agreements with Soviet bloc countries, the Canadian Government assumes that NATO countries would ensure so far as possible that those agreements incorporate principles similar to those governing normal trade and commercial relations among Western countries.

43. The members of NATO individually and collectively have an interest in the improvement of living standards and the maintenance of political stability in many of the underdeveloped areas of the world. (Question 6(a)). The recent tendency of the Soviet bloc to engage in activities in this field is undoubtedly disturbing, even though in some instances Soviet aid to and trade with the underdeveloped countries may serve the purposes of NATO by strengthening the economies of those countries. In the view of the Canadian Government it would be desirable for NATO members to consult about these Soviet activities and their significance in order that they might take account of them in connection with their aid programmes and trade relations. It would not, however, appear to be appropriate or helpful for NATO itself to become involved in the provision of aid or the working out of trade arrangements with the underdeveloped regions. Moreover the Canadian Government would not consider it wise to have the direction of general aid or trade programmes distorted unduly by Soviet manoeuvres. The main emphasis should continue to be on strengthening the economies and the political and social structures of the underdeveloped countries. In general it would seem best that such aid as the individual NATO countries are able to make available should be supplied bilaterally or under international arrangements which are acceptable to the underdeveloped countries concerned, and which are capable of ensuring any coordination which may be necessary for the efficient execution of such aid programmes.

44. For similar reasons, the Canadian Government would consider (Question 7(b)) that the appropriate response to competition by the Soviet bloc in the field of contracts for public works in politically sensitive areas would depend on the facts of the particular case. It would not seem possible to generalize concerning all public works in such areas or even concerning particular types of public works.

45. It is not desirable that the aid which NATO countries give to underdeveloped countries in other parts of the world should appear to be politically motivated, which will inevitably be the case if such aid has a NATO label on it. One of the main reasons that the aid given under the Colombo Plan has been particularly effective and acceptable has been the absence of any evidence of political coloration (Question 8). There have, indeed, been other reasons as well, in particular

(a) the fact that its membership comprises all of the countries in the region covered by the Plan;

(b) the existence of reasonably efficient administrations in several of the key countries in the region;

(c) its reliance on direct contacts between countries which have a good deal of confidence in one another and which in many cases are joined together in other associations;

(d) the voluntary character of the general consultations which take place annually concerning aid and development programmes.

46. The most important factor, however, has probably been the fact that the assistance offered is not only without any political strings attached, but felt by the recipient nations to be so. United Nations programmes (including those being carried out by the International Bank and other specialized agencies) have this characteristic to a greater degree than most other arrangements. The preliminary views of the Canadian Government on the proposals for establishing a special aid fund under the United Nations have been made known in its answer to the U.N. Secretary-General's Questionnaire. This matter will, of course, be discussed further in various United Nations bodies over the next few months. The Canadian Government assumes that all members of NATO will be examining seriously the functions which such a fund under the United Nations might be able to perform in assisting the underdeveloped countries to achieve economic and political viability and in facilitating the coordination of bilateral aid activities.

PART III — CULTURAL QUESTIONS

Increased cooperation in the cultural field might serve to strengthen relations between NATO countries, provide a larger measure of public support for NATO and encourage the feeling of belonging to an Atlantic Community.

General Comment

47. Since the NATO Alliance rests on certain common cultural foundations, much can be done to strengthen it through coordinated activities in the cultural field. Experience has shown, however, that in cultural relations, ideas quickly tend to outstrip resources. The aim therefore is to make the most effective use of our resources, and to concentrate on selected and coordinated major projects which command general support in fields not already covered by other organizations. In particular, as the line of cleavage along which the Atlantic community might most easily be split is that which separates Europe from North America, the Community's cultural activities should be strongly trans-Atlantic in character. Should, however, North American members of the Community be unable to participate in any particular activity, this should not inhibit the European members from acting to strengthen their own cultural relationships within the broader Atlantic framework.

48. In keeping with the principle of conservation and concentration of resources, a system of priorities for various projects should be agreed upon, having regard to their value to the well-being of the Community, their cost, and the need to avoid duplication of effort.

(Question 1a) Does your Government consider that these aims will be served by setting up a common research institute for Atlantic Community studies?

49. (Answer) In the opinion of the Canadian Government this is a project deserving serious and careful examination. It will undoubtedly be valuable from the point of view of the future of the Atlantic Community to conduct fundamental research and studies of the various aspects of the Atlantic Community, including those factors which unite and those which divide its members. No doubt many views will be expressed as to the most effective ways and means of carrying out such a project, and the Canadian Government is willing to participate with others, and with the assistance of a panel of educationalists, in further exploration of the possibilities of this project.

(Question 1b) Does your Government consider that these aims will be served by setting up a civilian version of the NATO Defence College in which short courses on political, economic, social and cultural problems of the Atlantic Community would be given to those in the position to influence public opinion, such as teachers, journalists, etc.?

50. (Answer) If proposals of the kind referred to in the previous question are to be examined thoroughly, the project in question 1(b) should be dealt with in the same study. In this connection, consideration might be given to broadening the basis of the NATO Defence College by having more civilian students, and by adjusting the curriculum. Possibly the College might be used to hold short seminars for the purposes indicated when the normal courses are not in session.

(Question 2) Does your Government consider that NATO should encourage cooperation between youth movements in NATO countries, bearing in mind the coordination of youth activities in communist countries? Should the Council discuss youth cooperation problems?

51. (Answer) Canadian youth movements are voluntary in character. While it might be possible to include NATO in the field of interest of existing youth movements in Canada, the possibilities of international cooperation on a NATO basis are a matter for the organizations themselves, and arrangements would be made directly between the organizations concerned.

(Question 3) Does your Government consider that NATO should undertake the coordination of measures to increase the recruitment and training on a long-term basis of scientists, technicians and specialists, bearing in mind the developments in these fields in communist countries?

52. (Answer) The solution of this problem is directly related to the economic and military potential of NATO members including their ability to provide technical assistance to the under-developed countries in other parts of the world. This being so, it is of sufficient importance to warrant the organization's direct concern.

53. The Canadian Government therefore believes that the scope of the problem and the area of possible NATO cooperation should be precisely defined, taking into account studies already made in this field, and with the advice of highly qualified and representative experts. On the basis of such an examination, NATO Governments would then be in a position to determine what action on a NATO basis is practicable and should be undertaken.

(Question 4) What educational activities, if any, should be undertaken by NATO to strengthen the ties of the Atlantic Community, which are not already carried out by existing International Organizations such as UNESCO?

54. (Answer) The question of NATO educational activities is partly covered by our comments under questions 1 and 2. Insofar as the objective is to increase knowledge and mutual understanding between the citizens of member countries, member governments should consider what further step might be practicable to facilitate and encourage travel by and communication between the peoples of the North Atlantic area. This might well include the development of effective arrangements for bilateral exchanges of visits of students and other selected individuals.

(Question 5) Would your Government favour the exchange of service personnel individually or in groups for the purpose of familiarising themselves with conditions in other member countries and for the promotion of goodwill?

55. (Answer) The Canadian Government supports in principle any initiative which may assist in promoting better understanding and goodwill between service personnel of member governments. It is with this objective in mind that it has encouraged the members of Canadian forces stationed in Europe to take advantage of their regular leave periods to travel to the various NATO countries, and to learn about the people who form part of the Atlantic Community. The Canadian Government is of the view, however, that such exchanges of visits on the part of service personnel, except when part of regular training programmes, are better left to individual initiative. The Canadian Government believes nonetheless that even outside the scope of official programmes of exchange of visits, ways and means remain available to national authorities to encourage individual travelling by service personnel, by impressing upon them the educational and other advantages of such travelling, and by assisting them, through information and other advisory services, in planning their visits.

(Question 6) Which of the possible programmes under Questions 1, 2, 3, 4 should in the judgment of your Government be financed:

- (a) under a commonly finance programme;
- (b) on a joint user basis;
- (c) singly by member governments?

56. (Answer) It is not possible to comment specifically on methods of financing any of the projects discussed above until they have been worked out in greater detail. The Canadian Government would naturally be willing to examine the need for common or international financing in connection with acceptable projects where this method seemed appropriate.

PART IV — INFORMATION QUESTIONS

Increased cooperation in the information field particularly under the conditions of competitive co-existence and the new Soviet policies, might serve to increase support for NATO of a well-informed public opinion and thus increase the unity of the Alliance.

General Comment

57. In addition to the informational tasks to be considered in keeping NATO members better informed of the organization's activities, attention should also be paid to the tasks of explaining and reporting on NATO activities in non-NATO countries, including those which regard themselves as "uncommitted", and in programmes directed to the peoples of the Soviet and satellite states. The following replies suggest the extent to which this might be done.

(Question 1) Does your Government consider that the Information Service should concentrate on purely factual information about NATO?

58. (Answer) Nothing in the Information Service's terms of reference should preclude it from preparing, on demand, special studies on matters of common interest but not necessarily about NATO. This would be justified, for example, where the experience and information available to the combined membership would be of appreciably more value to such studies than that of any single member. There have been occasions when it would have been convenient to have had a NATO publication (e.g., on conditions in the Soviet Union) which could have been distributed inside Canada in response to requests. The Information Service should deal exclusively in factual information, but it should not necessarily be confined to information about NATO. Its activities in other fields, however, should be governed by the requirements of the member states. (See also Answer 2(c) below.)

(Question 2) Does your Government consider the necessity of a better coordination of efforts in the information field to deal with the Soviet initiatives in the propaganda field?

59. (Answer) There are four areas to be considered under this heading:

- (a) Activities within the NATO area;
- (b) Activities within countries closely associated with NATO Powers;
- (c) Activities in the "uncommitted" countries;
- (d) Activities directed toward the Soviet bloc.

60. Under (a) it is obvious that arrangements for distribution of NATO information within the territories of member states should conform to the wishes of the country concerned. Some governments will doubtless wish to retain the exclusive responsibility for distributing NATO information within their own territories. In those member states where the government itself does not wish to be too active in the NATO information field, consideration might be given to the idea that representatives of other NATO members in such countries might include a proportion of NATO information in their normal information service.

61. Regardless of the manner in which information is distributed within the NATO area, there is obviously a great advantage in coordinating activities. It would, therefore, seem appropriate for the NATO Secretariat to suggest common approaches for the treatment of NATO problems and, in addition to providing factual material about NATO, it might, on request, provide some degree of coordination in counter-Communist propaganda for domestic purposes. Under (b), similar principles might be developed in cooperation with friendly non-NATO governments for improving understanding of NATO purposes.

62. Under (c), there are indications of increasing mistrust of NATO among the peoples of the "uncommitted" nations. NATO should consider what steps could be taken to present its case in a more favourable light among the uncommitted countries, and particularly in the Middle East. For example, the NATO Secretariat might prepare a paper for the guidance of the diplomatic missions of NATO countries in the uncommitted countries. The various NATO governments might then, on the basis of this paper, instruct their missions in these countries to try to remove any mistaken impressions about NATO which may have developed. Specifically, the representatives of NATO countries might be instructed:

(i) To explain to government officials, journalists and others with whom they come in contact, the aims and achievements of NATO, and continue to keep them informed of developments within the Alliance;

(ii) To attempt to disseminate factual information about NATO as appropriate to the general public by means of public speeches and interviews, joint film showings, distribution of publications, and the regular provision of material to newspapers and radio stations on developments within NATO.

63. In addition, the NATO Information Service might consider preparing pamphlets and other information material specifically for use in the "uncommitted" countries. (See answer to Question 1 above.)

64. Under (d), the coordination of radio broadcasting and the exchange of experience relating to the distribution of information in Soviet and satellite countries might be a function of the Information Committee comparable to the present exchange of information which takes place on the subject of contacts with Soviet and satellite countries. As a form of political consultation it would be useful and appropriate for member states to exchange views on the lines that might be adopted by their international broadcasting services on issues of common importance. As a minimum, member states should be prepared to inform NATO of the general lines their broadcasts have followed in order that flat contradictions might be noted and possibly avoided in future broadcasts.

(Question 3) Does your Government consider that reciprocal visits of professional groups such as teachers, journalists, etc. should be extended?

65. (Answer) (See Part III, Question 4 above concerning exchange of professional groups.) Visits of publicists have been extremely valuable both from the national and from the Community viewpoint. There is, however, a saturation point and, in Canada, the organizations whose cooperation is necessary for success would probably not be able to deal with more than two tours a year.

(Question 4) Does your Government consider that cooperation between the NATO Information Service and national information agencies, governmental as well as private, should be improved?

66. (Answer) Inside Canada the Government gives the material provided by NATO Information Service possibly slightly preferred treatment over material provided by its own service. So far as the Canadian Government has the facilities for distributing information, it will continue to see that all information received is put to the best use. Replies to other questions might suggest fields to which this cooperation might be extended. We would, for example, be prepared to keep NATO informed of the general lines of the political broadcasts of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation International Service. Some useful purpose might be served if the NATO Information Service or the Political Division were kept informed of what national information services were doing in areas of interest to the organization as a whole.

(Question 5) Considering the importance of the impact on public opinion of extending political consultation in NATO, has your government any suggestion on how far to go in keeping the public informed of activities in this field?

67. (Answer) It would be unwise to assume that NATO members will be able to engage in serious political consultations on sensitive issues, and simultaneously make informational capital out of these consultations without diminishing their value. The greatest value of NATO consultation will be lost if privacy cannot be assured when sensitive matters are under discussion. Information activities centering about political consultation cannot be divorced from the substance of such consultations, and if the substance is regarded as of prime importance, it must be recognized that the dissemination of information about this activity must inevitably inhibit the candid exchange of views. It is important to recognize that just as there are occasions when the widest possible publicity is called for, there are also occasions when it is vitally important that no information should be given out. The public might be informed at appropriate times and in general terms of what is being talked about, and when a collective view is reached, it should be made known; but details of discussions and the viewpoint of any particular member should not be revealed. When basic decisions are taken, the public should be as fully informed as possible.

Conclusions

68. It is abundantly clear that different member states have different attitudes toward NATO's information activities. There is some reason to believe that the Information Service's terms of reference reflect the most restrictive of the views held of its activities. Without presuming that any member should be expected to change its attitude in this regard, we consider that the Information Service should have the authority and the funds to enable it to respond to any reasonable demand made on it by NATO members. Obviously the cost of providing any particular service will have to be examined in the light of its usefulness to the Community as a whole, and the number of members likely to avail themselves of the service.

69. If the Information Service and the Political Division were to be allowed to operate on this basis it would involve activity in the following fields:

- (a) Information about NATO as an organization and about its activities as an entity;
- (b) Information about member states, interpreting each to its fellow members and, possibly, to the world at large;
- (c) Information about conditions in countries outside but of concern to NATO; in "uncommitted" countries; and in the Soviet and satellite countries;
- (d) Coordination of national information service activities relating to (a), (b) and (c) above.

The results of these activities would be available to member states in appropriate forms for use on request. A minimum guarantee of use would, of course, have to be given by interested members before the provision of such services could be justified.

70. The material provided could be used in the following ways:

- (a) Within the NATO area:
 - (i) NATO Information Service, if expressly requested by a member state, might undertake direct distribution;

(ii) Each national information service could continue to distribute material within its own territories, as at present;

(iii) Missions of member states might undertake to include some of the material as a part of their own information service within the territories of other members.

(b) In non-NATO countries (including Soviet and satellite) as appropriate:

(i) The material provided might be used as a means of coordinating the approach of NATO members in information activities directed toward the various non-NATO countries and groupings;

(ii) It might be distributed by NATO members as a part of their own information services in these countries.

71. Each member state would, of course, have to decide for itself the extent to which it would be willing to participate. NATO might provide the material — if sufficient interest is displayed — and arrange coordination and provide advice on tactics to be employed in any particular area.

PART V — ORGANIZATIONAL AND FUNCTIONAL QUESTIONS

(Question 1) What specific changes in procedure or organizational arrangements would your Government recommend to ensure closer and more effective consultation in the Council to improve and extend NATO cooperation in non-military fields and to develop greater unity within the Atlantic Community?

72. (Answer) The Canadian Government makes a distinction between the procedural and organizational arrangements within the Organization. On the organizational level, the Government considers that the present machinery is adequate to ensure closer and more effective consultation in order to improve and extend NATO cooperation in non-military fields and to develop greater unity within the Atlantic Community. The Canadian Government considers that the various bodies within the Organization which have been established to assist the Council to discharge its obligations, including planning committees and working groups, are adequate to handle any matter which might require detailed study, provided sufficient flexibility is maintained in their terms of reference. The efficiency of the Council and the smooth handling of the preparatory work required might well, in fact, be impaired if there were to be an excessive proliferation of such subsidiary organs within the Organization.

73. The Canadian Government considers, however, that certain modifications in the present procedure for meetings of the Council would be conducive to a more effective consultation and should thus improve cooperation in non-military fields.

74. The practice of holding two regular meetings during the year, one attended by Defence, Finance and Foreign Ministers, and the other by Foreign Ministers to examine political problems in general seems to have proved satisfactory; in the view of the Canadian Government, however, this represent a minimum, and Foreign Ministers should endeavour to participate more frequently in regular Council meetings on an informal basis whenever their other duties permit them to do so. Not all Foreign Ministers need attend such informal meetings at the same time, but a more constant exchange of personal views between NATO Foreign Ministers would strengthen political consultation. This would seem particularly desirable when difficult and delicate problems arise involving conflicts of interest and views between members of the Alliance.

75. The Canadian Government is further inclined to give favourable consideration to the suggestion that Ministerial meetings of the Council may not necessarily be held in Paris. Public opinion in NATO countries will probably benefit from having Ministerial meetings held from time to time in the respective member countries. There should not be too rigid a plan for deciding on the venue of such meetings, but if they are to be held away from the Headquarters, regard should be given to appropriate geographic distribution. One possibility to be explored is to take advantage of the presence of Foreign Ministers in New York for the opening of the U.N. General Assembly to have an extra Ministerial meeting of the Council.

76. As regards the time devoted to Ministerial meetings, it is the opinion of the Canadian Government that it is essential that enough time is made available to ensure a thorough and beneficial examination of the problems on the agenda not only in the Council but also in informal and private consultation between Ministers. This involves not only setting aside much more time than has been the case in the past for such meetings, but also having governments pay more attention to the preparatory work on the problems to be discussed.

77. While member governments should be encouraged to send as their permanent representatives to NATO individuals as fully qualified as possible to speak for them, it may be useful also if senior officials from their home offices were sent some time in advance of regular Ministerial sessions to assist in this preparatory work. Senior experts might also be sent to aid in consultations on special subjects. The task of the Council might also be facilitated if member governments were to develop the habit of circulating position papers outlining their views on current issues.

(Question 2) To what extent does your Government consider that experts could be used more either on a permanent or ad hoc basis, to assist the Council in the process of political consultations?

78. (Answer) The Canadian Government views with favour the assistance on an ad hoc basis which experts could render the Council in the process of political consultation. Governments should be encouraged to send their experts most familiar with their thinking on any given problem under discussion in the Council to assist their Permanent Representatives and to consult with their counterparts. Such arrangements should be kept flexible and under the continuing control of the Council.

(Question 3) To what extent should the Secretary-General play an active role in the field of political consultation, and to what particular types of problems should such a role extend?

79. (Answer) The Canadian Government believes that the Secretary-General should play an active role in political consultation. In addition to helping the Council to arrive at a consensus on political problems, the discussion of which may be initiated by member governments, the Secretary-General should feel free to propose matters for discussion which in his judgment may substantially affect the unity or effectiveness of the Alliance. However, it is recognized that in order to enable the Secretary-General to fulfil such a function, he should be kept fully informed on the thinking of member governments on questions of common concern to the Alliance. This information should be transmitted by member governments to the Secretary-General through their permanent delegations, where possible in advance of Council discussions.

80. The Secretary-General, through periodic visits to member governments, as well as through contact with Permanent Representatives, is in a unique position to help in any situation where informal consultations would lead to greater understanding among member governments, and contribute to the unity of the Alliance. In addition to the authority to raise any matter of common concern for discussion in the Council, therefore, the Secretary-General should not be precluded from taking the initiative in offering and providing in such instances whatever informal good offices might appear to him to be conducive to the conciliation of divergent interests between member governments.

81. To facilitate this role in political consultation, it is our view that the Secretary-General should act as chairman of the Council (rather than as Vice-Chairman as at present). The Council might thus derive an advantage through being able to make the fullest possible use of the Secretary-General's continuing and special knowledge and experience in NATO affairs.

(Question 4) In view of the economic responsibilities of NATO, and those in prospect, what organizational changes, if any, does your Government consider are required to discharge them?

82. (Answer) The Canadian Government believes that no basic structural changes in the organization of NATO are required to deal with the present and foreseeable future economic responsibilities of NATO. Given the necessary flexibility, existing NATO bodies, including committees and working groups, should be able to initiate whatever action or study is requested by the Council. As circumstances warrant, ad hoc groups of experts could be set up within the established bodies and consultants drawn from outside the Organization as their services are needed. While Canada shares the view that NATO should not assume responsibilities now discharged by OEEC or other international economic agencies, it is considered that member countries should make full use of the facilities provided by other international agencies in the economic field in an effort to avoid friction through conflicting economic policies which would affect the interests of the North Atlantic Community.

(Question 5) Does your Government consider that greater use should be made of NATO machinery for the circulation on a NATO-wide basis of "basic position material" by individual governments (e.g. texts of agreements, basic statements of position, etc.)?

83. (Answer) The Canadian Government is of the view that it would be in the general interest of the Alliance for member governments to make available for background information "basic position material" which would help the Alliance as a whole in the consideration of problems of common concern and assist individual governments to understand more fully the reasons for the position adopted by any particular member country on an issue which is its special concern, but which affects as well to varying extents other members of NATO. Such material, within the limits of domestic security restrictions, might be circulated through the respective permanent delegations to other delegations and to the Secretary-General.

(Question 6) The suggestion has been made that a closer relationship might be established between NATO and the United Nations, possibly establishing the position of NATO as a regional organization in the terms of Chapter VIII of the United Nations Charter. What are the views of your Government on this question?

84. (Answer) The Canadian Government considers that NATO is an organization whose purposes are wholly consistent with the provisions of the United Nations Charter, and that, for the present, there is no need to take formal action to establish the position of NATO as a regional organization in terms of Chapter VIII of the Charter.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE QUESTIONNAIRE — UK REPLIES

We called on Bushell, Assistant Head of the Western Organizations Department, for an informal discussion on the UK replies to the NATO questionnaire. As suggested, we used as a basis for our talk your recent memo to Cabinet, without disclosing the source.

2. Bushell confirmed that the UK approach to questions was on the whole very similar to the Canadian one, and that the only difference might be one of emphasis in some of the replies. He said that the UK attitude to the whole exercise could be described as an expression of British mentality in the sense that the Foreign Office do not wish NATO to be ruled by a set of fixed principles or procedures. They feel that the present machinery has given good results in the last seven years and that there is no need for a general overhaul. Flexibility is considered as a sound principle which has proved also to be a very wise one.

3. Bushell said that from the UK replies it clearly appears that as far as the UK are concerned political consultation is considered as the more important factor. They wish more depth and reality to be given to such consultation. To obtain that goal one urgent step would appear to be that the climate of confidence and trust be restored. How can controversial issues be fully discussed in the Council if one country is not confident that information of a secret nature is not to leak out? Without making specific reference to Greece, one is inclined to feel that in view of the recent difficulties between these two countries, there is among UK officials a reluctance to refer certain issues to the Council. This might also account for the UK emphasis for more restricted sessions.

4. Of course there are factors which have to be taken into account and are bound to limit the scope of political consultation, one of which is that national governments must retain final responsibility with respect to national policies. The UK replies also made it clear that they are not prepared to accept at this stage automatic obligation to consult or to accept advice given in the Council. Similarly, they consider that governments offering advice cannot be held to share in the responsibility for a policy on which their advice has been sought.

5. Another point in the UK replies which is of some importance deals with the need for Permanent Representatives to be better informed of problems before the Council. Bushell said that in a way Permanent Representatives are acting as in some sort of Parliament and are expected not only to make official statements but to be able to answer questions on specific points of policies. In certain instances Permanent Representatives are not fully informed of the thinking of national governments or of the formulation of national policies before these are finalized. There is improvement to be made there and also a need for Council agenda to be prepared with more care. If these were achieved, perhaps there would be no need for more frequent ministerial meetings.

(For Ottawa Only)

6. We were not able to go into much detail, but during our conversation Bushell volunteered to make available to us the full text of the UK replies on the ground that they would enable Mr. Pearson to be better prepared for his talks with the Foreign Secretary. We sent two copies to you by today's airbag, under cover of our letter 1384.†

7. We are wondering whether we could not reciprocate and make available to the Foreign Office more information on the Canadian replies. Could we not, for example, give them a copy of your memorandum to the Cabinet of July 30 1956? We would strike out the reference to the Cabinet and also paragraph 12. It seems to us that such information would enable the Foreign Office to brief Mr. Lloyd before the Minister's arrival.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE

The preparatory work got off to a good start on the basis of the procedures outlined in DL176 of August 27† which were found generally acceptable to the others.

2. A draft working paper setting out possible recommendations has been prepared and will be considered by the Three Ministers at the beginning of next week. If this draft is agreed to it could, with the replies to the questionnaire, constitute the basis of discussion with them in their consultations with the committee which will go on as scheduled through next week and the following one.

3. I will keep you generally informed of progress but will not be communicating drafts as they will be constantly changing and in any case at this stage are the responsibility of the Committee of Three.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE

The three Foreign Ministers have now agreed on procedures for consultations with other government representatives which are to begin today, September 12. To assist in the consultations, the following documentation had been prepared for the Ministers:

(a) working paper containing main questions of principle arising from country replies, which will be made available to government representatives;

(b) briefs on main points contained in each of the country replies and on degree to which the approach taken by each country is reflected in the present draft of the Committee's proposed recommendations.

2. The working paper mentioned in (a) above consists of an outline of points of possible draft recommendations prepared last week and is being presented to government representatives as first thoughts for basis of discussion, without commitment either on the part of the Committee or of government representatives.

3. As three Ministers wish at this stage to avoid subsequent controversial discussion of various points which are to be taken up with government representatives, the latter are being asked to return the working paper following their consultations with the Committee of Three. Ministers are also anxious that consultations should bear on broad questions of principle, particularly in political and economic fields, and discussion of detailed proposals will therefore be discouraged.

4. The Committee has also considered request of Permanent Council for advice on the disposition of Survey of Article 2 activities. A Norwegian suggestion to have the Survey made available to the Atlantic Treaty Association for subsequent dissemination by that Association as its own product was approved, subject to a final review of the present text by the Permanent Council to ensure that any opinionated statements are deleted and that the Survey is strictly factual.

COMMITTEE OF THREE

The Committee of Three held consultations last week with representatives of Iceland, The Netherlands, Greece, Turkey, Belgium and Germany. It also heard spokesmen for the Conference of Parliamentarians and for the Atlantic Treaty Association. We are sending under separate cover copies of reports of each of these consultations.³⁸

³⁸ Non retrouvé./Not located.

2. Little new emerged from these interviews. The Germans made a most interesting and impressive presentation of their views, particularly on the "political annual review" which they had proposed. The Turkish and Greek representatives were both critical of the U.S. proposal on the settlement of disputes; the former because the moral obligation which would be created might not be honoured, and the latter because the obligations and sanctions were not strong enough.

COMMITTEE OF THREE

1. Three Ministers had final meeting yesterday September 22 at which they reached agreement on substance of report to be made to Council. Ministers intend to have the report, consisting of introductory chapter and recommendations on political, economic, cultural, information and organizational aspects, to be made public ultimately and the text is being revised with this in mind. It will be transmitted to governments, however, under a confidential covering note containing points of more controversial nature and which would not be appropriate for public release.

2. The remaining timetable agreed by the Ministers for winding up Committee of Three exercise stands at present as follows:

(a) Working group composed of one officer from each delegation, together with consultants, will remain in Paris until Wednesday to polish up drafting of certain parts of present text and to prepare list of points which should go in the covering note to governments.

(b) Complete draft will be sent to Ottawa for final editing by me and for drafting of covering note on basis of list of points prepared by working group, which will then be sent to the other two Ministers.

(c) Three Ministers will meet in New York a few days before opening of U.N. Session for final approval of report and of covering note.

(d) Final text will be despatched to Secretary General for immediate distribution to governments through permanent delegations in Paris.

3. Ministers have also agreed on text of press release about conclusion of present consultations which will be available in Paris for Monday morning editions. Text of press release will be found in my immediately following telegram† and is the only information to be given out.

Herewith a top secret memorandum on discussions I had in London and in Paris concerning changes in British defence policy. CHANGES IN BRITISH DEFENCE POLICY AND THEIR INTERNATIONAL
 IMPLICATIONS

This was, I think, the most important single subject that I encountered during our sojourn in London. Its implications, for NATO generally, and for Canada even apart from NATO, are very important and could be far-reaching. The story, as it concerns us, is as follows.

On Sunday, June 17, the day I arrived in London, I had dinner at the High Commissioner's with the Foreign Secretary, Selwyn Lloyd, together with Sir Harold Caccia, and Lord Hood of the Foreign Office. Lloyd told us that the United Kingdom Government had been re-examining the basis of its defence policy and would be significantly altering it to take into consideration new political and strategic developments. Changes were also required by economic and financial considerations, which necessitated some reduction of U.K. defence expenditures, which were proportionately higher than any other European country.

They had come to the conclusion that it was wrong to concentrate large forces for the defence of Western Europe when, in fact, the real defence of that area, as well as the most effective deterrent against aggression was the capacity of the U.S. Strategic Air Force to bomb Russia with thermo-nuclear weapons if an aggression took place. What, therefore, was the use of having 50 or 60 or 70 divisions which could never be effective for defence? Why not merely 20 or 30, as a screen on the frontiers, an attack against which would call into play the atomic deterrent? He called this the "trip-wire" theory of defence, though it also might be designated as "burglar alarm" strategy. It would mean a reduction of expenditures of all the NATO European countries for conventional defence and the removal of two U.K. divisions from the continent. Some of these troops would be demobilized and thus would ease the manpower as well as the financial burden.

We were then told that a proposal embodying these new ideas (attached herewith)⁴¹ would be submitted to Mr. Dulles in Washington. We were the only people to have seen it apart from the U.K. Cabinet.

My first reaction to this proposal was that it made sense in terms of defence strategy. Indeed, it would help us solve one of our most difficult Canadian problems by facilitating the eventual withdrawal of some Canadian forces from Europe for use — in the case of the R.C.A.F. — behind the Early Warning Lines in Canada, in lieu of U.S. squadrons which otherwise might be stationed there. However, I also felt that if this British policy were to be implemented unilaterally, without consulting the NATO Council and without trying to secure a new, and agreed, defence directive, the political results might easily be disastrous, especially in Washington and in Bonn, and for NATO itself.

It seemed to us, therefore, that it was of vital importance that the British should not act too quickly or on their own. Lloyd, however, was worried about delay and said they might have to make this a "bolt from the blue" operation. We strongly advised him to proceed carefully and slowly and above all to consult fully with the Americans as well as with the French and the Germans; and ultimately clear the matter through the NATO Council.

It would certainly prejudice the work of the Committee of Three on non-military co-operation if a decision of this kind were taken unilaterally without NATO even discussing it. What would be the use of talking about the virtues of political consultation in these circumstances?

Lloyd accepted all this but was worried about the time element. He said they could not wait beyond the middle of July. He was also fearful about a leakage if there was prior consultation. We impressed on him the impossibility of having this matter discussed, let alone decided, in the NATO Council within 2 or 3 weeks. I did suggest that, in order to avoid publicity, possibly a July meeting of the Committee of Three with the other members of the NATO Council, ostensibly to discuss our work, might be a useful cover for a defence discussion. Later consideration, however, made it quite clear that this would not be a very good device.

Mr. Robertson and I were thoroughly alarmed by the attitude of the Foreign Minister, and particularly by that of his officials, who were so preoccupied with the domestic aspect of this question that they did not seem to appreciate fully its international implications.

On Tuesday, June 19, Mr. Robertson and I saw Mr. Lloyd again, and several of his officials, at the Foreign Office. He told us that their Ambassador in Washington had now discussed their defence proposal with Mr. Dulles, whose immediate reaction had not been unfavourable, they thought. He read us a telegram from Makins, reporting on that reaction. I told him that I was absolutely convinced that they would be making a great mistake if they took this message to mean that the United States Government would not be strongly opposed to sudden unilateral action on the U.K. part of the type indicated Sunday night.

Lloyd was worried, however, about the difficulty of clearing things in Washington at this particular time and also of the danger of leakages if there were discussions in Paris and in Bonn. We felt he should take that risk if the United Kingdom Government were, in fact, going to make an announcement in the House of Commons the following week about defence cuts, as he indicated that they would have to do. I told him that I would be in Paris the rest of the week and would like very much to discuss, on a personal and confidential basis, some of these matters, both with Ismay and Gruenther. It seemed to me that not only the work of the Committee but the whole future of NATO was at stake on this issue; as well, indeed, as the fortunes of the Adenauer Government. I was convinced that the British, from the strategic point of view, were on the right lines, but I was equally convinced that if they carried out their ideas in the wrong way the results might be disastrous. On the other hand, if these changes could be made in the right way, we could exploit them in discussions with the Russians, not only in respect of the reduction of armaments, but also of the unification of Germany. We would have some new cards to play if we had enough skill and will to play them.

I found out in Paris that both the people at the Quai d'Orsay and the Italian and Norwegian Foreign Ministers, my colleagues on the Committee, were aware that something was happening in London. Stories, though vague and general, in the press, indicated that far-reaching decisions were being considered by the U.K. Government in the field of defence. Both Lange (Norway) and Faure (France) indicated to me their anxiety about these developments. "Pug" Ismay was more than anxious. He was acutely distressed at the possibility of NATO being by-passed by the U.K. I have seldom seen him so exercised, and he was very critical of U.K. policy and tactics, even though he also felt that the ultimate objectives might be sound. He asked me to have lunch with him alone so that he could talk to me very frankly, and he did; even to the point of suggesting that he would not remain on as Secretary-General if his country "let him down" in this way. He was considering taking the initiative in calling a meeting of the Council to discuss the matter, or asking some government to do so. I told him that I shared his anxiety but I advised him strongly to do nothing as I felt that the U.K. Government were now giving second thoughts, at least to procedure. I promised to convey his worries in a very personal and confidential way to the Foreign Secretary and said that I would report to him again after I had had further talks in London. He thought, and I agreed with him, that there should be a special ministerial meeting of the Council at the earliest possible date, probably in September, to try to agree on a new defence directive. As this would be primarily a political decision, though with vital military implications, the initiative should come from the Council and a decision on policy made there. I left Ismay, I think, in a better frame of mind than when I found him.

I was unable to see General Gruenther as he had left for the United States the day I arrived in Paris.

On my return to London I saw Selwyn Lloyd late Sunday night, June 24, and told him about my talks in Paris.

Lloyd had had further word from Washington and, as I expected, it was less favourable than Dulles' first reaction. The Americans are very worried and in no position at this time, with the President out of action, even to discuss the grand strategy of defence. They also have their own strong differences of opinions which cannot be resolved in a hurry. So Dulles does not want any meeting of NATO until after the election, and Lloyd says they simply cannot, nor should not, wait so long. He told me, "very, very confidentially", that Radford was favouring their ideas, but Gruenther, now in the United States, was strongly opposing them.

Fortunately, Harold Macmillan did not announce any far-reaching changes in defence policy, when he made his statement on "outs" to the House of Commons Tuesday (June 26). They will now suspend such a policy statement as long as possible, a decision which removes some of our anxiety. But they are impatient at American delays and insist on a NATO meeting by September. However, it seems that our warnings and worries have had some effect here.

On Wednesday night (June 27) at the Palace, after dinner, I got into a corner with Anthony Eden and we had quite a talk, mostly about defence and Cyprus. He was aware of the international implications of the new U.K. defence plans and agreed that they should not be announced without NATO consultation and as part of a NATO agreed plan for Western Europe. He emphasized, however, that they could not wait forever. He had discussed the new strategy with Montgomery who was all in favour of it (though his NATO chief was not) and had put his approval in writing in a personal letter. I was shown (on a personal and confidential basis) a copy of that letter which was a typical Montgomery production, short, sharp and dogmatic. Montgomery thought that a U.S. Corps and a U.K. Corps on the continent quite adequate, with reductions also in continental conventional forces. Eden had been told of our feeling that if NATO were allowed to deal with this matter, it could be exploited to our diplomatic advantage with the Russians. He was very interested in this and seemed to appreciate our views. He is aware of the difficulties and dangers that may arise in Bonn and Washington. I tried to underline both. "If only", he said, "Ike could take hold".

Thursday I lunched with Lloyd and Mountbatten at the latter's house. I arrived first and Lord Louis told me how useful it was that we had impressed on the people here the dangers of the course some of them were contemplating. Like us, he had no objection to the policy itself, but was very worried about the method of announcing and implementing it. Unless care was shown, it would break up NATO and he was convinced that this would be a major disaster. He proposed to talk to Lloyd along these lines at lunch and hoped I would back him up. He did and I did! It was a good talk.

That night at 10 Downing Street, after dinner, Salisbury, who is a great power in the Cabinet, said that Mountbatten had been reporting my views to him. He was very interested, he said, and would I come to Hatfield House for the weekend where we could follow the matter up.

So Saturday evening, after I had pored over some of Elizabeth's and Mary's original letters, the first Cecil's diary, etc., — what a treasure house that place is — we had a long talk along familiar lines. Salisbury seemed to me somewhat more concerned with the domestic, than the international aspect of the problem.

Mr. Ritchie had come over to see me from Bonn on Thursday and left with me a very good memorandum† on the effect of the proposed changes of U.K. defense policy on Germany (copy attached). I had a copy of this with me and thought it would be a good document for Salisbury to see. He was very much impressed by it and I think that after reading it he was more aware of the international difficulties involved in policy changes.

On Friday, I had phoned Ismay and told him in guarded language of my talks here and my hopes that things were now on the rails; that Macmillan's statement in the House of Commons on defence cuts could be implemented without any policy changes and was a holding operation prior to NATO talks. Ismay was relieved and gratified.

On Friday, late afternoon, I also had a word with Selwyn Lloyd about an idea which Charles Ritchie and I had discussed; that Hallstein should come to London to talk with me about German views on the work of the Committee of Three and that, during his visit, which would not, I hope, receive any publicity, Foreign Office people could discuss with him these European defence problems. Lloyd was attracted by the idea, but, after weekend discussions with others, phoned me on Tuesday to say that, on the whole, they thought that it was too risky. The Americans might hear of the visit and accuse the British of trying to alter the policy of the Adenauer Government before agreement had been reached between Washington and London. Perhaps he is right about this. In any event, Hallstein will not be coming.

On Tuesday afternoon the Commonwealth Prime Ministers discussed defence questions at a restricted meeting. During this meeting Eden had the following to say in language which was almost exactly that which I had used to him the other night.

"... The United Kingdom would not however take any unilateral action in adjusting her forces committed to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Any alterations would be discussed with the other member countries. There was a further reason for making some adjustment to meet the changed circumstances. At present the political initiative lay with the Russians who had announced their policies for Eastern Germany and had made the maximum use in their propaganda of the reductions in their armed forces. It would be desirable therefore for the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to agree on some counter measures, which could be put forward as a reply to the Russian moves and indicate their willingness to discuss with Russia further measures for the relaxation of tension in Europe. Only by producing imaginative policies would the Western Powers be able to gain an initiative from the Russians."⁴²

I should conclude this story by an account of a visit I had on Wednesday (July 4) at Canada House with General Gruenther, who was returning to Paris from Washington via London. He was much perturbed at the British suggestion for an early meeting would do more harm than good at this time, especially as governments would not be prepared for it. I told him that while this might well be true, nevertheless NATO governments were all giving serious thought to new defence policies and plans, and it would be an unhappy development for NATO if decisions in this field were made unilaterally. I indicated that while the British a few weeks ago were talking of a July meeting, they were now quite willing to wait for some time, but not indefinitely.

Gruenther, who had just come from seeing Selwyn Lloyd, said that what the NATO military authorities required was a political view from each government on defence strategy. If they could get this, they could press ahead with their military examination and be ready, he thought, to report to the Council by October. He had expressed this view in Washington where, incidentally, he had, so he said, received fairly rough handling from congressional committees on defence policy. I told him that my own view was that if a military examination was completed by October that would be satisfactory, and we should be able to postpone a Council meeting until soon after that date. I suggested he talk over the whole question with Ismay when he got to Paris, but keep in mind that the situation in London now, in regard to premature or unilateral action, was much better than Ismay might think on the basis of information he had received a couple of weeks ago.

I think this whole business is now "on the rails" but a lot of hard thinking on defence policy will have to be done by the NATO countries within the next few months. Some far reaching decisions will then have to be taken and these may vitally affect NATO's future as well as the defence policies of its members.

REAPPRAISAL OF NATO DEFENCE POLICY

On June 27 I sent to Mr. Martin, as Acting Minister, some notes† on the implications of the United Kingdom proposal for a reappraisal of NATO defence policy. Mr. Martin subsequently used these notes (copy attached) for a brief report to Cabinet on the matter.

2. The Norwegian Government has now since raised in the North Atlantic Council (telegrams No. 1038 of July 4† and No. 1058 of July 6† from NATO Paris, copies attached) the question of a military reappraisal, on the grounds that recent trends in Soviet policy may justify a reduction of the defence efforts of the NATO countries. In his explanatory statement on July 4, the Norwegian Permanent Representative said that current press reports suggested that there exist differences of opinion between member countries regarding the support that should be given to defence programmes, and that the pressure was growing for reducing defence expenditures. For these reasons, the Norwegian Government wondered whether the time had not come to call a Ministerial meeting, which could take place sometime in September to coincide with the Committee of Three consultations.

3. Up to last week, neither proposal implied that this military reappraisal should be done through the normal procedure provided by the Annual Review process. Both proposals were, in fact, silent on how exactly the details of this reappraisal should be carried out; the only specific point was on timing, the U.K. proposal favouring immediate action.

4. The exchanges of views which have taken place in the Council on these two proposals have indicated agreement among NATO members that a reappraisal is needed, and that the Alliance should really have another good look at its present strategy and defence policy. You will recall that in his initial reaction Mr. Dulles was reported to be in favour of some "scaling down" and so was Admiral Radford. Moreover, like ourselves, Mr. Dulles seems to favour a procedure which would avoid unwelcome publicity, and has suggested handling the matter through the Annual Review (telegrams No. 1202 of June 26† and No. 1265 of July 6† from Washington, attached).

5. We have conveyed to Mr. Wilgress as official views of the Department (telegrams No. DL-951 of June 26 and No. DLDL-9 of July 4 from External, attached) that we were in agreement with the need for a military reappraisal, and that in our view such a reappraisal was probably overdue. We made, however, two main qualifications; first that we did not think that undue publicity should be given at this stage to the whole problem of reappraisal, that therefore an emergency Ministerial meeting might not be the best procedure from this standpoint, and that the reappraisal might be carried out through the normal Annual Review processes, which begin towards the end of July each year and continue until the regular Ministerial meeting in December. We indicated at the same time that we would not object, if the majority of the members so desired, either to a suggestion of a Four-Power group to which the task could at least initially be assigned for negotiation and study, or to a special Ministerial meeting as part of the Annual Review procedure.

6. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, has expressed agreement with our reactions to the United Kingdom and Norwegian proposals (telegram No. DLDL-15 of July 6† to NATO Paris, attached). General Foulkes suggested, however, that, "if this reappraisal is to be based on a relaxation of the threat, the Permanent Council should start to work on this premise immediately". What would be required, in his view, is a re-assessment of the risk, and if it is agreed that the risk of war has considerably receded, the Council could then make recommendations as to what risk the governments should be prepared to take in authorizing the reduction of forces.

7. Even with the best information available, the Council could never assess accurately the intention of the leaders of the Soviet bloc. What can be evaluated, however, with some degree of accuracy, is whether the military capabilities of the Soviet bloc have decreased or not. If in fact we find that the present war potentials of the Soviet bloc are at least qualitatively as strong as they were three or four years ago, governments would surely have to conclude that the threat has not been substantially reduced. This does not rule out, however, a reappraisal of priorities which we have been urging to enable the best military use to be made of available resources, talking into full account the new methods of warfare.

8. The military problem is underlined in the attached report received over the weekend from Bonn (telegram No. 186 of July 4†) which confirms that the German Government has fixed its defence policy to the present German-NATO goals and that in fact a study group of German ex-generals has just recently reported to the Bundestag the necessity for the defence of Germany of a 500,000 man German army and conscription with an 18-month period service.⁴³ The reappraisal originally envisaged by the United Kingdom authorities and motivated by economic and political considerations would therefore mean a complete reversal of present German defence policy.

9. We now need your guidance on the following points, in order to supplement the interim instructions which have been sent to Mr. Wilgress:

(a) My understanding is that you share the Department's view that there is a need for having a reappraisal of NATO's strategy and defence planning. Am I correct in assuming this?⁴⁴

(b) Do you agree, however, that from the point of view of timing it would be undesirable to rush into this reappraisal in a manner which would give it unwelcome publicity and lead to its misinterpretation?⁴⁵

(c) For these reasons, should we not try to have this reappraisal associated with the Annual Review process, preferably without the calling of a special Ministerial meeting to initiate it, if the problem is to be approached primarily from a military standpoint?⁴⁶

⁴³ Note marginale /Marginal note:

We should give further thought to this question. I am not convinced that, given a general reduction of ground troops in Europe, the present German-NATO goals should be retained. J. L[éger]

⁴⁴ Note marginale /Marginal note:

⁴⁵ Note marginale /Marginal note:

Yes [L.B. Pearson]

⁴⁶ Note marginale /Marginal note:

Yes—if the UK doesn't insist on an earlier meeting. [L.B. Pearson]

(d) Alternatively, if approached primarily from a political standpoint, would it be desirable to give support to the suggestion made by the United States that a Four-Power group could initially formulate some proposals to be considered by the other member governments in the Council, taking into account the possible implications of NATO defence policy upon the problem of German reunification?⁴⁷

10. The most important next step from the Canadian standpoint would seem to be that of convincing the Department of National Defence of the necessity of taking action on a reappraisal of NATO strategy and defence planning, including Canadian defence policy, so that the necessary instructions would be given to the appropriate officials of that Department, and more particularly to those who will be participating in this year's Annual Review.

UK PROPOSAL FOR REAPPRAISAL OF NATO DEFENCE POLICY — STRATEGIC IMPLICATIONS

Following for the Minister.

The strategic reappraisal implied in the United Kingdom proposal will of course require an extensive and detailed examination of over-all NATO defence planning in the light of an equally detailed indication of the U.K. plans. As a preliminary reaction, some thoughts have occurred to us within the Department which might be useful to you for reference in any further consultations you may have on this matter.

2. Although the United Kingdom proposal as set out in London telegram No. 809† adduces some powerful military reasons for a reappraisal of NATO defence policy, in the light of the atomic stalemate and new Soviet tactics, it would seem that U.K. views on timing and the implicit suggestion that substantial conventional force reductions are now in order, stem in considerable measure from its present domestic economic and political difficulties.

3. Although we have no precision on United Kingdom thinking on the type of reduction or modification envisaged in present NATO plans for the atomic deterrent or in conventional field, it is probably not unwarranted to assume, on the basis of your recent reports, and earlier statements on defence matters by United Kingdom ministers in the last six or eight months, that the United Kingdom government considers:

⁴⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

There is no reason why they should not do this without any formal proposal from the Council.
[L.B. Pearson]

(a) In view of the atomic stalemate and new Soviet tactics, the present problem of threat of Communist aggression may be adequately met by a nuclear deterrent (possibly even less elaborate than at present envisaged) and with reduced conventional forces playing a limited role.

(b) That the military shield provided in Western Europe by NATO forces in its present state has more or less served its original purpose, and can now be reduced, with the ultimate possibility of its replacement by the ordinary national forces of the Western European members of the Alliance, presumably in terms of some mobile striking forces.

(c) That NATO planning for the build-up of a nuclear deterrent, which includes such items as early warning systems, forward scatter systems, extensive military and air installations and detailed logistic arrangements, is no longer justified to the extent at present envisaged, and should accordingly be simplified.

(d) That savings from downward revision of NATO conventional forces should be used:

(i) to bolster their national atomic potential in maintaining an effective nuclear deterrent; and

(ii) to increase their economic potential.

4. As you are aware, present estimates provide for a more or less full implementation of M.C. 48 by the end of 1959. More specifically, this requires the attainment of a forward strategy to provide a defensive shield to the east of the Rhein-Ijssel line which requires the complete planned German contribution as well as the tactical atomic capacity for NATO forces within this area. Measures must be developed for the adaptation of forces in being according to M.C. 48, to give them this atomic capability and the civil and military planning concepts must be revised and their problems delineated anew for the full implementation of M.C. 48 and its successor.

5. The problems which have prevented NATO from achieving the state of preparedness desired have included these:

(a) The lack of an adequate early warning system to counter the enemy advantage of surprise.

(b) The absence of uniform and agreed alert procedures, including the provision for emergency allocation of powers and forces to SACEUR.

(c) The limited degree to which national readiness measures have been studied and developed.

(d) Forces in being have been reduced in number or effectiveness below the anticipated requirements, causing a serious deficiency and delay in implementing a forward strategy.

(e) The slow progress achieved in the development of a sound air defence system for Europe.

(f) The inability of NATO forces as yet to prepare for the subsequent phases of any warfare as a result of their preoccupation with reaching the levels necessary for the initial phase.

(g) The lack of an established forward defence at sea capable of control and protection as well as for local offensives.

(h) The absence of a unified or adequate logistic system and other peace-time plans in order to provide for efficient operation and maintenance of both military and civilian requirements in the event of a sudden outbreak of hostilities.

6. In the case of the United Kingdom more particularly, the last Annual Review (1955) has brought out that despite recent improvements, the shortage of U.K. support units for

M-Day Forces stationed on the Continent and the delay in bringing major units to full war establishment remain two of the United Kingdom main weaknesses. Concern was also expressed at delays in the development and production of modern combat aircraft. A general conclusion was that in any adjustment of over-all U.K. defence programme, the level of defence expenditures should be maintained and the importance of a fully effective contribution to NATO defence should remain a primary contribution.

7. In the absence of detailed information on U.K. views as to how the new strategy should be implemented, and in particular, the extent of U.K. and possibly U.S. force reductions in Germany which they envisage, there is not too much that can usefully be said. However, we were struck by Mr. Dulles' remark (paragraph 5 of telegram No. 1163 of June 19[†] from Washington) that no country could consider maintaining two kinds of military establishments, nuclear and conventional. We are inclined to think that much of the European discontent with the existing NATO defence plan stems from the fact that they have to furnish conventional forces (which they feel are obsolescent and which require relatively large numbers of men) while the United States and United Kingdom reserve for themselves the task of supplying "nuclear forces". This sense of dissatisfaction and unreality will be exacerbated if the proportion of British and American forces to those from continental Europe is to be reduced substantially. If in practice the only real nuclear deterrent available to NATO is that provided for through the U.S. strategic air force, it would imply complete NATO reliance, for some time at any rate, on U.S. nuclear deterrent, with grave implications for the future of NATO.

8. We understand that U.K. Government considers that they could not wait for the usual leisurely procedures of the various NATO technical committees. The U.K. proposal itself, after referring to the urgency of the matter, states that nothing would be more calculated to evoke popular support for NATO than evidence that it has sufficient imagination to confront the new situation.

9. Against this appeal for dramatic and immediate action must be balanced the following considerations:

(1) Presumably there will be general agreement that nothing should be allowed to rock the boat until the U.S. Foreign Aid Bill is passed.

(2) Although it would appear that German legislative difficulties in getting military service legislation passed and implemented will drag on for too long a time to permit them to defer the reappraisal, there might well be fewer repercussions if the reappraisal were carried out quietly in conjunction with the regular annual review programme.

(3) We have an uneasy feeling that the United Kingdom has prejudged the results of the proposed reappraisal, and that while the results of this might have an immediate attractiveness to a number of countries, the long term effects could be very serious for the very existence of NATO. There would be less likelihood of this occurring if consideration followed the usual NATO process than if the emergency treatment proposed by the United Kingdom were applied. The only practical alternative would appear to be a special review by Ministers as early as possible, but preferably not before September.

10. The foregoing deals primarily with strategic factors and has received general concurrence of Chairman, Chiefs of Staff who may have, however, additional detailed comments to send at a later date. A separate message[†] will also deal with some political considerations.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

1. You have of course received the various telegrams which we have sent to the Minister in London and in which we discussed what had appeared to us to be the political and strategic implications of the UK proposal for a military reappraisal. I think that in general our thinking about the UK proposal would apply mutatis mutandis to the Norwegian suggestion.

2. In the discussion of NATO military reappraisal a distinction needs to be drawn between the actual need for a military reappraisal, the procedure for carrying it out and the timing of such a reappraisal. There is a fairly wide acceptance already that there is a need for having another good look at NATO's strategy and defence planning.

3. While agreeing that there should be this reappraisal, we share the view expressed in Council by the French representative that the organization should avoid attracting undue publicity to the problem. Unwelcome publicity would likely result if it were to appear that an emergency meeting, particularly of Ministers, were being called mainly to study ways and means for NATO countries to reduce their defence expenditures. It was for this reason that in previous telegrams we suggested associating this reappraisal with the normal processes of Annual Review. At this stage, we also believe that this reappraisal should be associated with the Annual Review process without the calling of a special Ministerial meeting. However as we have made the suggestion in the past of having Ministers consider the reports of the Annual Review Committee before this regular meeting, it might be more difficult to oppose it this year if some member governments feel that such a Ministerial meeting would now be appropriate.

4. If this reappraisal were actually to be absorbed in the Annual Review process, the question of timing would become of lesser importance, since the Annual Review will be carried out on the basis of a timetable which has already been agreed upon and which stretches from August, through the fall, and which culminates in the final report to the regular December Ministerial meeting. A special situation of course arises this year in view of the fact that the Committee of Three will also be meeting in September. The non-military and military reappraisals cannot be entirely separated; however it would seem desirable to try to avoid having the latter overshadow the former at least procedurally.

5. I might add that if the discussion in the Permanent Council of the Norwegian suggestion shows a desire on the part of the majority of the members to have the military reappraisal carried out as soon as possible and through some other than usual procedures, you might bear in mind the suggestion recently made by Mr. Dulles of a special Four-Power Group to which this task could at least initially be assigned. As we have ourselves indicated, we would have no particular objection to this idea which might have the merit of meeting both the present UK difficulties and the desire of other countries such as Norway to have prompt action on this matter.

6. You will appreciate that, as your next meeting is scheduled for tomorrow, the above views are preliminary and represent only the reactions in the Department. We hope to be able to send to you as soon as possible the views of the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff. These views are also, naturally, subject to any comments which the Minister himself may have from London to whom this telegram has been repeated together with your telegram under reference.

Note du président du Comité des chefs d'état-major Memorandum by Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], July 17, 1956

NOTE ON REAPPRAISAL OF THE MILITARY REQUIREMENTS OF NATO

1. There are indications that several of the NATO partners consider that a reappraisal of the military side of NATO leading to a reduction of force goals should be undertaken. It is quite apparent that any reappraisal should be a NATO exercise so as to prevent serious disruption of the alliance. If, on the other hand, there is a series of unilateral reappraisals and arbitrary reductions of forces, it may be very difficult to persuade all the member nations from following the same course, which may inevitably lead to confusion, mistrust and the eventual disintegration of the military alliance. Therefore it appears essential that any reappraisal leading to a reduction of force goals should be initiated by the Council as early as possible before any further unilateral announcements are made and all the other member nations feel it essential to make their cases public. It would therefore appear urgent to request the Council to ask all member nations to refrain from announcing the need for reappraisal and intentions to reduce forces until such time as a NATO study can be undertaken.

2. The basis for any reappraisal should be the lessening of the threat. The NATO alliance was formed to counter the Russian threat to Europe after the fall of Czechoslovakia, and any reappraisal should be made on the grounds that this threat has diminished. Therefore the first step would be to have a thorough examination made of the constituent parts of the threat to reach agreement that the threat has diminished and therefore greater risks could be taken in providing for the security of the whole of the NATO area.

3. This reassessment of the threat should be a joint political and military effort. This may not be too easy to attain as some of the reports emanating from SHAPE indicate that the SHAPE authorities do not agree that the military threat has in any way diminished. On the other hand it would be very serious for NATO if there were a wide divergence of opinion on a matter so important to the Alliance as any such difference of opinion would be bound to find its way into the press and the whole matter of reappraisal may be prejudged. If agreement on re-assessment of the threat can be reached, and it is agreed that there can be a relaxation of effort over a period of up to five years, then ways and means could be discussed by the Council with the military authorities as to how the lessening of the threat could be translated into reduction of military effort and expenditure.

4. It is at this stage that the question of a greater reliance on nuclear weapons could be considered. One course of action would be for the Council to make recommendations to the Supreme Allied Commanders to accept lower standards of readiness for the next four or five years. For example, they could recommend that forces be kept at fifty or sixty per cent strength instead of the eighty-five per cent now required by the Supreme Allied Commanders; and the numbers of aircraft to be maintained at standards of alerts could be reduced by, say, twenty-five per cent. Furthermore reserves of ammunition and stockpiles of stores could be reduced from perhaps ninety days to sixty or forty-five days. All these measures could be initiated without requiring the Supreme Allied Commanders to scrap their present plans. These measures could be accomplished as part of the Annual Review proceedings and put into effect in December. This kind of a device would allow considerable flexibility and if the strategical situation should deteriorate the forces could be quickly built up again provided the equipment was stored and reserves of manpower were available for immediate call-up.

5. This appears to be the only course which could be undertaken immediately, in which the initiative and responsibility could be taken by the political authorities, and which might have some hope of being accepted by the Supreme Allied Commanders. Any suggestion that the number of formations allotted to the Supreme Allied Commanders could in any way be reduced will be met by considerable opposition from the Supreme Allied Commanders themselves. You will note that both General Norstad (copy of General Norstad's recent speech is attached) and General Gruenther have already stated publicly that the forces they have available now are insufficient to carry out the tasks of defending the NATO area, even taking into account the greatest possible use of both tactical and strategical mass destruction weapons. It is on this particular aspect of the problem that serious difficulties can be expected. Any reduction in effort must carry the military judgment of the Supreme Allied Commanders; whereas the political authorities are justified in recommending the risks they are prepared to take in implementing the plans of the military authorities; i.e., keeping forces at fifty per cent strength. However it will be extremely difficult to persuade the Supreme Allied Commanders to draw up plans based on a smaller number of formations and be responsible for implementing those plans on short notice if the strategical situation changes. It is one thing to draw up a sound plan and have the political masters decide how far they will implement it; it is quite another to ask the military to draw up unsound plans to meet the political or economic requirements.

6. This plan could be brought into effect immediately and would avoid the serious embarrassment of requesting the Germans to reduce the number of formations to be provided before a start has been made on the implementation of the German plan. The second stage of the re-organization could take place progressively as the German forces are formed, with the ultimate aim of the European forces taking over increased responsibility for maintaining the "safety glass window" in Europe. In this way an effort should be made to have the forces stationed in or as near as possible to their own country. This may reduce the costs of maintenance of these forces. Such arrangements would allow the United States, Canada and Great Britain to withdraw considerable forces from Europe and these countries should give consideration to making proportionate contributions to the European countries for the maintenance of the forces in Europe either by mutual aid or other economic measures. It might even prove prudent for the United States and Canada to offer some assistance in maintenance costs to the United Kingdom in order to avert unilateral action which may start a series of public announcements which could spell the end of collective defence in Europe. At the same time the European countries should be given a greater share in the command, control and responsibility of the forces in Europe. This would mean that they should be represented on the Standing Group, and have a larger proportion of the command in both SHAPE and subordinate commands, with a considerable reduction of similar positions by the United States and the United Kingdom.

7. The limited reduction of conventional forces must also be accompanied by an increase in the number of tactical atomic weapons made available to the European partners. At present, under the existing United States law, the support of the forces in Europe by atomic tactical weapons, both missiles and bombs, must be handled by the U.S. detachments attached to European formations. This oblique support is not convincing enough to persuade the Europeans that they can count on this kind of support to replace the conventional weapons which now exist. This manner of providing atomic support creates some uneasiness as there is no assurance that it will be a continuing support if the United States decides to reduce its effort in Europe. Therefore it will be necessary for the United States to amend its laws and give a much wider interpretation of its security regulations so that the European partners can be assured of continuous tactical atomic support and eventually have this support in their own hands. Considerable feeling still exists in Europe that the United States treats the European forces as second-rate forces and complete confidence must be established that the Europeans can adequately defend their own frontiers without considerable external help.

Conclusions

1. Unless immediate action is taken to initiate a NATO reappraisal, most of the European partners will be forced into taking unilateral action and making such action public.
2. Any reappraisal must be based on the lessening of the threat and an agreement reached on the risks which can be taken.
3. Joint political and military authorities must decide the most appropriate and expeditious manner of translating political agreement on risks to be taken into economies to be obtained in the military field.
4. A searching enquiry should be undertaken into the best methods by which Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom can economically support the European nations; i.e., it is apparent that the funds the Canadian Government spends on maintaining a brigade in Europe could quite likely maintain a couple of European divisions. Therefore from an economical standpoint it would be of much greater help to the economy of the Alliance if Canada were to support the efforts of some other partner instead of maintaining forces in Europe at such extraordinary high costs.
5. A re-organization of the military structure should be undertaken immediately so as to give the European partners greater responsibility and a more adequate share of command and control of the forces in Europe.
6. Efforts should be made for the release of information, techniques and eventually the actual possession of tactical atomic weapons to the NATO partners.

COMMENT ON GENERAL FOULKES' NOTE ON REAPPRAISAL OF THE MILITARY REQUIREMENTS OF NATO

I assume that in your talk with Mr. Campney on Monday evening you will wish to take as the basis of discussion the note on the reappraisal of the military requirements of NATO prepared by General Foulkes for Mr. Campney, a copy of which he has sent to you as well as to Mr. Bryce, Mr. Miller and myself. (An extra copy is attached for ease of reference.) I have therefore thought it might be useful to prepare comment on each paragraph of General Foulkes' memorandum. In addition, you will find at the end of this paper some recommendations for decisions which you might wish to put to Mr. Campney in the course of the discussion.

2. As regards paragraph 1, we appear to be in agreement with National Defence that there should be a reappraisal of the military requirements of NATO and that member governments should authorize this reappraisal through the NATO Council, asking at the same time that member nations refrain from making unilateral statements on the reappraisal and of intentions to reduce their forces.

3. As regards paragraphs 2 and 3, where General Foulkes talks about the threat, we would agree that the starting point for such a reappraisal should be a re-examination of the nature of the threat. Likewise, we agree that the re-assessment should be a joint political-military effort. In making this re-examination it would be necessary to look, as General Foulkes suggests, at the constituent parts of the threat. But here it seems to us that General Foulkes does not refer to what would seem to be an essential part of such a re-assessment, namely the comparative increase in the relative threat against North America arising from the increased Soviet capability in atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons and the means of delivering them. Thus, the announced withdrawal of Soviet forces from Central Europe and of their intention to reduce their forces by 1,200,000 men while possibly further reducing the threat against Western Europe would not necessarily have an appreciable effect on the threat against North America and the possibility of air attack.

4. Any re-assessment should also bring out the point that a possible reason for arguing that the threat may have been reduced in Europe relatively to North America is the growth of air nuclear retaliatory power on both sides which has produced what Sir Winston Churchill has called "the balance of terror". An examination of the implications of this development may well lead to the conclusion that the shift in the centre of gravity of the NATO defence effort may be increasingly towards North America where the heart of the nuclear retaliatory power of the Alliance is located.

5. In paragraph 4 General Foulkes turns to a discussion of a re-assessment of the forces necessary to meet the changing threat. While this is a matter in which military opinion would necessarily have to be given greater weight, there seem to be two points which particularly require clarification by the military experts. First, assuming that it is correct that the Soviet nuclear capability continues to grow, what should the NATO powers do to match this capability which they are not doing in order to ensure that the nuclear deterrent capability of the allies is not weakened. General Norstad in the paper which General Foulkes attaches to his memorandum, admits that the military programmes based on a reduction in numbers but using reduced manpower with new weapons have not yet been achieved. One field in which some progress may well be necessary is referred to by General Foulkes in his paragraph 7, namely making tactical atomic weapons available to the European partners. Secondly, the military should clarify the relationship between the allied nuclear capability (i.e. SAC and the growing British air-nuclear power) and the "shield" or "trip-wire" defence concept for Western Europe.

6. In paragraph 5 General Foulkes discusses the adequacy of present force goals to implement existing NATO strategy under M.C.48. The important consideration here seems to us to be that, as long as the West maintains a capability of deterrence, a re-examination of the threat might lead to the conclusion that the possibility of attack is now considered less immediate than hitherto and that in some respects certain of NATO's military preparations might be deemed either unnecessary or allowed to run down. This particularly might apply to stockpiles if a 30-day nuclear war is what the military advisers reckon is the probable shape of the war to be planned against as a contingency for the NATO area. But this kind of alteration in NATO plans would hardly justify a substantial reduction in ground forces in Europe, at least the contribution to be expected from NATO's European members.

7. General Foulkes will have with him the details of present NATO force goals and the actual forces in being and committed to NATO. While General Gruenther has indicated that 30 divisions must be regarded as a minimum under revised plans (i.e. taking into account the use of nuclear weapons), the actual number of divisions on the central front is more like 15. Taking into account the absence of 12 German divisions and 3 French divisions moved from North Africa, the necessary forces could be provided for if present NATO programmes are implemented.

8. This leads to the question of whether NATO should try to implement the existing force goals including the German contribution or lower the force goals allocating the whole or part of the reduction of such goals to the German contribution (dealt with in paragraph 6). Here military and political considerations have to be considered in close relation to one another. Reduction of force goals before the German plan is implemented might indeed, as General Foulkes suggests, be an embarrassment to the Adenauer Government. On the other hand, it might be considered as an element for possible negotiations with the Russians over the question of German reunification and European security. On the other hand, a reduction of the German contribution has to be considered in relation to the pressures on the U.K., the U.S. and ourselves to reduce our forces on the continent of Europe, particularly as a result of the pressures on our respective governments to meet the increasing costs of air defence. In the case of the U.K., there is the question of the build-up of its retaliatory nuclear air power. In the case of the U.S. and ourselves, there are the growing demands for continental air defence. In this connection, General Foulkes has told us that he has received an explanation of Admiral Radford's reference to the possibility of reducing U.S. forces in Europe through General Sparling. It appears that the U.S. Chiefs have been examining this problem of the growing costs of continental air defence and have come up with several alternative ways of meeting it, including the possibility of reducing their forces in Europe. But we are assured that no official decisions have been taken which would contemplate such a reduction. The matter is only under consideration in Washington. This leads to the last point and that is that surely the Canadian Chiefs of Staff should likewise be examining various alternative ways of meeting the pyramiding costs of continental air defence and that the reappraisal of Canadian defence policy and forces can no longer be divorced from the reappraisal of NATO strategy and forces. (A copy of our memorandum of December 21, 1955,⁴⁸ in which this aspect of the problem is discussed, is attached.)

9. To sum up, I suggest that agreement should be reached with Mr. Campney on the following points:

(1) As regards the NATO military reappraisal:

- (a) that member governments agree that there should be a reappraisal of NATO's strategy and defence planning and should authorize that this reappraisal proceed forthwith;
- (b) that it should be carried out through the Permanent Representatives on the NATO Council in cooperation with SHAPE and the Standing Group;
- (c) that it should be based on a joint political-military re-assessment of the changing Soviet threat, including a consideration of its economic aspects and of the force goals necessary to meet it;
- (d) that recommendations on the re-assessed threat and force goals should be available to the regular annual meeting of Ministers to be held in December and to be considered by them together with the report of the Committee of Three on the re-assessment of the non-military activities of NATO and in relation to one another.

(A telegram to Mr. Wilgress incorporating these points is being drafted to be shown to the Department of National Defence in advance, in the hope that it could be agreed upon for immediate despatch to Paris in time to reach Mr. Wilgress for a discussion which is to take place in the Council on Tuesday, July 24 or Wednesday, July 25.)

(2) As regards the reappraisal of the future pattern of Canadian defence policy and of its forces:

- (a) that a concurrent reappraisal be conducted by the Chiefs of Staff and whatever working group is necessary be set up to which officials of this and other departments concerned might be added as required;
- (b) that this reappraisal should include consideration of the following questions of most direct concern to this Department:
 - (i) what priorities are to be assigned to air defence as against other Canadian defence commitments?
 - (ii) should Canada take the initiative in seeking to have the U.S. share the cost of air defence installations in Canada and if so on what basis?
 - (iii) are planning and command arrangements for the North American air defence adequate to protect Canadian interests and, if not, should Canada take the initiative to have these considered jointly with the U.S. authorities?
 - (iv) what provision should be made in the pattern of Canadian forces for the contingency of having to take part in a collective action to deal with a peripheral war initiated either by the U.S.S.R. or Communist China using conventional forces?⁴⁹

MINISTERS' DISCUSSION ON REAPPRAISAL OF NATO STRATEGY

Mr. Pearson and Mr. Campney met on the evening of Monday, July 23 in Mr. Campney's office in the House of Commons for discussion on:

- (a) the procedure to be followed in the reappraisal of NATO strategy; and
- (b) the substance of what might be the Canadian attitude to this reappraisal.

2. General Foulkes, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Miller, Mr. Wershof, Mr. Watkins and Mr. Ignatieff were also present.

3. As regards procedure, agreement was reached on the text of instructions to Mr. Wilgress for the discussion in the North Atlantic Council on Wednesday, July 25, as contained in telegram DLDL-56 of July 24, attached.

4. As regards the substance, Mr. Campney expressed some doubt as to how one could go about re-assessing the threat of attack with any certainty. The net military capability of the Soviet Union had not been reduced and he doubted that there had been any real change in Soviet intentions. Mr. Pearson pointed out that there had been some changes in the Soviet military capabilities even though their net military strength may not have been reduced; but these changes, such as the announced reduction of ground forces and the continuing growth of Soviet nuclear air power, justified a re-assessment. The latter surely had important implications for Canada. As regards Soviet intentions, there surely had been significant changes in Soviet policies and attitude, such as the withdrawal from Austria, changes in attitude to Yugoslavia and their bid for support for the uncommitted countries, to name just a few. A re-assessment therefore of the threat was obviously important. Some of the questions that should be looked into were set out in paragraph 4 of the message to Mr. Wilgress.

5. Most of the rest of the discussion was concerned with NATO's strategic concept of the deterrent and the role in this strategy of the nuclear air power of the United States and of the ground force "shield" in Europe. Mr. Pearson said that the real deterrent was the commitment that, if any one member of NATO were attacked, all the allies would retaliate including the United States. In other words, the deterrent really was the acceptance of a determined commitment on the part of the allies to act together. So long as any opponent realized that there was this determination, he would be deterred from aggression. In applying this principle, however, it was not clear to what extent the commitment to supply ground forces in Europe for the "shield" was a necessary element. He thought this problem should be further explored.

6. In reply, General Foulkes said that the purposes of the "shield" were several, including the following:

- (a) to cause the Russians in the event of attack to mass so that tactical atomic weapons could be used against them;
- (b) to give assurance to the Europeans that, if they were attacked, retaliatory power centred in North America would be used against the USSR.

The latter consideration was of the utmost importance for the Europeans needed the assurance of U.S. support to give them a feeling of security. On the other hand, it was important that they should also have a feeling of participation with the U.S. in common defence and this might be strengthened if some arrangements were made by the U.S. to share tactical atomic weapons with their European partners.

7. In the discussion, however, it was pointed out that an essential part of the deterrent was that the United States would be prepared to fulfil its guarantee of its European partners under Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty if they were attacked. With the growing Soviet nuclear air power, the question needed to be considered as to whether the U.S. would in fact be prepared to take action if faced with the choice of suffering a nuclear holocaust or allowing one of the Western European countries to succumb to Soviet attack. Such an attack might for instance be in a form calculated to avoid nuclear retaliation such as the use of East German forces against West German to seize Berlin. From this point of view it was important that the allies should retain strong enough conventional forces in Europe so that the "shield" might be adequate to deter Soviet military moves using conventional forces. The allies should avoid being placed in the position of having to make a choice between risking a nuclear holocaust or taking no action at all. It was also essential to aim at the preservation of united action, politically and militarily by NATO.

8. There was also some discussion on the ways and means of effecting economies in NATO and in this connection General Foulkes distributed a paper,[†] copy of which is attached.

9. It was agreed after the meeting that as a next step comment should be prepared for the guidance of Mr. Wilgress in Paris on the basis of General Foulkes' memorandum of July 17 entitled "Note on the Reappraisal of the Military Requirements of NATO". Mr. Bryce would prepare notes⁵⁰ on the comment prepared in the Department for Mr. Pearson in a memorandum dated July 20. When this comment is available, a revised paper on the reappraisal of military requirements of NATO should be prepared and circulated to General Foulkes and Mr. Bryce for clearance before despatch to Paris.

10. There was also some discussion on Lord Ismay's proposed statement on unilateral reduction of NATO forces. The Ministers agreed that it was undesirable for a statement to be issued which might draw attention to the controversy which has developed on this issue in the press. It would be preferable for the Council to avoid making any statement and to deal with the matter by coming to grips with the reappraisal without further delay, which should have the effect of restraining further unilateral statements on this matter until the reappraisal had been completed. A message[†] in this sense was drafted and despatched to Mr. Wilgress.

11. There was also some discussion about the U.K. Government's approach asking the Canadian Government to accept certain naval responsibilities in the Atlantic and Pacific and to continue manning two aircraft carriers.⁵¹ Mr. Campney, General Foulkes and Mr. Miller all indicated that the response would probably be in the negative, and that Lord Mountbatten had been so informed when he had discussed these matters with the Canadian Chiefs of Staff during his visit to Ottawa. Mr. Pearson recalled that the matter had been raised by Sir Anthony Eden with the Prime Minister and that, particularly in view of the past services rendered by the Royal Navy in the protection of Canadian interests at sea, the question should be given proper consideration. It was agreed that an interim reply should be drafted by Bryce for the Prime Minister, indicating that more information was required about the U.K. proposal and that the follow-up on this should be through the Chiefs of Staff level.

REAPPRAISAL OF NATO STRATEGY

1. The reappraisal of NATO military strategy and defence effort should be considered in relation to the "great debate" which has already started about the future of NATO and Ministers will wish to consider recommendation arising out of the military reappraisal together with the report of the Committee of Three when they meet in December and in relation to it. At this stage it is important to consider how to make this reappraisal an effective and productive exercise. Our thinking on some of the procedural aspects of the question has already been communicated to you to some extent in telegram DLDL-9 of July 4 and in a departmental memorandum dated July 10, copy of which was referred to you. These and further suggestions which have been discussed with National Defence are summarized below.

2. We believe that the Council should seek agreement on the following:

- (a) That a reappraisal of NATO strategy and defence effort should be authorized as a matter of urgency;
- (b) That it would be undesirable to have this reappraisal conducted in a manner which would give it unwelcome publicity and particularly which would be interpreted as proceeding from an intent to reduce NATO's military strength;
- (c) That it should be carried out through the Permanent Representatives on the NATO Council in cooperation with SHAPE, the Standing Group, and the other military representatives rather than being initiated by a special Ministerial meeting;
- (d) That it should be based on a joint political-military reassessment of the changing Soviet threat, including a consideration of its economic aspects and by the greatest possible utilization of tactical and strategic nuclear weapons work out the minimum forces to meet the reassessed threat;
- (e) That a report (including the evaluations which will have been prepared by the NATO military authorities, as reported in your telegram 1120 of July 16†), on the reassessed threat and force goals together with appropriate recommendations should be available to the Ministers when they consider the Annual Review and the report of the Committee of Three at the December Ministerial meeting;

(f) That in the meantime, it would facilitate the reappraisal if all member governments were asked to refrain from making public unilateral statements about it.

3. The Council should also offer necessary guidance to ensure that this year's Annual Review process is geared to the current reappraisal. It will be important to have an opinion from the military as to the time at which the earliest impact of the reappraisal on the Annual Review goals is likely to be effective. Presumably we should not expect the reappraisal to have been fully completed? And its results approved in time to affect the plans for 1957. This would mean presumably that for the rest of 1956 and for 1957, the assumptions and goals of MC.48 would remain operative, for the purpose of the current Annual Review.

4. The Council in agreeing on procedures for the military reappraisal should ensure that its reassessment of the threat is properly coordinated with the military. This reassessment should take into account the following questions:

(a) Has the recently announced decision of Soviet Russia to reduce its forces in Europe by 1,200,000 men amounted to any decrease of its military capabilities?

(b) What changes have there been in Soviet nuclear and air striking capabilities?

(c) What effect would such changes have on the likelihood of an attack in (a) Europe (b) North America?

(d) What implications may be drawn from Soviet capabilities on the likelihood of "limited wars" affecting the NATO area?

(e) Are we likely to get reliable enough estimates of the period of warning of attack to permit the running down of the NATO state of readiness?

5. I have no doubt that the military will think of other points which will need to be looked into before we can say that the threat has been fully reassessed. Further, I am inclined at present to think that it will be only on the basis of military answers to questions (a) and (b) above that the Permanent Council with its military advisers will be able to tackle the remaining questions, and in the light of these, report to the Ministerial Council in December whether the organization can afford to take a greater calculated risk in stating its continuing military requirements.

6. I would envisage the Ministers deciding whether the results of the reassessment would justify (a) a reduction or (b) a reorganization of the present military activities of the alliance or both.

7. Although we are open to suggestions as to how the reappraisal should best be handled by the Council, you may feel free to use the above suggestions in the Council discussions.

8. This telegram has been discussed today with Mr. Campney and the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff.

REAPPRAISAL OF NATO STRATEGY

Yesterday was the last regular meeting of the Council before the summer break, although we are having a meeting on July 31 to consider future infrastructure. Accordingly, I considered it desirable to take advantage of the private meeting following the regular meeting to raise the question of the reappraisal of NATO strategy on the basis of your telegram under reference.

2. I began by referring to the Norwegian proposal to hold a Ministerial meeting in September for this purpose. I said we still felt that this would give rise to undue publicity and that it was necessary that the ground should be thoroughly prepared beforehand by the Permanent Council. Moreover, it would be useful if the final report on this subject could be considered by the Ministers at the same time as they were dealing with the report of the Committee of Three. I then outlined the points upon which we felt agreement should be reached in Council, mentioning those given in paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference.

3. I then went on to say that we were not quite clear as to what instructions had actually been issued by the Standing Group to SACEUR, SACLANT and CHANCOM. We felt it was important that the NATO military authorities should undertake a through reappraisal along the lines I had indicated. I referred to the statement of the Standing Group Liaison Officer that a report was being prepared for a meeting of the Military Committee to be held in Washington in the middle of October and that I felt the Council should instruct the Standing Group to proceed with as much despatch as was consistent with their taking into account the points I had made. At the same time, the Council itself should give attention to the political and economic aspects with a view to coordinating what was being done by the military. I then referred to the relationship of this reappraisal to the Annual Review process and said I understood from previous statements by the Chairman of the Annual Review Committee and by SGLO that it might not be possible to incorporate any of the results in this year's Annual Review. I felt that this was another matter which required clarification.

4. At a later stage of the discussion I was able to bring out the points mentioned in paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference as illustrative of some of the questions we felt the reassessment should cover.

5. The Italian Representative intervened immediately following my remarks and said the approach of his government was different. They favoured the original proposal by Norway that a special Ministerial meeting be held in September when the Foreign Ministers come to Paris to meet with the Committee of Three. Public concern with this matter had now assumed such proportions that it would be inadvisable to postpone its consideration until December. This, of course, did not preclude examination of the problem by the Permanent Council in the meanwhile.

6. I may add, however, that the Italian and Norwegian positions seem now to be out of step with the attitude of the majority of governments. The Netherlands and UK Representatives said it was quite unrealistic to envisage that work entailed in a thorough political, economic and military reappraisal, as suggested by Canada and which they generally supported, could be completed in time for a Ministerial meeting in September. Moreover, the Norwegian Representative in a later intervention said that, while they still maintained their proposal, they realized that the majority of countries were not in favour of a September meeting and they would be prepared to go along with this majority view.

7. The UK Representative stressed the need for time to enable governments to clarify their own positions. He felt that the subject should be kept before the Council in order that governments may be able to put forward their views as they mature. The USA Representative took no part at any stage in the discussion.

8. The Standing Group Liaison Officer said that he understood that the evaluation being carried on at the instance of the Standing Group, while part of the normal military procedure of keeping strategy under constant review, was along the lines we had indicated. He was leaving for Washington at the end of this week when he would be able to go into this whole matter. He would be able to report to the Council when he returned around August 10. He would impress upon the Standing Group the urgency felt in the Council; the SGLO stated that he cannot be categorical now as to whether or not some of the military recommendations resulting from the reappraisal might be introduced into this year's Annual Review.

9. The Acting Chairman of the Annual Review Committee intervened to state that the Annual Review Committee would be meeting at the beginning of September and they could consider in what way the Annual Review process could be modified to take into account any current reassessment of the defence effort. Their general feelings was that it will not be possible to proceed on any other basis than that of present assumptions. At this stage, the UK Representative intervened to suggest that this year's Annual Review might be more in the nature of a stocktaking exercise.

10. It was finally agreed that the Council would keep this subject before it and a meeting would be arranged on August 14 or at an earlier date if Council found it necessary to meet to consider the reply expected from the Icelandic Government to Lord Ismay's letter. At that time, the SGLO will be able to make a full report on what he had learned in Washington. It was also agreed that when the Council resumes its normal routine at the beginning of September, it would discuss what should be done regarding the political and economic factors. It was thought that the working group on trends of Soviet policy might be called together with experts from the principal powers at an earlier date than envisaged to deal with the political aspects of the reassessed threat. Ordinarily they would be meeting just a few weeks prior to the December meeting. The Annual Review Committee will also be meeting early in September and the Council could direct them as to the character of an urgent report they should give regarding the effect of recent developments on this year's Annual Review. In the meantime, Permanent Representatives would seek the views of their governments on the various suggestions so far made in Council in order that further progress may be made at the Council meeting on August 14 and at subsequent meetings. An opportunity will be afforded for any statements any government would like to make at the meeting on July 31, which has been called to deal with future infrastructure.

11. Since the meeting was private and no records were kept, we have considered it desirable to circulate to all delegations except Iceland a mimeographed summary† of the various points I made during my interventions. SGLO in particular requested such a statement in order that he may be fully briefed for his conversations in Washington.

REAPPRAISAL OF NATO STRATEGY

The following for your information is repetition of first paragraph of Canada House message 1203 of September 3†:

"The Minister saw Mr. Lloyd yesterday morning. The conversation covered several subjects and Mr. Lloyd was accompanied by Mr. Nutting, Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick, Sir Christopher Steel and various foreign office experts. Mr. Pearson was accompanied by Mr. Pierce. The Minister led off with a brief account of the present status of the work of the Committee of Three and outlined the timetable for the Committee's work in Paris over the next fortnight. Mr. Lloyd then turned to the question of the reassessment of NATO military requirements in Europe and read a memorandum which is at present in draft form, but which, when finalized, the UK would hope the North Atlantic Council would accept as a directive to the NATO military authorities. This memorandum begins with a political appraisal which (a) rules out the likelihood of global war; (b) reiterates the West's intention, if the Soviet Government does commit an identified act of aggression against NATO territory, to launch a full scale attack on Russia with thermo-nuclear weapons; (c) accepts the fact that Soviet long term aims remain unchanged and that Soviet attempts, by economic and political means, to undermine the position of the West outside the NATO area will be strongly increased; (d) assumes that Soviet political and economic efforts will be supplemented by indirect military action where this seems to be to their advantage; and concludes that the more subtle and insidious Soviet threat makes it all the more necessary for NATO to maintain its alertness and solidarity. On the basis of this political assessment, the UK draft directive recommends that the military forces maintained by NATO (which must be within the economic capacity of the Alliance) should be the minimum needed to meet the following requirements (i) to keep confidence in the military effectiveness of the NATO defence organization; and to prevent external intimidation, (ii) to deal with local infiltrations and incursions, (iii) to enable Soviet or satellite aggression to be identified as such; and to deal with a satellite attack, (iv) to secure the radar facilities required for the full use of the strategic bomber force. The paper concludes "The NATO military authorities should reassess the size, composition and disposition of NATO forces in accordance with the above political directive."

REAPPRAISAL OF NATO STRATEGY

When the Council meets on September 12 to discuss NATO military planning, we think it important that such momentum as the reappraisal exercise has acquired should be maintained. For this reason, and having in mind German apprehensions lying behind their decision to call the forthcoming WEU Ministerial meeting, we believe that the Council should continue to show an active interest in the reappraisal of NATO strategy.

2. You have suggested two possible courses of action which might form the basis of the Canadian position at tomorrow's meeting and we assume that you will have discussed these with Mr. Pearson. For our part we do not think that we should again take the initiative at this time unless it should appear to you that, without an intervention on your part, unsatisfactory progress would be made in the matter.

3. We think the best solution would be to have the United Kingdom draft memorandum referred to in our telegram DLDL-192 of September 4 serve as the basis on which the Council could formulate a political directive for the military authorities. We realize that this draft, from Mr. Lloyd's statement, will require a revision of the defensive aims of NATO as stated in MC48. We consider that any such revision should be in accordance with our thinking as given in DLDL-180 of August 30.† The difficulty in connection with the UK paper is of course that we cannot initiate discussion on it nor do we know whether other NATO members are even aware of its existence. Perhaps you can find out what UK intentions are with respect to the use of their draft. We feel that, if the United Kingdom is prepared to table the document in the Council within, say, about two weeks, this should be sufficient to maintain the momentum of reappraisal. We would like you to discuss with the Minister the possibility of using the paper as the point of departure in the Council for preparing fresh political and economic guidance for the military authorities based on a reassessment of the Soviet threat.

4. If it proves impossible to have mentioned in the Council that a UK paper is due in about two weeks which should form a most useful basis for a political directive, and if no other delegation makes a move to take the initiative with regard to reappraisal, then we think it would be desirable for you to intervene again and propose that the Council undertake a reassessment of the political and economic guidance now being used by the Standing Group and the military authorities and you might suggest that this task be entrusted to the Working Group on Trends in Soviet Policy or some other working group organized for this purpose. On the whole we would prefer that a move of this kind be proposed by another delegation since it was Canada which pioneered in this matter and we do not feel we should persistently lead the pack.

5. We would like to know if you will require further views from us in advance of the WEU meeting Friday. You might indicate your wishes in this respect when you inform us who the Canadian observer will be.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

At this morning's private session of the Council, the question was raised by the Italian Representative as to the advisability of informing NATO members of the discussion that took place last Saturday in WEU. Alessandrini realized that the discussion was of importance to NATO but was not clear as to the procedure that should be followed. The Norwegian Representative said that the communiqué issued after the WEU meeting mentioned the fact that the Secretariat had been asked to prepare a paper on the problems discussed and that he thought that this document should be made available to NATO. The UK and other representatives agreed that the transmission of this document to NATO would be desirable. It was finally decided that Alessandrini would inform the Chairman of WEU, Mr. Martino, of the general desire on the part of members of Council to be fully informed regarding the WEU discussion. As Chairman of the WEU, Martino would probably issue instructions to the Secretariat to make this info available through Lord Ismay to the members of the Council.

2. The Belgian Representative took this opportunity to say that there was perhaps a lesson to be drawn from the WEU discussion. While the NATO Council had been seized with this problem for some time, it had not yet been able to discuss seriously the political aspects of the NATO military reappraisal. The WEU Council, he felt, had gone further in discussing these problems than the NATO Council. Following Mr. De Staercke's remarks, I said that we, too, in attending the WEU meeting had been conscious of the fact that NATO was lagging behind in considering the wider implications of the NATO military reappraisal. We feared that time is running short if we wish to conduct the necessary political preparations prior to the December Ministerial meeting. For our part, we are not desirous of submitting further proposals for political guidance as our understanding has been that other governments intended to submit proposal. While waiting for other delegations to receive instructions, we felt that one aspect could be taken in hand without delay. We therefore suggested that Council should instruct the Working Group on Trends of Soviet Policy to prepare for Council consideration a paper on the changes in the form and implications of Soviet intentions which would constitute an up-to-date appreciation of the Soviet threat looked at from a political standpoint. My Belgian colleague fully concurred.

J.A. McCordick

3. While agreeing with our suggestion, the Dutch Representative said that the study of the Working Group might be facilitated if we had a firm starting point. He was wondering, therefore, whether some authoritative statement could be obtained that a "shield" force is an essential requirement to NATO defence policy. Mr. Perkins said that he did not see how one particular aspect of the reappraisal could be isolated in this manner. He further elaborated on his thought by saying that the necessity of retaining conventional forces was not under dispute. The real problem was to determine at what level conventional forces should be maintained.

4. The French Representative on the whole favoured the Dutch approach as the problem was so complex that we should at least have some firm principles to guide our study.

5. De Staercke said that the core of the problem was, how to utilize most advisedly, in the light of our present assessment of the Soviet threat, the limited military resources available to governments. As he understood it, this had been the approach in the WEU meeting. Quite rightly Von Brentano had recalled that the Paris Treaty determines the level of forces that the UK, for example, are prepared to maintain on the continent. Brentano's line of reasoning was that there are now rumours that the UK government intends to withdraw or reduce these forces. If such an eventuality is to materialize the WEU and NATO partners are entitled to know how this weakening of the NATO defence is to be compensated. If it is to be compensated by the use of atomic weapons, then the implication should be that the control of these weapons should not be the exclusive responsibility of two NATO powers, namely, the UK and the USA, but should come under the authority of the Supreme Commander.

6. When asked by De Staercke whether the UK government intended to produce its promised paper on the various implications of the NATO military reappraisal, the UK Representative said that he was not yet in a position to say when his government would make its views known.

7. Finally, our suggestion that the Working Group on Trends of Soviet Policy be asked to prepare a paper on the basis of the proposal we made in Council on July 25, was approved. Mr. Parodi suggested a private meeting of the Council within the next few days which will discuss the broad outline that such a paper might follow. He said, for instance, that one of the questions that should retain our attention is whether atomic warfare is the only kind of war we should prepare for. There is no doubt in his mind that this concept is now outdated.

8. The Working Group on Trends of Soviet Policy will have a preliminary meeting next Friday and we shall, of course, keep you informed of its work.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

The Working Group met on Friday as scheduled to have a preliminary discussion on the preparation of a paper on "Changes in the Forms and Implications of Soviet Intentions". As we had made this proposal in the Council we were asked to amplify what we had in mind. We therefore put some views forward in a tentative way based on your general instructions, pointing out that the actual form of the proposed paper had not yet been studied in detail in Ottawa. As we conceived it at this stage, however, the objective of the proposed paper was not to dwell on Soviet intentions in the sense of offering speculative ideas as to what the leaders of the Soviet Bloc might do. We rather saw this paper as offering an opinion as to what the Soviet might logically be expected to do on the basis of a political assessment of Soviet policy and guided by their own interests. The purpose of the paper was to estimate, as far as possible, the real nature of the Soviet threat. We were not using the word "threat" in its military connotation but rather in its political sense. This paper, in our opinion, should provide, if possible concise political guidance to the NATO military authorities by analysing the nature of the threat facing the members of the Alliance. We realized that the analysis of the Soviet threat from a political point of view was being done to a certain extent in the annual paper produced by the Working Group on Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy but this year, the paper should concentrate on changes that have occurred in the nature of this threat which would seem to have a bearing on the current reappraisal of our military planning.

2. Starting from these premises we said, very tentatively at this stage and just for the purpose of initiating the discussion, that the proposed paper might take the following form. A first section would dwell on the unchanged element of Soviet policy. It could consist of an analysis of the most recent authoritative statement made by Soviet leaders, showing that the ultimate aims of the Soviets remain unchanged. The second section of the paper might review the important changes that have taken place in the Soviet Bloc since the death of Stalin. This section might analyse in practical terms the doctrine of coexistence as propounded by the Soviets and the manner in which it has been implemented in various fields. It might also try to draw some conclusions from the important internal developments in the USSR as reflected in the Khrushchev speech.⁵³ The third section of the paper and the most difficult one, would try to define as precisely as possible the present nature of the Soviet threat and the form that this threat may assume on the basis of the new situation that has arisen. This third section might review the three main forms that the Soviet threat could assume. One would be the possibility that the Soviets might launch a global war. The paper should try to identify the advantages and the disadvantages, from a political point of view, for the Soviets to start a general conflict. The second possibility is that the Soviet threat might take the form of peripheral wars. The paper might study whether this type of tactic would be the best way for the Soviets to attain their objectives and what particular geographical areas are considered dangerous by governments at this time. Thirdly, the paper might study the possibility that the Soviet threat will assume essentially the form of subversive activities, propaganda, political and economic penetration in the NATO countries and in the non-NATO area. From the political information available to governments at the present time, what are the areas likely to become Soviet targets?

3. We ended up our remarks by saying that if a paper were produced along these lines it might be able to throw some light on the nature of the political threat posed by the Soviets and which the members of the Alliance have to cope with. Our thought was that it would then be for the military strategists to evolve specific plans to deal with the situation.

4. No other delegation was in a position to offer precise views as to how this paper should be organized. The USA Representative said that at the moment his instructions were only that a Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy paper as produced annually for the Ministerial meeting is warranted. He did not think that Washington was necessarily against making a rather pointed political assessment such as that we had outlined but his authorities have not yet considered the matter closely. The UK Representative was much in the same position. He said that the usual annual paper on Trends should be produced perhaps with some alteration but for the moment he could not offer suggestions as to what form it should take. There was some discussion in the Working Group as to whether the title of the proposed paper should be different from that of the annual paper produced by the Working Group. The USA, UK and Italian delegations thought that the usual title should be retained. Some other delegations felt, and we shared their views, that it was unrealistic to discuss the title of the paper before we knew exactly what its contents will be.

5. It was generally felt also that because of the special nature of the proposed paper it should probably assume this year the form of an "agreed" paper on the grounds that it was very difficult for the political division of the Secretariat to assume the responsibility of preparing a paper touching on such delicate matters. Finally, it was agreed that the Working Group will meet in a week's time and in the meanwhile delegations would obtain the views of their authorities on the general nature and, if possible, the specific topics that might be mentioned in the paper. It is hoped that some governments might even go further and produce a first rough draft that could be used as a basis for further discussion.

6. As we have taken the initiative of making this proposal we should appreciate receiving your views on the general outline mentioned above and, indeed, any other suggested outline that you would think preferable. We are not, of course, committed to the ideas that we put forward as it was clearly understood that these were only put forward to elicit the views of other governments and provide some basis for the discussion of the Working Group. The hope is that by next week delegations will have been able to obtain the reactions of their governments and that we might be able to see more clearly the nature of the paper that governments would like to see prepared. Mention was also made during the discussion of the possibility that, because of the character of this exercise, governments might wish to send some of their political experts to Paris to conduct this work. It is perhaps too early to see whether this would be warranted and depending on the outcome of the forthcoming discussion in the Working Group we should probably reserve our judgment on this point.

7. It was generally realized in the Working Group that if such a paper as envisaged is to be produced it would have to be ready as soon as possible in order that the political guidance it will contain might be taken into account in the military planning that is now under way. The most optimistic target date, according to the Secretariat, taking into account the fact that governments would want to consider this matter carefully, was November 15. This means that the Working Group will meet three times, that is, next week, October 10 and towards the end of October. The intervening periods would be used to allow time for consultations with governments. We should therefore appreciate receiving your preliminary views as to how this exercise should be conducted and on the possible contents of this paper in time for the next meeting of the Working Group scheduled for Friday next.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

We think that the general outline which you have proposed would be very suitable.

2. It is suggested that the title of the proposed paper be amended to read simply "An Appraisal of Soviet Intentions".

3. As regards the approach to the subject, you might suggest that the evidence relative to intentions is not only what the Soviet government has said and is saying, but also what it has done and is doing in both the domestic and foreign fields. An analysis of Soviet conduct, to be penetrating, ought really to look at this in the perspective of at least the last ten years.

4. The suggestions made above would apply primarily to Section II as you have envisaged this. The evidence relevant to the intentions of a State would seem to fall under these broad categories; politics, economics and defence. You might wish to consider the possibility of a careful summary in this section of the direction of all the relevant developments under each of these three headings. When this has been done, this section might then inquire what intentions on the part of the USSR these developments seem to imply.

5. There might then be a case for an additional section which would integrate the conclusions on Soviet intentions reached in Section II, before proceeding to the third section which you have suggested.

6. We would hope that Section I would consist of more than just an analysis of Soviet pronouncements on their foreign policy aims, and that there might be a real distinction between ultimate aims according to unadulterated Soviet theory, and the practical short-term aims of the present leaders.

7. Implied in all this is the suggestion that the task of the paper be rigidly confined to intentions.

8. Section III of the outline might then be amended to read something like this:

"Section III: This would try to define as precisely as possible the present nature of Soviet intentions in the international field and the form in which these intentions might manifest themselves in Soviet policies and actions. This section might review the three main lines along which Soviet policy could develop in the light of the fresh appreciation of Soviet intentions:

(i) The possibility that Soviet intentions, coupled with what in Soviet opinion would be a sufficient military capability, might lead to the launching of a global war. The paper should try to identify the advantages and disadvantages for the Soviets to start a general conflict.

(ii) On the assumption that the Soviet Bloc has the capability of waging successful peripheral wars, they might use this means of implementing their intentions. The paper might study whether this tactic would be the best way for the Soviets to attain their objectives and what particular geographical areas are considered dangerous by governments at this time.

(iii) The possibility that Soviet tactics will assume essentially the form of subversive activities, propaganda, political and economic penetration in the NATO countries and in the non-NATO area. On the basis of the political info available to governments at present the paper might attempt to define the areas most likely to become Soviet targets."

9. In preparing subparas (ii) and (iii) of Section III above we consider that these should not be dealt with in isolation from each other since we would anticipate the probable use of both methods at the same time in different areas.

10. Ultimately the nub of the problem in reappraising the level of NATO forces is to determine what that critical level is. It appears to us that if the level of forces drops below whatever the critical level may be it may prove inviting for the Soviet Union to use the weapon of local war or military and political blackmail within the NATO area without running a real risk of this leading to atomic attack on the Soviet Union. The mere reiteration by NATO of its willingness to use its deterrent atomic power might not in some circumstances convince the Soviet Union that it would in fact be used and the awkward problem would then be posed to the Western Powers whether in the event of local conflict they would use it. It might be best if this latter thought were not expressed in these terms to the Council itself at this time but perhaps you would bear it in mind in any discussions you may have.

11. General Foulkes has seen this telegram and has commented as follows: "It is hoped that the approach which you have suggested, together with the above suggestions, would go far in assessing the probability of war within certain time limits which would enable the Council to decide whether they were justified in accepting risks which would allow the military authorities to reduce their present forces or standards of readiness, or holding of reserves of ammunition and logistics, etc. If such risks are justified, it is also important that a period of time should be established during which these assumptions are valid, (without any qualification or miscalculation) as any decisions taken on reductions take time to produce economic results. Furthermore the scope and character of the probable reductions will vary sharply with the extent of the period under review". It appears to us that this particular problem which General Foulkes has raised would best be dealt with when the Intentions paper and the Standing Group's studies have been completed, so that the Council can reach a judgment on the nature of the threat and on the risks which attach to the maintenance of any particular level of forces.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL — UK DRAFT PAPER

Following is text of revised UK draft paper on NATO military reappraisal:

A review of NATO Defence Planning is required in order to determine how, within the resources likely to be available, the defence effort of the Alliance and of each individual member can best be adjusted to achieve the most effective pattern of forces in the light of current developments notably

- (i) development of thermo nuclear weapons
- (ii) the new Soviet tactics
- (iii) the mounting costs of new weapons.

2. It is evident that since the death of Stalin and the detonation of their own thermo nuclear bombs, the Soviet government have re-examined their tactics and strategy. They now appreciate fully the disastrous consequences to Russia of a thermo nuclear attack, and they also appreciate that even after they have attained parity with the West in bombs and means of delivery, this will not affect our ability to devastate their country. It will therefore be their policy to avoid global war, and as global war will not be initiated by NATO, it must be regarded as unlikely.

3. If nevertheless, the Soviet government do commit an identified act of aggression against NATO territory, it must always be understood that the West would at once launch a full scale attack on Russia with thermo nuclear weapons.

4. Soviet long term aims will however remain unchanged. In Europe, the main Soviet objective will continue to be disruption of the solidarity achieved in NATO and WEU. At the same time, Soviet attempts by both economic and political means to undermine the position of the West outside the NATO area, notably in the Middle East, Southeast Asia, and Africa will be strongly increased.

5. It must be assumed that Soviet efforts in the political and economic fields will be supplemented by indirect military action where this seems to them to be to their advantage. This might take the form of action by the satellite or other hostile powers, with Soviet moral or covert military support. We must also expect Soviet-inspired subversive movements, either with or without covert military support e.g. by volunteers.

6. In this new phase of competitive co-existence, the members of the Alliance must show flexibility in their thinking and their dispositions, so as to put their available resources to most effective use in meeting the Soviet threat in its various and changing forms on a world front. Thus the NATO defence effort must be so adjusted as to enable member countries to fulfil also their defence commitments in other areas; and despite the rising cost of weapons overall defence expenditure must be kept at a level which will give the members of the Alliance the necessary margin of economic strength to compete with the Soviet threat in all its aspects, without endangering their economic stability which in itself is an essential element of their security.

7. Apart from forces for the strategic air offensive, the military forces maintained by NATO should be the minimum needed to meet the following requirements in the NATO area:

(i) to keep confidence in the military effectiveness of the NATO defence organisation; and to prevent external intimidation

(ii) to deal with local infiltrations and incursions

(iii) to enable Soviet or Satellite aggressive intentions at sea, on land, or in the air to be identified as such; to provide a shield against a Satellite attack; and to hold an identified Soviet aggression until the strategic counter offensive becomes effective

(iv) to secure the radar facilities required for the full use of the strategic bomber forces.

8. The atomic capability with which NATO forces will be armed (over and above that provided by the Strategic Air Forces) will be used in the event of aggression whether by Russia or her satellites.

9. The NATO military authorities should re-assess the size, composition and disposition of NATO forces in accordance with the above political direction.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL — UK DRAFT PAPER

We have looked at the UK paper first of all from the point of view of where it fits into the whole reappraisal exercise. Our understanding of what now seems to be under way is a reappraisal which already includes the following elements or stages:

(a) Four military studies, namely two Standing Group studies, one SACEUR study and one SACLANT study. (We have recently received a draft of the first Standing Group paper, entitled "Overall Strategic Concept for the Defence of the North Atlantic Treaty Area". All four studies are based on "Current Political and Economic Guidance Furnished by the Council", which turns out to be an amalgam of guidance provided since 1949 but not reviewed in connection with the present reappraisal.)

(b) A fresh appreciation of Soviet intentions, now being undertaken by the Working Group on Trends of Soviet Policy.

(c) An assessment of the nature and magnitude of the Soviet threat derived from a collation of the appreciation of Soviet intentions mentioned in (b) and the appreciation of Soviet capabilities which the studies mentioned in (a) should provide.

(d) A political and economic directive, based on (c), from the Council to the military authorities. This should also give guidance on the "risks" NATO can run.

(e) A revised formulation by the NATO military authorities of the NATO strategy needed in the light of assessment (c) and directive (d).

2. The most unsatisfactory aspect of stage (a) is that the studies therein suffer from using out-dated political and economic guidance; this is largely because of the mechanical separation of the preparation of the military appreciations and the political guidance which should underly them. These two processes should be related so that in December the Ministers will have drafts to work on in which up-to-date military, political and economic considerations are brought together. One of our impressions of the first Standing Group paper, "Overall Strategic Concept for the Defence of the North Atlantic Treaty Area" (short-titled MC14/2) is that it suffers from being based on older guidance, whereas ideally it should have followed stage (d) or at least have had the benefit of stage (c).

3. The UK draft seems to fit into stage (d). It assumes the completion of stages (a), (b) and (c) and thus takes a great deal for granted regarding Soviet capabilities, intentions and the threat resulting from combining intentions and capabilities. In our view it will also have to be related to the political considerations governing European defence put forward in WEU. Although this draft anticipates three as yet uncompleted stages of the reappraisal, it might constitute a useful working paper for the Council which will soon have to tackle stage (d). We have therefore also examined the paper from this point of view and have the following comments to make on its contents:

(1) Paragraph 2 of the draft contains the assumption that mutual atomic deterrence makes global war unlikely, a further implicit assumption being that global war would be fought with thermo-nuclear weapons. This seems to discard too lightly the possibility of a limited yet serious attack with "conventional" weapons which is dealt with in paragraph 5. Such an attack could (but not necessarily would) lead to the eventual use of atomic weapons. Paragraph 5 mentions some of the forms of action which might be undertaken with "conventional" weapons. Such actions might be countered in kind but they could spark a general conflagration using atomic weapons. When the paper is redrafted, consideration should be given to tying paragraphs 2 and 5 closer together.

(2) Paragraph 3 raises a very important issue and requires most careful thought. It does not seem realistic to lay down the unqualified assumption that any "identified Soviet aggression" will call forth immediate thermo-nuclear retaliation, with the certainty of a Soviet response in kind. The expression "an identified act of aggression" needs careful definition in the context of provoking an atomic reaction. For instance, would the members of the Alliance, and particularly the USA, agree to the triggering off of atomic warfare in the event of an attack by East German forces against Berlin?

(3) In paragraph 4 it is stated that "Soviet long-term aims will however remain unchanged". This begs the first half of the question of the reassessment of Soviet intentions and ignores the other half, Soviet shorter-term aims, between which there might be a real distinction. This part of the draft will have to be revised in the light of the completion of stage (b) above.

(4) Paragraph 6 stresses that the members of the Alliance must show flexibility in their thinking and their dispositions. This is desirable, but flexibility must be accompanied by closer consultation; otherwise the Alliance would be in no better position to meet the changing forms of the Soviet threat.

(5) "The necessary margin of economic strength to compete with the Soviet threat in all its aspects", also mentioned in paragraph 6, lends itself to very subjective interpretations, and will not be easy to define in the case of each member country in a way which will be acceptable both to the country concerned and to the Alliance as a whole. However, the point is valid and will have to be given due consideration.

(6) In paragraph 7 (iii) there is a clause which says that a minimum NATO requirement is to be able "to hold an identified Soviet aggression until the strategic counter offensive becomes effective". Assuming that it may take up to 30 days' hammering of cities and bases in the Soviet Union to have an effect on the advancing Soviet forces in Europe, something more than a "trip-wire" will be necessary for a shield. If it is the recognized aim of NATO to hold rather than retard a Soviet aggression, then any idea of a "trip-wire" strategy would have to be discarded, since forces able to hold a Soviet advance would obviously have to be substantial.

4. The UK paper and these preliminary comments have not yet been considered by the Chiefs of Staff. We will be sending you their views in due course.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL: UK REVISED DRAFT PAPER

Pritchard has now given us a revised UK draft of a political directive to the NATO military authorities, reflecting certain views expressed on the previous draft in Washington. In its present form this draft paper, Pritchard said, is "generally acceptable" to the US authorities and is to be tabled in the NATO Council this Friday.

2. Explaining the nature of the consultations which have taken place in Washington, Pritchard emphasized that the present draft was not to be regarded as a joint product since the US authorities were anxious not to give the impression that the draft political directive was the product of "a discriminatory collusion of a small group within NATO". The draft to be tabled therefore is to be still regarded as a UK draft and is to be discussed in NATO as such. It will apparently be shown only to the French and Germans (apart from ourselves) in advance of the meeting. Pritchard again requested, however, that we should not admit having advance knowledge of the paper in discussing this draft with representatives of other governments.

3. The main changes suggested by the US authorities were as follows:

(1) Paragraphs 3 and 8 of the old draft seemed to imply that a decision had been made in NATO to authorize the use of atomic weapons at the outset of any war, whereas MC48 only authorized the possibility of their use as a planning assumption, reserving the decision to use atomic weapons to member governments. Apparently Mr. Dulles attached sufficient importance to this point to speak to Mr. Selwyn Lloyd about it in New York and changes were consequently made to paragraphs 3 and 8 to make the language more in accordance with MC48.

(2) In paragraph 2 the US queried the very emphatic way in which the previous UK draft had stated that it was Soviet policy to avoid global war. While apparently they were inclined to agree with the UK that under conditions of atomic stalemate global war was less likely, it was the US view that the possibility of Soviet aggression should not be ruled out quite as categorically as it was in the previous draft.

(3) The third point which the US queried was in paragraph 6 with its reference to defence commitments in non-NATO areas. The US asked whether the UK was suggesting that a higher priority should now be given to the defence effort outside the NATO area. The UK apparently replied that they did not intend raising as a new problem the proposal that defence commitments in other areas should be given a higher priority; all they wanted was to emphasize the need for flexibility in the NATO defence effort. Accordingly, a sentence was inserted to the effect that the defence of NATO remains the primary task.

4. Finally Pritchard said that in view of the fact that the UK Permanent Representative in NATO would table the UK draft political directive in the Council on Friday, the UK Representative at the NATO Military Committee in Washington was being instructed to reserve his position on the approval of the NATO strategic guidance paper under consideration in that committee until the NATO Council had considered the political directive to which the NATO strategic paper should be related. Pritchard said the UK authorities hope that the Canadian Representative on the Military Committee would likewise ask for postponement of the approval of the NATO strategic guidance paper pending consideration by the Council of the draft political direction to the NATO military authorities.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL: SACEUR'S REPORT SHAPE/230/56
SEPT 28/56

Although it is not for us to criticize the military argumentation of SACEUR's paper it strikes us as a logical and competent study within its terms of reference. However, the political terms of reference are the older guidance on which the MC48 series is based referred to in paragraph 1(a) of our DLDL-300. In the absence of agreement on new political assumptions to be incorporated in the Political Directive for the Guidance of NATO Military Planning, there is no agreed basis for commenting on the political implications of SACEUR's or the other NATO military planning papers.

2. We believe, therefore, that the new political and economic guidance for the military authorities towards which the Council is working must come first, if the military papers in final form are to be realistic and are to constitute a genuine reappraisal of NATO strategy in the new circumstances. We feel that the Council should press on with the elaboration of a new political directive and that this directive should take into account the conclusions of the intentions paper being prepared by the Working Group. More precisely, we would like to see the appreciation of Soviet intentions collated with an appreciation of Soviet capabilities and the resulting assessment of the Soviet threat form an essential part of the directive. In practice the procedure suggested in your telegram 1749 seems to us a good way of approaching the problem. In case any of your colleagues should think that we are introducing an extra stage into the exercise by speaking of an assessment of the threat to follow the appreciation of intentions, we should like to emphasize that we regard this as an essential element in the reappraisal rather than as a separate stage in time. The difficult thing is to assess Soviet intentions. Soviet capabilities are obviously much better known and indeed form part of the background of SACEUR's paper and the Standing Group paper. However, it should be a relatively short operation to produce a statement of the threat reflecting both Soviet intentions and capabilities for use in drawing up political and economic guidance. (Incidentally, it is our view that the assessment of the threat should show an increasing threat to the North American area of NATO, due largely to steadily growing Soviet air-atomic capabilities.)

3. The UK draft guidance paper would, we believe, be a useful starting point for discussions in the Council leading ultimately to an agreed directive. We note, however, that in its revised form (our DLDL-342 October 17[†]) the paper has become even closer to the MC48 concept and its underlying assumptions. It is of course conceivable that the reassessment of the threat and other considerations could lead to a political directive little different from that underlying the MC48 series, but it is important that this reassessment be made and be incorporated in the new directive. Among the other new considerations we have in mind are the important political arguments put forward at the recent WEU meeting and summarized in your telegram 1524 September 17,[†] which we believe must be fully taken into account in the new political directive.

4. To sum up, we should like to see, as the next step, the Council agree on a new directive for NATO military planning for the elaboration of which you have outlined in your telegram 1749 what seems to us to be an expeditious procedure. This directive should also indicate what risks the Alliance is prepared to take in achieving the aims which the directive will set forth. It should then, in our opinion, be given to the military authorities so that the Standing Group, SACEUR and SACLANT papers could be recast in its light.

5. If your colleagues are agreeable to concentrating now on the political directive, we should be grateful to have your opinion on the possibility or likelihood of the directive being ready in time to enable the military studies to be properly revised and made available to the Ministers for their consideration in December. It seems to us that time is getting very short and that it may not be possible to have more than the political directive ready for the December meeting, but of course we hope that the original aim of making revised strategic papers available for the December meeting can also still be achieved.

6. We will be reviewing the problems raised by the military reappraisal with General Foulkes next week when he returns from the meetings of the Military Committee and it would therefore be helpful to have your comments if possible by Monday or Tuesday.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

The purpose of the special meeting of the Council this morning was to enable the UK Representative to table his political directive paper relating to the current NATO military reappraisal.

2. Before this was done, however, the Council heard a brief report from Mr. Casardi, Chairman of the Working Group on Trends of Soviet Policy, regarding the work of his group (see our telegram 1749 October 17†). It was agreed that the Council need not decide whether the Working Group paper on Soviet intentions should be only discussed within the Council itself before the governments had in fact seen the draft paper prepared by the experts of the Working Group. The governments are requested to send in their comments on the Working Group draft paper before October 30. If it is then considered by the Council that the comments of the governments entail a substantial revision of the Working Group paper the Group might be asked to reconvene again. Otherwise the further discussion of the Working Group paper would take place within the Council itself in connection with the discussion of the UK paper and other papers regarding political guidance. This latter course of action, as you already know, is strongly favoured by the UK.

3. The USA representative opened the discussion on the UK paper by saying that he was not prepared to discuss it in detail at this stage as obviously these important problems will have to be thoroughly considered in Washington. His understanding was that this morning we could only hope to obtain clarification on some of the points of the UK paper. Sir Christopher was asked where he thought his paper fitted in the order of procedure we had suggested regarding the conduct of the current military reappraisal. (We are sending you for your records the text of the memo† we submitted to the Council on October 16.)⁵⁴ The UK representative said that they considered their paper as a possible basis of discussion for Stage III mentioned in our memo. This does not mean that our two first stages are overlooked but, in the UK view, the consideration of the basic papers to be submitted to the Council as well as the discussion of the political factors involved in such a reassessment should necessarily be somewhat parallel. The UK representative saw advantage in having their paper introduced at an early stage in order that the Council may have clear in mind the ultimate objective of the exercise.

4. When prodded further on this point, the UK Representative said that we should not overestimate the importance of the basic military papers for the purpose of the present exercise because all along we have known the Soviet military capabilities. We know that these capabilities are no less dangerous today than they have been in the past, that they can be deployed in all directions in various forms, and that the basic fact is that the Soviets will soon reach atomic parity with the USA. In short, his contention was that governments already have the necessary military background info to prepare a political directive. This UK point of view gave rise to some discussion as several permanent representatives disagreed that all relevant military factors were already available. The Dutch Representative suggested that the Council hold a combined meeting with the military before finalizing its work but there was no support for this idea and it was agreed that the consultation with the military would take place in each national capital in connection with the formulation of their views on the UK paper.

5. Both the French and the Norwegian said that they agreed with the Canadian outline of the various procedural steps that should be taken to conduct the current NATO military reappraisal although they thought it wise not to freeze the procedure before some of the substantive thinking on these important issues was better known.

6. Speaking on his paper, the UK Representative said that NATO military strategy so far had been based on the possibility of World War III. The military in their thinking had not considered the hypothesis where each side could destroy each other so to speak by pressing push-buttons. The radically new element is that the USA are now subject to nuclear bombardment by Russia. To this assertion the USA Representative immediately said that this was perhaps an over-simplification. In fact, military planning has taken this responsibility into account.

7. Referring to sub-paragraph (iii) of paragraph 7 of the UK draft, particularly to the phrase starting with the words "and to hold an identified Soviet aggression etc.", the UK Representative stated that their document was a political one and therefore they had not made any attempt to assess how long this period will be. This is a problem for the military to work out. Quite an extensive discussion developed on this point. The French Representative asked whether this phrase meant that the hitherto accepted doctrine that the shield forces should be strong enough to provide a "durable defence of Europe" was now being abandoned in favour of a concept whereby the shield forces would be strong enough only to delay a possible Soviet offensive until the strategic counter-offensive could be effected. Pressed to clarify his position the UK Representative merely said that in their thinking priority number one goes to the maintenance of deterrent retaliatory power. The second priority goes to counteracting subversion or small aggressions that may develop. All that could be said at the moment was that our resources should be allocated and distributed in the best rational and economical manner. The USA Representative asked clarification about the words "identified Soviet aggression". Did these words mean all types of aggression or only major ones. Sir Christopher replied that they had in mind aggressions which would aim at changing the status quo as against aggressive acts as could be described as mere accidents. The Dutch Representative asked whether the British had also considered the possibility of local conflicts which may grow into something bigger requiring the use of not only conventional weapons but strategic atomic weapons as well. In that eventuality would holding operation still be valid or would the NATO powers use their full atomic capability. Sir Christopher did not wish to go into this at this stage.

8. With regard to paragraph 6 of the UK paper the USA Representative asked what relative importance was being given by the British to the defence of the NATO area and the non-NATO area. Sir Christopher's only reply was that the operation that takes precedence is the one that happens to be conducted at the time. We also asked some clarification as to the phrase of paragraph 6 "Nevertheless the NATO defence effort must be so adjusted as to enable member countries to fulfil also their defence commitments in other areas". Did the words "member countries" mean only those NATO members which have commitments outside the NATO area or all members of the Alliance. Sir Christopher replied that "member countries" meant those which had commitments outside NATO with the qualification, however, that the interests of one member affected the interests of all.

9. The question was asked with regard to paragraph 8 of the UK paper whether it meant that a policy of making available atomic weapons to NATO allies had been agreed upon. Sir Christopher replied in the affirmative.

10. Finally, the French Representative stated that the UK draft paper failed to mention an essential point, namely that the review of NATO strategy should be conducted with a view to strengthening the security and the unity of the Alliance. As you know this point appears in the USA paper circulated at the meeting (we shall not be sending it over to you as this paper is exactly the same as that given by Timmons to our Washington Embassy. See telegram 1874 October 18).†

11. It was finally agreed that the UK, USA and French papers will be considered by governments and that their preliminary comments should be available for the next meeting of the Council on Tuesday October 23. It is envisaged that a series of meetings of the Council will take place in the next few weeks. We should hope to have, by Tuesday, any additional views that you may wish us to put forward both on the procedural aspect and the substance of the problems at hand. We bear in mind, of course, the comments you already sent us in your telegram DLDL-102 of October 9 and which we did not wish to use extensively at this morning's meeting lest we conveyed the impression that we had already studied the UK paper.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

In opening the discussion on the above subject at today's private meeting, Ismay reminded the Council that it was agreed last week the discussion would centre on the text of the UK draft political directive and be concerned principally with points of clarification in that text.

2. Ismay questioned the UK Representative on the last sentence of paragraph 7 (iii) of the UK paper which reads: "and to hold an identified Soviet aggression until the strategic counter-offensive becomes effective". He wanted to know how long the UK authorities envisaged this period to be. Sir Christopher Steel replied that they thought it would be much less than the thirty days usually mentioned.

3. The Norwegian Representative referred again to paragraph 8, asking whether this paragraph implied that atomic weapons "would be spread out" among the different NATO countries (see paragraph 9 of our telegram under reference). Steel again confirmed that this was his understanding. During the discussion on this point, Steel stated that, as far as this paragraph was concerned, he did not think any distinction should be made between atomic bombs and tactical atomic weapons and that the words "atomic capability" referred to both. This, of course, did not apply to the thermo-nuclear bomb which is possessed only by the USA and the USSR. Steel added that, as far as he knew, this did not necessarily mean that atomic weapons or bombs would be distributed to all NATO members. He thought they would likely be distributed to those forces which, in the circumstances, were in the best position to make use of them. The Belgian Representative suggested that it might be found desirable to issue in the first instance such weapons to the NATO Supreme Commanders rather than to national forces. Steel thought the criterion would be that they would be issued where they would be most militarily effective and politically acceptable.

4. The Norwegian Representative also referred to another problem, which he admitted was not directly connected with the current discussion but which nevertheless greatly concerned his government. The problem was the need to have some type of international control on the production of atomic weapons. He thought that it would be desirable to initiate some joint action in this direction in the UN. The Greek Representative said that his government shared this concern. Both pointed to the possibility of the production of such weapons by irresponsible countries and individuals, such as Nasser, and the consequent dangers. The Greek Representative said that he intended to urge his government to join Norway and any other interested governments in an effort to sponsor some sort of a UN resolution which would aim at restricting the production of this type of weapon. He thought one advantage in this was that it would take away some of the initiative in this field from the USSR, which has been making considerable propaganda out of this issue. I intervened to say that I thought any move in this direction should be in connection with the disarmament discussions that are going on under the UN auspices and I referred to the fact that the problem of control and inspection is the most difficult one. If the issue were raised in the UN outside the framework of the current disarmament discussions, it might only give rise to further undesirable propaganda, especially on the part of the USSR. The Norwegian Representative concluded the discussion on this point by saying that before this matter was raised in the UN, it should be discussed beforehand in the NATO Council. He hoped they could receive the views of other NATO governments.

5. The USA Representative again referred to the words "an identified act of aggression" in paragraph 3 (see paragraph 7 of our telegram under reference) and asked Steel whether he was in a position to enlighten him on the meaning of these words. Steel admitted it was most difficult to attempt a definition. All he could say was that the words were intended to mean any act which was intended to change "the status quo". They were not intended to mean a mere border incident which might result, for instance, from an indiscrete act of a drunken soldier. In reply to a question by Italy whether the West would retaliate with atomic bombs in the event of a Soviet attack with or without such weapons, the USA Representative said he thought it would be most difficult to give a categorical answer to this question but added that the important thing was that the West should have the capability of using these bombs and at the same time retain enough flexibility to decide when they should be used.

6. I then mentioned most of the comments contained in paragraph 3 of your telegram under reference. The UK Representative thought that most of your points deserved careful consideration and added that his authorities would welcome these and any other suggestions for a rearrangement or a better wording of the text in order to dispel any doubts about meaning or intentions. He thought this was the whole purpose of the current discussions. On your comment (3) relating to paragraph 4 and the specific omission of Soviet "short-term aims", he thought that the remainder of the same paragraph covered your point, but he admitted that for the sake of clarity, a specific reference to the shorter-term aims could be written into the text.

7. Ismay said that the UK paper seemed to envisage only the first phase of a future war and gave no political guidance as to what should be planned in the subsequent period following the initial atomic exchange. It was like reading the first chapter of a book, but not the whole story. Steel replied that it was so difficult, if not impossible, to envisage what the result would be following the first phase that it would be highly speculative to attempt to lay down any directive for the subsequent phase. Ismay thought that the NATO naval forces, as one example, might not suffer to the same extent as other NATO forces. He referred to the sea lanes and the vital importance of the Atlantic Ocean as a lifeline to the Alliance. Steel countered by saying that the role of the navy in this period would depend to a very great extent on what harbours and port facilities were still available and usable. His authorities (and he thought the authorities of most other countries were in the same position) just could not foresee what the world would look like after the first intensive atomic exchange and he thought that the only thing to do was to make the best of whatever was left. However, he did not seem to rule out the possibility that some further thought might be given to this point.

8. This subject will be discussed again at the private session of the Council on October 30. It is hoped that, by that time, all delegations will be able to give the considered views of their respective governments on the text of the UK paper.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

The discussion at yesterday's Council meeting appears to have been a second reading of the UK draft political directive, the first having taken place on October 19. While we agree with the UK Representative's point mentioned in paragraph 3 of your telegram 1772 October 19 that the consideration of stages I, II and III be somewhat parallel, we would like to repeat our approval of the procedure outlined in your telegram 1749 October 7. It is our feeling that it would be wasteful to spend much time in commenting on the UK paper in its present form before it can be considered jointly with the Working Group's study of Soviet intentions and an assessment of the Soviet threat. In this connection please refer to paragraphs 3 and 4 of our DLDL-337 October 18. We hope that this procedure is already being adopted although the discussion reported in your telegram under reference left us wondering whether the UK draft, after some pruning and editing paragraph by paragraph, might be accepted by the Council as a new political directive without sufficient discussion of a re-assessment of the threat. The reappraisal might then come to be little more than a formality, in which case the European misgivings and criticisms recently expressed in WEU would almost certainly reappear in more acute form. Probably the foregoing is an overstatement of our apprehensions but this has been done to emphasize our interest in seeing that the reappraisal is as genuine and thorough as possible. We recognize, of course, that it is for the Europeans rather than for you to express any misgivings they may have about the thoroughness or otherwise of the reappraisal.

2. In using the UK draft directive as a working basis or starting point in the formulation of a new directive we think that concurrent consideration can and should be given to the points raised in the WEU Ministerial meeting, in the United States statement quoted in Washington telegram 1874 October 18,† and in the French notes quoted in your telegram 1690 October 9.‡

I welcomed receipt of your telegram under reference because it confirmed that you had the same misgivings which have been worrying us. Ever since the Council meeting on October 23 I have been thinking over our future tactics. Yesterday I decided to send you a telegram today outlining the situation as I saw it and asking for your further guidance. Consequently, your telegram under reference arrived at a most opportune time.

2. First of all I would like to clear up certain aspects of the current situation which you may not fully have understood from our telegrams. At the meeting on October 19 when the UK Representative introduced their draft political directive there was a discussion as to how the Council should proceed in view of the fact that papers had been submitted by the Canadian, French, USA and UK delegations. It was agreed that the most practical procedure would be to take the UK paper as a basis for discussion but at the same time taking into account the papers submitted by the other delegations. For convenience of reference the Secretariat reproduced all the papers in Document C-M(56)121. This is now one of the basic documents.

3. The discussion on October 23 was a very preliminary second reading of the UK draft political directive. Delegations had been given until October 30 to obtain the views of their governments and consequently only a few representatives were prepared to comment. The discussion is to be resumed at the meeting on October 30 when it is hoped that all representatives will be instructed.

4. I fear there has been a misunderstanding regarding the procedure outlined in our telegram 1749 of October 17. This is probably due to the fact that the subject of the telegram was given as "NATO military reappraisal". The paper being considered by the Working Group referred to in that telegram was the paper on "Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy" which has since been circulated as document AC/34(56)WP/9. You will have noted that the paper contains in paragraphs 29 to 34 inclusive an "Estimate of Soviet Intentions". My fear is that the UK, after stalling until their paper was ready, now intend to concentrate on a procedure which better conforms to their ideas than ours. What they have in mind is that only one main paper will go to the Ministerial meeting for action, namely a paper based on their draft political directive. The paper on "Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy" will be used as a background paper together with such papers as may emerge from the meeting of the Military Committee to be held on December 4.

5. What has been worrying me has been that the UK and the other delegations do not appear to share our appreciation of the need for a reexamination of the MC48 concept and its underlying assumptions. Such an examination would have to be made by the NATO military authorities. It is probably too much to expect that it could be done before the December meeting but if this is the objective the political directive should be framed to this end.

6. Another of my worries is that no representative has yet commented on our memo on procedure, the text of which was given in our telegram 1773 of October 19.† Consequently, no consideration is being given to the possibility of fitting in Stage 2 of that procedure. I have realized that there are practical difficulties for the Council to prepare a general assessment of the strength and magnitude of the Soviet threat. I was grateful to have your telegram DLDL-337 of October 18 in paragraph 2 of which you elaborated what you have in mind. The chief practical difficulty arises from the fact that the civilian and military sides of NATO work in separate compartments. The Council may consider that Soviet intentions have been covered adequately in paragraphs 29 to 34 of the paper on "Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy" and that information regarding Soviet capabilities is available from the military documents. It will be argued that it is not possible to go further than this. I take it that one of your main objectives is that given in the last sentence of paragraph 2 of your telegram DLDL-337. If this is the case I should appreciate if you could consult General Foulkes on how far he thinks the military would be prepared to go in giving information about the steadily growing Soviet air/atomic capabilities and the threat that this brings to the North American area of NATO.

7. To collate adequately Soviet intentions and Soviet capabilities would require a joint exercise with the military for which we are ill-equipped. We could, however, direct a specific request to the military for certain data to be used by the Council in drawing up an appreciation of Soviet intentions collated with an appreciation of Soviet capabilities. This is what I had in mind proposing if any representative raised at the next meeting a question as to how we should proceed to deal with Stage 2 of the proposed Canadian procedure. What I would particularly like to have guidance on is the desirability of raising at some time or other the fundamental question of whether or not we are looking towards a reexamination of the MC48 concept and its underlying assumptions. This appears to me basic to the whole exercise. If the end result would be a re-affirmation of the soundness of this concept in the light of the changed political and economic situation, we would have accomplished the major objective which was to dispel so many of the doubts which have been raised and which found expression at the meeting of the WEU Council. I would not wish, however, to state the position in these terms unless on specific guidance from you.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

We appreciate your misgivings about the trend in the thinking of some delegations in the Council discussions on the military reappraisal and it was this which prompted our comment in DLDL-375 of October 25. However we see no reason why confusion need arise provided the Council follows sensible application of the procedures which we have suggested in the conduct of the current NATO military reappraisal as set out in your memorandum of October 16 (repeated in your 1773 of October 19†).

2. The confusion seems to arise from treating the need for "reexamination of the MC48 concept" and its underlying assumptions as one exercise rather than two at this stage. We see the two-fold problem as (a) re-examination of underlying assumptions and then (b) re-examination of MC48 concept in the light of (a). Surely the Working Paper on Trends of Soviet Policy (on which we comment in detail in a separate telegram†) represents an assessment of the Soviet threat in terms of both intentions and capabilities and thus fulfils the necessary preliminary groundwork in terms of basic study and appreciation referred to in Stages 1 and 2 of our procedures which are necessary to the formulation of the directives for military planning under Stage 3. As we have indicated in previous messages we should not insist on any artificial separation of the various stages in our procedural approach in terms of time. What we should insist on however is that the Council should prepare a draft directive for the consideration of Ministers in December which would in effect represent a re-examination of the assumptions underlying NATO military planning.

3. Once the Ministers have approved the political directive we would presume this directive would be turned over to the NATO military authorities who would be required to consider to what extent, if any, the strategic guidance and military planning papers should be revised. At this stage we are not assuming that the MC48 concept need necessarily be revised but what we would like to see is a thorough examination of the underlying assumptions which should be reflected in the draft directive which would take into account the changing international political and economic circumstances under which military planning is to proceed in the future. This I would hope you would make clear in any further remarks in the Council.

4. In the light of the foregoing we would be prepared to go along with the UK in the suggestion that only one main paper go to the Ministerial meeting for action but as suggested in our DLDL-375 of October 25 we would want that paper carefully considered in relation to the excellent work done by the Working Group in the reassessment of the threat and taking into account the points raised by our European partners at the WEU Ministerial meeting, the USA statements quoted in Washington telegram 1874 October 18 and in the French notes quoted in your 1690 of October 9.

5. We would think that the conclusions of the Working Group's paper on Trends of Soviet Policy might be included in the draft directive as revised in the Council discussion in the form of a preface. The main body of the trends paper might be included as an appendix to the political directive. If this were done, it would both make clear what the underlying assumptions of the directive were as well as we would hope ensure that the political directive would be examined and revised in the light of these assumptions.

6. Concerning the point in paragraph 6 of your message about Soviet capabilities, we would think that it would be inappropriate to spell out Soviet capabilities in any detailed way in a political directive. The main point which needs to be covered is that Soviet capabilities in every military field are steadily improving and will continue to do so, whatever the political climate may be. You will note in our comment on the Working Group paper we have suggested a change of wording covering the increasing Soviet capability for the delivery of nuclear air attacks against North America as well as Europe. If the Council needed supporting data we would suggest that reference be made to the S.G.161 series, which reviews annually Soviet capabilities.

7. To sum up we would most certainly look to the Council concentrating at the December meeting on a thorough re-examination of the assumptions underlying NATO military planning and believe that this re-examination should result in the draft political directive to be considered by the Ministers and upon which we shall be sending comments later.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

Council resumed its discussion of the NATO military reappraisal at a private meeting this morning directing its attention first of all to the Working Group paper on "Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy". The meeting was not a satisfactory one in that prior to commencing discussion Ismay afforded an opportunity for representatives to discuss the latest news on the situation in Hungary and in the Middle East. Moreover, the discussion was interrupted a number of times when representatives intervened to report most recent developments on the basis of telegrams which they received during the meeting. I mention this to indicate the atmosphere in which the discussion took place. The final outcome was not too unsatisfactory from our point of view.

2. After the Chairman had introduced the subject the Italian Representative intervened to say that in his opinion it was not opportune to discuss the paper until the international situation had clarified. He was supported strongly by the German Representative and by a number of other representatives. I had to intervene to point out the connection which we saw in the paper under discussion to the whole question of the military reappraisal and the preparation of a more up to date political directive on which future military planning could be based. This enabled me to outline our ideas about having the conclusions of the Working Group paper included in the directive in the form of a preface and the main body or Part II of the paper being included as an appendix to the political directive (paragraph 5 of your telegram DLDL-384). Sir Christopher Steel said that he thought this was a good idea and he hoped that the Council would follow our proposal to have a thorough discussion of the paper as a preliminary to further consideration of the draft political directive.

3. At a later stage I had to intervene again to point out that there was only five weeks left before the Ministerial meeting and we could not afford to let time pass by waiting for events to clarify. It was important that the Working Group should start at an early date with the revision of the paper, both in the light of recent events, in the light of amendments proposed by delegations and in the light of Council discussion. The revision of the basic paper for the Ministerial meeting would have to be a continuous process and I could only see a final text emerging shortly before the Ministerial meeting but in time to give the Ministers an opportunity of studying it.

4. In the meantime there had been circulated amendments proposed to the Working Group paper by the Canadian, UK and USA delegations. Our amendments were based on your telegram DLDL-385 of October 29.† The UK proposed a few amendments to paragraphs 4 and 5 of Part I. The USA amendments also related to Part I of the paper. We shall be sending you the amendments proposed by the UK and the USA delegations in our two immediately following telegrams.†

5. Finally Ismay proposed that we go through the paper paragraph by paragraph in order to accomplish the objective referred to by Steel. I proposed that we should first of all take up Part II because the conclusions were derived from this part of the paper. This was agreed to but we only got as far as paragraph 3 when a deadlock between those who were willing to continue discussion at the present time and those who favoured postponement until the international situation had clarified. Steel had argued that events in Hungary should not be interpreted as a return to the Stalinist method of repression in the Satellites and I supported him in this contention. Perkins, however, took directly the opposite view and said that they thought that from now on we would witness a return to a policy of repression so far as relations with the Satellites were concerned. This gave the opportunity for all those delegations who were seeking postponement to argue that it was not possible now to proceed with consideration of the paper until this fundamental question had been resolved.

6. The Chairman attempted to break the deadlock by proposing that we leave Part II in abeyance for the present time and turn our attention to Part I because the conclusions seemed to be less controversial. However, there seemed to be little disposition in the Council to get down to a detailed consideration of what we have described as the underlying assumptions behind NATO strategy. Proposals were made that the Working Group should attempt to revise the paper they had produced.

7. After some confusion it was agreed to call the Working Group together on Friday morning next to have them present as soon as possible a revision of the conclusions set forth in Part I. In order not to delay matters they would not attempt to produce an agreed text and where there were divergencies these would be indicated in square brackets for the Council itself to resolve. The intention would be to produce such a revised paper for the Council to consider on Monday next. After this, the Working Group would direct its attention to Part II, making as much progress as it could in the light of the discussions which the Council will be having on the conclusions. As soon as a more definite consensus of view is derived from the Council discussion the draft political directive will be taken up so that all parts of this exercise may be proceeded with as expeditiously as possible.

8. Action required. Your telegram DLDL-385 gave us concrete suggestions for the revision of Part II. Paragraph 15 of that telegram stated that these concrete suggestions would need to be reflected in the conclusions of the paper in Part I. For the guidance of our representative in the Working Group it would be useful if we could have your concrete suggestions for the revision of Part I. These should reach us in time for the meeting on Friday morning, November 9.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL — UK DRAFT PAPER

The Council for the last three days has been getting down to detailed consideration of Part I of the paper on "Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy". You will be glad to hear that this has induced the Permanent Representatives finally to face up to the fundamental issues involved in the NATO military reappraisal. Our detailed study of this question has been facilitated by Ismay giving up the chair after the first meeting and leaving it to Bentinck to preside. We shall be sending you tomorrow the new revised text as it has emerged from Council consideration and will also give our comments on the reasons for the more significant changes.

2. The purpose of this telegram is to advise that it was agreed today that the next meeting of the Council will be held on Monday morning, November 19. The Council will first of all give final approval to Part I of the "Trends" paper and then go on to consider the UK draft of the political directive. In the latter connection you may wish to send us further instructions than those contained in your telegram under reference which we took to be your preliminary comments on the UK draft paper. In this connection I think it is important to let you know that the impact of the events in Hungary and the Middle East is leading the Council away from the former complacent attitude based on the retaliatory nuclear capability being sufficient to deter the Soviet Union from running the risk of a general war. Led by Blankenhorn of Germany but with considerable support from the other European countries, the trend has been even to question the wish of the Soviet leaders to avoid a general war. I have been in the lead in resisting this trend and have received some support from the UK, so that the text of Part I of the "Trends" paper as it has emerged is somewhat of a halfway position between these two opposing views. I feel sure that the same conflict is likely to arise when we come to consider the UK draft political directive. You may wish to bear this in mind when you send your further instructions. These should reach us in time for the meeting on Monday morning, November 19.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

Our immediately following telegram contains the revised text of the paper on Trends of Soviet policy.

2. This revised text was submitted to Council yesterday by the Secretariat, and it was unanimously agreed that from the point of view of presentation it was by far preferable to the earlier text. The efforts of the Secretariat have consisted in rearranging the sequence of paragraphs of the earlier paper in order that they may fall logically under three heading: general trends of Soviet policy; possibilities of general nuclear war; possibilities of Soviet action through the use of conventional arms. Not only is the new presentation a more logical one, thus making the paper more readily assimilable but the present text, in our opinion, constitutes a better introduction to the political directive that the Council will prepare.

3. The old paragraph 3 (now 4 in the present text) remains substantially as it was although it has been slightly shortened at the suggestion of the USA delegation. No attempt is made in the new version to define under what circumstances greater risks would be taken by the Soviets. This further compromise enabled the UK Representative to accept paragraph 3, albeit subject to his government's approval, and abandon a far more restrictive amendment he had proposed which only recognized miscalculation as qualifying the general proposition that the Soviets will not in the foreseeable future deliberately launch a general war.

4. As you will see, paragraph 6 of the new text now consolidates sub-paragraph (a) and (b) of the old paragraph 4. No substantive change is involved here and, from the point of view of presentation, the new version is more concise and clearer.

5. You will notice that the bracketed sentence relating to satellite forces has now been dropped from this paragraph and appears in sub-paragraph 2 of paragraph 2. This sentence now reads: "The effects of the upheaval in the Satellites on the military strength of the Soviet Bloc are not yet wholly clear, but some of the European satellite forces might not be reliable, depending on the circumstances in which aggression occurred." Our amendment was accepted in that form.

6. With regard to Part II of the paper, your suggestion has been accepted by the Council with the proviso that if the Secretariat is able to bring it in line with Part I before the Ministerial meeting. Part II might be presented as a Secretariat paper (which does not necessarily represent the agreed views of the governments) and given to the Ministers as background info.

7. The Council agreed also to constitute the USA, UK and French Representatives as a working party which will prepare a single draft political directive paper on the basis of the three draft papers (USA, UK and French) already submitted to the Council. The international staff will be represented on the Working Group by the Director of the Political Division, the SGLO and Mr. Greeg. The Council agreed to take into account the proceedings of the September meeting of the WEU Council in preparing their draft directive.

8. The trends paper will come up in Council for final approval on Thursday and unless we hear further from you we shall assume we may accept it as it now stands.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

Following is revised text of "Trends" paper. Text begins:

PART I. SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

General Trends of Soviet Policy

The Soviet leaders see international affairs in terms of a struggle for world domination between two rival ideologies. This concept also coincides with many aspects of traditional Russian power policy. They continue their unremitting efforts to weaken and ultimately to destroy the "capitalist world", which they look upon as their opponent in this struggle for power. This assessment has been confirmed by the events which have taken place in Hungary and the Middle East.

2. Whatever repercussions these events may have within the USSR, there is no reason to doubt that the régime will remain sufficiently stable to go on developing its economic and military strength.

In spite of reductions in manpower, the military strength of the USSR will not be diminished. On the contrary, it is steadily increasing in terms of modern weapons for air, land and sea forces. Overall nuclear capability continues steadily to grow, including a capability for the delivery of nuclear weapons both within Europe and directly against North America. In addition to expanding their nuclear capability, the Soviets appear to be keeping forces able to undertake non-nuclear warfare on either a large or a small scale. The effects of the upheaval in the Satellites on the military strength of the Soviet Bloc are not wholly clear, but some of the European Satellite forces might not be reliable, depending on the circumstances in which aggression occurred.

Changes in the direction of decentralisation and limited "democratisation" in the Soviet Union have taken place; these changes have not been so extensive or of such a character as to constitute a basic change in the Soviet régime.

These developments have also affected Soviet-Satellite relations. The recognition of "different roads to socialism" and the shock of de-Stalinisation have imposed very great strains on the structure of the Bloc, and have confronted the USSR with serious policy dilemmas. It is not clear at present whether the USSR, having apparently miscalculated the score and strength of nationalism and anti-communism in Eastern Europe, will continue its earlier policy of modifying Stalinist types of economic, political and military controls in the Satellites. It is clear, however, that there are limits beyond which the Soviet GKZT will not permit the Satellites to go and they are prepared to take not only economic and political, but also the most ruthless military measures to retain their control over the bloc.

3. The rapid growth of the Soviet Union's economic strength gives added hope to the Soviet leaders that their aims can be achieved without resorting to a war in the foreseeable future. To accomplish an expansion of its influence the USSR has attempted to portray itself as a force for peace, has tried to lessen the suspicion of Soviet intentions in non-communist areas, and has made increasing use of traditional diplomacy, economic ties, and cultural relations. While the Soviets are likely to continue these policies they may now find increasing difficulties in doing so, at any rate in the West.

The USSR's continuing and main objective in the NATO area is to undermine support for Western defence arrangements and thus lead the way to the dissolution of NATO. At the same time, the Soviet government are actively exploiting new possibilities for trouble-making which have arisen in the Middle East, Asia and Africa. By capitalising on the forces of nationalism and neutralism, the Soviet government seek to increase their position of power vis-à-vis the West and to undermine and outflank the world-wide position of the Western Powers. In this process two important weapons are the Soviet Union's growing ability to make attractive economic offers on a highly selective basis and its readiness to supply conventional arms from its large disposable stocks. They will be able to do both with increasing facility as they continue to maintain a rate of industrial growth designed to outstrip the West in economic as well as military power.

Possibilities of Soviet Launching of General Nuclear War

4. There is no doubt that the Soviet leaders understand and fear the consequences of general nuclear war. It can be assumed therefore that they will not deliberately launch a general war so long as they know that the West is prepared to retaliate with nuclear weapons in sufficient strength to devastate the USSR.

Circumstances may develop, however, in which the Soviet leaders may harden their attitude and be prepared to take greater risks than heretofore. They have indulged in the use of threats, including the threat of war and even of nuclear attack, as blackmail to attain their ends.

There is, furthermore, a danger of general war arising from miscalculation on their part. This danger could arise, for example, through an underestimation of the Western reaction to an aggressive action by the Soviets or through a misconstruction of Western intentions which might lead them to conclude that the Soviet Union was about to be attacked with nuclear weapons.

Possibilities of Soviet Action Through Use of Conventional Arms, Entailing Risk of General Nuclear War

5. The Soviet leaders are fully aware that any attack they might launch against NATO, even with conventional arms, would entail an immediate military response by the NATO Alliance and thus risk a general war. They would almost certainly regard open attacks with conventional arms across recognised state frontiers outside the NATO area by Soviet, Communist Chinese or Satellite forces as involving, under present conditions, a serious risk of general war and therefore as something to be avoided. The Soviets are thus not likely to launch such attacks, provided that the West maintains its defence commitments, such as the stationing of overseas troops in Western Europe, its firm purpose to defend itself, appropriate nuclear retaliatory strength and adequate conventional forces to ensure that local armed intervention by Soviet or Satellite forces does not offer a prospect of easy success.

6. However, the following possibilities of action by the Soviet leaders through the use of conventional arms, but which would, in varying degree, entail the risk of deteriorating into a major war, must be included among those requiring consideration:

(a) General Attacks Against NATO. The USSR might launch general attacks with conventional weapons against NATO if the Soviet leaders estimated that the Alliance would be deterred from employing nuclear weapons against the USSR except in retaliation to a Soviet nuclear attack. The Soviet leaders might believe that NATO would be thus deterred, for example:

- because of assumed Western reluctance to be the first to use nuclear weapons;
- because of assumed fear on the part of the West that it was more vulnerable than the Soviet Union to nuclear attack;
- because of assumed Western division or demoralisation.

(b) Local Attacks Against NATO. If the Soviets believe that NATO would be deterred from employing nuclear weapons (except in retaliation to a Soviet nuclear attack) and were not able to defend itself against all types of limited aggression, including local attack (e.g. by a Satellite), the Soviets might initiate, instigate, support or condone such aggression.

(c) Attacks Against Peripheral Non-NATO Countries. If the West is deemed to be deterred from employing nuclear weapons and if for this or other reasons the Soviet leaders thought that a non-NATO country on the periphery of the Soviet Bloc would not or could not receive effective support of the Western Powers, the Soviets might be tempted to use their preponderance in conventional forces either for armed intervention in the country in question or to exert pressure on it in order to influence it towards alignment with the Soviet camp.

(d) Insurrection and Guerrilla. Armed insurrection or guerrilla activity under direct or indirect Communist sponsorship supported by irregular or "volunteers" from the Bloc might occur if the Communists are presented with opportunities (e.g. serious internal disorders in a non-communist country, disunity in the free world or collapse of its defence arrangements, etc.).

(e) Indirect Intervention Outside of NATO Area. Situations in which relations between countries outside the Soviet Bloc deteriorate will be exploited by the USSR to further her political, economic and military influence. If the deterioration of such relations reaches the point of armed conflict, the USSR may go to the length of sending various forms of military assistance, including "volunteers", from the Bloc.

(f) Soviet Intervention in Satellites. Extensive military measures by the USSR to cope with serious deterioration of its control over the Satellites can produce an explosive situation. Text ends.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL

The revised text of the paper on Trends of Soviet Policy has probably now been as much refined as circumstances will allow. Since most of the points to which we attached importance have been adequately covered, you may now accept it as it stands.

2. We welcome the establishment of a working party to prepare the draft political directive paper on the basis of the USA - UK - French drafts. We hope that the working party will be able to present a revised draft in the briefest delay so that the Council and each member government can give adequate consideration to the paper prior to the Ministerial meeting. The military reappraisal item will be a major question at the December meeting and it is important that comprehensive briefs be available to the Ministers.

3. We have given some thought in the last few days to the points which in our view should be covered by the draft political directive. While you are not on the working party, there might nonetheless be some advantage in providing you with an indication of our present thinking on this matter in case you have occasion to be consulted informally by one of the members of the working party.

4. Generally speaking we believe the draft political directive should include:

(a) A statement of the threat to NATO; it has already been agreed that this would be Part I of the paper on Trends of Soviet Policy.

(b) A statement of the general aim of NATO, with particular emphasis on the military and strategic objectives. This could presumably be adequately covered by a review of the assumptions in MC 48 and MC 48/1, and by the general principles found in the opening articles of the Treaty.

(c) The clearest attainable definition of NATO responsibilities towards first the NATO area, and second the non-NATO area. To be complete this would require very careful examination of the responsibilities of the NATO military authorities in the event of incidents at borders of NATO countries, and of internal unrest in areas adjacent to but outside the NATO area. We recognize that this may raise a number of particularly complex issues, but which in our view can hardly be neglected in the face of recent developments.

(d) Some indication of economic assumptions, and the resources that are likely to be available. Although a vague reference to this point is contained in the UK draft, it is essential that this factor should be more clearly brought out and more extensively covered in the political directive. If it is not, we may be faced once again with the problems of the gap.

- (e) An indication of the likely duration and accompanying intensity of the threat.
- (f) An indication of the calculated risks which the organization could advisedly take while engaged in meeting the threat.

5. The last two points must necessarily be of a highly speculative nature and may in fact prove so difficult to elaborate as to be of limited use for the purpose of the draft political directive. However, we feel that in view of some of the studies on defence planning already carried out by the military authorities for various specific periods in the future, it might be worthwhile to try to cover these last two points if this can be done at all.

NATO MILITARY REAPPRAISAL-POLITICAL DIRECTIVE

Following is the text of revised draft political directive. Begins:

The North Atlantic Treaty states that the basic aim of the Alliance is to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilisation of the peoples of the NATO countries. To this end, a common defence system has been built up for the purpose of averting war. This purpose cannot be fulfilled unless the potential aggressor is made aware that the starting of a war would lead to his ultimate defeat. Hence, NATO defence planning has had to provide both a major deterrent to aggression and an assurance of the eventual defeat of the aggressor if there should be resort to armed aggression.

2. In the light of the conclusions contained in Part I of this paper, a review of NATO defence planning is required in order to determine how within the resources likely to be available, the defence effort of the Alliance and of each individual member can best achieve the most effective pattern of forces [for the next few years].

[This directive has long-term implications involving detailed implementations over a considerable period of time. This period will not be less than years.]

3. For NATO defence and as a major deterrent to Soviet aggression a fully effective nuclear retaliatory force must be maintained and protected. For this purpose there must also be provided the coordinated radar and communications facilities needed for air war.

4. In addition to the nuclear retaliatory force, the land, sea and air forces maintained by NATO should be designed to defend NATO territory and in particular to meet the following requirements:

- (a) To keep confidence in the military effectiveness of the NATO defence organization, and thereby to contribute to the deterrent to aggression, and to prevent external intimidation;

(b) To deal with infiltrations, incursions and local action by the Soviets, or by Satellites with or without overt or covert Soviet support;

(c) To identify serious Soviet or Satellite aggression (on land, sea or air), and to deal with such aggression in accordance with the concept of "forward strategy" and to sustain operations without any major planned withdrawal until the strategic counter-offensive has achieved its objectives;

(d) To protect and maintain sea communications as required in support of the above missions.

For the purposes of (a), (b) and (c) above, it should be assumed that, as an essential element of NATO policy, British, Canadian and USA forces will continue to be stationed in Allied Command Europe.

5. The forces required for an effective shield must, of course, have the capability to deal with the situations envisaged in 4(b) above without recourse to nuclear weapons. Should the situation so require, they must also be prepared to respond quickly with nuclear weapons to any type of aggression, and for this purpose they should be provided with a nuclear capability. [The decision to use nuclear weapons would, in each case, be a matter for governments.]

6. [Although NATO defence planning relates primarily to the Treaty area, it should take into account dangers which may arise for NATO because of developments outside the Treaty area.]

7. In planning for the most efficient organization and equipment of NATO forces, account must be taken of the possible need for certain NATO countries to use some of their NATO forces to meet defence commitments elsewhere, such as may arise because of the various and changing forms of the Soviet threat on a world front. This need should, however, be harmonised with their NATO commitments.

8. It is probable, but by no means certain, that an attack on NATO would be preceded by a period of acute political tension and heralded by advance indications involving the application of the "alert" system. Nevertheless, the consequences of an attack on NATO without warning are such that those NATO forces and facilities directly relating to nuclear retaliatory action must be kept in constant readiness at all times. Shield forces must be maintained at the appropriate standards of readiness.

9. In deciding on the allocation of total resources, governments will take account, inter alia, of the rising cost of new weapons and of the need for economic resources to deal with the Soviet threat in all its aspects, without endangering their economic stability, which in itself is an essential element of their security. Therefore, in present circumstances, few, if any, NATO countries can be expected to make a substantial increase in the proportion of their resources in men, money and materiel devoted to defence. Ends.

I. SUBMISSION TO MINISTERS ON QUESTIONS TO BE CONSIDERED AT THE NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING IN DECEMBER, 1956.

NATO Defence Effort: Political Directive to the NATO Military Authorities

(Document ED 16-56, text of the Draft Political Directive prepared by the Working Party, which had been circulated previously, was replaced by a later version of the text contained in Telegram 3080 of November 28 from Paris, which becomes Document ED 16-56(R)).

4. Mr. Macdonnell said that the production of a political directive had had its origin in two different factors. One of them was that some NATO members had hoped that a generally easier defence burden would result from better relations with the Soviet Union in the past few months. In particular, the United Kingdom had hoped to be able to reduce its force commitments in continental Europe. A second factor was the desire of the NATO Council to give the military authorities a revised set of political assumptions which they could use as guidance in future planning. Shortness of time had made the work of drafting a political directive difficult, and indeed, it was not likely that a final version on which governments had agreed could be prepared before the ministerial meeting.

5. Mr. Ignatieff commented that the paragraphs in the Draft Submission which dealt with the political directive attempted to point out some of the main issues and problems which the directive had raised. For instance, if the directive was addressed primarily to countries which had not met their force commitments, or which had reduced their components of the European shield, Canada would not be affected. If, however, the meaning of paragraph 5 of ED 16-56(R) was that countries should consider being able to meet an attack by using conventional weapons as an alternative to nuclear weapons, Canada certainly would be affected.

6. General Foulkes said that it was quite unreasonable, in military terms, to expect that NATO could meet an attack in Europe with conventional weapons. General Grunther had shown long ago that he would need 30 more divisions in Europe if he was to be prepared to fight with conventional weapons, and there had been no evidence that countries would, or could, provide these extra divisions. There was a good deal of confusion about the plans to use nuclear weapons in case of attack. It was not, of course, intended to engage in massive retaliation against local infiltrations, but it was intended to reorganize the structure of NATO divisions in Europe along the lines appropriate for the use of tactical nuclear weapons. Such a reorganization was essential if present and planned strengths of forces were to be adequate on the ground, and no country, not even the United States, could afford to maintain old type artillery and other support units alongside forces with tactical nuclear weapons and a strategic retaliatory capability. The statement in paragraph 5 of ED 16-56(R) that governments should decide in the event whether nuclear or conventional weapons would be used in meeting an attack would also be unacceptable to the military, who could not, with their present or foreseen resources, keep both types of defence ready. There would also be an unacceptable loss of time after the attack if all governments had to be consulted. The United States would certainly regard this suggestion as unrealistic.

7. The concern among European members of NATO about the use of nuclear weapons was largely due to their worry that a revolt in East Germany, for instance, might create such a demand for action in the Federal Republic that fighting across the border would take place. The Europeans feared that if nuclear weapons were used in such an eventuality, World War III would be precipitated. It would have been more helpful if the political directive had attempted to deal with the German problem in a concrete way, instead of making general suggestions. For instance, it was worth considering that the eastern borders of the Federal Republic should be defended by German forces which would deal with any local fighting. NATO troops would then not become involved unless and until the German forces had established that the fighting actually amounted to a wholesale Soviet aggression.

8. Mr. Miller commented that the Draft Political Directive seemed to have been written without adequate military advice.

9. Mr. Ignatieff said that the directive came about as a result of the initiative of the Germans, who were concerned about preventing a nuclear war from taking place on German territory. When they failed to get the problem discussed in NATO in the past summer, the Germans had raised it in the Western European Union Council of Ministers, where they had obtained considerable support. The Germans, and other Europeans also, were worried that the NATO strategy was going to result in a gradual weeding out of conventional forces in Europe and in their replacement by forces with nuclear weapons which would have to be used even in small wars. They felt that if this course was going to be followed, then the European forces should at least be armed with nuclear weapons also.

10. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed that the following action should be taken:

(a) that the Permanent Representative of Canada to the North Atlantic Council should be told that the present draft of the Political Directive seemed an adequate basis for discussion, but that Canada could not comment on it until it had been reviewed by Ministers;⁵⁵

N.A.T.O. MINISTERIAL MEETING, DECEMBER, 1956

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on the forthcoming N.A.T.O. ministerial meeting at Paris, beginning December 11th. This was the regular meeting but it promised to be a very important one. It had been thought that the United States Secretary of State would be unable to attend but Mr. Dulles had made a rapid recovery and was now expected to go.⁵⁶ Three main subjects would be dealt with, — the report of the Committee of Three on non-military co-operation in the organization,⁵⁷ a review of the world situation, and a military review.⁵⁸

⁵⁶ Le 22 novembre 1956, M. Dulles s'est fait opérer d'un cancer à l'estomac.

Dulles underwent surgery for stomach cancer on November 22, 1956.

⁵⁷ Pour prendre connaissance des travaux du Comité des Trois sur la coopération non militaire, voir la 3^e partie ci-dessus.

On the work of the Committee of Three on Non-Military Cooperation, see Part 3 above.

⁵⁸ Pour en savoir davantage sur la réévaluation de la stratégie militaire de l'OTAN, voir la 4^e partie ci-dessus.

On the reappraisal of NATO's military strategy, see Part 4 above.

The Committee of Three report had been re-written in the last three weeks in the light of the present international situation. All of the items discussed previously were there but put into a stronger form. Increased political consultation was urged and it was pointed out that co-operation between N.A.T.O. governments had deteriorated since the committee began its task. Important initiatives had been taken by members without prior consultation and unity had been strained. All of these divergencies, if not remedied, might cause the break up of the organization. Certain new procedures were recommended but no actual change in the organization.

The report was negative on the economic side as it was felt that the organization should not get into this field except through consultation on economic matters of political concern. On the whole, the report was not of outstanding significance but the political introduction was very realistic.

The political directive to be given to the military planners of N.A.T.O. could not be discussed and decided on at the present time because it was not yet ready. There would be the usual review of the military programmes and this year some harsh things were apt to be said.

6. Mr. Pearson added that the meeting would last four days and far reaching conclusions might emerge. There would also be the appointment of a new secretary-general. Other finance and defence ministers would be there and he hoped both Mr. Harris and Mr. Campney would be able to go over with him.

7. During the discussion the following observations were made:

(a) Unless the United Kingdom changed its mind, it was likely to announce drastic reductions in the British element of the N.A.T.O. forces. A great deal of the U.K. force had already been taken away, on the understanding that they would be sent back when the Middle East disturbances were over, but it did not look as if this would now be done.

(b) Suggestions had been made to postpone this meeting in view of the unfavourable political atmosphere and the expectation of wrangling. However, there were many reasons why this should not be done. It might be said that N.A.T.O. was afraid to meet. Mr. Dulles was to be there and his presence could lead to a better understanding between the major allies.

8. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on matters to be discussed at the forthcoming ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING: MESSAGE TO MR. DULLES

I am anxious that any move towards healing the breach in the Alliance and especially in relations between the USA and UK, which may be started if agreement is reached on troop withdrawals, should be followed up at the forthcoming NATO Ministerial meeting. This meeting may provide a most timely opportunity to repair the Alliance as quickly and as thoroughly as possible.

2. How much will actually be accomplished will depend largely on the attitude adopted by the USA at this meeting. In the present exacerbated state of feelings in London and Paris and among European members generally recriminations would of course do nothing but harm. What seems to be essential is to try to map out a programme of action which may lead to agreement on essential lines of policy in the Middle East and in relation to developments in Eastern Europe.

3. Now that it appears that Mr. Dulles is planning to attend the meeting himself, I thought that it might help if I addressed a personal message to him setting out some views on how the discussion on the international situation might be directed to this end. I realize that there will be no shortage of advice from various quarters to Mr. Dulles but if you think my message may be well received by the Secretary, I should be glad if you would let him have it, preferably personally or through Mr. Hoover, accompanying it with the expression of my sincere pleasure at his speedy recovery and the prospect of seeing and talking with him in Paris.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING: MESSAGE TO MR. DULLES

Following is text of message to Mr. Dulles: Begins:

Dear Foster,

I was delighted to learn that you are planning to attend the Ministerial Council meeting in Paris beginning December 11, not only because this confirms the good news we have been receiving that your recovery has been maintained, but also because it means that the prospects of constructive accomplishments at the meeting will undoubtedly be enhanced by the fact that you will be taking part in our discussions.

2. This meeting should provide a timely and very welcome opportunity to repair the Alliance as quickly and as thoroughly as possible after recent and unhappy experience, and to review in the light of those experiences the impact of developments on NATO's periphery on the common interests of the Alliance. I have been thinking, as I am sure you and others have, of how best to go about trying to achieve this aim, now more necessary than ever. I was glad to learn of the suggestion which I believe came from you that as the first item of substantive business, the Council should go into restricted session to discuss the international situation. I would hope, however, that this discussion would lead, as the Committee of Three suggested in their letter of transmittal of their report to "measures to overcome the grave situation which has arisen affecting the solidarity and security of the Alliance".

3. At the moment the most disruptive single element affecting this solidarity and security is the divergence over policy in the Middle East. I am certainly not optimistic enough to hope that the Council will in the time available to us be able to agree on any new or detailed proposals or plans. I earnestly hope, however, that we can make a start in trying to harmonize our policies as members of NATO with the gradual progress towards settlements in the General Assembly.

4. For instance, assuming, as I hope we can, that between now and the Council meeting the UK and French governments will have withdrawn most if not all of their troops from Egypt, the Council might try to secure agreement which could be reflected in the final communiqué on (a) NATO endorsement of the six principles agreed upon by the Security Council on October 13 on the Suez Canal as a basis for the resumption of negotiations between the parties concerned; (b) NATO active support for effective and speedy United Nations efforts to work out a lasting political settlement for the Middle East area; (c) a forthright expression of NATO concern at Soviet penetration in the Middle East and the consideration of remedies to halt it. There are naturally other problems in the Atlantic community, such as Cyprus, French relationships with North Africa, etc. for which solutions are overdue and on which discussion no doubt may develop. I think that at this meeting we should not avoid the frankest possible discussion on any matters brought up which, though technically outside the NATO area, have a direct influence and effect on NATO's policies and indeed on its future.

5. If, however, the Council's main discussion on the Middle East could be focused on some positive, even if limited objectives such as I have mentioned, it would serve not only to lay the foundations for agreement on common policy within the Alliance on the Middle East but also to improve atmosphere for subsequent talks in the United Nations; and as you know this needs improvement. It could also have the effect of being useful in the talks with Mr. Nehru in Washington and Ottawa, which will come immediately after our NATO meetings.

6. The other subject which will of course be foremost in the minds of all delegations and on which common policies need to be developed is the Soviet action in Eastern Europe, particularly its use of force in Hungary. You will agree, I am sure, that we must have a thorough common exchange of views on this and try to reach some conclusions, even if they are only tentative, on the implications for NATO of the developments in Eastern Europe in terms of our common interests in relations to the USSR.

7. As the Committee of Three reports certain specific measures to improve and strengthen consultation and the means of doing it, I would hope that its proposals might be related in a practical way to the discussion of the Foreign Ministers on the international situation. I do not think in the present situation it would be sufficient to limit ourselves to a mere exchange of views. What I would hope we could do is to agree on a number of specific fields in which NATO, both through the Permanent Council and the diplomatic channel, should strive to achieve common policies by the kind of full and continuing consultation based on common interests envisaged in the report. Thus the fields which I believe should be given highest priority are the Middle East, the relation of NATO members with the USSR in the light of developments in Eastern Europe, and possibly the problem of German reunification, if consultation on this subject is desired by the German Federal Republic. If we could agree on a number of topics such as these on which we can map out a programme of consultation in NATO between now and the meeting of Foreign Ministers next spring, I would hope that this might be reflected in the final communiqué as evidence of resumed consultation on a more effective basis between the Allies.

8. I am looking forward to having a chance of having a personal talk with you about these problems in Paris, and — perhaps even more important — to congratulate you on your remarkably speedy return to health. Kindest personal regards. L.B. Pearson.

NATO DECEMBER MINISTERIAL MEETING — SUBMISSION TO MINISTERS CONCERNED

The Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions considered last week the various matters which will be discussed at the coming NATO ministerial meeting, and agreed that a submission prepared on the basis of its consideration of these subjects, should be presented to the Ministers concerned with NATO. Attached for your consideration is a copy of this submission. You will note that its recommendation is that the Canadian Delegation to the 1956 December ministerial meeting of NATO be authorized

(a) "to approve the report of the Committee of Three and the recommendations contained in it.

(b) to participate in the formulation of a political and economic directive to the NATO military authorities having in mind the observations made in paragraphs 10 and 11 above.

(c) to approve the general report on the 1956 Annual Review, and to approve the defence planning recommended on the basis of MC 48 and MC 48/1 for the year 1957, with the reservations mentioned in paragraph 18.

(d) to consider, and if appropriate, to approve the report of the Secretary-General for 1956 on the activities of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization."

2. I should also like to draw your attention to paragraphs 10 and 11 which contain the views of the Panel on the present attempt by the Council to draft a political directive for the guidance of the NATO military authorities. These comments refer to the latest draft of the political directive prepared by the Permanent Council, and contained in telegram No. 3080 of November 28th from NATO Paris, copy of which is attached.⁵⁹

3. The original intention was to have this submission presented to the Cabinet Defence Committee. However, Mr. Bryce felt that since it was unlikely the Cabinet Defence Committee would meet before the NATO meetings, the submission should be addressed directly to the four Ministers concerned. Each Department with representatives at the NATO meetings is therefore taking steps to bring this submission to the attention of its Minister.

4. More detailed briefs† prepared interdepartmentally will be available on the items discussed in this submission, and on those which might possibly be raised at the meetings.

NATO DECEMBER MINISTERIAL MEETING — 1956

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be holding in Paris from Tuesday, December 11th to Saturday, December 15th, its regular annual Ministerial Meeting attended by Ministers of Foreign Affairs, Defence and Finance. The Canadian Delegation will consist of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Finance and the Canadian Permanent Representative to NATO. Its provisional agenda, a copy† of which is attached, includes the following items:

1. Report of the Committee of Three.
2. NATO Defence Effort: Political Directive to the NATO military authorities.
3. 1956 Annual Review.
4. The Report of the Secretary-General.

Report of the Committee of Three

2. Ministers will be confronted at their December meeting with the grave consequences to NATO of the deterioration in Western cooperation (and probably in the economic situation and in economic relations) resulting from events in the Middle East and from the serious divergencies between NATO members over policy in that situation. This deterioration, moreover, has taken place at a time when the Soviet Union both in respect of its policies in Eastern Europe and its threatening attitude on Middle East problems has served to increase international tensions.

3. The Committee of Three Report which has been circulated under separate cover together with a letter of transmittal points up the serious political problems confronting the Alliance and recommends that they should be discussed in the light of the recommendations in the report. These recommendations place first emphasis on the need to strengthen political and economic consultation in NATO or elsewhere for the benefit of NATO, and suggest the means of doing so. They are generally consistent with the Canadian reply to the Committee's questionnaire, the main lines of which Cabinet approved at the time.

4. The Council will be asked to adopt a general implementing resolution as well as a specific resolution intended to facilitate the settlement of inter-member disputes within the NATO framework.

NATO Defence Effort: Political Directive to the NATO Military Authorities

5. Under this item Ministers will be concerned with the formulation of a political directive to guide the NATO military authorities in their planning. Recognition of the need for a NATO reappraisal grew out of uneasiness in NATO circles resulting from reports to the effect that the United Kingdom was contemplating a reappraisal of its own defence policy which could have the result of reducing the strength of U.K. forces stationed on the Continent. The first formal initiative was taken by Canada with a proposal made in the Council on July 25th outlining the form which the reappraisal might take and the procedures which might be followed. The Canadian proposal was accepted.

6. While it was evident that the United Kingdom Government and some of the European members hoped that the improved international situation as seen earlier this year would permit a reappraisal leading to a reduction of existing force goals, several developments, political and economic, have intervened however to change the trend of thinking in the reassessment of the NATO defence effort. Particularly the previous relaxation of international tensions has given place to the use and threat of force by the Soviet Union in Poland and Hungary. Developments in the Middle East have led to a withdrawal of forces from the NATO area by the United Kingdom and France. The effect of Middle East developments upon the economic prospects of European members of NATO will also certainly influence their military programmes. These factors have been taken into account in an up-to-date comprehensive survey of the threat to the NATO area including an examination of the short and long term trends of Soviet policy, which according to the Canadian proposal was an essential preliminary stage in drafting the directive.

7. It was the intention to prepare on the basis of the conclusions of this survey a political directive which would provide the NATO military authorities with as clear a statement as can be formulated of Soviet intentions and of the political and economic considerations which should guide NATO defence planning.

8. This directive is not intended to affect force goals of member governments for 1957, nor the military recommendations made as a result of this year's Annual Review. It is important to member governments which are anxious to make definite plans for their 1957 defence budgets, that the Council approve at the December meetings the force goals and other contributions expected from them for the continued implementation of MC 48 and MC 48/1. These documents remain the latest basic policy papers on strategic planning of NATO, and will remain valid until the military authorities have had an opportunity to review their entire strategy and defence planning in the light of the new political directive which it will receive from the Council.

9. Canadian participation in the present military reappraisal and Canadian approval of the directive therefore is not expected to require changes in Canadian defence programmes for the calendar year 1957 (roughly corresponding to Canada's fiscal year 1957-58). If in dealing with the strengthening of the defensive shield in Europe, the directive limits itself to calling upon member governments who have not yet fulfilled their present commitments, to bring their force contributions up to previously agreed levels and standards, and to maintain them there, the reappraisal would not be expected to involve a change in Canadian policy in respect of contribution to NATO forces, except insofar as European member governments might request assistance in terms of mutual aid to enable them to bring their present and planned agreed force commitments up to NATO standards. However, the directive may, in order to increase the sense of confidence of its European members, call for the continued stationing in Europe of Canadian, U.S. and U.K. forces at presently agreed levels.

10. A principal issue which is expected to be raised in the directive, however, is that the ground forces required for an effective shield should have the capability to deal with limited armed attacks without recourse to nuclear weapons in order to reduce NATO defence on nuclear weapons, tactical as well as strategic, in dealing with various possible forms of armed attack on the NATO area. This proposed requirement would be in addition to the capability to hold an identified Soviet all-out aggression until strategic nuclear air counter-offensive becomes effective. If this proposal were written into the directive, such a political requirement would, in accordance with SACEUR's views involve not only maintaining existing NATO conventional force commitments, but in addition developing a further requirement for tactical atomic weapons.

11. The Panel considers that this suggestion that NATO forces, required for an effective shield, should have the capability to deal with limited attack without recourse to nuclear weapons and, should a situation so require, also be prepared to respond quickly with nuclear weapons to any type of aggression, appears to be well beyond the economic capabilities of the Atlantic Alliance as reflected in the general Chapter of the Annual Review report. The Panel wishes also to point out that the present draft political directive represents a compromise between divergent views about the intentions and objectives of the Soviet Union in Europe and in certain areas contiguous to the NATO area at a time when these Soviet methods are still being revised and modified. It is therefore unlikely that a political directive in this form would be acceptable to all the Ministers without further clarification of its implications as well as discussion.

1956 Annual Review Report

12. While some of the preparatory work in NATO reappraisal has been done this year, there have as yet been no final decisions reached, and the Annual Review, of necessity, has had to be predicated on previous assumptions regarding the threat and the military requirements to meet it. In the light of this situation, the 1956 Annual Review has been directed toward three main objectives:

(a) The evaluation of current forces, as the essential point of departure both for fixing firm goals for 1957 and for subsequent implementation of any new strategic concept.

(b) The identification of problems which have special importance this year.

(c) The indication of limited but practical improvements which can be worked into each country's defence programme over the period 1957-59 and which may be expected to retain their validity whatever changes in strategy may later be decided.

13. The review has shown that for the alliance as a whole the ground, sea and air forces now available are inadequate to accomplish their assigned missions. Owing principally to withdrawals of forces from Europe, there has been a marked decrease during 1956 in the number of Army M-Day units. Naval forces have not yet attained the required levels; nor have the airforces, despite considerable progress in re-equipment during the year. The question of naval replacement is becoming increasingly serious, and lack of qualified personnel is reducing the effectiveness of naval forces. The majority of the air forces in Europe still fall below the desired standards of readiness. Few countries maintain more than 50 percent of assigned aircraft in a combat ready status. Large reductions are envisaged in maritime aircraft, with no improvement foreseen before 1960. It also appears unlikely that there will be significant contribution from Germany before the end of 1959.

There has, however, been a considerable improvement in the atomic capability of ground and air forces in Europe.

14. Three special problems pointed up in the 1956 Annual Review are the following:

1. The general weakness of an effective European Air Defence System.
2. The severe shortages of service technicians in all countries.
3. The replacement and modernization of equipment.

15. The military recommendations, made in the light of Council's recognition that "at present many member countries do not consider it practicable to make substantial increases in the current level of expenditure on their forces", pay special attention to priorities. The recommendations have not yet been costed and it is recognized that in view of non-military implications (and the uncertain economic prospects of many European members as a result of developments in the Middle East) a flexible approach to the solution of each country's problems is essential.

16. In the Country Chapter on Canada the International Staff has made the following recommendations to Canada:

The Canadian Government should:

- (a) At least maintain the present level of mutual aid with increasing emphasis on deliveries of equipment as expenditures on the NATO air training scheme decline.
- (b) Should, as far as possible, develop long term plans relating Canadian aid with a view of the provision of modern equipment needed to maintain the effectiveness of NATO defence.
- (c) Should take action to implement the recommendations of the NATO Military authorities.

17. These military recommendations to Canada are as follows:

- (1) Arrange for the holding in Europe of the 60 days' war reserve of the balance of the First Canadian Infantry Division.
- (2) Maintain the 70% combat ready serviceability of AWX aircraft.
- (3) Provide the mobile logistic support force commensurate with the initial deployment of earmarked naval forces in the Eastern Atlantic Area and complete arrangements to ensure the availability of non-common-user stores for those forces.
- (4) Arrange to store in Continental Europe the complete 90 days reserves for the Canadian Infantry Brigade Group in Continental Europe.

18. It is suggested that the Minister of National Defence might comment on the military recommendations as follows:

"The first recommendation refers to the holding in Europe of 60-day reserves of the balance of the First Canadian Infantry Division. It is noted that in SACEUR's latest report on the Force Posture Allied Command Europe 1960-62, the forces outside Europe are shown as earmarked for use in Allied Command Europe as a strategical reserve. This new role as a strategical reserve, indicates that the question of the holding of war reserves in Europe for this force should be reviewed. In view of this suggested change in role and in order to complete Canadian planning, a study is being carried out of the shipping required to move the 2/3 Division, its equipment and its 60-day war reserves direct from Canada to Europe shortly after M-Day.

With regard to the recommendation to maintain the 70% combat ready serviceability of our All-Weather Aircraft, Canada is hesitant to accept this standard of readiness for the CF100 until experience has been gained in the operation of this aircraft in the European theatre. If, however, experience proves that the 70% standard is a realistic figure Canada will, of course, do everything possible to achieve this standard of combat readiness.

In the light of SACLANT's report on the Pattern of Naval Forces for NATO Control in the Atlantic during the next decade Canada has some doubts regarding the initial deployment of Canadian Naval Forces in the Eastern Atlantic area. Canada does not possess mobile logistic support; however, consideration is being given to the provision of mobile logistic forces in being to support RCN forces operating in the Eastern Atlantic, and in the Canadian Atlantic Sub-Area. A bilateral arrangement to ensure the availability of common-user stores has been arranged with the United States Navy, and a similar agreement is being arranged with the British Admiralty. These arrangements include the allocation of storage space for non-common-user items which will not be stocked outside of Canada prior to the outbreak of hostilities.

With regard to the fourth recommendation concerning the arrangement to store in Continental Europe the complete 90 days reserves for the Canadian Infantry Brigade Group, negotiations are being conducted for storing in Continental Europe the 90 days reserves for the Brigade Group. In particular, arrangements are now under way to bring the reserves of items which are only Canadian requirements, up to 90 days. Progress depends on the availability of storage space. However, in view of the concept expressed in SACEUR's report on Force Posture Allied Command Europe 1960/62 that major organized land fighting will not exceed 30 days, the question of holding 90 days reserves for the Canadian Infantry Brigade Group will have to be reviewed". (an appropriate paragraph concerning Canada's mutual aid programme for 1957-58 will be added later to this proposed statement).

19. In the General Chapter the International Staff point up two main conclusions: First, that solutions to many of the major NATO defence problems, particularly those relating to modernization of forces, depend on the outcome of the Council's reappraisal of Soviet policy and the Alliance's military and economic capabilities; second, that much can and should be done within the framework of current defence plans. Although limited in scope the 1956 Review has been more than a stocktaking. Firm force goals have been established for most countries and priorities indicated.

Report by the Secretary-General for 1956

20. Under this fourth item, the Ministers will be asked to approve the Annual Report of the Secretary-General for the year 1956. Although the report has not yet been published, it is expected that the Secretary-General's report will consist chiefly of a factual account of the activities of the Organization during 1956. If this is the case, its approval should be, as in past years a formality.

Recommendations

21. In the light of the above considerations, the Panel on the economic aspects of defence questions recommends to the Cabinet Defence Committee that the Canadian Delegation to the 1956 December Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization be authorized:

(a) to approve the report of the Committee of Three and the recommendations contained in it.

(b) to participate in the formulation of a political and economic directive to the NATO military authorities having in mind the observations made in paragraphs 10 and 11 above.

(c) to approve the general report on the 1956 Annual Review, and to approve the defence planning recommended on the basis of MC 48 and MC 48/1 for the year 1957, with the reservations mentioned in paragraph 18.

(d) to consider, and if appropriate, to approve the report of the Secretary-General for 1956 on the activities of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING

I am repeating in the immediately following paragraph the text of the Secretary of State's reply of December 6 to your personal message (your telegram under reference).

2. Dear Mike: Thank you very much for your letter of December 1. I greatly appreciate your good wishes and your thoughts on the forthcoming NATO meeting in Paris. I understand that you are on the verge of leaving for Paris and I look forward to discussing with you there the questions raised in your letter. With kindest personal regards, sincerely yours, (signed) Foster.

3. In a subsequent message I shall add a number of comments which we received orally at the State Department yesterday afternoon, December 6. Mr. Dulles will hope to have a chat with you on these matters in Paris on Monday, December 10. Our delegation might get in touch with Elbrick (or Timmons) of the USA delegation to fix a time.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING

Elbrick handed to me yesterday afternoon, December 6, the Secretary of State's reply to your message. The text is contained my telegram 2246. Elbrick had gone over your message with Mr. Dulles and he gave us an indication of the Secretary's preliminary views on how the Ministers' meeting might be expected to develop.

2. Mr. Dulles looks forward to a full and free discussion in the "review of the international situation". This should certainly be frank and cover the major problems confronting members of the Alliance. At the same time care will have to be taken in the public presentation of the Council's deliberations, and in the preparation of the final communiqué, not to give the impression that NATO as such is now directing its attentions to the Middle East, or contemplating NATO initiatives in this area. All members of NATO have a legitimate and lively concern in the Middle East crisis currently before the UN; but we must avoid the impression that we have any desire to extend NATO's sphere of activity; or to act as a "bloc". All this was not to say that the Secretary disagreed with the suggestions in paragraph 4 of your letter. It was simply a caveat regarding public presentation.

3. Elbrick indicated that, with Mr. Dulles absent from Washington, the kind of detailed preparation and consultation with him that normally preceded Council sessions had not been practicable in recent weeks. Nor has it been possible for the Secretary to discuss the agenda with the Secretaries of Defense and Treasury. For this reason Mr. Dulles would expect to have meetings in Paris with his own colleagues on Monday, December 10. But he expected also to arrange for direct discussions with the UK and French Foreign Ministers, and also of course with you, before the opening of the session on Tuesday, December 11.

4. One thought which Dulles may develop in his conversations with you is that consultation within NATO on certain subjects may profitably proceed on a bilateral basis. For example, in the matter of "support" costs (and with the present financial difficulties of the UK government in mind) he may wish to deal directly with the UK representatives rather than to inject so sensitive a topic into the Council itself. Such bilateral conversations would be a first step toward subsequent discussion in the Council.

5. We had a subsequent word with Timmons about the draft political directive. The unagreed points have been greatly reduced. Since this matter is still under active discussion in Paris. I do not think we need to elaborate on USA views, which were to be expressed in the Council at yesterday's meeting, December 6. Their main preoccupation is to see to it that there is an adequate reference in the directive to the need for avoiding jeopardizing the security of the NATO area through the withdrawal of forces for other purposes.

6. I am sending you a separate message† about USA views on the Secretary-Generalship.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — RESTRICTED SESSION ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

General statements were given on December 11 by Norway, USA, UK, France, Belgium, Greece, Denmark, Netherlands, Portugal and Turkey.

2. Norway, USA, Belgium, Denmark and Netherlands spoke with varying degrees of forcefulness about UK-French action in Egypt, using such words as "shocking", "blow", "surprise" and "disappointment". Dulles spoke at some length on the importance of moral pressures UK and France undertook to justify their actions. If there was a common theme, it was that nothing would be gained by recriminations about the past and that we must look to the future.

3. There was no real discussion, but rather a series of set speeches establishing the points of special interest to the country concerned. Despite the supposed secrecy of the proceedings, the major statements are well covered in the press.

4. The Chairman ended the meeting to avoid having to decide whether that was the proper time for an argument between the Greek and Turkish Foreign Ministers over Cyprus. Restricted session continues on December 12.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — SECOND RESTRICTED SESSION ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION, DEC 12

1. The second round of this discussion began inauspiciously with a wrangle on familiar lines between Greece and Turkey over Cyprus. When the Chairman suggested application of the Committee of Three report settlement procedures, Selwyn Lloyd said that while he had no objection to discussing Cyprus in NATO, any further negotiations should await Lord Radcliffe's proposals for self-government. In any case, as the Greek Foreign Minister pointed out, Cyprus was already on the UN Assembly agenda.

2. As the dialogue between Menderes and Averoff seemed likely to be interminable, I reminded the Council that if as much leaked out of the present discussion as had done of the previous day's, the public would inevitably gain the impression that NATO members were persisting in their divergencies on Cyprus as they were on the Middle East. This gave Selwyn Lloyd the cue to make a restrained and effective appeal for agreement on some of the "loose ends" of Middle East policy. He suggested consideration of a UN controlled demilitarized zone between Israel and Egypt, assumption of responsibility by the UN for the Gaza Strip, and possible extension of UN functions to cover all Israeli frontiers.

3. I then made a statement developing some of our ideas of possible objectives in Middle East policy, suggesting that an effort be made to seek common ground on the Middle East between the powers most directly concerned with a view to harmonizing these policies in the UN, which must retain primary responsibility for working out solutions.

4. Pineau followed up with a constructive intervention suggesting negotiations on the Suez Canal and on a settlement of Arab-Israeli relations in the UN through small committees, but with preparatory consultations between the powers most directly concerned.

5. Dulles, who seems to be holding back from entering into any discussions on Middle East with the British and French pending the Nehru visit, questioned the priority of the Council discussing the Middle East as a non-NATO area even before the Committee of Three report had been adopted. In any case he said that he had not brought any Middle East experts among his, as usual, large retinue of officials. He also quoted from the record of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the ratification of the Treaty about the Senate's reservations concerning a NATO bloc in international organizations.

6. Spaak and Lange, however, took up the line of argument I had suggested urging the need to work out agreement on objectives of Middle East policy if divergencies in the allies were to be overcome. Lange also pointed out that it was not proposed that the Council should enter into the details of Middle East solutions, but that the Council should surely concern itself with the general objectives on which members might try to concert policies. They also agreed that any agreement reached on objectives should be reflected in the communiqué.

7. After Luns had suggested postponement of further discussion in restricted session to take up the Committee of Three report and thus remove another procedural obstacle raised by Dulles, Martino tried to sum up the discussion but Dulles wanted to see his summary in writing before agreeing to it.

8. Discussion on the international situation in restricted session will be continued December 13. Brentano is to lead off a consideration of European policy.

MINISTERIAL MEETING — ITEM IV, NATO DEFENCE EFFORT — POLITICAL DIRECTIVE

Ministers also disposed on decode of Item IV, Political Directive, Document C.(56)138. There were no comments on Part I, analysis of Soviet intentions. A number of drafting points were raised in connection with Part II — the directive but little discussion of substance took place. Return party will bring text approved by Council.

2. Discussion was opened with briefing by General Johnson on behalf of Standing Group. Briefing as similar to that given to Military Committee last week, and earlier to Permanent Council. General Norstad spoke to stress NATO's lack of good intelligence and its dependence on national contributions. (All governments?) were invited to assist in this field.

3. Three main points emerged from discussion under Item IV:

(a) Nothing should be said or done which might lead Soviet leaders to think that nuclear retaliation might not be used in case of aggression by conventional forces.

(b) Importance of assurance that USA, Canadian and UK forces will continue to be stationed in Europe, and

(c) A clear warning by Macmillan that, unless there were arrangements to eliminate "inequities" in defence contributions, (UK government?) could not go on assuming responsibility for defence costs requiring payments in foreign exchange, e.g. German currency for support costs.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION — THIRD RESTRICTED SESSION, DEC 13

1. In view of the leaks of partial info to the press (particularly from the USA delegation), it was agreed that the NATO press officer would give full briefings on Council discussions.

2. Brentano, in putting forward his interpretation of recent developments in Eastern Europe, made the following points:

(a) He was inclined to share with the USA a more serious view of the implications rather than the more optimistic UK view;

(b) That totalitarian systems when faced with internal troubles are apt to have recourse to external actions to overcome their difficulties;

(c) Vital importance for the West to be united in facing these new dangers;

(d) Importance for NATO to have the necessary military strength to achieve a forward strategy;

(e) NATO should have the capability of dealing with limited military attack and not be entirely dependent on nuclear weapons, since Germany might well be the theatre of operations;

(f) That the evolutionary process towards freedom should be allowed to develop in the satellites, and that they should not be encouraged to rebel;

(g) That Germany will not be seduced by any apparently favourable developments in relations between Germany and the USSR, and that the allies would be consulted;

(h) That Western Germany would exercise moderating influence in Eastern zone, but that the turmoil was full of danger for Germany, and that they were watching particularly whether Gomulka would be able to consolidate his position in Poland;

(i) That Germany would watch for any opportunity for diplomatic action in pursuit of reunification; that they do not expect results shortly but would keep in close touch with their allies.

3. Concluding, Brentano said that the people of Eastern Europe had the right to know the position of the West in relation to their struggle for freedom. He therefore proposed that the Council should adopt a joint declaration containing following points:

(i) All peace-loving peoples shall support the right of the nations of Eastern Europe to self-determination and self-government in full freedom.

(ii) The political order in the countries of Eastern Europe shall be based on national independence, sovereignty and the banning of any imperialistic subjugation of small nations.

(iii) All nations in Eastern Europe shall have the right to decide themselves and in full freedom on the social order in their territories.

(iv) The internal development of the countries of Eastern Europe shall not be influenced by military force or threats or by economic and political pressure.

(v) The human rights of the population of the countries of Eastern Europe shall be inviolable.

(vi) The General Assembly of the UN shall ensure the observance of these obligations.

4. The Minister, recalling that the UN Assembly was discussing Hungary, questioned the propriety of asking the UN Assembly to ensure the observance of these obligations. He said that Brentano's important statement required careful study. Mr. Dulles said that while he was sympathetic to the idea of the declaration, he agreed with Mr. Pearson on the point about the UN. He suggested that appropriate mention might be made of Brentano's six points in the communiqué.⁶⁰

5. This concluded the discussion on the international situation.

MINISTERIAL MEETING — ITEM V — PRESENT STATUS OF THE NATO
MILITARY EFFORT

Following is the text of Mr. Campney's statement made under Item V of the agenda contained in CA(56)68: Text begins:

"I would like to make a brief statement regarding the Canadian position as reflected in the Annual Review presently under discussion.

⁶⁰ Voir Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord, Textes des communiqués finals, 1949-1974, Bruxelles: Service de l'information OTAN, s.d., pp. 105-109.
See North Atlantic Council, Texts of Final Communiqués, 1949-1974, Brussels: NATO Information Service, n.d., pp. 101-104.

The main recommendations so far as Canada is concerned deal with the problem of logistic support for our ground forces and for the ships which will be made available to SACLANT. These matters have already been given very careful consideration and I am able to say that we will meet the requirement of providing 30 days logistic support.

In regard to support beyond 30 days, because of the statements made in SACEUR's latest report on Force Posture we consider that the question of reserves beyond 30 days, particularly the stockpiling of equipment for forces of the strategic reserve, should be reconsidered.

As mentioned in the political directive, which was discussed in Council yesterday, the Canadian Government intends for the present to maintain Canadian forces in Europe. I might point out in that connection that when some weeks ago Canada decided to earmark up to 2,500 troops for service in the UN emergency force for police duty in the Middle East, they were designated from troops within Canada and without disturbing our existing forces in Europe.

With respect to Canadian mutual aid from its commencement up to the end of the Canadian fiscal year 1956-57, the total contribution made by Canada to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization by way of mutual aid is approximately 1 billion 400 million dollars. Of this total, over one billion consists of equipment and material transferred from Canadian production and service stocks, including $318,000,000 in aircraft, engines, and space parts. Expenditures on NATO aircrew training during the same period will be about $380,000,000.

During the next fiscal year, expenditures on NATO aircrew training, although still substantial, will be less than they have been in recent years as the number of trainees will be declining.

On the other hand, the expenditures on equipment content will be increasing.

In general, the emphasis on modern equipment will be maintained in the planning of the Canadian programme and account will be taken of recommendations made during the course of this Annual Review by the international staff. The desirability of long term planning is recognized by Canada and we will continue to do what is practicable, but some limitations must in fact be placed on our long range planning owing to the necessity of integrating it with the requirements of the Canadian forces at home.

It is planned to continue Canadian mutual aid during the next fiscal year at approximately the same order of magnitude as at present." Text ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETING
PARIS, DECEMBER 11-14, 1956

This meeting of the Council was a difficult, as well as a very important one, in the sense that it reflected some of the differences — and irritations — that had been created over the Suez intervention by the United Kingdom and France. It also presented an opportunity for easing those differences. The British, particularly Selwyn Lloyd, were sensitive and defensive. They were not able to resist the temptation to try to justify their Suez actions at every opportunity. They were also inclined to exaggerate casual critical observations by the Americans — into proof of either hostility or lack of understanding or both.

The Americans — or some of them — seemed to be a little self-righteous and retained some traces of the feeling of moral indignation which the Anglo-French action — without consultation — had provoked. Dulles' speeches often take the form, even when they do not possess the substance, of moral lectures and this was the more noticeable at this session because of the somewhat suspicious atmosphere which existed. The British and French, smarting under the failure of their enterprise, were in no mood to receive sermons gracefully. Their sensitiveness and Dulles' natural insensitiveness made for one or two awkward moments in the discussions.

On the other hand, it is only fair to add that some of Dulles' observations were very friendly and constructive, while, according to Lloyd, he could not have been more warm and understanding in his private talks. In his talks with me also, Dulles said nothing critical or offensive about the British or French. He adopted a "more in sorrow than in anger" attitude.

Lloyd, however — and this is a very unhappy development — told me that he now wondered whether he could any longer put any trust in Dulles' fair words or friendly attitudes. He had learned through the grapevine that while Dulles had been discussing things with him personally, amicably and reassuringly, some of his officials at parties, etc., had been passing on what they indicated were Dulles' views of a more bitter anti-British character. According to Lloyd — whom I advised not to pay too much attention to this kind of gossip — the culprit in Paris had been Douglas MacArthur, as in Washington it is Rountree.

I think it is fair to say that at this meeting the United States attitude, generally, gave the impression that the United Kingdom and France were still "on probation" though likely soon to be respectable again, while that of the British and French was "unrevised and unrepentant".

Incidentally, Lloyd was very warm in his praise of George Humphrey who, in contrast to Dulles, he found to be warm, human and straightforward even when he disagreed.

It must be remembered, however, on the credit side that Dulles agreed, though not without doubts and after some amendments, to the paragraphs in the communiqué which emphasized the necessity for NATO co-operation in the Middle East and for a speedy and effective settlement of the Israel-Arab, and Suez problems. Dulles is probably right in his fears that the United States — in such agreement — may have prejudiced to some extent the stronger position they have at the moment with the Arab-Asians. They are again associating with bad companions!

Another United States attitude which caused some impatience in non-American circles was the emphasis placed at every possible opportunity on the United Nations as the great agency for conciliation and for the settlement of all problems. American zeal now, in contrast with past performance, notably in Guatemala, as the British keep sardonically reminding us — may later be shown to have outrun discretion. There may be occasions in the future when they may not wish the United Nations to take such an active part, and when the praise which they are heaping on the U.N. now may boomerang.

I reminded our American friends of this, somewhat obliquely, in one intervention, and also — less obliquely — when I said that reliance on the United Nations is no substitute for effective national policies or for co-operation inside a coalition.

This new zeal in Washington for the United Nations is in contrast to the increasing disillusionment in France and the United Kingdom over the world organization. This feeling has indeed led to some active opposition in these two countries to the whole U.N. concept and performance.

There were one or two other members of the Council who shared in general the British and French reservations and anxieties about United States attitudes at this Council meeting, but the only one who was outspoken in this regard was Luns of the Netherlands. He has a cynical if witty tongue and doesn't mind against whom he uses it; especially in private conversations where — as he must know — his "anti-American" sallies are bound to be repeated. Selwyn Lloyd himself cannot resist conversational verbal sallies against the Americans on occasions, some of which, no doubt, eventually reach them.

I would say that this Council session confirmed that the breach between Washington and London and Paris is a serious one. It also, however, began the process of repairing the damage. The Communiqué was better for this purpose than we could have expected earlier in the week, and the session ended on a friendly and co-operative note, due in large part to Dulles' closing remarks, which were good.

My own view is that this process of healing would move more speedily and effectively if the three or four personalities chiefly involved in London, Paris and Washington were replaced. A distrust has arisen between them — both personally and officially — which is going to persist for a long time. The Council may have — though I am not sure of this — lessened that personal mutual distrust. It certainly has not removed it.

There will be difficult days ahead because of Suez and its failures and frustrations; difficult especially for Anglo-French-American relations, but difficult also for the United Nations, now unrealistically exalted by one side and the object of irritated impatience and growing suspicion on the other; difficult even for NATO itself as this recent meeting, successful on the whole as it was, has shown.

N.A.T.O.; REPORT ON MINISTERIAL MEETING

23. The Secretary of State for External Affairs considered that the most important result of the recent N.A.T.O. meeting was that some progress had been made in restoring the unity of the alliance. The U.S. secretary of state had had private talks with the U.K. foreign secretary and the French foreign minister which had been useful and friendly. However, differences over Egypt remained deep and it would be a long time before confidence would be restored. Personally, he doubted if it would be completely restored so long as the present personalities remained in charge.

It was the consensus of the meeting that a major war was less likely to occur now but that the possibilities of a peripheral war had increased. It was also felt that the chances of such a war becoming general were greater now due to miscalculation. Russia was no longer fully in control of its satellites in eastern Europe and might strike out in desperation. The most dangerous area was East Germany. If there was a revolution there, the West Germans would immediately come to the assistance of their fellow countrymen east of the Elbe and a world war could easily begin. The Bonn government was acutely aware of this and had cautioned against provoking trouble in East Germany.

For the first time the N.A.T.O. ministers had discussed actively and at length a situation outside the treaty area — the Middle East. The U.S. secretary of state had been opposed to this but the other representatives had insisted on such discussion. It would have been unfortunate if Mr. Dulles had had his way at a time when the question of increased consultation was before the council and in the present world situation.

The Committee of Three report on co-operation in non-military fields had been amended and approved.⁶¹ Mr. Dulles had made some moderate remarks on the question of consultation, but a distorted version of what he had said about the U.S. reserving its rights to decide questions alone had reached the press in a way calculated to help in Congress but likely to make trouble in N.A.T.O.

Mr. Spaak of Belgium had been chosen to succeed General Ismay as Secretary-General. He was a forceful character and a strong European and would introduce a different spirit into N.A.T.O. consultations.

The council had also agreed on a new political directive to provide guidance to the military commanders. The U.S. forces were now equipped with tactical atomic weapons and when the U.S. law was amended, as was quite possible, other countries might also obtain such arms. The directive was designed to guard against the mistaken use of such weapons, and to guide the military as to what action they should take in different circumstances. Needless to say, this was as difficult a problem as it was important.

24. The Minister of National Defence reported that the pressure from European countries to have tactical weapons was increasing as these became more readily available and as conventional forces were reduced. The British and French had already removed many of their units elsewhere. The U.S. was likely to reduce the size of its divisions but maintain their fire power with new weapons. Canada was the only nation that seemed to maintain the strength of its forces but this would be difficult in future in the face of reduced manpower contributions by other N.A.T.O. countries.

25. Mr. Pearson went on to say that in the Middle East, the U.S. had agreed to work on Suez and Palestine settlements but it was not pressing ahead with the work involved. Mr. Nehru was probably urging that things be allowed to settle down first but Mr. Pearson thought he was wrong in so doing. If the U.K. and France were confronted with no action on these problems as their forces withdrew, bitterness would increase. There would be great difficulties in reaching agreements on the future of the Suez Canal and on Palestine, but it was imperative to press ahead nevertheless. As regards the effect of hostilities in Egypt, the U.K. government was labouring under the wrong impression that the fighting had resulted in relatively few civilian casualties. In fact, destruction had been severe and hundreds of people had been killed.

The Iceland problem appeared to be settled for the moment. Icelanders had been so revolted by the incidents in Hungary and their feeling of danger had so increased that the communist party there agreed not to object to the continuance of the base arrangements with the United States.

The whole European situation had reached the point where both the west and the Russians were faced with a pretty thorough revision of their policies. One had to consider the possibility of a belt of neutral nations like Austria across the centre of Europe, including a unified Germany. The price for this would be the withdrawal of troops both by Russia and N.A.T.O. Such an arrangement was not possible without a real settlement with the U.S.S.R. The German foreign minister was now willing to talk of such a solution in private. It might mean that West Germany would have to withdraw from N.A.T.O. but Germany would be unified, even though its eastern borders would only extend to the Oder-Neisse line.

26. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the recent ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and on Middle East questions which had arisen during the discussions.

APPRECIATION OF THE NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING HELD IN PARIS
FROM DECEMBER 11 TO DECEMBER 14

This series of Ministerial meetings was generally regarded as of special importance. International developments since the death of Stalin had reduced, if not removed, the threat of all-out military aggression. Hopeful speculation about whether this could be reflected in reduced defence commitments had placed new strains upon the coalition. It was generally realized that if these were allowed to subsist they might ultimately undermine confidence in NATO and impair its effectiveness as an instrument of collective defence. Moreover, the crisis in the Middle East had undoubtedly shaken confidence among the three major powers, whose cooperation is essential to that assembling of superior power which is one of the main justifications of the coalition.

2. Another important factor was the decision of the Council last May to appoint a Committee of three Ministers to advise on ways and means to improve and extend NATO cooperation in non-military fields. While taking into account the new Soviet emphasis on penetration through political and economic measures, this report did not overlook the fact that events in Eastern Europe showed that the Soviet Union will not hesitate in certain circumstances to use force and the threat of force. Thus while NATO's mutual defence guarantee still remains, as the report points out, the "cornerstone of the foreign and defence policies" of NATO members, the measures of political and economic cooperation which the report recommends should, if applied by governments, serve to avoid a recurrence of the crisis of confidence through which NATO has passed.

Discussion on the International Situation

(a) The Middle East

3. With this kind of background the meetings began with an appeal from the Chairman, Dr. Martino, Foreign Minister of Italy, for further efforts to attain common policies on matters of common concern outside, as well as inside, the NATO area. However, in the discussion which followed, the consideration of Middle East questions was limited by the obvious reluctance of Mr. Dulles to enter into any detailed talks in formal session which might seem to prejudice discussions in the United Nations. Mr. Dulles in fact questioned the propriety of the Council discussing the Middle East — a non-NATO area — without the representation of governments whose interests were as directly or more directly concerned. He also quoted from the record of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the ratification of the Treaty to emphasize the Senate's opposition to the formation of a NATO bloc in other international organizations.

4. While it was agreed that the Council should not enter into the details of Middle East solutions, it was thought necessary (as the communiqué indicated) that the meetings should at least reach a common understanding on the general objectives on which members might try to concert policies. Otherwise it would appear that the divergencies on the Middle East were such that they could not even be discussed. With some reluctance Mr. Dulles agreed. However, although some moderately useful bilateral talks took place between Mr. Dulles and the U.K. and French Foreign Ministers on some aspects of Middle East problems, such as the clearing of the Suez Canal, divergencies on policy matters, as Mr. Dulles put it, were buried at this stage rather than resolved.

(b) Eastern Europe

5. The review of the international situation ranged far and wide, with each Foreign Minister stressing those aspects which were of chief concern to his government. The German Foreign Minister for instance took the lead in stressing that the present turmoil in Eastern Europe was full of dangers for Germany as well as for the Alliance as a whole, and that nothing should be done to interfere with the evolutionary process towards freedom in the satellites. The Federal Government was particularly anxious that no untimely, active opposition be aroused at this time in East Germany. Dr. Brentano concluded by suggesting that the people of Eastern Europe had the right to know the position of the West in relation to their struggle for freedom and proposed the adoption of a joint declaration containing a number of lofty if somewhat platitudinous thoughts, some of which was incorporated in the final communiqué.

6. Although Dr. Brentano referred to the continuing hopes of the German Government for early reunification, and indicated that his government would exploit any opportunity for diplomatic action in pursuit of this objective, it was clear that Germany's principal effort had now been deflected by events to the prevention of any untimely explosion in Eastern Europe.

7. There was no detailed discussion of Dr. Brentano's appreciation of the situation in Eastern Europe, but it is worth mentioning that Mr. Dulles seemed more inclined than

Mr. Lloyd to side with the German Foreign Minister in taking a serious view of its possibilities, particularly because of the risk that totalitarian régimes are apt to have recourse to external diversions when faced with internal difficulties.

Committee of Three Report

8. This report was generally well received. Mr. Lloyd who spoke first, urged its endorsement by the Council. Mr. Dulles interpreted what the Report had to say on prior political consultation as not meaning that member governments must in all cases obtain NATO's concurrence before taking action. The United States, he recalled, had a number of mutual defence pacts, and it would be impractical in the event of a major emergency arising outside the NATO area to expect the United States Government to tie their hands in advance to seek prior approval of the Council on all occasions before coming to the defence of other states to which the United States was bound by treaty obligations. Mr. Dulles made it clear however, that his approach did not imply any reluctance to discuss the developing policies of the U.S. Government and commitments in all parts of the world in NATO; indeed he said that "the U.S.A. Government would be prepared to discuss and explain its policies before the NATO Council with respect to every situation in the world, but when the situation is calm and when the necessity of action was not directly upon us." What he wished to avoid was a misunderstanding of the United States position which might lead to recriminations afterwards.

9. To meet certain interpretative comments made by Mr. Dulles and some reservations on the part of some delegations, particularly the French, the Council approved the recommendations of the report, leaving it to the Permanent Council and the Secretary-General to follow up its implementation. This approval could in due time constitute an important step forward for NATO, if member governments show a willingness to develop the habit of mutual consultation and use the procedures recommended for the settlement of inter-member differences to strengthen the solidarity of the Alliance.

Military Affairs

10. In the military field the Council, apart from giving its approval to the usual Annual Review reports, also approved a political directive for future military planning, taking into account a NATO estimate of Soviet intentions and capabilities and the various types of new weapons available for NATO defence.⁶² This directive does not actually call for any fundamental change in the NATO strategic concept. There was no disposition, for instance, to modify the understanding that governments would be prepared to use nuclear weapons in the event of overt Soviet military aggression. Recognizing, however, that the risk of direct military aggression has probably receded, while that of indirect aggression has not, the political directive does emphasize the need for the NATO military planners to have on hand conventional forces designed to deal locally with situations short of all-out war such as infiltrations, incursions and local hostile actions by the Soviets, or by the satellites with or without Soviet support.

11. There was naturally on the part of many member governments considerable concern about the increasing cost of defence, and about the implications of trying to maintain large conventional forces to deal with limited attacks, in addition to forces equipped with tactical nuclear weapons. The United Kingdom delegation, in particular, made a strong plea for reducing the burdens of defence expenditure, especially those arising from the necessity of providing foreign exchange to finance its troops stationed in Germany. The United Kingdom Government apparently look to the Government of the Federal Republic for some temporary relief in providing financial support for the United Kingdom troops stationed in Germany. The reaction of the German Foreign Minister to the Chancellor's statement reflected an obvious desire to avoid any controversy which might jeopardize the continued stationing of U.K. forces in Europe. Thus Dr. Brentano said that he thought the problem of support costs could surely be resolved in a friendly and helpful way.

12. The review of the military planning of the Alliance also provided the European members with an opportunity to reaffirm their desire to see their own troops equipped as soon as possible with tactical atomic weapons from the United States. While the United States representatives recognized in principle the desirability as well as the necessity for NATO forces being provided with weapons of "dual capacity", (i.e. weapons capable of using nuclear as well as conventional projectiles), they refrained from making any specific commitments and left the matter to later bilateral negotiations.

13. Firm assurances were also sought that United States, United Kingdom and Canadian troops would continue to be stationed in Europe as part of the NATO shield. Apart from the reductions hinted at by the U.K. representatives and references to "streamlining" of existing U.S. ground formations, this assurance was forthcoming. Insofar as Canada was concerned, Mr. Campney said: "The Canadian Government intends for the present to maintain forces in Europe".

Organization of Meeting

14. This series of meetings justified Canadian insistence over the years that Ministerial meetings should last at least four days. There was more time for informal discussions and consultations outside the regular meetings. But there was the usual trouble about attendance at "restricted sessions" of the Council. At no time was the attendance for these discussions less than 80 to 100 persons. There were also the usual leaks of partial information from these restricted sessions to the Press. After it had become clear that certain delegations, particularly the U.S., were giving their side of the story, the Council authorized the Secretariat to provide the press with full briefings. This does not make for intimacy in consultations, but is probably inevitable with ministerial meetings.

Conclusions

15. While these meetings cannot be said to have taken the Alliance very far along the road of restoring agreement between the major powers on the Middle East, a start was made on the repair of the Alliance, particularly through informal talks which justified the comment from Mr. Dulles that the meetings had been important and productive, and had led the Alliance to show "renewed evidence of vigour and unity".

16. Militarily, SACEUR was assured of additional modern weapons to reinforce his military shield across Europe. The principle of the nuclear deterrent was safeguarded, but there was general acceptance of the need, in the face of events in Hungary, not to lower the military guard and to be prepared to cope with local and limited attacks.

17. The appointment of M. Paul-Henri Spaak to the Secretary-Generalship in succession to Lord Ismay to take effect next April, was given added significance by the concurrent approval of the recommendations of the Committee of Three which offer the Secretary-General wider authority and opportunity for initiative. The selection of a political personality for this office also underlined the new phase into which NATO is entering, with a new emphasis on non-military co-operation as an essential complement to continued cooperation in defence.

UK PROPOSALS FOR REDUCING DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

At the private session of the Council on February 14 the UK Representative made a complete statement concerning the measures which his government were taking to reduce defence expenditures. This statement is being sent to you in our immediately following telegram.†

2. He said that this statement was being given at the WEU meeting which was being held at the same time. While the details of the proposals had been discussed informally with SACEUR during his recent [visit] to London, no formal approach to obtain his judgement of the effects on NATO defence had been made. He therefore suggested that the Council might wish to make such a formal approach in Ministerial session on February 26 at which time these proposals would be discussed in the light of SACEUR's military assessment.

3. It was the general feeling of the Council that this was a matter of the gravest concern and that the early date of the WEU Ministerial meeting required very rapid action on the part of NATO. While the Council normally processed all military matters through the Standing Group, it would be necessary in this instance to approach SACEUR direct in the interest of speed. This procedure was further justified in that 90 percent of the effect of the proposals would be felt in SACEUR's forces. Thus it was agreed that the Standing Group Representative should personally give SACEUR a copy of the statement with the Council's formal request for SACEUR to provide to the Council as quickly as possible his military assessment of the effects of these proposals.

4. In further discussing the procedure to be adopted the German Representative expressed the view that it would be very difficult for SACEUR to produce the full military impact in writing and that it would be very useful if SACEUR could present his views personally as well as to answer any questions of clarification. As several other representatives supported this proposal, it was therefore agreed that SACEUR would prepare his appraisal in writing and distribute it to all countries as soon as possible. The Standing Group Representative said that SACEUR had been working on this problem for some time and that it should be possible for him to produce his appraisal within one week's time.

After this appraisal had been digested and before February 26, SACEUR would be invited to attend a Council meeting to be held either at SHAPE or the Palais de Chaillot, whichever is the most suitable, to clarify further and to amplify his paper.

5. Regarding publicity, the UK Representative said his government's position is not to announce any of the details of the proposals until full consultation had taken place in WEU and NATO. If any press enquiries were made they would simply state that the proposals have been placed before the WEU and NATO Councils where they were now under consideration. The Council then agreed to adhere to this statement and while admitting they were studying the details, not reveal them.

6. Thus the procedure will be for countries to study the UK statement and to coordinate these studies with SACEUR's paper when it is available. We will send this paper to you immediately it is received. We will then be able to put forth questions and comments at the Council meeting at which SACEUR will be present. We would, therefore, appreciate having your comments and guidance in time for this meeting.

UK PROPOSALS FOR REDUCING DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

We have examined in conjunction with Chairman Chiefs of Staff your telegrams under reference in the light of our earlier guidance and of the recent discussions in Washington and Ottawa with the UK Defence Minister. You will find below a number of considerations by which you may be guided when the matter is discussed in Council on February 22. The text of additional observations by General Foulkes will also be found in my immediately following telegram which will provide you with a useful summary of our approach in NATO to the question of the reduction of force contributions on economic grounds by any of the NATO partners, and on the basis of which the present telegram has been prepared.

2. As SACEUR's assessment has not yet reached us, our initial reaction is that nothing too specific can be said at this stage about the UK proposals, until we have a clearer idea of the extent to which they will affect the strength of the present UK military contribution to NATO, and the overall strength of NATO forces in Europe. One of the questions for instance to which an answer will presumably have in due time to be supplied is whether the UK proposed reductions in manpower will only take place in strict relation to an increase of the military capabilities of the remaining forces. We are not sure also if it is the UK intention to effect the reduction by withdrawing one division or by leaving the present structure and reducing each of the existing four divisions. Mention is made in the reorganization plans of three tactical division headquarters although Mr. Sandys has been reported by the press as saying that the UK government would continue to maintain four divisions in Europe.

3. Another uncertain point concerns the extent to which the UK government will insist that its proposals be considered as a fait accompli. It is true that the UK statement affords an opportunity for SACEUR to comment on the proposals and for member governments to study them. At the same time these proposals have already received a great amount of publicity and have been presented as constituting fairly firm decisions on the part of the UK government. It seems to us that if we want to preserve the value and the significance of the Annual Review process and of the current military reappraisal, we must start from the premise that these proposals cannot be examined by themselves alone but that they must be brought into the context of the Annual Review process and studied in conjunction with the defence plans of the other NATO countries.

4. It would almost certainly be detrimental in the long run to the military strength of the organization if the Council felt that it had to rush a decision on the UK proposals without adequate processing by all the NATO military authorities concerned and proper consideration by other NATO governments and the Standing Group. Any reorganization of the land forces of the UK in Europe along the lines of the present proposals will obviously have considerable repercussions on the other national forces stationed in Europe, and more particularly those operating in the Northern Army Group. A careful examination of these repercussions would seem to be equally important before NATO can begin to talk about adopting the UK proposals.

5. On the other hand it has always been the view of the Canadian government since the formation of unified forces in Europe that, while Canada should give consideration to the views of the NATO military authorities regarding the character and formation of our contributions to the NATO forces, the decision as to the size and extent of such forces must rest with the Canadian government. This view is of course also in line with the TCC resolution at Lisbon and the practice accepted by the Council for the operation of the Annual Review.

6. In these circumstances and especially since we have not had yet the opportunity of taking cognizance of SACEUR's assessment, the following approach on our part in any discussion of the UK proposals would seem at this stage desirable:

(a) We should abstain for the moment from expressing specific comments regarding the nature of the proposals or the need for the reductions which they entail.

(b) We should however go along with any suggestion that the Council should refrain for the time being from approving these proposals, but merely note them. (We must in other words safeguard the right of the Council as well as of each member state to carry out a full examination of all the plans of the member states in the course of this year's Annual Review).

(c) If the appropriate occasion presents itself, you may suggest that the possible reorganization of forces on the basis of Brigade Groups, as the UK proposals seem to imply, should also be given careful study by the NATO military authorities, in an effort to ensure a standard organization through the NATO commands in Europe. (As our following telegram explains, Canadian military authorities will be taking steps to ascertain the intentions of the war office regarding the Canadian Brigade Group, although this need not be mentioned at this stage in Council.)

(d) If convenient during the discussions which the Council will have with SACEUR on the UK proposals, you may also refer to the problem raised by the disproportionate size of all NATO headquarters, particularly air force headquarters, at a time when the actual forces in being committed to NATO are well below the strength originally envisaged, and further reductions are now being contemplated.

7. In view of the above, we have no objection to having SACEUR meet with the Council on February 22 as already arranged, but we would expect however that another such meeting would be arranged in a week or so when all governments will have had time to digest SACEUR's assessment and any other data which he will have given on February 22.

UK PROPOSALS FOR REDUCING DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Following is text of additional comments made by Chairman Chiefs of Staff, with which we are in general agreement and the substance of which has been reflected in our immediately preceding telegram:

Text begins:

2. "At the Council meeting in Lisbon in February 1952, the temporary Council suggested a resolution which was agreed to by the Council, and paragraph 12(a) states:

'Resolves that the realization of adequate defensive strength and its continued support by the governments and peoples of the North Atlantic Treaty countries require sound economic and social foundations which can be developed only by a satisfactory rate of general economic expansion;'

When the Annual Review procedure was agreed to, the Secretary-General produced a paper in August 1952 as the background of the nation's Annual Review. This paper was accepted by the Council as a working document for the procedures of the Annual Review, and in this document Lord Ismay laid down the resolution of country contribution to their national economy as follows:

'To sum up, the best chance of preventing Russian aggression in Europe, and the only chance of a successful resistance to such aggression if it should occur, lies in the continued determination of the North Atlantic Community to build up at the earliest possible date the strongest possible collective strength in Europe, subject to the following limitations:

(a) No country must undertake commitments which would bankrupt its national economy.

(b) The capacity to hold the ring in the cold war must not be impaired'.

3. The resolution on important changes in National Defence efforts, approved in October 1955, provides for the following:

'The government concerned shall inform the Council and the appropriate NATO military authorities of the changes contemplated. This shall be done, whenever possible, in time for the Council's views to be fully considered by the government concerned before the execution of decisions on the matters in question'.

4. It has been the consistent view of Canadian Ministers since the formation of unified forces in Europe, that Canada should give consideration to the views of the NATO military authorities regarding the character and formation of our contributions to the NATO forces, but that the size and extent of such forces must rest with the decision of the Canadian government. Therefore, it is our belief that since the U.K. reduction of forces has been based on an economic necessity, it would appear that this is consistent with the T.C.C. resolution at Lisbon, and the practice accepted by the Council for the operation of the Annual Review, and with the accepted NATO procedure. It also appears to be in line with the Canadian views on the rights of national governments to decide the size and extent of national contributions. Therefore, I feel that it would not be appropriate for us to make any comment on the validity of the U.K. position in reducing its forces on economic grounds. Furthermore, any Canadian comment on the effect of such reductions in NATO may lead to a suggestion being made that because of Canada's buoyant economic position, we might be able to withstand a further contribution to balance out some of the reductions suggested by the U.K.

5. The immediate effect and the significance of such reductions will, no doubt, be brought out by SACEUR when he appears before the Council next week, but the ultimate effects of such reductions along with the plans of other partners in this direction cannot be adequately assessed until after the Annual Review Committee has completed its examination. It is felt that on the question of the appropriateness and extent of such reductions, it would only be appropriate for our representative to suggest that the Council note the U.K.'s reductions and to reserve any final comment on the effect of these reductions on the Alliance as a whole until after the Annual Review Committee could make a report.

6. There are other important changes besides the extent of these reductions which should be considered. The U.K. proposals have considerably changed the character of the forces and their proposals involve a major reorganization of the ground forces of the U.K. stationed in Europe. This reorganization will have considerable repercussions on the other nationals who operate in the Northern Army Group. The U.K. proposals change the basic organization of land forces from that of the Division to a Brigade Group. This revision radically changes the logistic system which will become divorced from the Division and the administration and logistic support proceeds direct from the Corps to the Brigade Group. The adoption of such a reorganization might prove to be very beneficial to NATO, but we believe that such a change would have serious repercussions on other members of the Alliance, and should be studied by the other members of NATO with a view to its adoption should it prove to be advantageous. An early opportunity for such examination could be made at the next meeting of the Military Committee, which is expected to take place in Washington early in April. This might well prove to be a good opportunity to standardize the ground force organization for Allied Command Europe.

7. From a purely Canadian standpoint, these changes may have considerable effect, and the Chief of the General Staff is requesting the Vice-Chief, who is now in London, to find out from the War Office the implications of these changes on our forces in Europe. It will be noted that the U.K. reorganization provides for three tactical divisional headquarters and five infantry brigade groups; to operate these three tactical divisional headquarters they will need six Brigade Groups. This organization seems to indicate that the Canadian Brigade Group now in Europe is to be included under one of the tactical divisional headquarters. The information in this telegram seems to indicate that the size of the Brigade Group will be considerably reduced, as they refer to two brigade groups comprising 5,000 officers and men. The present strength of our Brigade Group in Europe is over 5,000. It would therefore appear that we would be required to follow this reorganization if our Brigade Group is to be included in the U.K. Division.

8. With regard to the reorganization of the Air Force, this has no specific affect on our Canadian forces in Europe as we operate under the USA Tactical Air Force. The proposed changes referred to in paragraphs 13 and 14, indicate that the reductions would be made in the numbers of aircraft of the squadrons, and the large overhead of the Tactical Air Force appears to be maintained although the number of aircraft available in the Tactical Air Force is 216, which is very much less than the numbers we maintain in a subordinate organization in the Canadian Air Division.

9. We have felt for some time that the strength of headquarters in Allied Command, Europe, has been far out of line with the forces which are now being made available. The size of these headquarters was decided at the time when it was anticipated that there would be 100 divisions and some 9,000 aircraft in Allied Command Europe. The actual strength of NATO today is about one-third of the previous accepted force goals. We believe that it would be appropriate to raise the question of the size of these various headquarters, and ask that a complete review be made to bring them into line with the forces we have under command."

UK DEFENCE POLICY

We have not yet heard what or how much explanation of the changes in UK defence policy was given by Mr. Duncan Sandys during his visit a few weeks ago to Ottawa. In any case, we are submitting in this telegram our own analysis, which is based on a number of discussions with various senior officials concerned in the Foreign Office and elsewhere, with service officers, newspapermen and some Members of Parliament of both parties, as well as on public statements by Ministers, but not on private discussion with Mr. Sandys himself.

2. The timing of the decision to undertake major defence reductions was determined very largely by economic considerations, and a realization, which came to a head after the Suez fiasco, that Britain had for some years been carrying commitments beyond her resources. It is recognized that were it not for over-riding economic considerations then from a purely foreign policy viewpoint this is an unfortunate time to have to reduce commitments in NATO in view of political and economic developments going on this summer on the Continent.

3. Economic factors have also accounted in great part for the substance as well as the timing of the decision.

4. However, there is more to it than a mere economic need to cut the suit according to the cloth. Though they will not admit it in public, Ministers and many senior officials in the Foreign Office and elsewhere concluded after the Suez debacle that some drastic action was needed to overcome what they considered unreasonable conservatism and "dragging of the feet" by the Chiefs of Staff Committee. There has for some time been a feeling that the services have been reluctant to make sufficiently sweeping adjustments to adapt to new techniques when this involved disturbing established interests and interservice patterns. No doubt some at least of this feeling has been unfair. Political directives have probably not been at all as clear as service chiefs would have liked. It is said, however, that on many occasions successive ministers had requested the Chiefs of Staff to produce overall reassessments ab initio of defence requirements and plans in the new strategic and technical situation which is emerging, and that the Cabinet finally lost patience at the lack of result.

5. However this may be, the Suez fiasco seems to have revealed major blunders, not only in political direction but in service posture and planning as well: and though the Armed Forces staffs were consulted on the fateful decision itself hardly more than was the Foreign Office, nevertheless there was some resentment that the services had been remiss in that they had not developed in advance the capacity to act to protect the vital canal zone at once when the crisis began last summer. Perhaps more important, a post mortem on the military execution of the decision to intervene at the end of October seems also in some influential civilian eyes, to have revealed a sorry incompetence. In this connection you may have noticed Liddell Hart's indictment on technical military grounds in last Sunday's Observer, which in any case we are forwarding by despatch.

6. The sweeping new powers over the Services which Macmillan gave to Duncan Sandys, significantly beyond those held by previous Defence Ministers, illustrated the new government's determination to bring things to a head and make important changes. To a considerable extent therefore these changes are being imposed from above. The military "details" which have to be worked out within the services themselves, are as yet far from clear. Indeed this is a considerable understatement.

7. The latter part of this telegram will outline what we have been able to learn (in addition to the UK's NATO-WEU presentation) of the new plans for the UK's defence posture, though it seems that these have not yet been at all fully decided. Before leaving the question of motives, however, it might be useful to analyse a little more fully the economic aspect and to mention also the factor of prestige and "Great-Power" considerations.

8. Balance of payments pressures have, of course, become endemic in post-war Britain, but the Suez crisis brought them to a head, as well as putting in power a Prime Minister with particular interest in economic problems. Balance of payments factors are particularly relevant to that part of UK forces which is stationed in Germany. Reinforcing this, there has been growing concern about the effect of German exports on Britain's traditional foreign markets, and increasing resentment that German prosperity has been achieved in part "at British expense", since German reluctance to push ahead with implementation of her defence commitments has allowed a high portion of German manpower to be devoted to capital construction and to export industries, while a remarkable proportion of British manpower has been tied up either in the Forces or in defence production. As reported below, the timing and presentation of British defence adjustments has been determined to some extent by tactical requirements for the current financial negotiations with Germany.

9. However, economic considerations go much deeper than balance of payments problems. Defence requirements, both for Service manpower and weapons, have involved a serious limitation on requirements for British domestic investment and hence on the basic rate of growth.

10. The budgetary factors are also real enough. There has been growing dissatisfaction with high taxes and in the more progressive conservative circles criticism of them as a discouragement to enterprise.

11. There is also, of course, the factor that particularly after Suez the Conservative Party has to do something to rebuild its popularity, and the fact that the Labour Party is on record as advocating measures which will ultimately make possible the end of National Service.

12. There is too, in both parties a feeling that as weapons and gadgetry become increasingly expensive and increasingly efficient, it must be a logical concomitant that manpower requirements of defence should be reduced. Increasing complexity of weapons "should" mean that large conscript forces are less use than small mobile long-service professionals.

13. The earlier decision to develop a separate UK nuclear weapons programme, including new megaton fusion weapons, has played a significant if not entirely logical role in the re-examination. This decision was based in part on the view that defence forces without nuclear components would inevitably be inefficient, in part on belief that possession of nuclear weapons (now hydrogen weapons) would prove an essential condition of effective membership in the "Great Powers Club" and in part on a serious calculation of real politic and strategy.

14. This latter point is worth elucidation. There has been a concern among thoughtful men, including leading statesmen in both parties that in an era of thermonuclear stalemate the USA either could not be depended upon in the last analysis to defend UK vital interests against the USSR (a fear which the "casual" USA attitude last summer towards the Suez Canal crisis did much to enhance), or, alternatively, that if the chips were down there would be a tacit USA-Soviet agreement to localize things on the Korean analogy i.e., that in the event of war nuclear weapons would be used only in Eastern and Western Europe, sparing the heartlands of the Soviet Union and North America. Many UK leaders, political and military, believe that in such an eventuality independent UK possession of hydrogen weapons would serve to help deter aggression or at least to ensure that in the last analysis if hostilities start this island might be included in the tacit "safe haven" area.

15. (Comment. This latter point is a weighty one. On the other hand we ourselves, if not the UK, cannot help reflecting that similar considerations may well be thought to apply equally to other areas — France, Sweden, perhaps Canada, possibly soon Germany, Japan or elsewhere. Yet it is surely arguable that any decisions which encourage the change from the present bipolarity and the reciprocal nuclear stalemate to a multipolar situation in which any one of a considerable number of governments could independently take a decision to unleash nuclear war, can hardly be held to enhance the chances of survival of humanity as a whole.)

16. There is another possible non-sequitur in official political thinking about atoms. They have tended to regard the development of nuclear weapons primarily and indeed almost exclusively as a strategic deterrent — and hence offering a means of saving money by reducing forces on the Continent from a "shield" to a "trip wire". On the other hand it is at least arguable that the thermonuclear stalemate may mean that if hostilities do occur neither side will in fact use big fusion weapons, and the determining factor will be the tactical use of smaller fission weapons. These considerations might make the shield concept more important rather than less so. But the politicians' desire for economy tends to reinforce the service chief's reluctance to accept any restrictions on their free choice of weapons in a war, and hence to preclude the doctrinal substitution of graduated deterrence for the old concept of massive retaliation. This split between doctrine and practical military planning not only means greater risk of any small war spreading to a big one, but also means that the UK is reluctant to give the forces the men and money the shield policy would require.

17. To turn from general considerations to questions of geography, we have not found much evidence to support the idea that the UK has consciously decided to play in international affairs a role more limited, at least in terms of areas, than in the recent past. Senior Foreign Office officials categorically deny any such interpretation. Nevertheless an eventual smaller role is probably inevitable — indeed this reducing process began years ago. Certainly, moreover, the chastening events of last autumn should tend to discourage any further "Sinn Fein" adventures, at least for awhile, though there are inevitably some elements, both in parliamentary and official circles, who tend to seek further opportunities to go it alone precisely because they smart from recent failure.

18. We have been assured, however, that the UK government continues to consider the defence of Western Europe (i.e., the NATO area, as they see it) as the first and most vital interest. Despite the substantial reductions planned, the UK will still have a major portion of its forces stationed on the Continent. In this connection the Foreign Office are impressed with the undesirability, as they see it, of any deal with the Russians, at least at this time, for reciprocal troop withdrawals from Germany and Central Europe.

19. The UK seems determined however, "not to be suckers" in their relative contribution to German defence. In this connection, Patrick Dean, Deputy Under Secretary in the Foreign Office responsible inter alia for defence liaison, has told us that he does not expect an ultimate figure of more than six or seven German divisions, despite the promised twelve. And we gather that the UK figure of approximately 50,000 troops in Germany is a firm decision only until the end of the 1957/58 fiscal year. Maintenance of these troops after that will, they say, depend on the conclusion of satisfactory financial arrangements with Bonn.

20. Meantime, it has been indicated to us that the UK may delay somewhat the phasing of troop reductions in Germany, to meet SACEUR — but this, too, is linked with the tactics of negotiations with Germany, and the UK wishes that the NATO Council would divert its heat to Bonn.

21. As regard Germany, here is always also a further thought at the back of some Foreign Office officials' minds though it tends to cut across other considerations. This is the fear that conceivably Germany might one day become again a rogue elephant loose in the middle of Europe. As you know (our telegram 304 of February 19†) this is one factor behind the UK conclusion that it would not be desirable to try to negotiate with the Russians on mutual troop withdrawal from Germany and Central Europe. Incidentally, the UK believe that the Soviet Union for the same reasons (distrust of Germany) would not seriously contemplate such a deal. There is a further field in which this uneasiness about the future of Germany seems to be revealed, and that is a UK wish that it could tie in with the Germans on atomic and guided missile research and development. We understand that the Atomic Energy authorities here, as well as the Foreign Office, are not too happy at the prospect of exclusive German-French-Italian continental cooperation in this field. The UK wishes that their special relations with the USA and Canada did not preclude intimate UK association also with the Germans.

22. There has also been an ambivalence in UK political thinking about Western Europe. Some UK politicians have been keen on developing closer links, economic and otherwise, with Western Europe, not only for economic reasons, but as a means of developing a third force in Europe or at least a counterweight to USA preponderance within the North Atlantic community. The USA has on the whole tried to encourage the "European" trends in UK planning. This has irrationally caused some UK circles, parliamentary and official, to resent an assumed USA plot to reduce Britain to the status of a purely European continental power "like the Netherlands". On elements in the UK defence reassessment has been the feeling that hitherto through NATO too much of this country's defence resources had been tied up in Europe, whereas the USSR had switched her major threat to a gradual process of disintegration of Western interests in other more vulnerable areas. According to this analysis Nasser's Suez threat, and Britain's impotence to meet it, vividly illustrated this danger of "too much for NATO".

23. As for the Mideast, there has been no thought, UK officials tell us, of withdrawing from the Baghdad Pact. The strategic picture is however, changing. The UK used to rely in considerable part on four bases in a diamond formation — Libya, Cyprus, the Canal Zone and Jordan. Now they would like to withdraw from Libya, although they have been persuaded by the Americans to retain a small token force there. The canal base is lost and Jordan will go shortly. The UK are apparently determined that Cyprus must remain as a base. Its role as an exclusive UK base may be reduced (it will no longer have any function in UK thinking vis à vis the Suez Canal, we understand); but it must remain for NATO and Baghdad Pact purposes. It may also be developed as a base for intermediate range (1500 miles) guided missiles. As one senior Foreign Office official put it "Handing Cyprus to Greece would make Greece much too tempting a target for Soviet subversion — it would not even be fair to Greece".

24. As the Foreign Office see it, the essential thing in the Mideast is oil. The canal is not and must not become essential — the firm decision has been taken we understand to go ahead with alternative pipelines and with big tankers.

25. In the Foreign Office view, the local defence of the Mideast must depend on consolidation of the "Northern Tier" — Turkey, Iraq, Iran, Pakistan — supported by a logistic lineup from the South-West. The UK will therefore be very firm on defence of Aden and the Protectorates, we understand, while the USA has undertaken to consolidate its position in Saudi Arabia. Though no definite decision has yet been taken, the UK may go ahead with the plan to develop a major military base in Kenya.

26. In this concept, Egypt can be as it were by-passed. So can Syria, though perhaps less safely. But UK officials think that the present unsatisfactory political situation in these two countries could change.

27. As for the Far East, the UK have for some time recognized that Hong Kong is not defensible, though conceivably the Americans may decide to guarantee it by deterrent power. The UK will probably reduce its garrison in Hong Kong substantially. Also its forces in Singapore and Malaya, though timing here may be delayed through arrangements with the emerging Commonwealth governments. Perhaps Australia and NZ may take on more of the defence commitments in these areas.

28. In Korea the UK has decided to withdraw its forces, though in deference to American wishes a very small token group of officers may be left to show the flag and help the USA try to chasten Syngman Rhee.

29. So much for geography. As for forces, we have reported in previous telegrams on the plan to have bases for intermediate range guided missiles in the UK — some under USA control, some under UK control and with UK nuclear warheads. There will also probably be a progressive dependence on guided missiles for air defence of this island. Indeed it is already possible to surmise that the days of manned aircraft are numbered, except for moving army units in transport squadrons. Conceivably the air force as we have known it may prove to have been the most stupendous flash in the pan in history.

30. As for the navy, the situation appears to be confused. We understand from service officers that the RN has been asked to prepare several alternative papers on roles (or "missions") and costs, and that no decisions have yet been taken though a drastic budget reduction seems probable.

31. Whether the UK government envisage that their allies should take up a greater share of the free world's defence burden is very difficult to say. They must recognize the danger of starting a trend toward reductions which could prove disastrous. Certainly they hope that their allies will not reduce their absolute defence contributions. But we doubt whether they have as yet given much thought to the desirability or possibility of expecting an actual increase by others. The USA Embassy here is concerned that the UK government may be inclined to place too much reliance on the awful threat of the USA Strategic Air Command.

UNITED KINGDOM FORCE REDUCTIONS

When NATO was first seized with the United Kingdom proposals for the reduction of their forces in Europe we instructed our Delegation to abstain for the moment from expressing specific comments regarding the nature of the proposals or the need for the reductions which they entailed. In addition we instructed the Delegation to refrain for the time being from approving the proposals, with a view to safe-guarding the right of the Council as well as of each member State to carry out a full examination in the context of the 1957 Annual Review.

2. Since we sent these instructions SACEUR has commented that the proposed U.K. withdrawals can be accomplished only at the cost of increased risk to our security. In order to mitigate the unfavourable effects of the proposals he recommended phasing the reductions into the calendar year 1959, stationing on the continent part of the U.K. strategic reserve and the rotation of R.A.F. squadrons to airbases on the continent. The U.K. at the March 4th Council meeting agreed to phase their withdrawals into 1959 (it is contemplated that only 13,500 troops will be withdrawn up to April 1958). The U.K. has also agreed to the rotation of air squadrons if this is technically feasible. They have, however, been unable to agree to stationing the strategic reserve on the continent.

3. In the light of the U.K.'s reply, Council is now considering how it should deal with this question. Obviously any decisions lie within the province of WEU; on the other hand, the views of NATO members, which have been consistently negative if not unfavourable will have to be recorded in some way. When there appeared in Council to be a choice between merely recording national views and the passing of a resolution, Mr. Wilgress suggested that the Council might merely follow its customary procedure and have at the end of the record of Council discussions a note summarizing the main conclusions. This seems to us to be a reasonable suggestion.

4. We are attaching a draft telegram† to the Delegation, setting out views on how we think the NATO consideration of the U.K. reductions should be handled in the context of the 1957 Annual Review, and leading up to the December Ministerial Meeting. Included in the telegram is a draft statement which Mr. Wilgress would make at the next Council meeting. We have not yet had comments from National Defence, but we understand General Foulkes will be discussing the draft telegram tomorrow with Mr. Campney, and he may wish to talk to you about it.

U.K. FORCES REDUCTION

We have now had General Foulkes' comments on our draft telegram sent to you under cover of a memorandum yesterday. His letter of March 7 is attached.

2. The amendment proposed in his paragraph 2(a) seems acceptable. With regard to the additional paragraph suggested in paragraph 2(b), we feel that the ideas contained in it might better be added to the end of paragraph 6 as follows:

"The Council has of course recognized the right of any member country to determine its contribution to NATO in accordance with its economic capability. It will be recalled that this principle was recognized in the TCC resolution agreed at the Lisbon meeting".

We might then start off paragraph 7 as follows:

"In the light of this established principle, I think we should all welcome the reply which the United Kingdom Representative has made to SACEUR's recommendations."

3. I think we should avoid expressing our agreement in principle to the reductions as suggested in General Foulkes' paragraph, and his point regarding the discussion in the Annual Review has already been included in paragraphs 4 and 6 in our draft. General Foulkes' paragraph states that the discussion should take place before implementation but this is of course unrealistic for that part of the implementation which is to take place before April 1958.

4. We have discussed these changes with General Foulkes, and he agrees to them.

2. I am in general agreement with your reply but would suggest that the following insertions be added:

(a) Add the following words to the last sentence in paragraph 2: "and not make the going too easy for any other nations who are contemplating getting on the band wagon".

(b) Insert the following paragraph after paragraph 4: "However, the Canadian Government feels that the Council should recognize the right of any NATO member country to determine its contribution to NATO, consistent with its economic capability. It will be recalled that this principle was recognized in the T.C.C. resolution, as agreed to by Council at Lisbon and also in the resolution contained in the Secretary-General's document in August 1952 which was accepted by the Council as a working document for the procedures of the Annual Review. However, while agreeing in principle to these reductions, it is considered that the method, timing and the implications of changes in organization which may have far-reaching results, should be fully discussed before implementation through the normal processes, such as the Annual Review and consideration by the Military authorities."

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES

The UK replies to SACEUR and their at least partial agreement to his recommendations are encouraging. As you point out the UK consent to phasing their reductions may lend more substance to the examination of their plans in the Annual Review context.

2. We have been wondering, in the light of the UK's reply, whether it might be possible for Council at this stage to take note only of the reductions which are to take place in the 1957-58 UK fiscal year. This would meet the requirements of the UK budget and at the same time make possible a thorough examination of future reductions in the 1957 Annual Review. While this would "prolong the agony" for the UK, it would have the advantage of enabling the military and political authorities of the Alliance to consider all the implications and at the same time create a precedent for dealing with similar cases in the future — should they arise.

3. On the question of procedure, we think it would be desirable to include a statement in the Council minutes along the lines of your telegram 374. An additional paragraph after G might be added along the following lines:

"To express the intention of the Council to reexamine the reductions which the UK representative has stated are to take place after April 1958 in the light of the 1957 Annual Review."

4. If the Council decides not to include such a statement in the summary record you should propose that the Council should re-examine the UK reductions in the light of the 1957 Annual Review.

5. We think it will now be necessary for us to take a position in Council on the substance of the UK proposals. You should at an appropriate time make a statement along the following lines:

Begins:

"The Canadian Government has refrained, until the present, from commenting on the substance of the UK's announcement of their proposals to reduce certain elements of their NATO assigned forces. This was occasioned by our hope that Council would not be called upon to express a hurried view on a proposal which we felt had wide and serious implications for the Alliance. We had consequently suggested that all these implications should be examined in detail in the 1957 Annual Review. We are of course aware of the problem of timing and the wish of the UK government to have some aspects of their proposed reductions reflected in the next budget. If this is to happen it will obviously be impossible for the organization to devote to this question further detailed study at the present time.

SACEUR's comments have provided a basis on which to make a preliminary assessment of the impact of the proposed reductions and of the importance of limiting this impact. The Canadian government agrees in general with the analysis of SACEUR and supports his recommendations for limiting the effects of reductions which are deemed necessary. The Council has of course recognized the right of any member country to determine its contribution to NATO in accordance with its economic capability. It will be recalled that this principle was recognized in the TCC resolution agreed at the Lisbon meeting.

In the light of this established principle, I think we should all welcome the reply which the UK representative has made to SACEUR's recommendations. It reflected a willingness on the part of the UK to meet the views which have been expressed by their partners in the Alliance. The agreement to SACEUR's recommendation to phase the reductions of forces through 1959 is particularly welcome. Apart from helping to meet the military requirements for forces on the continent it will enable the organization to examine the full implications of the reductions which are to take place after April 1958 well in advance of the UK budget for that year. It is our hope therefore that this question will be studied carefully in the 1957 Annual Review and later discussed at the December Ministerial meeting.

We are of course fully and sympathetically aware of the economic difficulties which have led the UK to propose reductions in their defence expenditures, but we are concerned at the effects which reductions of these dimensions could have both on the defensive strength of the Alliance and on the political and psychological situations in other member countries. We cannot yet gauge the full military or political effects of these proposals. All we can do at present is to express our concern." Ends.

6. The UK authorities have apparently been rather upset by our suggestion that their proposals be examined as part of the Annual Review process. Quite strenuous representations from Earnscliffe were followed on March 6 by a letter† from Mr. Macmillan to Mr. St. Laurent setting forth briefly the UK case as already presented in the Council by the UK Representative, and asking that our Representative take a sympathetic view of the UK difficulties so that the discussions in NATO may be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Mr. Macmillan stressed that the proposals did not signify the smallest diminution in the UK's belief or trust in the Atlantic Alliance, but were necessary so that the economy of the UK should be strong enough to enable it to remain a good NATO partner. The text of Mr. Macmillan's letter and of Mr. St. Laurent's reply† will be sent to you in a separate message.

7. We have given Earnscliffe verbally the gist of this present telegram and have stressed the following points:

(a) that we recognize fully the right of the UK to determine its Force contributions to NATO;

(b) that it was and is our opinion that ideally reductions of such magnitude should be subjected to most thorough study before they have to become final and irrevocable;

(c) that at the same time we recognize and sympathize with the economic pressure which makes it necessary for the UK to have their reductions reflected in the forthcoming budget and that we have no wish to impede this step;

(d) that we still think that those reductions now phased to take place in the 1958-59 UK fiscal year should be examined in the 1957 Annual Review in order that the Alliance may obtain the clearest possible picture of their implications;

(e) that one of our main concerns has been that the UK steps, dictated though they were by undeniably serious economic considerations, should not set a pattern and that it would be possible to prevent the rot from spreading throughout the Alliance.

8. It is this last point which is partly reflected in our paragraph 2 above. We would hope that the "prolongation of the agony" might serve as an object lesson and discourage precipitate reductions by other member countries. We would also hope that the developing military reappraisal might provide a further deterrent to unilateral reductions by bringing home again to the members of NATO, when the stage of the essential Forces Posture has been reached, the seriousness of paring the net military strength of the Alliance. We note from paragraph 8 of your telegram 373 of March 5 that SACEUR has stated that "His responsibilities remained the same and in fact the political directive had increased them slightly".

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES

We thank you for your helpful telegram and are glad that you recognize the necessity for us now to take a position in Council on the substance of the UK proposal.

2. I see difficulty in persuading the UK to separate the reductions proposed for the fiscal year 1958-59 from those proposed for 1957-58. Their desire for early NATO and WEU conclusions is due to the fact that they are preparing a White Paper reviewing the UK defence effort over the next few years. They therefore could not agree that the decision with regard to the reductions to be effective in the second fiscal year should be postponed until after they have been examined in the light of the 1957 Annual Review.

3. Roberts told me last week that the USA had proposed that the Council should take action now only with respect to the reduction of 13,500 officers and men contemplated for the next fiscal year and that no decision should be taken with regard to the reduction of an equivalent number of officers and men for the second fiscal year. You will note that this USA approach is very similar to yours. Roberts had to tell Perkins that this would not suit the exigencies of the UK White Paper. In the message which Mr. St. Laurent has sent in reply to Mr. Macmillan's message, it is stated that the Canadian Permanent Representative will be instructed to support a statement for inclusion in the summary record of the Council which should bring the discussion to a close. In the UK view, this can only be done if we give them the green light to outline their proposed reductions over both fiscal years in their White Paper on Defence.

4. In the statement you have prepared for me to deliver in Council you refer to the economic capability resolution agreed to at the Lisbon meeting. This resolution has not been invoked by the UK who are basing their action solely on the provisions of C-M(55)82 (Final) which requires them to consult with their allies before withdrawing forces assigned to NATO commanders.

5. I doubt the wisdom of referring to the TCC resolution on economic capability. The chief contention of the other European countries is that like the UK they too have economic difficulties. The French in particular point out that their economic situation is even more acute than that of the UK. I fear, therefore, that a reference to the TCC resolution would not be well received and would give an excuse for that chain reaction which we so much wish to avoid. I believe that all we can do to accomplish the end you have in view in the draft statement you have prepared is to set forth our concern and propose that after we have taken note of the proposed UK reductions, we should reexamine them as part of the Annual Review process both in 1957-1958. With this end in view we have redrafted the statement which I am to deliver in Council on Wednesday and the text is being sent to you in my immediately following telegram. I should appreciate a reply commenting on this draft statement in time to reach us before the meeting on Wednesday morning, March 13.

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES

Following is text of statement for delivery in Council on Wednesday, referred to in my immediately preceding telegram. Text begins:

"We have refrained up to now from giving the Council the considered views of the Canadian Government on the substance of the UK proposals to reduce certain elements of their NATO assigned forces. We are of course fully and sympathetically aware of the economic difficulties which have led the UK to propose reductions in their defence expenditures but we are concerned at the effects which reductions of these dimensions could have both on the defensive strength of the Alliance and on the political and psychological situations in other member countries. We cannot yet gauge the full military or political effects of these proposals. All we can do at present is to express our concern.

We had hoped that the Council would not be called upon to express a hurried view on proposals which had wide and serious implications for the Alliance. It was for this reason that we had suggested that all these implications should be examined in detail as part of the Annual Review process. Our particular worry concerns the manner in which the Council have been presented with these proposals and asked to express their views without the proper opportunity for detailed examination. We are of course aware of the problem of timing and the wish of the UK government to incorporate their proposed reductions in a White Paper on Defence to be issued before the presentation of the next budget in April. This obviously renders it impossible for NATO to devote further detailed study at the present time. The comments of SACEUR have provided a basis on which to make a preliminary assessment of the impact of the proposed reductions and of the importance of limiting this impact. The Canadian government agrees in general with the analysis of SACEUR and supports his recommendations for limiting the effects of the reductions which are deemed necessary.

In our view, adequate consideration of the UK proposals can only come about when we are able to consider the revised UK Force contributions along with the contributions of other countries to our common effort. This is the purpose for which the Annual Review procedure has been devised. Given the exigencies of the UK time-table there is little more for us to do at this stage than to take note of the UK proposals. At the same time we should welcome the reply which the UK Representative has made to the recommendations of SACEUR. It reflects a willingness on the part of the UK to go some way to meet the views which have been expressed by their partners in the Alliance. While welcoming the agreement to phase the reduction of forces through 1959, we should hope that the time-phasing of these reductions and the other recommendations of SACEUR will be considered further both in the 1957 and the 1958 Annual Reviews. This would assure that, while taking fully into account the financial and economic difficulties with which the UK is faced, every effort will be made to lessen the impact of these reductions of forces on the Alliance as a whole.

In summary, therefore, we feel that once the Council has taken note of the proposed UK reductions, NATO should reexamine these reductions as part of the Annual Review process. It seems to us that there are very cogent reasons in favour of such a course of action.

First, such a reappraisal conducted in the Annual Review context would provide a further deterrent to unilateral reductions by bringing home again to the members of NATO the seriousness of paring the military strength of the Alliance.

Second, it would have the advantage of enabling the military and the political authorities of the Alliance to consider the full implications of the UK reductions. In this connection, I wish to draw the attention of the Council to the recent Standing Group statement (RDC/99/57) to the effect that: "The impact of the reshaping of British forces in the overall NATO military posture can be completely assessed only in the light of the military studies now in process, and after the full extent of any other planned UK reductions of NATO forces are made known and studied."

Lastly, it seems important to us that the Council in determining its present course of action gives due weight to the fact that its decision will create a precedent for dealing with similar cases in the future should they arise. Text ends.

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES

I have had a talk with Sir Frank Roberts who told me that the Mollet-Macmillan conversations last Saturday on the subject of the UK reductions in forces were not satisfactory. Both Prime Ministers reiterated their respective points of view and most of the arguments were at cross purposes. No definite conclusions emerged at the end of the discussion.

2. It appears that French preoccupation is with the number of men on the Continent. Mollet paid little attention to Macmillan's arguments about the increased efficiency of the new UK formations. He said that what France wanted were as many British, American and Canadian troops and dependents as possible on the Continent so that if anything happened these three countries would be as much in the thick of it as French men and women. I believe that this is another reflection of French anxieties over Algeria. The withdrawal of their best troops to North Africa has made the French conscious of their own lack of military security and dependence on their allies.

3. Up to the present the French appear to have the intention first of opposing strongly in NATO the proposed UK reductions in forces and, secondly of soliciting support for a WEU resolution disapproving the reductions. Roberts doubts if they will go as far as that but he is still without any definite indications of French intentions since the Ministerial talks on Saturday did not serve to clear the air.

4. Roberts left with me the impression that some very hard bargaining has been going on between the British and the French. In agreeing to examine sympathetically the association of overseas territories with the Common Market and to support the arms arrangement, Macmillan has made it plain that he expects in return French acquiescence in the proposed UK reductions in forces. He told Mollet that the fate of his government depends upon their carrying through the measures they have started and that if they were succeeded by a Labour Government, France would have less chance of securing the degree of British cooperation in European affairs he had promised to give.

5. Since dictating the above, Parodi has called to see me and advised that at the meeting tomorrow he will have to express his regrets that the French government is unable to agree to the proposed UK reductions in forces. He will suggest that later on the whole question should be examined afresh by NATO in the light of the economic situation in the various NATO countries and the requirements for new arms. He said that his government had not come to this decision lightly, particularly in view of the happy relations which have been existing between the French and British governments. However, the undertaking to maintain four divisions and the second tactical air force on the continent was one of the guarantees of the Paris Agreement which the French valued most highly. They could not be sure that further reductions might not take place once they had agreed that the UK could go below the level set in the Paris Agreement. They were also very worried about the possible chain reaction and felt that already Norway and Denmark were contemplating similar steps.

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES

Your telegram No. 423 reached us as we were considering the revised statement contained in your telegram 408. In the light of comments in your telegram 407 we agree that you should make your revised statement with the following amendments.

Paragraph 1. Delete "We cannot yet gauge the full military or political effects of these proposals. All we can do at present is to express our concern."

Paragraph 2. Delete 3rd sentence viz. "Our particular worry concerns the manner in which Council have been presented with these proposals and asked to express their views without the proper opportunity for detailed examination."

Paragraph 3. 2nd line, replace "consider" by "examine".

9th line, replace "go someway" by "do what they can".

At the end of paragraph 3 add the following sentence. "We feel therefore that once Council has taken note of the proposed UK reductions NATO should re-examine these reductions as part of the Annual Review process."

2. Delete remainder of statement.

3. In view of the outcome of the Mollet-Macmillan conversations and the information which Parodi has given you to the effect that the French government will not agree to the proposed UK reductions in forces it would seem unlikely that Council would be able to complete its discussions on this subject tomorrow. It may be that a way out of this impasse may be sought along the lines of our telegram DL-308 of March 8 whereby Council could take note of the reductions schedules for implementation up to April 58 and at the same time establish stringent procedures for examining the reductions which are to take place after that date. Although such a solution would not appeal to the UK you have reported that the USA have also been thinking along these lines and consequently they may form the basis of a compromise.

4. After making the statement as revised in this telegram you may make use of the ideas contained in our telegram DL-308 if you feel they may be useful in seeking a compromise.

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES

The morning and afternoon meetings on March 13 of the Council on the UK reduction of forces left an impression of uneasiness in view of the general opposition that continues to be expressed to the UK proposals.

2. We do not intend in this report to go into the detail of the statements made, partly because the reasons given to justify the positions taken would already be familiar to you and partly because it was decided, in view of the importance of yesterday's meetings, to have a full summary record prepared by the international staff which should be available in a few days. Our reporting will therefore be confined for the most part to the conclusions reached by member governments regarding the UK reduction proposals.

3. M. Parodi was the first to read a carefully prepared statement. The French government ask the UK authorities to reconsider their reduction proposals because:

- (a) they would result in a weakening of the shield;
- (b) they have not been coordinated with the overall military plans of the Alliance;
- (c) they have not been synchronized with the time-table envisaged for the use of modern weapons; and
- (d) finally they are politically unsound (the Soviet threat remains as great as ever, a chain reaction is likely to be provoked, they undermine the Paris agreements).

4. The Benelux countries all adopted a similar position, i.e. that the UK government should reconsider its plans. The Luxembourg and Belgian Representatives covered no new ground, but the Netherlands Representative was more articulate. He contended that no final decision could be reached on military grounds at this stage and quoted in this connection the Standing Group statement which we have already mentioned to you. His government felt unable therefore to accept the UK proposals unless SACEUR's recommendations were fully met. He particularly questioned the validity of the reasons advanced by the UK for not stationing their strategic reserve forces on the Continent and expressed the deep concern with which they view the contemplated drastic reduction in the number of aircraft. He ended his statement by advocating the consideration of the full implications of the UK reductions in the 1957 Annual Review.

5. One of the Scandinavian countries, Denmark, merely stated that they are only prepared to note the UK reductions, while Norway stood by the opinions they have previously expressed. Norway's main concern at this stage is that, in the conclusions that will eventually emerge from the Council's discussions, two points should be emphasized. First, that no development in the international situation justifies a relaxation of the NATO defence effort; secondly, that the forward strategy concept should be maintained.

6. The Portuguese Representative deplored the trend discernible in NATO to reduce its defence efforts and military preparedness (France's withdrawal of forces for North Africa, delay in the German rearmament, and now the UK reductions). The Italian Representative, for the same reasons as those given by the French, expressed the earnest hope of his government that the UK will reconsider its stand with a view to implementing SACEUR's recommendations. He also favoured a further detailed examination of the UK proposals by the Council. The Turkish Representative stated that his government hoped that the UK will reconsider its plans and accept SACEUR's recommendations which they consider as minimum requirements.

7. The German statement was perhaps the bluntest one. It ended up with the conclusion that the German government regret that for the time being they are unable to agree to the UK proposals. It repeated the now familiar arguments that the UK proposed reductions will weaken the continental shield (to a point where local conflicts could not be dealt with without the use of atomic weapons); that the present basic strategic concepts of the Alliance were put into question; that they will have grave political consequences; that Germany has done all it could to help the UK meet its foreign exchange difficulties; that they were greatly concerned over the reduction in strength of the second tactical air force by 50 percent and the transfer of the strategic reserve to the UK. The German Representative said they could perhaps consider reductions in the UK forces after the build-up of the German forces.

8. The USA Representative reiterated his government's concern with the long-term impact of the proposed UK reductions. Nothing that has been said so far diminishes their concern in this respect. He particularly hoped that the UK would be able to leave its strategic reserve in Europe and would be able to make further readjustments in their withdrawal plans. My own statement was made about halfway through the meeting before the German statement. After the meeting Roberts thanked me for having given him the sole opening to be forthcoming when he intervened to rebutt what had been said by other representatives.

9. I shall not attempt to report fully on the lengthy intervention of Sir Frank Roberts after the views of all the governments represented had been heard. It will suffice at this stage to mention some of the highlights. After having said that the UK government had done all it could to meet SACEUR's recommendations, it was apparent that a majority of their allies still felt that this was not enough. This implied nothing less than a demand that the UK government change its present plans. In their view, this was an entirely new NATO doctrine, the existence of which they were not aware. He regretted particularly the attitude that one friendly delegation (France) had seen fit to adopt. The major part of Sir Frank's intervention consisted of an extremely pointed and spirited rebuttal of the German points. It left the distinct impression that the UK has now decided to draw attention, more openly in the Council than they have done hitherto, to the inadequacies of the German contributions to the common defence effort. The UK Representative, after dwelling upon the foreign exchange difficulties they are facing, said that although they had not originally intended to invoke the last sentence of Article 6 of Protocol II of the Paris agreements, they now felt that the situation may warrant their doing so and they were prepared to have their foreign exchange problems examined by NATO. Sir Frank also addressed himself to our suggestion and that of The Netherlands, that the examination of the UK reductions should be carried out in the Annual Review context. They had no objection of principle to this suggestion as they were fully aware that their reductions will necessarily be reflected in their Force goals and that their own plans will take a long time to develop. It should be borne in mind, that while their reduction plans for 1957-58 were limited in character and could therefore be examined, the impact of their plans for subsequent years cannot yet be fully assessed. In any case, they thought that there should be plenty of time for the full implications of their reduction measures to be considered in the Annual Review. Sir Frank's concluding remarks were to the effect that they had two approaches opened to them. One was to invoke overseas emergencies, their desire to replace outdated military equipment or other such reasons which none of the allies could have seriously questioned. The other, a more arduous one, was a frank and honest exposé of their difficulties, economic or otherwise. They had chosen the latter and they hoped that in the end they will not be forced to conclude that this honest approach had proved to be a tactical error. He also stressed their preoccupation with reaction of their home public opinion if the discussions were to be carried on much longer. There could be a chain reaction within the UK.

10. When the Council reconvened in the afternoon, the German Representative said that their approach had been to consider SACEUR's recommendations as an integrated whole. If they were to be disassociated and only one or two were met as the UK proposed, their overall value would be lost. Although they appreciated the UK concessions regarding time-phasing, in fact it only meant that the phasing was improved by some three months. Under the original UK proposal the reductions were to start in the last quarter of 1957 and to be completed during 1958. The new proposal was that they start in the first quarter of 1958 and completed by the first quarter of 1959. In the German view also it was correct to speak of a 50 percent strength reduction in the second ATAF, as the number of aircraft was to be reduced by that percentage. He repeated the German thesis that the financial assistance they were giving to the UK not only eased the foreign exchange difficulties of maintaining UK troops in Germany but also went a long way towards the budgetary costs. He concluded his statement by asking the UK government to give further consideration to keeping its strategic reserve of 5,000 officers and men on the continent.

11. By that time it was apparent that the Council had reached the point where an attempt should be made to draw some general conclusions from the discussions. The Chairman suggested, and this was agreed, that the full summary record of these meetings would be considered as representing the views of the member governments. In addition, Lord Ismay had prepared, on his own responsibility, a paper which summed up what seemed to be general conclusions emerging from the exchange of views in Council. This paper is preceded by a factual section giving a chronology of the discussions. We are sending in a following telegram† the operative part of this paper which is along the lines indicated in our previous telegrams, although couched in more general terms. While it contains a reaffirmation of the multilateral character of the consideration of the UK reductions, it does not specifically refer to the fact that the UK reductions will be reexamined in the Annual Review context. As, on the one hand, the general conclusions are not meant to be exhaustive and, indeed, only reflect the general climate of the discussion, and on the other, that Sir Frank recognized the necessity of examining in detail the implications of their reductions in the Annual Review, I did not think it necessary to insist that this point be spelled out in the Secretary General's summing up, which he emphasized he was making on his own responsibility. To have done so would have evoked other requests for the inclusion of special points made by representatives.

12. The last point considered was the question of publicity. This arose from the fact that the press communiqué issued after the conversations held over the last week-end between the French and UK Prime Ministers mentioned that the Council was to consider this matter further on Wednesday. The UK Representative was anxious to be able to satisfy the curiosity of his home press about the outcome of the discussion. It was finally agreed that the following info should be given out if questions we asked:

"The North Atlantic Treaty Council today had a further discussion of the proposed revisions of UK forces stationed on the Continent at which Permanent Representatives expressed the views of their governments at this time. This concludes this phase of the consideration of the problem."

13. Both the UK and USA representatives thought it necessary, in addition, for NATO to issue a more substantive communiqué after the WEU meeting had been held. The Council will therefore meet again early next week to consider the matter. Delegations were asked to seek the views of their governments as to what might be said publicly about the consideration of the UK proposals by Council.

14. As you may know the WEU Council will meet at the ambassadorial level on Friday of this week; if they fail to reach agreement a meeting of the Council will take place on Monday next at the Ministerial level.

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES — WEU COUNCIL OF MINISTERS MEETING

Her Majesty's Government in the UK put forward on February 14/57, in connection with their new overall defence plans, certain proposals regarding the future pattern of their forces on the mainland of Europe placed under the command of SACEUR.

2. The Council took note of the opinions expressed thereon in NATO and also of the views of SACEUR.

3. The Council recognized that the problems facing the UK were, in fact, common to all members of the Alliance and that these common problems called for a common solution within NATO. The seven governments therefore agreed to recommend to the North Atlantic Council that they study urgently the proposals made by the German Chancellor for a new overall review of the resources of the Alliance covering (a) military requirements and defence aims, (b) relationship between conventional and atomic forces and weapons, (c) relationship between modern armaments and economic and financial resources, (d) common production of modern weapons, (e) common solution of currency problems arising from the stationing of troops in other member states.

4. The UK government pending the result of this review by NATO, will carry out their plans for 1957/58 having regard to SACEUR's views. This will mean a reduction of 13,500 men, of which the vast majority will be administrative and anti-aircraft troops.

5. Any further reductions, and the question of the location of the "strategic reserve" of 5000 men referred to in SACEUR's report, will only be decided in October 1957 after new discussion in WEU in conformity with Article VI of Protocol II of the Paris agreements and in the light of the abovementioned review.

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES — WEU CONCLUSIONS

1. We have now had occasion to examine interdepartmentally the WEU conclusions both for the purpose of the coming Bermuda meeting and for the NATO meeting next Tuesday.

2. You will find in my immediately following telegram† the text of that part of the Bermuda brief in which is outlined the Canadian position on the general principles involved in the UK proposals and on the specific WEU conclusions.

3. For the specific purpose of the NATO discussions the interdepartmental position may be summarized as follows: (a) the Canadian government welcomes in principle the fact that agreement was possible in WEU on the UK proposals; (b) the Canadian government considers the WEU conclusions in the present circumstances as generally acceptable and would be prepared to join the other NATO members in approving them, but; (c) we have noted that the opening sentence of paragraph 3 of the WEU conclusions was taken from the original German proposal where the meaning, because of the clarifying sentence, was subject to a less ambiguous and disquieting interpretation. We regard as a fair statement the German wording (that all members are faced with the same problem of reconciling the high costs involved in the equipment of their forces with modern weapons with their economic and financial resources). On the other hand we fear that the WEU wording (that the problems facing the UK are common to all members and call for a common NATO solution) may constitute an invitation for other members to copy the UK. We would therefore wish to see paragraph 3 of the WEU conclusions modified along the lines of the corresponding paragraph in the original German proposal, or failing this that its exact interpretation on the basis of the German proposal be duly placed on record during the NATO discussions; (d) with regard to the various points on which an urgent study is recommended in paragraph 3 of the WEU conclusions we have no basic objection to the general idea provided it is understood by all that points (a) and (b) are those which have already been covered to some extent during the preparation of the political directive, and that point (e) refers to a study in NATO of the nature of the currency problems, as distinct from an actual solution of the problems. We believe that there is indeed a distinction to be made here since it does not seem to us that NATO is the proper forum for seeking such a solution once the problem has been outlined. We believe that currency problems are usually best solved, as experience has shown, on the basis of bilateral negotiations. As to the study of points (c) and (d) we presume that the recently established Committee of Economic Advisers, strengthened as required by appropriate financial experts, could be useful in examining some aspects of these questions.

4. We have noted your comment concerning the choice of October as the time when further reductions by the UK could be considered by WEU. Since the normal Annual Review process is not completed before December it would be a question of either requesting WEU to change the date selected or for NATO to hasten the process of ministerial consideration of the Annual Review. You will recall previous suggestions for a meeting of Defence and Finance Ministers in October of each year in order to consider the results of the Annual Review before governments have made final decisions on their defence planning and their budgets. We would be quite prepared to go along with the proposal for such a Ministerial meeting in October if this would prove helpful in hastening the Annual Review process, and if it were acceptable to the other member governments.

5. Since it is difficult at this end to assess how the discussion will actually develop in the Council this week we must leave it to you to decide the timing and form of an intervention on the basis of the above comments. Our primary objective in any case should be it seems to prevent the resumption of a full dress discussion on the innumerable issues covered by the WEU conclusions. On this basis we think there is much to be gained by hastening the acceptance by the Council of the WEU conclusions as long as an understanding can be reached as to the implications of the more ambiguous parts of the conclusions. The attitude of the German and French delegations in particular will no doubt determine to a great extent the timing and nature of our own intervention.

6. We shall not fail of course to let you have as soon as possible a report of what may emerge on this subject at the Bermuda talks.⁶³

UK REDUCTION OF FORCES

At Friday's meeting of the Council, and at the Joint Meeting of the Council with the Standing Group on Saturday, there was further discussion of the procedural aspects of the WEU conclusions and the manner in which the examination of the German proposals should be carried out. As a result, this phase of the Council discussions may now be regarded as completed.

2. Points (a), (b) and the military aspects of (c).

The main point at issue was to find an appropriate formula which would ensure that military advice from the constituted NATO military machinery would be available to the Council without, however, prolonging the exercise unduly. The difficulty, of course, arises from the fact that, while Norstad is asked to assume personal responsibility for his replies to the German points, at the same time his views cannot be divorced from those he holds as SACEUR. There were no fundamental divergences of views in the Council however, as it is recognized that in conducting this exercise, Council should take into account military advice expressed through the usual channels. On the other hand, if General Norstad's report were to be processed in the normal way by the NATO military machinery, it would be quite impossible to proceed with the necessary despatch. Agreement was therefore reached over the proposition that SACEUR's report will be sent simultaneously to the Council and the Standing Group in order that the military views may be introduced during the discussion by Council of General Norstad's report. Such an approach should also enable the Council to have the benefit of the views of the other Commands (SACLANT and CHANCOM), if this should prove necessary. In fact, the German points affect primarily SACEUR's command.

3. Agreement was therefore reached over the following course of action regarding points (a) and (b) and the military aspects of (c) of Annex to C-M(57)41.

4. The Council should invite the NATO military authorities to instruct General Norstad to prepare specific replies to points (a) and (b) of paragraph 3 of Annex to C-M(57)41, taking into account the military aspects of (c), and in the light of the general policy of the Alliance as approved by the Council. In framing these replies General Norstad should take into account Professor Hallstein's exposé (C-M(57)46) and any other questions submitted to him by or through the Council.

5. General Norstad's replies will be submitted simultaneously to the Council and to the Standing Group in order that the Council may commence studying it without delay. The Council's constitutional military advisers will supply their comments to the Council at the earliest possible moment.

6. I may add that speaking on behalf of the Standing Group (which he referred to as the executive agency of the Military Committee), Admiral Denny approved this proposed course of action which he thought was "a perfectly reasonable way of proceeding". He only hoped that General Norstad's report will not prevent the military from completing their final forces requirements paper in June in order that the Annual Review process may proceed on schedule. It was also agreed that any questions which governments may wish to put up to General Norstad, in addition to those already formulated by the Germans, should be available before April 24. These questions will be addressed to the Secretariat which will circulate them to delegations. If within a week, no objection has been raised in Council by other delegations, they will be considered suitable for forwarding to General Norstad.

7. Points (d) and (e).

The German Representative proposed at the outset that the Economic Advisers Committee should draw up appropriate terms of reference for dealing with this matter. Once this had been done, governments would be in a better position to decide on the personalities who should be appointed. The USA Representative thought that the task of the Committee should primarily be to recommend procedures and define more precisely the manner in which these problems should be approached. (After the meeting, Perkins elaborated somewhat on the views he had expressed. What they have in mind is to have the Committee conduct a rapid factual examination of the problems involved and to suggest that a group of independent arbiters be appointed to make appropriate recommendations. This flexible formula meets, on the one hand, the desire of the Germans to appoint a group of independent experts and, on the other, ensures that use is being made of existing NATO machinery.) I reaffirmed our position on this point and said that as we saw it, the Committee's responsibility should be limited to examining, studying and defining the problems raised by sub-paragraphs (d) and (e) of the German proposals. The UK and Italian Representatives supported this approach. It was finally agreed that the Economic Advisers Committee would address itself to examining the problems in (e) and in (d) insofar as relevant to (e), making procedural suggestions if deemed necessary. In order to speed up its work, the Committee will not be bound to present an "agreed" report to Council, it being understood that reconciliation of views will be effected in Council. The Committee will probably hold its first meeting towards the end of this week.

POLITICAL CONSULTATION IN NATO-CYPRUS

1. My memorandum of January 23[†] contained a critical examination of United Kingdom policy on Cyprus and was prompted by our concern at the prospect of the grave consequences which would attend an indefinite prolonging of the dispute. Sooner than we could possibly have feared at the time, these consequences now seem to be emerging at present realities. The sudden deterioration of the situation was precipitated by the expulsion of Makarios, together with three of his associates, following the breakdown of the negotiations which at an earlier stage had appeared to hold some promise of yielding a satisfactory solution. (A summary of the course of these negotiations is attached as an appendix.†) However well the United Kingdom is able to document its case to prove the complicity of Archbishop Makarios in the terrorist activities of EOKA, it is hard to see how his expulsion can possibly advance the United Kingdom's cause, even in Cyprus itself; within the broader context of the United Kingdom's international relations the move is surely a serious blunder. While one can fully sympathize with the United Kingdom's desire to see order on the Island reestablished as quickly as possible, the sudden removal of Makarios, in addition to provoking a new wave of terrorism, has resulted in a spontaneous general strike throughout Cyprus — which incidentally will render the Island practically impotent as a military base as long as it lasts — and has set off a violent reaction in Greece. You will have seen that our Ambassador in Athens has reported that his British colleagues consider the move to have been ill-advised and ill-timed, an assessment with which one can only whole-heartedly agree.

2. The extent of the strain which this latest turn of events will impose upon Anglo-Greek relations (and also to a lesser extent on Greek-Turkish relations) is incalculable. The Greek Government has been faced with strong pressure from the church advocating a complete rupture of diplomatic relations and have compromised for the time being by recalling the Greek Ambassador in London for consultations in Athens. On the political front the Democratic Union which so very nearly succeeded in unseating Mr. Karamanlis less than a month ago has been provided with a new rallying cry and will not be slow to exploit the situation to the full. However reluctant he may be to give ground before the extremists' demands, Mr. Karamanlis, realizing that his political future is at stake, will have to take a strong line in acting as spokesman for an angry populace. Those elements in Greece which have been attacking their country's "encumbering" alliances and have advocated the adoption of a "neutralist" stand will become still more vocal and find, at least temporarily, broader general support. The Soviet Ambassador in Athens, who recently has been very active in cultivating the neutralist tendencies in Greece, will doubtless find the present situation much to his taste. This will be perhaps one of the most distressing long-term aspects of the Archbishop's expulsion: the opportunity which it gives the Soviet Union for effective propaganda against the West, though it must be added that up to now the USSR has not exploited it, no doubt because of the forthcoming visit of Khrushchev and Bulganin to London.

⁶⁴ Ce mémoire a été envoyé au ministre en annexe au document 336.

This memorandum was sent to the minister under cover of Document 336.

3. Turkey's support of the United Kingdom move will widen the gap between Turkey and Greece and will make it impossible for the time being for Mr. Karamanlis to fulfil his pre-election promise to the Turkish Ambassador that, if he was successful at the polls, he would forthwith undertake the re-establishment of normal relations between their two countries. The ministerial meeting of the Balkan Alliance is therefore as far off as ever. Indeed the Yugoslav Ambassador told Mr. Ford he considered that the Balkan Alliance had now very little chance of being revived.

4. It seems incredible that the United Kingdom should have been unaware of the storm which their move would raise. At the moment it rather looks as if they were prepared to jeopardize Greece's role in the defence of the Eastern Mediterranean rather than do anything which might alienate Turkish opinion or might be construed as a hesitation on their part in dealing with an inflammatory situation affecting their position in the Near East.

5. If the United Kingdom's deportation of the Archbishop was ill-timed, the message of "sympathetic concern" addressed by the United States to the Greek Government was scarcely less so. It brought into public view what can only be interpreted as disapproval on the part of the United States of the United Kingdom's handling of the situation and supported the supposition that a sharp difference of opinion exists between the two powers over the ultimate importance of Greece to Western defence. The United Kingdom's announcement that it would seek an explanation of the United States intervention did little to remedy the situation. Although the subsequent reply by the United States has eased the tension in this quarter to some extent, the whole incident was deplorable, revealing openly as it did the lack of unanimity between the two NATO leaders on an issue with vital implications for the Western defence system.⁶⁵ Although domestic politics no doubt played a role in the US action one can only hope that it was primarily prompted by a desire to prevent a revulsion against NATO on the part of the highly emotional Greeks.

6. Greece has asked the Secretary-General of the United Nations for a re-opening of the Cyprus issue at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly. A renewed appeal by Greece to the United Nations will place in a very difficult position those countries which with Canada supported the United Kingdom in opposing inscription of the issue on the agenda of the ninth and tenth sessions. In the circumstances it appears quite probable that the United States might wish to revert to its earlier attitude and support the inscription of the issue. In view of the failure to reach a settlement by negotiation, Canada's previous argument that an Assembly debate on the problem would do more harm than good would no longer carry much conviction.

7. There remains the possibility that something constructive might be accomplished by a full discussion of the problem in the North Atlantic Council. You will have seen that on March 14 the Greek representative broached the issue by reading a prepared statement on Cyprus. The upshot of the ensuing discussion was that Lord Ismay agreed to consult with the interested parties and his other colleagues to determine what action the Council might appropriately take on the matter. Two crucial questions emerged in the discussion following the Greek representative's statement. The first concerned the procedural issue and turned on whether the Council was justified in discussing Cyprus at all. If it was, the second point to be settled concerned the objectives and aims which the Council should set itself in its discussion of the matter.

8. With respect to the first point our position has been up to now that inter-member disputes should only be discussed in the Council with the full consent of the parties involved. Subject to this proviso, I think that there can be little doubt not only of the Council's competence but also of its duty to discuss Cyprus, since the dispute, so long as it continues, will have the most adverse repercussions on the unity, effectiveness and prestige of NATO itself. It is well within the realms of possibility that the new turn for the worse taken by the dispute might result in the complete suspension of Greece's co-operation with its NATO partners, if not the complete and formal severance of its NATO connection. This threat is of immediate and vital importance to all NATO members and presents an overriding argument in favour of a full discussion of the problem by the Council as a whole.

9. If this is admitted, what are the positive objectives and advantages which might be attained from an exhaustive debate of the issue in the Council? One must preclude at the outset the idea that the Council might work out itself a political settlement on the lines which the Greek Government would probably like to see, i.e. the formal incorporation of Cyprus as part of the NATO defence system. If the discussions were approached with such an objective in mind they would founder at once on United Kingdom and Turkish opposition. The United Kingdom conceives the strategic importance of Cyprus as going beyond its value to NATO defence of the Eastern Mediterranean; it regards the assured and unfettered use of bases and facilities in the Island as vital to its own national obligations and interests in the Middle Eastern area. Telegram No. 369† from Mr. Wilgress hints that the UK may be open to persuasion on this. On the other hand, Sir Anthony Eden went so far in the House of Commons as to say that the "welfare and indeed the lives of our own people depend on Cyprus as a protective guard and staging post to take care of these interests, above all, oil."

10. I think the following are the main advantages which might be gained from frank discussions of the issue in the Council:

(1) They might serve to overcome one of the most serious effects of the dispute, viz. the sense of isolation which it has engendered in Greece, the feeling that its NATO partners are indifferent to Greece's interests and aspirations with respect to Cyprus. This feeling of isolation was aggravated after the September riots when virtually the sole recognition which any of Greece's NATO partners took of the situation was extended in the identical message sent by the United States to Greece and Turkey, which seemed to imply that the United States considered both countries to be equally culpable.

(2) NATO discussion of Cyprus would help to remove the impression in the Greek mind that its NATO partners regarded the dispute as involving only Greece, the United Kingdom and Turkey, and were prepared to condone whatever action the United Kingdom undertook in handling the problem.

(3) By bringing to the fore the harmful effects which the Cyprus issue was having on the solidarity of the West at a time when the Soviets are showing considerable adroitness in their efforts to weaken NATO, both Greece and the United Kingdom might be brought to a more conciliatory and constructive attitude in their dealings with one another. By placing the problem in this wider context, which would show Greece (and the United Kingdom) the importance which other NATO members attach to Greece's participation in the Organization, an atmosphere might be created in which bilateral negotiation between the two parties could be resumed with a better understanding on both sides of each other's point of view, and hence with a better chance of success.

(4) The introduction of a general discussion in the Council would present the United Kingdom and the United States with the necessity of resolving, outside the Council, any differences of opinion which may exist between them regarding the handling of the dispute and provide an opportunity for them to co-ordinate their approach.

(5) It might just be possible that the Council's discussion of Cyprus could head off a renewed debate of the issue in the United Nations. Up until now Cyprus has not been dealt with in the United Nations as a "colonial" problem, because the traditionally "anti-colonial" powers have reserved their fire for those issues where African or Asian peoples are involved. Cyprus might finally be taken up as a colonial issue, and certainly the Soviet Union will try to exploit the situation from this point of view in order to further enhance its role as a champion of anti-colonialism. The Belgian representative at the March 14 meeting stressed the desirability of keeping Cyprus out of the United Nations and suggested that the next Ministerial meeting would be a good place for NATO to wash its dirty linen en famille. You may recall that at the time of the September riots, Mr. Spaak expressed himself as strongly in favour of the North Atlantic Council being used as the forum in which to discuss Cyprus. A distinction might usefully be drawn, however, between discussions in the permanent Council, for the exchange of information and views, and discussions in ministerial revisions of the Council, which would seem unlikely to be helpful unless positive proposals were under consideration.

11. To sum up, talks in the NATO Council on Cyprus should, if undertaken, be aimed at strengthening Greece's wavering NATO connection and at creating an atmosphere of mutual understanding which would permit the resumption of negotiations between the parties involved. It would be unwise, however, to regard the discussions, at least in the earlier stages, as a prelude to some sort of NATO settlement to be worked out within the Council itself.

12. These are all, however, rather negative aims; but if the serious weakening of the NATO alliance in the Eastern Mediterranean is to be stopped, something more positive should be contemplated. Mr. Robertson's telegram No. 306 of March 15,† indicates that in his way of thinking the British were precipitate in breaking off the negotiations with Makarios, great though the provocations undoubtedly were. In particular he thinks that the Cypriots were justified in being slightly skeptical of the nature of the constitution promised them. If we assume that the UK cannot indefinitely run against history by holding onto the island by force alone, then I think NATO should try to work out on a general basis a settlement which has proved impossible on a UK-Cypriot-Greek basis.

13. For this purpose Lord Ismay's proposals seem to me an imaginative start. They are:

(a) A commission would be formed of three constitutional experts to be nominated by each of the three parties from among nationals of NATO countries not directly involved (possibly Italy, Netherlands and Denmark).

(b) Acceptance of its responsibilities would be conditional upon the restoration of order in Cyprus and of an undertaking by the Greek Government to desist from inflammatory broadcasts.

(c) When the procedure had been accepted fully by all parties, Makarios would come back to Cyprus, provided that he also accepted the proposed procedure. You will recall that very similar proposals were advanced in the House of Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

14. This in itself is probably not sufficient to lead to a settlement. Sir Christopher Steel has hinted that NATO might eventually assume some kind of "trustee" responsibility for Cyprus, perhaps eventually taking over the defence installations in Cyprus. The internationalizing of the responsibility for the island might provide sufficient balm for Greek pride to permit a gradual return to normal life, and heal the rift between the three countries.

15. A solution of this nature would require, however, careful preliminary soundings outside the Council, before it could be brought formally before the Ministerial meeting. In the meantime, if there are to be further discussions in the permanent Council they should, in my opinion, be aimed at strengthening Greece's wavering NATO connection and at creating an atmosphere of mutual understanding which would permit the resumption of negotiations between the parties involved.

CYPRUS AND NATO

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Robin Ross of the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office called on Mr. Ford to ask, on instructions, whether we were thinking of discussing Cyprus at the Ministerial meeting of the NATO Council next month. Mr. Ross cited a report which the London Times correspondent in Washington had sent after the White Sulphur Springs talks last week, to the effect that Cyprus and the Middle East had "dominated" the conference and that you had foreseen "that the NATO Council might be asked to exert its mediating influence in the Cyprus dispute". The Times clipping is attached.⁶⁶

2. Mr. Ford replied that the Times report gave a quite erroneous impression. He said he understood that you had not discussed with Mr. Dulles the question of Cyprus as such, although you had spoken of the need to have a discussion at the next Ministerial meeting of the NATO Council of the major political questions affecting the alliance.⁶⁷

3. Mr. Ross then went on to explain the United Kingdom position, which he said Mr. Pritchard hoped to put to you directly within the next day or two. (I understand he is to see you today at four p.m.) The United Kingdom Government was firmly opposed to any

⁶⁷ Note marginale /Marginal note:

NATO intervention, whether by way of an attempt to mediate in the negotiations or to substitute the authority of NATO in Cyprus for that of the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom Government would prefer, for this reason, to avoid any NATO discussion of Cyprus, since it might lead to attempted intervention.⁶⁸ If the Greek representative at the Ministerial meeting next month insisted on making some sort of statement, the United Kingdom Government would not of course oppose this, but hoped that discussion could be kept to a minimum, as when the Greek representative on the Permanent Council had presented his Government's views in his statement of March 14. So far as the United Kingdom was concerned, a private discussion of Cyprus in NATO was to be preferred to another debate in the United Nations but since no solution seemed likely to emerge from NATO consideration of Cyprus, the Greeks would hardly agree to take Cyprus off the UN agenda in exchange for a NATO discussion. From the point of view of the alliance as a whole, even a NATO discussion — and still more the failure of a NATO attempt to mediate or "solve" the Cyprus question — could only have an adverse effect on Greek public opinion which was already dubious of the value of the NATO alliance.

4. As you know from my memorandum of March 27† (copy attached), the Turkish Ambassador came to see me last week to impress upon us the unwisdom of even discussing Cyprus in the NATO Council. I am not impressed by these Turkish and United Kingdom arguments. A NATO discussion, though abortive, would surely have a less harmful effect on the attitude of Greece towards NATO than the failure of NATO to discuss the issue of prime concern to the Greeks.⁶⁹

5. For that reason alone I believe we must not try to prevent or curtail a NATO discussion at the Ministerial Council.⁷⁰ Nothing in any event can prevent the Greeks from raising the question under the agenda item "Review of the Current International Situation". We have not heard directly of the intentions of the Greek government but Premier Karamanlis is reported this morning as having told the Greek Parliament that his Government is "determined to make use of every political and procedural method to achieve a settlement of the Cyprus problem".

6. Judging from reports so far received in the Department, the Belgians and Italians will strongly support a discussion in the Council, in spite of Turkish and United Kingdom opposition. There will therefore be a discussion; and, as far as we are concerned, this is all to the good. It would be totally unrealistic and damaging to the concept of political consultations in NATO if the Council met and did not discuss Cyprus. It would also be harmful to the supporters of NATO in Greece if the Greek representative's formal statement fell on stony silence. So the best, as well as the most likely solution is for a discussion to take place in the Council, though with a minimum of publicity since we cannot expect or even attempt any solution in present circumstances through the medium of NATO. There should, in other words, be discussion but not intervention.⁷¹

7. In any case, in view of the United Kingdom Government's negative approach to this issue, I now think it would be difficult for Canada to press for a Council discussion or attempt to put forward any solution.⁷² In addition to United Kingdom and Turkish representations, Mr. Wilgress has cautioned against any NATO intervention (his telegram No. 478 of April 3† is attached for convenience of reference).

8. It is still our opinion that the United Kingdom Government acted unwisely in deporting Archbishop Makarios and that further patience in the constitutional negotiations might finally have been rewarded. Even now the gap between the Archbishop and the United Kingdom Government is not great on paper, although the actions of the United Kingdom have, I think, nullified any prospects of early agreement.⁷³ It is not inconceivable that the United Kingdom Government may later change their minds about the possible usefulness of NATO as a face-saving means of reopening negotiations — or even of providing for a temporary custodian's role in the planned evolution of the island towards self-determination and self-government. At present, however, I feel that the most we should do is to give Greece the hearing she will presumably want at the May meeting of the Council, and to discuss the prospects with the parties concerned outside the Council meetings. There seems to be neither the time, the privacy nor the conditions for a "NATO solution" to the Cyprus question next month, though no one can deny the great political and strategic importance of the question for the alliance as a whole. Given a more forthcoming and imaginative attitude on the part of the United Kingdom Government on this issue, there might have been a more positive role for NATO than seems possible at this time.

9. I do not know whether you will agree with the foregoing analysis which has been rather hastily prepared in order to reach you before Mr. Pritchard sees you this afternoon. Perhaps our next step should be to bring Mr. Robertson up to date and seek his advice. If you agree I shall send him the recent papers prepared for you on this subject in the Department, and ask for his comments in preparation for the discussion I expect will be initiated by the Greeks at the Ministerial Council next month.⁷⁴

CONVERSATION WITH MR. THEOTOKY, GREEK FOREIGN MINISTER

Theotoky, the Greek Foreign Minister, came to see me in Paris before I left Sunday to tell me about his private talks with Selwyn Lloyd and Koprulu on the Cyprus question.

2. He was concerned about the signs of disunity already evident in the Alliance and for that reason had refrained from raising the Cyprus issue in the Council. If the issue however remained deadlocked, the Greek Government was determined to bring the matter before the U.N. at the fall session of the General Assembly, although they realize that this would be exploited by the Soviet Union. The only sensible way out was for the British to resume negotiations with the Greek Cypriots and in this connection he made it clear that Makarios could be the only person who would be in a position to negotiate.

3. After reviewing the background of events leading up to the present deadlock, he outlined the Greek position on the main points on which the negotiations have broken down as follows:

(a) Amnesty: The Greeks do not see how the British could insist on partial amnesty once they had decided that an offer of amnesty should be made to restore law and order; the offer had to be comprehensive to put an end to violence.

(b) Security: The Greek Government realized that the Governor must have certain reserved executive powers but he should not have reserved legislative powers to govern by decree in an emergency which might make self-government fictitious.

(c) Composition of the Legislature: The U.K. Government should clarify its intentions so as to establish that Cypriots would be given real self-government in the period of transition and a time limit should be set for the attainment of self-government.

4. Theotoky assured me that it was his earnest desire to have good relations with the U.K. and that he had told Selwyn Lloyd that the Greek Government fully recognized British strategic interests in Cyprus. After all, the Greeks were also dependent on the supplies from the same sources as the British. He also indicated to Selwyn Lloyd that he would hope that, if the British Government decided to make a new offer and to resume negotiations, the Greek Government would be informed in advance of what was being proposed.

5. In speaking to Koprulu, Theotoky had stressed the need for Greek-Turkish cooperation especially in the interests of NATO and to prevent Soviet exploitation of their differences, but he had also emphasized that the Cyprus issue could not be indefinitely postponed.

6. He also emphasized to me the political difficulties which faced his government since they had pledged themselves to cooperate with NATO and were now unable to show any results in a matter of such deep political concern as Cyprus.

7. I told Theotoky that, although Canada was not directly concerned in the Cyprus issue and we were not anxious to accept any special responsibility, we were interested in seeing a solution arrived at both as members of the Commonwealth as well as of NATO. If there was anything we could do usefully through NATO or privately with the U.K., we would be glad to consider it though it was difficult to see what even the most well intentioned intervention from outside could accomplish at the moment. I indicated to him that I was glad that he had taken the occasion of the NATO Ministerial meeting to have these private talks with the British and the Turks.

SECRET AND PERSONAL. IMMEDIATE.

1. When I saw Selwyn Lloyd on Wednesday, I told him that I had found everybody in Ottawa very worried and unhappy about the Cyprus situation. Their friends recognized the complexity of the problem with which the UK was compelled to deal, and were hesitant about proffering sympathy or advice. It was true the subject had not come up in the NATO Ministerial meeting, and it might not be raised directly at the forthcoming Prime Ministers' meeting, but it was undoubtedly very much in the minds of other governments who were closely associated with the UK.

2. Lloyd said that Harding appeared to be reasonably confident that persistence with present measures would restore law and order by the end of the year. Parenthetically, he observed that two or three months ago Harding thought the job might be accomplished in six months. Present intelligence information suggested that there were not more than 140 or 150 really desperate men in the EOKA cadres. His efforts were directed toward eliminating these men, destroying caches of weapons and explosives, and maintaining an effective blockade against gun-running into the island. The Governor saw some parallel between his problem in Cyprus and that which was being brought to a successful conclusion in Malaya. I got the impression that Lloyd didn't think the analogy a close one. He certainly recognized that the Malayan operation had been carried out in a vastly different international context and with the tacit support of the majority of the populace.

3. Lloyd was not complacent or reassuring about the situation. At the same time he found it difficult to see what the UK could do before it had put down terrorism in the island.

4. Lloyd said he was very much afraid of what the Turkish reaction might be to any major modification of present UK policies. He thought if the UK were to abandon Cyprus, the Turks might well try to occupy it by force. A strong Turkish Government, such as Ataturk's might have been able to contain the people's anger, but a weak Turkish Government, such as that now in office, beset by economic difficulties and harassed by popular feeling, might well feel compelled to take military action. Alternatively, if external action could be prevented, there was no reassurance that there would not be a recurrence within Turkey on a nation-wide and bloodier scale of last September's rioting in Istanbul. (Another view of these possibilities is taken by Sir Harold Nicolson in his letter to the Times of May 18.)

5. I had a word with Sir Michael Adeane on this general subject last evening. He is apprehensive about the way things seem to be going and thought that a private and direct approach to the Prime Minister might be in order.

CYPRUS

Following is full account of the conversation between the Minister and Lord Home.
Begins:

2. Mr. Pearson began by expressing concern for very real and very difficult problems the United Kingdom faced in Cyprus. Lord Home acknowledged the difficulty. He said that the Chiefs of Staff were absolutely firm about the necessity of holding the base and implied that the principal purpose of the base was to protect the Middle Eastern oil fields. He emphasized also British responsibility for government and for tranquillity on the island. The British could not simply walk out and abandon the island to civil war which he was certain would follow. He was quite sure also that the Turks would carry out the threat they had made to the British of taking over Cyprus if the British withdrew. Lord Home wondered if it might be useful for the British who were responsible for government on the island to prepare a draft constitution which could be prepared not as a final document but one which could be considered with the Cypriots. He considered that the United Kingdom had gone very far in its final offer to Makarios of a constitution which would provide substantial self-government. The principal difficulty was that Makarios would not accept provisions which would guarantee the Turkish minority. He implied, however, that there might be room for some further negotiation. He said that the British would be very happy to have any suggestions as to how NATO might help to solve this question.

3. Mr. Pearson said that we were not trying to give advice and we fully recognized the difficulties. He did think, however, that NATO might be useful and that perhaps if the worst came to the worst and the security position did not improve during this year, the United Kingdom might be happy to have some assistance. Just as they had turned to the United Nations to help them in Palestine, they might wish, though not he hoped as precipitately, to turn this problem over to NATO for consideration. He thought that NATO would be better than the United Nations for this purpose. Mr. Pearson recognized that the constitutional question was a matter for the United Kingdom. It might be, however, that some NATO formula could be found for the base which was essential not only to the United Kingdom but to all of NATO. He referred to the concern on the part of our Ambassador in Athens over the effect of these events in Cyprus on the Greek Government. Since our Ambassador had expressed his concern the Foreign Minister whom Mr. Pearson had found a reasonable man had been replaced. The position of Greece was a threat to NATO. Mr. Pearson thought it difficult also for NATO to talk about improving its structure in developing consultation when we could not solve these problems among ourselves.

4. Lord Home mentioned that Blair Fraser had said to him that opinion in Canada was critical of British policy in Cyprus and asked Mr. Pearson if this was so. Mr. Pearson said he thought that to some extent this was true. A good deal of the criticism might be attributed to lack of full knowledge and understanding of the question. It was based to some extent on a not very well defined feeling that the island was populated by people who wanted to be "free" and that they should be allowed to be. Ends.

CYPRUS

This memorandum is intended to provide you with an up-to-date picture of the Cyprus situation in view of the possibility that this question may be discussed informally in Paris.

A. Latest Developments

At the end of June, as you will remember, Turkey rejected the U.K. proposals for a settlement of the Cyprus problem because they provided, on certain conditions, for eventual self-determination, and the U.S. Government refused to support them because their implicit Turkish veto on self-determination would be unacceptable to Greece. The main features of these proposals were as follows:

(a) The United Kingdom Government would press ahead with the constitution and for this purpose Lord Radcliffe, as Constitutional Commissioner, would start consultations forthwith;

(b) it should be a condition of any change in the international status of Cyprus, that a defence agreement should be concluded between the United Kingdom, Greece and Turkey, terminable only by agreement between the parties, and providing for United Kingdom responsibility for the external defence of Cyprus and the use of facilities in the Island;

(c) a further condition of the change of international status would be a special treaty, safeguarding the interests of the minority racial groups;

(d) ten years after the Constitution took effect, the United Kingdom Government would be prepared to raise in N.A.T.O. the question whether a change in the international status of Cyprus would be compatible with the interests of western defence. If not fewer than two thirds of the N.A.T.O. members agreed, a plebiscite would be held. A two thirds majority would be necessary for a change in the international status.

2. The essential features would have been that the question of self-determination should not be raised by any of the three Governments directly concerned in the intervening period, and that all parties should cooperate sincerely in restoring and maintaining law and order in Cyprus. In view of the failure of the negotiations with Turkey (the U.K. apparently knew in advance that Turkey would not accept the new proposals but seemingly wished to cover itself by the latter's well publicized refusal and consequent equal share of responsibility)⁷⁵ the U.K. decided to leave the intractable question of self-determination in abeyance and concentrate its efforts on the development of self-government and the drafting of a constitution by Lord Radcliffe. The latter's work was reported thwarted by local hostility when the news came on August 16 of a suspension of terrorism, much to the astonishment of world opinion, discomfiture of the Greek Ethnarchy and mixed — but not altogether unfavourable — feelings of the Greek Government. This move by EOKA may have arisen in part from a desire for a breathing-spell, in view of the increased number of U.K. troops in Cyprus, and in part from a decline of support by the Greek Cypriots.

3. On August 22, Governor Harding announced that the terrorists had three weeks within which they had to surrender with their arms: they would then be given the choice of deportation to Greece or standing trial in Cyprus for personal crimes. An amnesty for certain offences was also provided for. EOKA retorted that it would resume terrorist activities at midnight on August 27 unless the order to lay down arms was withdrawn. Harding's order has not been withdrawn and EOKA's hostilities have apparently been resumed, although we do not know yet to what an extent. Although the U.K. has good legal reasons to require the surrender of arms, it is questionable whether imposing such a humiliating condition on proud and fanatic "patriots" was a wise move. Disputable also is the wisdom, at this stage, of labelling Archbishop Makarios as the leader of EOKA's criminal activities. EOKA documents were allegedly seized very recently proving the Archbishop's guilt in inciting terrorist activities and even for the assassination of certain people. At the time of Makarios' deportation, the U.K. government published certain facts about his complicity in terrorist activities in justification of their decision to deport him and even considered bringing him to trial. The British have now explained that, at the time of the Archbishop's expulsion, it was not possible to publish full details for security reasons; the discovery of new evidence however, coming as it does from EOKA sources, allegedly provides irrefutable proof of his guilt as the mastermind of all EOKA activities.

In my view, the British may simply wish to dismiss Makarios once and for all from the Cyprus parleys because he has refused to denounce violence on the island. It may be a sign that the U.K. Government is pretty sure of its own final victory, but by labelling Makarios a criminal it makes it almost impossible even in the future to negotiate with the man who, unfortunately, remains the key to the situation.

B. Ways of Handling the Cyprus Stalemate

As I mentioned above, the U.K. seems to feel confident that EOKA is in agony and therefore does not mind defying it. By a quick victory over EOKA, the U.K. may gain prestige as a law-enforcer in the eyes of many and may be willing to reopen negotiations with the parties concerned. In this respect, we have been informed by our Embassy in Athens that the U.S. Embassy in Ankara is reported to have been instructed by Washington to try, through informal conversations, to persuade the Turkish authorities to take a less obdurate and intransigent attitude towards the possibility of a compromise solution of the Cyprus problem. It is not known if the British are aware of this. Should terrorism again grow out of control, the U.K. may well have to defend its stand before the U.N. or refer the matter to N.A.T.O., despite its recently reiterated reluctance to do so. The Foreign Office has told Canada House confidentially that, as a last resort, they would contemplate partition of the island, with a U.K. enclave.⁷⁶

⁷⁵ Note marginale /Marginal note:

This may well explain the reluctance of the UK to request USA support in Ankara. [L.B. Pearson]

⁷⁶ Note marginale /Marginal note:

Mr. Lloyd mentioned this to me in London in July [L.B. Pearson]

(a) United Nations Solution

The U.K. is opposed, as you know, to a discussion of the Cyprus matter in the U.N. on grounds that it is a domestic affair.⁷⁷ On the other hand, the Greek Prime-Minister declared recently that, although he hoped the EOKA truce would place the U.K. in a position to end the Cyprus crisis, the Greek Government still intends to press its claim in the U.N.; the Greek Government's intention is probably made bolder by Washington's recent diplomatic assurances to it that the U.S. Government has not yet come to any decision regarding its attitude towards the raising of the Cyprus question in the U.N. and believes that circumstances affecting its policy might alter considerably before the Assembly meets. This U.S. assurance somewhat relieves the Greeks from the utter feeling of despondency that seized them when the U.K. declared that Turkey's refusal of the latest proposals made impossible any U.K. concessions towards Cypriot independence.

It may be worthwhile to mention that the Nationalist Chinese Ambassador in Athens has gathered the impression, from a conversation with Foreign Minister Averoff, that Greece's stand on the admission of Communist China to the United Nations Organization may be influenced by Nationalist China's own vote on the Cyprus issue if and when it is discussed by that body.

Our Ambassador in Athens suggested last month that, should the Greeks remain intent upon laying the matter before the U.N., it might be possible to turn this to advantage by bringing about a resolution, subject to the prior agreement of the parties concerned, which would set up a fact-finding commission, to report at a convenient date, but without recommendation or passing judgment. Another fiery, and probably useless, debate would thus be avoided and more time made available for a practical solution. We are examining this suggestion but are not inclined to believe it would be a wise move.

(b) NATO Solution

There is not much I could add to the contents of my Memo of June 8† on this subject (copy attached) except for the following developments. The Greek Foreign Minister recently told the Dutch Ambassador, as the latter reported in strict confidence to Mr. MacDermot, that he had been giving a great deal of thought to the problem of placating Turkey and in some way inducing it to yield to some extent on its absolute and immovable stand towards a change in the status of Cyprus.

4. Evidently assuming an intermediate stage during which some kind of self-government constitution would be introduced, Averoff said that if Enosis came to be the declared policy of the Cypriots, his Government would be prepared to under-write publicly in NATO the following commitments:

- (a) Complete independence and autonomy for the Turkish minority in educational and religious matters.
- (b) Double nationality for all Turkish inhabitants in Cyprus which would allow them to carry either or both Turkish and Greek passports.
- (c) Exemption from military service of all Turks in Cyprus for 50 years. All these provisions would be placed under the control of an international or U.N. commission to which there would be an immediate right of appeal in the case of failure of the Greeks to carry out the agreement.
- (d) The grant to the United Kingdom in perpetuity of a military base on the island.

⁷⁷ Note marginale :Marginal note:

It may be changing its position on this. [L.B. Pearson]

(e) The creation of Cyprus as a free port for Turks and Greeks.

(f) The maintenance of imperial preference for the island for between 30 to 50 years.

Averoff asked the Dutch Ambassador if he would put this forward to his Government with a view to their approaching Lord Ismay to see if this could be raised in N.A.T.O.

The Dutch Government is reluctant to become involved and has instructed its Ambassador to tell the Greek Foreign Minister that if the Greek Government can guarantee and carry out the curbing of radio and press excesses of expression, and are prepared to commit themselves to an official support of these proposals, the Dutch would give consideration to ways and means of raising it in N.A.T.O.

As the Dutch Ambassador recognized, the plan outlined by Averoff raises as many problems as it seeks to solve, but it appears to carry the matter a step forward at least in one respect, namely that the Greek Government is prepared to assume responsibility for backing with its own authority a solution for Cyprus, something that they have hitherto carefully refrained from doing.

It was quite obvious that neither the Dutch Government nor its Ambassador were at all enthusiastic about the plan, but in view of the despair now professed by the Greeks they seem willing to make an effort to advance Averoff's ideas on a tentative and exploratory basis, if their position can be satisfactorily safeguarded and if there is any hope whatever that their intervention might lead somewhere.

If the political consultation provided for in Para. 4 of the N.A.T.O. Treaty has any meaning, the Cyprus question offers a good opportunity of showing it. Also, if more and more emphasis is to be put on N.A.T.O.'s political role, a solution, or at least discussion, of the Cyprus problem by N.A.T.O. would be a step towards that goal. Although the British still say that there would be a real danger of fatally disrupting unity of the N.A.T.O. Alliance if it became too closely associated with the Cyprus dispute, they have also stated that they have never excluded the possibility of using N.A.T.O.'s good offices at an appropriate stage (see the U.K. proposals to Turkey, para. A(d) above). Incidentally, you will remember that Cyprus' strategic importance in helping the U.K. to carry out its N.A.T.O. obligations and maintain order in the Middle-East was one of the reasons given by the U.K. Government for keeping the island: the U.K. may have wished to emphasize this importance by accepting, as the press has just reported, a French request to station troops on Cyprus in case of trouble in the Suez Canal area, located some 250 miles south of Cyprus.

Our Ambassadors in Athens and Ankara have reported that both Turkey and Greece intend to remain within N.A.T.O. notwithstanding the outcome of the Cyprus stalemate, and therefore I think the U.K. fears are exaggerated. I continue to believe, however, that it would be inappropriate for Canada to suggest that N.A.T.O. become directly involved in the Cyprus question unless we were to have a clear indication that the three powers principally involved were in favour of this.

N.A.T.O. participation in negotiations leading to a settlement of the Cyprus problem may be futile, even obnoxious as the British contend, as long as the attitude of the parties concerned is governed exclusively by deep-rooted egocentric or emotional motives. However, a joint discreet and tentative approach by the N.A.T.O. partners not involved, aimed at bringing the parties concerned to more reasonable dispositions, might be a worthwhile preliminary step. When and if this is achieved, the partners concerned might choose to resume negotiations on their own or through N.A.T.O. The difficulty at the present stage seems to be that the psychological conditions required of the Cyprus disputants for a resumption of negotiations on their own are exactly the same as those required of them for official N.A.T.O. discussions or negotiations concerning Cyprus. I am attaching in this regard an interesting study (letter No. 375 of July 18, 1956† from Athens) from Mr. MacDermot commenting on our attached memo of June 8 on "Cyprus and N.A.T.O.".

CYPRUS — RADCLIFFE REPORT

Mr. Lennox-Boyd will unveil in the House of Commons in London this afternoon the Radcliffe Report outlining what has now become the United Kingdom government's proposal for a new constitution for Cyprus.⁷⁸ Mr. Belgrave of the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office brought us this morning the text of Mr. Lennox-Boyd's statement and a summary telegram outlining the Radcliffe proposals. The full report of Lord Radcliffe was given to us by Earncliffe at the end of last week. These documents are attached.

2. I will not repeat here the Colonial Office summary of the proposals. I should however, like to make a few preliminary comments which, if you agree, we shall pass on to our Delegation in New York, to our NATO Delegation, and to our other missions concerned.⁷⁹

3. In the first place, it is clear from reading the documents and from what Mr. Belgrave told us that there is very little prospect of the Greek Government accepting the new proposals as a basis for a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus question.⁸⁰ According to Belgrave, the State Department have assured the British Embassy in Washington that they will do their best in Athens to persuade the Greek Government not to reject the United Kingdom proposals out of hand. However, we have already had an AFP press report from Athens, when Mr. Lennox-Boyd was there on December 14, indicating that the proposals were unacceptable to the Greek Government. There is, as Mr. Belgrave agreed, no need for United States representations in Ankara since the private reactions of the Turkish Government are sympathetic, though their public statements may be more critical.

4. Turkish favour — and Greek disfavour — are based not only on the very careful constitutional protection which Lord Radcliffe would give the Turkish minority but on the completely indefinite nature of the United Kingdom statement (to be made this afternoon in London) regarding self-determination. Mr. Lennox-Boyd is to say merely that:

"Her Majesty's Government have already affirmed their recognition of the principle of self-determination. When the international and strategic situation permits and provided

⁸⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

that self-government is working satisfactorily, Her Majesty's Government will be ready to review the question of the application of self-determination.

"When the time comes for this review, that is, when these conditions have been fulfilled, it will be the purpose of Her Majesty's Government to ensure that any exercise of self-determination should be effected in such a manner that the Turkish-Cypriot community no less than the Greek-Cypriot community, shall in the special circumstances of Cyprus be given freedom to decide for themselves their future status. In other words, Her Majesty's Government recognise that the exercise of self-determination in such a mixed community must include the possibility of partition among the eventual options."

5. In view of the earlier indications we have received from United Kingdom sources it is perhaps rather surprising to find such a direct reference to the possibility of partition as an eventual solution. This, too, will please the Turks. Though the Greek Foreign Minister did not dismiss partition as a solution when you asked him about it in Paris last week, and though it may turn out in the end to be the only negotiable solution I think it is open to question whether the two principal communities on such a small island can be effectively segregated without disrupting the economic life of Cyprus.

6. The third comment I would make on the new constitution is that in only one respect does it go beyond previous offers; it does provide for two-thirds of the Legislative Assembly to be Greek-speaking, the remaining third being one-half Turkish and one-half appointed by the Governor to represent British residents and other minority groups. The Governor would retain entire responsibility for defence, external affairs, and internal security. He would have an implicit veto on legislation affecting other spheres of government as well, since it would be for him to decide whether such legislation was constitutional. The provisions regarding internal security and the Governor's veto (if we have understood the proposals correctly) would appear to represent a step backward from the position of the United Kingdom at the time that negotiations with Makarios were broken off at the end of February 1956.

7. United Kingdom delegation to NATO will to-day circulate copies of the United Kingdom proposals to other members of the Council. Mr. Belgrave explained that in doing so they were seeking to be guided by the report of the Committee of Three. They will inform their NATO colleagues that they are willing to continue to discuss the question of Cyprus with the Greek and Turkish Governments. They hope that if the NATO Council discusses Cyprus in the near future members will urge the Greek Government not to take a public position on the new proposals until the Cypriots and Archbishop Makarios have had a chance to comment upon them. This is the first indication we have had from the British that they are showing (or have shown) their proposals to Makarios — and this, at least, is a forward step.

8. From recent reports we have received, our impression is that the Greek Government, even before they were given an opportunity to study the new United Kingdom proposals, had probably come to the conclusion that their position in the new General Assembly and in Washington since Suez, was sufficiently favourable to justify them taking a stronger line. They see that a number of the Afro-Asian group, including all the Arabs, have swung to their side under the impact of Cyprus having been used as the main base from which the Suez attack was mounted. We have had indications from the Greek Embassy here that, possibly for this reason, the Greek Government may no longer be prepared to concede base rights to the United Kingdom Government in the event of a negotiated settlement providing for eventual union of the Island with Greece. Although the Greek Government might rationally estimate that the United Kingdom Government were almost bound in present circumstances to avoid fresh concessions over Cyprus, the Greeks seem tempted to take advantage not only of the increased voting strength of the groups favourable to self-determination in the General Assembly but of the split between Washington and London on Middle East policy. In the light, therefore, of both the new United Kingdom proposals and the stiffer Greek position, it seems to us unrealistic to hope any longer to avoid a bitter debate on Cyprus before the end of the present session of the General Assembly.⁸¹

We now have some indication of Greek tactics, gathered from conversations with members of the Greek Delegation.

2. The Greek delegate will start the discussion with a long statement à la Pineau and then table a resolution. The terms of it have not been decided on but its main point will be insistence on the application of the right of self-determination to the people of Cyprus. They have not finally decided whether or not they should include a request for UN intervention, or whether the latter should take the form of a request for renewal of direct negotiations between the UK and the Cypriots, or mediation by the Secretary General or some UN nominees.

3. The Greeks have made a strong plea for us to play a moderating role, and not to criticize Greece too strongly; to abstain, if possible, on the above resolution. They recognize we could never support it, but apparently think it is capable of receiving a majority of votes.

4. The Greek plea is along well known lines of reasoning. The government is very wobbly and cannot afford not to press the case of Cyprus strongly in view of the highly emotional state the Greek people have now reached on this issue. If the Cyprus vote goes against them, and particularly if all their NATO allies side with the UK and Turkey, then the Greeks are capable of doing something quite irrational such as turning out the Karamanlis Government, electing a Leftist Government, or even leaving NATO. These are arguments which the Greeks, of course, have been using for some time.

5. We told the Greeks that we did not know what our final position would be, but that a resolution couched in immoderate language calling for UN intervention would not in our opinion be a very wise move. We could certainly not support it. We suggested the advisability of considering a moderate resolution along the lines of the draft the Latin Americans were thinking of putting forward in the debate on Algeria. The Greeks did not think this would be acceptable to them.

6. We will try to secure the latest thinking of the UK Delegation, though it now seems improbably that Cyprus can be reached before the middle of next week.

CYPRUS

The following summary of our present thinking and of recent developments since your commentary was prepared may be of use to you in private discussions.

2. As expected, the Greek Government has summarily rejected the Radcliffe constitution on the grounds that it seeks the continuation of a colonial régime and vests the Governor of Cyprus with arbitrary powers. The Greeks were not reassured by Lennox-Boyd's statement in the Commons, which was vague about the key question of self-determination and ignored any consideration of amnesty for Archbishop Makarios. The Turks regard the Radcliffe proposals as a reasonable basis for negotiations but are not satisfied with the safeguards provided for the Turkish minority. They have expressed some interest in the idea of partition. The general position of the UK on Cyprus is set forth in CRO telegram 351 of November 7, 1956, which you have on file and in CRO Tel Y-26 of January 25/57, which has been forwarded to you by bag.

3. At the time of inscription of the item, there was good reason to suppose that the Greeks would take every advantage of the hostile reaction to the British invasion of Suez in order to round up support from the Afro-Asian and other delegations for a strong resolution on self-determination for Cyprus. However, Foreign Minister Averoff has told our Ambassador in Athens that the Greek Delegation plans to present such a resolution only for internal reasons and would be prepared to support any mild resolution that would advance the issue in some degree. Later, perhaps, something might be accomplished through NATO (Athens telegram 5 of January 8/57†). Averoff's proposed tactics are spelled out in more detail in telegram 169 of January 23† from Washington DC, reporting that the Greek Foreign Minister suggested to the State Department a resolution calling for renewal of negotiations between the UK and the Cypriots and for a continuing UN Commission on Cyprus. The State Department would probably go along with a moderate request for renewal of negotiations but would not accept a substantive resolution or one involving a UN Commission.

4. Despite Averoff's apparent reasonableness it must be recognized that the special circumstances of this Assembly i.e. British involvement in Middle East hostilities and additional potential sympathizers among new Afro-Asian members create a favourable climate for the Greek case and it is hard to believe that they will easily resist the temptation to press it. A practical point which may partially offset the Greek advantage is that extended debates on the Middle East and on Algeria have postponed consideration of the Cyprus items until very near the target date for the close of the Assembly session. It may be, therefore, that the time factor will be a strong incentive to a short debate and a moderate resolution. Furthermore, if the Algerian item is disposed of by a resolution which the French can live with, the USA and others whose behind-the-scenes efforts will have been responsible for such a result presumably will feel impelled to render similar services to the UK on Cyprus.

5. It looks from here, therefore, as if there might still be a slim chance of getting by in the Assembly without making matters worse than they are provided that both the principals are willing to retreat from their extreme positions in the interests of a possible solution outside UN. This would require of the Greeks that they speak mildly to their radical resolution (if indeed they insist on tabling it and cannot be persuaded to modify it), that they discourage their supporters from making fiery speeches and that they forego their idea of a UN Commission. For its part, the United Kingdom would have to register a reasonably gentle reaction to an initial extreme resolution for immediate self-determination and would have to tone down its own charges of Greek Government support for Cypriot terrorism. If these two delegations, along with the Turks, could be convinced of the merits of such self-denying ordinances a compromise might be arrived at in the form of a moderate resolution calling for renewal of negotiations. If this did no more than hold the position for the time being, it would at least avoid further damage to Greco-Turkish-British relations and thus increase the chance of subsequent fruitful negotiations.

6. Perhaps the parties mainly concerned could be brought to accept this line of reasoning by the prospect of a serious attempt to find a solution to the Cyprus problem through NATO. It would be impolitic to make reference to NATO in the General Assembly but it might be an argument in private discussions for keeping the Assembly debate on a moderate and responsible level. It is probably neither necessary or useful at this stage for specific proposals to be put forward. In our view, it would, for example, be a mistake even to raise the question of partition. For our part we would favour concentrating our efforts mainly on ways and means of disposing of the agenda items on Cyprus as harmlessly as possible in the hope that the whole problem would be thrashed out in the NATO forum. (It would be understood of course that this procedure would be without prejudice to the right of the Greeks to propose consideration of the Cyprus problem at a future Assembly session failing satisfactory progress outside the UN). We do not suggest that Canada should take too active a part in dealing with this issue but if you agree that the possibility of a NATO solution might help to modify extreme positions and keep the Assembly debate within reasonable bounds you might sound out the delegations principally concerned, including the USA Delegation.

7. We note from a report in the Christian Science Monitor of January 31, that the problem of Cyprus is under study in the Council of Europe. At first sight, it does not seem to us that a satisfactory solution under these auspices is likely but it may be that a full discussion in this purely European forum could at least lead to a better understanding of the real interests of the parties to the dispute.

8. As in the case of Algeria, we would be grateful if you would let us have the text of the Canadian statement on Cyprus when it is prepared.

9. Since dictating this telegram, we have received your telegrams No. 501 and 502† of February 7. Chances for a compromise do not seem bright but it might still be worthwhile to feel out other delegations on the NATO idea.

(For Washington only)

10. Could you take an early opportunity to discuss with the State Department the tactics outlined above? A NATO solution will not of course be practicable without active USA support and co-operation. Since the State Department agrees in principle with the desirability of a NATO solution (your telegram 169 of January 23†) the USA Delegation might perhaps be instructed to encourage the UK, Greek and Turkish Delegations to look forward to NATO discussion and to hold their fire meanwhile in the General Assembly.

(For London only)

10. We would be interested in knowing whether there have been any further developments in U.K. thinking toward a possible NATO solution for the Cyprus problem.

CYPRUS

Galsworthy Assistant Head of the Southern Department of the Foreign Office told us yesterday that their present thinking on Cyprus envisages two stages. The first is to ensure that the results of the discussion on Cyprus at the current General Assembly will be such as to convince the Greeks that their aims will not be secured either by repeated appeals to the UN or by the use of terrorism in Cyprus as an instrument of policy. The second stage is to employ NATO as a forum in which to seek a compromise solution by diplomatic negotiation (as distinct from a NATO solution).

2. Galsworthy emphasized that it has become quite clear that no progress can be made on the Cyprus issue until the Greeks can be persuaded to abandon their present intransigent policy of refusing to consider any proposal which does not completely meet their demands for full self-determination. In private of course in order to give an impression of moderation the Greeks keep expressing their anxiety to find a solution and their readiness to support moderate proposals. But whenever proposals are actually put to them they refuse any form of compromise, e.g. the way they flatly turned down the Radcliffe proposals without even giving them any serious study. A more recent instance of this intransigence is the official Greek announcement reported in the Times yesterday that Karamanlis had instructed the Greek Delegation in New York to abide by Greece's original claim for the application of self-determination to Cyprus and to oppose any compromise amendment or alternative that might be put forward by other delegations. A Greek spokesman in Athens is also reported to have described as an "unfriendly act" the Italian efforts to put forward a compromise solution; this is apparently the only reward the Italians are receiving for their pains. Galsworthy thought the Greek objection to Turkey being mentioned in the Italian proposals as a party directly concerned in the Cyprus dispute is indicative of how completely out of date the Greeks are in their attitude to the Cyprus question.

3. We gathered that the UK are proposing to take a pretty tough line in New York on the grounds that shock tactics at the UN offer the best prospect of making the Greeks see the light. The Foreign Office very much doubt that the possibility of a NATO discussion will have any moderating effect on the Greek position in the General Assembly since the Greeks are unlikely to agree to have the matter taken to the NATO forum until they are convinced that the UN offers them no hope of securing their aims. While the UK naturally regrets any discussion which would exacerbate the Cyprus problem they believe that if the question is to be discussed in the UN it must be discussed in its "true context". We were told the UK have plenty of evidence to document their item and that unless the Greeks should agree to drop their item, in which case the UK would do likewise, the UK propose to put forward "the facts". The Foreign Office believe this holds out the only hope of finally persuading the Greeks that the UN forum and the use of violence offers them no prospect of advancing their claims on Cyprus. A realization of this would put them in a more reasonable frame of mind and would thus open the way to the possibility of making some progress toward a solution. We were told the worst possible outcome of the discussion at the UN would be for the Greeks to get the impression that if they refuse to compromise and keep appealing to the UN year after year and encouraging terrorism they will in the end be able to secure their full demands. The UK very much hope, therefore that they will receive full support at the UN from their friends.

4. The second stage in Foreign Office thinking on Cyprus is to have the question discussed in the NATO forum. While the UK have never opposed a discussion of Cyprus in NATO until recently they had thought it inadvisable to encourage a move to hand the problem to NATO unless there was a reasonable prospect of a solution being reached. Otherwise such a step would merely transfer to the NATO Alliance the bilateral strains which already exist between Greece, Turkey and the UK. On February 11, however the Foreign Office submitted to Selwyn Lloyd a brief on the NATO aspects of the Cyprus question which had recommended that the UK should not only welcome NATO becoming seized of the Cyprus issue but should also take the initiative to bring this about. The reaction of Ministers to this suggestion was not yet known however.

5. When we asked about the likely Greek attitude to a discussion in NATO Galsworthy pointed out that the Greeks had always been opposed to a NATO discussion unless it were to be entirely on their own terms. They had thus made it clear when the question was raised in the NATO Council that unless a NATO discussion were based on the application of self-determination to Cyprus they did not want the matter discussed at all. Moreover in accepting the report of the Committee of Three, Greece had emphasized that the procedures laid down in the report should not apply to any existing dispute. Later when the opposition in Athens had attacked the Greek Government for harming the Cyprus cause by accepting the report Averoff had pointed out in a signed article in a Greek newspaper that the Greek reservations were, in fact, superfluous since the procedures outlined in the report were never intended to apply to Cyprus. Galsworthy told us that it was clear, therefore, that unless the Greeks could be brought to adopt a much less intransigent policy such as might be produced by the failure of their case at the General Assembly there is little prospect of their agreeing to a discussion in NATO.

6. From our discussion with Galsworthy we gathered that while the Foreign Office are thinking of a discussion of Cyprus in the NATO forum, they are definitely not thinking of a NATO solution. We were told that Foreign Office views on a NATO solution for Cyprus could best be summed up in the statement made by Dulles on April 24/56. When asked whether Cyprus could not be administered by NATO Dulles had pointed out that NATO was an organization of sovereign states and could not therefore govern any territory.
7. We enquired whether any thought was being given in the Foreign Office to the possibility that NATO might assume responsibility for the external defence of Cyprus or at least that any military bases on the Island should be integrated into the NATO defence scheme. We were told that in order to enable the UK to discharge its obligations under the Baghdad Pact, it was absolutely essential that in addition to any NATO bases which might be established in Cyprus the UK should retain a UK base on the Island.
8. We were interested to note that while the Foreign Office still consider that partition is a last resort which should not be adopted until all other attempts at a settlement have failed, partition no longer appears to be regarded as remote a possibility as it was some months ago. In fact Galsworthy gave it as his personal opinion that unless the Greeks are prepared to abandon their present attitude, is likely to be the only solution. He pointed out that the Trieste problem had also appeared insoluble until partition was adopted. The present view in the Foreign Office which we gather is firmly held is that if Greek-Cypriots have an inalienable right to self-determination it is only common justice that the Turkish-Cypriots should have the same right. When we referred to the difficulties involved Galsworthy said partition would undoubtedly raise a number of serious problems be expensive and result in considerable hardship to a number of Cypriots. He said however that both the Foreign Office and Colonial Office have been studying the practical details which would be involved in partition and that one could not conclude from any of the papers on the subject which had come across his desk that partition was impossible. We gathered that if partition were adopted as a solution Cyprus might either be divided into two (with a UK base in the Turkish sector) or alternatively the UK might wish to retain part of the Island for a base under UK sovereignty.
9. We were told UK policy with regard to Makarios has not changed and that during the recent discussions with him in the Seychelles on the Radcliffe report he gave indications of still wanting to use a denunciation of violence as a card to be employed to bargain in a Byzantine fashion. Galsworthy pointed out however that it is possible that Makarios' attitude was influenced by a desire to make no commitments until he can see what are the results of the discussion at the UN.
10. I am informed that the recent large scale sweeps against terrorists in Cyprus have produced encouraging results and that the security situation in the Island is now considerably better than it has been for some time. These successes against EOKA no doubt partly explain the present relatively confident UK attitude on Cyprus and their belief that the time has arrived to try to soften up the Greeks in the UN.

CYPRUS

Robin Ross of the UK High Commissioner's Office left with us the text of a resolution concerning Greek support for terrorism in Cyprus which the British intend to table at the UN shortly. We assume you have already seen the draft. The UK argument is that the resolution is not provocative because it does not name the Greek Government. Ross also pointed out that the resolution does not refer to the United Kingdom's efforts to initiate constitutional development because "such matters do not in our view lie within the competence of the UN organization". The UK hope we will be able to support their resolution. You will now have seen Robertson's telegram 266 of February 13 giving a reasoned exposition of the UK position.

2. While the resolution on terrorism may provide the UK with a better bargaining position and serve to counteract a strong Greek stand, we doubt that either the UK or the proposed Greek resolution (your telegram 501 of February 7) will advance a solution of the Cyprus problem. On the other hand the wording of the UK draft is not extreme and if it comes to a vote we would think Canada should support it.

3. We hope, however, that both resolutions can be headed off before they are pressed to a vote. This may be easier to accomplish if neither the Greek nor UK resolutions seem to have any real chance of majority support. Ross thought that the UK Delegation might be prepared to consider a compromise resolution but telegram 266 from London indicates that the UK attitude is hardening because they see little prospect of the Greeks agreeing to drop their item. Nor is the State Department very hopeful of success for tactics designed to achieve moderation in the Assembly debate. (See telegram 316 of February 13† from Washington).

4. Ross expressed the personal opinion that the UK might now be more amenable to a NATO approach than before the Suez Crisis and Galsworthy of the Foreign Office has confirmed to Robertson that the UK is prepared, after the Greeks have been rebuffed at the UN, to seek negotiations through NATO. As indicated in our telegram S-74 of February 8 we think it possible that the NATO forum might offer a face-saving formula for all the principals in the Cyprus controversy. We shall be interested to know whether the Greek Delegation might agree privately that a family discussion in the NATO Council would be a happier alternative than a heated debate at the UN which would be unlikely to advance their interests.

4. We fail to see how this UN exercise can be expected to produce any clearcut justification of UK policy in Cyprus or condemnation of Greek intervention, or any firm decision on self-determination. It can only offer scope for mischief to the Soviet Bloc and arouse the anti-colonial passions of the Afro-Asians. It seems to us therefore that the objective should still be to dispose of the Cyprus item as briefly and with as little rancour as possible so that a subsequent solution through diplomatic negotiations or through NATO will not be further prejudiced.

This question is likely to come before the First Committee on February 18. I have nothing new to add to our estimate of UK and Greek tactics already sent to you. On the basis of this info, and that contained in London telegram 266 and Washington telegram 316 February 13,† I think the prospects point to a rather bitter debate. The Greek position of complete support for the Arabs over Algeria, and the immoderate language used by the Greek Representative in his intervention has not helped to persuade Western delegations that the Greek case in Cyprus will be presented without rancour. The Greeks seem intent on exploiting the anti colonial passions aroused among the Arab Asian countries over Algeria for their own purposes. But the Greeks have privately admitted that they doubt if they can get a majority for their resolution.

2. We mentioned very informally to a member of the Greek Delegation the desirability of keeping the debate on a moderate level, and the idea that perhaps ultimately it could be discussed in NATO. The reaction was much along the lines indicated in London telegram 266 i.e. this would do more harm than good unless NATO could provide a solution acceptable to Greece.

3. I am inclined to think that it would be a mistake for us to take a very advanced position in trying behind the scenes to work out a compromise in the debate on Cyprus here, precisely because of the position we were obliged to take vis-à-vis the UK over Suez. We ought to be very cautious about making proposals about Cyprus, even in the very general terms you suggested. Of all the NATO countries, I think Canada is the one least qualified to attempt to intervene. In any case, I am sure the Greeks are now determined to have their say, and even the well intentioned efforts at compromise of the Italians seem to have earned them Greek resentment. We will, of course, do what we can, utilising the very sensible arguments outlined by you, but there seems to be little chance of a moderate debate.

The Turkish Ambassador called on me this afternoon, on instructions, to request Canadian support in seeking to avoid a discussion of the Cyprus items in the General Assembly and to resume instead discussions between the three capitals directly concerned. As a supporting argument for this view, he added that his government now favour partition (as we had heard last September from Moran) and had reason to believe that the Greek Government were now considering this possible solution.

2. I replied that although we did not welcome the Cyprus debate in the Assembly, I did not see how it could be prevented unless the UK and Greek Delegations in New York would withdraw their items, but I undertook to convey the Ambassador's message to you.

3. As Mr. Averoff has already spoken in the First Committee and resolutions have been tabled under both items, I do not imagine that there is any chance now of the Greeks foregoing the UN debate. I suppose the Turkish Ambassador was acting on instructions that may have gone to all their NATO missions, although he did not tell me which other governments were being approached.

The Greek Foreign Minister, Mr. Averoff, asked to see me this morning. He wished to talk about Cyprus. He was satisfied with the result of the debate which he thought to be constructive, though it has not been too well received in Greece.⁸² He said that he had deliberately refrained from circulating documentation regarding British atrocities in Cyprus as it would have "built a great fire". He told Noble that he had done this in a spirit of conciliation as he himself was anxious to restore good relations with the British and not make things unnecessarily difficult, even though Greek public opinion was highly inflamed on this issue.

2. He felt now that as an indispensable prerequisite to further progress the British should release Archbishop Makarios whose influence he was sure would from now on be helpful and whose release would bring an end to terrorism in Cyprus. The Greek Government was now willing to exclude annexation from any ultimate solution, and the Turks, who had, according to Averoff, also been pleased with the result of the debate, now realized that partition was impracticable and undesirable. Once Makarios was released, he felt that diplomatic discussions could begin between the three governments with a view to working out a solution based on local self-government under British sovereignty for a period of years, 5 or 7, at the end of which the Cypriots would be given an opportunity to vote for independence, or independence within the Commonwealth. Annexation to Greece would be excluded from any such plebiscite. The military base which would be required could be under NATO or UK auspices. He felt that there was a very real chance of a solution being reached along the above lines, but that it would be a mistake to discuss the matter in the NATO Council until progress had been made through diplomatic conversations. At the right time, the NATO Council could be seized of the matter and gain the credit for an agreed solution.

3. On the whole, Averoff seemed remarkably optimistic in regard to a plan which seems to me to make sense, but would not, I gather, have been possible six months ago. He insists, however, that the release of Makarios must be the prelude to any further progress, and he had informed Noble to this effect. I told him that I would have a talk with Noble about the matter and I wished him luck in his activities to bring about a solution on the above lines.

4. Perhaps there will be an opportunity for the Prime Minister to discuss this matter with Mr. Macmillan in Bermuda.⁸³

5. Averoff ended his conversation by protesting his desire to repair the damage to British-Greek friendship and Greek-Turkish friendship. He thought it should not be too difficult in either case though Sarper of Turkey was pessimistic about an early resumption of Turkish-Greek friendly relations. Averoff was sure that a trip by his Prime Minister to Ankara, followed by an unofficial visit of the King and Queen would undo all the damage that had been caused by the Cyprus issue.

CYPRUS

From a reliable source in the Secretariat we have known for some little time that Lord Ismay has been active behind the scenes in making soundings about the possibility of NATO playing a role in the settlement of the Cyprus issue. We have not felt in a position to report anything to you up to now because Lord Ismay was keeping this matter very much to himself. However, we have just learned from the same source that he has asked one or two members of his staff to give some thought to the permanent representatives who might assist him in the procedures of enquiry, mediation, conciliation or arbitration as set forth in paragraph 57 of the report of the Committee of Three and approved in the resolution adopted at the December Ministerial meeting.

2. The impression of our informant is that Lord Ismay desires to contribute to the solution of the Cyprus problem before he relinquishes office and now that the UN debate is over he is anxious to step into the picture. I would assume, although I have no information to this effect, that his first step after taking soundings here will be to talk the matter over informally with someone in the UK Government, probably Selwyn Lloyd. It is possible that he may receive encouragement from this quarter (see paragraph 4 of London telegram 266 February 13).

3. Lord Ismay no doubt sees this question as one affecting three NATO governments. I am not sure how far he is aware of the Greek attitude which was indicated in paragraph 5 of the telegram from London referred to above. In particular, he may not be aware that the Greek position at the close of the UN debate was that the interested parties referred to in the resolution were the UK Government and the people of Cyprus. For them the latter are represented by Archbishop Makarios, so that in their view the first step to be taken pursuant to the resolution would be the release of the Archbishop and the resumption of discussions between him and representatives of the UK Government. They are very gratified that the resolution did not recognize in any way the Turkish Government as one of the interested parties. They would, therefore, feel that any intention of Lord Ismay to discuss the question with representatives of the Turkish Government would be prejudicial to their case. It follows that the Greek Government would not regard themselves as a party directly interested in the first instance.

4. From this it would appear that an initiative by Lord Ismay at this time might possibly be premature. It is also doubtful if during the two and a half months that remain of his period of office he could hope to accomplish a solution of this vexed problem. It has been our view that this is a matter which could best be left to the more experienced hands of M. Spaak. It would be indiscreet to say the least to indicate this to Lord Ismay. In other respects we should welcome the interest and sense of responsibility he shows in being willing to take on such an ungrateful task. I feel, however, that he is in need of the best impartial advice that can be given. I have no doubt that at an early date he will follow his usual practice and call in for consultation certain of his colleagues on the Council. Accordingly, I should appreciate very much any guidance you could give me as to what I should say to Lord Ismay if he approaches me on this subject during the course of the next few days.

FOR THE MINISTER

CYPRUS

If there is any way Mr. Wilgress can discreetly discourage Lord Ismay from taking the NATO initiative on Cyprus in the near future I think, if you agree, he should try to do so. Now that the Assembly debate has passed off without too much damage and a resolution calling on the parties to negotiate has been almost unanimously adopted, I think the parties concerned should be given at least a few months in which to explore between themselves the possibilities of progress toward a negotiated settlement. Our earlier thoughts for a NATO initiative following the Assembly debate were based on the assumption that a generally acceptable resolution would not be forthcoming and that NATO might in some way or other have to step into the picture for lack of agreed alternative procedures. Happily that situation has not arisen.

2. Looking further ahead, however, I can see good reasons for not postponing a NATO approach too long if direct talks among the parties concerned remain deadlocked. Any initiative, to seize NATO with the problem late this summer, particularly if the initiative comes from UK sources, will be suspect by the Greeks who will by then be thinking in terms of the next Assembly debate. We have therefore been wondering if sometime in June might not be an appropriate moment for the new Secretary-General to take some initiative such as he has been contemplating for many months.

3. As you pointed out in your telegram 586 of February 14 from Candel New York we ought in present circumstances to be very cautious about making proposals about Cyprus and Canada is perhaps the least qualified of the NATO nations to intervene at this time.

4. You may wish to reply directly to Mr. Wilgress.

CYPRUS

Since sending you our telegram under reference events have begun to move at a rapid pace. Late last night we heard that Lord Ismay had prepared letters to the Permanent Representatives of the three countries concerned with the Cyprus dispute and that he had already seen the Permanent Representatives of The Netherlands and Norway on this subject. Today, he rang me up to ask if I could drop in after the meeting this afternoon.

2. He opened the discussion by showing me the letter which he had drafted to the three Permanent Representatives in question. This commenced by quoting from the resolution passed by the General Assembly. It then went on to quote from the resolution passed at the December Ministerial meeting of the Council based on the recommendation of the Committee of Three. It concluded by stating that he felt it was his duty under this resolution to offer his services and wished the Permanent Representative concerned to enquire from his government if they felt his good offices would be useful.

3. Ismay told me that while the note had not yet been delivered to any of the three Permanent Representatives he had shown the text to the UK and Greek Permanent Representatives and both had expressed the preliminary view that they thought it would do some good but they would sound out their governments and let him know.

4. Ismay said that what he had in mind was that he would associate with himself three wise men of which one would be Von Starckenberg, the former Permanent Representative of the Netherlands. I told him that I felt NATO could and should play a useful role in the Cyprus question but he is not sure whether the time had yet arrived and that a premature move might prejudice this possibility. Basing myself on paragraph 5 of London telegram 266 February 13, I mentioned that, in the view of the Greek Government, the resolution adopted by the Council last December did not apply to existing disputes and that the Foreign Minister of Greece had gone on record to this effect in a signed letter which he contributed to a Greek newspaper. In connection with the UN resolution I said that the Greeks regarded the interested parties referred to in the resolution as being the UK Government and the people of Cyprus and that the Indian delegate who sponsored the resolution made a statement to this effect. This meant that they were looking towards the resumption of discussions between the UK Government and Archbishop Makarios whose release, in their view, would be the first prerequisite.

5. Ismay said that he had looked up the record and could find no indication of the Greek Foreign Minister having made any reservation at the December meeting to the effect that the resolution would not apply to an existing dispute. (I believe this reservation was made not at the December meeting but when the Committee of Three consulted with the Greeks in September. We have asked the Secretariat to look into this.) I read [Group Corrupt] Candel Telegram 704 of February 27 in which the Greek Foreign Minister had told the Minister that it would be a mistake to discuss the matter in the NATO Council until progress had been made through diplomatic conversations but that at the right time the NATO Council could be seized of the matter and gain credit through an agreed solution.

6. The impression I derived was that Lord Ismay felt himself so committed to sending the notes he had prepared that he would proceed accordingly. However, he told me that he would have another talk with the Greek Permanent Representative and ask him if he could assure him that the sending of the note to him would not do more harm than good. This I told him would be a useful step.

LETTER NO. 108

New York, March 6, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL

CYPRUS

I am sending you separately a report† on the discussions of the question of Cyprus in the eleventh General Assembly, but would like also to add a few comments in the form of a postscript.

2. In my opinion the Greek Delegation attempted quite unscrupulously to exploit the increase in the number of Arab-Asian and Soviet bloc countries in the Assembly to push their advantage. For example, in the Fourth Committee with regard to Trusteeship questions, in the Special Political Committee with regard to the questions of race conflict in South Africa and the treatment of Indians in South Africa, and in the First Committee with regard to Algeria, the Greek Delegation took a line which was undistinguishable from that of the Arab-Asian (and Soviet) delegations. This, no doubt, was justifiable from the strictly narrow point of view of gaining votes on Cyprus but it was certainly resented by many of the Western delegations, in particular the French, British, Belgian, Portuguese and Turkish delegations and indeed presented a sorry picture of NATO solidarity.

3. The Turks behaved, in my opinion, with considerable dignity and certainly Mr. Sarper's presentation of their case on Cyprus was much the most convincing of the three major speeches. There was no subtlety in the Turkish approach on this or any of the "colonial" issues. It was not surprising to find that the United Kingdom Delegation was usually more disposed to compromise than the Turkish.

4. The United Kingdom Delegation seemed to be cursed with the same feeling of frustration that has bedevilled it during this entire session. For whatever reason, the British never raised the question of Cyprus in a Commonwealth meeting nor did they attempt to explain their tactics in any way whatsoever to even the Old Commonwealth countries. They were always prepared to give us information when we asked for it but were not very enterprising about informing us of intended moves. On one occasion we received information of a proposed United Kingdom tactic through the Netherlands Delegation. This clumsiness on the part of the United Kingdom Delegation particularly annoyed the Australians and New Zealanders.

5. The British started out with the intention of concentrating their case on the question of Greek aid for terrorism in Cyprus. They do not seem to have foreseen the Greek move of requesting a United Nations Commission to investigate the charges. Like the French in the case of Algeria, the British hoped that no resolution would secure a majority and that the Committee would conclude its deliberations without passing any resolution. After the introduction of the second Greek resolution on terrorism, however, they calculated that, in view of the large number of probable abstentions (most of Latin-America and Scandinavia) this resolution might secure a majority. They therefore threw their weight behind the attempt to find a compromise resolution.

6. The first attempt at a compromise was acceptable to the British but found no support with the Greeks because it implied that Turkey was an interested party. The Indian compromise was accepted by the Greeks from the beginning and by the British at the last moment. The Turks, as usual, accepted this move rather reluctantly.

7. There is no doubt that internal Greek politics played a considerable role in the attitude of the Greek Delegation. The Greeks told us quite frankly that they were reluctant to accept the first compromise resolution because it would weaken Mr. Averoff's political position if he were accused by the Opposition of not having pressed the Greek resolution to a vote, even though this meant having it rejected and having most of their Western friends line up against them. As you will recall from our telegram concerning the talk between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Averoff, the latter intimated that he would like to see diplomatic talks shortly commence between Greece, Turkey and the United Kingdom with a view to working out a new solution. This is rather curious since the Greeks during the debate had insisted that Turkey had no claim to discuss the question. This was also the whole point of the attempt by the Greeks to convince a number of delegations, including our own, to make a formal statement in explanation of vote that they considered that the interested parties implied in the Indian resolution were the United Kingdom and the people of Cyprus.

8. Perhaps the most interesting point to emerge from the debate was the categorical statement by the Greek Foreign Minister that his country would not claim Cyprus for itself. Attention was drawn to this statement by a number of delegations and, of course, Mr. Averoff reiterated in his talk with Mr. Pearson that annexation to Greece would be excluded from the plebiscite eventually to be held in Cyprus. He looked forward to an independent Cyprus or independence within the Commonwealth. It is also noteworthy that Mr. Krishna Menon stressed the glorious past of the Cypriot people and stated that they were as qualified to be an independent state as some other members of the United Nations, for example, Iceland.

9. To my knowledge, the idea of an independent Cypriot Republic has never previously been considered seriously. The Cypriot people themselves, or at least the Greek-speaking part of them, have always opted for union with Greece as an alternative to British rule. Since the Island is poor and with no important harbours it is a little difficult to see how it could seriously exist as an independent country unless it were heavily subsidized. Presumably if it were independent it would immediately be exposed to intense competition between Greece, Turkey, the United States and the USSR. The prospect is somewhat disquieting but will inevitably have to be considered now as one of the possible solutions to the problem.

In view of the urgent and apparently sympathetic consideration which the UK Government seem to be giving the EOKA offer of a truce if Makarios is released, it might be timely if you were to let them know in whatever way you find appropriate that in our opinion, based on my talk with Averoff in New York and on reports received from our missions, the resumption of negotiations with Makarios would be the best and perhaps the only way of reaching a more or less satisfactory settlement which would be tolerable for all three governments concerned. As Averoff told me, the Greek Government would accept a settlement negotiated with Makarios which excluded both union with Greece and partition but which would envisage within an agreed number of years independence or Commonwealth status for Cyprus.

2. I think this might also be the moment to indicate that we felt the immediate usefulness of NATO involvement chiefly depended upon the Archbishop's release.

3. If, as Mr. Robertson reports, Lord Ismay is still thinking of a NATO initiative leading to conciliation by some kind of Committee of Three, you might tell him that we understood the UK Government preferred a one man operation and that we also regarded this as the most suitable in the circumstances, both for privacy and flexibility. It is a task that the next Secretary-General could also carry on. In any case I would hope that Canada would not be asked to take part in such a Committee of Good Offices at least for a few months.

CYPRUS

Lord Ismay called a special private meeting of the Council this morning to discuss the latest developments.

2. He prefaced his remarks by relating what has happened in the past regarding the problem of Cyprus and NATO. The matter was first discussed almost over a year ago on the 14th of March 1956 on the initiative of the Greek Government. Lord Ismay said that after that meeting he had summarized the salient points of that discussion. They were briefly, that the Cyprus situation was damaging to NATO, that unless early steps to break the deadlock were taken the question of Cyprus would be discussed in the UN with the possibility that further damage might be done to the unity of the Alliance. The solution was a matter of agreement between the interested parties themselves and it was the wish of the Council that he should, as Secretary-General, direct his efforts towards devising ways and means of paving the way for a solution. He had already in mind then the possibility of entrusting the problem to three outstanding personalities chosen from countries not directly concerned with the dispute. He had visualized, however, that before such a step could be taken there should be a period of détente in the relations between the three governments.

3. Approximately a month later, the Cyprus issue had come up again in the Council, raised this time by the new Greek Permanent Representative, Mr. Melas. The Turkish representative had indicated that NATO was perhaps not the best forum to discuss a possible settlement. Likewise, the UK representative had stated that although they had no objection to exchanging views in the Council, they felt that a search for a NATO solution would not achieve a useful purpose.

4. Last December at the Ministerial meeting, the Greek Foreign Minister, Mr. Averoff referred to the April discussions of Cyprus in the Council and said that his government, if other governments agreed, would accept NATO arbitration. M. Menderes also agreed that the question might be discussed in NATO, but in that case it should be removed from the UN agenda. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd merely stated that he had no objection to discussing Cyprus in any forum. Lord Ismay said it was alleged that during the Ministerial meeting, Mr. Averoff expressed a reservation about the competence of NATO to deal with the Cyprus dispute. Lord Ismay wished to put the record straight in this respect. What Mr. Averoff had said was that the procedure envisaged in the Committee of Three report did not appear to be obligatory in respect to disputes already brought before NATO or in respect of which action was being taken in other organizations.

5. Lord Ismay said that in the circumstances he had felt he should make no move till after the UN had debated Cyprus. After the UN debate, however, he thought it his duty to offer his good offices. He had, also, before the UN debate spoken to the Permanent Representatives of the three countries concerned and counselled moderation in presenting their case in the UN. Subsequently, he drafted a letter to the three governments which he showed them in advance. The Greek representative had given him to understand that, although it might not be wise to send his letter before the Greek Parliament had concluded a debate on Cyprus, it was possible that once this debate was over the Greek Government might have a freer hand regarding Lord Ismay's offer of good offices. On the 15th of March, Lord Ismay decided to send his letters (the texts will be forwarded to you as soon as available from the Secretariat).

6. Lord Ismay then had the Greek reply read in its original French text. In summary, the reply is to the effect that they still believe that the procedure that should be followed is that outlined in the resolution adopted by the UN, e.g. that negotiations should be conducted between the administering power and the peoples of Cyprus. It goes on to say that the Greek Government does not believe it possible to accept the procedure proposed by Lord Ismay. It regrets that, in the present circumstances, the Greek Government does not consider that discussion in NATO would be in the best interests of the Alliance.

7. Lord Ismay then called upon the representatives of Greece, Turkey and the UK and asked them whether they wished to make comments on their governments' replies. Mr. Melas said that for the moment his government stood by the resolution adopted by the UN on Cyprus. Greece has always regarded herself as a mandatory to the Cypriot people. If the Greek Government were not to make that point clear it might be deduced that it was acting in its own interest and not in the interest of the people of Cyprus. He was not too concerned with the turn of events as, even if the present attempt to reach a settlement had not failed in the first stage of the discussions, it was quite obvious that, in view of the line taken by the UK Government, negotiations for a settlement would have failed at a later stage of the discussions. It seemed evident to him that if the UK Government were not prepared to negotiate with the Cypriot people, NATO itself could achieve no progress. He finally referred to the conditions attached by the UK Government to the release of Archbishop Makarios. He failed to see how the Archbishop could comply with these conditions without creating the worst possible impression on his own people. If the UK Government was sincere in its desire for a détente they should release the Archbishop unconditionally. He ended up his remarks by thanking the Secretary-General for taking the initiative of offering his good offices.

8. The Turkish representative said that the negative reply of the Greek Government came to them as a surprise (sic). He begged to differ from the interpretation put by the Greek authorities on the UN resolution.

9. Sir Frank Roberts, like his Turkish colleague, said that the UN resolution on Cyprus could be interpreted in various ways which do not necessarily coincide with the Greek interpretation. He disagreed also with Mr. Melas' remark that efforts towards a settlement would have failed at a later stage of the discussions even if they had been successful in the preliminary stage. It was his government's hope that the Secretary-General's initiative would enable a fresh start to be made as they were agreeable to search for an acceptable solution to all parties concerned. Under these conditions, he thought that an exchange of views following the Secretary-General's initiative would serve a useful purpose.

10. After the statement of the Secretary-General and those of the three interested countries, opinions were expressed by a few other delegates. I shall summarize the salient ones for the record as no minutes will be prepared by the Secretariat on today's meeting.

11. Mr. Perkins was the first to speak. He said that he could well understand the desire of the Greek Government to have conversations carried on between the UK authorities and the Cypriots. He welcomed the fact that the Greek official reply seemed to leave the "door slightly ajar" and that consequently there might be a useful role for NATO to play in the future. Under the circumstances, it seemed that the Secretary-General could only keep the situation under review and continue to consult with the parties most directly concerned.

12. The Belgian representative said that because of the importance of this matter for NATO every possible effort should be made to help effect a settlement. It was perhaps significant that in the last few months those which were opposed to having the matter discussed in NATO with a view to reaching a solution had now changed their position. If such changes had taken place in the past there was no reason to be pessimistic about the future. He attached a great deal of importance to those particular words in the Greek letter (dans les circonstances présentes — ne croit pas pouvoir) and he hoped that these could be interpreted as meaning that the Greek Government is not definitely opposed to accepting Lord Ismay's offer of good offices. He then made the point that the Greek Government's desire to abide by the UN resolution does not necessarily exclude the procedure envisaged by Lord Ismay. On the contrary, he thought when the NATO governments voted in favour of the UN resolution in NY, they had done so with the full knowledge that the problem might come before NATO and that negotiations could be pursued in that context. He ended up his remarks by an appeal to the Greek Government to review the situation and perhaps reconsider its position. At this point, Mr. Melas interjected that one should not be too optimistic about the interpretation to be put on the wording of his letter.

13. The Netherlands representative's remarks were to the effect that what is important to achieve is some kind of settlement; the question of procedure was secondary. All and well if some agreement can be reached in NATO but otherwise his government was quite prepared to see a solution found in another context. He wished, however, the NATO approach to be thoroughly explored and took comfort in the fact that there seems to be some hope that NATO might help in reaching a solution.

14. Because of the importance we attach to this matter, I thought that we should intervene in the discussion. In doing so, I had, of course, in mind the Minister's remarks contained in paragraph 3 of your telegram S-153 March 19. I said that we appreciated the motives of the Secretary-General in offering his good offices in an effort to settle a dispute which is so disturbing for the Alliance. Like my colleagues, I took comfort from the wording of the official Greek reply to Lord Ismay's letter which is slightly more hopeful than the press accounts which have appeared, and of course we can only respect the position taken by the Greek Government. The important point, however, is that the governments concerned should continue to give thought to the manner in which the Secretary-General and NATO could, in the course of time, play a useful role regarding the settlement of the dispute. That meant in practice that the Secretary-General should continue to keep in touch with the situation and to consult informally and privately with the representatives of the governments concerned. I insisted on the informal and private character of these consultations and drew attention to the fact that, although the procedure envisaged in the Committee of Three report had mentioned the possibility of some kind of a Committee of Three to study the problem, there was of course no obligation that such a procedure be literally followed. In our view, a one-man operation would prove to be more flexible and afford a better chance to conduct these talks with all due privacy. In conclusion, I said that all the Council could do at the moment was to take note of the Secretary-General's action with the hope that eventually NATO's discussion of the Cyprus issue would yield fruitful results.

15. The French representative deplored the fact that so much publicity had been given to Lord Ismay's intervention and he hoped that in the future whatever negotiations were carried on in NATO would be kept away from the public.

16. It could not be expected, of course, that clear conclusions would emerge from this meeting but it seems to have brought into light the fact that the Greek official reply to Lord Ismay's letter is couched in such terms that it may not constitute a flat no to Lord Ismay's offer of good offices. Consultation should, therefore, continue between the interested parties and a clarification of the Greek Government's position should be sought. The merit of Lord Ismay's initiative depends now on the slight possibility (which to me appears pretty dim, given the UK position regarding the release of Makarios) that the Greek Government may in the end decide to risk a NATO intervention under what appears to be pretty inauspicious circumstances.

17. At the end of the meeting, Lord Ismay cleared up a few procedural points. He will circulate to delegations the text of his letters to the three governments. The three governments concerned will make available to governments copy of their replies to Lord Ismay. These replies should be kept confidential, although the UK and Turkish representatives reserved the right for their authorities to erase these texts. It was also agreed that no comments whatsoever would be made to the press regarding today's Council meeting.

MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING — COMMUNIQUÉ

With Western Europe being alternately wooed and bullied by the USSR, and with NATO itself divided on a number of major questions both of European defence and of foreign policy, drafting of the Communiqué of the Ministerial meeting this week will present special problems and opportunities. In addition to the material in the departmental brief† commenting on specific topics, you may wish to have our thoughts as to what might be considered for inclusion in the Council's Communiqué or in press guidance.

2. There are, it seems to us, 3 principal objectives the Council's Communiqué might aim to attain:

(a) to give a telling collective answer to the present phase of Soviet foreign policy towards Europe;

(b) to secure better press for NATO in Germany and a deeper realization of Western Europe's dependence on the Alliance;

(c) to regain a greater sense of political unity for the Alliance as a whole.

3. It is easier to prescribe a forthright and constructive Communiqué which should give a lead to Western public opinion on current topics of contention with the Soviet Union than it is to draft such a document in terms acceptable to all members. In spite of the differences of emphasis which exist among the members of the Alliance on for example the cessation of atomic tests, it should in our opinion be possible to find a common denominator on most of the issues on which the Soviet Union is at present campaigning by means of diplomatic notes and broadcasts to members of the Alliance in an attempt to divide, confuse and intimidate. The Alliance was formed in response to a Soviet threat and even though there seems today less immediate risk of a military assault on Western Europe, the new Soviet campaign has conveniently reminded us of our community of purpose in standing together against both blandishments and threats aimed at dividing and weakening us.

4. At the same time the Communiqué might reasonably be expected to give the Soviet Union categorical reassurances that its fears of NATO forces or NATO bases being used aggressively are groundless. The proposed Western reductions in UK and German force levels should demonstrate our pacific purposes. In a period when the Russians are being given some credit in the uncommitted countries for military reductions they may not have made, it seems unfortunate that NATO should be divided on a similar issue without at least being able to take some credit for what some of its members have decided they must do.

5. Too often, it seems to us, Western countries have been getting the worst of both worlds in terms of public relations and a Communiqué that repudiated Soviet charges and reasserted as concretely as possible the defensive character of the Alliance would be timely.

6. Since the Council will be meeting in Bonn and in an election year, there is a special problem in regard to Germany. No doubt the German delegation will be in the best position to advise the Council in this regard, and will know how the German Government plans to reply to the particularly crude Soviet note of April 27 which attempts to interfere directly in German domestic politics. The Council should, however, be doubly careful to avoid such interference itself. The German delegation will no doubt have prepared for the Communiqué ideas on German reunification with reference to the 4-Power Working Group's report and may wish to explain in the Communiqué its essential features, which have as yet not been made public.

7. In addition the Communiqué might attempt to present a positive NATO attitude towards European security proposals in relation to German reunification and the general disarmament talks in London. In fact there is, we believe, a necessary interdependence between these three subjects which could be expressed in a form which would not trespass on the work of the Disarmament Sub-Committee.

8. Whether or not agreement can be reached in London on the elements of a limited disarmament agreement, it might be well for the Council to endorse in principle the new and flexible Western disarmament proposals particularly those of the United States. The Council may also wish to emphasize the interest of NATO in the European aspects of disarmament. In addition, the Communiqué might seek to express in a clear and convincing way the position of NATO governments on the need for nuclear tests and on the conditions under which their cessation would be acceptable as part of an international agreement providing controls which would ensure that compliance would not be only one sided.

9. It would seem desirable that something be said in the Communiqué about Soviet policy in Eastern Europe and particularly in regard to Hungary. The Council might again go on record as condemning the flagrant violation of human rights which has taken place through the military intervention of the Soviet Union. Although Soviet control of Hungary is now exercised less directly, the right of a people to chose its own government is still suppressed. Reference might also be made to Western help for the Hungarians through immigration and relief operations. It is surely a dramatic commentary on the state of affairs in Eastern Europe when an elaborate system of barb-wire, ploughed fields, lights, dogs, and watch towers must be erected to keep people from leaving their country. At the same time talk of "peaceful liberation" might be soft pedalled and the special position of Poland kept in mind so that the Council will not embarrass Gomulka.

10. We are of two minds as to whether any reference to Cyprus should be attempted in the Communiqué. Depending on whether it would help or hinder Mr. Spaak's future efforts, some reference might be made to the accepted need for using all possible means of reconciling differences among members. Any reference should if possible be related to the theme of political partnership.

11. The subject of the Suez Canal is not on the agenda and may well not be discussed. We would not be inclined to do anything to raise this issue, but if Ministers feel that reference should be made to it, in view of the past discussions of the problem and more particularly of their endorsement in the December Communiqué of the Security Council's six principles, we would hope that the reference might merely consist in noting the progress achieved and the useful role played by the UN Secretary General and others.

12. As the Bermuda Conference obviously has an important bearing on the re-establishment of close political partnership among the members of the Alliance, it may be that some of the points made in the Anglo-American Bermuda Communiqué could be used in the Bonn Communiqué although it might be inappropriate to refer explicitly to Bermuda.

13. In short, we suggest that the theme of the Communiqué should be political partnership. Last December, the Council's Communiqué expressed the undertaking of NATO governments to pursue the development of political, economic and cultural unity in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee of Three. It would now seem logical to stress the need for increasing the effectiveness of political consultation as a further step in building a genuine political partnership among all members of the Alliance. Each section of the Communiqué would we hope contribute to this theme rather than consisting of a series of separate policy statements on isolated topics.

MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING — COMMUNIQUÉ

Since this will be the first Ministerial Council meeting since the signing of the Messina Treaties on March 25, there is almost bound to be some discussion of European integration. We have given our views in the brief. Preliminary reports from NATO capitals indicate that some of the leading members of the Alliance see no need for a NATO pronouncement welcoming the signature of the Common Market and Euratom Treaties.

2. If, however, some members of the Six should insist that reference be made to these developments in the Communiqué we would see no objection provided it were so worded that the Council was not giving too solemn a blessing since this might weaken our hand in opposing certain sections of the Common Market Treaty when it is reviewed elsewhere. The chief thing which we think should be stressed in any public Council reference to this question is the need for Western European integration to take place in fact as well as in theory within the Atlantic framework, since any latent tendencies towards continentalism on either side of the Atlantic could be damaging to the Alliance and perhaps especially to Canada.

MINISTERIAL MEETING, BONN

You will have already seen in the press an account of the opening ceremony. We shall therefore only deal here with what seem to be the most important interventions made during the private discussion of Item II(a) of the agenda covered yesterday. (At Mr. Pearson's suggestion, it was agreed to consider the Secretary General's reports under Item IV of the agenda).

2. There is one part of Mr. Martino's statement that might be usefully reported at this stage. In dealing with Western policies towards the satellites, he referred particularly to Hungary. He suggested that Kadar's invitation to Hammarskjöld to visit Hungary should be accepted but only after the forthcoming report of the UN Commission in Hungary had been fully discussed in the UN. This would not only enable the Secretary General to convey the views of world public opinion on Soviet action in Hungary, but would give a purpose to the Secretary General's visit to Budapest, e.g., confront the Hungarian authorities with the findings of the UN report.

3. Mr. Dulles, after some academic remarks about "classic American thinking on alliances", developed three main points. First, that good progress has now been achieved in healing past differences; second, that the current Soviet campaign of threats has been met in a forthright and most courageous manner by members of NATO and finally, that the USA are assuming their full share in the cooperative efforts that are being made to meet the [new] situation. In this last connection, he mentioned the full support given by his government to European economic integration, of the work being done to find alternatives to the Suez Canal, the Eisenhower Doctrine,⁸⁴ the establishment of an economic development fund now under study and the new USA policy regarding trade relations with Poland.

4. In analysing current trends of Soviet policy, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd developed the theme that the 1957 brand of coexistence may well reveal the fact that beneath the surface the Soviet Government is now on the defensive. Although Soviet military power continues to grow and Soviet economy to expand, Soviet leaders are facing many problems. The satellites have become a source of anxiety; the upheavals in Hungary and Poland now prevent them from taking the initiative in Europe; the Eisenhower Doctrine is turning the balance against them in the MidEast; the old Stalinist methods have had to be revised and their desire to compete economically in the West create great internal difficulties. In all this, Mr. Lloyd saw some reason for guarded optimism. From the greater position of strength achieved by NATO in the last six years: he saw opportunity to talk with the Soviets about the MidEast, German reunification and disarmament proposals. Western attention should be directed specially at the Achilles' heel of the Soviets, Eastern Europe. In the course of his statement, Mr. Lloyd said that NATO had been right in basing its whole defence upon the deterrent. Later on, he felt the necessity of qualifying this assertion in the light of the French, German and Dutch insistence that the strength of the 'shield' be maintained. What he meant was that NATO cannot defend itself against a major assault by conventional weapons alone, and that the Soviets should know that any real aggression (as defined in the political directive) would be met with all the forces at our disposal, conventional and otherwise.

5. Mr. Pineau's intervention was perhaps the frankest and most courageous. He addressed himself to the question of the reassessment posed by the development of new weapons. There are, in his opinion, four main aspects to this problem. What should be the relative balance between nuclear and conventional weapons? The answers can only be that nuclear weapons should be available to deal with global attack but that conventional weapons were also necessary to deal with localized conflicts. Another important aspect was the temptation for some governments to decide unilaterally to "modernize" their forces. This was clearly inadmissible as full consultation in NATO was of the utmost importance in such vital matters. The most serious problem was perhaps that raised by the introduction of nuclear weapons in the arsenals of the NATO countries. The only acceptable arrangement for France would be to entrust SACEUR with the ultimate decision to make use of these weapons. Finally Mr. Pineau referred to the disarmament negotiations. His government's position in this respect may be summarized in four basic propositions. Disarmament negotiations are presently conducted in the UN context and it would be dangerous to link with them the problem of German reunification. No nuclear disarmament without classical disarmament. The control system should take into account foreseeable technical progress which may lead to H-Bomb explosions without fissile materials; it is unrealistic to expect that all but three powers should agree to limitations of nuclear [armaments].

6. It may also be useful for you to have a brief report of Mr. Von Brentano's remarks; the first gave an account of the unsatisfactory relations between the USSR and Germany since the last Ministerial meeting. He counselled extreme caution in resuming contacts and exchanges with the USSR as such a policy might give the impression that the Hungarian events have been forgotten. With regard to the satellites, however, he said that the West should try to maintain in their people the hope for liberation. This was particularly applicable to the Soviet zone of Germany. He believed in the sense of realism of Eastern Germans to avoid any uprising, but there was no use denying that explosive potentialities do exist. Perhaps NATO should make it clear to the Soviets that it stands ready to take adequate measures if this were to become necessary. He ended his statement by raising the question as to whether NATO countries should study the possibility of their resuming more normal relations with the satellites.

7. At a later stage in the discussion, Mr. Von Brentano referred to the growing tendencies of overemphasizing the importance of nuclear weapons. On this score, his government was very incensed with the current UK reductions. He wished the final Communiqué to include a statement to the effect that NATO should maintain in Europe a powerful shield of land, aerial and naval forces.

8. We shall try to send you a separate account of the discussions on MidEastern policy.⁸⁵

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION; MINISTERIAL MEETING; REPORT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

23. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said there were a number of items of interest which had been discussed at the N.A.T.O. Ministerial Council meeting held in Bonn, on May 2nd and 3rd. The United Kingdom plans for reduction in their forces were continuing to cause anxiety as possibly heralding a withdrawal of the U.K. from the continent and, more particularly, because they might cause a chain reaction of reductions by ⁸⁵ Il semble qu'un rapport n'a jamais été envoyé.

 It appears that no report was ever sent.

other N.A.T.O. countries. The U.K. Foreign Secretary had had some success in assuring the council that his country did not intend to withdraw completely and that the forces that would remain in Europe would in fact be stronger because of increased fire power. Another matter of importance was whether the continental countries should be equipped with atomic weapons. This was a particularly live issue in Germany, where there would be a national election in the autumn. Indeed, the meeting had been held in Bonn to give the government a measure of support for this contest. Once it was over the Germans would undoubtedly emphasize strongly their desire that their forces should be equipped with these weapons.

The United States Secretary of State had said that U.S. forces in Europe would not be reduced. As regards the Middle East, Mr. Dulles had made it clear that his government was now convinced that Syria was under communist domination. Therefore, in accordance with the Eisenhower doctrine, the U.S., if asked, would come to the assistance of a country attacked by Syria. Jordan had quietened down. The U.K. and France were almost gleeful to see how involved the U.S. had become in the area.

A number of the smaller countries in the alliance had been bitterly attacked by Russia for allowing the U.S. to establish bases in their territories, grant them military aid, etc. It was encouraging to see how irritated they had been and how manfully they had reacted to this pressure. On the question of Cyprus, the Turks and Greeks had spoken out clearly and unmistakably to each other. This would be one of the first problems that Mr. Spaak, the new Secretary-General, would tackle and he would have some advantages in doing so. It now appeared there was some hope of resolving it.

Nothing had arisen that specially concerned Canada and there had been no need or occasion for Canada to make a policy statement.

While he was in Europe he had held meetings with the heads of Canadian missions there, and in the Middle East, and had received interesting reports, particularly about the Arab world. A breakup seemed to be on the way with Jordan, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia forming a new front against Nasser, which was all to the good. Every effort was being made to get Israel not to take advantage of this developing situation. U.K. ships would soon start using the Suez Canal again, under Egyptian conditions, which on the whole were not too bad. Again, Israel was being persuaded not to try to run a ship through the canal as a test case at this time. Mr. Dulles' remarks in Europe on the terms of use were appropriate but what he might say in Washington on the subject was another matter.

24. The Cabinet noted with interest the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the N.A.T.O. Ministerial Council meeting held in Bonn, and on the Middle East situation.

CONFIDENTIAL

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — BONN MAY 2-4

Defence Liaison (1) Division: The NATO Ministerial Meeting held in Bonn last week afforded the NATO Foreign Ministers a useful opportunity to exchange views on the current political developments affecting the Alliance and to foster conditions for maintaining and developing a common NATO approach to the main political issues of today. No new or spectacular proposals were advanced, and none had been expected, but generally the meeting gave an encouraging indication of Atlantic Unity in spite of the continuing divisive forces with which it has been confronted, and of courage in the face of recent Soviet blackmail warnings.

2. The Government of Chancellor Adenauer took advantage of the presence of the Ministerial Council in Bonn to stress its interests in NATO, and to reaffirm its support of the Organization's present policies. Chancellor Adenauer helped, in his opening address to the Ministerial Council, to set the keynote of solidarity of the meeting by rejecting all suggestions of a neutral Germany or a neutral zone in the heart of Europe which would take Germany out of NATO. The fears which certain NATO Governments had entertained that the German Government might tend to use the meeting as a political instrument vis-à-vis the German electorate which is to be called to the polls next September did not materialize, and NATO Ministers were able to avoid charges of interference in the German election campaign.

3. In line with governments' wishes, there was no detailed discussion of the current military reappraisal, but there was a timely expression of agreement on the Alliance's intention to use all available means to meet any attack which might be launched against it. Mr. Dulles' reassurance on behalf of President Eisenhower, that the United States Government had no intention of reducing their military strength in Europe, was welcome in this context.

4. The length and range of the discussion on the Middle East showed a greater disposition by NATO Foreign Ministers, than had existed in the past, to review the problems effecting that area. There was some suggestion that Russian attempts at intervention in that region of the world may have been more active than generally assumed. The United States Secretary of State in particular surprised the Council by his emphasis on the degree of "Russianization" of the present Syrian administration. Mr. Dulles' statement showed a considerably hardened United States attitude towards Colonel Nasser, and indicated a United States belief that there was the beginning of a distinct cleavage in the Arab world on pro and anti communist lines. Some Ministers expressed the view, however, that in order to encourage the present trends, Western countries would have to maintain their present counter-pressure by continuing to support for instance, the Baghdad Pact, by developing more effective propaganda and by fostering more economic and cultural contacts with Middle Eastern countries.

5. The Ministerial Council felt that there had been since their last meeting, little change in Soviet policy, although they took cognizance of a new emergence of Soviet attempts at promoting a policy of peaceful co-existence. Yet the Council felt, in the light of the recent campaign of threats against certain NATO members, that the Russian leaders were still probably involved in the process of formulating a more definite policy towards the NATO governments, and towards Europe in general.

6. The Canadian delegation considered the final communiqué to be a useful and positive document.⁸⁶ While calling attention to the dilemma in which Soviet leaders are finding themselves, the final communiqué rejected in clear terms the flagrant Soviet attempts at interference in the internal politics of the Western countries. To this extent, the final communiqué gave a strong collective answer to the present phase of Soviet foreign policy towards Europe, and should have succeeded in creating an impact on NATO public opinion, especially regarding Western Europe's dependence on NATO. Although the German delegation was naturally anxious to have the communiqué place great emphasis on the problem of German reunification, agreement was possible on a formula which did reasonable justice to German expectations but which also avoided arousing unnecessarily Russian fears, and inflaming feelings in East Germany, and in the other satellites.

ICELAND, CANADA AND NATO

A Norwegian newspaper has stated that recent developments in Iceland⁸⁷ offered evidence that the Atlantic Pact had not yet created the political fellowship among the member countries which was necessary in the long run for its very existence. It added: "Here, we in Norway can reproach ourselves for not having done enough to knit the bonds more closely with our near kinfolk in that island. A more wide-awake fellowship and more intimate consultation regarding differences and problems could certainly make unity in the Pact more effective." If this is a Norwegian failure, it is a Canadian failure as well. In considering the recent developments in Iceland, it is easy to accuse the Icelanders of selfish irresponsibility, but it is thoroughly unreasonable to say that they have renounced the obligations they undertook when they joined NATO. When they joined NATO, they made no commitment to permit the stationing of foreign troops; it was the Korean War which induced them to do so, and it is difficult to argue that there is more risk of an outbreak of war today than at the time NATO was founded.

2. Our Minister to Iceland reported after his recent visit "that public opinion in Iceland is almost unanimous in opposing the principle of occupation of Iceland by foreign troops in peacetime." At the same time, most Icelanders with the exception of the Communists

⁸⁷ Le 28 mars 1956, le Parlement islandais, l'Althing, a adopté une résolution prévoyant la tenue de discussions avec les États-Unis sur la révision de l'accord bilatéral de défense conclu en 1951, pour obtenir le retrait des forces américaines stationnées en Islande.

On March 28, 1956, the Icelandic Parliament, the Althing, adopted a resolution which called for discussions with the United States on the revision of the 1951 bilateral defence agreement aiming at the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iceland.

favour remaining in NATO. But this merely points up the failure of the NATO concept; rather than being proud to contribute to the effectiveness of the North Atlantic Alliance, to which they belong, by playing host to North Atlantic forces, they think of United States forces as foreign occupation troops.

3. This, it must be confessed, is a natural reaction to the fact that the forces in Iceland are exclusively United States forces. It might have been politically wiser if contingents from other NATO powers could have been stationed in Iceland; though it is worth emphasizing that the United States forces have, on the whole, behaved well.

4. The gravity of the present situation should not be magnified out of all proportion. Our Minister reported after his recent trip to Iceland (his despatch† is attached): "(1) The Althing did not demand withdrawal of United States troops from Iceland, but has requested revision of the military agreement with the United States; (2) Present relations between Icelanders and Americans in Keflavik are very good and have never been better; (3) Icelanders are confident that they themselves are capable of maintaining all present sea and radar installations in Iceland for defence purposes; and (4) Americans have trained Icelanders to man the air base and radar stations and are fully prepared to give Icelanders still greater responsibility in all the military installations in Iceland." In these circumstances, it should not be impossible to work out after the elections a compromise agreement providing for greater Icelandic control but allowing some United States forces to remain. It is possible, of course, that the election campaign may lead Icelandic politicians to take up positions which would make an acceptable compromise impossible.

5. But even if an agreement can be worked out, this will not solve the long-term problem: the problem of making Icelanders feel full-fledged members of a North Atlantic Community. Our Minister states: "There is no doubt about the fact that a great majority of the Icelanders are pro-Western, but the Communist Party is also unquestionably gaining influence." And the Communist Party is receiving skillful assistance from the Soviet Union. When the British fishing industry imposed a ban on the landing of Icelandic fish in the United Kingdom, in retaliation for Iceland's extension of her territorial waters, the Soviet Union stepped into the Icelandic fish market and the Soviet Bloc is now taking 29% of Iceland's fish exports. Considering that Iceland exports very little else, it has every reason to be grateful for the Soviet Union's timely intervention. In the meantime, Iceland's dispute with the United Kingdom has not yet been settled, and the U.K. Minister in Reykjavik is urging his Government, Mr. Ronning reports, to be prepared to escort British trawlers into Icelandic waters if Iceland extends its territorial claims beyond present limits, a move which would be scarcely designed to strengthen the feelings of fellowship between Iceland and its NATO partner, the United Kingdom.

6. The Soviet Bloc has not limited itself to increasing trade. Many Icelanders have been invited to Russia and China and a first-class Soviet cultural delegation has toured Iceland. China sent a contingent of its traditional opera company to perform in Reykjavik, and the Icelandic sagas have been translated into Russian. These are only some of the moves which have been taken to encourage friendly relations between Iceland and the Soviet Bloc. Clearly, the Soviet Union must believe that it is not wasting its investment in Iceland. I doubt if all the NATO countries combined have made anything like a comparable effort in Iceland, and this is important in a country where literacy and interest in the arts is high.

7. At a time when we are willing to spend considerable effort and large sums of money in the hope of keeping the uncommitted nations of Asia on our side, or at least neutral, it is, perhaps, worth spending a little effort and a little money on keeping Iceland in the NATO Alliance. In doing this, Canada might make a very useful contribution.

8. It must not be thought that the United States is not active in countering Soviet propaganda. However, the United States is not in the best position to convince Icelanders that NATO is more than an excuse for having United States occupation forces in Iceland, that, in fact, it reflects a genuine Atlantic Community of free and sovereign states. In addition, its very size and strength tends to frighten and over-awe the Icelanders.
9. Nor is the United Kingdom able to present Iceland with a very convincing picture of Atlantic cooperation in action. Norway and Denmark could do useful work, although Denmark is hampered by Icelandic memories of Danish rule; but both are members of the Nordic Council as well as NATO, and greater co-operation by them with Iceland would be more likely to strengthen sentiment favouring Scandinavian co-operation than to awaken a new enthusiasm for NATO.
10. Canada is a northern neighbour of Iceland and the only country outside of Iceland that has a sizeable body of citizens of Icelandic descent; they number only slightly over 20,000; but this, in relation to the population of Iceland, is as great as the number of French-speaking Canadians in relation to the population of France.
11. In the field of technical exchanges with Iceland, we have already taken a few modest steps. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources recently sent over samples of balsam fir seed collected in various parts of Canada for trial plantings in Iceland. We are sending 1,000 kilos of fescue grass seed, a type of grass which apparently does exceptionally well in Iceland. We have invited the officer-in-charge of their reforestation programme to visit Canada; it is interesting to note that this gentleman is at present visiting Kamchatka and parts of Siberia to obtain seed and seedlings. The Icelandic Government, in its turn, has invited one of our shelter-belt experts to visit Iceland at their expense.
12. We, ourselves, have received useful information from Iceland on the eiderdown industry, an industry in which the Department of Northern Affairs hopes to interest Canadian Eskimos.
13. This kind of technical exchange and assistance could probably be considerably expanded. For example, we might invite an Icelandic expert over to study our Experimental Farm methods. We could offer post-graduate fellowships in engineering and agriculture.
14. We can never become an important customer of Iceland, since we are a fish exporter ourselves. On the other hand, this very fact may mean that we could exchange information on fishery techniques which would be of use to both of us.
15. It is not suggested that Canada try to buy Icelandic friendship for NATO. Rather, that to convince Icelanders of the reality of a North Atlantic Community, it is essential to show a little community spirit, and one way is to share with Iceland any special skills we have which would be of use to her. It would be a pity if we continued to show less initiative in this regard than the Soviet Union.
16. Technical co-operation is not the only way we could show our friendship and respect for Iceland. It would be a simple matter for some Canadian Ministers to stop in Iceland when flying across the Atlantic. The Icelanders would probably be flattered at our desire to consult with them on international questions. The only occasion on which this seems to have been done was in 1951 when the Prime Minister's plane was forced to land at Keflavik.⁸⁸
17. After the Icelandic elections, thought might be given to inviting the Icelandic President to pay a State visit to Canada. At the time of such a visit, we could discuss with the

⁸⁸ Note marginale :Marginal note:

President and officials who might accompany him ways in which technical co-operation could be increased between our two countries. A gesture of this kind might contribute in a small way to making Iceland feel more a part of a Western coalition, and to end their inevitable feeling of isolation, also, a visit might prove quite popular with Canadians of Icelandic descent.⁸⁹

18. It has been argued in this paper that the recent resolution in the Althing calling for a revision of the agreement with the United States providing for the stationing of United States forces reflects a failure of NATO powers to make Icelanders feel loyal members of a genuine North Atlantic Community, and that, even if a satisfactory compromise can be worked out after the elections, the long-term prospects are not good if Icelanders do not develop a more deep-rooted loyalty towards NATO. It is suggested that Canada could make an important and, in some ways, unique contribution in reminding Icelanders of their full membership in the Atlantic Community. The practical consequences of our failure to do so might quite shortly be felt in attempting to extend the DEW Line across the northern Atlantic, as it has already been felt with regards to the proposal of a new transAtlantic cable, with landings planned on Canadian and Icelandic territory.

19. I propose, if you agree, that we investigate all steps which Canada can take towards this end.⁹⁰

VISIT TO ICELAND

You will recall that you had tentatively decided last June to visit Iceland on your return from Europe but this proved impossible. In spite of the fact that in the intervening period a government has been formed containing two communist members, I believe such a visit would still be of great use, particularly in trying to convince Iceland, which, to the best of my knowledge, has never been visited by the Foreign Minister of any major NATO power except yourself, briefly, a few years ago, that it is not being ostracised by the West. Indeed, if the present isolation continues, the Icelanders are more likely than ever to jump the wrong way.

2. In the attached telegram† (1519, August 1) Mr. Heeney reports that the State Department feels that something should be done to stimulate the Icelandic government to action with regard to the NATO security question and renegotiation of the defence agreement with the United States. The State Department suggests that the Secretary General of NATO might bring to their attention again the desirability of negotiating with the United States within the allotted six month period, or that one of the Scandinavian members of NATO might do so. Mr. Heeney suggested that Mr. Lange might be able to do something along these lines.

3. I think that you could be of great help in this situation if you were to speak to members of the Icelandic government on the subjects of NATO security and the defence agreement on your return from the Paris meeting of the Committee of Three in September. You would be able at that time, having had an opportunity for discussion with your colleagues on the Committee, to express rather forcefully — and at the same time privately and without causing the Icelanders any embarrassment — the concern of all NATO members over the two questions. If you agree, we could ask Mr. Heeney to sound out the State Department informally on this subject. I think it might also be discussed by Mr. Ronning with Mr. Lange who had previously been in favour of your visit.

4. There are, of course, other good reasons for your stopping off in Iceland at that time. Your presence in Iceland, particularly on the occasion of your return from a meeting of the Three Wise Men, would go a long way toward convincing the Icelanders of their importance to the NATO community, a fact which deserves continual publicity if we are to expect their full cooperation in NATO affairs. Further, such a visit would make plain to the Icelanders the high degree of respect which Canadians have for them, and the interest which Canada takes in their problems. Finally, it would enable Canada to do something constructive toward the general furtherance of friendship among NATO countries.

5. The only objection to such a visit which I can foresee is that in attempting to impress upon the Icelandic people our respect for their nation and interest in their problems, it might also be interpreted as strengthening the present Icelandic Government. It is known that the United States would disapprove of any move of the latter kind, but it might be possible to arrange your visit in a way which would not admit of such an interpretation. It is also true that Mr. Gudmundsson will probably still be hospitalized at the time you would be visiting Iceland, but it is still possible that arrangements could be made for you to meet him. In any case, it is more important that you should meet the Prime Minister, Mr. Jonasson.

6. There is also the possibility that the press would interpret your visit at the end of the Committee of Three discussions as charged with special responsibilities by NATO for negotiations with the Icelanders, but I think we could successfully get around this.

7. Mr. Ronning assumed that you would be stopping off in Reykjavik on your way to the Paris meeting (his letter No. 22 of August 4† is attached), but we have informed him that it is now more likely that your visit, if it takes place, would be on your way back⁹¹ (our telegram SS-95, August 15,† attached). If you agree that such a visit is desirable, I would appreciate your comments on Mr. Ronning's inquiries (paragraph 4 of his letter) as to whether you would like to give a dinner in Reykjavik, whether he should give one,⁹² or whether you would prefer that your visit be kept as informal as possible. He also thinks that the President would probably like to give you a luncheon, and he would appreciate knowing the exact date of your arrival, so that he may inform the Icelandic authorities.

YOUR PROPOSED VISIT TO ICELAND

In accordance with your comments on our Memorandum of August 23, copy attached, we asked our Embassy in Washington and Canada House to sound out the State Department and the Foreign Office as to their reactions to your proposed visit to Iceland on your return from the Committee of Three talks in Paris. As you will have seen, the State Department "think well" of the visit and consider that it would serve a most useful purpose, for reasons very similar to those which prompted our suggestion. We have not yet heard from London but you may in any case have an opportunity of speaking to Mr. Selwyn Lloyd about it on Monday. We have also asked Mr. Ronning to stand by for your instructions from Paris, when your plans are more definite, and to hold himself in readiness to come to Paris for consultations with you before flying to Reykjavik ahead of your party.

2. Since you will have Mr. Ronning's advice in Paris before your visit, and since you will also have the benefit of consultations with Mr. Lange as well as with the United States and United Kingdom representatives in Paris, we shall not attempt in this paper to provide you with anything more than a few preliminary ideas regarding your visit, to be supplemented by telegram later if necessary. The Department is working with National Defence representatives on a general background paper on Iceland which is to be discussed by the J.I.C. on September 5. So as to provide Mr. Wilgress with adequate background information we shall be sending him a copy of the J.I.C. paper in draft by tomorrow's bag and intend to wire any substantive changes or comments to Paris in time for the NATO Council meeting on September 6 when Iceland is to be discussed. The final J.I.C. paper will therefore be available to you in Paris; a copy of the preliminary draft is attached herewith.

3. I am also attaching, as basic documents for your brief, the following:

(a) State Department Memoranda of August 2 and 8;

(b) The NATO Council communiqué of August 3;⁹⁴

(c) The Icelandic Government's Note to the United States Government of July 29.

4. From our rather limited vantage point, there seems to have been a good deal of fumbling over the two questions of primary concern to Iceland — their dispute with the United Kingdom over fish, and their desire to secure the withdrawal of United States military forces from their territory. Although these two questions are undoubtedly con-ected in the sense that Icelanders feel they should have had more sympathetic consideration from the United Kingdom Government as a NATO ally than they have in fact received, the only problems affecting NATO as such are the questions of renegotiating the United States-Icelandic Defence Agreement, and the provision of security arrangements which will prevent sensitive NATO material from reaching at least the communist members of the Icelandic Government.

5. With regard to the problem of restricting the flow of secret NATO material to Iceland, the necessary practical measures have already been taken by the Council. Although no reply has yet been received to Lord Ismay's note to the Icelandic Government, the American Ambassador in Reykjavik has been told by Mr. Anderson, the Icelandic Permanent Representative, that Iceland is prepared to continue for the present the informal arrangements approved by the Council and that he will absent himself from meetings of the Permanent Representatives unless requested to attend. Nevertheless the whole situation is uncomfortable and untidy and no real solution has been proposed for political consultations on sensitive matters at Ministerial Meetings of the Council. For the time being, however, the United States Government appears to be reasonably satisfied with the precautions taken and from our own point of view it seems better not to force the issue in such a way as to make the Icelandic Government conclude they are no longer welcome as NATO members.

6. It is precisely this feeling that they are being ostracized — that neither the United States nor the United Kingdom will negotiate with them and that NATO is afraid they will pass Western secrets to the Russians — that we hope might be partly erased by your visit. Both the Progressives and the Social Democrats wish Iceland to remain in NATO. The Prime Minister, Mr. Jonasson (the Leader of the Progressives) has made several statements to this effect since the election; and we have no reason to doubt their sincerity.

7. The Icelandic Government has been equally sincere in demanding that all United States troops should be withdrawn from their territory. They see no reason why, in the present international situation, they should not be given by NATO the same treatment accorded Norway and specifically spelled out by Iceland at the time of its accession to NATO — no foreign troops on their territory in time of peace.

8. Since you will not in any sense be negotiating with the Icelandic Government either for the United States or for the United Kingdom or for NATO, you may be able to form some impression of the intentions of the non-communist members of the present Government. As we indicated in an earlier telegram to Mr. Wilgress (No. SS-89 of August 10, † copy attached), if it came to the point of NATO having to choose between having fewer United States troops in Iceland or seeing Iceland withdraw from NATO, there could be no question of where our interests lie. Though it would create other problems of pay and discipline, a good many United States troops could no doubt be replaced by civilians, both Icelandic and (for the care and maintenance of sensitive equipment) American. The Progressive Party of Prime Minister Jonasson has recently indicated that — contrary to its earlier demand for the complete withdrawal of all U.S. troops — it would now be prepared to see American technicians maintaining the base in readiness for re-occupation by troops in case of emergency. This means that the presence of American civilians to maintain the base is accepted by parties holding 36 out of 52 seats in the Althing and supported by 58% of the popular vote. It should nevertheless be remembered that the official position of NATO is that United States troops are required not only to maintain the base but to defend a strategic outpost of the Alliance which would be costly to recapture. But with only some 4,500 troops of all categories on the island now, it is already lightly defended.

9. Whether either the United States Government or (in the case of the fish dispute) the United Kingdom Government would be prepared to make concessions to the present Government of Iceland is open to question, unless perhaps the leaders of either the Progressives or the Social Democrats (or both) were prepared to form a coalition government with the Conservatives subsequently and exclude the Communists as the quid pro quo for concessions towards the Icelandic point of view on both major issues.
