Mr. HAZEN: The necessity for the Bill which will be introduced if this resolution is concurred in arises from the fact that wireless telegraphy is constantly acquiring a more important position and greater utility in the affairs of the world almost month by month. The Bill, too, is the outcome to some extent of the deliberations of the Radiotelegraphic Convention that was held in London last year, at which there were representatives of all the nations and countries which adhere to the convention, among others, Canada, which was represented by the deputy minister of naval affairs, under which department the wireless telegraph of Canada comes, and also by the superintendent of wireless telegraph.

There is at present an Act on the statute book with regard to radiotelegraphy, and it is this Act which it is proposed to amend. The existing legislation in connection with wireless telegraphy is contained in that Act which is part of the Telegraphs Act passed in 1906. The existing Act substantially provides that no wireless telegraph station shall be installed by any person in the Dominion except under license granted therefor by the minister. It is, in fact, that provision of the present Act which it is sought to amend by the Bill to be introduced if the committee approve this resolution.

The new Radiotelegraph Act, in addition to providing for the issuance of licenses as required by the present Act, also provides for:

The compulsory installation of wireless equipment on passenger ships carrying fifty persons and plying between ports more than 200 miles apart;

The forwarding of radiotelegrams by all Canadian land lines, and cables;

The employment of only British subjects as operators on land stations;

The taking of a declaration of secrecy by all officers.

A penalty for the transmission of a false distress call or wilful interference.

It gives power to the Governor in Council:

To fix the fees for the different licenses;

To accede to any international convention in connection with wireless telegraph;

To make regulations for the effective carrying out the same.

With regard to that, I might say that the increased use of wireless telegraphy has made the international control of the same a necessity. At the present moment this regulation is undertaken by the International Radiotelegraphic Conference to which practically all the nations of the world, including Canada, subscribed. The following is a list of these nations; Germany and her protectorates; The United States of America, Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Bosni Herzegovine, Belgium and Belgium Congo, Brazil, Bolivia, Chili, Denmark, Egypt, Spain and her colonies, France and African Possessions, Great Britain and all colonies and protectorates except Newfoundland, Union of South Africa, Australia, Canada, British India, New Zealand, Greece, Italy and her colonies, Japan and her colonies, Morocco, Monaco, Norway, Holland and Dutch Indies, Persia, Portugal and her colonies, Roumania, Russia, Republic of St. Marin, Siam, Sweden, Turkey, Uruguay.

So, it will be seen that practically all the countries in the world are subscribers to this Radiotelegraphic Convention. It is important that powers be given to the Governor in Council to subscribe to such international conventions which are held every five years in order that the Dominion may be represented at the deliberations and have a say in the drafting of the regulations, since at this moment the Canadian Government owns more coast stations than any government in the world, namely 37. And it is also of importance that Canada should be entitled to all the benefits ensuing from the regulations, one of which is that Canadian ships will be provided with wireless stations by other adhering countries in every part of the world. If any hon. gentleman would like to look into the matter I will furnish a copy of the London convention. In addition to providing for the issuance of licenses and other provisions, and in addition to the power given to the Governor in Council, the Act gives to the minister certain powers as follows:—

To classify stations into different classes, and to specify what equipment the stations in each classification shall carry.

To issue different kinds of licenses and fix the period for which they shall be valid.

To prescribe the form of the different licenses and the conditions and restrictions to be continued therein.

To examine persons for operators' certificates, to prescribe the form of the examinations for the different classes of operators, and to prescribe what class of operator will be required to work each class of station.

To specify the watches to be kept at the different classes of stations and the number of operators which shall comprise their staff.

To make regulations for the inspection of all stations.

To make regulations to govern the working of installations on ships within territorial waters.

To make regulations to govern the working of all stations in the Dominion with reference to intercommunication.

The Bill gives power to His Majesty to assume at any time possession of a station and to work the same for the public service, or to censure the messages transmitted by and received at any station. Adequate penalties are prescribed for any violations of the different provisions of this new Act. The main defect first found in the working of wireless telegraphy, and which to a great extent exists at this moment, is the fact that signals are usually sent out with equal energy in all directions. Every receiving station within the range of a transmitting centre can read all the messages sent out from that centre, provided its receiving apparatus is capable of adjustment to the wave length of the transmitted wave, and at the same time it is not possible for more than two stations in a given area to interchange signals at a given time without mutual interference unless they are a considerable distance apart, are equipped with well tuned apparatus, and have at least 15 per cent difference between the wave lengths they employ, while if the stations are near together, a very much greater difference in the wave length must be employed if interference is to be avoided. Under the new Act the minister will have power to make regulations prescribing how such stations shall be operated, and the regulations will be drawn up with a view to obtaining a maximum of efficiency with a minimum of interference at the stations under his jurisdiction. When the matter is carefully looked into it is found that quite as much of the interference is due to inefficient operators as to poor apparatus. With this point in view, the minister, under the new Act, will have power to compel certain operators to hold certificates of proficiency in wireless telegraphy, and to state what class of certificate the operators on the different classes of stations must hold.

These are, briefly stated, the provisions contained in the Bill. I believe that this enactment is made necessary by the requirements of the times, and the fact that wireless telegraphy is becoming such an important agency in the commercial life of Canada and all other countries. It is held by many persons that wireless telegraphy, so far as its usefulness is concerned, is at the present time but in its infancy, and there is reason for believing that in a comparatively short time wireless telegraphy will be used for the transmission of press despatches and commercial messages of all kinds, to an extent which a few years ago was little dreamed of. I think this Bill is necessary in order that Canada's control over the wireless telegraphy within its borders may be placed on a proper foundation, and so that regulations may be imposed consistent with those adopted in other countries, and in accordance with the principles laid down by the convention which meets every five years for the purpose of determining questions of this nature.

Mr. PARDEE: I presume this enactment will appy to the great lakes?

Mr. HAZEN: It applies to all wireless telegraphy in Canada.

Mr. PARDEE: That is, wireless telegraphy on ships?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, there is no exception of any kind.

Mr. PARDEE: How does the hon. gentleman arrive at the distance of 200 miles. Does he not think that is a rather long voyage, and that it should be set down at a shorter distance? On certain portions of the great lakes a vessel might get into considerable trouble in a voyage of 200 miles. I think a distance of 100 miles would better answer the purposes of the Bill than the 200 mile limit, for there are certain portions of the great lakes where a limit of 200 miles would be of but little value.

Mr. HAZEN: It occurred to me in framing this Bill that perhaps an objection might be offered that we were going a little too fast, or making the Act somewhat exacting. If it is considered that the distance of 200 miles does not meet all the purposes for which the Bill is framed, I would be very glad to make it 100 miles, and this is a matter which can very properly be discussed when the Bill is in committee. I will bring this matter to the attention of officials of my department who have made a special study of the subject, and will ascertain their views in regard to that suggestion.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would this Act apply to ships not registered in Canada?

Mr. PARDEE: Of course there are a great many ships not registered in Canada to which the Act could not possibly apply.

Mr. HAZEN: As a matter of fact very few trans-atlantic steamers are registered in Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would it apply to that ship called the Duke of Connaught?

Mr. HAZEN: I think so. I may say the only trans-atlantic vessels registered in Canada are those of the Canadian Northern railway—the Royal George and the Royal Edward—which are registered at Toronto. The vessels of the Allan line, the White Star line, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are all registered on the other side of the water, but I think this Act ought to apply to all vessels that sail from Canadian ports.

Mr. PARDEE: A great many of the vessels on the great lakes are not registered in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, a great many.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the hon. gentleman thought of the steamship service on the Bay of Fundy?

Mr. HAZEN: To what service does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. PUGSLEY: From St. John to Digby. It is hardly more than 40 miles and it is quite as dangerous a body of water as most of the internal waters of Canada. Before reaching St. John the last stop of those steamers plying between Boston and St. John is at Eastport, and from that point to St. John is less than 100 miles. My hon. friend ought to consider that there are many bodies of water where the distance from port to port is not more than 40 or 50 miles, and navigation of which may be just as dangerous.

Mr. HAZEN: There is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend says, and this is a matter which may properly be taken up by the House when the Bill is discussed. There has also been some doubt in my own mind as to whether this enactment should be applied only to ships carrying at least 50 passengers, or whether it should extend also to any ships carrying passengers regardless of the number. As it stands at present, it applies to ships carrying not less than 50 passengers, and the view might be entertained that it should apply to ships carrying five or fifty or five hundred passengers. At the same time it may be contended that under the conditions existing in Canada certain small steamers that carry only a few passengers would find it inconvenient to install wireless telegraphy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The installation of wireless telegraphy is not so very expensive.

Mr. HAZEN: It is fairly expensive. Many of these small steamers in Canada are hardly paying their way, it might hardly be necessary to equip with wireless telegraphy a vessel carrying only ten or twelve passengers, but that is a matter of consideration. It can be easily seen that there are two sides to the question, and these matters can be discussed when the Bill comes before the House.

The service in the Bay of Fundy alluded to is, I suppose, that from St. John to Digby. It is only a little over 40 miles, but it is important and there are occasions when boats running across there carry hundreds of passengers on one trip.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would call attention to a terrible disaster I think on Lake Ontario two or three years ago when my attention was called to the matter particularly because some complaint was made against the Department of Public Works in reference to it. In that case several lives were lost and I have no doubt that if the vessel had been equipped with wireless that disaster might have been prevented.

Mr. HAZEN: In the United States legislation very similar to this has already been passed and similar legislation is contemplated by all the leading nations in the world that adhere to the international radio-telegraphic conference. United States legislation is more drastic than that proposed in this draft Bill. Their Bill compels all ships, whether licensed to carry passengers or not, carrying 50 or more persons and plying between ports 200 miles apart to carry a wireless telegraph equipment and a staff of not less than two operators with a penalty of $5,000 against the ship and $100 against the master of the ship for each violation of the Act.

So far as can be ascertained, all boats of Canadian register which would come under the terms of this section are already equipped with the necessary wireless apparatus. This remark applies to ships on the east coast, great lakes and west coast.

Several ships of British and foreign register will be affected, particularly the service between St. John, N.B., and Mexico, the Pickford & Black line to the West Indies, and the Furness-Withy service between Halifax and England, by St. John's, Nfld.

The general procedure adopted in connection with wireless installations on ships is for the shipping company to arrange with one of the wireless companies to instal the apparatus and operate it for a certain amount per annum. In practically every case this sum is $1,000 per annum for which amount the wireless company agree to instal the apparatus, maintain it in first-class condition, provide an operator, and handle the messages concerning the business of the ship free of charge.

No doubt there are certain steamships carrying on business in a small way in Canada to whom a charge of $1,000 a year would be a very considerable imposition which might hamper them in the carrying on of their business. If the ship desired to instal apparatus herself, the cost of a first-class equipment with a range of from 150 to 200 miles complete with an emergency equipment would be between $3,000 and $3,500. A second-class equipment with the same range could be obtained cheaper, at a cost of about $2,500.

The salaries paid to operators on ships are as follows: East coast, $40 per month and board; great lakes, $40 to $45 per month and board; west coast, $45 to $60 per month and board.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would call the attention of the minister to the importance of not making the Act too drastic. I am glad he has that in his mind, that there may be cases where small steamboats would be crippled if compelled to comply with the proposed regulation and employ an expensive man or two to run the apparatus after it was installed. I hope these matters will be looked into with a great deal of care, because it would be a mistake to follow the example of the United States and legislate our ships off the sea altogether. They have made it so difficult to own and run a ship in the United States now that they have very little shipping, and I fear that we are following their example to some extent. A few years ago this Parliament passed a law that a coasting captain on the ordinary coasting schooner should not navigate his ship south of Cape Hatteras. For generations the captains of Nova Scotia had been accustomed to sail around the Horn and trade on the western coast of South America, but all at once a regulation was passed prohibiting them from going any further south than Cape Hatteras. In the winter the trade of the maritime provinces is largely with the West Indies, and it struck a very severe blow to our coasting vessels, so much so that in order to escape this stringent regulation a number of them changed their registry to the Barbadoes and ceased to be Canadian vessels altogether. That was the only way in which they could continue to exist, because they had to go south of Cape Hatteras in order to do their business. I mention that as an example. A few years ago another regulation was passed requiring the inspection of steamboats, making it very stringent indeed. A steamboat that had been inspected in Great Britain by Lloyds, when it came to Canada might be submitted to a second inspection. That means very often that the ship has to be put on the dry-dock; it is very expensive and causes a good deal of delay. That created a great deal of friction among our shipping people and happily the regulation was repealed, and I believe the law at the present time recognizes the inspection made by the Lloyds in England and by some of the other great inspecting shipping companies in Europe.

Taking the coasting trade, for exemple, I would like to know how this regulation will apply to the large number of coasting steamers along the coast of the Maritime provinces, starting from Halifax to Prince Edward Island, or a port in northern New Brunswick, or Cape Breton, which may be more than 200 miles. Such a boat calls at a large number of ports on the way. If this means 200 miles between the different ports of call the Act would not apply, but if it is 200 miles from the starting point of the ship to the final destination then it would apply, and I think it would be unnecessary that these small coasting vessels on our coast should be subjected to these charges. I question if they would be able to afford them. With regard to the number of passengers, that varies greatly. I suppose sometimes with an excursion a small vessel would have 50 but very often they would not have half that many.

Mr. HAZEN: The Bill provides that this shall not apply. It says that the clause about the boats being equipped with wireless shall not apply to passenger ships plying between ports not more than 200 miles apart. That covers what my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. PARDEE: The question of making a hard and fast rule with relation to wireless telegraphy is rather a hard one. In many instances where the boats may be running on voyages of much less than 200 miles, wireless may be much more called for than on a longer voyage. I have wondered whether it would be feasible to have a provision that such boats should be equipped with wireless telegraphy as should be recommended to be so equipped by inspectors appointed for that purpose.

Mr. HAZEN: What inspectors would you suggest, the collectors of customs?

Mr. PARDEE: No, I would not, because the collector of customs might not always be fitted to make a recommendation in such a case. But I would suggest that now that wireless telegraphy has got to be so absolutely essential to all boats, practically, plying on the great lakes and ocean-going boats, the Act should say: Provided that such boats as such an inspector appointed for that purpose shall be forced to carry wireless equipment. Of course, it may very well be said, and I recognize the force of the contention, that if certain small boats were compelled to carry wireless telegraph apparatus at an expense of $1,000 a year, it would practically put them out of business. But we cannot get away from this patent fact that, even although boats do not carry as many as 50 passengers, that supposing they carry only 25 passengers, these 25 passengers have as much right to be protected by the wireless telegraph as 50 would have. It therefore appears to me that, taking into consideration what we know of the history of the lakes, it might be well for the Government to consider whether or not a man should be appointed for the inland waters and the great lakes to make such recommendations as he might think proper regarding the carrying of wireless apparatus by those boats. I am not prepared to say this is feasible at all, because I recognize the fact that such an Act as this should be imperative. If it is possible to arrive at the size of the boats and the number of passengers they should carry, perhaps it would be better to have a hard and fast rule. Nevertheless, I think it is well worth while considering whether or not it would be feasible to appoint an inspector to look after those boats and to take into consideration the number of passengers, the general equipment of the vessels, and their general sea worthiness.

Mr. HAZEN: I feel sure that if it is to be worked out satisfactorily, it would be better to have a hard and fast rule rather than leave it to the discretion of any official or of any department. If in a matter of this sort discretion is left in the hands of an official or of a department of the Government there is a very great danger of pressure of a political character or of some other character being brought to bear, which it might be difficult in certain cases to resist. If you have the matter absolutely defined by statute, there is little or no difficulty in carrying out the provisions of the law. There is no need to rush this matter through the House. It is one of very great importance and if, after the Bill gets its first and second reading, it is allowed to wait a reasonable time until after we come come back from the New Year recess, perhaps by that time the fact that such a Bill has been introduced to Parliament will be pretty well known in shipping circles, and to the press, and we will then have an expression of opinion that will enable us to modify the Bill and make it more in the public interest than in the form in which it is now being introduced. These are all matters of detail which we desire to settle as far as possible in the public interest, but at the same time I think there will be no dispute concerning the fact that regulations of this character or of a somewhat similar character should be enacted. I move that the resolution be now reported.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I understood the hon. minister to say that there was a clause in the Bill providing that the Government of Canada could purchase wireless stations at any time. I have been strongly in favour of the Government owning, controlling and operating these stations from the first, for I am confident that it is the proper course for the Government to take. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) has placed the matter, so far as the Great lakes are concerned, very fairly before the House. It is a matter which deserves a very great deal of consideration, because the traffic on these lakes during certain seasons of the year is enormous. There is a 200 mile stretch, and while there are not many boats that can make that trip, there are dozens which carry passengers and go from 50 to 100 miles. I would like to ask the minister (Mr. Hazen) whether any provision has been made for the purchase of wireless stations and the operating of them.

Mr. HAZEN: The Bill gives power to His Majesty's Government to assume possession of a station at any time and operate the same for the public service. This provision is not designed with the object that the hon. gentleman has in mind, of public ownership. The idea is that these stations will be essential to the carrying out of the commerce and business of the country, and if it be found that they are being inefficiently managed or not properly carried on, or that messages of a confidential character are being communicated to people to whom they should not be communicated, or for reasons of that sort, power is given to the Government, a very wise power, I think, to step in and operate them.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the intention of the Government to refer this Bill to the Marine Committee?

Mr. HAZEN. It is a Government measure, and I do not think that it is customary to refer Government measures to a committee. Perhaps there will be no necessity to do so, but if there should be any such necessity, I would have no objection to its being referred.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is possible that quite a number of interests might want to be heard, and there is a better opportunity to hear them before the committee than otherwise.

Mr. HAZEN: We will probably hear in a short time from those interests, and we will keep track of the representations made.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 26), respecting Radiotelegraphy.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Mr. Hazen, House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to amend The Canada Shipping Act, chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, and to provide (a) that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may give directions respecting the registration of wrecked ships and concerning the names of ships; and, (b) that the inspectors appointed under Part VII of the said Act, together with such other persons as the minister may appoint, shall form the Board of Steamboat Inspection.

Mr. HAZEN: When we were discussing the other Bill, my hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) made a facetious allusion to the registration of a dry dock as a ship. I have discovered in my department that a few years ago, when the Government, of which my hon. friend was a member was in power, a crane which was brought out by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal for the purpose of loading and unloading vessels was also registered as a ship. However, that has nothing to do with the Bill now before the House. The Bill I intend to introduce to amend the Canada Shipping Act is one that experience in the department has convinced the deputy head of the department and other permanent officials, is necessary in the public interest. That applies more particularly to the second part of it. The first part of it is simply for the purpose of facilitating the despatch of public business. At the present time, as every hon. member who has been a member of the Government knows, there is scarcely a meeting of council at which there is not a report from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries recommending a change in the name of some vessel that is registered in Canada. It may be that a vessel is brought into Canada and it is found that there is a vessel in Canada of the same name. Application is made to the department for the purpose of changing the name of the vessel. The result is that the time of council is taken up unnecessarily dealing with matters that are really of departmental concern and it is a ridiculous thing that the whole Government has to consider matters of this sort which should be dealt with by the head of the department. The change that is proposed in the Act is to substitute the word 'minister' for 'Governor in Council.' The minister, by this Bill, will be authorized to approve these applications. This procedure, I my say to my hon. friends, is not at all radicial in any way as it is in conformity with the practice in Great Britain where the board of trade, and not the government, or His Majesty in Council, deals with these cases. Otherwise the law as regards registration of ships will be unchanged.

The other point dealt with is of more importance and is in regard to the composition of the board of steamboat inspection and the appointment of a chairman. A real and substantial difficulty arose during the present season, when I was in England and my department was being looked after by another member of the Government, and in consequence this proposal is brought to the attention of the House with a recommendation in its favour by the deputy minister. At present membership is confined to the steamboat inspectors. It is proposed under this law that the minister shall have power to appoint to the board additional persons other than steamboat inspectors. The chairmanship of the board, it is felt, should be open to any of its members. At present the post can only be filled by an inspector and it is undesirable that this state of affairs should continue. It hampers the department in the management of this important branch of the service, and it prevents the board having a representative capacity. Provision must be made for the expansion and development of this service and the power to appoint other persons than steamboat inspectors on the board must be conferred on the head of the department.

It is, of course, not proposed to entrust the inspection of boilers and machinery, or of hulls, to any person who has not passed an examination as a steamboat inspector; only qualified officers will be allowed to do that work. But such questions as life saving appliances can be considered and dealt with to advantage by men who do not hold such inspectorships, and who do not wish for them and for whom none is available. The proposed amendment will tend to broaden the services and improve its usefulness. The appointment of the chairman is a matter of importance. If the minister's choice is limited to an inspector the service may suffer because the available men may not be the best for that responsible position. A man may be an exceedingly good inspector of machinery, or of hulls, and yet make a very poor chairman. The qualifications for the two positions are not the same. Then there is the delay in the examination if a new man is chosen. Before he can be appointed chairman he must pass as an inspector. The actual difficulty which occurred in the department this year was explained to me by the deputy minister as follows: When the former chairman, Mr. Adams, was superannuated last spring, the department although having a highly qualified man, Mr. Macdonnell, in the service, was unable to appoint him deputy chairman. We were obliged to designate one of the inspectors to that office. He was shortly afterwards taken ill and has been incapacitated all through the season. The result has been that the business of the branch has been seriously interfered with. Had this Bill been law, had it been possible for the minister to name some additional members of the board, I would have named the deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries as a member of the board and chairman and with him as chairman the work of the board would have proceeded satisfactorily and properly. As it was, Mr. Adams being superannuated at his own request, and the other gentleman who was named as chairman having been taken ill, there was not actually anybody that the department had the right to appoint as chairman. There was in the department a man qualified whom we were unable to appoint because he had not passed the necessary examination. It is necessary to have properly qualified inspectors because the inspection of hulls is something that is of the most important character for the safety of people who travel throughout the country and it is also very desirable that the Act should be extended so as to give this additional power of appointment to the minister who for the time being may be in charge of the department. That is the view of the permanent officials of the department, that is the recommendation that they have made and it is a recommendation with which I fully agree. If the House concurs in these proposed changes we will never be left again in the position in which we were unfortunately placed last summer.

Mr. PARDEE: The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that if there was a vacancy he should have the right to appoint an inspector even although he had not passed an examination.

Mr. HAZEN: Not to appoint an inspector?

Mr. PARDEE. A member of the board.

Mr. HAZEN: A member of the board. No man can be appointed inspector who has not passed the examination.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The law as to that is left unchanged?

Mr. HAZEN: Entirely unchanged. Hon. gentlemen can understand what an advantage it will be if you could appoint the deputy minister, or some other official of the department, who is familiar with the work as chairman so that he could take charge of and organize the work of the board. There might be an inspector who was not the right man to act as chairman or to deal with matters that come before the board.

Mr. SINCLAIR. May I ask the minister if he has limited the number that may be appointed, or if the number is unlimited?

Mr. HAZEN: The number has not been limited, and I think there is possibly some force in my hon. friend's suggestion. The same view occurred to me as I was reading the Bill to-night and I will consider that point with my deputy before the Bill comes before the House again.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is there any salary attached?

Mr. HAZEN: It is not proposed to pay any salary. It is proposed to appoint men who are already in the employment of the department.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the minister will pardon me for taking advantage of this discussion to ask if the very serious collision which took place in Sydney harbour between the City of Sydney and the tug Douglas Thomas has been brought to his notice, or if any investigation into that most serious disaster in which several lives were lost has been had, or if any steps to inquire into the matter have been taken. I have had some letters from Sydney complaining that so far no investigation has taken place. I would suggest to the minister that this is a case in which the most careful investigation should be made by the department.

Mr. HAZEN: As soon as the attention of the department was called to the matter instructions were given to direct the commissioner to proceed to Sydney and hold an investigation into the cause of the disaster. The Wreck Commissioner has had his hands pretty full lately in connection with disasters which have occurred on the St. Lawrence river; but I understand that if he is not already on his way to Sydney, he will proceed there at once for that purpose.

Mr. PARDEE: I would like to ask the minister another question which is pertinent to the Bill introduced just now; why it is a rule of the department that no reports of boiler inspectors or hull inspectors are allowed to go out to those asking for such reports on certain steamers. It appears to me at first blush that no particular harm could be done to anybody, if such reports were given out. If the boat is in good order they cannot hurt anybody, and if the boat is not seaworthy, so much the better that it should be known as soon as possible, and on application, the report of the boiler inspector or of the hull inspector should be made known to those interested.

Mr. HAZEN: I was not aware that any such rule existed.

Mr. PARDEE: About two months ago I wrote to the department asking for such a report, and I got a letter stating it was the rule of the department that such reports should not be given out.

Mr. HAZEN: Who was that letter from?

Mr. PARDEE: From the deputy minister.

Mr. HAZEN: I was not aware that the rule existed. There may be, however, a very good reason for it. My attention has never previously been directed to the matter, but I will make inquiries about it and find out the reason.

Mr. PARDEE: I am not saying there may not be a very good reason indeed, but I do not know what it is at present.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Pelletier, House adjourned at ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, December 9, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

A message from His Royal Highness the Governor General was presented by Mr. Borden, and read by Mr. Speaker, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have received with great pleasure the Address that you voted in response to my speech on the occasion of the opening of Parliament.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Commission of Internal Economy of the House of Commons for the preceding year.—Mr. Speaker.

Report of the Public Service Commission; also Orders in Council accepting the resignations of the Commissioners.—Mr. Borden.

On motion of Mr. Borden, it was ordered that the report be printed forthwith.

CANADIAN-WEST INDIAN TRADE AGREEMENT.

On motion of Mr. Foster, it was ordered that the House go into Committee tomorrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide as follows:—

1. That the agreement of the ninth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and twelve entered into at Ottawa by representatives appointed by the Government of Canada and by the representatives of the West Indies colonies, parties thereto be approved.

2. That there shall be levied, collected and paid after the said agreement is in accordance with its terms brought into operation, and so long as it remains in force, on all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies, parties thereto, when such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein if imported as aforesaid, duties of customs—

(a) At the rate of four-fifths of the several rates of duties, if any, imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country; or

(b) at the several rates of duties, if any, set opposite to each item respectively, or charged on goods as not enumerated in the column, British preferential tariff, in schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and in any amendment thereof, whichever shall be the lower rate.

3. That nothing in the next preceding paragraph shall affect the rates of duties of customs payable on raw sugar when imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein, to which the rates of duties of customs provided by tariff item 135b in schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1909 apply.

4. That on and after a date to be named in a proclamation published at such time as the Governor in Council deems expedient in the Canada Gazette, the goods, enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement shall only be entitled to the advantages or concessions provided for when such goods are conveyed by ship direct without transhipment into a sea or river port of Canada from any one of the respective colonies and possessions as may be admitted thereto by proclamation published in to the said advantages or concessions under the provisions hereof.

5. That before the discretion granted to the Governor in Council by the next preceding paragraph has been exercised provision shall be made for an effective control of rates of freight in all steamship subsidy contracts to which Canada is a party and under which steamers ply between ports in Canada and ports in the colonies which are entitled to the advantages or concessions hereby provided.

6. That the advantages or concessions granted to the colonies, parties to the said agreement, shall extend to the other colonies enumerated in schedule D, to the said agreement for the period of three years from the date on which the said agreement shall, according to its tenor, come into operation.

7. That the advantages or concessions granted to the colonies, parties to the said agreement, shall extend to the United Kingdom and such of the other British colonies and possessions as may be admitted thereto by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, so long as the colonies, parties to the said agreement, continue to be entitled to such advantages or concessions; provided, however, that nothing herein shall be held to diminish any advantage which the United Kingdom and British colonies and possessions enjoy under the British preferential tariff.

8. That the Governor in Council may make such rules and regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions and intent hereof and the said agreement.

9. That the operation of all laws inconsistent with the giving to the provisions hereof, and of the said agreement their full effect shall from time to time be suspended to the extent of such inconsistency.

Mr. FOSTER: I desire to lay on the table of the House the document asked for by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is it?

Mr. FOSTER: It gives the rates of import duty at present existing in all the West Indian Islands which are parties to the agreement.

THE NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

On motion of Mr. BORDEN, it was ordered that the House go into Committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient in connection with the Bill now before this House intituled: An Act to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, to provide:—

(a) That from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding thirty-five million dollars for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire;

(b) That the said sum shall be used and applied under the direction of the Governor in Council in the construction and equipment of battleships or armoured cruisers of the most modern and powerful type;

(c) That the said ships when constructed and equipped shall be placed by the Governor in Council at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the Empire; and

(d) That the said sum shall be paid, used and applied, and the said ships shall be constructed and placed at the disposal of His Majesty subject to such terms, conditions and arrangements as may be agreed upon between the Governor in Council and His Majesty's Government.

MRS. LABERGE'S CLAIM.

Mr. ETHIER: Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask a question of the hon. Postmaster General. Towards the latter part of last session I asked the hon. gentleman that a special indemnity be granted to the widow of Mr. Laberge, a mail carrier drowned in the lake of Two Mountains last fall. The Postmaster General said that it was too late, at that stage of the session, to put such moneys in the estimates. On the 4th of November last Mrs. Laberge wrote to the minister, and she received a reply on the 6th of November. It is written in French, and I will translate it:

I received your letter, dated the 4th instant, in regard to the indemnity which you wish to obtain from the department. I have taken note of what you tell me, and will see what I can do.

Yours truly,
L. P. PELLETIER.

Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to grant the request of Mrs. Laberge?

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend before the estimates are brought down.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PURCHASES OF WELSH COAL.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has any contract been awarded by the Department of Public Works for a Welsh coal supply to the various buildings belonging to the Dominion Government in the city of Montreal?
2. Were the tenders advertised? If so, in what papers?
3. What is the name of each tenderer, and the amount of each tender?
4. What is the name of the lowest tenderer?
5. What is the name of the firm to whom the contract was awarded?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No.
2. (a) Yes. (b) Montreal Gazette, Standard, l'Action, Le Devoir, Canadian Century, Tribune, Le Moniteur du Commerce, La Patrie, Canadian Jewish Times and l'Areldo del Canada.

—	Anthracite.			Bituminous.
	Furnace.	Egg.	Stove.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Geo. Hall Coal Co	7 25	7 50	7 50	4 00
J. C. Labrecque & Co	7 50	7 75	8 00	4 50
The Merchants Coal Co.	7 25	7 50	7 50
Ernest Lemire	7 50	7 75	7 75	4 75
Farquhar Robertson Ltd.	7 50	7 75	8 00
Andrew Baile	7 25	7 25	7 25
General Improvement & Contracting Co	....	.....	.. ..	4 15

4. Geo. Hall Coal Co., The Merchants Coal Co., and Andrew Baile were lowest for furnace coal for custom house.

Geo. Hall Coal Co., lowest for bituminous coal for examining warehouse.

Geo. Hall Coal Co., The Merchants Coal Co., and Farquhar Robertson (Ltd.), lowest for egg coal for postal station 'B.'

Andrew Baile was lowest for egg coal for Express Parcels office, postal stations 'C' and 'D,' Revenue Building and Immigration Building, also for stove coal for latter.

5. On a report from the Superintendent of Buildings, Montreal, that the Welsh coal that Andrew Baile intended to supply was not so satisfactory, the contract for that supply was awarded at the same price, $7.25 a ton, to J. O. Labrecque & Co., for: Custom House, The Merchants Coal Co.; Examining Warehouse, Geo. Hall Coal Co.; Postal Station 'B', Farquhar Robertson (Ltd.); Postal Station 'C', J. O. Labrecque & Co.; Postal Station ' ', J. O. Labrecque & Co.; Revenue Building, J. O. Labrecque & Co.; Express Parcels Building, J. O. Labrecque & Co.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. When did Mr. Guillaume Narcisse Ducharme cease to act as commissioner?
2. What salary did he receive as such?
3. What were his travelling expenses?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. November 19, 1912.
2. $6,690.00.
3. $430.40.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. When did Mr. Morine cease to act as commissioner?
2. What salary has he received from the Government as such?
3. What were his travelling expenses?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. June 1, 1912.
2. $4,920.00.
3. $154.65.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Have Messrs. Morine, Lake and Ducharme completed their work of investigation?
2. Have they filed a report of their proceedings in each investigation?
3. Has their commission been cancelled?

Mr. BORDEN:

1 and 3. Messrs. Morine, Lake, and Ducharme have, at their own request, been relieved from the prosecution of the duties with which they were charged under Orders in Council copies of which have been laid upon the table of the House.

2. Reports of their proceedings up to the date of their resignation have been received and have been laid before the House today.

CONTRACTS FOR DOMINION STEAMERS.

*Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. What steamers have been contracted for by any department of the Government during the past year, and what were the tenders received therefor from Canadian, British and foreign builders, respectively?
2. To whom were the respective contracts awarded and at what price?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Department of Customs:

Steamer Margaret—for which the following tenders were received:—John I. Thornycroft & Co., Ltd., Southampton, England, tender (including guns) £56,300 stg.; Wm. Beardmore & Co., Ltd., Dalmuir, Scotland, tender £58,200 stg.; Collingwood Shipbuilding Co., Ltd., Collingwood, tender, $315,000;

Department of Marine and Fisheries, fiscal year 1911-12:

Steamer Dollard. The following tenders were received, viz.:—La Compagnie Pontbriand, Sorel, P.Q., offer to build steamer in accordance with plans and specifications, $140,000 (tender withdrawn); Fleming & Ferguson, Paisley: Offer to build steamer in acordance with plans and specifications delivered at Montreal, £31,200—$151,839.79; Kingston Shipbuilding Co., Kingston: Offer to build steamer in accordance with plans and specifications delivered at Montreal, $155,000; Chambers & Simpson, Toronto: Telegram only, delivered on Clyde $165,000. Received after time expired for receiving tenders. Polson Iron Works, Toronto: Offer to build steamer in accordance with plans and specifications, delivered at Montreal, $199,331.

Department of Public Works:

(a) A tug boat, 50 feet long; (b) two tenders received from Canadian builders. The Polson Iron Works and La Cie, Pontbriand.

2. Department of Customs:

Contract for steamer Margaret awarded to John I. Thornycroft & Co., Ltd., at £56,300 stg.

Department of Marine and Fisheries:

Contract for steamer Dollard awarded to the Kingston Shipbuilding Co., of Kingston, Ont., at their tender price.

Department of Public Works:

To the Polson Iron Works for $31,499.75.

QUEBEC DRY DOCK.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has any site been selected for the proposed dry dock at Quebec?
2. If so, was the site selected after consulting an engineer?
3. What was the name of the engineer employed by the Government in connection with said site?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes. At Lauzon on south shore.
2. Yes.
3. Goode, Son & Matthews, through their representative, Mr. M. F. Wilson, made an examination and report as to the most suitable site for a dry dock at Quebec.

ST. PETERS CANAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals received any protests from the harbour master or other residents of St. Peters against the contractor in charge of the St. Peters canal improvements using the harbour for a dumping ground?
2. Has any communication on the subject been received from the resident engineer? If so, has any action been taken thereon?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. A complaint was received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries on July 8th, 1912, that clay is allowed to roll down the slope into the waters of the present canal. The matter was referred by the Department of Marine to the Department of Railways and Canals.
2. On July 20th, 1912, a report was received from the resident engineer stating that every precaution was being taken to prevent clay rolling down into the present canal. The principal assistant engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals also made personal observations at St. Peters on the 15th of July, and he noted that every precaution had been taken to prevent any clay dropping into the canal.

PURCHASES OF PRIVATE CARS.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many private cars have been purchased by the Government or by any member thereof since October 10, 1911?
2. Were competitive prices secured in each case?
3. By whom and where were the said private cars purchased, and for whose use were they intended?
4. What was the cost of each such private car?
5. How much money has been expended on the fittings, alterations, &c., of each of the said cars up to November 1, 1912?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. One private car, the Canada.
2. No.
3. By the Department of Railways and Canals from the Canadian Pacific railway, for the use of His Royal Highness the Governor General.
4. $15,000 appropriation voted.
5. $238.25, on the Canada.

IMPROVEMENT OF HIGHWAYS.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

Did the Department of Railways and Canals or any other department of the Government of Canada, since the close of the last session of Parliament, carry on any negotiations, by correspondence or otherwise, with any of the governments of the provinces of Canada relative to the expenditure of moneys voted at the last session of Parliament to be expended upon, and for the improvement of the highways of the several provinces of Canada?

2. If so, with what provincial governments, and what was the nature, extent, and result of the same?

3. If no such negotiations were carried on, what cause is assigned for not doing so?

4. Was any portion or the whole of said moneys voted for said purposes for the several provinces, expended during the past six months? If so, what amount was expended in each province?

5. If no portion of said moneys so voted were expended in any province during the past six months, what is the reason assigned for the non-expenditure of the same?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. No such negotiations were undertaken or carried on.

2. Answered by number one.

3. The Bill introduced at the last session of Parliament for the improvement of highways did not become law, and no negotiations were undertaken.

4. No expenditure of money for the purpose referred to was made.

5. Answered by number three.

THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY—PORT OF SHIPMENT.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the attention of the Government been directed to the report of a speech made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens, which appeared in the daily press of Canada on October 17, 1912, as follows:—

Attacks Railways—Maritime Provinces Member says Grand Trunk Pacific has no Port in Eastern Canada.

'Halifax, N.S., Oct. 16.—Before the Dartmouth Board of Trade last evening, speaking on the Grand Trunk Railway, F. B. McCurdy, M.P., who was the chief speaker, claimed that although the company had received all its financial aid from Canada, its freight will not be shipped from a Canadian port. He said the people of Canada, especially those in the eastern provinces should object to this state of affairs and especially when the road will cost more than three times the original figure. The Grand Trunk Pacific, he stated, did not leave a dollar in this province. He said that the east should be alive to its interests in this matter. He believed Mr. Borden, a maritime man, would do his duty in this matter, but the people should be alert to prevent the sacrifice of their interests by the railway.'

2. If so, has the Government any information showing that it is not the intention of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to ship its freight from a Canadian port?

3. If so, what action will be taken by the Government to prevent the company from carrying out its intentions?

Mr. BORDEN: This question is open to the same suggestion that was made last year. It seems to contain a statement of fact, and I would suggest that the hon. gentleman would do well to amend it.

DAMMING OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has any application been made to the Government with the object of damming the St. Lawrence river in the vicinity of Coteau, Cedar, Split Rock and the Cascade rapids to the level of the lake St. Francis?

2. If so, by whom has such application been made?

3. Has any decision been taken in the matter?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. No application has been made.

2. Answered by number one.

3. Answered by number one.

AGE LIMIT FOR APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

What is the age limit for appointments in the customs service, the railway service, and the lighthouse service respectively?

Mr. CODERRE: Department of Customs for appointments to the outside service, the general rule for age limit is under thirty-six years. Appointment to the inside service, the age of the person is required to be not less than eighteen years or more than thirty-five years, except as to certain special officers appointed under section 21 of the Civil Service Amendment Act 1908.

Department of Railways and Canals.—The age limit for inexperienced men in railway work is thirty-five years, and for men experienced in railway work forty-five years.

Department of Marine and Fisheries.—There is no specified age limit in the lighthouse service.

ST. LIN POST OFFICE.

Mr. SEGUIN:

Does the Department of Public Works intend, in the course of the present session, to have the necessary amount voted for the construction of a post office at St. Lin, a town of the Laurentides, county of L'Assomption? If not, what are the causes that prevents such construction?

Mr. ROGERS: Inquiry was made by the department concerning this work and from information secured, it was deemed to be immediately pressing.

RIVER L'ASSOMPTION WHARF.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Does the Department of Public Works intend, in the course of the present session, to have the necessary amount voted for the building of a wharf on the river L'Assomption?

2. If not, what are the causes that prevent such construction?

Mr. ROGERS: The matter is under careful consideration.

RIVER L'ACHIGAN BREAKWATER.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to have built on the river l'Achigan at St. Gérard de Magella, county of L'Assomption, some breakwaters to take the place of the icebreakers, for the construction of which special appropriations were voted in the estimates of 1911-1912?

2. If the Government does not intend to build the breakwaters, why has the building of the icebreakers voted for not been done, and at whose request?

Mr. ROGERS: Application has been received and the matter will be carefully considered when the estimates are being prepared.

FENIAN RAID BOUNTIES.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. What is the interpretation of the Department of Militia and Defence of the provisions of the Fenian Raid Volunteer Act, 1912, as to what services qualify a person for the bounty?

2. If an enlisted volunteer of a militia regiment was called out for regimental drill, and did undergo drill, but whose company or regiment was not ordered from the drill grounds for active service elsewhere, is he entitled to a bounty under the provisions of said Act?

3. What is the departmental definition of 'Active Service' as used in clause 2 of the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria):

1. That a volunteer must have been enrolled in a corps called out for active service and have actually served with that corps during the period of a raid, in pursuance of the order or proclamation which called it out.

2. If the corps was called out for active service and the drill or service was performed in connection with such calling out, yes; but the order for mere annual training, or drilling without the order for active service does not count. Verification must be by declaration of applicant and of at least one comrade; and the name must appear on the service or pay roll for the period—or other equally satisfactory evidence must be given.

3. Active service means service performed in response to the order or proclamation which called out the corps for the purpose of repelling invasion.

APPOINTMENT OF S. E. MACK.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Was S. E. Mack appointed to the customs service at Lunenburg, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, to what position was he appointed, what are the duties to be performed by him, if any, and what salary is he paid?

3. Was any recommendation made by any person in the custom service of Canada that it was in the interest of the customs service at Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, to create an additional office there, and to which Mr. Mack was subsequently appointed?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2. His rank is that of preventive officer of customs. His duties are to assist in the general work of the Port of Lunenburg. Salary $1,000 a year.

3. The appointment was made on the responsibility of the Minister of Customs to meet the needs of the customs service at Lunenburg.

DUTIES ON STEEL RAILS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Is there an application before the Government for the reduction of duties on steel rails?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): No.

ISAAC'S HARBOUR BUOYS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has the contract held by John Myers, of Isaac's Harbour, N.S., for maintaining buoys in the locality expired? If so, on what date?

2. Has the contract been re-let? If so, to whom?

3. Were tenders for this service asked for? If so, what are the names of the parties tendering and the amount of each tender?

4. What amounts per year was payable for this service under the contract of John Myers?

5. What yearly sum is payable by the department under the new contract, if any?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes. On the 23rd of November, 1912.

2. Yes. To Mr. Edgar Silver, of Goldboro, N. S.

3. Tenders were not called for and the service was transferred at the rate paid the former contractor.

4. $202.91, including the winter service.

5. $202.91, including the winter service.

HUMBOLDT HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. NEELY:

What are the names of the homestead inspectors appointed to the Humboldt Agency between September 21, 1911, and July 11, 1912, and the salary of each?

Mr. ROCHE : Albert Smyth, $1,200; R. G. Mackey, $1,300.

FARMERS' BANK INVESTIGATION.

*Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. Have the stenographic notes of the evidence taken at the Farmers' Bank investigation been extended?
2. Will the notes be available for the perusal of members of the House?
3. If so, when and where can members see the evidence?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds):

1, 2 and 3. The Government has no information as to whether the stenographic notes have been extended. Inquiry has been made of the commissioner and upon receiving his reply the Government will be in a position to fully answer the question of the hon. member for Ontario.

SASKATOON HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. McCRANEY:

What are the names of the homestead inspectors appointed to the Saskatoon Agency between September 21, 1911, and July 11, 1912, and the salary of each?

Mr. ROCHE: J. J. White, $1,200; J. G. Johnston, $1,200; T. W. Collins, $1,200; Wm. K. Walker, $1,200; Walter Cravette, $1,200.

PRINCE ALBERT HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. McCRANEY:

What are the names of the homestead inspectors appointed to the Prince Albert Agency between September 21, 1911, and July 11, 1912, and the salary of each?

Mr. ROCHE: Sinclair Snell, $1,200; Thos. L. Sutherland, $1,200.

DANBY—STE. CHRISTINE MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. MARCILE:

1. Has the contract granted to Felix Grisé, for carrying the mails between Danby and Ste. Christine, county of Bagot, been cancelled? If so, for what reasons?
2. Who is to replace him?
3. What price will he receive for the said contract?
4. Who requested this change?
5. By whom was the new contractor recommended?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. (a) The usual three months' notice has been given as provided in the contract. (b) In the public interest.

2 and 3. A. Bizaillon will perform the work at $195 per annum which is less than the amount previously paid.

4 and 5. Ordered by Postmaster General.

Mr. NEELY.

MARINE AFFAIRS AT ST. ROCH.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. For what reasons has the Government taken away the care of the ferry boat at St. Roch from Captain Andrews, to give it to David Bourgault, of St. Roch des Aulnaies?
2. What complaint is made against Captain Andrews?
3. Does the Government know that complaints are said to have already been made against David Bourgault, at the time he was lightkeeper at the entrance of the Saguenay?
4. Does the Government know that the said David Bourgault, as alleged, has publicly declared that he had paid $500 to one of the political organizers of Dr. Paquet, at St. Roch des Aulnaies, to be appointed in the place of Captain Andrews?
5. If not, will the department cause an inquiry to be made on this subject?

Mr. HAZEN: There appears to be some misunderstanding about questions 1 and 2, as the department does not maintain a ferry boat at St. Roch, and it knows nothing of Captain Andrews. Questions 3, 4 and 5 would indicate, though they are not very clear, that they refer to the lightkeeper at St. Roch des Aulnaies, and if the hon. gentleman will correct his questions, we will be very glad to answer them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has stated that there is no ferry boat at St. Roch. There is a mistake in the question as it appears on the Order Paper, due to an error in translation. The question as it appears in French reads as follows:

1. For what reasons has the Government taken away the care of the ferry boat at St. Roch from Captain Andrews, to give it to David Bourgault, of St. Roch des Aulnaies?

The word 'bateau-phare' meaning lightship, has been translated as meaning ferry boat.

Mr. HAZEN: That is where the mistake has evidently arisen It came into the department as 'ferry boat.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then the hon. gentleman will be prepared to give an answer to the question?

Mr. HAZEN: I will be prepared to give an answer next day.

Question allowed to stand.

ACTON VALE AND ST. THEODORE D'ACTON MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. MARCILE:

1. Has the contract granted to Joseph Bousquet, for carrying the mail between Acton Vale and St. Théodore d'Acton been cancelled?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Who is to replace him?

4. What price will he receive for the said contract?
5. Who requested this change?
6. By whom was the new contractor recommended?

Mr. PELLETIER: This contract has not been cancelled. It expires in the regular course on the 31st instant. A new contract has been authorized dating from 1st January, 1913, with L. Gauthier, at the same price as paid to present contractor, J. Bousquet, viz., $134.16 per annum.

LABOUR GAZETTE CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. How many correspondents of the Labour Gazette in Nova Scotia have been dismissed or asked to resign?
2. What are the names of said correspondents?
3. What were the grounds for dismissal or request for resignation in each case?
4. Were any investigations held? If so, in what cases?
5. Who were the appointees in each case to fill the vacancies?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Three—dismissals.
2. (a) A. D. Ross, (3) Thomas Bales, (c) A. J. Smith.
3. (a) Inefficiency, (b) offensive partisanship, (c) offensive partisanship.
4. No official investigations were considered necessary.
5. (a) J. Forsyth, (b) L. H. McKenzie, (c) P. Clancy.

MOOSEJAW HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle):

What are the names of the homestead inspectors appointed to the Moosejaw agency between the 21st of September, 1911, and the 11th of July, 1912, and the salary of each?

Mr. ROCHE: George A. MacKenzie, $1,200; J. Mines, $1,200; W. H. Erratt, $1,200; H. L. Bowyer, $1,200; Wm. Rathwell, $1,200; R. R. Miller, $1,200.

REGINA HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle):

What are the names of the homestead inspectors appointed to the Regina agency between the 21st of September, 1911, and the 11th of July, 1912, and the salary of each?

Mr. ROCHE: P. R. Brandt, $1,200; A. C. Sipes, $1,200; Jas. Balfour, $1,500; C. J. Ouellette, $1,200.

SWIFT CURRENT HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. THOMSON:

What are the names of the homestead inspectors appointed to the Swift Current agency between the 21st of September, 1911, and the 11th of July, 1912, and the salary of each?

Mr. ROCHE: A. E. Sparshatt, $1,200; Wm. Shields, $1,200; Peter McLaren, $1,200.

BAYVIEW, CARIBOO, LOBSTER HATCHERY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. What are the names and the remuneration paid to each of the employees of the lobster hatchery at Bayview, Cariboo, for the operating season of 1911?
2. What are the names and the remuneration paid to each of the employees of the lobster hatchery at Bayview, Cariboo, for the operating season of 1912?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. W. H. McLaren, $3 a day; W. S. Munroe, $2.25; Joseph Laverdière, $2; James Johnstone, $2.25; John Chisholm, $1.75; David Anderson, $1.75; John Reid, $1.75; Duncan Henderson, $1.75; Joseph Babineau, $1.75; W. L. Holmes, $1.75.
2. J. W. Hogg, $3 a day; Finlay McKenzie, $2.25; John Reid, $2; Isaac Harris, $2.25; Marshall Murray, $1.75; Robert Talbot, $1.75; William Leslie, $1.75; John Meagher, $1.75; Leslie Simpson, $1.75; Albert Murdock, $1.75.

POST OFFICES IN MEDICINE HAT.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. How many applications have been made for the establishment of post offices in the constituency of Medicine Hat, Alberta, since September 21, 1912?
2. How many of these applications have not been granted, and what was the reason or reasons in each instance?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. 67.
2. 39 applications have been granted; 23 are under inquiry; 5 have been refused as conditions were unfavourable, and the inspector's report against establishment. The ones refused names and locations are as undermentioned:

(a) 'Roseglen'—S.E. ¼, section 4, township 16, range 3, west 4th meridian: country but sparsely settled Excessive price asked for service. Report unfavourable.

(b) 'Kasimir'—S.W. ¼, section 14, township 14, range 20, west 4th meridian. District neither well settled nor likely to improve rapidly. Report unfavourable.

(c) 'Blairgowrie'—S.E. ¼, section 18, township 28, range 2, west 4th meridian. Proposed site within 4 miles of one office and 5 miles of another. Report against establishment.

(d) 'Klaras'—S.W. ¼, section 14, township 16, range 4, west 4th meridian. Proposed site within 3 miles of a post office; another office unnecessary.

(e) 'Walhonding'—S.E. ¼, section 14, township 15, range 4, west 4th meridian. Proposed site within 4½ miles of a post office. Another office not required. Report unfavourable.

CUSTOMS OFFICE FOR GLEICHEN.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has a request been made for the establishment of a customs office at Gleichen, Alberta?

2. If so, is it the intention to accede to the request?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): There appears to be no request on file in the Department of Customs for the establishment of a customs office at Gleichen.

GOVERNMENT BUILDING AT BASSANO, ALTA.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

Has the contract been let for the new Government building at Bassano, Alberta, provided for in the estimates of last session?

Mr. ROGERS: No, preparation of plans and specifications now in hands of chief architect.

BURDETT, ALTA., PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has Burdett, in the constituency of Medicine Hat, been made a port of entry by the Department of Customs?

2. If so, by whose request and on whose recommendation?

3. For what reason was this port of entry established?

4. Who is the officer in charge?

5. Where was his residence when appointed, and on whose recommendation was he appointed?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2. On the request and recommendation of the Minister of Customs.

3. To afford facilities for customs entries of imported goods.

4. Augustine Kerkham.

5. His residence at time of appointment is given as Lethbridge. He was appointed on the recommendation of the Minister of Customs.

MEDICINE HAT LANDS AGENT.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has a permanent appointment been made of an agent of Dominion Lands at Medicine Hat, Alberta?

2. If so, who has been appointed?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. No.

2. Mr. Geo. H. Macdonell is acting agent.

Mr. PELLETIER.

ICE BREAKING IN THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. DELISLE:

In view of the great damages said to be caused in the spring by the inundation from Cap Rouge to Montreal, is it the intention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries to give orders that the Montcalm and the Lady Grey be solely employed during the winter in breaking the ice from Cap Rouge upward?

Mr. HAZEN: It is the intention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, to utilize the C.G.S. Montcalm and the C.G.S. Lady Grey for breaking ice at Cap Rouge and upwards during the present winter.

STE. JUSTINE MONGENAIS MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. BOYER:

1. On what date will the contract end for the carriage of the mail between the station of Ste. Justine de Newton and the village of Ste. Justine and Mongenais?

2. What is the amount of the contract and when did it end?

3. Who is the present holder of it, and does the Government intend to cancel this contract before its expiration? If so, for what reasons and will new tenders be asked for?

4. When will these tenders be asked for?

5. If complaints have been made against the present carrier, by whom were they made?

Mr. PELLETIER: S. Lanthier's contract for this service was due to expire on the 30th September, 1913. On a report from the post office inspector it was found that this contractor was not performing the service properly. In accordance with a condition of his contract, three months' notice of cancellation was given on 5th October last, and arrangements made with another person to perform the service temporarily from the expiration of the three months' notice at the same amount as Lanthier received, viz.: $312.25 per annum.

RIGAUD POST OFFICE.

Mr. BOYER:

1. When does the Government propose to have the post office at Rigaud open?

2. Has one or more guardians been appointed to take care of the building?

3. What is their name or names and the emoluments paid for such duties?

4. Is the Government at present in possession of the building or has the contractor yet delivered it?

5. Has the Government asked for tenders for repairs of this building? If so, what are the names of the tenderers and their residence and the price asked in each tender?

6. To which of the tenderers has the contract been granted, and for what amount?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The building is now completed; the post office fittings are not yet installed, but will be in place about the end of December.

2. Two caretakers appointed.
3. J. B. Charlebois, caretaker, $12.50 per month; Gédéon Vallée, assistant caretaker, $12.50 per month.
4. Yes.
5. Tenders were invited for the post office fittings. One tender received, J. T. Schell Co., Alexandria, Ont., $1,487.00.
6. J. T. Schell Co., Alexandria, $1,487.00.

STE. MARTHE POSTMASTER.

Mr. BOYER :

By whom was the appointment of Mr. Emery Quesnel, as postmaster at Ste. Marthe, Vaudreuil, recommended?

Mr. PELLETIER : The appointment was made by the order and on the responsibility of the Postmaster General.

WHARF GRAHAM, VAUDREUIL.

Mr. BOYER:

1. What amount of money has been spent on repairs to the wharf Graham, in Vaudreuil, since September, 1911?
2. Who had the superintendence, and how much have the overseers and other employees each received?
3. What are the names of the furnishers of materials and what is the amount of each of their accounts?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. $759.38.
2. Treffié Coulombe, conductor, 18th September, 1911, 21st October, 1911, 29 days at $3, $87; Antoine Bertrand, conductor, 7-31st March, 1912, 21 days at $3, $63; Peter Graham, carpenter, 22nd September, 21st October, 1911, 22 days at $2.50, $55; Arthur Pilon, helper, 26th September, 17th October, 1911, 7 days at $2, $14; Antoine Bertrand, senior painter, 8-31st March, 1912, 20 days at $2, $40; Peter Berry, carpenter, 13-31st March, 1912, 16 days, at $2.50, $40; Barny Séguin, carpenter, 13-31st March, 1912, 16 days at $2.50, $40; Ludovic Séguin, teaming, 16-31st March, 1912, 12½ days at $4, $50.—$389.
3. William Hodgson, Como, Quebec, 3rd October, 1911, lumber, $167.51, 28th March, 1912, lumber, $50.93, $218.44; Alphonse Dumoulin, Boyerbourg, Quebec, 26th September, 18th October, 1911, smithwork, $9.50, 29th March, 1912, smithwork, $10.35, $19.85; W. Graham, Boyerbourg, Quebec, 23rd October, 1911, hardware, $2.45; Chevrier Frères, Rigaud, Quebec, 8th April, 1912, lumber, $82; B. Decoste, Rigaud, Quebec, 26th March, 10th April, 1912, hardware, $47.64.—$370.38.—$759.38.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. GAVUREAU:

1. For what reason was Odilon Pelletier, excise officer, or customs, at St. Roch des Aulnaies dismissed?
2. What is the salary of Joseph Dupon, who replaced him, and what are his duties?
3. Does the Government know, as alleged, that this officer can neither read nor write?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. Because he has made no reports of work done since his appointment in September, 1908.
2. The same salary, viz., $200 and the same duties.
3. No.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Why was R. A. Burriss dismissed from the position of immigration agent at Port Arthur?
2. Who has been appointed in his place?

Mr. ROCHE.

1. Incompetency and active partisanship.
2. No one has been appointed in his place.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. What was the reason for the dismissal of Gordon Macdonald, homestead inspector in the Edmonton land agency?
2. Who was appointed in his place?
3. What was the occupation of the person so appointed before his appointment, and what was his personal reputation?
4. Is he still in the employment of the Interior Department?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Political partisanship.
2. C. J. Brown.
3. No record in the department with respect to this.
4. No.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has Mr. Napoléon Rousseau, postmaster at Ste. Clothilde, been dismissed?
2 If so, for what reasons and who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been apointed as his successor and at whose request?
4. Was there an inquiry?

Mr. PELLETIER: Charges of political partisanship having been made against the postmaster, he was written to by the department, requesting an explanation. As he failed to reply to the department's letter, he was again written to and as he again refused to reply, his silence was regarded as equivalent to an admission of the charges, and his removal and the appointment of Mr. Alfred Laforest as his successor was authorized by the Postmaster General.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has Mr. George Rouleau, postmaster at St. Paul de Chester, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Was his dismissal asked for by Mr. Arthur Gilbert?
4. Who proposed his successor?
5. Was there an inquiry?
6. Who has been appointed postmaster in Mr. Rouleau's place?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. For political partisanship.
3 and 4. His removal was directed and his successor appointed by order of the Postmaster General.
5. No. He admitted having acted as a political partisan.
6. Mr. Octave Lafontaine has not been appointed receiver, but postmaster.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has Mr. L. P. Leclerc, postmaster at Bon Conseil, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons and who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been appointed his successor and at whose request?
4. Was an inquiry held?

Mr. PELLETIER: The postmaster was dismissed on facts which the Postmaster General considered sufficient, that he had acted as a political partisan, and consequently the expenses of an inquiry would have been useless. Mr. Bruno Chagnon has been appointed his successor by direction of the Postmaster General.

Mr. BROUILLARD :

1. Has Mr. Pierre Potvin, junior postmaster at St. Rémi de Tingwick, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons and who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been appointed as his successor and at whose request?
4. Was there an enquiry?

Mr. PELLETIER : The postmaster was dismissed on facts which the Postmaster General considered sufficient, that he had acted as a political partisan, and consequently the expenses of an inquiry would have been useless. Mr. Louis Trottier has been appointed postmaster, by direction of the Postmaster General.

Mr. BROUILLARD :

1. Has Mr. Calixte Lavoie, postmaster at St. Cyrille de Wendover, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons and who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been appointed his successor and at whose request?
4. Was an inquiry held?

Mr. PELLETIER : The postmaster was dismissed on facts which the Postmaster General considered sufficient, that he had acted as a political partisan, and consequently the expenses of an inquiry would have been useless. Mr. Louis Laforest has been appointed postmaster, by direction of the Postmaster General.

Mr. BROUILLARD :

1. Has Mr. Omer Marcotte, postmaster at Daveluyville, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons and who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been appointed his successor and at whose request?
4. Was an inquiry held?

Mr. PELLETIER : It having been represented, and ascertained to be the fact, that Mr. Adolphe Daveluy had been unjustly removed from the postmastership of Daveluyville, in 1908, and that his residence was a convenient location for the post office, the Postmaster General directed his reinstatement as postmaster.

DISMISSALS IN HUNTINGDON COUNTY.

Mr. ROBB moved:

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, and petitions for and against the dismissal of Duncan McDonald, preventive officer of customs at Athelstan, county of Huntingdon; also a copy of the report of investigation and evidence submitted to investigating commissioner.

He said: This resolution refers also to James Bennett, customs house officer, who was dismissed on 11th June. McDonald was dismissed on 27th June. Whatever may be said for or against the dismissal of public officials in other counties, it has been the proud boast of the county of Huntingdon that, from the time of Confederation until the present Government attained office, no public official, either federal or provincial, had been dismissed for political partisanship. In that county the public officers exercised their rights freely as free men, believing that the people they served were big enough and tolerant enough to allow them to vote and to act according to the dictates of their own consciences; and it was in this belief, and with this knowledge, that in 1908, and again in 1911, the Government officials, custom house officers, postmasters, and mail contractors, acted in a way that our Conservative friends would classify as political partisanship. In 1908 the Liberals were re-elected, and such had been the conduct of certain Conservative officials that some good zealous Liberals demanded their dismissal. But these Liberal friends were told that in the county of Huntingdon, Government officials were free men and had a right to vote and to act as free men. They were told, further, that if they insisted on the dismissal of those officers, the member for the county was prepared to surrender his mandate and to resign rather than make such a recommendation. To-day, the Liberals, and, I think, a good many Conservatives in the county of Huntingdon are glad to know that under a Liberal administration, and on the recommendation of a supporter of the Liberal Government, in the advancement of salaries that was granted throughout the county, no discrimination was made against Conservative office-holders. Indeed, I have in mind one customs house officer, a Conservative, who had taken what our Conservative friends would call an offensive part in the campaign of 1908, but who was given a considerable increase. Now in the campaign of 1911, the Conservative-Nationalist combination, the Borden-Monk-Bourassa combination, had for a candidate in the county of Huntingdon, a man who was a delegate to the Farmers' Convention in Ottawa which demanded reciprocity. That man, a very good friend of my own, and against whom I have nothing to say, presented himself in the county as an Independent, and emphasized that position upon every platform throughout the county. But, notwithstanding that, we know that he received very generous support from the Conservative headquarters at Montreal. No sooner was the election over than this Independent, with some of his friends, was seen in the front row of the House demanding the dismissal of good honest officials whose only offence had been that they had voted as they had always voted. One of them, a Scotchman, with the proverbial hospitality of his race was charged with having given to the Liberal candidate a refreshment, not a very grave offence in the eyes of a man who had campaigned throughout the county and was often hungry. The other man was an Irishman, and with the fearless character of a fearless race, he was bold enough to express his opinion of the Conservative-Nationalist alliance, particularly of that class who, the present Postmaster General tells us, were giving advice that might have led to civil war. Charges were made, and an investigation was held, and I am told, upon credible authority that the report of the investigating commissioner was to the effect that the evidence did not justify dismissal. But so insistent were the demands made upon the minister by those so-called Independents, that the minister dismissed two good honest faithful officials, and established a record of having made the first dismissal for political partisanship since Confederation in the county of Huntingdon. If this Government are resting quietly under the impression that the people of that county approve of the spoils system, they will change their minds after the next election. But in the meantime we lay upon them the responsibility of having established a record in the county of Huntingdon which, perhaps, some day they and their friends may be sorry for.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Customs is on his way to England, and I am sorry that I have not been able to put myself in possession of the information that would enable me to reply to my hon. friend. The documents for which he asks will, of course, be brought down. Let me say, however, generally, that dismissal for active partisanship is not a recent policy. It has been a policy of hon. gentlemen opposite while in power, and I believe it has been a generally recognized policy that officials drawing money for services rendered to the public irrespective of politics, shall not be permitted to take the part of active partisans during an election. I think that policy has been concurred in by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and it has been concurred in, as far as I know, by both parties since Confederation. The question of whether a particular officer has or has not been guilty of offensive partisanship is a question of fact. This motion indicates that an investigation has been held, and the statement of my hon. friend is at best, I submit, an ex parte statement. When the documents have come down, we shall be prepared, I have no doubt, to meet the charge which he has made, to discuss the matter, and to see if the complaints connected with this dismissal are justified, as I have no doubt they will be. But let me say a word further. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), one night last winter, read to this House, and it took him no less than two or three hours, a list of dismissals made by the late Government upon their accession to power in 1896, and the list comprised hundreds of names. There is no doubt about it, the leader of the Opposition is on record as having said, in substance, that if any public official desired to take an active part in politics he would have to take the consequences, that he would give him the opportunity—I believe I quote almost his exact words—of taking the consequences of being an active partisan. No doubt it is very regrettable that dismissals should have to take place by reason of active partisanship; but as long as officials who know the regulations will take an active part in politics during an election, they must be prepared to stand the consequences. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), the other night admitted that this principle had been acted upon. In fact, there is no use of elaborating the point because it is a well known and admitted fact. The hon. gentleman concurred with the view that if officials were guilty of active partisanship they must pay the penalty. Speaking for myself personally, I have held the view enunciated in this House some years ago by the late Sir Richard Cartwright then Minister of Trade and Commerce. He intimated that he would disqualify civil servants, or rather that he would put them in the same position as that in which judges are. His view was that they should not be permitted to vote in order that they should be without any incentive to take part in active politics during an election. A candidate who has been fighting a hard battle in a close constituency, finding lined up against him before the election, a number of men paid by the public, irrespective of political considerations, would not be human if he did not come to Ottawa and insist that those men who had transgressed the very proper regulations made to prevent such a practice, should be dismissed. Personally, I am in favour of giving very considerable latitude, but at the same time I do not know of anything that would disorganize the service more quickly than to take the ground that under no circumstances should officials be dismissed for active partisanship. It is very regrettable but the rules are there and they must be enforced. This principle has been acted upon by both parties when in office and the question of whether a man is or is not an active partisan is a question of fact. These papers will be brought down and I am sure that when they are brought down they will show that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs has acted properly, after investigation and only in accordance with the regulations and policy adopted by both parties.

Mr. ROBB: If the facts are as presented this afternoon, is the Minister prepared to say that he will reinstate this man?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): As I understood the hon. gentleman, his statement contained no specific details. The hon. gentleman was most general in what he said. That is the objection I have to his mode of presentation. He says that no such dismissals have taken place since Confederation. I understood him to admit the possibility of active partisanship. However, we cannot discuss the question intelligently until the papers are brought down. When they are brought down I will be very glad to take the matter up and discuss it with my hon. friend and I have no doubt whatever that at least a prima facie case and probably a conclusive case will be shown by the papers to have been made out.

Mr. TURRIFF: The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) is going on the assumption that we, on this side of the House, are asking for the reinstatement, or are objecting to the dismissal of, officials who have been active partisans in the elections. We are not objecting to the dismissal of officials who have been partisans in the late election. We are objecting that officials have been and are being dismissed who took absolutely no part in the election, that they have been dismissed without any investigation, or that, if an investigation has been held, it has been nothing more nor less than a fake investigation. I do not think any one will object to a man being dismissed who is an active partisan but that is not the question at issue at all. It is a question of the dismissal of officials who have not been partisans, who have done nothing more than go and record their votes just as they have done all their lives. I do not think any person will object to any official casting his vote. I believe the whole official service should be disfranchised, but until that is done every official has an absolute right to go and cast his vote. I have told hundreds of officials that if they choose to go out and work for one side or the other in a political contest, they take their official lives in their hands, and if they are dismissed they have nobody to blame but themselves. We are not objecting to partisans being dismissed, but we are objecting to the dismissal of officials who are not partisans.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSALS OF OFFICIALS IN THE COUNTY OF LOTBINIERE.

Mr. E. FORTIER (Lotbinière) moved:

For a list of officials dismissed by the present Government, in the constituency of Lotbinière, including the names and duties of such persons, the causes of their dismissal, the nature of the charges laid against them; also a copy of all correspondence relating thereto and of all reports of investigations when such were held.

He said: If I make this motion, Mr. Speaker, it is because I am convinced that a great number of public servants in the county of Lotbinière have been dismissed without cause. The only reason that could be given would be that these officials are Liberals. But then it is a well known fact that Lotbinière is a Liberal constituency.

I have yet to learn that any of these employees have taken an active part in the elections which were held at different times since I represent this county. I may add that, for my part, I have never recommended the dismissal of officials because they were of the Conservative party.

I ask the production of these documents in order to know why so many employees were dismissed. I have no other remarks to make for the present.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ON CEMENT.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved:

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams and correspondence between the Government of Canada or any member thereof, since April 1, 1912, to the present time, with any corporation, company, party or parties, in any way relating to the customs tariff upon cement, or to the temporary reduction made of the customs tariff upon cement; also for a copy of all letters and correspondence by and between members of the Government of Canada during the same period relating to the same subject, and of all papers, documents, memoranda and Orders in Council relative to the reduction of the customs tariff upon cement made by Order in Council since the close of the last session of Parliament.

He said : I think a similar motion was made by some other hon. gentleman, and of course, if the papers asked for here are included in that prior motion, I do not necessarily want them brought down.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): There is a motion for production of papers by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and I am under the impression that it covers the same ground as this motion.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The motion may go, with the understanding that if the papers are included in a prior motion, they need not be brought down. May I ask to change the date in the resolution to October 1, 1911 ?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): In connection with this, I might say that I am advised by the Customs Department that it regards as confidential any letters or correspondence from business firms relating particularly to their own business, and dealing with such matters as, for instance, cost of production. I think I should be able reasonably to satisfy my hon. friend from the public file, but I would like to ask him if he desires correspondence that might be reasonably regarded as confidential, on the ground that I have mentioned. I am told that in the department it has been customary not to give out such reports. I assure my hon. friend, however, that everything he reasonably wants will be given him.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I will confer with the hon. minister, and will be glad to agree with his suggestion if at all possible.

Motion amended to read, 'since October 1, 1911,' agreed to.

TARIFF DUTIES ON LUMBER.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved:

For a copy of all papers, documents, petitions, Orders in Council, letters and telegrams in any department of the Government of Canada, or that passed between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Justice or any solicitor, counsel, association, company or individual, during the past twelve months, respecting the imposition of tariff duties upon imported lumber dressed on one side and sized, or respecting the interpretation of tariff item No. 504, together with a printed copy of any stated case, appeal, factum or argument used before the Exchequer Court of Canada or the Supreme Court of Canada, in the matter of the judicial interpretation of tariff item No. 504.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Might I ask my hon. friend if he does not mean the Department of Customs rather than the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The hon. minister is correct. I meant the Department of Customs.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): That will be amended accordingly.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend has not asked for the judgments. It might be desirable to have the judgments or the reasons for the judgments laid before the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes, if the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) will be good enough to direct the minister in charge of the department to embody that, it might come in as a document.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSALS AT DESCOUSE AND WEST ARICHAT.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE moved :

For a copy of all recommendations, correspondence, letters and telegrams, relating to the dismissal of Leon N. Poirier, wharfinger at Descouse, N.S., and the appointment of Andrew Landry to succeed him.

2. Of all recommendations, correspondence, letters and telegrams, relating to the dismissal of Dougald R. Boyle, of West Arichat, N.S., fishery officer, and the appointment of Andrew Landry to succeed him.

3. Of all recommendations, correspondence, letters and telegrams, relating to the dismissal of Captain Frederick Poirier, of Descouse, N.S., buoy contractor, and the appointment of Andrew Landry to succeed him.

4. Of all petitions, recommendations, correspondence, letters and telegrams, asking for the discharge of Andrew Landry, from the common jail at Arichat, N.S., alleged to have been under sentence by Justice Graham for forgery, and the report of the hon. the Minister of Justice thereon, and of the order granting the discharge.

He said : I desire to make one or two observations in respect to the rather extraordinary condition of affairs disclosed by the motion which has just been read. If there is one thing the people of Canada expected with the greatest confidence when the present Government came into power, it was some attempt to adhere to the platform enunciated on many occasions by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government, and the hon. gentlemen associated with him in conducting the affairs of this country. I will content myself with quoting one declaration from the Halifax platform made by the right hon. leader of this Government some time previous to the last election. Among the reforms which he felt it was necessary, in the interest of the country, to bring about, and which would be consummated on the return to power of the Conservative party, was the recognition of the principle that men should be appointed to office by reason of their fitness and character, and not as a reward for political services. That section of the plank in the Halifax platform reads as follows :

Appointment of public officials upon considerations of capacity and personal character and not of party service alone.

As I have said, we all felt that the right hon. gentleman would exercise the very greatest discrimination in the appointment of men to offices in the public service, and that character and capacity would be the sole determining factors in the appointments of men to such positions. On the 8th of December, 1911, about two months after the present Government came into power, Mr. J. A. Gillies, who was my opponent in the last federal election, wrote the following letter to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries :

Arichat, N.S., Dec. 8, 1911.

Hon. J. D. Hazen,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—At a full meeting of the executive of the Liberal-Conservative Association held here yesterday, a resolution was unanimously passed asking for the dismissal of Dugald R. Boyle, of West Arichat, fishery inspector on Isle Madame. Mr. Boyle is a noted political partisan and was most active at the last election. He attended meetings of the Liberal party, canvassed openly and actively, and was the sworn agent in the poll at West Arichat on last election day of the Grit candidate. His position is indefensible and deserves and expects instant dismissal. The executive recommends the appointment of Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, to this position, and I now endorse that recommendation.

Yours truly,
J. A. GILLIES.

On December 13, 1911, the Minister of Marine wrote the following letter in reply to the one I have just read :

December 13th, 1911.

Dear Sir:—

I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 8th instant, stating that at a meeting of the executive of the Liberal-Conservative Association of Richmond county, held at Arichat, a resolution was unanimously passed asking for the dismissal of Mr. Dugald R. Boyle of West Arichat, fishery overseer, Isle Madame, on the grounds of offensive political partisanship, and that the executive recommend the appointment of Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, to this position, which recommendation you endorse.

In reply I may say after an examination of the existing organization of the outside staff of the Fisheries branch, I am quite convinced that it is not the best one that could be devised in the public interest, and I have therefore in view, just as soon as time will permit, going thoroughly into the matter with the object of completely reorganizing that branch of the service. I have in the meantime taken your letter into consideration, and hope to be in a position to advise you further in regard thereto in the course of a few days. Yours faithfully.

J. D. HAZEN.

J. A. Gillies, Esq.,
Sydney, N.S.

The following letter was written to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on December 18, 1911 :

The Honourable
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa, Canada.

Honourable Sir:—

Permit me the following: I have it from a reliable source that a Mr. Andrew Landry has been recommended for the office of fishery inspector for this county. Being pastor of a parish in this county of sixteen hundred souls, I am greatly interested in its progress and in having as public officers men worthy of the confidence of the people and a credit to the administration that has named them.

Consequently I think it is my duty and to the interest of your administration, to inform you that the above mentioned Mr. Landry is not a man for any public office in this county. Would you think a man who has a case pending against him for forged notes worthy of a public office and our confidence? Believe me, Honourable sir, your administration will be lauded by rejecting this demand.

I know you will believe that a good purpose animates me in laying this information before you, and that you will give this matter your attention.

Humbly yours,
WILFRID A. BOUCHER, P.P.

Descouse, Richmond Co., C.B.
Dec. 18th, 1911.

P.S.—The office above related to is now in hands of a Mr. Boyle of West Arichat.

W. A. BOUCHER.

The minister sent the following reply to that communication:

Reverend and Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 18th instant, stating that you have received information from a reliable source to the effect that Mr. Andrew Landry, of Descouse, has been recommended for the office of fishery overseer in the county of Richmond, in lieu of Mr. D. R. Boyle, of West Arichat, and I note you state as you are a pastor of sixteen hundred people you are interested in their progress, and in having as public officers men worthy of the confidence of the people, and a credit to the administration, and you therefore deem it your duty to inform me that the above mentioned Mr. Landry is not a man for any public office for many reasons (inter alia) that he has a case pending against him for forged notes.

In reply I beg to thank you for your letter, and state that it is the desire to have thoroughly competent and worthy officers, and I have therefore caused your letter to be filed for consideration in the event of a vacancy occurring in the position now held by Mr. Boyle.

Yours faithfully,
J. D. HAZEN.

Reverend W. A. Boucher,
Descouse, Richmond Co., C.B.

I have here a certified extract from the minutes of a meeting of the treasury board held on January 15, 1912, approved by His Royal Highness the Governor General in Council on the 30th of January, 1912 :

Marine and Fisheries.

The board recommend that the services of Mr. Dugald R. Boyle, of West Arichat, who was, by Order in Council of the 6th of November, 1896, appointed a fishery overseer in and for the county of Richmond, in the province of Nova Scotia, be dispensed with on the ground of offensive political partisanship.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

The Honourable
The Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

The following letter was written on January 26, 1912, by the Superintendent of Fisheries to Mr. D. R. Boyle:

Sir,—I beg to inform you that by Order in Council of the 20th instant your services as fishery overseer have been dispensed with on the ground of offensive political partisanship. You will please continue to act until the end of the present month, up to which time your salary and regular expenses incurred on official business will be paid.

Any documents or other property in your keeping which are official in their nature you will please immediately forward to the inspector of fisheries at Englishtown.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
W. A. FOUND,
Superintendent of Fisheries.

Dugald R. Boyle, Esq.,
Fishery Overseer,
West Arichat, N.S.

The recommendation of Mr. J. A Gillies, the defeated Conservative candidate, so far as the dismissal of Mr. D. R. Boyle is concerned, was immediately complied with, as you will observe from the communication I have just read. There was no investigation into the charge of partisanship alleged against Mr. Boyle, and the statement made by the defeated Conservative candidate in the county of Richmond was accepted. On January 26, 1912, Mr. Found addressed the following letter to Mr. Morrison, inspector of fisheries at Englishtown, N.S.:

Sir,—I enclose herewith a copy of a letter to-day written to Mr. Dugald R. Boyle, of West Arichat, informing him that his services as fishery overseer have been dispensed with from the end of the present month. The department is not at the moment prepared to say who will be employed to succeed him, and you will therefore arrange that the nearest fishery officers or guardians, who may still be engaged in the district, in order to prevent any violations of the law.

I am Sir,
Your obedient servant,
W. A. FOUND.
Superintendent of Fisheries.

J. G. Morrison, Esq.,
Inspector of Fisheries,
Englishtown, N.S.

On the 26th of January, 1912, after Mr. Boyle had been dismissed from the office of Fishery Officer on the ground of offensive partisanship, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries addressed the following letter to Mr. J. A. Gillies:

January 26th, 1912.

Dear Sir,—Adverting to your letter of the 8th December last, recommending for reasons contained therein, that fishery overseer D. R. Boyle, of West Arichat, be dismissed, I beg to inform you that an Order in Council was approved by His Royal Highness on the 20th instant dispensing with Mr. Boyle's services, and he has been notified that his engagement with the department will determine on the 31st instant.

In your letter you recommend that Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, should be employed to fill the vacancy. Subsequently I received a letter from Reverend Wilfrid A. Boucher, of Descouse, in which he expressed the opinion that Mr. Landry is not a suitable man to be employed ir any public office, and I gathered from his letter that action is pending against him for having forged notes. It may be that this information was not before you when you made your recommendation, and before proceeding with employment of a successor to Mr. Boyle, I shall await a further letter from you.

Yours faithfully,
J. D. HAZEN.

J. A. Gillies, Esq.,
Barrister, &c.,
Sydney, N.S.

Mr. Gillies then despatched the following to the minister:

Sydney, N.S., Feb. 16, 1912.

J. D. Hazen,
Ottawa.

Please send Andrew Landry his appointment fishery overseer immediately no foundation for charges against him.

J. A. GILLIES.

To that the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries replied as follows:

21st February, 1912.

My dear Sir,—In the absence of the honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who, is at present in Washington, I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of the 19th, instant, with reference to Captain Andrew Landry.

As soon after the minister's return as convenient your telegram will receive his attention.

Yours very truly,
A. JOHNSTON.

J. A. Gillies, Esq.,
Barrister,
Sydney, N. S.

On February 21, 1912, Mr. Gillies addressed the following letter to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

Sydney, N.S. February 21, 1912.
Hon. J. D. Hazen,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa, Canada.

Re Appointment of Captain Landry.

Dear Sir,—I wired you the other day asking you to be good enough to forward Captain Landry's appointment as fishery overseer at Isle Madame. I have made very careful inquiry respecting the matter touched upon in your letter and I have no reason whatever to withdraw my recommendation of him. It is simply bad blood between different factions at Descouse, and some of the parties are trying to damage the Landrys. I have known them for over twenty years and during that period of time I have found them absolutely straight and correct in every particular. Please send on his appointment at once as it is important that the distribution of the bounty cheques should be in the proper hands.

Yours very truly.
J. A. GILLIES.

You will note that he emphasizes the fact that the distribution of bounty would be in proper hands if placed in the hands of Capt. Landry. On March 2 Mr. Gillies addressed this further letter to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

Ottawa, March 2, 1912.
Hon. J. D. Hazen,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Hazen,—Will you kindly drop me a line stating whether Captain Andrew Landry's appointment as fishery overseer has been yet sent to him.

I wrote you on the 19th February—before leaving home—your acknowledgement thereof, dated 21st of February has been received by me here.

As the bounty will soon be distributed I will be very glad to know that Captain Landry has been duly installed in his position before this distribution begins.

Yours very truly,
J. A. GILLIES.

P.S.—Please address to Russell House.

On March 6, 1912, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries addressed the following letter to Mr. Gillies:

March 6, 1912.

Re Captain Andrew Landry.

Dear Sir,—I have to asknowledge yours of the 2nd instant with further reference to the above.

In reply I beg to say that pressure of sessional work has made it impossible for me to overtake this and a number of other matters of a similiar nature.

At the very earliest opportunity I shall give it consideration.

Yours very faithfully,
J. D. HAZEN.

J. A. Gillies, Esq.,
Russell House,
Ottawa, Ont.

Mr. KYTE.

That completes the file of public documents having reference to this matter, which was brought down in response to an order of this House during the last session.

From the evidence I have produced, it is apparent that on the 8th of December Mr. J. A. Gillies, the defeated Conservative candidate in Richmond, N.S., recommended the appointment of Andrew Landry as fishery officer in place of D. R. Boyle. On the 12th of December Rev. W. A. Boucher addressed a letter to the Minister of Marine intimating that the appointment of Mr. Landry to any public office in the county of Richmond would be highly undesirable, and, if I may paraphrase his language, would be a public scandal. Notwithstanding that, on the 23rd of November, 1911, the Deputy Minister of Marine addressed the following letter to Mr. Leon N. Poirier, wharfinger, Descouse, N.S.:

Department of Marine and Fisheries.
Ottawa, 23rd Dec. 1911.

Sir,—I have to inform you that the Order in Council of the 31st May, 1906, appointing you as wharfinger of the Government wharf at Descouse, N.S., has been cancelled and your services as wharfinger dispensed with owing to offensive political partizanship.

Captain Andrew Landry has been appointed in your room and stead to whom I have to request you to give up possession of the wharf and of all Government supplies pertaining thereto when required.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd) A. JOHNSON.
Deputy Minister.

Mr. Leon N. Poirier,
Descouse, N.S.

While the letter of the Rev. W. A. Boucher was in the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Ottawa, the Minister deliberately dismissed Capt. Leon N. Poirier, wharfinger at Descouse, on the alleged ground of partisanship and appointed this very man Landry to that position in the face of the statements and warnings he had received from the Rev. Mr. Boucher. It is apparent from the file that Mr. Gillies attempted to impress on the minister the fact that the charge made against Landry in connection with the forgery of notes was trumped up and was the result of bad blood in the parish of Descouse. On the 1st of February, 1912, Landry was brought before a stipendiary magistrate in Arichat on a warrant charging him with forgery. The charge was investigated and he was committed for trial in the Supreme Court of the county of Richmond. The Court met on the 4th of June and I have here the indictment presented by the Grand Jury.

In the Supreme Court—Crown Side.

1. The jurors of our Lord the King present that Andrew Landry at Arichat in the county of Richmond on the fifth day of April in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten unlawfully and knowingly did make a false document to wit; a promissory note in the words and figures following:

$50.00 Due April 8th, 1911.

Arichat, C. B., April 5th, 1910.

One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Andrew Landry,

Fifty ....Dollars,

at the Royal Bank of Canada, Arichat, value received.

his

Witness J. V. Shaw, Paul x LeBlanc,

mark.

No..... endorsed Andrew Landry.

Knowing the same to be false, with the intention that it should be used and acted on as genuine to the prejudice of one Paul LeBlanc, contrary to the form of statute in such case made and provided.

2. And the jurors of our Lord the King further present that Andrew Landry at Arichat in the county of Richmond on the fifth day of April in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten, unlawfully and knowingly did make a false document to wit: a promissory note in the words and figures following:

$50.00 Due April 8th, 1911.

Arichat, C. B., April 5th, 1910.

One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Andrew Landry,

Fifty ....Dollars,

at the Royal Bank of Canada, Arichat, value received.

his

Paul x LeBlanc,

mark.

No..... endorsed Andrew Landry.

Knowing the same to be false, with intent that one Paul Leblanc should be induced by the belief that said false document was genuine, to pay the said Andrew Landry the sum of fifty dollars, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided:

3. And the jurors of our Lord the King present that Andrew Landry at Poulamond in the county of Richmond, on the thirteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten, well knowing a certain document to wit: a promissory note in the words and figures following:

$50.00 Due April 8th, 1911.

Arichat, C. B., April 5th, 1910.

One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Andrew Landry,

Fifty ....Dollars,

at the Royal Bank of Canada, Arichat, value received.

his

Witness J. V. Shaw, Paul x Leblanc,

mark

Endorsed: Andrew Landry,

to be forged, did utter the said forged document as if it were genuine, contrary to the form of the statutes in such case made and provided.

4. And the jurors of our Lord the King present that Andrew Landry at Poulamond in the county of Richmond, on the thirteenth day of December in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten, well knowing a certain document to wit; a promissory note in the words and figures following:

$50.00 Due April 8th, 1911.

Arichat, C. B., April 5th, 1910.

One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Andrew Landry,

Fifty ....Dollars,

at the Royal Bank of Canada, Arichat, value received.

his

Witness J. V. Shaw, Paul x LeBlanc,

mark

No..... endorsed Andrew Landry.

to be forged, did use the said forged document as if it were genuine, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

5. And the jurors of our Lord the King further present that said Andrew Landry at Poulamond, in the county of Richmond on the thirteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten, well knowing a certain document to wit; a promissory note, in the words and figures following:

$50.00 Due April 8th, 1911.

Arichat, C. B., April 5th, 1910.

One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Andrew Landry,

Fifty ....Dollars,

at the Royal Bank of Canada, Arichat, value received.

his

Witness J. V. Shaw, Paul x LeBlanc,

mark

No..... endorsed Andrew Landry.

to be forged, did deal with the said forged document as if it were genuine, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided.

6. And the jurors of our Lord the King further present that the said Andrew Landry at Poulamond, in the county of Richmond, on the thirteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten, well knowing a certain document to wit; a promissory note, in the words and figures following:

$50.00 Due April 8th, 1911.

Arichat, C. B., April 5th, 1910.

One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Andrew Landry, the sum of

Fifty ....Dollars,

at the Royal Bank of Canada, Arichat, value received.

his

Witness J. V. Shaw, Paul x LeBlanc,

mark

No..... endorsed Andrew Landry.

to be forged, did cause one Paul LeBlanc to act upon the said false document as if it were genuine, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided.

(Signed) Daniel A. Cameron,

Prosecuting Officer,

County of Richmond.

That indictment was tried in the Supreme Court before Mr. Justice Graham after a true bill had been returned by the grand jury, and at the conclusion of the trial Andrew Landry was convicted of the offence, and I have here the record of the conviction:

In the Supreme Court.
Arichat, 5th June, 1912.

The King vs. Andrew Landry.

On indictment for forgery and uttering the sentence of the court is that you be imprisoned in the county jail in Arichat for the term of one year.

(Sgd.) D. H. CAMPBELL,
Acting Clerk of the Crown.

So that Andrew Landry was convicted and sentenced by Mr. Justice Graham to serve a term of 12 months in the county jail at Arichat for the said offence. On the 11th day of June, 1912, six days later, the superintendent of lights for the province of Nova Scotia addressed the following letter to Capt. Frederick Poirier:

Marine and Fisheries Department.
Office of Superintendent of Lighthouses,
Agency at Halifax, N.S., June 11, 1912.

Mr. Frederick Poirier,
Descouse, Richmond Co., N.S.

Sir,—It has been decided to appoint Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, to maintain the buoys which you have a contract for, and which terminates on the 15th inst., you will therefore be good enough to transfer the service to Captain Landry, giving him all the spare buoys that are now in your charge. You are supposed to have all the buoys in good order before transferring them to him.

I am, Sir,
Yours sincerely,
P. C. JOHNSON,
Superintendent of Lights.

On the 14th day of June, Capt. Frederick Poirier, replying to this letter of the superintendent of lights, stated that he had received Mr. Johnson's letter, but that it was impossible for him to carry out his instructions to deliver the buoys to Captain Andrew Landry, inasmuch as Landry was at the time serving a sentence for forgery in the county jail at Arichat. Now, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the right hon. the leader of the Government were in possession of all the facts. What did they do? Was Captain Andrew Landry allowed to serve out his sentence which the judge had imposed upon him? You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that on the 23rd day of December, Captain Landry was appointed wharfinger by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The intimation which Captain Frederick Poirier sent to the superintendent of lights, who no doubt forwarded it to Ottawa, was the first intimation to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that Captain Andrew Landry was in durance vile, and serving a sentence for forgery in the county jail of Arichat. He was not permitted to remain there very long, however, because it would appear that my hon. and compassionate friend the Minister of Justice was appealed to. A few days afterwards, on the 3rd day of August, the doors of the jail at Arichat opened as if by magic; we had a jail delivery such as had never been known in the county of Richmond, and Andrew Landry, convicted of forgery, and having served only two months out of the twelve months, walked out of jail a free man. Landry had no intention of giving up any of his emoluments as a public official on account of his conviction and sentence, because on the 6th day of August, a few days after he had been discharged from jail, he addressed the following letter to Captain Frederick Poirier:

Descouse, Aug. 6, 1912.

Captain Frederick Poirier,
To Dominion Government Wharf, Descouse, Dr.

To wharfage on buoys and moorings, for winter seasons 1909 and 1910 and 1911 and 1912, at $10 per season, $30.
E. & O. E.

Immediate settlement is requested by order of department.

(Sgd.) ANDREW LANDRY,
Govt. Wharfinger.

If paid at once I will settle for $10, otherwise I am instructed to press the claim for $30.

(Sgd.) ANDREW LANDRY.
Govt. Wharfinger.

This was three days after he got out of jail. It was the only office he held at that time because the letter addressed by the Rev. Wilfrid Boucher to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries prevented him at the last moment from committing the additional error of appointing Landry fishery officer, and thus as Mr. Gillies says: 'placing the distribution of bounties in proper hands.' He had been appointed buoy contractor while he was in jail, but his inability to take charge of the buoys and moorings on account of his incarceration at that time, compelled the minister to appoint a substitute in the person of another man in the vicinity. But there is one job to which he did hold on throughout all the stress and difficulty of his rather embarassing circumstances, and that was the office of wharfinger. That was a perquisite that Landry was determined not to relinquish, and in order that he might discharge his duties as wharfinger, this Government was compassionate enough to open the doors of the jail, and to release him from the conviction and sentence which had been imposed by Judge Graham, after he had served only two months of the twelve. There are other interesting documents with respect to this matter that I am extremely anxious should be brought before the House. I am anxious to know under what circumstances, and on what plea Captain Andrew Landry was released from jail. Captain Landry, as I am informed, is a man enjoying the best of health. He has been a sea-faring man for many years, he is a man who is never known to be laid up on account of illness and the fact that the moment he was released from jail he proceeded to his regular avocation goes to show that the plea of illness could not have been urged as a reason for his discharge. Since that time Captain Landry has acted in the discharge of his duty as a citizen in the village of Descouse and in the discharge of all the other duties which the Government have entrusted to him. He is still the wharfinger, in so far as I know that appointment has not been cancelled because it appears to be a matter of anxiety on the part, if not of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, certainly on that of Joseph A. Gillies, and other leading Conservatives in the county of Richmond, that Captain Landry shall still have the distinction of being a public officer in that county.

Mr. BLAIN: What salary does he get?

Mr. KYTE: If he knocks down all their accounts the way he tried to knock down that account it would not be very much. He is paid by commission.

Mr. BLAIN: Has the hon. gentleman before him anything to show the amount that this gentleman received during the preceding year, whether by salary or dues?

Mr. KYTE: Wharfingers in Nova Scotia are paid by commission. I have not been fortunate enough to get any other accounts collected by Captain Landry, but if he is prepared to knock down all the Government accounts to the same extent that he has knocked down this one, his commission will be very much smaller. These are the facts as I have detailed them from the public documents, in the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the records of the Supreme Court in Richmond county. It is not a source of pleasure or delight on my part to bring forward the shortcomings of any citizen in my county thus publicly before the high court of Parliament, but as representatives of the people we all have duties to discharge. In any case where miscarriages of justice are perpetrated by any department of the Government it is the duty of the representatives who sit in this House to bring them to the attention of Parliament.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Speaker, in so far as my department is concerned, there would not seem to be any reason for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) moving for these papers on this occasion, as the papers were all laid before the House at the last session of Parliament.

Mr. KYTE: The documents relating to Captain Landry's appointment as buoy contractor are not before Parliament.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman could have seen these papers at a moment's notice by coming over to my department if he had desired to do so. It is evident that the hon. gentleman is more desirous of making a speech for the purpose of calling in question the action of Mr. Gillies, who has been his opponent in Richmond in several elections, than of obtaining information in connection with this matter. As far as the department over which I preside is concerned, any papers there are will be brought down willingly and placed at the disposal of the hon. gentleman, and I presume that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) will be pleased to bring down any papers in his department also. As far as the action of the Minister of Justice is concerned, I may say to my hon. friend that I have heard to-day for the first time that Captain Landry had been actually sent to jail and that the sentence had been remitted by the Department of Justice. I never knew of the matter before. As far as the record of the Department of Marine and Fisheries with regard to this matter is concerned, the facts are that, a vacancy had occurred. The complaint of my hon. friend to-day is not that that vacancy had not properly taken place, he has not found any fault with the dismissal of Poirier and he has not said that Poirier was not an active partisan of the Liberal party. That vacancy having taken place, Mr. Gillies who was the member who had previously represented Richmond in the House of Commons and who had been a candidate on several occasions, made a recommendation to fill the vacancy. It is customary with all governments in filling vacancies in a constituency to take the recommendation of the member of the House of Commons representing that constituency who happens to be in political sympathy with the Government of the day, or to take the recommendation, in most cases, of the gentleman who has been the unsuccessful candidate in support of the Government of the day. Mr. Gillies made his recommendation in favour of Captain Landry as a suitable official. I have no doubt whatever, knowing Mr. Gillies as I do, that when he made that recommendation he believed Captain Landry to be a suitable man, worthy to fill that position, but, before the matter was considered by the department or myself, a letter was received from a clergyman, the parish priest, referred to by my hon. friend from Richmond. Having received that communication from the parish priest, I felt it would not be proper, until this charge against Landry was disposed of that Landry should be appointed to the important position of fishery officer in that county. As a result Landry was not appointed, he has never been appointed to the position and he is not holding the position now. Now, most of these positions as wharfingers are, as a rule, small and very unimportant positions. In most cases the remuneration is extremely small. The system that prevails is that the wharfinger is allowed a commission on the collections which he makes of, in some cases 25 per cent and, in some cases, 50 per cent. If I had known that the hon. gentleman was going to bring this matter up in the way he has done this afternoon, I would have had all the facts here. I do not know what the amount of the collections is on the wharf to which my hon. friend refers, but I know many cases where wharfingers, who are paid a commission of 25 per cent or more, get a very few dollars a year for their services, and that in some cases the commission will yield but $10 a year, running up possibly to $100. If the commission was 25 per cent the probabilities are that the amount the wharfinger would receive would be very small indeed. I do not want the House to understand me as arguing that a man who is unfit for the position should be appointed for that reason, but the position being a small one, when the recommendation was made, it may not have been scrutinized with the care that the appointment to a higher or more responsible position would be, and it never occurred to any official of the department, and my attention was never drawn to the fact, or it never occurred to me, that the man who was recommended for the position of wharfinger was the same man who had been recommended for the position of fishery officer against whom the parish priest there had made statements in the letter which he addressed to me. That is the way in which this man was recommended for the position of wharfinger and also to take charge of the buoy service. I do not think that at the present moment he has any other position and, in so far as the Department of Marine and Fisheries is concerned, had it for one minute occurred to any official in the department, or had my attention been drawn to the fact that this man, recommended for the position of wharfinger, was the same man whom we had refused to appoint to the position of fishery overseer, he certainly would never have been appointed.

I think my hon. friend has perhaps served the purpose for which he brought the matter before the House, that is, the opportunity of making an attack on the gentleman who was his opponent in the county of Richmond at the last election, and, having accomplished that purpose, I presume that my hon. friend will be satisfied. I may say to my hon. friend that it is not the desire or intention of my department, if we are aware of the fact, to appoint to a position of responsibility any man who is not fit for the position for which he is recommended. We accepted Mr. Gillies recommendation, believing, as I still believe, it was made in good faith, and believing, as I still believe, that Mr. Gillies firmly believed that Mr. Landry was a fit and proper person for the position and that he was the victim of some conspiracy that may have been formed against him. But, having received the communication from the priest referred to by my hon. friend, we declined to make the appointment of this man as fishery officer which is a responsible position. With regard to the other position referred to, as I have already stated, it never occurred to any one in my department that he was the same person whom we had refused to appoint and who had been previously recommended by Mr. Gillies. Any further papers, whether in connection with this matter or in connection with any other matter that my hon. friend wants to see, will certainly be laid on the Table of the House. I can say nothing about the circumstances regarding the discharge of this man from prison after serving two months, but I have no doubt that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will be able to give the hon. member for Richmond all the information he has in his possession.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of entering into any discussion as to the appointment of this man Landry to a position in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries states that he did not know anything about it, and, of course we take his word. It does seem rather singular that none of the officials in his department knew anything about this man. If my hon. friend is in a position to state that neither he nor any member of his department knew anything about this, we must take his word for it.

Mr. HAZEN: I can only speak for those higher officials with whom I come in contact practically every day.

Mr. CARVELL: It is not that branch of the case I wish to emphasise; it is the other branch of the case which has reference to the liberation from prison of a man after serving two months of a sentence of a year. It seems to me that this is something which is worthy to be considered by every member of this House and by every member of the community. I am in favour of the ticket of leave system. I believe that every lawyer in this House knows that there are many instances where the ends of justice are just as well served by keeping a man in jail during a part of his sentence as by keeping him there during the whole of it. But, if, for political reasons, the Minister of Justice, or the Department of Justice, is to liberate men from jail we have a different state of affairs entirely.

Mr. HAZEN: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has never heard of that taking place under the other Government.

Mr. CARVELL: I certainly never have.

Mr. HAZEN: Has the hon. gentleman never heard of the case of Bruce McDougall who was sentenced to jail by Mr. Justice White for defamatory libel and who was released by the then Minister of Justice before the sentence had been completed?

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is trying to draw something across the track which does not do him credit. He knows that Bruce McDougall was in a dying condition when he was released and that he was not released for political reasons. As a matter of fact, Bruce McDougall lived only a few weeks after his release from prison.

Mr. HAZEN: May I correct the hon. member? Bruce McDougall was no sooner released from jail than he at once started publishing another paper and he met his death in consequence of an accident in Truro, and his death had nothing at all to do with the general condition of his health at the time.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. minister is pursuing exactly the same course which he and his leader have been pursuing from the beginning, and that is, when we draw attention to any wrong, they try to justify it by saying we did the same thing. Is it going to be the settled policy of this Government that every time a political friend finds himself incarcerated he is going to be released, after serving one-fifth or one-sixth of his sentence, for political purposes? That is the question I want to emphasize; that is the only object I have in discussing this matter this afternoon. There may be good reasons for it, but it seems to me the reasons are not patent at the present time which will justify a man in the best of health, a man who is able to carry on the ordinary avocations of life, being released from jail after serving two months out of a sentence of one year.

Mr. BORDEN: I was not aware, until the discussion this afternoon, of the appointment of Mr. Landry; but, as the latter part of the motion refers to the action of the Department of Justice in respect to a certain matter, and as the Minister of Justice is unfortunately not here to-day, I would move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY — BRANCH LINES.

Mr. EMMERSON moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable in furtherance of the transportation interests of this Dominion, that the sphere of influence of the Intercolonial railway as a Government operated railway shall be widened and extended by securing by lease or otherwise such of the branch lines of railways now connected with the Intercolonial, as will serve as direct and profitable feeders to the traffic of said railway; and further by securing as aforesaid such of said branch lines as may be considered to be in the general interest of the Dominion of Canada and of its people, with relation to its transportation problems and interests, without especial consideration to the immediate direct financial results.

He said: In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I think it would be inconvenient to have this matter discussed, and I do not object to allowing it to stand, for that reason. I want, however, to call the attention of the Prime Minister and the ministers of the Government to the desirability of having the question of branch lines determined one way or the other before any action is taken by the Government with regard to the granting of running rights to the Canadian Pacific railway over the Intercolonial railway. In that event, the branch lines would then be taken up by any railway company having running rights, to the detriment, in my judgment, of the Intercolonial railway itself. I am anxious, therefore, to have the matter discussed, and if possible determined before any such action is taken.

Mr. BORDEN: I will direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson). I presume the consideration he urges would depend a great deal upon the nature of the agreement.

Motion stands.

LAUCHLIN McNEIL DISMISSAL.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and reports relating to the dismissal of Lauchlin McNeil, postmaster at New France, county of Antigonish, and the appointment of his successor.

He said: I desire to call attention to the facts in relation to the dismissal of Lauchlin McNeil. There have been a great many dismissals of postmasters in the county of Antigonish, about a dozen small country postmasters have been dismissed, and if there had been more Liberal postmasters there would probably have been more dismissals. During the 15 years the Liberal party were in power, there were no dismissals so far as I can ascertain in the county of Antigonish on account of alleged partisanship. In fact, over one-half of the postmasters in that county are Conservatives and nobody has ever sought to remove them or interfere with their positions. They have given satisfaction and performed their duties. As a rule these offices are taken in the country districts for the convenience of the people and the first thing sought is the most convenient location. Under the late Government one class of people were always sacred, the postmasters.

I want to get at the principle applied by the Postmaster General in regard to the dismissal of postmasters. There must have been about a dozen complaints against postmasters, because nearly a dozen of them were dismissed, but there was only one investigation. That man was investigated by Commissioner Duchemin. When he held his court no witnesses appeared against the postmaster although it is alleged that several were subpoenaed. And, of course, the commissioner could not make a report against that man because there was no evidence of any kind. I do not think, however, that the failure to dismiss the man who was investigated was due to any kindness or consideration on the part of the patronage committee but to the fact that the Conservatives in that district arose in arms and said no, you must not remove that man, he has been a competent official who has never interfered in any way; true he is a Grit like his father but he is an honest, conscientious man and you must not interfere with him. That is the only case I know of where there was an investigation. The Postmaster General, finding, I suppose, that this man against whom a charge was alleged could not be removed, or perhaps I should say that the men in charge of the patronage finding themselves baulked in getting rid of him, found another scheme to remove the unfortunate postmaster. The Postmaster General sent out a letter to the various postmasters accompanied by a declaration. It is a most unique document, and reads as follows:

Solemn Declaration made by virtue of the Act respecting Extra-Judicial Oaths.

I, the undersigned postmaster of.....do solemnly declare:

1. That I was appointed postmaster in the year.....

2. That since my appointment as postmaster, I have taken no active part in federal or provincial elections. I have not canvassed or taken any voter to the polls, nor have I offered or given money or liquor or represented any candidate at any polling division. I have not checked or verified any list of voters outside any polling station, neither did I take part in any committee of organization or address a meeting in favour of any candidate and I did not interrupt any public speaker during the course of any meeting.

3. All I did was to quietly cast my vote.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

And I have signed.

Declared before me at.....this ....day of.....1912.

It does not say how far back this extends, it may be 10, 20 or 25 years, and during all that time it was an offense if at any time a postmaster carried a voter to the poll or treated a friend of his. It does not say that he has not given or offered liquor for the purpose of influencing a vote or debauching anyone. I ask how any conscientious man or how the average, conscientious postmaster could subscribe an affidavit of that kind. Lauchlin McNeil, when he received this declaration and was asked to sign it, naturally felt insulted. He was disposed to return the affidavit in the form in which it was sent, according to the information I have received, but it appears that on second thought he wrote to the Postmaster General and enclosed such an affidavit as he could conscientiously subscribe, an affidavit which removed every charge or suspicion of partisanship. The affidavit which he sent to the Postmaster General with a letter of explanation is as follows:

Solemn Declaration made by virtue of the Act respecting Extra-Judicial Oats.

I, the undersigned.....postmaster of.....do solemnly declare:

1. That I was apointed postmaster in the year.....

2. That since my appointment as postmaster, I have taken no part in federal or provincial eleections. I have not canvassed or taken any voter to the polls except that I took my brother or a neighbour who had no team of his own, nor have I offered or given money or liquor to any voter to influence his vote, nor have I represented any candidate at any polling division. I have not checked or verified any list of voters outside any polling station, neither did I take part in any committee of organization or address a meeting in favour of any candidate and I did not interrupt any public speaker during the course of any public meeting.

3. All I did, so far as taking part in elections go, was to cast my vote, making no unusual noise when doing so.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. PELLETIER: I did not quite understand the words 'he quietly cast his vote.'

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): The paragraph in the declaration proposed by the Postmaster General, paragraph 3, was as follows: 'All I did was to quietly cast my vote.' He modified that and put in 'all I did, so far as taking part in the elections go, was to cast my vote, making no unusual noise when doing so.' I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if he could have subscribed to any other oath than that. Lachlan McNeil lives 6 or 7 miles from the polling booth, and his brother did not have a team of his own; so on election days, whether municipal or local elections, he took that man to the poll just as he would have taken him to church on Sunday, or to funerals, or to the village store, or to any other place. He could not, therefore, make an affidavit that he did not take any voter to the poll. He did not take any voter for the purpose of getting his vote, and he made an affidavit accordingly.

I have been put in possession of a letter, not by the postmaster, which was sent to the Postmaster General, explaining why he could not subscribe to the declaration in the form originally presented, and why he modified the declaration, and setting forth that he was prepared to meet any accusation that his traducers could make against him:

New France, Antigonish Co., N. S.
April 30, 1912.

Dear Sir,—When I accepted the office of postmaster at New France, I did so at the solicitation of the people of the district and for their accommodation. In doing so, however, it was not stipulated that I should barter away my freedom or be restricted in my rights or liberties as a citizen. Were such a condition proposed I would not have accepted the office.

I have always tried to do my duty as postmaster and I think I am safe in saying I gave satisfaction. No reflection has ever been cast upon me as an official. It is no wonder therefore, that I was tempted to return the declaration as it was received, and to treat the insult involved in being asked to make such a declaration with silent contempt, even if it cost the loss of my little office. I do not wish, however, to be discourteous and as representations (misrepresentations I call them) have been made to the department as alleged, I make the declaration (with proper modifications) as required. I cannot swear I have never taken any voter to the polls. I did, and I would not refuse any of my neighbours whether Tory or Grit, the accommodation of taking him in my carriage either to the polls or to church or the village store or anywhere else that we both happened to be going to on common business, and I have not a neighbour who would not treat me in the same way. The member of the county is a nephew by marriage of mine and a very intimate friend and I share his political views. None of these circumstances I hope render me unfit to receive mail matter from or distribute it among the people served by this office. I do not know what is meant by the 3rd paragraph in the original declaration. I may add however that I never influenced or attempted to influence any voter in the exercise of his rights as a citizen, and I always find I have enough to do to mind my own business without interfering in the way stated in the declaration.

I deny all charges of active or offensive political partisanship and challenge the fullest inquiry into my conduct as postmaster.

Now, when the Postmaster General received the declaration containing as full and unequivocal a denial of the charges of partisanship as could be made by any conscientious man, accompanied by that letter of explanation, I think he owed it to himself and to his department to at least grant an investigation, and I want to know why an investigation was not granted in this case. Commissioner Duchemin was always available in Antigonish. He spent the greater part of last summer there; I am told they are seriously considering the propriety of putting his name on the voters' list, because he has been in Antigonish for so long. I am quite sure that with the remuneration which he receives he would have been glad to conduct any investigation of a case of partisanship, and if the patronage committee had any evidence to submit I have no doubt that Mr. Duchemin would have been equal to the occasion, and would have discharged his duty to the fullest satisfaction of that committee.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to a case that I know of, in which a similar declaration was sent to a postmaster. When he read it and found that he was asked to state that since his appointment he had taken no part in elections, he was naturally astounded, for he happened to have been a very strong Conservative worker in the old days. He had been one of the most active Conservaties in his district, but at the last election, like many more loyal Conservatives in the county of Antigonish he had his own views on the question of reciprocity, and he thought that the reciprocity proposed by the late Government was the same measure for which Sir John Thompson had fought in his last election, and for which the great Conservative leaders in past days stood. But because forsooth he voted Liberal at the last election they went after his scalp. However, they over-reached themselves when they put such a declaration as the one I have referred to before him. He wrote to the Postmaster General explaining his position that he had always been a good fighting conscientious Conservative in the days of Sir John Thompson and of other Conservative candidates in Antigonish, and that he had been an active partisan in those days. Well, he heard no more about it, and he was not dismissed. Perhaps it was due to the fact that they could not get anyone to take the job. I know there are lots of postmasters who are suspected of being Grits and who are marked for slaughter but the Postmaster General cannot get men to take their jobs, and the result is that they have been allowed to continue in their positions. In the case of Lauchlin McNeil I direct the Postmaster General's attention to the fact that he caused a great deal of inconvenience to the vast majority of the people in that district by the change which he made. The post office was moved to one end of the section, leaving the south-eastern end of it practically without any mail facilities whatever, and the people in that section have to go four miles now for their mail on account of the change. I know of many other cases of a similar kind, but I am not complaining so much of that. What I desire to know is why the Postmaster General did not have some consideration for Mr. Duchemin when he established the precedent that there should be investigations into the cases of postmasters. Why did he not order an investigation into the cases of Lauchlin McNeil and others, who were dismissed without any inquiry, notwithstanding the fact that they courted the fullest investigation? I do not know that I should discuss the matter further until the papers are brought down. When that is done perhaps we shall see why it was that Lauchlin McNeil was dismissed.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is no objection whatever to the motion made by my hon. friend from Antigonish. The papers will be brought down. The declaration which my hon. friend has read, which was so severely criticised by the postmaster of New France, and which he thought fit to correct and to send to the Postmaster General, to teach him how it should be drafted, is not after all such a bad document. I find with a great deal of regret, and I must apologize to this postmaster, that I forgot to put in the last sentence that he made no noise. I really forgot to put that in. I admit that this correction is a most important and vital one under the circumstances, and I must thank him for having called my attention to this very great sin of omission on my part. However, when the papers are brought down, they may show more than my hon. friend has said. But I think we have had enough in the letter which my hon. friend has read to show that this postmaster that 'the Postmaster General may do what that 'the Postmaster General may do what he likes, and I don't care what happens.'

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I suppose he knew that would happen any way.

Mr. PELLETIER: That may be, but that is the way it struck me when the letter came.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): That is very mild.

Mr. PELLETIER: This declaration, bad as it is, and, omitting the knowledge that it does, has been availed of in my department to avoid expense. A great many investigations have been dispensed with because, when these documents were received, a certain number of postmasters were honest enough to say that they could not sign the declaration because they had taken an active part in the election. If the postmaster signs that declaration, well and good; we have an investigation. If he does not sign it, and says, 'I have taken a part in politics,' we save $50 or $60, in some cases $75, which we would otherwise spend for an investigation.

Mr. CARVELL: But the man has to go just the same.

Mr. PELLETIER: Well, as he has made his bed he must lie upon it.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): If the declaration is made, is that to be accepted as proof that the representations that were made to the department were not well founded? Would you accept the declaration of the postmaster rather than the vague statement of some committeeman in charge of the patronage?

Mr. PELLETIER: When we receive a declaration duly signed, we inform the persons who made the charge that the postmaster has denied the accusation. In some cases we have been told to stop there. Evidently, they were content to take the declaration as good and not go any farther. In other cases we receive letters saying that they are astounded that the man should have signed that under the circumstances, and then the matter is investigated. My hon. friend said that in many cases we had had a good deal of difficulty to find persons to take the places of dismissed postmasters. I can tell him that that has not been my experience.

Mr. ROSS: What would happen in the case of a Conservative postmaster who was a violent partisan?

Mr. PELLETIER: We would dismiss him just the same.

Mr. ROSS: Was he dismissed?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know. My. hon. friend from Antigonish has not stated the name nor the place where this happened. He spoke of the case of a postmaster who had been a Conservative all his life, but who had voted for reciprocity. If my hon. friend stated the name of the person, I did not catch it.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I am afraid that I might do him an injustice, so I shall not name him at the. present time. I fear the Greeks bringing gifts.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is somewhat difficult for me to answer a charge with regard to a postmaster in the large county of Antigonish, not having the name of the place or of the postmaster. However, there is no charge when the name of the postmaster and the name of the post office is not given; therefore, I assume, I am absolved from the necessity of going into the facts of such a case. I was going on to say that we always find somebody to replace postmasters who are dismissed, and, except in one or two cases in the west where the population is very limited in number, we have always had, not only one, but two or three and sometimes more applications for the job. That is not a difficulty which I have to meet. The papers will be brought down and I think my hon. friend will find in them some corroboration of the strong facts against his friend which he has put before the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that, if a postmaster who has been appointed by him should take an active part in politics on the Conservative side he will be dismissed?

Mr. PELLETIER: The rule applies to all. A case such as that to which the hon. gentleman refers has not come under my observation since I have been in the department. This is the first case to which my attention has been called. I have been told that I have kept this man because he has been a Conservative. If he had been a Conservative all his life and, in the last election had voted for reciprocity, that was his business; but if he interfered as an active partisan, the rule would certainly apply to him. If my hon. friend finds fault with me because I have not dismissed him, we might look into the case and see what can be done about it.

Mr. TURRIFF: Where a postmaster is conscientiously able to fill out the very extreme form of affidavit sent, such as has been read here to-night, where he is able to answer satisfactorily that he has not transgressed in any one of these cases that have been referred to, even to the extent of voting quietly, and where that is not taken as satisfactory, and he is not confirmed in his position, where an investigation is held and nobody appears to give evidence against him, what would be the policy of my hon. friend?

Mr. PELLETIER: If a charge is made against a postmaster, that he was an active partisan, that is prima facie evidence on the one side, and the accused postmaster is asked for a solemn declaration. If he denies the charge, an investigation takes place in the regular course. If no witnesses come forward then the postmaster is not dismissed, and I have in my department sixty or seventy cases of that kind.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is exactly what took place at Alameda. The postmaster at Alameda was able to make an affidavit that he was absolutely not guilty of partisanship and the Postmaster-General ordered an investigation. The investigator waited, and nobody came forward to give evidence against the postmaster and then he told the postmaster to go out and hunt up someone to say something in his favour. The postmaster did so, and the investigator absolutely refused to take down anything which the postmaster himself had said, or that any of the men who spoke in his favour had said. No witnesses appeared against the postmaster of Alameda, but yet he was dismissed. So far as I can judge, the Post Office Department has been swinging the axe in my part of the country with greater vigour during the last few months than ever previously. Of course, there will have to be a stop to it pretty soon, because there will be nothing more to do, and then perhaps the Postmaster General will weep because he has no other worlds to conquer. What is the policy of the department in this matter ?

Mr. PELLETIER: The policy of the Post Office Department is as I have stated that if a charge is made, a blank form is sent to the postmaster to sign. If there is a charge and a denial, an investigation takes place.

Mr. CARVELL: If no evidence is given, what then?

Mr. PELLETIER: I would expect the investigator to report that no evidence was put in.

Mr. CARVELL: What will the department do then?

Mr. PELLETIER: I could not dismiss the postmaster unless the investigator reported against him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This man was dismissed.

Mr. PELLETIER My hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) made out what I thought was a strong case the other day in favour of the postmaster of Alameda, and I immediately wired the inspector to stop the transfer of that office because the statement made by my hon. friend appealed to me. I showed the answer which I got from the post office inspector to my hon. friend. There is on file in the department a report from the investigator, Mr. Dorsett, who states that he investigated the charge and has found the postmaster guilty. I told my hon. friend privately, what I now tell him across the floor, that I sent the 'Hansard' report of his speech to Mr. Dorsett and asked him to answer that. What more could I do? It seems to me I have acted fairly.

Mr. TURRIFF: May I ask——

Mr. SPEAKER: This debate is irregular; the hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. TURRIFF: I wish only to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member asks a question, he usually drifts into a debate.

Mr. TURRIFF: Did Mr. Dorsett enclose with his report any evidence taken by him?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is just what I have maintained all along.

Mr. PELLETIER: I know most of the investigators in Quebec, and I know some of them in Ontario; but I could not possibly know them in the western provinces. and the maritime provinces, and in these cases I have taken as much care as I possibly could to name as investigators respectable men, whom I could trust. I have told them in my instructions that they must not employ shorthand writers because of the heavy expense. In some cases they have sent in evidence taken in long hand; in others, they report the general nature of the evidence, as in Mr. Dorsett's case, they have sent no return of evidence at all, but simply their report that the man is guilty or not guilty, as the case may be. The case of the Alameda postmaster being exceptional, I have sent the remarks of my hon. friend to Mr. Dorsett, and asked him for a report.

Mr. TURRIFF: He absolutely refused to take any evidence.

Mr. OLIVER: A reading of this affidavit which a postmaster is required to take under certain circumstances, leads me to the conclusion that the Government through the Postmaster General, have undertaken to place a considerable portion of the citizens of Canada under conditions that I think are intolerable in a free country. I do not know whether other members of this House look upon this matter as I do, but I take the liberty of placing before the House my views in regard to it. First of all, is the fact that a man draws a salary of $25 or $35 a year from this Government, to be the purchase price of his soul and body as well as of his services in licking postage stamps? I think there should be some right or liberty on the part of the citizens of this country, even if they should draw a salary of $35 a year from the treasury. I quite appreciate the position generally taken, that if a man is dependent upon his services to the country for his livelihood, he must serve his country and not his party, but I submit that because a man is drawing a very small amount from the treasury, for services rendered, which bears no reasonable proportion to a salary large enough for him to live upon, in such a case, the country that exercises such a tyrannical control over him as to require him to sign an affidavit of this description, as a condition of his holding that paltry office, is not a free country, and such a government is a government of tyranny. It is degrading to Canada that men who are discharging a public service in the interest of their fellow citizens for a very trifling consideration, and in many cases at a loss rather than at a gain to themselves, should be required to place themselves in the position they are required to do on this form of affidavit sent to them by the Postmaster General.

In regard to this affidavit, and in regard to the procedure that has been sketched to the House by the Postmaster General: I am not of a legal profession; but I will risk suggesting that when an accusation against any postmaster is presented to the Postmaster General it would be only right and fair that the Postmaster General should inform the postmaster of the accusation made against him, that is, if any proceedings were or are to be taken in regard to those accusations. The Postmaster General, however, does not do so.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do.

Mr. OLIVER: Here are the forms of affidavit that my hon. friend the Postmaster General sends out to men who are accused of partisanship, or whom he or his friends desire to displace for their own partisans. The letter that accompanies these affidavits has, I have no doubt, been read to the House.

Mr. PELLETIER: The affidavit has been read, but not the letter.

Mr. OLIVER: This is the letter:

Sir,—It is represented to this department that since your appointment as postmaster at New Frances, N.S., you have taken an active part in federal and provincial elections.

I am therefore, directed to request that you will be good enough to say whether this is true.

If the accusation is not well founded, I presume you will have no objection to sign the solemn declaration herewith enclosed, which would be attested before a justice of the peace.

An early reply is requested.

I am sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) HECTOR B. VERRET,
Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

A general accusation is made in the letter to which the accused postmaster is required to make certain specific replies by affidavit, which specific replies may or may not cover the accusation that has been made against him. It is an elementary principle of justice, and, I believe, also of law, that where a man is subject to punishment by reason of any act of his, he has the right to know specifically what he is charged with, and to have an opportunity of disproving that charge specifically; and he is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. But my hon. friend the Postmaster General does not act on that principle at all. He informs the man that there is a general accusation against him; he requires him to make an affidavit as to certain specific facts; and, having received the man's affidavit, he does not accept it as evidence. He puts the man in the position of having to swear that he is not guilty of something which he has not been specifically charged with, and, after swearing to that, he becomes subject to such trial and such conviction as the Postmaster General sees fit to hand out to him. Such a procedure is absolutely discreditable to this country, and cannot be justified under any rule of law or any theory of justice or fair play. Further, by what authority does this Government presume to restrict the activity of a $35 a year postmaster in regard to provincial politics? A few moments ago, I said that a salary of $35 a year is not an adequate price for the soul as well as the body of a self-respecting Canadian citizen, besides paying for his services in licking stamps for a whole year. I believe that the country postmaster has some rights. He renders his country some service, and the mere fact that in many cases he is a comparatively unimportant citizen is no reason why the Postmaster General, as a member of this Government, should put upon him such an insult as is contained in this affidavit, should treat him so unfairly, or should exercise such acts of tyranny against him.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): I would like to say a very few words in connection with these declarations that are being sent out by the Postmaster General to the postmasters of this country. I do not object to persons being dismissed from office because they have taken a strong part in elections—because, in other words, they are branded as partisans. A man who is a partisan, and who shows that partisanship to the extent of going around and canvassing against any political candidates, be he Grit, Tory or Socialist, stands amenable to the Government of this country, and they have an absolute, perfect and justifiable reason for dismissing him from office, be his office worth $10 a year or $10,000.

I have never raised my voice in this House, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PELLETIER: Does the hon. member for Edmonton follow that?

Mr. CARROLL: I have never raised my voice in this House to object to the dismissal in my constituency of any persons who have been partisans. But I consider the reason given here to-night by the hon. Postmaster General for sending these declarations to the postmasters of the country rather a lame one. He tells us that these declarations are sent out in order to save expense. In my opinion, the declarations sent into the riding of South Cape Breton were not sent for the purpose of economy, but because the postmasters lived in remote places which could not be reached by Mr. Duchemin in a parlour car. My first lieutenant in the fight in my constituency—Mr. Wallace Richardson, one time mayor of the city of Sydney—spoke with me on almost every platform in the riding. He did not mind losing his position, that of secretary of the Board of Pilot Commissioners for the port of Sydney. Why did not my hon. friend dismiss a man like that without an investigation? Every man in South Cape Breton knew he was a partisan, but Mr. Duchemin holds an investigation and brings in evidence, while if he had written to Mr. Wallace Richardson himself he would have told him at once that he was a partisan.

Mr. BARNARD: Was the Secretary of the Pilotage Commission dismissed by that body, or by the Government?

Mr. CARROLL: He was dismissed by the present Government.

Mr. BARNARD: We have exactly the same situation in my own riding. The secretary of the Pilotage Commission was the president of the Liberal Association, and he was dismissed by the commission.

Mr. CARROLL: That has nothing to do with my position. Why did Mr. H. P. Duchemin investigate this case? Because he could hold the investigation in the city of Sydney; but when he comes to deal with the case of a postmaster in a district which could be reached only by driving over very bad roads for 20 or 30 miles, he says to the Postmaster General: 'We don't want to investigate this case.' Somebody lays a charge, and, instead of sending the charge to the postmaster in the district, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton, this declaration is sent to him. I understand from the Postmaster General that in some instances affidavits are sent in by the accusers. I ask the hon. Postmaster General if he does not think it would be fair and equitable to give this man the statement that was sent in by his accuser, and afford him an opportunity of answering the accusation? If an indictment is found against a man in our courts upon a charge of theft, what would the public think if, after being indicted for that he was charged with murder as well? That is the position of affairs in respect to those declarations. A man is asked to swear that he has not under any circumstances or at any time since his appointment taken the least part in politics. There is not a man in Canada who can make a declaration to that effect, for while some postmasters may not be active partisans they may still be unable to sign these declarations sent broadcast throughout the country by the Postmaster General.

I know several instances of dismissals in the county of South Cape Breton to which I have no objection, and which I am not going to discuss at the present time. I have been hounded from pillar to post in my constituency and opposed by postmasters there; and I may say that I am going to send in the name of one of these postmasters, and ask that an investigation be held. He is a Conservative, and was appointed before the year 1896. He has attended the nominations in the city of Sydney, and abused me roundly before every person who would listen to him. He did this not only in the last election, but in every election held in the constituency of South Cape Breton during the last ten years. Such a man is the postmaster at Marion Bridge in the county of Cape Breton. I am not going to mention his name, but I intend to lay a charge before the hon. the Postmaster General, and see whether he is going to keep his word in respect to treating Conservative postmasters in the same manner as he deals with Liberals.

I did not intend rising on this particular occasion, but there are a few instances in my own constituency in which I consider that officials were wrongfully dismissed, and I intend to bring the matter up at the proper time. In respect to the small army of Liberal office-holders in the county of Cape Breton who have been removed from office, they earned their dismissal by working for me. Speaking from a charitable standpoint, I do not like to see poor men dismissed from office because they assisted me in the last election; but now that they are dismissed, I feel sure that they will assist me with more vim than ever in the next election if I should again be a candidate in that constituency.

Mr. CARVELL: This discussion goes to show the difficulties any man will get into when he departs from the recognized principles of fair-play and common decency between man and man. It also shows the difficulty in which a man invariably finds himself placed when he departs from ordinary first principles. My hon. friend the Postmaster General started out with a well-recognized principle, and that was to dismiss any official against whom any one could lay a charge, whether or not it could be proved. With my hon. friend the Postmaster General, that was quite a logical proceeding. In my constituency he dismissed eight or nine, I think, within the first three or four weeks after the election, and I do not know whether he even had a charge laid against them—certainly there never was an investigation. They were simply told to get out, and given about twenty-four hours to pack up and hand over their books and papers to their successors.

Mr. EDWARDS: They were supporters of yours?

Mr. CARVELL: They were.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is a sufficient reason for their dismissal.

Mr. CARVELL: But my hon. friend the Postmaster General saw that was not popular, and during the last session of Parliament he was told that these men should not be removed from office without being given a chance to defend themselves. My hon. friend then departed from his well-recognized principle, and commenced to hold investigations. But he found in very many instances that he did not get the evidence he wanted, and that the investigations did not turn out as well as he had expected. So he again departed from his principles, and adopted the procedure of sending out this document which has been placed before the House this afternoon. I must confess, Sir, that this is the first time I have had the pleasure of seeing this document, because, as I have already stated, every man in my constituency who could be charged with having political opinions based on Liberal principles was dismissed without an investigation. I beg his pardon, I think there was one little country postmaster, receiving a salary of about $35 a year, whose case was investigated some time during the latter part of the year. Whether or not he was accorded the privilege of signing one of these documents, I do not know.

Let us look at the other side of the question for a moment, and consider what is the position of a man employed in a British country, who is dismissed on the mere ipse dixit of a patronage committee —not always an affidavit, I am informed, —but in some cases simply a letter from the patronage committee, or from an interested person who wants a thirty-five-dollar job. He departs from all principles of British fair-play and British jurisprudence; not only the jurisprudence of Britain but of France and Germany and even other civilized countries; he goes to the jurisprudence of Russia and Mexico, and says: Because a man has made a charge against you swear you are innocent. Think of it. Think of a man being held up and branded as a criminal and saying to him: You are charged as a criminal, you are not entitled to know the particulars of the charge, but it has been asserted by a friend of mine that you are a criminal. Swear you are innocent or off goes your head. It is true that the Postmaster General attempted to take the position that he would give a man a chance to make his affidavit, and when the man had made it there would be one statement against the other. He said one affidavit against the other affidavit, but he has the statement of one of his henchmen against the affidavit of the postmaster, and then he says: 'We will give an investigation.' The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has given particulars of a case where there was no investigation, and no one appeared against the man charged, and yet they dismissed him. It is un-British, unfair, and, if it were not unparliamentary, I would almost say indecent, to mete out to any British subject such treatment; it is a temptation to perjury. It is not treating a man with the courtesy that the British laws of this country expect he shall be treated with. It is putting him down as a criminal, and telling him to prove himself innocent or off comes his head. It is to that that we on this side of the House object.

I think the hon. the Postmaster General will play a finer role and stand higher in the estimation of the people if he goes back to first principles, and when he wants to fire a man, fire him, but let him not go through the farce of having a one-sided investigation and saying: We asked him to sign these documents in order to save $50 or $75. What is $50 or $75 to the Postmaster General or to the country compared to a man being treated as though he were a Russian or living in an uncivilized country? That is a very lame excuse, and I hope my hon. friend will abandon this unfair, un-British policy. If he wants to fire these men, fire them, or give them an honest decent investigation.

Mr. WILCOX (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, the argument of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat is most amusing, in view of the conduct of the Liberal party in dealing with the civil servants in the part of the country from which I come. In the south riding of Essex, a representative of the Liberal party dismissed every civil servant in the customs and excise and boasted how he had cleaned up the Tories in South Essex. Of the splendid array of civil servants that was left at the customs port at Windsor by the Conservative party in 1896, five only were left to tell the story, and they were pretty well disfigured, for they kept them well down in the service.

It does occur to me when we hear these hon. gentlemen on this question, that the voice has been the voice of Jacob, but the hand has been the hand of Esau. Shortly after the change of government in 1896 an item appeared in the Ottawa Free Press which clearly set forth the policy of the Liberal party in this regard. It is as follows:

> The rank and file of the Liberal party will acclaim a plain statement of the need for a closer loyalty of the department to this accepted principle of party government—all patronage should go to the friends of the party. Every departure from this is an act of disloyalty to the followers and supporters of the party.
>
> No Cabinet minister nor any supporter of the Liberal party can assault this position and be loyal to his party.
>
> Every new appointment, every power of patronage, belongs by right of system and precedent to the members of the Liberal party.
>
> To appease a political foe by gifts of patronage is a sign of cowardice, or even worse.
>
> In the initial appointment or in the awarding of a government contract, it is expected that the party in power shall be loyal to its friends. Without such loyalty the party becomes disorganized.

There is the policy of the Liberal party, and to such an extent was this decapitation of splendid civil servants throughout this country carried when the Liberal administration came into power, that a conference of one of the leading religious organizations of this country passed this resolution:

> That the sordid system of patronage unfortunately obtaining in this country is not only folly from the party point of view with which as such this conference has nothing to do, but that it is contrary to public policy and an offence against the people inasmuch as it proceeds on the assumption that the party in power is justified in administering the affairs of the country to the advantage of that section of the electors who have assisted in returning it, whereas, according to any true view such party should regard itself as a trustee of the whole people.

That was a resolution passed by the Methodist Conference in 1896.

As I understand it, the question of patronage is a matter of law, the duties of a civil servant being clearly set forth in the statute.

Mr. EMMERSON: A case up this afternoon was that of an outlaw.

Mr. WILCOX: The statute provides, among other things, that when a man enters the service of the country he shall leave his politics behind, and if he does not the law provides the penalty of dismissal. The course pursued by my hon. friend the Postmaster General is a very proper one, and I have reason to believe that he is doing his duty to the civil servants of this country. In our part of the country, where we have a great port in which we collected this year $3,500,000, out of 147 civil servants only four have been dismissed, while of the postmasters not one has been dismissed. Therefore, I think that the statements made by my hon. friend the Postmaster General are very well founded. If the law has not been changed, there is no political party to blame but that of my hon. friends opposite, for I happened to have the honour of sitting in opposition in this House when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (then leader of the Opposition) moved the following resolution:

That in making appointments to the public offices, and particularly to those of a representative nature, party service should not alone be considered, but selection should be made with regard to capacity and personal character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILCOX: And my hon. friends opposite voted that resolution down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who are cheering now?

Mr. TURRIFF: Does your leader uphold it now?

Mr. WILCOX: So I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Postmaster General has taken the proper course in notifying postmasters, or any other civil servants in this country, that representations have been made to him that they are violating the law. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who has such a high regard for liberty and free speech, tried to make it appear that my hon. friend the Postmaster General, by simply notifying a civil servant that he had been charged with a violation of the law, was curtailing free speech. Why, Sir, the thing is not debatable, and I am surprised that a member of the supposed capacity of my hon. friend from Edmonton should use such an argument.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not intend to say anything on this subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: But I am glad to receive the approval of some hon. gentlemen on the other side for having something to say. My hon. friend (Mr. Wilcox) evidently does not know very much about the Civil Service Act. He is not a lawyer, and is not supposed to pay very much attention to these things, and I do not blame him for not knowing very much about that Act. He rates the ordinary country postmaster as a civil servant, and says that the moment he accepts that very lucrative position, paid for at the rate of nine cents a day, he must leave his independence, his opinions, his rights as a citizen, behind him.

Mr. WILCOX: It is hardly worth making a fuss about, then.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly, it is not worth making a fuss about; but it shows the principle that we are fighting against, and we have a right to make a fuss when contemptible conduct emanates from the other side of the House.

Mr. HAZEN: Why did not my hon. friend fight against it when his friends were in?

Mr. McKENZIE: We have a right to bring these matters to the notice of the people of this country, to appeal to Cæsar, so to speak, and to let the people know the difference between the high-sounding principles of certain gentlemen in opposition and their performance when in office. That is the privilege and duty which we are discharging, and it is my duty to the people I represent to point out that difference. My hon. friend is entirely mistaken if he thinks that the Civil Service Act applies to the ordinary country postmasters.

Mr. WILCOX : Is it not a fact that the provisions of the Civil Service Act apply to the inside service, and that the principle of that Act is supposed to apply to the outside service?

Mr. McKENZIE: It certainly does not apply to an individual who gets $35 a year.

Mr. WILCOX: Is there any distinction?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is certainly a distinction. If the service is of such a character that the time of the individual is paid for by the State, then the State has a right to exercise control over that individual.

Mr. WILCOX: Where does my hon. friend find that?

Mr. McKENZIE: I should not look for common sense across the way. I suppose, if I did, I think I should appeal to my hon. friend to bring his common sense to bear upon this matter.

Mr. WILCOX: I have lots of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: If my hon. friend has lots of it, let him apply it, and I think he will at once come to the conclusion that it is not necessary to hedge a man around at every stage with statutory regulations. If my hon. friend, who is a prosperous farmer, refused to feed his cattle some Sunday morning, and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals went after him to punish him for his neglect, he would perhaps say there was nothing in the statute that compelled him to look after his cattle on Sundays. He expects us to believe that no duty devolves on him unless that duty is declared by statute. Fortunately in this country we have not reached that stage. Fortunately there are a great many things upon which there are no statutes and upon which we have to use our ordinary common sense. There were days long ago—certain developments have taken place since—when I would expect these hon. gentlemen not to require any statutory authority from me to say that $35 a year would not be an obligation which would be regarded as restricting any citizen of Nova Scotia in the exercise of his privileges. There may be other views to-day. I simply want to point out to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that there is one thing to their credit in so far as these investigations are concerned. There is a new law in this country and, some years hence, when they are back again where they belong, in the cool shades of opposition, they will claim credit for having passed the statute which received the assent of His Royal Highness the Governor General on March 12, 1912. Let me tell hon. gentlemen that—and I need not tell them because there is a great galaxy of brilliant lawyers before me—that, whatever the custom may have been before the passing of this statute, it is to be remembered that it is now crystallized into law and this is the only authority that is binding upon them. It will not do for them now to go back to 1896, or any of the years between that time and the 12th March, 1912, when this statute was passed and look for a precedent as to the manner in which certain charges were investigated. We have a statute to-day which says that the charge must be specified. The hon. Postmaster General, I understand, is a brilliant lawyer and is familiar with the civil and criminal procedure of this country. He knows that, from Scatarie in the east to Vancouver in the west, we have a procedure, both in the civil and criminal courts, which demands most conclusively and emphatically that charges, whether they be of a civil or criminal character, must be clearly and distinctly specified. Chapter 28 of the statute which hon. gentlemen have placed upon the statute book says that:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

You will note that the statute says 'shall allow.' We know of cases where it has been refused. But section 13 is the one to which I particularly wish to call to the attention of the Postmaster General. I submit to him that he is either, by a violation of the analogy of the statute, or by a straight, positive violation of the statute, acting contrary to the law in sending these declarations through the country. The statute says:

> No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him and he shall have been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

What is the meaning of the words: He shall be given reasonable notice of the charge? Do my hon. friends opposite imagine that such a blanket declaration as was sent out by the Postmaster General is a compliance with the Act? It is abominably wide of it. It could not for one moment stand the test of an investigation by any court of this country. No court would say that a blanket charge of that kind is what is meant by this law which has been passed by hon. gentlemen with assistance from this side. This Bill was introduced by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) himself and at his instance it was passed through the House. If he were in his seat to-night I would be glad to ask him for his interpretation of this section:

> No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him.

That must mean a specific charge, the time of the misconduct, the nature of it and the circumstances under which he violated the law or rule or whatever it might be. If there were half a dozen charges, all of them would have to be specifically mentioned, they would have to be placed in his hands and he would have to be given the opportunity of answering them. I submit to the Prime Minister and other members of his Government that, wherever there have been investigations since the passing of this law, that provision has not been complied with. We have heard a great deal about Mr. Duchemin and his court. I was in his court several times in my own town and other places. I have no charge of misconduct against Mr. Duchemin. He treated me as a gentleman but I would say that his interpretation of the law was not to my liking and not, as I understand it, in compliance with the meaning of the statute. He refused me the right to be heard before him as counsel. I put this statute in his hands, showed it to him and he said it was merely discretionary with him whether he should hear me or not. I had to sit down in silence while five, six or seven people were being investigated and he would not hear me at all, putting the interpretation on the statute that, no matter what the language of the statute was, it was discretionary whether he would hear me or not. I submitted to his ruling, and made no fuss about it, because I had to take for granted that he meant what he said. I pointed out to him that there should be something specific put into the hands of an individual in the way of a charge before he could be investigated and on that he laughed and went on with his investigation. Upon these points I did not agree with him, but as to personal insults, I did not receive any at his hands and I am only speaking of him as I found him. I would like to tell the hon. Postmaster General that in my county of North Cape Breton and Victoria, or in Victoria and Cape Breton, before they were put as they are to-day, the position of postmaster was never regarded as a political office. I have been representing that county for quite a while. I could point out to the Postmaster General six or eight places where changes took place in the post office. The old postmaster had died and in every instance his son, or daughter, or somebody belonging to the family, was appointed to the place without any question being raised. If the hon. gentleman will examine the records in his department for the last ten years relating to North Cape Breton and Victoria, he will not find a single instance where the office was vacated in which the position was not filled by some other member of the family.

I submit to the Postmaster General that a most unreasonable state of things is obtaining in Nova Scotia because I believe that he is not taking any notice of the way in which his officials are placing post offices. I do not blame him for not referring to his officials in making dismissals but he should have the report of his post office inspector, or some other competent officer, before he places a post office in some other situation. I can point out to the Postmaster General in my county places where they have corralled four post offices within three miles of each other. I venture to state that he has not the report of a single official in Nova Scotia telling him that these offices are in the proper place. That is what comes of leaving these things haphazard to politicians, whose only object is to gratify their desire to have officials dismissed. I tell the Postmaster General that while he is dismissing these officials by the dozens in my county, such a thing was never done there before and never will it be done again if there should be a change of government. It is a new doctrine and practice to us down there; we do not understand it, and the people Grit and Tory do not approve of it.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) took exception to the doctrine that an official of the federal Government should be removed for participation in provincial politics.

Mr. OLIVER: If I took that position, I wish to withdraw from it. My remarks were applicable entirely to postmasters who draw a salary of $35 a year.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman says that officers of that character should not be removed from office no matter how partisan their conduct may have been.

Mr. OLIVER: I was dealing with the terms of the circular affidavit and I wished it to be understood that a postmaster who draws $35 a year might be guilty of all the specific instances he was required to swear he was not guilty of in regard to a provincial election and still be entitled to hold his office.

Mr. HAZEN: Then the hon. gentleman draws a distinction between interference in a federal election, provided the interference is of officials who belong to the outside service and hold positions the emoluments of which are not very large.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I also understood my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) to draw a distinction between partisan conduct committed by officers in the inside service and partisan conduct committed by officers in the outside service, such as country postmasters with a salary of $35 a year. Such an argument may be pardonable when advanced by the hon. member, because he was not a member of this Parliament in 1905; but the hon. member for Edmonton was, and had he thought for a moment he would have remembered that a resolution introduced to this House by Mr. Lake, then member for Qu'Appelle, was passed without a dissenting voice, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke in favour of that resolution, the express terms of which show that there was no intention to draw any distinction between partisanship committed by officers of the inside service and partisanship committed by officers of the outside service, or whether that partisanship be committed in a provincial or in a Dominion election. Quoting from 'Hansard' of July 17th, 1905:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The motion which has been placed in your hands by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle, is in these words:

'That whilst it is desirable that every official in the employ of the Government of Canada should enjoy perfect freedom of political opinion and the untrammelled exercise of his franchise in accord therewith, no official should be engaged or permitted to engage in partisan work of any description in the election of a representative to the provincial or Dominion legislature.'

My hon. friend will note that there is no distinction drawn between the inside and the outside service, and that the resolution states that no officials, no matter of what sort, shall be permitted to engage in partisan work of any description, whether the election be a Dominion election or a provincial election. Sir Wilfrid Laurier says:

There is nothing in this resolution which has not been accepted more than once by this Government and upon which we have not declared more than once that it is our intention to act. Therefore, I have no hesitation at all in saying that I am ready on the part of the Government to accept this resolution. The only point I had any hesitation about was as to whether this resolution should be limited to Dominion elections or to provincial elections. It may be said perhaps that we have no jurisdiction over provincial matters and that the resolution goes too far in including provincial elections as well as Dominion elections. But after reflection I have come to the conclusion that we would accept the motion as it reads. Political parties are not so differentiated between Dominion and provincial politics as to make it advisable that they should be treated in a different manner. We accept the services of all those who are engaged in the Civil Service of this country on the understanding that they shall give their undivided attention to their business. Of course, they are citizens, they have the right of franchise, they have the right to their opinions; they have the right, as I have said before, of citizens to express their opinion. But for my part I am strongly of the opinion I held when in opposition that an official who takes an offensive part in election campaigns makes himself and his party a scandal, places himself at once at variance with a large portion of the community who contribute towards the payment of his salary, and minimizes to that extent his usefulness.

Mr. McKENZIE: Sir Wilfrid Laurier states there that the civil servant must give his entire and undivided attention to his work; does that cover a $35 a year postmaster?

Mr. HAZEN: Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that he must give his entire and undivided service to the work; he said:

We accept the services of all those who are engaged in the Civil Service of this country, on the understanding that they shall give their undivided attention to their business.

He indicates that while they are taking part in politics they are making themselves offensive to a large number of the people of this country who contribute towards their salaries, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier endorses the resolution which, in emphatic terms, includes every official in the employ of the Government, and which says that no official, whether in the inside or outside service, and whatever his salary be, shall be a partisan without being punished.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the minister think that that resolution was intended by the House at that time to apply to country postmasters drawing a salary of $35 a year?

Mr. HAZEN: I must take the plain meaning of the language in the resolution, and it says it applies to all officials of whatever sort. It is not ambiguous, it is plain and clear and unmistakable. If it does not apply to a country postmaster receiving $35 a year, let me ask my hon. friend, would it apply to a country postmaster receiving $50 a year. Would it apply to one receiving $100 a year; or would it apply to one receiving $200 a year? What is the limit it would apply to? Let me ask any lawyer on the other side of the House if he can read any limitation into it? Because the language is plain and unmistakable; the idea is expressed in terms that cannot be misunderstood, that are free from all ambiguity, and that were accepted by the unanimous vote of this House and with the approval of the Prime Minister of this country, as the declaration of a principle that should guide the House and the country, then and in the future, with regard to dismissing from office officials found guilty of partisanship.

Mr. OLIVER: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend has already spoken.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend asked a question, and I should like to answer it.

Mr. HAZEN: Just wait a moment. I would like to quote a little further from the remarks of the Prime Minister on that occasion. Something was said about a gentleman acting as a scrutineer. Sir Wilfrid Laurier says:

If he was acting as a scrutineer, he was going farther than I would permit him to go. I do not think that an officer of the Government should act as a scrutineer or agent.

No limitation there as to country postmasters. A country postmaster is an officer of the Government, as well as the man receiving a larger salary. Although it may be a small office, his duties are responsible, and it is important that he should fulfil them properly. Men of honesty and strength of character are wanted for these positions, and there is no limitation whatever in the rule. Sir Wilfrid Laurier goes on to say :

I do not think an officer of the Government should do anything else but record his vote and exercise the legitimate functions of citizenship. An officer of the Government has no right to do things which are supposed to be the function of those whom we know as partisans. To that extent, I am quite willing to go, but I would not be disposed at this moment to prejudge any case. Having laid down this rule, I think that this case ought to be dealt with accordingly.

Now, a word to my hon. friends who supported the cause of the country postmaster, to whom they allot the smallest salary of $35. I think there are no positions in the service of Canada that require for the proper discharge of its duties, men who are not partisans, and who are removed from partisan influences, so much as the small post offices that are scattered throughout the country districts of Canada. The reason is evident. Let the people lose confidence in the post office; let them think that the postmaster, during an election campaign or at any other time, is so influenced by party feeling—it may be a mere suspicion—that when circulars are sent out to be posted in the neighbourhood, those circulars do not reach the parties to whom they are addressed, until after the date of the meeting, or at such a late date that the people cannot get to the meeting,——

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I have had that experience.

Mr. HAZEN: Complaints of that sort have been made against both Liberal and Conservative postmasters. Members on both sides of the House will say they have had this experience. It is of the utmost importance that these men should be free from partisan bitterness. There are cases where it is contended by the people in the country districts, that it is not safe to use the mails as a means of conveyance, because the postmaster may be so moved by party considerations that letters that are supposed by him to be of a political nature, are not delivered to the parties to whom they are addressed. There is, therefore, no reason why the postmaster with $35 a year should be singled out as the exception to the rule laid down by the unanimous voice of this House, and heartily concurred in by the Prime Minister of that time, to the effect that it should apply to all servants of the Government without any limitation whatever—as to inside or outside service, as to party, or as to the time they had been in office—and should apply as much for partisanship in provincial affairs as for partizanship in federal affairs.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): This whole discussion was on the unfairness of the method adopted by the Postmaster General in conducting these investigations, and my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) has not dealt with that phase of the case at all. The discussion arose on the question of submitting to the postmaster a long affidavit swearing to his innocence, before anyone came forward to submit any charge against him. I would like to know if my hon. friend thinks that the Postmaster General is justified in asking the postmasters of this country to take oath as to their innocence before they know what is the charge against them?

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman has asked me a question, but he has not, I submit, correctly stated the facts upon which he bases the question. He has stated his question as if the Postmaster General, without any charge being made, sent to an official in his department an affidavit and asked him to fill it in, denying that he had done such a thing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think that the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. The affidavit my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has read, is submitted to the postmaster, and he is required to make it. If the hon. minister doubts that, I can produce a dozen postmasters who received that affidavit, and who knew nothing about the charge laid against them, but who were asked to make that affidavit. Does the hon minister approve of that method of procedure?

Mr. HAZEN: When a man who is a defeated candidate or who has a complaint comes to the Postmaster General and says that the Postmaster at Dingley Dell, or wherever it is, was guilty of partisan conduct at the last election, that he took an active part for the purpose of attempting to defeat the party who is now in power, the Postmaster General, on receipt of a charge of that sort, writes to the postmaster whose conduct is complained of, telling him that a charge of partisan conduct has been made against him and asks him if this statement is true or not true. If it is true, that would end the matter very properly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not what he asks.

Mr. HAZEN: That is exactly what he asks.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not the Postmaster General ask him to swear that, at no time since his appointment, whether it be ten or twenty years ago, he has taken an active part in politics?

Mr. HAZEN: If the hon. gentleman had waited a minute, I would have explained. On receipt of this complaint about the postmaster, the Postmaster General writes to the postmaster telling him a complaint has been made against him, and asks if this statement is true or not true. If the postmaster says it is true, that would end the controversy. If it is not true, the Postmaster General says: 'Will you sign and swear to the declaration I am enclosing?' That declaration makes the postmaster swear that since he has been appointed postmaster, he has not taken any partisan part in connection with any election. That is as I understand the matter, and I think it is absolutely correct. Is it not, Mr. Postmaster General?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I am only asking, as I have only the affidavit read here to-night, and have not read it myself, but if I am correct in my statement, as I think I am, if that postmaster has not been violating the rule that governs the Civil Service, and which was laid down in the House by unanimous resolution, I fail to see where any injustice was done to a postmaster by asking him to sign a declaration such as that.

Mr. TOBIN: The Postmaster General has made certain statements here to-night regarding the dismissals of postmasters, and in connection with that matter I would like to read a letter received by Mr. Dionne, the late postmaster at Strathford Centre, Quebec, from Mr. Verret, dated May 22, 1912. It is in French, and reads as follows:

Ottawa, May 22, 1912.

Dear Sir,—You are accused with having, since your appointment as a postmaster, taken a part in the federal or provincial election.

I am directed by the Post Office Department to ask you whether it is true or not.

If the charge is not true, I presume that you will have no objection to sign the enclosed affidavit, which shall be received by a justice of the peace or a notary public.

If there was no justice of the peace nor any notary public in your place, the declaration may be received by the mayor of your parish.

You will please send us an answer at once.

I am sir,

Yours truly,

(Signed.) HECTOR B. VERRET.

Assistant Deputy Minister.

M. A. E. Dionne,

Postmaster,

Stratford Center, County of Wolfe,

Quebec.

Mr. Dionne received the declaration referred to, which required him to declare that he has not interfered directly or indirectly with elections since he has been appointed postmaster. He received this declaration on the 22nd of May, just a few days after the political landslide in Quebec. Evidently there were some persons in Strathford who wanted this position of postmaster, although the department did not see fit to take any stand until after the local elections. Mr. Dionne wrote a letter in reply a few days afterwards, telling Mr. Verret that for personal reasons he did not wish to sign the declaration. The letter is as follows:

Hector Verret, Esq.,

Deputy Minister,

Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—In answer to yours of the 22nd, I must telle you that, for personal reasons, I cannot sign the annexed declaration.

If the department wish to be acquainted with the facts of the case, let them ask my accusers to prove them.

Your obedient servant,

(Signed.) A. E. DIONNE.

He stated that those persons who had accused him of interfering with the elections should submit their proof. Did the minister hold an investigation? You, Mr. Speaker, being a fair man, would say yes, but the Postmaster General did not hold an investigation—he dismissed the man at once.

A few days ago I put on the Order Paper certain questions relating to the dismissal of the postmaster at Stratford Centre. The questions are as follows:

1. Has A. E. Dionne, postmaster of Stratford Centre, Que., been dismissed?
2. If so, who requested his dismissal?
3. Was an investigation held?
4. Who called for an investigation?
5. Has any petition been received asking that Mr. Dionne be not dismissed?
6. How many signed the petition?

The Postmaster General says he did not receive a petition, but I am informed that such a petition was sent, and only nine names out of the whole township of Stratford did not appear on the list (reading):

7. How many applications for the position have been received by the Postmaster General?
8. Who is Mr. Dionne's successor and who recommended his appointment?

The answers as given by the hon. the Postmaster General are as follows:

1. Yes.
2, 3, 4. The postmaster was given an opportunity to sign a declaration that he had not acted as a partisan, but he refused to do so, and therefore it was not necessary to go to the useless expense of an investigation.
5, 6. None has been received.
7, 8. Mr. J. I. Campeau, on authority of Postmaster General.

Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that this man was fairly treated? My hon. friend the Postmaster General stated this evening that he always wanted to do what was right. I think he should consider this case, and have an investigation held, and if any injustice has been done to the postmaster at Strathford, I should like to see it rectified.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries could not have read the declaration when he made the remarks which he did, because I am sure if he had done so he would not have stated to the House that he was meting out fair-play to the postmasters of this country. It is evident, from the statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that the postmaster referred to by him was dismissed simply because he did not sign the declaration sent to him at the direction of the Postmaster General. There was no proof given of partisanship; no man came forward to acquaint him with the charges which were made against him, but he was asked by the Postmaster General——

Mr. PELLETIER: Who said no charges was preferred against him?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat.

Mr. PELLETIER: He did not say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Postmaster General could not have heard him aright. In answer to a question put to him by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tobin), the Postmaster General stated that because the postmaster in question did not sign this declaration, it was deemed unnecessary to hold an investigation, and the man was dismissed. By this document the postmaster is required to swear that since his appointment as postmaster he has taken no active part in federal or provincial elections; that he has not canvassed or taken any voters to the polls. As one hon. member on this side of the House has stated, if during thirty years of office he had taken his father or brother to the poll with his own horse and carriage when he himself was going there, he could not properly sign that affidavit. He has also to swear that he has never given money or liquor to anyone on behalf of any candidate in any polling division, or interrupted any public speaker during the course of any meeting. The man has to swear that at no time during a period of office covering perhaps ten, fifteen or twenty years, has he interrupted a speaker at any public meeting, political or otherwise—a school meeting, parish meeting, or municipal meeting—it is not limited to meetings in connection with federal or provincial elections. If my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had read that declaration he surely would not have approved of such a monstrous document as that sent out by the Postmaster General. Every man against whom a charge has been made is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty, but, without any charge being made against this official, and without anyone being compelled to go on oath and swear the accused has been guilty of political partisanship, the Postmaster General dismisses this man because he does not swear to every point in this declaration. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says he knows postmasters on both sides of politics who could be found guilty of partisanship and against whom complaints were made with respect to the holding of mails. Let me ask my hon. friend if, since he has been a member of this Government, any Conservative who has been found guilty of political partisanship has been dismissed?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not heard of any being guilty of partisanship.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend know that in his own constituency there were scores of Conservative postmasters who took an active part in the election upon the Conservative side?

Mr. HAZEN: There were practically none left.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend knows better than that. In Carleton, I am informed, Conservative postmasters took an active part, but we have the statement of the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) that he intends to give the Postmaster General the name of a Conservative postmaster who took a very active part in the election and we shall see whether the Postmaster General will dismiss him for exercising partisanship in favour of the Conservative candidate. When we see the Postmaster General doing that and treating him as he has treated the Liberal postmasters we will be able to judge better of the sincerity of the Postmaster General with reference to this subject. As further evidence of the determination which this Government has shown to get rid of Liberal office-holders by hook or by crook let me call attention to the case of a gentleman in the constituency of South Ontario, Mr. Lyman C. Smith, who was collector of customs. From this case we will be able to judge the motive that has actuated the minister; and to know whether it is a sincere desire to have the Civil Service of the country removed entirely from partisanship or whether they are actuated by the desire to remove office-holders in order to secure the positions for their friends.

Mr. EDWARDS: You might take up the case of W. S. Milner.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Lyman C. Smith was for some 28 years head master of the Oshawa high school. He was a gentleman universally respected and admired. He was appointed collector of customs at Oshawa at the suggestion of leading business men of the town because it was felt that he would make a first-class officer and maintain the proper dignity of the position. It was admitted that he worthily performed the duties of the position and the only reason alleged against him and the only ground suggested for his dismissal is that he placed himself on record as being opposed to the idea that he should vote for a man who had been guilty of corrupt practices at an election. It appears that Mr. Smith took no active part in elections. It is true that he attended political meetings but he was simply an observer. At the last election he was requested by a Conservative to vote for Mr. Smith the Conservative candidate but he said he could not conscientiously vote for a man against whom the Court had pronounced and who had been guilty of corruption in an election and so, for that remark, as I am informed, that gentleman was dismissed from office.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria): Did the hon. gnetleman say that this gentleman was canvassed for his vote and gave that as a reason?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: Then the hon. gentleman's facts are entirely erroneous.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My information is from a gentleman well known to members of this House, a former member of this House, whose word, I think, would be taken without hesitation by the great majority of the members. That is the statement which has been made to me and no other reason has been given so far as I am aware, certainly no other reason has been given in this House, for the dismissal of Mr. Lyman C. Smith from the office of collector. He is a gentleman of very high ideals, and the Conservative candidate for whom he had been requested to vote had been declared by Mr. Justice Ferguson to have been guilty of corruption during some previous election, and he said he could not conscientiously vote for a gentleman against whom such charges had been proven.

For that and for that alone this gentleman, who was not a partisan, but as I was informed had taken no part at all in political controversies, was dismissed from office.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the hon. gentleman say that was a reason that appealed to him as a very strong one?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, and I hardly think it would appeal to my hon. friend. Many other instances could be given. There is the instance of the collector of customs at Coaticook who was dismissed simply because he had been appealing to Conservatives and Liberals alike, as appears from a return laid before this House, to frown down disloyal utterances by some of the candidates running in that election. Numerous other instances could be presented to show that gentlemen opposite have not, and I regret to say it is the case, been actuated by the sincere desire to purify the service from political partisanship but rather to secure places which may be filled by their friends.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria): The circumstances in connection with the South Ontario case are more or less familiar to me. A gentleman named Smith, who was the collector of customs there, and who is in many respects an estimable man but who is a dyed in the wool Liberal, as he has a right to be, was dismissed from office. The position taken by those concerned in having him removed was that while he was at perfect liberty to resign his position and exercise any influence he might have in himself as an individual on account of his position in the community, and long-standing as a teacher, in support of the Liberal candidate, he should not exercise the influence which the position of collector of customs conferred on him by seeking to influence those having business dealings with him. This gentleman was not canvassed for his vote. No man in South Ontario would waste time doing that, they knew his politics and knew he was one of those hard-headed gentlemen who could not be influenced. He himself became active, going around with a long face, bemoaning the state of public affairs and saying it was a sad condition when a gentleman who had been condemned by a judge should ask to be returned to Parliament. He was proving himself a white-livered hypocrite and I have no hesitation in saying that had he been in my riding he would have gone out much quicker than he did.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But he was a very estimable man.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria): But there are many estimable partisans. I had the privilege of dismissing one very estimable gentleman myself in about 17 seconds. I make no apology for any of these things. I always take the precaution of warning gentlemen on my side holding public offices to be good enough to mind their own business. I do not want their influence in a campaign. If they wish to vote for me well and good, that is their privilege, but I do not want and will not have their public support or have them canvassing for me in a campaign, and hon. gentlemen can rest assured that when I will not permit friends of my own in offices to canvass for me, I shall take particular pains that those opposed to me do not canvass against me.

Mr. KYTE: I wish to add one or two observations, particularly in replying to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. We on this side of the House were very glad to hear him assert his views that partisans ought not to be appointed to the charge of post offices in this country. I appreciate the reasons that have been advanced by the Minister of Marine and I am very sure that had he known the type of postmasters who have been appointed in my county by the Postmaster General he would take the earliest opportunity to reprimand his colleague. Now, in the county of Richmond about 50 public officers have been dismissed, and probably 20 of these are postmasters, and in all cases the appointments have gone to men who have been the most offensive partisans in the respective communities in which they live. There is a case in the county of Richmond of a very important post office being filled by a man whose only qualification was his excessive partisanship on behalf of the Conservative party during the last 20 years. As a matter of fact, he is so illiterate that he was obliged to assure the post office inspector that he would engage the services of another person to act as assistant postmaster, so that the duties of the office would be properly discharged. But as he had been a partisan of the deepest dye he was selected for that high and important position.

I subscribe to every sentiment expressed in the resolution moved by the former member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake), in the session of 1905, and I subscribe readily and gladly to the sentiments which were uttered by the then leader of the Government when he supported that resolution, and when he stated that partisan work of any description, in Dominion or in local elections, ought not to be permitted on the part of any person holding public office.

I am not complaining of the dismissal of partisans in my county. What I do find fault with is the dismissal by the Postmaster General of men who were not partisans in the election. I have upon the Order Paper motions relating to some 40 dismissals in the county which I represent, and when the papers are brought down, I hope to convince hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that a great many of the dismissals in that county were made, not because the officials who held the offices were partisans, but simply and solely because others desired to get their positions, and have secured them through the influence of the defeated candidate. For instance, the only reason advanced against one postmaster is that he made a statement to the effect that he believed the Government would be sustained. In another case a postmaster stated in conversation with a friend that he believed Mr. So-and-So would be returned; in another case a postmaster who was the presiding officer at a poll some few miles from his residence, drove his brother to the poll thinking it would be a brotherly act to take him in his carriage. That was the only evidence adduced against that postmaster, and I have learned within the past few days that he has been dismissed. I desire to emphasize the fact that I will never raise my voice in criticism of the dismissal of any man in the county of Richmond, who has been an active or offensive partisan, or a partisan in any sense of the word. What I do complain of is that in my county men who have not been partisans, who have taken no part whatever in elections, except, perhaps, to casually express an opinion as to whether the government would be sustained, or as to whether a particular candidate would be elected, have been dismissed. The things I have mentioned do not come within the range of political partisanship, and in my judgment the dismissals ought not to have taken place.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) complained of the dismissal of an official for stating that he would not vote for a man who had been noted for corrupt acts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who had been found guilty of corrupt acts by the judge.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What has my hon. friend (Mr. Kyte) to say to that as a reason for dismissal?

Mr. KYTE: It would depend entirely upon the nature of the corrupt act. There are some acts that are inherently corrupt; there are others that are merely a technical violation of the law, and I would make a distinction in these cases.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Suppose that he had been disfranchised for seven years for corrupt acts, would he have been justified in voting?

Mr. KYTE: I would like to know if my hon. friend is making any particular reference to me. I have heard that my hon. friend from Annapolis had some ambition to be the junior member for Richmond. I have here a copy of the Conservative newspaper published in my own town, and if my hon. friend has ref——

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has exhausted his right to speak again. This is a substantive motion.

Mr. KYTE: I am answering a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not permissible to enter into a new argument. The rule is that in exercising the right to reply a member may refer to any material part of his speech which may have been misquoted, or misunderstood, but he must not introduce any new matter.

Mr. KYTE: My hon. friend has asked me a question, and I am endeavouring to reply to him, and in order to give the reasons for my reply I wish to quote from a newspaper.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. W. SMITH (South Ontario): I desire to say a word or two with reference to some observations that have come very close home to me. A number of years ago I had the honour of a seat in this House. It is true that for a good many years I was out of it, but I came back despite the strongest opposition that could be placed against me in the riding that I have the honour to represent. I recognize that I have not been, perhaps, the best of men, but I believe that the electors of South Ontario have confidence in me. Now what are the facts in connection with the observations of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). He charges that I was personally responsible for the removal of a collector of customs in the town of Oshawa. I admit the guilt, and why? I have in my hand a letter from the collector of customs at Oshawa. I need scarcely read the whole of it, because it is on record in this House already, but one clause of it is as follows:

The head and front of my offending seems to have been that I stated to John McCulloch that I considered the right of franchise so sacred that I would never vote for any man, no matter who he was, or what the party, or what the issue, who had been proved to have been concerned in the giving of money for bribes. I stated that I had on a few occasions unknowingly voted for such, but would never so vote if I knew it. If pure men did not offer I would not vote at all. I further stated that in my opinion, a man that had done this should not have a vote himself or be permitted to hold any office. This view was stated in general terms, and I have often made the same statement when no election was pending. Remember, please, that all this was said in private conversation only.

John McCulloch was an old pupil of his at the high school of Oshawa. He was a member of the firm of McLaughlins, in Oshawa and was interested in the great question of reciprocity which agitated not only South Ontario, but the country generally, in 1911. He believed, as much as he believed anything, that he could influence an old pupil of his by appealing to him that a man who had been guilty of the charges which had been brought against me had no right either to sit in this House or even to have a vote, if it came to that. Mr. McCulloch did not exactly accept the situation but in the petition which was presented to me they say that:

During the election he did and said things which were regarded as offensively partisan, for example—he endeavoured to prevent individual Liberals of joining hands with the Conservative party, by making most offensive allusions to their 'lack of brains', and, secondly, he openly tried to prejudice voters against you personally by making unjust and unfounded attacks upon your 'personal character'——

The man does not live in Canada, and he cannot be found in South Ontario, that I have the honour to represent, that can say anything against my personal character.

—all of which has been regarded by Conservatives and by many Liberals as being very 'offensive' even from a narrow partisanship point of view.

The hon. member for St. John goes to a great deal of trouble in trying to put Mr. Smith's case, but he takes good care that he does not go any further because I removed another man from the customs in Oshawa, Mr. E. T. Mothersill, with regard to whom this document states:

Mr. E. T. Mothersill in our estimation deserves to be removed from office because of his active participation in the election. Not only on account of the quantity but also on account of the quality of his activity, do we most sincerely object. He imported into his section of the riding cargoes of lager, and other beverages with a view of demoralizing the electorate and of exercising such degrading influences in favour of the Laurier candidate, as should meet with instant rebuke from any decent form of government.

Yet I was to blame for removing these two men, one of whom, if he had had any common sense, such as we would expect from an old high school teacher, would not have tried to influence one of the most important, one of the strongest, men in the town of Oshawa. I removed this man, Mothersill, because he had done everything which it was possible for him to do to influence a certain portion of the electorate in the town of Oshawa. I stand, Mr. Speaker, by what I did in 1911, I know I was right, I know I did right, and I am going to say further, I say it in this House and I say it to the hon. member for St. John, that the man who was the collector of customs was removed because it is reported he bought his way into that position. That is all I have to say, and if hon. gentlemen want to pursue this matter any further, they will find me upon the floor of this House.

Mr CHISHOLM (Antigonish): As the mover of the resolution I have a right to the last word, and my remarks will be very brief indeed. We have got very far afield from the motion, as the hon. Postmaster General has said, but there is just an observation or two I would like to make with regard to that hon. gentleman. I do not think there is anybody on this side of the House who would take serious objection to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. We all grant that any person who is guilty of active or offensive partisanship should be treated accordingly, but just what active or offensive partisanship is bringing us to the line of cleavage. With reference to the postmasters to whom I referred, there is no evidence that any one of them was an active or offensive partisan. Certainly, of the dozen postmasters that were dismissed in Antigonish, I can safely make the statement that not more than two of them, in the last fifteen or twenty years, ever acted as scrutineer or agent or took any active part in an endeavour to influence a voter to vote for one candidate or another or to refrain from voting, or did any of the things which we generally understand as constituting offensive partisanship. What I complain of in so far as the Postmaster General is concerned, is that he receives his information or charges from persons who very often do not stand very highly in the community in which they reside, or, if the persons who give him the information are respectable people, that information is very often based by the party laying the charge on the tittle-tattle or gossip in the community, there being no attempt on the part of the persons supplying the information to verify it. The Postmaster General, on the receipt of such information, should write to the country postmaster asking him if he denied this charge and then he should say: If you make a declaration denying this charge, we will accept your declaration. If he wrote to the country postmaster and said: You are charged with so and so, what have you to say about it, and if the country postmaster denied the accusation, then he would be quite justified in saying: We will have to investigate the case. Or, if the Postmaster General wanted to save the expense of an investigation, he would see that the specific charges made against the country postmaster were set down and the country postmaster would be asked to make a declaration denying the charges if he was prepared to do so. If he made that declaration it would be the bounden duty of the Postmaster General to accept the sworn statement of that man rather than the unsupported statement of the informer. Then, again, observe the temptation there is for perjury. Here the Postmaster General puts a declaration to the country postmaster to which he asks him to subscribe and if he does not subscribe to that declaration he is plainly told: You lose your head, you are going to be decapitated, you are going to be dismissed from office. Instead of putting in that declaration specific charges of offensive or active partisanship the Postmaster General makes the declaration of such a wide and varied character, and puts it in such equivocal language that no conscientious man can subscribe to it. In the declaration which he submits to the country postmaster he asks him to declare that he had not taken active part in Dominion or provincial elections since he had become postmaster. That is going pretty far, but, while that is objectionable, there is still nothing downright wicked in the matter. But, he goes further and asks him to declare: I have not paid out money; I have never taken any voters to the poll. He does not put any qualification in the sentence at all. If he said: I have never carried any voters to the poll with a view of getting them to vote one way or the other, or, I have not given any money for the purpose of influencing votes, it would not be so objectionable as the declaration appears as drawn up. Ninety-nine per cent of the country postmasters would refuse to make that declaration in the form in which it was submitted because they would be afraid there was something in it that perhaps was not intended to be in it but at the same time would be calculated to get them into trouble. It is repugnant to the sense of manhood in the official to take such an affidavit, without knowing who his accuser was or what the accusation; it was an insult to these poor country postmasters to send them such a blank and general form of affidavit. When a postmaster did make that affidavit, the Postmaster General should have accepted it, but what was done was to take the stand towards the country postmasters: if you don't swear to the affidavit you will lose your situation, and if you do swear to it you will lose it also; you will be damned if you will and you will also be damned if you won't. Out of a dozen postmasters in my county who were dismissed, only one had an investigation, and that man had made the required declaration. And, the House will be surprised to hear, that after the poor man sent in the affidavit, the Postmaster General wrote to him; I am surprised to receive such a declaration from you; do you realize that declaration has the same force and effect as an oath; in view of the information we have, we cannot accept your declaration, and the thing must be inquired into further. And it was inquired into further, and Commissioner Duchemin was appointed to make the inquiry, and the Commissioner found nothing against the man and he was exonerated. In our part of the country, the people do not take affidavits lightly, and they are averse to being sworn except on serious and solemn occasions, and it was an insult to them to send out such a form. They have a proper conception of the grave character of an oath and the responsibility it involves. Fancy this poor man, who made the affidavit in the required form, and who told the truth, being insulted by the Postmaster General writing him, no doubt on the statement of some irresponsible person, that he had perjured himself, when, as the investigation disclosed, the poor man was telling absolutely the truth. Mr. McNeil, in his letter to the Postmaster General stated, that he challenged the fullest inquiry into his conduct; he denied the charge of offensive or active partisanship; he stated that he had done nothing but to exercise the God-given right of depositing his ballot as he thought proper, and yet the Postmaster General, without investigation, dismissed him. To-night, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) interrupting the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), asked him if certain postmasters who had been dismissed were Grits, and being answered in the affirmative, the hon. member for Frontenac said: They deserve to be fired. Well, I suppose there are some who will subscribe to that doctrine, and if the Government laid it down boldly and flatly, well and good, and it would be a much decenter thing for them to do than to pursue the hypocritical process of going through a farce of an investigation, simply because they want to remove a Liberal from office. Why don't they say openly to the officials whom they want to dismiss: You are out and we are in, we have to look after our friends; you are Grits; to the victors belong the spoils; we have friends on our side whom we have to look after; we are sorry for you personally, but we must play the game of politics and out you have to go. If the Government took that more manly course nobody would raise a howl about it, but the trouble is that the Government resorts to these sham inquiries and adopts such mean, low, contemptible subterfuges as the placing of affidavits in the hands of innocent country postmasters to try and trap them. Far better for the Government to take the courageous course of dismissing officials because they are Liberals, than to put the country to the expense of sham investigations, which are causing such strife and ill-will and ill-feeling between the people in different parts of the country.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED AND UNDISCUSSED MOTIONS.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents relating to the dismissal of Martin Johnston, preventive officer at Rea Islands, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Alexis Vigneau, captain of the patrol boat at Arichat, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Harry E. McDonald, assistant engineer at St. Peters canal, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Frederick Poirier, buoy contractor at Descouse, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of George H. Sampson, keeper of the storm signal at Lower L'Ardoise, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of David A. McLeod, postmaster at Cleveland, Richmond county, N.S. —Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Dr. C. P. Bissett, physician to the Indians at Salmon River, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of D. J. McKillop, postmaster at McKillop, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Norman Morrison, postmaster at Ferguson's Lake, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Michael Murphy, postmaster at Point Micheau, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Michael J. Sampson, light keeper at Lower L'Ardoise, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Thomas Brymer, light keeper at Lower L'Ardoise, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Dominique Boudrot, buoy contractor, at Petit de Grat, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Kenneth F. McAskill, postmaster at Loch Lomond, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of H. J. Fixott, port physician at Arichat, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Leon N. Poirier, wharfinger at Descouse, Richmond county, N.S.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, complaints and other documents relating to the cancelling of the contract for conveying His Majesty's mails, entered into on the 1st day of January, 1912, beteewn the Honourable Postmaster General and Mr. J. C. Beeman, of Guthrie, county of Missisquoi; together with the reason for the cancellation of this contract, the price paid to Mr. Beeman, the name of the present contractor and the price paid to him.—Mr. Kay.

For return showing the number of postmasters that have been dismissed in the County of Missisquoi since October 1, 1911, the names of the postmasters who have been appointed to succeed them, the causes of the dismissals and a copy of all complaints and correspondence with respect to the same, and of all reports on investigations where such have been held.—Mr. Kay.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, complaints, and of the evidence given at investigation, if one was held, relating to the dismissal of Mr. A. J. Gosselin, acting preventive officer of customs at St. Albans, Vermont, through the Port of St. Armand, County of Missisquoi.—Mr. Kay.

For a copy of all letters, papers, documents, telegrams, and charges relating to a complaint against Neil Ross, sectionman on the Intercolonial railway at West river, County of Pictou, and of the evidence taken at the investigation of the report of the commissioner thereon, and of all letters, papers or other documents relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Macdonald.

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of Allan Kinney, of Linwood, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, a sectionman on Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expenses connected with the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of John McDonnell, Afton station, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, a sectionman on Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expenses connected with the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of Huber Myatte, Tracadie, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, a sectionman on Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expenses connected with the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against Jeffrey Crespo, sub-collector of customs at Harbour au Bouche, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and reports relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of a successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against Angus A. Boyd, postmaster at Boyd's post office, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of a successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against John B. Macdonald, postmaster at Glassburn, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of a successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against Alex. G. Chisholm, postmaster at Ohio, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against John J. McLean, postmaster at Cross Roads, Ohio, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of a successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against Dougald McDonald, postmaster at Doctors Brook, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against Dan A. McInnes, postmaster at Georgeville, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the closing of the post office at Pomquet River, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, and the cancellation of the contract of the carrying of the mail between Heatherton and Pomquet River.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of William P. Landry, of Antigonish, Nova Scotia, a sectionman on the Intercolonial railway.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of William Landry, of Pomquet, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, a section foreman of the Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expenses connected witih the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of Charles Landry, of Pomquet, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, a sectionman on the Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expense connected with the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of James Armstrong, of Heatherton, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, as sectionman on the Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expenses connected with the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of John Melanson, of Afton, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, a sectionman on the Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expenses connected with the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, documents and reports relating to the dismissal of William R. Fougère, of Frankville, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, a sectionman on the Intercolonial railway, and for a statement in detail of the expenses connected with the investigation of the charges against him.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Abner Carr, postmaster at St. Francis Harbour, Guysborough county, Nova Scotia, and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the dismissal of John P. Meagher foreman dockhand on steamship Scotia, Mulgrave, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses on such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the dismissal of W. G. Mathews, coxwain, lifeboat crew at Canso, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the dismissal of D. S. Hendsbee, weigher, reduction works, Canso, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the dismissal of A. B. Cox, superintendent of reduction works at Canso, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the dismissal of H. L. Tory, fishery officer at Guysborough, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the dismissal of Richard Conroy, postmaster at Cross roads, Country Harbour, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Murdock McCutcheon, postmaster at Sonora, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of Captain George Livingstone, customs officer at Big Bras D'Or, Cape Breton, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of J. A. McNeil, customs officer at Grand Narrows, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of D. J. McDougall, section foreman, Intercolonial railway, Grand Narrows, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of Hugh D. McEachern, customs officer at North side East bay, Cape Breton, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of Frank Dunlop, postmaster at Groves Point, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of Captain John Arsenault, telegraph line repairer at Alder Point, Cape Breton, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of George Burchell, custom house officer at Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of John McDonald, freight handler and checker, Intercolonial railway at Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by P. H. Duchemin, in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of A. R. Forbes, fishery overseer at North Sydney, Nova Scotia in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by P. H. Duchemin, in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of M. Wilson Lawlor, harbour commissioner at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of P. J. McDonald, harbour commissioner at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of William Hackett, harbour commissioner at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relative to the dismissal of A. T. Gannan, car repairer and inspector Intercolonial railway at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Richard Hickey, agent Immigration Department at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Henry Cann, customs official and preventive officer at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Mary Dunlop, telegraph operator at Groves Point, Cape Breton county, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Murdock McKenzie, postmaster a Milville, Boularderie, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Richard Dugas, storm signal attendant at Alder Point, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Mrs. John Arsenault, telegraph operator at Alder Point, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of James Grantmyre, preventive officer at Little Bras D'Or, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of William Marsh, preventive officer at Little Pond, Sydney Mines, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Joseph Shean, harbour master at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Abraham Astephen, of North Sydney, Nova Scotia, interpreter Immigration Department, North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Dr. J. W. McLean, of North Sydney, Nova Scotia, medical examiner, Immigration Department of North Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a return showing in detail the number of dismissals from public office by the present Government to this date in the constituency of Qu'Appelle, with the names of the dismissed officers and the reason for their dismissal, the complaints against such officials, and a copy of all correspondence, petitions, papers and documents with respect to the same, and of all notes of evidence and reports of investigations in cases where they have taken place.—Mr. Thomson.

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents in the possession of the Department of Marine and Fisheries relating to the dismissal of Hormidas Lacasse as wharfinger on the Government wharf at Wendover, county of Prescott, Ontario, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Proulx.

For a return showing the number of commissions formed by the Government since September 21, 1912, the names and the occupations of the commissioners appointed, their duties, the duration of their services, and their remuneration.—Mr. Devlin.

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, &c., between the Department of Trade and Commerce and any company, person or persons, relative to the continuance and payment of a subsidy towards a steamship service between St. John, N. B., and Bear River, N.S., for the fiscal year 1912, and performed during the fiscal year 1911.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax.)

For a copy of all papers, documents, correspondence, &c., between the Department of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Donnelly, late Canadian Trade Commissioner in Mexico, relating to the closing of the office of such Trade Commissioner in Mexico.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, letters, &c., between the Government of Canada and the Commonwealth of Australia for the past twelve months relative to the matter of preferential tariff arrangements between the said two countries.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, petitions, Orders in Council, memoranda, correspondence, &c., by and between the Government of Canada or any member thereof, and the Government of the province of British Columbia, or any member thereof, since May 1, 1912, relating to the subject to an increase of the provincial subsidy to the said province.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a return showing all the mail contracts made between the Post Office Department of Canada and any party or parties, and cancelled before the maturity thereof, from October 14, 1911, to November 15, 1912, designating such cancelled mail contracts by giving the name of the contractor, the amount of the contract, the period of the unexpired service, the name of the district or districts, and the county and province wherein the service was performed together with the reasons for such cancellation.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a return showing all changes made in the customs tariff of Canada by Order in Council since the close of last session of Parliament.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all advertisements, tenders, contracts, Orders in Council, memoranda, papers, letters and correspondence in any way relating to a subsidized steamship service between Canadian ports and any ports of the British West Indies, or any proposed improvement or extension of such steamship services since November 1, 1911, to the present time.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a return showing the quantity and value of molasses of cane, as defined in tariff item No. 137a, imported into Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1912, from each island of the British West Indies which are parties to the Canada West India Trade Agreement.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, appeals, decisions of the Privy Council of Canada, Orders in Council, letters, telegrams, &c., in connection with the appeal from the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada in relation to the location of the station of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway at Hazelton, B.C., and also for a copy of all telegrams, letters, papers and documents sent to or received from the Government of British Columbia or any member thereof, or any company, person or persons in relation to the location of said railway station at Hazelton, B. C.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, correspondence between the Department of Public Works and any person or persons relating to the placing of obstructions in the waters of South West Cove, Lunenburg county, N.S. —Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, memoranda, Orders in Council and correspondence relating to the dismissal of A. H. Stratton, late postmaster at Peterboro, Ont.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, correspondence, Orders in Council, &c., relative to the dismissal of S. A. Johnson, late postmaster at Petite Rivière, Lunenburg county, N.S. —Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all documents, papers, evidence and correspondence relating to the dismissal of Geoffrey Gorman, coxwain of the life boat station at Herring Cove, Halifax county, N.S.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, evidence, reports, findings and correspondence relating to the dismissal of Mathew Boutilier, recently postmaster of Mushaboom, Halifax county, N.S.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all documents, papers, tenders, contracts, Orders in Council and correspondence in connection with the supply of castings for and the purchase of scrap iron from the Eastern division of the Intercolonial railway since May 1, 1912.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, letters, &c., relating to the matter of the establishment of a lobster hatchery at Spry Bay, Halifax county, N. S.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, letters, &c., relating to a strike of temporary employees of the Intercolonial railway at Halifax in August, 1912.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, documents, petitions, memoranda, correspondence, &c., with the Government of British Columbia or any member thereof, with the fishery officers of the Marine and Fisheries Department resident in said province, with salmon canneries in said province, and with any company, person or persons, relating to the prohibition of the export of sock-eyed salmon from the said province of British Columbia since October 15, 1911.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all petitions, correspondence, memoranda, recommendations and ther papers or documents in the possession of the Department of Marine and Fisheries relating to the proposals to supply medicine or medical attendance free, or otherwise, to Canadian boat fishermen.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, letters, &c., relating to the dismissal of L. P. Carignan, forest ranger in the constituency of Champlain, Quebec.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and correspondence referring to the tenders received and the contracts awarded, if any, for the carrying of the mails between Antigonish and Livingstone Cove.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all documents, correspondence and telegrams relating to the dismissal of James Stewart, postmaster, at Middleton, Antigonish county, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all tenders received and the contracts entered into for the carrying of the mails between St. Andrews and Beauly, county of Antigonish, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence on file in the Post Office Department containing any recommendation or advice regarding the awarding of such contract, or in any way referring thereto.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and correspondence referring in any way to the purchase or leasing of the property in Antigonish, N.S., now in use as a gun shed or store house for the equipment of the 18th Field Battery of Artillery.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of the report made by Mr. Tessier to the Department of Railways and Canals on a proposed line of railway from Orangedale to Cheticamp in the county of Inverness; and also of all petitions, memorials and correspondence referring to said proposed line of railway.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a return showing. 1. The names of all light-keepers in the province of Nova Scotia who were dismissed from office or employment since October 10, 1911, together with the date of each dismissal.

2. The names and location, by place and county, of lights from which such light-keepers have been dismissed.

3. The cause assigned in each case for the dismissal of such lightkeepers respectively. —Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For the copy of all papers, documents, memoranda, Orders in council, letters and correspondence, relating in any way to the closing of the Canadian Immigration office at Boston, U.S.A., in 1911, and its subsequent re-establishment.

For a copy of all papers, telegrams, letters and Orders in Council respecting the transfer of the property known as the Police Point reserve to the corporation of the city of Medicine Hat, Alberta.—Mr. Buchanan.

For a copy of all correspondence and other papers connected with the removal of Harry A. Drigg, from the position of postmaster at Grassy lake, Alberta.—Mr. Buchanan.

Copy of all complaints, accusations, inquiries, reports, correspondenec, and of all documents relating to the dismissal of Lucien O. Thisdale, a customs employee at Valleyfield, Quebec, and to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Papineau.

Copy of the accounts of Jean Baptiste Lona, and of his wife for work done to the public buildings at Valleyfield, Quebec, in May, 1912; also for a copy of all correspondence, reports and documents relating to the payment in full or a part of their accounts. —Mr. Papineau.

Copy of all correspondence, complaints, reports and all documents relating to the cancelling of lease No. 18778, consented to by the Honourable Minister of Railways and Canals, to Aurile Lebeuf on 12th December, 1910.—Mr. Papineau.

Copy of all complaints, accusations, correspondence, petitions and of all documents and reports respecting the dismissal of Antonin Leduc, postmaster of St. Timothé, in the county of Beauharnois and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Papineau.

Return showing the names of the employees on the dining cars of the Intercolonial railway and the nature of their employment; and also of the employees on the Pullman cars of the Intercolonial railway and the nature of their employment.—Mr. Boulay.

Return showing the detail and number of dismissals from public offices by the present Government to this date in the riding of Saskatoon, with the names of the dismissed occupants, the reasons for their dismissals, the complaints against such officials, and all correspondence with respect to the same, and of all reports of investigations, in cases where such were held.—Mr. McCraney.

Copy of all documents, papers, memoranda, rulings, findings, appeals and correspondence relating to any appeal asserted from any decision, ruling or finding of the Board of Railway Commissioners to the Privy Council of Canada, and the action taken by the Privy Council thereon.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

Copy of all papers, documents, memoranda and correspondence relating to the application of the Banque Internationale to the Treasury Board for a certificate for the commencement of business.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

Copy of all papers, documents, correspondence, &c., relating to the dismissal of John Ware of the Immigration Branch of the Interior Department at Halifax, N.S.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

Copy of all letters, papers charges and correspondence between the Department of customs and all other persons regarding the dismissal from office of Thomas Cameron, preventive officer at Andover, N.B., and also of all evidence and reports thereon with reference to the dismissal of the said officer.—Mr. Michaud.

Return showing all the public officers of the Inland Revenue Department in the county of St Jean Iberville, removed by the present Government since 1st May, 1912, together with the names and duties of such persons, the reasons of their dismissal, the nature of the complaints against them, the names of the persons who brought these complaints; also a copy of all correspondence relating thereto, and of the reports of enquiries in the cases where such have been held.—Mr. Demers.

Copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams relating to the dismissal of J. N. N. Poirier, collector of Excise at Victoriaville, Quebec, and also of the inquiry made by N. Garceau, by the Minister of Inland Revenue, and respectively of two affidavits given by Ludger Frechette.—Mr. Brouillard.

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and reports relating to the dismissal of Colin Macdonald, of James River Station, county of Antigonish as Intercolonial Railway sectionman, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

On motion of Mr. Borden the House adjourned at 11.08 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, December 10, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE SENATE—ADDITIONAL MEMBERS.

On motion of Mr. Borden, it was ordered that the House go into Committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide for two additional members of the Senate from each of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and for three additional members of the Senate from the province of British Columbia.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC BOND PURCHASE.

On motion of Mr. White (Minister of Finance), it was ordered that the House go into Committee to-morrow to consider the following propsed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize and empower the Governor in Council to purchase at par from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company such of the three per cent bonds of the company the issue and sale of which is provided for by Chapter 98 of the Statutes of 1905, and the deed of trust set forth in schedule 'A' to said Chapter 98, as may be unsold at the time of the passing of an Act that may be founded on this resolution.

FREIGHT RATES ON HAY.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. EMMERSON: Has any action been taken in connection with the freight rates on hay from Quebec to the Eastern provinces? I have a telegram from the secretary of the Board of Trade from Sackville, New Brunswick, as follows:

Sackville, N.B., Dec. 9.

The Hon. H. R. Emmerson, M. P.
Ottawa, Ont.:

Insistent rumour current in Sackville and Amherst that Intercolonial recently has put in force greatly reduced rate on hay from Quebec points to Sydney; matter has provoked great deal of resentment among farmers in this vicinity; report from credible sources.

I desire to know if this is true, and what action has been taken by the Government with respect to freight rates on hay, either temporary or permanent.

Mr. BORDEN: No action has been taken up to the present time.

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE

Bill No. 24, to amend the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act—Mr. Borden—read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon.

On Section 1—appointment of comptroller and officers:

Mr. OLIVER: Has it been brought to the Premier's attention that there is a reason for the appointment of an assistant commissioner for each of the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, not necessarily to be specified in the Bill, but that there should be, in practice, an officer of the force actually resident at the capital of each province, such capital being, of course, the centre of the administration of the law for that province so that a more intimate touch could be kept between the force and the provincial administration of law?

Mr. BORDEN: That has not been brought to my attention, but, as my hon. friend now suggests it, I shall be very glad to discuss it with the permanent head of the force and with the commissioner.

Mr. OLIVER: I am surprised that the matter has not been brought to his attention, as it has been the subject of very considerable discussion between the provincial Government of Alberta and the late Government. It was represented that the absence of any high authority of the force at the centre of the administration of law in the province of Alberta had resulted in more or less serious delays in the transmission of requisitions and orders between the provincial authorities and the police. I do not like to urge the matter, but I will be glad to have the Prime Minister looked carefully into it. I am satisfied there would be a great advantage in the administration of the force if that change were made.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not recollect this matter being brought to my attention, and I am informed by the acting head of the department that it has not been. He informs me, however, that the subject has been under consideration by the acting permanent head, and I think they have in mind at the present time the considerations which my hon. friend has urged. I would gather that these considerations have impressed themselves in a somewhat favourable way upon those who are responsible for the administration of the department. I cannot say more than that at the present.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I happen to be somewhat familiar with the question, because I was for some years responsible for the administration of this department, and I discussed it many a time with the comptroller. It is altogether a matter of discipline. As everybody knows, the discipline of the force has been maintained at a very high standard, and that is done simply because the organization is perfect in itself, and because the commissioner is absolutely responsible. There has been some local jealousy between Alberta and Saskatchewan. The headquarters of the force is stationed in Saskatchewan, and Alberta not unnaturally feels a little jealous. At one time the suggestion was made to me that there should be two commissioners, one for Alberta and one for Saskatchewan, a suggestion which I absolutely rejected and I suppose my right hon. friend would be similarly advised by his officers. Then, it was suggested that there might be a deputy for Saskatchewan and a deputy for Alberta. For my part, that is a suggestion to which I would not be favourable.

Mr. BORDEN: I would be very glad at some future time to consult with my hon. friend in a private way. I might be fortunate enough to gather something that would be of use from his experience as to the administration of the force.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—rank and duties of comptroller:

Mr. BORDEN: This is really for the purpose of making the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act conform with the existing practice. The salary of $5,000 has been voted from year to year, but the statute has remained unamended. This is to make it conform with the practice.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—pay of force to be fixed by Governor in Council:

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the working pay to artisans and others specially employed, I take it that that is in addition to the regular pay.

Mr. BORDEN: Yes. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked me for some information as to the present strength of the force. At the beginning of September the strength of the force was 654. The estimates for the last year provided for a strength of 700, and the acting permanent head of the force recommended some time ago that authority should be given for increasing the force to 760. He bases that recommendation upon the existence of very numerous requests from newly settled portions of territory, with very few of which he has been able to comply. On that account he thought it desirable, and in his recommendation I concur, that the force should be increased to 760.

On section 4—subsection 2—extra pay:

Mr. OLIVER: When mention was made of this proposed amendment in the newspapers, the clause which has just been read was represented as being somewhat different in its scope from what it appears in the Bill. In order that there may be no mistake about its purport I would respectfully ask the Prime Minister for an explanation.

Mr. BORDEN: The change in the law in that respect is this: Section 21, subsection 2, as it stands in the Act at present, is as follows:

The Governor in Council may authorize extra pay and allowances to be paid to members of the force serving in the Northwest territories and the Yukon territory.

We have added a few words, so that the clause as proposed reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may authorize extra pay and allowances to be paid to members of the force employed as detectives, and to those serving in the Northwest territories and the Yukon territory.

As I stated the other day men who seem qualified for detective work are selected from time to time for that work. They are trained in that work, and acquire skill, but their renumeration is so inadequate, compared with what they can obtain elsewhere, after they become so trained and experienced, that instead of re-enlisting to serve the Crown in that capacity with very great effect, they go elsewhere, and other men have to be brought on and trained. Therefore, it was recommended by the acting permanent head of the force, whose recommendation was concurred in by the commissioner, that provision should be made so that these men can be remunerated more adequately in connection with the very important duties which they discharge. That is the sole purpose of the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER: This applies only to enlisted men?

Mr. BORDEN: Only to enlisted men.

Subsection agreed to.

Bill reported.

CANADIAN-WEST INDIAN TRADE AGREEMENT.

Hon. Geo. E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide as follows:

1. That the agreement of the ninth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and twelve entered into at Ottawa by representatives appointed by the Government of Canada and by the representatives of the West Indian colonies, parties thereto, be approved.

2. That there shall be levied, collected and paid after the said agreement is in accordance with its terms brought into operation, and so long as it remains in force, on all goods enumerated in Schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies, parties thereto, when such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein if imported as aforesaid, duties of customs——

(a) At the rate of four-fifths of the several rates of duties, if any, imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country; or

(b) at the several rates of duties, if any, set opposite to each item respectively, or charged on goods as not enumerated in the column British Preferential Tariff, in Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and in any amendment thereof whichever shall be the lower rate.

3. That nothing in the next preceding paragraph shall affect the rates of duties of customs payable on raw sugar when imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein, to which the rates of duties of customs provided by tariff item 135b in Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter 10 of the statutes of 1909 apply.

4. That on and after a date to be named in a proclamation published at such time as the Governor in Council deems expedient in The Canada Gazette, the goods, enumerated in Schedule B to the said agreement shall only be entitled to the advantages or concessions provided for when such goods are conveyed by ship direct without transhipment into a sea or river port of Canada from any one of the respective colonies party to the said agreement or from one of the other colonies while entitled to the said advantages or concessions under the provisions thereof.

5. That before the discretion granted to the Governor in Council by the next preceding paragraph has been exercised provision shall be made for an effective control of rates of freight in all steamship subsidy contracts to which Canada is a party and under which steamers ply between ports in Canada and ports in the colonies which are entitled to the advantages or concessions hereby provided.

6. That the advantages or concessions granted to the colonies, parties to the said agreement, shall extend to the other colonies enumerated in Schedule D, to the said agreement for the period of three years from the date on which the said agreement shall according to its tenor come into operation.

7. That the advantages or concessions granted to the colonies, parties to the said agreement, shall extend to the United Kingdom and such of the other British colonies and possessions as may be admitted thereto by proclamation published in The Canada Gazette, so long as the colonies, parties to the said agreement, continue to be entitled to such advantages or concessions; provided, however, that nothing herein shall be held to diminish any advantages which the United Kingdom and British colonies and possessions enjoy under the British preferential tariff.

8. That the Governor in Council may make such rules and regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions and intent hereof and the said agreement.

9. That the operation of all laws inconsistent with the giving to the provisions hereof, and of the said agreement their full effect shall from time to time be suspended to the extent of such inconsistency.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce informs me, what I rather thought was the case, that the treaty has not yet been printed, and is not available for the general use of members of the House. In view of the importance of the matter I would ask my hon. friend if he would not think it desirable that the members should acquaint themselves with the terms of the treaty and that therefore it might be desirable that the resolution should stand over for a short time until the treaty has been printed and distributed.

Mr. FOSTER: The resolution is but a step in the routine and in its essential parts, is a transcript of the Bill. I suppose that it would be more businesslike and would perhaps be in accordance with the wishes of the House to defer the discussion until the Bill itself is before the House. I do not propose to go on with the second reading until the papers are printed and in possession of hon. members, but I would like to have the resolution passed. There were some copies of the agreement and of the doings of the delegation that met here printed privately and these have been distributed as far as they would go. Some members on each side of the House have received copies, but I should think that we could go on with the resolution and pass it. Then, I will introduce the Bill and the Bill will be before members of Parliament and we will not go any further with it until all the papers are before the House.

Mr. CARVELL: That seems to be a reasonable suggestion but, in the meantime, would it not be possible for the minister to state what changes are proposed in the Canadian customs tariff except the general change on dutiable articles owing to the one-fifth preference which is granted? Unfortunately, we have not the text of the agreement in our hands and, as I understand, there are to be some additions to the general duties imposed by the Canadian tariff as well as some decreases. I would like if the minister could give us that information.

Mr. FOSTER: We are dealing now entirely with the agreement between Canada and the West Indies. All that is involved in the agreement, as far as the agreement itself is concerned, is contained in the agreement itself and is embodied as it is proposed in the resolution. As a result of the agreement, when it has been passed by the House, there are some few adjustments that will have to be made in the tariff on some three, four or five articles.

Mr. CARVELL: I thought that possibly the minister could give us those articles.

Mr. FOSTER: The article as sugar, for instance, will have to have some adjustment in the general tariff, the articles of cocoa, lime juice, arrowroot and may be one other will also require some slight reduction but the changes will not involve anything very extended.

Mr. EMMERSON: Adjustment downward or upward?

Mr. FOSTER: Well, that will depend. These adjustments will be made in a tariff Act that will be brought down later by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, but when we come to them we can discuss those branches of the subject. What we do is to give a preference to the West Indies in three other articles and, in order to give them a preference on those articles, which are now on the free list, we have to place a duty upon them when coming from foreign countries. On cocoa beans, for instance there will have to be a general duty of not less than 75 cents per 100 pounds and that will enable the colonies that raise cocoa beans to have an advantage of this market which they could not otherwise have. Lime juice, concentrated, not refined, now free, is to be not less than 5 cents a gallon. Limes, fresh, which are now free are to be not less than 10 per cent ad valorem when imported from foreign countries. With reference to these three articles, the duty will be arranged so that a preference can be given to the colonies, that produce these more as staples. Generally speaking, what we found was that there were different climatic conditions, differences of soil and, therefore, different productions. What we wanted to do and what the colonies wished to have done was to have, in each one of them, some interest in which they would get the advantage of a preference in return for the preference that they gave to Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think it would be better for the minister to allow the House to go into Committee of the Whole and to make his explanations then because I would like to ask him a few questions and it is very difficult to do it now.

Mr. FOSTER: Yes, when we go into committee we will have a chance for conversation, but I was answering the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), who wished to know what the few proposed readjustments in the tariff would be. I was going on to explain with reference to sugar. The House will remember that there was an arrangement by which the refiners of this country were allowed to bring in at the preferential rate from foreign countries an amount equal to 20 per cent of the produce that they refined during the year. We propose to do away with that arrangement and that is why the adjustment in the sugar duties will be made necessary. Having answered these questions, perhaps my hon. friend will think it best that any other questions which he wants to ask should be deferred until we go into Committee on resolution.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee.

On paragraph 2:

Mr. FOSTER: I wish to insert in (b) the word 'tariff' before the word 'item,' so as to make it read: 'to each tariff item respectively.' After the word 'respectively' I wish to have stricken out the words 'or charged on goods as not enumerated,' which appear to be surplusage.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): This seems quite complicated and I desire information. As I understand it, when Canada in 1898 gave a preference to the British West Indies under the Canadian Customs Act of that year, it was always expected that in consideration of that, the British West Indies would some day give us preferential treatment in her markets. I think it was always the expectation that we would get that without any further consideration than that contained in our own British preferential tariff. That is, that in the event of an agreement being made, all we would expect from the British West Indies would be a preference rate in their tariff and that ours would remain as it is, as under it the British West Indies were already getting special terms. Under this agreement, I am not quite clear whether it is the intention of the Government to ask for the establishment of a further preferential rate with the West Indies in addition to the British preferential rate. If this agreement comes into force, will it happen in connection with any item mentioned in the schedule, that the British West Indies will obtain a greater preference from Canada than is contained in our preferential tariff; or, will it be, with a few exceptions, our general tariff rate, minus the twenty per cent or the preference rate, whichever will be the lower ?

Mr. FOSTER: I will explain that. It is true as my hon. friend says that in 1889 Canada gave a preference to the West Indies and has continued it up to the present time. It is not intended by this agreement to take away from the West Indies the privilege of the preference which they have enjoyed for that time, and which they enjoy at present. They have agreed to give us a preference in return, and when the mutual preference came up alongside of it, there was the question as to how long the agreement should remain in force, and it was decided that it should remain in force for ten years.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That is our present preferential tariff.

Mr. FOSTER: That is the preference provided in present agreement that we are now discussing. What is guaranteed is, that during that period of 10 years the West Indian colonies, parties to this arrangement shall not receive less preference than is stipulated for in this agreement which is 20 per cent, roughly speaking, less than the duties exacted from foreign countries. That is the guarantee in the agreement. At the present time they are receiving a greater preference than that, and it is not the intention that they shall be deprived of the greater preference they are getting now and have been getting for the last 15 years and which is being granted to Great Britain and numerous other parts of the Empire. By this agreement, they have the certainty that for ten years their preference shall never go below one-fifth; that is, that they shall not pay higher duties coming into Canada than four-fifths of what is paid on foreign imports. So much for that. That is provided for in (a).

(a) At the rate of four-fifths of the several rates of duties, if any, imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country;

To retain for them the advantages which they have been having for the last fifteen years and which we purpose they shall continue to have so long as this Parliament thinks it is right they shall, clause (b) is introduced:

(b) At the several rates of duties, if any, set opposite to each tariff item respectively, in the column British Preferential Tariff, in Schedule A to the Customs Tariffff, 1907, and in any amendment thereof whichever shall be the lower rate.

If four-fifths of the duty on the importation from a foreign country is lower than the preference rate, they get that; if the preference rate granted to a British country is lower than four-fifths of the duty imposed upon importations from a foreign country, they get the lower rate.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Then the agreement is merely an undertaking on the part of Canada to continue the British preferential rate to the British West Indies for a fixed period?

Mr. FOSTER: To continue the rates provided therein for ten years.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Our preferential rate now applies to a great many other British colonies.

Mr. FOSTER: Maybe my hon. friend might misunderstand my last remark. Did he mean to ask whether this was a guarantee that for ten years they should receive the present preferential rate?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No, the preferential rate whatever it may be.

Mr. FOSTER: That is right.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): There is to be no further tariff schedule applicable to the British West Indies under this agreement; the present British preferential tariff will continue not as to rate but as to principle.

Mr. FOSTER: That is so, and conversely the West Indian colonies give a guarantee of preference on importations from Canada. The colonies or Canada may make such changes as they like in their own tariff laws provided the minimum preference is maintained.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): There are other British colonies, such as British India, Ceylon, the Straits Settlements, and the South African Commonwealth, which are entitled to the British preferential tariff——

Mr. FOSTER : And remain so.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): They are entitled to the same preference in the British West Indian markets as Canada is under this treaty, and vice versa.

Mr. EMMERSON : As I understand it, they asked for a guarantee of ten years of the present preference, and that it was finally agreed on the part of Canada that the guarantee would be given with respect to the twenty per cent for ten years, but no guarantee would be given with regard to the greater preference which they now enjoy.

Mr. FOSTER : So far as the agreement concerning the ten-year period is concerned it simply goes this far, that during that ten years we shall always give them say, one-fifth preference, and during that time they shall always give us one-fifth preference. But during that time we may give them more than one-fifth if we like, and they may give us more than one-fifth if they like.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I asked a question a few minutes ago, and I think I may look for an answer here. I do not understand why Newfoundland is mentioned in Schedule 'D.' As I read it, that practically means that Newfoundland may send its sugar, coffee, cotton, sponges and things of that kind——

Mr. FOSTER : And bananas.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): ——and bananas, into Canada at the same rate that the British West India people do, and that Canada may send fish into Newfoundland at the same rate at which we send the same products into the British West Indies. I think that is the true interpretation of the agreement and schedule so far as Newfoundland is concerned, and it strikes me that there must be some error there.

Mr. FOSTER : We were not making a treaty with Newfoundland. This agreement is between ourselves and the West India islands participating in the agreement.

Mr. LEMIEUX : Can the hon. minister give us a list of the islands?

Mr. FOSTER : The hon. member means the islands concerned ? The list is Trinidad, British Guiana—which is part of the West Indies,—Barbados, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Antigua, St. Kitts, Dominica and Montserrat. The privileges of the arrangement for three years are extended to the Bahamas, Bermuda, British Honduras, Grenada and Jamaica. These colonies and Newfoundland are to enjoy for a limited time the benefit of the agreement so far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I assume that they get it without any reciprocal arrangement on their part.

Mr. FOSTER: That would depend as far as the West India Colonies parties to the agreement. The delegates from the West Indies were not empowered to make an arrangement with Newfoundland nor were we making an arrangement with Newfoundland. But it is the intention of the West Indian colonies to admit British countries—I believe that is their intention —on the same terms as they admit Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not expressed in the agreement.

Mr. FOSTER: It could not be expressed, because they were not making a treaty with Newfoundland. Now, my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) asks if Newfoundland was included here, because she would get much advantage out of this arrangement on her exports of like goods to Canada. Great changes in climate may take place, but of course it is not likely that in ten years Newfoundland will be in the banana belt. But Newfoundland was put in rather to show good will. I believe what is intended in the West Indies is that the products of Newfoundland shall receive the same treatment in the West Indies as the products of Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not object to putting Newfoundland in if it were put in the right place. If there has been an error, I merely wish to point it out so that there may be a correction. I would refer the hon. gentleman to clause 3:

> The conditions granted under section 2 by Canada to any of the above-mentioned colonies shall be extended to all the other colonies enumerated in Schedule B.

Now, the articles which are to be admitted into Canada at preferential rate under this agreement are enumerated in Schedule B, and they are altogether the products of tropical countries such as the West Indies. But reading this clause along with Schedule D, it means that Newfoundland shall be entitled to ship products such as sugar, sugar cane, cocoanuts, sponges, into Canada at the same rate of duty as the British West Indies under this agreement. That is obviously absurd, because Newfoundland does not produce any of the articles mentioned in Schedule D. I merely point it out, because if it was the intention of the parties to the agreement that Newfoundland products should enter the West Indies on the same terms as the Canadian products it should be so expressed, and there is time yet to make that clear.

Mr. FOSTER: I do not think that could be expressed, because the West Indian delegates were here to arrange with Canada and not with Newfoundland. Whatever they did for Newfoundland——

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Why was it put in Schedule D then? Was it to show good intentions?

Mr. FOSTER: Let us say that it was to show goodwill and sisterhood.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Why not make another schedule?

Mr. FOSTER: It is not necessary to do that. My hon. friend does not pretend that it will work any injury to Canada. It may have a little effect in disposing the people of the West India islands all the more willingly to admit the products of Newfoundland to their countries at the same rates. However, as I said, Newfoundland was included in the agreement, and we here cannot change the agreement. If my hon. friend can show that there is any very great danger to Canada in the matter, it might be worth while to revise the agreement, but that would take a different process from what we can bring into force here.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Is it the intention under the agreement that the preference shall only apply to goods coming to Canadian ports?

Mr. FOSTER: We will come to that a little later and my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) will see what we mean when we come to it.

Mr. LOGGIE: If I understand the minister correctly, we are to receive for three years the goods from Jamaica at a reduced rate of duty. Does Jamaica in turn receive goods from Canada at a lower rate of duty during that period than from foreign countries?

Mr. FOSTER: There are certain parties to this agreement. The West Indian colonies, the names of which I read to the committee, are the only ones in the West Indies that are parties to the agreement. Jamaica is not a party, and so is not bound by the terms of the agreement. We have for fifteen years been giving a preference to Jamaica, the Bahamas, Bermuda, and Honduras, and it would probably be a hardship if those colonies which are not parties to the agreement should have a continued preference in our markets without giving any concessions in return. But both parties to the negotiations were decidedly of the opinion that the door should not be shut at the present time, and that for three years the treatment accorded to Jamaica, the Bahamas, Bermuda, and Honduras, should be the same as it has been in the past.

On paragraph 3:

Mr. FOSTER: If my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) will refer to the Tariff Act, he will find that, as amended in 1907, section 135 (b) makes a provision by which the refiners of beet sugar manufactured from beets raised in Canada have the privilege of importing a certain quantity of sugar from foreign countries at a reduced rate. That legislation does not expire till 1914. and this agreement makes no change in regard thereto, the provision in section 3 being framed to meet that case. The undertaking of the Canadian Government is that when this legislation runs out in 1914, there shall be an adjustment to meet that case rather than the one provided for in section 135 (b).

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But you are under obligations not to renew it when it expires?

Mr. FOSTER: We guarantee that it shall not extend beyond the period of the present legislation.

On paragraph 4:

Mr. FOSTER: The proclamation referred to in paragraph 4 has reference to this item, and not to the whole Act. Sections 4 and 5 of the Act will not be operative until they are proclaimed to be in force. This proclamation may be issued some time during the period of the treaty, or it may not. If at any time it becomes apparent, after a consultation, that the traffic arrangements between Canada and West Indian ports are such as to form a reasonable foundation for the proclamation, then, if an agreement is reached in the matter, and control of rates is established, a proclamation may be issued which will make it necessary that to obtain the preference either in West Indian colonies or in Canada, the goods must come direct to a port in Canada, or go direct from Canada to a port in the West Indian Islands. This matter was fully discussed in committee, and it was felt that a good deal of care ought to be taken with reference thereto. It would not be advantageous to West Indian ports, under present conditions existing in regard to steam communication between those islands and Canada, that they should be denied the privilege of sending goods to Canada in bond through the United States. They were of the opinion, however, that as soon as these communications were reasonably established, the subject might then be taken up, and if concurrence was had—as Canada would not like to act without the consent of the West Indies, and vice versa—and provided also that there was a fair and proper control of rates, it would be advantageous to both countries, and conduce to the benefit of traffic between them, if such a condition of affairs was brought about by proclamation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, agreeing as I do with the practice of limiting this preference, as well as the British preference, to goods coming by water direct to Canadian ports, I should have been glad if my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce could have held out to us the hope that at an early date this proclamation would be issued. But, on the contrary, my hon. friend suggests that the proclamation may issue at some time during the existence of this treaty, or it may not. As this treaty is to last for ten years, the promise is not a very satisfactory one. Why should it not be possible to secure an efficient and proper service between Canadian and West Indian ports, and to do so in the almost immediate future? Why should we have, year after year, an unsatisfactory service which renders it desirable for our people, when they want to go to the West Indies, to proceed to New York and take a steamer there, and makes it advantageous for them to ship their goods by way of New York? Why should not this freight and passenger business be done through Canadian ports? Is Canada too poor to inaugurate such a service as will be suitable for the conveying of passengers and freight under satisfactory conditions? We have millions of dollars to spend for other purposes; why should we not spend a few hundred thousand dollars, if need be, for the purpose of establishing a proper and satisfactory service between the principal ports of the Maritime provinces and the West Indies the whole year round, and St. Lawrence river ports during the summer months? It is provided in paragraph 5.

That before the discretion granted to the Governor in Council by the next preceding paragraph has been exercised provision shall be made for an effective control of rates of freight in all steamship subsidy contracts to which Canada is a party and under which steamers ply between ports in Canada and ports in the colonies which are entitled to the advantages or concessions hereby provided.

What is to hinder my hon. friend from having to-morrow an effective control of freight rates? This Government is to day giving a subsidy to steamers plying to the West Indies. Probably that subsidy is not sufficient to secure a good service but it is quite within the power of the minister to impose conditions which will give an effective control over the rates and compel the companies to make those rates just as satisfactory as the rates between the West Indies and the port of New York. Therefore it seems to me that unless my hon. friend has had this provision put in the treaty merely to hold out to the people of the Maritime provinces and to the city of Montreal, and Quebec, the hope that this preference will be given some time, I think my hon. friend ought not to be so vague in his statement as to when this proclamation is likely to be issued, and effective steps ought to be taken in the near future to so limit the preference as to give Canadian ports what I think is only a legitimate advantage. Too long has Canada allowed imports from England and the West Indies to come into Canada by way of American ports, Portland, Boston and New York, and I think the time has come, especially now that we have negotiated this treaty with the West Indies and Parliament is asked to approve of it, when effective and determined steps should be taken to secure, as far as possible, the bringing of imports from those islands through Canadian ports.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend has raised some interesting questions. I shall not use a tu quoque argument but I notice a few things as a reply to his questions: Why has not this been done, why has not that been done? That was a question which troubled my hon. friend during the whole time he was a member of the Government in power and the Government did take action, and had very strong support from Great Britain for ten or eleven years when Great Britain implemented the subsidy which Canada was giving by a very handsome amount, paying, I think, one half of the whole subsidy. That held for fifteen years, and at the end of the fifteen years there was still not only not an efficient service, but I am not characterizing it too strongly when I say an inefficient service between Canada and the West Indies. I go back a little further. When I was first Minister of Marine and Fisheries I took up the question of this subsidy with the West Indies; I was the first minister to subsidize a line there. I worked at the problem during the period I was in office and the Government of which I was a member worked at it, but it was not solved. For fifteen years after that, with a treasury overflowing, and a gentleman with just such strong sentiments on this point as my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley)—having a very strong influence on that Government he could not say, when that Government went out, that an efficient and proper service was carried on between Canada and the West Indies. I will not give way by a single letter or syllable to my hon. friend in saying that, if it were possible, all the goods that come overseas to Canada should come through Canadian ports. I believe in that principle, and just as soon as and as fast as it can be done without doing injury to the trade of Canada—because we must recollect that we have certain climatic and geographical conditions which place us at some disadvantage, and which we have to overcome by greater energy and enterprise, and also by greater cost of service—I am strongly of the opinion that it ought to be done. But to-day the condition of the service between this country and the West Indies is not such as to warrant the proclamation issuing immediately when this agreement goes into effect.

My hon. friend, as he thinks of the service as it is to-day, must also be of that opinion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I complain of is the long delay my hon. friend seems to fore-shadow.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend complains of himself. He had fifteen years and did nothing effective and yet he complains of my year's delay. Fifteen parts of that complaint my hon. friend must direct to himself. The other one-part he may direct to me. But what has been done?

The committee will recollect that last year I brought down quite a large vote for improved steamship service and we debated the question in the House and practically agreed on what we thought ought to be the basis of an efficient service between this country and the West Indies.

The House willingly voted the amount I asked. I asked for tenders and the tenders came in some time in October. When those tenders were opened, for whatever reason I am not quite ready to say, but there must have been several reasons, they were not sufficient, to my mind, to insure us the required service. There was not a breadth of competition and there was not a detail of conditions which made those tenders to my mind what the department required and what I thought the country would require. I therefore extended the time to the fifteenth of December. I hope we shall then get wider and better tenders. We shall see what we can get at that time. Just at this present time it is a little more difficult than it was a few years ago, to get steamships to enter into a new contract for improved services between the West Indian islands and Canada. The position of the shipping trade to-day is so good that every one is occupied and every ship is loaded and there is not the same desire and facility to engage in new operations as outlined in the trade conditions between ourselves and the West Indies. But I hope we shall get effective tenders and if we do I can assure the committee that the service will be put into operation as soon as possible. But we may just as well open our eyes to it, there are difficulties in conducting a steamship service between Canada and the West Indies. I have met them, my hon. friends met them when they were in office and they are there to-day. The conditions under the preference will be more favourable than ever they were before and I hope we will be able to conquer these difficulties and get an efficient service. The West Indian people say: We get a preference from you but if you tie us down to direct shipments it is possible that the steamships will take all of that preference and we will get none; therefore, before we agree to direct shipment, we must have some control over the rates; we cannot control the rates in the West Indies, therefore we must ask Canada, which has an equal interest in the matter, to control the rates. My hon. friend says we have control of the rates. So we have; wherever we subsidize steamers we have a clause which gives the department or the minister a certain control over rates. It is a difficult thing to operate as my hon. friend probably knows, and I have been greatly puzzled to know what efficient modus operandi could be put into effect in order to get at the basis of information and to enforce that control. There must be some control or else we are likely to lose all the benefit of the preference because of increased rates.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there only one subsidized line?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes. It goes around the rim of the islands, from St. John and Halifax down to British Guiana.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We all remember that when the late Government asked Parliament to ratify the treaty with France, there was a provision in that treaty that the preference given to France would apply only to goods brought direct through a Canadian port. Some people said that this was going to be very unsatisfactory to Canada because there would be difficulties about steamship service, and the Intercolonial railway was not competent to give quick dispatch, and so on. A great many objections were raised, but the treaty was put through with that clause in it, and to-day, as I understand it, the preference given to France applies only to goods brought direct through Canadian ports. Has my hon. friend heard of any special dissatisfaction resulting from that arrangement?

Mr. FOSTER: No. The arrangement is a little wider than my hon. friend makes it. It is not confined to shipments direct from a French port to a Canadian port and vice versa.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Direct to a Canadian port.

Mr. FOSTER: They may come through Great Britain or through countries that have favoured nation treatment, which enlarges it somewhat. But I cannot say, so far as I have informed my mind upon it, that I have heard any expression of discontent. But that was a basic condition upon which the French treaty was made, and you could not have made a French treaty on any other condition. I think there is some difference between the position of France and Canada, and the position of the West Indies and Canada, taking into account our present methods of steamship service.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): While I am disposed to agree with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in saying, as I think he did say, that before goods imported from the United Kingdom could enjoy our preferential tariff these importations should enter through Canadian ports, I am also disposed to agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that, for the present at least, it would be impossible and inadvisable to put into operation this particular clause of the West India-Canada agreement. The whole agreement is rather (an indifferent) value to this country, or, to put it in another way, by reason of this agreement I do not hope to see any abnormal development of trade between the British West Indies and Canada. Without this agreement, there would be a gradual growth in that trade, but the agreement will not in itself develop that trade very rapidly. Whether it is a success or not will largely depend upon the character of the steamship service in operation between Canada and the British West Indies.

Mr. FOSTER: Quite correct.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think our trade in the past has been injured, in some degree at least, by reason of the fact that the steamship service between Canada and the West Indies was not very well arranged and also owing to the uncertain ity of the tenure of subsidies held by steamship companies. It would seem almost imperative that the minister should let Parliament know, at least it is desirable that we should know, if possible what the steamship service between Canada and the West Indies will be before we can pass judgment upon this agreement. At all events, upon the probable effects of the agreement. It is unfortunate, of course, that the minister has had to postpone dealing with the tenders, or rather that he has delayed the period for the reception of the tenders until December 15. Had those tenders been received and dealt with by the minister prior to this date, it would have been much easier to gauge the possible results of this agreement. I do not think it will ever be possible for the Government to obtain from any person or persons or from any company tenders which will meet his desires under the conditions set forth in the tenders issued by the department. For instance tenders were asked for an alternative service between Montreal and the British West Indies. Now, with all due deference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the officers of his department, I say it is utterly impossible for any steamship service operating between Montreal and the British West Indies to secure any traffic that will warrant any great expenditure of money, and such a service would not be of any special value to the western portions of Canada, Ontario and the provinces west. I wish to submit, not because I represent a constituency which has practically built up the greater part of the trade between Canada and the West Indies, namely, the port of Halifax, but for higher and wider considerations, that if ever a satisfactory steamship service is established between the West Indies and Canada it must be a service of steamships departing from and arriving at the port of Halifax.

Mr. FOSTER: Has not my hon. friend got into another discussion?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I am not going to elaborate the question at the present time I shall return to it on another occasion. Just at present, the steamship service which we have, provides for calls at St. John on the inward voyage before reaching Halifax, and for calls at St. John on the outward voyage after leaving Halifax, and the result is a service that is not satisfactory to either St. John or Halifax, nor can it ever be satisfactory so long as this system continues. It would be better for the Government to give a subsidy, of the same amount if necessary for a direct service from each of the ports of Halifax and St. John, and if the Government feels impressed with the claims of Montreal, it might give that service the same subsidy, or give no subsidy to any steamship service at all. Possibly by not giving a subsidy to any steamship line the difficulty would be solved all the more readily, and perhaps it would be better for the future. I had hoped that before this agreement was presented to Parliament in the shape of a Bill that we would have had some information from the Government as to the disposition made by the department respecting the tenders for a steamship service between Canada and the West Indies.

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry the minister does not see his way clear to bring into effect at once that portion of the agreement which provides that goods coming into Canada under this preference should come through Canadian ports. But I realize there are many difficulties in his way, and I think the minister has taken the House fairly well into his confidence, and there is a good deal of logic in everything he has said this afternoon. I was somewhat surprised in reading the report of the conference to find it stated by one of the delegates from Barbados, I think, that, there was really a difference of four cents on the 100 pounds in the freight rates on goods shipped via New York as compared with the Halifax or St. John route.

Mr. MACDONALD: Which way is the difference?

Mr. CARVELL: It is against the Halifax and St. John route, and in favour of the New York route. It seems to me that that is the crux of the whole situation. Of course the minister will pardon me if I say that all this agreement amounts to is a mere nothing because it is only trying to drive trade through unnatural channels, but I feel like assisting it in every way I can and I think the House should consider the matter as a business proposition and see how far that trade can be driven if we are going to drive it at all.

Mr. RHODES: Surely my hon. friend is not referring to reciprocity?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not referred to reciprocity and I do not intend to refer to it. It seems to bother my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes); it is probably a case of the guilty mind which knows no rest. I want to be fair to my hon. friend, and I have given the hon. minister credit for taking the real business-like, logical view of this matter. If we are going to drive trade into unnatural channels, let us drive it and drive it vigorously. In my opinion, it can only be done by an up to date, efficient steamship service in conjunction with the railway service. I do not believe my hon. friend can ever make a success of the effort to increase trade between Canada and the West Indies by his monthly—I think it is —circuitous steamship service which has been going on for the last fifteen or twenty years. I almost forget the particulars, but I know there is a service from Montreal in the summer time and one from St. John in the winter time. A steamer coming from the West Indies calls at St. John, discharges cargo, goes to Halifax, stays there for a week or two, discharges cargo, takes on some more, comes back to St. John, goes through the same operation there and goes on to the West Indies. If a man in the Barbados, or any of the West Indies, wants an ordinary article sent there, whether oats, hay, lumber, or potatoes, the difficulty is that the service is so intermittent and the time between sailings is so great that he says: It will take me so long to get these goods by Canadian ports that I will order them through United States ports. In the United States they have a splendid service. I have not been to the West Indies, but members of my family have, members of this House have been there, and the minister himself has also been there. Any person who has been there will tell you that they have an up to date service from Boston and New York. There are steamers running every three or four days and a man can cable an order for a shipment of hay, oats, lumber, fish or any other such product and get the goods immediately. If we are ever going to make a success of this thing we have to have, not only a better steamship service, but more steamships. I believe that the only efficient way is to give two services, one from St. John and one from Halifax. In the summer time it may be possible to go around by the circuitous route, but it takes too long to get goods forwarded from Montreal to the West Indies or vice versa in that way, except it be sugar or something that is being brought back in large quantities for manufacturing purposes. Within the last three or four years I have had a number of conversations upon this question with certain gentlemen representing the Canadian Pacific railway and, among them, the vice president of the Canadian Pacific railway himself. We have been trying to develop a business, not so much with the West Indies as with Cuba, in potatoes and we have succeeded to some extent. I was told by a representative of the Canadian Pacific railway that if a subsidy were given and a genuine up to date service were provided running direct from St. John there are many articles, such as hay, oats, and products of Ontario and the West, that are now going to the West Indies through American ports, that could be shipped straight from Canadian ports. If the minister would take this phase of the question into consideration and see if some agreement could not be made with the railway companies and if he could not bring himself to the conclusion that there ought to be two services instead of one provided at regular intervals, having it so arranged that there would be a service arriving in the West Indies every ten days instead of every three or four weeks, he would be in a better position to do business. But, I am afraid that if he keeps to the present antiquated steamship service with only one line following this circuitous route between St. John and Halifax and vice versa, he will never succeed in diverting trade from American ports, because, after all, these American ports are our chief competitors for the West Indian business. I am not saying this in a fault-finding spirit, but I am giving the minister the impression that I have derived from talking with men who know something about this question. The solution of this question, and which would bring it back to the object sought to be attained by my hon. friend from St. John and others namely, that all goods, to be entitled to this preference, should pass through British ports, can only be attained by increasing the number of steamers and by providing a better steamship service.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was not in when the minister discussed this question with reference to the matter of limiting the preference on goods that come through our own ports. I regret that I did not have an opportunity of hearing him. I have on the Order Paper a resolution dealing with the question which I hope at a later period of the session to discuss. I, therefore, will not go into the question just now at any greater length. A remark made by my hon. friend from Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell), struck me particularly, and that was that there is a difference of 4 cents per 100 pounds as between the cost of freight going through Canadian and American ports.

Mr. FOSTER: That may be occasional. It might be less or more just at that particular time to which the hon. gentleman's remark applied.

Mr. CARVELL: I think that referred to the winter season when the St. Lawrence was frozen over. I do not think that there is that difference in the summer time.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understood my hon. friend to say that the difference existed as between transportation from the Maritime provinces and American ports. If that difference does exist in any permanent way it is a matter which, wrapped up as it is with the solution of the larger problem, is very important and one that must be overcome. I really cannot understand how it is that such a difference should exist. It is a well known principle to the cost of transportation that you can carry products by sea a great many more miles than you can by land for the same cost, and the fact that there is a longer haul by water and therefore a less haul by land going through Canadian ports than through American ports ought to create an advantage by which trade ought to go through our ports as cheaply as it goes through American ports. The solution of this steamship problem must go with the treaty if it is going to be a success. I see no reason why we should not have two lines from the West Indies connecting with our maritime ports in the winter time at least. As to the difficulties which have been suggested on account of the closeness of the colonies to some of the American ports, as compared with Canadian ports, I do not think there is very much in that as far as our staple products are concerned. The staples of Canada which can be sold in the West Indies are usually purchased under the condition that they are not required for a week or two, and they must necessarily be purchased by parties in business, or parties who will arrange in advance for their receipt. Looking at the trade returns there must be a tremendous amount of Canadian goods of all kinds which can displace American products which go to the West Indies. I am sure that the minister will have the greatest possible interest and support from gentlemen on this side of the House in applying himself to really giving Canada, if he can, some substantial business as a result of the arrangement which he has made with the West Indies. But, business will not flow merely by writing this agreement in documents. It requires to be obtained by implementing efforts on the part of the minister.

On paragraph 7:

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): What is the purpose of that?

Mr. FOSTER: Whatever they give to each they will give to the United Kingdom, and so far as Canada is concerned that amounts to nothing more than we are giving now. On the part of the West Indian colonies it will be a distinct change with regard to the United Kingdom.

Mr. CARVELL: In what proportion of percentage will this preference allow these goods to come into Canada to a greater extent than they come in now under the British preference?

Mr. FOSTER: This agreement does not enlarge the preferences that are given already by Canada to any part of the British Empire.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not what I mean. The British preference to-day allows molasses, cocoa, fruit, &c., to come in under the preferential rate; to what extent, if any, does this increase the preference?

Mr. FOSTER: As a matter of fact, if you confine yourself to what is the minimum that must be granted to the West Indian colonies, and still keep the agreement we are giving a much larger preference now.

Mr. NESBITT: This clause reads:

That the advantages or concessions granted to the colonies, parties to the said agreement, shall extend to the United Kingdom and such of the other British colonies and possessions as may be admitted thereto by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette.

To be entitled to the same conditions, would the United Kingdom have to be proclaimed in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. FOSTER: The United Kingdom has its preference now, a much larger preference than the one-fifth which may be the minimum preference to the West Indian colonies. That preference is not curtailed, nor is any action necessary by proclamation to continue it. But, we might go still further. There are certain parts of the British Dominions that have not preferential arrangements; for instance Australia has no preferential arrangement; our liberty is absolutely intact; we may to-morrow make an arrangement with Australia and admit her to preference, and we may take other outlying parts of the British Empire and admit them to preference in addition to these which we have now, which I think very probably will be done.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): There is a provision that tariff item 137 (a) be repealed, and that item provides that: 'Molasses of cane, testing under 35 degrees by polariscope when imported for use in the manufacture of compressed food for live stock, is entered free in Canada.' I suppose the assumption is that something will take its place. The agreement, when contemplating the placing of a duty upon articles which are now free, places these altogether in Schedule C, and I wondered why item 137 (a) was not placed in that schedule. Is it the intention of the Government that a duty be levied upon imports under this item as against foreign countries, and that it be free to the British West Indies?

Mr. FOSTER: The contention of the British West Indian delegates was that if 137 (a) remained, their molasses of different kinds would be cut out from a considerable portion of legitimate export to this country. This molasses comes in from the United States for certain purposes. The contention of the delegates was that a great deal of real molasses came in free to Canada under the guise of being used in this way, and the statistics seemed to prove that. This is meant to give fair preference in favour of the molasses of the West Indies.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Has the minister made any progress with the matter of lessened cable rates which was much discussed during the conference?

Mr. FOSTER: I think I can say yes, but I am not prepared to give the details now. I took the matter up with the British Government and we had several conferences while I was in England. I am not at liberty to go into details, but I think I may say that there is every prospect of a diminution in the cable rates. These rates, owing to varied conditions which we can discuss when the matter comes up, are the highest in the world. I think they run up to seven shillings a word to British Guiana. The determination is that these rates are abnormally high and must be reduced, and I hope I shall be able to announce, before long, the details of a satisfactory reduction.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I understand from the Minister of Finance that the proposed changes in the tariff made necessary by this agreement—I have reference to the items in Schedule C—will not be made until he presents his budget, and therefore no part of the treaty will come into effect before that.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): That is my present intention. It is, I think, the proper way to deal with the matter. There will be a number of tariff changes, owing to the agreement, going into operation, and a convenient time to make these changes would appear to be on bringing down the Budget.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce tell me what is the difference in rates from Canada to the West Indies as compared with those from the United States to the West Indies? I noticed as compared with a report that there had been a break in the cable between the United States and the West Indies, and the announced rate of cabling to be done from Nova Scotia was very much higher.

Mr. FOSTER: If you take the line which runs from Halifax to Bermuda and from Halifax to Jamaica, which stands, so to speak, by itself, the rates are very reasonable. But for all communications to the West India Islands beyond these, whether they go by that line from Halifax or whether they go round by the United States, the rates are high, and they are all at the same height.

Resolution reported.

Mr. FOSTER thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, respecting an agreement between Canada and certain of the West Indian Islands. He said: I desire to lay on the table of the House in connection with this agreement a very exhaustive return of the trade transactions between the West Indies and Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom, compiled from the West Indian blue books and statistics, in so far as they are available, and bringing the figures down to about 1911.

Mr. HENDERSON: Will that return be printed for the use of members?

Mr. FOSTER: I think it would be of use if it were printed. One copy is entirely insufficient, and to make typewritten copies would take a long time.

Mr. CARVELL: Does this return go very much further than the information in the Weekly Report issued by the department? That seems to be a very exhaustive report.

Mr. FOSTER: The document will be printed in the Weekly Report, and probably before the end of the year. I will make inquiry into that, and if what I have said is correct, there is no need to have two printed.

Mr. HENDERSON: I think that is sufficient.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Does the minister propose proceeding with the Bill?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN: There is not much satisfaction in waiting until the end of the year.

Mr. FOSTER: I suppose the House does not wish to go on with the Bill until it has the information before it. For my part I would like to pass the Bill and have it put through, but I quite understand that the House must have the necessary information. If we can get it printed before we rise for the Christmas holidays, I suppose there will be no objection to going on with the Bill, and if not, we will not press it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient in connection with the Bill now before this House intituled An Act to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, to provide:

(a) That from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding thirty-five million dollars for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire;

(b) That the said sum shall be used and applied under the direction of the Governor in Council in the construction and equipment of battleships or armoured cruisers of the most modern and powerful type;

(c) That the said ships when constructed and equipped shall be placed by the Governor in Council at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the empire; and

(d) That the said sum shall be paid, used and applied, and the said ships shall be constructed and placed at the disposal of His Majesty subject to such terms, conditions and arrangements as may be agreed upon between the Governor in Council and His Majesty's Government.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to say that, after looking over the Bill carefully, my judgment is that, according to our procedure, it should have been initiated by a resolution considered in Committee of the Whole. But as the Bill, with the consent and upon the instructions of the House, was formally introduced and read the first time, and will stand until this resolution is considered, and, I presume, referred to the Committee of the Whole House to which the Bill will be referred, I imagine that the present action on this resolution is the only proper one that can be taken, and that it will correct the procedure when we reach the stage of the second reading of the Bill. But I would like to say in connection with this that at least I hope it will not be regarded as a precedent for avoiding the introduction of money measures by resolution, as provided for under our procedure and practice.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee, (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

Resolution reported.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the order for the consideration of the report of the committee upon this resolution be the first order after questions by members on Thursday next, and thereafter have precedence over all other business except questions by members until the House adjourns for Christmas recess.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are quite a number of motions for returns which will come up as a matter of course and which, if not reached to-morrow on account of any discussion that may arise, ought to be given an opportunity of going through before the Christmas vacation.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend refers to motions for the production of papers?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes.

Mr. BORDEN: I shall be quite prepared to call these up.

Motion agreed to.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Bill No. 22, respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal—Mr. Hazen—read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Has this Bill been approved of by the Montreal Harbour Commissioners?

Mr. HAZEN: This Bill was prepared after consultation with the harbour commissioners; it was submitted to them for their consideration and approval. The Bill is of a very simple character. At the present time there is a divided control over the waters of the harbour, because the main ship channel of the St. Lawrence river runs through the harbour, and under existing legislation that ship channel is under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, while the rest of the waters of the harbour are subject to the control of the harbour commissioners. This Bill is introduced for the purpose of placing all the waters in the harbour under the control of the Montreal Harbour Commissioners.

On section 9—seizure of vessels:

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to explain this clause?

Mr. HAZEN: When that section was passed the harbour commissioners of Montreal acted also as the pilotage authority in connection with the waters of the Montreal harbour. Years ago they ceased to be the pilotage authority, and they have now nothing to do with pilotage dues or any proceedings in connection therewith; therefore, it is not necessary to embody that provision in the statute.

Bill reported.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill No. 27, to amend the Canada Shipping Act—Mr. Hazen—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. HAZEN: This Bill was before the committee a few days ago, when its terms were very thoroughly discussed, and my attention was called, I think by my hon. friend the member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), to section 582, which gave the minister the power of appointment of persons to the Board of Steamboat Inspectors. The hon. gentleman directed my attention to the fact that there was no limitation as to the number of persons the minister might appoint. I thought the point was very well taken, and when we come to section 582 I intend to move an amendment to that clause, and to add after the word 'persons' in the third line, the words, 'not exceeding three in number,' so that the number of persons appointed by the minister will be limited. The clause will then read:

There shall be a board, to be called the Board of Steamboat Inspection, to be composed of the inspectors and such other persons, not exceeding three in number, as the minister may appoint.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many steamboat inspectors are there at present?

Mr. HAZEN: In the whole Dominion?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: In most provinces there is one steamboat inspector. I think in the Maritime provinces there are two. The inspector for New Brunswick also acts as inspector for Prince Edward Island. There is an inspector for Nova Scotia. In the province of Quebec and Ontario there are more inspectors than that, and there are also inspectors for the Western provinces and British Columbia. There are ten or twelve inspectors altogether.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Then we are to understand that in addition to the 10 or 12 inspectors who compose the board, the minister proposes to limit the additional number to three, so that the board will be composed of 15?

Mr. HAZEN: Inspectors are always busy with their duties and sometimes it is difficult to get together enough of them to constitute a board, and the reason we are asking that the minister may have power to add several to the board who are not inspectors, is that in practice we have had difficulties actually occur. Last summer when I was in England, Mr. Adams, who had been chairman of the Board of Inspectors for many years, asked for leave of absence with a view to obtaining superannuation which he afterwards obtained. The department appointed another man to discharge the duties. That gentleman unfortunately got ill and the department was actually left in the position of having no one to appoint as chairman with the requisite qualifications. A man may be an admirable inspector and yet not have the necessary qualifications to act as chairman of the board. If we had then had this provision the minister could have at once appointed the deputy minister or the chief engineer to act as chairman, but it was impossible to do it under the existing law, and the department was actually hampered in its work because of the lack of some provision of that sort. This amendment is simply to overcome that difficulty. There is no salary fixed to be paid to the persons so appointed, the idea being that departmental officers already in receipt of salaries would be appointed to that work.

Mr. SINCLAIR : I see no objection to the proposals of the minister in the Bill. The only criticism I would make is that the board appears to me to be of unweildy size. There is a member in each province, and as it has certain duties to perform the difficulty of getting these people to meet, or even of getting a quorum of them together, would be very great. While I have no suggestion as to how that can be remedied, it strikes me that it is a practical difficulty. Possibly some method might be devised by which an executive committee of this board might be so organized that it could deal with any questions that would arise. I am aware that when Mr. Adams was in charge he was practically the whole board, and he was so well posted in all matters coming up in relation to their duties that he did not require even to consult the other members of the board very often, and I can conceive that as he has retired it will now be necessary to make some new arrangement. I wish the minister would consider the importance of making the executive of the board smaller.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What qualifications are required for the position?

Mr. HAZEN: The inspector has to pass a technical examination at Ottawa, set by technical officers to show that he is fit for the position.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I heard some years ago inspectors were very easy in their inspections. I have heard some complaints in the city of Quebec about the inspection of certain boats. The question is a very serious one. Of course if you get good men you have to give them good salaries, and you must provide also that the examination is a very severe one. There have been so many accidents on the river of late that I would urge upon my hon. friend to be very careful in the selection of his inspectors.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman is absolutely right about that, and I think he is right in saying that years ago the qualifications demanded were not as high as in the last few years. My information is that the examination which the inspectors now have to undergo is of such a character as to insure the appointment only of men who are thoroughly qualified to inspect ships and grant certificates.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The inspection applies to sea-going as well as inland navigation?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the average salary of an inspector?

Mr. HAZEN: They begin at about $1,400 and run up to something like $1,800 or $2,000.

Mr. HEPBURN: Who examines these men as to qualifications?

Mr. HAZEN: The examination paper is prepared by the chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspectors, and the answers are examined by the board. For years the paper was set by Mr. Adams who was referred to by the hon. member from Guysboro and he was, I think, a very capable man, technically speaking.

On section 1—wrecked ships may be registered:

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not aware that there is any general provision in the department through which the evidence required under subsections A, B, C can come regularly before the minister.

Mr. HAZEN: I think there is a provision for that now. Reports from the technical officer are approved by the Deputy Minister, and a report is made to council. The procedure is that the technical officer brings the matter to the notice of the minister, the minister looks into it, and the deputy minister passes upon it, and then the minister's report is sent to council recommending the change of name, or what ever is necessary. That is being done almost every week of the year. It has been done for years past, it is exactly the same machinery as has been in operation, and, so far as my information goes, it has been sufficient to safeguard the public interest.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Would it be different if the minister happened to be absent?

Mr. HAZEN: If the minister were absent of course there would be difficulty, for if there were no one acting as minister in his place, there would be nobody to sign the report to council, and council will never act except on the report of the responsible minister. As a rule, as my hon. friend knows, if a minister of any department is away for any length of time, he gets some other minister to act in his place, and that minister can sign his reports to council.

Mr. McKENZIE: Suppose there is a wreck at North Sydney, at St. John, at Halifax, or at any other port, the ship master, or those in charge, find that they have to furnish evidence to the satisfaction of the minister. There is no machinery through which they can furnish that evidence, so far as the Act shows on the face of it. There is what I might call a private practice which has grown up in the department, but of which the public generally know nothing, until they put themselves in communication with the department. If this Act or some general regulation of the department provided that the captain or the owner could go with the proper proofs before the customs officer, the county court judge, a judge of the Supreme Court, or some other public official, that official would receive the evidence and pass upon it, and it could be sent to the minister without the party having first to make application to the department to ascertain what proofs there was and how it should be given. I have had some experience in connection with the law as it stood, and we had always to approach the department to ascertain how the proof should be given and what kind of proof would be recognized, and it was a very round-about way of getting what was necessary.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand the suggestion of my hon. friend to be this, that it would facilitate matters if the department passed some general regulation as to what it would regard as satisfactory proof in such cases, and if that regulation was placed in the hands of collectors of customs or other officials at the different ports, so that the captain or owner of a vessel in trouble could apply to them and find out at once what kind of proof it would be necessary to furnish to the department without his coming to the department. I think the suggestion is a very good one, and I will certainly call the attention of the officials of the department who have been dealing with this matter to it. I see no reason why it should not be acted upon.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

DISMISSALS AT DESCOUSE AND WEST ARICHAT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Kyte for a copy of all recommendations, correspondence, letters and telegrams, relating to the dismissal of certain persons at Descouse and West Arichat, resumed from December 9.

Mr. BORDEN: I made some inquiry into the circumstances which were brought to the attention of the House yesterday by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte). While my hon. friend the Minister of Justice desires that the debate should be further adjourned, he has some information bearing directly upon the matter which I may now give to the House. It appears that on the 8th of December, 1911, Mr. J. A. Gillies, who had been the Conservative candidate in the county of Richmond, recommended the appointment of Capt. Andrew Landry as wharfinger at Descouse. The previous occupant of that position, Mr. Leon Poirier, was charged with offensive political partisanship within the knowledge of Mr. Gillies during the then recent election and in the previous election. On the 19th of December, an Order in Council passed dispensing with the services of Poirier and appointing Capt. Landry as wharfinger. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has already explained to the House in the course of the debate that at the time that appointment was made it had not been brought to his knowledge, nor were the officials of his department aware, that Capt. Landry was the same gentleman respecting whom a certain communication had been made to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Capt. Landry had been recommended for the position of fishery officer, and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had declined to appoint him to that office by reason of the communication which had been made to him. However, on the 19th of December, he was appointed to the minor and petty office of wharfinger in ignorance of the fact that he was the person alluded to in the communication. On the 19th of June the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in the province of Nova Scotia brought it to the attention of the department that this man was then in prison, having been sentenced under a criminal charge. Accordingly, within a few days afterwards, on the 26th June, Mr. J. A. Gillies was advised that the department proposed dispensing with the services of Captain Landry and asked him to recommend a suitable successor. Under date of the 3rd of July, Mr. Gillies advised the department that the duties of the position were being very well attended to by Captain L. A. Langlois who was, he represented, a highly respected citizen. He was advised that the department would regard the appointment of Captain Langlois as satisfactory and that he could discharge the duties of the office until further action was taken. On the 19th of July instructions were accordingly issued for the preparation of a recommendation to council dispensing with the services of Captain Landry and formally appointing Mr. Langlois, and on the 26th of August an Order in Council dispensing with the services of Captain Landry was passed, and Captain Langlois was appointed in his stead. Therefore, it will be apparent to the House that as soon as possible after the information which I have alluded to was brought to the attention of the department, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took the course of dispensing with the services of Captain Landry and appointing another officer in his place. As a matter of fact, since some time in June, Captain L. A. Langlois had been performing the duties of the office which, I imagine, are of a very trivial character, and since the 26th day of August last he has been discharging these duties under a formal appointment by the Governor in Council. I have also made some inquiry with regard to the circumstances under which Captain Landry was liberated under ticket of leave. I have examined the file and have ascertained that it is absolutely impossible to suggest that it was due to any political considerations whatever. My hon. friend who made the suggestion in this House could have ascertained the truth of what I am now saying if he had gone to the office of the Minister of Justice and examined the file. There is no suggestion in the file from beginning to end of any political pressure whatever. This man was released by reason of the representations of clergymen and others, including his own physician, that it was necessary for him to undergo a very severe operation and that for that purpose he should be removed to an hospital. The matter was dealt with by the then acting Minister of Justice, the Hon. W. T. White, in the ordinary course of routine and upon the usual report of the officers of the department who look into such cases. He was utterly unaware at the time that Captain Landry had been appointed to any public office. The matter was dealt with from first to last absolutely in the same way in which these applications for discharge upon ticket of leave are ordinarily dealt with—upon the report of the officers of the department who are appointed for the purpose and whose duty it is to examine, consider and report upon the representations which are made for that purpose. As to bringing down the papers, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) will address himself to the House on this subject to-day. All I have to say is that it is entirely open to any hon. member, on either side of the House, to go to the Department of Justice, examine that file, and satisfy himself as to the absolute correctness of what I have stated. My hon. friend from Richmond, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, or any other hon. gentleman on that side of the House or on this side of the House, is at liberty to take that course. I have deemed it advisable and proper, pending further consideration of bringing down these papers, that this information should be given to the House, in order that there might not be any impression throughout the country that the discharge of this man under ticket of leave had anything to do at all with political considerations. Any such suggestion is absolutely unfounded.

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, in regard to that portion of the motion which asks that all correspondence, papers and documents, including the report of the Minister of Justice and the order for the discharge of this man from prison, should be brought down, that there is absolutely no reason, nor have I any desire, to withhold anything in that connection from any member of this House or the public in general, if it be a proper thing to do. But, I believe I am correct in stating that it has been a well established practice not to bring down documents of this kind and I think that a moment's reflection will make every hon. member realize that there might, in very many instances, be serious objections to the bringing down and publishing of documents of this kind. The issuing of tickets of leave is a portion of the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in extending clemency. Under the law, the Minister of Justice, not the Government, or Council, as a whole is made the adviser of the Governor General in regard to the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by this Act. The responsibility for what is done belongs, I submit, therefore, entirely to the Minister of Justice. I do not point that out as being a reason why the papers in cases of this kind should not be brought down, but one will readily understand, any one certainly who has to deal with these applications will know, that in connection with large numbers of them letters are written or petitions are submitted setting forth matters of a very peculiarly private nature which the parties writing them, from no improper motives, might very much regret to have laid before the public, and the laying of which before the public would serve no good end. I desire, therefore, before saying whether or not these papers will be brought down, to go more carefully into the question because I understand that if I should acquiesce in this motion and bring these papers down I would be establishing a precedent in the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: What has been the practice of the Department of Justice with regard to an order of the House for papers in such cases?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am informed that the invariable practice has been to treat these documents as being confidential and, speaking subject to confirming my statement by careful verification, I am not aware that there has been a case of an order of the House for the bringing down of such papers. My impression is that the common sense and good judgment of the House have led it to the conclusion in the past that it is not desirable that papers of this kind should be brought down for publication. In that connection, what I pointed out a moment ago has a bearing—the dealing with these matters is a prerogative of the Crown, and if hon. members will stop for a moment to reflect, they will realize that this House is not perhaps the proper tribunal to determine such. We have had it suggested that there were political motives in this matter and I do not think it would be any reflection on this House to say that perhaps there might be more danger of political influences creeping into this House than of their working upon the mind of a Minister of Justice even though he be a compassionate Minister of Justice, as my hon. friend from Richmond was good enough to describe me. Anyhow, whatever compassion may have been exercised in this particular case was not exercised by me; because, as a fact, I was 3,000 miles away when this transpired. I do not say that with a desire in any way to repudiate responsibility; I am just as prepared to stand responsible for the absolute impartiality and the absolute incapacity of the Minister of Finance, who was acting Minister of Justice, to be influenced in a matter of this kind by political considerations as I am prepared to stand responsible for my own conduct. I desire to add that it is a matter of great surprise to me that two hon. members of this House should, without taking the trouble to inquire, and before they have the documents—have thought proper to insinuate that I, as Minister of Justice, would be capable of allowing myself to be influenced by political considerations in dealing with applications for pardon. That is an insinuation that I have committed an offence which I frankly believe is as grave as any that could be perpetrated. I would be sorry to believe that any man, holding the position of Minister of Justice, would be capable of availing himself of that high position, to allow himself to be influenced by political consideration in the exercise of such a solemn duty. I venture the opinion that the two hon. members who made that insinuation do not believe in it themselves. I would be sorry indeed to believe that on serious reflection, any member of this House, without the most absolute and conclusive proof, would impute such utterly despicable conduct to any man elected by any body of constituents in Canada. I know of nothing I would be more sorry to impute to a representative of the people than such conduct. As the Prime Minister has said, these two hon. gentlemen (who are both members of the profession to which I have the honour to belong), are at perfect liberty to come to the department and peruse this file, and they will have demonstrated whether or not they, or either of them, have justification for sending broadcast the insinuation that the Minister of Justice had abused his position by determining the granting or the refusing of an application for pardon, upon political considerations. Personally, I feel that I can look upon such an insinuation with absolute contempt. I verily believe that no man whose respect I value would believe such a thing of me. As for those, who may be ready, without proof, to entertain such suspicion, and to give public expression to it—unless they did it in a moment of irreflection—I venture to say that what their opinion of me may be, is to me a matter of utter indifference. If these gentlemen should look over the files, they will find there is an entire absence of suggestion of political influence. The request for this discharge originated with a clergyman of one religious belief; it is supported by a clergyman of another religious belief; it is supported by a letter which comes from a lawyer, a gentleman whose political proclivities, I have not the slightest knowledge of; there is further a petition from this unfortunate man himself, and there is evidence of a certificate by a physician that this man was to be taken from the jail to an hospital that a serious operation might be performed on him. The whole procedure went through the ordinary routine, and the hon. the then acting Minister of Justice signed the advice to His Royal Highness, upon the report of an officer of the department who has served not only under this Government but under previous Governments, and who I believe has had the confidence of successive Ministers of Justice.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Is that Mr. Archibald?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is Mr. P. M. Coté, who is the gentleman in charge of that particular duty, and who, so far as I have been able to observe, since I have been Minister of Justice, has fulfilled his duties to the very best of his ability and that is not little and I am absolutely convinced, with perfect impartiality. I believe that if my predecessors in office were here they would give Mr. Coté the same character as I am giving him now. I shall make quite certain whether it is proper to bring these papers down. If I deem it proper, in this particular case—though I may add that my view on first examination is that it would be a very undesirable precedent—I shall personally be very glad to bring them down. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate with a view of making a final statement later.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Justice has displayed an unusual amount of feeling in regard to this matter. It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman was not in Canada himself at the time the exercise of the power, which is a prerogative of the Crown, was carried out, and consequently, the Minister of Justice need not have felt so keenly or complained so bitterly about suggestions made in regard to a case which could not by any possibility refer to him in any way.

I do not agree with my hon. friend in the assertion of the principle that Parliament has not the right to pass a motion of this kind. Hon. members who have been in Parliament a long time will recall the Shortiss case which was discussed in this House in 1896. Hon. Mr. Dickey, who was then the Minister of Justice, concluded, in reference to the matter, as 'Hansard' which I have here will show, that there was no doubt of the constitutional right of the House to call for papers in regard to any matter in which the prerogative of the Crown in relation to pardon had been exercised. But he goes on to say—what every hon. member who is accustomed to constitutional practice will agree with—and to quote Macaulay and Peel for it, that the House in any investigation they might make into the facts on which the Minister of Justice had advised the Crown should exercise the greatest care. The papers in the Shortiss case were brought down, and the facts were discussed preliminary to bringing them down. And hon. members who were in the House at that time will recall the attention given to the matter by the country. I will not discuss the facts of this case. I was not here when my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) brought the subject before the House. I only rose to express my dissent from the theory that this House has not the constitutional right to ask for papers in such a case. And while I am on my feet let me point out that—and I use a word which the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) used earlier in the session—a synchronism—the pardon of Captain Andrew Landry synchronised in a wonderful way with his appointment to a public office.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend is mistaken. The appointment was made on December 11, and the pardon granted on August 12.

Mr. KYTE: May I be permitted to say that, on the 11th of June, Captain Landry was appointed in charge of the buoys in the harbour of Descouse, and that synchronized with his release.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to be allowed to conclude. I rose particularly to refer to the constitutional question, but I desire to remark that the Minister of Finance could find another 'synchronism' in this case to add to the one which he discovered early in the session.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member for Richmond has referred to the question of the buoy contract. I desire to give the facts in regard to that. They are in a memorandum of the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

MEMORANDUM RE BUOY CONTRACT, DESCOUSE, C.B.

The facts in connection with this contract are substantially as follows: On May 28th, 1912, Mr. J. A. Gillies advised the department that Captain Frederick Poirier's contract for attending to the buoys in that vicinity would expire on the 15th June. He recommended in that connection that the work be entrusted to Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, after the expiration of the contract. Without taking into consideration that this was the same Captain Landry against whom charges had been preferred, the deputy minister of the department recommended that the contract should be placed at the same figure that the former contractor was receiving.

On the 7th June the agent of the department at Halifax was directed to notify Captain Landry that the work of attending the buoys after the 15th June would be entrusted to him. On the 11th June a telegram was received from Mr. Gillies asking that action respecting this contract be withheld until he would advise further in the course of a few days. The agent of the department on the same day was directed to defer action. On the 12th June a telegram was received from the agent advising the department that the previous instructions had been carried out, and asking whether he should countermand them. He was directed at once to countermand the instructions.

On the 15th June Mr. Gillies wrote recommending that the work of attending the buoys be given to Captain Charles Fougère, of Descouse. On the 20th June the agent of the department at Halifax was advised to place the work with Captain Fougère. A formal contract was entered into between the department and Captain Fougère for the performance of this service for a period of three years from the 2nd July last.

Hon. members will see that the recommendation in favour of Captain Landry was made on the 28th of May, and the deputy minister says that without taking into consideration that this was the same Captain Landry against whom charges had been preferred, he recommended him that the contract be placed with him at the same figure that the former contractor had received. This recommendation was made before he was found guilty or before the department knew that he was accused of crime—before they realized that he was the same individual whose appointment the parish priest had opposed in a communication to the department; and the moment it came to the knowledge of the department that he was the same man against whom the parish priest made the protest, the department cancelled the contract with him and appointed another man to the position.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to say a few words, particularly in answer to what has been said by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). But first, a word with regard to the suggestion made by the right hon. the leader of the Government, that the files in the department were open to me to examine. I am bound to say that I adopted the usual course in this matter. It has been the practice, ever since we first had a parliament, for members to stand up in this House and move for papers that are of public record. I have some doubt of the wisdom of adopting the course suggested by my right hon. friend, having in mind the experience of a member of this House who did go to one of the public departments to examine a public file. He examined the file, and took some memoranda which would enable him to have accurate knowledge of the contents of the document, should he have occasion to use it. But a few days afterward he received notice from the department that the information must be regarded as confidential and not to be used publicly. Therefore, I assume, if I had gone to the department looking for information, I might have been embarrassed in the same way. The whole difficulty arose, not from any disposition, I am confident on the part of the Minister of Justice to do anything else than that which is right and proper, but from the new precedent established by this Government in accepting the recommendation for appointment to public office not from responsible members of this House, but from irresponsible defeated candidates who are not here to defend their recommendations.

Last year I intimated to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) that it was a highly improper thing for him to accept recommendations of defeated candidates for the removal of public officers and the appointment of their successors. It is improper for the reason that, while a member elected to this Parliament is here and can be looked to to defend his conduct and uphold the propriety of his recommendations, the defeated candidate is not here, he has no responsibility such as a member of this House has, and is likely to be actuated largely by feelings of revenge towards the men who have opposed him, and not by desire—in the same degree as a member who is here to be challenged for his conduct—to promote the public interest. Mr. J. A. Gillies, the defeated candidate in Richmond, is primarily responsible for the most extraordinary condition of affairs revealed by the reading of these documents. But, next to him, I hold the Minister of Marine and Fisheries responsible for the result of these extraordinary circumstances. That hon. minister says that if he had known that the Andrew Landry who was recommended by Mr. Gillies for the positions of wharfinger and buoy contractor at Descouse was the same Andrew Landry who had been charged with forgery, he would not have appointed him. I still say, however, he is responsible, having accepted the recommendation of Mr. Gillies, who is not here to defend his conduct, and therefore, cannot be held responsible for his action. My hon. friend the Prime Minister endeavours to minimize the consequences of this extraordinary procedure by stating that the salary of a wharfinger is a mere pittance, and therefore the matter is of no consequence. But the Minister of Marine and Fisheries states that the salary paid Landry as buoy contractor is not a mere pittance, although he has not stated the amount, I think it is in the neighbourhood of $200 a year.

With respect to the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister, and repeated by the hon. Minister of Justice, to the effect that Landry had to undergo a serious surgical operation, I am bound to say that suggestion makes it all the more desirable and necessary that we should see the papers upon which the hon. Minister of Justice acted. Mr. Landry is a man not unknown to me. He lives in the county of Richmond, and I frequently visit the district in which he resides. I know that Landry has not been afflicted with any serious illness during the last twelve months, and I know that as soon as he was released from jail he proceeded to the city of Sydney and obtained employment there in the steel works.

I have only recited the facts as I gathered them from public documents, and I do not desire to impute to the Minister of Justice any improper motive with respect to his conduct in this matter. Information came to me yesterday to the effect that the Minister of Justice was not the responsible head of the Department when Landry's release was ordered, as that took place in the absence of the minister in the old country. That, however, does not alter the circumstances of the case, and the hon. Minister of Justice and the right hon. Prime Minister have given no substantial reason for the assumption that I acted otherwise than within my privilege in this matter. I read from public records in the department and stated succinctly the facts of the case. These facts have not been denied, and the statements made in regard thereto, show that I was amply justified in bringing them to the attention of the House.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KYTE: I might remind the hon. gentleman that the case to which I referred before six o'clock was not the only case in which recommendations made by Mr. Gillies had to be cancelled by his department during the last six or eight months. I remember the case of the superintendent of the lobster hatchery at Arichat, who was dismissed upon the recommendation of Mr. Gillies and a man named Captain Terrio appointed in his place. I put a question on the Order Paper as to the circumstances under which Captain Terrio was appointed and his qualifications and asked his age and was told he was seventy-one years of age. I also learned from the papers which I moved for in the House of Commons last winter that as soon as the inquiry was made by the Minister of Marine from a source other than Mr. Gillies and he learned that this man's age was seventy-one years, he wrote to Mr. Gillies stating that he would not recommend the appointment and asked him for another nomination. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries reprimanded Mr. Gillies for giving him the name of so old a man who had had no experience in the duties that would be assigned to him as superintendent of the hatchery and was not likely to acquire the knowledge necessary to the proper discharge of his duties.

There is also the case of a light keeper in the county of Richmond who was dismissed in April on the recommendation of Mr. Gillies on the ground that he was an offensive partisan. I was astonished and amazed at this for as every one personally acquainted with the light keeper knew it was absolutely impossible for him to be an offensive partisan. He took no part in public affairs and had not interest enough in the last two federal elections to vote. I asked for an investigation and the minister was good enough to say that if the dismissed light keeper would make an affidavit setting forth that he was not guilty of the charges an investigation would be granted. Such an affidavit was forwarded and the minister was good enough to grant an investigation. The investigation took place in September before Mr. Duchemin, the commissioner appointed for that purpose, and not a syllable of testimony was adduced to prove that the man was guilty of partisanship. I am sure the Minister of Marine will rectify the wrong done in this case, and take the earliest opportunity to restore him to office.

I wish to remind the minister and other gentlemen of this Government that Mr. Gillies has not yet quite completed his work of dismissing officers in Richmond. While he has to his credit some 50 or 60 dismissals, there are still some few postmasters, collectors of customs and preventive officers in remote parts of the county who will, no doubt, receive Mr. Gillies' attention in due time. I wish to notify the Minister of Marine and other members of the Government that before accepting any other recommendations of Mr. Gillies as to the dismissal of officers in public employment and the fitness of others to take their places, they should institute a very rigid inquiry. There are some 80 other defeated Conservative candidates in Canada besides Mr. Gillies, and it is just possible that the minister may be misled by the recommendations of these defeated candidates as they have been misled by accepting the recommendations of Mr. Gillies, and I trust that the ventilation which this subject has received in the House of Commons will at all events have the effect of inducing the minister to institute some sort of inquiry before dismissing further officials on the unsupported statement of defeated candidates.

Mr. BLAIN : Did not the Government that the hon. member for so many years supported, adopt the same policy of asking recommendations from the defeated candidates and has that not been the policy in Canada for many years by both parties ?

Mr. KYTE : It never was the policy of the late Government to accept recommendations for dismissals from defeated candidates. They did accept from them recommendations for appointments after vacancies had occurred in the public service.

Mr. RHODES : I gave an instance within the last 2 or 3 days where the present hon. member for Pictou, then a defeated candidate in that county, had two men dismissed in the Railway Department on his mere recommendation by letter.

Mr. KYTE : I was speaking from my own experience in the county of Richmond during the 15 years the Liberal party were in power. I do not pretend to be able to say what happened in all the other constituencies in Canada. I have no doubt the hon. member for Pictou will be able to justify any dismissals which he caused to be made while the Liberal party was in power.

Mr. RHODES : It is not a question of justification, but of fact.

Mr. KYTE : As a further justification for moving in the House of Commons for the papers asked for in this resolution and having a discussion on this question, there is the fact that immediately after Landry was convicted of the offense for which he was sentenced to 12 months imprisonment, his friends stated that he would not be in jail long, that they would make application to their friends in Ottawa for his discharge, and he would be discharged without any question. I do not mean to insinuate that any hon. minister is responsible in any way for the statement made by Landry's friends in the county of Richmond, but at all events when you take the result in connection with the expressed intention of his friends to apply for his discharge, the coincidence is very striking. Two defences have been set up by the right hon. the leader of the Government, and the hon. the Minister of Marine, which appear to be the only extenuation which exists for the appointment of Landry to these positions and his discharge from jail. The first is that the appointments were to offices of a trivial character and that the remuneration which Landry would have received was trifling indeed. I do not think that the Minister of Marine or the leader of the Government wish to have it understood that they intend to proceed in future upon any such principle. The whole principle for which we are fighting in this connection, a principle laid down time and again by hon. gentlemen opposite, was that no person should be appointed to office, no matter how trifling unless he was qualified in point of fitness and character. I pointed out before 6 o'clock that one of the positions to which Captain Landry was appointed was not of a trifling character, and that the remuneration was not insignificant. The contract for placing the buoys in the harbour of Descouse and Lennox passage was worth about $200 a year. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries states that it was on the 15th of May, 1912, that the department decided to terminate the contract with Capt. Frederick Poirier and to award it to Capt. Landry at the same figure. I would respectfully remind the hon. Minister of Marine and and Fisheries that such a practice has not existed in his department in the past. Whenever a contract for buoys in the Maritime provinces has been terminated, tenders have been called for, and the contract has been awarded to the lowest tenderer. I am not aware of any case in which on the termination of the contract it was awarded to another person at the same figure without calling for new tenders. Be that as it may, however, the fact is that Captain Andrew Landry was appointed to the position, which was somewhat lucrative, while he was under commitment to the Supreme Court on a charge of forgery.

The other defence put forward by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is that he did not know that it was the same Andrew Landry who had been recommended by Mr. Gillies for the appointment of fishery officer, and who was afterwards recommended for appointment to the position of wharfinger and subsequently to that of buoy contractor. I will refer for a moment to the recommendations received by the department from Mr. Gillies in regard to those three matters. Mr. Gillies said:

> The executive recommends the appointment of Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, to this position, and I now endorse that recommendation.

The position referred to was that of fishery officer. The next recommendation received by the department was with respect to the appointment of Captain Landry to the position of wharfinger. On December 23, the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries notified Leon N. Poirier that he was dismissed from the position of wharfinger, and that Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, was appointed in his place. There could be no mistake about that name. The Captain Andrew Landry mentioned by Mr. Gillies in his first recommendation on the 8th December, for the position of fishery officer was the same Captain Andrew Landry referred to by the Rev. W. A. Boucher in his letter of 12th December. Furthermore, there was a letter of June 11, 1912, addressed by P. C. Johnston, superintendent of lights to Mr. Frederick Poirier:

> It has been decided to appoint Captain Andrew Landry, of Descouse, to maintain the buoys which you have a contract for——

Now, there could be no room for misunderstanding or mistake in reference to that. If his name had been given with the initials only, or if some error had crept in as to his description, there might have been some excuse perhaps for the officials of the department not understanding that the Captain Andrew Landry referred to was the identical Andrew Landry who in June had been convicted of the crime which has been described. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries insinuated that there was, if not a defence, at least a justification for the action of the Government with respect to the case of Andrew Landry in releasing him from jail. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries referred to the case of Bruce McDougall who was released under the late Government. With all deference I say that if the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries believes that I charged him with having been actuated by political considerations in granting the discharge of Andrew Landry, it might be said that he even more broadly hinted a similar charge against the late Minister of Justice in connection with the release of Mr. McDougall. I understand that Landry has been released upon parole, and not by virtue of the prerogative of pardon which His Royal Highness the Governor General enjoys. When the hon. Minister of Justice read the list of documents upon which he had been moved to release Landry from jail, I did not hear him state that he had a report from the judge who tried the case.

Mr. DOHERTY: There certainly was a report from the judge.

Mr. KYTE: The only other point I wish to deal with is as to the propriety of bringing down the papers. I think that all the cases that have been debated in this Parliament upon motions to bring down papers, have had reference to capital offences, or at all events, they were papers upon which was based an application for the exercise of the prerogative of pardon. The release of Andrew Landry was not brought about on any such principle. He was released by virtue of the statute which was passed some years ago, and which is known as the Ticket-of-Leave Act. Under that statute, power is vested in the Minister of Justice to discharge prisoners, and it is entirely different from the law referring to the prerogative of pardon. I think, therefore, that every precedent establishes my right to ask for the production of the papers in this case.

Mr. DOHERTY: Do I understand my hon. friend to suggest that the statute authorizes the Minister of Justice to discharge prisoners? The statute provides that he shall recommend His Royal Highness to discharge.

Mr. KYTE: The minister makes a report on which the discharge is granted. I do not purpose to argue that phase of the question at the present time, as the hon. Minister of Justice has intimated that he will look into the papers and precedents and give his decision later on. I very much regret if my cold statement of the facts has been taken to imply any reflection on the hon. Minister of Justice. I had no intention of doing so, because, as I stated before six o'clock, I was aware that the hon. minister was not in the country at the time. I venture to say that upon reading the report of the debate which took place yesterday, and the records which I laid before the House, the hon. minister must come to the conclusion that I abstained from making any undue reflections on any person, and that I contented myself with making a cold, plain, bald statement of the facts to which the papers brought down last year have reference, as well as the papers filed in the Supreme Court of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House in connection with this matter, but I desire to make an explanation which I hope, and am certain will be accepted by my hon. friend. I was acting Minister of Justice at the time the recommendation was made upon which Landry was granted ticket-of-leave. I never heard the man's name before the occasion on which the application was dealt with by me in the ordinary course in the Department of Justice, nor have I heard his name until it was mentioned, I think, last evening by my hon. friend. Nobody has ever spoken to me at any time, either before or since the ticket-of-leave was granted with regard to Landry, and when my hon. friend was dealing with it last night it was not in my memory, nor had it been in my mind, until my attention was called to it by the hon. Minister of Justice that such a man had been released on ticket-of leave or had come in any way officially before me. The procedure that is followed in the Department of Justice is known to my hon. friend and to others in this House. The report of the keeper of the jail, the finding of the judge, and any report he may make, the report of the physician as to the physical condition, the behaviour of the prisoner during confinement—all of these matters are taken into consideration. I may say for the information of hon. gentlemen that there are continually applications by the hundreds before the Minister of Justice for tickets-of-leave. Out of those hundreds of applications a very small percentage is favourably considered, and they are considered only upon a favourable report being made by the experienced and trained officers of the department. The officer who dealt especially with this case was Mr. Coté. Mr. Coté has been in the department for a number of years and I think he makes a report on every capital and other important case which comes before the department. I formed a very high opinion of his impartiality and judgment in dealing with such matters. This particular case was taken up in the ordinary course and without any knowledge whatever on my part that the Landry in question was the Landry referred to by my hon. friend from Richmond. I had no communication with Mr. Gillies; in fact, his name was almost unknown to me at that time. The case was dealt with impartially as any other case would be in the ordinary course. I do not understand my hon. friend to suggest any impropriety with respect to the important matter of the administration of justice especially in connection with the prerogative of mercy, the exercise of which belongs to the Crown on the advice of the minister. But, I do desire, in justice to my hon. colleague (Mr. Doherty) and myself to make this explanation, and to set forth the facts precisely as they exist with regard to the liberation upon ticket-of-leave of this particular person.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL—SECOND READING.

Bill No. 11, respecting New Orleans and Grand Isle Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited, and to change its name to New Orleans and Grand Isle Railway, Light and Power Company, Limited. —Mr. Macdonell.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

APPOINTMENT OF MR. PANNETON, K.C.

* Mr. LEMIEUX:

I would like to know if it is true that Mr. Panneton, K.C., of Sherbrooke, has been appointed a judge at Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC—CONNECTION WITH MONTREAL.

Mr. WILSON (Laval):

1. Is it the intention of the Government to connect the city of Montreal with the Grand Trunk Pacific by a branch line?
2. Have works been already undertaken in that connection, and to what distance?
3. Has the line been definitely located? If so, what part of the country is crossed by that line?

Mr. COCHRANE: The matter is engaging the attention of the Government.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. How many employees of the Intercolonial railway have been dismissed from their duties from the 23rd June, 1896, to the 1st January, 1901, from Lévis to Campbellton?
2. What are their names, duties and ages and the reason for their dismissal?
3. Who asked for their dismissal in each case?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. 150.

2 and 3. See statement filed with the Clerk of the House.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has Mr. J. H. Pelletier, locomotive engineer on the Intercolonial railway at Rivière du Loup been dismissed as such? If so, for what reason?
2. Was there an inquiry and who was the informer?
3. Who was the inquiry commissioner and what amount has been paid to him up to date?
4. Have complaints or information been sent to the Minister of Railways on the subject of the dismissal from office of Mr. J. H. Pelletier?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes. For offensive partisanship.
2. Yes, an investigation was held; there was no informant, Dr. Luc Lebel made complaints.
3. Emile Gelly. $101.80 paid him.
4. Yes.

RESIDENT ENGINEER.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Who was the resident or superintendent engineer of the Welland Canal in the month of October, 1911?
2. What position in the Department of Railways and Canals has he held since that date, and at what salary?
3. Did he draw his full salary for the month of October, 1911, and during June and July, 1912?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. J. L. Weller.
2. Held the position of superintending engineer of the Welland canal at a salary of $3,850 per annum up to December 31, 1911. Since that date he has held the position of engineer in charge of surveys, design and construction of the new Welland canal at a salary of $7,500 per annum.
3. Yes.

WELLAND CANAL CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. GERMAN:

When does the Government expect to advertise for tenders for construction work on the new Welland canal?

Mr. COCHRANE: Plans and specifications are in course of preparation but are not yet sufficiently complete to call for tenders.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—STATION AT ST. EDOUARD.

Mr. MARCILE:

Does the Department of Railways intend to build a station at St. Edouard, county of Bagot? If so, will tenders be asked for?

Mr. COCHRANE: It has not been decided to build a station at St. Edouard.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—SUBWAY IN NEW GLASGOW.

Mr. MACDONALD:

Does the Railway Department intend to build a subway at Forbes street crossing in the town of New Glasgow?

Mr. COCHRANE: The matter is under the consideration of the department.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—NEW STATION AT TRENTON.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Have any petitions or requests been received asking for the erection of a new station or improved station accommodation at Trenton on the Intercolonial railway?
2. Does the Government intend to provide a new station at said place?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Two letters were received.

2. The matter has not yet been considered.

SUPERINTENDENT PAPINEAU.

On the Order:

For a copy of all correspondence and other papers connected with the dismissal of Mr. Papineau, superintendent of the Sorel shipyards.—Mr. Lemieux.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the hon. member is under some misapprehension about this. Mr. Papineau was not dismissed from the position of superintendent in Sorel. He tendered his resignation, and is now employed as an engineer in the Department of Public Works. If the hon. member desires the papers regarding his resignation I will bring them down, but I think the only paper in the case is the resignation itself.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Dropped.

DES PRAIRIES RIVER DREDGING.

Mr. WILSON (Laval) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, recommendations and reports respecting the dredging of Des Prairies river, the work done, depth, length and width of channel dredged, the list of men employed to perform that work, their salaries, and the amount of money spent on that work since the 1st of October, 1911, up to the 21st November, 1912.

He said: The only object I have in asking for this return is to get the information about this dredging. I may speak on this subject later on, after the return has been brought down, and with that view I shall probably make notes on paper, and on perhaps more than one sheet of paper. But, as I am not Prime Minister, and as my speech will not be an announcement of a naval programme, I give you my word of honour, Mr. Speaker, that I will not read those notes.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND THE VALE ROAD.

Mr. MACDONALD moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents received since the 1st day of January, 1912, asking that the line of railway known as the Vale Road, should be taken over by the Intercolonial railway.

He said: The line of railway referred to is about six miles in length. It belongs to the Acadia Coal Company, and is operated as a coal road, not as a passenger road, between the town of New Glasgow and the town of Thorburn in the county of Pictou. A year and a half ago, arrangements were made by the then Minister of Railways with the Acadia Coal Company by which the Government were to lease this road for a period of ninety-nine years at a nominal rental. Everything was in readiness for the completion of that arrangement—a Bill was introduced into this House for the purpose of enabling the Government to carry it on—when dissolution came in 1911, and matters came to a standstill. In pursuance of the understanding which had been arrived at between the Government and the company, though it had not been ratified, the Railway Department proceeded to give to the people who live along this line and in the town of Thorburn necessary railway accommodation by running passenger trains to that point from New Glasgow twice a day. After my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) came in as Minister of Railways, the Railway Board stopped the accommodations which had been afforded under the previous minister, and the result is that since that time the people who live in this progressive village of Thorburn, while they have this railway running into their town operated for the transportation of coal, they have no means by which passengers can go from there to the centre of the county. Along this line of railway are various industries which have increased in size and importance to a very great extent. A portion of the enterprise of the Drain Pipe Company of St. Johns, Quebec, is in operation along that road, and arrangements were made during the past autumn to duplicate their present plant and double its output, and immediate means of transportation are needed in order to provide for the extension of that industry. There are also undeveloped coal areas within that district which can be dealt with satisfactorily only by the taking over of this road by the Government, and the carrying out of the arrangements perfected by the late administration, thus giving to the people interested the facilities they desire. I directed the attention of the Minister last year to this fact, and pressed upon him very strongly the desirability of taking over this road. I pointed out to him then—and I desire to reiterate the statement now—that whatever his view may be as to the general branch-line policy of the Government in connection with the Intercolonial railway, the conditions in regard to this particular matter vary so absolutely from those ordinarily existing that there are no difficulties in the way of his assuming control and operation of the road. Nothing is sought for by the company in the way of rental. It is practically a case of their giving over the road, provided certain provisions are made with regard to freight charges upon coal transported over that line. For over a year the people in this growing town have been lacking the privileges of communication which at one time had been given to them. The minister has received representations upon this subject from a number of people, and I am sure he must have been impressed by the strength of the case, and the desirability of bringing the matter to a definite conclusion. I make the motion for the purpose of getting the information contained in the papers which I am sure have been brought to the attention of the hon. minister during the past year, and of impressing upon him the necessity of carrying out the arrangement effected in 1911 by assuming the control and operation of this road, giving to the people and industries affected those facilities of transportation of which they have been too long deprived.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is no objection to this motion being carried. I may say the matter has been delayed pending the development and taking over of the branch lines. We have not yet reached a stage at which we can formulate a definite policy, and I am not sure whether we will be able to do so this session, but the matter is receiving attention.

Mr. MACDONALD: Dealing with this question does not necessarily involve the establishing of any principle in regard to branch line railways. All the other branch line propositions involve payment by the Government of sums of money, or assuming some obligation in regard to which a general policy ought to be established, but this case does not interfere in any way with such a general policy. It can and should be treated by itself. I think it would be unfortunate if the minister should continue to deprive the people interested of the desired means of communication.

Mr. COCHRANE: One point which has to be considered is whether or not the branch lines are paying running expenses. Speaking from memory, I am under the impression that the line referred to by my hon. friend was put in operation as an experiment, and I do not think there was any definite arrangement as to continuing its operation.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister investigated that feature of the matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: I can make no statement to-night in reference to that.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. MACDONALD moved:

For a copy of the different freight tariffs in force on the line of railways from Sunnybrae to Ferona Junction, on the Intercolonial railway, and of any requests that have been received in regard to the change in the same, and also a copy of any requests, petitions, letters or other documents complaining of the said tariff.

He said: About a year ago the Intercolonial railway purchased a line running from Ferona Junction to Sunnybrae, a distance of about 30 miles. Since that time that road has formed a part of the Intercolonial railway, and has been operated by the hon. minister through officials of his department, but the hon. minister and his officials have been charging the people special rates for freight carried by that line, treating it as if it were a separate road, and not a part of the Intercolonial. I am informed by railway men that the practice followed by other railway companies when dealing with conditions such as this is to avoid unduly antagonizing the interests of any community along the branch line and to give them the same rates as on a main line. I make this motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the minister to this fact; to ask him to remove this discrimination, and to treat all freight carried along the line referred to in the same manner as that transported on any other part of the Intercolonial railway. I am sure the minister could not have been seized of the facts, or, if the matter was called to his attention, he could not have appreciated the discrimination that was being carried on in this respect. Now that the matter has been brought to his attention, I trust he will take steps to remedy this state of affairs, which undoubtedly ought not to exist.

Mr. COCHRANE: We get $2 for every $4 we spend in the operation of this line. That is one of the difficulties which exist in respect to many of these branch lines—the high cost of maintenance and operation—and it is one of the most difficult questions we have to deal with. We have not come to any conclusion in the matter, but there is no objection to the motion being carried, and we will bring down any papers in connection therewith.

Mr. MACDONALD: Evidently the hon. minister does not intend to remove this discrimination?

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not say I would not.

Mr. MACDONALD: The answer given by the hon. minister is not a fair one. Certainly he is not encouraging the development of these branch lines by thus penalizing all the business attempted to be carried on in connection with their operation. I do not wish to open up this question, but if my hon. friend had carried out the policy contemplated in respect to the line of railway so purchased, and had proceeded to construct a line to Guysborough, then this complaint would not have arisen. I submit the position which I have outlined in respect to this matter is a grossly unfair one, and I regret the minister has taken such an attitude in regard to it. I shall take advantage of another opportunity to bring the matter to his attention.

Mr. COCHRANE: The same policy has been pursued as that which I found in force when I took office.

Motion agreed to.

ERNEST PAQUIN DISMISSAL.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, investigations and papers generally concerning the dismissal of Ernest Paquin, postmaster of Ste. Cécile de Levrard, county of Nicolet.

He said: I was surprised the other day to receive a letter from this unfortunate postmaster. He was an old elector of mine when I had the honour to represent the constituency of Nicolet, and in those days he was supposed to be a Conservative. In fact I received many letters and petitions from the parish of Ste. Cécile de Levrard to dispense with his services. He was supposed to be an active partisan. However, I went into the matter pretty deeply and found out that while it was true that he was a good Conservative he was a good postmaster, and I did not care to dismiss him. Now, after four or five years, I find that he has been declared to be a Liberal and has been dismissed for cause. I suppose it was because I was so good to him when he was a Conservative that he gave our government some support, some evidence of his gratitude. If I had thought at the time that it would turn out that way, perhaps I might have followed another course. At all events, I am sorry that this postmaster was dismissed, because I happen to know the man personally, and he was highly recommended to me by a gentleman whom my hon. friend knows very well, Senator Shehyn, of Quebec. I suppose that the papers will disclose something extraordinary to justify the course that has been taken, because he had the support of the parishioners of Ste. Cécile de Levrard as well as of the pastor, and I am really surprised to find that he had been found guilty of some political offence, for he is a gentleman who did not take part at all in elections.

Mr. PELLETIER: The papers will be brought down. I have not the facts in my memory at present. I see that this gentleman occupied the position when my hon. friend was in office.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD.

MARTIN LANIGAN DISMISSAL.

Mr. EMMERSON moved for:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports, and all other papers, relating to the dismissal of Martin Lanigan, postmaster at Rexton, county of Kent, New Brunswick, and of the minutes of evidence of any investigation of inquiry held relating to the said dismissal, and of all and any charges and recommendations connected therewith; as well as a copy of all letters written to the Postmaster General, or to any official of the Post Office Department, by F. J. Robidoux, M.P., or by any other person relating to the said dismissal.

He said: This is a case that need not occupy the attention of the House at any length. It would seem that during the past year my hon. friend the Postmaster General has indulged in a carnival of decapitation with a glee which outside of this House, and if it had had reference to the animal kingdom, would be called ghoulish. Personally I am not cognizant of all the facts and circumstances of the case, but they have been brought to my notice in a letter addressed to me by Mr. Lanigan the decapitated postmaster of Rexton in the county of Kent, in the province of New Brunswick. Mr. Lanigan, writing me under date November 25 last, says:

I am inclosing you notice I received from Post Office Department with declaration attached for me to fill out and signed by a justice of the peace, which I did with a note attached, saying I had taken no part in the elections nor had I attended a meeting of any political party for twelve or thirteen years. I said I represented the Hon. D. J. LeBlanc in 1896 in Rexton booth; and in 1900, in Richibucto, I was returning officer in the local election about that time. Since then I took no part, did not ask any person how they were going to vote or how to vote. I went to vote and did not deny that my sympathy was with the Liberal party. It was the only party I was under any obligation to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EMMERSON: It is not everybody who discharges his obligations. (Reading):

I heard in the winter that they were going to take the office from me, so I wrote Mr. Robidoux if such was the case as I had taken no part in the election any more than vote, which I thought was my right. I told him I was an old man going on 73 and had a heavy charge depending on me for a living, but it made no difference. Without consulting any of his supporters outside of Brait and Carson and two or three more on the south side of the bridge where the post office was removed to, at the inconvenience of the bank and others on the north side of the bridge that made up seven-eights of the revenue to the office.

If there is a mark standing against me in the Post Office Department while in my official capacity, fifteen years and two months, I will say nothing, but I think it very hard to be dismissed without some reason and without any investigation. I also inclose you Mr. Robidoux's reply to my letter.

It would seem that, in addition to the executioner in chief, there are local, subordinate county officials who have the privilege of saying what shall be done and when it shall be done. Before reading this letter from the local executioner for the county of Kent, I will refer to the document first made reference to in the letter of Mr. Lanigan:

Ottawa, 23rd April, 1912.

Sir,—It is reported to this department that since your appointment as postmaster at Rexton, N.B., you have taken an active part in federal and provincial elections.

I am, therefore, directed to request that you will be good enough to say whether this is true.

If the accusation is not well founded, I presume that you will have no objection to sign the solemn declaration herewith inclosed, which should be attested before a justice of the peace.

An early reply is requested.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
HECTOR B. VERRET,
Asst. Deputy Postmaster General.

This declaration which was to be sworn to and attested before a justice of the peace was made by Mr. Lanigan and returned to the Postmaster General. All these accusations were denied, pursuant to the terms of the declaration which, I may say, is a most unique document in itself. The postmaster executed that document, returned it, and the next that he heard was that the office had been transferred from him to his successor. This post office, for many years, was located on the south side, I think, of the Richibucto river. Rexton is quite an important community, separated by the Richibucto river and the different sections of the village or town are connected by a bridge. There are large business interests on both sides of the river, and on the one where the post office was heretofore located are situated the bank and other large business establishments. By the removal of Mr. Lanigan from the office and its transfer to another section of the town very great inconvenience was occasioned to the business community. Let me explain that the section of Rexton from whence this post office was removed was the section which contributed more than seven-eighths of the total revenue of the post office. Mr. Lanigan, in his letter, refers to having written to Mr. Robidoux, who has the honour of representing the county of Kent in this House. The letter of the hon. member for Kent in reply to that of Mr. Lanigan, is as follows:

House of Commons,
Ottawa, Jan. 18, 1912.

Martin Lanigan, Esq.,
Rexton, N.B.

Dear Sir,—Your letter of the 15th inst. duly received and contents noted. I can only say, in reply, that I have your case under consideration and that it will be considered on its merits.

I remain,
Yours very truly,
FERDINAND J. ROBIDOUX.

I am not objecting at all to the tone or phraseology of the letter, but it does seem to indicate that this is not a matter of judgment on the part of the Postmaster General, that it does not depend upon the exercise of his discretion, but that, under the system which now prevails, the responsibility and the exercise of discretion are placed upon the member in support of the Government representing the constituency, or in the hands, as we have had evidence in this House during this session, of the gentleman who was the candidate in the Conservative interest at the last election, but who was defeated and now stands as sponsor for the acts of the Government in all matters relating to patronage. To me the matter of these dismissals in connection with these small post offices throughout these different ridings is one of amazement and I cannot fully appreciate the action that has been taken. I can say this, in so far as the county which I have the honour to represent is concerned, that the appointment of country postmasters, from one end of the county to the other, has not been in the hands of patronage wielders, but has been in the hands of every individual patron of the office in the district which the office serves. All these appointments were made on petition from the residents or inhabitants. I have never heard of the dismissal of a country postmaster because of participation in elections either on one side or the other. But, perhaps the Liberal party are responsible for it all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friends say: 'hear, hear', but perhaps not for the reason which I ascribe. When the Liberal party came into power they found a Post Office Department with a deficit of nearly a million dollars. They found postmasters throughout the country receiving the paltry pittance of about $10 or $12 per annum and they increased the pay from $10 to about $35 per annum. Now, the bait has been too rich. The Liberals should never have furnished the bait so that there would not have been so many applicants. I know that the tender heart of the Postmaster General revolts against these decapitations. I know it is no pleasure to the Postmaster General to dismiss any employee, but he tells us himself, he is so hounded from one end of the Dominion to the other, with demands for dismissals, and that he only wavers to a small extent in proporotion to the demands made upon him. The facts disclosed in this case prove that the treatment accorded Mr. Lanigan was very unfair. After the charge was made in the first instance, the minister should have given Mr. Lanigan an investigation. I would not call in question the word of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Robidoux), but I do say that he could not be expected to have a personal knowledge of the facts, and he no doubt had to depend upon the representation made to him by parties who were interested in securing the reversion of the office. I venture to think there must be something in the report to the department setting forth that there were wide differences of opinion in the community, not only with respect to the individual who should occupy the office, but also as regards the convenience of the location of the office. If the papers disclose facts which support the representations made to me by Mr. Lanigan, I hope justice will be done him even at this late hour. I have no objection to the adjournment of the debate until the hon. member for Kent is in his place.

Mr. PELLETIER : When the Postmaster General is attacked he is supposed to be able to take care of himself, but in the present instance the attack is against another hon. member who is absent. The hon. member for Kent has gone to St. John to be present at the consecration of the bishop, and it is only proper that the debate should await his return.

Mr. EMMERSON : I am not attacking the hon. member for Kent; I am attacking the system.

Mr. PELLETIER : The papers will be brought down. The hon. member is mistaken if he thinks that I dismiss officials simply because I am told to; that is not at all the line of action I have been following.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

Mr. BURNHAM moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, a Select Special Committee should be appointed to make an inquiry into an old age pension system for Canada, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): A resolution similar to this was adopted last session and I understand that the hon. member desires to continue the same committee for the purpose of obtaining the information required. There is no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF Dr. J. POMMINVILLE TO THE ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, recommendations and reports concerning the appointment of Dr. J. Pomminville as surgeon at the penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul, in place of Dr. A. Allaire.

He said: I wish to draw the attention of the House, and more particularly that of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), to the matter of the dismissal of Dr. Pomminville as surgeon at the penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul, considering that the change was effected during the absence of the hon. minister in Great Britain last summer.

I must say to the credit of the hon. Minister of Justice that in his administration of the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, he has not indulged in wholesale dismissals as other ministers have done in various departments. In bringing this matter to the attention of the House, my object is to acquit myself of a duty towards my constituents and towards Dr. Allaire.

I understand Dr. Allaire was appointed in the month of February, 1902. He never meddled with politics. He was recommended by myself and by the late Mr. Tarte, who owed him something. When I say that he owed him something, I do not mean money or anything of the kind. He was an old friend of the Conservative party. For a period of ten years Dr. Allaire discharged the duties to the satisfaction of the department. For seven years past, Dr. Allaire has been a widower with a family of six children to support, and I may add that he is very poor. His youngest child was educated at the expense of the Reverend Mr. Harel, chaplain of the penitentiary, who died a year or two ago.

Mr. Allaire never took part in elections; he even never attended public meetings. Unexpectedly, without a quarter of an hour's notice, and while the hon. Minister of Justice was absent, he was dismissed, deprived, and his six children as well, of their only means of subsistence, to make way for Dr. Pomminville, brother-in-law of Mr. Sévère Laviolette, the chief organizer at St. Jérôme of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel). Mr. Sévère Laviolette is a brother to Dr. Camille Laviolette, of Montreal, a well known Conservative, whom the Liberal Government of Quebec retain in their employ as physician at the Longue Pointe lunatic asylum, at a salary of $1,200 per annum.

As for Dr. Pomminville, he was formerly Conservative candidate in the county of Laval, and has attended all political meetings for a number of years. He was Mr. Léonard's organizer in that constituency. He was always ready for a fight—I say so advisedly—; I shall abstain from referring to his private conduct, as that would lead me too far. At the last election he represented Mr. Léonard, the Conservative candidate. For the last fifteen years to say the least, Dr. Pomminville has always taken a very active part in elections. He even once requested the returning officer to expel me from a polling booth when I was a candidate.

Mr. Pomminville has a revenue from personal sources of above a thousand dollars per annum. He is married, but has no children. I beg to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice, as a father of a family, to these circumstances, and would like to inquire why Dr. Allaire has been deprived of his position in favour of Dr. Pomminville. What has the latter done to earn that position?

As for Dr. Allaire, who has been dismissed, he never interfered in politics. You will not find a man in the county of Laval to contradict me on that point, and I may even appeal to Dr. Pomminville himself as to that. I shall leave it with him to say whether or not Dr. Allaire has deserved the treatment which is being meted out to him on the grounds of having meddled in politics.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not in memory the grounds for the action that was taken in this matter, but if my memory serves me well it was not in connection with any political partisanship on the part of Dr. Allaire that the change was effected. With regard to Dr. Pomminville I am not aware whether he was or was not a very active supporter of the party to which he belonged. I would be willing to accept the hon. member's statement to that effect. But I would not consider that the fact that a gentleman occupying no position as a government employee had concerned himself with politics would be a reason why, if he were otherwise qualified, he should not be appointed to office. In his present office, of course, he will be expected to abstain from party politics; but I am free to confess that I cannot follow the hon. member's contention that past participation in politics should have prevented the appointment of Dr. Pomminville. The hon. member shall have the papers.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED AND UNDISCUSSED MOTIONS.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Henry Burrell, postmaster, Yarmouth North, Yarmouth county, N.S., and the same information regarding the appointment of Henry Burrell's successor; and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by Charles Lane in regard to the same, also a detailed statement of expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Law.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents relating to the appointment of Charles W. Hatfield, fishery office on the Tusket river, Yarmouth county, N.S.—Mr. Law.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Captain George Wetmore, harbour master at Yarmouth, Yarmouth county, N.S., and the same information regarding the appointment of Captain Wetmore's successor; and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by Charles Lane in regard to the same, also a detailed statement of expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Law.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Norman L. Trefry, shipping master at Yarmouth, county of Yarmouth, N.S., and the same information regarding the appointment of Mr. Trefry's successor.—Mr. Law.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Dr. Charles A. Webster, port physician at Yarmouth, county of Yarmouth, N.S., and the same information regarding the appointment of Dr. Webster's successor.—Mr. Law.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of D. Morin as postmaster of St. Pie de Bagot, county of Bagot.—Mr. Marcile.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents respecting the dismissal of J. E. Phaneuf, postmaster of St. Hugues, county of Bagot.—Mr. Marcile.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, requests, telegrams and other documents relating to the appointment of Louis Nadeau as postmaster at Ste. Christine, county of Bagot.—Mr. Marcile.

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, &c., in connection with the recent reduction in cable rates between Canada and Great Britain.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a copy of all documents concerning the dismissal of Charles Meunier, customs preventive officer at Marieville, Quebec.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a return showing (a) each mail contract awarded since the 15th of October, 1911; (b) the name of the tenderer in each case; (c) the figures of each tender; and (d) the name of each party to whom such contract has been awarded.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a copy of all correspondence and other papers, in the Department of Public Works, concerning the awarding of a contract for a Welsh coal supply to the various Dominion public buildings in Montreal.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a copy of all correspondence, petitions and other papers received by the Prime Minister, or any member of the Government, since the 1st April, 1912, in connection with the school system established in that portion of the Keewatin territory annexed to the province of Manitoba.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a return showing the detail and number of dismissals from public offices by the present Government to this date in the riding of Saltcoats, Sask., together with the names of the dismissed occupants, the reasons for their dismissals, the complaints against such officials, and a copy of all correspondence with respect to the same, and all reports of investigations in cases where such were held. —Mr. MacNutt.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, complaints, petitions and other documents relating to the investigation of A. W. Salsman, postmaster at Middle Country Harbour, N.S., and to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all correspondence, evidence and papers generally in connection with the dismissal of James Murphy, postmaster at Tweed, Ont.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a return showing the number of dismissals from public offices by the present Government to this date in the constituency of Regina, together with the names of the dismissed officials, the reasons for their dismissals, the complaints against such officials, and a copy of all correspondence with respect to the same, and of all reports of any investigation held in respect to the same.—Mr. Martin (Regina).

For a return showing all the public officers dismissed by the present Government in the district of Kamouraska, with the names and duties of such persons respectively, the reason for their dismissal, the nature of the complaint brought against them, also of all correspondence relating thereto and reports of inquiries in cases where such have been held.—Mr. Lapointe.

For a copy of all evidence, plans, reports, correspondence, &c., respecting an inquiry held concerning an accident on the Intercolonial railway at St. André de Kamouraska on the 7th October, 1912, caused by train No. 33, the Maritime express, going west.—Mr. Lapointe.

For a return showing all public officers removed by the present Government in the district of Portneuf, together with the names and duties of each person, the reasons for their dismissal, the nature of the complaints brought against them, also a copy of all correspondence relating thereto and reports of inquiries in cases where such were held.—Mr. Delisle.

For a copy of the original contract granted to Messrs. Corry & Laverdure by the Hon. Mr. Haggart, Minister of Railways, the instructions given to the contractors by Mr. Schreiber, the daily, weekly and monthly reports of Engineer Rogers, charged by the Government to superintend the works; a copy of the correspondence exchanged between the contractors or their lawyers and the department respecting the extras on the work; of the instructions given by the department to Engineer Rogers and the contractors respecting the said extras; of the first claim of Messrs. Corry & Laverdure; of the Order in Council referring this claim to arbitration; of the correspondence exchanged between the department, the Minister of Railways or any of his officers and the contractors and their lawyers respecting this claim and this reference; of the instructions given by the department to the arbitrators; of the report of valuation and the proof presented to the arbitrators; of the award of the arbitrators, and their report to the department; of the correspondence exchanged between the department and the contractors or their lawyers after the award up to the payment of the arbitration; of the Orders of the Governor General in Council relating thereto; a copy of the minutes of the Treasury Board respecting the matter; of the report of the Minister of Justice, Hon. Mr. Mills, on the award of the arbitrators, &c.; of the correspondence exchanged between the department, the contractors and their lawyers after the payment of the first arbitration; of the second claim; of the Order in Council referring the said claim to the arbitrators; of the letter of the Minister of Railways allowing such reference; of the minutes of the deliberations of the arbitrators; of the proof produced before them; of their report to the minister and their award; also a copy of the correspondence exchanged between the minister, the department, the contractors or their lawyers since the award; a copy of the reports made to council at different times respecting this award of the different reports of the Minister of Justice on the subject; of the suggestions made by the Minister of Justice that the matter be submitted to the Exchequer Court; of the minutes of the Treasury Board respecting the claim; of the reports made on different occasions since 1895 on this claim by Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals; and of the special reports made by Engineer Rogers on the same matter; finally, a copy of all the correspondence exchanged between the contractors or their lawyers and the present Minister of Railways and Canals.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a return showing the detail and number of dismissals from public offices by the present Government to this date in the riding of Strathcona, together with the names of the dismissed occupants, the reasons for their dismissal, the complaints against such officials, and a copy of all correspondence with respect to the same, and of all reports of investigations, where such were held.—Mr. Douglas.

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents and papers relating to the dismissal of H. Lacasse, as postmaster at Wendover, county of Prescott, Ontario, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Proulx.

For a statement showing (a) the name of each counsel retained by the Dominion Government in connection with the marriage reference case to both the Supreme Court and to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and (b) the fees paid to each counsel before each tribunal.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a copy of all papers, documents, tenders and correspondence relating in any way to the construction of a wharf at Krant Point, Lunenburg county, N.S.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, recommendations, and reports concerning the dismissal of Miss Eugénie Dorion, an employee in the office of the post office inspector at Quebec; the reasons for her dismissal, the nature of the complaints brought against her, if any, the names of the persons who brought these complaints, also a copy of all correspondence relating thereto, and the report of inquiry, if there was one held.

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, recommendation and other reports respecting the dismissal of Dr. A. Allaire as surgeon of the penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul, and also respecting the payments of his gratuities, superannuation or retiring allowance.

On motion of Mr. Pelletier, House adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 29, to incorporate Canada Western Trust and Mortgage Company.—Mr. Meighen.

Bill No. 30, to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters, and to change the name to 'The Independent Order of Foresters.'—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 31, to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Guarantee Company of North America.—Mr. Baker.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF HIGHWAYS.

Mr. COCHRANE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, to encourage and assist the Improvement of Highways.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are we to assume that this Bill is the same as that introduced last year, or are we to expect that it has been improved?

Mr. COCHRANE: There were some amendments agreed to in the House last session that I thought of putting in when we come to them.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FOREIGN FISHING VESSELS IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. HAZEN moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HAZEN: While United States fishing vessels, in common with British fishing vessels, have liberty to fish in the waters that are mentioned in the treaty of 1818, other foreign fishing vessels have no such liberty; but there is nothing in the existing legislation to deny them this privilege, and to-day, if other foreign fishing vessels came to fish in those waters described in the treaty, we have no power to prevent them from doing so. The purpose of this Bill is to remedy that state of affairs.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Does the hon. minister say that, under the conditions now existing, foreign vessels cannot fish in those waters mentioned in the treaty of 1818, other than United States fishing vessels?

Mr. HAZEN: I did not say that. Under the treaty of 1818, fishing vessels belonging to the United States have undoubtedly the right to fish in the waters described in that treaty, but other fishing vessels have not that right. Under the legislation that exists, however, if other fishing vessels did come in and fish in those waters which are described in the treaty of 1818 we have no power under the statute at present to prevent them from doing so. In drafting the Act, the drafter was evidently under the impression, or whether he was under the impression or not, the idea is conveyed by the Act that the fishing vessels of foreign powers have the right to come and fish in those waters, while it was clearly the intention of the treaty that that privilege should belong to fishing vessels of the United States.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We understand it now. I could not realize why it was thought necessary to prohibit the vessels of other nations from fishing in our territorial waters, but apparently it is to correct a mistake in the statute.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that the Bill is of a character which affects trade or customs duties, and, if so, it requires to be preceded by a resolution. I do not know whether the hon. minister's attention has been drawn to that point.

Mr. HAZEN: My attention has not been drawn to that point, and it did not occur to me that any resolution was necessary. But if you, Mr. Speaker, have any doubt about the matter, we could let the Bill stand, and I shall look into it. I do not think it deals with trade and commerce, in the sense that trade and commerce are usually referred to. The Bill is really for the purpose of correcting a mistake in the existing legislation. However, there will be no harm in allowing the Bill to stand for the present.

Bill allowed to stand.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BURNHAM moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BURNHAM: This Bill simply contemplates making the Dominion Elections Act conform to the various provincial election Acts. That is to say, instead of there being a deposit of $200 as is now required in all Dominion elections, the deposit in Dominion elections should conform to that required in the particular province in which the elections take place. For example, in Ontario no deposit is required under the provincial Act, and, therefore, under this contemplated legislation no deposit would be required in the Dominion elections in that province, and so on.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MEIGHEN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34 to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill is in the exact wording of the Bill introduced last session, which was explained to the House. The only difference is that the first clause of last session's Bill is omitted in this Bill. There is no attempt in the amendment now proposed to compel the submission to the Board of Railway Commissioners of any plans for cattle guards or fences. The clause that remains is the important and vital clause of last session's Bill, and it provides for a different character of burden to be borne by the railway company before they escape liability for the killing of animals on the track.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADMIRALTY ORDERS FOR CANADA.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, before you proceed with questions, may I call the attention of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) to a despatch from London which appeared in the Citizen of yesterday, and which is addressed to the Canadian Associated Press. It is in these words:

Replying to Hon. Mr. Lee, former Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Hon. Mr. Asquith said that certain arrangements of a general character had been agreed upon between the Admiralty and the Dominion Government with regard to the transfer of certain warships of the Royal Canadian Navy after sufficient notice had been given to allow of them being replaced, by placing in Canada of an order for some light cruisers. The papers would be laid before Parliament after the Dominion Government Bill received the Royal assent.

This states positively that Mr. Asquith said yesterday that, besides the agreement we have now under consideration between the Admiralty and the Dominion Government, there is another which is to take effect later on, and which has not yet been submitted to the House.

Mr. BORDEN: I am under the impression that Mr. Asquith is alluding to what I stated in my speech, namely, that I am assured that the Admiralty are prepared to give orders for the construction in Canada of some small ships, such as cruisers, oil tank vessels, and auxiliary craft. I do not know to what the reference could be unless it was to that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I noticed very carefully, when my right hon. friend delivered his speech the other day, and when I read it afterwards, that he made several rather vague statements; for instance, he said that he had the assurance of certain things, amongst others, that Canadians would be allowed to become officers on board the Canadian ships; and when there were certain orders to be given by the Admiralty, the cost being defrayed by the Canadian Government. I understood from the speech of my right hon. friend that nothing definite had been agreed to, but that certain conversations had taken place in that direction. I would have supposed that, if there had been a concrete understanding, such understanding would have been brought before the House. The statement of Mr. Asquith would rather indicate that there has been such an understanding. If my hon. friend says that Mr. Asquith was not properly advised, that will, as far as I am concerned, end the matter, but what I would like to know is whether or not the despatch is accurate. May I read it again?

Replying to Hon. Mr. Lee, former Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Hon. Mr. Asquith said that certain agreements of a general character had been agreed upon.

These arrangements are different from the arrangements we have before us now, and I understand that there are such arrangements in form between the Admiralty and my right hon. friend.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not vouch at all for the report of Mr. Asquith's observation which appears in the press. It is beyond question that whatever he did say in regard to it is absolutely in conformity with the fact. At the moment I have nothing more to say about it than that which I stated in my speech. We have the assurance to which I alluded. Further than that, if my right hon. friend will observe the terms of the last clause of the Bill, he will see provision made for stating these matters in a more concrete form, if necessary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If these arrangements are simply vague and not reduced to writing, I have nothing more to say; but if they are in the form of an agreement which has been reduced to writing, certainly it would be the duty of my right hon. friend to give communication of them to the House.

Mr. BORDEN: The assurance to which I have alluded has been given, we rely upon it, and we have no doubt whatever that it will be carried out. Further than that, definite arrangements can be made under the clause to which I have alluded.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is evading the point. I want to know if there is such an arrangement as that in writing. I have no doubt that, whether verbal or in writing, it will be carried out; but I want to know if there is such an agreement in writing.

Mr. BORDEN: I want to tell the right hon. gentleman that I was authorized to make the statement I did make in this House, and that is all the information I am able to give to him at the moment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear; we are to understand that it is a verbal arrangement.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GOVERNMENT SHIPYARD AT SOREL.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. How many employees have been dismissed from the Government shipyards at Sorel, Quebec, since January 1, 1912?
2. What was the date of dismissal in each case, and the name and salary paid to each?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. The superintendent of the shipyard at Sorel reports that since the 1st January, 1912, the services of three hundred and eighty-five persons have been discontinued. Of this number three hundred and fifty-nine have been retired, to make the number of men employed conform to the amount of work on hand. Of the number thus retired, fifty-four have been taken back from time to time as employment has been found for them. Twenty-one have been dismissed for insubordination. In the case of the remaining five, no cause has been assigned by the superintendent for their retirement.

2. Statement filed with the Clerk of the House.

MINISTERS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. What are the names of the ministers' private secretaries, and what is the rank and salary of each?
2. What was the occupation and salary of each such private secretary at the time of his or her appointment?

Mr. CODERRE:

Department of Agriculture:

1. William Ide, B.A., sub-division 'B' of the first division, salary, $2,400 per annum, with an allowance of $500 per annum as private secretary.

2. Clerk, copyrights and trade marks branch, salary, $1,850 per annum.

Department of Customs:

1. James Sydney Rowe, is private secretary to the Minister of Customs; his rank is that of clerk in the first division, subdivision 'B' and salary $2,100 a year and private secretary's allowance of $600.

2. Occupation at the time of his appointment, press correspondent, salary unknown.

Department of Finance:

1. R. B. Veits; rank, subdivision 'A' of second division, salary $2,100, and private secretary's allowance of $600.

2. Clerk in Department of Finance and private secretary. Rank, subdivision 'A' of second division, salary $1,800 and private secretary's allowance of $400.

Department of Inland Revenue:

1. Joseph Leon Kemner Laflamme, first division, subdivision 'B' $2,100, plus $600 as private secretary.

2. Not previously in the service.

Department of Justice:

1. Private secretary to the Minister of Justice, John T. Hackett, B.A., B.C.L., rank, first division, subdivision 'B' salary $2,800 per annum and $600 allowance.

2. Barrister.

Department of Labour:

1. J. G. McKellar, second division, subdivision 'A,' $1,600. No extra allowance, as private secretary.

2. Not previously in the service of the Government.

Department of Marine and Fisheries:

1. Gustav Heidmann, first division, subdivision 'B' $2,100 plus $600 as private secretary.

2. Assistant to the secretary of the National Transcontinental Railway Commission, salary $1,800.

Department of Militia and Defence:

1. A. B. Goldwyer-Lewis, B.A., subdivision 'B' first division. Salary $2,400. Private secretary's allowance $600.

2. A clerk in the Department of Militia and Defence.

Post Office Department:

1. Position at present vacant.

2. Answered by number one.

Privy Council Office:

1. A. E. Blount, first division, subdivision 'B' $2,800 and $600 allowance. Private secretary to the Premier.

2. No information.

Department of Public Works:

1. George F. Buskard, 1 B., $2,400 and $600 private secretary's allowance.

2. Private secretary to Minister of the Interior at same salary as above.

Department of Railways and Canals:

1. Mr. George W. Yates, first division, subdivision 'B' salary $2,400 and $600, total $3,000.

2. Private secretary to Mr. Cochrane who had been Minister of Lands, Forests and Mines for Ontario.

Departments of the Interior and Secretary of State:

1. No appointment of private secretary to the present Secretary of State yet made, and no one paid as such.

Mr. J. G. Mitchell, private secretary to Honourable Dr. Roche when Secretary of State is now acting private secretary to Dr. Roche, Minister of the Interior.

Mr. Mitchell is still on the pay list of the Department of the Secretary of State as an officer of subdivision 'B' first division at $2,100 and private secretary's allowance of $600.

Department of Trade and Commerce:

No appointment made.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—MR. ESDRAS MORIN.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has Esdras Morin, of St. Aubert, been appointed to any position on the Transcontinental railway?

2. Is he employed by the Government in any position? If so, what are his duties and his salary?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No.

2. On the 30th September 1912, by Order in Council, Ernest Taschereau, Commissioner of Police of Quebec, was directed to appoint Esdras Morin of St. Aubert, to serve as a police constable within his jurisdiction. No salary has been fixed.

GOVERNMENT LIGHTSHIP AT ST. ROCH.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. For what reasons has the Government taken away the care of the lightship at St. Roch, from Captain Andrews, to give it to David Bourgault, of St. Roch des Aulnaies?

2. What complaint is made against Captain Andrews?

3. Does the Government know that complaints are said to have already been made against David Bourgault, at the time he was lightkeeper at the entrance of the Saguenay?

4. Does the Government know that the said David Bourgault, as alleged, has publicly declared that he had paid $500 to one of the political organizers of Dr. Paquet, at St. Roch des Aulnaies, to be appointed in the place of Captain Andrews?

5. If not, will the department cause an inquiry to be made on this subject?

Mr. CODERRE:

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of the hon. member for Temiscouata to the above question in which he asks, 'Does the Government know that, as alleged,' and so on. There is no allegation in any part of the question, and I do not know what allegation my hon. friend refers to. There is nothing alleged in the question as being a fact. Possibly some mistake may have been made in the translation of the question. I am answering the question, but I want to say in answering it that it must not be considered in the future that there has been any allegation made because we are not aware of any such allegation. The answer is as follows:

1. It would appear that the member refers to Capt. Andrew Christensen instead of Capt. Andrews. The change was made so that each captain would be situated in his own county.

2. None.

3. During the first year of his service it was reported that he did not appear 'to have the required commanding power to control his men.' Since that time he has given satisfactory service.

4. No.

5. No charge of the nature specified in question four having been made to the department it does not consider it necessary to cause an inquiry to be made, but if any member of the House on his own responsibility makes such a charge an investigation will be ordered without delay.

PORT HOOD HARBOUR.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness):

1. What was the estimated cost of the closing of the entrance to Port Hood harbour?

2. How much money has been expended to date on this work?

3. What was the amount spent each year since the project was undertaken?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to complete the work?

5. Will there be an appropriation in the estimates this year for this work?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. $285,000.00.

2. $133,653.68.

3. 1903-04, $2,968.85; 1904-05, $19,942.43; 1905-06, $9,999.91; 1906-07, $14,885.13; 1907-08, $14,999.37; 1908-09, $15,000.98; 1909-10, $15,012.31; 1910-11, $22,412.35; 1911-12, $18,432.35; total, $133,653.68.

4 and 5. The matter will be carefully considered when the Estimates are being prepared.

OFFICIAL HISTORY OF CANADA.

Mr. ETHIER:

1. Has the Government appointed a commission charged to prepare an official history of Canada?

2. If so, is it true that this commission is composed of Messrs. Pope, Doughty and W. Jarvis, and what are the powers of the commissioners?

3. Why has the Government not added to this commission a man of letters or a French historian?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to fill this position by making such appointment?

Mr. CODERRE :

1. No.

2. By a commission dated the 9th November, 1912, Sir Joseph Pope, K.C.M.G., and Messrs. E. F. Jarvis and A. G. Doughty were appointed commissioners for the purposes of an investigation with respect to the records of the different departments of the Government of Canada, with a view of ascertaining their nature and extent and their state of preservation, the use made of them in conducting public business, the state of the buildings wherein such documents are deposited, the space they occupy, the facilities of access thereto by such departments and by the public, and the control exercised over the said records.

3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

SUPERINTENDENT OF DOMINION PARKS.

Mr. OLIVER :

1. Why was Howard Douglas, superintendent of Dominion parks, dismissed?

2. Who has been appointed in his place?

Mr. ROCHE :

1. Because he was unreliable and was using his official position to advance his personal interests.

2. P. C. Barnard-Hervey.

HUDSON WHARF ROAD.

Mr. BOYER :

1. Who has the superintendence of the repair works of the road between the wharf at Hudson and the railway, and what amount has this overseer received?

2. Who are the other persons who have worked on this road, how much has each received, and what kind of emp'oyment?

3. Who are the different furnishers of material for this work, what are their names and the amount of their accounts respectively?

4. How many days work was required on this work?

5. What is the extent of this road and how many tons of stone have entered into its construction?

Mr. ROGERS :

1. Nap. Mallette, 28th May to 31st August, 1912, 83 days at $3....$249 00

2. Wilfrid St. Dénis, teaming, 29th May-8th June, 1912, 10 days at $4.00.. .. .. $ 40 00

Stephen Daoult, teaming, 29th May-24th July, 1912 (double team), 41½ days at $4.00, $166.00; 8th July-31st August, 1912, 36½ days at $3, $109.50..$ 275 50

Daniel Daoult, labourer, 10th June-16th August, 1912, 52 days at $2.00.. .. .. 104 00

Alfred Daoult, teaming (single), 8th July-31st August, 1912, 39½ days at $3.00.. .. .. 118 50

Antoine Leroux, labourer, 12-17th August, 1912, 5½ days at $2.00 11 00

Achille Bertrand, teaming (double), 6-17th August, 1912, 11 days at $4.00.. .. .. 44 00

Total.. .. ..$842 00

3. George Pearson, Hudson, Qué., 1st July, 1912, 55 loads of stone at 10 cents.. .. .. $ 5 50

Nap. Mallette, Fils, Hudson, Que., 1st July, 1912, 190 loads of stone at 10 cents, $19.00; 1st August, 1912, 62 loads of stone at 10 cents, $6.20; 1st August, 1912, 189 loads of earth at 15 cents, $28.35; 31st August, 1912, 303 loads of earth at 15 cents, $45.45; 31st August, 1912, 55 loads of stone at 10 cents, $5.50.. .. .. .. 104 50

Geo. Parsons, Como, Qué., 1st August, 1912, 79 loads of stone at 10 cents, $7.90; 1st August, 1912, 106 loads of earth at 15 cents, $15.90; 31st August, 1912, 158 loads of earth at 15 cents, $23.70.. .. .. 47 50

Total.. .. ..$157 50

$999 50

4. 28th May to 1st September, 1912.

5. 605 by 20 feet; 756 loads of gravel; 441 loads of stone.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY KINDLING WOOD.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. On what date or dates were tenders called for the supply of kindling wood on the Intercolonial railway during the past calendar year, for the eastern division of the Intercolonial railway, or for all the divisions?

2. How many tenders were received, what are the names of the tenderers, and at what dates respectively, were the tenders received, and what were the prices named by each tenderer?

3. Was the lowest or any tender accepted? If so, whose tender, and at what figures was the contract entered into?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. On the 24th April, 1912, for the divisions of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and the province of Quebec.

2. See abstracts of tenders and memoranda filed with the Clerk of the House.

3. See abstracts of tenders attached and memoranda filed with the Clerk of the House.

ISAAC'S HARBOUR LOBSTER HATCHERY.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Was Charles G. Giffin, Isaac's Harbour, N.S., dismissed from the employment of the Department of Marine and Fisheries as an employee of said department in connection with the lobster hatchery at that place? If so, why?
2. Was an investigation held?
3. Who was appointed in his place?
4. Were public tenders asked for?
5. If so, what is the name of each tenderer and the amount of each tender?
6. Was the contract or employment given to the lowest tenderer? If not, why not?
7. Why was Charles G. Giffin's contract cancelled?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Charles G. Giffin was at no time a regular employee of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but had an agreement with the department to supply a gasoline launch for the collection of lobster eggs at $12 per day, during the season of 1911.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The service during the past season was performed by Captain P. McArthur, of Goldborough, N.S.

4. Yes.

5. Captain P. McArthur, Goldborough, N. S., offered to supply boat 34 ft. over-all, 8 ft. 6 in. wide and 50 ft. deep. Fitted with sails and 8 horsepower Fairbank's Morse engine. Boat and engine new, for $5.75 per day.

Captain Charles G. Giffin, Isaac's Harbour, N. S., offered to supply boat 32 ft. long over-all, 8 ft. 2 in. beam, with 10 horsepower double cylinder, for $5.95 per day.

6. Yes, the lowest tenderer.

7. No regular contract existed.

DAVID MURRAY'S SERVICES.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

What salary or remuneration yearly or otherwise is David Murray, of Mulgrave, N.S., receiving for the services being rendered by him as a preventive officer at that place?

Mr. WHITE: The salary of Mr. David Murray for services at Mulgrave and other points in Nova Scotia, on Customs Preventive Service, is $400 a year.

LABOURERS' PAY.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

What is the minimum rate of wages per day payable to common labourers employed by the Department of Public Works respectively when the work is being done by contract or when being done by a foreman appointed by the department?

Mr. COCHRANE

Mr. ROGERS: There is no fixed minimum rate of wages for common labourers employed by the Department of Public Works, as the rate varies in different parts of the country. In the case of contract work, the Fair Wage Schedule inserted in the specification, upon which contractors tender, is furnished by the Labour Department after an investigation of local conditions. In cases where the Public Works Department carries out work by day labour under a foreman, the rate of wages current in the locality is paid.

POPULATION OF CANADA.

Mr. MACDONALD:

What was the date of the completion of the enumeration of the population of Canada under the last census?

Mr. BURRELL: The census of Canada for the year 1911 was tabulated and published on the 25th February, 1912. Since then reports have been received for the census of Riggolet and Northwest Arm posts of the Hudson Bay Company for date of July 24; and in November last the census of Fort Chimo and for the posts of Cape Wolstenholme, Wakenham bay on Hudson straits and for Hopes Advance bay on Ungava bay were received. This is believed to complete the whole work.

STELLARTON PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has the Department of Public Works purchased any land at Stellarton for the purpose of erecting a public building thereon?
2. Has said department authorized or arranged with any one to take any option or options upon land in said town?
3. If so, to whom was the authority given or with whom was the arrangement made?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes; acquired by expropriation.

2 and 3. The department instructed Mr. D. H. Waterbury, Superintendent of Public Buildings, St. John, to visit Stellarton and secure options on suitable properties for a public building site.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. When were tenders called for the car ferry between the mainland and Prince Edward Island?
2. Who were the tenderers?
3. What was the amount of each tender?
4. Has the contract been awarded?
5. If not, does the Government propose to award it or to call for new tenders?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Tenders were invited on June 10, 1912.

2. Tenders are still under consideration by the department.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Answered by No. 2.
5. Answered by No. 2.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has the report of the Commission of Technical Education been received?
2. If not, when is it expected?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. No.
2. The minister is informed by the chairman of the commission that the preparation of the report has involved the careful examination of an immense mass of important material collected in countries outside Canada, that every diligence has been used, that the report is in the final stages of arrangement and consideration, and that it may be expected early in 1913.

PICTOU LIFE BOAT CREW.

*Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What are the names of the life boat crew at Pictou island in the county of Pictou, in the year 1911?
2. How many of the said crew of 1911 were removed or changed in 1912?
3. What were the grounds or reasons for such removal or change respectively?
4. What are the names of those appointed to fill the vacancies?
5. On whose recommendation were said changes made?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Alex. Currie (coxswain), Angus MacDonald, Hugh McCallum, Robt. McFarlane, Chas. A. McCallum, George D. Rankin, Torquil McLean.
2. The whole crew.
3. The coxswain, Alex. Currie, had ceased to reside permanently on Pictou island.
4. Duncan McCallum (coxswain), Allan McFarlane, John W. McDonald, John A. Rankin, J. Ward McCallum, Charles McIver, Dan Hector McLean.
5. The superintendent of the life saving service recommended the coxswain, who secured his own crew.

MR. MONK'S PRIVATE SECRETARY.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Since the resignation of the Hon. F. D. Monk as Minister of Public Works, what duties have been assigned to his former private secretary?
2. What is the name and the present rank and salary of the said official?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Hon. Mr. Monk's former private secretary has been retained on the staff of the present Minister of Public Works in connection with the French correspondence of that office.
2. Miss Louise Sarault, 1B, $2,400.

TRACADIE LOBSTER HATCHERY.

*Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

1. What are the names of, and what was the remuneration paid to each of the employees of the lobster hatchery at East Tracadie, Antigonish county, during the operating season of 1912?
2. When was the hatchery opened and how long was it in operation?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Michael J. Boudreau, $3.00 per day; Wm. S. Archibald, $3.00 per day; A. Scott Dawson, $2.50 per day; Michael Coté, $1.75 per day; Hubert Coté, $1.75 per day; Normand Beshong, $1.75 per day; Frank Coté, $1.75 per day.
2. Opened May 25, and in operation until July 10, 47 days.

STE. ADELAIDE DE PABOS BREAKWATER.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has a contract been awarded for an extension of the breakwater at Ste. Adelaide de Pabos, county of Gaspé?
2. If so, to whom and at what figure?
3. Who were the other tenderers, if any, and what were the figures of their tenders?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.
2. Arthur Nadeau and Edmond Nadeau, for $6,485.
3. J. E. Bernier, $6,950; J. Wilfrid Bégin, $7,200; David Duguay, $9,000.

SELKIRK ELECTION.

Mr. NEELY:

1. Who was the returning officer for the electoral division of Selkirk at the Dominion election of September 21, 1911?
2. By whom was this gentleman recommended for this appointment?
3. Is this gentleman now in the service of the Government? If so, when was he appointed, and by whom was he recommended for appointment?
4. What salary does he receive?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Frederick Walter Robert Colcleugh.
2. No information.
3. Yes, as agent for the Department of Indian Affairs at Selkirk, since 1st June, 1912. There is no information respecting his recommendation for appointment.
4. $1,200 per annum.

ST. PETERS CANAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to call the attention of the Secretary of State to certain replies which he brought down on Monday to questions put by me, and which do not constitute answers to the questions put. My questions were:

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals received any protests from the harbour master or any residents of St. Peters against the contractor in charge of the St. Peters canal improvements using the harbour for a dumping ground?

2. Has any communication on the subject been received from the resident engineer? If so, has any action been taken thereon?

The answers of the Secretary of State were:

1. A complaint was received from the Department of Marine and Fisheries on July 8, 1912, that clay is alowed to roll down the slope into the waters of the present canal. The matter was referred to the Department of Railways and Canals.

2. On July 20, 1912, a report was received from the resident engineer stating that every precaution was being taken to prevent clay rolling down into the present canal, principal assistant engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals also made personal observations at St. Peters on the 15th of July, and he noted that every precaution had been taken to prevent any clay dropping into the canal.

My questions had reference to the dumping of clay in the harbour of St. Peters by the contractor, and had no reference whatever to the canal. The canal is under the Department of Railways and Canals, and I was not as much concerned as to the use made of that by the contractor, because the contractor was the servant of the department. I say that the contractor has been using the harbour of St. Peters as a dumping ground for the last six months.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order in debating the question at this stage.

Mr. KYTE: Will the Secretary of State say whether or not protests were made to the department against making the harbour of St. Peters a dumping ground?

Mr. CODERRE: I presented to the House the answers given by the several departments; I will make further inquiry.

Mr. KYTE: The Secretary of State will observe that my question has reference to the dumping of clay in the harbour.

Mr. CODERRE: I will make inquiry as soon as possible.

ROYAL NATIONAL SANITARIUM ASSOCIATION.

Mr. W. A. CHARLTON (Norfolk): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I desire, without the usual notice, to call the attention of the Postmaster General to a matter which is very urgent. A few years ago the National Sanitarium Association, of which Lord Strathcona is president, obtained the privilege from the Post Office Department to use what were known as Christmas stamps, and last year they sold about $16,000 worth of these. At present they have $20,000 worth of these stamps on sale in every city, town and village in the Dominion, and it now appears that the use of these stamps is to be forbidden. I had a telegram last night and a letter this morning from the chairman of the executive committee, stating that instructions had been given by the Post Office Department to discontinue the use of these stamps. I might point out that in the United States the American Red Cross Society is using these stamps on the back of the letters. If it is possible for the Postmaster General to do so, I would ask him to let it be known publicly, as soon as possible, that these sanitarium stamps may be used on the back of the letters in Canada.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): The matter is one of considerable importance, and, as my hon. friend says, somewhat urgent in view of the printing of the stamps which has been going on, and which has been to a certain extent justified by a previous decision of the Post Office Department. It has been found in practice that anything appearing on the face of the letter which resembles in shape or colour the usual post office stamp, hampers to a great extent the work of the officials in the post office, more especially in large offices like Montreal and Toronto. The officials work in these offices under high pressure at times, and the appearance of these special stamps on the letters becomes confused with the regular post office stamps. This has caused considerable loss and trouble. Moreover, the countries which belong to the Postal Union have prohibited these special stamps, and Germany, Austria, Italy, Great Britain, return the letters, even if properly stamped, should they bear these special stamps. The Post Office Department in Canada always refused this privilege up to a certain date, when the late minister actuated no doubt by laudable and benevolent motives permitted their use for the first time. I have received protests from some of the countries belonging to the postal union, and we think it better to follow the same policy as other countries. However, I understand that the case to which my hon. friend refers is one which will appeal to everybody in this House, from its very excellent character. As a great deal of expense has already been incurred, we have come to the conclusion after some consultation with my officials that if the board of directors of the hospital in question will undertake to have those stamps used only for sealing purposes on the back of the envelope, and not on the face of the envelope where the postage stamp will be, for this year we will depart from the rule of the department, and will allow it for the very excellent purpose in view, with the clear understanding, however, that next year we shall have to adhere strictly to the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: This seems to me to be distinctly out of order. I understood it was a direct question and a direct answer. In such cases it would be better to put the usual notice on the Order Paper, because if one member departs from the rule, it only leads to others availing themselves of the same privilege, and you can scarcely decline to one what you grant to another.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysboro) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, Orders in Council, despatches, memoranda and other papers and documents in the possession of the Government, or any department thereof, relating to rates proposed to be charged by the Government of the United States to shipping passing through the Panama canal.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that this is an Imperial as well as a Canadian matter, and that it is now under the consideration of the Government of Great Britain. Our interest, however, is very great in this matter, as the Panama canal will affect the trade of Canada both in the East and in the West. For example, the use of the canal will bring Montreal some 3,000 miles nearer to Australia than it is to-day. It will also very materially affect the trade of our Pacific coast and will bring British Columbia many thousands of miles nearer to Halifax and Europe than at present. The Panama canal is so closely related to the shipping of Canada that I do not think the present situation should be allowed to pass without some reference to it in this House. The point I wish especially to discuss is the freeing of the coasting trade of the United States from tolls and the imposing of those tolls upon foreign shipping. This affects particularly the coasting trade, but it will affect the deep sea trade as well.

Our shipping in Canada is not very large at present, and it is not growing to such an extent as we should like, especially our deep sea shipping. That shipping tends to rather disappear from the sea of late years. We have some 800,000 tons of shipping at present on the Canadian register. Everybody knows that our people are ambitious to build ships. The people of Canada are a proud people, and they will not long be content to see their flag disappear from the sea. In the province from which I have the honour to come, we boasted years ago of the tonnage owned in that province. At one time the people of Nova Scotia owned more than one ton of shipping to each inhabitant of the province. That is a greater average, I believe, than has ever been attained by any other country, including Great Britain. There never was a time in the history of Great Britain—and the same is true of the United States—when the people owned the average of one ton of shipping for each person in the country. We, in Nova Scotia, are ambitious to restore the old position and to take our places again upon the sea. We have the men and we have the material at hand. We are a maritime people and, owing to the great progress that has been made in recent years in our iron and steel industries, the time ought to be opportune for the people on the coast of Canada to embark upon the building of ships. My purpose, as I have said, is to draw attention to the action taken by the United States which I regard as a breach of an agreement made between Great Britain and the United States some years ago. I called attention to this matter last session, and the Prime Minister was good enough to say that it was having the best attention of the Government. I have no doubt this is the case, but since that date the Congress of the United States has taken action and an Act has been passed by which they have freed the coast trade of the United States from all dues for passing through this canal and imposed considerable dues on the tonnage of foreign ships. I am aware, of course, that this matter has been taken up by the Foreign Office in London and everybody has read the very able presentation of it which was made the other day by Sir Edward Grey. No one in Canada objects to the people of the United States subsidizing their own ships; if they choose to pay a subsidy to promote the shipping of the United States we cannot object, but what we object to is that this should be done at our expense, because the whole cost of paying the interest on the money invested and maintaining this canal is to fall on foreign shipping, and if the coastal shipping of the United States is to be relieved altogether then, as a matter of fact, we will have to pay our share of the subsidy which is being given to the ships of the United States. The terms of the agreement made between the two countries are familiar to everybody, that there should be no discrimination between the tolls charged to ships of the United States and to ships of Great Britain. An agreement was made as far back as 1850 between the United States and Great Britain called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in which the United States and Great Britain bound themselves that they would take no action in regard to the construction or operation of this canal. Permit me to quote a sentence of this treaty:

> The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.

That treaty made in 1850 stood in the way of the United States when the Panama Canal Company fell through, and they resolved to undertake the construction of this important work themselves. It therefore became necessary for them to go back to Great Britain and make a subsequent agreement as they could not go on with the construction of the canal and with its operation because the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty stood positively in their way. Then, in order to avoid the difficulties in regard to that agreement, a subsequent treaty was made in 1901 which is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This treaty was concluded on the 18th November, 1901, and proclaimed on the 22nd February, 1902. Permit me to quote the 2nd and 3rd articles of that treaty:

> 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or subject to the provisions of the said treaty. The said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such a construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the said canal.
>
> 3. The United States adopt as the basis of a neutralization of the said ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople filed on the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez canal, that is to say: 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions of traffic or charges on traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges on traffic shall be just and equitable.

This gives the United States authority to construct the canal and maintain it, but under the very specific and clear condition that it shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing the rules, on entire equality. President Taft, I understand, holds that 'all nations' does not include the United States, though this treaty was obviously made to create a condition by which equal terms would be given to the vessels of the United States and Great Britain, and the construction that President Taft has put on it is that the words 'all nations' do not include the United States, and consequently they are at liberty to allow the ships of the United States to pass through the canal free and to make the ships of all countries foreign to the United States pay the whole expense of maintaining the canal. The whole point is that the Government of the United States surrendered the right to build the canal at all, or to operate it by the treaty of 1850, and they recovered this right under the treaty I have just quoted, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in 1902; but they did so under the express conditions which I have also quoted, and I contend that they are now failing to keep that condition.

I wish also to quote the statute passed by the Congress of the United States since our last session in regard to this important matter:

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled that, from and after the completion of the Panama canal no tolls shall be charged or collected from any ship or vessel for passing through said canal which flies the American flag and which is engaged in coastwise traffic of the United States.

That Act of the Congress of the United States was passed on the 16th of December last year, but it was not ratified at that time, as I understand, by the President. The ratification, however, took place at a later date. The Act further provides:

> That in fixing the charges for the use of the canal any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, which is owned in whole or in part by any railway company, or which is owned by any company the stock of which is owned in whole or in part by any railway company, shall pay the highest charges prescribed for any vessel.

There is a question as to whether this applies to ships owned by railway companies in Canada, or whether it simply applies to ships owned by railway companies in the United States. That question is being dealt with by the Foreign Office.

I submit that the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty have been violated by the action that has been taken by the Congress of the United States. There is more or less difference of opinion on this question in the United States itself. Prominent newspapers there have come out strongly against the action of President Taft and Congress in regard to this treaty. For example, the New York Evening Post uses the following language:

> That pledge, in both its spirit and its letter, the pending Panama Bill proposes coolly to break. It would do it by allowing American vessels to pass through the canal free of tolls, while charging them upon all other ships. This is the Congressional idea of 'entire equality' and 'no discrimination'! The glaring bad faith of this has been repeatedly pointed out, both in and out of Congress.

Strong language of that kind has been used by the press both in the United States and Great Britain, and I think it is justifiable. The clause that concerns the coasting trade of the United States, to my mind, clearly conflicts with the treaty, in the first place, because it places the entire cost of maintaining the canal on foreign ships, and, in the second place, it places the American coastwise trade in a preferential position, which was prohibited by the agreement. It may be that Canada holds the key to this matter, as ships of the United States are using the St. Lawrence route, and, I understand, are passing at present through our waters free. I am not very well posted as to what rights they possess, or whether their rights are such that no change is possible. But it is quite possible that in Canada we might be able to impose some terms upon the shipping of the United States passing through our waters that would have the effect of securing fair play and respect for our treaty rights with regard to the Panama canal. This question is of very great importance to both the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast. I have nothing further to say except that I do not think it advisable to allow this condition of affairs to pass without some protest being entered by the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. BORDEN: The subject to which the hon. member for Guysboro has called attention is no doubt a very important one. I had the opportunity of discussing that subject with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs during the past summer, and of placing before him the views which the Government of Canada entertained with regard to it. As the Foreign Secretary has lodged with the government of the United States, through the British Ambassador at Washington, a note embodying the views of His Majesty's Government on the subject, and, as I am not aware that the reply of the United States to that note has yet been given, it is not desirable for me to-day to enter into a general discussion of this question. Not only orally, but otherwise, the views of the Government have been placed before His Majesty's Government, and, in addition to that, the Department of Trade and Commerce has taken steps to secure from boards of trade, shipping associations, railway companies, and other important interests in Canada, their views as to the probable effects of the legislation of the United States in that regard. There is no reason why the papers should not be brought down, except in so far as any of them may be of a confidential nature at the present time. I am very glad that my hon. friend has brought the subject to the attention of the House; and I entirely concur in the view which he has expressed as to the cogency and force of the memorandum which has been submitted by Sir Edward Grey, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to the Government of the United States, for their consideration.

Motion agreed to.

PURCHASE OF WHARF AT SOREL.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all petitions, letters, telegrams, &c., in connection with tht purchase by the Public Works Department of the Pontbriand wharf at Sorel, Quebec.

He said: I hope the facts which will be divulged by the production of the documents will not be as grave as I am informed they are. This wharf was offered some years ago to the late Government for the sum of $6,000. In answer to a question which I put on the Order Paper the other day, I was informed that the present Government had paid the enormous amount of $15,000 for that wharf. I have seen that wharf myself, and, although I am not an expert, the little I know about wharfs warrants me in saying that, if it is not a mistake, that the Government has paid $15,000 for this wharf, it is a scandal of the purest water.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto): That is rather a contradiction in terms.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I repeat, it is a scandal of the purest water, so as to make it clear, and to wash, if possible, those who may have been guilty of this purchase. One thing you will notice, Mr. Speaker, is that the wharf was purchased just a few weeks before the last election in the county of Richelieu. Several names are mentioned in connection with the purchase. It did not go through very quickly, apparently, and some people intervened. Some others complained. Some said that the patronage belonged to them. Mr. Morgan, who was the Conservative candidate, repeated all over the county that some one would have to pay for it, and that the patronage belonged to him, and not to gentlemen who represented neighbouring counties. At all events, I have no hesitation in saying that the purchase by the present administration just on the eve of a by-election for $15,000, of the wharf which was refused at the price I have mentioned $6,000, by the late Government, seems to be a rather shady transaction. At all events, we will see the papers, and if the Government is not guilty, I will say so in the House.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto): It might have been better, perhaps, if my hon. friend had not introduced so much presumptive evidence that the Government was guilty before he received the papers.

Motion agreed to.

EXPROPRIATION OF LANDS AT ST PETERS, N.S.

Mr. KYTE moved:

For a copy of all papers, letters and telegrams in the custody of the Department of Railways and Canals, or any other department, since October 1, 1911, relating to the acquisition or expropriation of lands at St. Peters, N.S., for canal purposes, and relating to the appointment of valuators to appraise the value of such lands, the instructions to such valuators, the report or reports of such valuators, the area of land taken, and the price paid for the same, and also the amount paid to each valuator for his services.

He said: I desire to place the House in possession of certain information that prompted me to place this motion upon the Order Paper. Some two years ago it was determined by the late Minister of Railways and Canals to effect certain improvements at St. Peters canal in the county of Richmond. A part of the scheme was to divert the course of the present canal with the view of eliminating, as far as possible, the curve that existed in the old canal and which prevented the accommodation of the larger class of vessels which are now seeking access to that very important waterway. For this purpose it was necessary to expropriate a certain piece of property which, by the way, is owned by Mr. J. A. Gillies, defeated candidate in the county of Richmond in the last election. When the item was up for consideration in supply I put some questions to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) which I shall now read from 'Hansard':

Mr. KYTE: Has the minister any report as to the amount of additional land that will be necessary for improving the canal?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not. They are expropriating lands there now.

Mr. KYTE: Does the minister intend to have the value of those lands fixed by the Exchequer Court?

Mr. COCHRANE: I may say that some parties wrote me the other day, and I sent Mr. O'Dwyer down there to value the lands. That is as far as I have gone.

Mr. KYTE: I think the value should be fixed by the Exchequer Court.

Mr. COCHRANE: The department sent somebody to value and then made an offer to the owner. If the owner did not see fit to accept the offer then it went to the Exchequer Court.

That statement was perfectly satisfactory to me. I felt that if the owner refused to accept the valuation placed upon this land by the expert valuator sent down there by the Department of Railways and Canals and he would be obliged to go into the Exchequer Court, there would certainly be no ground for assuming that any excessive or extravagant value would be placed upon the land by that tribunal. It is true that a gentleman by the name of O'Dwyer was sent to St. Peters in April last for the purpose of valuing the land and that Mr. O'Dwyer made a report upon the value of the land, but the Minister of Railways and Canals did not carry out the plan which he assured me would be carried out, that is, to compel Mr. Gillies to go into the Exchequer Court if he wanted more money than the amount recommended should be paid to him by Mr. O'Dwyer. The fact of the matter is that when Mr. O'Dwyer's report was made and sent to the Department of Railways and Canals the owner of the land did not accept the valuation. What was done was that Mr. Gillies recommended the appointment of a commission down in the town of St. Peters to act as a court of appeal from the appraisement made by Mr. O'Dwyer. The commissioners recommended by Mr. Gillies were two defeated candidates in the provincial election in Nova Scotia and the third was his campaign manager in the last election. These three men were appointed by the Minister of Railways and Canals to constitute a court of appeal, if I may so speak of it, from the independent valuation placed upon this property by Mr. O'Dwyer. Well, Sir, these valuators met, their award was made some time ago, and they awarded Mr. Gillies $3,750 for the amount of land required by the Department of Railways and Canals, the quantity taken being 3·8 acres. So, you will see that Mr. Gillies was awarded $1,000 an acre practically for the quantity of land which was appraised by his commissioners and which was required by the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many acres?

Mr. KYTE: Three decimal eight acres of land, for which these commissioners awarded him $3,750, or practically $1,000 per acre.

Mr. EMMERSON: What was Mr. O'Dwyer's valuation?

Mr. KYTE: I have not been able to see Mr. O'Dwyer's valuation, and that is one of the reasons why I have placed this motion on the Order Paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the value of property there?

Mr. KYTE: I have some evidence which I shall place before the House as to what was the fair value of this property. Mr. Gillies has been the owner of the land since 1900. In the year 1906 Mr. Gillies was assessed the sum of $8,800 for 90 acres of land which he owned at that time, the assessors thus placing a value of about $100 per acre upon the land. According to the rule by which the assessment of property is made in Nova Scotia, the valuation to be placed upon property for assessment purposes is that which it would bring at a cash sale, and the assessors in 1906 assumed that $100 per acre would be a reasonably fair valuation to be put upon this property and they so assessed it. But, Mr. Gillies was not content with that assessment, so he made a motion before the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, by way of certiorari, for the purpose of having that assessment quashed. I will read the affidavits that were made in connection with that motion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the same Gillies who appointed Landry?

Mr. KYTE: That is the same man. I shall first read the affidavit made by Mr. Gillies himself in the Supreme Court, and then I shall read the affidavits of two of the commissioners who awarded him $1,000 an acre for the property.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was Landry one of them?

Mr. KYTE: No, he was not. Landry was not available as a commissioner at that time, as he was in jail. (Reading):

In the Supreme Court—Crown Side.
In the Matter of the Assessment Act, and in the matter of the assessment of Joseph A. Gillies, of Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, barrister, of lands at St. Peters, in the county of Richmond.
Affidavit of J. A. Gillies.

I, Joseph A. Gillies, of Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, barrister, make oath and say:

1. That I am the applicant herein:

2. That I am the owner of land on the western side of the canal at St. Peters, in municipal district number seven, in the county of Richmond, which contains less than ninety acres, and is the only land that I own in the said district of St. Peters, in the said county of Richmond.

3. That I acquired the said land in the year 1903, by purchase from Charles Archibald, of Halifax, Esquire, paying him therefor the sum of one thousand dollars——

That is, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Gillies paid $1,000 for the whole 95 acres which he then purchased.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How long ago?

Mr. KYTE: In 1903. (Reading continued):

—said tract or piece of land then contained ninety-five acres; and that since its purchase its area has been diminished by over six acres, by expropriation for railway purposes and by sales.

4. That said land has not increased in value since I purchased it, and has been cut up into several lots of different areas by a railway, which runs through it since 1902.

5. That the sworn assessment of this block or lot of land was returned by the municipal assessors for the district in which it lies, at the sum of twelve hundred dollars for the years 1902, 1903 and 1904.

6. That herewith produced and marked as exhibit 'A' to this my affidavit is a plan of the said property, upon which is shown the portion of said land taken for the Cape Breton railway right-of-way, and for other purposes in connection therewith.

7. That the land taken for said railway purposes consists of five acres and a third of an acre, and is near the centre of the whole block and extends from its western to its eastern boundary.

8. That a large portion of this lot or block outside of the area taken for railway purposes is injuriously affected by virtue of the severance; besides cutting off the frontage of my land on St. Peters harbour, and depriving me entirely of a water front of over five hundred feet on the waters of this harbour.

9. That this land was taken for this railway some time after I had purchased it from Mr. Archibald, and was taken under chapter 123 of the Acts of the province of Nova Scotia 1902, and the five acres and a third of an acre so taken, including all damages done to the balance of the lot by virtue of the severance, and including the damages done by depriving me of access to the frontage on St. Peters harbour, were valued and appraised at one hundred and sixty dollars, which was the award made by the arbitrators, James H. McKichan, Simon H. McKenzie and Alexander E. Morrison, all residents of the county of Richmond, as I verily believe.

10. That I am residing at Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, where I have my office and place of business. That there is no occupant of my land at St. Peters nor is there any house or building of any kind upon it, nor is it fenced or enclosed in any way, nor is there any one in actual possession thereof; that I have no office or place of business at St. Peters, nor in any part of the county of Richmond, nor have I any agent there, nor have I any place of residence in Richmond county.

11. That only on the 20th of April last did it come to my knowledge that the assessment of my property at St. Peters was returned by the general assessors for the county of Richmond for the present year at the sum of eight thousand eight hundred dollars. That I had no notice of any kind from the assessors or any other person of this assessment; that I had no knowledge whatever of it until after the time for appealing had elapsed, or I would have appealed therefrom. That I had no notice before assessment was made, nor was I furnished with any schedule to fill up, nor was I asked for information. That I had no idea that the assessors would return this property at an amount greater than it was assessed for in 1902, 1903 and 1904, namely, twelve hundred dollars, as this figure was in the opinion, and from my knowledge of the value of property at St. Peters a high valuation for assessment purposes.

12. That no property at St. Peters, near, nor about, nor adjacent to my property has had its assessment increased over the assessment of the past three years, to any but a small extent, if at all.

13. That there is no demand for property at St. Peters, and since I acquired this tract in February, 1902, I have had it in the market, but have succeeded in selling only four small lots for building purposes to St. Peters people; and although I have made every possible effort to make sales, both by the lot and by the acre, I could not effect a sale in either way, nor have I had any offer to purchase at any price.

14. That a large portion of this lot or tract is wet, boggy and unfit for use, and could not be sold I verily believe at any price; that a large part is covered with bushes or light wood of no value; that the statement of the assessors returning this property as containing ninety-five acres is incorrect, as it contains less than ninety acres, and out of this several acres are practically unsaleable, by reason of the proximity of the railway, the shape and size of the lots and their being cut off from access to the road as will appear by reference to plan exhibit 'A.'

15. That the assessment of eight thousand eight hundred dollars made upon this property is largely and extravagantly excessive, and altogether wrong, and I believe if I had had an opportunity of appealing therefrom I would have been able to establish these facts conclusively.

16. That I am informed by the municipal clerk of the county of Richmond that the council did not appoint any date for the completion of said rolls, other than that prescribed by chapter 73, Revised Statutes 1900.

17. That I am informed by William Levesconte, Esquire, who lives near St. Peters, and who is a real estate holder in said county of Richmond, and from such information I verily believe that the assessment roll for district number seven was posted up in said district not earlier than January 8, 1906.

18. That a grave miscarriage of justice will be had, and grave injustice done me if this assessment be allowed to stand, as the amount for which it is assessed is far in excess of its market value, and far in excess of the amount that could be obtained for it if sold at auction, and far in excess of the amount that I would gladly accept for the whole property.

Sworn to at Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, this 17th day of December, A.D., 1906.

Before me (Sgd.) A. D. GUNN.
A Commissioner of the Supreme and County Courts, in and for the county of Cape Breton.

JOSEPH A. GILLIES.

This affidavit is filed on behalf of Joseph A. Gillies, the applicant.

I have affidavits here from eleven leading citizens in the town of St. Peters setting forth that the value of the land is less than $100 an acre and that the assessment of $100 an acre made upon the property was grossly extravagant, excessive and unjust. I will, for the moment, content myself with reading two of the affidavits made by two of the commissioners who awarded Mr. Gillies $1,000 per acre in May or June last.

Mr. KYTE.

This is the affidavit of John Morrison which is to be found at page 8 of the printed record.

In the Supreme Court—Crown Side.

In the matter of the Assessment Act, and in the matter of the assessment of Joseph A. Gillies, of Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, barrister, of lands at St. Peters, in the county of Richmond.

Affidavit of John Morrison.

I, John Morrison, of St. Peters, in the county of Richmond, hotelkeeper, make oath and say:

1. That I am and have been a resident of St. Peters aforesaid, for over forty years.

2. That I am the owner of real estate at St. Peters, and have a good knowledge of the value of lands there.

3. That I know well the land assessed to the said Joseph A. Gilles at St. Peters aforesaid; that there are no buildings on said land, nor is it fenced or cultivated or improved in any way, but is a common, and portions of it are wet and boggy, and unfit for use.

4. That there is no demand for small building lots at St. Peters, nor has there been, and while a lot might be occasionally sold, I verily believe it would be impossible to sell any considerable number of lots, nor do I think the demand has increased, or if it has it has been very slight within the past few years.

5. In my opinion the assessment of $8,800 on this lot of land is far in excess of the market value of said lot if sold at auction, and from my knowledge of this lot of land and in land in the district of St. Peters, I do say that the valuation of $8,800 placed upon this lot is excessive, extravagant and unjust.

Sworn to at St. Peters, in the county of Richmond, this 3rd day of December, A. D. 1906.

Before me,
(Sgd.) JOHN D. MATHESON,
A commissioner of the Supreme and County Courts, in and for the county of Richmond.

(Sgd.) JOHN MORRISON.

This affidavit is filed on behalf of Joseph A Gillies, the applicant.

The following is the affidavit made by Donald Y. Stewart, another of the commissioners, who allowed Mr. Gillies $1,000 an acre for this land in the month of May or June last:

In the Supreme Court—Crown Side.

In the matter of the Assessment Act, and in the matter of the assessment of Joseph A. Gillies, of Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, barrister, of lands at St. Peter, in the county of Richmond.

Affidavit of D. Y. Stewart.

I, Donald Y. Stewart, of St. Peters, in the county of Richmond, merchant, make oath and say:

1. That I have been residing in St. Peters and carrying on mercantile business there for a period of about twenty years, that I own several pieces of real estate at St. Peters, and that I have a good knowledge of the value of real estate at St. Peters and its vicinity.

2. That I know well the property at St. Peters assessed to the above named Joseph A. Gillies for $8,800, and I do say that said valuation in my opinion is far in excess of the sum that said lot would bring at auction.

3. That the said lot is unfenced and is used as a common, and a large part of it is wet and boggy, and in its present condition unfit for use.

4. That there is no demand for small building lots at St. Peters, and while a lot might be occasionally sold, it would be impossible to sell any considerable number of lots for building purposes.

5. In my opinion the assessment of $8,800 on this lot of land is far beyond its market value, and from my knowledge of the value of land at St. Peters and its vicinity, I do say that the assessment of $8,800 placed upon this lot of land is excessive and unreasonable and unjust.

(Sgd.) D. Y. STEWART.

Sworn to at St. Peters, in the county of Richmond, this 7th day of December, A.D. 1906. Before me, (Sgd.) JOHN D. MATHESON.

A Commissioner of the Supreme and County courts in and for the county of Richmond.

This affidavit is filed on behalf of Joseph A. Gillies, the applicant.

I will not delay the House to read more of the affidavits which appear in this printed case, I content myself with making the statement of the facts as they appear from these records. I will make no further comment, except to say that in view of the statement and assurance given me by the Minister of Railways at the last session of Parliament that if the owner of the land was not content with the value placed upon it by Mr. O'Dwyer, who was sent out for that purpose, he would be obliged to go to the Exchequer Court, I was astonished that that procedure was not carried out. I was extremely disappointed that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals did not allow the matter to go into the Exchequer Court, instead of having accepted the decision of three of Mr. Gillies' own personal and political friends in the town of St. Peters, who were constituted a court of appeal from the award given by Mr. O'Dwyer. I have no doubt that the hon. minister has in his department several documents referring to this matter, and I am anxious to see them before making any further remarks. In the meantime I will leave these facts to the House and hope to return to the subject at a later date in the session.

Mr. COCHRANE : I have no recollection of making any such statement about what the hon. gentleman says I agreed to last session. I do not dispute it, because I have not looked it up. It is true that I sent Mr. O'Dwyer down there, as I understood that he was familiar with the values of land through that section of the country, and his valuation was $3,780.90, which I myself thought was high. They refused to pay on that valuation, and I appointed, as my hon. friend states, the three arbitrators. I did not consult Mr. Gillies in any way as to whom I should get. Their valuation was $3,750. The hon. gentleman has made some rather strong remarks in reference to this, and I beg to move the adjournment of the debate until I get further information.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DISMISSAL OF LEMUEL BENT.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved :

For a copy of all papers, documents, Orders in Council, telegrams, letters, &c., relating to the dismissal from office of Lemuel Bent, late collector of customs at Oxford, N.S.

Mr. RHODES : This is the case to which I made an ineffectual attempt to refer the other day. It has been the subject of considerable attention by the Opposition press throughout the country. This man was dismissed upon my recommendation, on the ground of offensive partisanship. It is true that he is minus one arm and a portion of one leg, but I hope it is not necessary for me to say that no one regrets more than I do his unfortunate physical condition. In view, however, of the nature of criticism in the Opposition press, one might very well believe that I had been guilty of amputating this man's arm and leg, and, by way of completing my work, that I had then thrown him out of a position which constituted his only means of livelihood. The Opposition press have attempted to make political capital out of his dismissal, and to level criticism against the Prime Minister and the Government for not keeping their promises in regard to the spoils system. With respect to this case the Opposition press have shed crocodile tears copiously and continuously. Most of the criticism has been by way of editorial reference; but one man has published a letter in the Winnipeg Tribune. I will give him the credit of saying that he writes over his own name. He makes reference to this subject, and criticises my record as the representative of the county of Cumberland, comparing it unfavourably with the record of my predecessors, and then follows this paragraph:

No, but it was left for the present member of Parliament to be a party to one of the most brutal acts of political partisanship ever heard of in Canada.

I may say with respect to this man, that his tears are not crocodile tears; they are simply blind tears, because he does not know what he is talking about. And let me here point out that the bulk of criticism in regard to this dismissal has been made by the press outside of the province of Nova Scotia. In that province the subject has been referred to only by one newspaper, the Halifax Chronicle, and in it reference has been made on two occasions, by reason of letters written to that paper by the man who was dismissed. I do not believe he was a fit subject for appointment; in the first place, because a man with one arm and one leg is hardly competent to handle the packages coming into and going out of a customs house, and dealing with the various papers, incidental to the duties of his office. Bitter complaints have been made to me on many occasions by residents of the town of Oxford, that this man was not competent for his duties by reason of his physical unfitness, but I do not propose to justify my action in the matter upon that ground. I propose to justify it purely and entirely on the ground of offensive partisanship. Shortly after the elections of 1911, this matter was brought to my attention by several of the leading men of Oxford, a town of some 1,400 inhabitants. They told me, that he was a partisan not in the ordinary sense of the word, but that he was a very bitter partisan, that his partisanship was of such a nature that he was a partisan in season and out of season, at elections and between elections. I took the precaution to go to the town of Oxford, and there consult with practically all the leading citizens, many of them being Liberals, and the statements of those people went to verify my information. As an evidence of the correctness of the statements I have made, I beg to submit only two affidavits with respect to the conduct of this man.

Canada,
Province of Nova Scotia,
County of Cumberland, N.S.

In the matter of Lemuel Bent, of Oxford, in the county of Cumberland, customs house officer, charged with being an active political partisan.

I, Oliver King, of Oxford aforesaid, farmer, do solemnly declare that:

1. I am a resident of and a voter in the town of Oxford aforesaid.

2. That during the political campaign ending September 21, 1911, the aforesaid Lemuel Bent, continuously and persistently advocated in public the policies, principles and character of the Liberal party and belittled and condemned the Liberal-Conservative party, their platform and followers, and in the course of his advocacy and discussions in public was most blatant, outspoken and abusive towards members of the Liberal-Conservative party.

3. That his team was on the streets on election day and was used for the conveyance of voters to and from the polls.

4. That the said Lemuel Bent was and has always been most insolent and abusive in his discussions of the Liberal-Conservative party and has always appeared ready and willing to so discuss such party.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing it is of the same force, virtue and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the 'Canada Evidence Act.'

OLIVER KING.

Declared before me at Oxford aforesaid, this 25th day of October, A.D. 1912.

C. H. OXLEY,
Barrister-at-Law of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

I have also the affidavit of John S. Thompson, as follows:

Canada, Province of Nova Scotia, County of Cumberland.

In the matter of Lemuel Bent, of Oxford, in the county of Cumberland, customs official, charged with political partisanship.

I, John S. Thompson, of Oxford, aforesaid, farmer, do solemnly declare that:

1. I am a resident elector of the town of Oxford aforesaid.

2. The said Lemuel Bent carried on and allowed to be carried on political discussions upon the premises used as a customs office, wherein he and others indulged in outspoken attacks and abuse on and of the platform, policies and adherents of the Liberal-Conservative party, and upheld the policies and members of the Liberal party.

3. He was most bitter, sarcastic and offensive in his arguments and remarks against the Liberal-Conservative party, and his voice has frequently been heard on the street corner either arguing with, agitating or agravating some friend of the Liberal-Conservative party, and at times has been extremely bitter and offensive in his denunciations of such party.

4. His team was on the street carrying friends of the Liberal party to and from the polls on election day, September 21, 1911.

5. I am informed on good authority that he contributed to the campaign fund of the Liberal party at the September 21, 1911, election.

The fifth paragraph, is a matter of hearsay. I may explain that these affidavits were not prepared by me, but I read them as they were submitted to me by friends in the town of Oxford. (Reading continued):

6. Several of his intimate party (Liberal party) friends say that he cannot stand an investigation.

7. He has for many years been a most blatant, argumentative, tantalizing upholder and supporter of the Liberal party.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing it to be of the same force, virtue and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

JOHN S. THOMPSON.

Declared before me at Oxford aforesaid this 26th day of October A.D., 1912.

Before me,

C. H. OXLEY,
Barrister-at-Law, Supreme Court, Nova Scotia.

It will be observed that these affidavits—

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Who signs that affidavit?

An hon. MEMBER: Shut up.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not want the hon. gentleman to tell me to shut up. I refer to the hon. member for Simcoe. I wish to ask the name, residence and occupation of this person who signed that declaration.

Mr. RHODES: It is signed by John S. Thompson, of Oxford, farmer.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Who prepared that declaration?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot say.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It is not likely the declarant did. Does not the hon. member know who prepared it?

Mr. RHODES: I do not.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No suspicion?

Mr. RHODES: I have a suspicion, but I would not be justified in giving a positive answer on suspicion. The facts are that these affidavits came to me from a very reliable man in the town of Oxford, and I took particular pains to ask him and other citizens of the town as to the character and standing in the community of the deponents, and, as the result of my interview with them, I have no hesitation in saying that the deponents are men worthy of confidence. It will be observed that this declaration is dated as having been sworn on October 26, 1912. That is some time after Mr. Bent was removed from office. But I desire to explain that I had in my possession, at the time I made the recommendation for the removal of Mr. Bent, an affidavit from the first of these deponents, Mr. Oliver King, and a statement purporting to be an affidavit of John S. Thompson, covering substantially the same ground. But these documents were not in proper form; and, in view of the prominence of this case, I wrote to the town of Oxford and asked that these men have their statements put into the form of regular declarations. I do not think there is any question that this man has been a partisan of the most offensive class.

We then come down to the question of his unfortunate physical condition. If we lay down the principle that a cripple is not to be removed upon any account whatever, for partisanship or anything else, then it would be the obvious duty of the party in power to gather as many cripples as possible and appoint them to the public service. They would be paid by the state, and immune from the regulations laid down as to partisanship and they could be turned loose as offensive partisans, and so we should have the most effective political machine of any country enjoying representative institutions. But, where I have been called upon by force of circumstances to ask for removals, I have always been very careful to make inquiries, first as to the financial position of the person affected—as to whether he was dependent in any degree upon the money he received from the public service as a means of livelihood,—and second, as to his physical condition. In the case of this man Lemuel Bent, I took particular pains to inquire as to his material condition. I have a letter, written to me by one of the most representative men of the town of Oxford, in which he makes a statement of the circumstances of this man. I will give it briefly as he gave it to me:

He (Bent) had been in Oxford over twenty years as a dry goods and grocery merchant; and was fairly well off when he came and has been doing a very good business ever since. The eldest son, Dr. F. D. Bent, is practising in Oxford, is worth over $5,000; Ernest (his other son), 24 years of age, assists in the store; his wife is living and also clerks in the store. Mr. Bent is about 60 years of age, his real estate is worth $4,000, his stock in the store about $5,000. I have it on good authority that he is drawing interest on $8,000 invested and in the bank. He has lost one leg and his right arm, and customers often have to make out the customs papers, as he is very awkward with his left hand. (I have done this.) While he is a very good neighbour and friend of mine, I believe all that Oliver King and John S. Thompson have said, as he is very insulting at times. About three weeks before he was dismissed, I had occasion to go to his store. He was at his customs desk, and he insulted me without the least provocation on my part, so much so that I do not consider him a proper man for a public office of that kind.

Mr MACLEAN (Halifax): Is that letter from Mr. Patton?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. And I may say that Mr. Patton is one of the representative citizens of the town of Oxford and one of the best-known men in the whole county of Cumberland. I was satisfied, first, that Mr. Bent had been an active partisan and, second, that his financial position was such that he would not be a sufferer if he lost the sum of money he received as a custom officer, which was, I believe, $500 a year. But to be absolutely just to Mr. Bent, on September 5, 1912, I wrote him this letter.

Amherst, N.S., Sept. 5, 1912.

Dear Mr. Bent:—

I regret to have to advise you that it has become necessary for me to ask for your removal from the position of sub-collector of customs at Oxford.

The matter of dismissals is a most unpleasant one for me and if I were to consult my own wishes none would be made except in the most flagrant cases. A public man must in many such cases listen to the advice of his followers.

This letter is not written to excuse myself, as I am prepared to take the full responsibility in the matter. I wish, however, in justice to you to advise you in advance.

Yours very truly,

Lemuel Bent, Esq.,
Oxford N. S.

That letter was written on September 5, 1912. Mr. Bent was not removed from office until October 16, or within one or two days prior to that date. In other words, he was not removed from office for nearly six weeks after I wrote giving him positive notice that I proposed to call for his removal from office. Here is a significant fact. Mr. Bent made no reply to that letter, nor did anybody on his behalf. He did not make the perfectly obvious answer, if he had not been a partisan: I have not been a partisan, I am a poor man, I would like to have an investigation—any one of these things which a man not guilty of charges laid against him would do. He remained absolutely silent until after he he had been removed from office, and then he, or, as I prefer to believe, some one on his behalf, wrote a letter which he signed to the Halifax Chronicle, in which the pitiable circumstances and conditions were detailed at large. He makes the statement in his letter that he was not a partisan. To that statement I wish to give unqualified denial. After his letter appeared in the Halifax Chronicle I gave a statement which appeared in the form of an interview in the Halifax Herald on November 4. The heading of that interview, which takes over two columns was: 'A poor man, but worth $17,000.' It goes on to relate the various steps that I took prior to his dismissal and the grounds upon which I acted in making the dismissal. I said I believed that Bent had been a partisan. Having been a partisan he is not entitled to sympathy because of his physical condition, owing to the circumstances that he is a man well-to-do, but if he believed that injustice had been done him, I would be very happy to recommend that he be granted an investigation. That interview appeared on the 4th of November, and was seen the following day by Mr. Bent, to my knowledge. That was well over a month ago. Mr. Bent, since the publication of that article has not asked an investigation. He has been dismissed from office for three months and still has not asked an investigation, and it seems to me that that circumstance alone is sufficient evidence of the assertions that I have made, with respect to both his partisanship and his circumstances.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): There will soon not be much left of him. He had an arm and a leg off before you met him, and you took his head off.

Mr. RHODES: His head must be in fine condition physically because his organs of speech are in first class condition. As for the offensive partisanship, it is not necessary that he should have two arms and two legs or any arms or any legs in order to constitute a breach of the rules laid down, with respect to the public service, because certainly this man has been a violent and most offensive talker. If we are going to take sympathy and physical condition as the basis which shall govern in these cases, the man I recommended is far more worthy of consideration than is the man who was removed from office. The young man whom I recommended to be appointed, Charles D. Blair, is, I am sorry to say, suffering from a chronic disease which carried off his father in early manhood, and he has been advised by his physican that he is apt to go in the same way as his father. His wife is a delicate woman and he has children to support. The opportunities to make a living in his profession, that of photographer, are not very wide in the town of Oxford. He was at one time offered good positions in Edmonton and in the adjoining town of New Glasgow, but was compelled to decline by reason of his unfortunate physical condition. When I ascertained the circumstances I felt I was amply justified in recommending his appointment, and while I regret on his account to have to make public reference to his physical condition, I feel compelled to do so in view of the criticism levelled against me in connection with the case.

The party press of the Opposition are pleased to draw conclusions from premises based entirely upon the ex parte statements of the accused in this case. They take his letter and, upon the strength of that, strong editorials have been written by the opposition press and published broadcast by the press of this country. I gave my reply showing that there was a fair side and a just side, namely my side, in the Halifax Herald of November 4, but to this date I have yet to find that one Opposition paper has had the manhood to publish the fact to their readers that there is another side to this case. It is possible that this matter may be referred to at a later stage in this House. There are other facts and circumstances to which I could refer at greater length but I will content myself with this brief statement at this time.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) is indebted to me, I think, for the opportunity afforded him this afternoon of discussing the matter of the dismissal of Lemuel Bent, customs officer at Oxford, Nova Scotia. This is a matter which is of very little interest to me politically. The motion appears under my name owing to the fact that a request was made to me by a party in the county of Cumberland for the production of these papers. I cannot understand why the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) rushes so madly and earnestly to his own defence at this stage, because he might very well have waited until a production of the papers was made to the House. I sometimes fear that a guilty conscience impels my hon. friend for Cumberland to make a defence this afternoon.

Mr. RHODES: Do not give yourself any anxiety on that ground.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I read recently a very interesting article in a magazine in which the writer upon a rather abstruse and scientific subject, which he designated 'The New Psychology,' laid down this proposition, that when a man wished to forget a thing, he never succeeded; he always placed the idea which he wished to get rid of, somewhere, where it was continually coming up before him. I fear that the idea which my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes), desires to put away is held by him sub-consciously and is very easily summoned up. I have little or no knowledge of the facts concerning the dismissal of Mr. Bent, other than those contained in the one or two letters which were published in the press of Halifax, and those presented to the House this afternoon by the hon. member for Cumberland. On a later occasion I may possibly return to the discussion of this subject. I fear that my hon. friend from Cumberland is hardly correct in his analysis of the criticism made by the press of this country concerning Bent's dismissal. He submits the defence that because Mr. Bent, was, in his judgment, a partisan his dismissal was justified. Now, I think the position that the press has taken is that whether or not Mr. Bent was a partisan was immaterial, but that owing to his unfortunate physical disabilities, he should have been permitted to remain in office. I think that was the basis of the newspaper criticism concerning this dismissal, and I think it was a fair criticism. It is unfortunate for hon. gentlemen opposite that in another case in the province of Nova Scotia, where they have been so very free with dismissals of public officials, they recently dismissed from office, a person in the county of Guysborough, who was in receipt of the munificent salary of $20 per year, and who did not even have one leg. This dismissal was made only a few weeks ago in the county represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) I do not know, nor do I care, whether this person who held a $20 office in the county of Guysboro' was a partisan or not. I submit that once that official received office and was capable of discharging the duties pertaining to it, it was the bounden duty of the person having charge of the patronage of that county in all the circumstances to allow him to remain in office; and I say the same concerning Mr. Bent who was dismissed in the county of Cumberland. I wish to read, so that it may be on record, the first letter written by Mr. Bent in connection with his dismissal. The letter was addressed to the Halifax 'Chronicle,' and was as follows:

I was appointed collector of customs for the port of Oxford in 1903. In fact, I took the initiative, circulated a petition which was signed by Liberals and Conservatives, and was instrumental in every way in having the office installed in this town. During my incumbency I have always received high commendation from inspectors, and have served the public in a competent and efficient manner. I have taken no political part whatever in either federal or provincial elections, but today find myself dismissed from the customs service on the pretext of 'active political partisanship.'

It will be noticed that Mr. Bent takes issue with the member for Cumberland.

Mr. RHODES: I take issue with him.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): And Mr. Bent takes issue with my hon. friend, and therefore, the facts being at issue, they should have been determined in some other way.

Mr. RHODES: I ordered an investigation two months ago.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That was after Mr. Bent had been dismissed, and his case had been prejudged. I do not suppose any good purpose would have been served by an investigation after he had been dismissed.

Mr. RHODES: What about the notice I gave?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax) (reading):

I am one of those to whom fortune has been quite unkind. I am sixty-three years of age, and am not blessed with an abundant supply of this world's goods. Fifteen years ago I was forced to have my left leg amputated above the knee, and ten years ago a similar operation was performed on my right arm, at the shoulder joint (the bone being removed from the socket). So you see that my condition as far as the performance of manual labour is concerned is a sorry one.

The above facts were known to our representative, Mr. Rhodes, who for a time seemed loath to advise a dismissal, but seemingly in their desire to be drunk with the satiety which only the trough can produce, they became destitute of feeling.

I am glad to observe the tribute to my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes), that he was driven and pressed sorely by his political friends in the town of Oxford to make the recommendation for the dismissal of Bent. I have no doubt that if my hon. friend had been left to his own discretion he would have been only too pleased to leave this unfortunate man in office.

I wish also to put upon record a brief statement made by Mr. Bent in answer to the interview or letter of the hon. member for Cumberland. That hon. gentleman urged that the financial position of the dismissed official was of such a nature that his livelihood was not impaired by the loss of income from the office which he had held, and he also urged that by reason of his physical disabilities Bent was incompetent to perform properly the duties of the office. Upon that point the hon. member for Cumberland and Mr. Bent are at issue. In answer to these points raised by the hon. member for Cumberland, Mr. Bent denies that he is worth $17,000. He says:

I am positively worth not one-fourth of $17,000.

If that be true, and Mr. Bent is unable to pursue any other occupation which will give him an income, the question of his livelihood is one that must naturally give him and his family some concern. He says in answer to the charge that he was physically incapable of performing the duties of the office:

It is not the duty of customs collectors to make out important papers, but I have often performed this service as an obligement.

The hon. member for Cumberland in his interview or letter stated that Mr. Bent was very awkward in making out those papers with his left hand, which is, of course, an obvious truth, but Mr. Bent makes the reply that under the customs regulations he was not obliged to make out those papers, that the person making the entry at the customs, was supposed to do it himself. In answer to the further charge that somebody in the town of Oxford had been insulted without provocation by Mr. Bent, the latter says that the person who claims to have been insulted was one Mr. Patton whose letter was read this afternoon by my hon. friend, and who was an applicant for the office from which Mr. Bent was dismissed.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The hon. member cannot be the only judge on that point, and if Mr. Bent is correct, he, of course, was a prejudiced witness, and his evidence should be received with due caution——

Mr. RHODES: You are referring to Mr. Bent's evidence now?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No.

Mr. RHODES: If the hon. gentleman will permit me—I am sure that he wants to have an exact record—I want to say positively that Mr. Patton was not an applicant for this office, and that he concurred in the appointment of Mr. Blair.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I have seen it happen on many occasions that applicants for office were obliged to concur in the appointment of somebody else.

Mr. RHODES: He was never an applicant.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Well, I am not going to dispute that point with the hon. member for Cumberland, but I merely say that Mr. Bent alleges that Mr. Patton was an applicant for the office.

Mr. RHODES: It is not true.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I hope it is true that the hon. member for Cumberland did not have personal knowledge of the great number of applicants there were for appointment to office in this particular town of Oxford. Mr. Bent said:

Mr. H. A. Patton and I, however, indulged in a few warm words, which had nothing to do with customs or political affairs. He (Patton) is president of the Conservative Association here, boasts an annual income of $2,500 on investments and was an applicant for the customs position, which is good evidence of the fact that my friends, the enemy, were not actuated by sympathy (just the crocodile tear brand, perhaps, about which they make mention in the Herald) towards my successor.

He proceeds:

To make a rather long story short, I can assert from a most reliable source, that a prominent member of the patronage committee there admitted the many absurdities in the letter to which I have just referred, and added that 'it was necessary as Mr. Bent had published a very stiff letter.'

I do not propose reading the balance of this letter of Mr. Bent's. I merely wish at this stage to put the contribution made by Mr. Bent to the newspapers on record, and when the papers have been brought down, pursuant to this motion, I shall have an opportunity of seeing them, and, if I deem it necessary, I shall return to a discussion of this matter.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF ALEXANDER MACDONALD.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, reports, and other documents relating to the dismissal of Alexander Macdonald, of Doctor's Brook, Antigonish county, as subcollector of customs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have just a few observations to make before the motion is put. The motion which I have the honour to make has reference to the dismissal of a sub-collector of customs in the county which I represent. This sub-collector, is not like the collectors in the county of Cumberland or like the late collector at Oxford. This man has sound legs, sound arms, a good head and a strong mind. The only complaint that he has to make is that he has been deprived of his official head without any just cause. There was an investigation before Commissioner Duchemin. I was present at that investigation but I was not accorded the privilege of taking any part in the examination of witnesses. Mr. Duchemin distinctly told me that, as there was no counsel on the other side, he was not going to permit the accused either in this case or in any of the other cases that he was considering at that time, to be represented by counsel, and that, be it noted, in the face of the Inquiries Act which provides that not only may he allow counsel but shall allow a man accused an opportunity of conducting his defence by counsel if he so desires. Although I was not permitted to take part in the examination of witnesses, I took particular note of the evidence on that occasion and I have a short synopsis of it which I propose to read. Before referring to the evidence, let me state that, as I understand, these investigations should be conducted in the same way as they would be conducted before a judge of the county or supreme court. The Inquiries Act provides all the machinery for the conduct of these investigations in the same way as procedure is carried on in the civil courts. I say, too, that it is not part of the duty of the investigator to find that because an accused person does not go on the stand himself there must be a presumption of guilt against him. It is the bounden duty of the commissioner conducting these investigations to be guided by the evidence adduced in support of the charges. We complain in this case that the charge was not specific, that it was a general charge of partisanship, so that the commissioner, when the inquiry began, went over the whole field. You will observe from the nature of the evidence given by the witnesses how wide the scope of the inquiry was. The first witness called was Alex. MacInnis :

Alex MacInnis sworn:
Alex. MacDonald had no talk with me during last election. Did not meet him—did not see him election day.
Don't know of any political meetings attended. I can't say whether he attended nomination.
Don't know of his attending any of committee meetings. All I know is that I saw him go to Angus MacIsaac's house, and saw him with committee men. Don't know what he was doing. These were M. D. MacDonald, L. A. Gillis, D. M. MacDonald, D. A. MacDonald and himself These men have been the leading workers. I can't tell what they do only they meet there.
I saw him drive a candidate around—A. J. MacGillivray, councillor.

The commissioner ruled that that was not evidence and I do not think it is down in the evidence that he took. (Reading continued):

I have not seen him drive men election day. Angus R. MacIsaac is a neighbour? MacDonald has been going there on other occasions? He goes there two or three times a week outside of election times.

You will observe that all the evidence that could be adduced from Mr. MacInnis, a strong Conservative in the district, was that he had a suspicion that the accused sub-collector was a Liberal partisan because he noticed that had been going to the house of Angus R. MacIsaac on the eve of the election. But, he had been going to that house two or three times a week outside of election time and it was only natural that he should go to the house of his next door neighbour. The evidence of Alexander MacInnis was not given much weight by the commissioner. Then we come to the evidence of Angus H. MacQuarrie :

Angus H. McQuarrie sworn:
I don't know him as a worker at polls or attending conventions.
I don't know him to have canvassed any one or to have engaged in political discussions with any one at any election.
I presume he is a political worker because he was the reviser in 1919 and because he struck my name off the voters list in 1910. I did not say it was for party reason. I know of no reason unless a political reason. When I spoke to him about it he said it was a mistake if his name was left off and that he would go to Antigonish to rectify it. He went to Antigonish.

All that the evidence of Angus McQuarrie amounts to is, that Alexander McDonald was one of the revisers for the district in which they both live, and that inasmuch as the name of Angus H. McQuarrie was left off the voters' lists by this reviser, he concludes that Mr. McDonald was a liberal partisan. Mr. McQuarrie is a strong Conservative, and he is a thoroughly honest and conscientious man, but in this case he certainly draws a conclusion which the facts do not warrant. There being no evidence whatever against him, Mr. McDonald was asked if he wished to go on the stand and he replied that he did not, and Mr. McDonald afterwards finding that there was a rumour in the district that he had left a name off the voters' lists improperly, and seeing in that rumour a reflection upon himself as an officer sworn to do his duty, he made the following declaration as to the circumstances of the leaving of the name off the list:

Dominion of Canada,
Province of Nova Scotia.

I, Alexander McDonald, of Doctor's Brook, in the county of Antigonish, farmer, being reviser of electoral lists for polling districts No. 1, Arisaig, and No. 14, Maryvale, for the year A.D. 1910, do solemnly declare that the fact of the name of Angus H. McQuarrie not appearing on the electoral list for that year was not through any political bias on my part or for other reason whatever, but the omission occurred inadvertently, and I further solemnly declare that I did all in my power to rectify the error as soon as the fact was brought to my notice, to which the present municipal clerk and the sheriff for this county can testify. And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at Arisaig this 3rd day of August, A.D. 1912.

D. M. McDonald,
A justice of the peace in and for the county of Antigonish.

ALEX. McDONALD.

It will be seen that Mr. McDonald did everything in his power to endeavour to rectify the mistake; he went to the sheriff, who, in Nova Scotia is the Court of Appeal from the Revisers' Board, and he asked to have the name put on in district No. 14, but the sheriff informed him that he could not hear the case unless it came to him in the regular way as an appeal from the Board of Revisers. He also saw the municipal clerk with a view to having his mistake rectified. When Mr. McDonald made the declaration, which I have read, he gave it all the publicity he possibly could, and if any one doubted the truth of it, there was an opportunity to proceed against him for perjury. But, any person who knows Alexander McDonald would accept his statement apart altogether from an affidavit. Mr. McDonald is known to be an absolutely truthful and honest man, one of the most respectable men in that part of the country. A copy of this declaration was sent to the Minister of Customs, so that the Minister of Customs, before making this dismissal, without any evidence whatever to justify it, was aware of the facts. But, the Minister of Customs seems to have laid down the principle that no matter how an officer conducts himself at election times or any other time, if he is a Grit he has to go. The action of the Minister of Customs in this matter bears out my contention that these investigations are purely a screen and a cloak for the purpose of diverting responsibility from the proper shoulders, and that they are intended to deceive and mislead the people. On August 7, 1912, I was handed a copy of this declaration of Alexander McDonald, and I sent it to the Minister of Customs accompanied by the following letter:

Antigonish, N.S., August 7, 1912.

Hon. J. D. Reid,
Minister of Customs,
Ottawa.

Dear Dr. Reid,—I am asked by Mr. Alexander Macdonald, preventive officer at Doctor's Brook, in this county, to send you the inclosed copy of declaration made by him. Mr. Macdonald was investigated by Commissioner Duchemin last week, and the only evidence against him was that of one Angus H. McQuarrie who said that some years ago Mr. Macdonald, when reviser of electoral lists, left his name off the voters' lists for Maryville district in which he had property, although he lives in Arisaig district. From this circumstance and this alone, the witness believed McDonald to be a Grit worker, although he had no knowledge of the latter attending meetings of the party organization, or doing any work at election times. Mr. Macdonald did not think it necessary to give evidence to meet suspicions which had no reasonable foundation, and on which no court would act. But as there might be some in the community in which he lives who would be so unreasonable as to harbour the same suspicions that Mr. McQuarrie entertained, he made the declaration in question which was read in his parish church by the parish priest —a good active Conservative. Instead of sending the inclosed to Mr. Duchemin, in whose spirit of justice or fair-play I have no confidence, because of what I have seen of his methods. I send you the document.

Yours truly,
WILLIAM CHISHOLM.

I may mention to my hon. friend from Cumberland that the parish priest referred to there is the Rev. D. L. McDonald, P.P., to whom he referred in this House a few days ago, when he read a letter from that reverend gentleman white-washing his friend the commissioner. This case may be in itself an unimportant one, but I believe I am justified in referring to these facts for the purpose of showing that these investigations that were held by Commissioner Duchemin, not only were conducted in violation of the law, which permits and provides for counsel to be present, but that the findings of fact which he made, if indeed he made any, are such as no regularly constituted court would dream of finding.

Mr. CARROLL: Was Mr. McDonald dismissed?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Oh, certainly.

Mr. RHODES: May I ask the hon. member, or any other hon. member on that side of the House, if he knows of a case in which counsel was allowed to appear before any commissioner holding similar investigations after the elections of 1896?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): The amendment to the Inquiries Act which provided that counsel should be heard was not passed until last year, as my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, ought to know.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I shall be glad to have the papers brought down. Unless my hon. friend has read all the evidence, it is apparent that we have been hearing merely an ex parte statement, apparently based on fragments of that evidence. I find it difficult to reconcile the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to these dismissals. One hon. gentleman will contend that in every case investigations should be had, while another will contend that when an investigation is held by a reputable commissioner, against whom no charge of impartiality or unfairness is brought, then it is merely a farce and done for the purpose of shielding the minister. It is difficult to reconcile the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in these matters.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What has the minister to say to the statement that the commissioner refused point blank to allow counsel to be heard, in face of the fact that the Inquiries Act gives the person the right to be represented by counsel?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): That is an assertion which is made, and I have not before me the documents to enable me to give an opinion.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The statement is made by Mr. Chisholm, of Antigonish, that he himself asked to be heard.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): It will be well to have all the papers down before the matter is discussed. My hon. friend has presented only one side of the case. It would be well to have all the documents before us, and then I shall be prepared to discuss this matter in view of the evidence, which will be on record, and the finding of the commissioner, which will be before us. The finding of the commissioner is of extreme importance, and I think my hon. friend, before reading portions of the evidence, should have possessed himself of the finding of the commissioner and dealt with that, instead of discussing the matter before the House, as he has done.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is not an answer to my question at all. The fact is not disputed that the commissioner refused counsel in the case of Alexander McDonald, the case which we are now considering. That statement is made by Mr. Chisholm, the member for that county, who went to the investigation and asked to be allowed to represent the accused. I should like to get an expression of opinion from the hon. minister in regard to the conduct of his commissioner who has violated the rule in all the cases in which he has refused counsel. This is only one case. Dozens of cases have been brought to the attention of the Government.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I am now in a position to read a report of the commissioner in regard to this matter. I have before me now what I said that my hon. friend should have had when he took the matter up before the House (reading):

On the 30th ult., I conducted an inquiry into the charges of partisanship filed against Alexander McDonald, preventive officer of customs, Arisaig, N.S.

The inquiry took place in the school house at Arisaig, and the following named witnesses gave evidence under oath: A. D. McInnis of Doctor's Brook, farmer; A. H. McQuarrie, farmer; and Alex. J. McDonald of Arisaig, merchant.

Mr. McDonald, the accused, was present throughout the hearing and was attended at the inquiry by William Chisholm, M.P., Mr. Chisholm did not, however, appear as counsel.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I was not allowed to take any part. I make the statement, and I make the statement on my responsibility as a member of this House that I asked the privilege of appearing as counsel, and I was denied that privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Mr. Duchemin said: 'If you choose, you can sit alongside of the man, and you can whisper to him, but as there is no counsel on the other side you cannot interfere.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): With the permission of the House, I will read the report of the commissioner, which I think is entitled prima facie to carry weight with the House.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That is a trick of his.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): At the same time I do not desire to say that my hon. friend is making any statement that is not correct.

A. D. McInnis testified that during the last Dominion election, he saw Mr. McDonald frequent the meeting place of the Liberal committee from time to time throughout the election campaign. The Liberal committee workers were in the habit of meeting at the house of Angus R. McIsaac and witness testified that it was the custom of Mr. McDonald to meet with these committee workers. Witness gave the names of five men whom he regarded as the leading Liberal workers in the district, and amongst these he included Mr. Alexander McDonald, preventive officer of customs.

Mr. McInnis testified that it had been Mr. McDonald's habit to attend the committee meetings of the Liberal workers in McIsaac's house, not only in the last Dominion election but in previous elections as well.

A. H. McQuarrie testified that Mr. McDonald was a political worker. Witness said, 'One of my reasons for so saying is that he was reviser of voters' lists in 1910, and he had my name struck off the list. I was a duly qualified voter and there was no reason except political for my name being struck off.'

Alex. J. McDonald, of Arisaig, testified that Mr. Alexander McDonald applied to have the name of his brother George D. McDonald struck off the list of voters for district No. 1. Witness saw the notice requiring this name to be struck off. It was signed by Alexander McDonald. Witness stated that he was familiar with Mr. McDonald's writing, having seen it on several notices. George D. McDonald's name had been placed on the preliminary list, but on Alexander McDonald's application, was struck off. George D. McDonald is a Conservative.

Mr. Alexander McDonald was present throughout the giving of the testimony referred to above, and on the conclusion of the last witness' evidence was asked if he wished to make a statement under oath to rebut any of the testimony given against him; but he declined to go on the stand and make any statement.

Now, the commissioner said he gave this man the opportunity of being heard in his own behalf.

Mr. CHISHOLM: On what?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): On the charge that he was a partisan, and he declined to go on the stand and give evidence. What else could the commissioner have done?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Does my hon. friend contend that it is the duty of the accused to go on the stand to give evidence before a case is made out against him, and is there any inference to be drawn from the fact that he has not gone on the stand when there is no evidence against him?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I did not say it was a question of his duty; it is a privilege for him to give evidence on his own behalf or not. I have heard many members on the other side of the House ask why is the accused not given the opportunity of being heard in his own defence. The commissioner here is giving the opportunity to the accused to be heard in his own defence against a charge of offensive political partisanship, and he declines to take the stand. I submit it is not the fault of this commissioner or the Government that the accused did not take the stand in his own behalf, because he was given the opportunity. The commissioner could not compel him to take the stand. Now I submit that in all these cases, unless there is evidence to show some corrupt intention on the part of the investigator, his finding should be entitled to prima facie weight. I think that might be stated in regard to any judicial investigation. As there is no evidence of this kind against the commissioner, it is to be deemed that he held the investigation fairly and impartially. I have heard hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House say with regard to this particular commissioner, that they had no fault to find with the manner in which he conducted these investigations, but that they did not agree with his conclusions. That is often the case especially if those conclusions should happen to be against their views. Here is the finding:

Mr. Alexander McDonald habitually attended the meetings of the Liberal committee workers in his district during the last Dominion election campaign.

This man is paid by the Government, by citizens on both sides of politics, and apparently in violation of the regulations that he is not to take part in a political campaign, the commissioner finds that Mr. Alexander MacDonald habitually attended the meetings:

2. He has been in the habit of attending meetings of these committees for a number of years.

3. He has done work in the preparing of the voters' lists in the interest of the Liberal party during the past two or three years.

4. He has procured the striking off from the voters' list the name of George B. McDonald, a Conservative applicant to have his name placed thereon.

5. Mr. McDonald is one of the leading Liberal workers in his district.

6. He has thus repeatedly violated the rule of the department prohibiting employees from doing election work.

I have the honour to be, Sir.

Unless it can be shown that this investigator approached his duties with an almost corrupt intention of making an improper finding, that finding is prima facie entitled to weight, and I think that this House would not be justified in discrediting that finding or in refusing to believe that it was a just finding, unless my hon. friend is prepared to go into all the evidence submitted by the commissioner and can prove some corrupt intention on his part. Some weight must prima facie be given to this finding unless and until it is shown and shown conclusively that he had some improper object in making this finding. Either there is no use whatever of appointing investigators, or their findings must be entitled to weight. In connection with this it has been further suggested that every official, against whom a charge is made, should be given the opportunity of being heard in his own defence, and that his conduct should be investigated by a commissioner. That is precisely what has been done in this case. What other could the Commissioner of Customs have done than he has done. He has appointed a commissioner. The commissioner finds that this man is actively engaged as a partisan and says that his conduct has been in violation of the rule of the department prohibiting employees from doing election work. The point I make is this. If, on that finding, this man ought not to be dismissed, we might as well lay down the rule that, no matter what part officials take in elections, no matter how they violate the regulations of the department, they are not to be interfered with. I think it is conclusively shown from this report—unless in some way the integrity, or fairness or impartiality of the commissioner is impugned—that his finding is entitled to weight and to the favourable consideration of this House.

Mr. EMMERSON: Is the finding accompanied with the evidence that was submitted?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I find that a summary of the evidence is attached, but, if there were stenographic notes, they do not seem to have been extended.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But my hon. friend has evaded my question, and I would like very much to get an answer. This is not the only case in which Mr. Duchemin has refused counsel to represent officials charged with partisanship. There are a number of other cases besides this—dozens in my own constituency—in which not only was counsel refused, but friends of the accused were refused opportunity to help the person whose conduct was being investigated by cross-examining witnesses to draw out the truth. My hon. friend knows very well that it is imposible to reach the truth in an examination of this kind unless cross-examination is allowed. And the only way to get this done is to permit counsel to represent the person accused. That is recognized by the Inquiries Act. This commissioner, apart from the other things for which he is blamed, has constantly refused to allow a person accused to be represented by counsel. We have the proof here in this case, and it is a good time to get a decision. What I want to know is this: Assuming it to be true—and everybody admits it to be true—that the hon. member for Antigonish Mr. (Chisholmî was present on that occasion and asked the right which is given under the statute to represent this man as counsel, and Commissioner Duchemin refused the right, does the Minister of Finance approve the conduct of his commissioner?

Mr. RHODES: I do not wish to interfere with the question of the hon. member for Guysborough, but he has not put the case quite fairly.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like to get an answer. Surely, the hon. Minister of Finance can take care of himself.

Mr. RHODES: Certainly, he can take care of himself. But he has not a wide knowledge of local conditions in Nova Scotia, and I wish to place before the House another view of the case. The hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) has made the bold statement that counsel was refused. That is not in conformity with the statement I have in a letter written to me by Mr. Duchemin, the commissioner in the case. The letter, which I received recently, bears the signature of Mr. Duchemin, and deals with a number of matters. One paragraph relates to the case under discussion. It is as follows:

> On the 30th of July I conducted three investigations at Arisaig, in the county of Antigonish. The parties under inquiry were A. R. McAdam, fishery inspector, H. R. McAdam, lighthouse keeper, and Alexander McDonald, customs officer, Mr. Girroir, M.L.A now senator, Mr. William Chisholm, M.P., and the Rev. D. L. McDonald, parish priest of Arisaig, were present throughout the inquiries. Mr. Chisholm asked if Mr. McDonald, customs officer 'might appear by counsel.' I had previously conversed with Mr. Chisholm in Antigonish, and had advised him that I was discouraging the appearance of counsel at these inquiries, and gave him my reasons. He expressed approval of my course in excluding counsel, and approved of my reasons, which were chiefly, that if counsel were admitted the investigations would be unduly prolonged and that feeling and bitterness would be engendered that would do more harm than good to the accused. I accordingly advised Mr. Chisholm that I would not have counsel in this case, but that he might remain by the accused and advise him at any stage of the inquiry, that if he wished when the accused was cross-examining witnesses he might suggest questions to him, etc. Mr. Chisholm availed himself of this right. He sat by the accused and advised him throughout.

Mr. McKENZIE (Cape Breton): The Minister of Finance, in replying to one of the criticisms on this side of the House, made reference to a member on this side as having stated that he was satisfied with the manner in which Mr. Duchemin had conducted investigations. I think that reference must have been to myself. I stated in my place a few evenings ago, that, while I did not approve of Mr. Duchemin's understanding of the regulations and statutes under which he was acting, yet, so far as rudeness or any conduct of that kind was concerned, I had no complaint to make. I have pleasure in repeating that statement; no discourtesy or rudeness was shown to me. But I must state that Mr. Duchemin refused to hear me as counsel, and refused to give me opportunity to represent the cases of those who had asked me to be present on their behalf. I must refer to the observation of my hon. friend from Cumberland and the quotation from the letter which he says he received from Mr. Duchemin. The hon. member was pleased to intervene between the question put by the hon. member for Guysborough and the answer which we would like to have heard made—and, which, no doubt will be made—by the Minister of Finance. The hon. member for Guysborough did not ask the Minister of Finance to take it for granted that the hon. member for Antigonish had been refused the right to appear as counsel for Mr. McDonald, the custom house officer, whose case was under investigation. What the hon. member for Guysborough said was: Assuming it to be true that the hon. member was not permitted to appear as counsel, what would be the opinion of the Minister of Finance of the conduct of his commissioner. That question still remains unanswered. But the hon. member for Cumberland intervened with an explanation in the form of a letter from Mr. Duchemin, in which Mr. Duchemin says that—for the sake of economy, forsooth!—he had assumed power to suspend the law of the land. I want to know upon what authority this commissioner or any other authority in this country, can suspend the statute law. The statute law is made by the high court of Parliament representing the whole country, and that law can only be changed, repealed or suspended by the same authority that made it. That is nothing new to the Minister of Finance or to any other lawyer of this country. And I am sure, Mr. Speaker, from my knowledge of your conception of fair-play and constitutional right, you would be shocked at hearing that any person in this country had arrogated to himself the right to suspend the law and to deal with the trial of cases in such a way as might seem proper to him, and that, for the sake of saving a few dollars or a few minutes of time, he would conduct an investigation otherwise than as the law directs. I said a few days ago that the present Government will be claiming credit for the passing of this Act. I give them credit for the passing of the Act. I think it is a splendid provision which the Minister of Justice inserted in this Act of Inquiries and I submit that it is intended to further preserve the liberties of the individual. I am sure it was not the intention of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice that this law should be put upon the statute book as a dead letter. Let me again remind the Minister of Justice of the provisions of this law.

No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charges of misconduct alleged against him, and he shall have been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

Mr. McKENZIE.

The people of Canada expect and properly expect that that law shall be complied with. The meaning of the law is that the charge will be placed in the hands of the person accused. What has been done and what is being done is that a man is told that he is charged with offensive partisanship, the charge extending back for 10, 12, 40 or 50 years. Does anybody who knows anything about procedure in Canada think that that is the meaning of the law? If the matter is to be dealt with under a quasi-criminal procedure, only one charge would be put in the paper, but it would have to be placed in the hands of the person accused. In a case of civil procedure then, as the Minister of Finance well knows, the charge must be stated in the most explicit terms, there must be no equivocation about it and every opportunity must be given to answer. I care not then whether the charge is under the criminal procedure or the civil procedure, and there being no procedure prescribed by the Act it must be under one or the other, the fullest opportunity must be given to defend after the charge has been properly laid and placed before the individual whose conduct is to be inquired into. I submit therefore that the question that is put so properly to the Minister of Finance remains to be answered and that it does not lie in the power or jurisdiction of any person appointed under the Inquiries Act to suspend a statute for any reason whatever. While the statute remains on the statute book it cannot be modified or suspended by any authority whatever; it must stand until this Parliament deems proper to deal with it.

Mr. AVARD L. DAVIDSON (Annapolis): I wish to state that Mr. Duchemin, the gentleman whose conduct is under discussion in this debate, is a gentleman of very high standing at the bar of Nova Scotia, known from one end of that province to the other as a very honourable and reputable lawyer. My hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) knows him well, and I venture to say he will not in this House assert that Mr. Duchemin has ever shown any unfairness in the conduct of these investigations. On the contrary I think he will bear testimony that whenever he is called on to act in a judicial capacity, he acts fairly, wisely and discreetly, and I am emboldened all the more to make this observation because the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) does not talk in the same way outside of this House in respect to Mr. Duchemin. During the debate a day or two ago a letter was read from a very reputable gentleman stating in explicit terms that Mr.

Chisholm had told him he was absolutely satisfied with the conduct——

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I rise to a point of order. I contradict that.

Mr. DAVIDSON: As far as I remember, the hon. gentleman said he did not remember making any statement of that kind.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I stated emphatically that I did not make any statement of that kind. I stated at first that I did not remember, then I went on to show reasons why I could not have made it, and I wound up by saying I did not—and more than that I can prove it by Mr. Murray himself.

Mr. DAVIDSON: There are some observations which I am advised he made, which perhaps he will deny also. I am advised he had a conversation with Mr. Duchemin with respect to some previous investigations and the attitude and conduct of my hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) in reference to Mr. Duchemin, that Mr. Duchemin had complained to my hon. friend from Antigonish of the unfair treatment which he felt he had received at the hands of the hon. member for Guysboro.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I rise to a point of order. I do not think that this has anything to do with the case, but I may say that I give an emphatic denial to any reflection on the hon. member for Guysborough.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that is not a point of order.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am advised that on that occasion, after Mr. Duchemin had complained to him that he had not received fair treatment in this House from the hon. member from Guysboro, the hon. member for Antigonish laughed good naturedly and said: Oh, don't mind that. Mr. Sinclair is only talking politics. Will the hon. gentleman deny that he used these words?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I feel sure I did not use these words, but if I did they were very harmless. Mr. Duchemin may have said something, and perhaps I got into an altercation with him.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman does not deny emphatically having used these words. Perhaps as the debate goes on he may grow stronger in his disclaimer, but we will let it go at that. I am bound to believe, in the light of that statement, that the hon. gentleman is trying to play the game of politics a little bit himself. A letter was read the other day from Mr. Murray in which it was stated that the hon. member for Antigonish said he was perfectly satisfied with the conduct of the investigation, but that afterwards he wrote to Mr. Murray complaining bitterly of that conduct. He said, furthermore, in reference to the conduct of my hon. friend from Guysboro' that he was playing the game of politics, and I believe, in view of these facts, that the discussion was brought up not for the purpose of getting at the facts, but simply with the view of playing the game of politics.

There are one or two observations that I wish to make with respect to the evidence brought before the House by the hon. member for Antigonish. It seems to have been established at the investigation that McDonald was a Liberal reviser of the voters' list in the province. I have had some experience of the political game in Nova Scotia, and if I were a commissioner I would not want any better evidence upon which to act than that a man was a Liberal reviser of the voters' list. I think that would be quite enough. Furthermore, my hon. friend stated that a declaration had been made by this man McDonald and that this declaration had been sent to the department explaining one of the acts which had been complained of before the commissioner. At the investigation McDonald had an opportunity to give evidence on his own behalf, and if he had taken advantage of that opportunity he would have been subject to cross-examination. The commissioner would have had an opportunity to examine him. But Mr. McDonald was afraid to give evidence on his own behalf. He remained silent. Acting on the advice of his counsel, but afterwards, behind the back of the commissioner, prepared a solemn declaration and sent it to the department. He saved himself from being subjected to cross-examination, but anxious, nevertheless, to get his story before the department he pursued the course of preparing a solemn declaration. My hon. friend from Antigonish objects that McDonald did not have a fair show because he was not allowed to be represented by counsel. It seems to me that my hon. friend from Antigonish and the hon. member for Cape Breton North, are under a misconception as to the nature of these investigations. They assume that when an official is examined before a commissioner he must be either a criminal or the defendant in a civil suit. Now, I do not think that these investigations partake of the nature of either a criminal prosecution or a civil action. Their purpose is to ascertain, for the benefit of the Government, whether or not office-holders have been guilty of offensive conduct. The Government is the employer; the office-holder is the employee, and it is merely a case of the employer wishing to satisfy himself as to the conduct of the person employed; and therefore where an accused party refuses to give evidence, it is prima facie evidence of guilt. Supposing Mr. Speaker, that you were to ask your servant if he had stolen from you, and what he had to say to the charge of theft, and he said, 'I don't want to say anything, I will keep silent,' would you not naturally infer that he was guilty? In the same way when an official is charged with partisan conduct, and he has the opportunity to say anything on his own behalf, and he refuses to do so, is not the commissioner justified in coming to the conclusion that he is guilty, as otherwise he would disclose the facts in connection with the matter?

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) says that an investigation of this kind is neither criminal nor civil. I would like to ask what it is. There are only two classes of cases that come before the tribunals of this country, civil and criminal. It shows the broad and legal mind of my hon. friend that he can come to this House, where there are a few lawyers, and try to impress upon them the idea that an investigation of the kind referred to should not be carried on either as a criminal or as a civil investigation. My hon. friend shows his great legal capacity when he tells us that if a man refuses to stand up and say anything, that is sufficient evidence that he is guilty of the charge brought against him. I want to point out to my hon. friend that that is contrary to the criminal and civil laws of this country, and that if a learned judge made any comment to the jury in a criminal case as to the defendant not going on the stand on his own behalf, that would be a reason for quashing any conviction that might be obtained.

Mr. LANCASTER: I suppose my hon. friend is aware that that is because of a special section of the Act dealing with the right of the prisoner to give evidence in trials of that kind.

Mr. CARROLL: It is the law of this country, and the statute which was amended last year gives to an accused person who comes before a commissioner the right to have counsel. I think Mr. Duchemin is going too far when he refuses, as there is ample evidence to show that he did refuse, hon. members of this House the right to appear before him and argue the case as counsel, when the Act, as amended last March, says that the accused official shall be permitted to be heard through counsel in those investigations. I do not think that any hon. member from Nova Scotia who knows Mr. Duchemin will say that he is not an honourable man and an honourable lawyer. I know him very well, and I know of no man that I would rather chat with than Mr. Duchemin. I know of no man in Nova Scotia, if I had money to loan, into whose hands I would rather put it than Mr. Duchemin. But in those investigations, Mr. Duchemin has proved himself to the whole of Nova Scotia as a most unfair man, and one eminently unqualified to conduct them.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Has my hon. friend forgotten that Father McDonald of Antigonish attended a great many of these investigations and pronounced them absolutely fair?

Mr. CARROLL: The Father McDonald to whom my hon. friend refers is one of the greatest Conservative partisans in the county of Antigonish. He goes from door to door at every election seeking for support on behalf of the Conservative candidate whoever he may be in that county. That is the sort of evidence that is brought to this House to show that Mr. Duchemin is unbiassed and a good man to make those investigations.

There are some cases coming up from my own constituency that I intend at some future date to talk about, and I will then give to my hon. friend from Cumberland an answer to the question which he has thrown across the floor of this House on several occasions, as to whether or not Mr. Duchemin had refused to adjourn certain cases for persons whose conduct was to be investigated before him. I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I think that the hon. Minister of Finance owes it to this House and to the country to say what he thinks of a commissioner, acting under the statute passed last March, who refuses to allow counsel on behalf of persons who come before him.

Mr. BLAIN: I ask the hon. gentleman if he will be good enough to give the House his own opinion of the commissioner?

Mr. CARROLL: I will refer my hon. friend to 'Hansard' of to-morrow, and, if he understands the English language, as an ordinary member of this House understands it, he will there get my opinion of Mr. Duchemin as a commissioner and as a man.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): It seems to me that the question of the hon. member for Guysborough, in view of the conflict of statement and possible misunderstanding—because that is the simplest explanation—is at best hypothetical. There is no question that, as has been stated by the last speaker (Mr. Carroll), Mr. Duchemin is a man whose character is of the highest. He, therefore, was properly appointed as commissioner. That is not controverted. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) says that Mr. Duchemin declined to hear him as counsel. On the other hand, Mr.

Duchemin, whose character is beyond question, says that the hon. gentleman did not appear as counsel.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): He does not deny it.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): My hon. friend did not appear as counsel.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I asked to be allowed to appear as counsel and he declined to allow it.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): In addition, my hon. friend from Cumberland produces a letter from Mr. Duchemin in which he says that the hon. member for Antigonish was a consenting party to the principle which he laid down that counsel should not be heard in this particular case. In view of these conflicting statements how is it possible for me to give an answer to the question of the hon. member for Guysborough? The simplest interpretation is that there is a misunderstanding all around. I decline to be put in the position of making an answer to what is an hypothetical question in view of the facts which have been stated here this afternoon.

Mr. LANCASTER: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in reply to what has just fallen from the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) with regard to the legal aspect of this matter. I understand the hon. gentleman to say, as a matter of law, and without any hesitation about it, that the rule always is that when the facts are stated, and one of the parties to an issue has permission to contradict or controvert those facts, it is no evidence if he refrains from doing so and it is in no way an admission that the facts as stated by the other side are good as against him. I entirely disagree with that statement as a matter of law in any part of the British Empire. The hon. member must know, if he knows any law at all, that the very Criminal Code which he quoted from was passed because of the state of the law as applied to ordinary cases and under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. CARROLL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LANCASTER: I have the floor, and I do not propose to be interrupted now.

Mr. CARROLL: I rise to a point of order. I made no such statement as that which the hon. gentleman attributes to me.

Mr. SPEAKER: Let the hon. gentleman state his point of order.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member who is speaking says that I made the statement which he has just made. I say that I did not make any such statement at all.

Mr. SPEAKER : I do not see any point of order in that.

Mr. CARROLL : I have contradicted what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. SPEAKER : It is competent for an hon. member to deny a statement which has been made and which he considers unfair to him, and it would, under such circumstances, be the duty of the hon. member making the statement to accept his denial; but I do not understand that there is any point of order raised.

Mr. LANCASTER : If the hon. gentleman was speaking to the question before the chair, if he was discussing the question of the dismissal of this man and the action of the commissioner who held the investigation—and I apprehend that I am right in supposing that he was speaking to that question—the only inference I can draw from what he said was—and he used a section of the Criminal Code to prove his point—that in any investigation, whether a criminal trial or a civil case, by a section of the Criminal Code, the judge, or counsel, is prevented from remarking to the jury that the accused did not go into the witness box and give evidence on his own behalf and that therefore the same rule must apply to this investigation before this gentleman, whose name, for the time being, I have forgotten—it matters not—who held these investigations in Nova Scotia. The common law in England, gives the parties, both sides, in every civil action an opportunity to go into the witness box and if he does not accept that opportunity it is always commented upon by the counsel and a judge as indicating that the facts must be as stated on one side or the other. How else would you ever get through with a trial or investigation ? If one side states certain facts and the law says that there is an opportunity of going into the witness box and denying those facts, why should the failure to take advantage of that opportunity not be commented upon ? It was because that is the common law, because that has always been the rule in regard to all other tribunals that, when the special section of the Criminal Code was drawn up permitting an accused person to go into the witness box, it was provided that his silence, or his failure to go into the witness box, should not be commented upon either by counsel or judge, which is an exception to the general rule. I thought it was necessary to set my hon. friend from Cape Breton right in this matter.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): With respect to the statement of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson), I have only to say that, according to his idea of the law, and according to the law that he laid down for us this afternoon with respect to the conduct of such investigations as these, he would make an ideal commissioner for those who desired to dispense with the services of any Grit whether guilty of partisanship or not. He seems to think that Mr. Duchemin is justified, if the accused does not go upon the witness stand and give evidence himself, in coming to the conclusion that he is guilty. I stated before that these investigations are conducted under the Inquiries Act and that the Inquiries Act contemplates a procedure similar to that which is found in the county and supreme courts. Therefore, it is incumbent on the party preferring the charge to establish a prima facie case before the other side should be called upon to make a defence. You have no right to draw any inference from the fact that the other side does not choose to go into the witness box and knock down a man of straw.

Mr. LANCASTER : Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question ?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I do not know that we will get very much nearer to the facts of the case by discussing these questions of law. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Annapolis lay down the proposition that if a person is accused and if he does not go on the stand and defend himself he must be held to be guilty. I have always understood that is was necessary for the party preferring the charge to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the party is guilty of the offence charged and that there is a presumption of innocence until guilt is established. As far as the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance are concerned, I agree with him that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, he has the right to assume that the findings of the commissioner are justified and that the commissioner is honest and has discharged his duties properly and faithfully. I am not going to say that Commissioner Duchemin acted corruptly, but I will say that he is such an extreme partisan, like my hon. friend from Annapolis, that he would rather find a Liberal guilty than believe he was innocent. If he can at all, he will, torture the evidence, not intentionally, but his partisanship is of such an extreme character that he will unconsciously torture the evidence, as I have seen him do, and he will unconsciously read into the evidence and the surrounding circumstances that which will condemn the accused rather than that which is consistent with his innocence. That is quite clear from the findings of Mr. Duchemin in the case under consideration. He says that Alexander McDonald was guilty of partisanship because he had done work in the preparation of voters' lists, whereas the fact is that Mr. McDonald was discharging work of a judicial character in revising the lists, having been appointed by the municipal council to sit as a judge to make the lists in accordance with the law, and he was sworn to do his duty faithfully and impartially. He admits he made an honest mistake with reference to the name of Angus McQuarrie, and he did all in his power to remedy it as soon as he discovered his error. On these facts, Commissioner Duchemin, without the slightest tittle of evidence finds that Alexander McDonald was actively engaged as a partisan in the preparation of voters' lists. That is the way in which Mr. Duchemin has acted unfairly all through. The form in which the report is made is calculated to deceive the minister, who would naturally suppose from reading it that McDonald was engaged in revising the lists in a partisan capacity and not in a judicial capacity as really was the fact. To show the apparent dishonesty of Commissioner Duchemin's report, I might point out that he says that William Chisholm was present, and the minister on reading that statement would naturally infer that I was permitted to act as counsel, which is not the fact. I did have the privilege of sitting as adviser and friend to the accused, Alexander McDonald, and of suggesting to him certain questions, but any lawyer will know how difficult it is to conduct a cross-examination and to suggest proper questions through the medium of the accused, and there is the further fact that Mr. McDonald was a little hard of hearing. My experience of Mr. Duchemin before was that if I attempted to speak any way loudly enough for my friend to hear and understand the suggested questions on cross-examination, he would call me to order for interfering with what he considered to be the decorum that should prevail in his court. My submission is that when the Minister of Customs received that declaration from Alexander McDonald, he should have looked at the evidence, and I believe that if the Minister of Finance now reads the evidence given at the investigation and reads the affidavit, he will have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the findings of Mr. Duchemin could not be sustained as a matter of law in any court. On account of the flippant remarks of my hon. friend from Annapolis, and his insinuation that I made reckless statements, and his animadversion with respect to certain remarks that took place between Mr. Murray, chairman of the Maintenance of Ways Executive Committee, and myself, at Pomquet, I shall read a letter which I sent to Mr. Murray. I did contradict the statement of Mr. Murray, as a fact. I wrote to Mr. Murray before the discussion that took place some days ago with respect to this very same statement that I observed on file in one of the departments. I wrote to him on December 2, and as I have not yet received a reply, it looks as if no reply were coming. In order that the member for Annapolis may have no misgivings as to how I regard the conduct of Mr. Duchemin, I read the following letter which I wrote Mr. Murray:

December 2, 1912.

G. W. Murray, Esq.,
Chairman Maintenance of Ways Executive Committee,
Truro, N.S.

Dear Mr. Murray,—

I observe from the correspondence on file here that Mr. Girroir, now Senator Girroir, states that I admitted to you that Duchemin conducted his investigations at Pomquet with the utmost fairness.

I cannot understand how Girroir could make such a statement, for I do not believe that you ever so informed him. You will recollect that in the course of that investigation Mr. Duchemin undertook to read a lecture—I do not know whether it was intended for your benefit or mine or some of the witnesses—to the effect that it was an act of kindness and condescension on his part to allow those not directly interested in the inquiry to be present. He spoke of the courtesy that he extended to some person or persons, which he had in mind, but did not name. I commented on this to you in words that did not convey much appreciation of Duchemin's sense of judicial dignity, justice and impartiality. If you refer to my letter to you not long afterwards, you will see there an expression of opinion of Duchemin hardly consistent with the certificate of character contained in Girroir's correspondence. If you refer to my letter to Mr. Lowe, which was sent to you by the latter, and which I observe by the correspondence on file, you must in the goodness of your heart have shown to Mr. Girroir, I do not think you will find there any evidence of a high regard for Duchemin's fair play.

I do not want to do you any injustice and I therefore desire to know whether you did inform or misinform, I should say, Mr. Girroir in the manner which he ascribes to you.

Asking for the favour of an early reply, and thanking you in anticipation of same,

I remain,
Yours truly,
WM. CHISHOLM.

When the papers are brought down I may have something more to say upon the matter.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED AND UNDISCUSSED MOTIONS.

For a return showing for each department of the Civil Service, the names, ages, offices and salaries of such persons employed either in the inside or outside divisions thereof, and of such persons not in the Civil Service employed by the Government in any department since the 10th October, 1911; and in cases where no commission of investigation was appointed, as have been removed from office by dismissal, superannuation or otherwise, specifying in each case the manner of, and and grounds for such removal, and the length of notice given to the person removed, and the amount of superannuation or gratuity granted, if any; also showing the name, age, office and salary or remuneration of any and every person appointed to the Civil Service in the place of, or as a consequence of any such removal.—Mr. Murphy.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Charles J. Lafford, postmaster at Grand Grève, Richmond county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against John R. Morrison, postmaster at Oban, Richmond county, N.S., and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal, and the appointment of a successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all papers, documents and correspondence relating to the dismissal of A. T. Doucet, postmaster and collector of customs at Salmon river, Digby county, N.S. —Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the establishment of a car ferry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, of the report or reports of any engineers or experts in regard to the said proposal, and of their estimates of the cost thereof, the advertisement calling for tenders therefor, and a copy of any plans, conditions or proposed specifications therefor, or in regard thereto, and of the tenders received in response to said advertisement, of the reports, if any, of any officials in regard thereto, and of all data in possession of the department in respect of said project.—Mr. Macdonald.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of W. H. Henlow, keeper of storm drums, Liscomb, Guysborough county, N.S.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Henry Hanlon, chief engineer at lobster hatchery at Canso, Guysborough county, N.S.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Stanley Henlow, lightkeeper at Liscomb, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expense of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of L. W. Pye, customs officer at Liscomb, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Parker Sangster, postmaster at Upper New Harbour, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expense of such investigation. —Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telgrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Archibald Barss, postmaster at New Harbour, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against Simon Hodgson, engineer lobster hatchery at Isaacs Harbour, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal and the appointment of a successor.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Fred E. Cox, engineer lobster hatchery at Isaacs Harbour, Guysboro county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all complaints and charges made against W. B. Langley, assistant at lobster hatchery, Nova Scotia, and of all letters, telegrams and correspondence relating in any way to his dismissal and the appointment of a successor.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of John Cummings, assistant at the lobster Hatchery of Isaacs Harbour, Nova Scotia, and of evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all representations, statements and complaints as to political activity made against John A. Macdonald, postmaster at McArras Brook, Antigonish county, and of all correspondence relating to the charges made against him, and of the report of commissioner Duchemin on said charge.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all papers, documents, payrolls, accounts, receipts, and correspondence in connection with all expenditures of money made in 1912 upon the Petite Rivière breakwater, Lunenburg county, Nova Scotia.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax.)

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of H. C. V. LeVatte, harbour master at Louisburg, Cape Breton South, Nova Scotia, and of evidence taken and report of investigations held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same.—Mr. Carroll.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of John McLean, fishery officer at Gabarus, Cape Breton South, Nova Scotia, and of evidence taken and reports of investigations held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same.—Mr. Carroll.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of H. C. V. LeVatte, fishery officer at Louisburg, Cape Breton South, Nova Scotia, and of the evidence taken and reports of investigations held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same.—Mr. Carroll.

For a copy of all Orders in Council in connection with the construction of a line of railway from St. John to Grand Falls in the province of New Brunswick, or any portion thereof, and also of all plans and profiles filed with the Department of Railways and Canals by the St. John and Quebec Railway Company, and of all correspondence between the Department of Railways and Canals or any official thereof and with the said company or the government of the province of New Brunswick, or any official thereof, with reference to the curves, grades or general specifications of the said railway or any portion thereof.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of John Taylor, late postmaster at Carnduff, Sask., and of all reports of investigations held, &c.—Mr. Turriff.

For a copy of all papers, documents and correspondence relating to the dismisssal of Captain C. E. Miller from the 75th Regiment. —Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Pascal Poirier, collector of customs at Descouse, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation; and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Bertie Boudrot, light keeper at Poulamon, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation; and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Abram LeBlanc, postmaster at West Arichat, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expense of such investigation; and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Frederick A. Martell, postmaster at L'Ardoise, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and of the report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation; and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of J. Scott Nelson, postmaster at Louisdale, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation; and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Leon N. Poirier, postmaster at Descouse, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and of the report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation; and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Ellis M. Boudrot, keeper of storm signal at Petit de Gras, Richmond county, N.S., and of all the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation; and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Peter Fougère, preventive and customs officer at Petit de Grat, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Norman McAskill, postmaster at Framboise, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and of the report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation, and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Martin Bourque, lightkeeper at River Bourgeois, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and of the report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation, and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Dan. A. Coffey, lockman at St. Peter's canal, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and of the report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of W. A. McNeil, lockman at St. Peter's canal, Richmond county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and of the report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation, and a copy of all papers relating to the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all accounts, correspondence, telegrams, complaints and other documents in possession of the Department of Public Works in relation to the expenditure of moneys on harbour improvements at Grand Etang during the year 1911-12.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all accounts, correspondence, telegrams, complaints and other documents in possession of the Department of Public Works relating to the construction of telegraph lines during the year 1911-12 from South West Margaree to Scotsville, from Scotsville to North Ainslee, from Scotsville to South Lake Ainslee and Whycocomagh, from Little Narrows to Whycocomagh, from Rossville to Big Interval, and from Rossville to the Victoria county boundary line all in the county of Inverness.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of John K. McDonald, postmaster at Whycocomagh, Inverness county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of D. McLochlin, postmaster at Marble Mountain, Inverness county, N.S., and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of M. Muce, lightkeeper at Cheticamp island, Inverness county, Nova Scotia, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of John A. McRea, lightkeeper at Margaree Island, Inverness county, Nova Scotia, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of W. S. Lawrence, postmaster at Margaree Harbour, Inverness county, Nova Scotia, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of A. G. McDonald, postmaster of North East Margaree, Inverness county, Nova Scotia, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness.)

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Ronald D. McDonald, fishery overseer, at Broad Cove, Inverness county, Nova Scotia, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness.)

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of A. D. Archibald, postmaster at Glenelg, Guysborough county, N.S., and of all evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, December 12, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS.

Eighth Annual Report of the Commissioner of the National Transcontinental Railway for the year ended March 31, 1912. —Mr. Cochrane.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, No. 2, for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Foster.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—FREE TRANSPORTATION OF HAY.

*Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

1. Is it the intention of the Railway Department to allow free transportation of hay over the Intercolonial railway from the province of Quebec to the eastern counties of Nova Scotia, or any of them?

2. What relief, if any, in the matter of freight rates on hay to be carried over the Intercolonial railway for the farmers of the eastern counties of Nova Scotia is proposed?

Mr. BORDEN: This matter is under consideration at present.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—MR. ALEXANDER ALEXANDER.

*Mr. BELAND:

1. Was Mr. Alexander Alexander, late of Troy, New York, appointed an inspector on the National Transcontinental railway in or about the month of October, 1912? If so, what are his duties and salary?

2. Prior to his appointment in Canada, what engineering experience had he and on what railroads had he been employed?

3. By whom was he recommended for appointment on the Transcontinental railway and by whom was he appointed?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. (a) No. (b) Duties as assigned by the chief engineer. Salary $90 per month.

2. Location of electric railways in New York state.—

3. Applied for work, and was employed as a draughtsman on October 4, 1912.

PAYMENTS TO MR. H. P. DUCHEMIN.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How much has been paid by the Government, or any department thereof, up to the 21st day of November, 1912, to Mr. H. P. Duchemin for services and expenses in connection with investigations into complaints or charges against officials?

2. If any accounts of Mr. Duchemin for remuneration or expenses have been rendered and not paid, what is the amount of the same?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Department of Agriculture, $103 for services and expenses; Department of Customs, $860.31; Department of Marine and Fisheries, $840, expenses, including witness fees, &c., $473.31; Department of Militia and Defence, $36.80; Department of Post Office, $521.93; Department of Public Works, $112.83, $75 services, $37.83 expenses; Department of Railways and Canals, $1,279.83; Department of the Interior, $26.21.

2. Department of Agriculture, nil; Department of Customs, $239.30; Department of Marine and Fisheries, nil; Department of Militia and Defence, nil; Department of Post Office, nil; Department of Public Works, $47.80, services $30, expenses $17.80; Department of Railways and Canals, nil; Department of the Interior, nil.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Is it the intention of the Minister of Labour to introduce any amendments at the present session to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

2. If so, when will the legislation be brought down?

3. Is it the intention of the minister to repeal said Act?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. No decision has been reached.

2. Answered by reply to No. 1.

3. The Minister has no such present intention.

OSGOODE STATION POSTMASTER.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Was a charge of offensive partisanship preferred against the postmaster at Osgoode station, Ontario? If so, by whom?

2. Was such charge investigated? If so, by whom and what report was made by the commissioner?

Mr PELLETIER:

1. (a) Yes. (b) By Messrs. A. P. Wilson, Henry Lewis, Vance Allen and J. A. Moss.

2. (a) Yes. (b) Mr. C. A. Seguin was appointed Commissioner to investigate this case. His report was to the effect that the evidence submitted was not of such a character as to substantiate the charges of partisanship preferred against the postmaster.

CUMBERLAND POSTMASTER.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has there been a change of postmasters at Cumberland, county of Russell, since November 1, 1911?
2. If so, on whose recommendation was the change made, and what was the reason therefor?
3. What is the name of the present postmaster at Cumberland?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. The post office inspector reported that the postmistress had not resided in Cumberland for over two years, and had never performed any of the duties of the office. The Postmaster General directed, therefore, that an appointment should be made to this office, as the office was practically without a postmaster.
3. Mr. H. D. Cameron.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—CARDSTON, ALBERTA.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Was the attention of the Department of Customs drawn to a report that the collector of customs at Cardston, Alberta, was using his position to his personal advantage in making imports of lumber from the United States?
2. Was an investigation held? If so, by whom?
3. What was the finding of the person who held the investigation?
4. If the report was shown to be correct what action has the department taken, or does it intend to take?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds):

1. Complaint has been received at the Department of Customs to the effect that the customs officer at Cardston, Alberta, was importing lumber from the United States for sale.
2. The matter was investigated by Inspector H. C. Graham.
3. The inspector reported that the customs officer had not imported lumber from the United States, but had been selling shipments of lumber from British Columbia.
4. The attention of the officer was directed to the provisions of the Audit Act concerning revenue officers, and he has undertaken to discontinue his connection with outside business.

YORKTON HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. CASH:

What are the names of the homestead inspectors appointed to the Yorkton agency between September 21, 1911, and July 11, 1912, and the salary of each?

Mr. ROCHE: Geo. McGowan, $1,200; R. J. M Parker, $1,200; J. C. deBalinhard, $1,200.

EDMONTON CUSTOMS COLLECTOR.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Has Frank A. Osborne, collector of customs at Edmonton, been dismissed? If so, why was he dismissed?
2. What was his salary at the time of his dismissal?
3. Who was appointed in his place, and at what salary?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds):

1. No.

GRAND MERE PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. BUREAU:

1. Has a site been purchased for a public building at Grand Mère, county of Champlain?
2. If not, are any negotiations now taking place for such a purpose?
3. If a site has been purchased, what is the number and location of the lot or lots, from whom purchased and what was the price paid?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 2. A site was purchased on 16th August, 1912.
3. (a) Lot 31 of subdivision 93 of Ste. Flore, situated at the corner of the public road and Jarvis street; (b) from Mr. Paul Doucet for the sum of $15,000.

KOOTENAY RIFLES.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Have the Kootenay Rifles, Fernie, B.C., Military district No. 11, been dissolved? If so, for what reason?
2. Was any attempt made to reorganize this company?
3. Has the intention of the late Government to build an armoury at Fernie been abandoned? If so, for what reason and on whose advice?

Mr. HUGHES:

1. (a) Yes, they were disbanded by General Order 102 of the 1st June, 1912. (b) they were not kept up since the fire of 1908, and did not drill after that period.
2. Yes.
3. The intention of the late Government is unknown. Tenders are being called for a proper drill hall.

CANADA-JAMAICA TRADE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What was the total trade between Canada and Jamaica for the year ending March 31, 1912?
2. What was the total trade between Canada and Porto Rico for the year ending March 31, 1912?
3. What was the total trade of Canada with the West Indian colonies, mentioned in the recent proposed trade agreement, for the same period?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto):

1. Not available.
2. $690,408.
3. Not available.

ST. ELOI MAILS.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Have tenders been asked for the carriage of the mails from the post office of St. Eloi, Quebec, to the Intercolonial railway station?
2. If so, how many tenderers were there and what are their names?
3. What is the amount of each tender?
4. Who obtained the contract and was he the lowest tenderer?
5. Why was there so much delay in granting this contract?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. J. B. Parent, $216; Ernest Godbout, $264, reduced to $200; Isidore Dumas, $287.

4. Ernest Godbout at $200.

5. The department was endeavouring to obtain a reasonable offer for the service.

FRASERVILLE HARBOUR WORKS.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the Hon. Minister of Public Works been interviewed lately, with delegates from Fraserville, on the subject of the harbour works, at Rivière du Loup?
2. If so, did the promise to place in the Estimates of this year or next year a reasonable amount for the said works?
3. If not, does he propose to ask for a certain amount for the said works, and what will be the nature of the said works?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Matter now under consideration.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Foster:

That the report of the Committee of the Whole on the resolution to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, adopted in Committee of the Whole on the 10th instant, be now received and read a first time.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria).

Motion agreed to, and resolution read the first time.

Mr. BORDEN: I beg to move that the resolution be now read a second time and concurred in. Before doing so, I would like to read, for the information of hon. members, and especially for the information of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), certain correspondence which I have obtained leave to place upon the table with regard to the matter which was brought to my attention yesterday. I was unable at the moment to give further information on the subject without communicating through His Royal Highness with the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The correspondence which I desire to read is as follows:

Ottawa, Ont., October 3, 1912.

My dear Mr. Churchill,—

As I txplained to you in England.... it is sufficiently manifest to me that the construction of battleships of the largest and most powerful class cannot be undertaken in this country within a reasonable period, having regard to the grave conditions which we are called upon to confront. At our interviews in London I suggested to you a possible solution which you will doubtless recall. If the Canadian Parliament should vote a large sum of money sufficient for the construction of two or three battleships of the latest type, and should authorize the expenditure of that money in the United Kingdom, it would seem not only practicable but reasonable that the great ship-building firms to which the contracts might be let should undertake the beginning of a ship-building industry in one or two parts of this country.

Moreover, you will perhaps agree in the importance from an Imperial standpoint of the early establishment not only of dockyards but of naval bases provided with the necessary equipment both for building and for repairing war vessels of the smaller type at least.

I cannot too strongly emphasize the importance of the considerations which have been very briefly set forth in this letter. Possibly the particulars, the early arrival of which your recent cable announces, may cover this point.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) R. L. BORDEN.

The Right Honourable
Winston S. Churchill, M.P.,
First Lord of the Admiralty,
London, England.

Ottawa, October 5, 1912.

My dear Mr. Churchill,—

In writing to you on the 3rd instant with respect to the importance at this juncture of stimulating or encouraging the beginnings of a ship-building industry in Canada, I omitted to allude to the proposal or suggestion more than once discussed between us, that war vessels, such as destroyers or small cruisers, might be built within a very early period in Canada, and that possibly an arrangement might be made to divide the extra cost between the two Governments.

Believe me, yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) R. L. BORDEN.

The Right Honourable
Winston S. Churchill, M.P.,
First Lord of the Admiralty
London, England.

Admiralty, Whitehall,
4th November, 1912.

My dear Mr. Borden,—

I have given careful consideration to your two letters about the encouragement of the ship-building industry in Canada. I recognize the importance of such a policy on general grounds not less than from the immediate Canadian standpoint; and any practical scheme for Admiralty co-operation would command my support. The main difficulty to be surmounted is to obtain that high degree of expert knowledge and experience which modern war-ships require for their efficient construction.

We might, however, in the first instance agree upon certain classes of vessels with which it may be considered that competent Canadian shipyards would be able to deal. The most suitable classes of vessels with which to inaugurate the system would be light cruisers, oil tank vessels and small craft for auxiliary services. We should, if it would meet your views, be prepared to invite tenders from approved Canadian firms for the construction of some vessels of such classes in the near future.

It would be understood that progress with this policy would have to depend on the prices quoted being reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances (including the fact that Canada will be prepared to share any extra cost) and also on the time required for construction not being excessive as compared with the dates fixed for completion of similar ships in England. No fixed scale or proportion of orders could be guaranteed to Canadian firms. We would begin by giving some orders at once, and further progress would depend upon the development of the industry and the extent of our programme.

The Admiralty would, of course, remain wholly responsible for the design of all vessels, and for the supervision of the construction of those building in Canada. Arrangements for this could be worked out in detail and should not present any difficulty.

WINSTON S. CHURCHILL.

I also inquired as to the statement of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, which was alluded to by my right hon. friend yesterday, and I have the following telegram as to what actually took place:

Text of Lee's question December 9th is as follows: 'Mr. Arthur Lee asked the Prime Minister what conditions, if any, have been attached to the offer of the Canadian Government to provide three first class armoured ships for the strengthening of the British fleet and is it to be understood that these ships will be in addition to the programme for several years ahead adopted by His Majesty's Government and announced on July 22, 1912.

Prime Minister's reply was: 'Certain arrangements of a general character have been agreed to between the Admiralty and the Dominion Government regarding the transfer of the Canadian battleships to the Royal Canadian navy on notice sufficient to allow for their replacement if necessary being given and regarding the placing by the Admiralty of orders for some light cruisers in Canada, the training of Canadian naval cadets and other minor and incidental matters. Papers on these subjects will be laid (before the House) when the Bill now before the Dominion Parliament has received the Royal assent. As to the second part of the question it was stated by my Right Honourable friend the First Lord of the Admiralty in introducing the Supplementary Estimates in July last that any ships given by Canada at this juncture would be additional to the forecast of annual construction already announced and that this was the wish of the Dominion ministers.'

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, as I rise to present to the House the views of His Majesty's loyal Opposition upon the measure which has been presented to it by my right hon. friend, perhaps it will not be out of place if I refer to the fact that some few months ago a document came to me as well as to my right hon. friend, signed by some of the most important citizens of Canada belonging to both parties, strongly urging that the subject of Imperial defence should be removed from the domain of contentious politics. The motive which animated these important and respected citizens is certainly worthy of all ecomium, and, so far as I am concerned, meets altogether with my approbation; but I may be permitted to observe that if the question of Imperial defence has been introduced into the domain of contentious politics, the blame is not to be imputed to any one sitting on this side of the House.

When four years ago my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) introduced this subject in a concrete form, we were in control of the House, and the House will agree with me that we did not receive his motion in any carping spirit. The motion moved by my hon. friend was to this effect :

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

We received the proposition of my hon. friend quite sympathetically, and we suggested to him that it would be advisable to enlarge it and to bring it to the broader basis of Imperial defence, in view especially of the new conditions which were then and had been for some time arising in Europe. I am bound to say that our suggestion was well received by our friends on the other side, and they in turn offered us some amendments which we were only too glad to receive. The original motion of my hon. friend thus amended, was passed by the unanimous voice of Parliament. It was in these terms:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

The ink was scarcely dry upon that resolution before it was assailed from the ranks of the Conservative party assailed from motives divergent and contradictory. One section affirmed that the duty of Canada towards the Empire would not be properly discharged by the creation of a Canadian navy, but that the only manner in which this duty could be discharged was by contributions from the Canadian treasury to the Imperial treasury. The other section on the contrary, protested against the very idea either of a contribution or of the creation of a Canadian navy. This was introducing with a vengeance into the domain of contentious politics the question of Imperial defence and it also let loose passions which he had hoped were buried, but which we found were easily brought to life again. Can it be denied that the result was affected by these feelings in the last contest?

Under such circumstances, there might perhaps be some temptation to retaliate, and to create political capital out of the difficulties of the gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches,—difficulties which have resulted and culminated in the resignation of one of the most important of their number. But, Sir, the subject is too great, too sacred. By such methods we will not be impelled to act, by such methods we do not desire to win. I have stated before, and I now repeat—and I think that always I have been true to my pledge—that never would I utter a word which would be calculated to fan the flames which unfortunately this subject has rekindled. I have stated before, and again I repeat, that in the consideration of the measure which was to be brought forth, and which has been brought forth by the Administration, we would be guided by its merits, and by its merits alone. My right hon. friend, the other day, in presenting his resolution—and he presented it in terms to which I do not take exception, as I said at the time—stated that he was animated—this may not have been his exact words, but it is the effect of what he said—by no other purpose than to promote the welfare of Canada and of the Empire to which we belong. Let me say to my right hon. friend that I am glad to meet him upon this ground. If we differ from him on the policy which he has presented to the House, it is because we are firmly convinced, in our consciences and our souls, that the policy which we advocate is more conducive to the end which he says he has in mind than the policy which he has presented.

Sir, the country expected and waited with great impatience for the announcement to be made, and which has now been made by the right hon. the Prime Minister after consultation with the Admiralty. Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill, Sir Edward Grey, had again and again, asserted that England had no enemy, that she was prepared and ready for all comers. Still, there was an apprehension far and wide spread that somehow, somewhere, some mysterious danger was threatening England. And, indeed, some went so far as to say that England was on her knees, begging for support — an assertion which surely was more calculated to wound the pride of those to whom it was addressed than to create respect for those who uttered it. All these apprehensions, however, have been removed by the document which was placed on the table of the House by my right hon. friend. England is always England; she bows the knee to no one; she asks no favour from anybody; she does not come here as a suppliant, still less as a mendicant; but, to the inquiry of our ministers, she answered: Here are the facts set forth in this paper; judge for yourselves and act as you please. This is the language, and it is no other than what we might expect from English statesmen and the English people.

Sir, in other respects there is cause for rejoicing. This document shows that there is no emergency, that England is in no danger, whether imminent or prospective. But the document discloses a condition of things, of which indeed we knew, but upon which has now been placed the sanction of official correspondence. It shows that there has been going on in Europe for some years past a certain movement to which we cannot be indifferent. The armament of the great powers has compelled England to alter the strategic lines which hitherto have been essential for her security. The document discloses the fact that, on account of this increased naval armament, England, in order to maintain her security in her own waters, has been obliged to withdraw some of her naval forces from the distant seas. This, I believe, is a fair statement of what is disclosed by the document laid upon the table by my right hon. friend. In the face of this position, I now ask the question: What is the duty of the House of Commons, what is the duty of the people of Canada? That is the question.

But, before I proceed to give my answer, I think it would be advisable that I should come nearer home, and review the situation as it has been made by the division of the two parties during the last contest. During the last contest in the province of Quebec, the Conservative party, as a whole with some exceptions, which I could count upon the fingers of one hand, or at most upon the fingers of two hands—contended upon hundreds of platforms that Canada owed nothing to England——

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am glad there are some hon. members who say, 'No, no,' to that statement. I cannot accept their denial; the facts are too patent. But at least the denial shows that these hon. gentlemen resent the conduct of some men with whom they are now forced to associate. The position taken, I repeat, by the Conservative party in the province of Quebec—at that time they were not the followers of my right hon. friend; they were an independent party—was that Canada owed nothing to England and discharged its whole duty in the matter of defence simply by providing for the defence of her own shores. I am glad to say there is another spirit prevailing now. Conditions seen from another angle have changed the view. But when harmful doctrines of that kind have been preached for months and years, that preaching leaves behind it an impression which it is much more easy to create than it is afterwards to destroy.

We have recently heard throughout the province of Quebec that we owe nothing to England, because in the long chapter of our diplomatic history she has sacrificed our interests in the adjustment of the boundaries between ourselves and our neighbours to the South. For my part I have often stated that in such questions British diplomacy has not shown itself to advantage. And what conclusion are we to draw from this? Are we to draw the conclusion that England was indifferent to our interests? Nothing of the kind. Are we to draw the conclusion that England wantonly sacrificed our interests? Still less may this be presumed. The only conclusion we can draw is that in these matters British diplomatists were not as well informed as those of the United States in regard to every inch of ground which was in issue. This shows conclusively that local matters are always better dealt with by those responsible for local administration. The fact is undeniable that, practically ever since we have had in our hands the conduct of our diplomatic relations, Canada has suffered no sacrifice. In the last dispute we had with our neighbours, on the question of the Atlantic fisheries, not only did we not suffer any sacrifice, but we obtained recognition of rights which had been long denied.

As a result of this deleterious preaching to which I referred a moment ago, we have lately heard in the province of Quebec that England, forsooth, had sacrificed our interests because she had not interfered on behalf of the South in the American civil war! The young gentleman who made that assertion I know quite well. It was not his better nature that thus spoke, and I am sure he will some day appreciate the fact—if he has not already done so—that if there is one thing which tends to the glory of England it is that when the North and the South were engaged in that titanic struggle resulting in the abolition of African slavery, she would not interfere as against what might have been her own interests; and, as a result of her non-interference, that blot upon Christian civilization has forever been wiped out. England is too great to fear or to begrudge the greatness of the United States, and no British subject, wherever he may be, has any cause to resent or fear the rise of any other power.

Sir, there does not exist the necessity for our saying what we owe to England. We are British subjects; we do not want to be anything else; and that settles the whole question. If there are men in the province of Quebec who will not recognize this truth, let me appeal to them from another point of view—from the baser motive of selfishness. We have been immune from invasion by the sea ever since we became subjects of England by the Treaty of Paris in 1763. But can we say to-day that we are now immune from invasion by the sea? At the end of the seventeenth century, there were only three maritime powers in Europe—England, France and Spain. In 1805, at the memorable battle of Trafalgar, the naval forces of France and Spain were crushed. Spain never recovered from the blow; but France, owing to her marvellous recuperative strength soon built a navy second only to that of England. The navy of France ranks to-day second or third among those of the different countries of Europe; but, happily, we have nothing to fear from France. The entente cordiale has brought France and England together in such close friendship that war between these countries would, I am sure, be regarded by either nation as equivalent to civil war in any one of them. I have heard that the late Queen said on one occasion she would rather die than see another war between England and France. The good Queen did not live to see accomplished that dream of her life, the 'entente cordiale,' but it was left to her son to accomplish it, and we to-day receive the benefit of it. There are other maritime powers to which we are exposed, although I do not apprehend any attack from them, nor do I consider that there is even any comtemplated; but I am sure we must all agree that when increased armaments are going on we cannot afford to be idle and rest upon a sense that our security in the past would be a guarantee of security in the future.

It has also been said in the province of Quebec during the last contest that we could rely on the Monroe Doctrine. To anyone who would rely upon the Monroe Doctrine, I would say, let him examine the record of Cuba after the Spanish-American war. When the Cubans were desirous of removing the yoke of Spain, they appealed to the United States for help, and they got it, but when, with the assistance of the United States, they had freed themselves from the control of Spain, they found that they had a rather high price to pay for the help they had received. That price was the abridgement of a portion of their independence. After the war was over, the people of Cuba naturally wanted to establis a regular government of their own. They called a convention and adopted a constitution, but that constitution had to go to Washington for revision, and there after three months discussion, certain conditions were imposed upon Cuba which to the people of that country were extremely distasteful, which convention they adopted by a narrow majority of five. The following conditions were made part of the constitution of Cuba:

> Cuba shall not make any foreign treaty which may tend toward placing the independence of the island or any portion thereof in jeopardy; no loans can be issued unless a surplus of revenue is available for the service of such obligations; the United States can intervene to preserve the independence of Cuba or to insure protection for life and property; the Acts of the United States military administration in Cuba since 1898 are recognized as valid; proper hygienic precautions must be taken to protect public health on the island; the ownership of the Isle of Pines is left for future consideration; coaling stations shall be sold or leased to the United States in localities to be hereafter decided.

This shows how much Cuba had to discard of her sovereign power for the sake of the Monroe Doctrine. We have to take our share in the defence, not only of our native shores, but of the Empire as a whole. We can defend ourselves only by the assistance of the mother country.

Now, I come back to the question which I put a moment ago upon the condition disclosed by the memorandum of the Admiralty. Let me state it again. As a result of the armaments which are now going on in Europe, England has been obliged to increase the margin of security which she relies on for her own defence, by reducing her naval forces in the outlying seas. Such is the condition; and, I ask once more, what is the remedy? In our humble judgment, the remedy is this, that wherever, in the distant seas, or in the distant countries—in Australia, Canada or elsewhere—a British ship has been removed to allow of concentration in European waters, that ship should be replaced by a ship built, maintained, equipped and manned by the young nation immediately concerned. If the young nations of the Empire take hold of the equipment and manning of ships to look after the distant seas, concentration can easily take place in the waters of Europe, and the British Admiralty knows what zones it has to defend. This is the Australian policy; this ought to be the Canadian policy. I insist once more upon what is stated in the memorandum: There is no emergency, there is no immediate danger, there is no prospective danger. If there were an emergency, if England were in danger—no, I will not use that expression; I will not say if England were in danger, but simply if England were on trial with one or two or more of the great powers of Europe, my right hon. friend might come and ask, not $35,000,000, but twice, three times, four times $35,000,000. We would put at the disposal of England all the resources of Canada; there would not be a single dissentient voice.

But this is not the condition with which we have to deal. The condition that we have to deal with to-day is simply what I described a moment ago. This is not new. The memorandum which my right hon. friend submitted the other day disclosed nothing which we did not know before. Every word that is there we knew; every figure we knew. I may say more; every word, every figure in that memorandum we discussed four years ago. We discussed it in the month of March, 1909; and then we came to the conclusion, the unanimous conclusion, that the best method of helping England, of discharging our duty, was not by contribution, but by the creation of a Canadian navy. Sir, I remember very well the question on that occasion, and those who were present in the House at that time cannot have forgotten it. This question gave rise to one of the most important debates which, in the some thirty years of my own experience, the Parliament of Canada ever saw. I remember the speech of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), an excellent speech, one of the very best he ever made, and that is paying a great compliment well deserved. I remember the speech of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) the present Prime Minister, and if ever a man gave reasons against the policy which he has now introduced, my right hon. friend gave those reasons on that occasion. This is his language:

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country, I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that. The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the mother country and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory. In Australia it failed, in the end, to meet with the approval of the people for the reason that Great Britain felt constrained to ask Australia that the field of operations of the squadron should be extended to the China and Indian seas; and when the operation of that squadron was so extended, the Australians felt that the contribution which they had been making for some years past was not really being used to give that protection to Australia which her interests demanded. So that the policy of Australia at the present time is to build up a flotilla of submarines and torpedo boats which, in case of war, would co-operate with the armed cruisers and battleships of the British navy.

Mark these words, Sir:

So that, the policy of Australia at the present time is to build up a flotilla of submarines and torpedo boats,——

I have heard that described as a tin-pot navy——

—which, in case of war, would co-operate with the armed cruisers and battleships of the British navy. It was pointed out in discussing this question that Australia in providing a force of that kind would provide a force which it would be very difficult if not impossible for Great Britain to send across the seas, and that in thus protecting themselves they were providing the best possible force for the protection of the Empire. So, I am at one with the Prime Minister as far as this is concerned.

No less forcible was the language of my hon. friend from North Toronto. He said:

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do; as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to this form of aid. It goes still further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve, or twenty, or thirty years, you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck, there will be no residue left.

There will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the product of defence. Yet some time or other, no one can doubt that with resources and with a population constantly increasing, we must and will have in this country a naval force of our own for our coast and home defence.

Four years ago my right hon friend said we must and will. To-day he no longer says we must and will; but we on this side of the House continue to say we must and will. Now, Sir, I ask, why is it that my right hon. friend and his first lieutenant, the leaders of the Opposition then, who to-day have the responsibility of office, will not go on with the policy so forcibly put forward by them, instead of a policy under which, in the language of my right hon. friend, there will be no preparation of the soil or beginning or growth of the product of defence? The reason, Sir, is not far to seek. The reason is well known: there is one, and only one, and it is because this subject of Imperial defence has been made the subject of contentious politics. It is the result of the alliance, the unholy alliance, which has been formed by hon. gentlemen opposite.

What is this contribution that we have to-day before us, and upon which we are asked to vote? It is big in money; it is big in figures. Is it as big otherwise as it ought to be? I ask every hon. member of this House; I ask every hon. gentleman sitting there: You give England two or three dreadnoughts, to be paid for by Canada, but to be equipped, maintained and manned by England. Did I say, manned by England? I must qualify that statement. In justice to my right hon. friend, I must qualify that statement; because he told us that he had secured from the Imperial authorities the privilege of having Canadian officers serve on those ships. Oh, ye Tory jingoes, is that the amount of the sacrifice you are prepared to make? You are ready to furnish admirals, rear admirals, commodores, captains, officers of all grades, plumes, feathers, and gold lace; but you leave it to England to supply the bone and sinews on board those ships. You say that these ships shall bear Canadian names. That will be the only thing Canadian about them. You hire somebody to do your work; in other words, you are ready to do anything except the fighting. Is that, Sir, the true policy?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that the true policy? It is a hybrid policy, it is a cross between jingoism and nationalism. Unless I mistake the spirit of the Canadian people, if they are true to their ideals, if they are true to their own blood, no matter to what province they belong, they will not be satisfied with this hybrid policy, but they will insist that their contribution shall be a contribution of money and of men as well, as was provided in our resolution of 1909.

Mr. Speaker, it is not money that England wants at this moment. England never was wealthier than she is at the present time; her coffers are overflowing. What she wants are the hearts, the brains, and the brawn of her subjects all over the world. It has been stated—I hope it will prove true—that this generous contribution of $35,000,000 to the Imperial treasury will create a deep impression in Europe amongst the great powers. I hope it is true, but would not the impression be much greater yet if, instead of this money contribution, the nations of Europe were to see the young daughters of the Empire, the young nations scattered over the whole world, building fleets of their own, to use the language of the resolution of 1909—

—in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire, and the peace of the world.

Would not that create a greater impression? Many there are, and I am one of them, who deprecate the important fact that upon the distant seas they do not count as many pennants as they counted some few years ago, but let this policy be adopted, and then the full quota, which we saw at one time, of our ships on the distant seas, would be re-established, and the white ensign, which has been for so many centuries the symbol of England's naval pride, would again unfurl its folds on the seven seas. Then, Sir, we would see, besides the white ensign, the colours of the young nations themselves, attesting the solidarity between mother and daughter. That is the policy which we adopted, that is the policy which we intend to follow.

But I may be told that that is not the policy recommended by the Admiralty to the Prime Minister. Sir, I deny that altogether. My right hon. friend did not go to England to consult the Admiralty about a policy. It is evident that when my right hon. friend went to England, he had abandoned the policy of a Canadian navy. He went to England—it is very clear from the last paragraph of the memorandum—to ask what they would accept for immediate aid. In other words, he went to England to ask what England would accept in the case of an emergency, although there was no emergency.

Therefore, we come back to the question: what is the true policy? Is it a policy of emergency, which as stated by my hon. friend from North Toronto, which produces nothing and leaves nothing behind, or is it a policy of naval organization in Canada? That is the problem we have to deal with at the present time. Australia has adopted the same policy, and she has adopted it for the reason stated by my hon. friend in the debate of 1909: that having tried contribution, she found that contribution would not work. Australia, therefore, came to the conclusion which we came to: she came to the conclusion that gentlemen now sitting on the Government benches came to, but which they have abandoned, and abandoned for what reason? For no other than the well known reason of their alliance with the Nationalist party of Quebec.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we went on with the execution of our policy. We asked for tenders, with the intention of having ultimately a double unit, one on the Pacific ocean and one on the Atlantic ocean; we asked for tenders for four cruisers and six destroyers, which would cost $11,280,000. We did not choose to award the contract, in view of the impending change of Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : Yes; we thought as the general elections were coming, that it would not be fair, in a matter of this kind, which was at issue between the two parties, to award the contract in case there might be, as there was, a change of government. I say now that the Government in power would have been better advised if they had awarded the contracts, and, had they done so, we would at the present time have under construction on the stocks in Montreal four cruisers and six destroyers.

There is another reason which causes us to stick to our policy of a Canadian navy. I have to thank my right hon. friend the Prime Minister for bringing down to-day some papers—not those for which I inquired yesterday—but some papers which show us the policy of Canadian construction of our navy is so strong that he and his Government are trying to trifle with that question by endeavouring to get some ships built in Canada, which he tells us may happen some time in the spring. There is a better way of doing it. Let us have a Canadian navy, and as soon as practicable, and then all the ships will be built in Canada. I have reason to believe that the Minister of the Naval Service has actually an offer from one of the great British firms, to build the largest possible plant in Montreal if he chooses to have it.

I now come to another subject, which I would not have mentioned at all were it not for some observations made during the Debate on the Address by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). During the last electoral contest, I heard it many a time, and I read it many a time, that our Canadian navy was a separatist navy, and that it was, on account of something which was to be found in the Act, liable to be neutral in time of war. I have been too long in the fight to care very much for what may be said of me during an electoral contest; but when a thing is repeated upon the floor of Parliament within my hearing, I owe it to myself to take notice of it. And, just here, apropos of this, let me recall a classical and historical incident. On the eve of the battle of Salamis, Themistocles offered advice to the commander of the fleet of the Greeks, and, although that advice ultimately prevailed and carried the Greeks to victory, the Greek commander at first refused to accept it; and, on Themistocles persisting the commander raised his staff to strike him. Themistocles said: 'Strike, but hear me.' Sir, I have been struck, but I still say: 'Hear me.' In refutation of the charge that the Navy Act was intentionally, on my part, separatist, I think it is sufficient for me to set up the record of my seventy years of life. I do not entertain, at the age of seventy, many of the ideas I had at twenty, or at thirty, or even at forty; but I trust I have not lived in vain, and that in the course of my long career I have learned something from observation and experience. Let the matter be settled once and for all, not only for myself, but for my friends here and outside, by my declaration: that any thought of separation from Great Britain if any such thought exists anywhere, and I do not believe it does—would be a folly and a crime. As to the contention of my hon. friend from Kingston that in case of war our navy would be neutral, I have only this to observe. I said a moment ago that I hope I have not lived in vain, and I hope I am to be given credit for some common sense and some knowledge, and my answer to that contention is: when England is at war, we are at war, and the thought of being neutral would be like the command of King Canute to the sea to recede from his feet. No action of ours could bring that about. When England is at war, we are at war; but it does not follow that because we are at war, we are actually in the conflict.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We can be in the conflict only through two things, namely, actual invasion of our soil, or, the action of the Parliament of Canada. That seems to arouse the hilarity of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: They have not read much history.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Perhaps, if I answer these hon. gentlemen opposite by citing history, that will be the best answer of all. How many wars have we had since Canada became a British possession? Speaking from memory, we had first, in 1776 the war with the American colonies; we had next the war with France, which commenced in 1793 and lasted until the Battle of Waterloo in 1815; we had the war with the American republic in 1812 and 1813; we had next the war with Turkey for the independence of Greece in 1827; we had next the Crimean war with Russia in 1854; we had next the war with China in 1860; we had next the expedition to Abyssinia in 1868; we had the expedition to Egypt in 1882; and, last of all, we had the Boer war in 1899.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe): We were in it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not expect such a compliment to the Liberal Government would come from my friend from East Simcoe. We were in it on account of the action taken by the Canadian Government and the Canadian Parliament at that time.

We were in it in the war with the American colonies in 1870; we were in it in the war with the American republic in 1812-13; but we were not in it in the war with France; we were not in it in the war with Turkey; we were not in it in the Crimean war; we were not in it in the expedition to Abyssinia or the Soudan war of 1885. We might have been in that, but Sir John A. Macdonald, then leader of the Government, refused. Why should we attempt to trifle with such questions as these? Is it not a fact that our forces can go to war only by the action of this Parliament? You may give your sanction, now or at any time if you choose; but no one in this country will claim that we can go to war, except by the will of Parliament or by the force of circumstances.

Some objections have been made to our Naval Act, because it was said that the British Admiralty could not count at all times upon the support of the Canadian navy. I simply say that the Admiralty can count at all times upon the Canadian navy, because last year we passed an agreement with the Admiralty, whereby naval stations were created for the Canadian navy. The Canadian Atlantic station would include north of 30 north latitude and west of the meridian of 40 west longitude. The Canadian Pacific station would include north of 30 north latitude and east of the meridian of 180 west longitude. So the Admiralty knew that at all times in those bodies of water there were Canadian ships to guard the waters; and the moment the ships of an enemy of England appeared in those waters it was the duty of our navy to pounce upon them, to grapple with them and to sink them, in the same manner as if they had been in the harbour of Halifax. That is the interpretation placed upon that Act. My hon. friends, however, have to-day the administration of the Act; they can interpret it themselves; but surely they will not interpret it in the way it is said they could. They can amend it as they please; but, whatever they do, if they are sincere, as I hope they are, they cannot put any other construction than the construction I put upon this Act.

The present policy which my right hon. friend proposes settles nothing. The problem that you have to deal with is one which demands a permanent policy—a policy for to-day, for to-morrow, and for every day, so long as the armaments grow in Europe; and the duty which you owe to yourselves, to Canada, and to the Empire, is the enactment of a permanent policy. As regards the creation of a Canadian navy, you have apparently decided against that. In respect to contribution, does any one imagine that you will have only one contribution? Contributions must be recurring and again recurring, and, in the words of my hon. friend from North Toronto, they leave no trace behind them. As I understand from the speech of my hon. friend, he does not want to have a permanent policy on this subject, because, he says, 'Before we have a permanent policy, we must have a voice in all questions of peace or war.' This is a very large contract. If we are to have a discussion of that question, this is not the time for it. It is not germane to the question which we have before us to-day. We have the question of defence to deal with. When we have to deal with the danger of an enemy rushing upon us, whom we must be called to face at any moment, are we to fold our arms and do nothing until we have settled the question as to whether or not we shall have a voice in all matters of war or peace? My hon. friend is like the Emperor of Constantinople, who went to Italy to discuss questions of theology, when his city was on the eve of being assaulted by the Turks, who finally captured it. If we go on discussing the question of having a voice in matters of peace and war, the enemy may be upon us before we have settled that question, and we may never have any occasion to deal with it at all. It is a very important question, and I do not minimize it in any way; but it must be discussed separately and not in conjunction with the present question, or we shall be at a standstill.

Whether we shall or shall not have a voice in all questions affecting peace and war is a very large proposition, and I would not at the present time pronounce finally upon it; but there are certain objections that present themselves at once to my mind. The diplomatic service of England is carried on by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and it is to-day in as good hands as it ever was. These transactions are very minute, very serious, and sometimes must be carried on with great secrecy. I understand that my right hon. friend proposes to the English Admiralty that there should be a representative of the Canadian Government all the time in England to confer with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on all questions on which war may probably arise. If this is done for Canada, it must be done for Australia, for New Zealand, for South Africa and for Newfoundland, and I doubt very much if the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would receive much assistance from such a multitude of advisers. Supposing they do not agree, or supposing they do agree, how can we pretend to dictate in these matters, or even to take a part? The Foreign Office, only last year, had to deal with the question of the division of Persia. Are we to understand that Canada and all the other Dominions would be invited to discuss such a question with the Foreign Office? A few years ago the Afghan boundary question was a burning question with the Foreign Office. Of late years it has been put in the background by the fact that Russia has not been in a position to be aggressive. But that question may be revived. Within the last year, when the German Emperor sent warships to Agadir, the Foreign Office had to take immediate action upon the question whether Germany should be allowed a footing in North Africa. Would the Dominion of Canada also be interested in and be consulted upon this question? If so, it seems to me that this is opening a door to consequences which must be carefully considered before any action is taken. I do not wish to condemn the view taken by the right hon. gentleman; I do not now approve or condemn it; the subject is too new. But the point upon which I appeal to him, and to which I ask the attention of the House, is this, that we cannot postpone our preparation for defence until this question is settled. It may take a long time to settle it. Therefore, let it be settled by itself; but, in the meantime, let our preparations go on.

My right hon. friend concluded the argumentative part of his speech with the statement that, in claiming for the overseas dominions the power to have a voice in all questions of peace and war, he was inviting the attention of the statesmen of Great Britain 'to the real problem of Imperial existence.' Mark the words: 'the real problem of Imperial existence.' I think it would be difficult for my right hon. friend, or anybody else, to convince us that the existence of the British Empire rests upon so slender a thread. We have been accustomed to believe, and we will continue to believe, that it rests upon a firmer basis. Sir, I am not indifferent—far from it—to anything that concerns the unity of the British Empire. This agglomeration of continents under the British Crown has something in it which strikes the imagination, something which has always had, at all events for me, a great attraction. But I have always believed, and will continue to believe, that the firm basis of the British Empire is next to the British Crown the local autonomy of the different dependencies; that is to say, their working out of their own destinies to the central end of the Empire. The Crown is the great bond, the cement, which binds together the scattered continents over the whole world. The Crown is a purely sentimental bond; but that bond, though purely sentimental, has proven itself stronger than armies and navies; has shown itself to be equal to all occasions. I do not believe the Empire is in danger; I do not believe it can be cemented by the means suggested by my right hon. friend. I believe the relations of the different parts of the Empire to the Mother Country are not perfect, but that essentially they are perfectible. You can discuss problems of improvement; there is no occasion to discuss problems of existence.

It is with these views that we approach this subject. And I repeat now, in conclusion, what I said at the beginning, that I have endeavoured to approach this subject on the same plane as my right hon. friend. I do not question his motives when he says that what he has in mind is the grandeur of our common empire. I hope he will not discuss my motive when I say that I approach the question in the same spirit. If we differ with him, it is because we believe that under existing circumstances our policy is more conducive to what he has in mind than is the policy which he has announced. Therefore, I beg to move the following as an amendment to the resolution:

That all the words after the word 'That' be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:—

'This House declines to concur in the said resolution and orders that the same be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend the same in the following particulars, namely, to strike out all the words after clause (a) and substitute therefor the following:

'The memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the general naval situation of the Empire and communicated to this House by the right hon. the Prime Minister on December 5th shows that several of the most important of the foreign powers have adopted a definite policy of rapidly increasing their naval strength.

'That this condition has compelled the United Kingdom to concentrate its naval forces in home waters involving the withdrawal of ships from the outlying portions of the Empire.

'That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without further delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence.

'That any measure of Canadian aid to Imperial naval defence which does not employ a permanent policy of participation by ships owned, manned and maintained by Canada and contemplating construction as soon as possible in Canada, is not an adequate or satisfactory expression of the aspirations of the Canadian people in regard to naval defence, and is not an assumption by Canada of her fair share in the maintenance of the naval strength of the Empire.

'This House regrets to learn the intention of the Government to indefinitely postpone the carrying out by Canada of a permanent naval policy.

'It is the opinion of this House that measures should be taken at the present session to give effect actively and speedily to the permanent naval policy embodied in the Naval Service Act of 1910 passed pursuant to the resolution unanimously approved by this House in March 1909.

'This House is further of the opinion that to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy by the addition by Canada under the above Act of two fleet units, to be stationed on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada, respectively, rather than by a contribution of money or ships, is the policy best calculated to afford relief to the United Kingdom in respect to the burden of Imperial naval defence, and in the words of the Admiralty memorandum, to restore greater freedom to the movements of the British squadrons in every sea and directly promote the security of the dominions; and that the Government of Canada should take such steps as shall lead to the accomplishment of this purpose as speedily as possible.'

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have this afternoon, as I always do, listened with very great interest, not unmixed with pleasure, to the speech which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has made in opposition to the resolution which has been placed before this House by the right hon. the Prime Minister of the country, and in opposition to the Naval Bill introduced to this House by the Prime Minister early last week. I have followed as closely as it was possible for me to do, the remarks of my right hon. friend. In the course of the hour and a quarter that he occupied in addressing the House, he discussed very many subjects. The hon. gentleman has delved into history, ancient and modern, and has dealt with questions which I think have no bearing whatever on the resolution before the House. Having followed the hon. gentleman as closely as I could, I think I may without offence make the observation that I believe the people of this country and the members of this House will recognize that my right hon. friend has advanced no argument and no reasoning that is conclusive as to why this Parliament should reject the resolution and the Bill which has been based upon it.

The commencement of my right hon. friend's speech was couched in lofty sentiment and lofty language. From his opening remarks, a stranger coming into this House would have been led to conclude that not for anything in the world would the leader of the Opposition have attempted to deal with this question so as to obtain advantage for the party which he leads. But, Sir, scarcely had my right hon. friend passed the introductory remarks in his speech, before he began to discuss this question absolutely from the standpoint of party politics; and, as his speech proceeded, it became clearer with every sentence that the interests which the right hon. gentleman was so anxious to protect were not the interests of the British Empire—but were the interests of the party which he leads. From first to last, the speech of my right hon. friend was simply an appeal to the party spirit, and the party feeling of his supporters throughout the country, as well as of those who are in the House.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, endeavouring to fix the offence of inconsistency upon the right hon. the Prime Minister and upon my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), harked back to the debate which occurred in this House in the year 1909, when a resolution was passed with regard to the naval defence of Canada and of the Empire. I was not a member of the House of Commons in 1909, and therefore do not feel called upon to enter upon a discussion of what took place on that occasion. But, Sir, had I been a member of this House in 1909, I do not think I would have felt called upon to defend my action on this occasion. What the people of this country want is not a discussion of ancient history, not a discussion of what may have taken place in 1909 and 1910; but what they want to know is whether or not the proposition submitted to the House by the Government of this country on Thursday last is a proposition in the interests of Canada and of the Empire, and a proposition that should commend itself to the constituencies of this country. I fail entirely, Mr. Speaker, to appreciate any argument which my right hon. friend made charging the right hon. leader of the Government and the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce with inconsistency in regard to that matter. The right hon. the Prime Minister has pursued a course that is the very epitome of sincerity, the very epitome of consistency with regard to naval defence. What was it that the right hon. the Prime Minister promised to do, if he, as the result of an appeal to the country was entrusted with the seals of office? I would refer my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to 'Hansard' of November 24, 1910, and there he will find the declaration of the Prime Minister as to what course he would take in this matter if he became Prime Minister of Canada. On that occasion, he said:

It may be fairly asked what we would do if we were in power to-day with regard to a great question of this kind. It seems to me that our plain course and duty would be this. The Government of this country are able to ascertain and to know, if they take the proper action for that purpose, whether the conditions which face the Empire at this time in respect of naval defence are grave. If we were in power we would endeavour to find that out, to get a plain, unvarnished answer to that question, and if the answer to that question, based upon the assurance of the Government of the mother country and the report of the naval experts of the Admiralty were such—and I think it would be such—as to demand instant and effective action by this country, then I would appeal to Parliament for immediate and effective aid, and if Parliament did not give immediate and effective aid I would appeal from Parliament to the people of the country.

That was the policy of the party led by the right hon. gentleman then, and that is the policy of the party which the right hon. gentleman leads in this House and in this country to-day. But the right hon. gentleman then went further, distinguishing between the two questions of an emergency contribution and a permanent policy. He said:

Then, Sir, as to the permanent policy, I think the people have a right to be consulted. I do not know whether I have made my position clear but I have done so according to my humble capacity. I think the question of Canada's co-operation upon a permanent basis in Imperial defence involves very large and wide considerations. If Canada and the other dominions of the Empire are to take their part as nations of this Empire in the defence of the Empire as a whole, shall it be that we, contributing to that defence of the whole Empire, shall have absolutely as citizens of this country, no voice whatever in the councils of the Empire. I do not think that such would be a tolerable condition. I do not believe the people of Canada would for one moment submit to such a condition. Shall members of this House, representative men, representing 221 constituencies of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, shall no one of them have the same voice with regard to those vast Imperial issues that the humblest taxpayer in the British Isles has at this moment? It does not seem to me that such a condition would make for the integrity of the Empire, for the closer co-operation of the Empire. Regard must be had to these far-reaching considerations, a permanent policy would have to be worked out, and when that permanent policy has been worked out and explained to the people of Canada, to every citizen in this country, then it would be the duty of any government to go to the people of Canada to receive their mandate and accept and act upon their approval or disapproval of that policy.

That was the well defined pledge which the Prime Minister made to this House and to the people of this country at the time that he led the Conservative party in opposition in 1910. Has the right hon. gentleman not carried out in good faith the pledge that he made? Has he not, in the language of the report, taken proper action for the purpose of ascertaining whether the conditions that face the Empire at this time with respect to naval defence are grave? Has not the right hon. gentleman done as he promised to do—to consult with the Admiralty, with the Government of Great Britain, and to take instant and effective action in this country if it were found that such action was necessary?

My right hon. friend brings before the House to-day this policy in pursuance of the promise which he made in 1910. The fact that at the very first opportunity he consulted with the Admiralty, and, as a result of that consultation, he lays before the House a state paper, which is now on the table, and comes before Parliament asking that, under the circumstances as they now exist, this Parliament shall make provision for aiding and increasing the effective naval power of the British Empire, shows conclusively that my right hon. friend is determined to carry out the pledge which he gave to the Canadian people. But my right hon. friend has on all occasions been careful to distinguish between what may be regarded as an emergency contribution and a permanent policy with regard to Imperial defence. The policy which the right hon. gentleman is placing before the House to-day, having regard to the present condition of affairs, is not intended to take the place of a permanent policy for the naval defence of the Empire; it is proposed because of the circumstances which exist at the present time.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, time and again, in addressing this House, has made the statement that there is no emergency, that there are no circumstances which justify this contribution; but I will take the opportunity a little later on to point out to the House what the unanswerable reasons are why I think that, if Canada is true to herself and true to the Empire, she should not hesitate in carrying out the proposal which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has laid before the House.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, in discussing the naval policy which his Government had brought down, sought to excuse the action of that Government in not entering into contracts for the four cruisers and six destroyers for which they had asked tenders from ship-builders in Great Britain. Any one who was not aware of the facts, listening to my right hon. friend, would have gone away from this House and from the dulcet sounds of his voice, thinking that only a few days, or at least a few weeks, had elapsed between the receipt of the tenders for these cruisers and destroyers, and the date of the defeat of my hon. friend's Government at the polls. What are the facts in regard to the case? The facts are that on May 1, 1911, tenders were received from a number of leading ship-building firms in the British Empire for the construction of these destroyers and cruisers. My right hon. friend did not go out of power, or resign office, until the 7th of October following. The elections were held on the 21st of September, nearly four months and three weeks after these tenders had been received. My right hon. friend did not retire until the 7th day of October, nearly five months after these tenders had been received; and yet my right hon. friend had no better excuse to offer, no better reason to give, for the course he took in allowing, these tenders, with the deposits attached to them, to remain in the office here, in Ottawa, for nearly five months, than that this Government thought that, as they might go out of power at the election, it was wise to leave the question to be dealt with by their successors in office. Did my right hon. friend, when these tenders were received on the 1st of May, anticipate the result of an appeal to the country within a few months? When I referred to this matter, in speaking on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne at the session of 1911, I took the opportunity of saying that I believed the Government of the day in not accepting these tenders, although they had had many months in which to do so, were actuated by the fact that an examination of the whole matter, they having had time to sit down and think about it, had led them to the conclusion that they had acted hurriedly and unwisely in calling for those tenders. Having made themselves acquainted with the information that was available to them, and having realized what they had done, they felt that to enter into a contract at that time for these cruisers and destroyers, under the conditions and with the possibilities of building ships in Canada which existed, would result in a waste of public money to the amount of at least $15,000,000, which, including armaments, would have been the price which these vessels would have cost. What reason have I for making that assertion? I quoted to the House last year a memorandum on the subject, prepared by Admiral Kingsmill, director of the Naval Service, on the 9th October, 1911, in which Admiral Kingsmill said:

> Owing to the rapidity with which designs change it is anticipated that, if it takes six years to complete the programme, the ships will be out of date before they are completed.

Then he said:

> In the short period which has elapsed since the present designs were adopted, the typical destroyers have increased in displacement and the machinery arrangement has been redesigned, which may make it desirable to negotiate with the firm who undertakes the work for an improved destroyer.

But, Mr. Speaker, I propose to give this House and the country other evidence than that which was contained in the memorandum of Admiral Kingsmill—evidence which has come to my knowledge. In the service of the Naval Department of the Canadian Government, appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, there was a gentleman who occupied the position of chief-of-staff, Commander Roper, an officer brought here from His Majesty's navy, and, on the 20th of September, 1911, one day before the defeat of hon. gentlemen opposite, Commander Roper prepared a memorandum regarding this matter in which the following sentences occur, and I commend them to the consideration of the members of this House:

> Extract from a Memorandum of Commander Roper, Chief of Staff, dated 20th September, 1911.
>
> As is well known a naval service is composed of a large number of items which all dovetail and all of which go to make up the whole. If, therefore, all these items are not simultaneously proceeded with, the structure must become unstable and ultimately collapse.

Mark you, this was written on the 20th of September, 1911. And to-day, when hon. gentlemen opposite are speaking in such emphatic language about the beauty and the wisdom of their naval policy, we find that they were so managing their Naval Service that the structure, according to this high authority, had become unstable, and would ultimately collapse. Proceeding, Commander Roper says:

> This, at present, is what is occurring with regard to the Naval Service of Canada.
>
> A programme having been drawn up, it was adopted by the Canadian Government and embarked upon in the early part of 1910. From that time up to the present it has only been proceeded with piecemeal and items have, from one cause and another, been postponed and again postponed, until at last a point approaching stagnation is being reached, and all the most undesirable features such as uncertainty, delay and unnecessary expense are being produced.

Let me read a little more from this memorandum of Commander Roper:

> The only vessels belonging to the Naval Service of Canada up to the present, are the two cruisers Niobe and Rainbow, whilst four cruisers and six destroyers have been authorized by Parliament.
>
> So far back as August of 1910 it was announced that these vessels would be built by contract and that tenders would shortly be called for. It is now the last half of 1911 and the contract has not yet been awarded.
>
> The conditions are that the first cruiser is to be delivered in three years from the date of signing the contract, whilst the total of four are to be completed in six years from that date.
>
> On referenec to the Admiralty return it is found that the Weymouth type of cruiser which is similar to the type to be built by Canada was launched in 1910, and is now ready to be commissioned. The earliest that the first cruiser for Canada can be expected, supposing the contract to be awarded without further delay is the latter part of 1914; in other words this type of vessel will be four years old before it is completed, whilst the last will be seven years old, and rapidly approaching the stage of obsolescence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I digress, to make reference to certain utterances of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). From the moment we announced to the House last year that we did not intend to accept any of these tenders for the construction of cruisers or destroyers, that hon. gentleman has lost no opportunity of declaring in our constituency and elsewhere, that the Government, especially myself, by declining to accept these tenders—although he and his party when in power allowed five months to pass without accepting them—were striking a blow at the interests of Canada and especially at the interests of the city of St. John. When in June last the provincial elections took place in New Brunswick, the hon. gentleman hurried down to that province and he availed of every opportunity, condemning me, not only because of my record as a member of the Dominion Government which did not accept any of these tenders, but because of my record as Premier of that province during the time I held that office. With the finesse which the hon. gentleman thinks distinguishes him, he formed a ticket in the city of St. John, and, after putting forward his arguments up and down the constituency for weeks before the election took place, although the constituency is usually a reasonably close one, three members of his ticket lost their deposit and the fourth succeeded in saving it by a very few votes. And, in that part of the constituency which lies outside the city of St. John, and where the hon. member addressed the electors in the strain I have referred to, for the first time in the history of that constituency, by an overwhelming vote, the candidates in favour of the Conservative party and who supported my friend Mr. Fleming, Premier of New Brunswick, were returned by an overwhelming majority. I take this opportunity of saying to my hon. friend that he can continue in the course he has adopted for the past year of trying to raise the smallest kind of party feeling out of this naval matter, and I can assure him that his arguments will fall on deaf ears in that constituency. The hon. gentleman also referred to Admiral Kingsmill's memorandum, which he criticised, saying that if the reasoning of Admiral Kingsmill were true, how foolish it would have been for Japan to have undertaken the construction of a navy, and how foolish also for the United States, both of which countries to-day have navies which are almost equal to any of the navies of the world. But the hon. member forgot to tell the House that it is well known that Japan gradually developed her resources, and commenced by having her warships built in England of the latest design, and that Japan was establishing shipyards and buildings for constructing merchant ships, before undertaking the building of vessels of war. The building of war vessels in Canada has been referred to by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on many occasions in this House, but I would ask any practical man in Canada if he can imagine for a single moment that within any reasonable time we could build in Canada a great dreadnought which costs in Britain $11,500,000. Possibly, after considerable delay, we might get in Canada shipyards in such condition that the material could be assembled and put together here, but even then the great mass of that material would have to be manufactured in Britain, the guns, the armament, the armour plate, all that portion that goes to make up largely the value of the ship. In the policy which has been announced to the House by our right hon. leader, we have, I submit, taken a sane, common-sense, business-like view of the situation, and in carrying out that policy we may hope that in the course of a reasonably short period of time we will be building in Canada for the British navy vessels of the smaller type such as cruisers, tank-ships and destroyers, and that ultimately, and before many years, we will be building in Canada vessels as large as any afloat, and on as advantageous terms as they can be built in the shipyards of the motherland.

I think the House will agree with me that the principal matter we have to consider in this Debate is as to whether the occasion exists to justify the legislation submitted by the right hon. the Prime Minister. I have only had the opportunity of hearing read in the House the amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. Anybody who reads that amendment will agree that it is prepared simply from the standpoint of party strategy and party tactics. It is an extraordinary thing that my right hon. friend who in 1910 was absolutely opposed to the contribution of one fleet unit, is now prepared to go the length which he says this country ought to go. It is a pity we had not heard from my right hon. friend earlier in that regard. The country would have been disposed to put more faith in his words than they do to-day, when they consider that during the long years the right hon. gentleman was in control of the Government, he did nothing in the direction suggested. And now he comes along with a proposition which is larger in its ideas and scope than anything ever before suggested in this country. Will not the country think that the time for my right hon. friend to have put forward that view and that policy was the time when he was in power? My right hon. friend has made the statement that when the Empire is at war Canada will be at war, but that Canada, while at war, may not be in the conflict. It takes a master of the English language, a master of finesse, a master of adroitness and skill in debate, to utter a sentence of that sort, which sounds well, but the moment it is analysed, the whole idea behind it falls to pieces. My right hon. friend has perhaps read what Louis Botha, who commanded the Boer forces in the South African war, and who is now Prime Minister in South Africa stated, when the words attributed to my right hon. friend were read to him, and he was asked what he thought of them. He said: 'I for my part cannot comprehend how the Empire can be at war without every portion of that empire being at war.' Having regard to the popular opinion of this country, it is evident that a change has come over the spirit of the dreams of my right hon. friend since the year 1910. I hold in my hand a copy of a speech made in this Parliament by the present Prime Minister of Canada on the 20th of April, 1910, during a discussion regarding naval affairs. The right hon. gentleman said:

I have here section 18 of the Bill. The section provides:

In the case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal navy, the Naval Service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the Naval Service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the Naval Service.

What is the meaning of that proposal? From the report of the debate in Committee, I will read one passage which I think ought to be placed before the House. On page 7626 of the unrevised 'Hansard', I find:

Mr. R. L. BORDEN: Would the right hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Suppose a Canadian ship meets a ship of similar armament and power belonging to an enemy, meets her on the high seas, what is she to do? I do not ask now what she will do if attacked, but will she attack, will she fight?

Sir WIRFRID LAURIER: I do not know that she would fight. I do not know that she would fight either. She should not fight until the Government by which she is commissioned have determined whether she would go into the war. That is the position we take. My hon. friend takes a different position. He says that without any question, under all circumstances, we are bound to send our ships into the war. We take a different position, and we say: let the country judge between us.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN: Would our ports and harbours be neutral like our fleet until an Order in Council had been passed?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not understand what my hon. friend means by asking if they should be neutral.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN: I understand the Prime Minister to say that our ships would not fight until they were ordered to do so, and therefore they would in effect be neutral until the Governor in Council had made an order that they should participate in the war. Have I misstated my hon. friend's position?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

My right hon. friend has repeated that statement about Canada being at war and not being in the conflict, by referring to certain historical events which occurred during the past hundred years, but nearly every reference he made was to a war that existed long prior to the time when Canada had the means, the transportation facilities, and the opportunity for sending her troops to fight the battles of the Empire.

My right hon. friend has also referred to the South African war, and has spoken as if his Government had sent troops to South Africa. Has the right hon. gentleman forgotten that the statement was made that the government of that day permitted troops to go to South Africa, but did not send them? It was first declared that not a man would be sent to South Africa, and only after the country was aflame did the right hon. gentlemen submit to the wish of the people of this country, and permit the troops to go to South Africa. The right hon. gentleman has also said—I intend only to refer to the matter now, and will discuss it a little later on—that this proposition to place three battleships of the most modern character at the disposal of Great Britain, is not a business proposition. He said that if we do that we should also equip them, man them, and maintain them. Does the right hon. gentleman remember that in the South African war the British Government put up the larger proportion of the sums that were paid to our troops for their services? When the right hon. gentleman talks so lightly about manning our ships, surely he overlooks the fact that the naval service to-day is a highly scientific service, and that the men who are to be put on these great fighting machines, these great policemen of the ocean, have to be men who for at least five years have undergone training to qualify and fit themselves for the service. We expect that these three great dreadnoughts will within three years be in service, and form part of the fleet of Great Britain. It would be impossible in that time to man them with sailors from Canada, because, even if our men could be got in time of peace to enlist in the navy, we would not be able to give them the necessary training to serve on board those ships to the satisfaction of the Admiralty by the time those vessels were in commission, were flying the British flag, and were playing their part in keeping the peace of the world and guarding the honour and safety of the Empire.

My right hon. friend has also referred to the question of representation. I think I recollect his utterances, as I have read them many times, and I was led to the conclusion that he regarded the question of representation as one of extreme importance, when we came to consider what the future relations of the different component parts of the Empire were to be. My right hon. friend nods his head in assent. Then, why does he find fault with my right hon. leader for putting that view of the question forward? Is not the right hon. leader of this Government right in saying that the question of the permanence of the Empire and the permanent policy under which Canada will unite with the other overseas possessions and with the British Islands for the purposes of bringing about the defence of that Empire is connected and linked up with them the question of representation, so that Canada, contributing to that protection as a permanent matter, may have some voice in regard to the foreign affairs, some voice in regard to the general affairs of the British Empire? That question of representation has made very great strides everywhere during the past twelve months. We know the view that Mr. Asquith previously entertained with regard to it. We know Mr. Asquith's sentiments as uttered this year in the House of Commons when the Canadian ministers were in England and after he had listened to the opinion of the Canadian people, voiced—and I believe correctly voiced—by the Prime Minister. Let me read Mr. Asquith's words:

> I will add—although I will not make any detailed statement upon that point at this moment—that side by side with this growing participation in the active burdens of the Empire, on the part of our Dominions, there rests with us undoubtedly the duty of making such response as we can to their obviously reasonable appeal that they should be entitled to be heard in the determination of the policy and in the direction of Imperial affairs. I do not say it would be wrong to state—of course Mr. Borden and his colleagues would be the first to disclaim any desire for any such declaration—but I do not say in what shape or by what machinery that great purpose is to be obtained. Arrangements like that cannot be made in a day. They must be the result of mature deliberation and thought; they will probably have to develop from time to time; but without committing ourselves in any degree to particular forms in the matter we share with our great dominions the feeling which has become more and more conscious and articulate as years have gone on throughout the Empire, that we have a common heritage and interests, and that in the enjoyment of that heritage, and the discharge of the duties which those interests involve, we ought more and more to be conscious partners with one another.

Throughout the speech of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition there ran the idea that this policy—or rather this contribution, for I do not speak of it as a policy—this contribution which we are asking the Parliament and the people of Canada to make towards the British navy, was to be regarded as a substitute for the policy which the right hon. gentleman himself had introduced in this House. Permit me to say that nothing is further from the thoughts of this Government. That policy might have existed, it might have been going on now, and yet we would have felt compelled to ask Parliament for the contribution which we are now asking it to make to the effective naval forces of the Empire. It is a contribution, not part of a permanent policy—a contribution intended to meet the circumstances of the case as they are now. The further question of permanent policy and the permanent defence of the Empire, that will be shared in, I trust, not only by Canada, but by Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the other overseas dominions, will still command the attention and thought of this Government. It is a policy that cannot be worked out—and the people of this country will not expect it to be worked out—in a few weeks or a few months. But when it is worked out, and before the country is asked to commit itself to it, the Government will be prepared to appeal to the people on that policy.

Now, I come down to what I really think is the question which this House has to consider to-day—the question of what is the right thing for us to do at the present moment for the British Empire, having regard to the circumstances of the case as they exist? Is it right for the country to ask at the present juncture that this contribution of three great capital ships shall be made? As I desire to place my argument in this matter before the House in a form and in language which will be exact and which I am prepared to stand by without any question, I may have to trespass a little upon the good nature of the House, and perhaps even trespass upon the rules of the House, by making more frequent reference to the notes and manuscripts which I have prepared than I would otherwise do.

It has been truly said, Mr. Speaker, that 'the defence of the territory and commerce of the British Empire is founded upon sea power, the correct and legitimate employment of which, in war, is to obtain early and effective command of the sea, and to maintain that command against any and every attack of the enemy.' The importance of defence of that commerce to Canada may be seen from the fact that the value of Canadian trade (overseas) in 1911-12 amounting to $100,000,000, and that tonnage of Canadian vessels, on December 31, 1911, amounted to 588,741 tons, to which must be added the Canadian shipping registered in Great Britain, bringing up the total to over 700,000 tons. In the maintenance of the whole of this vast and increasing trade wherever it may be about the distant waters of the world, as well as for the maintenance of her communications and the security of her trade across the seas, Canada is dependent and has always depended upon the Imperial navy without corresponding contribution or cost. To attain this command of the sea, it is necessary that the British navy should be maintained at a standard of strength which would give complete and absolute command of the sea against any reasonably probable combination of powers. This command of the sea ensures; (a) the security of the Empire against oversea invasion; (b) the power to reinforce oversea garrisons and to transport land forces rapidly and safely to any point where the vital interests of the Empire may be threatened; (c) the power to establish an effective blockade of the enemy's ports; (d) the comparative safety of seaborne commerce; (e) the power to deny passage of the high seas to mercantile vessels under the enemy's flag. Great Britain still has the power, by making special arrangements and mobilizing a portion of her reserve, to send, without courting disaster at home, an effective fleet of battleships and cruisers to unite with the Royal Australian navy and the British squadrons in the Pacific for the defence of British Columbia, Australia and New Zealand, and these communities are also protected and their interests safeguarded by the power of Great Britain so long as her naval strength is unbroken, but this power will diminish with the growth not only of the second greatest navy in the world, but by the simultaneous building by many powers of great modern ships of war.

The aims of the British Empire are essentially of a peaceful nature. Britain does not look for conquest or for further enlargement of her dominions, but her interests in the way of trade, and especially in the way of her large carrying trade, call for the maintenance of peace; and the fact that the British dominions and colonies are spread over the four quarters of the globe makes it of paramount importance that her communications on the high seas should not be interrupted by war. The British navy is the instrument which serves to effect this purpose and to insure Great Britain, her dominions, her colonies and her trade routes against attack by any foreign power. To render the navy effective for this purpose it is necessary not only that it should be superior to that of the possible foe, but also that it should have sufficient superiority to make a successful attack almost an impossibility. Britain stands thus on the defensive, and, in the great game of war, the defensive position, as far as the navy is concerned, is a weak one. The navy cannot hold all its ships in constant readiness. A number of the vessels must be laid up periodically for repair and refit, and the officers and crews must be given proper rest and a certain amount of leave. This means that at any average moment the effective force of the fleet is very much below its total striking force, and at certain moments, by reason of accidental causes, its numbers may be seriously diminished. On the other hand, the navy preparing for attack would calculate its movements and operations so that every ship, every gun and every man would be available for the chosen moment of attack. A navy standing on the defensive must therefore provide a large margin of strength over the navy which may be the attacking force. To insure safety, it is necessary that the navy on the defensive should at its moment of least efficiency still be superior to the possible attacking navy at its moment of maximum efficiency. This is one of the reasons why it is necessary that the British navy should have such a large margin of superiority over any possible foe. It is not that the British ships or sailors are in any way inferior to any that may be brought against them, but it is the result of the peaceful attitude and peaceful objects of the British Empire, which renders it necessary to maintain the average strength of her fleet at a figure which seems high as compared with even the maximum strength of a possible enemy.

Illustrations of the margin of superiority which is necessary to a British force can be obtained from the great French wars. In 1793, when war broke out with revolutionary France, Great Britain had 115 battleships. Of these 75 were ready and 40 nearly ready. France had only 76 battleships. Six months after war had been declared, the principal French fleet in the Atlantic was off Ushant with 21 ships, to which Great Britain opposed only 17. In the Mediterranean, at Toulon, France had 31 battleships and England about 22. In the battle of the first of June, 1794, when the countries had been at war for sixteen months, the British had 25 battleships and the French 26. In 1803, when the war with Napoleon was resumed, the British had 111 battleships and France and Holland together only 75. Spain in 1805 brought about 25 additional battleships to the alliance. When the great campaign of Trafalgar opened in that year Napoleon could count on a total of 74 battleships and Great Britain 116, yet the British ships almost everywhere were in a condition of numerical inferiority. Nelson fought Trafalgar with 27 ships to 33. He was to have had 40 battleships, and in reality he had about 34, but various casualties had reduced the number to 27. The British Admiralty in 1805 was under men inured to war and of brilliant skill; yet the commitments of the British navy all over the world were such as to force these men to pit smaller forces of British ships against larger French and Spanish fleets.

We are told in the state document prepared by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and submitted to the House by the Prime Minister on Thursday last, that in 1908 Germany's fleet consisted of 9 battleships including coast defence vessels, 3 large cruisers, 28 small cruisers and 113 torpedo boats, and that in 1920 Germany's fleet will consist of 41 battleships, as against 9 in 1898, 20 large cruisers as against 3 in 1898, 40 small cruisers as against 28; 144 torpedo boats as against 113, and 72 submarines as against none in the year 1898. This fleet will be manned by 101,500 men, at an annual cost to the country of £23,000,000. In other words, when my right hon. friend took office in 1896, the effective portion of this navy consisted of four small badly-designed, weakly-armed battleships. The British navy had about 25 battleships, any one of which was probably a match for any two of the German ships. When my right hon. friend resigned office in 1911, the German navy was the second strongest in the world.

Having a very small coast line, which is entirely protected by islands and other obstacles, Germany is not obliged to detach any important number of her vessels for the purpose of coast defence, and is able to utilize her large and well-equipped fleet for the purpose of action on the high seas. In the Mediterranean sea, Britain's interest in maintaining open the route to Egypt, to the Suez canal, and to India, requires the maintenance of a fleet superior to any probable combination which may be brought against it.

It is well to bear in mind, too, in connection with the necessity of Britain's supremacy upon the seas, and the impossibility of her abandoning the Mediterranean and other important positions, that about half of Britain's grain supply comes through the Mediterranean. The figures last year show that over £31,000,000 of her grain supply came through the Mediterranean route, and about £35,000,000 by other lines of approach.

At the present moment both Austria and Italy are building large and powerful fleets of battleships. According to the present programmes, in 1915 Italy will have 6 modern battleships, and Austria will have 4 vessels of the same description, together with a large number of pre-dreadnought battleships, and a fleet of cruisers, torpedo boats, &c., and it will be necessary for Britain to provide a fleet well above the combined forces of these two nations. The expenditure of the great nations for naval defence in the years 1901 and 1912 is as follows:

	In 1901.	In 1912.
France spent..	$66,250,000	$86,835,000
Russia spent..	45,000,000	84,869,000
Germany spent..	45,750,000	108,500,000
Italy spent..	23,580,000	41,000,000
Austria-Hungary spent	8,750,000	28,000,000
United States spent..	76,850,000	127,400,000
Japan spent..	21,325,000	45,400,000

We are told, however, in the document prepared by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and laid before the House by the Prime Minister on Thursday last, that these figures, though strikingly suggestive of the tremendous advance that is being made in naval power by the nations of the world, give no real idea, in the case of Britain's chief competitor in naval power, of the actual advance, for the size and cost of ships has risen continually during that period, and, apart from increasing their total numbers, Germany has systematically replaced old and small ships which counted as units in her earlier fleet by the most powerful and costly modern vessels. Neither does the money provided for the completed law represent the increase in cost properly attributable to the German navy, for many charges borne on British naval funds are otherwise defrayed in Germany; and the German navy comprises such a large proportion of new ships that the cost of maintenance and repair is considerably less than in navies that have been longer established. Even if no further increases are made by Germany to her naval programme in the interval, the fact remains that the fleet possessed by that power in 1920 will not be inferior to the British navy of to-day. Already, by fifteen years of scientific effort, Germany, from practically having no fleet at all, has raised herself to what is indisputedly a second place among the navies of the world. And the whole of this extraordinary revolution, comprising as it does the building of ships of all kinds and of the most powerful types, the training of officers and men of every specialized grade and rating, the development of naval science and tactics, the provision of training schools, of vast arsenals, of guns, torpedoes, armour-plate, and every kind of naval appliance, of naval harbours, docks and dockyards, and of marine fortifications on an unexampled scale; all this has been achieved under the guidance and during the tenure of a single minister of marine.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Speaker, when the House separated at six o'clock, I was making an argument for the purpose of showing that the course which the Government is taking now in making a contribution of three capital ships to the British navy is not only the course rendered necessary and desirable by the present position of affairs, but the only proper course for Canada to take for the purpose of rendering more effective the naval policy of the Empire. It is the course, I might point out to this House, that is recommended in the memorandum submitted to Parliament by the Government and Admiralty of Great Britain, who have studied closely this question. It is the most effective one, and it is desirable in the interest of the naval power of the Empire. In making that argument I pointed out the enormous increase that has taken place in the past comparatively few years, under the administration of a single Minister of Marine, in the naval armament of the German Empire. No one, of course, disputes the absolute right of Germany to take the course that she is taking. No doubt, in increasing the force and power of her armaments, Germany feels that she is acting in the interest of her own country and for purposes which, from her own standpoint, are of a patriotic and praiseworthy character. The causes which have led to Germany increasing and developing her navy are still a matter of dispute. Two divergent views regarding this question are put forward in the debates on this subject which, from time to time, of late years, have taken place in the British House of Commons. These views are antagonistic—one pointing to the inherent effect of the British navy on the German increase, and the necessity of Britain replying from time to time with a larger programme, if she is determined to maintain her naval superiority, and consequently her national existence, and the other insisting that German expansion is due, not to any anti-British feeling, but to the expansion of the naval and foreign policy of Great Britain. In what I believe will be regarded by this House and the country as a most powerful and unanswerable argument, the Prime Minister, on Wednesday last, in introducing the Bill, pointed out that the naval power of Great Britain had certainly not been provocative; and, in support of that contention, he referred to the fact that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, when he became Prime Minister in 1905, made a most earnest and determined effort to check the rivalry in armaments which was going on between the nations of Europe. But the government of Germany, he also pointed out, had refused to discuss the matter at the Hague conference in 1906; and, although the British construction of capital ships and naval armaments was substantially diminished, the German naval law was passed providing for the addition of six of the greatest ships in the world to the German fleet. It cannot, therefore, I would submit with all confidence, be argued with any degree of force or conviction, that the German naval expansion is due in any measure to the foreign policy of Great Britain or the British Empire.

The statement has been made that the expansion of the German navy is intended simply for the defence of Germany's overseas possessions and her growing sea-borne commerce and mercantile marine. If this were the principal object, we might have expected to see a navy of numerous and powerful cruisers distributed widely over the world, showing the German flag in distant seas, and aiding commerce and colonial development by their presence.

But on the contrary, we find strong fleets of battleships kept concentrated in close proximity to the shores of Germany and the shores of Great Britain. Can it be argued for one single moment that the German fleet exists for the defence of Germany against the attack of a naval power? It must be remembered, in considering this matter, that Germany has a very small coast line and few great harbours on the North Sea, and it would be difficult to find a more unpromising coast for a naval attack than around the small islands with their dangerous navigation, uncertain and shifting channels and sand banks, mists and fogs, entirely apart from the fortifications, crowned by enormous batteries, protecting the principal approaches to Germany from the North Sea. It is impossible to believe that the fear of a British invasion, which has done duty in Germany, can have any influence on the minds of men who direct Germany's foreign policy at the present time. Does not the whole character of this fleet show that it is designed for aggressive and offensive action in the North Sea or the North Atlantic? One cannot avoid, I submit, coming to the irresistible conclusion that that fleet, whatever may be said about it, has been created for the purpose of fighting, if need be, a great battle on the North Sea or on the North Atlantic against some other great naval power.

While the facts and figures which I have placed before the House this afternoon, fully justify, I think, the course of the Canadian Government in making the contribution which it is asking Parliament to make at the present time to the effective force of the British navy, there are other reasons, entirely apart from what may be spoken of as the German scare, entirely apart from the great expenditures which the other countries of Europe are making for the purpose of naval defence, which will fully justify the Government in the action which it is asking this House to endorse to-day, and which is in line with the recommendation of those who have studied most closely and most carefully in the British Islands the present conditions of naval defence and naval power throughout the world. What are the reasons why Canada should make this contribution, in order that it can be as truly said in regard to the British navy to-day as it was said in the days of Drake or at the time of Trafalgar, that Britannia rules the waves?

In this connection I want to say a few words regarding the British naval expenditure in Canada during the Nineteenth Century. During this century the exterior relations of Canada were protected by the power of Great Britain, and its safety against invasion by foreign nations was assured by the British navy and the British navy alone. Great Britain stationed a military force in the principal cities of Canada during this period, and maintained a fleet in the North Atlantic and another fleet on the Pacific coast, which had as its principal mission the protection of Canada on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. Canada benefited by the power of the whole British navy distributed over the face of the globe, but she was particularly interested in that section of the navy which was attached to Halifax on the east and Esquimalt on the west. The protection thus afforded to Canada constituted as it were the insurance on Canadian commerce against foreign attack, and enabled Canadian traders to extend their business all over the world without fear of interruption, and without fear of hostile action on the part of any country. It is a difficult thing to estimate the total amount of Great Britain's military expenditure which should properly be charged to the cost of ensuring the safety of Canadian trade; but it may be taken that at least the cost of maintaining the fleet off Halifax and off Esquimalt should be directly chargeable to the protection of that trade. I have endeavoured to ascertain from the best information available what was the cost of maintaining this fleet; but it is a difficult task. The naval estimates of Great Britain are not distributed according to geographical limit; the money is voted by Parliament to the Crown and is spent under different heads—such as pay of personnel, stores, ammunition—without any regard to the parts of the world in which the ships are operating. Nor does the information which has been preserved of the strength of the forces maintained in different parts of the world during the last century enable any reliable division of expenditure on this basis to be arrived at for the whole of this period. Certain figures have been obtained, and it has been ascertained that the cost of maintaining the ships on the North American and North Pacific Oceans from 1851 to 1901 was about as follows:—

1851-1861	$21,000,000
1861-1871	27,000,000
1871-1881	19,000,000
1881-1891	19,000,000
1891-1901	23,000,000
	$110,000,000

It will be seen from this that the total cost to Great Britain of maintaining ships on the North American and Pacific stations for the protection of Canada and of Canadian trade and commerce during the last half century amounted in round figures to $110,000,000. This does not include any charge whatever for the first cost of the ships and armament, or for the preliminary training or pensions of the men. The British Admiralty also, during this period, maintained two dockyards on Canadian soil: the Halifax dockyard first established in the eighteenth century, at a cost of installation of $800,000 and the Esquimalt dockyard established in 1855, at an original cost of $580,000. The expenditure on the maintenance of these two establishments, during the period from 1850 to 1900, amounted to over $6,000,000. During the first half of this century there was a naval establishment at Kingston, but no figures are available to show what was spent on it out of naval funds. It was closed in 1853 and handed over to the War Department, being subsequently transferred to the Canadian Government in 1877. In addition to this, the Imperial Government subsidized drydocks at Esquimalt and at Halifax for the purpose of assisting in the defence of Canadian trade and the shores of Canada, at a total cost of some $400,000. Apart from these direct items, the Imperial Government has also incurred the expense of hydrographic service in Canadian waters, exploring voyages in these regions, and in the protection of Canadian vessels and Canadian citizens in foreign countries. Then, Canada has had during all these many years the advantage and moral and material assistance of the British navy in her foreign relations, without having contributed one single dollar to the cost. This also is exclusive of military expenditure from 1853 to 1873 during which years alone that expenditure was $53,000,000. Prior to 1845 Great Britain spent more money on the military garrisons in British North America, than the provinces raised altogether for their administration and for their own material development. I think I can appeal safely to the members of this House and to the people of the country and ask: is not the fact that during all these years that Canada has remained under the protecting aegis of the British Crown, we have not been called upon to contribute anything to the cost of the maintenance of that navy—without which our overseas commerce and tonnage would be without protection, and without which Canada could not possibly exist in its present free and independent position under its present form of government,—calculated to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every loyal Canadian? That reproach is one which will be wiped out by the passage by this House of the Bill which has been submitted by the right hon. the Prime Minister.

Mr. CARROLL: Suppose a dreadnought cost in the vicinity of $11,500,000, can the minister tell me how much of this goes to material, how much to construction, and what profit is left for the builder?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not these details with me at present, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that the information can be obtained, and if he wishes I will get it for him. Other overseas dominions, having regard to the protection that has been extended to them by Great Britain, having regard to the fact that they needed to protect their own shores, have taken the view that they should make contributions for Imperial defence, with the following result:

Contribution from overseas towards naval expenditure in 1911:

Australia	£200,000
New Zealand	100,000
South Africa	85,000
Newfoundland	3,000
India	100,000
Canada

The aid which has been thus given, but more particularly the aid which Canada is now proposing to give, cannot, as has been truly said, be measured only in the value of the ships or in the money which these ships cost. It will have a moral value out of all proportion to the material assistance provided, and it will have a very material effect in bringing about the peace of the world. Had not Canada taken this effective step at this moment, I think the very worst possible impression would have been produced at home and abroad. But this action on Canada's part has not only been re-received with enthusiastic applause and acclaim in every part of Canada itself, but it has been recognized everywhere as a proof and sign that those who at any time may be minded to menace any part of the British Empire will have to contend, not with that part alone, but with the united strength of the whole. True, it is stated in the memorandum prepared by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and laid before the House on Wednesday last, that no matter what decision Canada may come to, Great Britain will not, under any possible circumstances, fail to do her duty to the overseas dominions, but it is also stated in that memorandum:

> That any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and the mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, will be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness to the united strength of the Empire and to the renewed resolve of the overseas dominions to take a part in maintaining its integrity.

The Prime Minister has pointed out to the House what defeat—in a great naval battle—would mean for the Empire, what it would mean for Great Britain herself and what it would mean for Germany. It has been shown that Great Britain can never violate German territory even after a complete defeat of that power at sea, as her army is not organized for such an undertaking in comparison with the ogranization of the German army. On the other hand, Germany could if she chose invade and conquer Great Britain after a successful naval engagement in the North Sea. Germany has no overseas territory desired by Great Britain, while Great Britain has overseas territories, the cession of which might be demanded by another country after a successful war. A decisive battle lost at sea by Germany would still leave her the greatest land power in Europe, whereas a similar one lost at sea by Great Britain would shatter the British Empire to its foundations and change profoundly the destiny of its component parts. In support of this contention, which is not the view of an alarmist, or a dreamer of dreams, may I quote from 'The Day of the Saxon' by General Homer Lea:

> By the efforts men make to preserve their families from want, from servitude or destruction do we judge their domestic virtues. In such a manner only to a larger degree, should judgment be rendered upon these same men according to the efforts they make toward a like preservation of their race. If a man who gives over his family to the vicissitudes of neglect is deserving of scorn, how great should be the contempt felt for him who evades the obligations he owes his race and gives over, not alone his family, but all his people to conquest or destruction.

Public fealty is only a nobler conception of the duty a man owes his family. A nation is a union of families; patriotism the synthesis of their domestic virtues. The ruin of states, like the ruin of families comes from one cause—neglect. To neglect one's family is to lose it; to neglect one's country is to perish with it. Individuals are a part of the world only in the duration or memory of their race. It is not so much in the vastness of British possessions that are found conditions provocative of war as it is in its geographical distribution. It is not a segregated sovereignty occupying, as the Russian Empire, a corner or contiguous position of the earth, but forms, on the other hand, a circle around the entire globe, within which is placed all the other powers of the world; and not one of them can follow their lines of natural expansion without, sooner or later, being brought into direct contact with the British dominion.

If the conflict is between an insular and a continental state, the sea becomes the first area of the struggle. If the insular power suffers defeat its war is at an end, since a land defence by an insular nation against a continental power in command of the sea is a political, military and economic impossibility.

If the naval power of the continental nation is destroyed, it results only in a transfer of the theatre of war from the sea to the land, from naval to land forces, since a continental state with land frontiers is economically free from the insular nations control of the sea. Its military forces must be defeated before its internal economies or political powers are affected to the extent of suing for peace. In the recent war between Russia, a continental state, and Japan, an insular nation, this principle is made clear. Had Russia destroyed the naval forces of Japan the war would have ended on the date of that disaster.

It is not necessary, in modern times, to invade an insular state to destroy it.

With the destruction of the British fleet, British capacity to wage war is at an end. England is invaded. This invasion is starvation. Before harvest there is only enough food in the United Kingdom to last for a few weeks; after the gathering of the crops only enough to last a few months. But long before physical starvation sets in moral starvation will have accomplished its work.

It was contended, I think by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition this afternoon, that Canada would be taking a more effective step in the direction of Imperial defence if, instead of making a direct contribution of three of the greatest and most powerful dreadnoughts she would enter upon the construction of a Canadian navy. Without in any way wishing to forestall or even to suggest what Canada's permanent naval policy may be, I think the concluding words of the document laid before this House by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, is a sufficient answer to a contention of that sort. What do the Lords of the Admiralty say, after having sized up the arguments, after having put forward the grounds and the reasons? It is absolutely, I think, unanswerable as to the necessity at the present time of the overseas dominions of the Empire coming to the aid, and the effective aid, of the British navy for the purpose of protection and for the purpose of maintaining peace. The concluding words of that document are:

> The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

That is the suggestion of the Lords of the Admiralty. It is the suggestion, in effect, of the present Government of Great Britain, which has devoted a great deal of time to studying questions of this sort. Therefore I say that not only is Canada, in making this contribution, doing what the circumstances of the case require, what a careful perusal of the document submitted by the Admiralty and of other sources of information have convinced this Government is the only proper thing to do; but, she is acting in harmony with the position taken by the present Government of Great Britain, which, after giving due consideration to the subject, has made the positive announcement in the concluding words of the State paper laid on the table of this House on Wednesday last. In view of that, can my right hon. friend or any one else successfully contend for one moment that what Canada is doing at the present time is not a much more effective contribution for the purpose required by the British navy to-day than would be such a policy as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition formulated, when he asked for tenders for cruisers and destroyers in 1910, and which he stated to the House would have been in process of building at Montreal at the present time? If that policy had been followed up, how can it be contended that that would have been a more effective contribution to the British Empire than the contribution which the Government of Canada in all confidence are submitting for the consideration of the House and the people of Canada to-day? I would like again to ask the indulgence of the House to permit me to quote from so high an authority as Silbur on 'The Evolution of Sea Power,' at page 159; and I commend the extract for the consideration of the House and the country. He is recognized as one of the great expert writers on the subject of Sea Power to-day. (reading):

It would appear, from the turn events are taking in the British Empire to-day, that there are certain ambitious colonial statesmen who would advocate the creation of independent navies, which, in the event of the mother country being embroiled in war, might, or might not, as the cause and course of the war determined, be allied with the British fleets. Now, it is not at all likely that any exception to naval history will occur here. The inherent weakness of naval alliances is simply a principle of sea-power; or rather, let us say, the superiority of a homogeneous navy is a principle of sea-power.

It is to be supposed that, in the event of Canada, Autralia, or South Africa having hostilities forced upon them by a foreign power as the result of some fancied or real breach of treaty obligations, Great Britain, irrespective of the righteousness or cause of the trouble, would throw her sea-power into the breach, and probably at the cost of inestimable treasure and many valuable lives, defend her colony. If the independent navies simply joined in such a war as allies, the fancied privileges and rights of the colonials would hamper and considerably weaken British sea-power; and we might have the puerile bickerings as to responsibility and rank which made the Swedish and Danish alliances in 1780 impotent, and which were even noticeable among the colonial and Imperial officers during the Anglo-Boer war of 1899-1902.

Sea-power, to be truly effective, must be held by a homogeneous navy, in which jealousy of rank, priority of station, distrust, antagonism of colony, dominion, union, or mother country must be eradicated if the British Empire is to include the empire of the seas.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With the hon. gentleman's permission I would like to ask him a question. He has quoted the opinion of an expert—in fact, the opinions of two or three experts. Has he the opinion of Lord Charles Beresford?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not that here on my desk. I know to what the hon. gentle man refers. Now, I understand my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, this afternoon—repeating time and time again as he did that there was no emergency, no condition of affairs that called for this contribution at the present time—to say that he knew four years ago everything that the Admiralty's memorandum of to-day contains. If he knew four years ago everything that the Admiralty's memorandum of to-day contains, I would like to ask him how it is that it is only to-day that he thinks it necessary to move an amendment embodying the idea that there should be a fleet unit on the Atlantic and a fleet unit on the Pacific? How is it that he allowed these four years to pass, with the knowledge in his possession which he says justifies his present position, without having asked this House and this country to take action? I think his remark to the effect that four years ago he knew everything that is contained in this memorandum of the British Admiralty cannot be taken as literally and completely correct. Within the last four years conditions have changed very much. He could not possibly have foreseen or foretold that in the spring of 1912 Germany would pass another navy law making its navy more effective, a circumstance which adds very much to the necessity of having a contribution made by Canada.

The right hon. gentleman talks about a Canadian navy. We speak, as the right hon. gentleman did, of the necessity for a Canadian unit of the British navy; and it is not correct, as stated by the right hon. gentleman, that this would become an annual tribute or an annual contribution. This is not to be the permanent policy which this Government intends to lay before this House. As I have already said we are proposing to the House a contribution having regard to the present state of affairs throughout the world, for the purpose of strengthening the navy of Great Britain so that it may be still stronger and effective to defend the interests of citizens wherever they are found and to protect the interests of Canada, our coasts, our commercial marine and our commerce on the high seas.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman please tell us what is the permanent policy?

Mr. HAZEN: If my hon. friend had been in his seat this afternoon, he would have heard me make the statement that this was not to be regarded for a single moment as Canada's permanent part in Imperial defence. We have stated that Canada's participation in permanent defence is a matter that cannot be decided in a few weeks or months; it is a matter for careful consideration, not only with His Majesty's Government of the British Islands, but possibly with the governments of the overseas possessions as well. I think that is a position the justice and fairness of which will be recognized by most members of this House if not by my hon. friend from the city of St. John. That question of permanent defence will be worked out; it will be worked out along proper lines; and we believe that one of the elements that will have to enter into the question of permanent defence will be the one of the representation which Canada and the overseas dominions shall have with regard to foreign affairs and the policy of the British Empire as a whole.

The Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker, regard this act of policy as a contribution, and a very great contribution, to the cause of peace. It is their hope that it will assist in averting the horrors of war, in two ways. For one thing, it will strengthen, in the councils of the Empire, those elements which look with aversion upon adventurous policies and earnestly desire the Empire to continue to follow the paths of conciliation and of aloofness from international strife. For another, it will add to the might of the British Empire, an admittedly genuinely peaceful power, and for a century past the greatest secular agency for good that the world has ever seen. The British Empire, Mr. Speaker, is essentially peaceful. The present situation is one of apprehension of attack from outside, not of aggression by His Majesty or any of the realms which own his sway, and it is the hope of the Canadian Government that Canada's free and loyal gift will help to put the issue of a conflict beyond peradventure. In our strength is our peace; it is to preserve those inestimable blessings that Canada gladly and willingly adds to the one armament in the world which stands for defence, not defiance, for security instead of adventure, for the preservation of industry and the amelioration of social conditions.

I come, Mr. Speaker, from one of that group of little provinces by the sea, where bold and hardy seamen are reared, where the salt breath of the sea is ever in our nostrils, where the limitless road of the ocean lies at every man's threshold, tempting him beyond the horizon to lands afar. In days gone by those provinces excelled in ship-building; the products of their skill were found in every sea and in every port. The coming of the iron age killed that industry; the former days of romance are gone. But it is a peculiar pleasure to me to be able to point to that feature of our policy which provides for the revival of our ship-building industry, and provides for it upon a sound, a well considered and a business-like plan. Under its fostering care, Mr. Speaker, we may look forward with confidence to the day when we again may see our own ships plough the distant oceans, when once more to the man of the Maritime provinces the sea will be his rightful heritage. When that day comes, those trading ships under the Canadian ensign, those peaceful merchantmen gliding backwards and forward like shuttles binding the countries of the globe together in a web of harmony and industry will cross oceans guarded from molestation by the white ensign of the Imperial navy. The trade routes our steamers will follow will be protected by the warships of our navy—ours in reality henceforward—and among those great policemen of the ocean will be Canadian ships, helping to secure our trade from interruption and our flag from insult.

I do not wish to lay exclusive stress upon peace. This world has not yet reached the millennium; lawless passions still are abroad; the clash of war may come. If come it does, I know the blood from which our two great races spring, I know that they will not shrink from the test. Nay, more, if I read my countrymen aright, if the hour of battle comes I know where they will wish Canada's representatives to be. Not as weak coastal vessels hugging a far-off shore, anxiously awaiting the issue of the conflict; not as mere scouts hovering on the fringes of the fray; but in the foremost fighting line where the heaviest work is to be done: there is the place for the ships of Canada to bear the flag that has braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze, the flag that we derive as of right from the strong men of past centuries, the flag for which Canadians already have fought and died and lived.

The Bill which has been introduced to the House, Mr. Speaker, provides for an expenditure from the resources of Canada not exceeding the sum of $35,000,000, for the purpose of building and equipping three of the greatest ships afloat; ships of the largest and most modern description; ships of the dreadnought or cruiser-dreadnought type, as may be agreed upon; the cost of which will in each case amount to about $11,500,000. It has been stated throughout the press of this country that Canada will have to borrow from England the money for the purpose of obtaining those ships and adding them to the navy of Great Britain. Such is not the case, and my belief is that those ships will be obtained and equipped without adding one single dollar to the permanent debt of Canada and the cost mentioned will be taken from the revenue of Canada alone. When this Bill becomes law, it will be the duty of the Canadian Government to enter into a contract for the construction of the ships. Their construction will be subject to inspection by the Admiralty, who will no doubt place at our disposal all the facilities of their organization—an organization which we do not possess—for the purpose of having the contracts properly carried out, and seeing that the ships are of a modern type and of the best possible workmanship and construction. As to the terms and conditions on which these ships are to be constructed, and to become a part of the British navy, that is a matter to be agreed upon, as set out in the last clause of the Bill, by the Admiralty and the Canadian Government. I believe that when the contracts were entered into and the ships are built, there will not be a man in this country worthy the name of Canadian who will not feel proud when he hears of those ships forming part of the navy of Great Britain, and bearing Canadian historical names. They will be an evidence for all time of the intention of Canada to come to the aid of the British Empire of which she forms so important a part; that she will continue to be a part of that Empire, and to do all in her power to enable Great Britain to for ever maintain the supremacy of the seas, so desirable in the interests not only of the colonies, but of the Empire as a whole, and so desirable in the interests of no part of that Empire more than the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): In rising to contribute a few remarks on the question now before the House, one cannot but be impressed with the grandeur and magnificence embodied in the words 'British citizenship.' When there is added to that the robust Canadianism exemplified in the people of the northern half of this American continent, we are still prouder. In the discussion of this great question we ought to keep in view two things: first our duty as British subjects, and second, our rights and privileges as Canadians. I am proud to be a British subject, and I am prouder to belong to this particular part of the British Empire than if I were born in London, for, after all:

> That man's the best cosmopolite
> Who loves his native country best.

I have no apologies to make either on this side of the ocean or the other, for speaking in this debate from the standpoint of a Canadian, and none the less of a British subject because I am a Canadian.

I was delighted, in a way, to hear the eloquent peroration of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. It was largely an eloquent apology for abandoning a policy that would have given to Canada a great ship-building industry. I was surprised—and the great nations of the earth will also be surprised—that the head of the Naval Department of this Dominion painted such a pitiful picture of the condition of the forces of the British Empire, and the possibility of England being defeated on the sea, and what would happen if she were defeated. Sir, there is not a word in the memorandum of the British Admiralty—not a word anywhere in the history of the world within the last fifty years—which points to the fact that there is any danger of the British Empire being defeated on the seas. If my hon. friend entertains that fear, I do not, and the Admiralty says there is no danger of such a condition, because it is prepared to take care of the British Empire the world over.

I consider that the policy of my hon. friend is one not only of inactivity, but one of inability as well. It is one of inactivity in that it refrains from developing what would be a permanent policy. My hon. friend quoted figures to prove that there did exist some particular emergency. What do his figures prove? They prove that there is a permanent emergency; a permanent condition that cannot be met by what he himself would not dignify by the name of policy, but terms an expediency—a contribution. It is one of inability, for that he followed his leader in pointing out the inability of Canada to build ships; the inability of Canada to supply men for them, and, the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite is the practical exemplification of that belief, for they do not propose to either build ships in Canada or man the ships they are going to give to the British Empire.

My hon. friend talked very eloquently, and rightly so, of the place that Canadians should have in the firing line—of the place before the enemy, facing the foe, that the Canadian ships with those three distinguished names should have, but he does not supply a man to put in the firing line. It is a reversal of the old rhyme that we used to hear :

> We don't want to fight,
> But, by jingo, if we do,
> We've got the ships, we've got the men,
> We've got the money, too.

It is a reversal of that. Now it is, if Great Britain wants to fight, we will give her the battleships, but not a man; we shall set afloat three of the most powerful battleships that science can devise or that money can procure, and so far as Canada is concerned, any foreign country can come and lug them away; there is nobody to defend them. In the firing line, battleships, but not a man when the enemy has to be faced. Sir, I ask the men of Canada, the descendants of the men from whom my hon. friend sprang, what they think of the policy of a government which publishes to the world that we will give to the Empire our money because we have it, but that we will not give what is more precious, and what would show real devotion, our lives in defence of the country. I ask the descendants of old France in this country, that country that gave us such illustrious examples of fighting valour in the days gone by, what do they think of the policy supported by their own friends in the Government that tells the world and old France, we have got the money, your descendants have made money in Canada, it won't harm us to give the money, but we have lost the fighting spirit you had, we will not let a man go. Mr. Speaker, they misrepresent the men of Canada. I would ask the Englishmen who have come to Canada in recent years, those men who left their sires or their grandsires, or their kinsmen at home, what do they think of the policy of the country to which they have come as exemplified by the Government, who appealed to them in the last campaign? British born, what do you think of the policy that tells the friends you have left at home, 'here father, here brother, take our money, we are making lots of it, but go and fight yourselves?' I ask the descendants of the men of Belfast, of Dublin, of Ulster, of Tipperary, what think they? What think they of the Government which represents the men descended from the country that has given to Britain the greatest generals her army perhaps ever had, what do they think of the Government which tells the Irishmen at home that their kinsmen will fight when they are in Ireland, but that when they come to Canada they develop cowardice, that they will give their money but never fight? What think the men from the lowlands, the Highlands? What think the descendants of the brave men of Germany of this reflection on their valour? If this Bill is to become law, which it should not, I appeal to the Government, and to the men behind them, to strike out the libel on the Canadian people; and, if they are going to give ships paid for by Canadian money, not to send them afloat as hulks, unmanned, but to give Britain what she wants more than our money—the Canadians to defend the Empire when it is in danger.

My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) was unfair, I think, concerning the time which elapsed between the advertisement for tenders and the letting of those tenders. He said that several months elapsed. You know, Mr. Speaker, that a half truth does not always convey the whole truth. Let me give the House the facts as to those tenders, and let us see if the charge which my hon. friend made is borne out by them: On May 1, 1911, the tenders were received. On May 12, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Marine, the head of the naval affairs of Canada, left for England, to attend the Imperial Conference.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Quite an omission.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not forsaking their duty, but doing just what my hon. friend did this year, although they did not make the same kind of speeches. They left England on the 3rd of July, and arrived in Ottawa on the 12th, and the dissolution took place on the 29th of July. I leave it to the House to pronounce judgment as to whether the hon. minister was fair or not. I want to point out this other side of the question. What a wail or what a protest would have gone up from hon. gentlemen opposite if the Government had dared, after suffering defeat, to let that contract for that great and important work. My hon. friends opposite would have had something to charge the late Government with. As it is, they have nothing to charge them with, and the attempt made this afternoon by my hon. friend shows the weakness of the position he holds, and the delicate and difficult task he assumes in trying to defend something that he refused to-night to call a policy.

Now, let me point out something else. I take a somewhat—I was going to say a wider view, but I should not use that word. I wish to present this view to the House, and I do so without any hesitation, that the return to a system of contribution by the people of Canada is a squint towards a reversal of the constitutional relations existing between the British Empire and her Dominions over the sea, and is a step backwards of seventy years. Allow me to call the attention of the House to a few historical facts. I know my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not like this, because he objected this afternoon to the historical references of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. In dealing with the record of this particular case, he dared not go back further than 1910. After that he got into difficulty with his colleagues. For one hundred years prior to Canada becoming a part of the British Empire she was ruled by France at long range. The attempt was unsuccessful in so far as any great progress was concerned. In 1763, when we became a part of the great British Empire, that form of government still continued—government from across the ocean by men who could not possibly realize our position or understand clearly the aspirations of the Canadian people or the ambitions with which they were imbued. I will not say, Sir, that a good deal of progress was not made under that form of government, but the full fruition of the people's hopes never came until Canada got responsible government. Let me call attention to another fact. During the last half of the century another important event took place on this continent. New England became separated from the mother country largely through a question of taxation, but I want to call the attention of the House to a particular episode which occurred about this time. I can do it coming from the province from which I do. I have heard it intimated—I have even heard it intimated in the corridors of this House—that we could not absolutely depend on our fellow countrymen who descended from old France when a question of British loyalty was at stake. I utterly repudiate that statement and the history of this country proves my repudiation. About the time that the New England states were separating from Great Britain, emissaries came across the line and visited the old historic province of Quebec. Mark you, the French people had just recently been subdued and conquered by the British forces. Even some of the men who protest so loudly their loyalty in these days would have been irritated in that new situation in which they found themselves, and if ever a man would be liable to give way to such solicitations as were then held out it would be at that moment. Sir, these emissaries came across the line and endeavoured to seduce the newly conquered race, or their leaders, into joining them in the rebellion.

Mr. EDWARDS: Of what nationality were the emissaries?

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine that they would give a contribution if they were in this House instead of sending men to fight. What was the answer given by the recently conquered people, by the descendant of old France? They absolutely refused and, Sir, I say it as a Canadian, an English-speaking British subject, it is possible that we owe to these patriotic Frenchmen the fact that Canada to-day is a part of the great British Empire. He who says aught to reflect on the devotion and loyalty of the French citizens of this country to Great Britain has not read history aright, or else he is prejudiced beyond the point of conviction.

I come down a little further, and I find that in 1791 Canada was divided into Upper and Lower Canada. We still progressed along certain lines, always having the aspiration of being able some day to manage our own affairs with full autonomy granted with the good will and blessing of the motherland. But, that aspiration did not ripen very fast, and let me call the attention of the English-speaking members of this House to the fact that in those days Ontario was not the predominating influence and the rich and populous province but that in those days the province of Quebec occupied that proud position. We were in a different frame of mind from that which hon. gentlemen sometimes now exhibit when they are discussing public questions where an apparent conflict between the two races might appear.

Let us come down a little further to 1812, when we had a difference again, this time with the United States. What happened? Did the Canadian men stand back and say: We will send our guns, but we will not go ourselves? They were ready at the call of the Empire to fight for British supremacy and for the retention of this part of the Empire under the old flag. Now, I come to 1837, a time fraught with significance. I am not going to discuss the actions of those who took part in the revolt of 1837 either in Ontario or Quebec, but let me point out to you, and particularly to you younger men, that in a country's history it very often happens that the rebels of yesterday are the heroes of to-day. In 1837 what was the agitation for?—for the right of the Canadian people to spend their own money and to manage their own affairs. That was finally brought about a few years later. Then, in 1841, we again had Upper and Lower Canada united and this country owes to Baldwin and Lafontaine a debt of gratitude that cannot be estimated. Lord Elgin said, in discussing this matter, that Baldwin himself was worth three regiments of the British army because he had given to the people a privilege for which they had sighed, a privilege which they have long continued to enjoy and under which they have prospered. What has all this to do with this question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: Men who have not read history aright cannot tell. Men who have not read it at all dare not try to tell. It means that there was, after years of struggle, a victory achieved by the Canadian people. They were to be allowed, I repeat it, to govern themselves as they saw fit, and not only to contribute their own money but to expend it through the votes of their representatives and not to have it expended through Downing street. I say, and I say it with all confidence, that the introduction of a contribution, disguise it as you will, is a proposal which cannot commend itself to those who look at this question in the light of history. Instead of giving our men, instead of providing what Britain wants with our own money, these hon. gentlemen say: No, we will give you money instead with which to purchase ships. That is not the policy of responsible government, but it is directly opposed to that great principle.

I want to come down now to a later day. In 1867 we had brought about in Canada perhaps one of the most notable events in the history of the nations of the world when Confederation was accomplished, and the men who worked out that problem performed a service for the British Empire far greater than that which can be rendered by the presentation of dreadnoughts, performed a service for the peace of the world, to use the expression of my hon. friend, and performed a service for Canadians, unexcelled in preceding years. It was not an easy task, as those who have since attempted the Government of Canada have found out. But, mark you, that never could have been brought about but for the underlying principle of responsible government, and it could not be maintained, if for one moment we should depart from that great underlying principle. Let me point out that this great question of responsible government was admitted years ago and up to the present moment has never been seriously interfered with.

What happened with regard to the land force defences of Canada? Hon. gentlemen say we must have the protection of the British Empire, and so say we all, and we ever will have that protection; we must do our share, and no man shrinks from doing his share. But there is a right way and a wrong way of doing our duty. What happened with regard to our land forces? For a great many years the soldiers of the motherland defended and occupied our country; British troops were here until 1870 and in 1861 there were 18,000 of them on the soil of Canada. When they departed after having been here many years, and when Canada herself undertook the task of managing her own land forces, did anything serious happen? Sir, when we assumed our own defence on land it was a step in the right direction, the young son having grown into manhood, and needing no further to hang on to the apron strings of his mother, stood for himself to defend his country. What was done with the land force ought to be done with the naval force. Let me read what Lord Grey, Colonial Secretary, wrote to the Governor General of Canada in 1851:

Canada in common with the other British provinces in North America now possesses in the most ample and complete manner in which it is possible that she should enjoy it, the advantage of self-government in all that relates to her internal affairs. It appears to Her Majesty's Government that the advantage ought to carry with it corresponding responsibility and that the time has now come when the people of Canada must be called upon to take upon themselves a larger share than they have hitherto borne of the expenses which have incurred on their account and for their advantage. Of these expenses, by far the heaviest charge which falls upon this country is that incurred for the military protection of the provinces. Looking to the rapid progress which Canada is now making in wealth and population and to the prosperity which she at this moment enjoys, it is the conviction of Her Majesty's Government that it is only due to the people of this country that they should now be relieved from a large proportion of this charge which has hitherto been imposed upon them for the protection of a colony now well able to do much towards protecting itself.

The words of Lord Grey in 1851, as applied to the land forces, might well be applied now in regard to the naval defences of Canada, and we might very well, along the lines suggested there, proceed to relieve Great Britain from the protection of our shores by taking that protection to ourselves. I again call attention to the basis for this doctrine laid down by the Colonial Secretary of that date.

'Canada in common with the other British provinces of North America, now possesses in the most ample and complete manner in which it is possible she would enjoy it the advantage of self-government in all that relates to her internal affairs.'

Responsible government, Lord Grey said, had been given to Canada, and now let her take care of her own land forces. Sir, that principle of self government lies deeply embedded in the history of Canada, and it would be a sad mistake to do anything which may appear to interfere with it now, or at any time in our history. I point out that in dealing with the militia of Canada this great principle was not only kept in view but the fact was emphasized on every possible occasion. In 1861 and 1862 the Committee on Expenses of the militia brought in a report and, referring to the presence of British troops in Canada, that report said:

'The system prevents the development of a proper spirit of self-reliance among the colonists, and enfeebles their national character. By the gift of political government

. . . .

Mark you, based on responsible Government again.

By the gift of political government we have bestowed on our colonists the most important element of national education, but the habit of self-defence constitutes a part, hardly less important to the training of a free people, and it will never be acquired by our colonists if we assume the task of defending them.

I submit the words of this committee to my hon. friends opposite. British Imperialists of the highest order, those who have watched our growth in the years as we have come to nationhood, have always taken the ground since we got responsible government that as rapidly as possible, in pursuance of the granting of responsible government we should assume certain responsibilities, and these responsibilities were not to depart from the principle of self government by making contributions and again bringing Great Britain back to our assistance in times of peace particularly, but that we should learn to help ourselves and develop the national spirit. The fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt were referred to by the Minister of Marine to-night, and I regret that he neglected to point out that the late Liberal Government had looked after that very important matter. The Imperial troops having left the Dominion in order that we might take charge of the defence of our country by our own militia, and thus develop our self-reliance under political responsible government, there came a time when a further step was to be taken, and Great Britain desired, and the late Government of Canada agreed to it, that she should be relieved of the expense of the fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt. Has Canada suffered by the change under which the British troops left Canada and our militia took charge of our defence? I leave it to the Minister of Militia to say whether Canada has suffered or not by that change. The fact is that we have to-day in Canada a splendid body of volunteers, not afraid to fight if necessary for the defence of their country, and had the British troops remained in the Dominion of Canada, we would not have a Canadian militia such as we are proud of. But as soon as they were withdrawn, and even before that, the spirit was in the air, the young men of Canada, who are never afraid to fight when occasion arises, joined the Militia of Canada, and to-day the Minister of Militia believes he is at the head of one of the finest bodies of men and one of the finest organizations anywhere in the over-seas dominions of the British Empire.

Hon. Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): Does not the hon. member believe it also)

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is much better than it would have been under the old conditions. I wish the House to bear in mind that, as our responsibilities have increased, our devotion to the Empire has become intensified, and every new task we have assumed has not made us a separate entity, as some hon. gentlemen would argue, but has drawn us closer to the motherland, and has strengthened the tie that binds us and always will bind us to the great British Empire. It is human nature properly developed that the more responsibility you place on a thoughtful, strong person, the more he feels his responsibility. So it is with the young nation, the Dominion of Canada; and at this moment, instead of adding to the responsibility, instead of allowing young Canada to assume her proper place as a young nation side by side with the Mother Country, we have before the House something not to be dignified by the name of a policy, saying: Stand back, do not go too rapidly, young Canada; you cannot build ships; you cannot man ships; but let us take your money and send it to the old land for the construction of warships.

There have been other developments all based on the great principle of responsible government, that is, of allowing Canada to manage her own affairs. Conditions years ago concerning treaties were not the same as they are to-day. Sixty years ago, Lord Ashburton and Daniel Webster sat down and framed a treaty providing for the division of certain territory in which Canada was vitally affected. No Canadian representative was there. Had there been one there, perhaps the award would have been different. When the Washington Treaty was framed, Sir John A. Macdonald was one of several representatives. This was a little advance. Later, when the Alaskan boundary came to be determined, out of three British arbitrators, two were Canadians. Following down this line we find now, as is exemplified in the treaties with France and other countries that when a treaty is to be made in which Canada is concerned, the Canadian representatives practically make that treaty with the foreign country. Canada at the present time has developed along that line of responsible government and home management to the extent that Great Britain can make treaties in which Canada may not necessarily join, if she does not so desire, and treaties can be made which will give certain benefits to Canada, which do not apply to other parts of the Empire. So great has been our development along this line that Canada is practically a nation within herself.

The people of Canada should not forget that Great Britain has allowed us the utmost freedom, and, as that freedom has been allowed so has our devotion and loyalty increased; but hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is an old parliamentarian, will remember that Canada was allowed further privileges. I think away back in 1859 Mr. A. T. Galt imposed a tariff which applied against the motherland, and when the National Policy was introduced in 1879, what was the position taken? Some persons raised the question that the tariff should not apply, in its entirety at least, against the British Empire, and a paper strongly supporting hon. gentlemen now in the Government said 'If it interferes with our relation with the motherland so much the worse for British connection.' They were strong then on Canadian autonomy. Why? Because certain financial interests then might have been involved, that may not be involved in the present surrender of that autonomy.

I come now to the time when Canada was allowed to begin to repay some of these great kindnesses, and that was when the late Minister of Finance, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, introduced the British preference into this parliament. Hon. gentlemen now take the view, as was expressed by the right hon. the Prime Minister, that a permanent policy cannot be evolved until the question of representation in Imperial councils is settled. They took the same ground when the British preference was introduced, that Canada should not give this preference till she dickered and made a bargain to get something in return. The same principle. While the right hon. the leader of the Opposition does not at all minimize the great importance, of the discussion and consideration of that question of representation, he says that the discussion and consideration of that question should not be held as a barred door against doing something in the way of a permanent policy for the naval defences of the Empire. He does not ask for a quid pro quo. He says that we are prepared in the face of a permanent condition to give a permanent policy, and that while in years to come this other great question may have to be solved, the construction of Canadian ships to be at the side of the motherland in the time of stress must not be delayed, awaiting the settlement of that question, which may mean the indefinite postponement of the adoption of a permanent policy of naval defence. Let me read just two or three quotations from certain gentlemen on this question of managing our own affairs. The editor of the 'Round Table,' referring to the resolutions passed at the Imperial Conference in 1907, said:

> This resolution established the status of the Dominions as naval entities, and entirely distinct from that which inhabited the British Isles. It recognized that the basis of Imperial organization was the co-operation of five nations, not the centralization of power in the hands of the British Government as an Imperial Parliament. It finally destroyed the older conception of Imperial development as a gradual reunion of the colonies with the mother country through representatives in either of the British Houses of Parliament.

Hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that notwithstanding arguments that may be brought forward to divert their attention it is not the British Parliament that is the bond of union, it is the British Crown that is the bond of union. The British Parliament in itself is a body such as we are, responsible to the people who elect it, and it has in its sphere no greater powers than has this Canadian parliament in its sphere. Let me read what Mr. Balfour said in 1911 at the Constitutional Club:

> I cannot help thinking that as we have now thoroughly realized in every one of these great communities that each is to manage its own affairs, carry out its own life, make its own experiments as if it were an independent political entity, as that is a truth understood by every politician of every party of every one of these several communities. I cannot help thinking that upon that solid basis we shall build up something which the world has not yet seen, which political dreamers, in the past, have never yet dreamed of. A coalition of free and self-governing communities, who feel that they are never more themselves, never more masters of their own fate, than when they can recognize that they are parts of a greater whole from which they can draw inspiration and strength, and that each lives its own life and is itself in the fullest sense a self-governing entity, which yet has a larger whole to look to whose interests are not alien to it, on whom it can rest in time of trouble, from whom it can draw experience, to whom it can look, whom it can aid, and from whom it can receive aid.

Always, by all these authorities, so far as I have read them, there is reference back to the giving to Canada and the other dominions overseas of the right of self-government. Mr. Asquith, at the opening of the Imperial Conference in 1911, said:

> Two things in the British Empire were unique in the history of great political aggregations; the reign of law, and the combination of local autonomy with the loyalty to a common head. In proportion as centralization was seen to be increasingly absurd, so has distintegration been felt to be increasingly impossinble. We, each of us, are, and we, each of us, intend to remain master in our own household. This is here at home and throughout the dominions the life-blood of our policy, 'It is the articulus status and cadentis imperii.' It is none the less true that we are and intend to remain units indeed, but units in a greater unity and it is the primary object and governing purpose of these periodical conferences that we take free council together in matters which concern us all.

Again Mr. Asquith bases his remarks largely on the fact that we are self-governing entities and intend to remain such—and with the full consent of the motherland. The London Times, in discussing the resolutions of the Imperial Conference—I think this was the conference of 1909—says:

> Taken as a whole, the memorandum is a well conceived and eminently practical solution of the very difficult problem of bringing three naval forces, possibly more hereafter, which are to be under separate administration into such close and organic relations that even in time of peace, the advantages of a single Imperial fleet will be, to a very large extent, secured and in time of war, an Imperial fleet, single and indivisible in direction and control and imbued with the common inspiration and discipline, will automatically come into existence, subject only to the established autonomy and discretion of the several dominions concerned.

The editor of the Times, it will be seen, bases his comment upon the great advancement that had been made in the autonomy of the dominions across the seas and declares that that autonomy is not to be interfered with.

While I am on the question of autonomy, I wish to refer to a point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) which seemed to excite considerable merriment—the question of the Canadian portion of the Imperial navy being under the control of the representatives of Canada. I ask why not? Why not? If the principle of responsible government is to be maintained, then what the Canadian Government buys with the Canadian people's money the representatives of the Canadian people surely ought to control. Two impossible situations cited, or rather concocted, seem to give point to the suggestion of my hon. friend. It is asked:

If a Canadian warship were to meet an enemy on the sea it could not fire upon it unless Parliament had consented.

Mr. HUGHES: It would not meet on land.

Mr. GRAHAM: It might, if it were a schooner of a certain kind. But my hon. friend shall not drive me from this point. He believes in constitutional government, in responsible government. There is no greater enemy of the old lack of principle that prevailed in Canada under the family compact than my hon. friend, and anything that smacks of family compact, I know will have his disapproval. Let me point out that the conditions of which my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) spoke could not very well exist. If there were an enemy of Great Britain on the high seas approaching the Canadian coast it would be because war had been declared. And surely there is no man in this House but would say—certainly, I hope, the gentleman who is at the head of the naval forces of Canada, which, I hope will yet include a great Canadian navy, will never admit—that, war imminent, the country throbbing at the prospect, he would not have his warships under control, mobilized, ready to act upon his orders in fifteen minutes. It is not true that Parliament has to be called in order to allow these warships to go to the aid of the motherland; that is left to the Governor in Council. Are hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches afraid to trust their own loyalty? Thinking men will not be deceived by such declamation devoid of argument. The principle of responsible government means that such a navy should be under the control of the people who own it, just as the British navy is under the British Admiralty and the representatives of the British people who own it. The law provides that the Canadian navy can be placed at the disposal of the British Admiralty by Order in Council, and that if Parliament is not then in session it shall be called to meet in ten days. Why? —hon. gentlemen opposite ask why? Responsible government again. Get away from the family compact idea. Under responsible government, Parliament must meet to vote the money for the fleet that is to join the Imperial forces. Surely, this Government would never send its navy—except the three ships that it is proposed to send, unmanned—without the ships being fully equipped or without money to pay their expenses. So Parliament, if not in session, must be called to vote the money. And I misjudge the representatives of the Canadian people who are here or who are to come here, if they would not be prepared at any time to vote every dollar that is necessary to protect the shores of Canada and to aid the British Empire in every part of the world where danger threatens.

Now, Sir, I refer again to history. I have already quoted some history, but it is, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would say, ancient. That part that he quoted about St. John would not be classified as being ancient or modern, but rather as sacred and profane. But I wish to come to more modern history. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) will not object if I again put on 'Hansard' what he said in 1909. It was a good speech, and at that time my hon. friend meant it. I want to say in all sincerity that to my mind it was without exception one of the most eloquent addresses ever heard in a deliberative body. For years I had been considering, as a journalist, the duty of the press and the people of Canada on this question of aiding in the naval defence of the Empire. A portion of the press contended that we were niggardly; we were not performing our duty; we were not proceeding with enough expedition. I for years had taken the ground that, up to a certain time at least, the greatest benefit we could confer upon the British Empire was the development of our own resources. Our resources were then not as large or our revenue, as buoyant as they are at the present time, but as a writer, I had taken that view in a modest way. But it was a question that was rapidly coming to the front, and when as a young member of this House I listened to the speech of my hon. friend, backed up by his leader, now the Prime Minister, I was absolutely convinced not only that Canada should do something, but that the proper way to do that something was to take her share in Imperial defence by building a navy of her own, to act on her own shores in times of peace and to be by the side of the forces of the motherland in times of stress or danger. My hon. friend made the matter so clear and expressed it in such eloquent terms that no one who listened to him could gainsay the matter of his speech, except, perhaps, in one or two points which I considered of minor importance. My hon. friend will, I trust, allow me to quote his words. I want them to be imbedded in the centre of my remarks this evening on this great question of Imperial naval defence. If hon. gentlemen opposite do not believe such of my remarks as they may read, I want them to be in a position to read the remarks made three years ago by the member for North Toronto. They are as follows :

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do; as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to this form of aid.

It still remains basic.

It goes still further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve, or twenty, or thirty years you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck; there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the product of defence. Yet some time or other, no one can doubt that with resources and with the population constantly increasing we must and will have in this country a naval force of our own for our coast and home defence.

The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada. I want to see something grafted on the soil of Canada's nationhood, which takes root and grows and develops until it incites the spirit of defence in this country, leads to a participation in the defence, leads to that quick interest in it, its glories, its duties and its accomplished work, which is after all the one great thing that compensates a people for great expenditures either on land or on sea in the way of defence and of the maintenance of the rights of the country.

Again, it disjoins what has been joined together from the earliest days of the world's existence—commerce and the protection of commerce. After all, the basic idea of a naval force is the protection of the commerce of a country. A commerce side by side with its protector, and its protector side by side with the growing commerce of a country, flourish best together, and are the surest helpers to each other. That is the idea which is in my mind—that when we make our contributions in the way of a fixed sum and it goes from us, and we are not responsible for it, we have none of the inspiration arising from the growth and development of a system of future defence in our own country. We are deprived of the larger benefit ourselves, and in the future we do no greater service to the Empire of which we form a part in this matter of defence.

Then, again, I think this method ignores the necessities and the aspirations and the prospects of a great people such as the Canadian people are destined to become. We must have beginnings; these must at first be small; but some time, or other, as I have said, our country will have its naval force for the defence of this country if for nothing else. The point with me is as to whether it is not the greater wisdom to sow the seed at once and cultivate its growth, as best we may, in our circumstances and with our resources, until at last we arrive at that stage of expansion, which we have reached in other great lines of our country's progress. You will notice that while I have tried to discuss the pros and cons in connection with this method, while I have stated reasons in favour of and others against it, my own mind tends rather towards the employment of another form than that of an out and out money contribution.

The then hon. member for North Toronto, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, uttered those great truths three years ago in more eloquent terms than I could possibly express them; and if I had nothing else to say on the subject, he has made the case unanswerable even against the arguments adduced this evening by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the head of the naval forces in Canada.

The right hon. Prime Minister also made a speech bearing on this question, in which he impressed upon the House the very same views as were entertained by the hon. member for North Toronto. Above all things I am impartial, and perhaps the House will pardon me if I also read his remarks: My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) did not read from his extracts the words which the present Prime Minister used on a certain occasion about the Canadian navy. This is what the present Prime Minister said when in Opposition.

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country, I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that.

He said: 'I entirely believe in that'; no reservation, and I am afraid that a certain movement had not then taken root, as my hon friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce would say:

The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the mother country and it has not worked satisfactorily in any repect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory. In Australia it failed, in the end, to meet with the approval of the people for the reason that Great Britain felt constrained to ask Australia that the field of operations of the squadron should be extended to the China and Indian seas; and when the operation of that squadron was so extended, then Australia felt that the contribution which they had been making for some years past was not really being used to give that protection to Australia which her interests demanded.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Put in the word 'Canada'.

Mr. GRAHAM (reading):

So that, the policy of Australia at the present time is to build up a flotilla of submarines and torpedo boats which, in case of war, would co-operate with the armed cruisers and battleships of the British navy.

It was pointed out in discussing this question that Australia in providing a force of that kind would provide a force which it would be very difficult, if not impossible, for Great Britain to send across the seas, and that in thus protecting themselves they were providing the best possible force for the protection of the Empire. So, I am at one with the Prime Minister as far as this is concerned. I am at one with him in this respect also that I think that an expenditure of money designed for that purpose ought, in the main at least, to be under the control of our own Parliament, and that by making an appropriation of that kind, and attending to the defence of our own coasts, by co-operation and co-ordination with the Imperial navy forces, we would be rendering a real service in the defence of the Empire and we would be doing our duty, not only to Canada, but to the Empire as a whole.

An hon. MEMBER: A good speech.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, let me compliment my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) on the fact.

Mr. EMMERSON: Did he say it should be under the control of Parliament?

Mr. GRAHAM: He said that all the money expended should be, in the main, under the control of Parliament. These were the words uttered by the present Prime Minister on that occasion.

Now, I want to come down to the conference of 1909, and in doing so I desire to call attention to a fact, which was emphasized very strongly by the Prime Minister in the speech from which I have just quoted, that is, the change that Australia decided to make from her former policy. Her former policy was one of contribution which this Government is now taking up where Australia let it drop. Australia has advanced, and has taken up the policy that we advocated, and still advocate. Hon. gentlemen opposite are behind in the march of events. Their policy is unmanned as well as their boats. At that conference of 1909, Australia practically said to the British Government we have been trying long enough this experiment of contribution, and, as my right hon. friend pointed out, it has not worked out. Australia said we are going to take the more Imperial course, the better Australian course, the common-sense course of building a navy to protect our own shores, our fisheries, our commerce in times of peace, a navy which shall be of some assistance to the Empire in time of war. Now Australia is building a navy of her own.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is her dreadnought now?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is one dreadnought, and it will be on the Australian coast when the unit is completed. The unit is under construction; it has not been indefinitely postponed.

Mr. AMES: Where will it be stationed until the unit is completed?

Mr. GRAHAM: Wherever the Governor General of Australia, under their Act, agrees it shall be.

Mr. EMMERSON: By whom will it be manned?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a touchy question. I want to compare what is under order now for the Australian Government with what is proposed by the Canadian Government. Australia has begun a big programme that will not be completed for some years, but at the present time, working along the lines laid down by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition this afternoon, and having tried the old-fashioned method proposed now by this Government as an expedient and found it did not provide the remedy they are providing a fleet unit of their own:

The Government of the commonwealth has adopted the general lines of Admiral Henderson's report, but at present only one fleet unit is under construction. This consists of a dreadnought cruiser, three unarmoured cruisers of the Bristol class—the same sort which Canada under the Laurier programme proposed to build four vessels—six destroyers, and three submarines, or thirteen vessels in all. These vessels are either in commission or approaching completion. A naval college is also to be established for the training of officers. For the present Australia's dreadnought cruiser will remain in British waters, but it is maintained by the Australian taxpayer.

Mr. AMES: By whom will it be manned?

Mr. GRAHAM: Eventually by Australians.

Mr. AMES: By whom will it be manned while in British waters?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is trying hard to get away.

Mr. AMES: My hon. friend might answer that question. By whom will it be manned while in British waters?

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose by the best available men engaged by the Australian Government and paid by it. They may be British marines, of course.

Mr. AMES: Will they be Australians?

Mr. GRAHAM: A good many of them may be, and possibly they may have the same magnificent privilege that is provided in this Act, of allowing some Australian officers to serve on the ships. That is a privilege of course extended to any qualified officer of the British navy.

Mr. BORDEN: There is not a line in the Act regarding that.

Mr. GRAHAM: But there was in my right hon. friend's speech.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend said the Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend's speech cannot be dissociated from this Act if it can be from some others. I read the memorandum, and I read my right hon. friend's speech very carefully. If I said it was in the Act it is an error; it was in my right hon. friend's speech, which, to my mind, is fully as important as the Act itself. Now, Sir, let me go a little farther. I want to point out something that occurred at this conference in 1909 about which we have heard so much. Perhaps the House will bear with me if I read from this Admiralty memorandum, page 23:

Imperial Conference.
With Replies of Self-governing Dominions on the Naval and Military Defence of the Empire, 1909.

I shall not read it all, as it is quite lengthy, but let me put on 'Hansard' a few statements made in this memorandum and one of these statements will be as to what constitutes a fleet unit so that the people of Canada and the Empire will know what our policy is in the matter of Imperial naval defence. Section 2 of this memorandum, page 23, says:

If the problem of Imperial naval military defence were considered merely as a problem of naval strategy it would be found that the greatest output of strength for a given expenditure is obtained by the maintenance of a single navy with the concomitant unity of training and unity of command. In furtherance then of the simple strategical ideal the maximum of power would be gained if all parts of the Empire contributed, according to their needs and resources, to the maintenance of the British navy.

Listen to section 3:

3. It has, however, long been recognized that in defining the conditions under which the naval forces of the Empire should be developed, other considerations than those of strategy alone must be taken into account. The various circumstances of the overseas dominions have to be borne in mind. Though all have in them the seeds of a great advance in population, wealth, and power, they have at the present time attained to different stages in their growth. Their geographical position has subjected them to internal and external strains, varying in kind and intensity. Their history and physical environment have given rise to individual national sentiment, for the expression of which room must be found. A simple contribution of money or material may be to one Dominion the most acceptable form in which to assist in Imperial defence. Another, while ready to provide local naval forces, and to place them at the disposal of the Crown in the event of war, may wish to lay the foundations upon which a future navy of its own could be raised. A third may think that the best manner in which it can assist in promoting the interests of the Empire is in undertaking certain local services not directly of a naval character, but which may relieve the Imperial Government from expenses which would otherwise fall on the British Exchequer.

That clause I wish to call the particular attention of the House to as it recognizes the aspirations of any dominion over the sea to lay the foundation of a navy of its own to grow and develop into a strong arm of the great Imperial navy. Now I want to come down to the vital point which I have in my mind; that is the constitution of a fleet unit. After discussing the question of the fleet unit in several paragraphs, section 7 says:

The fleet to be aimed at should therefore, in the opinion of the Admiralty, consist at least of the following:
1. Armoured cruiser (new 'Indomitable' class, which is of the 'Dreadnought' type).
3 Unarmoured cruisers ('Bristol class').
6 Destroyers.
3 Submarines, with the necessary auxiliaries, such as depot and store ships, etc., which are not here specified.

Such a fleet unit would be capable of action not only in the defence of coasts, but also of the trade routes, and would be sufficiently powerful to deal with small hostile squadrons should they ever attempt to act in its waters.

Twice that is the policy of the opposition in this House. My hon. friend's friends rather thought he scored a point this afternoon when he asked my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition: Why did you not, some years ago, when you had the power, provide for two additional fleet units? Why? Why was not the militia withdrawn from Canada in 1850 or 1860, instead of 1870? Why did it not go? The time had not arrived. Canada to-day has nearly double the revenue she had four years ago. The British Admiralty in 1909 was in favour of a fleet unit on the Pacific coast. I want the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to listen to the position taken on that occasion by the representatives of himself and other citizens of Canada who reside on the Atlantic coast. The Government, or its representatives said then: We have a Pacific coast; we have an Atlantic coast; we cannot at the present moment provide a fleet unit for each and we cannot put a unit on one coast only because the other coast must be protected as well. So the Government proposed a plan by which, with future development, we would have one fleet unit on the Pacific and one fleet unit on the Atlantic coast. But, in the meantime, they provided for the construction in Canada of a certain number of ships that could form component parts of each of these fleet units when the time arrived for the fleet units to be fully constructed. This policy to-day is a carrying out of the policy which the late Government had in mind when they introduced their naval law in 1910. Canada's resources will now permit of it, and, if we are to believe what my hon. friend says about urgency, he surely will not object to an increased naval programme, even if it is in Canada. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated that the memo of the British Admiralty said that the way this Bill proposed was the right way. What did it say? Let me read the memo. I might premise this by saying that the British Admiralty did not discuss a Canadian navy. The promise had been made by this Government that the naval law of Canada would be repealed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: To please the Nationalists.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will come to that—and a request was made by the Prime Minister under conditions which could not admit of anything but a contribution. Now, the British Admiralty was in this position: You are going to give us something, you are bound to give us something, it is not to be a Canadian navy, it is not the policy outlined in the McKenna memo of 2909, you have forsaken that, we have read your speeches, you have promised the Nationalists that you are going to repeal that law, now are you going to give us something and you ask us what we will have.

> The Prime Minister of the Dominions having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

There is nothing in that which says three dreadnoughts—a certain number—and in the policy propounded on this side of the House we propose to follow that line, and we are going to give two of the highest class of battleships, but attached to that, and in addition to it, we are going to give a balance of two fleet units.

Again, our policy is double what was asked in 1909, and it is nearly double in efficiency what this Government proposes, and it would cost to carry out practically the same amount of money as that proposed now in this contribution. It would be out of place for me to comment on the contents of the document placed on the table of the House to-day by the Prime Minister, but I may say that it is not as strong as it might be; it is not as definite, at all events, as the promise of repeal of the naval law given by the Prime Minister. I may say, however, that I have the utmost confidence in the intent of the British Admiralty to carry out any pledge they make. Let us for a moment analyse that memorandum. The Minister of Marine and the Prime Minister told us that it will take so many years to establish ship-building in Canada that we cannot wait. In fact the policy of the late Government was condemned by the Minister of Marine because it would take too long to build even these small ships in Canada—he is going to get them quicker by postponing indefinitely. Look at the fallacy of the position taken by the Minister of Marine. Mark you, the ships that were to be built in Canada were to be built by one of the great ship-building firms of England. The Minister of Marine tells us they could not be constructed with sufficient rapidity under the late Government and on that account I suppose he cancelled the contract. But, what does he hold out as a solace in his eloquent speech to the people of the Maritime provinces? It is, that these great British ship-builders, several of whom offered to build the ships in Canada one year ago, could not then establish yards in Canada and build these ships here; but when the British Government tells them to, they can do it very well and then we will reap the benefit. But, the same men were going to build the ships in Canada under Laurier as are going to build the ships in Canada under the Admiralty.

An hon. MEMBER: Under the British Admiralty.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under the British Admiralty via this Government. Let me point out another fallacy equally untenable from the Canadian standpoint—this Government promises to pay the difference in cost of building the ships in Canada as compared with the cost in Great Britain, and which, according to the Minister of Marine, is a large amount. And then what? Canada, after paying all this cost, will not own one ship of the fleet, but they will belong to the British Admiralty. Sir, if the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had been carried out, the British ship-builders would be in Canada now building these ships to be paid for by Canada, and when paid for to be the property of the Canadian people who paid for them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have always opposed the view that we should take a plebiscite on this question, and the hon. member for North Toronto has also opposed it consistently.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not think he voted.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will come to that. He opposed it consistently, and he was right; he had the courage of his convictions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He did not vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure you are right in that.

Mr. FOSTER: Be sure of your facts.

Mr. GRAHAM: I thought I was sure of my facts, but I was not sure of my man. As I have said, I am opposed to a plebiscite. I do not believe in it. I believe that Parliament had the right to proceed as it did with the introduction of a policy such as was introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But, there is some excuse for these gentlemen in the province of Quebec in demanding a plebiscite. Let us see by whom a plebiscite was promised to them. On February 3, 1910, nearly a year after the unanimous resolution, a motion was moved in this House and there was an amendment to it and an amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. Monk, who I regret is indisposed, and this is the amendment Mr. Monk moved:

This House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of the opinion that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the Empire, and ought, in consequence, be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the opinion of the nation by means of a plebiscite.

Now, let me read out the names of those who voted for that amendment. Surely, if the building of a Canadian navy was a departure from the constitutional relations, as outlined in the amendment, existing between the motherland and the overseas dominions, this proposition for a contribution now before us is ten-fold a greater departure. The hon. gentlemen who voted that a plebiscite must be taken were—the Government may be represented in this list, I have not scanned it carefully, but I will read it: Blondin, Broder, Chisholm (Huron), Currie (Simcoe), Doherty, Forget, Hern, Jameson, Lewis, Lortie, Monk, Nantel, Paquet, Sharpe (Ontario), Verville, White (Renfrew), Wilcox, Worthington. Now, I am going to read this amendment again, because if these hon. gentlemen are consistent, they cannot vote for this contribution unless they ask the people first, not through a general election, but through a plebiscite.

Mr. CURRIE (North Simcoe): You forget there has been a general election since then.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I am in a position not to forget that, and there was also a by-election which my hon. friend will not forget. It does not alter the situation one iota, because my hon. friend never told the electors of North Simcoe about this vote. Let me read this amendment again, because my hon. friend smarts under it, and anything he smarts under is sure to be pretty nearly right.

This House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the Empire and ought in consequence to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.

'Changes the relations of Canada with the Empire,' to pass an Act to spend money in our own country! It changes them ten-fold to go back seventy years in the history of Canada, and give a contribution. I might say that personally this is what I should like, although it would not really meet the view expressed in favour of a plebiscite: I should like hon. gentlemen, who form the Government to bring in their Redistribution Bill, let us put it through, and then let us go to the country. That will let you out of a serious difficulty; but let us have the Redistribution Bill first, and, if it is fair at all, we will assist you in putting it through. Then let us go to the country, and let the people decide as to what its naval policy is to be.

I want to point out that the men who entertained the view expressed in the above amendment had a good precedent in that some of their leaders entertained the same view. You must not be too harsh now on the fruit of the vine which you yourselves planted. There was a Monk amendment also. I think my hon. friend from North Toronto was absent when the yeas and nays were counted; and the word 'speedy' put into that resolution at the request of my hon. friend, now the Prime Minister, signified no such rapidity as the gait struck by my hon. friend in leaving the House. This is the Monk amendment:

The House regrets that the speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy and the general question of the contribution by Canada to Imperial armaments.

Just what this is let me see. I suppose that a few of the despised Nationalists voted for this amendment, and hon. frontbenchers did not? My hon friend from North Toronto did not, and I think very few of the Toronto contingent did, but I have scanned 'Hansard' to find out really the main spokes that revolved around this hub of a resolution. The amendment was negatived. I almost hesitate to read this. I am afraid that the new members will hardly think this is from 'Hansard,' but at page 133, November 22, 1910, of 'Hansard' 1910-11, you will find this record.

Now, who voted for that amendment? Borden——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Which Borden?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not Sir Frederick, Monk, Blondin, Burrell, Crothers, Doherty, Nantel, Perley, Reid and Roche, all members of this Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Shocking.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my hon. friend the Prime Minister just selected the men who gave this vote, and was bound to have nobody in the Government except those who voted yea on that amendment. I might add that the present Speaker voted for it also. Now let me ask if you cannot have a permanent policy, as you say you cannot, without going to the people, how are you going to annul your vote on going to the country on a question of contribution to Imperial armaments? That is what you are doing—giving a contribution without going to the country, although in November, 1910, practically every member of this Government who was a member of this House then said that on principle he would not contribute to armaments for the British Empire without first consulting the people of Canada.

Mr. COCHRANE: And we have consulted them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I deny that absolutely. Not a single constituency in Canada was consulted on this policy. I thought perhaps I would be questioned when I said that, but my hon. friend the Minister of Marine said himself to-night that he would not call it a policy, and I accept his good judgment in that regard. It is an expediency; it is a subterfuge to get away from a difficulty, not international but interpolitical in one part. It is not international, it is inter-Nationalist.

There has been some question as to what these battleships should be called. Several historic names have been proposed. Will the House pardon me if I propose names that, I think, will be suggestive of this policy? Would the hon. ministers think about it for a moment? I would suggest, in view of the facts, that they abandoned a policy adopted by themselves and unanimously approved by this House in 1909, and dragged this great Imperial question into politics—that they were responsible for certain statements, far from edifying, made in one province concerning this navy—that they were responsible for changing the whole attitude of the Government—that these ships should be called respectively the Monk, the Nantel and the Pelletier. It is no wonder that these ships are to be unmanned. So far as the greatest of these three names is concerned, the Government is unmanned already. For the man who bears that name adhered to the policy laid down by himself, and when it came to a point where he was called upon to sacrifice his principle, he declined. He stands in the same position and no other, that every man stands in who voted for the amendment concerning consulting the people before contributing anything to British armaments. He may be made the scapegoat, but he is not worthy of the distinction. Other gentlemen ought to bear the burden; they bear the salary. Do not condemn too strongly the man who adhered to his views; if condemnation is to be meted out, mete it out to those who forsook their views.

Sir, this question is one of great moment to this country. I believe in the policy outlined by the leader of the Opposition, which is a development of the policy of 1909 endorsed unanimously by this Parliament, as one that stands most firmly not only for Canadian dignity, but for Imperial unity as well. Let me summarize: I am opposed to the resolution on many grounds, including the following:

1. It constitutes us a nation of substituters, willing to allow others to take our places in the firing line in the defence of the Empire.

2. It ignores the true test of devotion—the sacrifice of ourselves, if necessary, as well as our money, in the defence of the common cause.

3. It reverses the policy of the past seventy years and is a retrograde step in the constitutional relations existing between the motherland and Canada.

4. At the best, it is but an expedient, humiliating to both the Empire and Canada, and makes no provision for a policy of permanent benefit to both.

5. It is in no wise a solution of the problem of naval defence, but merely a temporary make-shift without lasting result to the motherland or the Dominion of Canada.

I am in favour of the policy outlined in the amendment:

1. Because it is a real and permanent policy commensurate at once with the needs of the Empire and the dignity of the Canadian people.

2. It will establish and develop a large ship-building industry in Canada, giving employment to many of our people.

3. It will tend to strengthen the tie that binds us to the motherland, and will intensify, if that were possible, the strong feeling of loyalty and patriotism which now exists in Canada, and will afford full opportunity to the rising generation to show their devotion to King and country by being prepared, should duty call, to fight on sea as well as on land.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to say whether the speech which we have just listened to is a patriotic, statesmanlike speech or not; it will be for the country to say whether it is such a speech as we ought to expect under the important circumstances in which we find ourselves. I do not begrudge the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) his wit or his sarcasm—that is all right. But I would ask him, in view of the important duty which we in Canada have to perform, whether this is the kind of speech with which an important proposition like this ought to be received.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard clearly laid down to-day the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. It appears that it has been somewhat difficult to bring it about, that it was necessary to have three or four—or was it five?—caucuses in order to bring this infant policy into the world. And now we are told, practically, that we ought to hide our heads in shame, that we ought to be held as having insulted the people of Canada, because we are offering $35,000,000 to the motherland. And these words have been uttered by the first lieutenant of the great party on the other side of the House. But, at all events, we have our policy outlined. They ask us: Is that all you are going to do? Is that all your policy? And their hearts bleed because Canadians will not shed their blood and because Canada will not pay more money for the great British Empire. When the hon. member for South Renfrew tells us this Government does not consider that men in Canada will be worthy of those great sacrifices, he may believe that statement true, but he misrepresents the ideals of this Government and of the Canadian people. Men have been found in Canada to do their duty at all times, but governments have been known which have one day said they would not allow Canadians to do their duty, and the following day obliged to reverse their statements because of their fear of being swept out of power. I have no doubt that statements of hon. gentlemen opposite that they do not want any money to be voted, but that they want blood shed, and more money voted for the manning of the ships, is the continuation of the policy adopted by them two years ago. All Canadians will to-morrow be unanimous in stating that this resolution which we now have before us from the opposition, is a splendid piece of architecture. And why? Because 'le grand Canadien Francais'—the great French Canadian—will be able to hold his own anywhere in Quebec on the money question. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin) appears to be quite pleased, and evidently thinks I have stated the matter correctly. Hon. gentlemen opposite, the great nation builders, are playing politics with this question. The leader of the Opposition began his speech this afternoon by saying that he had received a certain memorandum appealing to him to take this question out of politics, and he told us that these lofty ideas were all right. But then he said: 'I am not going to do it because my adversaries in the last contest did not do it'—meaning to say, I presume: 'if they didn't do their duty I am not going to do mine.' But whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may say in regard to the matter, the policy embodied in the government resolution now before the House is the policy desired by the Mother Country. The hon. member for South Renfrew said a few moments ago, 'That is not going to please England very much,' and the right hon. leader of the Opposition said, 'England doesn't want that.' The Government has reason to know that this is a policy acceptable to England, and we are doing it to please the Mother Country. To hon. gentlemen who want people to go and fight for their country, I say there is at this moment no occasion for these big words and sentiments in regard to fighting.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, and I repeat it. But the war that is going on is one which, on account of the excessive armaments going on in other countries, is tending to take away from the motherland that supremacy on the sea which she has so long enjoyed. That supremacy on the sea is the life of the Empire, as it is the life of Canada, and the necessity existing is for the overseas dominions, like good daughters of the Empire, to see that the number of ships composing her navy is equal to all occasions, and that they will be so numerous that the supremacy of England on the sea cannot be impaired.

When the right hon. leader of this Government said in England he thought there should be one navy for the British Empire, he had the best of reasons for making the statement, and I may recall to the memory of the hon. member for South Renfrew the fact that separate navies in distant seas may not be on the spot just at the right time to take any share in the great bloodshed which the hon. member seems so desirous of having. Let him remember what took place in the war between Russia and Japan, during which Japan destroyed in twenty minutes one of the Russian fleets. What is wanted by the Mother Country is ships in the home waters, for reasons which have been well explained by the right hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Whatever pleasure hon. gentlemen opposite have had to-night in the witty remarks made by the hon. member for South Renfrew, I venture to say that when the resolution presented to this House went before the country it created a certain effect and impression, not only upon the people of this country, but in the motherland, and to-morrow morning in the press in England our friends over there will read that this resolution, which has sent a thrill of joy through the heart of every true Briton, of both political parties, has been played with by one of the political parties of this country. Will not my hon. friends only realize for once that they are in opposition and that they are going to stay there? This is a political game. This amendment is before the House because our friends opposite expect and hope that they will, in some way or other, get back their places in the Government which they have lost. Without being a prophet, let me tell them that this country will take little stock and place little credit or confidence in the position taken by my hon. friends opposite. But, Sir, we should not be surprised. Every big thing that has been done for this country, every big measure introduced by the Conservative party has been opposed by our friends on the other side. Excepting some of their best men, they were opposed to confederation; they were opposed to the building of the Canadian Pacific railway; they were opposed to the acquisition of the Northwest territories. They have not been big men; they have been small men. My hon. friend may put what names he likes on the ships. For my part I would rather have no ships than have ships which cannot fight, and I would rather leave Canadians on shore than put them on tubs which go on the Yarmouth rocks. If that is the big navy of which my hon. friend from South Renfrew is so proud, let him have it, but this Government is not going to have any such thing as that.

Mr. MACDONALD: They are not going to have any at all.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am very sorry that our friends are so sore about this. They are sore, they are bitter; they have not yet got over their disappointment of a year ago. What can we do, Mr. Speaker, what means are in our power to make them forget that, so that they will not be carried away, from what they ought to do in really important circumstances like these. I venture to say that in years to come they will regret it themselves.

I do not intend to keep the House very long to-night, but I think that before having the debate adjourned, it is of the greatest importance that the country should not remain under the somewhat erroneous impression which may have been created this afternoon and this evening as to the position taken in the House of Commons in 1909. We have been told that this resolution which provides for one contribution is a violation of the motion adopted unanimously in 1909. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition has stated that in so many words. Now let me put the facts before the House. There was a motion moved by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition who was then Prime Minister, was not satisfied with the text of that resolution, and, without finding much fault with it, as he said, he prepared another one which he put before the House, and which, if it had been adopted as drafted by him, might have justified what he said this afternoon. But it was not adopted in that form; I shall come to that in a minute. The resolution in the original draft proposed by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition as I find it in 'Hansard' reads partly as follows:

The House re-affirms the opinion, repeatedly expressed by the representatives of Canada, that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions the payment of any stated contribution—

Mark these words:

—the payment of any stated contribution to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be a satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let the hon. member who says, 'hear, hear,' wait a minute. The House would not vote for that. A substitute for that paragraph was adopted, and this is the way it reads:

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes,——

And so on. My hon. friend would have the country believe that it was the payment of any contribution to which exception was taken. Not one man voted for that original motion because the right hon. the leader of the Opposition adopted the draft which I have just read, and which says the House would not adopt a policy of giving regular and periodical contributions. A comparison of the two texts shows that it was the intention of the House that if at any given moment the Government was of opinion that one contribution was necessary it might be given. Any man who can read will understand that; any school boy will understand it. Therefore we are acting now in conformity with that resolution. There is another paragraph here. This is how it reads; it is the last paragraph:

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises, the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

Now, that is what was adopted by the House of Commons, and we are within the four corners of that resolution with the measure which is now before the House. Having said this, and at this late hour, I think I shall now move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 11.04 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, December 13, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Railways and Canals for the year ended March 31, 1912. —Mr. Cochrane.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 35) to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act.—Mr. Hazen.

SOUTH AFRICAN SCRIP.

Mr. OLIVER : Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I ask the Minister of the Interior if it is the intention of the Government to provide for any further extension of the South African scrip.

Mr. ROCHE : Last year's Act provided for an extension of time to the original holders only; such extension to last until the 31st of December of this year. It also provided for the granting of $500 to any person who desires to surrender the certificate to the Government. There has been no appropriation made for the payment of that $500 and there will have to be an appropriation this session for that purpose. Many requests have been made to extend the provisions of last session's Act for another year. I have not finally decided as to that. I have held out no hope as yet that that should be done.

Mr. OLIVER : It is very desirable that a decision should be come to as soon as possible, because it may be that some men are holding scrip who find it inconvenient to locate, and if they knew there was going to be no extension of time, they would certainly get it located. I urge that a decision be reached at the earliest possible moment.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General) (resuming): Mr. Speaker, a great effort has been made both by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and his friend and neighbour the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) to make this policy of theirs, as set forth in the amendment, look important and Empire-like. Boiled down, what does it amount to? What is there in it if we look at it unaccompanied by that flourish of trumpets with which it has been presented to this House? Well, Sir, it amounts to nothing practical and useful at the present moment. Nay, if it did accomplish something for the moment it would be to a certain extent to hamper the British navy. There is a great desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite—in words of course—to be in the firing line, to be right at the front, but they have arranged it in such a way that the ships will be far from where the fighting will take place. The trial of strength, when it comes, will not be in Canadian waters. Nobody believes or suggests that it will. If the moment for fighting should come, and we all hope it will be postponed as long as possible, the battle will be fought in the North Sea or near the home waters of England or Germany, and then, at that vital moment, we will have these two big units of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, where they will doubtless remain until everything is over. Sir, these gentlemen of the Opposition are the great warriors we have before us to-day. They tell us they want to man the ships. They have manned the Niobe and the Rainbow and the least that can be said about that experiment is that these ships were certainly undermanned. But, notwithstanding their failure in that direction, they want to man some more ships. Do they know that practically they could not get men in this country even for the Niobe and the Rainbow? Do they know that we must go to England to get men to man those ships? Do our friends know what wages are paid on board those ships, and what wages are paid on board British warships? It is an interesting matter to know this, when these great men are launching this great policy. Let me tell them. In Canada ordinary seamen are paid 50 cents a day; in Great Britain they are paid 28 cents a day. In Canada able seamen are paid 70 cents a day; in England 40 cents a day. Petty officers here are paid $1 a day; in England 66 cents. Stokers here are paid from 90 cents to $1 a day; in England they are paid from 40 to 50 cents. Let me give the House and the country the percentage of the proposed Canadian rates in excess of the British rates, and the House will soon see the importance of it.

As regards the officers, for captains our rates are 20 per cent more; for the commander, 20 per cent more; for the lieutenant, 50 per cent more; for the sub-lieutenant, 120 per cent more; for the engineer captain, 50 per cent more; for the engineer commander, 18 per cent more; for the engineer lieutenant, 25 per cent more; for the engineer sub-lieutenant, 80 per cent more; for the assistant paymaster, 75 per cent more; for the warrant officer, 75 per cent more. This long list of officers may interest our friends who are walking in the dark in regard to this great navy.

We will now take the men: seamen, 90 per cent more; stoker petty officer, 60 per cent more; chief stoker, 70 per cent more; stoker, 75 per cent more; chief machinist, 40 per cent more; machinists, 33 per cent more; artisan, 50 per cent more; sick berth staff, 100 per cent more; writers, 60 per cent more; cooks, 80 per cent more; ships' police, 50 per cent more; officers' cooks and stewards, 120 per cent more.

Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite have, at the present moment, when we cannot do it, this idea of theirs adopted, do they think of paying the men less than the rates which I have given here, which are already so high over and above the rates paid in England? I do not suppose they do. Will those rates not take away men from the British navy, and induce them to come here? That is as plain as A B C. Will we not then oblige Great Britain to increase enormously the pay of their men, and increase their budget accordingly? Is that a method of helping the Mother Country? I put the question fairly, and I think I am entitled to a fair answer. I may safely say that I do not think that we are exposed to war here at the present moment, and I hope that we are free from apprehension in that respect for years to come.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No Canadian Navy?

Mr. PELLETIER: We are about to celebrate with our neighbours to the south the centenary of peace, and there is not a man in this House who does not hope and believe that this celebration will be the beginning of a new era of peace between our neighbours to the south and ourselves. We have, and Great Britain has given it to us, a most fortunate and happy treaty of peace with Japan, which will not expire for eight or nine years. In that treaty, which has been renewed lately, there is one clause which is new. That clause stipulates that if a general arbitration treaty be passed between Britain and the United States, the treaty with Japan will not be broken on that account. Nothing in that treaty prevents Canada from having her full liberty as regards immigration, so that they can try to keep this country for the white man. Why, then, do what is not urgent, and ignore what is urgent? According to the figures given a moment ago there is nothing possible and nothing practicable in these two big units about which my right hon. friend opposite speaks. It is impossible to man these ships with Canadians, unless we double or treble the pay which we give now, or have conscription.

Mr. TURRIFF: You have done that with the mounted police.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is the immediate consequence of the so-called policy of my right hon. friend. It is not on account of cowardice on the part of Canadians, and I do not think my hon. friends on the other side have the right to call it so; but what do we see in this country? From all the countries of old Europe, men are coming here to take a part in the building of our great public works, and there are not enough men in Canada for that purpose. Men come from Italy, from Bulgaria, from everywhere. Men from Bulgaria, since I mention them, after having come all the way to Canada to earn their living, when they heard from across the seas and from the tops of the mountains that there was war at home, left everything here to one side and hurried back to help their country in its difficulty and in its glorious victory which has just been achieved.

An hon. MEMBER: They went themselves; they did not send their money.

Mr. PELLETIER: But they took back the money which they had earned in this country to help; and I will show the House, before I resume my seat, that that is what Canada has done in a glorious manner in the past. Everybody knows—complaints are made daily—that the sons of our farmers are rushing to the cities. There is work, and plenty of it, for every one, and at wages that are really surprising. Longshoremen on the wharfs of Montreal, as I was told this morning by one of the men who knows, earn as much as $40 and $42 a week; and a man does not need anything but a little experience to become a longshoreman. Now, do we expect—can we expect—that this great policy which is not matured, which has not been studied, which has not been looked into, is possible under the circumstances, except with the result which I have indicated? Is the right hon. leader of the Opposition in favour of increasing pay, or is he in favour of conscription? Let him come out from behind Torres Vedras, for once, and tell us all. Is the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux)—well, he is not here. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland)—would he vote in favour of conscription?

Mr. BELAND: No. Are you in favour of it?

Mr. PELLETIER: Where, then, are you going to find your men?

Mr. BELAND: We are going to find them in Canada.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let me tell my hon. friend from Beauce, who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries for a few days, that, without either increase of pay or conscription, he would not get enough men in Canada for a starboard watch. Now, our hon. friends have told us they are not in favour of conscription. But their theory does not hold together, their policy does not stand on its own feet. I have here something that may help them. I have been handed a little Bill, which never saw the light of day very much but on which I find the following words:

Fourth Session, Ninth Parliament, Edward VII., 1904.

An Act constituting the Naval Militia.

It has the name on it of Mr. Préfontaine, who at that time was Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I find embodied in this Bill conscription, enrollment—and six months in jail for every man who will not be enrolled or go under conscription. I am sure my right hon. friend will recognize this child.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, I do not.

Mr. PELLETIER: The right hon. gentleman is going very far when he treats his own baby in that way. The Bill was not presented to the House—if it had been, the parent would not renounce his own child—and even, I understand, the plates were ordered to be broken after this was printed in the Printing Bureau of Canada. But the germ, the idea, is there. I did not have this printed. As hon. members will see it is getting yellow with age. It has been preserved, safely preserved, and here it is. I thought it might help our friends on the other side to launch the great project which they have given us of the so-called great navy of which they spoke yesterday afternoon.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did you get that from the Minister of Militia?

Mr. PELLETIER: Let my hon. friend possess his soul in patience. We heard yesterday something about members of this House smarting under an attack; it is their turn; let them take their medicine. They began slowly—this Bill is only a beginning.

Now, I thought it would be interesting for this House to get a statement concerning the Niobe and the Rainbow, showing what it has cost this country for these two magnificent relics of the statesmanship of our hon. friends on the other side:

Cost—Niobe.

Purchase price..	$1,046,333 33
Works and stores in connection with alterations..	75,107 74
Heating apparatus..	8,181 83
Wireless apparatus..	5,207 33
Total cost to Aug. 31, 1911.. ..	$1,134,830 23

Of the Rainbow, I shall give only the total, as she is only a small thing. The total cost was $263,049.98. Now, let us look at the annual cost:

Annual Cost—Niobe.

Upkeep and maintenance.	$373,183 63
Special expenditure for stranding..	145,705 20
		$518,888 83

Rainbow.

Upkeep and maintenance.	$163,472 01
Special expenditure for armament..	102,118 18
		265,590 19
Total Niobe and Rainbow..		$784,479 02

Thus you have a total expenditure of over three-quarters of a million dollars a year. The Globe newspaper, which is, I take it, the principal organ of my hon. friends opposite, in a quite recent issue has spoken in this way:

The Borden proposal is a very cheap substitute for the programme of the Laurier Government, which contemplated the formation of a naval force to be built and maintained by Canada. The debate on the Navy Bill in the House of Commons in 1910 made it clear that the annual cost of maintaining six cruisers, six destroyers, a naval college for training officers, barracks and recruiting facilities for men and bases at Halifax and Esquimalt would be $3,680,000 a year. Including interest and depreciation on the first cost of the vessels, which was estimated at $11,730,000, the total annual cost to Canada was to be $4,253,000. This expense the Laurier Government was prepared to face that it might begin the work of building up a Canadian naval defence force. This is two and a half times as much as the interest on the Borden gift.

These figures are very interesting when we couple with them the fact that the cost of maintenance, if the rates of pay for the men be increased, will be, not $4,200,000, but at least eight or nine million dollars a year. It should also be remembered that the naval policy of the last two years would result in a navy powerless, defenceless, and useless for the purposes to which it should have been devoted. Such a policy is useless to Canada and useless to the Empire. What we propose is a plan not only more effective, but costing the people of Canada a much smaller amount.

What does the policy expounded by my hon. friends opposite amount to? Bombastic remarks, empty words, peanut politics. We have no shipyards; we have no trained officers; we do not possess the necessary equipment, yet our friends opposite want to have these big ships here at once. They would have the baby talk and walk before it is born! We have had tons of words and carloads of statements, but what Canada wants to-day is action. The country is getting sick of words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: Hon. gentlemen opposite pound their desks, but they do not remember, perhaps, that their leader and other hon. gentlemen talked and talked yesterday, but for nothing. Some remarks were made last night about the front benches on this side of the House. Apparently they are not filled to the satisfaction of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). The right hon. leader of the Opposition has had on this question the opportunity of his life to prove himself a big man, above party. He is on the front bench, but he has not proven himself equal to the occasion. The hon. member for South Renfrew,—who was referred to at Arnprior by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) as being the probable successor of the right hon. leader of the Opposition—will not be offended, I trust, if I tell him that he has treated this important matter with levity, and even with flippancy.

But we have another front-bencher, the great leader from the West; the hon. gentleman who is this year supposed to represent the backbone of such hope as is left for the future of his party. He is on the front bench, but he sits tight on certain occasions. I do not envy him, nor would I like to have been in his place on a certain occasion which I have in mind.

We have been told in a somewhat sarcastic, and I may perhaps say, impertinent manner, that certain names were to be given to these three ships. In making a choice of names, we may perhaps call the ships Western Canada, Central Canada and Eastern Canada. We may perhaps call them Lafontaine, Baldwin, Macdonald or Cartier. Or we might recall to the memories of hon. gentlemen opposite that some Liberals have in the past proved themselves to be above party on great questions, and we might call one of them George Brown. Certainly we shall not designate any of them by the name Minnie M, nor shall we call them Laurier and Torres Vedras, or Oliver and Reciprocity.

I yesterday alluded to a certain fact which was well stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), and, after having slept over it, I am now even more satisfied of its truth. This policy, Sir, is no policy; My hon. friends opposite know it. They know that this matter must be carefully looked into, considered, and arranged before it is launched before the country. But they have an object in view. As I said last night, they have had caucus after caucus, and, moreover, we are told—of course the little bird that gives us this information may not be very accurate; but we are told that apart from members of this House, there are other poor orphans who have no seats in the House, but who would like to have a little chance to try again; men discredited on account of their reciprocity record, men who are trying to play politics here in order to, if possible, bring on a general election in the hope of getting back into this House. These are facts which we see, and which the country sees, and that is the part played now—not to extend unanimous help to our Empire and to our country, but to play a little game in order to gain some little political advantage. This is what the policy of our hon. friends, boiled down, amounts to, and the country will see it; the country knows it now.

We heard a great deal from the hon. member for South Renfrew about Downing Street and about the family compact. Why, Sir, I think my hon. friend is becoming a Nationalist.

Mr. GRAHAM: Somebody had to take your place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: I knew that the hon. gentlemen were after our places.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not in that respect.

Mr. PELLETIER: All this talk of Downing Street and of family compacts is a thing of the past of which nobody speaks now. It tends to create prejudices in one part of this country against the British Empire and against Great Britain. There is no escaping from this; these words have been pronounced for a purpose, and what the hon. member for South Renfrew had in mind when he pronounced those words is as plain as daylight. I may tell him that this country has lived long enough now and has learned enough not to be carried away by these old war cries which have died out and which ought to be left where they were buried.

We are told that we are asking this country to become tributary to Great Britain and to pay tribute. The two hon. members on the other side who have spoken on this question have not used the word 'tribute,' but their papers are full of it. They have had too much self-respect to use it themselves, but it is the war cry which is raised throughout Canada as one means of creating a hostile public opinion against the measure of the Government. Everybody should know that a tribute is a duty levied by a conqueror upon the conquered. It is duty imposed by a superior power on an inferior power, and this duty the inferior power is bound to pay. Is this our case when, of our own free will, we decide to ask the people of Canada to make a contribution, voluntarily in all respects, to help the motherland? Surely the people who use these arguments have come to the conclusion that the people of this country have lost their ordinary common sense. Is it tribute when there is no pressure whatever? Is it a tribute when we see in this document words like these:

> The Admiralty set the greatest store; by the important material, and still more important moral assistance, which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas, but they think it necessary to disclaim any intention, however indirect, of putting pressure upon Canadian public opinion, or of seeking to influence the Dominion Parliament in a decision which clearly belongs solely to Canada.
>
> The Admiralty therefore confine themselves in this statement exclusively to facts, and it is for the Dominion Government and Parliament to draw their own conclusions therefrom.

Is that paying tribute? Let us look at one of the other most important parts of this memorandum. It has been read several times, but it should be read over and over again so as to be in the memory of every member and of every Canadian worthy of the name:

> Whatever may be the decision of Canada at the present juncture, Great Britain will not in any circumstances fail in her duty to the overseas dominions of the Crown.
>
> She has before now successfully made head alone and unaided against the most formidable combinations and she has not lost her capacity by a wise policy and strenuous exertions to watch over and preserve the vital interests of the Empire.
>
> The Admiralty are assured that His Majesty's Government will not hesitate to ask the House of Commons for whatever provision the circumstances of each year may require.

Is that telling Canada: You are going to pay us this, that, or the other amount? On the contrary, they say: We put the facts before you and leave you to decide, and we sit here as a parliament, not taxing anybody without representation. We ask this Parliament and this country to do a thing which, as I said last night, we know will be acceptable and pleasing to the people of Great Britain.

I may say, en passant, that we have not been in England as partymen. We did not meet there a government whose opinions and whose name in politics would be anything like the name of the Liberal-Conservative party on this side of the water. We have dealt with the Government of the Mother Country, and for us there was no Asquith or Bonar Law, no Churchill or Balfour; but there was the Government of the Mother Country. That is the view we took of the situation, and we have dealt there with a government led by the successor of Gladstone, that great statesman whose policy my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has so often proclaimed throughout this country. If he doubts our word, let him make inquiry whether the policy now before the country is acceptable to the Government and the Opposition of Great Britain; because in the motherland when these questions come up, in a moment—— these questions come up, in the form in which they have sometimes come up, in a moment of pressing need, both parties go into the same lobby and vote in the same way. We are not paying tribute, we are doing better than that: we are to-day becoming a partner with Great Britain. By our action we are mounting to a higher plane than Canada has ever before achieved. When I heard the hon. member for South Renfrew say that we were insulting the motherland, I thought that surely he did not mean that, and, some day—

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that.

Mr. PELLETIER: —when he finds that the effort he made before the House proves abortive—

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then, what did my hon. friend say?

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend wants me to, I will tell him.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not want to put words into the mouth of my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, I will tell you what I said. In speaking on the point of consulting the country about this resolution, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) said that it had been consulted. I said rather that under this policy the Canadian people had been insulted, not the British Empire at all—meaning, of course, that the fighting spirit of young Canada had been insulted.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then, it is the Canadian people who are insulting themselves in doing what is at the present time so much needed by the motherland. I can only repeat what I had begun to say, that when the hon. member for South Renfrew has found that the effort which he made last night is fruitless and abortive, he would change his mind in that respect.

Mr. GRAHAM: Give us a chance.

Mr. PELLETIER: Hon. gentleman want to have a chance! Where would the hon. gentleman run if he had a chance?

Mr. BUREAU: He would run in Quebec county and beat you.

Mr. PELLETIER: Surely that should not be said in this House by a man representing the minority in his county, and elected by a judge.

Mr. BUREAU: Anybody can sit for the majority.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is true, but it depends on the amount of self respect. I probably have to beg my hon. friend's pardon for being so prompt in replying to him, but these interruptions will provoke answers. Sometimes you may go a little beyond what you intend, but it is the fault of the man who interrupts.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman's remarks are very welcome and very interesting.

Mr. PELLETIER: I said a moment ago, before I was interrupted, that we are becoming partners of Great Britain; at all events, we are getting closer to Great Britain, and this will be one of the big steps in that direction. We are ceasing to be a colony, and we are becoming something more important. That is the view which the right hon. leader of the Opposition has himself expressed on many occasions and principally on the other side of the Atlantic. Let me read what he said in Glasgow:

> We are free to-day but we are colonists. Will I break your hearts if I tell you that we aspire to be something more than colonists; we aspire to play a greater part in the Empire of Great Britain. . . . Our ambition is to remove what disparity there may be between an Imperial subject and a Colonial subject. It is the intention of the colonists to go onwards until we have a fully United Empire—the British Empire.

Here is what he said at Edinburgh:

> The relations of the colonies to the motherland to-day are satisfactory; but they are not permanent, they are temporary. The time will come when the present relations will not be satisfactory and when that time comes the relations must become one of two things—either they must break altogether or they must become closer.

Is not that the policy which is contained in the resolution before us? Is it not calculated to bring the Mother Country and Canada closer together? This may be a tribute in some way, but not in the odious way which is suggested in the Grit papers of this country. It is a tribute in two ways: It is a tribute from the heart in one respect, and it is at the same time a tribute to our self-respect. In that way you can call it a tribute. Everybody knows, and everybody is proud of the fact that we are becoming a nation. Where would we be to-day if, during the childhood, the infancy, of this country, we had not been protected by the British flag and the British navy? Why, Sir, at the moment when we are becoming a nation, when we are entering upon the stage of nationhood, we realize that we would be to-day a part and parcel of some other country if we had not been protected by the British flag and the British navy when we were young and defenceless.

We have been told in some quarters that we have lost territory and rights on account of treaties which have been made. Whatever may be my personal opinion in that respect, I shall not discuss it now; but I think that upon important occasions, to say the least, if we have lost rights, it has been because of the attitude taken, not by gentlemen from Great Britain, but by a man appointed by the preceding Government to act as an arbitrator with regard to an important matter. These facts are well known, and therefore it is of no use to reproach England with that. At all events, would that be enough, even if it were true, to justify what has been said in that respect? I do not think it would. I said a moment ago that but for the protection to which I have alluded we would be to-day part and parcel of another country. Have we not reason to be satisfied with what we are to-day, and with what we are going to be to-morrow? After years of toil and hardship, while Canada is within sight of the promised land, we find ourselves possessors of half a continent; we have a united, happy, contented people; the future is before us; we have a great mission ahead of us; and the time has come when the Prime Minister of this country has said in England that Canada would be the adjunct of no one, not even of the motherland. When the country has reached that stage, we ought to be proud of ourselves, and if we have reached that stage it is because of the protection we have received. A greater destiny than that of throwing in our lot with the people to the south of us has been steadily kept in view. We are moving onward in the march of progress, and we all believe that we will have a great country in ten, fifteen, or twenty years.

My right hon friend the leader of the Opposition has spoken of an emergency; and before that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) had even looked up his dictionary to find what 'emergency' meant. Evidently this word is quite as unfamiliar to the ears of hon. gentlemen opposite as it is to some of the press of this country. But, let us not stop at words, let us look at big things in a big way. There is nothing in a name but there is in a big deed when you come to look at it in a proper light. We claim that there is an actual and pressing need. We claim that a situation confronts us which has got to be met now, because if we do not meet it now then when the time of danger has arrived it will be too late to take the necessary precautions. We are given three arguments by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House against our policy. We are told that British statesmen, the members of the British Government, have proclaimed from their seats in the House of Commons that there is no danger; that old England is all right, and that she can hold her own. We are told in the second place that there is no German war scare, and in the third place it is said: the Empire is not in danger, let us sleep soundly. Declarations made by the Ministers of the Crown in England have to be read with some common sense. Our hon. friends opposite find in the words of British ministers a certain meaning, their newspapers find a certain meaning also, while others will quote the same words or others and will derive from them an absolutely different conclusion. That all goes to show that the statesmen in England have exposed the two sides of the question and further, the British ministers have to speak with restraint. It may be the part of a great soldier at a given moment to express his anxiety in words that ring throughout the world, and even if he should speak the truth, diplomacy and policy may require that these words should be to a certain extent contradicted or explained I feel that what I now say will be thoroughly understood by hon. gentlemen in this House. We are told that there is no quarrel between England and any other country, and I am glad of it, and I do not pretend there is. But I do know, and nobody can deny it, that at any moment one spark may set the whole of Europe ablaze; a fact of which we had an example during the last few months, and it may be that the danger is not over. The danger of actual warfare may come at any moment, and who will dare say that the Empire must not be prepared for it. And even supposing for the moment there is not that danger of actual war to-day, is it not the duty of every nation to look to what may happen to-morrow. What will that to-morrow bring? Facts, important in themselves, have been put before this House by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Marine, and it is not necessary for me to deal further with them than to say that nobody will deny that the supremacy of Great Britain at sea is not to-day what it used to be. Is not that a situation which should be met, and met in a patriotic way? What has become of the splendid isolation in which Great Britain was years ago and which she then could well afford? We have now the triple alliance. Great Britain made with France an entente cordiale in 1904, and in 1907 that entente was extended to Russia. The two-power standard is gone.

Mr. BELAND: It is not gone.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend knows what I mean by saying that the two-power standard is gone; it is now three to two. If my hon. friend takes the number of battleships and cruisers and so on and figures it out for himself he will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. BELAND: The two-power standard is not gone.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let my hon. friend make the calculation I have suggested, and he will find that I am right.

Mr. BELAND: I say the two-power standard is not gone, and Mr. Churchill says it also.

Mr. PELLETIER: I happen to know what Mr. Churchill said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Then tell us; some more secrets?

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, from his seat in the House—I will not say play to the mob, because I have too much respect for him; but will he not say that there are secrets and confidential things which the Government must not reveal?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would be sorry to believe that any British statesman would say in public what is not true.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not mean that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have read the speeches of Mr. Churchill as well as my hon. friend has, and I took it that he was speaking the truth.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not at all what I meant, and the right hon. gentleman knows it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know it.

Mr. PELLETIER: I made a statement as to a fact to this House, and somebody from the back benches called out: 'Is it confidential?' At that moment I called the attention of the leader of the Opposition to the incident, and asked him if he was going to play to the mob by approving of cries such as that I heard coming from his supporters behind him. My right hon. friend cannot get out of it by saying that Mr. Churchill has told the truth. Certainly Mr. Churchill has told the truth. My right hon. friend has been a member of a government for fifteen years, and will he say that a minister of the Crown has to tell everything to the public? He will not say it and nobody else will.

Mr. BELAND: The number of ships that are being built is not a secret.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is not necessary for any reasonable man to go into secrets. We have enough before us for any reasonable man, who is not playing with politics on this question, to be fully convinced. This document from the British Government, which we have before us, says, 'We have protected you and your trade, and we will do it again.' After that, momentous facts are given, and the conclusion, which we cannot read too often in this House, is as follows:

> But the aid which Canada could give at the present time is not to be measured only in ships or money. Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness to the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the overseas dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.

A schoolboy will understand what that means without asking for any secret documents or communications. Every one will understand that, except those who are blind or want to be blind for political party purposes. In order to have something which is pressing, it is not necessary that there should be actual war. The words found by the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) himself in his dictionary were that 'emergency is a pressing need.' Those words are sufficient. I alluded a moment ago to this defunct child, the draft navy bill of 1904, and I find there a definition which will exactly correspond with the actual situation. Emergency is defined there to mean, 'War, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended.' Now 'danger apprehended' creates an emergency. This word is to be found in the naval law of 1910. Put the word 'apprehended' side by side with a resolution which provides for the construction of ships, and you will have the whole thing worked out and easily understood. It is for a danger apprehended that these ships are going to be built. They will not be ready to-morrow; that is not what is needed for actual war. There is an apprehended danger, and to meet the situation, ships will be built which will take their part in the common defence of the Empire.

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I ask my hon. friend a question? My hon. friend seems to have been studying the situation carefully. Can he tell the House, in view of the present activities in all the shipyards in England, owing to the great number of ships that are being built, both commercial ships and war vessels, how long it would take to have these three dreadnoughts constructed in England?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know exactly in months, but one thing I am sure about is that it will take one half the time to build them in the old country that it will take here.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not answering my question. I would ask my hon. friend the question again. If my hon. friend can tell me, I should like him to do so; if he cannot, it makes no difference.

Mr. PELLETIER: As I told my hon friend, I could not say exactly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How close could my hon. friend come to it?

Mr. PELLETIER: About two years or two years and a half on the other side, but we have been told by the late Government that it would take three or six years to build a navy in this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the agreement which has been referred to by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) says six years, does not my hon. friend know that that means for the whole eleven war vessels, and that there are to be two vessels constructed every eighteen months?

Mr. PELLETIER: Will my hon. friend allow me to answer this question to the point?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Certainly.

Mr. PELLETIER: The suggestion that we would have a Canadian navy carries with it, I suppose, the fact that we are going to have a navy which could do something, and which would be a unit to be depended upon. Now, the policy of my hon. friends on the other side was to have twelve ships of that description, and I take it that these ships were needed for the purposes in view, and it is those twelve ships which it would have taken six years to build. My hon. friend is satisfied now, I suppose?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not see that my hon. friend has answered the question.

Mr. PELLETIER: If that is no answer, I do not see what answer will satisfy my hon. friend.

I will not make the quotations; as I said a moment ago, quotations are made on both sides, and everybody finds in them what he wants to find; but I was most impressed on the 10th of July last, when I heard in the British House of Commons, Mr. Bonar Law, leader of the Opposition, tell his countrymen that the German navy, ever growing in strength and efficiency, at twelve hours' distance from the English shore, was almost like a loaded cannon pointed all the time at England. I was impressed with those words, and I looked into the situation and tried to understand it. Words like those convey a meaning which nobody here will underestimate.

We have been told that we are going to lose our autonomy. How can any reasonable man outside of this Parliament assert that we are going to lose our autonomy, because we choose at an important moment to do what we are doing now? Where is the Parliament that is going to legislate for us? If we lose any particle of autonomy, surely somebody else will legislate for us; we have not been told yet who will, and I should like to hear an answer to that question. This Government by the mouth of its leader has said that whatever is the permanent policy later on, the people of this country will be consulted, and, moreover, the people of this country will have a voice in the councils of the Empire. Is that losing autonomy or is that gaining in importance and becoming greater than we were before? I claim that what we are doing now will not only help the motherland and the British Empire, but is in our own interest as a country. Great Britain tells us that she is prepared to continue to do for the spoiled child all that she has done in the past. That is very well. But human nature is human nature. If, while other parts of the Empire are doing the work of Empire, we the strongest, the largest of the overseas dominions, sit and look on, may we not expect that, at any moment, the motherland will become more lukewarm to our interests than before? I think that is a fair question. We have known in the past the most important British statesmen to make certain statements about the colonies. One of the greatest men of England, Mr. Gladstone, spoke once of what he called 'the wretched colonies' as being 'a millstone about the neck of England.' And Mr. Disraeli, who afterwards became Lord Beaconsfield, suggested at one time that the colonies should be given over to the United States in settlement of outstanding difficulties. This state of things—I thank Providence for it—has ceased to exist; and you find that to-day, in the old country, everybody takes the same interest in Canada, almost, as we Canadians do, and Canada is truly and really considered over there as part and parcel of their great country. Are we prepared to return to the state of things in which these ominous words were pronounced in the days gone by? I say no.

There are three courses open to us to-day. One is for us to become part and parcel of the United States? Now, as my hon. friend himself said yesterday, if that question were put to the people of Canada, there would be for answer, a loud and unanimous, No! from one ocean to the other. Well, if that is not to be our future destiny, are we going to be an independent country? We are to-day, Sir, to all intents and purposes practically an independent country. Why, we have the right even to tax importations from the motherland; we have the right to settle as we choose every question pertaining to Canada. We are an overseas dominion. But what do we lose by it, what do we suffer by it? We gain everything and lose nothing by it. But, if we were an independent country what would be in store for us? Should we not, if we were an independent country, be under the necessity of contracting alliances? All the important countries in Europe, all the important countries throughout the world, are uniting their strength in order to be able to face any future situation. What would that involve? Would not that involve something more, something much heavier and much more difficult to bear, than the present situation? But, Sir, everybody in Canada to-day, except a very few, is satisfied with the present situation, and believes that the third solution, which I now intend to speak about, is the only one for us—that we shall remain part and parcel of that great Empire on which the sun never sets. But, can we do that without doing what is our proper share for the common good? The answer to that question is not forthcoming.

We have been told in certain quarters that we should continue to build railways and dig canals, and that our situation in the world would be well taken care of if we did that. But, Sir, this is a question of give and take. If we receive help, protection, will we be content merely to build railways and pay our gas bills regularly? I do not think we will. The situation, as I understand it, is simply this: We are doing something which is agreeable to the motherland, something which she prefers. And what does it amount to? It amounts practically to a loan of Canadian ships, which, when this country has been consulted and has decided the question, will come back to us. And what shall we have lost? Simply the interest on the amount—that is, $1,750,000. And this instead of the useless navy of hon. members opposite which would have cost between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000 a year. On the whole, Sir, I think, we are making a good bargain for Canada.

Look at the situation of the near future. Everybody is interested now, in seeing what is to happen about the Panama canal. The western situation has to be taken care of, and Canadians, of all parties, must prepare for the increased production of grain in the West. Now, I think it may fairly be said that when the Panama canal is open, probably from points east of Saskatoon, grain will continue to come eastward for export. But from points west of Saskatoon, it is very likely that some proportion of the grain of Canada will seek the west coast and go through the Panama canal. Is it not important that the question of fees and tolls on the Panama canal should be settled and well settled? In a way we are more interested in that question than even Great Britain herself. Could we, alone, settle this question as advantageously as we can settle it with the help of the motherland, and with her statesmen at our back and helping to have the situation solved as it should be solved? That is only a sample of the many advantages which we, as Canadians, have to expect. And for these advantages we should be ready to do our duty. A motion was presented in this House during the debate on the Address to the effect that Canada should not do anything in this matter until she had a voice in the councils of the Empire. I do not wish to refer to that at length, but I would like simply to say a word. This measure now before the House, coupled with the speech of the leader of the Government, provides for a temporary thing. With this temporary step we have a preliminary voice in the councils of the Empire. And when we come, if it comes to that after consultation with the people, to a permanent policy, then we shall have a more important voice in those councils. Is that not all that was contained in the amendment? If the amendment had not been presented to the House at all, the proposal now put before the country meets the situation, I think fairly well. Shall we indulge in discussing past declarations? The hon. member for Rouville has stated that it is a false principle to take part in the wars of the Empire, but I shall not discuss this matter in that way. Hon. members on the other side of the House may do it if they choose, but I think these tactics of party warfare are not suited to the discussion of such an important question as we now have before us. This matter should not be settled by scrapbook oratory or argument; it is too big for that, and, in my humble opinion, scrapbook arguments will not be appreciated by the people of Canada as forming an important feature of the settlement of so vital a question. This policy is either good or bad. If it is good, past declarations by the ton will not make it bad.

In view of the fact that this measure has to be judged by the facts before us, I was astounded to hear the right hon. leader of the Opposition say that four years ago he knew everything which this memorandum states. Truly he must have been a prophet or a great guesser, because important events have taken place in the last four years, and I rather think my right hon. friend went too far when he made that assertion. Events which have transpired during the present year have created a completely new situation in the British Empire and in other countries. We all know that about twelve years ago Germany had practically no navy, and that what is called the fleet law was passed in 1898. I have before me the new law passed in 1900, and I may say that the memorandum from the Admiralty refers to a paragraph in the preamble of that law. In order to put before the House and the country the nature of the German law, I quote as follows, from the fleet law of 1900 when referring to the law of 1898:

> The fleet law does not provide for the possibility of a naval war against a great naval power, because when it was drawn up in the summer of 1897, the chief point was to ensure the carrying out of the fleet scheme of 1873 in up-to-date material, the increase being limited to the small number of battleships necessary in order at least to carry out the organization demanded by tactical considerations for a double squadron.
>
> 'The argument, to the fleet law allowed of no doubt as to the military value of the battle fleet. It is expressly stated that 'against the more important naval powers the battle fleet has solely the significance of a fleet for surprise attack.' That is to say, the ships are to do their utmost. What is possible in this respect becomes apparent when it is borne in mind that the fleet law provides for a total of 42 cruisers, while, for example, the greatest naval power of today possesses 206 cruisers (ready and in course of construction) and has besides at its disposal bases and coaling stations on all the principal trade routes.

I will now quote from the German fleet law of 1900:

For the attainment of this object, viz., protection of our trade and colonies by assuring peace with honour, Germany requires, according to the strength of the great naval powers and with regard to our tactical formations, two double squadrons of first-class battleships, with the necessary attendant cruisers, torpedo boats, &c. Since the fleet law provides for only two squadrons, the construction of third and fourth squadrons is proposed. Two of these four squadrons will form one fleet. The tactical formation of the second fleet should be similar to that of the first as provided in the fleet law.

Information as to the actual number of additional ships required, prepared on a definite basis, as in the case of the battle fleet, cannot be given for some time. If the demand is made that the foreign service fleet is to be in a condition—

(1) To powerfully represent German interest everywhere in time of peace;

(2) To be equal to operating against foreign countries possessing fleets of no importance worth mentioning, an increase of at least five large and five small cruisers, besides one large and two small cruisers as a material reserve, appears necessary.

The House will bear me out when I say that up to the year 1900 there was in the two fleet laws mentioned, no apparent ambition on the part of Germany, to take away from the Mother Country the supremacy of the sea.

This is where we were in 1911. We will now look at the proportion as attained in 1912:

I have here the German naval law of 1912, and what does it say? Members of the House will see that it is no more the humble words which Germany used before.

The organization of the fleet still suffers from two serious defects. The one defect consists in the fact that in the autumn of every year the time-expired men, i.e., almost one-third of the crews in all ships of the battle fleet are discharged and replaced mainly by recruits from the inland population. Owing to this the readiness of the battle fleet for war is considerably impaired for a prolonged period.

The requisite ships for this third active squadron are to be derived and so on.

And then, further on :

This means that the maintenance in commission of ships in the reserve can be reduced by one-half in consequence of the increase of active organizations, the formation of a third active squadron in commission of three battleships, three large and three small cruisers, &c.

But listen to these words :

The second defect consists in the fact that at the present time with an establishment of 58 capital ships only 21 capital ships are available at first, if the reserve fleet cannot be made ready in proper time. Since the fleet law was drawn up, this latter has become more and more unlikely, as the moment at which the reserve fleet can be ready for war gets more and more deferred. This is a consequence of the ever-growing complexity of modern ships and of the steadily growing difficulty in training large organizations. At the present day, therefore, the reserve fleet only comes into consideration as a second fighting line; but in view of our great numerical strength, &c.——

What does this mean ? It is easily understood and may be briefly put. Before 1912 Germany never thought of being ready at once for war, of having a big array of battleships in the first fighting line, but here in 1912 those are the words she speaks, and what does she do ? She not only provides for new battleships and cruisers to be built, but she takes out of the reserve fleet one-half of that fleet and puts it with the active fleet ready for war at any time, and not in the second fighting line. Did my right hon. friend know these facts four years ago ?

What is the result of these figures ? That whereas in 1911 Germany had in the active battle fleet 17 battleships and in the reserve battle fleet nine battleships, the change has operated so that now she has 25 battleships in the active battle fleet and only four in the reserve. They have gone up in one year, by one stroke of the pen, by one piece of legislation, from 17 to 25 battleships. Is that nothing? Has it any meaning or not?

Let us take now the battle-cruisers. The active fleet had four cruisers and the reserves had two. They have made it for the future eight in the active battle fleet and one in the reserve. The small cruisers have gone up from twelve to eighteen, just as a result of this law. Who will say, in fairness that this has not created a completely new situation?

This fleet is not meant as a pure ornament. The Minister of Marine has represented to this House that Germany is an unassailable power by sea, and this is an undisputed fact. She is protected by enormous batteries, protected by everything which human science can devise, protected by a long line of islands beginning at Heligoland and going as far as the Frisian Islands. There is not one ship or twenty ships of the British navy to-day which could do anything to the small German coastline. We had before what might be called a land-locked navy as far as Germany is concerned. But what do we see to-day? We see that three great naval stations of Germany—Emden, Williamshaven, and Cuxhaven—have become the strongest points in the world except Gibraltar, so far as defence is concerned. We see also that the great warships of Germany which formerly could not enter the North Sea by the canals have perfect freedom of movement. The Kaiser Wilhelm canal and the Kiel canal have been deepened so as to bring the war vessels into the North Sea by the shortest possible route. Instead of making the long detour, the big ships—the Oldenburg, the Moltke, and the Von der Tann—will be able to come into the North Sea at short notice, in a few hours. Is that situation new or not? Are British statesmen bound to look at that situation as it is created? I think I am justified in saying that no one will deny that these facts should be taken into account. The consequence is that a new situation has been created and we should face it before it is too late. To put it colloquially, I would say that it is useless after the wreck has taken place to get the life-saving apparatus, and that it is too late after the fire has occurred to organize and equip a fire-brigade.

We are told that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite would lead to the revival of the ship-building industry in Canada. By that policy we were to strive by leaps and bounds to build ships, although we had no shipyards or equipment. But by the measure which we have placed before Parliament, well worked out, matured and well arranged, we will begin at the beginning: shipyards will be constructed, and ship-building, one of the old industries of Canada and of Quebec, will be revived; the place held in Quebec by the wooden ship-building industry of years ago will be taken by the building of vessels of steel.

We have a precedent for what we are doing to-day, and, in the second place, this precedent has shown to us the path of duty. I shall not refer to what took place in this country in 1775 or in 1812. Those facts are well known, and public men very often speak about them. But, I shall put before the House certain documents which will show that instead of doing the thing that is considered degrading on the other side of the House, we are simply doing what our own ancestors have done in the past. I have here a photographic reproduction of a circular which I want to put before the House and which is dated 1793. This is not 1775, nor 1812, but it shows the constancy, the continuation of those things. It is a circular letter signed by the Roman Catholic bishop of Quebec who had then the whole province of Quebec under his jurisdiction and who wrote to the priests under him and told them what their duty was at that time. This document is somewhat lengthy and I shall not read the whole of it. I shall translate a few paragraphs and if the House does not object we might perhaps put the whole of it on 'Hansard.'

An hon. MEMBER : Read it if you want to put it on 'Hansard.'

Some hon. MEMBERS : Read it, read it.

Mr. PELLETIER : It is not because I have anything to hide, but because I desire to save the time of the House. (Reading):

Gentlemen: notices received from New York within a few weeks give us to understand that a French fleet which has left the coast of the United States of America has, or may have, the intention of coming over to the province of Lower Canada. The circumstance has appeared to us to be of sufficient importance to justify us in soliciting your attention and in doing this our duty and our inclination are entirely in accord.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm): (Translation.) May I inquire from the hon. gentleman whether the documents he is quoting from is written in French?

Mr. PELLETIER : Yes.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Then I shall request him to read it in French to begin with.

Mr. PELLETIER: I shall proceed as I have a mind to, and my hon. friend will be at liberty to correct any mistakes by comparing my translation with the French text which he will find by Monday in 'Hansard.'

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I maintain that, considering that document is written in the French language, it should be read in French to begin with. How can we know whether the translation he gives us is correct?

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: I fail to find anything in the rules of the House which compels the reading of this document in the French language, especially after the statement just made by the hon. minister that he intends having the original document inserted in 'Hansard'.

Mr. PELLETIER : The hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) may rest assured of one fact: I am translating it to the best of my ability, but the translation and the French version being in 'Hansard,' whatever is wrong with my translation will be corrected by any person who sees it.

It is not because we have any anxiety about your personal conduct in this matter in case of some enterprise on the part of the French fleet or power in our province. The complete loyalty of the clergy of this diocese, which was shown during the invasion of 1775, is a guarantee of your zeal in defending on all occasions the interests of the Government, those of the religion of which you are the ministers and those of the country in which you live and which, by the admirable disposition of Providence, are so closely united and bound together. But, as we have to fear that the farmers of this country, mainly in the country districts, may be struck by the name of French and may therefore not exactly understand the line of conduct which they should follow in circumstances like that, it has seemed to us absolutely essential that you should put before them the following considerations:—

1. That, by the capitulation of Quebec in 1759 and of Montreal in 1760, and much more by the treaty of Paris in 1763, the ties which bind them to France have completely disappeared and the fidelity and obedience, which before were due to the King of France, they now owe to His Majesty the King of England.

2. That the oath taken by them or their ancestors to the King of England when this country was conquered binds them in the same manner, that they should not violate that oath and that if they did they would be guilty towards God as well as towards themselves.

3. That, independently, of the obligation which results from an oath like that, the conduct, full of humanity, kindness and benevolence, that the British Government has always shown towards them, should suffice to attach them inviolably to the British Crown.

4. That, in particular, the constant protection granted to their religion by the same Government makes it a bounden duty for them to exert their efforts in order to prevent themselves from passing under any other domination.

5. That the spirit of religion, subordination and attachment to the Government, which hitherto was one of the glories of the realm of France, has been replaced in later years by another spirit of independence, anarchy,——

And so on. I have had some difficulty in translating this, but, at all events, I have given the main parts of it which I wanted to put before the House in English, and it is with the greatest pleasure that I put it on 'Hansard' in French, because I want it to be there.

Mr. LAFORTUNE : What is the name of the bishop who signs that ?

Mr. PELLETIER : The name is Bishop Deneault. The circular as it appears in French is as follows :

Circular to the Parish Priests.

Gentlemen: notices received from New York within a few weeks give us to understand that a French fleet which has left the coast of the United States of America has, or may have, the intention of coming over to the province of Lower Canada. The circumstance has appeared to us to be of sufficient importance to justify us in soliciting your attention and in doing this our duty and our inclination are entirely in accord with the wishes of His Excellency the Right Hon. Lord Dorchester.

It is not because we have any anxiety about your personal conduct in this matter in case of some enterprise on the part of the French fleet or power in our province. The complete loyalty of the clergy of this diocese, which was shown during the invasion of 1775, is a guarantee of your zeal in defending on all occasions the interests of the Government, those of the religion of which you are the ministers and those of the country in which you live and which, by the admirable disposition of Providence, are so closely united and bound together. But, as we have to fear that the farmers of this country, mainly in the country districts, may be struck by the name of French and may therefore not exactly understand the line of conduct which they should follow in circumstances like that, it has seemed to us absolutely essential that you should put before them the following considerations:—

1. That, by the capitulation of Quebec in 1759 and of Montreal in 1760, and much more by the treaty of Paris in 1763, the ties which bind them to France have completely disappeared and the fidelity and obedience, which before were due to the King of France, they now owe to His Majesty the King of England.

2. That the oath taken by them or their ancestors to the King of England when this country was conquered binds them in such manner, that they should not violate that oath and that if they did they would be grievouly guilty towards God, nee enim habebit infantem Dominus eum qui assumpserit nomen Domini Dei sui frustra, Exod. 20.9.

3. That, independently, of the obligation which results from an oath like that, the conduct, full of humanity, kindness and benevolence, that the British Government has always shown towards them, should suffice to attach them inviolably to the British Crown.

4. That, in particular, the constant protection granted to their religion by the same Government makes it a bounden duty for them to exert their efforts in order to prevent themselves from passing under any other domination.

5. That the spirit of religion, subordination and attachment to the Government, which hitherto was one of the glories of the realm of France, has been replaced in later years by a spirit of independence, anarchy and parricide which, not content with putting to death or sending into exile the sound portion of the French nation, has sent to the scaffold their virtuous sovereign and rightly filled with indignation all the great powers of Europe; and that the greatest evil that might befall Canada, would be to undergo the rule of such revolutionists.

6. That under the present circumstances, the Government is not alone interested in warding off these Frenchmen from the province, but that every loyal subject, every true patriot, every good Catholic, desirous of conserving his liberty, his laws, his morals, his religion, is particularly and personally interested therein.

We flatter ourselves, gentlemen, that the spirit of God, your zeal for the salvation of the people confided to your care, and your loyalty to the Government under whose rule we have the happiness to live, will enable you to enlarge, whether in your public instructions, or in private conversation, on the principles which we have merely pointed out herein. And should you consider that the publication of this our letter is likely to give greater weight to your entreaties, we hereby authorize you to read it at church meetings for divine service, leaving it to your own judgment to decide how often it should be read.

Meanwhile, we entreat you to join with us in praying to Heaven that our diocese may be be spared the innumerable evils which would result from the introduction in this country of that new spirit of impiety, independence and debauchery.

I remain, gentlemen, with a sincere and retire devotion

Your most humble and obedient servant.

‡JEAN FRANCOIS,
Bishop of Quebec.

Quebec, November 9, 1793.

Not only were these principles preached by the head of my church, but they were put in practice as well. In 1798 an effort was made to have Parliament vote a sum of money to aid Great Britain in her then difficulties: but the country was poor and the Government was poor and it was thought not opportune to impose a special tax for that purpose. Then, a great act of patriotism and devotion was witnessed in Lower Canada and the whole people. French and English came together and organized a subscription to raise money to send it as their humble contribution to the Mother Country to help her in her wars. I have taken from the archives, our glorious archives I call them, the documents I now have in hand. A movement to start subscriptions for the purpose I have mentioned was started in Montreal, another in Quebec, another in Three Rivers, and another in Sorel, and from all these centres the lists of subscribers speak with vivid eloquence of the patriotism of the Canadians, French and English alike, of that day. At the head of the list is the name of the patriot Bishop of the province of Quebec with a subscription of £50 and most of the priests of the more important parishes gave their contributions, and opposite the names of many of them is the undertaking that they will continue their subscription yearly so long as the war lasts. The subscription list for Montreal contains the following statement at its head, and follows the names of the French subscribers, some of whom I shall read:

Being desirous of assisting in the glorious struggle which, should it please Providence to crown by a successful issue, cannot fail to secure to the British Government the gratitude of millions yet unborn throughout the civilized world have agreed to contribute the sum affixed to our respective names in aid of the general cause and to pay the same on or before the fifteenth day of October next into the hands of His Majesty's Receiver General, to be disposed of as His Majesty shall be pleased to direct.

And we also of the more laborious class, having just emerged from the disadvantages of a long and rigorous winter and being about to make provision for that which is to ensue, do now for the first time experience an additional mortification in being unable to testify our zeal in a manner suitable to our wishes, at the same time trusting that our humble mite contributed with cheerfulness will be favourably accepted as a pledge of our affection to a most benevolent Sovereign and of attachment to our most free and excellent constitution:—Louis Chs. Foucher, Montreal, £25; Louis Plessis Bellair, Ste. Geneviève, 2s. 6d.; Le Séminaire de Montréal, Montreal, £500; Rev. Malard, ptre, Lac des Deux Montagnes, £2; Ignace Lacroix, Montreal, £10; J. B. L'Affricain, Montreal, £1; François Levesque, Montreal, £6; Major Chs. St. Ours, St. Ours, £20; J. Bte. Raymond, La Prairie, £10; N. de Labrevoir, ptre, Lachenaie, £4; N. Pouget, ptre, Berthier, £5; L. Lamonthe, ptre, Lavaltrie, £4; Pierre Panet, Lachenaie, £25; M. Bertrand, ptre, Rivière du Loup, £5; Ls. Ed. Hubert, St. Denis, £3 10s. 9d.; Joseph Duval, ptre, Longue Pointe, £3 10s.; Pierre Juervat, St. Denis, £10; M. Déguire, ptre, Vaudreuil, £6; Jos. Déguire, vicaire, Vaudreuil, £1; J. Bte. Déguire, Vaudreuil, £1; Joachim D'Abreuil, père, Vaudreuil, 5s.; Jos. E. Jonnet, Montreal, 5s.; Pierre Confroy, curé, Boucherville, £5; F. X. Bender, Montreal, £6; Paul Lacroix, Montreal, £1; Gabriel Franchère, Montréal; £2; Rév. Lemaire, ptre, St. Martin, £5; François Duberon, ptre, Varennes, £16; Ls. Montizambert, père, Montréal, £1; — Jilbert, curé, Sainte Anne, £2; Chs. Borduine, Cascades, £5; Ant. Girouard, ptre, Pointe aux Trembles, £4; J. P. Leprohon, Montreal, £10; Noel & Shorto, Montréal, £10; P. F. Cherrier, ptre, Saint-Denis, £10; P. C. Berthelot, ptre, Saint Henry, £3 10s.; Legras Pierreville, Boucherville, £4; Rev. Raimboult, ptre, Pointe Claire, £5; Ls. Chaboillez, notaire, Montreal, £4; Rev. Faribault, père, Berthier, £1; Jacques Cartier, père, St. Antoine, £10; René A. DeBoucherville, Boucherville, £10; Jos. de Cabruère Montarville, Boucherville, £10; Pierre Ls. Panet, Montreal, £40; François Desrivières, Montreal, £25; Charles Labruère, Boucherville, £5; Jos. Périnault, ptre, Montreal, £4; J. Donnagairy, Montréal, £10; Pierre Fortier, Montréal, £5; S. de Beaujeu, Montreal, £10; Jos. Provain, Montreal, £5 11s. 2d.; Alex. Henry, Montreal, £25; Ls. Dulongpré, Montreal, £2; Pierre Huguet Latour, Montreal, £3; J. F. Hébert, ptre, £3; Rosina McClement, Montreal, £15; David David, Montreal, £12 10s.; Michel and Samuel Dumas, Montreal, £8; Jos. Périnault, fils, ptre, Rivière des Prairies, £4; Etienne Deschambault, Longueuil, £3; F. Laperière, Boucherville, £10; Jos. Bédard, Montreal, £6; Maurice Blondeau, Montreal, £6; Pierre Constantin, Montréal, £1; Frs. Compain, curé, St. Antoine, £2; Christophe Marchesseau, St. Antoine, 5s.; Jean Bte. Levesque, Montreal, £1; Samuel David, Montreal, £5; M. Panet, curé, Verchères, £5; Louis Cadieux, Montreal, 10s.; Michel Jaubert, Montreal, 10s.; J. M. C. De les Derners, Ste. Anne, 10s.; George Meyer, Pointe Claire, £2; Eustache Parent Montreal, £2; François Fillau, Montreal, 10s.; St. Georges Dupré, Montréal, £4; P. R. St. Ours, L'Assomption, £20; M. Réard, ptre, St. Hyacinthe, £2; Jean B. Boucher, curé, Laprairie, £4; François Rolland, Laprairie, £4; Edmond Henry, £4; Joseph Hébert, Laprairie, £4; Jos. Ignace Hébert, Laprairie, £4; Joseph Nolin, Laprairie, £2; Simon Baruret, Laprairie, 5s. 3d.; J. Bte. Perras, Laprairie, £2; Louis Lefebvre, Laprairie, £4; Simon Nixon, Laprairie, £1 3s. 4d.; Antoine Dupré, Laprairie, 5s.; Michel Boucher, Laprairie, 5s.; Frédéric Hintz, Laprairie, 5s. 6d.; Veuve Dupuy, Laprairie, 10s.; François Dupuy, Laprairie, 5s.; Joseph Porcheron, Laprairie, 10s.; Pierre Perras, Laprairie, 5s.; Jos. Tremblay, Laprairie, 5s.; Grant & Laframboise, Montreal, £12 10s.; Christophe Sanguinet, St. Philippe, £6; François Malhiot, Verchères, £8 5s.; François Milloni, Montreal, £6; Louis Charland, Montreal, £2; Lambert St. Omer, Montreal, £2; J. Bte. Desève, Montreal, £1; Charles Martel, curé St. Marc, £2; Pierre Fréchette, curé, Melœil, £2; —— Gadebois, Capte. Milice, Belœil, 15s.

I call attention to the fact that foremost amongst the names is the Roman Catholic Seminary of St. Sulpice of Montreal with a subscription of £500 and a declaration that the same sum of £500 would be given to England every year even for a war with France. We have a similar list for Sorel and amongst the names of subscribers there I find one Mr. Cardin. We have a similar list for Quebec, another for Lavaltrie, another for La Prairie. Permit me to read a very illuminating letter from the parish priest of Lavaltrie, who writing to the Secretary of the Governor General says:

> Allow me to send my humble subscription to help for the cause of the war against France. It is only £4 but it will be the same during the whole time of the war.

There is amongst these papers another document which is very touching indeed, and it says:

> We people do not subscribe the large amounts which other people do, but it is because we are so poor. The little we can give shows our heart and our desire.

These men subscribed, some one shilling, some two shillings, and some less, but the good-will was there. Now, Sir, I ask this House, cannot the Canadians in 1912 do as their ancestors did in 1879. I have here documents which show that similar subscriptions were made in 1800, 1801, 1804 and 1816, and which show that the people of Canada, French and English alike, loyal as they had become to the British Crown and the British Empire were giving what they could afford to help old England in her difficulties.

We are told in certain quarters that we should not do this at the present moment, and some people have used harsh words in telling us that. I wish to say to them that we are doing this, because we believe it to be our bounden and sacred duty, and that no harsh words will prevent us from doing that duty to the limit, as we think we ought to. We, the French-Canadians in this country, have traditions and a history of which we are proud; we ought to maintain those traditions. Once there was in this country a flag which was a beloved flag for us; but it has gone away; it has been replaced by another one. We saw those two flags at war after that for many years, and our hearts bled; but we stood where we were, true to our new allegiance and true to the duty which we owed to Britain. To-day our hearts have their reward, when we see those two flags of old on the horizon, interwoven and intertwined, and when we have the satisfaction of knowing that in defending one we are helping the other. Let us do what comes straight from the heart to the lips. It may be a big contribution, but Canada will soon be big and count for much. I have great faith in the moral effect of what we are going to do with this measure. I believe that we are here working and striving in our humble way for the peace of the world. I hope and trust that our action will have a world-wide effect. If it has, what has that in store for us? Let me read here a quotation which appears in an important German paper, which is the organ of the German naval and military world:

> It should serve to tranquilize us that Canada attaches to her gift an important condition, demanding henceforth a seat and a voice in the Government of the British Empire. The other large colonies will doubtless follow suit.
>
> We shall no longer have to do with England alone, whose half-anxious, half-menacing stare across the North Sea for years kept all Europe in a state of the worst nervous tension.
>
> Rather will this collaboration in Imperial counsels result in a wider outlook, through the participation of men for whom the British world-Empire has other and higher tasks than a constant challenge to a continental power which, for over forty years, has given more than sufficient proofs of her love of peace.

These words from this very important German paper begin to show the more or less important effect of what Canada is doing to-day. We have in this country, and we glory in having in this country, many noble sons of the German Empire amongst our best citizens. If in the end we are an indirect means of bringing about an understanding between Great Britain and Germany, will not that make us glad? Our German compatriots will help in bringing that about, and perhaps Germany will find that four hundred thousand sons of hers in this country will then send her a message of joy, of gratitude, and of happiness.

I will now conclude by expressing the confidence and the hope that my compatriots will do their duty in this matter. Circumstances have placed me here in an important but difficult position, a most difficult position indeed, because I feel and understand thoroughly that I cannot fulfil the duties devolving upon me as the co-operators of Sir John A. Macdonald would have done. We are going through momentous times and momentous events, and, calling to my help from my seat here the patriotism of these men and of my worthy and honoured leader, I think it is my duty, and I do it to sound the bugle call of duty to all the French-Canadians, as well as to the other races in Canada. Our forefathers have done their duty; let us do ours and rise equal to the occasion. Our duty is much easier than was theirs; let us fulfil it with a glad heart. If there are some men who want, whilst the process is going on, to stay by the roadside, carping and throwing insults, never mind them; let the others march nobly on with unfurled flag for the defence of our common heritage and our common Empire.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pelletier) has been warmly applauded by his friends on account of his utterances concerning the navy. What a change from former days. I wish you had heard the hon. Postmaster General when he was scouring the province of Quebec, in company with his leaders, Henri Bourassa, the masterly mind, and Armand Lavergne, the beloved one. He loudly applauded these gentlemen when they poured out their invectives before Quebec audiences: Monstrous navy! fatal Bill! iniquitous law! I can assure you he was in a desperate state of mind in those days; he groaned, he almost wept. Just think of it, would he say, we are going to build battleships, we are going to send our children away to be butchered, to be decapitated, to be pierced with bullets. They will be torn away from their mothers' arms. He may have delivered some fine oratory to-day, but it was quite another kind he had in store at the time. Those poor Canadians, he would exclaim, they are making preparations to help Great Britain to whom we owe nothing. Great Britain wants us to supply her with ships, but is she not the wealthiest nation on the surface of the earth? Such a proud nation as Great Britain to come and beg ships from Canada, is not that a shame? Thus did the Postmaster General speak, and the Nationalists the same. They even went so far as to say: D.....navy!

Mr. PELLETIER.

They came to wage war against me in my own constituency, because I had voted in favour of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's navy. They cried out on every husting that the end of the world was coming, such was their idea of the proposal to build ships for the defence of Great Britain. There was no emergency then, no necessity for it, oh, no; such a proposal smacked of national treason.

And what do they say to-day? To-day they say that Laurier has not done enough. The right hon. Prime Minister then called the vessels purchased by the Government a 'tin-pot' navy. But the Nationalists, on the other hand, were going through the province of Quebec claiming that Laurier was doing too much, there was no sense in it. Among them there were able men, forcible speakers, and they succeeded in deceiving the people. They brought defeat to several of our candidates who had voted for that measure. In my constituency, the master mind, as I said, came to meet me. I remember he stated among other things: The children and grand-children of those members who supported the navy Bill will curse their forerunners. How nice, to thus advise our children to curse us. I voted for the Laurier Bill without fear or misgivings, and I am not sorry for it. Those who branded us as time-servers, because we supported that measure, are in a very different disposition to-day. What do you think of it?

Mr. Monk, who condemned the policy of his leader, later on accepted a portfolio in his Cabinet. That is a thing I would never think of doing. He used to say that Laurier's policy was iniquitous, but that Mr. Borden's policy was still more objectionable. And those same gentlemen are here to-day loudly praising the Government. They would say to us: You are time-servers, sheepish men, devoid of honour or character. You vote like a lot of sheep. We answered: We are not deserving of such aspersions any more than you are; we love our country, our children, our wives, and we realize what is our duty. You may be sure that should we go through the ordeal once more, I would not hesitate to fulfil my duty as before. I see that the hon. Postmaster General is leaving the House. He is running away, unwilling to hear what I have to say concerning himself. He avoids discussing the navy question, and that is why he kept away from the meeting at Jeune-Lorette. While listening to him, I satisfied myself that he had copied the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition in support of the navy. But previous to the last elections, he would not listen to a word concerning the navy. He has undergone a wonderful change since September 21, 1911. He has just repeated what the leader of the Opposition had said, viz, that we are a nation. A queer nation, surely, if we admit our inability to do anything by ourselves, and the necessity under which we are said to be of having our ships built abroad. Does Great Britain order her ships from Germany, Italy, Denmark, France, China, or Japan? No, she has them built at home, and from the very beginnings of the navy, that was the policy she followed. Where does Germany procure her ships? Is it in England, in France, or in some other foreign country? No, at home. Do the United States order their ships from British, French or Japanese firms? No, they build their own vessels, and they build them at home. In following such a policy as is proposed, will we succeed in proving that we are a nation? Why should we apply elsewhere? Oh, it is objected, it will cost too much to build such vessels in Canada? Well, admitting it would cost a little more, it should on the other hand be taken into account that the money would thus remain in the country, those millions would be spent in Canada. But no, that did not suit the views of those gentlemen. They made up their minds to send that money to Great Britain, for the benefit of the workingmen in Manchester and other great British centres, and we will be lookers on while they earn our millions, without ourselves deriving any benefit from it. And those same gentlemen exclaim: Long live the Mother Country! Long live the navy! Long live the contribution to the British navy!

However, the Laurier navy was a Canadian navy, under the control of the Government and of Parliament. The Postmaster General and his friends, statute in hand, succeeded in making the people believe, during the Drummond and Arthabaska election, that it was an Imperial navy. The hon. minister, with all his good Nationalist friends, cried out that Laurier was no longer a French-Canadian, that he was an Englishman who was selling out Canada to Great Britain. These gentlemen went through the province of Quebec exhibiting that famous resolution adopted at St. Eustache and at the Ontario street rink in Montreal. They went to St. Jérome, Nicolet, Chambly and Verchères, everywhere repeating that it was national treason to undertake the building of a navy. Have we not heretofore got along very well without a navy? They would ask, why should we start building one now, it is the country's ruin. Bourassa had two long statements showing the cost of navies in the United States, France, Great Britain, and all great countries in the world. And to better show that it was an extravagant policy, if not a ruinous one, considering that we had always fared well, lived happy and grown prosperous without a navy, he added: In 1901, Mr. Laurier acted right, and similarly in 1903, in London, in 1906 and in 1909; but to-day he has grown old, he is losing his head, he proposes to build a navy in his declining years, you can see that he is not all there. Such were the statements of these gentlemen. Was I not right a moment ago in asserting that they are wonderfully changed?

The Hon. Mr. Monk, of course he is entitled to that appellation, having been a minister for a short time—thus expressed himself at Lachine: Just think of it, I have to break away from my leader; how sorry I feel! Borden is even worse than Laurier, he wants to build a navy and provide a contribution of twenty million dollars. What would he have said at the time had he been told that the contribution would be thirty-five millions? I think he would have given him a pretty stiff dressing down. Surely his disappointment would have been much keener. Why not build the Georgian Bay canal, he would ask, why not carry on the deepening of our system of waterways; why not build new railway lines, help on colonization, build great national highways? We have innumerable requirements at home, and now they are going to take the people's money to build ships. Such were the statements made by Mr. Monk, who with tears in his eyes condemned his leader. How sorry he was! Laurier's policy was objectionable, but Borden's was still worse. In consideration for having thus condemned him, the Prime Minister offered him a portfolio in his Cabinet. Did I suspect that by condemning my leader, I might secure a similar reward, I might be tempted to follow suit.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: So I say, in any case, why should not the ships be built in this country? Do hon. gentlemen object to protecting Canadian labour, or workingmen who settle in our midst, or those immigrants who are reaching our shores by hundreds of thousands? Why should not our own raw material be utilized in such work? We have wood, iron, steel, tin, nickel, etc., in abundance. Why should we order from Great Britain ships which we are in a position to build here? And these same gentlemen will be appealing to the patriotism of Canadians.

Our primary duty is to protect those who live in Canada, to protect our wives, our children, to consult the country's interest, to expand our trade, to develop our resources, to provide work for those who live in our midst. But this Government seems unable to realize that. They are anxious to have ships constructed for Mrs.

England. I say: No. I love England as I love the Crown under whose protection we live. But what is there to induce us to send our money to support the workingmen over in Europe, and particularly over in Great Britain? We are not in a position to exert any control over that expenditure made in Great Britain. When the hon. Mr. Monk contended along with a good many others, that we owed nothing to Great Britain—and I am not ready to say that I agree with him on that point—his objection would hold good as regards a contribution of thirty-five millions as well as regards any other amount. When has the people ever authorized such a contribution to the British exchequer? Have we authority to give away what does not belong to us? In doing so are we assisting the people? No, we have been sent here to see to it that our national resources are developed, that equitable laws are carried out without injustice to any one, that the public funds are properly expended, in such a way as to satisfy our constituents.

It has been stated that we enjoyed the full privileges of representative government. That is so. But as representatives of the people, have we such a right? When accounts are rendered, it is incumbent on us to inquire from the ministers why they spent ten dollars on such a man, or applied some other amount to such or such a purpose. We look into the accounts and are entitled to know about every detail. We are bound, on the other hand, to justify, to the satisfaction of our electors, vouchers in hand, the whole of that expenditure. Now, if those ships are to be built in Great Britain, will we have the right to inquire what use has been made of our moneys? Show me the accounts, so that I may know to whom you have paid these thirty-five millions? No, will they answer, that is none of your business, you hold no brief from the British House of Commons, you are a Canadian member of Parliament, and consequently you are not entitled to look into the vouchers for that expenditure.

What becomes of representative government under such a system? Will it not soon be a dead letter? And that representative government has cost us the lives of many patriots, some of whom have died on the scaffold for having claimed that privilege.

So I lay down as a principle that under a system of representative government, not a single cent should be spent without authority from the representatives of the people. Would you, Mr. Chairman, be justified in taking a single cent of the indemnity voted as a remuneration for your honourable services, previous to its being voted by Parliament? Are not hon. gentlemen in this House in a similar position? Is not His Royal Highness the Governor General in the same case? So I say that the people have precedence over the King, precedence over the Government, and that they are entitled to know for what purpose and to whom the public moneys have been paid. Hundreds of millions have been expended on building railways, tunnelling mountains, running through glen and prairie, bridging over great rivers, and all that with a view to opening up our country, discovering and developing its resources; but that has always been done with the consent of Parliament.

What would become of our great national undertakings, if we had them carried out elsewhere? Why should we not have our railway cars built somewhere else; why should not our wharfs be constructed by foreigners; and our great factories, and also our crafts for inland navigation? Why, in fact, should not the running of this House be farmed out to foreigners?

This Government is powerful, no doubt, with that honourable majority at its back; but the ministers should bear in mind that they have as their master the people, whose memory is long. Whatever the Government does will be submitted to the people and discussed on the public platform. The people will ask a strict account of the moneys expended outside of Canada without due authority. When the Laurier Naval Bill was brought up, we were told: You have no right to build that navy, as the question has never been submitted to the people. The objection was urged over and over again at the last general election. Well, when has this Government ever called on the people to vote those thirty-five millions? Was that the principle laid down at the last general election? Certainly not; these hon. gentlemen were desirous of getting into power on side issues, and they succeeded in doing so. As Mr. Monk put it: We are here and you are there. Some day the Government will be called to account for all the promises made by these gentlemen, and I am satisfied that the people will grumble some, and when the people grumble, some one has to suffer for it. As I have just stated, in a young country such as ours, I am inclined to think that Mr. Monk was right in contending that we would be making a better use of our millions by investing them in great national works rather than making presents out of them as is proposed.

Nothing more is heard of those great undertakings. There is not a single member of the Cabinet to utter a word about these great improvements which were to be carried out with the funds taken up by the navy. Have they changed their plans? I think the former Minister of Public Works was right in stating that we had too great a need of these moneys for carrying out improvements in our own country to be able to afford sending them abroad. Why should we spend millions towards helping Great Britain, was urged at the last elections, when our farming community is so much in need of assistance in every shape? The former Minister of Public Works represents a constituency almost wholly made up of honest farmers, and so he had no end of sympathy for the farming class. He was anxious to protect them, to make them more prosperous. Why not assist our cheese factories, our butter factories, and protect the farming industry against outside competition? Why not build canals, irrigate the dry belt, spend the people's money for the people's benefit? I think that before donating thirty-five millions we should look into our requirements. Before sending our money over there, let us come to the assistance of the most numerous class, the farming class.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO moved second reading of Bill No. 20 respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—Mr. Lespérance.

Mr. CARVELL: When this Bill came up on a previous occasion, I raised the objection that it seemed to me there should be some explanation of it. Later on I had a conversation with the promoter of the Bill, and he assured me that he would give an explanation which he thought would be satisfactory to the House. I do not want to delay the passage of the Bill, but there is such a remarkable proposition contained in it that I do feel that the House is entitled to a statement from the hon. gentleman in charge of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member is not present, perhaps it would be better to allow the Bill to stand.

Mr. CARVELL: I think so.

Bill allowed to stand.

SECOND READING.

Bill No. 29 to incorporate Canada Western Trust and Mortgage Company.—Mr. Meighen.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) At recess, Mr. Chairman, I was answering those hon. gentlemen on the other side who contend, or rather who contended, that we owe nothing to Great Britain, seeing that it is due to our own efforts if we are still under the British Crown, and that therefore there is no reason why we should build vessels for the defence of the Mother Country. It was even contended that the liberty we now enjoy, we had won at the point of the sword; that to breathe the air of liberty, we had been forced to bore bullet holes through the British flag. Such language is surely energetic enough, and easily understood when coming from those who opposed the building of a Canadian navy. It had been necessary to bore holes through the British flag, to tear it up, in order to enjoy the liberty which is now conceded to us. The statement was reiterated in several localities and at large political meetings. The followers of these gentlemen loudly applauded such statements. They were making a great deal of noise to show that Laurier's naval policy was no good. I challenge those hon. gentlemen to repeat such statements on the floor of the House. When I heard the member, or rather the would-be member, state at St. Eustache, in the county of Bagot, in Chambly and Verchères, and wherever he went: Just think of it, we are called upon to build ships for Great Britain, although British soldiers in 1837-38, did not hesitate using the churches as barns for their horses and making them drink from the chalice. And his followers would cry out vociferously: Hurrah for Marcile!

The hon. Postmaster General knows something about it; he attended a large number of Nationalist meetings, and though one of the most prominent of them, he never protested. To-day he is a thorough-going Imperialist. He wants us to give all our possessions to Great Britain, his newly-adopted country. It is by means of such statements that they succeeded in defeating the Laurier Government. Some contended that we did not owe anything to Great Britain, while others said that Great Britain owed us all; that if she still held Canada, the finest of her colonies, it was due to the loyalty and devotion of the French Canadians. And where are these hon. gentlemen now? I am anxious to hear them speak out on the floor of the House. They have not done much talking since the opening of the debate, but they have modified their former attitude. What has happened since September 21, 1911? Would it be their coming into power which caused such a change? Would it be the result of promises made, of rewards kept dangling before their eyes? I cannot understand such a right about face. Since September 21, what appeared to be worthless lead is transformed into pure gold. There is some mystery about it. Now, be careful, the people do not readily forget; the people will remember all you said previous to September 21, and will remember as well all you say in the meantime, and the people will not be fooled again.

If only it was shown to us that when the Canadian Cabinet ministers were in London they had concerned themselves with the interests of the farming class; if as a condition to that gift of 35 millions it had been understood that the embargo would be removed off Canadian cattle, I would say something had been achieved. But no, farmers are attended to in election time, when their support at the polls is needed. And when it comes to contributing thirty-five millions to the British exchequer, the interests of the farming class are forgotten. Canadian cattle shipped to Great Britain are stopped at the landing place; they must be slaughtered right there and then to protect Irish, Scotch and English breeders.

Had you been in Drummond and Arthabaska and had you heard the utterances of the then members of the Opposition, you would fully realize that they are not playing the same tune at present. I was present in Drummond when the navy question was being discussed. It was represented as an invention of Laurier's, as something iniquitous, a national treason to build warships, that Canada was in no need of any, being at peace with all other countries and having nothing to fear from any, that this was only a foolish notion that entered Mr. Laurier's head. Where are the fools to-day? Where are the dreamers? Those who spoke thus do not court publicity to-day; they modestly keep in the background, unwilling to reiterate their former statements. There is something puzzling about it. Talented men, fluent speakers, are to-day as mute as fish. They are such fine speakers, who express themselves so much better than I can, if we are to believe a certain fellow who sits in the press gallery and writes disparagingly of the people's representatives, being paid so much a line for the work; I long to hear these masters of oratory who speak so well the tongue of Boileau, while I speak it so poorly, says that gentleman in the gallery. But I, at any rate, have the courage to speak my mind.

The Government attracts settlers to our shores, and why? Because, of three essentials in the make-up of a great country, there is one which we lack. We have the territory, we have the finest waterways in the world, but we are wanting in population. Our country covers an area eight times as large as France, ten times as large as Great Britain, fifteen times as large as Belgium and twice as large as the United States, but our population is very sparse. The Government is taking every means to attract immigration, but after they have reached our shores, what will we do with them? We cannot hope increasing our population unless we have bread and high salaries to help support it, unless we provide work for those who have taken root on Canadian soil.

If we have our ships built in London, that will be of no advantage at all to our public exchequer, while if the contrary plan were adopted, our raw material would be utilized, and our money would be spent in our own territory. Differences of opinion are permissible on questions of procedure, but on an issue such as this there can be but one opinion. The people who toil, who are hard workers and thrifty, will take you to task on that account. They have not appointed you trustees of the public funds only to send them over to Great Britain; they are anxious that you should retain them in Canada, to increase the national exchequer and compensate us for our sacrifices. There cannot be two views about this matter, unless political partisanship should throw a mist over the mind.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Translation: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order; the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) is smoking in the House.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Translation.): Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the hon. minister smoking; possibly that is the only privilege left to him, and very likely he will not enjoy it much longer.

At the start of this debate, if the information tendered by the right hon. Prime Minister be correct, we were evidently on the verge of war. The outlook was threatening, black clouds overhung the horizon. He heard the guns roar, he could smell the powder; all indications pointed to war. I was scared; I began to write out my will. Just think of it, Sir, a war that might have wiped us from the surface of the earth; it was time to settle our accounts with Providence. In the meantime, matters have taken a better turn; for, if we are to believe the Postmaster General, the outlook for war is not so threatening; the sky is clearing up, the guns are no longer heard in the distance, war is less to be apprehended. These hon. gentlemen do not agree in their statements; if they do not agree any better in the council chamber, they must have a time of it.

Let us suppose that Germany should declare war against Great Britain and the latter make preparations, puts all its forces in line. What would there be left here to protect us? Would Great Britain send here the ships she is so much in need of, to defend our coasts, our fisheries, and prevent smuggling? What would there be available then in Canadian waters to protect us? We would not even have a row boat or a punt, we have nothing at all. We could not use Yankee aeroplones, for fear of breaking our necks. What part of the world would benefit the most in time of war? Would it not be Canada, the Empire's premier colony? When a country is at war, trade is at a standstill, so is agriculture, there is a stoppage of all activity. Now, where will England, essentially a manufacturing country, find supplies for her forces? In Canada, of course, in the Northwest territories, where there are so many millions of bushels of wheat available. How will Canada protect those millions of bushels of wheat for export, if we have no ships? Shall we borrow them from the United States, Germany, Italy, China or Japan? We need a few ships for Canada's protection in the first place, and besides that, ready to assist the Empire in case of need. I say that the measure put through by Mr. Laurier is the only necessary one, the only practical one as regards the safety of Canada and the Empire. When I listen to what these hon. gentlemen have to say to-day, I cannot have faith in their sincerity. What they propose is not practical and is a subversion of our country's constitution.

The hon. Postmaster General made some rather surprising statements this afternoon. He went pretty far back into our past history; he even read some circulars, which he would not have read to the electors of Drummond and Arthabaska, and had he done so, the outcome might have been different. They made fun of Mr. Laurier's navy, the member for Chambly and Verchères among others, saying that it was good for nothing, an old tin-pot navy, made up of old discarded ships, which Great Britain had no longer any use for. Had they spoken then as they do to-day, Mr. Gilbert would never have been returned. True, he did not remain very long in this House, and as soon as the electors were given a chance to make amends, they hastened to send him back home again. The hon. Postmaster General thinks that we should not lose sight of the morrow. Right he is, and that is why Sir Wilfrid Laurier who saw far into the future, resolved on making preparations. Let us provide a navy for ourselves, let us begin by building our own ships, and by degrees as circumstances permit, we will do more. We will be content with having two or three ships at the outset, but before long we will build more. These hon. gentlemen opposite will not have time to build any, for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that before long they will have to change places with us and then we will be able to say as one of them said: We are here and you are there. When the Laurier policy will be compared with that of this Government, and the people is put in a position to judge, you may be sure it will not take two years for the verdict to come out. The electorate will have no hesitation in condemning that antinational policy. The people may be fooled once, but you cannot fool them twice in succession. And that you will find out at the next election. It is all right to think of the morrow but at the same time it is too late to do so when the house is on fire. That is what Mr. Laurier had understood when he was getting ready for future wars. In speaking as he has done, the Postmaster General has merely given his endorsation to Sir Wilfrid's policy. His measure provided for the defence of the territory, the protection of our fisheries. I say it was necessary and I will prove what I say: the new ships were barely completed and in Canadian waters than they had to be sent out to seize foreign ships poaching in Canadian waters to the detriment of the public exchequer. Is not that sufficient proof that the policy of the late Government was necessary?

Reference was made at the time to the Niobe and the Rainbow. I heard former candidates say: Those ships are worthless, and if we are carried to power, they will soon be disposed of. I have yet to hear that this has been done. Where are the Niobe and the Rainbow to-day? Are not these hon. gentlemen using them? Are they not part of the fleet? Such is their sincerity. When they are in Opposition, the Niobe and the Rainbow are worthless, the money spent on them was simply wasted. But as soon as they reach power, they go around with them, they make trips in them here and there. Hurrah for the Niobe! Hurrah for the Rainbow! They had a new coat of paint put on them; a new rudder made for the Rainbow, and a new pilot provided. Hurrah for the Rainbow!

These gentlemen spoke thus to the electors of Chambly and Verchères, Yamaska, Berthier, Bagot and Dorchester: Should we get hold of power, that infamous Laurier legislation will be repealed, we will wipe it off the statute book. Where are their promises to-day? The people was to be consulted; that poor people would be called upon to vote by means of a plebiscite. Let us not vote any funds or any contribution, unless the question is beforehand submitted to the people. Has the people been consulted concerning this gift of thirty-five millions? These gentlemen are like sister Ann in the song, who is all the time looking ahead for somebody who never comes. They will be left a long time in expectation, for, neither repeal of the Laurier Bill, nor plebiscite will be forthcoming. With a view to purchasing the Niobe and the Rainbow, the then Government had obtained a vote of about a million and a half each; and our opponents would say: You have not consulted the people, you have not referred to such a scheme in the course of the last election; therefore you have no right to spend that money. These hon. gentlemen are now in power—I will not say that they are in the manger, as they said of us, I have too much consideration for them to say such a thing, and I do not wish to be in the least sarcastic—but have I not the right to look into their sincerity? Why have they so quickly changed their minds? How comes it that when the Liberals acted in such a manner, it was all wrong, and now that the Conservatives are doing the same thing, everything is all right and sweet?

As to the use to which public funds may be put, differences of opinion are permissible; but I hold that there can be but one opinion as to the principle that the people's representatives are not sent here to give away our money. The people's money should be spent on the people. Whether we vote $2,000 or $100,000, I have the right to ask for the papers and look into the expenditure, so as to know who has profited by it. Have not hon. gentlemen on the other side shown that they were unwilling to give up that privilege? When, at Sorel, in the county of Richelieu, it came to light that the Government had sold some paint to a member, the aforesaid gentlemen, unwilling to sacrifice any of the popular franchises, insisted before the Public Accounts Committee that an inquiry be held, so as to make a clear breast of the whole business. Their action was entirely justified. But if this proposal is agreed to, thirty-five millions will be sent over to London and spent there, without the representatives of the Canadian people having a word to say about it, or being called upon to control, and criticise the expenditure, or audit the accounts. I maintain that such a departure is unconstitutional. Under the constitution we have the power to establish a navy, but there is not a word empowering us to have ships built abroad.

I say 'abroad,' meaning that it is outside the jurisdiction of the Canadian House of Commons, outside our jurisdiction. This work being carried out in Great Britain, we will have no control over the expenditure; therefore I say the measure is unconstitutional. The Government may carry through the measure in spite of the constitution; they hold power, they can get their majority to put it through; but I maintain such action will be contrary to all principles of representative government, of the government of the people by the people and for the people. The Postmaster General stated that is was no time for words, but for deeds. Let us see how he follows the rule laid down by himself. How about his former statements, promises and criticisms? He has not done a single thing to carry out his pledge to the Canadian electorate. Words are of no use, he says, deeds are in order. Very well then, be the first to apply that principle: when one states that there is no use for a navy, the words must have a meaning, or was it resolved even then that the Navy Act would remain in the statute book?

An hon. MEMBER: (Translation.) What about the Empire?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) What does he want, and where does he hail from? At any rate, he must be a stalwart. Reference has been made to Canada's autonomy. For many years back, I hear that question debated. What should we understand by the country's autonomy? I for one consider that the country's autonomy means the maintenance of the rights and privileges which we enjoy. Are we really preserving the autonomy of Canada when we sacrifice the rights and privileges which the House of Commons enjoys of controlling public expenditure and looking into the Government accounts? Have we the right to delegate to some other country the powers of the House of Commons, its right to control public expenditure? Can we delegate those rights to another country? What is there to justify such action on our part? Have I the right to state to my constituents that I have delegated my powers to some other country? No, I have not that right, and my electors are entitled to know how the funds voted have been expended and whether they have been properly expended. I should be in a position to give them some assurance that I have looked into the accounts, controlled the expenditure, ascertained to whom the moneys have been paid and for what purpose. After all this has been done, I must be able to draw the conclusion that the money of the Canadian people has been put to proper use. How could I arrive at such a conclusion without having the data in hand if I am not posted as to any of the facts, and how could I under such circumstances put myself right with my constituents? I say that the Government's policy is unconstitutional, and I protest with all my might against its being carried out.

It is contended that it would cost more to build those ships in Canada than it would to build them in Great Britain. Well let us, for the sake of argument, admit the truth of this contention. What about it, if the money is spent here? Our people would get the advantage; they would supply the raw material, the coal, the iron, the steel, in short all that is required for building these ships. The mechanics in the large Canadian centres are interested in having these ships built in the country. You will not find a single mechanic to approve of the idea of having these ships built outside of Canada. Just try to impress them with that view at some public meeting and you will find out how they feel about it. All will agree in stating that such works should be carried on in Canada.

Meanwhile we are offered something great in the shape of consolation. The Postmaster General joins in with the Prime Minister to inform us that we will have a representative yonder. What a thundering representative, what a powerful protection in the councils of the Empire! One representative to control the British House of Commons. I pity that poor Canadian, he will have a hard time in making himself heard up there. Canada does not want anything of the kind. It seems to me that the voice of our House of Commons would have a better chance of making itself heard. whoever is sent thither, whatever his personal and political worth, his influence will not amount to much over Imperial decrees when it comes to deciding between war or peace, and once it has been resolved to spend our money differently from what we would have liked. When this Government introduces a measure, it is thoroughly overhauled, and the Opposition has the right to offer criticisms. So I say that such a system of representaion is not satisfactory, is unconstitutional and besides affords no protection whatever.

The Postmaster General stated with a great flourish of trumpets: Great Britain is proud of us. Of course she is, otherwise she would certainly be difficult to please. Just think of it, a gift of thirty-five millions. If instead we had given fifty millions, she would be still prouder of us: and if we reached the one hundred million mark, she would exclaim: 'Now, now, aren't those Canucks well fixed!' But we will have no share in that gift over here. We will not be invited to the feast. You may be sure that we will not be seen at the dance.

A moment ago I said a word in reference to the Georgian Bay canal. Why not carry out this great work, which is so necessary for the transportation of our products, from lake Huron, along French river, the Mattawa, the Ottawa, the des Prairies and St. Lawrence rivers to Montreal, whence shipments would be made direct to Halifax or London without breaking load, thereby effecting a saving of 400 miles on the journey?

The former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) stated time and again that we owe nothing to Great Britain and that we would be acting more wisely in spending our funds on the Georgian Bay canal. He was right. But we are told in answer that the Welland canal is to be deepened. To my mind that would be money ill spent. Already several millions have been spent on that canal, and hardly is that work carried out than there comes a further proposal for deepening it and turning it into a ship canal.

The Postmaster General greatly amused me when he said in connection with those thirty-five millions: It is a loan we are making. Did you ever hear it stated, Mr. Chairman, that it is the lender who pays interest on the amount of the loan? I for one never heard before of such a transaction. And where will we find those millions which are destined to Great Britain? In Great Britain, no doubt. Now if Great Britain is in a position to lend us thirty-five millions, what need has she of such a gift from our hands? Such is the argument of the Postmaster General. It is a loan, he says, and he adds: It is a good piece of business. If that is the way he transacts his own private business, I do not expect him to grow rich very fast. He is a wealthy man and well deserves it, but I do not think it was by means of such a policy that he obtained that result.

When Mr. Laurier proposed the building of a navy, he stated at the same time that those vessels would be built in Canada. That gave us the assurance that we would get something in return for the expenditure. When a farmer purchases a farm with a view to starting in life one of his boys, he is not any poorer on account of that purchase. He has acquired a farm whose value is equivalent to the money paid out or borrowed. He is neither richer nor poorer on that account. Let us suppose that the two warships bought by the Laurier Government cost on an average one and a half million dollars each; anyway, after the purchase we were owners of those ships. But when one makes a gift, he gets nothing in return. When I give Christmas boxes to my employees, I get nothing in return, and we will be in the same position if we get into the habit of making presents. Do you think that pays? What a transaction! We will be called upon to pay the interest on thirty-five million dollars, and the Postmaster General thinks it is good business. Had he spoken in that sense to his constituents previous to September 21, he would not be here to-day. A mere statement of the principle satisfies one as to its falsity, its utter falsity. Such statements cannot be made seriously before intelligent people. The minister stated that was only preliminary; well, then, what are we to expect next ?

Mr. PELLETIER : (Translation). What I said was preliminary is the granting of a representative in the councils of the Empire.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) But we will have still more to pay when we are allowed several representatives in that council. And if the intention is to allow us several representatives in that council, does it mean that we are on the straight road leading to Imperial federation, through representation in the British House of Commons? Shall I be permitted to go there and represent my constituents? But the very men in the gallery who think I speak so poorly would never agree to that. If this is only the beginning, I am going to take up arms. I refuse to sit in an Imperial council; I am only anxious to maintain our privileges, our constitution and our representative system. If this is only preliminary, a first step, does it mean that we shall be called upon to donate another thirty-five millions next year? When that matter was brought up for the first time, the then leader of the Opposition, to-day the Prime Minister, moved for a grant of twenty millions, but since his trip to Great Britain he has got rich, and now he gives away thirty-five millions. The more one takes, the more one wishes to take.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side say, through their papers and on their own responsibility: Let us be patriotic, let us not put any politics into this question. They even went so far as to request Sir Wilfrid to help them out. Yes, we will help you to jump overboard. What have these hon. gentlemen done with the resolution of March, 1909, which was unanimously voted by this House? When Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his ministers went off to England to carry out what had been resolved upon here, they did not do so of their own movement. They were carrying out the mandate of the whole Parliament concerning the establishment of a navy. At the time hon. gentlemen on the other side did not put any politics into it; they acted on the spur of the moment's happy inspiration. But when they found out that Laurier had carried out what the House had empowered him to do, they changed their mind and blamed him for it. And to-day they come to us and say: Do not put any politics into this question, act as free and independent men. Are they sincere in asking that of us? However, we would comply with the wishes of these hon. gentlemen if we considered it necessary, if there was no better means of settling the matter. But we will not do so seeing that we have no control over what you are going to do, and I dare say you would not follow a different course.

The then Opposition refused to vote the subsidies in 1911 on account of reciprocity. These hon. gentlemen said: You have not consulted the electors on that point, and kept business at a standstill in the country for months and months. It is our turn now. The present Opposition has as much energy, tenacity and devotion as the former Opposition. Do you think we are going to let you pass such a measure? I, for one, am quite disposed to spend many a night here before letting such a proposal go through.

My constituency will not submit to such treatment. And when I address hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House, it is not your humble servant who is speaking; it is the representative of an immense county, settled by a hardy race of men, who are anxious to keep what they have. They would say to me: When agriculture was in such need of help, when irrigation works were needed, when there were hills to level down, canals to build, railways to provide, and which were so sadly wanting in your county, and lastly when a post-office, the necessity for which cannot be denied, was being refused to you, it was bad management on your part, and you had not the right to make such a gift.

The hon. Postmaster General stated that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was no prophet. He is not, but he was right in his guess when he foretold that his opponents when in power would fight among themselves over that navy question. He was a pretty good prophet then. It is objected that it would require too much time to build ships in Canada. But if Great Britain is in a hurry, she could lend us a hand. She might send her most skilful workmen over here, men with a practical and technical training. These men would spend part of their salaries here, and those millions would remain in Canada. Our country would derive some advantage therefrom. To my mind the child should not be expected to assist his father, but rather the father to assist his child. When the young man is anxious to settle down he says to his father: I am of age, and I wish to get married, provide for me. And so the old gentleman purchases a farm, a store, some business, and provides for his son. But in the present case, the child is expected to provide for his father. The end of the world must be at hand. I am not afraid of war, but I fear that the world will soon be coming to an end.

The hon. Postmaster General stated that our mechanics were earning high wages. That is so. Why? Because our industries are in full blast, because, since the coming into power of the Liberal party, great industries have grown up in Canada. The Liberal Government has protected agriculture and those who have settled in the Dominion live comfortably on high wages. That was not the case previous to 1896. Our workingmen were leaving the country, crossing the border. To-day the people find employment and are well paid for the work they do. We have no shipyards to build such vessels, it is contended; well, let us start some. It is an easy matter to provide shipyards, to build factories, to procure all that is required for the building of warships. I stated that the Laurier scheme at any rate gave to the people their money's worth. But of what benefit will this proposal be to us?

The hon. Postmaster General used to say: Act before it is too late. There is no denying that; it is too late to make preparations when the fire is started. The fire brigade must be organized before the fire is on; it is no use then to send for an engine across the seas; extinguishers should be at hand. That is what made Laurier say: Get ready for war in time of peace. Do not wait until the thief has been around to close the stable doors. To-day these gentlemen are the first to say: Do not delay until the fire is started. Well, that is further evidence of their lack of sincerity.

The hon. Postmaster General read a document prepared by a certain Mr. Denault. I have not known that illustrious bishop, he lived long before my time; but I have had occasion to read some of the things written by that great person. That is why I inquired from the minister whether what he was reading was written in French. I am willing to believe that he gave us the correct English translation; but it happens sometimes that there is slipped in a word which does not exactly convey the meaning. I shall go over the report in 'Hansard' and find out what the minister's translation is worth. But that document was not read to the electors in Drummond and Arthabaska, or in Macdonald or in Richelieu. It might have been a good thing to do so at the time; the people might have realized more fully what should be done for the defence of the Empire and their views might have been altered in consequence.

The hon. gentleman stated that at the time the Government was poor. But we have had a rich government since 1896. But is Great Britain poor? All governments under Conservative rule are poor; Can the financial prosperity of the Mother Country be seriously questioned? I believe not, and if Great Britain is not poor, if she is in a position to lend us millions, why should we send her such a gift. I feel indignant at what is going on, and, in spite of my efforts to keep cool, my blood is boiling. Why such a gift when our lands are in need of irrigation, when we have so many things to do? Let us carry on necessary improvements, instead of us giving Great Britain thirty-five millions, let Great Britain give us an equal amount. That would be a difference of seventy millions. When I think this is only the beginning, it makes me mad.

The hon. Postmaster General gave a list of the presents which were made to Great Britain in times past? Of course, he would never have read that list to the electors previous to September 21. He stated that was the list of Great Britain's benefactors. He spoke of 'our sacred duty'; that is all very well, but our primary duty is to assist and protect our wives and children, not other people's. Our primary duty is to make this country prosperous, such is 'our sacred duty.' What would we do if war broke out between Germany and Great Britain? How could I, a farmer, ship my products abroad on board vessels which would leave Halifax and might be captured on the way by some small German warship. As is known, in time of war there is no insurance against piracy and looting expeditions. We would be ruined and our products would be for German consumption only, since we would be without warships to protect them. In time of war, to the . . . .

An hon. MEMBER: (Translation.). To the victor, the spoils.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) Just so. Who will protect our cargoes of agricultural products? All that requires consideration, and the English and Scotch people, who are practical men, business men, know to what straits farmers are put at times to make both ends meet; what an amount of labour, of spirit, of self-denial, of frugality, make up the life of a successful farmer. How will our shipments of horses, of cattle, of cheese and butter be protected in time of war, considering we have no vessels at Halifax to ward off privateers and freebooters ?

The Postmaster General waved the French flag; I almost thought he was going to make a gift to France as well. Why should we not give France thirty-five millions, seeing that both countries are so friendly and united by the entente cordiale? You will be making somebody jealous, by giving thirty-five millions to one and nothing to the other.

Who are the people who defied the Mother Country? They were not the French settlers. Who were the men who in 1774 fired at the British flag in Boston harbour? They were not the inhabitants of New France. They were settlers who had come from London and had settled in what was known as New England. And why? Because the Mother Country wished to levy taxation on them as she is trying to do at present in our case. Who defended the British flag in this country of ours? It was the French Canadians who, after Canada had passed under British rule, prevented Canada from returning under French rule. Flag-waving, bragging of one's loyalty, reminds one of those women who loudly proclaim the purity of their lives; it makes one suspicious. The old saw is right: a guilty conscience needs no accuser. I say that there is no need for any flag-waving in this House. When the Mother Country was made to suffer, it was through her own progeny; when she had to fight, it was against her own children. Of course, I am not taking sides in the quarrel; but if one hundred million people are separated from the Mother Country, that was accomplished after the guns had roared.

The Government have had to go before the people in Macdonald, Richelieu and Hochelaga, but in none of those constituencies have they made known their policy; that is, their intention to grant that thirty-five millions to Great Britain. Not a word was said about it. We will give it out on the floor of the House, they said. But it was before the electorate, properly their judges, that Government should have expounded their policy. The Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) should have intimated to the electorate in Richelieu. We have made up our minds to give thirty-five millions to Great Britain. It was feared that this policy of the Government would be rejected by the people; that is why they kept their mouths closed on the subject. In spite of all that, they were licked in Richelieu. They won in Macdonald, but in Hochelaga there was practically no fighting, the right hon. leader of the Opposition having expressed the wish that the Government candidate be not opposed, considering that their stand on the navy question had not as yet been announced. But in all three constituencies you should have made known beforehand to the electors your intention of donating that thirty-five millions to Great Britain.

I understand that the former minister of Public Works is sick; I am sorry to hear it, and I hope he will promptly recover. When he comes back, I intend asking him why he changed his mind, and I will not be the loser for waiting a while. He used to say in Jacques Cartier, and he repeated it in Montcalm: Let us strengthen our defences. Several Nationalists propounded the same views. The boundary line between Canada and the United States is a thousand miles long and there is not even a 3-foot fence to cut us off from the neighbouring republic. Let us spend on our land defences the amount Mr. Laurier is anxious to spend on a navy. What has made him change his mind? To-day the proposal is to have ships built in England for Great Britain's use. Those gentlemen used to say: There is no danger for Canada, and if ever war breaks out between us and the United States, it will not be through the port of Halifax, or that of St. John, or that of Quebec, that the enemy will penetrate into our territory, neither will it be by following the rivers or water courses. So let us build up our land defences. There is no more said about that nowadays, no more defences to build, those were stories good in old father Adam's time.

When we had difficulties with the neighbouring republic over our fisheries, we obtained fifteen millions compensation for the fish taken in Canadian waters. Which shows the need of vessels to protect our fisheries, as the same events may recur again. Mr. Chairman, the general cry, and rightly so, is educate the children. Let us have schools and schools again to prepare the young generation for the struggles of the future. Let us send our children to classical colleges, commercial schools, technical and engineering schools. The country is going to a great deal of expense to equip the rising generation for the struggles of their grown-up days. But why should we get them educated, if they are to be left aside when it comes to carrying on our government works? Of what use will that education be if those works are farmed out abroad? I say that we have in this country skilled and experienced workmen, capable of catering to all the country's requirements. It is objected that we have not the necessary equipment. To that I answer: If that is the case, let us equip ourselves right now. Would not the people of the maritime provinces, who are so proud, and rightly so, of their fine seaports, see with pleasure the building of those ships carried on in their midst? Would not Halifax, Sydney or St. John gladly undertake such works, build ships on our own territory, seeing that they have on hand all that is required for that purpose: wood, iron, coal, etc. The people of the maritime provinces should with one voice demand of the Government they support that the ships required be built right there, failing which, our Government would not be doing its duty. I appeal to the representatives of the maritime provinces and urge them to ponder over my words. I believe they will reach the same conclusion as I have, and say that those ships should be built on Canadian soil.

Have we had to apply to outsiders for the building of wharfs at Halifax, Pictou, Gaspé, Quebec, Lévis, Montreal and elsewhere? No, we dispensed with British labour in the building of those wharfs. We now have at Montreal something wonderful, I mean a dry dock. To what use are we going to put it? Was it brought over here only for the show? Apparently the new Government have resolved to follow up what their predecessors had undertaken. True, this Government has not initiated the work, but it carried to completion what the previous administration had started. What will be the use of a dry dock, if the work is carried on abroad? We did not require the services of outsiders to build the Lachine, Soulanges, Beauharnois, Rideau, Welland, Chambly and Sault Ste. Marie canals, the latter possibly the most important in the world. That shows that our country is in a position to carry out all the improvements which may be required. We have the intelligence, the muscle and brains of the French-Canadians and Canadians generally, and with that I see no need of calling in outsiders. The Victoria bridge, which at one time was classed among the marvels of the world, and rightly so, was built entirely by our people, and solidly built, too. It was opened in 1860, and never went down. The Quebec bridge did go down through an accident, but it will be rebuilt and carried to completion without any need for calling in help from Great Britain. We have also bridges at St. John's, Terrebonne, Charlemagne and many other points, and all those important works have been carried through without our being obliged to get mechanics from the Old Country. Our Canadian workmen did it all.

The French-Canadian workmen are bright; if you enter factories on the other side of the line, you will find French-Canadians at the head of the most important of them. Our compatriots have shown cleverness, skill and a good disposition. Everywhere in those large centres, in the great manufacturing industries, they have evidence of skill, and if you visit those establishments you will find many French Canadians as managers. Why should it turn out otherwise in regard to this new undertaking? Our compatriots are better educated now than they were formerly. Our schools have turned out men of ability, and I can assure you that those who have settled on the other side of the line are a credit to the Dominion. All that testifies to the efficiency of our mechanics: Who built the most powerful elevators to be found in any part of the world? I mean those at Montreal? Are the elevators in Philadelphia, New York or Boston comparable to them? Americans come here to learn what is being done in Canada in that line. All those elevators have been built by Canadians.

If any further evidence was needed of our country's progress in the matter of equipment, I would point out to the establishment here of a branch of the Royal mint; we now turn out in Ottawa the coins which formerly we could obtain from England only. According to the Government's contention, we should never undertake anything new, but everlastingly follow in the beaten path. When the spinning of cotton was introduced into this country, much fun was made at the expense of that valiant Montreal merchant, Mr. Victor Hudon, who started the first factory at Hochelaga. That renowned establishment is the finest in Canada. The same might be said of the factories established at Valleyfield and Point St. Charles.

When we started building railways, it was done under government supervision, and Sir Etienne Cartier did not put in the statute: You will have your ships built in the Old Country, no, not in Great Britain, but in Canada. And when he sang 'Oh, Canada, my country, my love,' he did not mean that England should be employed to do our work. Just now twenty-five million dollars are being spent to build a tunnel from the village of St. Laurent, where I have the honour to reside, right through Mount Royal and terminating at Dorchester street, in the city of Montreal. Canadians are doing that work. There are 2,500 men so employed. That brings money to the storekeeper, the butcher, the grocer, etc., everybody profits by it. Nobody thinks of getting men from Great Britain to do the work.

But, Mr. Chairman, is there not a statute which shows how jealously we should watch over the interests of the working classes in this country? The Alien Labour Act forbids the importing into Canada of foreign labour, except in cases where skilled workmen are needed and cannot be procured here. Recently I summoned before the magistrate the manager of the Windsor hotel, Montreal, who had procured abroad some help for his kitchens. The manager was arrested and fined under the Alien Labour Act.

A word more in connection with the labour question. In order to show to this hon. House what measure of protection the law affords to workingmen, I may recall what is being done in the great city of Montreal. They have regulations there to prevent outsiders from competing with the local hands. Policemen must reside within the city limits. All that is done with a view to protecting the city's interests. What Montreal does on a small scale, we should do here on a larger scale, and consequently not allow our funds to be spent outside Canadian territory.

Who were the men who showed the greatest devotion to the Mother Country at the time of the Boer war? The Nationalists would not hear of any help being given. The master resigned his mandate and appealed once more to the electors of Labelle, because the Government had decided to assist Great Britain in a war which did not concern us. His object was to get returned especially for the object of opposing that measure. But Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not affected by such considerations and did not for one moment falter in the path of duty. The Opposition was unanimous in approving the stand of the Laurier Government. Canadians were left entirely free to enlist, but they are a generous people and volunteers were not lacking. Some of them were killed, others wounded, all that through mere devotion to the Mother Country. On that occasion the Liberals fulfilled their duty in spite of the protests and opposition of the Nationalists. Some expenditure was incurred and it cost us a good deal of money to perform our duty. It seems to me that to-day the Mother Country should compensate us, do something for the Canadians in consideration for the services rendered and make us a present of a few ships. She should say: Here are two or three warships, make use of them and if ever we require them, you will return them to us, but in the meantime we are anxious to help you on.

Canada owes at the lowest four hundred and fifty millions. That is a large amount. It will take us a long time to pay that up, and the interest charges eat up a considerable amount. If we add to that amount thirty-five millions, that will bring the capital of the debt close to five hundred millions. Is that wise policy? Should the people's money be administered in that way? If we were clear of debt, I would not complain so much; thirty-five millions for a wealthy country does not seem so very much. But considering that we already owe four hundred and fifty millions, that we have the Quebec bridge to finish, the Hudson Bay railway to build, other works also which will cost at the lowest twenty-five millions, the Welland canal to deepen, I say where will we find the money for all that? Are we in a position to make presents? No, we should not think of it. What would we say of a farmer who having a mortgaged farm would keep on making presents right and left? We would consider him crazy; we would say to him: Pay your debts first, pay your dues to the priest, your taxes, etc., and after that you will make presents if you have a mind to. Before making presents, Canada should pay her debts. The rule is the same whether it be the state or an individual. That money belongs to two classes of persons: to the people, in the first place, and then to the creditors. The rule is the same the world over. Now, I inquire from the Government whether it has consulted the people? We all know that it has not done so. Did it consult Canada's creditors?

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) We never thought of that.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) There are a good many other things of which you never thought. The rule of common law is well known; one has no right to give what does not belong to him. Now the thirty-five millions which it is intended to give away are not the property of the Government. What is the oath which every member takes in this House? To faithfully and conscientiously fulfil his duty as representative of the people. Have not the ministers been called upon to take that same oath? It is very strict. The hon. minister may laugh to his heart's content . . . .

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) I am not laughing about that.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) You may laugh, but a time will come when it will be in spite of you.

Mr. Chairman, I have detained the House rather long, but I feel that I have done my duty, nothing more than my duty, and in taking my seat I wish to sum up in two words what I have said. The people will decide whether the policy expounded by the Government is beneficial or not. But the people cannot so decide unless they are consulted. We should go to the polls. The advantages and disadvantages should be set forth, and then we will know whether your humble servant is in the right.

I appeal to all members of this House, but particularly to former Nationalists. I cannot say how they propose voting. Of course, that is their own business. They are not obliged to consult me any more than I am obliged to consult them; but I say that this grant for the navy should not be put through previous to consulting the people. No contribution without a plebiscite, without hearing from the electors, our judges in the nature of things. I cannot wish them success for their contention is wrong. Let their electors decide. But the electors have good memories, and when an opportunity offers they will show you that they have not forgotten the statements you made previous to September 21 as well as your behaviour since that date.

Mr. AIKINS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Pelletier for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the House adjourns I might say that it would be very advantageous during this discussion to have the plans for the lay-out of the proposed shipyard at St. John in connection with the dry-dock under construction there; also the plans relating to the proposals for dry-docks at Sydney, Cape Breton and Montreal, together with any correspondence which has taken place between the owners of the dry-docks or any one on their behalf and the Department of Marine and Fisheries or any member of the Government. I would ask my hon. friend if he would be good enough to lay these documents on the table of the House when the discussion is resumed on Monday.

Mr. HAZEN: I think that most of the documents to which my hon. friend refers in connection with the construction of dry-docks are under the control, not of my department, but of the Department of Public Works. If my hon. friend, however, will give me a memorandum of the documents he wants, I will do what I can to see that they are produced.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the tender of Cammell, Laird and Company, a copy of which was laid on the table of the House recently, the plan for the lay-out of the ship-building plant is specially referred to, and, as it states that a copy was forwarded to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, my hon. friend will have that at all events.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, December 16, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That, as the time for receiving petitions for private Bills, and the time for presenting private Bills without an additional charge will be curtailed by the Christmas adjournment, be it resolved, That petitions for private Bills be received by the House if presented on or before January 23, 1913, and that the time for presenting private Bills without the payement of the additional charges provided for under paragraph (b) and (e) of subsection 3 of rule 89, be stended until February 6, 1913, and March 6, 1913, respectively.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

THE GEORGIAN BAY SHIP CANAL.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to construct the Georgian Bay Ship canal?
2. If so, will an amount be included in the Estimates of the present session for the purpose of commencing the work?

Mr. ROCHE: Information will be given when Estimates are brought down.

GOVERNMENT AUTOMOBILES.

Mr. WILSON (Laval):

1. How many automobiles have been purchased by the Government or by any of its members since October 10, 1911?
2. Were such automobiles purchased after competitive prices had been received by tender?
3. What was the cost of each automobile so purchased?
4. In addition to the purchase price, what further amount has been paid for repairs, fittings, upkeep, storage, &c., of the said automobiles?
5. By whom are the said automobiles used?
6. How many of them are used for other than official business?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Department of Militia and Defence.—Answered last session (see unrevised 'Hansard,' page 4117).

Post Office Department.—Two.

2. Department of Militia and Defence.—Answered by No. 1.

Post Office Department.—No.

3. Department of Militia and Defence.—Cost of car, fitted with Dunlop traction tread tires, top glass, front, speedometer, gas lamps and generator, 3 oil lamps, horn, kit of tools, tire repair outfit and pump, $850; additional equipment, viz.: 1 spare traction tread cover, 4 tubes, 1 tire envelope, 1 set of tire holders, 1 top envelope, 1 jack, 1 cutout, supplied for $101.60; total, $951.60.

Post Office Department. — (Quebec), $1,550 and (Ottawa) $4,500.

4. Department of Militia and Defence.—Statement of expenditure from time of purchase to 15th November, 1912, for running, repairs, fittings, upkeep, storage, &c., of twelve automobiles and three gramm trucks.—1st division, $72.42; 2nd division, $75.80; 3rd division, $7.19; 4th division, $81.29; 5th division, $58.91; 6th division, $135.27; 10th district, $133.46; 11th district, $32.60; 13th district, $111.55; headquarters, $78.38; Petawawa, $201.97; total, $988.84.

Post Office Department. — (Quebec), $292.21; (Ottawa), repairs, $80.50; fittings (including tires, battery, speedometer, presto light tank, slip covers, &c., $971.75; upkeep (gasoline, oil, grease, &c., $201.03; wages of chauffeur, $497.33; storage, $93.80; —$1,844.41; total, $2,136 62.

5. Department of Militia and Defence.—Answered by No. 1.

Post Office Department.—For the use of the department.

6. Department of Militia and Defence.—None.

Post Office Department.—For the use of the department.

Mr. RAINVILLE:

1. How many automobiles were purchased by the Government or by any of its members, previous to October 10, 1911?

2. Were such automobiles purchased after competitive prices had been received by tender?

3. What was the cost of each automobile so purchased?

4. In addition to the purchase price, what further amount has been paid for repairs, fittings, upkeep, storage, &c., of the said automobiles?

5. By whom are the said automobiles used?

6. How many of them are used for other than official business?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. At Toronto—2 auto trucks and 4 motor mail vans purchased 5th June, 1911. At Montreal—1 purchased 19th July, 1910.

2. At Toronto—Yes; at Montreal, No.

3. At Toronto—Auto trucks, $3,000 each.. .. .. $ 6,000
Motor mail vans, $2,500 each.. 10,000
At Montreal—Cost, $4,260; duty, &c.. .. ..

6. An inquiry for the minister's information was also made by his secretary. He was occupied one week. Warden Platt's is of date 10th of April, 1912. The secretary reported verbally on his return to Ottawa and submitted depositions.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Has Dr. Platt tendered to the Government his resignation as warden of Portsmouth penitentiary? If so, when?
2. Who is at present acting as warden of said penitentiary and how long has he been performing the duties of that office?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes, June 20, 1912.
2. Inspector Stewart—since May 1, 1912.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY MANAGEMENT.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Did the Minister of Railways and Canals, or did any other member of the Government authorize Mr. M. G. Siddall to make an announcement to the effect that a change would at no distant date be made in the management of the Intercolonial railway?
2. Did the Minister of Railways and Canals, or any other member of the Government give any assurance to Mr. M. G. Siddall or to any other person that any promise given to the effect that there would at no distant date be a change made in the Intercolonial railway management would be given effect by the Government?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. No.
2. Answered by number one.

FREIGHT AT PICTOU, N.S.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. What amount was paid for the handling of freight at Pictou during the season of 1910-1911 in connection with winter service with Prince Edward Island?
2. What quantity of freight was shipped and received at said port during said season on said service?
3. What amount was paid for the handling of freight at Pictou during the season of 1911-12, in connection with said service?
24. What quantity of freight was shipped and received on said service during 1911-12 at said port?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. $4,575.
2. 8,340 tons.
3. $5,368.
4. 7,549 tons.

STE. ADELAIDE DE PABOS BREAKWATER.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has a contract been awarded for an extension to the breakwater at Ste. Adelaide de Pabos, county of Gaspé?
2. If so, to whom and at what figure?
3. Who were the other tenderers, if any, and what were the figures of their tenders?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes.
2. Arthur Nadeau and Edmond Nadeau for $6,485.
3. J. E. Bernier.. .. .. $6,950
J. Wilfrid Begin.. 7,200
David Duguay.. 9,000

SALMON RIVER INDIAN SCHOOL.

Mr. KYTE:

1. What was the number of pupils enrolled in the Indian school at Salmon river, Richmond county, in each school year from 1890 to 1911 inclusive, and the grade of each?
2. What is the number of pupils enrolled there at present time and the grade of each?
3. What was the number of adult Indians of both sexes at the Indian reserve at Salmon river during each year of the years from 1890 to 1911 inclusive?
4. What is the number of adult Indians of both sexes at the reserve at the present time?
5. What was the average school attendance in each year from 1890 to 1911 inclusive?
6. What is the average attendance at the present time?
7. What is the number of children between the ages of 5 and 15 years on said reserve in each year from 1890 to 1911 inclusive?
8. What is the number of children between the ages of 5 and 15 years on the reserve at the present time?
9. What are the hours each day during which teaching is to be carried on?
10. Is the school conducted under the regulations of the Nova Scotia council of Public Instructions?
11. If not, who prescribed the regulations governing the school, the grading and the course of study?
12. Is the school under the inspection of the public school inspector for the district?

Mr. ROCHE:

1.

Year.	Enrolment.	Standard of Grade. I.	II.	III.	IV.	V.	VI.
1890	24	Standards not given.
1891	32	"	"	"
1892	27	"	"	"
1893	27	"	"	"
1894	30	11	7	7	4	1	..
1895	29	16	8	4	1	..	..
1896	33	16	10	4	3	..	..
1897	23	12	7	3	1	..	..
1898	26	6	10	5	3	2	..
1899	24	7	8	5	..	1	3
1900	25	7	7	2	5	2	2
1901	25	14	3	3	3	1	1
1902	25	17	3	2	2	..	1
1903	28	17	8	1	2	..	..
1904	21	10	9	..	2	..	..
1905	26	10	15	1	..	..	..
1906	27	16	9	2	..	..	..

Year.	Enrolment.	Standard of Grade. I.	II.	III.	IV.	V	VI.
1907	16	9	5	3	1	..	..
1908	23	9	8	4	2	..	..
1909	26	16	4	4	2	..	..
1910	26	14	6	5	..	..	..
1911	23	15	5	3	..	..	..

2. Present enrolment, 20 pupils; Standard I., 13 pupils; Standard II., 5 pupils; Standard III., 2 pupils.

3. There are no returns showing age or sex of Indians on this reserve previous to 1901.

Year.	Male.	Female.
1901	32	22
1902	33	28
1903	26	26
1904	35	39
1905	24	25
1906	25	26
1907	23	23
1908	27	25
1909	18	21
1910	24	25
1911	24	25

4. Twenty-nine males, 31 females.

5. 1890, 6; 1891, 12; 1892, 7; 1893 10; 1894, 10; 1895, 17; 1896, 10; 1897, 8; 1898, 9; 1899, 5; 1900, 8; 1901, 5; 1902, 5; 1903, 7; 1904, 5; 1905, 8; 1906, 8; 1907, 6; 1908, 7; 1909, 8; 1910, 7; 1911, 8.

6. Ten.

7. No returns are given for any year previous to 1901. Census returns only show the number of children between the ages of 6 and 15 years which are as follows: 1901, 35; 1902, 26; 1903, 27; 1904, 25; 1905, 24; 1906, 35; 1907, 22; 1908, 28; 1909, 37; 1910, 32; 1911, 32.

8. Ages, 6 to 15 years, 18 boys; 17 girls. The census returns only show the number of children between the ages of 6 and 15 years.

9. The morning session is from 9 a.m. to noon, and the afternoon session from 1 p. m., with a recess during each session of not less than 15 minutes and not more than 20 minutes.

10. No.

11. The Department of Indian Affairs.

12. Yes.

COMMISSIONER W. E. DORSETT.

Mr. TURRIFF :

1. Is W. E. Dorsett a commissioner appointed to hold investigations as to partisanship of Government officials?

2. Does he take evidence under oath?

3. If so, under what authority does he do so?

Mr. CODERRE :

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

Mr. ROCHE.

3. Under authority of an Order in Council, dated 27th November, 1896.

THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY —SHIPMENT OF FREIGHT.

*Mr. MURPHY :

1. Has the attention of the Government been directed to the report of a speech alleged to have been delivered before the Dartmouth Board of Trade by the hon. member for Shelbourne and Queens on October 15, 1912, and to the statements therein attributed to the said hon. member, namely, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company will not ship its freight from a Canadian port?

2. If so, has the Government any information showing that it is not the intention of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to ship its freight from a Canadian port?

3. If so, what action will be taken by the Government to prevent the company from carrying out such an intention?

Mr. BORDEN :

1. Yes, by the question of the hon. member.

2. The Government has no information indicating any intention on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to depart from the terms of its contract in this respect.

MR. VINCENT BRENNAN.

Mr. LAW :

1. Has Vincent Brennan, of Woods harbour, Shelburne county, N.S., been appointed fishery guardian?

If so, is said Vincent Brennan a British subject, and when was he naturalized?

Mr. HAZEN :

1. Yes.

2. As far as the department is aware, he is a British subject. His name is on the voters' list.

BARRINGTON FISHERY INSPECTOR.

Mr. LAW :

1. What salary did Andrew Robertson, of Barrington, N.S., fishery inspector, receive at the time of his dismissal?

2. What salary does Ward Fisher, fishery inspector, receive?

Mr. HAZEN :

1. $700 per annum.

2. $1,200 per annum.

MR. ELZEAR FISET.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has Mr. Elzéar Fiset, an advocate at Quebec, been appointed to a situation in the Post Office Department at Quebec or at Ottawa?

2. If so, what do his duties consist of and what is his salary?

Mr. PELLETIER :

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN QUEBEC.

Mr. ARTHURS :

1. For how many towns, villages or parishes, in the province of Quebec, having a population of 2,000 or less, has money been voted by this Parliament for public buildings during the past five fiscal years?
2. What is the population in each case?
3. What is the amount of gross postal revenue in each case?

Mr. ROCHE :

	Population.	Postal Revenue.
1. 22.
2. Arthabaska,	1,458	$2,123.90
Berthier (en haut)	1,335	2,000.04
Cookshire,	996	3,620.89
East Angus,	No information	2,042.32
Iberville,	1,905	1,791.06
Knowlton,	885	2,790.52
Laurentides,	1,128	1,375.50
Louiseville,	1,675	2,322.74
Marieville,	1,587	1,455.64
Murray Bay,	1,449	1,970.36
Napierville.	1,000	612.07
New Carlisle,	1,104	1,556.38
Pierreville,	1,363	2,206.30
Plessisville,	1,559	1,706.81
Rigaud,	856	1,401.96
Roberval,	1,737	3,068.44
Rock Island,	861	4,809.58
St. Casimir,	2,640	1,303.93
St. Gabriel de Brandon,	1,431	1,431.53
St. Laurent,	1,860	1,386.66
Weedon Station,	1,254	742.75
St. Jacques Montcalm	No information	783.69

VALLEE DES ERABLES POST OFFICE.

Mr. BOYER :

1. Did not the previous Government decide to open a post office in a part of the parish of St. Polycarpe, called Le Ruisseau, under the name of Bourbonnais?
2. Does the present Government intend to proceed with the creation of this new office?
3. Who has been recommended for postmaster and by whom?

Mr. PELLETIER :

1. Yes.
2 and 3. This office has been opened under the name of Vallee des Erables, with Mr. Ludger Bourbonnais as postmaster, on instructions of the Postmaster General.

GEORGE DICKIN.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Is George Dickin a homestead inspector?
2. If so, when was he appointed and what salary is he paid?
3. To what land district is he attached?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes. George Dickin.
2. 5th of December, 1911.
3. He is located at Manor, Saskatchewan, and attached to the Estevan agency.

CHARLES R. INMAN.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Was Charles R. Inman, immigration agent at Aroostock junction, N.B., dismissed from office? If so, when and for what reasons?
2. Was an investigation held into his conduct? If so, by whom?
3. Was the evidence taken at such investigation reported to the Department of the Interior with a recommendation thereon?
4. Did the department make the dismissal on such recommendation?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes. 15th of April, 1912. Active partisanship.
2. No.
3 and 4. Answered by No. 2.

RIVER SCIBOUIT PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot):

1. What amount was spent by the Department of Public Works in the River Scibouit, parish of Ste Helène, county of Bagot, during the months of May and June, 1912?
2. What are the names of the persons who worked under the direction of the engineer of the Department of Public Works, and how much did each person receive?
3. Have Messrs. Eusèbe Petit, Cléophas Laforme, Alaric Rivet, Joseph Pariseault, Alphonse Beloal, U. L. Collette, and Trottier, been employed by the said engineer? If so, how much has each of these persons received?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. $137.
2. J. E. Petit.. .. .. $44.00
   S. Gadbois.. .. .. 18.50
   A. Beloal.. .. .. 18.50
   A. Rivet.. .. .. 22.50
   Joseph Parizeau.. .. .. 10.00
   C. Laforme.. .. .. 23.50
3. J. E. Petit.. .. .. 44.00
   Cleophas Laforme.. .. .. 23.50
   Joseph Parizeau.. .. .. 10.00
   Alphonse Beloal.. .. .. 18.50

U. L. Collette, not employed; Allaric Rivet, not employed. Paul Trottier, assistant engineer, employed at a fixed salary. He had supervision of the above-mentioned work.

STELLARTON PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Who was the owner of the land acquired at Stellarton, Nova Scotia, for a public building?

2. When was the said land acquired by expropriation?
3. What was the price?
4. From whom were options taken and what was the price agreed upon in each case?
5. Has any vote been made for the public building in Stellarton? If so, when?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Mrs. Mary McKay.
2. Expropriated by authority of Order in Council of April 30, 1912.
3. $4,000.
4. Acadia Coal Co. offers lot on corner of Jubilee avenue and Main street for $3,500; M. Douglas offers lot on Main street, 120 x 220, for $5,000, or part of lot 70 x 100, for $3,000, and another offer of a lot, 60 x 100, for $2,700. Mary A. McKay offers lot on Main street, 98 x 130 feet, for $4,000. No options were given on the Soby lot, adjoining the Acadia Coal Company's lot, but could be purchased, 50 x 100, for $3,000, and the Culton lot, 90 x 100 feet, could be purchased for $5.500.
5. Yes, $4,000 in Estimates for fiscal year 1911-12.

DE WOLFE McLEAN.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has de Wolfe McLean, of Hopewell, N.S., been paid for his services as special fishery guardian in 1911?
2. If not, when will he be paid?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. Answered by No. 1.

PARSBORO GOVERNMENT BUILDING

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Who is the inspector of the Government buildings being erected at Parrsboro, N.S.?
2. What remuneration is he receiving?
3. Is the same person the Indian agent and Indian medical doctor for the Half Way River Reservation, Cumberland county, N.S.?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. J. C. McDougall.
2. $4 per day.
3. Yes.

HOBSON'S NOSE LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Were any repairs made during 1912 to the Hobson's Nose lighthouse, Lunenburg county, N.S.?
2. If so, what is the total expenditure made and the nature of the work performed?
3. Who was the foreman in charge of the said work?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. The estimated cost is $2,600. Accounts received to date, $2,380.81. It is not certain that all accounts have yet been received. The work performed consisted of extensive repairs to the cribwork breakwater protecting the island.
3. M. A. McKinnon.

BRIDGETOWN DRILL SHED.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Was the drill shed at Bridgewater, N.S., painted during the year 1912?
2. If so, what was the cost of the same, and who performed the work?

Mr. HUGHES:

1. Yes.
2. $665. William S. Messer.

AMHERST POINT WHARF.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

Who was recommended to the Department of Public Works as a foreman for the spending of money upon the Government wharf at Amherst Point, Cumberland county, N.S., in 1912?

Mr. ROCHE: Stanley Fullerton.

FISHERY INSPECTOR WARD FISHER.

*Mr. KYTE:

Is Ward Fisher, one of the fishery inspectors for Nova Scotia, at Shelburne, N.S., authorized to use a part of the Government building at Shelburne, N.S., set apart for the use of customs officials, in the discharge of his official duties as fishery inspector?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

IMMIGRATION OF ORIENTALS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Have any steps been taken, or is there any intention to in any way alter or amend the arrangements made by the late Government with the Government of Japan, as to the immigration of Japanese into Canada? If so, what are the alterations or amendments?
2. Have any steps been taken or is there any intention to in any way alter the arrangement made between the late Government with the Imperial Government, as to immigration from India to Canada? If so, what are the alterations?
3. Has any request been made to the Government by companies or contractors carrying out large works in British Columbia to allow them to import Asiatics for employment on such works? If so, has such request been granted?
4. Has the Government any proposals for increasing the restrictions upon Orientals coming into Canada? If so, what are they and when will they be put into force?
5. Have any alterations been made in the regulations adopted by the late Government with respect to Chinese, Japanese or Hindoos coming into Canada? If so, what alterations have been made?

6. Have any restrictions been imposed by the present Administration on the immigration of Japanese, Hindoos or Chinese into Canada? If so, what are the restrictions?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. The subject is under consideration in connection with the treaty between Great Britain and Japan signed on the 3rd. April, 1911. In the meantime no alterations or amendments have been made.

2. No steps have been taken to alter the existing arrangements. The future policy of the Government will be a matter for consideration.

3. No.

4. The Government will announce in due course any alteration in policy upon which it may determine.

5. No.

6. No additional restrictions have been imposed.

FISHERY LICENSES TO JAPANESE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many licenses were issued by the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Nanaimo in the years 1911 and 1912 to Japanese fishermen to carry on herring fishery in Canadian waters?

2. How many of such licenses have been issued during the months of October, November and December, 1912?

3. Has the policy of the Government in regard to the issue of fishery licenses in British Columbia been modified? If so, in what way?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. No licenses issued except to British subjects. Two licenses were to British subjects of Japanese extraction in 1911. five in 1912.

2. Five.

3. Yes, in the northern district of the province. The salmon fishery licenses in the past were issued in connection with the canneries. For the coming year licenses, independent of any cannery, will be issued to bona fide white fishermen owning their own boats and gear, who may apply for such. A sufficient number of licenses to cover all such applications, it is anticipated will be received, is being reserved for this purpose.

PROPOSED LONG SAULT DAM.

Mr. WILSON (Laval):

1. Has the International Waterways Commission, created by an Act of the United States Congress, approved July 13, 1902, and concurred in by the Canadian Government, made any interim or fiscal report upon the project of the St. Lawrence Power Company and the Long Sault Development Company for the construction of a dam on the Long Sault rapids, opposite Cornwall, Ontario?

2. If the Commission has made such a report, is it the intention of the Government to lay the same on the table of the House, and when?

3. Are the two above-named companies still making efforts to obtain from the Government of Canada permission to develop a water-power on the Long Sault rapids?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. The International Waterways Commission has not made any report upon the project of the St. Lawrence Power Company and the Long Sault Development Company for the construction of a dam at Long Sault rapids, opposite Cornwall, Ontario. Reference is made to the fact that the commission in the annual reports of the Canadian section for the years 1907, 1908 and 1909.

2. Answered by question 1.

3. No such application has been made to the present administration and the Government is not aware of any such efforts.

DEPOSITS IN BANKS AND WITH GOVERNMENT.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. What were the total amounts on deposit in the Post Office Savings bank and the Government Savings bank on October 1, 1912, on October 1, 1902 and on October 1, 1892?

2. What were the total amounts on deposit in all the chartered banks in Canada on October 1, 1912, on October 1, 1902 and on October 1, 1892?

3. How many depositors had money on deposit with the Government on October 1, 1892, 1902 and 1912?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds):

1. October 1, 1912, Post Office Savings Bank, $42,661,908.96; Government Savings Bank, $14,553,354.81. October 1, 1902, Post Office Savings Bank, $42,725,979.69; Government Savings Bank, $16,145,890.82. October 1, 1892, Post Office Savings Bank, $22,633,-101.72; Government Savings Bank, $17,173,-185.46.

2. Total amounts on deposit in the Chartered Banks of Canada on September 30, 1912, $1,096,859,279; September 30, 1902, $397,856,183; September 30, 1892, $164,734,-983.

3. Total number of depositors, October 1, 1892, Post Office Savings Bank, 112,320; Government Savings Bank, 46,615; October 1, 1902, Post Office Savings Bank, 164,959; Government Savings Bank, 46,615; October 1, 1912, Post Office Savings Bank, 148,306; Government Savings Bank, 35,129.

SAINT JEAN IMMIGRATION BUILDING.

Mr. DEMERS:

1. Is the Government informed that the Grand Trunk Railway company, in conformity, as alleged, to a Government order, has caused to be constructed at its station at Saint Jean a wing for the detention and examination of immigrants?

2. If so, is this building intended for the immigration service, under control and special care of a federal employee?

3. If not, does the Government intend to appoint some one to this position?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes.

2. It is used by, and is under the control of inspectors who make their headquarters at Rouses' Point, St. Albans and Alburg, and inspect trains on railway lines converging at St. John's.

3. The appointment of a caretaker at St. John's is under consideration.

RATES OF INTEREST TO AGRICULTURISTS.

Mr. SCHAFFNER:

What are the minimum and maximum rates of interest charged by the banking institutions of the various provinces of Canada in the agricultural class?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): The Government has no information which would enable them to answer this question.

On the Orders of the Day being called.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. KYTE.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak upon a question of privilege. In the Halifax Herald of Thursday, December 12, appears the following despatch:

Ottawa, Dec. 11.—Mr. Carroll, M. P. for Cape Breton, in the course of a debate this afternoon, made a most brutal attack on the Rev. Father MacDonald was a partisan of a Father MacDonald had been quoted as having stated that he considered H. P. Duchemin's conduct of official investigations was fair, and Mr. Carroll, in heated terms, stated that the Rev. Father MacDonald was a partisan of a most extreme and violent type and incapable of expressing a fair opinion. The declaration was loudly applauded by Messrs. Chisholm, Antigonish; Sinclair, Guysboro; Kyte, Richmond; MacKenzie, Cape Breton, and Chisholm, Inverness, who expressed their approbation by pounding their desks in the most vigorous manner.

I am prepared to take the full responsibility for both my language and my conduct inside the House as well as outside of it; but it happened that on the 11th day of December, when the question was discussed by the hon. member for South Cape Breton I was not in the House, and I knew nothing whatever of what had taken place during my absence until I read the proceedings in 'Hansard' of the following day. I think it is of the greatest importance that the position of members on all questions should be properly represented by the press correspondents, and while I do not say whether I approve or disapprove of the attitude of hon. gentlemen in regard to this matter, I repudiate the intimation that I was present on that occasion.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As my name has been mentioned in the article just read by the hon. gentleman, I wish to say that the statement, as far as I am concerned, is not true. I have no personal acquaintance with the reverend gentleman mentioned by the member for South Cape Breton, nor do I know whether the reverend gentleman is an active politician or not, but I am quite certain that I did not join in any applause during that part of the hon. gentleman's speech. The reporters in the gallery are, of course, aware that they are enjoying a privilege in being permitted to be present during the discussions in this House, and it is only fair that they should accord gentlemanly treatment to hon. members, and not attribute to them any statements which they do not make. I am quite certain that I have been improperly represented in this item.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I also have read the article referred to by the hon. member for Richmond, and, in so far as any reference to myself is concerned, it is absolutely without any foundation in fact.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is reported in the Quebec papers that a party of engineers has left Ottawa to inspect the Quebec and Saguenay railway. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals if that party of engineers has been sent by his department, and if this action has been taken with a view to the probable guaranteeing of the bonds of the Quebec and Saguenay railway.

Mr. BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman will put his question on the Order Paper, it will be answered in due course.

THE SCHOONER ADVOCATE.

Mr. DEVLIN: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the report of the Department of the Naval Service for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1912, in which I find that the schooner Advocate has been purchased, and is being fitted out for the practical instruction of cadets in seamanship. I would like to ask the hon. minister when this purchase was made, and what is the exact size and strength of the schooner Advocate.

Mr. HAZEN: I am quite sure my hon. friend would not expect me to answer such a question at a moment's notice, but I will be glad to obtain the information and give it to him at a future date.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think these questions are such as can only be properly answered after notice has been put on the Order Paper.

Mr. DEVLIN: I respect your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to point out that this is a matter relating to the defence of our territory.

Mr. SPEAKER: If this is a matter of urgent public importance it could be taken up by motion to adjourn the House.

Mr. DEVLIN: Might I be permitted to ask if the purchase of the schooner Advocate was made in connection with the urgent need for the defence of our territory?

Mr. HAZEN: If my hon. friend will put his question on the Order Paper, full information will be given.

THE CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MACDONALD: I wish to say a few words on behalf of hon. members who come from the extreme eastern and western provinces of the Dominion, in regard to the adjournment of the House over the Christmas holidays. By the adjournment as now proposed, these gentlemen will have their Christmas holidays at home narrowed down to about a week, and the hon. gentlemen will see that to them this arrangement is very unfair. In a great many instances the House is dependent upon the gentlemen from the eastern and western provinces for a quorum on Mondays and Fridays, and, were it not for their faithful attendance, a large amount of the public business of the country would remain undone. If, as is now proposed, the House adjourns on Thursday until the 8th of January, the time which hon. gentlemen from extreme eastern and western provinces will spend at home will be very short. I am sure I speak on behalf of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House when I ask the right hon. Prime Minister to take into consideration the proposition to adjourn on Wednesday of this week until January 13. I was speaking to an hon. gentleman from British Columbia in regard to the matter, and he pointed out that under the arrangement as originally proposed he would arrive home on the Monday before Christmas day, and would be obliged to leave the day after New Years. Hon. gentlemen from the East could not arrive home until the Sunday morning before Christmas, and would be compelled in some instances to leave on the Saturday previous to the 8th of January. If hon. gentlemen have any business engagements, as most of them have, it would necessitate their being absent at some period during the session, and, as a result of shortening the holiday period, subject them to a reduction in their indemnity. In making this request, I am sure that the business of the House will be transacted in just as satisfactory a manner as if the original proposition were carried out, and that there will be no disposition on the part of any hon. gentlemen to unnecessarily retard the business of the House if reasonable consideration is given to this suggestion.

Mr. BORDEN: I feel that special consideration should be given to hon. gentlemen from the Western, as well as those from the Eastern provinces, for the reasons which my hon. friend has suggested. I will assent at once to the adjournment on Wednesday, and will give my best consideration to the other suggestion.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Hazen.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance), moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to revise the laws relating to banking, to continue until the first day of July, 1923, the charters of the several banks to which the provisions of the Bank Act apply, and to authorize the payment out of consolidated revenue fund of remuneration to auditors for special examination of the affairs or business of banks which the Minister of Finance may require to be made.

He said: I have been requested by members on both sides to give them copies of the new Bill, and it is in order to accommodate them that I have asked the assent of the House to this motion, which is necessary, under the rule, before I am permitted to introduce the proposed new Bank Act for its first reading.

Motion agreed to.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. J. A. M. AIKINS (Brandon) : Mr. Speaker, in order to arrive at a proper decision as to what Canada should do toward the protection of the British Empire and of itself, we should eliminate from consideration all those things which would belittle the importaance of the subject or which are irrelevant or foreign to it, as they only becloud the issue.

The House will not derive much benefit from dictionary definitions of words, such as emergency or crisis or empire or British Empire or autonomy. These should be understood in their ordinary significance and as generally understood by the people of the country. In order that the hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) might come to a proper conclusion as to the course which he should pursue he had recourse to Webster's dictionary to ascertain what an emergency meant.

Mr. LEMIEUX : I was rather taken with the interview given by my hon. friend (Mr. Aikins) when he came back from Europe and declared that war was actually declared between Germany and England, and I wanted to know——

Mr. AIKINS : If the hon. gentleman will have a little patience that subject will be considered. I wonder if the hon. member for Rouville was ever sick, and if, being sick, he consulted the dictionary for the words emergency or illness to find out whether he was really sick or not, or whether he should send for a doctor.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My friend is sea-sick now.

Mr. AIKINS: I wonder, too. if, after having consulted that dictionary he came to the conclusion that something was wrong, and the doctor diagnosed his case as incipient diphtheria, he would refuse to take an antitoxin because he was not in an emergent condition and would wait until he was hovering between life and death before applying preventive remedies. I wonder whether, if the hon. member lived out west near a settler who saw a little smoke on the prairies in the distance, if he would advise that settler to consult his dictionary to see whether a critical condition had arisen or whether he would expect that same settler to say: I do not know which way the wind is blowing, the wind may change, the rain may come, something may interfere with the progress of that fire; I shall sit down for the present in statu quo. Would he do that or would he expect that settler to do what any sensible man would; go out, perhaps with his neighbour, and put out that fire if possible, or go out with a team to plow a fire-guard, or burn one against the wind, so that his home and property might be saved from destruction. There are preventive remedies in respect of war as well as corrective force, and these preventive remedies should be applied where possible. We can also eliminate in trying to reach a proper conclusion what was said a year ago or two years ago or four years ago—under circumstances and conditions which were entirely different. What matters it what the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said four years ago in respect of circumstances then but not now existing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS: Mr. Speaker, I observe that what those gentlemen are depending upon to decide their course is thoughts expressed in times past under very different circumstances. What matters it what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, what the right hon. the leader of the Government (Mr. Borden) said four years ago under particular circumstances then but not now existing, how the Minister of the Interior or the Minister of Inland Revenue voted in days gone by. That is not important. The matter of importance is what are their opinions, their views now, and what action are they going to take? We may also eliminate from consideration details of past constitutional history. What matters it how the little provinces in the earlier Canada advanced from Crown colonies to greater strength? What matters it when those provinces were incorporated into the Dominion, how gradually they grew from boyhood into young manhood and were accorded by the Government of Great Britain the liberty which young men are given when they leave their home and assume family responsibilities. What cares he how he escaped from the cradle to the school, how educated at school. How fostered and cared for, and allowed a little freedom? What matters it to him the stages of adolescence, and young manhood and freedom from paternal government. And so with our country. What matters it on this important question how our country escaped from its swaddling clothes into the knickerbocker stage, and grew to its present strength. A young man leaving his home for one of his own can with mind alert and eye clear, understand the condition prevailing at his old home. If the family at home requires aid, it is not necessary for that family to tell him they need his assistance. He knows it. It is not necessary for the family to demand it; he gives it voluntarily, and he does not hesitate and say: 'I am a young man, and if I grant this aid, I am back in my swaddling clothes, back at the school, or back to the time when I was under parental control I felt restive under restraint.' What he gives to the family he gives unsolicited and out of the enthusiasm of his heart; and so it is in the present case with Canada. Canada is indebted to the British Empire for its existence. That Empire guarded its juvenescence, and brought it to present maturity; if the British Empire now requires some naval aid, shall we wait until that assistance is even suggested not to say demanded? Sir, Canada does what it now proposes of its own motion, and voluntarily says to Great Britain: 'Here is the aid we offer, we beg you to take it.' Canada is a self-governing nation, and, Sir, the action that is being taken at the present time by the Government in the resolution and Bill before the House, is not only consistent with, but confirmatory of its rights as a self-governing nation. The people of the British Isles, or the Government of the British Isles do not ask it. It springs from the people of self-governing Canada, through the members of Parliament assembled. The Canadian people and they alone can tax themselves to build the battleships now offered. We all know, and the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition knows, that practically all public property is held in the name of the Crown. It may be so held in the right of the Dominion; or in the right of the provinces; this aid is given to the Crown and these splendid battleships are held in the right of the Dominion of Canada. Owned if you like by Canada and subject to an arrangement between the Government of this country and the Government of the United Kingdom, under which they will be liable to be recalled at any time that Canada wishes to recall them. The action of the present Government is not a policy of permanency; it is a policy of present expediency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS: I presume that if a condition suddenly arose and confronted some of those hon. gentlemen and required immediate action, they would decide on what was expedient.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Look at Webster.

Mr. AIKINS: Again my hon. friend, with that flippancy which is characteristic of him, tries to reduce this debate to the level of dictionary definitions. The question for the consideration of this House is, what should Canada now do, under existing circumstances to give efficient aid as speedily as possible in the naval defence of the Empire? Not a slow policy of permanency, but an arrangement of the most temporary character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS: The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) nods his head, and that it is temporary is true. If instead of building ships for the navy which protects our country, Canada had made a money grant of thirty-five million dollars to the people of Great Britain, there would be an element of permanency about that, because, once paid it would be gone forever, and Canada would cease to have control over it. But under the present arrangement, what is proposed is to build three of the finest dreadnoughts, to let the British Admiralty have the use of them for the time being, and then, should the Dominion of Canada, through this Parliament, decide to have a Canadian navy, it will have in those three magnificent ships a splendid nucleus for such a navy.

It has been suggested by speakers on the other side of the House that Canada should maintain its status quo, and not move save to build a small navy for itself —should not Canada move strongly. When we consider what has been going on in the world among warlike nations, the wonder is that Canada did not move more quickly. When you consider that within the last fifty years Russia has attained power, has a navy, and a population of 150,000,000; when you consider that the United States has in that time practically grown to be the greatest manufacturing and agricultural producing nation in the world with a population of 100,000,000 and a navy; when you consider that within fifty years there has arisen the Empire of Japan, an empire which aspires to rival the British on the Pacific ocean; when you consider that other European nations are building large war vessels, that Germany within fifty years has become a consolidated country, a population of 69,000,000, which has increased in wealth by virtue of its application of scientific methods to industry, has become a workshop, has organized one of the greatest armies the world perhaps ever saw, an army that can within a few months mobilize 3,500,000 trained and equipped soldiers, that in its aggressiveness Germany desires to equal in naval power any other empire upon the sea; why then should Canada not act quickly and effectively; fifty years ago Great Britain was practically the workshop of the world, she was unchallengeable upon the sea, she could send her commerce almost without a rival to all parts of the world, and was without a peer in wealth. Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, has the United Kingdom increased proportionately in wealth, in power and in aggression? The population of the British Isles is only 45,000,000 and the wealth of her people has not increased proportionately to the wealth of the Germans.

Mr. DEVLIN: Yes, it has.

Mr. AIKINS: It has not increased proportionately to the wealth of Germany or some other countries during that 50 years. England does not possess in herself great natural unexploited resources. We must surely come to the conclusion that the United Kingdom has not increased proportionately with some of these other countries, in population, in riches, in industries, in commerce and power, yet the British Empire as a whole has increased in proportion, will maintain its importance, so long as that British Empire in all its parts is one and indivisible.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it not a fact that the United Kingdom is to-day the only European power which is reducing its national debt?

Mr. AIKINS: That is not the pertinent question at all. The point is that the United Kingdom, which undoubtedly was the superior of all other nations fifty years ago, in the way I have mentioned, is not maintaining its proportional progress and strength as a lonely unit but the British Empire is so long as the British Empire remains, one and indivisible.

If we cannot depend on dictionary definitions, and if we cannot be guided in the course we should take by details of past Canadian constitutional history, by what can we be guided with certainty? Sir, these can guide us safely: the instinct of self-preservation; natural and national instincts, the impulses and inspirations of the heart; the belief of the people of Canada and of the Empire, that there is some great world purpose for this young country, namely, to hold higher and wave wider the torch of British civilization, which has been a benefit in past times to the whole word. There is above all the faith that the people of Canada have that there is before them one great destiny, not that Canada will be only a great, independent, self-governing nation, but a great and leading nation in the greatest Empire of the world. These instincts, these impulses and this faith will be 'the voice within the heart to melt the freezing reason's colder part;' these are the voices behind us saying: 'This is the way; walk ye in it.' The Empire is one and indivisible; any separation from it of any one part the untying of the bond which binds all parts together or some of the parts together, the adoption and pursuit of the policy of Canada now in and Canada now out, the Empire being at war, yet Canada not warring or in conflict, and reciprocally of Canada being at war and the United Kingdom not in conflict or warring, means the destruction of the British Empire and the construction of another and different empire, if empire it may be called. The Empire is one and indivisible, and the navy which is indisputably sufficient and necessary to protect Canada in all its rights, Canadians and their property at home and abroad; which is sufficient to safeguard, protect and enforce trade arrangements or foreign treaties with other countries, will be sufficient to safeguard and protect the United Kingdom and other parts of the Empire. And, conversely, the navy which is without a doubt sufficient to protect the United Kingdom, its people and its rights, is sufficient to protect all parts of the British Empire. Is it not absurd to suppose, because some battleships of the British navy have been withdrawn from outlying parts of the Empire, that these parts of the Empire are not protected. Where would you expect the navy of Great Britain to be if not in a position to face and meet and control that strongest naval power which at any time might destroy the power of the British Empire, or bring disaster to self-governing nations belonging to it? And the place at present for that British navy is in the North sea, confronting the German navy, four-fifths of which is kept ready and on a war footing.

The aid which is at present being given by this Parliament to the British navy, is a temporary aid, as I have said: three large battleships to assist that navy, concentrated in the North sea. What is to be the future policy of Empire naval defence? It may include a Canadian navy. That future policy may have to include in it, joint action with Australia, with New Zealand, with Canada, and the United Kingdom in respect to the protection of the Pacific ocean, as it most certainly will have to include the question of the protection of the Atlantic ocean and trade routes. It may be that that navy which is held now in the North sea may in time to come be stationed at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, or in the China sea, protecting the interests of that part of the Empire. Whatever the future naval policy of the Empire may be, I know not; but this present contribution of ships for the purpose of aiding the British Empire, if it spells anything, spells this: a British-Canadian fleet under British-Canadian control.

I wish to refer for a moment to the amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. There are some things in it which I do not quite understand. It says:

This condition—

Referring to the earlier part of resolution.

—has compelled the United Kingdom to concentrate its naval forces in home waters, involving the withdrawal of ships from the outlying portions of the Empire. That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without further delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence.

Naval defence of what? Does that mean defence of Canada or of the whole of the Empire? I think I am entitled to an answer from my right hon. friend; I am not putting the question captiously, but because I want to understand this amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does my hon. friend want my answer?

Mr. AIKINS: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think the policy is stated in the amendment: That the new condition of things which has arisen in Europe has compelled Canada to take a part in the defence of the Empire as a whole, and the manner of doing it is by the creation of a Canadian navy.

Mr. AIKINS: Let us look at it in this way:

That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence.

Does that mean of Canada or of the Empire?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have just stated: of the Empire.

Mr. AIKINS: Then it says:

That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without further delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence,——

—of the Empire, and that without consulting the British Government.

Mr. TURRIFF: A lawyer's quibbling.

Mr. AIKINS: And an hon. gentleman's want of apprehension to see the point. We should enter without further delay actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence of the Empire, as if the responsibility were thrown upon Canada alone to defend the Empire? Now, let me read just a little further in connection with that:

This House is further of the opinion that to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy by the addition by Canada under the above Act of two fleet units, to be stationed on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada, respectively.

Might I ask the hon. gentleman one question? It seems to me there has been an omission when it says: 'to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial Navy by the addition to '—what?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on reading it.

Mr. AIKINS: It does not say to what. I want to know to what, simply because I want to understand that resolution.

Mr. TURRIFF: The people of the country understand it.

Mr. EMMERSON: To arrange for a night school.

Mr. AIKINS: My hon. friend who has just spoken, having in view some honour from the Government, might think a knighthood instead of a night school. I would really like to know for the information of this House what it means thereby, 'the addition to.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am very sorry that my imperfect knowledge of the English language is not adequate to convey the meaning to my hon. friend. I think if my hon. friend will read the whole sentence, he will have no hesitation as to its meaning:

This House is further of the opinion that to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy by the addition of two fleet units.

If that means anything, I think it means an addition to the Imperial Navy.

Mr. AIKINS: That is the explanation I desire.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am glad you have it at last.

Mr. AIKINS: Let us read it again:

That this House is further of the opinion that to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy by the addition to the Imperial navy by Canada under the above Act of two fleet units.

Now we have something that interprets that, which we will see if we read a little further on. The first part is that this House is of the opinion that it is necessary to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and a little further on that it is necessary to restore greater freedom to the movements of the British squadrons in every sea. Does the amendment, then, mean that there is to be an addition by Canada of 2 fleet units to the British squadrons in every sea. If it does not then it draws a distinction between the British squadrons and the Imperial navy. As I understand it, the very purpose of this amendment is otherwise—that there should be established in Canada a navy of two fleet units, one to be stationed on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, under separate and independent Canadian control, and not under the same control as the Imperial navy or the British squadrons? Am I wrong about that?

Mr. GRAHAM: Read the resolution.

Mr. AIKINS: I have read the resolution. It seems to me that the purpose of this amendment is that there should be stationed on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, under the control of the Canadian Government, two fleet units built by the Canadian Government, to act as the Canadian Government thinks proper they should act—sometimes perchance in conjunction with the Imperial navy, perhaps never in conjunction with the Imperial navy, and never under the same control. If that be the true construction, and I believe it to be, is it the purpose of this amendment that there should be an inpendent Canadian navy and an independent British navy? Let us look at some of the statements that have been made by the right hon. gentleman, and I think we will come to a conclusion upon that point. He says in one part of his speech upon this resolution :

The document discloses the fact that, on account of this increased naval armament, England, in order to maintain her security in her own waters, has been obliged to withdraw some of her naval forces from the distant seas.

This means, if it means anything, that in the belief of the right hon. gentleman, and I suppose also of his supporters, the British navy has been withdrawn from Canada to maintain the security of England in her own waters. Does not that suggest the idea that Canada is no longer protected, when the battleships are withdrawn to protect England only for her own security? A little further on he says :

What is the duty of the House of Commons, what is the duty of the people of Canada?

He answers a little further on:

England has been obliged to increase the margin of security which she relies on for her own defence, by reducing her naval forces in the outlying seas. Such is the condition; and, I ask once more, what is the remedy?

In order to protect herself, England has withdrawn her fleets from other seas, and the suggestion is that as Canada is left unprotected, the remedy suggested by the right hon. gentleman is that Canada should have a Canadian fleet in order to protect and look after Canada. Is that right? The suggestion is that in order to increase the mobility of the Imperial Navy Canada assumed the responsibility of looking after Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear.

Mr. AIKINS: Some hon. gentlemen says, hear. I presume that is his view of the case. Let me ask this question: To what do the people of Canada look now for their protection? To what have they looked in times past for their protection? What hopes have we for our future protection except one thing, the Imperial Navy? I have had the impression, which the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickel) had, that the tendency of the naval policy of the right hon. gentleman and his recent government was toward separation of Canada from the Empire.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh!

Mr. AIKINS: I have heard the statement made by the right hon. gentleman that he is a Britisher, and I believe it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then how can you be ieve that he wants separation?

Mr. AIKINS: I will tell my hon. and impatient friend if he will wait just a moment. The right hon. gentleman appeals to his 71 years of life as a British Canadian—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS: And I say, Hear, hear, to that, yet it was not necessary to convince me of his loyalty. The right hon. gentleman is a Canadian. I am a Canadian, and as a Canadian I respect great Canadians, and the right hon. gentleman is a great Canadian. I have no more doubt of his loyalty as a British subject than I have of my own.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS. I will go further. I have no doubt of the loyal hearts and loyal sentiments of the hon. gentlemen who support their right hon. leader.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why should you?

Mr. AIKINS: I should not. Sir, loyalty is a matter of affection, of sentiment, of the heart. But, while I believe their hearts are right their judgment is wrong. Hearts right, heads not so. I imagine their heads do not follow what their hearts dictate. Consider the statement that has been made by the hon. gentleman just now, and if that statement means anything, it means, that, ships have been withdrawn from Canada, Canada is left unprotected. And what is their remedy? The creation of two fleets, one on the Atlantic coast and the other on the Pacific coast. Controlled how—by the united control and power which guides the British navy? No, but by Canadian control. Look at the amendment, and you find that it refers to the Naval Service Act. And what does that say?

The Governor in Council may place the naval forces or any part thereof, on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

And who is to decide the emergency? The Canadian Government. But that is not all:

In case of an emergency, the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service the Royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof.

'May' place. What does that mean? It means that the Governor in Council will have the right to decide whether there is an emergency or not—taking the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux's) definition as to 'emergency' though defined in Naval Service Act to which that hon. gentleman did not refer. What certainty has the British Admiralty or the British Government that the Canadian Government will decide there is an emergency or will place Canada's navy here given for general service. They will say: That may or may not happen; therefore we will have to strengthen the Imperial navy so that we may be independent of the naval units of Canada on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coasts. It means more than that. Even if the Government of Canada decided that there was an emergency, and that they should place the naval units at disposal for general service of the British Empire, one stationed on the Atlantic, and the other on the Pacific, would require much time to reach the place where they are required. And when they reached there, if anything adverse had happened, the enemy, as suggested by the right hon. gentleman, would grapple and sink our beautiful units of the Canadian navy. The naval protection of Canada and of the British Empire has been a united protection. The Imperial battleships have been taken away, are we therefore without protection in Canada, that we must prepare our fleet units to protect ourselves? Let us assume that there is a severance between the Canadian naval units, the Imperial Australian units, and what may happen? Any power, stronger power than any one of them—I do not care what it is—may attack each singly in an unequal contest and in disgraceful disaster. Why should that be? The only present naval protection which Canada has is the Imperial navy. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is really sincere in what he says, that this policy is necessary to protect Canada, British battleships being withdrawn. And has he just now awakened to the importance of the position? But when did that withdrawal take place? Did it take place only the other day? Did it take place in 1910? As I understand it, they were withdrawn in 1906 and 1907. If the right hon. gentleman and the members who support him were sincere about it, why did not they do something about it when these battleships were withdrawn? Why did not they then begin to make provision for the protection of Canada? Do they really believe that when the United Kingdom withdrew these vessels to their own waters Canada required protection? If so, what protection did they offer? They purchased, it is true, the weeping Niobe,—and all the more weeping when she was on the rocks. They also purchased a Rainbow. What a name! It suggests that Canada need fear no more, because the Rainbow is there. Has Canada been unprotected in times past? These certainly did not protect Canada against other navies. Assuming the British navy was not protecting Canada, was Canada still protected? Protected by isolation? Is Canada so isolated that other nations do not know anything about her? Is she like Iceland? Yet the Scandinavians found even Iceland. Why, Mr. Speaker, in these days, if Canada were located at the pole and unprotected, we should find some incautious Cook or some patriotic Peary starting out with the Stars and Stripes to nail them to the pole. If we cannot depend for protection upon isolation, is Canada so unattractive, so inhospitable, that we are protected without the benefit of any fleet? We have advertised to the world that Canada is one of the richest countries and have urged people to come. And they are coming in hundreds of thousands a year, at an average of nearly nine hundred every day, of whom from five hundred to eight hundred a day are going into the western part of Canada. This shows the attractiveness of our country. If we are not protected by our isolation or by our want of attractiveness, are we protected because we are so good? Is there so little 'of the earth, earthy' about us, are we so divine in our lives that hostile nations will look at us and say in sacred regard, 'Touch not Canada.' The time has not arrived when nations learn the art of war no more; the time has not arrived when nation does not rise up against nation, but the very reverse appears to be the case. Japan, having been asleep for many years, following her peaceful avocations, suddenly awakened, beat her ploughshares into swords and her pruning hooks into spears, and drove back the Russian bear to his northern fastnesses. The time has not come when for this country we can claim any special providential protection. It is said that a special Providence watches over drunken men and fools. Canada does not wish to classify yet if Canada does not see to her own protcetion, she may be classified among those—and yet be unprotected. What has protected Canada in times past? What is protecting Canada now? The British navy.

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) referred to the Monroe Doctrine, and I am pleased to know that he is not satisfied with the results of that doctrine. He has referred to the complications that have arisen in Cuba by virtue of the intervention of the United States and the domination of the latter over Cuba as a consequence. I am glad to know he is commencing to realize that dangerous results may come from entanglements with the United States. The right hon. gentleman has said that we want to have nothing to do with Monroe Doctrine. But is it possible to avoid it? Is it at the option of Canada to decide whether the Monroe Doctrine will or will not be enforced? Let us assume a condition of affairs, and suppose that a foreign fleet—from Germany or Japan, I care not which—appeared in the St. Lawrence river or on the Pacific coast, threatening Canada, under the Monroe Doctrine, the principle of which is that the United States has a paramount interest in American affairs—a doctrine which has rapidly developed since 1890—what might happen? The United States navy might appear, and without our option, in effect say to those hostile fleets on the Atlantic or Pacific 'Hands off'; and the United States might say: 'We saved Canada' and might they not, Mr. Speaker, claim for themselves the salvage? Is that a desirable condition of affairs?

What has protected Canada in the past? A Canadian fleet? No, there was no Canadian fleet; but we have been constantly under the protection of the naval forces of Great Britain. I can only refer, Mr. Speaker, to the time when Canada ceased to be a French possession; to the time when Montgomery appeared before Quebec and was beaten back by the patriotic French Canadians; to that time a little later on when the United States sent Benjamin Franklin, Charles Carroll and Samuel Chase to Canada to entice the people to unite with the United States. They failed, just as the army of Montgomery failed before Quebec. But I do wish to call attention to what has since happened between the United States and Canada, in order that we may understand the power which protected us. In an address at Washington before the International Conference held under the auspices of the American Society for the Judicial Settlement of International Disputes. Mr. John W. Foster, who was a member of the Harrison Government in 1891 and 1892, made this statement:

> The war of 1812 was a partisan and sectional war. In this respect it was quite different from the Mexican and Spanish wars. Henry Clay, Speaker of the House, gathered around him a body of ardent young members, known in history as the 'War Hawks,' Calhoun, Grundy and others, and organized the committees with the view of bringing on the war. Slight disguise was made of the purpose to conquer Canada. As early as January, 1811, Clay, in discussing a retaliatory Bill against Great Britain declared: 'The conquest of Canada is in your power. I trust I may not be deemed presumptuous when I state that I verily believe that the militia of Kentucky are alone competent to place Montreal and Upper Canada at your feet.' His memorable speech on the Army Bill, as epitomized by his biographer, anticipated the results of the war. 'It was to be an agressive war, a war of glorious conquest. He saw the battalions of the Republic marching victoriously through Canada and laying siege to doomed Quebec. His dream was of a peace dictated at Halifax.' Grundy, in defending the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs favouring the war, said, 'We shall drive the British from our continent. . . . I feel anxious not only to add the Floridas to the south, but the Canada to the north of this Empire.'
>
> The war of 1812 was declared before diplomatic recourse had been exhausted. This is manifest from the fact that on the day before war was declared Parliament voted the repeal of the Orders in Council, the announced cause of the war. Adams, who has discussed this phase of the question fully, states that 'the people of England never wanted war with the United States,' and this is confirmed by other historians. Parliament met in January, 1812, and the speech from the Throne was 'studiously moderate' in its references to our affairs, closing with the declaration 'that England could bear more from America for peace's sake than from any other power on earth.'

That was the action of the United States against Canada in 1812, to which I think the right hon. gentleman has referred. What was it that protected Canada in that conflict? Although there were successes and reverses; although Canadians did splendidly in the war, what really terminated the conflict was the fact that the British fleet was released from its European contest, was free to protect Canada and the Canadians to the British Empire, and did so. In the same speech, Mr. Foster further stated:

> The war with Mexico followed immediately after the annexation of Texas, and was caused by the forcible occupation by the army of the United States of territory which was in dispute at the time of the annexation. Before the annexation was consummated the republic of Texas had proposed to Mexico an adjustment of all differences between them, and the basis of settlement had been agreed to by Mexico, but was not carried out because of the annexation. One clause of this proposal was as follows: 'Texas will be willing to submit disputed points respecting territory and other matters to the arbitration of umpires.'
>
> In his memoirs 40 years after the event General U. S. Grant wrote:
>
> To-day I regard the war (which resulted from the annexation of Texas) as one of the most unjust ever waged by a stronger against a weaker nation.

The United States then wished to have that territory; the fact of an agreement for arbitration did not stand between her and her wishes and that territory was annexed.

I do not wish to attribute improper action or motives to the people of the United States. It is a magnificent country, a splendid nation, that has been created in a very short time, a nation of wonderful business enterprise, of intellectual advancement, a nation in which there are hosts of manly men and womanly women, but nevertheless they are just as acquisitive, they desire advancement just as much as Canadians and we who are living in a glass house should not throw stones. At this juncture, while I am expressing an admiration for the people of the United States, I cannot but voice the sympathy which I am sure is felt by all members of the House with the people of the United States because of the death of their late eminent ambassador to London, Mr. Whitelaw Reid. But, while I respect the United States and regard them as being a great nation, is there any reason why that nation should not act towards Canada just as it did towards Texas? Any reason? Yes, one reason is this, because of the supremacy of the British fleet and the power of the British Empire.

Let us go a little further. Mr. Foster in speaking about the Spanish war said:

President Taft has recently announced in a public address in my hearing that the Spanish war was an altruistic war; it must have been such for only on that ground can it be justified.

I wonder if that altruism of the people of the United States might not at some time be exercised towards Canada? Might not the United States, at some time, wish to give to the backwoods people of our country the benefit of the free and great institutions of the United States? What is to prevent it if altruism is upheld by war?

Let me go just a little further in respect of a matter which is now of very great importance to us in Canada, that is, the Panama canal, which was referred to recently by the hon member for Guysboro' (Mr. Sinclair). The provision in that treaty is that:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

We know the legislation passed in the United States in making free from toll American vessels doing coastwise trade. The President of the United States in his message said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Then what does he add? He says:

I suggest therefore that before the time has elapsed for the disapproval of the Bill congress will consider the wisdom of passing a joint resolution as follows.

And among other things:

When any alien, whether natural person, partnership, company or corporation considers that the charging of tolls or the enforcement of any other regulation under and pursuant to the provisions of this Act violates in any way any such treaty, rights or privileges, such alien shall have the right to bring an action against the United States for redress of the injury which he considers himself to have suffered; and the district courts of the United States are hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine such cases, to decree appropriate relief and from the decision of such district courts there shall be an appeal to either party to the Supreme Court of the United States.

If there is a dispute Canada's remedy then is only in the courts of the United States. Is that fair? There is no country more interested in the proper interpretation of that treaty than Canada. The last speaker in the Senate closed the debate on that very Bill with a remarkable outburst in which he attacked the British interpretation of the treaty, not because it was incorrect, unjust or inaccurate, but because it was an interpretation which the American people would not observe. Moreover he observed bluntly that this was not a question of arbitration, it was a question of power, and if diplomacy failed then war would be the final arbiter.

I wonder what in times past has protected Canada in all her rights. What protects it now? The navy that has been recently instituted under the Naval Service Act by my right hon. friend? The Rainbow with its pop-gun and the Niobe with its hand-grenade? As the right hon. gentleman suggests, would they pounce upon and grapple and sink all other battleships in Canadian waters?

What can we rely upon? If we cannot depend upon the British fleet we might purchase our safety. I refer my good British friend to what Kipling says on that subject.

It is always a temptation to a rich and lazy nation,
To puff and look important and to say
Though we know we should defeat you!

Think of the Niobe!

Though we know we should defeat you, we have not the time to meet you,

We will therefore pay you cash to go away.
And that is called paying the Dane-gelt;
But we've proved it again and again,
That if once you have paid him the Dane-gelt,
You'll never get rid of the Dane.

Canada, unless it be protected by the British navy, which we are told is now concentrated to protect the United Kingdom, is like a rich and very attractive looking young heiress, I will not say loved, but longed for by other covetous people who would like to take possession of her. The fleet units of a Canadian navy or a greater Canadian navy will not be sufficient to protect Canada for the next quarter of a century without the assistance of the British fleet. The richness of our country is a temptation to other aggressive nations, its lack of protection an incitement.

Again allow me to refer the right hon. gentleman to Kipling:

It is wrong to put temptation in the path of any nation,
For fear they should succumb and go astray,
So when you are requested to pay up or be molested,
You will find it better policy to say:—
We never pay any one Dane-gelt,
No matter how trifling the cost,
For the end of that game is oppression and shame,
And the nation that plays it is lost.'

What is there then to protect us against those who would like to occupy Canada? We are told that Germany is looking for colonies, that she wishes to get colonies under her control where she can sell her goods and place her surplus population. What is there to protect us in the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty? Nothing; we would be helpless unless beneath and above us and enfolding us were the prestige and power of the British Empire, and the unchallenged supremacy of the Imperial fleet.

Mr. Speaker, I have been from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I have been in the houses of well-to-do Canadians, I have seen their nice drawing rooms with perhaps the lady of the house or her daughter playing the piano, I have seen their dining rooms, on the tables of which were spread bountifully the necessaries of life. I have seen the children happily at play there, all the attractions and enjoyments and comforts of any home; and I have passed out to another part that might be called a shed or a lean-to. In that shed or lean-to is stored the wood, the coal, the water, perhaps, the fish in a refrigerator, and other things. Everything necessary in that shed to bring comfort to the home, and that place, with all its coal, and wood, and water, and raw products, is nothing less than an adjunct to that home. The persons working there are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. What was it that caused young Canada in its knickerbockers, almost to shake its fist in the face of the great people of the United States and cooly to turn down their Reciprocity proposition, if it was not that they stood between the forepaws and under the strong jaws of the British lion, and found there strength and protection? And yet the power of Great Britain is questioned. The supremacy of that fleet is now being challenged. I shall not go into a long discussion of how, but I shall refer to what has been stated by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government in regard to the explanatory notes in the German Navy Act of 1900. That Act refers to the greatest sea power, to the mightiest naval power. What power could be meant other than Great Britain? Let me read from it:

Germany must have a fleet of such strength that even for the British Empire——

I am using the words 'British Empire' instead of 'the mightiest naval power.'

Germany must have a fleet of such strength that even for the British Empire, a war with her would involve such risks as to jeopardize its own supremacy. For this purpose it is not absolutely necessary that the German fleet should be as strong as that of the British Empire because, generally, a great sea-power will not be in a position to concentrate all its forces against us. But even if it should succeed in confronting us in superior force the enemy would be so considerably weakened in overcoming the resistance of a strong German fleet that, notwithstanding a victory gained, the enemy's supremacy would not at first be secured any longer by a sufficient fleet.

That is the declaration of the policy in 1900. How have they followed it up? From the Naval Pocket Book of 1898, it appears that of war-ships built, building or ordered on February 1, 1898: Britain had 88 armoured ships, 154 cruisers, 60 coast defence, 313 torpedo craft. Germany had 28 armoured ships, 24 cruisers, 13 coast defence and 127 torpedo craft. Since then there has been such a rapid increase that now the German programme is for 61 battleships. Now, naval sea power does not consist simply in the number of vessels, but in their preparedness for immediate action, and all those vessels that have been gradually increasing in number and power are now in the North sea or in the Baltic which are connected by the Kiel canal, like hounds in leash, prepared for any emergency, prepared to strike when the antagonist is at his weakest. In a pamphlet published recently in Germany which is mentioned in Hurd's 'Command of the Sea,' and which is signed by one 'Lookout' who is supposed to be a well-informed Admiral, there is a comparison between the growth of the British navy and the growth of the German navy as follows:

In 1898 the German navy stood to the British navy in the proportion of one to 6.3; in 1900 one to 4.3; in 1903 one to 3.5; in 1911 1.2 to 2.2; in 1912 one to 2.1.

This shows how rapidly the Germans have increased their navy. Then it goes on to suggest that the two to one standard is doomed, and that when Germany has 60 dreadnoughts Britain will have to stop building, as she will not have enough men to man 120 dreadnoughts or enough money to pay for them. In another article which appears in one of the German magazines, this is stated:

The cause to which this naval expansion in Germany is attributed by leading German politicians is 'the widespread belief shared by many people of very advanced views and friendly feelings towards the British nation that Great Britain will one day try to get rid of German competition and the menace of the German navy by forcing war upon Germany and destroying as many German ships as possible.'

Britain has not given Germany cause for such a belief. Why circulate then such a spectral story? The empire ideals of Pan-Germans are high. Do we blame them? Driven by ambition they steadily pursue and work up to them. Why should we condemn it?

That is the talk that is circulated in Germany in order that the people may keep on increasing the navy. If the British purpose is to destroy the German navy, it may be asked why did not the British navy do it long ago, and why is it not doing it to-day? When Germany is not as strong as it hopes to be a suggestion in 1905 was made to the people of England that they should reduce their armaments, and from 1905 to 1909 they did reduce the building of warships to the extent of about £11,000,000 sterling per year. Then what happened? The people of Germany, so we are told, said, 'Oh, England has reached her limit; and can go no further; now is our opportunity to increase our navy,' and they did increase it, as was stated by the right hon. the Prime Minister. If England increases her armaments the people of Germany say they intend to destroy us; and the people of Germany are told so, and so they increase their armaments. If on the other hand Britain decides to reduce her armaments the German people say now is our opportunity, and so the contest goes on. Such is the challenge of the aggressor. What do English statesmen reply? The Hon. Mr. Asquith stated in 1908:

Every foreign power knows that if we have established, as we have, and if we mean to maintain, as we do, an indisputable superiority on the sea, it is not for the purpose of aggression or adventure, but it is that we may fulfil the elementary duty which we owe to the Empire, to uphold beyond reach, yes, and beyond risk of successful attack from outside, our commerce, our industry, our homes.

Lord Rosebery speaking in 1909 said—and I call the attention of the hon. member for St. John to this:

We live in the midst of what I think was called by Petrarch as tacens bellum, a silent warfare, in which not a drop of blood is shed in anger, but in which the very last drop is extracted from the body by the lancets of European statemen.

The Right Hon. Winston Churchill, speaking on February 9, 1912, said:

Whatever may happen abroad, there will be no whining here, no signals of distress will be hoisted, no cries for help or succour will go up. We will face that future as our ancestors would have faced it, without disquiet, without arrogance, but in stolid and inflexible determination. We should be the first power to welcome any retardation or slackening of naval rivalry. We should meet any such slackening, not by words, but by deeds.

Mr. Balfour, in the debate on the Naval Estimates, July, 1912, said:

The Germans were moving steadily and remorselessly, they were adding year by year to the number of men, to the number of ships, and to the readiness of those ships and those men for instantaneous action, and he (i.e. Mr. Churchill) said and he said rightly, in my opinion, there is one way and but one way to meet a menace of that kind, and that is to imitate the policy of our neighbour, and neither to lapse into panic nor, what is even more important, to relax for one instant your efforts for the augmentation of your strength, so that no possible revolution of fortune will ever put you at the mercy of some military or naval accident.

A prominent authority writing to the Tagblatt so recently as the 10th of December last, says:

There can be no doubt, that the increase in the British fleet is due, not to American or French armaments, but to Germany's action. Canada's is proof, of the unity and strength of the British Empire and a little reflection must have long since made it obvious to anybody that nothing was more calculated to weld together the British Empire than the hurried strengthening of the German fleet.

In the Taglische Rundschan published on the 10th of December last, referring to Canada's proposed naval contribution, we read:

This development is the result of the enormous increase in the British world power which brings Germany face to face with the question whether they can any longer be satisfied with the slow progress established in the last naval estimates.

And so that tacens bellum goes on. There is between these two nations a state of war, but what words can describe it better than these: that Germany and England are in a state of war, though no overt blow has yet been struck. Sir, that was the statement which was made by me when I was in the old country, and which was sent by the Associated Press to Canada; misread, I submit, by some hon. gentlemen opposite. I never stated, as was said by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that England and Germany were actually at war. It is the tacens bellum I referred to and that conflict is to-day continuing between England and Germany. The people of Germany are as a result groaning beneath the burden of debt; it has added £39,000,000 to the debt since 1900 for building vessels. The people of England are burdened by the taxation they have to bear for naval armament; not for the benefit of the United Kingdom only as was suggested by the right hon. gentleman, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No, the concentration of the fleet was for the protection of the whole British Empire, including Canada. Now, what should Canada do under the circumstances? Is it to commence to build a Canadian navy; to start where the right hon. gentleman had left off, and complete a great naval fleet unit on the Atlantic and another on the Pacific? No aid would go to the United Kingdom in that way short of ten or fifteen or twenty years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. AIKINS: The right hon. gentleman said, referring to the members on this side of the House; 'O ye Tory jingoes,' in connection with the manning of the fleet—'O ye Tory jingoes.' I might just as well say to the right hon. gentleman and to his friends on the other side: 'O ye Grit jockeyers.'

Mr. LEMIEUX: We are riding only one horse anyway.

Mr. FOSTER: It's a poor looking horse.

Mr. AIKINS: I rather pity that poor one horse with all the hon. gentlemen on the other side with their diverse opinions, upon its back. These gentlemen opposite tell us that no provision is made for the manning of these offered dreadnoughts by Canadians, and let us consider that for a minute. The people of Canada, young men and others, are very much occupied in the development of our own country. There is a great demand for labour here, there is a great demand for labour in the United States, and does this House suppose that Canadians will leave their work, their industries, their farms, and go at low wages on board battleships to be trained—and, it would require four years to properly train them. Does the patriotism of my right hon. friend opposite, or any of those behind him move them so strongly that they are ready to relinquish their seats in this House to go on board these vessels from patriotic motives, and be trained in the science of naval warfare? Of course, they say no, and why should any class of Canadians make sacrifices, these gentlemen opposite are not prepared to do. Why, you would have to pass a law of conscription to oblige Canadian workers to leave their occupations to man the battleships.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why? Is there one in England?

Mr. AIKINS: What?

Mr. LEMIEUX: A law of conscription. Is there one in the United States?

Mr. AIKINS: There is not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why should we have one in Canada?

Mr. AIKINS: I will tell you. The people of Canada are occupied in the development of Canada. We have a young population. They are occupied in the development of Canada; they are receiving very high wages; and, assuming that the three dreadnoughts, which are to be for a time part of the Imperial navy, were to be manned by Canadians, the rate of pay would have to be twice as much or more in order to induce Canadians to go on board, than that paid to the seamen that are on board the dreadnoughts in the Old Country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can Canada afford to pay?

Mr. AIKINS: Canada can afford to pay; but can the people of the United Kingdom afford to double the wages of their ordinary seamen in order to man their own vessels? Put the two English and Canadian vessels side by side. The Canadian on one dreadnought is paid twice or three times as much as the Britisher on board another dreadnought, then what will happen?

Mr. OLIVER: Is that an objection?

Mr. AIKINS: That there should be a conflict between seamen from the United Kingdom and those from Canada in respect to their wages? Is it an objection that dissatisfaction should be raised among the people who are manning the British fleet and who are to fight for the protection of our Empire, because of discrimination.

Mr. OLIVER: It did not form an objection in South Africa.

Mr. AIKINS : Where were the dreadnoughts of Canada in South Africa ? There is a very great difference.

Mr. OLIVER : The soldiers of Canada were the dreadnoughts in South Africa.

Mr. AIKINS : What a great imagination the hon. gentleman has ! There is this difference between an army and a navy. An army is restricted to the land; it's ambit is narrow; it cannot go beyond that narrow ambit without a fleet. A fleet on the other hand is mobile; it can go anywhere. Any supreme fleet has its highway upon the oceans, and can protect every part of our Empire. A fleet must be united in order to achieve great things. In an army regiments may be paid different wages in different countries, that is quite true, and it might be an objection if they were long together, and one section knew what the other section was being paid; but on the field they soon separate as in the South African campaign. I say, unless there was a conscription law you could not get Canadians to go into long training and service at very small wages.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about Canada and the United States?

Mr. AIKINS: What discrimination my hon. friend has that he does not know any difference between aiding by dreadnoughts the navy of the United States and aiding the Imperial navy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Speaking of conscription?

Mr. AIKINS: Does my hon. friend think so much of the United States, that the Canadian unit is going to be a part of the United States navy?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

Mr. AIKINS: The conditions are different.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With the hon. gentleman's permission, if he will allow me.

Mr. AIKINS: Certainly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman referred a moment ago to the possibility of Canada adopting the conscription law. Then I interjected, 'What about England? What about the United States?' My hon. friend has answered as regards England. Now I put the question, what about the United States? I am referring to conscription. My inference is that as there is no conscription in the United States, therefore there is no necessity to have conscription in Canada. I am in earnest as to this.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to draw hon. members' attention to rule 23, which says that when a member is speaking, no member shall interrupt him, except to raise a point of order. It seems to me that in the interests of the procedure of the House, it is desirable to follow that rule as closely as possible.

Mr. AIKINS: The hon. gentleman asked a question with respect to the United States. In that country they pay high wages. In Canada, if the fleet were stationed in Canada, and were not a part of the British fleet, Canada could afford to pay very high wages, but when the Canadian dreadnoughts were united to the British fleet and it became known, as it would, that Canadians were paid very high wages for their services, the same services as were given by men from the United Kingdom, there would at once be dissatisfaction. It must not be forgotten also that the British Isles are sea girt, that the people learn to live upon the seas, and it would be very much easier to get people to go from those islands, trained as they are upon the sea, to man the battleships from Canada, than it would be to get Canadians to leave their homes and go to England. Not every man is fit to do duty on a dreadnought. It requires a man of skill, a trained mechanic. Therefore one cannot be surprised at the difficulty we might experience in endeavouring to get Canadians to go upon these vessels, even at a high rate of wages.

Let me refer now to the question of the necessity of promptly taking efficient action. I have pointed out that men in England, who know a great deal more about it than we do, think the circumstances call for immediate action. I refer to the statement made by Lord Roberts only last October, in which he said:

> Germany has within the past ten years sprung up at a bound, from one of the weakest naval powers to the greatest naval power, save one upon the globe. But yesterday, so to speak, the British fleets did not feel the furrows of the German war keels on the high seas. To-day, every British warship and every British merchant vessel thrills in all its iron nerves to that mighty presence..... .....I point to the gradual displacement of the British fleets before the German menace. I point to the Mediterranean, bereft of British battleships and the gradual harrowing year by year of Britain's once far-flung battle line. . . .
>
> Germany always advances towards complete supremacy by land and sea. . . . How impressive in this magnificent unresting energy! It has the mark of true greatness. It challenges admiration even from those against whom it is directed. . . . . There is one way in which Britain can have peace with Germany and every other power, namely, to present such a battle front by sea and land that no power or probable combination of powers dare attack her without the certainty of disaster (loud cheers). That is the only reply worthy of our past or wise for our future. (Renewed cheers). But there is a way in which Britain is certain to have wars, horrors and calamities, namely, by persisting in her present unpreparedness, apathy and unintelligent blind disregard of warnings of the most ordinary practical political insight. . . . . What is the lesson which history enforces? We must abandon the Empire and with it our commercial wealth or be prepared to defend it. We have a great fleet but that fleet is rapidly becoming unequal to the fleets by which we may be opposed. . . . . A paramount navy we must possess, whether of two keels to one or three keels to one. That is a self-evident truth. . . . . What then is my ultimate counsel to the nation in this solemn hour?

Gentlemen, it is a message burnt into my mind. . . . . That message is, arm, prepare, quit yourselves like men, for the time of your ordeal is at hand. . . . . Remember, war does not begin nor end on the day of battle. There is a kind of war, a war of preparation, which goes on silently and unperceived amid apparent peace. . . . . If once you permit any one state to be your undisputed superior by sea or land, that hour, even if not a shot be fired, you cease to be a free nation. . . . . I ask myself how can I, even at this late solemn hour, best help England. Again I say arm, be prepared to quit yourselves as men, for the day of your ordeal is at hand.

This is from one of the oldest and most patriotic warriors Great Britain ever grew. Surely, he knows as much of the interests of the British Empire, and more about British protection, than we do in this House—even than hon. gentlemen opposite do. Therefore, what should Canada do? Arm and prepare for protection. Protection of what? Solely of Canada? No. Disaster to England would mean disaster to Canada; the protection of the British Isles means the protection of Canada; the supremacy of the British fleet means the supremacy of a Canadian fleet, if forces are united. Therefore, we should now take those steps which will result in giving the most efficient aid in the shortest possible time. Canada has been delaying too long; it has been trifling with the so-called Canadian navy. If the late Government had been in earnest a Canadian navy would have been established long ago. Why was it not? The very reason assigned by the right hon. gentleman for the establishment of these navy units on the east and west coasts of Canada existed long ago. If the need existed, why then was not the remedy applied? There is however but one protection for the British Empire—the united British Empire.—and that is a united British Empire fleet. And so what was said to the people of England by Lord Roberts will equally apply to the people of Canada:—'Arm, quit yourselves like men; be strong.' Are we going to neglect the teachings that are indisputable? 'When the strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are at peace. But when a stronger than he cometh upon him and overcometh him he taketh away the armour wherein he trusted and divideth the spoils.' What is the armour in which Canada has trusted in the past? The British navy. Will we in Canada allow a stronger to come upon the Britisfi Empire and take away that armour in which we trusted? Or will we make stronger the strong and add to the armour. When these three splendid Canadian dreadnoughts float in grim silence and power with the other dreadnoughts of the British fleet and a Canadian minister advises on its control whatever complaint has been made—such as that mentioned by the right hon. gentleman as to people in England, in ignorance giving away portions of land which otherwise might be part of Canadian territory—these complaints will absolutely disappear and every foot of farm land, every mineral vein, every waving tree-top, every one of the lowing kine and every fish that cuts in joy the Canadian waters, every towering church-spire, every bowed worshipper, every humble home, and every happy fireside in Canada, will be of as much interest and as carefully guarded as the very beatings of the heart of the British Empire, the breathings of its own existence. Sir, never in the history of Canada, never in the history of the British Empire, was there such necessity for prompt and efficient measures as there is to-day. Now is the opportunity offered to Canada to assert her greatness and to come out into the limelight as an important world power. And Canada will do it. While these clouds and that darkness surround the British Empire, they separate for a moment, and through the rift comes a ray of light. It falls upon the tree of Empire whose branches and leaves are for the strengthening and healing of the nations, and that tree of Empire stands Canada, the young shepherd of the Empire, ruddy, because of his healthfulness, strong, because of his experience, full of courage, because Canada has been grappling with the wilds of prairie and of forest; in his sling and pouch are three smooth stones like unto battleships; and there stands before that tree of Empire an aggressor armed from top to toe in steel. And in his hand he holds a sharpened battleaxe ready to cut down that tree. But he stands, for he hears that young shepherd of the Empire, Canada, saying:

> Aggressor, spare that tree,
> Touch not a single bough;
> In youth it sheltered me,
> And I'll stand by it now.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, Lord Beaconsfield said of the policy of protection, that it was both dead and damned. I think myself that the naval policy of the present Government was dead-born; it has certainly been damned effectively by the defence that has been set up behind it. My hon. friend (Mr. Aikins) who has just taken his seat, objected to irrelevancies in debates; and in gitting rid of irrelevancies, he took a wide sweep at the very start. He divested himself, as I understood him, of the dictionary, a work which is not only useful, but is quite a necessity in modern life. And then he divested himself of all knowledge of or responsibility for the constitutional history of the country. If I might borrow my hon. friend's method of describing the irrelevant, I am afraid I should turn to the dictionary and the constitutional history of Canada for a very great deal of the speech to which we have just listened. For a man who claimed to discard the irrelevant, I thought he was wonderfully bold in becoming irrelevant. I cannot for the life of me see what the past sicknesses of the hon. member for Rouville have to do with the question of a Canadian navy. From the past sicknesses of the hon. member for Rouville my hon. friend conducted us to what seemed to me to be another irrelevant question—the nature of prairie fires, and he asked me what I would do in regard to a prairie fire. During the eleven years I have been in western Canada I have fought prairie fires, but I always fought them myself: I never dreamed of anything so foolish as hiring a neighbour to assist me.

I am sure my hon. friend will excuse me if I do not refer at greater length to his speech. I am readily excusable, I think, upon the ground that the speech was, to a great extent, not addressed to this side of the House. My hon. friend, for more than half the time he was on his feet, pursued what to me seems to be a new and very reprehensible parliamentary practice. Hon. gentlemen never see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) turn his back upon his rhetorical foes; he always pours his hot shot direct into the ranks of the enemy. However, the methods of my hon. friend are pardonable under the circumstances. It is an extraordinary fact that in the discussion of this question we have two broadsides—to use a nautical metaphor—of no mean strength, thrown into the policy of the Government; but my hon. friend had a method in his madness. He felt that probably he need not address his arguments to us on this side of the House, as we are persuaded that the arguments of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) are unanswerable. So he proceeded, very naturally—and without much success, so far as I could see—to work up some enthusiasm upon his own side of the House.

I am one of those who believe in the Imperial status quo. I want to enrol myself behind the opinion of the hon. member for South Renfrew, when he said that the real bonds of the Empire are the bonds of sentiment —the love and affection which we have for the Throne, the Monarch, and the flag that floats over the Empire. I believe that sentiment is so strong in Canada that I venture to repeat what I have said before in this House, that in the event of any attack upon that flag, there would be no fine legal quibbles as to our attitude when Britain was engaged in these wars to which my hon. friend refers. From what I have seen of Canada I have found the opinion prominent that ninety-nine Canadians out of one hundred—aye, a far larger proportion than that—in the event of any attack upon the flag being made, would at once say: 'We are behind that flag, which is as much ours as Britain's, with the whole of our material and moral resources.'

But the condition of affairs, does not deprive gentlemen on this side of the House of their right of free speech and open discussion of any proposition brought before the House by the Government. Any other contention would be absurd in the extreme. The idea, forsooth, that our loyalty is to be impugned because we do not endorse a particular scheme of a particular government, which is here to-day and gone to-morrow, is one which cannot for one moment be entertained. Consider what the result would be if we adopted such an attitude on any question concerning the defence of the Empire. I think it is perfectly clear to any one who has followed the proceedings of this House in regard to this matter that nearly four years ago we were unanimously in favour of defending our own shores. That sentiment was contained in the original resolution carefully thought out and drafted by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Very well; because this is a question of Imperial and foreign politics we at once accept that position, and we will defend our own shores. But the same statesmen say to-day that was all wrong; we must send a contribution to Britain because the real fight will be in the German ocean. Some hon. gentlemen are not political acrobats enough to make such changes so swiftly. But are we on that account to be told we are disloyal? I contend we have the absolute right, in matters of foreign as well as of national politics, to discuss with perfect freedom any scheme brought before us.

The Prime Minister, in bringing his Bill before the House, deprecated any spirit of controversy entering into the consideration of this question. On general grounds, despite what I have just said, this would be most desirable, but I do think that a Prime Minister has a very sanguine temperament who, coming from a cabinet rent with controversy and on the point of disruption, expects a spirit of controversy to be absolutely avoided in this matter by the Parliament and the nation. On this side of the House we are but human, and when the document is heralded throughout certain parts of the country by supporters of the present Administration who seek to eliminate party from the discussion of this matter, two questions naturally arise: when and by whom was party introduced into this contest? These are questions, Mr. Speaker, which admit of the most specific answers. The time was the by-election in Drummond and Arthabaska, and the people who introduced this spirit of controversy, I regret to say, were those prominent men in the present Government who sent telegrams to the effect that everything should be done in Drummond and Arthabaska which would help to down Laurier. Yes, shoot imaginary holes in the British flag to down Laurier! I am sure that nothing so partisan will be done or said on this side of the House as was evidenced in that telegram. The fact is that the intrinsic qualities of the scheme make an acute and prolonged controversy upon the question an absolute certainty. For that, I repeat, members of the present Government are absolutely responsible. The action of the Tory party of this country in connection with that by-election, and in that alliance which is so unstable in its very nature that it is already beginning to break up, will go down on the pages of history as subject to the condemnation of all fair-minded men, because Quebec, of all provinces, was the one where such tactics should have been avoided. Every statesmanlike consideration for the unity of the Empire and the harmony of all classes of Canadians should have restrained public men from making Quebec the cockpit of our party battles. In this connection I want to say that the name of the right hon. leader of the Opposition will be perpetuated in history surrounded with this great glory that on the naval question he was able to carry the province of Quebec by a large majority in favour of a policy which ought to have been the policy of the whole of Canada.

The second ground upon which I regret that this party aspect has been introduced and that the question is in the realm of controversy, is because it makes it impossible for us to meet the first desire of the British Admiralty, expressed in their memorandum—I mean first in point of importance. Any one who reads that memorandum must be impressed with the fact that what the British Government wants is the moral support of Canada behind any scheme by which we are to help in the defence of the Empire and in the defence of Canada as well. I put it to my hon. friends opposite that with that spirit of controversy, which we did not introduce, with Canada actually divided as it is at the present moment, is it not a deplorable fact that the moral effect of Canada's attitude —unless there be some revision of policy on the part of the Government, which I am told is not an impossible contingency—the moral effect of Canada's attitude is absolutely destroyed and thrown away. I personally am rather in a position to plume myself on this naval question. I have to appear, Sir, in no white sheet on the subject. I was no scare-monger four years ago—I think my friends, of whom I have many opposite, will do me that credit —and I am no scare-monger now. I have not had to change my mental attitude, which is always a convenience—at least I find it so. The fact of the matter is that this German scare has become so attenuated a thing that it only finds a resting place in such comparatively disordered minds as we have had an example of this afternoon. At the time that the whole of Canada, almost, was in a state of hysteria on this question, I was learning political wisdom in regard to scares at the feet of no less a person than the present first Lord of the Admiralty, Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill. In the year 1909, when this question first arose in this country, Mr. Winston Churchill used this very remarkable and useful language—and I commend it especially to any of the younger generation of Canadians outside of this House who may hear my words so that they may have some guidance how to act when future scares arise. He said :

> In my judgment a Liberal is a man who ought to stand as a restraining force against an extravagant policy. He is a man who ought to keep cool in the presence of jingo-clamour. He is a man who believes that confidence between nations begets confidence, and that the spirit of peace and good will makes the safety it seeks, and above all I think a Liberal is a man who should keep a sour look for scare-mongers of every kind and every size, however distinguished, however ridiculous—and sometimes the most distinguished are the most ridiculous—a cold, chilling, sour look for all of them, whether that panic comes from the sea or from the air or from the earth or from the waters under the earth.

If the hon. member for Brandon had only come earlier under the teaching of a political philosopher such as Mr. Winston Churchill is, what a mental perturbation he would have been saved in his course through this troubled vale.

It is interesting, with this scare drawing to a close, to look into the history of the scares that have troubled Anglo-Saxons during the lifetime of living men. The first one was the French scare about the middle of the last century, which had many resemblances in the way it was kept up to the German scare. The thing that was then afflicting the people was that the French were going to come over and attack them; and one strong resemblance to the present scare was that just as Lord Roberts, an ancient warrior of eighty, has been trying unsuccessfully to alarm the people of Britain at this time, at that time the Duke of Wellington wrote his famous letter to Lord Burgoyne in which he described exactly the military shortcomings of Great Britain as Lord Roberts did the other day, and in which he was rebuked by an eminent statesman of that day just as Lord Roberts has been rebuked by Sir Edward Grey and others to-day. Another comparison between the two scares—and these are very interesting historical studies—I apologize to the Minister of Marine for introducing history; but, after all, a little historical knowledge is not a drawback in a statesman. At that time the papers printed most authentic statements that the French nation was engaged in building warships secretly in the harbour of Cherbourg, just as the other day we had it printed that the Germans were engaged in a similar impossible occupation. I say impossible because your common sense will tell you that it is impossible to build a dreadnought secretly. If a man were living alone on a prairie, and had a rent in his pants, he could mend it secretly, and he would probably choose to do so; but a dreadnought is quite a large article, so that you need a harbour and you need thousands of men working around. There is no secret that is ever divided between two. The pants would not necessarily be divided between two at all, but the moment a dozen people knew about the dreadnought—the thing on the face of it is so silly that it condemns scares now and forever more and it is incredible that there should be people silly enough to print these things and a still larger number silly enough to believe them. After the French scare, in the late seventies, we had a scare of which I remember all the particulars—I was a keen young student of British politics at the time. That was the Russian scare. That agitation had one great similarity to the German scare which is now dying a natural death. At that time it was thought that Russia threatened Constantinople, and the British Government asked Parliament for a vote of credit. They asked for a gift from themselves of six millions pounds, thirty million dollars, five million dollars short of what this Government propose. I remember that the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, then approaching the height of his wonderful powers, told a story in a strong speech which he made against that vote of credit. I recall the story for several reasons. The first is that it is extremely apposite to the hesitation and the vacillation of the present Government, at last followed by some kind of decisive action, and the second is that it illustrates the freedom with which prominent men, and men who receive the respect of all Canadians, have attacked the foreign policy of England in England when they thought it was contrary to the true policy and principles of the Empire. He told a story of three men on a raft. I suppose one might think that it might be in the present day the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Prime Minister and the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). They were struggling together in great trouble upon the raft trying to save themselves from shipwreck, when one of the three turned to the two others and appealed to them for goodness sake to engage in some form of devotion, to sing a hymn, to pray, or to repeat a portion of the Scriptures. But he found that neither man was any use for his purpose. 'Well, then,' he said, 'we will have to take up a collection.' On the raft, in the case of the present Government, they could not even come to an agreement about the collection, because, the moment a collection was mentioned by the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) jumped overboard. Now if we remember these matters, I think they will help us very much to bring a calm mind to the consideration of the Government's proposals.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had pointed out that just as in the middle of the last century the French scare passed away without there having been the smell of gunpowder between the two great nations of France and Great Britain from that time, and as the Russian scare in the seventies passed away likewise without there having been a trigger pulled then or since; so happily for humanity and civilization the German scare of yesterday is vanishing. I think I shall be able to offer proof from the best possible sources that a generation from now we shall be looking back upon this scare as another of the human follies and upon the historical fact that following it there was not the firing of a shot by the one or the other of these two great Christian nations.

That brings me to the position which I think was the position taken by the Prime Minister himself in laying down his policy: that there is no emergency—no emergency present and no emergency prospective. I base that statement in the first place upon the fact that the Prime Minister did not rest his case upon the claim that there was any emergency. The contention that there is such appears to me to be impossible in view of the simplest of our experiences at the present moment. What have we seen, Sir, in the recent history of Europe? We have seen in Eastern Europe a conflagration, and we have seen this remarkable spectacle: that the two great powers which were in the most active cooperation for the promotion of peace, were Great Britain and Germany, which we are told here by some people are at each other's throats. The evidence that there is no impending war between these two countries is carried to our very doors. Some one had the courtesy to send me a copy of the Montreal Gazette the other day, and it contained a most interesting interview. As it is a column long I do not intend to read it, but I might say, it was an interview given by a Canadian-born gentleman, but of German parentage, Mr. Munderloh, who has just returned from Germany. I will read two of the headlines of this interview only :

> Mr. Henry Munderloh saw no Anti-British Feeling in the Fatherland.—The Great Mass of the People are too much Concerned with Earning a Living to bother about War.

And about the latter headline; those of us who know something about the fiscal position of Germany have known for some time that this was a condition produced in her people by a too close sticking to the policy of protection—that by the way. The next evidence I would offer is the evidence which was referred to by my right hon. leader when he said that no one could claim there was an emergency in the face of the public utterances of the leading statesmen of Britain during the last twelve months. Then, the memorandum itself is the best proof that Great Britain is equal and far more than equal to any claims that are likely to be made upon her powers of defence, if such claims are made, and, as I have already said, there is no evidence that there will be any demand upon these powers for some time to come. I cannot understand why any gentleman on the other side of the House should want to believe there is an emergency, for so far as I am concerned it is a matter of gratitude with me to think to-day that the great masses of civilized mankind are convinced that a war between Britain and Germany would be a causeless and a purposeless war; that it would entail untold misery and loss and suffering upon both nations now, that it would hand down a heritage of hate to generations yet unborn, and that it would take its place in the front rank of the criminal follies of mankind.

There is no emergency. But the extraordinary political situation we are in in Canada is this: that although there is no emergency we have a government which comes coolly forward for its only naval policy with an emergency contribution. That is a most extraordinary position. I am inclined to think it is a position which the Ministry themselves are finding extremely difficult to sustain within the secret deliberations of their cabinet councils at the present time. And, Sir, I am perfectly certain and convinced in my own mind that it is a position which is absolutely hostile to the confirmed opinion of the great majority of the people of this country. An emergency contribution in the presence of no emergency is an absurdity in terms and it is an absurdity in fact. It is a contribution that is proposed, and a contribution pure and simple, for I set no store by the strings that are supposed to be put on it.

We are told that it is to be returnable to Canada, and we are told this by a Ministry to whom the First Lord of the Admiralty complains that the objection to the fleet of my right hon. friend is that the ships would become effete in six years. Do dreadnoughts not become effete? What is to be the condition of the dreadnoughts when they are returned to us? Why, clearly, they will be effete. We are to get the dreadnoughts back; they are to come to Canada and constitute the elements of permanent policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they will come to us when they have been reduced to scrap iron.

I set no store either by the string in the shape of a promise of a member of the Defence Committee from Canada. It may readily be conceded that the only logical departure from the Imperial status quo would be some form of Imperial federation; but the trouble about this Imperial federation is that people have been actively discussing it since the time of Edmund Burke and Adam Smith, who took diametrically opposite views of the question a century and a quarter ago, and I am skeptical whether my right hon. friend opposite, even with the assistance of his Postmaster General, could succeed where Edmund Burke failed. Why, the main criticism which was offered to the speeches of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in the old country upon this question was, that while he talked about Imperial federation, he did not give the slightest hint as to how he was going to bring it about. If one thinks for a moment about the question, one will see what the difficulties are. I would ask in the first place, is Imperial federation feasible? and in the second place, is it desirable? This must be perfectly clear: that in any form of Imperial federation we in Canada would have a very small minority in the representation upon such a body. There is no doubt that the majority upon that body would rule, and it is perfectly obvious that a conclusion might be carried by the majority in any Imperial Council that you can conceive of, over the heads and against the ideas of the Government and the Parliament and the people of Canada on matters which were close to their rights, close to their interests, close to their habits. This is the difficulty that has met every statesman for a century and a quarter, who ever approached this subject, and we are no nearer the solution of it now than we were then. Does anybody who has considered the constitution of the Committee on Defence consider that in that Committee of Defence there are the germs of Imperial federation? Why, the very suggestion of our having any power in regard to the policy of Great Britain has set a large portion of the British public by the ears, to such an extent that the Times newspaper, which is in sympathy with the policy of my right hon. friend opposite, has hastened to assure the British people that it is not proposed to give any power to Canada, and that great newspaper has defined in the most exact terms the duties of the Committee on Defence. I quote from the London Times:

> The Committee on Defence is a body created solely to co-ordinate our naval and military preparations with the requirements of policy as defined by the Cabinet——

That is the British Cabinet:

> —and indorsed by Parliament and approved by the electorate.

That is, the Parliament and the electorate of Great Britain:

> The Committee on Defence can commit the country or the Empire to nothing. It has neither responsibility nor power except in so far as its councils are approved by the Prime Minister who presides over it and by the other ministers who attended it.

Is that the kind of thing that is to compensate us for any suspicion of an attack upon our selft-government? Does any one see in that the germ of a responsible government in London managing the affairs of the whole Empire? We have no power in it, no responsibility. We have a man sent to London whose privilege it is to help to co-ordinate the naval and military forces of the Empire and of our portion of these naval and military forces; to carry out a policy thought out by the British Government, endorsed by the British Parliament and by the British electorate. If that is not humiliating to Canada in the extreme, and taking away from us in a very real sense our self-government, then I do not know how to describe it. We are face to face with a policy of contribution pure and simple, which is not accompanied by any permanent naval policy, but which for all practical purposes means the abandonment of any permanent naval policy.

Take the point to which I have just referred. If in another century and a quarter we get as short a distance forward as we have done in the last century and a quarter on Imperial federation, on the construction of this representative council; and if we can only have a voice in the foreign policy of Britain when we have that representative council; then I submit to the intelligence of gentlemen opposite that we may say, for our purposes at any rate, that a permanent naval policy is abandoned, because I do not think we will be likely to live for another century and a quarter. The quarter of a century will do me, and there will still be a hundred years to wait. No permanent policy for Canada, but what follows is worse than that. If there be no permanent policy in Canada what we are really committed to is a permanent policy outside Canada. No minister, no member opposite, will stand up in his place and claim that that is the last time we will give a contribution, if we give it this time. I know that my hon. friend the Prime Minister said that this was not to be taken as a precedent; but the next time some fellow like Robert Blatchford comes along and writes some scare words, there will be more contributions; or some party will want to use this policy in some by-election, if not in Drummond and Arthabaska, then somewhere else, and you will have the party that needs it coming along with another contribution. Apart from these considerations, it is too humiliating to think that Canada is going to get off for all time with a contribution of $35,000,000. It is the beginning of a permanent policy outside of Canada. I do not need to go any further to condemn it in the minds of all thoughtful men in this country.

Now this is the sense in which the policy is understood by leading supporters of my hon. friends in the press. I do not know whether or not they all read this article in the Citizen. It is an extremely significant article. It says that the people, who supported the Laurier navy and opposed the contribution forgot that the main role of Canada in this world is a peaceful role. If that means anything at all, it means that we are not going to have a navy, but that a policy of contributions is to be our permanent policy. It is a peculiar article. According to the Bible, the battle of Armageddon preceded the milennium, but the Citizen is going to run the two concurrently; it is going to have Armageddon in Europe and the millennium in Canada.

I should like to appeal to members of the Government to reconsider this policy. It is true, they have had fourteen months to consider it in, but that is not enough for men who are newly in harness. When they have reconsidered it, they will run away from it in shame. I have said that if the Prime Minister did not base his policy on the claim that there was an emergency, what did he base it upon? He based it upon two points, the first being that there is need of closer co-operation between the various portions of the Empire in matters of trade and defence. That was his only reference to trade in the whole speech, but it was full of significance. I wish the Prime Minister had been in his place, but I can trust the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) to tell him what I say. I should like to advise him not to worry too much about trade. I see that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) is not in his place. That is too bad. Trade depends on causes far beyond the control of hon. gentlemen opposite. They may win elections by a cry about trade, but I see the light is dawning upon my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White). In his budget statement last year he would not see the light. He pursued the policy of the political ostrich. While he was reading the details of the trade of this country, when he came to the statement in reference to our expanding trade with the United States, he stuck his head abruptly into the sand. My hon. friend, the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), took his head out, and he had to cough up the truth about the matter. This year he admits that we must trade with the United States. Of course we must, and yet my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce goes on worrying about the scheme of trade within the Empire. For a man of his intellect, it is the most pitiable sight I know. The facts of the situation are these. Last year our total trade with the United States was roughly $406,000,000. There is the obvious fact, which as I say, is now playing its full part upon the brain matter of my hon friend the Minister of Finance; but my hon friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce still thinks he can ring trade up within certain limits. He talked some time ago about two estimable gentlemen going to Washington; he himself was visited in the spring of the year by fourteen or sixteen gentlemen, and they had a pow-wow about trade with the West Indies. I think he is going to Australia to talk with his relatives in the southern seas about the possibilities of trade within the Empire. He did not formerly believe in foreign commerce at all; he was the great advocate of the home market. He reminds me of a story of two Scotchmen who were walking in Perthshire one day, and they came across a man whom they had never seen before except in kilts, and he was wearing an extraordinarily wide pair of trousers. One of the gentlemen called the other's attention to it, and the reply came, 'Converts are always enthusiastic.' Now that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has gone in for foreign commerce, he has gone in for it with a vengeance. Now $406,000,000 was our total trade with the United States last year, and during the same year we did $16,000,000 total trade with the West Indies, Australia and New Zealand put together. I give these figures in reference to the phrase, which I have just quoted from the Prime Minister's speech, as to the matter of closer co-operation within the Empire on questions of trade and defence. I should like to give my right hon. friend the Prime Minister the piece of advice I gave in his absence, do not worry too much about the trade aspect of this thing. Whatever antics you perform in the field of defence, trade will pursue its own course in accordance with laws far above human influence, in the future as in the past. Britain and Germany will be knit closer by that commerce, which is one of the sights of the world today, and that commerce we have been doing with the United States will knit closer together in many ways, without in the least interfering with our political allegiance or our national defence. The great fault of my hon. friends opposite is that they are guilty in these great questions of what I would call inverted thinking. They exaggerate the influence of sentiment, where it has no influence at all, because trade is the most prosaic thing in the universe; and they minimize the influence of sentiment where sentiment is all powerful. That is all that is wrong with them, but it is a good deal when you come to think of it. It means that their thinking is apt to be upside down. People do not trade with their relatives. I heard my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce talk the other day about dealing with Newfoundland or somewhere else on the principle of sentiment. Who ever heard of a storekeeper doing his principal business with his own relations? The thing is absurd. We trade according to the laws of trade. People trade for a profit; and, as a profit is their object, they look for numbers, they look for proximity, they look for exchangeable products in their customers. That is the only way you can do business. And we will do that business with the States, and we will do it freely yet; I don't care which side brings it in.

The other ground upon which my right hon. friend based his policy was the ground of the projected change which it is found necessary to make in the disposition of the British fleet. Approaching that with my own common-sense—such of it as Providence has given me—I should say, that that was the strongest argument, on the face of it, for the supplying of the deciency that is left in the outside portions of the Empire. And I am reinforced when I find that such a man as Lord Charles Beresford, takes the same view. But I am going to offer now one of the very few quotations with which I shall trouble the House, the strongest that I know along this line, in the shape of an extract from a speech made by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in April of this year. I also think that if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, for whose mind I have a great regard, and his ministers, will give an open-minded and frank consideration to this quotation, they will see that they are embarked upon an impossible course, a wrong course, one that does not make for the greatest usefulness and strength of Canada nor the greatest strength and harmony of the Empire:

> The British fleets are now practically concentrated. The recent great review before the King is only one proof of the quality of concentration with the Admiralty has lately brought to its final act, a policy of naval concentration which has given a real measure of security to the centre and heart of the British Empire.
>
> But there is one aspect of naval concentration which requires the attention of thinking men here and elsewhere throughout the British Empire. The fact that our fleet is not only concentrated in the decisive theatre of European war, but must be kept concentrated, and in a certain sense, tied to that theatre, has been for some years creating a new want, a new need, a new opportunity for the great self-governing dominions of the Crown.
>
> Naval supremacy consists in our being in possession of naval forces sufficient to overcome in war the strongest effort or efforts which any reasonably probable combination of powers may bring against us. That we should be always in a position to do—that we believe ourselves to be now and in the immediate future in a position to do. But a war may go on for a long time before a decision is obtained or gained; and this is the more likely of the two contingencies. If we act, as we shall do, with discretion, with sobriety, with simplicity, with good will to all nations and rancour and prejudices against none, it is much more likely—I say it with sincere conviction—that war will never come in our time, and perhaps will have passed from the world; at any rate for periods which our most adventurous imagination enables us to forsee. Meanwhile, and pending a decision in the critical theatre, there is no doubt that the general mobility of our fleet is reduced. It cannot move safely and freely to every part of the world to the same extent as in former years. At present, of course, and for some years to come we are not only able to maintain a sufficient margin in home waters at the decisive points, but we could—by making special arrangements, by effecting partial mobilization we could if need arose—fit out and despatch strong squadrons to the aid of any of our colonies or dominions across the sea, whose vital interests were menaced or attacked.
>
> That is the duty which we are able to discharge, and which we are proud to discharge—a duty which we should not hesitate to run the risk of discharging—which we should not hesitate to make sacrifices for—the protection of our great self-governing dominions. And when I speak of this, I mean not only by a general supremacy which operates simultaneously and universally at every portion of the globe, but by the despatch, if necessary, of particular squadrons to any point or any part of the British Empire where special danger might menace our fellow-countrymen. That we can do now, next year,, and in the years which are immediately before us.
>
> Still, here we are—gathered together a company of practical shipwrights, and accustomed to deal with real and great facts. We must face them and we must recognize them, for with every new development in continental navies, with every fresh squadron which takes water abroad, with every step in the ceaseless accumulation of naval strength with which we are confronted, the world-wide mobility of the British navy becomes restricted.
>
> And here is a great opportunity—the great chance of the self-governing dominions—these strong young nations which have grown up all over the world under the shelter of the British flag and by the stimulus and protection of British institutions, and they have already begun to seize it; already we have seen the development in Australia of a strong modern fleet unit. New Zealand has contributed a noble ship to the general service of the British navy
>
> And in Canada men of all parties and of both races are deeply stirred upon the problem and of the share which the great dominions should take in the means by which it and all the other parts of the British Empire are kept from harm. And we are soon to receive, I understand, representatives of the new Canadian Administration, who will come over here to consult with the Government and the Admiralty upon the course of policy which should be adopted in the future.

Says Winston Churchill, the head of the British Admiralty at the present moment:

If the main development of the past ten years has been the concentration of the British fleet in decisive theatres——

The ground upon which my right hon. friend founds his case—

—it seems to me—and I dare say to you—not unlikely that the main naval development of the next ten years will be the growth of the effective naval forces in the great dominions overseas. Then we shall be able to make what I think will be found to be the true division of labour between the Mother Country and her daughter states—that we should maintain the sea supremacy against all comers at the decisive point, and that they should guard and and patrol all the rest of the British Empire.

I am perfectly serious when I ask the Government and its supporters to consider that as decisive of the whole case. And I am more serious still when I ask them not to tell us, as my hon. friend the Postmaster General has told us, that he is undertaking this to please the British Government or the British people. He is taking the course precisely opposite to the course which Mr. Churchill recommends.

These are the two grounds upon which the right hon. Prime Minister based his case. We have had a defence of that policy—and presumably a reply to the argument of my right hon. leader and the hon. member for South Renfrew—from two Ministers, I think I shall be supported by the judgment of the House when I state that these two Ministers both laboured very hard to prove an emergency; and it certainly needed hard labour, for it is hard to prove an emergency where one does not exist. And they laboured very hard to prove that the British Government had asked for their policy. I do not think, in the face of the quotation from Mr. Churchill such ground can possibly be taken with any decent self-respect in the future. But my two hon. friends, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, based their case upon the memorandum, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries especially based his case upon the last two paragraphs of that memorandum.

Evidently we are differently constituted for these two paragraphs taught me exactly the opposite of what they taught my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. They taught me, in the most comprehensive and unmistakable language, that the British Government say there is no emergency, and they taught me also that the British Government did not ask for this contribution, or anything else. Now, the last paragraph but one of the memorandum states in the most emphatic terms the fitness of Great Britain for all duties of defence that may devolve upon her.

She has before now successfully made head alone and unaided against the most formidable combinations, and she has not lost her capacity by a wise policy and strenuous exertions to watch over and preserve the vital interests of the Empire.

It cannot, in the face of that language, be successfully claimed that there is any emergency, and, if there were, still less can it be claimed that Great Britain is not able to face that emergency. But it is in the last paragraph we are told the British Government asks for this policy. It reads as follows:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friends say hear, hear; I will read to them again the first two lines of that paragraph:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective.

What is the only conclusion that even my hon. friends who say hear, hear, can draw from that language? It is, that the Prime Minister of Canada went with his colleagues to the Government of Great Britain with a cut-and-dried policy of contribution. They did not go to seek a policy; they went with the only policy which the Nationalists of Quebec would allow them to propose—no other possible meaning can be attached to that statement. I do not now hear any of my hon. friends opposite say hear, hear. Having gone to the British Government with that cut-and-dried policy of contribution, what could the Admiralty say? They are but human. I venture to say that if any department of any government anywhere is offered the sum of $35,000,000, they will jump at it. I am not a fighting man, but I could put it to some use if I had it. What could the Government do but tell them the form in which that immediate aid should be given?

My hon. friends a moment ago said hear, hear, as if this paragraph did not carry its own interpretation. Most hon. members, have, no doubt, read the very simple and explicit statement of Mr. Asquith in the British Parliament last Thursday upon this very subject. Mr. Asquith is a master of terse expression. In reply to a question as to whether any request had been made of the Canadian Government by the Imperial authorities, he said:

> The memorandum speaks for itself. It contains no request, but leaves the facts set out to the unfettered consideration of the Canadian Parliament.

I believe that is another thing we shall not hear very much about in this debate. I take it that the people of Canada who carefully follow the interpretation of these two paragraphs, as understood, having my own judgment confirmed by the unmistakable language of Mr. Asquith, will not accept the statement that the British Government asked for anything. If hon. gentlemen are going to stand by this policy, they should stand by it in their own strength, and not try to father it on the British Government.

I now wish in terms as brief as possible, to offer the objections which occur to my mind as being insuperable against the policy of a contribution. I do not know that my initial objection will commend itself very largely to either side of the House. I wish it would, but I am afraid it is too idealistic for a somewhat materialistic country. My initial objection to this policy of a contribution to what is going on in Europe in the way of armaments is that it fails to carry out what I conceive to be Canada's highest duty in world politics. The most significant fact in the international history of civilized nations, is, in my judgment, the fact that on this North American continent we have two great nations, destined, I have not the least doubt, to be the two greatest nations of the world, between whom no act of war has taken place for one hundred years. As I say, this is a most significant fact in the international history of civilized nations, and certainly it is a most significant fact in the national history of Canada, for in that fact lies the high-water mark of the world's civilization in international politics up to the present time. But, turning to Europe, a very different scene is disclosed to our view. We see what Sir Edward Grey, in direct and simple language, described a few years ago as the nations of Europe marching to the ruin of civilization through armaments. At the present moment it seems to me that to send $35,000,000 out of Canada into the maelstrom of European politics is inevitably to embark Canada upon the march to the ruin of civilization through armaments. I did not expect on its first presentation any great acceptance of that view in this House, but I am perfectly certain that this view will commend itself to a large number of the most thoughtful and benevolent of our fellow citizens.

Mr. BURNHAM: How does that affect the Laurier naval policy?

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend is always getting his thoughts disjointed, he will hear about that when I come to it. But if it is a point upon which my hon. friend would like some information, he may see the distinction between sending money into the maelstrom of European armaments, and engaging to a modest degree—and gradually—in what is a primitive——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK: I have authority for saying that it shall be done gradually, because your great leader in rhetoric told us in March, 1909, that beginnings must be small. How partisanship blinds men! Hon. gentlemen opposite cheered my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the echo in 1909 for a statement which they laugh at when I make it now. We see that this thought which I am trying to impress upon the better nature of every man within my hearing is attracting attention in Europe itself, for there was a despatch the other day from Great Britain which said:

> The entrance of the Dominion into the European race of armaments and the fresh fuel furnished the already powerful armour industries are facts of serious importance. The contractor's profits on Canada's gift will be $3,500,000.

And in trying to estimate whether the country of which I have the honour of being an adopted son, is following her highest destiny, I claim the right to bring this thought before this Parliament and to point out what has already resulted from our entering into this race of European armaments, or threatening to enter on that race. Why, within two days of my right hon. friend's statement, language of the most provocative kind was used by members of the German ruling classes towards Mr. Winston Churchill as a direct result of this policy having been proposed in Canada. They referred to him as lying, and well they might, if he had guaranteed that the armaments of Great Britain were not to exceed a certain point, and Canada's gift was at once to increase those armaments by three dreadnoughts. There is an immediate result along those lines, and a result of a deplorable nature, which only indicates what will happen to us, and what will be the dire results if we pursue that as a permanent policy, outside of Canada.

I object to this policy of contribution because it stultifies this Parliament—absolutely stultifies the resolution unanimously arrived at by this Parliament. I do not think I need to prove this case. Is there any one on the other side of the House who will try to prove that this policy of a $35,000,000 contribution to the British Admiralty in any way realizes our conception of a speedy construction of a Canadian naval force? Is there any connection between the two? No one can claim that for one moment. I claim that the Government, if they had had the courage of their convictions in this matter, before they brought in this proposal should have repealed the resolution of March 1909 and should have repealed the Navy Act. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) has failed to notice the difference between my right hon. friend's position now and in 1909; but that must have been because he has not had time to read up carefully what has happened in this House. Indeed, he had a peculiar way of proving his case. He described my right hon. friend as the epitome, the boiled-down essence, of consistency—if I may adopt a dictionary definition of the word. Because my right hon. friend had pointed out that what the Prime Minister was doing now was not consistent with what he said in 1909, the Minister of Marine at once proceeded to prove that the consistency was all there by reading something the Prime Minister said in 1910. That is a method of logic that I have not been accustomed to and that does not carry me with it at first sight. The fact of the matter is that my right hon. friend may claim to be consistent only in the sense in which the acrobat may be said to be consistent who makes his living entirely by turning somersaults. Does anybody see the speedy construction of a Canadian naval service in the bald statement made with very great courage that we cannot have an organization worth speaking of in Canada for 25 or 50 years? Is there any agreement between these positions? Without the rescinding of that resolution and the repeal of the Navy Act, this proposal of the Government is almost ultra vires, to use a legal expression; it reduces parliamentary procedure to the greatest farce imaginable. The claim as to the inability of Canada to do things in 25 or 50 years is one that I would look for from hon. gentlemen opposite. One of the first things I heard on coming to this country was a statement from a prominent Conservative in a schoolhouse in Alberta that he expected to see the grass growing on the bed of the Grand Trunk Pacific, so little did he think, even in 1904, that it was possible to compete sucessfully with the one great creation of the Tory party, the Canadian Pacific railway. I heard that with my own ears. People who in 1904 had so little faith in their country as that might well doubt the ability of Canada to enter upon the field of a reasonable defence of her own shores. Nobody else would, I am sure.

My next objection to the policy of contribution is that it absolutely declines the elementary duties of a nation. I shall not read extensive quotations, but I wish to read one not from any malignant desire to score a point off the Prime Minister, but because it states the proper policy for Canada in terms that cannot be improved on, certainly cannot be improved on by me. Speaking in Halifax, on October 14, 1909, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister gave an admirable condensed definition of the duties of the Canadian people as I conceive them to be in this case. He said;

> The House of Commons last session laid down a certain policy touching naval defence in which both political parties united. It may not have satisfied the aspirations of all Conservatives, but it seemed our bounden duty to place, if possible, above the limits of partisan strife a question so vital and far-reaching, and to attain the standard which has for many years governed both political parties in Great Britain with respect to foreign nations.
>
> How the present Administration will work out the policy which was outlined by a resolution to which I have alluded, remains to be seen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: You keep your, Hear, hear, for the next sentence.

> One governing principle at least should control, namely, that out of our own materials, by our own labour and by the instructed skill of our own people any necessary provision for our naval defences shoulde be made so far as may be reasonably possible. In this connection may we not hope that there shall be given a stimulus and encouragement to the shipbuilding industry of Canada which has long been lacking.
>
> To-day should be Nova Scotia's opportunity in that regard. Providence has endowed this province with the material, with the men, and with the maritime situation which are essential not only for developing a scheme of naval defence and protection, but also for the resuscitation of this shipbuilding industry which once made Nova Scotia famous throughout the world.

I put on one side a number of quotations from the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the same sense exactly, but I have one which has not been read, and which is too great a beauty to miss:

> The imagination can scarcely grasp the commerce that waits for Canadian vessels, manned by Canadian crews, and a mighty instrument of expansion and wealth to be held almost completely in our own hands. But to accomplish that purpose we must build steel vessels.

Unfortunately in this matter of defence my hon. friend does what he does with regard to trade; he relies upon his imagination. He does not get down to actual facts, and the consequence is that both trade and defence will disappear in the direction from which they come unless he changes his ways. I did not read that extract from my hon. friend's speech to make an argumentative point at all. It is sound policy, and it was sound policy when it was uttered. Let me put it to my hon. friends opposite in this way: I came here from Britain eleven years ago, and took a western homestead; and, with a number of other fellows out there, I have been doing my best to dig the wealth out of the soil of Western Canada. Before I came here, I used to see the great shipyards upon the Tyne where I resided, and upon the Clyde which I visited; I saw the men clambering over the sides of boats there, and I saw the serried hordes of Britain's labour going out of the shipyards and the steel works. As a Canadian, I want to see those activities in Canada. As a western farmer especially, I claim the right to speak strongly on this question. In almost the last utterance, if not the last, of Sir Richard Cartwright in the Senate, he proved to my satisfaction at any rate that western Canada is overtaxed today. We shall contribute our full share of the money to pay for those dreadnoughts which are to be sent out of the country; because it is the workers and the farmers of Canada who will have to raise that $35,000,000, and it is to those workers and to those farmers that you will have to answer for this policy, not to the millionaires of Toronto.

There is a pestilent type of Imperialist who comes across the Atlantic from the old land that one meets in this country from time to time. I meet him in the railway trains and in the hotels. He has been driven abroad by the Lloyd George budget. After I have let him blow off a good deal of steam on Lloyd George's budget, I touch him gently on the subject of dreadnoughts, and he says: 'oh, yes, we have got to have dreadnoughts.' His appetite for dreadnoughts is in inverse proportion to his appetite for taxes, and I am afraid he has his representative in Toronto. These millionaires are very good at talking Imperialism, but they come to Western Canada, to the men who are digging the wealth out of the homesteads, to get the money to pay the piper. That is a kind of Imperialism I have very little use for. Now, it seems to be an aspect of the case that we cannot forget. It is Canadian labour that it is the duty of this Parliament to build up, it is Canadian industry that it is the duty of this Parliament to develop, and in doing so we will have the blessing and the good wishes of Mr. Winston Churchill, according to the passage I have just read from the speech he delivered last April.

Another objection to this policy is that it sets out a new constitutional relationship between Canada and the old country. One may concede that technically it does not give away autonomy. I do not wish to make a single unfair argument on this subject. If we give the money, we are not having the money torn from us; I admit the contention of the Postmaster General in that connection. But we do give away what is very close to self-government, and that is the power of spending the money. We give away the power of the purse, and I would press this point upon the thoughtful men in the House on whatever side they sit. My right hon. friend referred to the permanent and constitutional relations between Canada and the Mother Country. In that connection, I read the other day a most interesting address which the Prime Minister gave ten years ago in the town of Lindsay, a most interesting and instructive address. He reviewed in a manner very similar to that followed by my hon. friend the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) the history and progressive development of self-government in Canada and he went on to show how each step in the way of widening Canada's liberties had been accompanied by greater loyalty to the old land because of greater freedom. Can any one contend that in giving a contribution which is to be spent by the British Admiralty, we are extending our self-government? Can any one contend that that marks progress in our constitutional relations? Mr. Speaker it marks retrogression in our constitutional relations; it is a move backward. As I have said, it will not be the last contribution. We give up control of our expenditure. Self-government not only here, but in Great Britain, is largely associated with the control of the purse. Why was it that they cut off a king's head? Because he wanted to take money from the people without the consent of Parliament. What was it that lost the thirteen colonies? The fact that Lord North wanted to take money from them without their consent. The third step seems to me not much better when it is proposed that the Government and the Parliament of Canada should take money from the people and send it over to Great Britain without their consent. There is an argument here for a plebiscite anyway.

Mr. BORDEN: To prevent misapprehension, would my hon. friend explain what words in the Bill he is relying on for his argument?

Mr. CLARK: I was not referring to the verbiage of the Bill; I was dealing with the proposition.

Mr. BORDEN: The money must be spent under the terms of the Bill. That will be the law, but I am not aware of any words in the Bill that support the hon. gentleman's argument.

Mr. CLARK: Well, I am not a great constitutional lawyer, and I do not know that I need meet my hon. friend's point, because the hon. gentleman who preceded me in the debate said this was not a case of constitutional law, that it was not a question of words, that is was a question of $35,000,000.

Mr. BORDEN: I would like to point out to my hon. friend that by the terms of the Bill the money is to be spent under the direction of the Governor in Council, and not under the direction of the Admiralty.

Mr. CLARK: My right hon. friend helps himself extremely little, because, after all, the ships that are to be bought with our money are to be run by the Admiralty. I would like to put this to my right hon. friend, is it in any sense a step in the direction of the extension of self-government, which he elaborated in the address to which I have referred? I think he will have difficulty in persuading the people of this country on that point. Further, I want to express the opinion that the step of running any portion of Canada's public works, or works of defence, from Downing Street, is a hazardous and rash step. It has never been done, and it has never been attempted without serious consequences in the United States, and in the past Canadians have carried arms for this principle of self-government, and have shed one another's blood for it. We are entering, in my judgment, upon a vista the end of which no man can see.

I am opposed to this contribution because it is wholly and absolutely unnecessary from a financial point of view. In fact, from this point of view, it approaches the grotesque and the absurd, and I think a couple of simple figures will justify my position. I believe I am correct in saying that the United Kingdom has invested in Canada, publicly and privately, at the present moment, nearly four hundred million pounds—two billion dollars. Now, Great Britain—I know on the authority of Sir Edgar Speyer of London, in an address of his which I read—draws an average interest of 5·2 per cent on her foreign investments. But if you allow only 4 per cent on her investment in Canada it follows that this country is paying annually to Great Britain $80,000,000 every year in interest. I have had occasionally to carry my land out West—thank Heaven I am free of that business now—but for a number of years I had to pay 5 per cent interest, and I know they were always prompt about collecting the payments. We are sending eighty million dollars a year to Great Britain at the present moment in the shape of interest on her investments, and there is another fact that is of some importance. Since the Asquith Government came to power several years ago they have paid seventy million pounds or $350,000,000 off the national debt of Great Britain. We are needing to borrow money every year from Great Britain for the absolutely necessary development of our own country. Here is Great Britain which has two billion dollars invested in Canada, which is drawing from us eighty million dollars in interest every year annually, and we are to be told, forsooth, that to keep the flag flying and to keep the British Empire intact we have to send a miserable toll of thirty-five million dollars across—miserable compared with the money we are now sending annually to Britain. That situation approaches a little to the grotesque and absurd.

Sir, this contribution places on Canada a badge of inferiority which I for one believe her people will not carry, and this brings me for a moment to the argument of the Postmaster General. I wonder sometimes why the Prime Minister took the Postmaster General across the Atlantic with him last summer. I had thought that perhaps he took him over as an interesting specimen of an almost extinct species; but, when the Postmaster General comes back here and makes a speech such as he made the other day, I see that the Prime Minister had a deeper purpose in view: it was to make a thorough-paced jingo of the Postmaster General. But there is nothing very thorough-paced about the jingoism of the Postmaster General; he is only a calculating and frugal jingo, after all. And I must say that the calculations he enters upon seem to be particularly ill-suited for the furtherance of the policy which his speech was made in support of. There was something noble about the real original jingo. If the Postmaster General should come to me in private, I can help along his education a little; I would like to teach him some of the ditties in the days that St. Jingo first arose:

> We don't want to fight but by jingo if we do,

The old original jingo said:

> We've got the men, we've got the ships, we've got the money, too.

There's something whole hearted about that. It is more like my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins); there are varieties of the jingo. The Postmaster General says we have not got the ships, and we have not got the men, but we will send a belated donation, and we will send it on the cheapest possible scale; we will get the most for our money, he says. Just think of it. If we were to spend the money here, according to the Postmaster General, we would have to bring men from Britain and we would have to pay them more than they are paid in Britain; we can get Britain's men-of-war's men on the cheap in Britain. What a noble type of jingo he is! There was another ditty they used to sing when the name jingo first arose:

There's money in the country,

They are aways ready with the money in Britain for fighting purposes——

And there's thunder in the air,

The Prime Minister spoke of the thunder in his peroration——

And little Turkey's threatened by the great big Russian bear,
The British lion is looking on and waiting for a row,
That's what the people say in England.

There was something whole hearted about that, but somehow or other this lion's cub that talked the other day has not got the right roar; he may have borrowed a skin somewhere. Then, at a later period, we had a song about Tommy Atkins, being an absent-minded beggar. There is nothing absent-minded about the Postmaster General when it comes to counting up the cents he is prepared to pay his seamen. No, Mr. Speaker, this combination won't work. The Government has only been founded 15 months and it was founded on an alliance which was unstable in its very nature. It is beginning to break up now—one of them has gone and the sooner the other two go the better for the Cabinet. I can tell the Prime Minister that if he wants to have a cabinet of real jingoes he cannot make them out of such stuff.

This policy puts the badge of inferiority upon Canadians. I listened to the figures which my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) gave us: he told us that Britain contributed $220,000,000 every year to the upkeep of the navy. Divide that by the 45,000,000 people who are in the British Isles and you will find that if I were in Britain I would be worth $5 annually as a good seafaring-fighting man. But, in Canada if you divide $35,000,000 among 8,000,000 which is our population, you will find that here I am worth $4.50 for an indefinite and indeterminate period. Does the Prime Minister think so meanly of his fellow-citizens as to believe that they will put up with that calculation; not for one moment. If he went to the country on that policy that fact alone would damn him, if I understand the spirit of the Canadian. And these are the people who talk to us about our tin-pot navy. All I have to say is that if we lowered the dignity of the nation by entering upon the construction of a tin-pot navy, I do not think you will elevate that dignity by passing around the hat. But, the financial indignity put upon the Canadian nation is as nothing to the moral indignity, because, in addition to my being worth only four and a half dollars in Canada, at intervals of, I do not know how long, as compared with the Britisher at home who is worth five dollars every year of his life, there is this moral indignity put upon the Canadian, that if that bolt from the blue, which my hon. friend says might fly, ever does fly, not one drop of Canadian blood would be risked or spilt. That is what I call the moral inferiority which Canadians will not put up with. I have tried, Sir, as briefly as I could, to place before this House and the country the main objections which I have to this policy of contribution. I shall vote for the amendment because it sets out the distinct principle that what we do in this matter we should do as Canadians. The Prime Minister referred to the splendid organization of the British navy and I might point out to him that it has taken a thousand years to organize that navy. They began with boats with men rowing in them, and what I say about this thing is: If we can only have a canoe to start with, let us have a Canadian canoe. We, on this side of the House stand united as one man, and we stand where we did, and we stand where you did, and where you should be standing to-day. We stand for Canada as a nation; a nation beneath a common flag; a nation within the Empire but a nation still; with a nation's rights, a nation's aspirations, a nation's responsibilities, yes, and a nation's courage and spirit to discharge these responsibilities. We stand for Canada a nation, not less in herself than Great Britain or any other nation composing this great Empire. Great Britain trades where she will and she defends herself. We stand for Canada with the right to trade where she will, without any man daring to tell us that we are disloyal. We stand for Canada with the power and the ability to begin now the naval defence of her own coasts, in co-operation with the various portions of the most glorious Empire the world has ever seen. We stand on that policy, and we believe we have the majority of the people of Canada with us, because it is the only policy that makes for the dignity of this nation, for the harmony and progress of the Empire, and for the peace of the civilized world.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House upon this most important question, I feel particularly pleased that it is totally unnecessary for members on this side of the House to offer to the country apologies for not having done something which, according to statements made in years gone by, they might have done. When the right hon. the Prime Minister brought down his proposition a week or ten days ago, in introducing this most important question for the consideration of the House, he struck a note which has claimed and dominated the attention of the people of Canada, the people of the Empire, and a great many nations outside of the Empire. When the note was sounded, I believe that I am safe in saying that the people of Canada and the people of the Empire felt that a statesman had given expression to a sentiment and to principles which were bound to appeal to the good sense of the people throughout the land. It fell, however, to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and his able lieutenant the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) to introduce into the discussion of this question sentiments that I believe are unworthy of gentlemen who hold and who have held such a high place in the estimation of many of the people of Canada. They lowered the debate immediately to the plane of party and petty politics; and much as we should have liked to keep clear of that form of debate, we are by that very circumstance forced to reply to some of the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Before proceeding to do so, I would like to make a few references to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Michael Clark). He has indulged as usual in a series of witticisms, sallies and jokes for the entertainment of the House. The House is usually pleased to listen to the hon. member for Red Deer, as a sort of relaxation from serious contemplation of matters of importance. It was said of my hon. friend about a year ago, after he had made one of his historic speeches on free trade in the city of Montreal, that he used the old fashioned blunderbuss with black powder, which made a great deal of noise and a great deal of smoke, but scattered very badly. The exhibition we have had this afternoon and evening I think bears out very well this description of my hon. friend. His arguments were very scattered; he could not refrain from going off into fields of trade and commerce, and he read the House a homily on the way that trade will carry itself along and so forth. I shall not, however, digress to that extent, but shall try to confine myself as much as I can to the question at issue. The hon. member complained that the previous speaker on this side of the House, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), had not directed his remarks to the members on the opposite benches. I trust before I complete my speech to-night to address some remarks to the hon. members opposite which they will probably wish had not been spoken. As a matter of fact, as to the burlesque the House was treated to the other evening by the hon. member for South Renfrew, his whole argument was summed up in the few words he read at the end of his speech. The rest of his speech was a diatribe on the right hon. leader of the Government, and his fellow members in the Cabinet, with extracts from certain speeches, which he detached from their context and put meanings into that were never there, and never intended to be there. It is perfectly clear that it is the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite, in their dismay, at this particular time, to try and mislead the people of this country by misrepresenting the remarks of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

We have been told time and again by the hon. member for Red Deer and other speakers on the opposite side of the House that the bonds of Empire are bonds of sentiment. In truth, according to the policy of the late Liberal Government, the bonds of Empire have been bonds of sentiment pure and simple. In a moment or two, I shall show that from 1902 to 1911 the hon. gentlemen opposite were aware of certain conditions, but they did absolutely nothing, and so I say that as far as they are concerned, they are bonds of sentiment. But as far as the people of this country and the speakers on this side of the House are concerned, we demand that these bonds of Empire be substantiated by something more concrete, more lasting and of a more material character.

The hon. member for Red Deer has also said that our part in Imperial Defence will be that we defend our shore—that our part in Imperial defence is complete if we do that. Apparently it is the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite to base their arguments upon this ground, which I shall examine in detail a little further on.

We have been very severely criticised because it has been stated that there is an emergency, that there is a demand at the present time for some immediate action in connection with this great question, and my hon. friend from Red Deer quotes from Hon. Winston Churchill in 1909. He described him as a great philisopher. I shall not quote the remarks, as the House will remember them. At that particular time he said also that Lord Roberts had indulged in certain statements for which he had been later on taken to task. I should like to point to the hon. members of this House that Hon. Winston Churchill within the past two months supported Lord Roberts in the statements he made; and while in 1909 he deprecated the tendency to increase armaments, in 1912 he admitted the necessity of it; and he is one of the most active men in this regard in Great Britain to-day. In 1909, as is ably pointed out in the memorandum that has been submitted to this House, the British authorities made a serious attempt to lessen the progress of armaments, they reduced their own expenditure, but it was noticed that other powers were increasing theirs until, I believe about a year ago, the British authorities saw the utter uselessness of that method and increased their armaments during this year. Imperial federation, we are told, presents difficulties to the people of Canada; and my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, has been twitted by hon. members opposite, especially by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, with having attempted to present to this House any suggestion that it was possible to solve this great problem. I take it that it is the mark of a statesman to face and to deal with a difficult question rather than to turn his back upon it because it presents certain difficulties; and, so far as I am concerned, I hail with delight the attempt that has been made, the steps that have been taken, to lay the foundation upon which, I believe in years to come, Imperial federation will be built. It is stated that it would attack our autonomy and be a retrograde movement. I absolutely repudiate such an inference. The federation of the Overseas Dominions which have now assumed the rank and place of nations in this Empire, their federation with some common control, so far as international affairs are concerned, and so far as defence is concerned, has become an absolute necessity; and that problem must be solved—or there must be the alternative and that is the disintegration of the Empire.

Now, I wish to direct attention for a few moments to the famous resolution which has been so constantly kept to the front by hon. members opposite and by reference to which it has been attempted to misrepresent the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have no doubt that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce makes his statement to the House, gives his conception of this policy, he will take care of himself, as hon. members opposite well know he is able to do. But let us examine this famous resolution briefly and compare it with some of the statements made by the hon. leader of the Government at this time and with the attitude taken by the Government. There is one clause which states:

> This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada. . . . to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

We are charged at the present time with doing something that is anti-Canadian because we presume to carry out the introductory clause of that resolution which asserts it to be our duty to assume our proper position, our proper responsibilities, in connection with national defence. The resolution goes on:

> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

We quite agree to that. It has been agreed on all occasions that it is not intended to set a precedent of cash contributions. This is not a cash contribution; it is simply the most effectual way of giving expression to the will of the people in this regard. Let me quote the leader of Government in his speech here the other day:

> In presenting our proposals, it will be borne in mind that we are not undertaking or beginning a system of regular and periodical contributions.

I wish to refute absolutely the attempts made and persisted in up to the present moment, to give the country the impression that we are acting contrary to the statement of the right hon. the Prime Minister when introducing this Bill.

Now, let me examine the resolution offered in amendment by the right hon. gentleman. I shall not read it all, but only a clause or two:

> That any measure of Canadian aid to Imperial naval defence which does not employ a permanent policy of participation by ships owned, manned and maintained by Canada, is not an adequate or satisfactory expression of the aspirations of the Canadian people in regard to naval defence, and is not an assumption by Canada of her fair share in the maintenance of the naval strength of the Empire.

Let us try to interpret that clause by the words of the right hon. gentleman himself at various times. In the first place, I will read a quotation from the right hon. gentleman in 1909:

> We have done a great deal for defence, though not, perhaps, as much as we might have done. At the conference in London in 1902, we stated that we undertook to develop our own defences by land and by sea. With respect to our land defences, we have done more than our duty.

He goes on:

> In the development of naval defences, I admit we are altogether behind the times. Engaged as we have been in works of peace, we have delayed and put off the development of our navy, and I agree with my hon. friend that we shall undertake this work, and undertake it immediately.

In 1902, the right hon. gentleman attended a conference of the Overseas Dominions in London. He states that they discussed the question of Imperial defence. Certain proposals were made to that conference by the Admiralty. But, up to 1909, absolutely nothing was done, and from 1909 to 1911, nothing was done. The Admiralty, in 1909, suggested that Canada, Australia and New Zealand should each form a unit composed of one battle cruiser and three small cruisers. This was to be the basis of the overseas protection of their own dominions. It was suggested that these units should be on the Pacific ocean and that they might co-operate in case of necessity. Now, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition absolutely rejected that suggestion. Hon. members opposite are charging us at the present time with not accepting the proper suggestion of the Admiralty; they are charging us with dictating to the Admiralty as to what our policy should be. But in 1909, the leader of the Opposition, supported by all his colleagues, absolutely rejected the advice of the Admiralty. They went back and asked Great Britain what could be built for £600,000 or £400,000. When they found that out they ordered four small cruisers, of a light type, quite unsuitable for the purposes for which they were supposed to be used, that is the defence of of our shores,—mere scouting ships. They refused to accept the main vessel in the unit, the battle cruiser. This force they divided between the Atlantic and the Pacific. It resulted in this—that the suggestion of the Admiralty was entirely rejected, and that the policy adopted was useless so far as the assistance to Imperial defence was concerned. The resolution was passed in August 1909, the tenders were called for in February 1910, opened in May following, and still nothing has been done.

A few moments ago, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) drew forth cheers and hilarity on the part of his colleagues by referring to the Australian navy. The intention was to impress upon members on this side of the House that, so far as they were concerned, they had proposed a policy similar to the Australian policy, which is absolutely without foundation in fact—they proposed nothing of the kind; they rejected that policy. What did the Australians do? In 1909, the conference was held. They accepted the advice of the Admiralty, and in the same year laid down three destroyers of which two were completed in 1910. In the same year, they laid down an 18,800-ton battle cruiser which has just been completed. And in 1911, they laid down three other cruisers which are all completed. So that, as far as Australia is concerned, they have their unit complete, whereas Canada has what? Absolutely nothing. The policy that the hon. gentleman proposed was not in the slightest degree carried out.

I now wish to examine for a moment the sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, in regard to Imperial defence. We have heard a great deal about loyalty, and I do not know why hon. members opposite continually assure us of the fact that they are loyal. It seems to be incumbent upon them to be continually reminding us of their loyalty to the British Empire. However, we will take their loyalty for granted for the time being, and we will now analyse for a moment some of the statements they have made recently in this debate, and compare them with statements made by them during the last ten years.

A statement has been made that no emergency exists at the present time. What is understood by emergency? The hon. member for Rouville had frequent access to the dictionary to ascertain the proper definition of the word emergency, and I would like to quote him a definition that is official on his side of the House so far as the Naval Act of 1910 is concerned. It says that emergency means 'war, invasion or insurrection.' In other words, as far as Canada is concerned, she should do absolutely nothing until war, invasion or insurrection actually breaks out. There is another definition of emergency which I think applies very aptly to hon. members opposite, and it is this: the process of issuing forth from concealment or confinement. It is about time that Canada did come forth from her position of concealment or confinement on this naval question. I wish to quote very briefly from the Naval Act of 1910 as follows:

In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the Royal Navy the Naval Service, etc.

In every part of that Act, as passed in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite, there is a string on the Canadian navy. I wish to show, by quoting from the speeches of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, that his idea of a Canadian navy, and the idea of his followers, in so far as they endorse his opinions, is a Canadian navy controlled by the Canadian Government, and which, goes to war only when ordered to do so by the Government of Canada. The statement has been made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition that 'when England is at war, we are at war, but it does not follow that because we are at war, we are actually in the conflict.' As far as Great Britain is concerned; as far as Australia, New Zealand, South Africa or Canada are concerned; they are not at war unless invaded, or unless insurrection actually takes place.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition made this statement in the debate of 1909:

Now, it may be said that defence, which is the duty of all nations, is a matter as to which there should be a common aspiration. Yes, I agree to that, but at the same time the young daughters of nations of England have insisted that even in the matters of defence they should preserve in its entirety local autonomy.

In other words, as far as Canada is concerned, we are going to preserve in its entirety our local autonomy. I do not think that such a position is possible when we speak of Imperial defence. Then he proceeds:

I have no hesitation in saying that the supremacy of the British Empire is absolutely essential, not only to the maintenance of that Empire, but to the civilization of the world. I have no hesitancy in saying that the supremacy of the British Empire on the high seas must be maintained in the highest degree.

What a contradiction ! In one paragraph of the speech he tells us we must preserve in its entirety our autonomy, while in another paragraph he says the safety of the British Empire depends entirely upon the supremacy of the British fleet!

In the year 1899, the Boer war broke out. All the different parts of the British Empire immediately offered to send troops to the aid of the Mother Country. In Canada the question was debated pro and con in the public press and on the floor of this House, and the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, then leader of the Opposition, strongly urged upon the then premier that something should be done. And what followed? On July 31, a resolution of sympathy was passed for the Mother Country in connection with the Boer war. The Globe on October 4, 1899, in an interview, gives very clearly the attitude of the right hon. leader of the Opposition at that time in connection with Canada being at war when the Empire was at war. He was reported as having said:

Canadian troops are to be used to fight for Canada's defence.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider that statement in comparison with those made by hon. gentlemen opposite in trying to persuade the people of this country that as far as war is concerned we are at one with the Empire in this matter. Then he goes on, still speaking of the Boer war:

There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so without Parliament granting us the money. So it is we have not offered a Canadian contingent to the home authorities.

There you have again, in clear and terse language, the attitude of the right hon. gentleman at that time regarding the matter of Imperial defence. The Globe, which I think is a good Liberal organ, said editorially:

Summed up, the Government's situation is this: the Government has done nothing and has nothing to say one way or the other.

So that the ideas of the right hon. gentleman at that time on the question of Imperial defence were that Canadian troops and Canadian money should be retained for the defence of Canada, in spite of the fact that we had been receiving from the Mother Country for over 100 years the benefit of the protection of her navy.

In quoting from the remarks of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, I shall not now go back as far as 1899, but I shall quote the remarks of the right hon. gentleman in Ottawa in August, 1912. At a banquet held in the Chateau Laurier in honour of Sir Arthur Lawley and Arthur Grenfel, at which the right hon. leader of the Opposition was present, as well as other prominent gentlemen interested in matters of Imperial welfare, he said:

Canada has only one neighbour and with that neighbour she has had no war for 100 years.

Implying that it was none of her business what other parts of the Empire might do or what the relations of Great Britain or say of Australia to her neighbours might be. As far as Canada was concerned, as long as she was at peace with her neighbours, that was all that was necessary.

Then speaking of European armaments, the right hon. leader of the Opposition said:

Thank God we have been free on this continent from that. Shall we go into that mad race or shall we continue to settle our difficulties by arbitration? That is a question we want to solve here.

He said: Shall we continue to settle our difficulties by arbitration? I want to ask any hon. member on what grounds did we ever settle any difficulty by arbitration? There has been only one power back of the arbitration of Canadian matters and that is the power or might of the British Empire. Yet the right hon. gentleman has the temerity to stand up, quoted as he was throughout the length and breadth of the land, to ask the people of Canada whether or not we should take part in assisting the mother country in the defence of the Empire or continue, forsooth, to settle our difficulties by arbitration. He went on:

You think (speaking to the hon. gentlemen who represented the Mother Country)—you think all the time of armaments and spend half your revenue upon them. We think of railways and canals.

In other words, we have no part or lot with you in your defence of the Empire.

The best way for the British Empire was to live according to the principles of autonomy.

I shall examine briefly what the right hon. gentleman means by that. We have heard it from every member on the other side of the House who has spoken on this question, representing from time to time that we must maintain in its entirety the principle of autonomy. What do they understand by autonomy? As far as I can learn they mean not only self-government on internal matters, but self-government and self-responsibility as far as Imperial matters are concerned. That is, if the Empire is in any sense involved in a controversy with any nation that is no business of ours so long as it does not affect immediate and local conditions within the bounds of our own country.

At another time the right hon. gentleman said:

We can be in the conflict only through two things, namely actual invasion of our soil or the action of the Parliament of Canada.

That statement was made by the right hon. gentleman the other day: 'We can only be in the conflict in this way, by actual invasion of our soil or by action of Parliament.'

Another thing, speaking of the Canadian navy in 1909, as reported in 'Hansard,' page 7626, the right hon. gentleman replied to a question from the present leader of the Government. The question was this:

Suppose a Canadian ship should meet a ship belonging to an enemy on the high seas what is she to do?

The answer of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was:

I do not know that she would fight.

We heard the other day a lot of diatribes from the hon. member from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) against the Government and members on this side of the House regarding fighting. You would think that the hon. member for South Renfrew was the only member who invited a fight, politically or otherwise. As far as I can remember his record, he is anxious to avoid political fights, yet he delivered a series of diatribes against members on this side, claiming that we were trying to avoid fights simply from the proposed manner of manning the vessels to be furnished by Canada with British sailors. The right hon. gentleman continued in his answer:

I do not know that she would fight. She should not fight until the Government by which she was commissioned had determined whether she would go into the war or not.

What would be the use of a naval force in Canada, as far as the Empire is concerned, if it were not permitted to participate in the battles of the Empire, in the defence of the Empire, until you were able to call Parliament and thrash the question out on the floor of the House? I think we would be here a long time with the present Opposition before we would be able to get a Bill through this House to permit vessels to fight.

A question has been raised about the manning of the navy. We have been charged with trying to evade our duty in connection with the manning of the Canadian navy, and this amendment which has been proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite was proposed to catch the vote of the innocent people on the Pacific coast. They know perfectly well that under their own policy at the present time we are absolutely unprotected on the British Columbia coast. They know that the British Government has been forced to transfer her battleships to the home waters because of pressure in that locality, and so they have offered this, hoping to pull the wool over the eyes of the people on the coast. In the first place we must judge men by their actions, and judging the hon. gentlemen opposite by their actions and policy when in power, their policy in connection with fisheries on the Pacific coast, I think you will see immediately how hopeless a task it would be to man anything on the Pacific coast. Ten years ago we had 10,000 white men engaged in the fishing trade. It is well known that the fishing population is that from which you must draw the men to man navies. The other day we heard some eulogy of the fishermen on the Atlantic coast and I agree that they are worthy men whom we could draw on, but on the Pacific coast in place of the 10,000 white men engaged in fishing what have we to-day? Except for 300 or 400 men they have been entirely supplanted by Japanese. Where do they intend to draw men from for the navy? I suggested at one time that they intended to bring over Admiral Togo and his men, and from the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that apparently was the course they intended to pursue. I should like to explain the effect that this policy has had on our coast. In the first place, the Japanese who are doing the fishing on the Pacific at the present time have charted every foot of our coast. They have more complete charts of the Pacific coast of British Columbia than have the Admiralty. They have charted every harbour, every inlet and every foot of the coast. They have some of their leading naval reservists, officers and men constantly doing this work, all under the protection of the policy introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the Japanese. From Alaska to Cape Horn every strategic point of value along the Pacific coast is now occupied by Japanese. This is true in the Queen Charlotte islands, the Aleutian islands, the Hawaiian islands, Mexico, Chili and Peru, wherever there is a strategic point of value it is held by Japanese, largely aided and abetted by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Our coast on the Pacific is exposed. The intention of this amendment is to suggest to the people of British Columbia that the Opposition are offering greater protection.

I wish to say that, as far as we are concerned, we hail with delight and pleasure and confidence the policy of the right hon. leader of the Government. That policy as presented to the House is a policy which ensures the supremacy of the Imperial navy, and that is a most essential feature in connection with the world's peace. If the supremacy of the Imperial navy were threatened or impaired in the slightest degree our danger would be increased three-fold. The other day the right hon. the leader of the Opposition stated that if the Empire were attacked, under the Opposition policy, Canada would have a powerful fleet scouting the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. I ask members of this House to consider what terror it would strike into the hearts of the Japanese to see the Rainbow shooting out from the harbour of Esquimalt to meet them on the high seas. Their policy could not have been completed until 1917, but, if it had been completed at the present time, what a laughing stock it would have been to the nations of the world as a protection for our coasts, particularly in view of the fact that that navy would have been a neutral navy—no one can gainsay it. It would have been the laughing stock of the world, whereas the policy which has been offered to the country by the present Government is one that gives to the world the idea that, so far as Canada is concerned, she intends to cement her interest with those of the Empire, while, so far as the Imperial navy is concerned, it is strengthened by three of the finest fighting machines that can be placed on the face of the waters.

We heard quite a little lecture from the hon. member for Red Deer on the moral side of this question. Britain, he said, wants moral support. Now the moral support proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite is that we build a puny navy costing $11,000,000 for our two coasts. That is the moral support they offer. The moral support we propose to give is that at once we contribute three dreadnoughts costing $35,000,000 to be under the guidance and orders of the Governor in Council for active participation in any war, an offer unqualified and unconditional. My hon. friend made the statement that there was no emergency, that conditions had changed from what they were in 1909. He said that then there was a considerable jingoism, but he thanked God that the clouds were passing away, and so on. But let me ask, why is his party trebling the contribution which they proposed in 1909 if the conditions are less dangerous than they were then? In 1909 the right hon. leader of the Opposition and his able lieutenant from Red Deer proposed a contribution to the defence of Canada of only $11,500,000. Now, they say, you are not doing enough, we will give $35,000,000 too, and yet in the same breath they tell us that the conditions are less inimical at the present time, a contradiction that cannot be justified or harmonized in the slightest degree.

Now, there is the question of manning the navy. The policy proposed in 1909, which, I would remind you Mr. Speaker, was never carried out—and no attempt was made to carry it out beyond buying two obsolete ships—if it had been carried out, would have demanded 2,000 men to man the boats. But what were they able to do? There are, I think, 365 men on the Niobe and about 125 or 130 on the Rainbow. That was the full quota of trained sailors that could be secured to man the boats which would have required 2,000 men if the scheme had been carried out. I submit that the policy of the Opposition bears every evidence of insincerity from start to finish.

Another matter which I desire to point out is that during the Imperial conference of 1902, when this question was brought up, it was proposed by the British Admiralty to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister, that Canada should do certain things. I have already pointed out how he repudiated and rejected that advice and suggestion. At that particular time the contributions to Imperial navy defence per capita were as follows: Great Britain, 15s.; Cape Colony, 1s. 10d.; Australia, 1s. 0¾d.; Canada, nothing; Natal, 10s. 9d.; Newfoundland, 3s. 0½d.; New Zealand, 1¼d. So that every part of the Empire at that time was participating in naval defence. That condition was presented to the then Prime Minister of Canada, and he rejected absolutely the proposal, although Canada had sent him there with a mandate to close up some form of assistance. And from that day to 1909 the Government never stirred a finger. In 1909, however, they were forced to take certain action, though up to that period they had not done a particle to bring out the practical side of the question; and their policy, as I have said, is represented by two obsolete vessels, and is the laughing stock of the world. In view of that record and of that attitude, I ask Mr. Speaker, can you credit the sincerity of the right hon. the leader of the opposition and his followers?

Now, I wish to say a word or two as to the need of the policy now proposed, and in doing so I shall quote a few figures. We were told very glibly by the hon. member for Red Deer that trade was going to take its own course. He advised the right hon. the leader of the Government not to worry about trade, and, in the supercilious tone which is characteristic of the hon. gentleman, and with that profound wisdom born of his Cobden training 25 years ago and never revised to date, he presented this House a homily on the question of trade. I am not very old, but my hon. friend seems to have stopped in his evolution, in his knowledge of trade 25 years ago, for every speech I have heard him make, and I have heard him make a good many, is absolutely the same from beginning to end. If he knows anything about political economy, and he presumes to be the authority for this House on that question, he ought to know that the development of British commerce has gone hand in hand, concurrently, with the development of the British navy, and that the development of trade in Germany has gone on concurrently with the development of the German navy. He knows perfectly well that as the trade and power of a nation develop, there must be a development of protection for that trade. It is all very well to have fine theories and to state in this House that he wants to see the day come, and it will come shortly, he says, when armaments will be a matter of foolishness, and that 20 years hence we will look back and think of the folly we indulged in. But we are dealing with conditions and men and nations, and not with theories, at the present time. I submit to the House the following statement which shows each country's naval strength, its army strength, and its commerce in tonnage, and the comparison between the standing of the British army and navy and that of other countries will be interesting:

Country.	Naval.					Merchant.		Army
	Armoured Battle-ships.	Cruisers.	Others.	Officers.	Men.	Over 10,000 tons.		Peace.	War.	Peace Cost.
						Ships.	Tonnage.
*Austria	19	12	105	835	18,500	2	28,567	386,800	3,560,000	£14,370,000–1910
France	52	12	344	2,426	60,000	15	203,170	606,294	3,630,000	34,872,198–1910
Germany	54	48	224	.....	66,000	45	838,720	1,056,000	4,360,000
Japan	36	21	145	2,072	46,000	4	72,351	800,000	1,500,000
United States	57	16	116	.....	60,217	9	115,398	100,000	.....
	218	109	934	5,333	250,717	75	1,258,206	.....	.....
British	110	104	441	.....	137,500	145	2,024,490	323,826	500,000-700,000
Other Countries.
Turkey	8	5	22	.....	.....	.....	.....	390,000	.....
Italy	28	9	187	.....	33,500	.....	.....	270,000	3,380,203
Russia	28	8	126	.....	50,000	.....	.....	1,424,000	4,547,000
China	.....	11	14	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Brazil	6	10	39	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Argentine	9	9	65	763	18,558	.....	.....	.....	.....

*With only 140 miles of coast line

It will be seen from this statement that the tonnage over 10,000 tons of the British Empire is something over two million tons, and that the tonnage of all these other countries put together is very little over one-half of that, and yet, these other countries have armies exceeding ours ten to one, and their combined navies largely exceed our navy. The deduction I draw is that while, so far as our navy is concerned, it is large, yet it is not too large to protect our trade in comparison with the protection afforded the trade of other nations. The redeeming feature is that we maintain very little of a military force; and Great Britain has reduced her army 86,000 men in the last five years.

Now, I want to draw attention to some interesting facts in connection with the Niobe and the Rainbow. The full complement of the Niobe was 701 men and the average was about 400 men on board during the last eighteen months; the full complement of the Rainbow was 253 men and the lowest number she had was 125, the average running at about 175 men on board each month. It will therefore be seen that for the two or three years the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been in force, as far as it was in force, he and his Government were unable to man the two little toy ships we have on our coasts.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): How many deserters were there?

Mr. STEVENS: The desertions numbered 193. The manning of these ships is an economic question: every one knows that the demand for labour in Canada at the present time is very great, and that it is exceedingly difficult to get men to serve in the army and in the navy. The experience of the leader of the Opposition and his Government in this matter ought to be sufficient to demonstrate beyond all question that so far as manning the navy is concerned it is a serious problem at the present time and one that it will take many years to solve. But, we are told by the hon. member for South Renfrew that we are belittling the manhood of Canada in saying that they would not fight for the Empire. As a matter of fact, that sentiment expressed by the hon. member is not the sentiment of the people of Canada; it is a sentiment which generates in his own imagination, and so far as I can see he is the only man in the country who holds it.

I wish for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the memorandum from the Admiralty about which we have heard so much This memorandum is official, it is given to this House with the full authority of the Imperial Government, and I deprecate the light manner in which the leader of the Opposition and his colleagues have treated this document. In their amendment there is a veiled insult almost, thrown upon the British Government for giving us this memorandum. I read from the memorandum:

> The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty are prepared to comply and to supplement in a form which may be made public the confidential communications and conversations which have passed between the Admiralty and ministers of the Canadian Parliament during the recent visit to the United Kingdom.

No man in the Dominion of Canada knows better than Sir Wilfrid Laurier that in the carrying on of the Government there are confidential communications which cannot possibly be published, and no man knows better than he that there must have been given to the Prime Minister of Canada information that he dare not expose. And yet that situation is taken advantage of by the leader of the Opposition and his followers. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition talks of retreating into the lines of Torres Vedras, but he knows that the Prime Minister is absolutely helpless in the face of that statement, and that he cannot reveal in any detail the confidential information that has been imparted to him. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition knows also that while this memorandum gives in part that confidential information, it does not give it all by any means, and he knows well that there must have passed between the statesmen of Canada and the statesmen of England communications which cannot be made public. Now, I ask hon. members opposite to treat this thing seriously. So far they have treated it from start to finish absolutely as a joke. In this connection I wish to call attention to the attitude taken by the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) when this question was submitted to the House the other day. In the presence of members of the Royal Family, when the grand old national anthem was sung, that hon. gentleman retained his seat, and that very incident will give you an idea of the attitude which hon. gentlemen opposite take on this question. I am glad to observe however, that during the past week or ten days, through the instrumentality of these Liberal caucuses which have been held back in the corner room here, his fellow Liberals have succeeded in teaching the hon. member for Edmonton to know the air when he hears it, and consequently the other day he rose in his place when God Save the King was sung. This memorandum also says:

> The power of the British Empire to maintain the superiority on the sea, which is essential to its security, must obviously be measured from time to time by reference to the other naval forces of the world.

I believe with the hon. member for Red Deer that it would be a crime to have a war with Germany, but there are conditions prevailing which cause us who are anxious for the maintenance of the British Empire, to take heed. Incidentally, I wish to say that I believe the Monroe Doctrine of the United States has had more to do with the armament of Germany than has had the policy of Great Britain. If the United States were to throw overboard that absurd Monroe Doctrine and give an opportunity to the European nations to expand in South America and settle it up with a race who would be like ourselves in temperament, it would be a happy day for this North American continent. The effect of the Monroe Doctrine is that while keeping European races out of South America it is allowing it to be settled with Asiatics, and the time is not far distant when we will have an Asiatic question in South America. We have it stated in this memorandum that the maintenance of the British navy is essential to the security of the British Empire and coming from the Admiralty that is enough for me to be certain of one thing, and that is, that there is a possibility of a prospective emergency. I say the statement contained in this memorandum is enough to satisfy any sane man that there is a prospective emergency and that being so it is our solemn duty to the Empire to be prepared for that emergency if it should come. The memorandum also gives a comparison of the development of ship-building and it shows distinctly that Great Britain endeavoured to stop the increase of armament in 1909, and that the Hon. Winston Churchill then deprecated increased armament, but this year he has gone into it heart and soul, seeing that the life of the Empire depends upon it. Here is the paragraph in the memorandum which is set out by hon. gentlemen opposite as an excuse for doing nothing:

> Further, at the present time and in the immediate future Great Britain still has the power, by making special arrangements and mobilizing a portion of the reserves, to send, without courting disaster at home, an effective fleet of battleships and cruisers to unite with the Royal Australian navy and the British squadrons in China and the Pacific for the defence of British Columbia, Australia, and New Zealand.

That has been seized on by every speaker on the other side of the House as an excuse for lethargy, as an excuse for doing nothing in connection with this question. Just mark those words, that by making special arrangements, calling out reserves, the British Empire is still in a position to look after all its colonies; but forsooth, Canada is to stand back, fold her arms, and do absolutely nothing. In connection with that clause, I wish to say that, when the right hon. the leader of the Government brings down his permanent policy, as I have no doubt he will do at some future date, and in plenty of time, from the experience we have had of how ably the right hon. gentleman handled this part of it, he is not going to bring it down until he brings down something that will be well worthy of consideration. When he does bring it down, it will be something we can say is a finished product, and not a raw tin-pot navy. In another clause is says:

> Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety; would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness to the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the Overseas Dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.

In other words, Canada has never up to the present time given any evidence of participating in Imperial defence; but if she does so at this time, it is conclusive evidence of her attitude on this question. I shall not quote the last clause which has been quoted so often, but this particular clause is our warrant for our action. When the hon. gentlemen opposite twit us with having suggested to the Imperial authorities a certain clause, I want to call their attention to their own attitude in 1902, and again in 1909, where they absolutely rejected the suggestion of the Imperial authorities, and went back and said to them: What will you give us for £600,000? —a ten cent policy instead of a policy that any self-respecting citizen might adopt— What will you give us for £600,000, or better still: We want to hit a bargain, what will you give us for £400,000? That is what the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition asked the Admiralty when he was in power.

To conclude, I just want to say this. So far as our opponent's policy is concerned, they say: Let us have a Canadian navy, and by that they mean a Canadian navy which will not participate in Imperial wars, if there are any, until directed by the Government to do so. Those are the words of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. We say an Imperial navy, an entirely distinct proposition. They say we should not fight until Parliament determines whether we should take part in a war or not. I am quoting their exact words. We say: 'Our ships shall be a part of the Royal navy ready at all times to fight in every battle, and for Britain to demand its assistance at any time and in any place.' They say to Britain, 'You think of armaments; we have railways and canals.'. We say to Britain, 'You have borne the burden of Imperial defence alone long enough. We want to help you. Here are our dreadnoughts at your disposal, until we can definitely adjust our policy upon a permanent basis.' They say: 'Shall we enter this mad race, or shall we continue to settle our differences by arbitration?' We say: 'Britain has for a hundred years supported and protected Canadian trade without one cent of charge; now we wish to enter into and partake of our responsibilities with Great Britain in this matter.' They say: 'The British Empire can best be maintained by increasing Canadian independence or autonomy.' We say: 'Imperial unity is essential to Imperial existence.' And I want to lay that down particularly, that Imperial unity is essential to Imperial existence, and we will do our part in cementing the various overseas dominions into one whole. They say: 'A separable Canadian navy.' We say: 'One king, one flag and one navy.'

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I will not follow my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) through the whole of his argument, or I would rather say his apology to the people of British Columbia for the position he is taking in regard to this matter. I am told that the people of British Columbia are ambitious to build steamships; that they are looking forward to starting a great shipbuilding industry on the Pacific coast, and that they are urging their representatives in this Parliament to do everything they can to promote that great industry. British Columbia has some thousands of miles of exposed coast line, and I am told that a fleet unit is a very popular idea in that province. What is the attitude of my hon. friend from Vancouver on that question? He tells us that there are no fighting men in the province of British Columbia, no white fighting men in that great province. That is practically his answer. If the Dominon of Canada should at some future time or if it should at the present time, decide to spend fifteen or twenty million dollars in order to equip a fleet unit on the Pacific coast, my hon. friend informs us that that fleet unit would necessarily be manned by Japanese, and not by white men at all. Does my hon. friend mean that the white men of British Columbia show their whole loyalty by singing God Save the King, but that they won't fight? That is not the opinion we hold on this side of the House in regard to people of that great province.

I do not accept his interpretation of the difference between the two policies. He has informed us that the Canadian Navy is not to fight unless the Parliament of Canada gives the word. The Parliament of Canada must provide the cash. You cannot run a navy on a war basis for the same money that you can run a navy on a peace basis. It is necessary that the Parliament of Canada should have something to say in regard to the navy, if we are to have a Canadian Navy. The Parliament of Canada would have to be called together on proclamation of war and provide the money as quickly as possible in order to prosecute that war. I have listened to this naval wordy battle for the last three or four days from my seat in this House, and as a party man I may say that I have no fears as to the final outcome. On this side of the House, we have signed on under a captain who has weathered a good many storms, and we have confidence in him that he will steer the ship clear of rocks and bring her safely into port. We are not asking any quarter from the enemy, and we are not hanging out any signals of distress. We have a policy that we think appeals to the patriotism and to the courage of the Canadian people, and to their aspirations; we feel that if we can have an opportunity of submitting that policy to the Canadian people that it will be found to be a winning policy. Our policy indicates that we have grown to manhood, that we are strong enough to begin to do something for ourselves. It ensures the revival of the ship-building industry in this country. It cannot fail also to stimulate our great steel industries. Why, Sir, I am told that we are in a position to-day to roll armour-plate at Sydney. It means that we shall take our proper place on the high seas as the oldest, and strongest daughter of the Empire. It guarantees the protection of our own coasts, east and west, and puts Canada in a position to aid the Empire in time of need, to aid not only with ships but with men, and not only this year but in all the years to come. It is the only sane Imperial policy that is consistent with Canadian pride and Canadian honour.

What is the policy on the other side? The policy of the Government is to build—or to pay for the building of—three dreadnoughts and turn them over empty to the Admiralty. The chief of the Naval Department of Canada, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) has informed us it is not a policy at all—that he cannot dignify it with the name of policy. It leaves Canada's coasts unprotected; it leaves this country without a sailor or an officer in the firing line; it ignores the principle of self-government; and it implies that we are a mean-spirited lot of hucksters in this country who would rather pay than fight.

The situation that exists in Canada to-day has never existed before since Confederation. We have one gentleman after another on the other side rising in his place and informing us that he does not know what is the permanent policy of the Government on the naval issue. I venture to say that we never had such a situation in this country, and I trust that we never shall again, when the dominant party of this country have no permanent policy to offer the people of this country in regard to the naval issue. They say that some day they will evolve a policy. But is it not a helpless condition to be in, when they must confess that they are not able to-day to state what they would like the country to do on this question, the most important question now before the people. Such a condition could not have existed under the leadership of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John Thompson or any other of the great men who, in past years, led the forces of the Conservative party. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was somewhat disappointing to us on this side of the House. He seemed to take a rather hopeless and helpless view of the situation. My hon. friend is a maritime man, and we supposed that he would take a broader view of this great question, and regard it as a Canadian question. We expected some expression of opinion from him in regard to the great subject of steamship building in this country. He stated over and over again, that before we should be able to launch one of these armoured ships, they would be so old and useless that they would be considered obsolete and fit only for the scrap-heap. When making that statement he was referring to what he called the slow manner in which the late Government conducted their business. He is now in power, yet he has not indicated that he is able to go any faster than the late Government did. Is he able to formulate a policy by which ships can be built in his own city or in any other port, and have them launched before they become obsolete? He has not shown that he has any naval policy any more progressive than that of his leader. He refers to a naval authority, Commander Roper, who criticised the late Government because they had not been able to go faster in the construction of these ships. Now, as my hon. friend has appealed to Commander Roper he must go to Commander Roper. I have been looking up the record of that gentleman, and I find that he has been dealing with the naval situation on various occasions. A good deal of criticism was heard throughout Canada in 1910 in regard to what was called by hon. gentlemen opposite the 'tin-pot navy' of the Laurier Government. Commander Roper considered it his duty to come out in the public press and make statements which I wish to read to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He told some very plain truths in the interview. I quote from the Ottawa Citizen, of Wednesday, 14th of September, 1910:

The Ottawa 'Citizen,' Wednesday, September 14, 1910, page 1, second column.

'Tin Pot Navy' is often, much too often used, and I have been to some trouble to find out the origin of the term, and have come to the conclusion that it is used by some of those people who are in disagreement with the present programme regarding the navy, and I firmly believe, that this arises chiefly through ignorance or want of thought.

A little hard on the Minister of Marine, because, I understand that he was one of the offenders, one of the gentlemen who used the term 'Tin-pot navy' with regard to——

Mr. HAZEN: What authority has the hon. member for that statement?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the hon. minister mean by that he did not——

Mr. HAZEN: I ask, what authority has the hon. member for making that statement?

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the hon. minister denies——

Mr. HAZEN: I repeat, that I ask my hon. friend for his authority.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The speeches I have read from my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen), as I recollect them. If he denies, I will take his word for it.

Mr. HAZEN: Up to 1910, I had not made a speech on the naval question, and the hon. gentleman will find, if he investigates the matter, that he is probably referring to a speech made by his friend from the county of Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson).

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. minister says that up to 1910 he did not use the term 'Tin-pot navy.' Are we to infer that he used it after——

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member is convicted of making a statement without any authority to back him up.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At all events, it was used frequently in this House by the supporters of my hon. friend. And his chosen naval authority, Commander Roper, says that it was used through ignorance or want of thought.

To a large number of people, the beginning and end of a navy is to be reckoned in dreadnoughts, and also as regards obtaining a fleet, all that has to be done is to say, 'We'll have a navy,' and they expect to find a fleet of dreadnoughts floating on the St. Lawrence next day. That, of course, is a slight exaggeration, but it is the principle on which they work.

With regard to Canada's share in Imperial defence, a large faction only had one aim in view, namely, the presentation of a couple of dreadnoughts to the Mother Country. There arose other ideas, but whatever they were, a dreadnought was invariably included, and so when these people—— that is, the friends of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

—found that the Government proposal did not include a dreadnought, they immediately designated it 'Tin Pot' which, I think you will agree with me is rather a contemptuous term to apply to a service which I sincerely trust and hope will, in the near future, be looked upon with gratification and pride by every soul who has the honour of calling himself or herself a Canadian citizen, and who is consequently a member of this great Empire of ours, the greatest the world has ever seen.

Just one more point to show you how much some of these people understand about what they are talking. A gentleman came up to me the other day and said: 'What I cannot make out is, what Canada wants half a dozen river destroyers for, when the St. Lawrence is the only river they can possibly be required to work on.' I then had to explain to him that these river destroyers are ocean-going destroyers of the very latest type, but are technically known as the river class, as they are named after various rivers in Great Britain to distinguish them from other classes. That, I think, is a very good illustration of the amount of knowledge possessed by some of these people, and I would advise them to go and study Brassey and other standard books, before venturing to talk or write on that which they know so little about.

That rebuke was intended for the jingoes of the Conservative party who were calling this navy a tin-pot navy, but who did not know what they are talking about. (Reading continued):

Now, a fleet is composed of various classes of ships, namely, battleships, cruisers, torpedo craft, fleet auxiliaries. I have no time to fully explain the working of these classes of vessels in connection with one another. Briefly, let me say that battleships are the vessels which should bear the brunt of the fighting, and it is an Admiral's duty to so place his battleships that they will in due course meet those of the enemy. Now he cannot do this without information, and it is the cruiser's duty to obtain and transmit this intelligence. In other words, battleships without cruisers are like blind men without a guide. During my service in the navy, it has been my lot to take part in six of the annual manœuvres when I was serving on the staff of the Admiral in command of one side. From beginning to end it was always one cry 'information.'

The Admiral can never be too well informed. Study the life of the greatest of all naval leaders, Nelson, and you will find there that his one cry of the whole time was for cruisers. Why? Because he wanted means of obtaining information. Now I have no hesitation in saying that at the present moment Britain has plenty of dreadnoughts, but has she plenty of cruisers? For an expression of opinion I refer you to that distinguished sailor, Admiral Lord Charles Beresford, who emphatically says she has not. When, therefore, the question arises as to what share Canada is to take in Imperial defence, every detail and item must be considered. It is not that Britain requires actual assistance from Canada so much as she requires that, in the event of trouble, Canada will to a certain extent be able to look after herself. The present naval programme, namely, four cruisers and six destroyers, is framed to meet the existing situation, keeping in view the amount of money available to the Government. These cruisers and destroyers will also be a useful addition to the Imperial navy in the case of necessity. Dreadnoughts cost a lot of money, they also take a larger number of men to man them, and docks of the largest capacity to hold them. If therefore, a policy including dreadnoughts was embarked on, a very large sum of money would be involved, and probably considerably more than Canada at present can afford.

If I were asked as to the relative importance of the various items composing a navy, I should place them as follows: Men, ships, and docks. Personally, I do not believe that we take sufficient count of the personnel. The wear and tear of a future naval war on the human being will be terrific and in my humble opinion, cases will arise where the personnel will be beaten whilst the material is still available. If the future struggle arises before the Canadian vessels are ready, the men can always be placed at the disposal of the Mother Country. There are many distinguished and clever men who say that the next trouble will arise in 1912. On that point I express no opinion, but what I do say is that apart from building ships, Canada by training and supplying men to the Mother Country will be rendering her the greatest assistance possible.

I am referring to Commander Roper's statements because my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries appealed to him as an authority in naval matters. The conclusions to be drawn from his statements may be summarized, as follows:

(1) That the parties who used the expression 'tin pot' did so through ignorance;

(2) That the clamour for dreadnoughts and dreadnoughts alone arises from a misconception of the requirements of the service;

(3) That dreadnoughts, unless accompanied by cruisers, are a weakness rather than a strength to the navy;

(4) That a dreadnought without swift cruisers to collect information as to the enemy's position, is like a blind man without a guide;

(5) That in naval warfare men are of more vital importance than ships or docks;

(6) That training and supplying men would be the greatest service Canada could perform for England.

A good deal of reference has been made in this debate to the attitude of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1909. I have had the pleasure of sitting in this House with the hon. gentleman for several years, and have listened on a great many occasions to his eloquent and persuasive voice. But I remember only one occasion when he was able to carry the whole House with him by the force of his eloquence and clear reasoning. That was a triumph for my hon. friend, and on that occasion he stood for a Canadian navy, owned by the Canadian people, manned by the Canadians and rooted in Canadian soil. Could any one believe that within the short period of four years he would become a member of a government that would go back on the principles he so strongly advocated on that occasion, and of the truth of which he so fully convinced hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house? It is said that misery brings strange bedfellows, but political emergencies also make us acquainted with strange bedfellows.

On that occasion objection was made to the humiliating course of hiring our defence, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House object very strongly now to the use of that expression. But I want to point out that that expression did not originate on this side of the House, but with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I shall not quote his speech but will read only two or three paragraphs:

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do.

Then he goes on:

It goes still further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve, or twenty, or thirty years, you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck; there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the product of defence.

Further on in the same speech he made these statements:

The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada. . . . . I think this method ignores the necessities and the aspirations and the prospects of a great people such as the Canadian people are destined to become.

These words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce carried conviction in this House, and the principles then laid down by my hon. friend are the same now as they were then; the situation on that occasion is very much the same as it is to-day. But, Sir, the poison must have been instilled into the veins of the Government on some occasion or other, and I do not think it was at the time of the by-election at South Renfrew. I am of the opinion that it was earlier than that; that it took place in the by-election of Drummond and Arthabaska, and the result, so pertinently described by the leader of the Opposition, is a policy that is a cross between jingoism and Nationalism.

The Prime Minister used so many forcible arguments to back up the policy we are now placing before this country that the House will have to excuse me if I quote very shortly from him. On the occasion of that debate in March, 1909, the Prime Minister said:

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country, I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard, is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that.

I venture to say that my right hon. friend still believes in that if he could only shake himself free from the Nationalist trammels that surround him. That was on March 29, 1909. My right hon. friend during that summer went over to England and he attended the Dominion Day banquet in London and there spoke as follows:

Some feeling was created in the British Islands owing to the fact that Canada did not by resolution or by speech from the Prime Minister vouchsafe the offer of one, two or three dreadnoughts. The resolution in the form in which it was passed, while its terms might not, upon the surface, seem as significant as the offer of one of two dreadnoughts would have been, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada which would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of dreadnoughts.

That was the statement made by my right hon. friend after he had had two or three months to think over it, and a little later on, when he came back to Halifax, he addressed a meeting there in October of the same year in which he repeated that statement as follows:

That, out of our own materials, by our own labour, and by the instructed skill of our own people, any necessary provision for our naval defence should be made.

How does he stand to-day? He has abandoned the Canadian navy altogether. He proposes a gift of three empty dreadnoughts to the Admiralty, the very thing he condemned in 1909, and he states emphatically that these dreadnoughts are to be built in England. He does not give us a look-in in Canada as to whether we can do it or not, but he lays it down that they are to be built in England; and yet the Minister of Marine says the Prime Minister is the epitome of consistency. Some question arose this afternoon as to what control the Dominion Government would have over the building of these dreadnoughts. My right hon. friend stated that they were to be built on the other side of the ocean, and further, that they were to be built under the supervision of the Admiralty. It strikes me that the Dominion of Canada will have very little more to do than to pay the bill of $35,000,000.

Reference was made here to-night to the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty, Right Hon. Winston Churchill. Speaking at the banquet of shipwrights in London on May 16, 1912, he said:

If the main naval developments of the last ten years have been a concentration of British fleets in decisive theatres, it is not unlikely that the main naval developments of the next ten years will be the growth of effective naval forces in the great dominions overseas.

That was the occasion on which the first Lord of the Admiralty made the proposal, that:

We in England will guard the centre and they, the colonies, will guard and patrol the rest of the Empire; the gaps should be filled by our comrades across the seas.

This was the opinion of Mr. Churchill in May, 1912, just two or three weeks before my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and the Prime Minister and the other ministers went to England. I have given the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty. I shall quote one or two Conservative opinions from British quarters. First, I shall quote from the London Spectator, a well known Unionist journal, which is out-spoken against any contribution policy. It says:

We felt—that is, the English people felt—however, that the essential thing was to interest and so to instruct the Britons oversea in the truths and realties of sea power. Next we realized that they could not attain to that interest unless they had navies which they could call their own, and feel were their own, because they had provided them. The notion of hiring sea power and of paying our Admiralty so much a year to protect them was, we knew, a barren idea from which no real help could ever come.

That was the opinion of one of the greatest London newspapers on the Unionist side. Let me quote also the opinion of the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour, the real leader of the Conservative party in Great Britain. This was delivered a few weeks ago at St. Andrew's dinner on November 30:

He referred to the great part his countrymen had played in reconciling the principle of nationality with that of ardent patriotism in various parts of the world. It was only by emulating that example that the future of the Empire as a whole could be secured. The people of Canada and other Overseas Dominions must have, and will have, their own feeling of nationality. Every Canadian ought to want to feel that Canada has got its own principles of development, and in future do not let us discourage that local patriotism, he said: Let them cultivate their own feeling of nationality. Canada for the Canadians, Australia for the Australians, but the whole for the Empire. It was the misconception of this principle which led to the great disruption between the American colonies and the Mother Country a century and a half ago, and perhaps, after all, it required that lesson to teach us what we know.

I agree with the leader of the Conservative party in that regard. We do not hear very much from our hon. friends on the other side of the House about that old slogan, 'Canada for the Canadians.' They used to use it quite often. I do not think I have heard it at all in the present discussion from hon. gentlemen opposite. I would like to know if they have abandoned it altogether. I agree with Mr. Balfour that it is a good policy: Canada for the Canadians, Australia for the Australians, and all for the Empire.

I was referring to the attitude of the Prime Minister in regard to the question where the ships would be built. In that part of his speech he does not give us very much hope that he sees any time ahead when we would be able to build battleships in Canada. What does he say about this?

That the Admiralty are prepared in the near future to give orders for the construction in Canada of small cruisers, oil-tank vessels and auxiliary craft of various kinds.

That seems to be the best that the Prime Minister expects for the people of Canada. I submit that this is a pretty small programme, that it is a small programme for my friend the Minister of Marine to go to St. John with and tell the people: You are not big enough to build a battleship, not even big enough to build a Bristol cruiser in St. John or Halifax, but we will allow you to tackle an oil-tank, that is the best we are able to do for you. That is not very ambitious, and I do not think it will be a taking policy with the people of this country. It has not created much enthusiasm with hon. gentlemen opposite, and you will note that the Government does not provide a dollar to build even the oil-tanks, they say that the whole $35,000,000 is to be passed over to the British Admiralty in order to build the three dreadnoughts. Where is the money to come from to help the building of those oil tanks that are to be constructed at Halifax, St. John and other places? We cannot be expected to become very enthusiastic over a policy like that. Hon. friends opposite called the policy of the late Government, which was approved by the British Admiralty, and which was a good Canadian policy, a tin-pot policy. I do not know whether we can get a good name for this policy, unless we call it an oil-tank policy. It will not be a taking policy in the province of Nova Scotia, I feel satisfied of that. There is nothing that will rouse the people of that province so much as the prospect of returning to the old and prosperous days of ship-building. They have never forgotten those old days when the flag of Nova Scotia was seen in all ports of the world. Perhaps there are some hon. gentlemen who do not know that the province of Nova Scotia had a flag of its own. I think it was the only province of Canada that had a distinctive flag of its own, and that flag was a common sight in all the ports of the world. The people of that province are very ambitious to take the place that they lost on the sea when the change took place from the wooden vessels to the iron ships. And why should they not? Why cannot they get a chance on this occasion to start the steel shipbuilding industry in this country? At the last election, the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) was aware that this was a very important issue in the province of Nova Scotia. He was accused on the hustings in the city of Halifax, and at other places in the province of Nova Scotia, of having voted against the Laurier Naval Bill. The people took the ground that he should not have done so because the Laurier policy meant the establishment of a ship-building industry in that province. In the city of Halifax, my right hon. friend found it necessary to issue a manifesto to clear up the question. I have a copy of it here and I want to put a small part of it on record. It is headed:

Mr. R. L. Borden's splendid Steel Shipbuilding Policy for Halifax.

Addressing a public gathering in Halifax, on the evening of the 14th October, 1909, the Liberal-Conservative leader, Mr. R. L. Borden, made an important declaration on the subject of steel shipbuilding at this port, which must have given much satisfaction to our people who, for many years previously, had been seeking aid for such an industry from the Laurier Government, but who had been receiving only very cold, and empty and, as the event proved, very worthless promises from the ministers. On that occasion the Liberal-Conservative leader said: The House of Commons last session laid down a certain policy touching naval defence in which both political parties united. It may not have satisfied the aspirations of all Conservatives, but it seemed our bounden duty to place, if possible, above the limits of partisan strife a question so vital and far-reaching, and to attain the standard which has for many years governed both political parties in Great Britain with respect to foreign relations. How the present Administration will work out the policy which was outlined by the resolution to which I have alluded, remains to be seen. One governing principle, at least, should control, namely, that out of our own labour and by the instructed skill of our own people, any necessary provision for our naval defence should be made so far as may be reasonably possible.

This was intended for the electors of Halifax at the time my right hon. friend was seeking their suffrages.

It may be noted, however, that in a Laurierite resolution published in the Halifax 'Chronicle,' it is asserted that Mr. Borden has 'deliberately repudiated that pledged policy. This Laurierite assertion is simply false. Mr. Borden has never 'repudiated' that policy, nor has he ever said or done anything inconsistent with it.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that this was in September, 1911, at the time of the election. My right hon. friend was seeking the suffrages of the people of the county of Halifax, and the statement was made by manifesto on behalf of his party that Mr. Borden had never repudiated that policy, and had never said or done anything inconsistent with it.

The Laurierite pretence is that it was a repudiation of this shipbuilding policy for Messrs. Borden and Crosby to vote against the Laurier Naval Bill. Such a pretence is simply nonsense. The Laurier Naval Bill made no provision for shipbuilding at Halifax. That Bill was passed, but what has Halifax gained by it in the way of shipbuilding? A few other facts should be noted: First, the Government's power to build ships did not and does not depend upon the passage of the Naval Bill. Second, the Naval Bill, in itself, did not authorize the building of any ships at Halifax or anywhere else. A vote against the Naval Bill was, therefore, no vote against shipbuilding at Halifax.

That was the manifesto on which my right hon. friend sought election in the city of Halifax. Mr. Speaker, seeing it is eleven o'clock, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. AMES: I think it was understood that my hon. friend would finish to-night.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is 11 o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS: I understood from the whips that there was an understanding that Mr. Sinclair would finish.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The motion is carried. It is after 11 o'clock, and it is surely not unreasonable for my hon. friend to ask the adjournment.

Mr. ROGERS: I think 11 o'clock is quite early. We have been listening to a good deal of argument, and we can go on for another hour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. At the last session of the House, an hon. member on the other side moved the adjournment and it was agreed to, and it was a little after ten o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS: That was on Friday night when we wanted to get home.

Mr. AMES: Since then it has been decided to adjourn on Wednesday instead of on Thursday, and a number of speakers who are expecting to come on will have to be crowded into the next two days, if my hon. friend does not go on.

Mr. PELLETIER: We will adjourn the debate as soon as my hon. friend is finished.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not make any announcement regarding the question.

Mr. ROGERS: I think our friends opposite are rather unreasonable. It is very early in the week and early in the evening, and the hon. member is apparently satisfied to go on and finish his speech. I do not see why he should not do so.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think that when the hon. gentleman asked for an adjournment, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries nodded his head, and I do not think it is fair now for other ministers to make him take back water, especially when it is after 11 o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. TURRIFF: You will not be ahead on it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was pointing out that my right hon. friend had issued a manifesto to the people of Halifax on the question of ship-building, and that in that manifesto he had advocated the building of naval ships at Halifax. That is what the people of Halifax voted for on the 21st of September, 1911, and I feel certain that that is what my right hon. friend would like to do to-day if he were not tied hand and foot by the jingoes of Toronto and the Nationalists of Quebec. I feel certain my right hon. friend would like to keep this promise, although the announcement he made in the House was not encouraging: that in his judgment about 25 or 50 years would elapse before we would be in a position to do anything ourselves in the way of naval defence. Is it true that Canadians are so phlegmatic that they can neither build these ships nor fight? Is it true that we are not fit to take rank with such countries as the Argentine Republic, or Chili or Denmark, or Belgium, or even China, all of which are building navies of their own? Is the breed in Canada inferior to the breed in Australia where our cousins are establishing a naval service of their own and carrying out the agreement entered into between the Imperial authorities and the colonies some years ago? In reading over these various memoranda I have come to the conclusion that there was virtually an understanding between the Imperial authorities and the Dominions of Australia and Canada that Australia would undertake to provide a local navy to guard the coasts of that country and the adjoining islands, and that Canada was to undertake the task of policing her Pacific and Atlantic coasts. That was the understanding, and Australia is going on in good faith carrying it out and I submit it is not a creditable course for the people of Canada to take to repudiate the understanding entered into on that occasion.

The argument of my hon. friends opposite is that we are not capable of building ships in this country and that we have not enough white men to man them when they are built. I refer hon. gentlemen opposite to the progress Canada has made during the last forty years. We have changed a string of scattered provinces into a nation; we have opened up the great West; we have established a great manufacturing industry in this country; we have developed a trade of one billion dollars with the outside world; we have constructed the greatest railway and canal system in the world, and are we to be told that with our present population and enormous wealth and overflowing treasury we are too puny to build our own naval ships and to protect our own coasts. It is an insult to the people of Canada to make such a statement.

But how did all this confusion arise in regard to this naval question and who is responsible for the difficulties we are in at the present time. I wish to call testimony which will have to be admitted by the hon. gentlemen opposite. If there is any newspaper in this country that is supporting vigorously the present administration, it is the Ottawa Journal; and I quote from it to show the reason for the confusion that exists among the people of Canada and especially among hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to this naval question. In September, 1911, two or three days after the election, the Ottawa Journal published the following:

> The situation is a very curious one. A number of newspaper comments on the election are to the effect that one good feature of it is that Mr. Borden is independent of Nationalist support, but those who comment so lose sight of the fact that not merely Mr. Bourassa's direct followers, but Mr. Monk, Mr. Forget, Mr. Nantel, Mr. Blondin, Mr. Paquet, all in fact of the old guard of Quebec Conservatives have been just as flatly opposed as Bourassa to any Canadian naval expenditure, and that all of them voted steadily against Mr. Borden in Parliament on this point. This renders it very difficult for any of them to enter a Cabinet which must make naval expenditure a plank in its platform. When a committee was appointed to arrange for a great Conservative convention last year, the French-Canadian members delivered an ultimatum that unless it was agreed that no resolution should be offered on the naval question no French Conservatives would attend the convention, and on that account the convention was abandoned. This indicates the vital nature of the naval issue.

Now, Sir, does any one think that this shifty policy that is now before the country would have been resorted to were it not designed to appease the Nationalist followers of the Government? The Postmaster General in his address told us that we were doing this in order to please England, that the Admiralty preferred a contribution. But it has been clearly pointed out in this debate that the Admiralty did not have any choice, because prior to the visit of the Prime Minister and his colleagues to England they had made up their minds to abandon the Canadian navy. Why Sir, at the last session of Parliament a question was asked the Minister of Marine as to what he was to do in regard to repeal of the Navy Act, and the question and answer are worth reading:

Mr. MONDOU: 1. Does the Government intend to propose the repeal of the Naval Act?

2. If so, does the Government intend, in case of such repeal to propose another Act containing the policy of the Government on this matter?

3. If such other Act is proposed, is it the intention of the Government to submit the same for the approval of the people before being put into force?

Mr. HAZEN: The answer to these three questions is, yes. After such consideration and inquiry as may be necessary the Government will present its naval policy in Parliament and to the people. That policy will undoubtedly require legislation which will involve the repeal of the present Naval Service Act. In the meantime, that Act will remain on the statute book for purposes in connection with the Fisheries Protection Service and otherwise. Before any permanent naval policy is put into force, the people will be given an opportunity to pronounce upon it.

The Prime Minister on his visit to England, had this before him; he had agreed to repeal the Naval Service Act; he had agreed to abandon the former policy of the construction of a Canadian navy, and he approached the Admiralty in this way: Assuming that we will not have a Canadian navy, assuming that we will not undertake the construction of a navy and the protection of our coasts, what is the next best thing we can do in order to do something for the defence of the Empire? And, to that question, we have the answer as it appears in the memorandum from the Admiralty. On the question as to an emergency quotations have been read to the House from various sources, and may I be permitted to add another. In the discussion in the Imperial Parliament on the 20th of March last, the First Lord of the Admiralty said:

The hon. member for Chester and the hon. member for North Kensington have both recognized the strength which the Government possesses at the present time, and I do not think it would be possible to find two members in this House who have more right to give an authoritative opinion on that subject, for both of them have brought to the consideration of naval matters the study of a great many years, and both of them are gifted with knowledge which far exceeds any I have been able to acquire during the short term I have been in the Admiralty. I recognize very gladly the statement they have made that our position at the present time is a thoroughly satisfactory one, and I do not think there is any danger or chance of it becoming unsatisfactory in the future. If it is satisfactory now, and that position is maintained in the next few years, let it be remembered that we owe that position to my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, the fruits of whose administration the present First Lord of the Admiralty is reaping.

It would be most unjust and ungenerous if the satisfactory position which we now occupy, were to come by the public to be attributed to any efforts of mine, whereas they are entirely the result of what was done two or three years ago.

Permit me again to give you a remark made by the Prime Minister of England in July of this year in the House of Commons. It must have been about the time that my right hon. friend with his colleagues was over in England. The Prime Minister says:

There never has been a moment, and there is not one now, when we have not been overwhelmingly superior in naval force against any combination which could reasonably be anticipated.

Not Germany alone, but any combination that could reasonably be anticipated. I now give a remark made by the Prime Minister, (Mr. Asquith), on this question of an emergency only a few days ago:

The great powers are working together with a closeness of touch and a frankness and freedom of communication and discussion which are remarkable, and which may seem almost unintelligible to those who believe that because of certain purposes the powers have been and are arranged in different groups. Nothing is further from the fact.

That statement was made by the Prime Minister in England not one month ago. He said that there never was a time when the nations of Europe were in better agreement than they are at the present time. I want to quote another extract from the First Lord of Admiralty, because I think it is very pertinent to this discussion. It condemns making a splurge in naval affairs, and advocates a continuous and steady policy such as is advocated by the Opposition in this House. This is an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Commons in England on the 22nd of July 1912:

Cool, steady, methodical preparation, prolonged over a succession of years, can alone raise the margin of naval power. It is no use flinging millions of money about on the impulse of the moment, by a gesture of impatience, or in a mood of panic. Such a course only reveals your weakness and impotence. Those who clamour for sensational expenditure, who think that the kind of danger with which we are faced needs to be warded off or can be warded off in that way, are either ignorant themselves of naval conditions or take advantage of the ignorance of others. The strain we have to bear will be long and slow, no relief will be obtained by impulsive or erratic action. We ought to learn from our German neighbours whose policy marches unswervingly towards its goal across the lifetime of a whole generation.

On that occasion the First Lord of the Admiralty condemns what my hon. friends opposite are doing to-day; he condemns making a rapid splurge in naval affairs; he advocates a steady and continuous policy. Of course, the Government of England will accept the gift. What else could they do? But what do they really think about the policy of the present administration? I should like to know what Lord Churchill in his heart really does think of the policy of my right hon. friend and his ministers in regard to this question. What does he think of those gentlemen dumping three empty dreadnoughts upon the door step of the Admiralty and then singing, 'God Save the King,' and thinking they have done their duty? He does not stop there. In that same passage he makes the following remark:

It indicates that the plans for naval construction shall be made years ahead, and that they shall be frankly communicated to the European power.

He indicates that if we break up the proposals we have made covering a period of years, it casts suspicion among the European powers, and does a great deal of harm. The First Lord of the Admiralty was referring to that phase of the question when he made these remarks.

What we want to avoid if possible is suggestions that vessels are being constructed, apart from those which are published and shown in the regular returns. The House knows that a lot of suspicion and ill-feeling was caused on that subject in former years, and it would be a great benefit if at any rate that element of suspicion could be altogether eliminated from the naval relations of two great powers. We would go a very long way on that road provided that reciprocal facilities are afforded to us. These are two things that we can do: we can remove uncertainty by letting it be known quite clearly what we propose to do and what are the limits within which the Goverenment increase or decrease from our prescribed course.

Now the announcement was made by the British Admiralty as to what they would do, and it covered a period up to 1920, quite a number of years ahead, and the Canadian Government came in with their three dreadnoughts, disturbing the arrangements that were made by the other European powers, after this announcement. That is the reason why these angry things are said in the German press to-day, and why the first Lord of the Admiralty is charged with falsehood by that press. The action of my hon. friends opposite in so far as an emergency is concerned has not done much to help the peace of Europe, but has rather created suspicion among the great powers. There is a witty gentleman in London by the name of Bernard Shaw, a very witty Irishman and a well known writer. This is what he says in regard to the situation:

Bernard Shaw gave the Canadian Associated Press the following opinion of Borden's scheme for building up a navy for Canada by putting out her ships to nurse with the British fleet at the expense of British taxpayers until the time comes for recalling them to form an independent navy for the Dominion:

'It seems to be a clever and altogether good bargain for Canada, but for obvious reasons Borden should stipulate that after sufficient delay to allow for the necessary training, the Canadian ships shall have exclusively Canadian crews.

'I notice some English papers regard the scheme as a method of strengthening the British fleet at the expense of Canada. If I thought Borden meant that I should recommend his immediate removal to a lunatic asylum. Canada must be able to defend itself before it can be a source of real strength to Britain, or any other power.

'It need not cut the painter, but it assuredly must cut its apron strings if it is to take its proper place in the world as a grown-up state.'

It has been asserted and it has not been denied, that the Admiralty does not need our money, that they have an overflowing treasury. As pointed out by my hon. friend from Red Deer, the present administration have met the expenses of the Insurance Bill, they have met the expenses connected with the Old Age Pensions, and all the other vast schemes of the government, and they have been able to pay $70,000,000 of the public debt during the time of the administration. Why should we send $35,000,000 of Canadian money across the ocean when the Treasury of Great Britain is overflowing, and when the British statesmen tell us they have provided for the defence of the country for a number of years ahead? It seems to me that our proper task, the task we undertook in 1909 is to spend that money in the building up of the Canadian navy, developing our own country, developing a shipbuilding industry, and preparing ourselves to take a part in the defence of the Empire, if it should ever need our help. An interesting account was given the press some weeks ago of a meeting held at a place called Fort Francis, in the province of Ontario. My hon. friend the member for Rainy River (Mr. Carrick) was at that time addressing the public. I quote from a newspaper report which I assume to be correct; if it is not correct my hon. friend will inform me:

> Mr. Carrick gave an interesting account of his visit to Great Britain at the time Premier Borden was there and said he was gratified at the way the people of Great Britain received the Canadians, recognizing the Dominion as a coming part of the Empire.

We were all gratified at that.

> In conclusion he referred to the naval question and said his opinion was that Canada should have a navy and that the dreadnoughts should be built in Canada. The money should be spent in Canada and in this way Canada would receive the benefit. In the time of war the Imperial Admiralty should be in control and thus Canada could assist the Mother Country in time of peril. Loud applause greeted these remarks, the speaker evidently striking a popular chord.

Now, Sir, Fort Francis is not the only place where that popular chord could be struck. I venture to say that you cannot get a hundred Canadians together anywhere in the Dominion but they will cheer the same sentiment when it is presented to them.

A good many hon. members opposite have referred to the difficulty of finding men to man the ships. I wish to remind the House, and particularly the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), that we are a maritime country in Canada. If he will refer to his own report, I think he will find that something like 70,000 or 80,000 men and boys are engaged in the great fishing industry of this country. From these men we shall be able to draw the sailors, and, I hope, the officers, to man the coming Canadian navy. It should not be an impossible task to find these men on the coast of the maritime provinces, if none can be found on the coast of British Columbia. There are many men in the Island of Newfoundland—

Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask the hon. member what proportion of the Niobe's crew are Canadians?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Since September 21, 1911, There has been no expectation among the men in the maritime provinces where I live, that the navy was going to continue under this Government. The idea got abroad, when the present Administration came into power, that the Canadian navy for the present, was doomed, that it was no use to enter upon it. I am not surprised that the young men on the coast of Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces would not enter upon a scheme of that kind.

Mr. EDWARDS: What proportion of the crew of the Niobe before the Laurier Government went out of power, and when that Government had in full control, were Canadians?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have not the figures before me at present. But I am informed that the report of last year states that the recruiting was very satisfactory indeed. But it remains true that we have a very large maritime population on the coasts of the maritime provinces, and that we should not have very much difficulty in finding men for a naval career, provided we make up our minds that we will build up a Canadian navy. Young men do not care about starting a career of that kind unless there is some settled policy, and there has been no really settled policy on this question since hon. gentlemen opposite dragged it into politics at the time of the by-election in the province of Quebec. I was going to suggest to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is always willing to take a suggestion, that, if it should be his lot—and I hope it will—to reverse the decision of the present Government and restore the policy of the Canadian navy, it would be advisable to start training schools along the coasts of the maritime provinces where the young men who are engaged in the fishing industry, who are at home in the winter and have not very much to do, could qualify themselves for positions in the Canadian navy. The British tar, as everybody knows, has a great history. But I submit, he is not made of any better stuff than the men who hunt the seals on the ice floes of Newfoundland, or who man the fishing vessels and schooners on the coast of the maritime provinces.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), referred to the war of 1812. I do not just recollect the point he made; but it occurred to me, that it would not be out of place to remind hon. gentlemen opposite, who think we have no fighting blood in this country, that in Nova Scotia, in the war of 1812, they fitted out troop ships and sent them along to the United States to help the British warships in the conduct of that campaign. They did not send a contribution, but they did some good work. We sent no contribution, I say, to the Imperial treasury, but we sent men who helped the Admiralty in the task they had in hand, and these men brought back a very comfortable little contribution of Yankee money, with which we started Dalhousie College, one of the great institutions of learning in this country. It is of no use for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to tell us about those brave fellows on the coast of the maritime provinces who have the salt sea in their nostrils. If they have to travel three thousand miles to get a look at the dreadnoughts he is going to build.

Great stress has been laid by hon. gentlemen opposite on the statement that they were dong something that could be done quickly. But should we adopt the amendment that is before the House, those dreadnoughts can be built in England, for the amendment does not say they must be built in Canada. They are to be manned by Canadians and owned by the Canadian people. Their first duty will be to protect the coasts of Canada and to assist in the defence of the Empire. That is the proposal made in the amendment. By the amendment the dreadnoughts could be built in a British shipyard, but you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in addition to the dreadnoughts we have to have a number of other ships to compose these fleet units. We require 6 cruisers, 12 destroyers and 6 submarines. We could keep the Canadian shipyards busy building these cruisers, destroyers and submarines, and we could have the construction of the ships going on on both sides of the ocean at once, carrying on the work with far greater speed than is proposed by the present Administration. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to vote for a policy that will do something quick, and do something that is worth doing, they ought to vote for this amendment.

It is common knowledge that it takes a considerable time to construct a dreadnought. In the discussions in the British House of Commons it was brought out that it takes at least two years to construct one of these large ships in the British shipyards. Some of my hon. friends seem to run away with the idea that everything goes like clockwork in the British shipyards; that there are no delays on the other side of the water, and that when a ship is bargained for, its construction is completed with the greatest degree of promptness. Such is not the case. They have labour troubles in the Old Country to an even greater extent than in Canada. In the discussion in the British House of Commons regarding the delays in the British shipyards, one of the greatest authorities of the Conservative or Unionist party, Mr. Allan Burgoyne, M.P., editor of the 'Naval Review,' and a man who has studied this question for many years, made the following statement.

Similar criticisms can be brought forward in relation to the delay of other four vessels of the class. But in the case of the Australian and New Zealand vessels there is something like a scandal attaching to their play. The armour of a specific type was tendered for by a very well known firm. They were unable, however, to secure a patent for this particular armour, and attempted the manufacture of it for themselves, with the result that the Admiralty were forced to condemn the whole of it, and the ships are now laid up on the Clyde practicly built, with the exception of their armour. The Financial Secretary to the Admiralty might well reply to that. First, I put it at a charge of incompetence and as a lack of care in seeing that the tenders that were accepted were carried into effect by those who put them forward.

That is the condition existing in the shipyards of Great Britain, and therefore it cannot be expected that the work will be done with any greater degree of promptness than in Canada.

We on this side of the House have faith in the ability of the Canadian people. We feel certain that if the Government decided to build these ships in Canada, the Canadian people would be found equal to the task. I have not the slightest doubt that would be the case, and that we could build ships or do anything else in that line as well on this side of the water as on the other. The Prime Minister in his eloquent address the other day referred to the proud position that the people of Canada occupy as citizens of the British Empire. It is quite true Mr. Speaker, that this is the most precious of our possessions. There is no British subject anywhere in our far-flung Empire who does not enjoy the protection of the British flag. There is not a fishing skiff tossed on the white-caps off Cape Race or a settler's hut on the western prairie but is a matter of Imperial concern. We boast of our wonderful heritage in this country, but, if we are true to our traditions we must take steps to see that the flag is kept floating over those regions now under our control. Planting the Canadian flag here and there on the northern headland and marking vast regions on the map with red is only an idle pastime unless we have the courage to maintain that flag and to defend those headlands by land and by sea. For over 150 years we have accepted the protection of the British fleet, and we are now asked not only to protect ourselves, but to assume some share in the burden of protecting the Empire. And what answer does our Government give to that request? An offer of three empty dreadnoughts and at the same time refuses to accept any permanent responsibility in regard to the defence of the Empire. I assert most positively that this does not express Canadian sentiment. It is not the answer of the Canadian people; it is the answer simply of a group of jingoes and millionaires who for the moment occupy prominent positions in the control of the affairs of this country. If I supposed for a moment that the gift of three dreadnoughts expressed the sentiment of the people of Canada, I would come to the conclusion that a naval battle or something of the kind was necessary to save us from national stagnation. Sir, it were better that our shores should be in danger; better that our blood should be stirred for a time by a hostile invasion, than that we should settle down to be a nation of pedlars and hucksters, without national sentiment, courage or aspirations. If I do not mistake the temper of the Canadian people, I feel sure they are prepared for the adoption of a permanent naval policy, and that they are prepared to assume not only the task of defending their own shores, but of accepting a fair share of the burden of defending the great Empire to which we belong.

I am opposed to the proposal of the Government, for the following, among other reasons:

1. Because there is no emergency to justify it.
2. Because it is the outcome of a political compromise with the Nationalist party of Quebec.
3. Because it abandons the opportunity which should now be embraced to establish and foster a steel ship-building industry in Canada.
4. Because it postpones indefinitely the commencement of a Canadian navy.
5. Because the proposal of the Government is no relief to Great Britain, as it is in addition to the stated programme, and imposes upon the home authorities the expense of manning and maintaining the ships.
6. Because the policy of the Government implies that the people of Canada are a parcel of mean spirited hucksters, who would rather pay money than fight.
7. Because it is the introduction of a system which is subversive of the principle of local self-government.

These, Sir, are the reasons why I am opposed to the policy of the present administration, and why I intend, when this question comes up, to vote for the amendment.

Mr. AMES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, December 17, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 37, respecting the Alberta Central Railway Company.—Mr. Clark (Red Deer).

Bill No. 38, respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company.—Mr. Buchanan.

Bill No. 39, respecting the Algoma Eastern Railway Company.—Mr. Smyth.

Bill No. 40, respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 41, respecting the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Smith.

Bill No. 42, respecting the Guelph and Goderich Railway Company.—Mr. Morphy.

Bill No. 43 respecting the Kootenay and Arrowhead Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 44 respecting the Manitoba and North Western Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Cash.

Bill No. 45 respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—Mr. White (Renfrew).

Bill No. 46 to incorporate the North West Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company.—Mr. McKay.

Bill No. 47 respecting the Ottawa Electric Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 48 respecting the Ottawa Gas Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 49 respecting the Ottawa Northern and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Fripp.

THE CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That, when this House adjourns on Thursday, the 19th instant, it stands adjourned until Monday, the 13th day of January next.

He said: In reply to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), I said the other day that I was willing to have the adjournment take place to-morrow instead of Thursday, and I move this motion, by permission, with that change. It seems to meet the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON: It seems to be agreed that Monday is a very inconvenient day. I suppose we can all travel on Sunday to get here. I wonder that the hon. member for Pictou did not suggest some other day than Monday.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). A great many of the members from the province of Ontario would be very much inconvenienced by the arrangement proposed. We who do not live on the main line of either the Grand Trunk railway or the Canadian Pacific railway cannot possibly leave home until Monday afternoon. I did not understand what the arrangement was, and thought that the adjournment would be until one of the days in the middle of the week. I would ask that that be considered.

Mr. BORDEN: I am afraid that we are going to put it so far forward toward the spring that very little time will be left for the session. But, if there is a strong feeling on the part of hon. members that Tuesday would be a more convenient day, I would be willing to accede to that, provided there is a guarantee that no hon. gentleman will rise and object to that. I would like it to be final. It is understood that this is final, I beg to change my motion so as to replace 'Monday the 13th' with 'Tuesday the 14th.'

Motion, amended accordingly, agreed to.

THE BANK ACT.

On motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance), House went into Committee (Mr. Bennett, East Simcoe, in the Chair) to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to revise the laws relating to banking, to continue until the first day of July, 1923, the charters of the several banks to which the provisions of the Bank Act apply, and to authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of remuneration to auditors for special examinations of the affairs or business of banks which the Minister of Finance may require to be made.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): My apology for interrupting the progress of the debate which has arisen on the special order of the day is the request of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House for a copy of the new Bank Act, which I shall introduce immediately upon the adoption of this resolution.

The resolution itself refers to one of the provisions of the new Act under which an external audit by auditors appointed by the shareholders of the bank at its annual general meeting, is provided for. At present there is no system of inspection of audit of the chartered banks of Canada except the inspection carried on by the various banks themselves, which serves the very useful purpose of informing the directors as to the conduct of the business of the banks at their several branches. Under the present Act, authority is granted to the Minister of Finance to ask for a return or statement from the banks pertaining to anything regarding their affairs in connection with which it may be desired to make an inquiry, but there is no machinery provided whereby he may verify the information obtained, in other words, he must rely solely upon the statements made by the banks. It occurred to me that in the revision of the new Bank Act it would be wise to insert a provision enabling the minister, in the event of his having any reason to suspect the correctness of a return made by a bank, to have that return verified by an independent officer. The officer I have fixed upon for this duty is the auditor appointed by the shareholders, who are the proprietors of the bank. The auditor, of course, occupies an independent position, and I therefore think that such an officer is the proper one to make to the minister any report, under the system of external audit which I propose, upon any matter concerning the affairs of the bank in regard to which any information is desired

Let us take a concrete case, and suppose the monthly return of a bank discloses something that does not appear to be satisfactory to the minister, or requires further explanation He would in the first instance, call upon the bank for such further explanation. He would in the first being unsatisfactory he could call upon the auditor, who is independent of the bank or its officials, and ask him to make a report in the matter. I have considered it desirable that any special services rendered by the auditor should be paid for by the government, so that the auditor would feel a direct responsibility to the government for any report made by him upon the direction of the minister. As that, therefore, would constitute a charge upon the Consolidated Revenue fund of the Dominion, it is necessary for me to proceed, with respect to this comparatively minor revision of the Bank Act, by way of resolution. As I stated, after the Committee approves, if they do approve of this resolution, I shall present a brief statement as to the leading changes which I propose in the new Act.

Mr. GERMAN: Will there be a separate auditor for each and every bank, appointed by the shareholders, so that if the hon. Minister wants a special report from any particular bank, he will obtain it from the auditor appointed by the shareholders of that bank?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend has correctly understood me. The provision in the new Act is to the effect that the shareholders of each bank, at its annual general meeting, shall appoint an auditor or auditors.

Mr. GERMAN : They do that now, do they not ?

Mr. WHITE : No; two or three of the banks do, but all of the banks do not. My predecessor, Hon. Mr. Fielding, when presenting his revision of the Bank Act in 1911, made permissible the external audit which I have in view. His Act provided that the shareholders may appoint auditors for the purpose of auditing the books, vouchers, accounts and securities of the bank, and certifying to the shareholders at the annual general meeting that the balance sheet presented for their consideration exhibited a true and correct statement of the affairs of the bank. I have gone a step further, and while I cannot, of course, speak for my predecessor, I am inclined to think that if he were introducing the Bill at this time he would take the same course. I believe the plan outlined follows the English system—a system applied to the great banks of England—and it is the same system, in substance, adopted in the several provinces with regard to the audit of financial and other companies.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Is this inspection imperative or optional under the English Act ?

Mr. WHITE : I think it is imperative; at any rate we are making it imperative in this case. With further reference to the question of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), there will be an auditor or auditors for each of the banks, and the Government, in the event of its desiring an inquiry as to any particular matter relating to the affairs of any bank, may ask the auditor to make a special report to the minister in regard to the matter.

Mr. PARDEE : The auditor appointed by the bank makes the report to the minister ?

Mr. WHITE : The auditor appointed by the shareholders of the bank will make the report to the minister. I thought this was a more desirable plan than that of calling in a special outside auditor or accountant to look into a matter which probably would not require any extensive explanation—which, while on the face of it might appear to be a proper subject for inquiry, yet upon investigation might turn out to be of trifling importance. It is desirable that the auditor appointed by the shareholders, who would be familiar with the affairs of the bank, and who, as I have said, occupies an entirely independent position, should make this special report to the Government.

Mr. CARVELL : Would this auditor have the right to enter into an investigation of the affairs of any particular account or any particular asset, or would it simply be an audit of the bank's books ?

Mr. WHITE : Does my hon. friend mean in so far as the minister may direct him to make inquiry ?

Mr. CARVELL : Yes.

Mr. WHITE: It would not be necessary to look into an account, and I did not have that in mind. But if on return of the bank being made, or if, for example, notice is given to the Government, as it has been in the past, in the case of the failure of banks, that a certain state of facts exists, I think it very advisable and necessary that the minister should be able to refer the matter to the auditor, and ask him for a special report. I do not understand that it would at all relate to or give the minister or the Government information with regard to particular accounts. I think that would be highly undesirable, and that the Government, in these circumstances, would not require such information; nor do I believe that the provisions would go quite as far as that.

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid that unless the minister goes to that extent it will not amount to very much, because, unfortunately, a number of banks have gone to pieces in the eastern part of Canada within my recollection, and I have found that they have gone to pieces because of the existence of a few accounts that ought not to have existed. Therefore, unless you can go into particular accounts or assets, if you choose to call them so, I do not see what advantage there would be in an audit.

Mr. WHITE: I am afraid we are speaking at cross purposes. What I had in mind was that of course the banks have the accounts of thousands of individuals and commercial houses and I thought probably my friend feared that in the course of the administration of this Act, and especially having regard to the provision now under consideration, that matters relating to ordinary accounts might be asked for. Without question, if any suspicion of fraud were thrown upon accounts it would be open to the Government to ask the auditor to make a special report, for this reason, that the auditor, before he can certify that the balance sheet represents a true and correct statement of the affairs of the bank, would have to check over the accounts and conduct a running audit, and if there was anything in the course of his duties that would suggest that any fraud was being practised on the bank or assets carried in such a way as to constitute a fraud, so far as the statement is concerned, I think unquestionably, apart from the inquiry of the minister, it would be his duty to call the attention of the directors, and if necessary of the shareholders to that. What I had in mind was in regard to ordinary accounts, about which no question of fraud is involved, that my hon. friend desired to know whether the Government would ask the auditor to investigate any accounts of that kind. I would say that if the question of the bank's solvency or of any impropriety is involved, then it should be done without question, because then his investigation would be absolutely pertinent and in that case the minister would be justified in asking the auditor to make a report in regard to whatever had been brought to his attention.

Mr. EMMERSON: Has the minister considered this feature, that while, nominally, the auditor appointed would be the appointee of the shareholders, yet in reality and practically he would be the appointee of the directors because of the fact that the directors have the controlling interest usually; they control the stock in the election of officers.

Mr. WHITE: That feature has been brought to my attention and I have given it consideration. I do not regard that as at all universally true, and so far as my own observation has gone, the moral effect upon a staff, upon the officers of an institution, of the appointment of outside auditors is very great. I do not doubt its extreme value to all institutions.

I would say that the shareholders of all industrial institutions in Canada, railways and banks, and others, should take a greater interest in the affairs of their several institutions than they do. My own view is that the shareholders of a bank should particularly take an interest in the affairs of their institution, and should at their shareholders' meetings be careful to appoint a proper auditor, because in the case of banks there is not only the value of shares held by the shareholders but there is also the question of the double liability, and I am therefore of the opinion that the shareholders of a bank will be careful to see that a firm of reputable outside external auditors is appointed for the purpose of the audit I have in mind, and, in addition to that, I am inclined to the view that public opinion will be very weighty in bringing about the appointment of firms of high standing in connection with the audits of our chartered banks under the Act which I am about to bring in.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 36, respecting Banks and Banking. He said: As I have said, my apology for introducing the Act is the request of members who desire copies of it. The copies will be available this afternoon or at latest tomorrow. As to the Bill itself, the discussion should, of course, properly take place upon the second reading, but with the consent of the House and as concisely as possible I desire to indicate the chief changes which have been made in the existing Act. As the House is aware, under chapter 29 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, the charters of the existing banks would have expired on July 1, 1911. By two Acts of 1911 and 1912 respectively, those charters and the corporate powers of the banks were extended for one year in each case, thus preserving the existence of the banks until July 1 of next year. It is usual in connection with these revisions of the existing Bank Acts to extend the term for ten years and following that practice the present Act extends the charters of the several banks and their corporate powers until July 1, 1923. I shall indicate very briefly some of the leading changes which have been introduced into the new Act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Have the changes in the Bill been reprinted in type other than the ordinary type?

Mr. WHITE: The changes in the Bill have been printed in italics, so that, upon perusal, they may be clearly seen. Additional safeguards have been thrown about the organization of banks with a view to the protection of the subscribers between the period of the incorporation of the bank and the issue of the certificate of the Treasury Board. No expenditure may be made by the provisional directors, or by the board of directors, unless of a very trifling and necessary character, until the application is made to the Treasury Board; and the certificate of the Treasury Board may not issue until the Treasury Board is satisfied that all the expenses, in connection with commissions and other expenditures of a similar kind, are reasonable. In the event of the certificate of the Treasury Board not being obtained; in other words, if the bank is not successfully launched, then any of the moneys in the hands of the directors or provisional directors, as the case may be, cannot be paid out of commission or for other heavy expenses, unless with the consent of the subscribers obtained at a meeting specially called for the purpose, or upon the order of the court.

Now, I have explained to the House, and I will refer to it again very briefly, the principle which I have adopted with regard to an external audit. Let me repeat that in this we have followed the provisions of the English law with regard to the audit of the great joint stock banks. I believe that the system has been found very satisfactory in Great Britain, and I incline to the view that it will provide a very effectual safeguard against occurrences such as we have had unhappily in the recent banking history of Canada. I refer more particularly to the Ontario Bank, to the Sovereign Bank and to the Farmers Bank. I believe that a proper system of external audit, such as we have in view under this Act, would have prevented the failure of those institutions, or would, in the case of one of them, have detected the frauds by which that bank was wrecked. It will not be necessary for me at this stage to say anything more as to that feature.

Then, in connection with the annual statement which is to be presented by directors to the shareholders of banks, I may say that the present form, the form which appears in the present Bank Act, has really been part of our legislation for some sixty years, and has been greatly outgrown, in fact so much outgrown, that many banks have themselves elaborated it in their annual reports to the shareholders. We have still further elaborated it, and provided for giving the shareholders information, in some respects, which the present Act has not provided for. I may make the same remark with regard to the monthly return which is made to the Department of Finance. That has been elaborated, and further particulars are called for, the idea in both cases being, to present to the shareholders and to the Government, respectively, a particularized, detailed statement of the assets and liabilities of the bank, properly grouped, and showing, as fairly as can be, the position of the bank. As I have said, in the case of the annual statement presented to the shareholders, that will have attached the certificate of the auditor or auditors, who will certify that they have examined the books, accounts, vouchers, securities, and cash of the institution in question, and that the balance sheet presented to the shareholders exhibits a correct view of the affairs of the bank at the date at which it is given.

There is another matter which the Bill introduced by my predecessor dealt with. That matter is the question of the penalty attaching to directors, officers, and auditors for false and deceptive statements made either to shareholders or to the Government or, in fact, to any person. Under the existing law it is practically necessary to prove intent. There is no criminal liability for negligence on the part of the officers or directors of a bank. I have given a good deal of thought and attention to that and it appears to me that there should be a provision in the Bank Act whereby a director, or officer, who is guilty of negligence, should be subject to indictment. Under the present state of the law, it has practically to be shown that a director, or a president, no matter how negligent he may have been, had had guilty knowledge before he can be indicted. I think that is the effect of the decision. I have introduced a provision into the new Act whereby, in addition to the penalties imposed by the existing Act for wilful misrepresentation or deception, or falsification, directors and officers and auditors will be liable to indictment and punishment for negligently preparing or making false and deceptive statements.

There is another provision in the new Act to which I desire briefly to call attention. It relates to the circulation of the banks. As the House is aware, under the present Act, the banks of Canada are permitted to issue their notes to the amount of their unimpaired paid-up capital. There is also a provision in the existing Act whereby, during what is called the crop moving period, from the first of September until the end of February, the banks are permitted, upon payment of 5 per cent for the privilege, to issue additional circulation to the amount of 15 per cent of their unimpaired paid up capital in reserve. These powers I am preserving to the banks; but in addition, we propose to give the banks the right to issue note circulation against gold. At the present time the banks may deposit gold with the offices of the Receiver General and receive Dominion notes, five dollar notes, or notes of a larger denomination in exchange for it. The gold is, of course, deposited as security, and as a guarantee for the redemption of the Dominion notes so issued. The banks, therefore, in addition to their authorized circulation, circulate large amounts of Dominion notes secured in the manner I have indicated. During last fall the Dominion issued, I think, over $10,000,000 of the new five dollar notes. The banks obtain those, and circulate them in addition to their own note circulation. The expense of printing those notes, is, of course, on the Dominion, and the expense of holding the gold, which is deposited before those notes are issued, also falls upon the Dominion.

I may say for the information of the House that the Bank of England has an issue department from which its notes are issued against gold. The Bank of Scotland, similarly, in addition to its ordinary powers of note circulation, is permitted to issue notes against gold in its own possession. We desire to give the banks here the power of issuing bank note circulation against gold, and in order to bring that about I have provided in the new Bank Act for the establishment of what we call a central gold reserve. In that central gold reserve may be held such amounts of gold as each of the banks may care to deposit. A bank may deposit, let us say, $5,000,000 of gold, and it may issue notes against $1,000,000, $2,000,000, $3,000,000, $4,000,000, or $5,000,000. It may issue notes against the whole of the gold reserve, but it must not issue its notes in excess of the amount of gold held for it in the central gold reserve. If at any time the amount of gold held for it in the central gold reserve exceeds the amount of its note circulation issued in respect of that gold, then the surplus in the central gold reserve would belong to the bank and may be returned in its report to the Government. That gold reserve is to be held by four trustees. They are to be appointed, three of them by the Canadian Bankers' Association, and one by the Government. I have inserted a provision that the amount of gold so held in the central gold reserve is to be reported on at least twice a year by the officers of the Finance Department; in other words, there is a provision for the inspection of the central gold reserve on the part of the Government.

The custody of that gold and the conditions under which it is to be held, are to be determined upon in accordance with the by-laws of the Canadian Bankers' Association, which by-laws have to be approved by the Treasury Board. The result will be that in some central place—Montreal, I would imagine, would be a proper place—the banks will be able to deposit gold, and, up to the amount of the respective deposits of each, notes may be issued in excess of the circulation authorized by the existing Act. I should point out to the House that there is no profit to the banks in the issue of their notes against gold deposited as there is in the case of the issue of notes against their own credit, because the gold could be used, not so conveniently, of course, but could be used instead of the notes, or, in the alternative, the banks could deposit the gold, get Dominion notes and issue circulation in that way.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Will this fund have any special designation?

Mr. WHITE: No, there is no provision for any special designation. The same check will be applied to the note circulation of a bank when the gold reserve is established as obtains to-day; that is to say reports must be made not only to the Government, but to the Canadian Bankers' Association, and there will be the same check precisely upon the note circulation of the banks as exists to-day. The Act has been enlarged only to the extent I have indicated, namely, up to the amount of gold held in the central gold reserve for the banks. This matter has been given very careful and weighty consideration on behalf of the Government.

I believe that, as a result, in time, Canada will be known as one of the great gold countries in the world, and that this reserve of gold will be built up to the great advantage of Canadian credit and prestige. The policy is one which is adopted in European countries. As I have indicated the Bank of England has its issue department and its notes are issued against gold. In the same way, to a limited extent, the Bank of Scotland, issues notes, and, in the same way, upon the continent, notes of the banks are issued against gold or gold reserves, the result being that many of these countries have accumulated very large reserves of gold which are immediately available for the redemption of note circulation by the banks which have issued it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Will the Government make any charge for the issue against gold?

Mr. WHITE: No, the Government will make no charge for this issue against gold. The Government very properly makes a charge for the additional note circulation which the banks at the present time are privileged to make during the crop moving season because they issue as against their credit, but, if gold is deposited, it is perfectly obvious that the bank makes no money upon that note circulation; in fact the banks would be money in pocket if they deposited the gold and used Dominion notes because in that case the Dominion has to bear the expense of engraving, whereas, under a provision of the new Act, the banks, in so far as they avail themselves of the privilege of issuing notes against gold, will be obliged to bear the cost of engraving these notes.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That is quite clear, but I thought there might be some costs incurred in the keeping of the gold and in the administration which would mean some little expense to the Government.

Mr. WHITE: I did not understand that that was the question, but I may say here that the entire cost of the administration of the central reserve is to be borne by the banks. I have under consideration and will probably introduce a Bill later whereby the banks, continuing to use as they do the office of the the Receiver General for the purpose of depositing gold for the issue of the large legals whereby they make their clearances from day to day, will be obliged to pay a reasonable amount for the service thus rendered by the Government. For the information of the House it may not be out of place to state that we hold now a very large amount of gold—I think $70,000,000 or $80,000,000—in the office of the Receiver General for which large legals are issued. The banks use those large legals for the purpose of making their clearances from day to day amongst themselves. But, in addition to that, there is no doubt that the custom has grown up by which the banks make use of the office of Receiver General for the purpose of conveniently storing their gold. The point I am making is that if the banks continue this practice, it is only reasonable that they should contribute a certain amount, which may be regarded as fair, to the Government for the service which it renders them in the storing of gold.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): How much of an increased circulation will this give the banks if they avail themselves of the privilege up to the full extent of the gold deposited in the central reserve?

Mr. WHITE: It is impossible to state that for this reason: The Bank Act does not make it compulsory upon the banks to carry any specified amount of gold as part of their assets. The result is that some of them carry more, we will say, proportionately, than others, and the amount fluctuates and varies from time to time, from day to day. This Bill will enable the banks as I have stated, to deposit, let us say, $5,000,000, and to practically allow it to remain there. That is what I hope will be the result of the Bill. Up to that amount the banks may issue their notes in accordance with their requirements, but not exceeding that amount. As to the extent to which the provisions of the Bill in this regard will be availed of, I am unable to state. I believe that most of the banks will deposit gold, and issue notes against it. I am inclined to think at the outset that the bank note circulation may not be greatly enlarged, but I believe that over a course of time it will be very considerably enlarged, and that the banks will be enabled in this way to more adequately meet the circulation requirements of the country.

Mr. NESBITT : Might I ask what check the department would have over the issue of the notes and the return of them ?

Mr. WHITE : The same check that exists at present. Statements must be made by the officers of the bank under the existing Act as to the amount of circulation outstanding. A similar report is made, I believe, to the Canadian Banking Association, which has the duty of supervising the note issue.

Mr. NESBITT : But you have no supervision ? You have to take their statement ?

Mr. WHITE : That is true, but, so far as I know there has been no abuse of the note issuing powers of the banks; and with the Canadian Banking Association having the matter under its supervision, with the present provisions in the Bank Act and the penalties therein provided for false statements, and the experience of the past; I think no question is likely to arise as to over-issues. The point I am making is this, that under the new Act, the same evidence will be obtained as at present, as to the note issues of the banks from time to time.

Mr. NESBITT : I am sorry I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman made his explanation. Might I ask if it is the intention of the hon. minister to send the Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee after it has passed the various stages ?

Mr. WHITE : It is the intention that this Bill should go to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I understand how important a piece of legislation this is, and how complex a matter our banking system is; and I do not pretend for one moment to say that this is the last word in legislation in regard to banking. I wish to assure hon. members on both sides of the House that any suggestion of a practical character will be welcomed by me for the consideration of the committee. While the Government, of course, takes full responsibility for the Bill as brought down, still, any suggestion that will improve it, any additional safeguard about the operations of the banks, or any suggestions to improve the machinery which we have provided for carrying out its intentions, will be welcomed and carefully considered.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the hon. minister explain whether or not the Government now issues legal tender in excess of the gold reserve, and what power the Government has in that respect?

Mr. WHITE: Under the Dominion Notes Act, it is provided that the Dominion Government may issue $30,000,000 in notes, of which $22,500,000 is not secured by gold. $22,500,000 of the entire Dominion note circulation at the present time is therefore not secured by gold. As to the remaining $7,500,000 of the $30,000,000 which I mentioned, and as to all further issues of Dominion notes, the Dominion has deposited in the vaults of the Receiver General throughout the country gold to a corresponding amount. In other words, for every note now issued, gold is deposited. The Dominion is therefore practically upon a gold basis, for this reason, the Dominion ones and twos are the small change, so to speak, so far as the note circulation of the people of Canada is concerned, and it is perfectly apparent that notes of the denomination of $1.00 and $2.00 to the extent of from twenty to twenty-five million dollars are out in such general use, that they are not likely to be presented for redemption under any circumstances. If my hon. friend will refresh his memory by reading the history of the banks in England up to the Peel Act of 1844, by which the issue of the Bank of England were provided for, he will see the theory on which they proceeded was, what amount of notes are so outstanding that they are not likely to come in under any conditions, and, having established that, they then proceeded to enact that as to future issues gold should be deposited to a like amount. With regard to the Dominion of Canada, it may be said that we are on a gold basis for the reason that about $25,000,000 is out among the people, and would not, under any circumstances that we can conceive of, be presented for redemption.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is the whole issue of $5.00 bills secured by gold?

Mr. WHITE: Oh, yes. In fact, all issues of recent periods have been against gold. In the early days, of course, the revenues were not as buoyant as at present, and the 40 per cent provision, that is in the present Bank Act, was really there for the purpose of holding out this circulation which was not secured by gold. In other words the Government inserted that provision in order that the banks might be obliged to hold Dominion notes, so that they would not come in for redemption. That condition has long passed, and we have been on a gold basis for a long time.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not wish to ask as to the locus where the gold is deposited, where it is received by these trustees, but I should like to ask if any portion of it finds its way back in to the banks on deposit for the trustees who hold it in trust?

Mr. WHITE: The custody of the gold and the conditions under which it is held, as I have said, will be under the supervision of the Canadian Banking Association. That is a matter of detail. I may assure my hon. friend that that gold reserve has to be held in vaults absolutely under the control of the four trustees, one of whom is to be appointed by the Government. Of course, if a bank had not issued notes up to its gold reserve, it would be able to go to the four trustees and say that it wanted to take out the surplus gold.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I presume, of course, that this Bill will go to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I wish, however, to ask my hon. friend if the Bill contains the same provisions which were in the old Bank Act, that the bank shall not lend money upon the security of its stock to any shareholder?

Mr. WHITE: I am not aware of any change of that kind having been introduced. I think I can say, no, positively to my friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to call my hon. friend's attention to this. While that is the case, that banks shall not lend money upon the security of its stock, there is another section which seems to be inconsistent with that, and which I think is very objectionable. It provides that if a shareholder of the bank transfers his stock, the bank may refuse to register the transfer unless and until all liability of the shareholder to the bank is wiped out. I think that is entirely inconsistent with the provision that the bank shall not lend money on its own stock, for the bank can make such a loan in an indirect way. If that section be not struck out, there ought to be a provision that, on the face of the certificate of the shareholder, the section shall be clearly set out, so that any person buying the stock may know the nature of what he is buying.

Mr. WHITE: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman give me a memorandum of his suggestion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. WHITE: When the Bill is in Committee—and I suppose it will be in the Committee for some weeks—we shall be able to consider the question raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. minister indicated one respect in which his Bill differed from the Bill introduced by Mr. Fielding in the session of 1911. Would it be convenient for him now, or later, to indicate in what respect his Bill differs from that of Mr. Fielding? Or is that indicated, by italics, in the Bill?

Mr. WHITE: I would not say that the portion in italics is the only portion of the Bill that differs from the existing Acts. Most of the matters to which I have been adverting were not dealt with, I think, by my predecessor on the day he introduced his Bill. I have explained that he made external audit permissible, and we have made it compulsory. The provision for a central gold reserve was not contained in his Bill. The penalty clauses to which I have adverted were substantially provided for in his Bill.

I come now to one other feature. We have given to the farmers of the West the privilege of borrowing under the Bank Act upon grain in his own possession. Or, to put it in another way, we have permitted the banks to loan to farmers on the security of threshed grain in their possession.

Mr. EMMERSON: How about the farmers in the East?

Mr. WHITE: The legislation is general.

Mr. EMMERSON: The hon. minister, in speaking, limited it to the farmers of the West.

Mr. WHITE: I mentioned the farmers of the West because it was having regard to the situation in the West that it was thought desirable that the law in this respect should be changed. The matter was given very careful consideration, because it does raise very important questions as to the lien of the bank, the rights of creditors and other matters that have been discussed in this House before, particularly, I think, in 1890. However, having regard to the desirability of encouraging the farmer of the West to provide storage facilities; having regard to the transportation problem, we thought that the advantages of the legislation would more than counterbalance its disadvantages. That is a matter also that will be more fully discussed in the Committee.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is it confined to grain, or does it apply also to live stock?

Mr. WHITE: We have also given the rancher the privilege of borrowing upon his cattle.

Mr. WHITE: The lien is a banker's.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the Bill provide that the lien upon the grain in the possession of the farmer shall be registered or filed as a bill of sale, so that the public may have some notice of it?

Mr. WHITE: The lien is a banker's lien, which requires no registration under the Bank Act. I know, of course, what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. EMMERSON: The hon. minister is merely extending the privilege?

Mr. WHITE: We are extending the privilege. Hitherto, under the existing Act, the privilege of hypothecating property in the possession of individuals has been practically confined to wholesalers. While one may borrow upon warehouse receipts, or on personal property in the possession of a third party who may give a receipt, in the past the privilege of using the liens provided for in the Act has been confined practically to the wholesalers. In the West, banks to-day take security of this kind upon cattle. But, by reason of a decision in the courts of Alberta some doubt has been thrown upon their right to do so, and the provision that the rancher may borrow upon his cattle—the rancher being in a sense a wholesaler—has been inserted for the purpose of removing all doubts as to that point and making it clear that the rancher may borrow upon his cattle. As to the advisability of the extension of the bankers lien to other personal property owned by farmers or others, that raises very many weighty considerations indeed; and I am sure the House will agree that the whole subject is one that requires very careful consideration. And, so far as I am concerned, as I have said, I shall welcome any criticism or suggestion with regard not only to this but to other provisions of the Bill when it is under review by the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the Bill be printed before the Christmas adjournment?

Mr. WHITE: I arranged with the law clerk that copies should be ready—he said this afternoon, or at latest to-morrow. So the Bill will be available for hon. members.

One other matter—and I hope I may be allowed to conclude. There is a feature of this question to which the attention of the House has been directed by discussion and otherwise—the question of so-called bank mergers. That is not a very happy expression. For while it is in one sense a merger, the Act really provides for the purchase and sale of the assets of a bank. When one bank purchases the assets of another bank that is popularly called a 'merger.' There has been a good deal of discussion with regard to the propriety of so-called bank mergers. Without going into the question as to whether bank mergers are desirable or not, I would merely indicate my own opinion that no hard and fast rule can be laid down. Under certain circumstances, the purchase of one bank by another may be not only desirable for the banks concerned, but may strengthen the whole financial situation. On the other hand, cases can easily be suggested in which a grave question would arise as to whether, in the public interest, banks should be allowed to merge—or, to put it technically, one bank be allowed to purchase the entire assets of another. I think instances will readily occur to hon. members in which it might be most undesirable that two large and powerful banks, say doing business in competition throughout the country, should be permitted to come together, unless for very good and very weighty reasons. Under the present Act, when a bank desires to purchase the assets of another bank, a certain course is followed. An agreement is made between the boards of directors of the respective institutions. That agreement is not known to the public until the meetings of shareholders of the respective banks are called for the ratification of the agreement. If these meetings of shareholders sanction and ratify the agreement entered into by the respective boards, in due course, application is made to the Treasury Board, and upon its sanction being given the so-called merger or purchase is complete, valid and effective. In the present state of the law, when that application is finally made to the Treasury Board, the agreement has been made public, the matter has been discussed at the meetings of shareholders, the inspector of each bank has thoroughly gone over the affairs of the other bank; and, except in very exceptional cases a very serious question would arise as to the propriety of refusing the sanction of the Treasury Board to a purchase which has gone so far. I have introduced a feature into this Act, which I shall ask the Committee to consider, which provides that, before an agreement may be entered into, the consent of the minister must first be obtained that an agreement may be made. That, I think, will at an early stage enable the Government, in a clear case, to prevent the amalgamation of two banks, if in the opinion of the Government such amalgamation would be against the public interest.

Mr. CARVELL: At what stage would that consent take place?

Mr. WHITE: Before the agreement is brought before the shareholders—before it becomes public.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Through the Treasury Board, or through the minister?

Mr. WHITE: The minister; but if it is thought that would cast too much responsibility upon the minister, there would be no objection to substituting the Government or the Treasury Board. That is a matter of detail.

Mr. EMMERSON: Are all transactions of the Treasury Board concurred in and approved of, formally at least, by the Governor in Council?

Mr. WHITE: Not every transaction, for the reason that the Treasury Board has a statutory existence, and is charged with certain duties and certain acts quite apart from the Governor in Council.

Mr. EMMERSON: Does not the Treasury Board report to the Governor in Council?

Mr. WHITE: The Treasury Board is constituted a committee of the Governor in Council. Its report goes to the Governor in Council, and is approved of or referred back, as the case may be. But by statute there are a number of matters dealt with by the Treasury Board. I should say, in regard to bank amalgamation, that this is one of the matters which goes from the Treasury Board to the Governor in Council.

Mr. TURRIFF: Has the hon. minister considered the advisability of compelling banks, when the desire to amalgamate or form such a merger as he has described, to come to Parliament for authority to do so, just as they have to come to Parliament to get a charter? This matter of bank amalgamation has assumed a very serious aspect, and, if it continues for any length of time as it has existed in the last two or three years, the whole of the financial interests of the country will be in the hands of as many men as can be counted on the fingers of one hand. It seems to me, instead of applying to the Treasury Board, or even to the Minister of Finance, who is a member of the Treasury Board, that if two or three banks wish to amalgamate they should be compelled to come before Parliament and secure its authority, just as they have to obtain the authority of Parliament before they can go into business.

Mr. WHITE: While I have not given special consideration to the matter, I should say off-hand that that is not feasible, for the reason that Parliament is not in continuous session. Parliament may last for five or six months, or for a longer or shorter period. My hon. friend will, no doubt, bear in mind that we are acting under the principle of responsible government and that it might not be advisable to compel the banks to come to Parliament for its sanction in matters such as this. I think the Act may very well be left as it is in that regard. My hon. friend will realize that circumstances might arise in which a delay of six months would be very inexpedient, and against the public interest. On the whole, I think in the amendment to the Act which I propose, the interests of the public in regard to the matter under discussion will be reasonably safeguarded. As I have said, the discussion of the Bill will naturally be upon its second reading, and I must apologize for occupying the time of the House for such a length of time; though I submit that for this I am not altogether responsible.

Mr. ROSS: In regard to the protection of the interests of depositors, the hon. minister must know that the depositors in the Farmers' Bank will lose nearly a million dollars, and, if I am informed correctly, some six hundred depositors have been absolutely impoverished. I think one of the most important amendments that could be made, considering the privileges enjoyed by banks in this country, is that depositors should be adequately protected, and I think it would not be difficult to frame an amendment embodying such a provision. I would like to ask the hon. minister if he proposes to introduce any such amendment?

Mr. WHITE: I do not believe any legislative provision could be made which would absolutely secure the interests of depositors. I believe that on the whole, the Canadian Banking system is one of very high character, and constitutes a strong financial situation. But in the last analysis we must never forget that the security of depositors rests more upon the integrity and ability of the directors and officers of the bank than upon anything else. I do not believe we shall ever emancipate ourselves from that condition. The interests of the bank are entrusted to the president, the directors, the general manager and other officers, and I believe, speaking with regard to Canadian banks, that no more capable body of men exists anywhere than is found in connection with the banking institutions of Canada. I have a very high opinion also of their integrity, but with regard to the particular case referred to by my hon. friend, I believe the provisions we have introduced for external auditing would have prevented the disaster in connection with the Farmer's Bank, because the auditors would have seen that improper entries were made, that accounts were falsified, and that fraud was practised. I have great confidence in the moral effect of such supervision by capable auditors upon the staff of the bank, and, in all probability, none of the frauds that wrecked that institution would have been attempted under a proper system of external audit. There is no doubt whatever that the officials of an institution whose work from day to day is checked up by capable accountants would feel it incumbent upon them that those accounts should be correct, in the event of contemplating any fraud, should fear its speedy detection. Answering my hon. friend more fully, the provisions of the audit and the penalty clauses which are provided in the new Act go as far as it is possible to go in legislating to prevent such occurrences as he has referred to.

Mr. ROSS: Could the minister not introduce some clause whereby protection could be given to depositors in much the same respect as in connection with the bank note circulation fund? Why not exact from them a certain percentage of their deposits, place that percentage with the Government and make all the banks responsible for any failure that would occur to any one bank. The banks enjoy such privileges that this would not be a very great hardship to them even if you allowed interest on the deposit at the rate of 3 per cent which the banks themselves pay, and then you would not have to depend on the honesty of any man or set of men but they would have absolute security for the depositors, who are not investors.

Mr. WHITE: I do not think the suggestion feasible. My hon. friend suggests the securing of deposits in the same manner as bank note circulation is secured. So long as the notes are issued against anything but gold the circulation must be the first charge against the assets of the bank. I do not think that any member would seriously put forward the view that the note circulation of the bank should not be a first charge upon its assets.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not the point at all. The point is that at present the notes are the first charge upon the revenue of the bank, the deposits are the second; but there is a provision in the last revision of the Bank Act, making a fund out of which the notes are to be retired. The suggestion is, could not a similar fund be made for the depositor.

Mr. WHITE: That provision which is in the Act to-day by which all the banks contribute is continued in the present revision that is in reference to note circulation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The suggestion of the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) is whether or not a similar fund could not be established for the protection of the depositors.

Mr. WHITE: Off-hand I should say it would not be feasible for this reason, if for no other, the enormous amount of the deposits in the chartered banks of Canada. Not only that, but I understand my hon. friend to suggest that say three per cent should be allowed upon such a fund, and that the fund should be administered by the Government. If the proposal were at all feasible I should say that a very large amount would have to be deposited in that way and that would, of course, cut down the earnings of the banks, and affect the rates of discount in respect of their total deposits, and it raises many considerations which I think we could hardly discuss to-day, but which, of course, might be discussed fully in the Committee. Personally I do not believe that the suggestion that has been made is feasible, but I do not say it is not worthy of consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would have been obliged if the minister had given a little more information as to the scope of his proposed independent audit. I understood him to say that he would follow the English practice. Like other members I have received many pamphlets, &c., containing suggestions as to what particular kind of audit should be provided for in the Bank Act.

Mr. WHITE: I thought I had gone fairly far in a general way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the English system in regard to joint stock banks?

Mr. WHITE: The appointment of auditors by the shareholders.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not by the Government?

Mr. WHITE: Oh, no, not by the Government. The English system regards the shareholders as the real proprietors of the bank and of course they are and they appoint at their annual general meeting auditors for the purpose of checking the accounts, vouchers and securities of the bank or institution in question and certifying to the shareholders that the annual statement presented by the directors is a correct statement of the affairs of the bank or company.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there provision in the proposed Act for discovering the disposition that is made by the banks of their assets?

Mr. WHITE: In the ordinary course of conducting business the banks from day to day make disposition of their assets. That would be checked, of course, by the auditors, to whom I have referred.

Mr. OLIVER: It is commonly stated that there are banks which hold property which cost those banks many million dollars, but which is charged in their accounts at comparatively trifling amounts. Is there any provision for discovering that and giving such information to the public?

Mr. WHITE: I should say that there is no specific provision for that, but if the attention of the auditors were directed to anything that, prima facie, appeared improper, of course, he would call it to the attention of the directors. I am not aware of these particular matters to which my hon. friend refers unless he means that banking premises are sometimes carried at a comparatively small amount on the books of the bank. I think that in some glaring cases a few years ago a change has been made so that the statement now made more nearly represents the actual state of affairs, but I would ask my hon. friend to bear in mind that a very expensive bank building may be useful only for the purposes of banking and that, therefore, a very nice question arises as to its value. Of course there is no doubt that reasonable valuations might be placed upon these buildings. I do not see how the discretion of the board of directors could very well be interfered with except in extreme cases.

Mr. GUTHRIE.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to know if there is any provision in the Bill and if it is the policy of the Government to procure information on the point I have mentioned and to place that information before the people of Canada?

Mr. WHITE: The Bill has certain provisions which I have explained as to the occasions which the minister or the Government would consider it necessary to make inquiries. It would be impossible to answer a specific, almost a hypothetical question because I have not in mind at present any such matter as my hon. friend has alluded to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member for Edmonton has raised——

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It has invariably been the custom of this House not to permit any discussion on the first reading of a Bill. We have been departing from that custom during the present session, and I would ask your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not a motion for the first reading of the Bill, but for leave to introduce the Bill, which permits the minister presenting it to give a clear and succinct explanation. Of course, it is not the usual custom to enter into a discussion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: To-day an exceptional course has been taken. The House unanimously consented to the Minister of Finance taking this Bill out of its regular order with the view of giving to the House and to the country information as to its contents. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has raised a question of a great deal of importance to the people of the the country and to the shareholders of banks, that is, as to investments which banks are to be allowed to make in real estate. As my hon. friend no doubt knows, in the present Bank Act there is a provision that a bank shall not invest in real estate except in so far as may be necessary for the purposes of its banking business. But we all know that banks have gone far beyond that, and that they have erected large and expensive buildings in various cities in Canada, which are brought into competition with those of real estate owners.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under the Bank Act they are prevented from doing so.

Mr. CURRIE: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is not the commanding officer of this House.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member is making a speech. He can only ask questions; he cannot make a speech.

Mr. PUGSLEY : It is a very brief speech that I am making, and it will not take up much of the time of the House. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the fact that the intention of Parliament evidently was in passing the Bank Act that banks should not invest their money in real estate beyond such buildings as are necessary for the carrying on of their banking business, and whether with the knowledge of the fact that they have gone far beyond that, and have invested vast sums of money in buildings which they rent for ordinary business purposes, he will give attention to the matter with the view of making some clear provision in the Bill which will limit the investment of money by a bank in real estate for the purposes of their business only. Some of the banks, such as the Bank of Montreal in the city of Montreal, have erected splendid buildings which, I understand, are used entirely for banking purposes, and many other banks have done the same. In St. John, N.B., there are very fine bank buildings of the New Brunswick Bank, used entirely for the purposes of its business; but other banks have adopted the practice of investing large sums in buildings which are used for purposes entirely apart from the requirements of their banking business. May I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if he has given attention to this phase of the question ?

Mr. WHITE : This matter, and any other matter in which my hon. friend from Edmonton or any other hon. member may be interested, should, I think, be considered, and will, so far as I am concerned, be considered and discussed in the Committee, which would seem to be the proper place in which to discuss it. Let me say further—because I do not believe that my hon. friend is aware of the circumstances under which I was permitted to-day to introduce this measure out of its order—that it was due to the request of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, so that the Bill might be presented for their consideration and perusal during the recess. My desire was to present it as concisely as possible, and not to enter upon any prolonged discussion. I do not question that the course pursued has been proper up to date, but, unless there is a very good reason for doing otherwise, I would ask that the matter to which my hon. friend has referred, and other matters of a cognate character in connection with the Bill be dealt with, either on the second reading, or in the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LOCATION OF SOUTH AFRICAN SCRIP.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche), who I am sorry is not in his place, but who, no doubt will be notified of my question by the Prime Minister, to the fact that on Friday last I asked if he had reached a decision in regard to an extension of the time for the location of South African scrip. The hon. minister said he had not yet reached a decision. I then pressed him to reach a decision as soon as possible. It is very important, in the interests of those who hold scrip at the present time, that they should know before the end of this month what the intention of the Government is, and I would ask very respectfully that an answer be given to the House to-morrow.

Mr. BORDEN: I will direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the matter. I have no personal knowledge of the situation.

DRY DOCK AND SHIPYARD PLANS.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he has laid upon the table, or if he is prepared to lay upon the table of the House, the information which I asked for, namely, a plan of the layout of the proposed shipbuilding yard in connection with, and adjoining the dry dock at the port of St. John, N.B.; also a plan of the layout of the shipbuilding plant in connection with the dry dock at Sydney, in the province of Nova Scotia; likewise the plan in connection with the dry dock at Montreal and also at Esquimalt in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is disinctly out of order. It seems to me that these questions are of a character which should properly be answered after notice has been given.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Surely, before the Orders of the Day are called, I have a right to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether he has done what he very kindly said he would do. It is very important that we should have those papers before continuing the discussion of the naval question.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend's request was conveyed to me only yesterday afternoon. I have the plan that my hon. friend asked for with regard to Courtenay bay, which I shall lay on the table to-morrow. I have asked my officers in the department for the other information, and if it is ready, will lay it also on the table of the House to-morrow.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is entirely satisfactory.

DUTY ON WHEAT AND OATS.

Mr. ROBB: I would like to draw the attention of the acting Minister of Customs to 'Hansard,' of December 4, and to the fact that questions 5 and 6 of that date were not answered. The questions related to the duty on wheat and the duty on oats.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend is correct. The questions referred to were not answered, but it was entirely by an inadvertance, and I now beg leave to lay upon the table the answers to several questions, including the two which were overlooked.

Mr. ROBB:

1. How many bushels of wheat and of what grade were imported from United States to Canada, during twelve months ending October 31, 1912, and the number in each grade?
2. What was the value of wheat imported from United States to Canada during twelve months ending October 31, 1912?
3. How much duty was collected on wheat imported from the United States during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912?
4. What quantity of such wheat was re-exported, either as wheat or flour?
5. Was any portion of duty refunded on account of grain, flour or mill feed exported during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912? If so, how much?
6. Has any application been made for a refund of duty on account of wheat, flour or mill feed exported during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912?

Mr. WHITE:

1. The quantity of wheat imported from United States to Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912, amounted to 4,927,473 bushels. Imports of wheat are not classified by grades in Customs statistics.
2. $4,922,628.
3. Duty collected on wheat imported for consumption from United States was $23,-691.60.
4. Quantity and value of foreign wheat exported from Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912, amounted to 6,564,360 bushels, valued at $6,602,437.
5. No.
6. No.

Mr. ROBB:

1. How many bushels, and what grade of oats were imported from the United States to Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912, and the number of bushels of each grade?
2. What was the value of oats imported from the United States to Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912?
3. How much duty was collected on oats imported from the United States during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912?
4. What quantity of such oats were re-exported either as oats, meal, oatmeal, rolled oats or feed?
5. Was any portion of duty refunded on account of grain or meal exported during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912? If so, how much?
6. Has any application been made for a refund of duty on account of grain, flour or meal, exported during the twelve months ending October 31,1912?

Mr. WHITE:

1. The quantity of oats imported from the United States into Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912, amounted to 1,742,786 bushels. Imports of oats are not classified by grades in Customs statistics.
2. $771,671.
3. Duty collected on oats imported for consumption from the United States was $12,633.20.
4. The quantity and value of foreign oats exported from Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912, amounted to 2,256,037 bushels, value, $1,076,442.
5. No.
6. No.

SALMON RIVER INDIAN SCHOOL.

Mr. KYTE: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the answer which was given yesterday to a question of mine relating to the hours prescribed for the opening and closing of the Indian school on the reserve at Salmon river, in the county of Richmond. My question was 'What is the hour for opening, and the hour for closing?' The question was answered in regard to the hour for opening, but there was no statement with regard to the hour at which the school closed. Perhaps the hon. minister will observe my remarks in 'Hansard,' and bring down his reply later on.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. H. B. AMES (Montreal, St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, for several days I have listened carefully to the speeches made by hon. members on both sides of the House in connection with this naval question. I am reminded of an experience which I had some years ago when, one day, standing on a hill that overlooked a small winding valley, I saw two railway trains approaching one another. One was coming from the north and the other from the south. Apparently, there was to be a collision, but when I was just expecting this to occur, I saw that the two trains passed each other and went on their way and I realized, what I had not noticed before, that there was a double track. Now, to a very considerable extent in this debate, the two proposals are not necessarily contradictory and for those of us who are considering this matter more from a national than a political point of view, the principal question is: what is the first duty that we as Canadians owe to ourselves?

I think it is necessary that we should clearly distinguish between special action and permanent policy. There is a great deal of confusion at present in the public mind, confusion which our hon. friends opposite have done their best to create and done their least to clear up. The speech of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, when introducing his Naval Bill, dealt, as you well know, mainly with the question of special action. The memorandum of the Admiralty, which we all have before us, contains, in the last paragraph, the question that was put by the representatives of Canada to the highest naval authorities of the Empire. The question was: In what form would any immediate aid that Canada might give be most effective? And the answer was this:

It is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

In this instance, when our representatives went across to consult with the Admiralty, they did not take it upon themselves in advance to tell them that Canadians' generosity would be exceedingly limited. It was in consequence of the answer which was given to the question put to the Admiralty that the Bill now before the House was brought down. The Bill is for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire for the common defence of the Empire. You there have the purpose and you there have the method.

Now, the Opposition attitude in connection with this debate is two-fold: it is an attitude of attack and it is an attempt to produce an alternative policy. In the attitude of attack they endeavour to deny that there is any need for special, immediate action. I think that those of us on this side of the House who have carefully read the despatch of the Secretary of State for the Colonies with his instructions to the Governor General transmitting the memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty, or the general naval situation and communicated to the Government of Canada by His Majesty's Government on November, 1912, are quite convinced, and are quite willing to submit the question to any impartial body of people throughout the Dominion of Canada, that necessity for prompt and special action has been, by that memorandum, disclosed. But, there is more than this memorandum. We know perfectly well that our representatives who were present in London in July last had laid before them certain confidential information as to the exact condition of affairs throughout the Empire and the relationships of Great Britain with other countries, information that they cannot disclose to this House, but which, nevertheless, had an effect in convincing them that special action for the common defence of the Empire was requisite and necessary. While they cannot disclose this information, its existence cannot be denied, and the responsible ministers of His Majesty's Government in Canada are prepared to tell us that it is of such a grave character that it must be, by them and by this Parliament, immediately acted upon.

There has been an attempt on the part of the Opposition to reduce this debate to a comparison of permanent policies. It is nothing of the kind. Hon. gentlemen opposite are overlooking entirely the fact that the permanent policy of the Government has not yet been disclosed. It is as if the owners of a building were sitting down and asking one another how they might make that building fireproof while smoke issuing from the very windows told them that it was time to ring the fire alarm.

Although the Prime Minister has not disclosed a permanent policy he has, nevertheless, indicated that it is his intention in due course so to do and he has also laid down some of the lines that will probably be followed. The Prime Minister is aware that there are grave difficulties in the way of a permanent policy. He realizes that steps must be taken to remove those difficulties. He knows that certain preliminary arrangements must be made, certain barriers removed, certain constitutional relationships defined before a permanent policy can be put in force in this Dominion which will stand for future generations to build upon. We made one false start in connection with this navy question. We do not want to make another, it is not dignified, it does not tend to make Canada stand higher either in her own self-respect nor in the respect of the nations of the world and we do not care to make such a blunder a second time.

There are certain prerequisite conditions that must be met and satisfied before a permanent policy can be put into force. They are of three kinds—physical, constitutional, and what I may, for the want of a better term, call honourable. Since they have been foreshadowed by the Prime Minister, these conditions may, I think, be discussed with propriety in this House.

What are the physical prerequisites that are necessary to a permanent Canadian naval policy? I think that the desire for a Canadian navy, built in Canadian shipyards and manned by Canadian seamen, is a patriotic and worthy desire that many people throughout Canada share, but it will be many years before we shall see that desire realized. We are sometimes told of the Japanese navy. The Japanese have been building warships for thirty years. When I was in Japan sixteen years ago I was not permitted to go into the shipyard at Kure, so jealous were they of what they were doing and yet, for the last two battleships built by the Japanese, the Satsuma and the Kurama, sixty-one per cent and fifty-eight per cent respectively of the materials used in their construction had to be imported from other countries. You talk of the Australian proposal to build ships; the Australian dreadnought was built in England, is manned by Englishmen and is patrolling the waters of the North sea. As to the torpedo boats they are assembled in Australia, while as to the cruiser that they are beginning to build, the work is dragging along to the dissatisfaction of all concerned. It takes many years to establish the physical prerequisites necessary for the construction of a navy. Now, the proposition of the Prime Minister points the way. He makes what I think to be the most reasonable possible proposal towards this end. He says, we shall endeavour to interest and we have assurances that we can interest the great experienced ship-building firms of the old country to establish branch shipyards in Canada; they will bring over their engineers; they will bring over their skilled workmen; they will construct their plants; and in order that the venture may be a business venture, they will receive orders from the Admiralty; we will undertake as well to see that if they construct in Canada, a share of the additional expense will be borne by us. That it seems to me is beginning at the beginning, building from the ground up, building with a permanent basis, building with something definite in view. Further, by the proposition of the Prime Minister, training of officers will take place on those three dreadnoughts built by Canada's money. Why should there not be Canadian officers trained there? Any one knows that a man, in order to be an officer on one of those great fighting machines, has to go through many years of careful training. The sooner we commence to train men for that purpose the better. Take for example Japan. What has made it possible for Japan to have an educational system? She sent her bright young men to the schools of England, the United States and Canada, and they were taught to be teachers; they came back and set up an educational system in Japan to teach the citizens of the East in regard to the service of the West. If we are to train officers, it is not a matter of seamanship, it is a matter of mechanical operation, we too must train men for the higher places that they in due course may come back to Canada and train men who shall occupy places on those ships. Last of all, be it remembered that provision has been made that these dreadnoughts in due time may be brought back to Canadian waters should it be the wish of the Canadian people that they should form part of a Canadian unit of the British navy. Therefore, it seems to me that the wisest, most careful preparation is being made to provide the physical prerequisites that may be necessary to some day construct, to equip, to man, and to maintain ships that will be built in Canada.

The constitutional prerequisites are perhaps more important than those of a physical nature. In my opinion, the most significant part of the speech of the Prime Minister was that in which he intimated that the British Government were prepared to receive and that we in Canada were prepared to send a member of the Cabinet of the day to sit as a permanent minister in the Council of Imperial Defence. The fact that we are to have regular, continuous, permanent representation in the councils of peace and war, is to my mind the most important declaration the minister gave to this House. Defence is of two kinds, land defence and naval defence. We of Canada can at all times and will at all times probably have complete control of our land defence; but the moment a ship flying Canadian colours is upon the water, that ship becomes and must become part of the fighting force of the British Empire, because the enemy that ship may have to encounter may be in the most distant waters of the globe. Naval warfare therefore cannot be local; defence of all is defence of each, and it must move in unison; such defence involves joint control; such control can only be based upon common knowledge, where the utmost frankness occurs between all concerned. Hence a necessary prerequisite to any permanent naval policy must be to find an acceptable basis for consultation.

The attitude of the present leader of the Opposition necessitates the same consideration. If you establish a fleet unit on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, you do not get away from dealing in a straightforward manner with this question of joint control. The Pacific unit to be of any value whatever, must be regarded as merely a part of the navy that flies the British flag in the Pacific ocean. It must be possible to assemble at one point if necessary, under one control, all the contributions of Australia, of New Zealand, the fleet in the China sea and the fleet in the East Indies. It must be possible to unite them, to direct them against a common enemy, and if necessary to scatter them again. To anchor a fleet unit on the Pacific coast may be as absolutely useless as if they were grounded on the rocks of Yarmouth. So, the leader of the Opposition does not get away from this question; he must meet this constitutional question even with his navy proposals, because he must decide how the fleet units of the Atlantic and the Pacific shall be subject to joint control which shall be the control of the fleet of the Empire.

Now, this permanent policy necessarily foreshadows a change in constitutional relationships. It is no new problem. It has been looming above the horizon for many years. It has been viewed by different public men in different ways. The leader of the Opposition has seen it; he has tried to evade it; he has tried to procrastinate in the consideration of it. The member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) the former Minister of Public Works, has seen it, and being a constitutional lawyer of repute has known what it meant and has cried out against the beginnings of it, because he felt it would end where he did not wish it to end; but the Prime Minister of to-day, who also sees it with equal clearness, sees it, accepts the responsibility of it, and glories in it as a working out of Canada's manifest destiny.

The other day we were treated to a eulogium of autonomy by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). He went back to 1763 and traced the history of Canada. Perhaps, following his illustrious example, I may be permitted to do something along the same line. Let me remind members of this House that this very day is the one hundred and twentieth birthday of the establishment of representative government in the old province of Quebec. One hundred and twenty years ago to-day, the first legislature assembled in the ancient city of Quebec to take the first step towards Canada's self-government. Canada's history of the last century has been a steady progress and a gradual development. In the early part of the century, our forefathers were anxious and active to gain for us the full degree of self-government. In the latter part of the century they have been especially busy in developing our natural resources. In both, they have been eminently successful. Autonomy, which was the slogan of the last century, has done its work, accomplished its purpose, and belongs to the last century. It does not belong to the Canada of to-day. For confirmation, let me make a few comparisons. The early governors of Canada thought it was their duty to impose upon Canadian citizens the British point of view. The later governors of Canada have felt it was their high office to point out to the citizens of the British Isles what was the Canadian point of view. You have only to compare Lord Durham and his understanding of his instructions, with Earl Grey and how he carried out his work here in Canada. Prior to the Union, the public lands were the property of the Crown, and were regulated from Downing Street; but since that time they have come into our hands, and the last Land Act has been disallowed that will ever be disallowed in Canada, for to-day every foot of soil from the 42nd parallel to the North Pole is under the undisputed control of the Canadian Parliament. Prior to 1843, the Judiciary was nominated by the representative of the British Crown in Canada, without necessary consultation with his responsible advisers. But, during the last portion of this century, judges have been named by the Governor in Council solely; and we have the Chief Justice, the highest judicial functionary in Canada enjoying the honour of also being a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest judicial body in the British Empire. In the early part of the century, prior to 1843, our tariff and customs laws were made for us by Downing Street. But, since the last ineffectual protest on the part of the Sheffield manufacturers in 1859, that Canadian tariffs were interfering with the free access of British goods into Canada, we have heard not one murmur to that effect. Between 1840 and 1850, Canada was garrisoned by British troops; and we have been told in this House that the amount of money spent by Britain upon the garrison exceeded the total revenue of Upper and Lower Canada for their own local purposes. But, by 1871, we had seen the last of the British regiments withdrawn; and when we took over Halifax and Esquimalt and assumed the defences of these two fortifications upon the Atlantic and the Pacific respectively, we felt that the whole question of land defence was under the control of the Dominion of Canada. Prior to 1868, when Great Britain made treaties, she included us and the other colonies, whether we liked it or not. Then came the day when we were permitted to assent or dissent, where treaties were made. The next step came when we were permitted to participate in the negotiation of treaties. And the final step came when our representatives, as fully endowed plenipotentiaries, were enabled to make trade treaties with the nations of the world as they saw fit.

While governors would not act upon the advice of their responsible advisers, while our lands, and tariffs and garrisons were regulated in Downing street; while our judiciary were appointed by men not responsible to the people although they had to be paid from local taxes;—while these things lasted, there was room and need to invoke the spirit for which the word 'autonomy' stands, and for pressing to the full our demand for local self-government. And all honour to those who, in those days, suffered that we might secure self-government, and who worked as pioneers to develop the resources of this great country. All honour to them! But the time has come when to push on still further along the line of autonomy means to push towards absolute independence of the British Empire; it means to set Canada up as a sovereign state; it means to step forward towards excessive individualism and separation. No, no. Autonomy was a good word for the last century. But it has done its work, a noble work of which all are proud. But the word of the twentieth century is 'co-partnership.'

The spirit of the Canadian constitution is full of this idea, the idea of a unit within a unit. We have the municipality making its own by-laws, collecting its own taxes, looking after its own local affairs, absolutely autonomous within its own sphere of action, although it lies within the province. Again, we have the province completely supreme in the matters which are relegated to its control, although it lies within the Dominion. And I say the day is coming when the Dominion will hold the same relation to the Empire that the province holds to the Dominion. Prior to 1865, there was great misgiving on the part of many leading French-Canadians as to whether it would be desirable that a federal union of the provinces should take place. Read the pre-Confederation debates, and you will see that many serious men felt that from the French-Canadian point of view such a step would be a mistake. But what have we? Have the French-Canadians of the province of Quebec lost one iota of the rights and privileges that they previously enjoyed? Not at all. The very reverse is true. They have entered into a larger and fuller life; they exert their influence throughout the whole Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific; they are an element of stability and permanence throughout all Canada. And every other province of Canada, re-acting upon the French-Canadians and pouring their life blood into our province, have regenerated, revivified, awakened the old province of Quebec. And the benefit has been decidedly mutual. And what has happened there we may expect to happen when Canada assumes fuller relationships with the other parts of the British Empire. We are not losing anything that we have or hold dear; we are gaining, we are getting more than we had. They who lose their lives shall save them, is a proposition true in this case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, permit me to point out to you the evidence on which I base my assertion that this idea of co-partnership is growing, extending, sweeping along with a flow that cannot be stayed. Within the memory of men sitting in this House to-day, the colonies of Great Britain were looked upon by responsible British statesmen as of very doubtful advantage. It was thought that, as ripe fruit, they would in time drop from the parent tree. It was a question as to whether it was worth while to keep them all. Now, mark the change of recent years. Queen Victoria, of blessed memory, was crowned Queen of Great Britain and Ireland; she subsequently was also called Empress of India. Under that title she lived, under that title she died. And when Edward VII was crowned her successor, he too, assumed that title. But, shortly after his accession, Lord Salisbury, after communicating with the self-governing dominions, proposed the Titles Act of 1902. That Act altered the title of the King. And those of us who were privileged, eighteen months ago, to be present in the Abbey, when our Sovereign was crowned, heard the Archbishop of Canterbury say, 'King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the seas; Defender of the Faith, and Emperor of India.'

Then, too, mark the development in the Colonial conference. In 1887, at the time of the Queen's Jubilee, it was merely an informal gathering of delegates. They took it for granted that it was Great Britain's duty to look after the defence of the Empire and other similar matters. They discussed merely matters of mutual trade. By 1897, this Imperial conference had reached the dignity of being called together by the Colonial Secretary and of being participated in by the prime ministers of the several self-governing colonies. At that time, the request for periodic and stated contributions was made. And it was rightly refused. We did not then, and we do not now, advocate stated and periodic contributions. By 1897, the constitution of the Imperial conference had crystallized in definite form. It sloughed off the word 'Colonial' and took on the word 'Imperial.' Instead of being called together merely from time to time, it was decided to call it together every four years and to hold subsidiary conferences when required. Where previously called together by the Colonial Secretary, it becomes a conference presided over by the British Prime Minister. And its constitution declares that this conference —to be called the Imperial conference is held every four years, at which questions of common interest may be discussed and considered as between His Majesty's Government and His Governments of the self-governing dominions beyond the seas.

Let us now take up the third indication of the tendency of the times, as evidenced in the Committee of Imperial Defence. Originally the Committee of Imperial Defence was a committee of the Cabinet. It absorbed the old Colonial Defence Committee, which became a sub-committee thereof. True, it is but an advisory body, but inasmuch as the leading ministers of the British Cabinet are members, and inasmuch as leading naval and military experts are called in, it is a very influential body, and occupies a very important position. The results arrived at are put into effect by the members of the ministry who form so large a part of the committee. Sir Frederick Borden was the first Canadian to attend a meeting of the Committee of Imperial Defence, in 1903. He was invited as a guest, for the consideration of only one question, and that a Canadian question, namely, the taking over of the defence of Halifax and Esquimalt. In 1909, if I am rightly informed, Sir Frederick Borden and Mr. Brodeur were present, again on invitation, and again dealing with Canadian questions. Let me now read what Mr. Asquith said in the British House of Commons on the 25th of July last in reference to the position the Committee of Imperial Defence had at that time attained:

Last year (1911) we had the pleasure of summoning to the committee—and they sat with us at the deliberations three days—the prime ministers of our self-governing dominions. I was in the chair myself, and I was the sixth prime minister; for there were five other prime ministers sitting around the table. I do not think there has ever been in the history of our Imperial development a more momentous, or, in many ways, a more significant occasion. Of course it is almost impossible to go into any detail in public as to what was done and said upon that occasion. We were all acting, naturally and properly, under the seal of confidence. There is no reason, however, why I should not indicate to the committee and the country generally an outline of our proceedings on that occasion. First of all we had a statement from my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the general course and direction of our British foreign policy. He spoke with the greatest frankness and freedom in the presence of these prime ministers of the various dominions of our relations with other powers, and disclosed to them with a candour, intimacy, and fullness, which would have been impossible in official or written communications, exactly what our relations were with each of the various European and other powers, and how far those relations affect, and must affect, our naval and military situation.

Imagine, if you can, the nature of the conference of last July, at which three Canadian representatives were present. But to continue:

This statement was followed by one equally full and frank, made by the then First Lord of the Admiralty, in regard to the naval policy, and finally a statement from the Secretary for War in regard to the military policy.

Leaving out a few words, I go on:

This year (1912) we had the privilege of having with us, not indeed the representatives of all the dominions, but a considerable representation from the Canadian Cabinet, including its distinguished Prime Minister, Mr. Borden. They have, at my invitation, attended a meeting of the Imperial Defence Committee more than a week ago, and again my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs spoke to them and to us all on our foreign policy, and the First Lord of the Admiralty on our naval situation; and I am glad to say that a further adjourned meeting, which we propose to have next week, Mr. Borden and his colleagues will again attend, and I hope we may arrive at conclusions satisfactory to them and to us. I do not think it is possible to exaggerate, in the necessarily loose and informal development of our constitutional arrangements as an Imperial power, the value of a body like this, which, from time to time gives the statesmen of the dominions and the statesmen of the mother country a meeting ground on which they can exchange with the fullest confidence their respective views, experiences and knowledge in regard to those matters which we growingly feel affect not only the Mother Country, but the dominions as much as ourselves.

We have corroborative expressions from Mr. Balfour also, along similar lines, which I have not at this moment time to read.

The Prime Minister has stated in this House that hereafter a member of the Cabinet over which he presides will be present for the greater part of the year at the meetings of the Imperial Defence Committee—not as a guest, but of right; not occasionally, but regularly; not called in only for the discussion of special Canadian subjects, but with every detail of the policy of the Empire in its relations with foreign nations open on the table before him. Could there be any more complete expression of the sentiment of co-partnership than that found in the proposed arrangement? Can we estimate its influence in Canada and in the motherland? The representative from Canada and those from the other self-governing dominions who sit from day to day in the Committee of Imperial Defence, will exercise, there is no doubt, a pacific influence. Canada, and the rest of the self-governing dominions do not wish to engage in any war of conquest; their whole influence will be towards the preservation of peace. Perhaps the time may come when England will find it possible to withdraw from some of those entangling European alliances which to-day threaten her peace because she has to be true to her allies. Is it not also possible that the representatives from the Overseas Dominions may be the means of preserving a permanent and continuous policy when governments in England change, and British representatives on this committee come and go? There is another consideration we should not forget, and it is this: that the member who belongs to the Committee of Imperial Defence as representing Canada will be the connecting link between the Government of the Empire and our own Canadian Government.

These three examples, I think, show conclusively that the tendency of the twentieth century is a tendency towards co-partnership. The sweep of the tide is too strong to be thrust back. One might as well try to check the waters of Niagara midway in their fall and push them back over the brink from which they have fallen as to endeavour to prevent Canada from proceeding along the course of her manifest destiny.

The third prerequisite is a peculiar one. It is a barrier of honour. There are some who do not consider that the pledges of politicians are expected to be carried out, but that is not the policy on this side of the House. One of the pre-election pledges of the Prime Minister was that before Canada entered upon her permanent naval policy the people of the country should have an opportunity to express their opinion upon it. The people, therefore, must be consulted, and this is the barrier of honour that stands in the way of putting this policy into immediate effect.

Such consultation in the present instance is unnecessary. The proposed contribution is for a specific and distinct purpose. It is to provide immediate and effective aid. When we have given it, when the amount has been paid as it will out of our super-abundant revenues, without adding a dollar to our debt, without any permanent interest charge, when it has been paid, our status will be exactly what it was before, it will not have been altered one whit. It is a free gift. We owe it to our self-respect, if to nothing else, to make it. There are no conditions, there are no obligations and our constitutional relationships will be exactly the same after that amount is paid. Consequently there is no necessity to consult the people on that phase of the question. If, however, as a natural consequence of this token of spirit on our part and of ability to do something that counts within the Empire, we are to become co-partners in defence, then there is a changed relationship, then the promise holds, then the people of Canada must have the proposition submitted to them and be permitted to pronounce themselves thereon. Only the other day our friends opposite pretended to welcome an opportunity to lay their propositions before the people. They will get their opportunity, they will have their opportunity when the permanent policy of this Government is placed in contrast with the permanent policy of my hon. friends opposite.

The Conservative policy as it is to-day before this House falls naturally into two parts, immediate and permanent policy. The gift that we make renders the heart of the Empire secure beyond peradventure. As to the permanent policy, that will be developed later. But the Prime Minister realizing that he is choosing not for to-day or for to-morrow, but for generations yet unborn is preparing to lay his foundations strong and deep. He realizes that certain obstacles must be removed, that certain prerequisite conditions must be arranged, that the question of our status within the Empire must be settled before that permanent policy comes into effect; and because he realizes the difficulties in the way and does not rush in, as fools do, where angels dare not tread, because he realizes the seriousness of the question he is taking the time necessary for the preparation of a policy which will outlive any of us in this House.

What is it, after all that binds together the Empire? Is it origin, race, language, religion? No, we differ on all these points. It is not that, it is the recognition that the British system of government is the best, the freest and the highest development of government that the world has ever seen. It is the determination that as far as we are concerned we want to see that system continued and maintained, because we believe our best development will go on under it. It is because we believe there are other races under the flag more backward than ours, struggling towards the light, who need this system of government, to come into the full stature of manhood as we have done. The Empire can only be preserved and maintained by supremacy on the sea. Supremacy on the sea demands common action. Common action is based on complete interchange of knowledge and that involves co-operation. Hence I consider the proposition submitted here that we are henceforth to have a member of this Cabinet as a permanent member on the Committee on Defence, the most important feature of the whole speech of the Prime Minister.

Frankly, freely, courageously, let us face the trend of events as they are and realize what they are. It is a great thing to be a Canadian. You are proud of it and so am I; but there is an even greater thing than being a Canadian, and that is to be a participating citizen of the British Empire.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I apprehend it will be generally conceded among most people, at any rate outside the walls of this Chamber, that it makes but little difference in regard to at least a large number of matters coming before this Parliament, which political party may happen to be in power. We often hear the expression in the country: Oh, there is no difference between you; it is only the ins and the outs; and I admit that I have in many instances some of that feeling myself. We are all Canadian citizens, all striving as best we can to work out the best destinies of this great Dominion and usually, as regards most of the business that comes before Parliament, so far as policy is concerned, there is very little difference between the political parties. But questions do arise and have arisen which are of prime importance and which mark a distinct line of cleavage between the political parties which stand like monuments planted along the pathway of Canada's political advancement showing clearly the bottom principles which divide the Liberal and Conservative parties in this country and which have divided them for one hundred years past. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ames) has given me an opportunity of perhaps referring to somewhat ancient history as he did himself, and I am delighted that he gave me that opportunity.

Without desiring to draw this question more strongly into the political arena than is absolutely necessary, I feel it necessary, as shortly as possible, to refer to some past matters which were mentioned by my hon. friend. There is one thing which I assert with confidence, backed up by the knowledge of every one who has read the speeches of public men in the past and the acts of various parliaments and legislatures: that is that since Canada has been Canada the Liberal party in Canada have stood for reforms which have made the bottom rock of our Canadian freedom. They stood for the extension of the franchise; for the decentralization of power and full local autonomy with absolute self-control over all local affairs; for the absolute control of the raising and spending of public moneys; and for the imposing of a tariff commensurate only with the needs of government. To each of those matters the Conservatives were in Opposition, except in one notable instance to which I will refer later on.

My hon. friend spoke of responsible government the building up of which in this country has been one of the great features of our history. But, Sir, it is to the Liberal party and to Liberal statesmen that we owe those liberties. Prior to 1838 we were governed by an executive council and a legislative council, appointed for life by the Crown through the Lieutenant Governors, and those gentlemen according to Bourinot in his Parliamentary Government, had exclusive control over the revenues, expenditures and taxation of the country. That became an intolerable state of affairs. The Liberals of that time fought against those principles, and in 1838, so far as Upper Canada at any rate was concerned, they succeeded in destroying the condition of affairs that existed then, and from that time until the present hour we have had responsible government in Canada.

The next great question was representation by population and extension of the franchise. The Liberals found that they were not being properly represented even in the legislative assemblies of those days, and they made a struggle to right matters; and they succeeded in righting matters against the strong opposition of the Conservatives of those days led by the then John A. Macdonald. That brought about Confederation, and, Sir, even in the confederation of this great country we found the Tory element of centralization trying to thrust itself to the front. My hon. friend (Mr. Ames) stated that a legislative union would have been intolerable, and every one knows now that it would have been intolerable; a confederation based on legislative union could not have lasted till now, could not have lasted even for twenty years, and yet it was a legislative union that Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservative party struggled for. George Brown and his associates determined to have a federal union giving to each of the various provinces of this Dominion exclusive autonomy and control of its own local affairs. These were the principles which actuated the Liberals and Conservatives of those days.

The next question of very considerable importance in Canada was what was known as the National Policy. That was a question of taxation. The Liberals always stood for a revenue commensurate with the needs of government. Alexander Mackenzie was Prime Minister of this country and the head of a Liberal Government, and every one knows that the manufacturers of Upper Canada at that time went to Mackenzie before they saw Sir John A. Macdonald, and suggested to him that he should put a protective tariff on imported manufactured goods. Had he consented to do so, the chances are that he would not have been driven out of power in 1878. But unyielding Liberal as he was, true to the principles which had actuated him throughout his life, he would not impose a tariff for the purposes of protection. He refused the request of the manufacturers; they went to Sir John A. Macdonald; he appealed to the country, and on that appeal he was sustained. That, Sir, in a modified form—because it was very considerably modified when the Liberals came into power in 1896, —has been the policy of the successive governments in this country since, and possibly in that modified form it may remain the policy of Governments for many years to come. It is true that the hon. leader of the present Government talked for some years about adequate protection, but so far we have not been able to discover what he meant by that term. Year after year he was closely examined by the then Minister of Customs, the hon. Mr. Paterson, but notwithstanding the most severe cross-examination, we never discovered what he meant by adequate protection, and we have not been able to discover its meaning yet, though he has been in power for the last two years.

Now we have got the present proposition, and I say that in this proposition the distinctive feature which has divided the Liberals from the Conservatives for the last 100 years, is in existence. Cover it up how they may, the cloven hoof of the old family compact still shows up in this resolution. What is the proposition? To give $35,000,000 for the building of three dreadnoughts for the British Admiralty. The great Napoleon once said, 'If you scratch a Russian, you will find a Tartar.' Well, Sir, I think that if you scratch a Liberal-Conservative of to-day you will find a Tory of a hundred years ago, and the same political principle, the same desire as far as to get control of the government out of the hands of the people and to centre it in the hands of what we might call an oligarchy.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. LESPERANCE moved second reading of Bill No. 20, respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Explain.

Mr. LESPERANCE : This Bill is for the purpose of increasing the capital stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.

Mr. GERMAN.

Mr. GRAHAM : What is the increase ?

Mr. LESPERANCE : Five million dollars, from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000.

Mr. CARVELL : Mr. Speaker, this Bill has been called a number of times during the last two or three weeks, and we have asked to have it stand for explanation by the hon. member who is promoting it. The hon. gentleman is here to-night and I think he is not treating the House with the courtesy to which it is entitled in practically failing or refusing to give it any explanation. I do not know that this House objects to any company increasing its capital stock to that amount so long as it is a proper increase and the money is being provided for a proper purpose. I do not say that it is not the intention of this company to expend the money for a proper purpose. I find that the present capital stock of this company is $10,000,000, and that it is proposed by this Bill that it shall be increased fifty per cent, or to $15,000,000. That is all right if the money is going to be used in connection with the legitimate enterprise of the company. But, what I cannot understand and what I think this House should have some explanation upon is clause 2 of the Bill, which provides that:

> The company may invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may seem expedient.

The evident intention—there is not only an intention but there is practically the statement in the Bill itself—is that all the money which will be received from this increase of stock is not to be used for the benefit of the undertaking itself. It says that the money not immediately required may be used as may seem expedient. If my hon. friend were coming here and asking for an increase in bonding powers I could then understand that it might be necessary to grant those powers with respect to a lump sum. It might be necessary to issue and sell bonds at one time because they could be sold to better advantage, and if anything remained which was not immediately required for the purpose of the company, the balance might be carried over and used in some other way so that the company might not be under the necessity of carrying idle capital. But, this is not a proposition to increase the bonding powers; this is a proposition to increase the capital stock of the company, and the company does not have to sell all the capital stock. It only has to sell the amount of stock which is necessary to carry on the undertaking. It seems to me that we must come to the irresistible conclusion that it is the intention of this company, or of the promoters of this legislation, to use a portion at least of this $5,000,000 for some purpose other than the legitimate business of the company. It is on that ground that I was objecting to it, it is on that ground that many hon. gentlemen object to it, and it is on that ground that we ask for an explanation from the promoter, or some other gentleman, as to the real intention of those who are behind this legislation.

Mr. LANCASTER: Mr. Speaker, I agree to a great extent with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, but it occurs to me that we are rather wasting time. If this Bill has to go to one of the select committees I think that would be the proper place to put into operation whatever may be necessary with regard to protecting the people in view of what has been said by the hon. gentleman. I do not think that, on the second reading of a private Bill, we are in the habit of undertaking to, so to speak, lick it into shape, but I rather think that we usually do that in the select committee. This Bill will go to one of the select committees and that will be the proper place to scrutinize the Bill and to take any precautions that may be found necessary, having regard to what my hon. friend has just said; and it has to come up here afterwards before the third reading anyway.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not pretend to object to this Bill. I think that probably it is a very proper Bill but when there is any question at all about it there should be a fuller explanation than that which the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill has given us. The hon. member perhaps has not studied the Bill or he may not be in a position at the present moment to give us a full explanation. If not, I think he should allow it to stand so that we may get an explanation on another occasion because it is desirable that hon. gentlemen who are not members of the committee to which it will be referred may have an opportunity of understanding what its provisions are.

Mr. LANCASTER: It has to come back to this House from the committee to which it is referred.

Mr. LESPERANCE: The increase in the capital stock is to provide for new equipment, boats, and terminals. It will be used progressively as the necessities of the company may require. As to clause 2, the charter of the company at the present time does not allow it to use its spare funds, and as the company has no traffic to care for in the winter time, its spare funds would then lie idle and it is not desirable that it should be under the necessity of losing interest on this money. As the clause will go before the Railway Committee it can be put in such shape as will satisfy my hon. friend. I can assure my hon. friend that the only intention of this provision is that the company shall not lose interest on the spare funds that it may have on its hands.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a second time.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

Mr. MACDONELL moved the second reading of Bill No. 30, to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters and to change its name to the Independent Order of Foresters.

Mr. GRAHAM: Explain.

Mr. MACDONELL: This Bill is very simple. Its primary object is to change the name of this well-known organization and to consolidate and amend the Acts under which it is incorporated and the amending Acts. I see its original incorporation took place by Act of this House in 1889. Since then it has had various amendments, and this Bill is designed to consolidate, revise, and amend the laws governing this organization; to provide for certain by-laws for its future government; and also to make provision for various other matters, such as the holding of real estate, the relationship between the supreme court and subordinate lodges, the liability of the branches, the investment powers of the supreme court and of the subordinate branches, and various other matters. The Bill further provides that the company shall come under the Insurance Act, and be under the jurisdiction of the Superintendent of Insurance and the Insurance Department. A schedule is attached providing for certain by-laws and other regulations for the future government of the organization.

Mr. GRAHAM: Anything about the rates?

Mr. MACDONELL: No, there is nothing in particular about the rates, except as regards the means of ascertaining the rates. The by-laws and regulations cover them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no objection to the Bill; but I think that with organizations of this kind, we ought to be very careful as regards legislation. Most of us have had experience with fraternal societies, and our difficulty has always been to have the membership at the annual meetings agree as to a rate sufficient to meet the liabilities as they occur. In any legislation or any amendment that is proposed, I think we ought to keep in view the fact that we should not loosen the reins at all; but we should, if anything, draw them a little tighter, so that there may be no chance in the future of any of these organizations failing, owing to unwilling-ness of members to pay the amounts requisite to keep all the certificates in good standing. I just throw out this hint, as I have had some experience as regards fraternal societies. I would urge upon the committee when this Bill comes to be considered, to watch closely that nothing is contained in any of the amendments that will in any way loosen the restrictions providing that sufficient funds shall be on hand to protect the widows and orphans, when they come to need that protection.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was making the suggestion that the present proposition of the Government embodies a principle, which has marked a distinct line of cleavage between the Liberal party and the Conservative party for very many years past, and that it is the absolute right of Canada to control its own financial affairs, to have full control over all the money which is raised from the people of Canada, no matter to what purpose that money may be devoted. This Bill encroaches upon that principle. The right hon. the leader of the Government says in answer to that: Oh, but the Bill says that the money shall be spent under the direction of the Governor in Council, in the construction and equipment of battleships. I know that the Bill says that; but it also says that the battleships, which are built with Canadian money, are to be handed over to the British Admiralty, and to be absolutely under the control of the British Admiralty. I doubt very much that even the wording of the Bill will solve the problem as against the proposition which I have suggested. I saw in the Citizen today a very significant statement made by the leader of the Conservative party in the British House of Commons, Mr. Bonar Law. What does he say? The article shows that the very instant a man begins to go downwards in a wrong path, he finds plenty of people ready to push him along. The leader of the Conservative party in England is beginning at once to push Mr. Borden along the path of centralization of power, and the control of our funds by another power outside of ourselves. It seems to me that what he says is pregnant with meaning. Speaking of this very proposition, he says:

> If the whole Empire is ever to become in reality as well as in name, a united empire and a united nation, it can do so in one way only, by the establishment of a real federal system by the United Kingdom and our colonies, in proportion to their population contributing to the defence of the Empire, and sharing in the glory of governing the Empire.

If that means anything, it means a principle of continual contribution by Canada to the British Government. That is the principle which is evolved at once in the English Tory mind, by reason of the proposition which is put up by the Tory Government in Canada, that we shall from now on make periodical appropriations towards the maintenance of the British navy. We Liberals in Canada do not take a second place with the Tories in Canada or Britain in our loyalty to the Empire. Many of us are descended from men who gave up their homes in the United States, and came to Canada to maintain their British citizenship; and we do not have to make excuses in Canada for our loyalty or for any statements we make in regard to the business affairs of Canada. We stand as Imperialists for one people, one flag and one Empire, but within that Empire, and beneath the folds of that flag, we will work out our own destiny as a Canadian nation, as best suits our own interests and our own advantage. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Give money to England—thirty-five millions of dollars. In the name of all that is sensible, why? England has not asked for it. England does not want it; she certainly does not need it. Then why should we give it? There has been no reason given by any hon. member who has spoken on this subject from the Government benches. There is a complete absence of argument in favour of the proposition. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), who so eloquently addressed the House, but very shortly, this afternoon, produced no argument—absolutely no argument in favour of it. And there has been no argument put forward—nothing that could be dignified by the name of argument—in support of the proposal. It is simply, and solely, and only sentimental—nothing else but pure sentiment. Sentiment is a very good thing. But we do not want all sentiment. It is the same old story which Tories have put up from time immemorial—'The old flag and an appropriation.' But they do say—and perhaps I was a little hasty in declaring that there was no argument—it was said by the hon. member from St. Antoine: See what you are going to get. Give thirty million dollars to Great Britain to build three dreadnoughts, and you will have a Minister of the Crown from Canada on the Defence Committee of Great Britain. That is the only reason that is given. And that is the bargain the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) is trying to make. They always want a bargain. They wanted a bargain on the question of preference for Great Britain when it was introduced by the late Government. They said: It is all right to give a preference to Great Britain, but you must not give them a preference unless they do something for you. And now they say to Great Britain: We will give you the money to build three dreadnoughts, but, if we do this, you must give us the right to have a Tory Minister of the Crown sitting on the Defence Committee. Let us see what Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, said about that only yesterday:

London, Dec. 17.—In the House of Commons last night Keir Hardie asked the Premier why the House of Commons was being committed to a policy which had been communicated to the head of the Canadian Government and of which this House was ignorant.

Rt. Hon. Mr. Asquith replied that His Majesty's Government was not committed to any policy.

Mr. Hardie asked if the three Canadian battleships would entail an addition to the naval estimates for their manning and maintenance, and whether one of the conditions of the loan of the ships was that Canada should have a seat on the Committee on Imperial Defence.

The Prime Minister said he deprecated any discussion of these matters until the debates of the Dominion Parliament had been concluded. He might repeat, however, that the offer of representation on the Committee of Imperial Defence was made to the dominions last year by His Majesty's Government before any question had arisen as to the present proposals.

Where, then, is there consideration for this grant of thirty-five million dollars? The only argument they have put forward is: We shall have a minister on the Imperial Defence Committee. And last year, the Prime Minister of England offered to the then Prime Minister of Canada a seat on that Imperial Defence Committee without any proposition of dreadnoughts or any contribution. One would suppose that we should hear no more of that suggestion of a consideration for giving this thirty-five million dollars to Great Britain.

But, Sir, the Prime Minister tells us that the situation is exceedingly grave and requires that immediate financial aid be given. Who believes it? I do not think he believes it himself. Is there a man living to-day who believes that there will be a war between Germany and England? Here are two nations which, for hundreds of years, have not only practised, but disseminated the religion which teaches peace on earth and good-will towards men. What has become of our boasted civilization? Where are the beneficial effects of that religion? Sir, if these two great nations, in this twentieth century, are to fly at each other's throats and to let loose the dogs of war, one would be inclined to say that their Christianity is a farce and their civilization a failure. I do not believe it. No man believes it. English statesmen do not believe it, and the leading English statesmen so declare. On July 10 last, Sir Edward Grey, speaking in the House of Commons, said:

Our relations with the German Government at the present moment are excellent. We are perfectly frank with each other about all questions of mutual interest, and I believe that when questions come up, whether they be for instance, in connection with our respective interests in South Africa, or whether they be in connection eventually with the Baghdad railway, both governments are convinced that their mutual interests can be perfectly reconciled.

And about the same time—in the same month, certainly,—Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking in the House of Commons, said:

Our relations with the great German Empire are, I am glad to say, at this moment—and I feel sure are likely to remain—relations of amity and goodwill. My noble friend, Lord Haldane, the present Lord Chancellor, paid a visit to Berlin early in the year. He entered upon conversations and an interchange of views there which have been continued since in a spirit of perfect frankness and friendship, both on one side or the other, and in which I am glad to say we now have the advantage of participation of a very distinguished diplomatist in the person of the German Ambassador.

And Mr. Bonar Law said:

But in spite of all that has been said, does the country—do the House of Commons, do any of us, really believe that there is danger and vital danger? I confess that I have the greatest difficulty in believing it myself.

What more need be said of the matter? From remarks made by some hon. gentlemen opposite, one would believe that Great Britain was on her knees—that the poor old lady was drooping to decay, that her financial condition was deplorable, that she must have some assistance from Canada. The hon. member for St. Antoine, this afternoon, said: 'The gift we give makes the Empire perfectly secure.' No question about it—not a doubt about it! Thirty-five millions is to secure the Empire from all peril! What are the facts? Great Britain is a country whose total wealth approximates sixteen billions of pounds, and whose income is two billions of pounds or over.

In the last nine years, according to the British Naval Annual, edited by Viscount Hythe, Great Britain has expended on her navy the sum of £365,000,000, and in the year 1912-13 has appropriated £45,000,000, making a total of over £400,000,000. During the same length of time, she has spent on her army more than half as much, making a total expenditure on army and navy in nine years of about £600,000,000. Hon.

gentlemen may say: We must come to her aid with $35,000,000 that burden is so teriffic. But it must be remembered that England has paid that enormous amount of money out of her revenues, and during that period has not only paid that money, and carried out all the laws in regard to the relief of the poor, and other public interests, but has reduced her public debt to the extent of £65,000,000. But this Government says: 'Oh you poor unfortunate old England! Out of your revenues you can spend on your army and navy £600,000,000 in nine years, and you can reduce your national debt by £65,000,000, but we must give you $35,000,000 or you will go to ruin, and the Germans 'will get you if you don't watch out'. That is too absurd for discussion. Sir, these figures make one pause in wonder and amazement in realizing that this little sea-girt isle has such gigantic financial possibilities. And why is this so? One of the reasons is that some two hundred years ago she captured Canada from the French, and has since held Canada as one of the great assets of the British Crown. She has, in her great scheme of world-wide colonization, obtained possessions in every sea. She owns to-day half the mercantile tonnage of the world; she is the commercial toll-gate of all nations, taking toll from nearly every dollar's worth of commerce carried on the ocean. That is why she is to-day such a gigantic financial possibility. Hon. gentlemen say: 'Oh, we must give her money', because forsooth, as stated by the hon. member for Brandon yesterday Canada could never exist were it not for British protection. I know not whether the hon. gentleman referred to a physical or a political existence—possibly he thought he might not have existed were it not for English protection. Sir, England became possessed of Canada 200 years ago because the acquirement of this country was a business transaction. She wanted Canada as an asset to the British Crown; she has held it as such until the present day, and now Canada is one of the best assets England has—a country embracing a larger territory than the United States, capable of accommodating 60, aye, one hundred million people; loyal to the British Crown and the British Empire; ever ready to stand by Great Britain in time of trouble, but ever striving to build up Canada and make her a nation, in the accomplishing of which she is doing what is best for the Empire as a whole.

Let me cite an illustration in connection with this gift to England. It is said that the hon. member for West Toronto (Sir Edmund Osler) is a very wealthy man, and I do not doubt that he is. Supposing I went to the hon. gentleman and said: You are engaged in very extensive and profitable commercial transactions, but your financial position is very grave, and you need assistance. There is a man down street, Mr. Burlowitz, who borrows money from you continually, but is going to give you a great deal of trouble. Lend me $3,500, and I will place it in the bank to your credit, thus saving you from absolute financial destruction.' Hon gentlemen may think this statement too far fetched, but is it too far fetched to be within the range of reasonable comparison with the proposition the Prime Minister has put before us? I think not.

England does not need money; does she need ships? Mr. Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, has been referred to in this debate, and I also intend to place him on the witness stand. Here is the statement of Mr. Churchill in regard to shipbuilding in England. Between April 1, 1911, and March 31, 1912, the following ships were completed and have become available for service: 4 armoured ships, 4 protected cruisers, 2 unarmoured cruisers, 20 destroyers, 5 submarines and 4 miscellaneous ships; 39 in all. On April 1, 1912, there were under construction, 10 battleships, 6 battle cruisers, 8 second-class protected cruisers, 2 unarmoured cruisers, 31 torpedo boat destroyers, 15 submarines, and 2 river gunboats, 74 in all. As 6 of these ships were for Australia and New Zealand, the total number of ships for the British Admiralty is therefore 68, and the total number of ships constructed and under construction between the 1st of April, 1911, and the 1st of April, 1912, was 107.

Let us now note Mr. Churchill's statement regarding the naval situation in general. In introducing the naval estimates on the 18th of March last, he said:

> I propose, with the permission of the House, to lay bare to them this afternoon with perfect openness, the naval situation. It is necessary to do so mainly with reference to one power. I regret that necessity, but nothing is to be gained by using indirect modes of expression.

Now, Sir, what do we find?

> We possess more dreadnoughts than any other two powers in the world to-day and if all the dreadnoughts in the world were sunk to-night our naval superiority would be greater than it is at the present time. We cannot imagine the course of a naval war which would tend steadily to increase the relative fighting value of the large resources we possess in pre-dreadnoughts, until, as time went on, quite old vessels would come out and play an important part. We therefore keep such vessels carefully in a material reserve and arrangements are being perfected by the war-staff to bring them into commission at the sixth, ninth, or twelfth month of any war. All this must be considered in judging the standards of new construction which are appropriate to our needs.

* * * * * *

Having reviewed our existing naval resources in the light of the foregoing observations, we are not prepared to recommend at the present time the two keels to one standard in new construction against Germany. The time may come when that may be necessary, but it is not necessary now. I will, however, state precisely the standard which we regard as appropriate to the present situation. Before doing so I would like to make it clear that, as a result of the measures taken by my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, there is no cause whatever for alarm or despondency. The Admiralty are prepared to guarantee absolutely the main security of the country and of the Empire day by day for the next few years, and if the House will grant us what we ask for the future that prospect may be indefinitely extended.

He further says :

Lastly, the House is entitled to be relieved of any anxiety which members may feel in regard to the expensive power of the shipbuilding resources of the country. It is not possible to say whether our most prominent competitors can build as fast as we do. What is certain is that they do not, in practice, do so, and it is also true, I am pleased to say, that we can build, arm and equip great ships each year and we can continue that process year after year upon a scale largely in advance of any other single power, according to its present resources. The House may take it for certain that there is absolutely no danger of our being overtaken unless we decide as a matter of policy to do so.

And further :

We have faced combinations over and over again in the past, and sometimes heavy odds, but we must never conduct our affairs so that the navy of any single power would be able to engage us at any single moment—even our least favourable moment—with any reasonable prospect of success. If this is 'insular arrogance' it is also the first condition of our existence! I am glad to be able to assure the House that no difficulty will be experienced in making arrangements to maintain our relative position in the near future, and to secure as quickly as we need them adequate margins of safety. I am glad also that these measures will not involve any excessive disproportionate expense.

In the light of that how can any man say that England needs gun-ships ? As I stated before it is too absurd for even an attempted argument. They do not need the ships. Now do they want them ? Let us see what Mr. Winston Churchill says about that problem. I might here refer to what was said by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) a few nights ago, condemning the policy of the late Government on the ground that if they began to build the ships, these ships would be obsolete before they were completed; he meant that as an argument against the late Government's policy of beginning to build ships under the tenders on which they were intending to base a contract. What does Mr. Churchill say about this question of ships ?

My third observation is this,—it is wrong and wasteful to build a single ship for the navy before it is wanted. Up to the moment when the contract for a battleship has been definitely signed, the vessel is the heir to all the expanding naval science of the world; but from the day when the design has been finally fixed she is obsolescent. She has become a wasting security. Nearly three years of her brief life have been lived before she is born. Before she is even launched the vessels which are capable of destroying her have been projected. It is an ill service to the navy and to the state to build a single ship before its time. We have to sow each year for the harvest we require two years later, as such as we require and no more. What I might venture to call the 'more the merrier' argument is as detrimental to efficiency as to economy. The only safe rule which the British Admiralty can follow is to maintain the minimum consistent with full security.

This Government is proposing to build three dreadnoughts which the British Admiralty do not want. Mr. Churchill says they do not want them, he has looked at the situation from every point of view and these gentlemen must say either that Mr. Churchill is deceiving the King and the Parliament of Great Britain or else that he knows what he is talking about. He says they do not want them, that it is practically a crime to build them before they are wanted, and yet this Government propose to build three dreadnoughts with the money of the people of Canada, and before they are completed, vessels will be projected capable of destroying them. That is what Mr. Churchill says. What more does he say on that very subject ?

Upon the establishment of ships maintained in full commission and upon the number of active service ratings actually permanently available depends our immediate readiness for war. . . There is a considerable difference between the number of ships available any day, taken at random throughout the year and by chance and the number that could be got ready for a particular date or period marked out in advance. For instance, if the House of Commons sent a committee down to Portsmouth to-night and orders were given to mobilize all the ships in the harbour, we could produce a certain number. If, however, we were told privately beforehand that the committee were going down to see how many ships we could turn out at short notice, say on April 1 or May 1, we could produce from 25 per cent to 35 per cent more. That is a very important fact which any one can appreciate. It is a fact which makes it necessary for us to have a sufficient margin to be able to meet at any moment the naval force of an attacking power at their selected moment.

So you will see he is taking every possible contingency into consideration.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): When did he say that?

Mr. GERMAN: On the 18th of March, 1912, in introducing the navy estimates to the British House of Commons. Having taken all these things into consideration he comes to the question of maintenance. It will be remembered that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, in proposing his amendment, said: You are building dreadnoughts, but you are sending them to England unmanned, England to man them and England to maintain them, and the policy of the Liberal party is to build our ships, maintain our ships and man our ships. Now, Sir, what does he say about maintenance?

The second observation which I would wish to make is this—it is very easy to make rapid increase in new construction so long as you are not burdened with the expense of maintaining a great establishment. Our German neighbours have not yet begun to feel the weight of maintaining year by year a gigantic naval service. These charges mature slowly but remorselessly. The expenses of maintenance apart from new construction must grow irresistibly with every year, and therefore it may be found that as time passes the very rapid rate of new construction which we have seen elsewhere may to some extent be abated by the dead weight drag of increasing maintenance charges.

That, Sir, is what the Government is forcing on Great Britain to-day, the dead weight drag of increasing maintenance charges. The right hon. the Prime Minister says we are going to add to your dead weight charges three dreadnoughts which you do not want, but we shall impose on you the whole cost of maintaining those dreadnoughts which Mr. Winston Churchill says are a dead weight drag upon any country that has to maintain them. What more need be said in regard to that matter? As I have already stated, it is nothing but sentiment. There is no argument in its favour. Those gentlemen love to wear their loyalty on their sleeves, ever in view, but never useful.

Now, Sir, what have we got as an alternative to that proposition? I do not think that any one can or will say soberly and fairly and honestly that England needs money or ships or assistance from Canada. The contention is that we are going to build ships in Canada. They say we will give $35,000,000 now. This is a make shift policy, it is not a permanent policy. Well, evidently Mr. Bonar Law and the Tories in England are trying to make a permanent policy, and if those people get into power it will be a permanent policy before long. They say we cannot build ships or establish a navy in Canada for 25 or 30 years. That was the remark of the right hon. the leader of the Government. I say that that is an insult to the business ability, energy, and intelligence of the people of Canada. It is not all dreadnoughts that they want over there; they want cruisers as well as dreadnoughts. The editor of this book from which I have quoted, Viscount Hythe, says:

In the cruiser classes we have a large superiority, but hardly so great as is required for the protection of the enormous interests we have at stake on the sea. For the protection of commerce, more second-class cruisers are required.

Let us build the second-class cruisers; let them build the dreadnoughts. $35,000,000 spent on cruisers would be just as valuable to Great Britain as $35,000,000 spent on dreadnoughts. She needs cruisers; she is building cruisers continually. She is building cruisers to-day, and she is spending not $35,000,000, but $135,000,000 on cruisers. Let us build the cruisers which we can build, and let her build the dreadnoughts. I do not see any difficulty in that problem. The right hon. the leader of the Government says,—Oh, some time in the dim and distant future, we will get the British Admiralty to build coal-hookers, or oil-tank boats over here. Why, they are building them here now. We do not need the British Admiralty to come over here to build them. He says he will get the British Admiralty to come over here, and he will pay part of the expense. That is another of the great considerations offered. There are two considerations, first, that he, or one of his colleagues, is to have a seat on the Defence Committee. That was promised to Sir Wilfrid Laurier a year ago without any suggestion of a navy donation. The second is that the British Admiralty shall come over here and build a few coal-hookers or oil tanks. Sir, as I have already said, we are building those ships here now, but if we cannot build them, or establish a navy in twenty-five years, are we going to complete the operation sooner by delaying it at the beginning? Shall we begin now? The Conservative policy is, we will give $35,000,000 to England, and we shall postpone for an indefinite period a permanent policy of establishing a Canadian navy. The Liberal policy is, use the $35,000,000 in Canada, establish now a Canadian shipbuilding yard, and begin now to build a navy for Canada which will be a part and parcel of the British navy in time of war.

I have said there was nothing in this but sentiment, and there is nothing in it but sentiment. But the sentiment of hon. gentlemen opposite goes into divergent fields. They have a sentimental idea of giving $35,000,000 to England. They have another sentimental idea. They say, oh we don't need ships to protect Canada's shores forsooth, because the shores of Canada are fully protected under that great American doctrine, the Monroe doctrine—truly a lovely sentiment for those high-flying Tories to entertain, that Canada must remain under the protection and only under the protection of an effete doctrine suggested by a President of the United States fifty years ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. GERMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). We say that we can build the ships in Canada, and we believe that now is the time to begin.

It was contended by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the late Government in the first place did not want to carry out the policy which was placed on the statute book by them, that they had an opportunity to carry it out and to sign the contracts, but that they failed to do so. I do not care as a matter of argument whether they wanted to carry it out or not. As a matter of argument, the question is, can we in Canada establish a shipyard and build naval ships suitable for a Canadian navy or for the British navy. That is the question and the sole question, and I say we can do so, and the Canadian people feel that they can do so. The Canadian people are willing to begin now, and the Canadian people prefer to use their own money in that way rather than to send it to England, not to aid England but absolutely throw it away. You are foisting on England something that she does not require, and something she does not want.

Now, the right hon. the Prime Minister says that when he has got his permanent policy he will appeal to the people of Canada, but we know not when that will be. We have propounded a permanent policy. He has got a makeshift policy. Let him go to the country on his proposal to appropriate $35,000,000. It is no small sum of money. They say, we can take it out of our surplus. It is owing to the fact that we had a Liberal Government in power for fifteen years that we have a surplus. We can take it out of our surplus, but every one knows that we are borrowing the money, and if we take it out of the surplus to-day we will borrow the money to-morrow. Let him go to the country and he will get his answer promptly and emphatically, that the overwhelming majority of the people of Canada stand for a navy built and maintained in Canada, for a fleet unit on the Atlantic and on the Pacific oceans, manned by intelligent young Canadians, ever ready on all occasions to go forth when duty calls and give loyal, courageous and effective aid in maintaining the supremacy of the British flag on every ocean of the world.

Mr. O. J. WILCOX (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) prefaced his remarks by saying that there was no difference between the two political parties in Canada. I thought that he was going to take upon himself the attitude of a statesman, and that his address could only possibly be surpassed in quality and character by that of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) himself. But, he did not go far until he fell into the political swim with most of the other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have spoken in this debate. I was not surprised at the attitude which my hon. friend took as he rose in this House and told them all the great things which, in his opinion, the Liberal party had accomplished in the last hundred years. There were, however, a great many things that my hon. friend might have told us the Liberal party did not do in that time. But, when he proclaims himself an ardent Liberal and a supporter of my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and when he can go down to his constituency, jump upon the Tory horse of anti-reciprocity and get elected without a contest, he certainly is taking upon himself the attitude of a politician. I am not going to follow my hon. friend in detail, but when he seeks to minimize what the great Conservative party has accomplished in this country, let me point out to him that there are a few epochal periods in the history of this country which I must draw to the attention of my hon. friend. In the year 1878, the industrial life of this young country was born, an interest in which there is to-day $2,000,000,000 invested, in which there are 800,000 pairs of Canadian hands engaged and drawing $400,000,000 in wages, and that this great interest exported to the nations of the world last year over $1,000,000,000 worth of manufactured products. It is that great interest which has developed our magnificent home market and which has permitted me as a Canadian farmer to stand up in this country and say that I am proud of the land in which I live. I ask you, Sir, where would have been that great interest if the Liberal party had had their way in 1878?

Let me refer to what I consider to be another epochal period in the history of this country. In 1882 and 1883 a great line of railway was launched by that distinguished statesman, Sir John A. Macdonald, and as a result a double line of steel extends from Montreal around the north shore of lake Superior, through the virgin prairies of the West, over the Rocky mountains and down to the blue waters of the Pacific ocean. That great railway has opened up our splendid heritage in the western part of Canada and has given to us the life and prosperity which we enjoy at this present hour. I ask you where would that railway have been if the policy of the Liberal party had prevailed?

Let me point out to my hon. friend from Welland what I consider to be another epochal period in the history of this country. In 1891 when the battle of British connection was fought in Canada, when our friends went through the length and breadth of this land declaring in favour of the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, which the Hon. Edward Blake subsequently declared meant commercial union with the United States, where would have been our British connection, if the Liberal party had succeeded? Another great epochal period to which I may refer in this connection was on the 21st September, 1911, when the battle of the fiscal independence of Canada was fought. I do not intend to refer to my hon. friend's speech at greater length. I have learned that it is not the part of good sportsmanship to waste your ammunition on a fox when there is bigger game in sight.

As a layman, I should have in all probability refrained from offering any argument in support of the resolution introduced in this House by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, purporting to deal with the great question of Imperial Defence, had it not been for the fact that the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals , who I understand, and I say it as courteously as I can, is recognized as the Moses, the political Moses of the Liberal party in Ontario, with higher aspirations and ambitions, of course, charged the hon. member for North Essex with bowing down to false gods in respect of a certain amendment or amendments introduced in the years 1910 and 1911. Our friends opposite take up a good deal of time in making various references to the contingent occupying seats upon the Government side of this House from the grand old sister province of Quebec. Let me say to them that as an Englishman—I am not all English, I am part Irish—that I have been most intimately connected with my hon. friends from the province of Quebec; and I declare from my seat in this House that there are no more loyal or more patriotic members in this House than they, and that they are a credit to the province from which they come and an honour to the country in which they live. My hon. friends opposite are past grand masters in the art of the political game, and they are seeking with all their eloquence—some of it, God knows, not very eloquent—and with all the force of argument, to make it appear in the province of Ontario that the Liberal-Conservative party in Canada is linked up here in Ottawa with some kind of a disloyal class. Let me repudiate that statement of those in the Opposition. Let me invite them to adopt, in the discussions of public questions in this country, the method that is pursued by the hon. gentleman who leads this Government. Let them discuss those great questions, with which the future interest of this country and of the Empire in which we live is identified, upon their merits, and not get down into the mire of partisan politics. I am inclined to the view that the conditions which surrounded my entering public life as a layman are more unique than those of any other man that I know of in this House. When I came to Ottawa to represent a great and a free constituency in this country, the paramount thought that I had in my mind was to give my best to the constituency that I served and the country in which I lived. In what little part I may have taken in the debates of this House and in the votes which I gave upon the various questions which came before me for consideration, notwithstanding that my parliamentary experience had been greatly limited, and my patient constituency might, under the circumstances in which I was placed at that particular time, have excused any errors that I might have made, I was so able to speak and to vote that when I went back to my constituency on the 21st of September, 1911, my majority was increased more than two to one, whereas my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals lost his own election. Therefore, I think my hon. friend should not stand in a glass house and throw stones. He said that I and others from the province of Ontario had associated ourselves with a despised class in this country. I say to him, as courteously as I can again, for I do not feel at all bitter, because I am beginning to understand the game of my hon. friend opposite, that I do not think that a man, called upon to represent an independent constituency in this country, has yet risen to that dignity of manhood where we would expect him to be, who would throw a charge of that character across the floor of this House. On December 15, 1910, when he addressed this House rather flippantly, eloquently in some respects, and my hon. friends opposite were rattling the tambourines and pounding the cymbals politically, he made, in my opinion, a rather significant statement, in view of the allegation which he had made previously. It was this:

For years I had been considering as a journalist the duty of the press and the people of Canada on this question of adding to the naval defence of the Empire.

A portion of the press contended that we were niggardly; we were not performing our duty; we were not proceeding with enough expedition. I for years had taken the ground that, up to the time of writing, at least, the greatest benefit we could confer upon the British Empire was the development of our own resources.

I ask hon. members to remember that statement, in view of subsequent remarks which I intend here to make. Then he goes on to say that when he listened to the able and eloquent address of the Hon. George E. Foster, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce—'without exception one of the most eloquent addresses ever heard in a deliberative body'—I am quoting his own words—he came to the conclusion that it was time that Canada should take another step and take some part in Imperial defence. Mr. Speaker, there has been a conversion here. Previous to the 29th of March, 1909, my hon. friend did not have that view. But upon listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, shall I say the genial light and warmth of the doctrine of Imperial defence dawned upon him, the scales fell from his eyes, and immediately he went forth proclaiming a new gospel. I think I may offer to the Hon. George E. Foster my sincere congratulations, in that, after a life of honest toil and conscientious work in the Parliament of Canada, in his declining years he has been able to bring to the penitent bench such a hardened sinner as my hon. friend from South Renfrew. Let me quote this sentence again:

For years I had been considering, as a journalist, the duty of the press and the people of Canada on the question of aiding in the naval defence of the Empire. A portion of the press contended that we were niggardly; we were not performing our duty; we were not proceeding with enough expedition. I for years had taken the ground that up to the time of writing, at least, the greatest benefit we could confer upon the British Empire was the development of our own resources.

I ask you, are not these the views, practically word for word, of Henri Bourassa? I ask you if that is not the situation we find to-day in the Liberal party in this country? That which they charge against our colleagues is that which is paramount in their own ranks, and prevents them from doing their whole duty to this great British Empire.

I wish to make some explanation of the amendments to which my hon. friend referred. But before doing so, permit me to say that these two amendments are the absolute justification of the vote that I gave against the policies introduced in Bill No. 95 of the session of 1910, a policy which they themselves have discarded. It is an admission that the name which was given to the navy authorized under the provisions of Bill No. 95 was justified—it was truly a 'Tin-pot navy.' The first amendment to which my hon. friend referred reads as follows:

This House while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the Empire and ought in consequence to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.

I ask you if there is a word within the provisions or meaning of that resolution which prevents the Government from giving a contribution to the British Admiralty if the conditions justify?—as the conditions are shown to justify it under the memorandum handed down to the House by the Prime Minister. Not a word. It is only a question, as it appears to me: Are you in favour of the tin-pot navy as authorized under the Bill No. 95—which hon. gentlemen opposite have discarded—or would you prefer to put this question to the people of Canada before you adopt the tin-pot navy. That is the way I put it, and that is the way I voted; and because I voted that way, I have come back here from a constituency as their representative, and my hon. friend who proclaimed the doctrine of a tin-pot navy lost his political head.

There is another amendment against which the hon. gentleman made a rather vigorous charge:

The House regrets that the Speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy and the general question of the contribution by Canada to Imperial armaments.

Is there anything in that resolution in contradiction of the present policy? Did not every Conservative, then in opposition, vote for that? There is not a thing in it about an emergency.

Therefore, I will not, for the present, refer again to my hon. friend from South Renfrew. But in submitting an argument or two—and I do not desire to proceed at great length—permit me to say that I have sympathy with all those in Canada who say that war is horrible. And when we view the conditions as they exist to-day among the civilized nations of the world we are almost led to the conclusion that the upward movement of humanity has been rather slow.

It is, Sir, a regrettable fact that in this twentieth century, and in this enlightened part of the civilized world, the standard of civilization has not yet reached the height where nations can settle their disputes by arbitration. That cannot be done; therefore we must to-day, as a Parliament and as a country, face conditions as they exist. I believe it is universally recognized that the highest power in the world is physical force, and the same principle applicable to the establishing of peace within the confines of the city of Ottawa applies also to the establishing of peace throughout our great Empire. What more is the navy of the Empire than a police force? But if we removed the police force from the city of Ottawa, and lawless men had no fear of being brought to justice, I venture to assert the belief that we would not be safe within the confines of this city. By the very existence of that police force, peace is established, because that force is beneficial not only in what it does, but even to a greater extent in that which it prevents being done. The same condition therefore, applies to the establishing of peace throughout this great Empire to which we belong.

I have taken a great interest in this debate, because I realize, as the representative of a free constituency, that this is a most important question. As I listened to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, it seemed to me that in their references to the Empire some hon. gentlemen did not grasp the size or magnitude of Britain and her possessions, for it was referred to, and chiefly by hon. gentlemen who have heretofore addressed the Parliament of Canada on this subject, as if it consisted of those little islands in the North sea, this Dominion of Canada, recognized as the brightest jewel among British Colonial possessions, Australia, New Zealand, Cape Colony and so on. But I would remind hon. gentlemen that the King's subjects number 460,000,000 people, and that 360,000,000 of those subjects are neither of our colour nor our race. Let me remind them of, shall I say, the exquisite delicacy of Imperial diplomacy in the government of many of those colonies forming part of this great Empire, and of the phenomenal degree of fair-mindedness and patriotism exercised governing of 360,000,000 aliens without encroaching more than is necessary upon their individual freedom and their ancient customs, and at the same time establishing and maintaining principles of British justice, and protection of life, virtue and property. I venture to say the statement can be made without successful contradiction, either in this House or out of it, when we realize that those little British Isles with their 42,000,000 people have, in centuries past, taken care of and nurtured her possessions; ever present on every occasion of need to defend, protect and assist the outlying portions of the Empire, that at no time or under no circumstances have the people of those little British Isles asked the outlying portions of the Empire for a dollar. As a Canadian citizen and a British subject I submit that the national self-respect that makes acceptance of this statement universal should redouble our admiration and the fervour of our love towards the people of the British Isles.

Possibly it is unnecessary to point out that the Empire has had to protect the great heritage and problems of the Canadian people, or to enumerate the conditions under which our ocean pathway has been secured, how we have been protected by the Mother Country in all times of need; how our trade, going out on every river and from every port, making its way to the various nations of the world, has been absolutely protected and secured by the power and the might of the British navy; yet the Canadian people have never contributed a dollar. In this connection, the following extract from the memorandum of the British Admiralty, regarding the expansion of Canadian trade submitted by the right hon. Prime Minister, will be of interest:

> The rapid expansion of Canadian sea-borne trade, and the immense value of Canadian cargoes always afloat in British and Canadian bottoms, here require consideration. On the basis of the figures supplied by the Board of Trade to the Imperial Conference of 1911, the annual value of the overseas trade of the Dominion of Canada in 1909-10 was not less than £72,000,000, and the tonnage of Canadian vessels was 718,000 tons, and these proportions have already increased and are still increasing. For the whole of this trade wherever it may be about the distant waters of the world, as well as for the maintenance of her communications, both with Europe and Asia, Canada is dependent, and has always depended upon the Imperial navy, without corresponding contribution or cost.

It is a significant fact that these little British Isles have contributed to the protection of the outlying portions of this magnificent Empire $400,000,000, that the large-hearted British taxpayer has gone down in his pocket and has contributed $150,000,000 since Confederation to protect Canada as a colony of that Empire. That argument seems to me to be absolutely conclusive and to justify the contribution which the Prime Minister has proposed, as a means by which we can do something to keep up that great police force which is necessary to protect our trade, with the other trade of the Empire. I do not believe there was a truer statement in the address of the right hon. the Prime Minister than the statement that if for no other reason we owe that contribution to the British Admiralty as a matter of self-respect.

My hon. friends opposite and particularly my hon. friend from Welland, who can jump a political fence pretty quick when there is an election by acclamation in it, laboured hard to disassociate Canada from the Empire. As I understand it, if Montreal is attacked the British Empire is attacked just as if Liverpool is attacked. If Victoria is attacked, the British Empire is attacked just as if Liverpool is attacked. If Windsor is attacked the British Empire is attacked just as if old London is attacked. The policy of this Government shows that they realize the importance of the consolidation of this great Empire because in its liberties is our heritage and in its traditions is our pride.

I want to refer to the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the great leading light of the party that is now in the political wilderness. I do not impute disloyalty to any Liberal who occupies a seat in this House and I am conscious, God knows, when I say that no constituency in Canada would elect a man to Parliament unless he was a loyal Canadian citizen and a British subject to the core. But my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—oh, how many times I have heard that name up in the back concessions of North Essex among my French-Canadian countrymen—and no more loyal or patriotic citizens or electors can be found anywhere—but, Sir, our right hon. friend does play the game of politics down in North Essex just the same as they do, Mr. Sevigny, down in your constituency; the voice is the voice of Jacob and the hand is the hand of Esau in North Essex just the same as with you. My right hon. friend was wise in his day and generation, speaking politically, and he said in this House the other day:

> Let the matter be settled once and for all. Surely I have not lived 70 years of my life in vain.

A beautiful sentiment, if we could only take the sentiments into our inner consciences, if we could believe that my hon. friend meant them, we would think a great deal more of that eloquent statement and graceful phraseology. In 1896 Mr. Bourassa was a disciple and follower of the right hon. gentleman; they bowed together, they rose together and they were at one politically. Mr. Bourassa uttered these words:

> Well sir, what was the language of Mr. Laurier in Boston in 1891? That Canada would never consent to Imperial confederation even on commercial lines alone because the consequence would be the participation of Canada in British wars and Canada would never consent to that.

Again at page 1142 of the 'Hansard' of 1892 we find these words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

> I hold out to my fellow countrymen the idea of independence, but whenever the day comes it must come with the consent of both countries and we must continue to keep the good feeling and the good will of the motherland. If we are true to our record we will again exhibit to the world the unique, the unprecedented example of nation achieving its independence by slow degrees as naturally as the severing of the ripe fruit from the parent tree.

Imperial defence, bowing to false gods, 70 years of my life sacrificed in Imperial defence. I say again, Sir, the voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau. Again, on page 1,143 we have the words of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, this man, whose statements, as the leader of a great party in Canada should not be such as to appeal to those sentiments. In those sentiments he has sowed the wind, and he is to-day reaping the whirlwind. Because of the differences of view that exist in his own party, he dare not support a policy which is Imperial in its nature, and which is in the interests of this great Empire. He says:

> Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when we would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy?

That is the statement of my right hon. friend, and I presume that if my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) had the opportunity, and would rise, he would say that that is simply an unfettered, promulgated free speech. That is, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman would rise if the House were not singing 'God Save the King'. I want to quote these statements for the benefit of those on this side of the House, and for the benefit of the young member from North Essex. Let me give you a little political history that has just come to my mind. My hon. friend the ex-Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) was in North Essex in 1909, at the time of the by-election, and my hon. friend, his colleague, the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) was with him. I am not going to narrate what took place because I think I would be ashamed to tell it. But I shall say this, that some of the professional minions of the party got into a part of the constituency where I was not well known and what do you think they said? I do not know whether they believed it or not, it does not make a particle of difference, it was said. They said, you farmers of Essex, you are picking out now a man to represent you in Parliament. The constituency has just conferred an unbounded honour upon your former representative, by giving him a good fat job for the rest of his days at your expense. They did not put it that way, but that was the construction of it. They said, you farmers want a man to represent you. If you want a man to go out into the cornfield and plough, Wilcox will be all right. But you want a man qualified to express your views upon the floor of Parliament. Well, they did not know me then. I took it as an insinuation that a representative farmer was not qualified in their judgment to occupy a seat in this House. Let me digress from the point just a moment to say that as a farmer—and my hon friend from Red Deer (Mr Clark) always gets up and takes a crack at the protectionist—I have no quarrel with the industrial life of this country, because, as I said before there is a close connection between the farmers of Canada and the industrial life of Canada. We produce the raw material; they produce the manufactured product, and you cannot dissociate the one interest from the other. As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, they are like the old maid and the old bachelor. Together they thrive and prosper, but separated they will shrivel up and die. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was quoting from the speech of my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, and I desire to quote him just a little further:

It is no use whatever at this stage of the proceedings on the floor of the Canadian Parliament to try to deceive ourselves as to what is intended by this subject of Imperial defence. If it is intended simply to discuss what part Canada is prepared to take in her own defence, what share of the burden must fall upon us, being responsible for the safety of the land in which we were born and to which we owe allegiance, in which our hopes and affections are centred, certainly, we are always prepared to discuss that. But there is a second school abroad in England and in Canada, a school represented perhaps on the floor of this Parliament which wants to bring Canada into the vortex of militarism which is now the blight and curse of Europe.

A little tin-pot navy for Canada, but nothing, not a thing for the Empire. My hon. friend from Red Deer says that all England wants is our moral support. Well I am perfectly willing to give Engand our moral support and to accompany it with a little bit of our cash.

When the right hon. leader of the Opposition, then a younger man, wise in his judgment and generation, made these statements he believed that they would bring political grist to his own mill and to his own party. It is astounding to me, in view of the campaign that has been carried on in various parts of this country, that hon. gentlemen opposite would stand for hours slinging accusations across this House at hon. gentlemen who honourably and ably represent their constituencies. That conduct is responsible for the sentiment which has developed in this country and which makes it pretty hard for the leader of the Opposition in the circumstances in which he finds himself at the present time. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) dwelt upon the amendment. I imagine that that lengthy amendment was submitted to the Liberal caucus, and that there was a great amount of courting going on in the caucus between the Hon. George and some others. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) told a story or two last night. Probably it will not be considered a digression from the argument if I were to illustrate what I mean. Up in our part of the country, on one of the back concessions, near where I live myself, there was a young man whose name was George, but it was not George Graham. He was accompanying a young lady home one evening and he felt that it was his duty, or desire, to ask her to be his wife. It was the proper thing for him to do, but, when he reached the point in the conversation when he was about to say: 'Nellie, will you be my wife,' his courage failed him and he said: 'Mary, it looks like rain.' I imagine that this political George was just in about that position when he submitted the conglomeration of ideas in this resolution to the caucus. But, finally his inner consciousness seemed to be wounded, his eyes were opened as they had never been before, and he looked up into Nellie's face and said: 'Nellie, will you walk down the stream of life with me?' 'Oh, yes,' she said, 'George, I will, but do not tell anybody.' I imagine that was going on in this building and George looked up into Nellie's face and said: 'Oh, Nellie, I won't, because I am just as much ashamed as you are.' I am inclined to believe that things were not so smooth as they appeared to be on the surface.

Reference has been made by many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to the part which Canada took in the South African war. I think my hon. friend the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) has referred time and time again to the part that Canada took in the Boer War. Let us investigate that. As a loyal Canadian my heart was thrilled when I saw the colonial possessions of this great Empire sending their sons to assist the Mother Country in the time of stress and trial. In the Globe of October 4, 1899, appears this statement by the right hon. leader of the Opposition:

As I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late, our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops, to be used to fight for Canada's defence. There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops I do not see how we can do so. Then again, how could we do so without Parliament granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon Parliament.

If in that time of stress and trial, the then leader of the Government and his colleagues could not send the young Canadians, whose hearts were pulsating with loyalty to the King, to defend the flag in South Africa without summoning Parliament, what is he going to do with his Canadian navy ? But, they were urged to do it. Boards of trade, mayors of towns and loyal citizens throughout the length and breadth of Canada showered their messages into Ottawa and the groundhogs were compelled to take their holes. Then, in Montreal, shortly after this, there was a right-about, turnabout somersault. The right hon. leader of the Opposition said :

We believed it our duty as a British colony to take part in the war, and permit two thousand Canadian volunteers to enlist in the English army and to fight for the Mother Country. We did it because we believed it our duty to do it in response to the unanimous sentiments of the people of this country. We are a free country; ours is a constitutional government, and our duty is to put into execution the popular will, and the moment the popular will was known to us we had but the duty to discharge, and we discharged it of our free will. There was no power to constrain us to act as we did; but in the plenitude of our legislative independence we had the right to reply to the popular will.

The then Government did not allow these soldiers to go until such time as they were forced by the loyal sentiments of the people. When our soldiers made their 7,000-mile journey across the ocean, when they fought upon the hills and sands of Africa, when the blood of many of them was spilled for the flag that floats over this Empire, it was, in my mind, an epochal period in the history of the Liberal Administration, for Canada got an amount of advertising as a result of the action of these loyal volunteers that it had not had for many, many long years.

There are just one or two quotations that I desire to read in concluding. I wished to discuss several other matters in respect to this question, but I have spoken longer than I intended. I have quotations here from the Toronto Globe of March 24, 26 and 29, 1909, when the resolution over which there has been so much discussion in this House was submitted to Parliament. I desire to place on record an editorial from the Toronto Globe, because, mark you, I have no doubt that very many people will read it, and I recognize that while there are some people in this country who bow the knee daily and say: 'Give use this day our daily bread,' there are others who say: 'Give us this day our daily Globe.' The Globe of 24th March, last, said in its leading editorial:

British feeling for Germany until the last few years has ever been friendly and admiring. Germany's feeling for Great Britain, as was manifested during the Boer war, has been jealous and unfriendly. This unfriendliness reached its climax when Britain and France recently entered upon a friendly understanding. The policy of Germany since the war of 1870 has been to isolate France in Europe. The friendly relations with her neighbour across the channel have been openly and avowedly resented by the Berlin war party.

The German nation has groaned for years under the weight of military preparations. Without lightening that burden an ounce, the Kaiser and his advisers have superimposed the burden of creating a great navy. There is not another nation in Europe which if in the same position as Great Britain, would allow another nation to prepare an engine for its destruction without asking for explanations and an understanding. There is not another nation in Europe which would impotently stand by and see an instrument forged for its destruction. They would seize the reptile while it was still weak and strangle it.

But that is not the British way. They have instead endeavoured to keep pace with German activity in augmenting naval power. The contest has become a desperate one. It is a contest between a nation of 65,000,000, and constantly growing, with a nation of 42,000,000, from which its sons swarm across the seas year in and year out. War is deprecated, but, as a matter of fact war is in progress. The contest in shipbuilding is war. If the Mother Country were engaged in a deadly conflict, Canadians could not get across the ocean fast enough to the aid of the motherland. The Canadian exchequer would be open to the last dollar in such a cause. But we must recognize that our aid is as much needed now as if a physical war, instead of a war of shipbuilding were on. Germany appreciates that if ever she is to challenge British supremacy and break up the British Empire, now is the time.

This is from the Toronto Globe, I would ask my hon. friends opposite to remember:

Every year is adding to the might of the British possessions, and ten years hence would be too late. The colonies can show by prompt and decisive action that it is already too late. They have it in their power to proclaim to all the world that the Empire is one and indissoluble. It will be a stroke for peace, for the moment Germany perceives that the strength of the resources of every colony have been cast into the scale, from that moment she will see that she has lost the game. She began her programme too late. It is Canada's duty, from every point of view, our affection for the land of our fathers and our own self-interest to take prompt action and practical action.

Here is what the Globe said on March 31, last:

While the British fleet is master of the channel no European fleet could be a serious menace to the shores of Canada. . . . In the day of trial the all-important aim would be to make the Imperial fleet so strong that the issue of a combat would not be doubtful.

On the day the resolution was passed, March 29, last, the Globe said:

There can be no resisting the conviction, in view of these facts, that the Mother Country will accept the aid of her colonies at this time of crisis with thankful enthusiasm. Nothing is so likely to bring the mad competition to a stop as a conviction on the part of Germany that it is hopeless. In such case the colonies will be conferring a boon on the German taxpayers as well as on the British. We are not of those who believe that an invasion of Britain just now is feasible. That is not the danger. The danger lies in the future, when the German fleet would have arrived at a pitch of strength when there would be no need for evasion. There would be a direct challenge to a trial of strength, and if the German admiral prevailed, the British Empire as now constituted would be at an end. English, Scotch and Irish valour would be of little avail. The islands would be beleaguered, their food supplies cut off and a surrender at discretion formed on them. That is a consummation which cannot be paltered with or derided, and while it is even remotely possible that every part of the Empire must stand shoulder to shoulder in rendering it impossible.

I have another quotation from the Globe of March 26. I want them to pay particular attention to this:

The sort of vessel that should be built is fixed by the circumstances. The competition now raising between Great Britain and Germany is in the direction of first-class battleships. If Canada were to build a little fleet of wasps and hornets it would have no moral effect on the situation at all. What we would like Canada to do would be to manifest by a veritable act that in this competition of the fleets she ranges herself proudly and gladly by the side of the Mother Country.

Without going farther into details, I want to say that I am heartily in accord with the proposals of the Canadian Government at this time of need to do the best we can to assist in keeping up that great naval force which is necessary to preserve peace within the confines of our own Empire and the great country in which we live.

Some one has said, concerning our great Empire, that amongst all the monarchs of the world, King George can truly say: 'The sun over my dominions never sets;' and he goes on to say:

Let us begin at old London, 'the heart of the Empire,' as it is called. When its eight million dwellers have been but a few hours astir, the sun is waking up the fishermen of Newfoundland. On it sweeps up the majestic St. Lawrence, opening up the great vista of that mighty water; on and on over the spacious lakes and the thundering cataracts, which flash like jewels at his coming. Soon he smiles on the golden wheat fields in Alberta and Saskatchewan; then he gleams over the boundless prairies of Alberta and the Northwest, and climbs the snow clad summit of the Rockies. He sheds his genial light and warmth upon the fertile slopes of British Columbia; next the sun reveals the pasture-fields and mountain peaks of New Zealand; then in their turn Australia welcomes the glorious morning sun, still shining on the British Empire. He rolls on and on across the Icelanders; in the East Indies he sweeps over Borneo to open up the bazars of Calcutta, and all the majestic life of India and the Persian gulf; then it is day-break on the African belt and in the diamond fields of Kimberley, and before our brethern in the sandy desert of Egypt, or the jungles of Africa, have rubbed their eyes, lo! a day and night have passed, and once again the sun rises over Britain.

That is a glorious world embracing panorama, but how small would be the most of Canadians, or any of the people of the Empire, if they had nothing to be proud of, save the size of that Empire. Fancy a Canadian or any other Britisher having nothing more to stir his pulse than the knowledge that the Empire to which he belongs is a bit bigger than that of Russia. What makes our people justly proud is, that they are freeborn inheritors of not only the biggest, but the best Empire that the world has ever seen, an Empire unique in the world's history, a united family of nations, with common interest, common ideals, a common cause, and all devoted to human progress and peace.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Wilcox) who has just taken his seat upon having made—if I may be permitted to say so—by all odds the best presentation of the case of the Government that has come in the course of this debate. I also wish to say that with many of the positions he has taken I entirely agree. But I recognize these positions rather as arguments for our side of the case than for his. There is, however, one point that I must criticise in his remarks. If there was one matter that he seemed to lead to more strongly than another, it was the exceeding loyalty of himself primarily, and of his friends secondarily, to the British Empire; and, by contrast, the disloyalty and treasonable attitude of members who have the audacity to oppose the proposals of the Government of the day, and particularly of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with his seventy years of service to his King and country. He did us the honour to read to us quotations from remarks made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition many years ago as evidence of that lack of loyalty to the Empire that he desired to claim for himself. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that these quotations were read without statement as to their context, without reference to their bearing. And, while I have no knowledge of the matter myself, I think I shall be safe in saying that they had no bearing whatever on the question that is before the House to-day, and that, so far as they related to military service, it was military service by land and not by sea. But the question before us to-day is sea service, and not land service. And, if I am permitted by the House, before I conclude my remarks, I will take the liberty of showing what the position is to-day in regard to land service held by the Government and people of Canada even under the jingo leadership of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes). But when my hon. friend (Mr. Wilcox), if I do not misquote him, calls high Heaven to witness the loyalty of himself and his friends and the disloyalty of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends, because of alleged opposition to Imperial defence, I am sorry to have to question the sincerity of my hon. friend, even though he made his statement with such an air of sincerity. He might have quoted statements made by some of his colleagues sitting beside him, behind him and even in front of him, made not fifteen or twenty years ago, but within the last year or two; and not made on some subject which has no relation to the question before the House, but made on the very question that is before the House—statements which were not veiled treason but were open and palpable treason to the well-being and defence of this Empire. I will not trouble the House to go over these statements again, but I see before me hon. gentlemen who have been publicly accused in this House of making such statements and they were not able to deny them. The hon. gentleman mentioned the name of Mr. Henri Bourassa, and he was good enough to say that Mr. Bourassa was a political associate of members on this side of the House. But it is within the knowledge of some members here that the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Smyth) holds his seat in this House because of having signed a document pledging him to support the naval programme of Mr. Bourassa; and that the seat held by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), was secured by his predecessor in that seat, now Senator Gordon, by having signed an identical document. And, as my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, is heir to the seat held by Senator Gordon, so I say he is heir to the pledge made by Senator Gordon. It comes with ill grace from any hon. gentleman who is in association with these gentlemen on that side of the House, who stand convicted before this House and before Canada of sentiments that I am not permitted by the rules of the House to properly characterize—I say that it ill becomes any hon. gentleman sitting in this House under these circumstances to charge treason or disloyalty against men who never have been found, and never will be found to hold their seats here under such conditions.

I said there were some points in my hon. friend's remarks with which I absolutely agree. One was to the effect that peaceful development is the natural and proper ambition of Canada. For my own part, I am not a military man; I have no military ambitions and have had no military experience. I have always looked to the work of peacefully developing the resources of this country, and of improving its conditions, so that it might become the home of an ever increasing number of ever more prosperous people by peaceful means.

But if circumstances arise that compel us to consider other possibilities than those of permanent peace, then I agree with him that we must take those possibilities into consideration. I agree with him also as to the horrors of war, and if there were any way of avoiding war by ignoring it, I would be glad to do so. But it is a matter of fact—and I need not dwell upon it—that war comes without regard to time or circumstance. I have heard it suggested that wars were made by kings. I have heard it suggested that wars were made by diplomats. I have heard it suggested that wars were made by the antagonisms of people. May I, with all reverence and respect, suggest that war is the crucible of God, by which it is decided what races of men shall hold dominion and what races shall be subject. Whether the reason be one or the other; whether it be this or that, considering the history of this world from earliest ages to the last few weeks, I am forced to the conclusion that war is a condition that must always exist or be in prospect, and for which we must always be prepared.

The political condition created by the proposals now before the House is a new condition, and I may say, a startling one. In 1910 a provision was made for the first time for Canada's participation in Imperial naval defence. It was assented to, by Parliament, having in view rather the foundation of a naval service than active participation in the wars of the Empire. I speak of it in regard to the amount of money involved. It was not the intention at that time to trench heavily upon the resources of the Dominion in regard to naval defence. It was intended, I say, to lay the foundation, and to subsequently build up year by year as condition required and as circumstances permitted. But to-day we are face to face with proposals made from both sides of the House involving very much more than the mere laying of a foundation. The sum of $35,000,000, which is now at issue, constitutes a serious inroad upon the financial resources of Canada, and not only this—let it be the proposition of the Government or the Opposition—it means inevitably still further trenching upon the resources of Canada. I say we are face to face to-day with proposals to enter actively, seriously, and expensively into the question of Imperial naval defence —a condition essentially different from that which prevailed two or three years ago; and the members of this Parliament will have to justify to the people of this country the position we take in asking for such large appropriations, and incurring such large prospective obligations.

I am here, Mr. Speaker, to absolutely justify the position that we have taken, both as to the amount of the present appropriation and as to the fulfilment of future obligations imposed thereby, and the consequences thereof. I am aware that the position I take is somewhat different from that hitherto adopted in the course of this debate, but the matter has been impressed upon my mind as being of the most serious importance—as being the most important matter that has come to the attention of this Parliament since I have had the honour of being a member of it, both as to the manner of present and prospective expenditure, and as well the principles underlying the several proposals relating to that expenditure. If it were possible for Canada to separate itself in some way from the rest of the world; if it were possible for Canada to protect itself by preaching peace, then such an expenditure would not be necessary. If conditions in the world to-day were as they existed one hundred years ago, such expenditure would not be necessary. But I am afraid some of our people are apt to forget that they are not living within a very few years after the battle of Waterloo. That battle occurred 100 years ago. Its consequences have to a great degree passed away, and to-day we are face to face with new conditions regarding military and naval matters such as the world has never before seen.

When the civilized nations of the earth entered upon the policy of national armament, as they did many years ago, the citizens of the British Empire, whether of the British Isles or the outlying dominions, looked upon the adoption of the principle of universal military service with somewhat careless eyes. So long as Britain held the seas, so long Britain and her dominions were safe, although the European countries might number their soldiers by millions, as they do. But that madness, if you like, which has caused the European nations to enrol their whole population as soldiers, having achieved its climax, when France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Russia, are absolutely nations in arms, we find that instead of the idea of military dominion stopping with that, having established the nation in arms on land, forthwith they proceed to attempt to secure control of the sea, and each of these nations to-day is building a fleet to do at sea what it has already done by land. For many years the British Islands were protected by the narrow seas and the British dominions were protected by the width of the ocean, but to-day we must recognize the fact that it is merely a matter of time when the millions of men who are or who can be placed under arms in Europe at practically a moment's notice can be transported over sea as quickly and as certainly as may be necessary to carry out the will of the nation to which they belong.

There is no purpose in Canada ignoring this condition of affairs. It does absolutely exist and the question is what interest has Canada in it. I was astonished to hear the Postmaster General speak as though Canada had no direct interest in this condition of armament, of men and fleets; as though Canada in some way stood apart from the rest of the world, and that whatever danger might menace Great Britain or the United Kingdom was a matter of academic interest to Canada but did not in any material way affect Canada. Let me suggest to this House that a fleet that can sail across the North sea can sail across the Atlantic ocean, can sail around the world, and that Canada has, no guarantee of immunity from the presence of such fleets or of individual members of such fleets, and that our fair provinces by the sea, including the one which my hon. friend represents, stands in just as much danger as the British Islands themselves in case of any outbreak of war in which the British Empire is involved.

To-day in case of a declaration of war between Great Britain and any other civilized country of the world, there is nothing to hinder one small vessel, and she need not be armoured at that, from absolutely holding up the trade of Canada. There is no country in the world whose trade can be as easily blocked as that of Canada, and when my hon. friends opposite sneer at the idea of the tin-pot navy that the Laurier Government was going to build, even a tin-pot navy such as that could protect the commerce of Canada as it is not protected to-day but as it must be protected somehow by somebody in case of war, if it is to continue to exist. In such case Canada will suffer as she never suffered before; as, apparently, if we may judge from the utterances of some public men, she has no idea that she is liable to suffer. Canada needs naval defence in case of war just as much as England does, and it is as essential to England that Canada shall be defended in case of war as that England shall be defended.

I have heard statements attributed to the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in respect to this question of naval defence. I have heard him make the statement in his place in the House that when the Empire was at war Canada was at war. Such a statement does not need to be repeated but may I impress upon the minds of our friends opposite who seem to think that Canada is in no danger in case of war and that only England is in danger, that wherever the flag of the Empire floats there is danger to the Empire in case of war and loss if that flag should be pulled down. The Empire cannot afford to lose the prestige that results from the hauling down of its flag on the most remote island of the sea. The Empire, as an empire, must be defended in all its parts, or it ceases to be an empire, or at any rate, it loses prestige by such losses as may occur in that way. So I come again to the point that the responsibility for the defence of Canada is just as much a responsibility for the defence of the Empire as if it were for the defence of the county of Devon, or of the county of Kent or of the city of London, it is just as necessary for the Empire, and just as necessary for Canada. I lay stress on this, Mr. Speaker, because the suggestion has been made, and no doubt it will be repeated, and heralded through the press—we have seen indications of it in the debate already—that because we have already made, and are now making proposals for a Canadian navy, therefore, we are not showing proper loyalty to or proper consideration for the Empire. Canada is a part of the Empire. Canada is necessary to the Empire. The defence of Canada is the defence of the Empire.

I need not draw attention to the special matter in which there is an absolute community of interest. Great Britain draws a large part of her food supply from Canada. She must draw, and we hope she will draw an increasing proportion of that food supply from Canada; and it is just as necessary, in order that that food supply may be transported safely from Canada to Britain, that the shores of Canada should be protected, that the ports of Canada from which the laden ships shall sail should be protected, as that the ports of Britain, at which those laden ships shall land, should be protected. Whatever might be the case in regard to other parts of the Empire, there is no question that, so far as Canada is concerned, the protection of her coasts and ports is just as important to the maintenance of the Empire and to the security of the United Kingdom as the protection of the ports of England herself.

I said a minute ago that it was necessary to keep the flag flying wherever it floats, that wherever it was pulled down the Empire would suffer a loss of prestige. I want to bring this matter home as closely as possible to our friends opposite, and I do not think anybody will deny that the case, as I present it, is absolutely according to fact. We will assume that there is a great combination of European powers, that they are able to give more or less successful battle on the North sea or on the North Atlantic to the British navy. In the meantime, it has been possible for this combination of powers, by the use of a trifling number of warships, to absolutely blockade the seaports of Canada, to practically control Canada, to land men in Canada, to occupy Canada, to take Quebec and Montreal. I ask my hon. friend the Postmaster General to-day what is to hinder it? Supposing such a thing took place, supposing there was an effective occupation of a part of Canada, the part in which my hon. friend the Postmaster General lives, the part in which my other friend Mr. Bourassa circulates his views chiefly, in which he preaches the doctrine that there should be no preparation for military or naval defence; supposing that that part of the country were occupied by hostile troops from the continent of Europe, supposing that the prospective battle in the North sea resulted unfavourably to the British navy, and supposing there was a settlement of the terms as between Great Britain and that combination of European powers, I ask my hon. friends what would likely take place? I ask them if they realize just how much interest Canada would have in that transaction?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is in the event of England being defeated in the North sea?

Mr. OLIVER: Exactly. Supposing it became necessary to make terms. What are those overcrowded countries of Europe looking for but a place for their surplus population, where they can build up trade for themselves, where they can establish their own institutions, where they can strengthen themselves overseas as Britain has been strengthened overseas? I ask our anti-militarist friends in Canada if it is not an absolute certainty that under such conditions, Canada would pass from the control of the British Empire to the control of the successful one of those European powers? We are apt to shut our eyes to the possibilities that are around us, but we have seen within the past two months just such transactions take place, or, at any rate, they are in process of taking place to-day. Out of a condition from which no one suspected that anything would arise, the fact emerges that delegates are meeting to-day to apportion conquered territory. And so, assuming the possibility of such an occurrence as I have suggested, in my mind there is nothing more certain than that Canada would be the prize that would go to the victor. Do my hon. friends think that such a thing is not possible? They have used the name of Germany as the great possible aggressor against Britain. Do they think that Germany, if she should happen to be in that combination that I have supposed, and was successful against Britain and her fleet, would not wish to become owner and control this Dominion of Canada? Do they think that because they happen to belong to another race that they would not fall under German dominion, supposing such a thing took place? If they have any ideas on this subject, let them recall Alsace and Lorraine, the prize of a successful war, and let them figure to themselves whether Canada would not be just as fair a prize, or whether Canada would not, in absolute fact, be the prize for which those fleets would contend in the North sea if ever such a terrible event should take place.

Mr. PELLETIER. That is quite possible.

Mr. OLIVER: It is what I wanted to bring to the mind of my hon. friend.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then Great Britain will have been defeated in the North sea?

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely.

Mr. PELLETIER: The moment the British fleet is defeated there, the British Empire goes.

Mr. OLIVER: Surely there is no reasonable probability that the United Kingdom can be conquered and kept by any other power or combination of powers any more than France was kept because she was conquered by Germany. But a price was taken for the conclusion of peace. In the settlement of matters after a war has taken place, possession is ten points of the law and the victorious power which holds possession of territory at the negotiation of peace retains that territory after the conclusion of peace. It is not too much to say perhaps that it has been exactly on that principle that the British Empire has been spread around and around the world. What has been done may be done again. What I am trying to impress upon the House is the absolute necessity of Canada, as a part of the British Empire, and in the interest of the British Empire, providing for her own defence to the limit of her ability.

Mr. PELLETIER: In the event of the defeat of Great Britain on the North sea, say, by the Germany navy, to carry out my hon. friend's argument to its legitimate end, Canada would need a navy strong enough to defeat the German navy which had defeated Great Britain's navy.

Mr. BELAND: What about occupation?

Mr. PELLETIER: How can we prevent occupation if we have not the strongest, and greatest navy in the world?

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend has read the papers giving an account of the war in the Balkan peninsula, he will have seen that the four allied powers have systematically gone on the principle that what they were able to capture before the negotiations for peace began they were entitled to hold in accordance with the terms of peace. What I am trying to impress upon my hon. friend is that it is up to Canada to prevent the occupation of Canadian territory, so that, whatever may occur, in the first place, Canada will have done her share in the maintenance of the Empire, and, in the next place, Canada will not be the prize that will have to go to the victorious country if, unfortunately, such a case should occur. I am for the British Empire in defeat or victory, for I believe that Canada's destiny can best be worked out in accordance with the ideals upon which the British Empire has, up to the present time, been built and upon which we hope it will continue to grow.

I have listened—I must say I have not listened with pleasure—to the repetition and repetition and repetition of suggestions of the discreditable character of the late Government's proposals with regard to naval defence; to the allusions to that proposal as a tin-pot navy and as an ineffectual means of securing a measure of naval defence. It has even been suggested that the fact of the limited character of this measure of defence was due actually to disloyalty to the Empire. And again it is suggested to-day that the proposal now before the House, to provide for two fleet units on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts respectively, is of no value at all because these two fleet units are not sufficient to defeat the German, or the French, or some other European navy. Now, let me get my position before the House by instancing a parallel case. We have the little countries of Belgium, Holland and Denmark lying alongside of the great German Empire, and one of them adjoining the great republic of France. As many soldiers can be put under arms in the two countries of France and Germany as the whole population of any of these three countries. Is that a reason to these countries why they shall not arm their population? Do you not find in Belgium, Holland and Denmark——

Mr. LEMIEUX: And in Switzerland.

Mr. OLIVER—and in Switzerland, identically the same provision for universal military service as in France and Germany? Is it true that the people of Belgium, or Denmark or Holland, do not know what they are doing or why they are doing it? I do not think that the people in these countries need to come to us for instruction in regard to military matters. The reason of their doing as they do is this: In the first place in establishing universal military service amongst their own population they are providing a first line of defence and, in the second place, they are providing a foundation upon which an alliance may be made with some other country, thereby securing a combination strong enough to give them protection. What is common sense for Belgium, Holland, Denmark and Switzerland, is surely just as good common sense for Canada and it is just as much the business of Canada to provide a first line of defence on land and on sea, now that the question of sea power has come to the front, as it is for Belgium, or Holland, or Denmark, to do the same. If Canada does not make such provision, Canada is not doing her duty by herself or by the Empire. Let us take our own case. We are keeping up here a militia force and not only a militia force, but a force of regular soldiers. We are alongside a country of a hundred million people; we cannot, by any stretch of imagination expect to put under arms enough men to withstand a premeditated onslaught in war by that hundred millions of people to the south of us and still, from year to year, we spend money on a militia force. We are training men and providing arms and equipment of all kinds; and we take some pride in our militia and military forces generally, and we desire to see them brought up to the highest possible point of efficiency.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria): Does the hon. member know what the relative proportion of men in the field, in the war of 1812, was between Canada and Great Britain on the one hand and the United States on the other?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know the exact proportion, at this moment.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria): I may say that it was one Britisher and Canadian against 43 on the other side.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think that has any bearing on the case. I am very glad, however, to know that our predecessors in this country, our forefathers in the case of some of us, were such excellent fighters; and I only hope if the day of trouble should come, that our people of the present day would acquit themselves as well as did those men of 1812. At the same time I think the minister takes a rather optimistic view; and I would again say that we are keeping up this militia force; we are spending this money, not in the expectation of withstanding a premeditated onslaught from the United States, but for the purpose of providing a first line of defence; and we would be doing less than our duty to ourselves and less than our duty to the Empire, if we did not make that reasonable provision. Now to come back again to my first position, conditions having arisen that constitute sea power as much a necessity for the protection of the Empire as land power used to be, it is our business to provide a first line of defence in sea power, just as it is in land power, even if it does cost us this large amount of money to do it. If we do not do it, we are not doing ourselves or the Empire credit.

I just want to say further, that I believe that this preparation should be made, because of the obligation that we owe to ourselves and to the Empire as we stand to-day; and should not be made contingent upon the establishment of some other relationship, in regard to which no man can give any idea as to what it will be or when it will take place. I ask my hon. friends who speak of introducing a permanent naval policy, when and after they have secured the establishment of satisfactory Imperial relations, will the fleets and armies of the militant nations of Europe wait their convenience and until they have made those satisfactory arrangements? It would seem to me that that is their view; but my view is that we should recognize practical conditions as they actually exist, make our preparations accordingly to meet those conditions, and depend on the future to take care of the question of inter-Imperial relations, just as the past has done; and I believe it will do it satisfactorily. I will go further and say that, in my humble opinion, the suggestion to defer preparation by Canada for taking her proper part in Imperial naval defence, until some arrangement in regard to inter-Imperial government is made, is a suggestion which is not founded upon loyalty to the Empire; but is dictated by party exigency, the result of disloyalty to the Empire.

I was somewhat struck by the promise held out by the right hon. the Prime Minister, that when the dreadnoughts that we are to provide for were built we would have the privilege of having them officered by Canadians. Later on, he told us it would take from twenty-five to fifty years to establish a navy in Canada. It would take from twenty-five to fifty years, not surely to build ships? We could surely build them in less time than that, but I presume to train men is what he meant, and particularly to train officers. He told us we could not get men in Canada; but he tells us that we can provide officers for those dreadnoughts that are to be built in Britain. Now I would hesitate to characterize the suggestion coming from such a source. Was the hon. gentleman trifling with the intelligence of the members of the House when he threw out such a suggestion, which he himself contradicted. I think in all fairness and with all due deference, that the House has not been treated fairly by the right hon. gentleman on this question. We are told that we cannot build ships in Canada; we cannot find men in Canada; we cannot train men in Canada. On the other hand, he tells us that the Admiralty can build ships in Canada, providing Canadians will pay the extra cost. Really I cannot imagine a more humiliating position to be taken by the leader of a party, no, by the leader of the Government of this country of Canada. Surely his party exigencies were pressing him very strongly when he was compelled to make such an answer to the people of this country.

I do not wish to introduce controversial matters into this debate; but they have been introduced by members who have spoken on the other side; they have given an interpretation to our acts and our position on the other side, and may I be permitted to return the compliment. May I be permitted to say—I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will call me to order if I trespass—that, in my hunmble judgment, the proposal to provide money for the building of empty dreadnoughts to be handed over to the Government of Great Britain, is a policy inspired not by the interests of Canada, and not even so much by political exigency in Canada, as by political exigency in Great Britain, and is put forward at the instigation of the Tory Opposition in England for the purpose of discrediting the Liberal Government of that country.

There is a remarkable community of interest between the two sides of the Atlantic on this question. We have heard to-day from the First Lord of the Admiralty that Britain is equal to the occasion on the shores of Britain against all comers. But we have heard and seen in the newspapers the assertions repeated, and repeated, by the Unionist party that the Liberal Government of Great Britain was not making adequate preparation for the conditions as they exist, that they should have greater naval expenditure, that they should have more dreadnoughts. And, by arrangement with our friends on the other side of the House, conveniently but unfortunately at the present time directing the affairs of Canada, forthwith Canada comes forward and says to the British Government: You do not know your business; you are not providing adequately for the defence of the Empire; we are going to help provide for you. Thus they attempt to discredit the Liberal Government of Great Britain for the benefit of their Tory Unionist allies.

Mr. PELLETIER : That is pretty hard on the Liberal Government of England.

Mr. OLIVER : No, I do not think it is.

Mr. HAZEN : They ask to be discredited.

Mr. OLIVER : My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) will not find anywhere any word from the Government of Great Britain asking for anything. In all they have sent, what we read is that they asked to be left alone, that they are equal to the occasion as it arises, and they suggest to us that we shall meet the occasion as it arises to meet us. But we do not do that. Under the leadership of our friends on the other side, we do not attend to our own business. On the contrary, they tell us that we do not know enough in this country to build ships, that we have not patriotism enough or men enough to man them. But we know more about the needs of the heart of the Empire than the men who are charged with the responsibility of conducting those affairs, and we come to their rescue ostensibly, but for the purpose of discrediting them as far as possible.

Mr. PELLETIER : And the idea of my hon. friend is that the Asquith Government is not cute enough to see that ?

Mr. HAZEN : They fell into the trap.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not see that there is anything the British Government could do that would prevent my hon. friends from doing what they have done.

Mr. PELLETIER: I found them more intelligent than that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You have not fooled them—be sure of that.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says we have.

Mr. OLIVER: Not at all—I never made such a statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: You offered them something, and they are willing to take it.

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly, but they are careful to say that they never asked you for it and they do not want it.

Mr. HAZEN: Curious that Mr. Asquith should say that he was going to take an opportunity of thanking Canada for its action.

Mr. OLIVER: He would have to be polite—certainly. In discussing, a few minutes ago, the duty of Canada to provide a first line of defence by land and sea, I forgot to mention that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, in his presentation of the case to the House, informed us that, as a possible result of the presenting of the three dreadnoughts to Great Britain, the flag that has disappeared from the shores of Canada would be replaced by Britain sending vessels to these shores—which vessels, I presume, would be a duplicate of the 'tin-pot navy' that the Laurier Government was going to provide. Which is to say, they are going to send vessels that would form a first line of defence, just as the Laurier Government would have provided. But it was only a 'tin-pot navy' and discreditable if provided by the Laurier Government, but is to be regarded as the height of Imperial statesmanship if done by the Imperial Government. Now, I protest against this drawing of distinctions between Canada and the United Kingdom, between Canada and the Empire. I take the position that what is for the naval and military protection of one part of the Empire is for the naval and military protection of all parts; and I want, further, to protest against the suggestion that has been made, by inference if not by words, that loyalty to Canada is disloyalty to the Empire. On this side of the House we take no second place to our friends on the other side in the matter of loyalty to the Empire. But we say that Canada is a part of the Empire and that loyalty to Canada is loyalty to the Empire.

In regard to this matter of contribution: Canada is rich. We have an abundance of revenue. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us that we could pay this contribution out of our surplus this year. That is very gratifying. But he did not tell us how many more contributions would be expected of us before that wonderful permanent naval policy would be adopted. I cannot imagine that, if the adoption of this permanent policy is to be deferred as long as there is every prospect of it being deferred, the needs of the Empire, which are increasing from year to year, will not, in reason, call for further contributions from Canada. And I ask hon. gentlemen to say to this House and this country what their intention is in that regard. I see that their newspapers, their ultra-loyal newspapers are proclaiming that their proposal of a $35,000,000 grant is cheaper for Canada than the proposal that has been made on this side of the House. Is that the ground upon which they are going to justify it? We want to know, we are entitled to know, whether they take the ground that this $35,000,000 is a settlement in full or only an instalment of the claim. I take it for granted—and I am entitled to take it for granted—that it is not a payment in full, but that it is only what it purports to be, a contribution on account; that it is, as my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) said, the beginning of a permanent policy.

Now, how does he justify this contribution? Some hon. gentlemen on the other side say that this $35,000,000 is made to save the Empire from ruin. My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) did not say so, but, if I understood his remarks correctly, he said this $35,000,000 was to be put up by Canada as a token of her loyalty to the Empire, and was expected to have the effect of deterring other nations from competing with the Empire in matters of naval defence. In other words, we are putting up this $35,000,000, as a bluff to the world. I think this is a fair conclusion to draw from the remarks of hon. gentlemen on the other side; but I want to say it is a conclusion not big enough and not good enough. $35,000,000 will not bluff the nations of the world that are arming to-day by sea as they have already armed by land. If it is intended that Canada is to continue to make contributions in order to keep up the bluff, I say, that with all regard to Canada's riches, Canada's prospects and Canada's loyalty, that the contract is too large even for a country such as ours. In opposition to that suggestion we propose the establishment of naval defence for Canada according to Canada's needs and possibilities—not as a result of any scare; not as a matter of emergency, but as Canada's duty to herself and to the Empire, carried out without bargaining as to conditions of control of Imperial foreign policy.

This policy of a contribution is absolutely contrary to the principles advocated by both parties in this country ever since Confederation, and I would like to point out wherein it seems to present a great danger to Canada and to the Empire. We are to-day gathering immigrants from many countries of the world—they are coming in by the hundred thousand. The Department of the Interior reports that during the past year our population has by immigration increased by about 400,000 people. Some of these people are from the British Islands, but the large majority are from other countries—very many of them from the United States; very many of them from these warlike countries of Europe. When they come to Canada it is our business to plant in their minds the principle of loyalty to Canada and to the Empire. That is our duty, and it is the only way in which we can preserve Canada's present condition and sustain her progress.

It is a fundamental principle of our political institutions that there shall not be taxation without representation; that there is not and shall not be payment of tribute. Having come in contact with many of these immigrants, I have found that one of the very first questions they ask is: 'What is the amount of taxation that Canada pays to Great Britain?' I have been asked that question by many immigrants from the United States, many of them fully believing that we did pay tribute to Great Britain, and I have been asked the same question by emigrants from the continent of Europe. I was able to say to them, however, that Canada pays no tribute to Great Britain, that Canada's connection with Great Britain costs her not one cent; that Canada pays no money that she does not absolutely control. That is the first question that comes to the lips of many of those emigrants, and when we are made to answer it as we have been doing up to the present time, we establish in their minds, by that means and at that moment, a gratification and satisfaction with Canadian conditions and British institutions which is the first step towards their establishment as loyal Canadians and loyal Britishers. But if we have to tell them after the Government's Bill passes, that Canada does pay tribute to Great Britain; that Canada is now paying tribute to Great Britain for naval protection, we are deprived of the strong position we have hitherto held. Hon. gentlemen are taking very long chances on the future of Canada when they introduce that practice into our country.

It is urged on both sides of the House as against this proposal that it involves the idea of separation of Canada from the Empire, and that suggestion is largely based on the provision contained in the Naval Act providing for control by Parliament of the Canadian navy. Who should control a navy paid for by Canada and manned by Canada, except the Canadian Parliament? Do hon. gentlemen say that control by the Parliament of Canada of that which has been provided by Canada and belongs to her, indicates separation from the Empire? What is our position in regard to our military forces, which are in an absolutely parallel position to the naval forces? Does anybody suggest that the Parliament of Canada should not absolutely control the Canadian military forces? Did anybody ever suggest anything but that? What is the condition to-day in regard to the military forces of Canada? I will take the liberty of reading to the House something which bears on the matter, for I think there has been no subject upon which there has been greater misrepresentation, and I will go so far as to say greater wilful misrepresentation, than on this matter.

Mr. OLIVER

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is going a little too far.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to trepass upon the rules of the House, and I absolutely withdraw the expression.

Mr. SPEAKER: To say that a thing is wilfully done is unparliamentary.

Mr. OLIVER: I absolutely withdraw any reference. The Naval Service Act of 1910, this separatist proposal, this proposal that has been declared to be evidence of disloyalty on the part of the Government, contained this provision:

Section 22. The Governor in Council may place the naval forces or any part thereof, on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

And the Militia Act says, in Section 69:

The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, in active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof——

For the defence of Canada only, you will observe.

—at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

In section 23 of the Naval Service Act it says:

In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal navy the Naval Service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the Naval Service, and the officers or seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the Naval Service.

And in section 24:

Whenever the Governor in Council places the Naval Service or any part on active service, as provided in the two preceding sections, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall issue for a meeting of Parliament within fifteen days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

The Militia Act says:

Whenever the Governor in Council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of Parliament within fifteen days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

And in section 72:

In time of war, when the militia is called out for active service to serve conjointly with

His Majesty's forces, His Majesty may place in command thereof a senior general officer of his regular army.

The provisions of the Militia Act have been on the Statute Books for many years, I suppose since Confederation, and they are absolutely identical, so far as circumstances wil permit, with the provisions of the Naval Act. The provisions of the Naval Act were intended to be absolutely of like effect with those of the Militia Act and they are absolutely of like effect but the same men who were satisfied with the provisions of the Militia Act, who could see no separatist idea in those provisions, when they came to the Naval Service Act could see all kinds of treason and separatist ideas in identically the same provisions.

You have prevented me, Sir, from giving my opinion of the gentlemen who argue from these standpoints. You have prevented me expressing my opinion of men, either in or out of Parliament, who would use such arguments based on such facts. I leave the facts to the consideration of the public and I believe that when the public are acquainted with those facts they they will hold identically the same opinion as I do in regard to the men who make such statements

Mr. SPEAKER : I wish to correct the hon. member. My ruling did not refer to what he might characterize as men in or outside of the House. It referred only to members of the House. The hon. member, who is an old parliamentarian, will agree that the rule is laid down very clearly that it is not permissible to say that a member wilfully and purposely did an improper thing. That is all I referred to, the rule that controls members of Parliament in the discharge of their duties here.

Mr. OLIVER : I did withdraw, and I wish to be understood as absolutely withdrawing any such wording and to say that I thoroughly desire to support you, Sir, in preventing the use of improper allusions in the House. I think you have taken a very proper course on the occasions which have come to my notice, and I wish in every way to conform to your ruling.

The other night my hon. friend the Postmaster General resurrected a Bill—I am rather in danger of trespassing again, but you have heard of course of those people who dig around in graveyards and what they are called and what opinion people hold of them. He by some means had got possession of a document which purported to be, and which he desired to place before the country as the matured opinion of the late Government in favour of naval conscription. I need not traverse the ground; there never was such a Bill. No such Bill ever received the approval of the late Government; so far as I know, as a member of that Government, it never received consideration at the hands of the late Government, and if it ever did receive consideration, inevitably under all the circumstances it would have been rejected by the late Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX : It was a dead-letter.

Mr. OLIVER : But my hon. friend desires to alarm the people of the country by the word 'conscription.' He desired them to understand that this was a new idea that was going to be brought upon them by this villainous Liberal party if they ever were given another chance. There is no manner of doubt that the Postmaster General knew that on the Statute Book, in the Militia Act, section 10, there is a provision not only for conscription but for a levy en masse of the people of Canada, not only those above 18 years of age, but even those under 18 years of age. Section 10 reads :

All the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of 18 years and upwards, and under 60, not exempt or disqualified by law and being British subjects, shall be liable to serve in the militia.

I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue will listen to this:

Provided that the Governor General may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms to serve in the case of a levée en masse.

Subsection 2 makes this further provision:

Nothing in this section shall prevent any male inhabitant of Canada under the age of 18 years enlisting as a bugler, trumpter or drummer.

So we have had in Canada for sixty years a provision whereby every male citizen of Canada, between the years of eighteen and sixty, may be called upon to do military service, and my hon. friend, with that section on the statute book, undertook to create the impression in the minds of the people of this country that the late Government had in mind the introducing of a new principle into the administration of military or naval affairs in this country. Again, Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to characterize such an attitude. In order, however, that there shall be no misapprehension, I desire to say that the Naval Service Act does not make provision for conscription, that it never was a part of the policy of the late Government that there should be conscription, and that it is the belief, I take the liberty of saying, of those who were members of the late Government, and of their followers in this House, that there is not now, and never shall be the need of conscription in connection with the Naval Service of Canada. There are enough Canadians to man a Canadian navy. But they tell us that we were not able to man the Rainbow and the Niobe. We were able to man the Rainbow and the Niobe, but they were not able to keep them manned.

Mr. STEVENS: With what did you man them? With British seamen, imported.

Mr. OLIVER: The Rainbow and the Niobe were manned under the administration of the late Government, and the commonsense reason why the present Government have not been able to keep them manned is that they proclaimed to the world that they intended to abolish the so-called tin-pot navy, and no man is going to enlist in such a service, unless he has the assurance of permanence of employment.

Mr. STEVENS: They never were manned.

Mr. GRAHAM: The report says they were.

Mr. OLIVER: They certainly are not manned now, and no Government could expect them to be manned under the conditions that have governed them during the administration of the present Government. I would certainly say that it would be a bad thing for Canada, and for any naval service that should ever be organized in Canada, if it were to be under the control of a government constituted and supported as this Government is, with one part of their membership and support absolutely pledged against the Canadian navy, and pledged to repeal the Act, and the other part of their support prepared to go to any length to discredit the policy of their predecessors, even though it meant injury to the Empire and to Canada.

There was no part of the addresses delivered by my hon. friends on the other side of the House that attracted my attention more than their protests against partisanship in dealing with this question. The mire of partisanship, I think my hon. friend the member from North Essex called it, and he said he protested against it most strongly. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that there is any reason why members of Parliament, elected as members of political parties, elected as partisans, and by partisans, should protest against partisanship, or be ashamed of it. I do not know that there is anything discreditable in being a member or a supporter of a political party, that is, as I understand political parties, and partisanship. My understanding may of course be different from theirs, but my understanding is that a political party stands for certain principles, that the support of that party is the support of those principles, and is something that is absolutely creditable to the men who believe in the principles; that it is elevating, and not degrading, and that it is absolutely necessary to the honest carrying on of the government of our country. The men who are protesting against partisanship are the men who—I may be trespassing, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure you will call me to order if I am—the men who in my humble judgment have sacrificed loyalty to partisanship on the one hand, and what they were pleased to call their principles to partisanship on the other. Well, perhaps I should not say partisanship alone; I should say office as well as partisanship. I do not think that on this side of the House we have to take any lesson from our friends on the other side in the matter of dealing with this or any other question from the standpoint of the public interest. We believe that it is the maintenance of the principles of Liberalism as applied to the conditions of Canada and to the conditions of the Empire that will bring the greatest measure of success to both Canada and the Empire.

The House will perhaps permit me, Mr. Speaker, not to digress, but to make a personal allusion in this connection. Some of the speakers on the other side have made more or less covert allusions to myself and to the fact that on the conclusion of the address of my right hon. friend the Premier, I remained in my seat while the House generally stood and sang 'God Save the King.'

I have been made the subject of very unfavourable comment by the newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen because of my action on that occasion and the suggestion has been made that I did not show proper respect to the National Anthem by not rising in my place when it was sung. May I be pardoned if I say that there is no man in this House or out of it who believes more thoroughly in the propriety of doing honour in the proper and accustomed form to the National Anthem whenever and wherever it is sung as a national anthem than I. But, permit me to say that when the National Anthem is sung not as a national anthem, but as a partisan demonstration, by partisans, on a partisan occasion, and for a partisan purpose, it is those who are singing the National Anthem who are showing disrespect and not the man who refuses to join in that disrespect. When my hon. friend concluded his remarks it was desirable from the party point of view, maliciously prearranged by the whips of the party—I am given to understand——

An hon. MEMBER: Maliciously?

Mr. OLIVER: I say maliciously.

Mr. STANFIELD: What about Thursday?

Mr. OLIVER: I am coming to that—maliciously arranged by the whips of the party in order to create a false impression in this country and across the ocean as to the unanimity of the reception of the proposals of the Premier that, on that side of the House, they should rise to sing the National Anthem, thereby compelling, by the ordinary procedure that takes place in this country when the National Anthem is sung, those on this side to join and thereby appear to show agreement with the proposals of the Premier——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OLIVER: Wait until I get through.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If I have the hon. gentleman's permission——

Mr. OLIVER: Wait until I make my statement and I will answer any question that anyone desires to ask me. But, I wish to finish this statement. It was desirable that the impression should be telegraphed throughout Canada and across the ocean the House unanimously supported the proposals of the Premier and in order that there might be some foundation for telegraphing that impression, I say it was maliciously arranged by the whips of the party on the other side to start the National Anthem in order that they might thereby serve their party ends.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Do I understand from the hon. gentleman's explanation that it was under compulsion that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House also sang God Save the King?

Mr. OLIVER: Not at all; I am speaking for myself. I have been made the subject of most unfair comment by the friends of hon. gentlemen and I say that they deliberately did what they did in the hope that they would have not only one, but that they might have more members on this side of the House that they might have the opportunity of attacking as I have been attacked.

Mr. WILCOX: Was it any more malicious upon the part of the members on the Government side of the House to rise and sing 'God Save the King' when the Prime Minister introduced his proposals than it was malicious upon the part of the members of the Opposition to rise and sing 'God Save the King' when the leader of the opposition introduced his policy?

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking for myself.

An hon. MEMBER: Answer.

Mr. OLIVER: I will answer all right. I am speaking for myself, making a personal statement of the reasons why I did as I did and I want to repeat that, in my humble judgment it was not I who showed disrespect to the National Anthem but it was those who misused the 'National Anthem' on that occasion. With regard to what the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wilcox) wishes to know, I do not pretend to justify the misuse of the 'National Anthem' whether it be on that side of the House or on the other.

An. hon. MEMBER: What did you stand up for?

Mr. OLIVER: I stood up because I agreed with the proposition as it came from this side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: I did it because I agreed with the proposition as it came from this side of the House and by standing up I was not causing any misrepresentation of opinion to go out to the country. But, if I had stood up when the right hon. gentleman's proposal was made I would have assisted in giving out a wrong impression as to the opinions of the members of this House with regard to that proposal. I recognize that the singing of the 'National Anthem' is a proper expression of the feelings of the loyal people of Canada whenever it is sung under circumstances that will permit of that expression being given, but again I say that, when it is sung as the anthem of a political party, it thereby and, to that extent, ceases to be a national anthem and becomes a party anthem.

Now, my hon. friends have made a great deal of political capital against my humble self in this matter. They are welcome to all the capital they can make. I have been in public life for a matter of nearly thirty years. I have held the confidence of my friends and neighbours during the greater part of that period. Many of them will bear witness that I do not have to ask any member of this House for a certificate as to my loyalty to Canadian institutions or to the British Empire. I am aware that the possibility of my having retained the good will and confidence of my friends and neighbours during so many years has not been because of brilliant ability, for nobody is more thoroughly aware of his own shortcomings than I am myself, but if I have held the confidence of the people of Edmonton, it is because they knew, by the experience of thirty years, that they could depend on me to stand for the principles that I believe in under all circumstances, under all conditions and in the face of any amount of misrepresentation no matter from whence it came.

In regard to this matter of party, I have said that I think it comes with ill grace from members of this House to decry party. Let me say that I think there was nothing that tended to discredit the late Government in the country so much as the claim on the part of our friends on the other side and of their friends in the country, that there was not any difference between the two parties. That, I think, was fatal to us. I believe that the defence which our friends on the other side make to every accusation that is made against them now, namely, that their practice is the same as ours, would be just as fatal to us, if it could be proven. The contention that there was no difference in principle then and that there is no difference in practice now, was untrue then and it is untrue now, and on no subject was there or is there a wider difference of principle than on this question that is now before the House. We are prepared to stand or fall by our principles and by our record, but we do not want to be subject to condemnation as being in any way responsible for either the principles or the record of our friends on the other side.

Let me point out in as few words as I may, what strikes me as the differences to-day between these two parties in regard to the question before the House: the difference between contribution and co-operation; between temporizing and decision; between humiliation and self-respect; between hiring naval protection and providing it; between contributing to the Imperial naval forces where they are strongest, and strengthening them where they are weakest; between making an appeal that is to be justified to one section of the people on the ground of Imperial loyalty, and to another section on the ground of Imperial disloyalty, and making an appeal to Canadians of all sections of all races to bear their fair share of the increasing burden of Imperial naval defence; between the traditional Tory policy of Canadian sectionalism and the traditional Liberal policy of a united Canada; between a proposal dictated by party exigency, that its maker does not dare defend except as a temporary expedient, and a policy based on and in accordance with the traditions and principles upon which the British Empire is founded, and by which it is and only can be maintained; between a policy which belittles and weakens Canada in the eyes of the Empire, and the Empire in the eyes of the world, by saying that, for a period to which no limit has been put Canada will only defend the Empire or herself at sea to the amount of $35,000,000 of borrowed dollars—and a policy by which Canadian industry, second to none; Canadian sea-faring skill, second to none; Canadian courage and loyalty, second to none; by which Canada her very self shares in the Empire's defence, and in upholding the standards of British liberty, British justice and British fair play in the face of the world.

On motion of Mr. Stanfield the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers House adjourned at 12.30 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, December 18, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

PUBLIC SERVICE INQUIRY.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I desire to lay upon the table of the House the report of Sir George Murray, who undertook to inquire into certain matters committed to his charge by Order in Council passed on the 7th day of October last. In order that the House may understand the scope of the investigation, I shall read the Order in Council under which Sir George Murray discharged the duties assigned to him:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration a report under date of the 30th September, 1912, from the right hon. the Prime Minister, in which he observes that he has engaged the Right Honourable Sir George Murray, G.C.B., to undertake an inquiry into certain matters affecting the operation of the Civil Service Acts, the organization of the public service and the methods of administration under which the public business of Canada is carried on; and that Sir George Murray has arrived in Ottawa and has commenced the consideration of the matters aforesaid.

The Prime Minister further reports that the time which Sir George Murray will be able to spend in this country will be somewhat limited, and that it is desirable to define the scope of the inquiry upon which he is to engage.

The Prime Minister recommends that his action in engaging the Right Honourable Sir George Murray be confirmed, and that he be requested to give such consideration as may be possible within the time at his disposal to the following subjects and to report thereon:—

1. The methods employed in the transaction of public business.

2. The control of appropriations and expenditure.

3. The administrative methods and operations of the chief spending departments, including:—

(a) the manner in which appointments to the public service are made;
(b) the manner in which promotions within it are made;
(c) the manner in which retirements are effected;
(d) the classification of the staff and the distribution of duties in each department and the duplication of the same or similar work in two or more departments;
(e) the distribution of the work between the several departments or authorities.

4. Generally the manner in which the public business of the Dominion is administered.

The Prime Minister further recommends that for the purpose aforesaid the Right Honourable Sir George Murray, G.C.B., be appointed a commisisoner under the provisions of the Inquiries Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, chapter 104, with all the powers conferred by the said statute, and that a commission do issue to him accordingly.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

As pointed out in the Order in Council, the time at the disposal of Sir George Murray for his service was somewhat limited, owing to his engagements in Great Britain. He was able, however, to devote several weeks to the work, and I am personally aware that in the discharge of his duties he exhibited very great energy and industry, and it is needless to say that his marked ability and long experience should render his report of great service to Parliament and to the Government.

On motion of Mr. Borden it was ordered that the report should be printed forthwith

Mr. LEMIEUX: If there are any very radical changes suggested in the report of Sir George Murray, would my right hon. friend outline them?

Mr. BORDEN: I really have not studied the report sufficiently to enable me to do that at a moment's notice. It has just been printed, and I hasten to place it on the table of the House so that it may be available to hon. members during the recess.

DRY-DOCKS.

Mr. HAZEN: I desire to lay on the table of the House plans included in the tender of Cammell, Laird & Co., in connection with the construction of dry-docks for the Canadian Naval Service. These are the only plans asked for by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that are in the Department of Naval Service or Marine and Fisheries. The other documents must be in some other department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought my hon. friend would communicate that request to any other department in which the plans might be found. Is my hon. friend willing to do that?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. CURRIE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 50, to amend the Naturalization Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CURRIE: This Bill proposes some changes in the Act relating to the voting of aliens at elections. It provides that the alien must speak the English or the French language and forswear his allegiance to a foreign country. In this respect it follows the American practice.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LORD'S DAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. VERVILLE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 51, to amend the Lord's Day Act. He said: This Bill has the effect of amending the present Act in so far as it prevents musicians from playing in sacred concerts or at funerals, &c., on Sunday. In Winnipeg it seems they have not so far been prosecuted, but they have been threatened with prosecution if receiving any salary for playing on such occasions on Sunday. The Bill also provides for a holiday once a week for cooks and waiters in hotels and restaurants.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—W. F. TYE'S SERVICES.

* Mr. MURPHY:

1. On what date did Mr. W. F. Tye's services begin in connection with the work for which these services were secured by the Transcontinental Railway Investigating Commissioner?
2. What amount has been paid Mr. Tye for services and expenses respectively up to December 10, 1912?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Mr. Tye's services commenced on September 18, 1912.
2. No amount has yet been paid Mr. Tye for his services or expenses.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADOLPHE LANDRY.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

1. Was Mr. Adolphe Landry, now of Amherst, appointed by the Department of Railways and Canals, and did he act as superintendent or inspector of the work connected with Station street and grounds at Amherst railway station on the Intercolonial railway? If so, how long was he employed, at what salary or wages, and what was the total sum paid to him for his services?

2. Is the said Adolphe Landry the same person who is said to be employed in the office of the law firm of Mr. E. N. Rhodes, M.P., for Cumberland county, N.S., or articled law student in the office of the said E. N. Rhodes, M.P.?

3. During the period of his employment, if engaged by the Railway Department, did the said Adolphe Landry devote his whole time during working hours to the inspection and superintendence of the said work?

4. How long did the said work last, and is it now completed and are the services of the said Adolphe Landry dispensed with?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. (a) He was employed in the usual way as inspector. (b) Forty days. (c) $3 per day. (d) $119.60.

2. The department has no knowledge.

3. Yes.

4. The work lasted during the months of May, June and July and when the work was completed the services of Mr. Landry were dispensed with.

ACTING MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

* Mr. KYTE:

1. Who was the acting Minister of Justice during the absence of the Hon. C. J. Doherty in England last summer?

2. On what date did the Hon. Mr. Doherty sail for England, and when did he return?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Hon. W. T. White.

2. June 24; August 29.

REFUSAL TO ACCEPT PRISONERS.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Has the Minister of Justice been informed as to whether, between September 26th and November 7th, A.D., 1912, there were the following named persons sentenced to imprisonment in the provincial jail at New Westminster for a breach of subsection 'J' of section 238 of the Criminal code:—Nellie Howard, Andell Warren, Bella Morrison, Dolly Wilson, Olie Simpson, Lilian Walker, Estella Vaughan, Mary Field, Silvia Leonard, Evelyn Matthews, Marjorie Dean, Margaret Walsh, Dorothy Crawford, Edna Warle, Irene Reynolds; for a breach of section 288, Mary James; and for a breach of subsection 'A' section 238 or section 228, Rosanna Paragree, Mary Scott, Mildred Hill, Florence Booth and Pearl Emery?

2. If so, has the minister been informed as to whether when the police authorities of the city of Vancouver delivered the said persons to the jail at New Westminster the jailer declined to receive them; and as to whether the authorities were informed by the jailer that he had been instructed by the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia to refuse to receive the said persons?

3. Is the minister of the opinion that, in giving such instructions, the action of the Attorney General in this respect is virtually an assumption on the part of the said Attorney General of the pardoning power?

4. Has the Minister of Justice been informed as to whether the Attorney General of British Columbia on being requested by the mayor and council of the city of Vancouver to give his reasons for refusing to have these persons committed to jail, replied that they had no room in the jail at New Westminster for such persons; and as to whether the city of Vancouver offered to supply the necessary accommodation. If so, as to whether the Attorney General then stated that he did not believe in the infliction of long terms of imprisonment for such offences as those for which these persons had been committed?

5. Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice, if the above questions are answered in the affirmative, to take the matter up with the Attorney General of British Columbia or to take any further action in the matter?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No.

2. No.

3. The minister can express no opinion upon a state of facts of which he has no knowledge.

4. No.

5. Answered by previous question.

GUYSBOROUGH-HEATHERTON MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Who was the contractor carrying the mails between Guysborough and Heatherton in 1911?

2. What was the rate paid per year?

3. When did the contract expire?

4. Who was employed to perform the services after the expiration of the contract, and at what rate?

5. For how many months was this temporary amount paid?

6. What is the present rate per year, and who is the contractor?

7. What is the name of each tenderer, and the amount of each tender?

8. What are the names of the sureties proposed by the tenderers?

9. Who was the lowest tenderer in each case when tenders were asked for, and what was the amount of each such lowest tender?

Mr. PELLETIER: This whole matter is still under consideration in the public interest.

CORNWALL-SUMMERSTOWN MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Who were the tenderers for the mail service between the towns of Cornwall and Summerstown station?

2. Who was the lowest tenderer for the contract?

3. Did the Department award the contract to the lowest tenderer? If not, why not?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. George E. Wert, J. G. Gallinger, Fred. W. Loney, Peter A. Nolan, Henry Laplante, and Louis D. Leroux.
2. J. G. Gallinger.
3. Yes.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY AND NEW HAZELTON.

Mr. MACDONALD :

1. Has any application been made to the Board of Railway Commissioners to direct the Grand Trunk Company to run its trains to New Hazelton, B.C.?
2. Was an order made by said board requiring said company to erect a station at New Hazelton?
3. Has said order been made, and are said trains running?

Mr. COCHRANE : The following information is supplied by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada :

1. Yes.
2. Yes. Order Number 16,987 made July 12th, 1912, directing the Grand Trunk Pacific railway to construct station on lot 882, group 1, Cassiar district, B.C., to be constructed and completed ready for use by public at least as soon as company's railway is opened for traffic.
3. (a) Answered by number 2. (b) board's engineer has been instructed to inspect line between South Hazelton and New Hazelton for opening for traffic. Inspection not yet made, matter being expedited, and no authority has yet been given under section 261 to run trains pending receipt of report.

ST. PETER'S CHANNEL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. McKENZIE :

1. Who is the contractor for the St. Peter's channel enlargement and improvements?
2. Was the work let by tender or by contract?
3. What are the names of the tenderers and the amount of each tender?
4. Was the lowest tender accepted?
5. When was the contract signed?
6. What is the date for the completion of the work mentioned in the contract?
7. Will the work be completed at the time mentioned?
8. Is the work progressing with such rapidity that the department expects that it will be completed within the time specified in the contract?

Mr. COCHRANE :

1. W. H. Weller, St. Catharines, Ont.
2. The work was let by tender and contract.
3. F. D. Brown, Toronto, J. A. Aylmer, Peterboro, $427,325.00; M. Connolly, Montreal, $369,040.50; M. J. Haney, Toronto, Hugh Quinlan, Montreal, A. W. Robertson, Montreal, $395,565.00; W. H. Weller, St. Catharines, $266,887.00.
4. Yes.
5. November 17, 1911.
6. November 30, 1913.
7. No.
8. No. The execution of the work this season has been delayed by bad weather and labour difficulties.

CATTLE EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES.

Mr. ROSS :

1. How many cattle were exported from Canada to the United States in the month of November, 1912, and what was their value?
2. How many cattle were exported from the province of Ontario to the United States during the same period, and what was their value?

Mr. WHITE :

1. According to returns to Customs, 6,622 head, valued at $316,473.
2. According to returns to Customs, 4,827 head, valued at $230,169.

THE OCEAN LIMITED.

* Mr. EMMERSON :

1. Has the Department of Railways and Canals positively decided upon cancelling or discontinuing the operating of the train known as the Ocean Limited on and after the sixth day of January next, or will they continue to operate such trains during the winter months?
2. Has the Minister of Railways and Canals considered the question personally and taken into account the desirability of having continued on the Intercolonial throughout the winter months this train, which is practically the only through train exclusively operating on that railway in competition with the Canadian Pacific trains between Montreal and Halifax?
3. Has the Minister of Railways and Canals taken into consideration the fact that when the Ocean Limited train is not in operation on the Intercolonial railway a large percentage of the through traffic between Montreal and Halifax and Cape Breton and intermediate points, and vice versa, is diverted to the Canadian Pacific railway, on account of connections and for the other causes?

Mr. COCHRANE :

1. No decision has been reached by the department as to the cancelling or discontinuing the ' Ocean Limited ' after January 6th, 1913.
2. The minister is giving this question his personal consideration.
3. Yes.

IMMIGRATION OFFICERS QUEBEC.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. What are the names of the immigration officers, regular or extra, employed at the American frontier of the province of Quebec?
2. What is the salary of each of them?
3. On what dates were they appointed?
4. What is the language spoken by each of these officers?

Mr. ROCHE:

Name.	Stationed at.	Salary per Year.	Date of Appointment.	Language.
		$
C G. Greene	Highwater	1,000	Mar. 3, 1909	English.
L. A. Gingras	"	900	Aug. 20, 1912	French.
Thos. Garceau	Coaticook	900	Nov. 1, 1912	"
P. R Thornton	"	900	" 1, 1912	English.
C. N. Boright	Mansonville	800	Jan. 12, 1912	"
B. Menard	Noyan Junction	900	April 1, 1909	French.
Jas. Demers	St. Armand	800	June 1, 1911	"
D. Neveu	Stanstead Junction	1,000	April 15, 1909	"
W. E. Huse	Beebe Junction	900	Dec. 4, 1911	English.
J. A. Aube	Comins Mills	800	Sept. 1, 1912	French.
N. E. Boisvert	St. Armand	900	July 1, 1911	"
Allan McDonald	Megantic	900	Sept. 15, 1912	English.
C. Commette	Lacolle Junction	1,300	June 1, 1908	French.
F. Marchand	"	900	July 11, 1912	"
A. Pansera	Athelstan	1,100	Nov. 21, 1903	Italian.
L. N. Larche	"	800	July 1, 1912	French.
E. C. Moquin, relieving inspector		900	Dec. 1, 1910	"
J. Sthal, relieving inspector		1,100	May 20, 1906	Australasian.

At places where there is no immigration officer the customs officer acts as such.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY INSPECTION.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has a party of engineers been sent by the Department of Railways and Canals to inspect the Quebec and Saguenay railway?
2. At whose request and for what purpose is this party of engineers being sent?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Advantage was taken of the presence, in the neighbourhood, of engineers from the department to have a small portion of the line inspected.
2. The engineers were directed by the chief engineer of the department to make this partial inspection to determine whether or not the works, upon account of which subsidy payments have been made, were suffering damage as a result of the suspension of construction.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I point out to the hon. Minister of Railways that yesterday Mr. Justice Fortin, of the Superior Court at Montreal, granted judgment against the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company to the amount of $400,000, and that there is a similar judgment to come out. Therefore, I advise him to be very careful in this matter.

Mr. COCHRANE.

YARMOUTH PREVENTIVE OFFICERS.

Mr. LAW:

1. What are the names of the preventive officers at the port of Yarmouth, N.S.?
2. What salary does each receive?
3. What are the names of the officials in the customs house at the port of Yarmouth, N.S.?
4. What salary does each receive?

Mr. WHITE:

1 and 2. The names of the persons in the customs service at Yarmouth, designated as preventive officers, and their salaries are as follows: W. R. Cann, $1,150; H. C. Churchill, $850; Andrew Kirk, $800; J. W. Boyd, $1,000; Arthur Rogers, $1,000; J. D. Pothier, $800.

3 and 4. The names and salaries of the customs officials ordinarily attending in the custom house and warehouse at Yarmouth, N.S., are as follows: Smith Harding, collector, $1,500; W. L. Campbell, appraiser, $1,150; W. R. Cann, $1,150; William McGill, clerk (retiring), $1,200; Arthur Rogers, $1,000.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has Mr. R. H. Haines been dismissed as postmaster at Aultsville, Ontario?
2. If so, why was such dismissal ordered?
3. Was there any investigation held?
4. Were there any complaints made against him?

5. Did Mr. Alguire, M.P., sanction this dismissal?

Mr. PELLETIER: Serious complaints were received in regard to the management of this office, which were made the subject of an official investigation. It was also shown that the postmaster had been an active political partisan. The Postmaster General, therefore, directed his dismissal.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has Mr. Sheets been dismissed as postmaster at Farran's Point?
2. If so, why was the said post office taken from Mr. Sheets?
3. Was there any investigation held?
4. Were there any complaints made?
5. Did the present member of the House of Commons for Stormont sanction the removal of the office?

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. George Kerr was postmaster at Farran's Point in 1896. He was then dismissed and has been reinstated by the present Postmaster General.

*Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. Has William Bow been dismissed from the position of postmaster at Winchester, Ontario?
2. If so, on whose recommendation and for what reason?
3. How long did Mr. Bow act as postmaster at Winchester?
4. Were there any complaints against Mr. Bow during the said period?
5. If so, by whom were they made and what was their purport?
6. Who is Mr. Bow's successor and on whose recommendation was he appointed?

Mr. PELLETIER: The department learned that the Winchester post office had been kept for years in a small room, quite inadequate to meet the requirements of the public, and that the postmaster did not give the duties of the office his personal attention. The postmaster admitted these facts, and the Postmaster General thereupon directed that a change should be made in the post office, and that Mr. Thomas A. Scott should be appointed as postmaster.

*Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Is D. A. Redmond still postmaster at Brinston, Dundas county? If not, when were his services dispensed with?
2. If so, what reasons were given for dispensing with those services?
3. Was any investigation held? If so, when, where, and by whom?

Mr. PELLETIER: The postmaster of Brinston has been removed for political partisanship, the facts being such as to satisfy the Postmaster General that the charge was well founded and that an investigation was not necessary.

SOUTH AFRICAN VETERANS' SCRIP.

On the Orders of the Day being called.

Mr. OLIVER: May I renew my question as to whether a decision has been reached by the Government in reference to the extension of the time for the locating of South African scrip?

Mr. ROCHE: In view of the very large number of requests that have been made for an extension of time, I have decided to recommend to Parliament the granting of a further extension of time for the operation of the Act of last session.

Mr. OLIVER: What length of time?

Mr. ROCHE: At least six months, possibly twelve.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): Could the Prime Minister inform me how it is that an order of the House of January 24 of last year has not yet been complied with? I see by the reports in the papers that my hon. friend the member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) was provided with a copy of a document showing the number of workingmen who have been dismissed at Sorel, 359 of them, I think. I have not a copy of that document, although my right hon. friend at the end of last session pledged his word to this House that I would be furnished with a copy of the papers showing the number of people that have been dismissed in every department.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member is rather outside the rule relating to the Orders of the Day. If he simply wants to ask a direct question he would be in order.

Mr. WILSON: My question was properly put, I think, and I am anxious to hear from my right hon. friend his answer.

Mr. BORDEN: I can only say to my hon. friend that this matter is under the control of the Secretary of State, to whom I have spoken on the subject, and he informs me that he has given instructions to his officers to expedite the report as much as possible. If time were available, I would be glad to look into these matters myself rather than that my hon. friend should be afflicted in this way. But, that apart, the only thing I can do is to instruct the officers to expedite these reports. If they are not doing their duty, if they are not expediting them, my hon. friend has just grounds for complaint. I shall make further inquiries and ascertain whether there has been any unnecessary delay.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In this connection I desire to point out to the Secretary of State that a large number of orders that were put through the House last session have not been complied with. I will not particularize them. A number of them were moved for by myself, and they have not yet been complied with. I went over the book kept in the record office this morning, and I found that no less than 64 orders of the House for correspondence and papers, passed during last session of Parliament, have not yet been complied with. I trust that during the recess attention will be given to this matter, as it will facilitate the business of the House when we reach the Estimates.

Mr. BORDEN: Attention will be given to the suggestion of my hon. friend. He will remember, of course, that a very large number of orders have been passed during recent weeks, and that the work of the several departments of the Government devolving upon the officers charged with the duty of supplying those returns, is very great at the present time. I was not aware that so many returns moved for during the last session had not been brought down. I had experience such as that in the past, but I do not remember any occasion when there were quite so many. The attention of the Secretary of State has been directed to the observations of my hon. friend, and we will do the best we can to expedite the bringing down of all those things.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have, in their different legislatures and halls of debate considered very many important and grave questions. The questions of responsible government, of Confederation, of industrial policy, and the great questions and problems of transportation have from time to time been under discussion in this Parliament. But I doubt if there has been any question during the whole history of legislation in what is now the Dominion of Canada which has been quite as important and freighted with quite as great results and consequences as the one we are now discussing in this House. It is not wonderful that the question now being debated has not made its appearance earlier; nor is it wonderful that, after it has made its appearance, it should increase in intensity and grow in volume, and become more urgent in its insistence upon an answer that shall be adequate and complete. It is not wonderful, I say, for in the last one hundred years peace has blessed this country on its borders, and, with three exceptions, within its borders. Our people have been very busy carving out homes for themselves, exploring and connecting up the immense territory which is their heritage, finding out and trying to utilize the most evident of its great resources, and in different ways laying the foundations of a young and strong nationality. It is not wonderful, therefore that, engaged, absorbed in these occupations, with peace during the whole period, and protected by the army and the fleet of the Mother Country almost unconsciously to themselves, the question did not sooner spring into life and activity. But, although most Canadians felt little their obligations, and seemed to prize still less the blessings under which they were living and working, there were always some, and of late an increasing number, who were conscious of obligations that had not been fulfilled, and of the exceedingly precious privileges which they were enjoying by the sacrifices of centuries, sacrifices which extended into the periods of their own lives, sacrifices not by themselves, but by the founders and the fathers of this great country and of the overseas possessions. But those who were conscious of those obligations gradually gave voice to the feeling within them. They communicated their feeling to their friends, and so the circle gradually widened until at last it found its way into the halls of legislature and into this Parliament. Once having found its way there, the question remains there to be solved, and it will stay there until it is solved aright. It has not only arisen in Canada, but it has also had its mission and its course in the sister colonies. Colony after colony, a little in advance of us, has taken up the subject and has carried it more or less to successful conclusions. But the matter has gone farther. It has gone up from the halls of colonial legislatures into Imperial conferences, and it has made its way through the media of these Imperial conferences until it has reached the highest circles of political influence and political control in the course of its solution. To-day it occupies the attention of the best statesmen in the Mother Country and of the best statesmen and the most thoughtful citizens in every one of the colonies in the great Empire to which we belong.

In 1887, at the Imperial conference, there was a hesitant beginning of things. In 1902 there was a further step taken, in 1907 a greater stride was made, but neither in 1887, nor in 1902, nor in 1907, was Canada in step or in stride with her sister colonies in the Empire. The session of 1909 brought the matter in an abstract form into this House and to a certain extent, in an abstract way, settled certain principles and settled them, I think, for all time. That was succeeded by the Imperial conference of 1909, in which still further progress was made. Then came the Bill which passed this House, known as the Canadian Naval Service Act. Then came the dissolution of this House, a change of parties and a change, in some respects, in the policy in reference to defence.

It will not be out of place for me at this stage to make a very brief, and, I hope, a quite impartial survey of the past history of the Empire defence problem in Canada going back no farther than the 1902 conference. The result of this conference was a step forward by Cape Colony, which increased her contribution from £30,000 to £50,000 yearly; by Australia, which increased her contribution from £100,000 to £200,000 yearly; by Natal, which increased her contribution from £12,000 to £35,000 annually; New Zealand from £20,000 to £40,000 annually, and Newfoundland from £3,000 to £4,800 annually. But in that conference, Canada, never before having made a contribution, still persisted in her refusal. The position that she took was briefly this, that while she felt the obligation to do something for the defence of her own shores, she had hitherto done nothing except by way of perfecting, to a certain extent, her militia. At that conference she refused to go further in reference to the utilisation of a portion of the militia for Imperial purposes, but she promised, through the mouths of her representatives, that she would take up the question of naval defence in so far as respected the formation of Canadian naval cadets. 1902 passed on to 1907 but the promise that was made in 1902 by Canada in reference to the Canadian cadet service was not implemented in any form.

Then came the conference of 1907. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) remembers this as also the preceding conference for he was present at both. The representatives were met as usual, by the statements of the Prime Minister and of the First Lord of the Admiralty. These were not begging for help as they had not been in 1902. England never has. England never will beg either her colonies or others for help, but the fact that she has not done so and will not do so is not to be taken as an excuse for not helping. It is the strongest appeal that can be made to honest, loyal hearts for help. They were given a statement of the present position and it was placed up to the delegates of that Imperial Conference to consider the matter and, if they thought they would like to help, to state how far that help could go. What happened? The South African states continued their contribution at £85,000 per year; Australia continued hers at £200,000 per year and undertook home duties in addition; New Zealand continued her contribution, raising it from £40,000 to £100,000 per year. When it came to Canada's turn to speak she spoke through the mouth of her Minister of Marine and Fisheries and from his lips—I am not overstating it—there came not one sound, not one syllable of either grateful and appreciative estimate of what Great Britain had done for Canada or of promise as to what Canada would do in the future. There came only words of apology and the note of misrepresentation—the words of apology—that Canada could do nothing because she was operating a fisheries protection service which was fairly burdensome; she was instituting wireless stations which cost money; she was watching with eagle eye the development of the United States fleet on the lakes and feeling about as to what was necessary to protect Canada from menace and danger from that source. It was stated, which was not true, that she had made a beginning in instituting a naval cadet service. That was all Canada had to say at the conference of 1907, except that when near the close of the conference Mr. Smart moved his resolution tending to go so far at least as to pass a unanimous expression of opinion that in whatever way the legislature of any overseas dominion or state should think it well to assist by contribution, or by local defence, or in any way it pleased, they should at least come to a unanimous decision that they would all do something on these lines. Canada through the mouth of her Prime Minister said: no, we will not pledge ourselves, we do not propose to be led away from the exercise of our proper autonomy and responsibilities at home; we do not intend to throw ourselves into the maelstrom of European conflict.

Then came the resolution of 1909, and the resolution of 1909 as it passed this Parliament affirmed certain principles. It affirmed that it was becoming more and more the duty of Canada, as she increased in population and wealth, to assume some of the duties of national defence; it affirmed that regular and periodical contributions were not, as a system, the most satisfactory solution of the problem of defence; it declared that the speedy organization of a Canadian service, in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along lines suggested by the Admiralty, was the best method for strengthening the naval supremacy of the Empire; it declared that whenever need arises—and I would like the House to keep that word in mind—that whenever need arises Canada would make any sacrifice to co-operate with the Imperial authorities in every movement to maintain the integrity and the honour of the Empire. But, that was not the form in which the original resolution came before this House; that was not the form of the amendment which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) then the leader of the Government moved. That was a resolution which was the result of concessions on both sides for the laudable purpose, without giving away any principle, of presenting to the country, to the Empire, and to the world, a unanimous voice from this Parliament. It has been suggested that gentlemen who voted for that resolution in 1909 are inconsistent now when they support the proposition of the Government as placed before the House, in that, the resolution cut out temporary or occasional contributions, and, in that, it declared that the policy was to build a Canadian naval service, and that the present policy of the Government contravenes both of those, and therefore that gentlemen who support the policy submitted to-day are inconsistent as compared with their action in 1909. The amendment which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved had in it the words: 'The payment of any stated contribution;' these words were excised and the words that were put in were 'regular and periodical contributions,' differentiating absolutely between the time of need, the period of emergency, and the settled and normal policy which should rule. If that is borne in mind all alleged inconsistency disappears and the argument founded upon it falls to the ground. Is more proof needed? My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) voted for that resolution as it appears in our journals, but the other day my right hon. friend got up in this House and said: If there were an emergency, and I believe in that emergency, I would vote $35,000,000; yes, four times $35,000,000 as an emergency contribution. How could he, and be consistent, if that resolution forbids the vote of money for urgent need?

Then came the Imperial conference of 1909. At that Imperial conference its delegates from the different overseas dominions were met as before in exactly the same cordial, manly, British way. There was no suppliance, there was no plea for help; the circumstances of the Empire were laid before them; they were asked to consider these circumstances and to act as each thought best. But the Admiralty at that time, with the concurrence of the British Government, made a statement before the members of that Imperial conference. They outlined different methods of aid. They said that strategically considered the most effective aid that could be given was contribution of money from the overseas dominions placed in the hands of the old, the experienced Admiralty and naval authorities of Great Britain, with a thousand years of naval tradition behind them and hundreds of years accumulation of the best experience and naval science the world could produce. They said: if you will do that it will be the most effective way of making the Imperial fleet effective. But we know there are objections in the overseas dominions to this, and, leaving that aside, the next most effective thing to do is to build naval units. And they insisted as an absolute condition with reference to the different naval units that the various ovearseas dominions might build—because they felt that maybe insistence would be placed on local control—that there should be one single indivisible control when war and danger and peril came. The British government made a most generous and most effective proposition. They said: If Australia would build a unit and if New Zealand would do her part as she promised to do, Great Britain would add what was necessary to make up New Zealand's unit and also assist in making up a unit for China and India. Then, if Canada would add her unit, these four units —comprising fifty-four vessels, headed by four great fighting machines—would be allotted to the unprotected Pacific coast and thus aid the Imperial fleet to the greatest possible extent.

What happened? Australia said: Yes, we will do that. And they pledged themselves, there and then, to build, and, after they had built, to maintain their unit, and during the time that that unit was building, to keep up their contribution of £200,000 per year. New Zealand said: Yes, we will give a dreadnought, and we agree to the conditions. Great Britain of course was an assenting party to the other units. What did Canada say? Canada said: We cannot do any such thing; we will not do any such thing. Mr. Speaker, to my mind the opportunity was lost then of doing the biggest, the grandest, the most effective thing that up to that period could have been done—perhaps such an opportunity may not recur for many years —for the aid of British supremacy by sea, and for the protection and security of the hundreds of millions of people who live within the Empire. Then, said the Admiralty, if you are bent on having your local fleet, and will not join Great Britain and the others in common action, please build nothing less than a unit, for nothing less than a unit would be effective. Canada refused to build a unit. She went to the Admiralty and said: We can only expend £400,000 per year, or maybe £600,000 per year; tell us what is most effective that can be got for that amount of money, and we will consider it. The Admiralty told them. They took part of the advice, and came back and instituted the policy of building four cruisers and six torpedoes, without a leading or dreadnought vessel—and so, short of the unit—and dividing that ineffective force between the east and west coasts of Canada; many thousands of miles separated from each other.

That was the result of the conference of 1909, and the Naval Service Bill embodied that result in legislation in 1910. This Act of 1910 went into force, and we are all acquainted with what has been done under it. It is not necessary for me to recount that part of the history. Suffice it to say that two vessels were bought, the Rainbow and the Niobe. They were filled with men who were not Canadians, hired by Canadian money. They have been on the coasts of Canada for now nearly two years. During that time not a Canadian has yet qualified to take service in these vessels. The number was not then, and is not now, by any means the full complement of the two vessels. It is about the same now—after some 271 desertions in that time—as it was when they came over to Canada. Nineteen young men have been passed one year through the naval college and are now being examined for midshipmen. Ten more are in the college at this date, and it is hoped that ten additional, making twenty in all, will be in the college on the 1st of January, 1913. Meanwhile, we have paid one and a third millions of good Canadian dollars as capital expense, and we have paid out seven hundred and eighty-eight thousand for upkeep. You have paid the money; you have the result; and you have the right to ask yourselves, what has this contributed to the defence of the Empire and how long would it be under such auspices and circumstances, before twenty-six warships could be manned by properly qualified Canadian seamen ?

Following that policy, as carried out by hon. gentlemen opposite, came the change of Government. New men came in with some new ideas as to what should be the proper and adequate policy for this country in the matter of naval defence. What is that policy? First, let me say this: The present leader of the Government when in opposition was asked what he would do if he were in power, and he made a statement as to what he would do, dividing it into two parts. First, he would find out as exactly as it was possible to do what were the conditions and the needs; and he would go to headquarters to find that out. He would not lie on the broad of his back and cogitate what was necessary, depending for information either on his party bias or on his imagination—he would go to headquarters, where alone that information could be got. And, if, after examination, he came to the conclusion that it was necessary that some quick and effective aid should be given, he would come down to the House and recommend a money vote for that purpose. There has been no variableness, neither shadow of turning in that respect, so far as the leader of this Government is concerned. His second course of action, as outlined, was this: That, in the meantime, as regards the permanent defence policy of this country—and I want my hon. friends to remember these two divisions and these two words, because they are inclined, in the ardour of debate, to shove one entirely out of view and to exalt the other as the only part of our policy—he would take it into most careful consideration. And he said he would link with it one other question, the importance of which and the necessity of settling which no man on that side of the House will deny, that is, if we are to embark upon a permanent policy of naval support for the supremacy of the Empire, some voice must be given to Canada as regards matters leading thereto, questions, that is, as to the foreign policy of the Empire. Does my right hon. friend disagree with that second condition? He has subscribed to it in this House; he is on record as subscribing to it, and I will produce that subscription and lay it before the House in the course of my remarks. The leader of the Opposition outlined a policy one part of which might result in a temporary contribution, and another part in a permanent plan being agreed upon, mutually cooperative and most effective, because it would be the result of careful inquiry and of the mutual mingling of wisdom and counsel. The late Administration went out of office, and my right hon. friend formed a government. When asked in the House what he proposed to do in reference to the policy of naval defence, he made exactly the same answer as he had made when leader of the Opposition. He said: I propose to go to Great Britain and ascertain, as nearly as I can, the exact state of affairs. If I find that there is a need or necessity, I will come back and ask this House for a money vote to meet that need. Then I will take up the question of permanent policy and thoroughly look into it. I will formulate that policy; but before it is made effective I will not let it lie in the mouth of any man to say that it passed the House, but that the country was not in favour of it. I will not let it lie in the mouth of any opponent outside the Empire to say we got a vote through Parliament, but the people were not in favour of it. I will take that mature and permanent policy; I will lay it before the people, and if it is carried it will be Canada's policy, without question or without doubt. And has that been done? The answer is plainly written in the late history of Canada. My right hon. friend and members of his Cabinet went to Great Britain. They spent two months there, and they were not idle. They saw the officers and Lords of the Admiralty, the Premier and Cabinet of Britain, and the secret knowledge of the policy and condition of the Empire were laid before them. They not only had statistics and figures and expert advice, but, what is still more valuable, they drank in the atmosphere surrounding men whose whole lives and purpose were devoted to grave problems of Empire, its conditions and the conditions of other countries, which is more valuable than dry statements or tabulated figures. After going through this process, my right hon. friend came to the conclusion that there was a danger; that there was a need for immediate and effective help. He came back to this Parliament and laid before it all the proofs possible, and gave to the House his own conviction as leader of the Government. He could not lay more before the House, because it is not permitted; but let no man run away with the idea that the statements contained in the memorandum of the Lords of the Admiralty which has been prepared for publication, was all, or even the most important part, of the information obtained. But, Sir, from the memorandum of the British Government, and from these deeper and more intimate sources of information, he forms his conclusion, and says to this House and to the country: There is a need, and it is pressing. I recommend immediate and effective aid in the face of that need, and I do this knowing well the trust that is committed to me. I hold a little more than Canada's welfare in that trust; I hold some part of the welfare of the Empire. Whatever men say or whatever men may do, the destinies of Canada are absolutely and irrevocably bound up with the destinies of the Empire. On my knowledge as given to you, on my knowledge as possessed but which cannot be disclosed, in pursuance of the sacred trust of a privy councillor and the leader of the Government of the country, I ask Parliament to pass this vote. Has he been consistent? Has he been courageous? Has he been weighing small things in the balance, holding up the straw to see which way the wind is blowing; waving a feather to find if there is the slightest ruffle of political breeze? He marched straight to his object; he got the information, he hands the result to this Parliament and the country, and I have no doubt that this Parliament and the country will accept his version and will pass this measure.

Mr. FOSTER (N. Toronto).

Without going more into detail, that is the policy of the present Government. Let me, however, again call attention to the fact that, whether designedly or not, there is a disposition, upon which many individuals have already acted, to declare to the country that there is only one branch to the Government's defence policy; and that is the branch of contribution; that a permanent policy has been thrown to the winds, and there is to be no Canadian naval service. This is an absolute mis-statement of the Government's policy. When this measure is brought before the House, what do we find? We find hon. gentlemen opposite, as indeed is their absolute right, criticising it. We would not bring it before this House if we did not expect and invite criticism. It is the absolute right, as well as the absolute duty, of any hon. member of this House to criticise a policy brought down, and to amend it or to show wherein it can be amended, if this can be done in a fair and reasonable way. But it is also open to members on this side of the House and to the people of the country to sift and examine the objections which are made to this policy. One effect is already apparent, a very grateful effect, and if it is a permanent effect, one which is sufficient to justify the policy even though nothing else results from it. What is it? It is the abandonment of false positions and wrong opinions hitherto held by my right hon. friend and those who follow him. It is the elimination by the right hon. gentleman and those behind him of errors which they have tenaciously held for the last fifty years. Let me enumerate some of them. This policy has had the effect of eliciting from my right hon. friend an expression something like this:

> We are British subjects, we do not want to be anything else; and that settles the whole question.

Thank Heaven. The time was when I listened to other sentiments than that. I am glad they were only vagaries of a more youthful period, the wild oats sown by disappointed men wandering in opposition. But from this time out the sentiment is not independence, or young nations in alliance with Britain. It is nothing else than that we are British subjects and will always remain so. That settles the whole question.

Another statement that this policy has elicited from my right hon. friend is:

> When increased armaments are going on we cannot afford to be idle and rest upon our own security.

My right hon. friend uttered a great truth in that pregnant statement, but, Sir, from 1902 until 1912 he neither uttered nor acted upon that sentiment. My right hon. friend said the other day that he knew every fact and figure that we know to-day—four years ago he knew it. During the last ten years a navy which, ten years ago, was absolutely negligible, has become the second great navy of the world and that navy is within twelve hours' steaming distance of Great Britain. My right hon. friend knew all those years of these increasing armaments and vast works, and launched dreadnoughts, and all the scientific improvements which make a machine terrible in naval warfare. He knew it, he had the facts, he had the figures, but, Sir, he gave no hint, he uttered no words, he did nothing. I am glad that the issuance of this new policy has brought him to his senses in that respect.

Then my right hon. friend the other day, in this House and in the face of his ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, denounced the Monroe Doctrine, and declared that we could not lean upon it in self-respect or in security. Thank Heaven, another mist has been cleared away. My right hon. friend said:

> Any thought of separation from Britain would be a folly and a crime.

Any thought of it? Go back to the market places of Boston and the New England States and not many years ago you saw there a figure, picturesque, younger than as we now see it, standing up in the market places and declaring that things could not go on as they were, that independence was the goal of Canada and that his only cherished hope was that when it came it might come without a wrench of birth, it might fall as the ripe apple from the tree. Gone are those haunting nightmares forever. Now any sort of separation would be a folly and a crime. Thank our policy for that conversion.

My right hon. friend absolutely refused one unit in 1910 when so advised by the Admiralty. In 1910, when it was not a proposition by the British Government or Admiralty, but was a matter for this House, he again refused it and substituted his four cruisers and his six torpedo boat destroyers. Now he is in favour of two units. Speculation is permissible as to why two units. Speculation is very soon satisfied when you think of the party prescience and wisdom of my right hon. friend. He had four cruisers and six torpedo boat destroyers, but the division of these between the two coasts would be such a small plateful that he was afraid neither would be grateful for the donation. Make it two units and give each a loaded basket. But I am happy to think that at last, under the pressure of this Bill, my right hon. friend stands to a certain extent with us on this side of the House and has pledged every man of his on that side that something will be done and that the adequacy of that something is not to be measured by four cruisers and six torpedo boat destroyers, but by something far larger.

But, giving my right hon. friend credit for all those things, let me proceed now to what is not so grateful, a criticism of some points that he took up in objection. I am sure my right hon. friend does not object to criticism. He deals it out fully and unsparingly and he is willing to take it in the same fashion and measure. But before I go to his objections I want to ask my right hon. friend what he had in mind in that little verbal, rhetorical, argumentative excursion that he took before he came to mention his objections to the Bill. What were they ? He declared that some one in Quebec said we owed nothing to England. Well, did he think it worth while discussing that himself? Why did he think it worth while, in discussing the policy of this Bill, to bring that in? Does anybody here say so? Does any one on this side of the House, does any party say so? Does it matter what some unnamed individual somewhere outside of this House says ?

An hon. MEMBER: Rot.

Mr. FOSTER: Rot, certainly rot. He took occasion to go back to the United States civil war, and, in this serious argument, to declare that some one said that we owe England nothing, because she did not intervene in the civil war in the United States and champion the cause of the South. He launched into a very eloquent rhetorical period or two as to why that could not and should not have been done. What relation had that to the matter before the House? Why did he take it up? Why? I cannot find a reason for it. Then he said that some declared that we owe England nothing because of her blundering ruinous diplomacy with reference to this country. One ear is a little dull, but I thought I gathered the sound, and I became sure afterwards in looking at 'Hansard' that I had. 'Some one said that we owe England nothing because of her blundering and ruinous diplomacy as regards Canada.' I remember one man who said that, my right hon. friend himself. I am glad again that he has found new light,——

Mr. MACDONALD: Don't you remember another, your former colleague, Mr. Monk?

Mr. FOSTER: I remember many other things, but if I were to unburden on this House all that I remember, the House would weary of it. So the best I can do is to cull the choicest bits.

Now, in the positions that have been taken up by the other side, there have been many voices; but, after all, the utterances have been along comparatively few lines, and I think I can answer my right hon. friend and several others who have spoken on the other side of the House, without following individuals, and without taking up time with each one.

But I want to ask the House to consider one thing. You use, and we use the word 'emergency.' Where did we get it? It does not appear in the resolution passed by the House. The word is not 'emergency' the word is 'need'—n-e-e-d. Whenever the need arises it is the duty of this House, and of Canada, to do whatever is possible to be done to maintain the integrity and honour of the Empire. We have narrowed, and wrongfully narrowed the question by substituting the word 'emergency,' and arguing with reference to that. What is an emergency? An emergency may be the flash of lightning which precedes destruction and death by but a moment. It may be the sound of cannon which heralds a declaration of war made overnight and when the cannon are searching close for your positions. But it may mean something different. It may mean a condition which has developed because of the grouping of powers, the promulgation of new laws with reference to armies and navies. It may mean many things. But we are quit of all discussion on that when we keep to the word in the resolution, the word 'need,' and whenever the need is demonstrated we have the right and the power to act. Who is to be the judge of the need? There you come up against a practical question. My right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition says there is no need, no emergency, no present or prospective danger. He says that. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister says there is a need, there is danger, there is apprehension; and to do Canada's part to relieve that I bring down this measure. Who has the right prima facie to be believed? Sitting with the members of the British Government, who are charged with the mighty possibilities of this great Empire, day after day counselling with them on the secret and intimate conditions that prevail, fortified by them in a memorandum which is one of the strongest that has ever been presented to any house of parliament, and backed by the conviction of duty inspired in one who for the time being is the responsible leader of this country, the Prime Minister, reaches one conclusion. Another gentleman who did not sit down with those ministers, who has not of late been in that intimate circle, who has not had the information and the means of knowledge of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister pronounces an opposite opinion. He states that four years ago he knew every fact and figure in that memorandum, but he must, I think, revise that statement when he remembers that in four years much has happened; and one thing that has happened has been the German fleet law of 1912, with its deep significance, its suggestions of perils, its terrible addition of striking force to a fleet already most formidable. So I say, prima facie, the people of this country will, I think, follow the judgment of my right hon. friend on this side of the House rather than the assertion of my right hon. friend on the other side.

My right hon. friend says further that this policy is a hybrid, bred of Tory jingoism and Nationalism. They have been together, and this is the result. I am puzzled. Suppose it was, does it make much matter if the rich fruit on the tree comes from one soil or another, is tended by one gardener or another, or by two, provided that the apple itself, in its flavour and quality, is all right? Had not my right hon. friend better savour the apple instead of chemically, or otherwise, analysing the soils out of which it has sprung? But, I am puzzled besides. He says that this is the result of an unholy alliance between the Tories and the Nationalists. Well, I come back to his speech, and what does he say? He says that immediately the resolution of 1909 was passed dissension broke out in the Liberal-Conservative party; there were two sections, one section wanted a contribution only and no Canadian navy, the other section wanted neither contribution nor navy. If there was a choice at all, the latter was for the Canadian service, while it utterly abhorred the contribution. If then this policy is the result of an unholy alliance between the Nationalists and the Liberal-Conservatives, after which parent does the child take its traits? Here is a measure which enacts contribution; the Nationalist damns contribution, will have none of it. How then does the right hon. gentleman argue it out that Nationalism has been triumphant when the very thing that the Nationalist abhors is embodied in the Bill and the only thing that he might look upon with favour—a Canadian service—is, he declares, not included in the Bill? If that is so, whatever the antecedents may have been, the Nationalist did not prevail. That is certain. My right hon. friend then goes on to say that the document shows that there is no emergency, that England is in no danger, immediate or prospective. Quoting from his own speech, he says the document shows that:

> As a result of the armaments which are now going on in Europe, England has been obliged to increase the margin of security which she relies on for her own defence, by reducing her naval forces in the outlying seas. Such is the condition.

I take issue with my right hon. friend. I beg to say to him that the document discloses more than that, that his is not a full statement of what the document does disclose. Let us analyse the document. Criticism was directed, if not by my right hon. friend, then by some hon. gentleman on that side of the House, to the first clause of the document:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada had invited His Majesty's Government through the Board of Admiralty to prepare a statement of the present and immediate prospective requirements of the naval defence of the Empire for presentation to the Canadian Parliament if the Dominion Cabinet deem it necessary.

That has been construed to mean, that my right hon. friend went to the Government of Great Britain and asked them for a document to suit his purpose. There is what he asked for and what else should he have asked for and what else, if he were honest, could he have asked for? He asked for a statement of the present and immediate prospective requirements of the naval defence of the Empire. Without that how could he make up his mind? To whom should he have gone? He went to the only proper source and he asked them the one straight question that he should have asked them. Why should any one cavil at that? Then:

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty are prepared to comply and to supplement, in a form which can be made public,——

That implies that they did not give all the information which is at their disposal.

—the confidential communications and conversations which have passed between the Admiralty and ministers of the Dominion Parliament during the recent visit to the United Kingdom.

That gives force to what I stated a little while ago. The British Government could not put before this or any other House the whole information they gave to the Canadian ministers. All they could do was to supplement, within the bounds of prudence and of statesmanship, the information which they had given by what might properly be made public. Now, what does the Admiralty say?

The Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material, and still more important moral, assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas.

Does my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition intimate at all, insinuate in the least, that that was made to order? I know he would not. I know that he appraises too highly the character of a British Government to think that its leader or its members would, to the order of the overseas dominions, prepare information to suit their political policies. But, if my right hon. friend would not do that I am not so sure that all who support him are as punctilious in that regard.

The Admiralty therefore confine themselves in this statement exclusively to facts, and it is for the Dominion Government and Parliament to draw their own conclusions therefrom.

Is not that eminently just? It is the manly British way. We give you the facts, we make no plea, advance no argument; there are the facts, yours is the responsibility for acting or not upon these facts. The memorandum goes on to say:

The power of the British Empire to maintain the superiority on the sea, which is essential to its security, must obviously be measured from time to time by reference to the other naval forces of the world.

And so, without unfriendly intention, they have to speak of other powers and other groups of powers.

From this point of view the development of the German fleet during the last fifteen years is the most striking feature of the naval situation to-day.

There was no provocation—says the British Government, in this memorandum—to Germany to increase her fleet. On the other hand, there was an effort continued for years, to retard construction, and without an arrangement, Great Britain did retard construction for four consecutive years. There was no response, but rather the German Government accelerated their building. That is an important point to be kept in view. Listen to what the British Admiralty say of the striking power brought into effect by the new German naval law passed, not four years ago, but this year:

4. In the spring of the present year the fifth German navy law was assented to by the Reichstag. The main feature of that law is not the increase in the new construction of capital ships, though that is important, but rather the increase in the striking force of ships of all classes which will be immediately available at all seasons of the year.

A third squadron of 8 battleships will be created and maintained in full commission as part of the active battle fleet. Whereas, according to the unamended law, the active battle fleet consisted of 17 battleships, 4 battle or large armoured cruisers, and 12 small cruisers, it will in the near future consist of 25 battleships, 8 battle or large armoured cruisers, and 18 small cruisers; and whereas at present, owing to the system of recruitment which prevails in Germany, the German fleet is less fully mobile during the winter than during the summer months, it will, through the operation of this law, not only be increased in strength, but rendered much more readily available. Ninety-nine torpedo boat destroyers, instead of 66, will be maintained in full commission out of a total of 144; 72 new submarines will be built within the currency of the new law, and of these it is apparently proposed to maintain 54 with full permanent crews. Taking a general view, the effect of the law will be that nearly four-fifths of the entire German navy will be maintained in full permanent commission; that is to say, instantly and constantly ready for war.

Is that not indicative of danger? Are submarines—just talk to your neighbour on the street about it—are submarines meant for far distant journeys across the ocean to foreign parts? Is the new machinery of torpedo boat destroyers meant to traverse the seas and to protect German commerce or German colonies. Read the whole of it from dreadnoughts down, and what man can fail to be struck with the fact that here—without any provocation on the part of the British Empire, it is provided in the twinkling of an eye, that four-fifths of the complete naval power of Germany is to be in a position to strike at the sound of the bell. Yet, my right hon. friend sees no danger, has no apprehensions, sees no emergency, and no need for any action. In the personnel of a navy, man-power counts, and the man-power of the German navy which it now 66,000 will, when this law has had its course, be 101,500. By 1920 under this law and preceding laws, the German fleet—and in this I make an unquestionable statement—will not be one whit inferior to what the British fleet is at this present moment.

Mr. BELAND: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend says: hear, hear, because I cannot make the statement that the German fleet would be superior to the British fleet then.

Mr. BELAND: No; I agree with my hon. friend when he stated that the German navy in 1920 might be equal to the British navy of to-day, but that is eight years away and the British navy will be doing something in the meantime.

Mr. FOSTER: It is a significant fact that in 1920 the German fleet will be equal to the present British fleet.

Then take another point. My right hon. friend knows, and so do all men, the disabilities under which an old railway with stock of various ages labours in competition with a new railway lately built and furnished with stock up to date and new. The very same thing takes place in regard to fleets. To-day, a portion of England's superiority in naval matters is due to the large number of pre-dreadnoughts which she possesses and which have not yet passed beyond the age for giving effectual service; but, by 1920, many of these will have become obsolete and ineffective. Britain has much to do between the present date and 1920, to replace these by new material and thus bring the fleet up to the required standard of effectiveness and power.

I do not think I need dwell on that memorandum further, except to say that whereas in the present year Great Britain possesses 18 battleships and battle cruisers of the Dreadnought class, against 19 of that class possessed by the other powers of Europe, and will possess in 1913, 24 to 21, the figures in 1914 will be 31 to 33 and in the year 1915 only 35 to 51. That introduces another element. The great European powers are building as well as Germany, and in the mutations of political power brought about by recurring influences and diplomatic alliances, who amongst the great powers knows whether his friend of to-day will not be the enemy of to-morrow; who knows to-day what possible combinations may be in store, within the next five, or six, or seven years? To-day the statesman who stands by the helm of the ship of state of this great and mighty Empire, and seeks to penetrate with what light he has the murky distant sea, is never free from the fear that a possible combination could be made within a day which would wipe out his superiority and confront him with fatal odds, in the last great struggle for the supremacy of the Empire. Any one who appreciates the position in which such a man stands; any man who values this Empire and is not utterly careless, must feel that the margin of safety must be maintained, for it is our life. And, Sir, if at any one unhappy moment, that superior combination prevails against us, all this mighty superstructure that a thousand years of blood, and brawn, and brain and soul have built up, might be shattered and the disjecta membra, picked up by the looters of the world who have not yet left its pathways.

Another thing is said,—and here I include my revered friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), and my gallant friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition,—and they will not object to that: they like his company, and he likes their company as well. The three of them unite in declaring: 'Yours is a money contribution, without body, blood or brains. England wants, not the money, but the hearts, the brains, the brawn of her subjects all over the world. Noble sentiment! They say we are giving three dreadnoughts, paid for by Canada, but to be equipped, maintained and manned by England. Scotchmen, and decendants of Scotchman, they ask, are you to be told that you are not to fight for the Empire? Frenchmen, and descendants of Frenchmen, in Canada, will you stand it to be told that you are not fit to send your body as sacrifice for a cause to which you give your money? Irishmen, and descendants of Irishmen, Dutchmen, and descendants of Dutchmen, we appeal to you to rise in your might and put down this iniquitous Government that imputes to you the wish to hire others to do your work.

O, ye Tory jingoes.' And thus they cry from the house tops.

But, now I ask my right hon. friend: suppose that, according to your belief to-day, an emergency, as you call it, existed, what would you do? The right hon. gentleman has said it: he would send $140,000,000 over to the British treasury. No blood, no bones, no brains. O, ye Liberal jingoes! We think that there is a need, we think that need cannot be quickly and efficiently met in any degree without a contribution. But at least we put our contribution in the form of fighting machines which represent Canada and which will be the finest in the Empire's fleet. Surely that is a little advance on the dollars without the machines. O, ye Liberal jingoes! During ten years of power and great revenue returns, you have sat in your seats and slept in your beds, and yet have sent neither money nor men. O, ye Liberal jingoes! In 1899 you permitted after sundry persuasions Canadian 'dreadnoughts' (à la my hon. friend from Edmonton), to go to South Africa. Did you give them rations? Did you supply them with ammunition? You sent our volunteers, our priceless Canadian 'dreadnoughts' to the veldts of South Africa without a ration to put in their mouths, without a round of ammunition to put in their belts. And they would have been met by the Boers, and, in the picturesque language of my hon. friend from South Renfrew, would have been 'lugged off' by the Boers, unless the British taxpayer had filled their stomachs and filled their ammunition pouches, yes, and paid their soldiers' allowances. O ye Liberal jingoes! To-day, you propose a divided force in home waters. No matter what happens in the European waters you will be absolutely unable within six years with your policy to add one single item to the force of the fleet that during that time may have to fight the supreme battle for the Empire. Oh ye Liberal jingoes!

Let us look at this, not in the heated atmosphere of party debate. Let us see it as it appears to us through other atmospheres. For how many years has the South African been sending his contribution to Great Britain—his money contribution? Did you ever hear it hinted anywhere that he was a coward and a do-nothing—that he saved his own precious body, but sent his money? For twenty years, Australia has been sending her £100,000 and £200,000 until she has sent more than £2,200,000 to the British Admiralty. Yet, we have never heard it said that the Australian was a cowardly man who desired to save his own skin. New Zealand sent her dreadnought, without a man in it, or a ration in it; and in the whole course of the discussion of this theme of Empire defence you have never heard the assertion made that the New Zealander is cowardly. Nor will they say of us, when they read that $35,000,000 is, at long last, put to some purpose for the use of the Empire in providing its defence, that these Canadians, though they give their money refuse their blood. After all, such argument is proof of one thing, and one thing only,—that the men who use it have not risen to the true conception of Empire. They tell us: It is England you are sending the money to, it is England, it is Downing Street, that is spending your money. That is not true. It is the best and most efficient machinery that the Empire has that is spending the money. And the Empire is all one family. Six children, grown up men, we will say, from eighteen to thirty years old, belong to one family. Two men are sent to the defence of their country; four remain at home. Do you say to the four who remain at home: You have no part or lot in this matter? One of those remaining at home provides a rifle, another a kit, another gives a bible—or perhaps, it is the mother that does that,—another gives his prayers his hopes, his good wishes. The whole family is in it—the whole family offers joint sacrifice for the country's safety.

The next assertion is that the Government's policy is one of contribution only; that we have abandoned the idea of a Canadian navy. We may call this a temporary policy, but that is not true. It is a permanent policy they say, contribution will recur and recur and eventually become permanent. The then leader of the Opposition before the election declared that his > Whole policy was in two parts, and he explained what they were.

My right hon. friend in introducing his Bill said:

> My policy is in two parts, and I have explained them. This Bill is to cover one; the other part of my policy is to be matured and presented to the people.

In the face of all this, how can fair-minded men make the assertion, as though it were absolutely true, that the policy of the Government has nothing but a contribution policy? Does my right hon. friend still insist on that? Because if he does I must labour with him a little longer.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I certainly concluded the policy of a Canadian navy had been abandoned by the present Administration, and that the law was to be repealed this present session.

Mr. FOSTER: My right hon. friend may be better informed than I am. I have not noticed him of late sitting in the Privy Council, although I have sometimes sat there myself.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend can tell me whether I am right or wrong.

Mr. FOSTER: My right hon. friend is absolutely wrong when he conveys the impression that this contribution, made upon the existence of a pressing need, is the whole of the policy of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER: Judging by the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite, I am inclined to think they take my word for it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Tell us all about it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is the hon. gentleman in favour of a Canadian navy as a permanent policy?

Mr. FOSTER: Does my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) or my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) expect me, as a member of the Government, when the Government comes down with its temporary policy, to answer the question as to what the permanent policy will be? It is the practice of hon. gentlemen opposite to befuddle the question under consideration. My hon. friend is a master of that art, but it does not count for anything in this House. If hon. gentlemen will hold themselves in patience for a while, they will find out first that there is to be a permanent policy, and in good time, they will find out what it is.

Mr. MACDONALD: Tell us what it is not.

Mr. FOSTER: My right hon. friend argues that there is to be no permanent policy because 'you are to have negotiations for a voice in the direction of foreign policy and that is to be made a part of the permanent defence policy itself and these negotiations will take a long time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understood that the negotiations which were to take place with regard to Canada's having a voice in questions of peace and war was to be a question preceding any permanent policy.

Mr. FOSTER: Well, I will put it that way. My right hon. friend has argued that the fact that certain questions were to be negotiated before a permanent policy was introduced was to him a proof, owing to the difficulty of coming to a settlement in that regard, that a permanent policy had been indefinitely postponed. It has not, and in the meantime we do everything that can be done to make the fleet of the Empire strong; we do more than hon. gentlemen under their policy could do, or could approach doing, within six, eight, ten or more years. We do more than that; we wipe off a long dark stain and redeem our good Canadian name. I am not uttering this simply to use words. I have sat beside men from South Africa, from Australia, from New Zealand, from our overseas dominions and from our Empire, and I have been asked why it was, when small and comparatively poor parts of the dominions of the Empire gave aid towards the Imperial fleet, that rich and prosperous Canada did not do something as well, if for nothing else than to step by the side of the others and give encouragement. More than one wet blanket has been thrown on the hopes of the best friends of the British Empire in all parts of it by Canada's delay in this respect. I venture to say that nothing has happened in past years which has so lightened and strengthened and freshened the hearts and hopes and aspirations of Empire lovers than the announcement that at last Canada had decided to do something. I go further and say that the announcement which was flashed across the world that Canada was taking an equal stand with the other dominions in rendering assistance to the Empire, was read with interest in the chancellery of every great power in the wide world. Now you have Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Canada, and the Malayan States ranging themselves by the side of the Empire. What does the Chancellor say as he reads that news? He says: 'Here is a new departure. We are making fleets, forging our blood and brains into machinery for war. For what? To compete with a country which has no designs upon it, in the hope that we may catch her unawares and overpower her? Our man power is as great as or a little more than hers.' But look at this. South Africa with her two millions, New Zealand with her one million, Australia with her five millions, Canada with her eight millions, are ranging themselves alongside the Mother Country, and the time is not far distant when that fifteen millions will be fifty, and the time not far from that when the fifty will be one hundred millions. This vast man power will not be all in one mass—would that it were—but distributed in four great corners of the universe, a tower of British Imperial strength in every corner, to watch and guard and preserve their interests, and to present a firm, able, effective, and united front to all aggressors. Do you mean to say that this will not have an effect to discourage war and ensure peace? And this effect would have been greater if my right hon. friend could have fallen into line as in 1909 and given to this contribution his support and then fought, as well he knows how to fight, for the addition of a Canadian naval service as well.

Mr. GERMAN: Did the hon. gentleman say in 1900:

When we make our contribution in the way of a fixed sum and it goes from us and we are not responsible for it we have none of the inspiration arising from the growth and development of a system of future defence in our own country?

Mr. FOSTER: I am not at all sorry that my hon. friend read that. I wish he would read my whole speech. If he does so he will find that if ever there was a non-partisan, detached discussion of a subject in this House attempted by any one, I attempted it in that discussion. All through it I gave the objections that were raised. I gave the objections of others and I valued them, as I thought, at their worth. I disagreed with many. I agreed with others, but up to a few minutes of the conclusion of my speech, I was discussing one thing and one thing only, the permanent, normal policy of defence; and I said then, as I say now, that I was not in favour of a permanent system involving yearly contributions. I stated so plainly and I stated the reasons why. But in the last of my speech I took up the other part and I said that in view of what had taken place of late we were face to face with another phase of the question, other than the defence of our own shores, namely a sudden danger and peril to the Empire itself. I said, and my right hon. friend knows it well, that if my right hon. friend would come down to the House and ask for a vote of millions of money for the emergency he would find every member on my side of the House at his back.

I must now take up the argument of my hon. friends from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and Red Deer (Mr. Clark), in conjunction with those of my right hon. friend. All of them declared that the contribution system was a cowardly one.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I must protest against that statement. I never used the word cowardly myself and never heard it used on this side of the House.

Mr. FOSTER: The word was not used, but they said that the contribution system was not the proper system because while it gave the money it did not give the man element, the blood, and brawn and brain, and therefore the imputation was that we paid our money to hire some one else to do what we were not brave enough to do. The member for South Renfrew certainly treated it as an imputation of cowardice. And now may I say that I have been awfully puzzled in dealing with the argument of that hon. member, to make up my mind as to where he was in earnest and where he was jollying.

Mr. GRAHAM: A good deal like my hon. friend to-day.

Mr. FOSTER: Some of his most earnest words were accompanied by such a quizzical look that I came to the conclusion it was not necessary to follow them out as part of a serious argument. One of his assertions was that our policy would reverse the constitutional relations between us and the Old Country and put them 70 years backward.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER: He says that Downing Street would expend our money that the Admiralty would purchase our ships. He says: You tell young Canada to stand back, you shall not build ships; you shall not man them, you shall not equip them—stand back, this money is to be sent to the old land and they are to do it there. He says it interferes with responsible government. Now was he serious in making that statement?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, decidedly so.

Mr. FOSTER: Did he really fear that if this Bill went through and the money were expended as the Bill directs, responsible government and constitutional relations would be reversed and put back 70 or 50 years? I advise my good friend to be cautious in his answer because he will be judged by it. Was he really fearful of that or was it merely a stalking horse for the concessions? If it was not a stalking horse what about the proposal of his right hon. leader to send $140,000,000 over to Downing Street? Let us argue it out. If a $35,000,000 gift will put back constitutional relations 70 years, four times that gift will put it back 280 years. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said in effect that this policy gives away self-government, gives away the power to spend our own money, gives up the control of expenditures. Why, he said, a king's head was cut off because he took money without the sanction of Parliament, 13 colonies left the British Empire once because of similar action. My hon. friend does not say that he did not use those expressions. He says the contribution is to be spent by the Admiralty. He also says that it is hazardous and dangerous to have Downing Street or people from Great Britain running the public works of Canada or the works of defence. Might I interpose here that for 100 years and more Downing Street and the Admiralty have been running the only works of naval defence this Dominion of Canada has had and doing it at their own cost and charges? But did my hon. friend ever study the Bill? He was asked by my right hon. leader if he had read the Bill. It was pointed out to him that he could hardly found his argument or assertions on the Bill as it was, but when he was cornered he said: Oh well, I do not think that is much of a point. But I think it is a very great point. Let us see whether it is or not. Under this Bill, which the House is asked to pass, the authorizing is done by a Canadian Act, enacted by a Canadian Parliament. The vote is passed through its three stages and made law by the Canadian Parliament. The money that is voted is expended by the Governor in Council by order of the Canadian Parliament. The construction of the battleships is carried out and the purpose for which they are to be used is indicated by the Canadian Parliament. The ships are to be placed at the disposal of the Admiralty by order of the Canadian Parliament, and they are to be put there for the common defence of the Empire by Act of the Canadian Parliament. And the terms and conditions of their service are entrusted to the Government of this country in concurrence with the Government of Great Britain. Where are constitutional relations impinged upon by that enactment? Where is responsible government outraged by that enactment? But my hon. friend from Red Deer says, you are sending money over to Great Britain, Canadian money, to be spent there, and the contractors will take a slice of $3,500,000 a year out of our money. I do not place much store by that argument, and I do not think my hon. friend would have used it if he had thought about it a little longer. Wherever ships are built, companies build them and make their profit. If they did not there would be no ships at all in the world. But I think I have caught my hon. friend from Red Deer napping. Is he not a free trader?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): May I point out to my hon. friend that what he has just quoted as mine is a quotation of what is being said in England about the scheme.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend then does not believe any of those things? I am entitled to finish my argument however, and here is where I think I caught him napping. Is he not a free trader, a disciple of Cobden, and is not the innermost principle of free trade to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend is a protectionist.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend (Mr. Clark, Red Deer) denies to Canadians the right to spend their money in Britain. But my hon. friend knows that if we spend it over there we will get an effective fighting force for $12,000,000 less of Canadian money than if we built it here. Is he a protectionist? That is the costliest kind of protection, the bounty. Shades of Cobden! My free trade friend stands in this House of Parliament in the twentieth century and pleads to pay the twelve millions more, to give the work to the people of our own country, give them a bonus and give them a bounty, he will be protectionist enough for that. Just on that point I wish to say this, and I say it in all fairness; there are some things that we can do so as to help political and industrial conditions, but when it comes to the life of an Empire, and to the provision to be made for the vital defence of that Empire at a critical moment, it is next to criminal almost to divert any of the money, which is devoted ostensibly for that sacred purpose, into channels for the sake of industrial or other preference that you think would aid certain interests and thereby diminish the effective aid. Now, Sir, if that is true generally it is absolutely true in an emergency of this kind. Every cent of the money which is to be expended is to go to meet a pressing need, which, if not met, may end in disaster and destruction.

I do not know whether it is necessary to introduce two other arguments of my hon. friend from Red Deer. I shall mention them, however. He says, this contribution is unnecessary financially. Great Britain, he says, is a rich country. Great Britain, he says, has $2,000,000,000 invested in Canada, and we are sending her $80,000,000 of money each year as interest on that. Now, he says, is that not enough money to be sending her? Why should we be sending her $35,000,000 in addition? She is rich; and we are sending her money. Well, I did not know before that when one party paid the interest on his mortgage, the other was under a special obligation to him, and, therefore, ought to protect him, build his fleets for him and maintain his navies for him. It seems to me that each tub must stand on its own bottom. I wish also to say what I think of that argument. Great Britain is a rich country, she does not need your money, says my hon. friend. But who is it that keeps up the fleet and the army in Great Britain at tremendous cost to keep safe the Empire and to secure peace within the Empire even as far as Red Deer? It is the British taxpayer, rich and poor. It does not come out of the moneys of the banks, or of the rich man exclusively. Everything is paid out of revenue according to men's incomes, and according to their consumption of dutiable and excise goods. Well, the incomes of some of the richest men are smaller than the incomes of many of the only fairly well-to-do people. Anyway, it is the British taxpayer through and through, and I invite my hon. friend (Mr. Clark, Red Deer) to visit Great Britain and go through its crowded centres, its country and its cities, its broad streets, and its purlieus, and then come back here and justify to his Canadian brother any shirking of a fair part of the defence of the Empire by throwing it on to the British taxpayer.

But my hon. friend from Red Deer says the contribution is a badge of inferiority, financially. I will not stand it, he says, neither will Red Deer stand it, nor my constituents, nor this country. He says you put a tag on me and you degrade me financially. You say I am worth only $4.50, whilst the British taxpayer is worth $5. He is taxed $5 in Great Britain, you only tax me $4.50, and only occasionally at that. I am as good and as able a man as he, says my hon. friend; it is a badge of inferiority and I will not stand it. Well, my hon. friend has been standing worse than that for some time. For the term of his life in this Dominion of Canada, his valuable life in Canada where he has done good work and good service both in and without Parliament—I willingly bear my testimony to that—for all that time he has been badged in another way. Nil. His brother whom he left on the other side has been worth $5 yearly to the upkeep of the fleet; Red Deer citizens have been worth nothing. Then he says it is a badge of inferiority morally not to consecrate that money with a drop of blood. I refuse, he says, I must have at least a little sprinkling of blood on that money, or else I am badged with moral inferiority.

I do not think I need labour that argument. Now, although there are others that I might mention, I am not going to pursue this side of the question any further. I want to come to something which I think is more important. I want to know whether I, as a citizen of Canada and of this Empire, fully size up the situation, and whether I am acting under full knowledge and comprehension of the great interests which are involved. I cannot do that unless I inquire and examine and think and reflect.

What is the situation? Britain is not an aggressive nation. I say that without fear of contradiction. Her hostages are such that she dare not be aggressive. Her possessions are so great that there is no will or wish to be aggressive. Her great problem is to organize, develop and maintain what she has got. She is a defensive, peaceful nation and must remain so. That weighs with me and I feel that it counts for much. More than that; let us not be misled by a play on the word 'emergency.' It is the condition of things that we want to understand. If the conditions imply danger, present or prospective, and if the danger is one that we, as part of the Empire, are called upon to face and to make provision for, the emergency can go to one side. It is the fact I am after, it is the condition that I want to ensure myself and the country against and that I would like to see the Empire insured against. What is the condition? There, you have Britain, the heart of the Empire, geographically placed in the North Sea, and you cannot take the heart of the Empire out of that place. You cannot change the geographical position. Great Britain today is the heart of the Empire. What does that mean? Stand at her ports and watch for a single month, a single year. Britain herself has only 121,000 square miles in an Empire which owns one quarter of the territory of the wide earth, 11,900,000 square miles. Britain has forty-five millions of people in an Empire which has 400 millions of people of every diversity of race, creed and class. Britain is diffused over the whole earth and the various parts of that Empire are thousands of miles distant from each other and from her. Dispersion adds to the difficulty of government, though it has advantages in some other respects. Now, watch at these ports. Everything that is eaten, that is consumed, beyond a certain amount, everything that is necessary for her great manufacturing industries, takes ship somewhere in distant lands, traverses the long line of the ocean waterways and finds its way into her ports to feed her industries, employ her people, and add to her wealth and help to make something for distribution again to the wide world. More than that; watch what goes out. More than 3,500 million pounds worth comes in every year; more than 2,000 million pounds worth goes out every year. What goes out? Stuff that has been made, products that are necessary to the subsistence of every quarter of the world. If, for one minute, the cotton trade between India and Great Britain were interrupted, Lancashire would go bankrupt. If, for a single season, the wools that come from abroad were to be kept from coming, what would become of the great woollen industries of Great Britain? If, for ten weeks, the food that comes in for her people were to be kept out, what would become of the forty-five million people of Great Britain? More than material things go out. Watch those coursing steamers, watch these channels of communication and you will see that something else is going out. The civilization of Britain, uplifting and making better those that need to be uplifted, the governmental policies, the law and justice, the moral, social and religious influences of Great Britain, everything that tends to uplift in the far distant regions of the world where her wards live, is carried far and wide on these lines of communication and, to and fro, the intercourse goes on. Suppose that for one single instant something happened. Rome had her great roads. The great roads of the British Empire are the pathless seas. If the roads to Rome had been cut off that moment Rome would have fallen. If the waterways of the Empire are blocked that moment intercourse ceases, the arteries glow flaccid, the veins grow limp, the heart beats weaker until at last it stops.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this House, when we come to think of all that is involved in the maintenance of those little islands in the North sea for the Empire, and, measurably, for the whole world, we must see how imperative it is that we realize the gravity of this question. If, to-morrow morning, the news were to be flashed around the world that Britain's fleet had been wiped off the sea and that Britain's communications had been absolutely blocked, that moment disintegration, confusion would set in and the distant parts of the Empire and Canada would have no security, no confidence and no absolute lease of life. When I look at that I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it makes me feel that this is an awfully grave and important matter. When I look at it in that way I say: Put aside for Heaven's sake, these huckstering objections. Banish the baseless fear from your heart about responsible government going to pieces or about constitutional relations being put back. Britain's ideas do not run in that line at all. If they did, ours do not and would not admit of it. But, let us feel that on the one great matter of Imperial defence, we are not a federation, we are not mere allies, but that we are all members of the same body. Does the hand quarrel with the foot because it fears that the foot will endanger its autonomy? The eye and the ear have different functions. The one strains to focalize the lines of light, the other to group the waves of sound and enact the interpretation therefrom. All are members of the same body, each does its own work and the whole entity glorifies and ennobles God's greatest work in the universe. We need not fear any one if we are able to say: There are our forces standing side by side with those of the Empire. Do not cavil whether your battleship be in St. John harbour or on the Pacific coast when the Empire's interests are in danger. Remember, that where the enemy's ships are, there will the great battle be fought and there the fateful decision made. Away with this idea too long held and still held in some quarters, that Canada must do nothing, lest thereby she enters into the maelstrom of European strife. Sift that idea for a moment. From what quarter is England menaced? From Asia? No. From Africa? No. From America? No. Whence is her menace to-day? It is in Europe, and if combinations of powers, or if any one power in Europe aims a spear at her heart, that is where my shield and helm should be to ward off the pointed dart and to prevent the death-dealing thrust. Britain is powerful to-day because of her European affiliations and her European influence; she could not be as powerful anywhere else. I saw when I was in London what was to me a most significant spectacle. It was in the fury and flame of the Balkan-Turkish war. There was a Guildhall banquet at which Prime Minister Asquith spoke; it was at a most critical time; the French Prime Minister had taken a leading part in peace negotiations; he had done all that his country could urge him to do and all that a man could do, but after all, there were cross-currents. Mr. Asquith rose in Guildhall; he spoke as Mr. Asquith, but he spoke for Britain; he spoke for the Empire; he spoke as the representative of a great power; what he said was calm and measured, counselling putting aside special questions until general questions had been settled, saying to the chancellories of Europe: let us keep our heads and keep our little differences back until we settle the main points. Next day, Sir, in every European country and all over the world the advice of Mr. Asquith was lauded, and more, it was taken, and a crisis was averted. Why had Mr. Asquith's words such power? It was because he was the head of a nation whose fleet was invincible as compared with any other. Great Britain's fleet could not make much headway against the interior of Germany or the interior of Austria, or the Himalayas—where a fleet gives a nation power is where it touches a nation which has maritime possessions and maritime commerce. There is the power of Britain's fleet, and to-day Britain is powerful there and through the world because of her fleet and because of that alone. But even her fleet is not sufficiently powerful to allow her to isolate herself from Europe; she must have friends in Europe, she must have allies, and she must work to keep these allies so that in all combinations of power she shall not be left to herself and to her own resources alone. And so, to the man who I think inadvisedly says to Canada: don't give your money because it may tend to drag you into the vortex of European militarism and contest; to him I say: it is in Europe that the strength of Britain lies, it is there at the present outlook where she floats or sinks, lives or dies, and where our fortunes as a nation within the Empire float or sink, live or die, with her. And, Sir, every dollar we can put into the centre of the conflict, that is the place we ought to put it at this particular time, and in such shape that it will be effective.

We have at the present moment two policies before this House; and I think I have pretty well outlined the policy of the Government and what it means. What is the policy which the Liberal party in this House place against it, and to this I wish to ask the attention of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. My right hon. friend seems to have had two policies, one policy in his speech and another in his resolution. In his speech he declared that certain things were disclosed by the Admiralty memorandum, and he asked: What is the remedy, and he stated the remedy and he detailed it as follows: That every vessel withdrawn from outside seas to concentrate for defence in home waters, the overseas dominions should replace by another vessel, equally as strong or stronger. He has not included that in his resolution. Does he mean that that was mere verbiage and that the resolution really includes what he meant by that, namely the two units. That opens up a number of queries. If each younger nation is to replace that which is being drawn away or is to be drawn away for concentration purposes, Canada will have nothing to replace, because we have not had on the coasts of Canada for a long period of years a protective part of the British navy. Or, does he think that all of the outside dominions should pool their interests and divide the cost pro rata for filling up these outside vacancies made by withdrawing ships to the home centre. If he does that he will find that within a few years eighty vessels and more have been withdrawn, and that Canada's share of this would be about eight-fifteenths according to population, and that would oblige us to provide forty-six vessels of war somewhere around these seas. I think my right hon. friend saw how untenable that was and so in the resolution he substitutes the two units. There is no difference between us what we both agree upon is a temporary emergency. In that my right hon. friend would go as far, yes, four times as far as we are going now.

We come now to the permanent policy, and the amendment of my right hon. friend says: Any measure of Canadian aid to Imperial naval defence must be by ships owned, manned, maintained by Canada, to be constructed in Canada as soon as possible (that is somewhat indefinite); to be worked under the Naval Service Act of 1910 (that is divided control) to the extent of two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, and thus shall greater mobility be restored to British squadrons.

Now, this is the question I ask—and it is not meant to be an impertinent question—Is this, on the part of my right hon. friend, a genuine policy? If so, St. Paul's conversion on his way down to Damascus was not a circumstance compared with the conversion of my right hon. friend on his way from his home to the Grit caucus. He refused any approach to aid in 1902, and in 1907. He turned down the one-unit proposal in 1909. He did not even award the contracts for the four cruisers and six torpedo boats. Yet my right hon. friend knew every fact and figure we now know, according to his own assertion. You knew the increase in armaments in your time,—in which Germany grew to be the great naval power she is to-day. And all these years you had full power and an overflowing treasury. Is this a death-bed repentance? Or is it a platform to get in on? My right hon. friend will forgive the average man if he sees in this a device to stop indefinitely all help to the Imperial treasury for the defence of the Empire. There is no doubt at all that if my right hon. friend attempted to carry out his policy of two fleet units to be constructed, manned and equipped by Canada, many, many years would pass over his head and ours before one single item of aid could be given to Imperial defence. Was it for that purpose, to hinder any effective co-operation and, if possible, make a platform upon which he could overthrow the present Government? I do not want to be uncharitable, but this has all the earmarks of a rather clumsily constructed platform to meet the other fellow, and if possible, make it appear to the country to be something better than the other had offered. Was it an emergency—a political emergency policy? My right hon. friend, I think, must take this as a not uncharitable deduction. It is when one is in power, and with full control, that he feels responsibility. But when a man is in the wide, roomy spaces of the Opposition, he can make platforms which he never intends to stand on, and he can formulate policies that he never expects to carry out.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has had a rich experience in that.

Mr. FOSTER: I have not observed my right hon. friend from 1883 up to the present day without being cognizant of the rich fields of ready promises that he has tilled.

A Canadian navy first, and then 'all the ships will be built in Canada,' says my right hon. friend. What does that mean? Does it mean that the boy is to learn to swim before you will allow him to touch the water? Or must you have a Canadian navy first and afterwards have a complete plant in which you will build war vessels? If that is it, where are you going to build your Canadian navy? In the Old Country?—Built by Downing street and paid for with our money? That you object to on that side of the House. But, if you mean that there shall be no Canadian navy until you can build it in this country, man and equip it in this country, then, I say that millenium is far off. Why, it is not possible; and no business man will say that it is possible within any reasonable period for speedy aid.

But, if it were possible how about its adequacy and effectiveness? You would have one fleet unit on the Pacific to protect the western sea routes and ports. Against whom would it protect you? You do not expect the Sandwich Islanders to invade Canada. New Zealand and Australia will certainly not attack you. If any one attacks you on that side, it will be one of the great naval powers. Will your one fleet unit be an effectual protection against such a power? Why, your fleet unit would be brown paper as against the impact of a rifle ball. You would have another fleet unit on the Atlantic to protect trade routes and ports on that side. Against whom ? The West Indies would not attack you, neither would any of the South American states. If any one interferes with you there it will be one of the great naval powers. It will be impossible for you by this means to protect yourselves against such an attack. Well, then, if you do not mean that, what do you mean? Do you mean that these two units, one on the Pacific and the other on the Atlantic, will go to the British fleet and fight at the central point of that fleet's operations as soon as the Order in Council issues ? If that is the idea, let me call my right hon. friend's attention to this point. Consider what a difference there is between wars by land and wars by sea. War by land is impossible without long advertising the commencement of it. But war by sea may be so secretly engineered may be so completely masked, that battle and the order for battle come within ten or twelve hours of each other. Then, for example, suppose that Germany with her mighty fleet, masked and protected as it is from aggression, backed by one of the greatest army powers of the world, a fleet ready for instant action—if such a fleet attacks Great Britain with a coast line of two thousand miles, and in twelve hours is at the point against which she directs its operations, where will your one Atlantic squadron be? What aid will your six-weeks-distant Pacific squadron give?

Brought down to the final analysis you should do one thing or the other: Either do what is absolutely necessary to make your ports defensible against any power; or if you are going to help the British navy and save the British Empire, put your force where the British Admiralty want it. They are the judges; they are the men whose views should guide us.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto).

There is another consideration, this: If you block this measure, what will happen? You cannot make your policy prevail short of a general election, and a reversal of the opinion of the people expressed on the 21st of September, 1911. That seems impossible. Hon. gentlemen may have powers which will enable them to do that, but much time will pass before anything definite can be accomplished. If that is done, and hon. gentlemen opposite come back with a majority in their party —which is not quite possible—then, the matter having been blocked for say two years, must begin anew. You make your fleet construction, tediously and lengthily, extending, certainly, over a period of six or seven years, finding it impossible sooner to obtain Canadian seamen to man it, because you have to train men as well as get them. In the event of such a contingency, and if the day of Armageddon came and caught us napping, I would like to have the consciousness that I am free from the remorse which would lie heavily upon me if I had been party to or contributed in that fatal delay.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Before moving the adjournment of this debate, I have only one remark to make in regard to the observations of my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. His preliminary remarks as to the calm, unprejudiced, non-partisan tone which his utterances on this occasion were to assume, have been carried out to the same extent as his promises and prophecies usually are when made before this hon. body. It took the hon. gentleman the first ten minutes of his speech to point out to this House the tremendous magnitude and importance of this proposal, and he also stated in the first of his remarks that if this measure was not passed by the House, it would be by this country, or words to that effect. But why not cut the Gordian knot? Why not accept the challenge of the hon. member for South Renfrew, bring in your Redistribution Bill—we will facilitate its passage—and then dissolve the House and go to the country ? This seems to me to be the simplest, and perhaps in the end the speediest and most satisfactory way of settling a question of such magnitude and importance. As hon. members are anxious at this stage, Mr. Speaker, to leave the House, I shall not make any further remarks on this occasion, and beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 5.15 p.m. to January 14, 1913.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, January 14, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ACTING SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that during the illness of the Sergeant-at-Arms, I have appointed Capt. H. W. Bowie, Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, to be Acting Sergeant-at-Arms; and have approved of the appointment by the Sergeant-at-Arms of John L. Godwin, Esquire, as a temporary Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, to assist the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms.

APPOINTMENT OF TRANSLATOR.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have directed the Clerk to lay upon the table the recommendation and other papers respecting the appointment of Mr. Louis Noailles as translator in the Translation Branch of the House.

PRIVATE BILLS.—FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 52, to incorporate the Bankers Trust Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 53, respecting Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 54, respecting the Collingwood Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Currie.

Bill No. 55, to incorporate the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 56, respecting the Hull Electric Company.—Mr. Devlin.

Bill No. 57, respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—Mr. Beattie.

Bill No. 58, to incorporate the Intercolonial Trust and Investment Company.—Mr. Barnard.

Bill No. 59, to incorporate the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 60, respecting the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 61, respecting the Simcoe, Grey and Bruce Railway Company.—Mr. Middlebro.

Bill No. 62, to incorporate the Western Canada Mortgage Corporation.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 63, to incorporate the Wetaskiwin, Yellowhead and Revelstoke Railway Company.—Mr. Bennett (Calgary).

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Borden.

Report of the Militia Department for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Hughes (Victoria).

Copies of general orders from November 2, 1911, to October 18, 1912.

Report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31, 1912 (vol. 3).—Mr. White (Leeds).

Report of the Director of Experimental Farms for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Burrell.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. COCHRANE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. He said: This is to provide for an extension of time. The contract was to have been completed on the 1st of December of last year.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. COCHRANE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 65, respecting the National Transcontinental Railway. He said: This Bill is to extend the time for completion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SHIP REPAIRING PLANTS AND SHIPBUILDING AREAS.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he has laid upon the table of the House, or if he is prepared to have laid upon the table, the plans for the lay-out of the proposed ship-repairing plants and shipbuilding areas at Sydney, Cape Breton, Montreal and Esquimalt, B. C.; likewise the correspondence which has taken place between the Government and Vickers-Maxim, Limited, in regard to the construction of war vessels at Montreal. Before the recess the minister stated that there was no correspondence in his department, but that he would be good enough to communicate with the ministers of the other departments interested and see what correspondence there was, and if any have it laid on the table.

Mr. HAZEN: I explained to my hon. friend before the recess that all the plans in my department had been laid on the table of the House, and that the plans to which the hon. gentleman referred were probably in the possession of the Public Works Department to which application would have to be made in order to obtain them. My hon. friend did ask me if I could get the information for him, and I think I promised to do so, but during the vacation the matter escaped my notice. If the hon. gentleman will give me a memorandum of what he wants, I shall be very glad to transmit it to the Public Works Department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have already given my hon. friend a memorandum, but I shall be glad to give him another. It will be quite impossible, so far as I am concerned, and probably so far as other hon. members are concerned, to speak with any advantage on the naval question without having this material before the House.

Mr. HAZEN: If my hon. friend had taken the direct method of applying to the department under whose control the matter is, he would probably have had the information before this. The matter has escaped my attention, but I shall try to expedite it in every way I can.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps I may ask my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works to see if he has the plans in connection with the dry-docks and repairing plants at Montreal, at Esquimalt, in connection with the British Columbia Shipbuilding Company, and at Sydney in connection with the Canadian Shipbuilding Company. Then, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will perhaps be good enough to submit the correspondence between the Government and Vickers-Maxim, Limited, in connection with the building of war vessels at Montreal.

Mr. BORDEN : I shall look and see if there is any.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

Mr. LEMIEUX : May I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if he has received any report from the party of engineers sent before the recess to examine the Quebec & Saguenay Railway ?

Mr. COCHRANE : I have received a verbal report only.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, rising to continue the debate upon the resolution now before the House which outlines the Government's naval proposals, and which is a necessary preliminary under our form of procedure to the subsequent introduction by the Government of a Bill entitled, 'an Act to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire,' one can hardly refrain at the outset from remarking that after an adjournment of this House for a period of three weeks to enable hon. gentlemen to celebrate and to enjoy that particular period in the Christian calendar intimately connected with the spirit of peace on earth, good will toward men, it is hardly appropriate, indeed it is somewhat amiss, that at the first moment after the recess the House should again be plunged into the discussion of a measure so greatly removed from the spirit of the season through which we have, with much happiness to ourselves, and with many well-wishes to our friends and neighbours, so recently passed. It is, I repeat, somewhat amiss that we must turn from that season of peace and good will to consider the very grave proposals which at once rise before the minds and imaginations of hon. members, not scenes of peace and amity, but scenes of strife and tumult, scenes of conflict, possibly of war, war either of aggression or of defence, involving, should it unhappily occur, immeasurable sacrifices of blood and of treasure. It is not a happy or a peaceful scene for the contemplation of any mind or imagination at this particular moment, and it is one, Mr. Speaker, which is in strong contrast to those peaceful associations and happy surroundings which I am sure we all enjoyed but a brief fortnight ago.

The House rose on the 18th December last, and I have still vividly before my mind the eloquent speech delivered on the afternoon of that day by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a speech which, if judged from the standpoint of oratorical effort, would rank high indeed among the many fine oratorical displays with which my hon. friend has favoured this House during a long and somewhat varied parliamentary career. I listened to that speech with some curiosity and with much interest. It had been currently rumored about the corridors of this House for some days prior to its delivery that my hon. friend would, on that particular afternoon and immediately preceding the adjournment of the House thereafter, have the last word and would assume the role of something in the nature of a political revivalist. It had been noticed, I think, by everyone that between the 5th of December, when this resolution was originally introduced, and the 18th December, when my right hon. friend addressed this House, there had been some lagging, some drooping, in the spirits of hon. gentleman opposite and it seemed quite evident to any calm observer that something in the nature of a stimulant would have to be administered. That stimulant took the form of an oratorical display on the part of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I must say that at the time I was considerably impressed by the eloquent diction, the eloquent phraseology and the vivid word pictures which my hon. friend seems at all times able to summon to his command. For example, his reference to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom as to a man standing with his back to the wall, as a man whose glance penetrated the murky sea, and his reference to the last great struggle for the supremacy of the Empire, were indeed striking and vivid word pictures if not convincing or even weighty arguments. Since the delivery of that speech I have read it and reread it and, last night as I re-read it, the thought uppermost in my mind was rather one of wonder and surmise. I wondered just in my own mind if, perchance, the Minister had spoken immediately after, instead of immediately preceding the Christmas recess and if, in the interval he had experienced some slight touch, even the faintest, of that spirit of good will which is supposed to actuate mankind at this season and which that hon. gentleman is supposed to have an abundance hidden about his person somewhere, although he does not often show it—I wondered, if under such conditions my hon. friend could, by any effort of his will power, by any flight of his imagination, have given the House so dire, so dreadful a picture of impending conflict, indeed, I may say of impending calamity, as that which he portrayed in masterly style, in colors at times lurid and flaming and at other times murky and dull. He is certainly a master of the art of framing pictures in this House, be the occasion for such pictures great or small, and I particularly remember his intense attitude and his language during one portion of his speech, after solemnly reading to the House the preamble of the Germany Navy Bill, passed, I think, in the year 1900. I remember how his eyes seemed to flash, how his voice quivered under the strain of suppressed excitement, how his right hand waved and parried as he uttered those ominous,those terrible words about German submarines. Are these, he asked, for service in far distant waters? Well do I remember him as he spoke of German torpedo craft. Are these, he asked dramatically, intended to traverse far distant seas? Read it all, he exclaimed, from the dreadnoughts down, and you will find that four-fifths of the complete naval force of the German Empire is ready to strike at the sound of the bell. Rather strong language to indulge in in this chamber and, to my way of thinking, there is nothing very peaceful, nothing very amiable, about the shades or colors or lines of the picture.

I am well aware that it is somewhat invidious to make comparisons or to draw contrasts between the performances of hon. members upon different occasions, but I think that in this instance, I would be justified in asking any member of this House who has the time at his disposal just to compare the florid, over-done utterances of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with the statements and speeches of the ministers or members of the Imperial House, on either side, as we find these statements and speeches in the debates of the Imperial Parliament. I question if my hon. friend's warmest admirers—and he has many admirers on this side of the House—would have thought that in a contrast of that kind his eloquent utterances showed to advantage. The object, the motive, the incentive, which seems to guide both ministers and members of the Imperial House is an intense desire to examine the situation in the light of actual facts. You will search the British parliamentary debates and you will search them vainly for word pictures or oratorical displays. You will not find in those reports references to the disjecta membra after the final dissolution of the British Empire. You will find no reference to the murky sea, to the lightning flashes out of the dark sky or thunderbolts from the blue—nothing of the kind whatever. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce likes to indulge in that kind of thing and I suppose it is nobody's business but his own if he does it to his heart's content. But what I do say is that the statesmen of the Motherland seek by their investigation and examination to afford a sense of security upon a plain, unvarnished statement of facts. Opinions in the Mother Country certainly differ and differ very widely, differ on questions of quality, quantity, method and on all questions of a like kind, but all the speakers whose speeches I have read in discussing naval affairs in the Imperial Parliament would seem to regard it as of the highest consequence to produce a sense of real security and my conclusion with regard to my hon. friend's utterances of the 18th December last is that his object was to produce in this country and in this House a sense of real insecurity or of impending calamity. What else could the language of my hon. friend mean? German torpedo boats, German submarines, German dreadnoughts within twelve hours steaming of Great Britain all ready to strike at the sound of the bell! Strong language that, pointed language that, ominous language that! I have very little doubt that the minister found it necessary to bolster up his case with something really spectacular on that occasion and that which came readiest to his hand, or to his tongue, was something in the nature of a general alarm.

But, Sir, does my hon. friend not realize that every word of his utterance, every phase of his argument, if argument it can be called, applies with greater force to Great Britain than to Germany? British dreadnoughts are far greater in number than are German dreadnoughts; British torpedo boats and British cruisers, far outnumber those of Germany, and are better equipped and more ready to strike at the sound of the bell.

I turn from the speech of my hon. friend to consider the utterances of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, delivered in the British House of Commons on the 22nd of July last. It is quite possible my hon. friend was present and heard the statement of Mr. Asquith, and the Prime Minister of Canada was possibly also there. What was the language of Mr. Asquith? Speaking at a time when he had before him the most recent German naval law, when he and his Government had considered that law, and understood every phrase of it, Mr. Asquith said (page 871 British 'Hansard'):

> There never has been a moment and there is not now when we have not been overwhelmingly superior in naval force against any combination which can reasonably be anticipated, but I entirely agree we must maintain that position and maintain it to the full.

Can we not take it for granted that Mr. Asquith understood the situation when he uttered these portentous words? The word pictures of my hon. friend seems to be in the nature of a two-piece canvas; he, for his own purpose, endeavours to magnify and exaggerate the lesser situation, the German portion of the canvas, and to ignore altogether the more prominent portion of it, which is the British situation in naval affairs to-day; and which has led Mr. Asquith to say that he considers the British navy to be overwhelmingly superior to any combination that can be brought against it. For my part, I belive there is only one deduction to be drawn from the speech delivered in this House by my hon. friend on the 18th of December last, and that is, his intense desire to create an unfounded alarm in this country and in this House, to destroy confidence and to establish a feeling of insecurity, solely and only to advance the passage of this measure which I am prepared to argue is by no means the best or most worthy method which Canada could adopt to meet the situation, whatever it may be.

I must turn now from what I may describe as the more or less unpleasant portion of my remarks to a more congenial atmosphere, and in doing so I wish to say a word in reference to the speech delivered on the 5th of December last by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. At the outset, I would hasten, were the right hon. gentleman here, to tender him my most earnest congratulations on the manner he adopted in presenting a measure of such magnitude to this Parliament. In my opinion, the right hon. gentleman presented it with a simplicity and a dignity quite in keeping with the importance of the measure and quite in keeping with his distinguished position in this country. I consider, of course, that speech to be more of a plain statement of facts than an argument. It is quite possible that such is what the right hon. gentleman intended it to be considered, and he left it to his more voluble and flighty colleagues in the Cabinet and his supporters in the House to draw such conclusions and offer such arguments and make such deductions as from time to time they might see fit. I find in the speech of the Prime Minister not very much that I would regard as argument in favour of his policy. He was very concise and very pointed in his statements, and his references to the more important parts of this discussion were few indeed. I commend him, however, for the absolute fairness which he displayed in the greater portion of his remarks. As I proceed I shall allude to one or two glaring omissions which I think were made not without intent. But on the whole, he made a concise statement of the facts upon which he founded this measure. While I can offer him genuine and hearty congratulations on his manner of delivering this policy to the House, I am sorry to say I can neither agree with him in his view of the situation, nor his proposed remedy to meet it.

In the first place, it would strike one who reads the speech of the Prime Minister, that he made no attempt to show anything in the nature of either peril or emergency. He did not disclose any unusual or any pressing necessity; his references in this respect were few and moderate in language. I assume, from the words of the Prime Minister, that he based his proposal entirely upon the memorandum of the Admiralty which has been laid on the Table of the House, and I note from 'Hansard' that he used this language:

> Upon the information which I have disclosed to the House, the situation is, in my opinion, sufficiently grave to demand immediate action.

I would ask the House for a moment to mark the precision of that language. All that the right hon. gentleman laid before the House in support of his proposal, I think I may fairly state was the memorandum of the Admiralty. He certainly gave us his views upon the great question of the supremacy of the British Empire, and on the duty and the right of Canada to participate in the maintenance of that supremacy. He made many statements which were cordially received on this side of the House and to which we all readily subscribe.

But the only matter of substance which he placed before us in the course of his speech was the memorandum of the Admiralty, and I assumed from his own language he relies upon that to support this case. I want to be particular in regard to my statement upon this point, because my right hon. friend was particular to exclude from his remarks anything in the nature of confidential information which he had obtained during his recent visit to the Motherland. He made a very brief reference to confidential information. His language on that point is as follows:

> A portion of this is necessarily of a very confidential character and cannot be made public.

He also states that that confidential information was in regard to the foreign policy of England, and the secrets of Imperial defence. He states that the Government took him, and I assume his colleagues also, into their confidence to that extent. They let them understand what British foreign policy was, as far as it was possible for them to understand it in so brief a time. That is the confidential knowledge which the Prime Minister of this country obtained, and I congratulate and commend him that in his speech he made no reference to it more than what I have quoted, and no attempt to base any of his arguments upon any information which he had received in confidence. It was otherwise with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). I believe that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as he watched the situation shaping itself after the 5th of December last, when the measure was introduced by the Prime Minister into this Chamber, saw the weakness of the whole argument. He saw that the Admiralty's memorandum placed before this House would not support the contention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. With his usual ingenuity, and with his propensity to magnify and exaggerate, he deliberately attempted to convince this House that there was more behind the scenes than had been disclosed by the Prime Minister, that the Government relied not only upon the memorandums of the Board of Admiralty, but upon the secret information locked in the breast of the Prime Minister, maintained there in absolute secrecy under his pledge of honour as Privy Councillor of the British Empire. Then the argument my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce made upon this question is this: The Prime Minister of this country knows the situation; the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) does not know the situation; the Prime Minister of this country says that the situation is grave and demands instant aid, and the leader of the Opposition has not the knowledge to say that that is not the case. That was the comparison he made, and it was a striking one, if it could be maintained. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was guilty of gross impropriety in taking that stand. His own leader would not take that stand, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce took the stand and emphasized as much as he was able to emphasize, the secret information of which the House has no knowledge, because he knew in his heart that the memorandum of the Board of Admiralty did not support the contention of the Prime Minister himself in the proposal which he has brought down to this House. Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce always goes one better than anybody else in debate in this House or in speaking outside of this Chamber. He has gone one further than the Prime Minister would go in regard to secret information, and he has gone him one better in information that was not secret, because he has told this House in two or three instances what the Prime Minister has said, and the Prime Minister did not say it. A close examination of the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will disclose that. At page 1415 of 'Hansard,' the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that the Prime Minister said: 'If I find there is a need or a necessity, I will come back to ask this House for a money vote.' The Prime Minister in his speech did not say anything of the kind. At page 1416, the Minister of Trade and Commerce says: 'My right hon. friend came to the conclusion that there was a danger, that there was a need for immediate and effective help.' The Prime Minister never said a word of the kind in his remarks on the 5th of December last. Again, at page 1416, the Minister of Trade and Commerce says: 'The Prime Minister says there is a need and it is pressing.' The Prime Minister never said anything of the kind. I only mention these things to show that the statements made by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot be relied on in this respect; and that he attempted to magnify the whole situation, to place emphasis where there was no need of emphasis, and if possible, to create a new situation in order to justify the proposal which the Government had brought down to this House. Before passing from that point, I want to make the same illustration as the Minister of Trade and Commerce did, but I want to make it in another way. He asked you, Mr. Speaker, to consider the Prime Minister with his conferences in England, with his secret information and with the recommendations of the Board of Admiralty before him, on the one hand, and my right hon. leader's (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knowledge of the situation on the other. He said: Whose opinion should be taken? Who should be the guide in such matters? Of course, he declared unhesitatingly that the opinion of the Prime Minister should be taken.

Let me make another parallel. The opinion of the Prime Minister to-day, as he stated it in his speech, was as follows: At page 706 he says: 'There is, therefore, grave cause for consideration.' At page 707 he says: 'The real test of our action is the existence or non-existence of absolute security.' At page 711 he says: 'Upon the information which I have described to the House, the situation is, in our opinion, sufficiently grave to warrant immediate action' Well, let me place side by side with my right hon. friend the Prime Minister of this country with the right hon. gentleman who is Prime Minister of the Imperial House of Commons, Mr. Asquith. You will agree with me that Mr. Asquith, occupying the position he does, having had the experience he has had, possesses perhaps the largest amount of political knowledge that is to be found in one head in the British Empire to-day. He has had the experience and knows the practice also; he knows every move on the political chessboard of European politics, he has tested the naval question from top to bottom; he is in daily touch with the First Lord of the Admiralty; he has all the knowledge on the subject, domestic and foreign, which can be obtained. On the other hand we have the statement of the Prime Minister of this country, whose knowledge on the subject was obtained last year from Mr. Asquith and his colleagues during the brief period of his visit to England. Then I put a paralled case to that submitted to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Whose opinion will we accept, that of Mr. Asquith, or that of my hon. friend the Canadian Prime Minister? On the one hand we have the statement of the Prime Minister of this country to the effect that, in his opinion, the situation is sufficiently grave to demand immediate aid, and on the other hand we have the opinion of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in these portentous words.

> There never has been a moment, and there is not now, when we have not been overwhelmingly superior in naval force against any combination which could reasonably be anticipated.

Make the comparison, Mr. Speaker, and make it calmly, as you would judge a business or any other proposal. Whose opinion is likely to be correct? What sane man believes that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister could in a few short weeks obtain that knowledge of Imperial affairs and foreign policy obtained by Mr. Asquith only after a long career of active participation? Does it seem reasonable that the Prime Minister of Canada has formed a correct estimate of the situation, and that Mr. Asquith's estimate is incorrect? I do not for a moment believe it, and in my opinion, the House will follow the proper course if, under these circumstances, it accepts the opinion of the man who should and does know, as against even that of the right hon. gentleman who occupies the distinguished position of Prime Minister of Canada.

That, I think, is one of the omissions made by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in the speech he delivered in this House on the 5th of December last. In all fairness to the House, he should have given us the opinion of a man who should know the real situation. But he has not done so; he has consistently omitted to do so, and in this course he has been followed by those of his supporters who have since spoken. Surely it is of some consequence to hon. members to know what those who occupy distinguished Imperial positions really think of the situation. But, Sir, the reason for this course is plain to everyone. I believe the omission to give to the House the opinion of any statesman in Great Britain to-day, or of any man prominent in the Admiralty, is the most striking admission of weakness and the most convincing argument against the proposal that any hon. gentleman in this Chamber could make.

How then, does the matter stand? We have on the one hand Mr. Asquith's statement, asserting the overwhelming superiority of Great Britain in naval armaments. Mr. Asquith is a man who has a world-wide reputation as a master of concise and pointed expression; every word he uses has its own particular meaning, and his words on this occasion, 'overwhelming supremacy', mean all that they could possibly imply in regard to the present situation. This statement is corroborated by the opinion of the leader of the Opposition in the Imperial House of Commons, Mr. Bonar Law, who spoke on the matter on the 25th of July last. I would not be surprised if the right hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues heard this statement; if they did they heard these words:

> But in spite of all that has been said, does the country—do the House of Commons do any of us—really believe that there is danger and vital danger? I confess that I have the greatest difficulty in believing it myself.

It is true that after making that statement, which evidently had been carefully prepared, the speaker did go on to argue that there never had been a time when England was so greatly imperilled, but as England has never been in very great peril—at least not for a number of centuries—his argument upon that point did not seem to effect the question very materially. But his reasonable, calm conclusion was that there was no indication of peril, no cause for unrest; that he himself could not believe there was any foundation for the rumours and the unrest so plainly evident in some quarters. Then, take the position of Lord Crewe in the House of Lords, whose statement bears out the attitude of Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bonar Law. Take also the position of Mr. Balfour, a gentleman sitting on the Opposition benches, and occupying a prominent position in the Conservative party. His criticism, in a very few words, was that he thought the Government were perhaps drawing it too fine in regard to their naval preparation. But the point I make in regard to his utterance in the House of Commons—and it was a speech well worthy of the consideration of all those who take an interest in European affairs—is that he did not believe there was a possible combination in Europe which would strike against England, or perhaps against any other country; he did not believe that any such combination existed or could possibly exist under modern conditions. To that extent he certainly has cleared the atmosphere. Then we have Mr. Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, confirming these expressions in language which I need not now quote to the House, because I believe it is already on 'Hansard.'

As against the imputation of an impending peril, we have now produced at least four authorities of the very highest character. They appear to be satisfied not only that there is an overwhelming naval superiority, but that there is no cause for danger or for unrest. To complete my statement, and to give my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce all the consolation I can find for him in the Imperial debates, I may say the Lord Chancellor has suggested that the situation is grave, but he expresses at the same time the determination of the Government to meet the situation and retain the supremacy of which Mr. Asquith had spoken. That is the only utterance of such a character I have come across in the English parliamentary debates after a careful and thorough search. I ask my hon. friends opposite, or the hon. member who may follow me in the course of this debate, to give the House the benefit of some real authority on the situation differing from those which I have quoted—Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill, Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Balfour, Lord Crewe and the Lord Chancellor. If anyone has such knowledge let him place the House in possession of it. If there be any man who can and will speak in the language of the right hon. the Prime Minister, that the situation is so grave that immediate aid is required from Canada or from any of the other colonies let him make his statement in this House.

I shall discuss for a moment the basis of the contention of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) and the justification for the resolution which has been proposed. I commend the Prime Minister for his manly statement that he bases his argument and his proposal on what he has disclosed to the House, not on secret information. He disclosed to the House only his own general knowledge and the memorandum of the Board of Admiralty, which, by the way, is dated October 25, 1912, and I believe that if any hon. member will calmly go over that statement, without any prejudice or bias, the only conclusion to which he can come will be that that dispatch or memorandum bears out precisely what Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill and the others have contended for, namely, the overwhelming supremacy of Great Britain in naval armament.

What is there in that memorandum that causes alarm? Which are the causes to which hon. members refer when they speak of the dangers and the necessities? I have not been able to find them. I do find that the British fleet at the present time, or in, 1912, contains 18 dreadnoughts while Germany has only 10 and all the continental countries of Europe put together only 19. Do these figures cause alarm, do they cause misgiving? Do they not, on the contrary, satisfy any man with an open mind that Mr. Asquith's language was precise and correct when he said that the position of Great Britain was overwhelmingly supreme?

It is noticeable that the memorandum extends only to the year 1915 so far as British armament and construction are concerned, but extends to 1920 in relation to German armament and construction; and comparisons between the armament of Great Britain to-day or in 1915 with that of Germany in 1920 are distinctly unfair. I do not know what my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce meant when he announced with great assurance in this House that Germany in the year 1920 would have an armament equal to that of Great Britain to-day. What is Great Britain going to do in the meantime? Is she going to rest on her oars, is she going to pause and wait to see what Canada and the other colonies are going to do? No, in the language of Mr. Asquith, her present position of supremacy will be maintained, her shipbuilding programme is going forward. But the British Admiralty, for reasons which have been explained by Mr. Churchill and Mr. Asquith, will not make public what their proposals are further on than the year 1915; but the British public and the British House of Commons have every confidence that when these figures are disclosed they will show the same overwhelming supremacy as exists to-day.

Why, may we ask, was this despatch ever sent to Canada and how did it happen that the Admiralty undertook to give us a memorandum on the subject? That, of course, is made plain by clause 1 of the memorandum itself. Clause 1 says:

1. The Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada has invited His Majesty's Government through the Board of Admiralty to prepare a statement of the present and immediately prospective requirements of the naval defence of the Empire for presentation to the Canadian Parliament if the Dominion Cabinet deem it necessary.

The Dominion Cabinet did deem it necessary, consequently it has been placed in our hands for consideration. There was a request from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Government of the Motherland asking for this document known as the memorandum. That request was evidently circumscribed, it was not a general request: What can we do for you? It was a request made with certain conditions attached to it. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister boldly proclaimed in Canada and in Greeat Britain, prior to the Admiralty's memorandum, that Canada would engage in no permanent naval policy until certain barriers, which he himself seems to have erected for his own purposes, had been removed. Canada would not construct a navy of her own until she was given a voice in the management of Imperial affairs. The Prime Minister made that abundantly plain in statements both in this country and in the Motherland and I have no doubt he brought it to the attention of the Board of Admiralty. He asks: Under these conditions what can we do for you? He has not left the Admiralty much to answer, has he? All the Admiralty could answer was: Give us money to build ships—and the answer of the Admiralty is certainly to be found in the concluding clause of the memorandum, clause 10, which reads:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Bear in mind the language:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid Canada might give would be most effective.

Mr. GUTHRIE

That, I assume, is what the Prime Minister asked of the Admiralty when he went to them. He did not ask: What scheme would you recommend Canada to adopt, he merely asked, what kind of effective aid will be acceptable to you, and he got his answer in the language of his question. The aid referred to is certainly cash. It may include dreadnoughts or super-dreadnoughts but when you bring it down to its final analysis it means money because the dreadnoughts, if given, are to be constructed in Great Britain, Canada merely paying over the cash. So, look at it from whatever point you will, it is purely a gift or contribution of cash. The proposal is that Canada shall give sufficient money, $35,000,000, to construct three dreadnoughts.

Last summer, in the debates on the navy question in the Imperial House of Commons, Mr. Churchill said: 'This year we are laying down four ships.' In the House of Lords, Earl Selborne demanded that that year, that is, last year, they should lay down eight ships, four more than the Government's programme authorized. Mr. Churchill replied on the following day, saying in effect, 'We cannot lay down the additional ships asked for by Lord Selborne, because if we do, we cannot man or officer them unless we relegate to the scrap heap ships that are now good enough for the purpose for which they are used, take the crews and officers from those ships and put them on the additional dreadnoughts.- Language to this effect was used in the House of Commons on the 25th of July last. Might I ask then how the Government look at the question of three additional dreadnoughts instead of four? If the British Government say that they cannot conveniently man and officer the four extra dreadnoughts asked for by Earl Selborne, how are they going to man and officer the three extra dreadnoughts proposed to be given by the Government of this country? I do not believe that the Admiralty had a free hand in this matter at all. I believe, as I said in the first instance that they were fettered that they were circumscribed, and that they were not permitted by the nature of the request to say what they wanted most. Why do I say that? I have the very highest authority for the language I have used. Just eight weeks before the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues landed in the Old Country, eight or nine weeks at the most, Mr. Churchill made his important speech to the Shipwright Company in London. That, I believe, is an annual statement made by the First Lord of the Admiralty on the occasion of the banquet of the Shipwright Company.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: What month was that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The first week in May or the last week in April, I am not sure which, eight or nine weeks at the most before the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues landed on the shores of Great Britain to discuss the naval situation with the authorities of Great Britain with a view to establishing some policy for Canada. While the most important parts of that speech are already on the pages of 'Hansard,' I may make one or two quotations from them. The points I shall quote are as follows:—

The British fleets are now practically concentrated. The recent great review before the King is only one proof of the quality of concentration which the Admiralty has lately brought to its final act, a policy of naval concentration which has given a real measure of security to the center and heart of the British Empire. But there is one aspect of naval concentration which requires the attention of thinking men here and elsewhere throughout the British Empire. The fact that our fleet is not only concentrated in the decisive theatre of European war, but must be kept concentrated, and in a certain sense, tied to that theatre, has been for some years creating a new want, a new need, a new opportunity for the great self-governing dominions of the Crown.

Later he proceeds:

At present, of course, and for some years to come, we are not only able to maintain a sufficient margin in home waters at the decisive points, but we could—by making special arrangements, by effecting partial mobilization we could if need arose—fit out and despatch strong squadrons to the aid of any of our colonies or dominions across the sea, whose vital interests were menaced or attacked.

I have quoted that paragraph for a purpose which I shall mention in a moment. Further on he says:

And here is a great opportunity—the great chance of the self-governing dominions—these strong young nations which have grown up all over the world under the shelter of the British flag and by the stimulus and protection of British institutions, and they have already begun to seize it; already we have seen the development in Australia of a strong modern fleet unit. New Zealand has contributed a noble ship to the general service of the British navy. And in Canada men of all parties and of both races are deeply stirred upon the problem and of the share which the great dominions should take in the means by which it and all the other parts of the British Empire are kept from harm. And we are soon to receive, I understand, representatives of the new Canadian Administration, who will come here to consult with the Government and the Admiralty upon the course of policy which should be adopted in the future.

Then he proceeds:

If the main development of the past ten years has been the concentration of the British fleet in decisive theatres it seems to me—and I dare say to you—not unlikely that the main naval development of the next ten years will be the growth of the effective naval forces in the great dominions overseas. Then we shall be able to make what I think will be found to be the true division of labour between the Mother Country and her daughter states—that we should maintain the sea supremacy against all comers at the decisive point, and that they should guard and patrol all the rest of the British Empire.

When the First Lord of the Admiralty made that speech he was looking forward to the arrival of the Canadian ministers in London. I suppose that at that time dates had been actually arranged. He knew the Canadian ministers were coming; he knew what force and effect would be given to his language; and, under all these circumstances he deliberately told a company of gentlemen, who, perhaps, know more about shipbuilding than any other company of gentlemen that could be got together in any other part of the world, what is the best policy both for the Empire and for the dominions beyond the seas. That policy is so plain that no one can misunderstand it. He says that the policy of the past ten years has been the withdrawal from all distant waters of the heavier ships, and the concentration of these ships at the decisive theatre of probable war in home waters. That is set out in the Admiralty's memorandum. He practically states that the greatest good the dominions can do, and this is their opportunity, is to see to it that colonial waters in distant parts of the world are properly patrolled and controlled, that the trade routes are kept open, and that British territory is protected, thus relieving the Motherland of that work, which might become necessary at any moment, and enabling her to concentrate her forces in the decisive theatre of war.

Mark again, Mr. Speaker, when that speech was delivered—eight or nine weeks before the Prime Minister reached London. Mark again that there is language in that speech which is copied almost verbatim et literatim in the Admiralty's report. That speech was one which in this country or in the United States would be called a keynote speech. It is the foundation, or a large portion of it is the foundation of the Admiralty's memorandum; but that portion of the speech to which we should pay most attention, the most important part of the speech as regards this Dominion, has been omitted from that memorandum. Why? Simply because the Prime Minister of Canada says: We shall not have a Canadian navy until certain obstacles which I have conjured up deliberately before my mind have been removed. Well, Mr. Speaker, in face of that document is it not rather wonderful to suppose that Mr. Churchill changed his views during the eight or nine weeks which intervened between his speech and the arrival in London of the Canadian ministers? The German navy law for last year was promulgated last spring. I cannot tell the exact date of the promulgation but the German Navy law does not provide, as Mr. Churchill says, for any great increase in construction. It does increase the striking force of the German navy and that is the main feature of it. So, it cannot be urged that the promulgation of the German Navy law caused Mr. Churchill to change his opinion in the short interval of eight or nine weeks. The fact is beyond question that the opinion stated solemnly on that occasion before the Shipwrights Company was that of the First Lord of the Admiralty after consultation with the sea lords and officials of the Admiralty. It was not only his opinion but it was their opinion. After all the First Lord of the Admiralty is the mouthpiece of the Board of Admiralty and in parliament he brings down estimates signed by the sea lords and officials of the Admiralty and they are accepted, I believe, practically on all occasions, sometimes increased, but never rejected. Therefore, he is more or less a direct official of the Board of Admiralty himself and spoke as a representative of that board in the opinion which he expressed so shortly before the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues arrived.

Now, what do the people of Canada think as to the conditions under which the Canadian ministers made their offer to the Board of Admiralty? These ministers simply say: What effective aid can we give to meet your present and immediately prospective requirements? I am going, for a moment or two, to ask the indulgence of the House to discuss just that question of the immediate and prospective requirements because that is the only line in the whole Admiralty memorandum upon which hon. members opposite can hang an argument. They have requirements, yearly requirements and needs, and not only in Great Britain but in every country of Europe and naval requirements are on a progressive scale. Annually they are becoming greater and greater. Their requirements are just such requirements as those which we have in this country and in this very chamber. During this session the Finance Minister will come down with a statement of our requirements and it will be found that they will be greater this year than they were last year. Every municipality in the country has its requirements and for some reason or other they are all more or less upon a progressive scale. So it is with the British Admiralty and with every country in Europe. They require so much for maintenance and new construction each year and they are prepared to supply it, they are bound to meet it. Can anybody say, in the fair meaning of the word 'requirements' that it involves a necessity? I suppose it is a need, a need which they are prepared to meet, but is there anything in the meaning of the word 'requirements' which will impart to your mind the idea of a necessity or of an emergency? Nothing whatever. There will be this ordinary budget growing from year to year and the determination of the government of Great Britain to provide for it as the need arises. Is there a single line in this whole document which in any way intimates that England wants or asks for anything which implies that she needs anything? There is no such syllable in the whole document. I have heard it said that England has never asked her colonies for anything and I believe that to be true. But, I know that in the province of Manitoba, Sir Rodmond Roblin, Prime Minister of that province, has stated on the platform that England has come to her colonies begging on her knees, to show the extreme position in which she is. I know that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that England is making the strongest appeal for the help that loyal hearts could make. I deny the truth of that statement.

Mr. FOSTER: That could be made to loyal hearts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That loyal hearts could make. I will read it as it appears in 'Hansard':

Mr. FOSTER: Just read the sentence preceding.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will read the sentence that I have just quoted first.

Mr. FOSTER: It would be better to read the other one first.

Mr. GUTHRIE: (reading):

It is the strongest appeal that can be made with honest, loyal hearts for help.

The silence of Great Britain is an appeal for help.

Mr. FOSTER: It would be very much better if you would just read the other sentence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, we will read the sentence.

England never has, never will, beg either her colonies or others for help,——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Wait a minute.

And the fact that she has not done so and will not do so is not to be taken as an excuse for not helping. It is the strongest appeal that can be made with honest, loyal hearts for help.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Now, read what Sir Rodmond Roblin says.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know that the statement is true. I know that England is making no appeal for help. Yet we have Sir Rodmond Roblin saying that England is on her knees.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Will the hon. gentleman mind reading that statement?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is well known. It will be found in the reading room or in the papers.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is your rendering of it and it will be very wrong.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is another phase of the question which I would like to refer to for a few minutes and that is as to why the position was taken by the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues, which they certainly took both before and after they landed in Great Britain, during the past summer, that they would not establish a Canadian navy, or a permanent naval force, which ever you desire to call it. There was a time we all remember when this House was a unit in opinion in regard to what Canada could do and as to what she ought to do. That was as recently as March, 1909. We came to that unanimous conclusion under rather strange circumstances. Those of us who remember the debate on that occasion will remember also that there was something approaching a real panic, a real alarm, throughout the length and breadth of the British world, or throughout the whole world, one might say. That alarm was caused largely by a speech delivered in the House of Commons in England on the 16th of March by Mr. Arthur Balfour, at the time leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition in that Parliament. During the course of that speech Mr. Balfour stated that because the Government of that day had receded from what was known as the two power fleet construction and had dropped the building of about one ship a year Germany had taken advantage of that temporary cessation of shipbuilding in Great Britain and Germany had pressed forward and accelerated as rapidly as possible her shipbuilding programme and that as a result the time would come, probably within three years of the time of which Mr. Balfour spoke, when Germany would be equal if not superior to Great Britain in the North sea, that the time would come within a period of three years when British supremacy would be challenged in those waters. That speech caused a tremendous sensation throughout the world and throughout the British Empire in particular. Mr. Balfour's prediction, it is true, has not been anything like verified. His predictions were based on such accurate knowledge in regard to construction as he could reasonably find, but in every case these predictions were far in excess of what actually happened with regard to construction in Germany and far below the construction which has taken place in Great Britain. Mr. Balfour announced that the crucial point when the supremacy of Great Britain upon the seas might be successfully challenged by Germany would be the 1st of April, 1912, when Germany would probably have 21 dreadnoughts as against only 25 for Great Britain, but, as a matter of fact, on that date Great Britain had 18 dreadnoughts and Germany had only 10. However that may be, the statement made in March, 1909, caused general alarm. The atmosphere became highly electrified; Australia cabled an offer of one dreadnought, and a proposal to increase it to two; New Zealand cabled an offer of one dreadnought. We, in Canada were perhaps more calm than they were in the other colonies, but my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) in that excited time, rose to the occasion in his place in this House, and notwithstanding the electricity in the air, notwithstanding the strained condition throughout the Empire and throughout Europe, notwithstanding the offer of dreadnoughts by the other colonies; he delivered himself of what I think we all considered probably the ablest effort of his life. He spoke reasonably and calmly, reviewing the whole situation piece by piece with the object of ascertaining actual facts, and of seeing what Canada could and should do to relieve the situation. The hon. gentleman impressed the House greatly upon that occasion and as a result of his motion, after amendment, this House came to the unanimous conclusion that the maintenance of British supremacy was a positive necessity, not only for the British Empire, but to secure the peace of the world. The House also came to the conclusion that Canada could best do her share both for Canada and the Empire, by constructing a naval service of her own, in co-operation with the British Admiralty. The House also affirmed that a proposal for a regular periodical payment of contributions to Great Britain was not a proper one and:

The House expresses the firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

We all agreed to that resolution and there was great satisfaction expressed throughout the country. We did not offer dreadnoughts, we refused to give contributions, and everyone in Canada and probably in Great Britain approved the course we had taken. And the man who is probably most entitled to the credit for that situation, is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, so far at least as its initiation was concerned. The hon. gentleman on that occasion gave some pretty solid reasons for his argument against a regular or periodical contribution. He told us in his speech on the 18th of December last that there is a distinction between an isolated gift or contribution and a regular or periodical payment, and I agree with him that there is some distinction between the two. If a judge were asked to interpret the clause which I have just read about regular and periodical payments, as against a proposal to make an isolation contribution, I have no doubt whatever that the judge would hold that the hon. member is technically right in holding that there is a distinction. But the argument of the hon. gentleman so well put in this House in March 1909 applies with just the same force to a single contribution as to a regular contribution. What were the points he emphasized in that speech—and I give them from memory—he told the House that the idea of a money payment was not right, that it seemed to him like hiring somebody else to do the work that we should do ourselves, that it looked like hiring a man to protect your own family, and, if I remember correctly, another of his objections was that a money contribution smacked too much of tribute. The argument in that case is only relative; a single contribution may not smack of tribute while a periodical payment or forced payment might smack of tribute——

Mr. FOSTER: I do not suppose it is very important, but, as a matter of fact, I stated that contribution, as spoken of by some, smacks of tribute, but for myself I did not lay much stress on that argument.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not much stress, but only a little stress.

Mr. FOSTER: I will allow my right hon. friend the comfort of taking his own meaning out of it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The position then is, that that was mentioned as a reason against contribution, but that my hon. friend said he would not lay much stress upon it.

Mr. FOSTER: Because it was not forced.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, perhaps the point that the hon. gentleman laid most stress upon was the fact that a contribution was objectionable because it did not develop in Canada a naval sentiment, that the seed did not go into the ground, that nothing took root here, and that what we wanted in Canada was the development of a Canadian sentiment, and particularly something that would develop in Canada the defence of our ports, our harbours, and our trade routes. I remember his saying also that the question of trade and commerce and defence were inseparably bound together, and could not be disassociated, and he laid down the principle that it was the right and duty of Canada to take up the question of defence of her ports and harbours and trade routes. In this the whole House agreed with him, and speaking at this moment I think I may say Mr. Speaker, that sitting to your left in this House there is not a single member who does not stand strictly by the affirmation made by the hon. member in 1909.

If there has been any deviation, any backsliding, any repudiation, that is to be found among those who sit on the right side of the House, and sad to relate, in the very Cabinet itself. On this side, we believe in the maintenance of British supremacy, first, last, and all the time. We believe that Canada has not only a right but a positive duty imposed upon her, to do not only her fair and proper share but a generous share in maintaining that supremacy. We believe also, as expressed in that resolution, if the time come when there is need, that Canada will come to the front; and the policy on such an occasion was explained by my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in the course of his speech that if need be, if emergency should arise, if danger should come, the policy of the Liberal party is not a contribution of $35,000,000 or even, as he stated, of four times $35,000,000, but the policy of those on this side of the House is a policy of the last dollar and the last man. That policy has been declared time and time again both in this House and out of it. I mention this because I think my hon. friend took about three-quarters of his speech to argue labouriously what we on this side consider axiomatic matters, matters beyond question, in regard to which not a syllable of argument was necessary. That was my hon. friend's opinion in 1909, and the opinion of his leader the Prime Minister. Following that resolution, this Government took action and sent its delegates. I think they were Mr. Justice Brodeur, at the present time, and Sir Frederick Borden, at that time Minister of Militia and Defence. My right hon. friend the present Prime Minister also went to London on that occasion, either on private business or for pleasure, and when he was there made a speech at an important banquet. The Dominion Day dinner in London is an important occasion, and speeches made there are reported throughout the length and breadth of the British Empire. On Dominion Day 1909, the present Prime Minister made a statement strongly confirming the stand he had taken in this Parliament that the proper policy for Canada to pursue was the construction of a Canadian navy. Later on when he came back to this country after his visit to Great Britain, he was tendered a banquet by his admirers in Halifax, and at that banquet he made the matter very plain and very pointed. I am not going to read the references but will give the result of what he says, if not his exact language. He stated that there has not been for forty years any constitutional difficulty in establishing a Canadian navy. He said that the policy we adopted unanimously in Parliament last session was the best policy, but it might not commend itself to a certain wing of the Conservative party. I assume from that, he meant that wing of the party led by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and probably now led by the Postmaster General. He further stated that the Canadian navy should be built in this country and he gave as his reasons that we have the iron, the coal, the lumber and the men.

Mr. GRAHAM: And the nickel.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Now, I do not believe that he was fully aware at that time of the effect that his recent colleague, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had been producing in the province of Quebec, during the present Prime Minister's absence in England in the year 1909. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier seemed to be dissatisfied after the House rose, so he started a little propaganda of his own and went under the wing of certain other gentlemen, dissatisfied or dissentient Liberals, namely, Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne. They started to stir up in the province of Quebec quite a little trouble over this Canadian naval resolution. Mr. Borden, when he spoke in Halifax in the autumn of that year, did not know, I think, the state of matters in the province of Quebec, because in his speech there he reaffirmed his position on all points. Then the session following, the Government acted promptly and brought in the Canadian Naval Service Act. At the first reading on Jaunary 12, 1910, the present Prime Minister spoke on that question, and then for the first time did he let a word fall in regard to Canadian representation in Imperial affairs. When the second reading took place on February 3, 1910, he just made a reference to it; but when he opposed the second reading of the Bill in his amendment not a single reference did he make to that constitutional question of Canadian representation in Imperial affairs. He said that our policy was wrong, and he moved an alternative that we should give dreadnoughts. Another gentleman, that veteran statesman, Sir Charles Tupper, wrote a letter in terms very strong and very pointed; but that was disregarded and the second reading of the Bill was opposed. The Bill, however, carried and nothing very much transpired until the autumn of 1910. Then came about that now celebrated by-election in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska. It was not until then that anyone realized the strength of the movement headed by my hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier, by Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne. The constituency of Drummond and Arthabaska, was a strong Liberal riding up to that time. The Government candidate supporting the Canadian navy was defeated by a man who called himself a Nationalist, a man who had been supported by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, until recently a member of the present Cabinet. The campaign on that occasion was most bitter. I do not believe the expressions used in that campaign, or the articles published in the daily press at that time, if published in Ontario or England, would have passed the Crown Attorney without a prosecution for sedition or something of that kind being instituted. The battle was fiercely waged, and the Government candidate was defeated by a man who would have nothing to do with Great Britain or navies or anything of the kind, and I believe that was the precise moment of time when the present Prime Minister deliberately made up his mind and so did the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They said: 'this is our chance, this is the thin edge of the wedge and we will drive it home.' A telegram came from Montreal to the Minister of Trade and Commerce shortly before that election in which the question was asked him as to what the electors should do. Although I have not the exact language before me, I know in a general way what was the telegram in reply. It said: 'Vote to turn out the Laurier admnistration,' which in practice and theory meant to vote for the Nationalist candidate as there was no Conservative. It was either the night of the election or the night after the election that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a speech in Toronto and in the course of that speech he said: ' You must not be too hard on Mr. Bourassa. There is good stuff in Bourassa.'

Mr. FOSTER: So thought my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

Mr. GUTHRIE: And I think that the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) also delivered himself to the same effect on the same occasion. It was on that night in the autumn of 1910 that the future course of the Conservative party in regard to the navy took definite form and shape. The House met in November, 1910, and on that occasion Mr. Monk, member for Jacques Cartier, moved an amendment to the speech from the Throne, the language of which can be found on the pages of 'Hansard.' The portion of that amendment to which I desire to call the attention of hon. members of this House was a statement of policy and principle upheld by the member for Jacques Cartier, and which seems to have appealed to the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister, as he voted for the amendment. It was as follows :

This House regrets that the Speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy, and the general question of the contribution of Canada to Imperial armaments.

As I have stated, that amendment was moved by the member for Jacques Cartier, at that time leader of the Nationalist Party in Quebec, and supported by the present Prime Minister and by nine of those gentlemen who sit in the Cabinet with him to-day. They understood the nature of the resolution; they knew for what they were voting. We assume that their votes were indicative of their opinions and convictions —and they deliberately voted that the question of naval policy should in the first instance be submitted to the people. After the introduction of the trade proposal between Canada and the United States in the month of January, 1911, and in the subsequent proceedings of that session of the House, the naval question dropped almost entirely out of sight. So far as eight of the provinces of Canada were concerned, there was little further discussion in regard to naval matters. In the province of Quebec, the discussion still went on, and increased in bitterness. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, in his speech upon this question on the 5th of December, told the House that his policy had been before the country for at least two years, as he had spoken in this Chamber in November, 1910, and had then enunciated his policy. But he never went to the people of the country upon that policy; at the general election of 1911 he made not a single appeal to the people based on the attitude of his party in the matter. The special manifesto issued by him at that time contains not one word of the policy he enunciated in this House in November, 1910. It is evident that on account of the alliance he had made with the Nationalists of Quebec he could not make public the policy he enunciated in 1910. The policy upon which he went to the country in 1911 was one to the effect that the Canadian Naval Service Act was of no practical use, and might cause much waste of money and much loss of property and life. Here is the wording of it :

Since the last general election the Government has entered upon a new line of policy in regard to naval affairs, which is of far-reaching importance. The policy adopted was not debated before the people during the election, and it bears all the earmarks of a hasty and ill-considered scheme. In my judgment our duty to the Empire cannot be properly or effectively fulfilled by such a measure. I hold that the plan of the Government contemplates the creation of a naval force that will be absolutely useless in time of war, and therefore of no practical benefit to Canada or to the Empire. It will cost immense sums of money to build, equip and maintain. It will probably result in time of war in the useless sacrifice of many valuable lives, and it will not add one iota to the fighting strength of the Empire. The more it is considered, the more does it become evident that the whole naval plan of the Government is an unfortunate blunder.

That is the statement made in the pre-election manifesto of my hon. friend the Prime Minister, and if he went before the electors with any naval policy at all, that was the one. I believe that in eight of the provinces of Canada not a single word was uttered by anybody during the election campaign, in regard to the naval policy. In the province of Quebec I will grant that it was the main issue, but do you see how skilfully my hon. friend's manifesto was prepared? He did not assert that he would go to England, ascertain the conditions, and then, if aid were needed, that he would grant it by contribution or otherwise. He did not say that after having settled certain constitutional questions, he would establish a permanent Canadian navy. The only inference that can be drawn from his manifesto is this: The navy of the Liberal administration is no good; they have committed a blunder, and if you give me a chance I will wipe it out. Why did he say this? Because that is the compact between the Conservative and the Nationalist parties! I wonder if in England they know of that compact? I wonder if the Lords of the Admiralty know why my hon. friend the Prime Minister could not establish a naval service? I venture the assertion that the Conservative party to-day is bound, not by any verbal pledge, but by a written document, to abolish the Canadian naval service, and that document is to-day in the hands of Nationalist leaders. Do not think for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that men like Henri Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne will take the word of the Conservatives of this country. We know of the case, in the good riding of Nipissing; of a gentleman now in the Upper House, occupying the position of a senator, who had a large number of French Canadians in his riding, and who sent to Mr. Bourassa a call for help. He got the help.

but he had to sign the document first! We know the experimence of a gentleman in East Algoma, who also had a large number of French Canadians voting in his riding—a good Scotchman too, and I am almost ashamed of him. He sent out to Bourassa the cry for help, and the help came—but not until the documents were signed. I believe the Conservative party in Canada to-day is just as effectually tied by the Nationalist pledge as any party can be, and that that pledge exists in the shape of a written document, and can be held over them as a menace to their existence during their whole administration. That is the reason they cannot have a permanent Canadian navy.

Sir, this constitutional objection is to me the most utter nonsense. What has the Canadian Naval Service to do with representation in the Imperial Parliament? We established in this country our own militia; did anyone doubt our right to do so? It was our primary right; we did not have to consult the people about it. I assume that the first duty of gentlemen elected to this House is to provide Supply for the King, and the second to provide necessary defence for the country. These are elementary duties and functions they are bound to perform without any mandate from the people. We established militia in this country on that basis; we proposed to establish and did establish a Canadian naval service upon that basis—we needed no mandate from anybody and there was no constitutional question involved. Possibly my hon. friend does not intend to establish a Canadian naval service, but to aid some portion or division of the Imperial service. I ask him now, and ask any hon. gentleman sitting around him, whether in fact there is any objection, constitutional or otherwise, to establishing on the seacoasts of Canada that degree of protection we established by our militia in the interior. Look at the clause in the Militia Act and the clause in the Canadian Naval Service Act, almost identical in terms.

Mr. LANCASTER: In answer to the hon. member I would point out that the British North America Act distinctly says that any navy of or in Canada shall be under the control of the King and this Act, which he is extolling, said it shall be under the control of the Governor in Council. There is that difference.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I read the Canadian Militia Act and I see that clause saying that if the Governor in Council see fit he can send the militia to any part of the world, and a similar clause in the Naval Service Act. The matter is not important and I do not propose to argue it, but if my hon. friend desires to satisfy himself he can go to the library and compare and examine both statutes.

Mr. LANCASTER: Read the British North America Act and you will understand.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My point is that there is nothing to prevent the establishment of a Canadian naval service now, no difficulty, constitutional or otherwise, and the only reason that a constitutional difficulty has been raised is to provide a barrier for members of this Government to enable them to carry out their pledge to the Nationalist party in Quebec and abolish the Canadian Naval Service altogether. Were it not for that I do not for a moment think that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister would come down to this House with this present proposal. I cannot believe in my heart, after hearing and reading his statement and considering it as seriously as I can, that the Prime Minister himself thinks there is the slightest warrant or authority for this proposal which he now makes for immediate aid to the British Empire. I do not believe that he considers there is danger; he has certainly made out no case, he has merely offered a subterfuge for the purpose of getting around a difficulty which he did not see when he spoke in Halifax in 1909, and said there was no constitutional difficulty. He is now trying to get around the difficulty to which his party committed him when they entered that abominable alliance with the Nationalist party in Quebec.

What is the proper course under the circumstances? Calmly as I can put it, what should Canada do if my contention is right? If Mr. Asquith's statement is correct, if Mr. Churchill's view is correct, what should Canada do—because we all agree she should do something? Should she not follow Mr. Churchill's advice given in his speech before the Shipwrights Company? I submit she should. Here we have an alternative policy which I know has been criticised at one time on the ground of expense and on another occasion on the ground that it will take too long to construct; various criticisms are offered on various occasions but are they real or substantial? Can we not construct dreadnoughts in this country? I would like any man to say we cannot. Suppose we take six, eight or ten years, is there any difficulty about that matter? Is there any danger threatening now? The policy of the Opposition upon this question is: Let us start and start now. If we take the advice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in these cases beginnings of necessity must be small. But it was not a small beginning, it was a substantial beginning which the previous Government sought to make, a beginning involving about $13,000,000 for construction, and about $3,500,000 for maintenance, not a bad beginning in any way. What objection can be raised or should be raised to Canada making a beginning now even on a more extended scale than she proposed to make two years ago? The amendment of my hon. leader asks for a Canadian navy and the construction of two complete units—one on the Pacific and one on the Atlantic, and the only argument that I have heard advanced against this policy is that you cannot build it in this country, it would take too long. I can only say that if, after the recent change of Government, the present Government had taken hold of the matter as they should have, their shipyards would have been ready to start construction this spring. Instead of that, to carry out their Nationalist obligations, the Government returned the cheques and wiped off the tenders and did nothing. How the Minister of Trade and Commerce charged that the Liberal party lay on their beds and tossed and tumbled and did nothing! What have my hon. friends opposite been doing for the last fifteen months? Absolutely nothing except trying to get up some sort of policy which will satisfy the jingo end of their supporters and avoid entanglements with the Nationalists with whom they have entered into a solemn obligation. I was amused when the Minister of Trade and Commerce placed as an argument before this House that while the Canadian ministers were in London they were carried away with the situation. I think he said they drank deeply of the atmosphere. I can only say this, that there must be something in that atmosphere or these associations which is fatal to correct ideas on the naval question so far as Canada is concerned when we can see a pronounced Nationalist member of the Government who has been a few months in old London drinking in that atmosphere come back to this country and run a close second to the Minister of Defence as an advanced jingoist. I was surprised to hear the Postmaster General speak in this House of the loaded cannon of Germany pointed directly at England.

Mr. PELLETIER: I did not say that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Or words to that effect.

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not wish to prolong the discussion so I absolutely withdraw that statement. But I do know that there is another minister in that Cabinet, a personal friend of mine, who, in my judgment, has been guilty of very grievous impropriety—and he is a man who I thought would know better what was due to himself and to the country. But he, it seems, was so carried away with his jingo war-like ideas that he could not control even his own tongue under special circumstances. Speaking on a public occasion in British Columbia we have the spectacle of a minister of the Crown going around with a chip on his shoulder, as the small boys say, inviting somebody to knock it off, using language which should never have been used by a responsible minister, informing his audience that Germany must be taught a lesson. What sort of language is that for a minister of the Crown? When the best men in Great Britain, the best men in Germany, the best people the wide world over, are striving by every means in their power to bring about peace, the Minister of Defence in the Government of Canada is going about boasting that Germany must be taught a lesson. The spectacle is too absurd. Does he forget that in Ontario many of the best citizens, both in business and in agriculture, are men who have come to Canada from Germany? There are very few of them in my riding, I am sorry to say, but there are many in adjoining ridings, in the whole western peninsula and the plains of the great western provinces. The German population of Canada is by no means small. I know something of it and I say there are no more peaceful, no more pacific, no more intelligent, thrifty and industrious people than those who have settled in Canada from Germany and become loyal British subjects.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe): Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am glad to hear the 'Hear, hears' from the opposite side of the House and I notice particularly from what quarter they come, but I urge on members opposite if they have any influence in the counsels of their own party, to rebuke the Minister of Militia and Defence for the unwarranted and insulting language he has used towards a large portion of the Canadian people.

The Admiralty dwells on one point which I would like to touch upon, and that is the question of moral support. I think, when all is said and done, that that is the most important question raised in the Admiralty's memorandum. It is important to Great Britain to know at the present moment, or in future years, that she has the absolute moral support of her colonies in regard not only to naval supremacy, but to other matters which pertain to international relationships throughout the world. I see the force of that, and every hon. member of this House must see the force of it. We cannot avoid it; we must meet it. I do not believe that there would be any moral support whatever if we were to go to Great Britain with our contribution of $35,000,000 and say that the contribution had disrupted our Cabinet and caused the resignation of one of our most important ministers. I do not believe that there would be any moral support if the contribution went to England with a divided House of Commons, and there is certainly a strong feeling of division in this House at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE : Some hon. members laugh, but I am trying to be as serious as I can. They are always inclined to accept a serious statement as a joke, but I am trying to speak seriously, and if some of the hon. gentlemen who interrupted me would try to contribute something besides interruptions to the discussions in this House, I think it would help. What sort of picture would it be to England if we went there with a divided government, a divided House and behind it a divided people, the majority of whom, I honesty believe, are against this proposal. I think we would create a spectacle that would not help Great Britain, and would not help Canada, and if our action is to go to the chancellories of Europe, where indeed the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated it has already gone, we are not going to improve the situation there. I make these preliminary observations for this purpose. I partly agree with the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce made on the 18th of December in opening his remarks. He enumerated the great questions that had been dealt with by the parliament of Canada. He said we had had the question of responsible government up in this Parliament, and we had settled that; that we had had the great question of Confederation up in this Parliament and we had settled that. Then he enumerated a great many other important questions that this Parliament had dealt with. Let me read the concluding words which are to be found in 'Hansard' in column 1408, and let me give my assent to the sentiments there expressed. He says:

> But I doubt if there has been any question during the whole history of legisaltion in what is now the Dominion of Canada which has been quite as important and freighted with quite as great results and consequences as the question we are debating at the present time in this House.

Later, in column 1409, he says :

> To-day it occupies the attention of the best statesmen in the Mother Country and it occupies the attention of the best statesmen and the most thoughtful citizens in every one of the colonies in the great Empire to which we belong.

I agree that it is one of the greatest questions that has ever been discussed in the Canadian Parliament and it is up here now for settlement. The line drawn between the parties is a well marked line of demarcation. Nobody can refuse to notice that. We must realize the circumstances under which we speak, and under which we act. If this matter is going to be a matter of moral support to Great Britain the only suggestion I can offer is that there ought to be, there must be, something in the nature of give and take. I have not consulted anybody, my leader or anyone else, on the question which I am now discussing. I believe that apart from matters of form, in matters of substance we are not very far apart. You propose a contribution to Great Britain, to send money to construct three dreadnoughts, these to be constructed in Great Britain. We, on the other hand, propose to enlarge the Canadian Naval Service Act by the establishment of two fleet units which will necessarily be headed by one dreadnought for each unit. Is there then a very great difference between us except in the matter of form? The British Admiralty has not asked for any specific number of dreadnoughts. The Government has fixed that of its own motion.' Might not that portion of the bill be modified to make it two dreadnoughts? Might not we on this side of the House modify our proposal a little and allow these dreadnoughts to be constructed in Great Britain? Then the rest of the fleet unit could certainly be constructed in Canada within a reasonable time. We could establish our navy yards and our construction plants and go on with the work. We would reach practically the same end as you do except that one dreadnought would be shorn from the British Admirality, and two fleet units, established in this country under our own laws, would take its place. No constitutional objection could arise because they would be under our own law and under our own control. We do not need to wait for a voice in Imperial affairs. I make this suggestion because I say there is a gulf between us and I believe the gulf can be bridged. I believe the gulf ought to be bridged. Therefore I suggest to my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) and to my right hon. leader that some give and take on the part of both sides of the House would be proper. I do not believe that this proposal in its present form meets with a very hearty reception in this country. I am not trying to boast, or to put a political cast on my language, but I have held five meetings during the recess and they were considered of sufficient importance to be attended and reported by three Toronto newspapermen. They were township and village meetings, but they were all capacity meetings in the way of not being able to accommodate the crowd save one, which took place on a stormy night. They were attended by men on the Liberal side and by men on the Conservative side, and I say what I actually believe when I tell you that this proposal is not in favour in that portion of Ontario which I represent, and I state that apart from my political bias whatever. My plea is, and I hope it will not fall on deaf ears opposite, although I am afraid it will, that between the two parties some compromise should be made. My suggestion is that two dreadnoughts might go to Great Britain and be built in England, that our two fleet units should be proceeded with in Canada, leaving the Admiralty to concentrate its forces in the decisive theatre of probable war. We would have our Canadian naval service, and there would be no entanglements or constitutional questions to bother or annoy us. We could base our whole programme on the language of Mr. Churchill the First Lord of the Admiralty. No one knows so well as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister what Mr. Churchill's view is. He may have had secret information, but he has had the sense and good judgment not to refer to it in the House. But I cannot get out of my head that when Mr. Churchill spoke eight or nine weeks before the Prime Minister arrived in England and told the colonies to establish local navies to go on and protect the outlying portions of the Empire, allowing the British Admiralty to concentrate its forces in the decisive theater of war I believe he laid down a policy which is the best policy from a Canadian point of view, and is the one policy that the British Admiralty really wants. If my right hon friend the Prime Minister had gone to the Admiralty and given them a free hand I do not believe they would have handed us a memorandum telling us what we might do in the way of giving immediate effective aid. But that is a matter which I cannot settle. My voice may be powerless in the matter, probably will be powerless in the matter, but I think it is a matter which ought to be drawn very pointedly to the attention of the House. If our action is going to give any moral support to Great Britain or to the Empire it has to be on different lines from those we are now following.

If we can bridge the gulf, the chasm, by all means let us do so even if there be some sacrifice on both sides, both in regard to the Government's proposal and in regard to that of my right hon. friend upon the line that I have suggested as the only line that now occurs to me although there may be others.

If we cannot settle it in that way, there is another way and that is to appeal to the great and final tribunal of the people. I believe that, having regard to the magnitude of the question, as stated by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and as stated by the right hon. Prime Minister, having regard to the fact that this question was never discussed, commented on or considered in eight provinces out of the nine in the Dominion of Canada and that in only one was it discussed, having regard to the fact that the policy laid down in this House two years ago, or in the month of November, 1910, by the leader of the then Government, was not the policy upon which he went to the country in the last general election, because his manifesto distinctly differed from his assertion in this House in 1910; if we cannot come to something like unanimity in this House, then, I say that the people have the right to pass upon this question. I would not say so if there was a question of need or emergency, need that was pressing. If the Empire was imperilled I would not say for one moment, appeal to the people, but, when there is a prospect of continued peace, when there is a prospect, according to Mr. Asquith, who ought to know and who does know, of overwhelming supremacy in Great Britain not only now but for the future and when all that we have before us is the requirements, now or prospective, of the British Admiralty, why not let the people decide this question? We know the situation as far as they have made it public and I certainly believe that this document is absolutely correct, that the statements there may be relied upon absolutely and that no information of a confidential or private nature which any member of the Government may have would alter or annul or change the contents of that memorandum which has been furnished to us by the British Admiralty. We are entitled to consider that absolutely correct, and in view of the statement of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, of Mr. Churchill and of other gentlemen high in political life in England, can any one say that there is danger, that there is incomplete security?

Why should we imagine there is when it is not so stated by the men who ought to know in England? I know there is a minority in England, among whom are a few very distinguished men, who do look upon the situation as grave and the security as somewhat doubtful. You will find that in every country, but the men who do know and who under the circumstances, ought to know best, state the contrary. Can we not reply upon them? They do so in England. Why cannot we do so here? If they say that there is a pacific feeling on both sides of the water, that there is a good feeling and that there are no indications of danger at the present time, why not take time to develop the policy which my right hon. leader has asked the House to adopt or, if not that let the people come forward and pronounce on this policy. Let them say which policy they think is proper. Observe the distinction I make between the hour of peril and the hour of security.

The position I take is the same as that which was taken by my right hon. leader in 1909. In the hour of peril we need no mandate; then, ours is the policy of the last man and the last dollar. That is our duty, but here in the hour of security on so great a question involving so many considerations, a question fraught with such great possibilities, having regard to the mutual support between the Motherland and her colonies or dominions beyond the seas---in this moment of peace, security and overwhelming supremacy, why not let the people have something to say in regard to this proposal? That is the last observation, the last suggestion that I have to make and I must thank the House for listening to me so long.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, while I agree with the observations very largely of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) who has just taken his seat, that it is to be regretted that both political parties in Canada do not see eye-to-eye on this great question of naval defence, especially in view of the tremendous and salutary moral effect such an agreement would produce in Europe. Nevertheless the most gratifying and outstanding feature of this whole debate is that, whatever differences we may have as to its application, we are all united and agreed that a sum of $35,000,000 should now be granted for naval defence.

That being the one and practically the only point upon which we are agreed, I have endeavoured to analyze the various speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, including the eloquent speech of the hon. member for South Wellington, because I have had the privilege of reading the reports of his speeches delivered during the Christmas holidays, with a view of codifying if possible the main differences between the two great political parties on this question, and I find that the line of argument running through all their speeches, with probably the one exception of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has been directed with a view and purpose of inculcating into the public mind of the Canadian people, a belief in the following statements and propositions which they affirm to be true and which we deny:

1. That there is no emergency or need of immediate and effective aid to the naval forces of the Empire—or any impending or threatened danger thereto.

2. That the grant of this $35,000,000 for these three dreadnoughts is the beginning of this Government's permanent contribution or permanent naval policy of Canada.

3. That the gift of these three ships in some way endangers, invades, or even reverses, the principles of our free constitutional Government and Canadian autonomy.

4. That the memorandum prepared by the British Admiralty last November and presented to this House by the Premier does not disclose any emergency or 'any immediate or prospective danger,' or need of naval assistance, nor warrant the grant of said three dreadnoughts and that the British Government does not even desire the same.

5. That Canada can now best contribute to the naval defence of itself and of Great Britain and the Empire by the construction of a separate and independent navy along the lines of the Naval Service Act of 1910 passed by the late Government, and though they now profess to find no fault with the grant of $35,000,000 or even more for naval defence, they say it should be applied and used in the construction of two complete fleet units, to be built, manned and maintained by Canada, but engrafted on the Naval Service Act of the late Government which was passed as the permanent policy of Canada and was not intended to meet but denied any emergency or assistance, as such, to the Imperial navy.

I have endeavoured to codify the differences and I think I am fair in saying that these are practically the only differences, unless it be that with reference to the question of a permanent representative at the Imperial Council Board, and I have not included that for the simple reason that I do not know what attitude the right hon. leader of the Opposition takes on the question. The right hon. gentleman, in the early Imperial conferences, took the ground that we should not be called upon to contribute to Imperial defence because we were not represented. Later on, when it was suggested to him that the British Government were willing to give us representation, he took the ground that we did not want representation because it would imply a corresponding liability. The right hon. gentleman, in his speech delivered in this House on the 12th of December, failed to declare his stand upon that question. He has not included that in the contest between the two great political parties. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) has thrown down a challenge to me to give the evidence upon which I believe there is urgent need for granting aid to the Imperial navy, and I accept his challenge. I shall first start out by defining what I believe to be the meaning of an emergency, and I may say here that we have been very unfortunate in the use of that word, because it does not convey to the minds of the people the condition of things about which we are talking. I had occasion to speak upon this great naval question some three years ago, and I attempted then to define what I thought was an emergency. With the permission of the House, I shall repeat my statement on that occasion, because I have had no reason to change my opinion with regard to it since. I would point out that in the unanimous resolution passed by the House in 1909, there was no reference to the word 'emergency,' and that the only word mentioned, which was intended to cover the condition of things as they exist to-day, was the word 'need.' In a previous speech of mine in this House I described an emergency as follows:

> By an emergency I do not mean a present actual crisis. I mean a condition of things which, if allowed to proceed in the manner determined upon, will eventually and inevitably lead to the destruction of that which is all-essential, both to ourselves and to the British Empire, the supremacy of the British navy. If we find a condition of things existing to-day which, if allowed to continue, will bring us to that culmination, I call that an emergency.

And, it is in that view of the subject that I purpose discussing the question of emergency as suggested by the hon. member for South Wellington. First of all, let me read the words of Mr. Churchill, delivered in the House of Commons on July 12, last year, and let me point out that the statements of Mr. Churchill, which my hon. friend has been quoting for the purpose of proving there is no emergency, were statements made by Mr. Churchill before he became aware of the details of the amendment to the German naval law passed in the year 1912. On the other hand, the statements of Mr. Churchill which I shall cite, are statements which Mr. Churchill made in the House of Commons after the German amendment became known to him. When Mr. Churchill became aware of the conditions of the German Bill of 1912, accelerating the construction and increasing of the personnel of the German navy, in the House of Commons on the 22nd of July last he used these words:

> We have to face the simultaneous building by many nations of great modern ships of war. . . Well do we understand the truth of Mr. Borden's words: The day of peril is too late for preparation.

Well do they understand the truth of Mr. Borden's words that 'The day of peril is too late for preparation,' and in my opinion, the converse of that constitutes an emergency; 'the need of preparation for the hour of peril.' I say that the hour of peril has arrived now and that we have reached a condition of emergency. Well do we understand the truth of Mr. Borden's words that the day of peril is too late for preparation; well does the Turkish nation understand to-day that the day of peril is too late for preparation; well did the Russian nation understand after the war with Japan that the day of peril was too late for preparation; well did the Spanish nation understand, after the American war, that the day of peril was too late for preparation; well did France in 1870 understand that the day of peril was too late for preparation, and because she did not prepare for the peril which came upon her, Alsace and Lorraine are to-day two provinces of the German Empire.

What is the cause of the present emergency? My hon. friend is unlike the First Lord of the Admiralty, who declared that he was going to speak fairly, plainly, and openly on the naval programme of the German nation, and the First Lord of the Admiralty added that he did not think the German people could find any fault with him for doing so. I say right here, if I were an ambitious subject of the German Empire I would do to-day as the German Empire is doing, for we must remember that the Germans are an ambitious and progressive people. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of the German people; they are doing what they consider best in the interests of the German Empire, and surely they cannot find fault with us if we do what we consider best in the interests of the British Empire. It is the amazing and abnormal growth of the great fighting engines and the increased personnel of the German navy in recent years that has been the cause of the general nervousness and the present crisis. The German navy was a nonentity in 1896 and to-day it is the second strongest navy in the world. The German navy has risen from 12 battleships and cruisers in 1908 to 61 projected in 1920; the German navy had as its personnel in 1908 but 25,000 men at a yearly cost of $30,000,000, but it has risen to 66,000 men in 1912 at a yearly cost of $76,000,000, and, according to their present naval programme, even if there is no acceleration of that programme—and there has been five accelerations since 1900—the personnel of the German navy will be increased to 101,000 men in 1920, at an annual cost of $115,000,000. Germany's annual expenditure in 1908 was $68,000,000, and to-day the cost has risen to $114,000,000 per annum. In these figures alone it seems to me there are evidences of a culminating emergency. And, let us look at some other facts which I propose to give for the purpose of proving this same condition. There are two ways in which a nation endeavours to accomplish some paramount ultimate object, and the paramount ultimate object of the German people is, in my opinion, to become on sea, as they are on land to-day, absolutely the predominant nation of Europe.

That predominance may be brought about either secretly or openly, and the German people have taken the course of doing it, with respect to the navy, in an open manner, and they have done that for the purpose of disarming all suspicion. When they first began to launch out as a great naval power, they set apart one thousand million dollars for the purpose of starting their navy, and they said openly and above board right in the preamble of their legislation, that this navy must be so strong that the strongest naval power in Europe dare not attack them. They might just as well have said that their navy shall be so strong that Great Britain dare not attack them. Then it must be remembered that the German Empire has a comparatively small coast line, a coast line protected by nature by sands and shallows and further protected by magnificent fortifications. The German people know as well as we do that their navy is not essential for their national existence. Even if Germany lost her navy to-morrow she would still be the dominant nation in Europe whereas if the navy of Britain were lost, our supremacy and our national existence would be gone. With Britain, the navy is a case of absolute life and death; with Germany, such a navy is more or less a luxury unless it be for colonial expansion, and the comparatively insignificant colonies of the German Empire to-day do not warrant the number of huge war leviathans they are constructing to control the seas. The ships they are building are not of a kind that are intended to be used for colonial expansion at long distance; they are of a type to be used in the North Sea, close to the shores of Great Britain, and close to the shores of Germany. I have seen it suggested that this was a proper time for arbitration, with respect to this matter; I have seen somewhere that the grain growers of the North-west made a suggestion that we should not do anything with respect to this question of naval defence, and that by doing nothing we would show the powers of Europe that we are in favour of international arbitration as the final arbiter. I want to point out that in the year 1905, Great Britain conceived the idea of some policy looking to the curtailment of naval armaments; in that year she was building four ships and Germany was building two. The Liberal Government was in power then, and they conceived the idea with a view, if possible, of checking the naval armaments of Europe, and concluded they would throw out an olive branch to Germany and try to get her to check her expenditure and England would do the same. In 1905, Great Britain was building four capital ships, in the same year Germany was building two. That is a natural status, because Great Britain has maintained for years a two-power standard. She threw out the olive branch and said: 'Let us stop building naval armaments.' The next year she reduced her building programme from four to three; Germany replied by increasing hers from two to three. The next year Great Britain said: 'We will still not build any more than last year.' She built only three; the answer of Germany was three. In the following year, still trying to induce the German nation to restrict her naval armaments, Great Britain dropped hers back from three to two, and the answer of Germany was four. The result was that during that time, while Great Britain cut her naval armaments in two, Germany doubled hers. We, therefore, gave a bonafide practical expression of our desire to curtail naval armaments, and the result was the doubling of the naval armaments of Germany. This was the condition of things in 1909, which caused the great nervous unrest in Europe, which caused the introduction in this House of the resolution which was passed unanimously by this Chamber in that year, and which was the cause of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition introducing his Naval Service Act of 1910. There is no doubt about that. It was the existing state of feeling as to naval armaments in Great Britain and Canada which induced my right hon. friend to bring in his Bill. Yet when he brought in his Bill, he totally ignored the question of emergency or any immediate aid to the Imperial navy. In the year 1909, the year of the Canadian Press Conference, we had the opinions of some of the most influential men in England, that there was a crisis on at that time. I have the speech of Lord Rosebery before me which I will quote because it affects the question. It is as follows:

> In June, 1909, there never was, in the history of the world, so threatening and overpowering a preparation for war. That is the sign which I regard as most ominous. For forty years it has been a platitude to say that all Europe is an armed camp, and for forty years it has been true that all the nations have been facing each other armed to the teeth, and that has been, in some respects, a guarantee of peace. And now what do we see? And now, without any tangible reason, we see the nations preparing new armaments. They cannot, indeed, arm any more men upon land, so they have to seek new armaments upon the sea, piling up enormous preparation, as if for some approaching Armageddon. I admit there are features of this general preparation for war which must cause special anxiety to the friends of Great Britain and of the British Empire.
>
> When I see one country alone asking for 25 millions of extra taxation for warlike preparations; when I see the unprecedented sacrifices; which are asked from us on the same grounds, I do begin to feel uneasy as to the outcome of it all, and to wonder where it will stop.

The Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, speaking on the same occasion, gave the same opinion. Mr. McKenna, First Lord of the Admiralty, and Hon. Alfred Lyttleton, ex-Colonial Secretary, speaking at the same conference, expressed the same views. In the year 1909, the British Government saw that their 'olive branch policy' had been a failure; they had given Germany the opportunity of curtailment by their own actual demonstration, and the reply was to double their armaments. In the year 1909, therefore, Great Britain's programme jumped up again from two capital ships to four. Australia gave one, New Zealand gave one. The First Lord of the Admiralty said: 'I am going to make provision for four more capital ships, making ten in all, but I will not build these four conditional ships until I see if Germany continues her aggressive naval policy.' That was in March, 1909. In July, 1909, Mr. McKenna got up in the British House of Commons and he used these words :

After very anxious and careful examination of the conditions of shipbuilding in foreign countries, the Government have come to the conclusion that it is desirable to take all necessary steps to ensure that the second four ships referred to in the programme shall be completed by March, 1912.

And so it was in consequence of the emergency that the British Government built the dreadnoughts, the Thunderer, the Conqueror, the Monarch and the Princess Royal. If it had not been for that emergency year, we would have had only sixteen dreadnoughts in commission as compared with Germany's thirteen; but it cost Great Britain $50,000,000 capital money to build those ships, and will cost from fourteen to fifteen million dollars a year to maintain them. Yet my hon. friend will say that there was no emergency even then; and my right hon. friend when he introduced his Bill paid no attention at all to that aspect of the case. When my right hon. friend brought in his Bill, we took the same attitude then as we are taking to-day. We moved the amendment that in order to satisfy the then existing emergency, we should give $25,000,000 for the purpose of building two ships for Great Britain. We said as to that part of our policy that we did not ask you to go to the people, that we did not think it necessary for you to go to the people, but as to the permanent naval policy of the country, which was the policy then being introduced by the Canadian Naval Service Act, we said that you should have gone to the country. We take the same position to-day as to this emergency contribution and as to our permanent policy. Give us the grant; send it to the old country where it can be effectively used at a psychological moment. As to the permanent policy we are willing to discuss it one, two or three years hence, and we will bring it down and discuss it in Parliament and before the people; and before we ask you to sanction that permanent policy, we will go to the people upon it, and abide by their decision.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 31, to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Guarantee Company of North America.—Mr. Baker.

Bill No. 37, respecting the Alberta Central Railway Company.—Mr. Clark (Red Deer).

Bill No. 38, respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company. — Mr. Buchanan.

Bill No. 39, respecting the Algoma Eastern Railway Company.—Mr. Smyth.

Bill No. 40, respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 41, respecting the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Smith.

Bill No. 42, respecting the Guelph and Goderich Railway Company.—Mr. Morphy.

Bill No. 43, respecting the Kootenay and Arrowhead Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 44, respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Cash.

Bill No. 45, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—Mr. White (Renfrew).

Bill No. 46, to incorporate the Northwest Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company.—Mr. McKay.

Bill No. 47, respecting the Ottawa Electric Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 48, respecting the Ottawa Gas Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 49, respecting the Ottawa Northern and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Fripp.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: When the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing the many evidences which I considered went to prove an emergency with respect to the naval situation in Great Britain. I had pointed out, among other things, that with a view of partially relieving or making provisions to cope with an emergency in 1909, Great Britain had placed four ships upon the conditional dreadnought list, to be built should Germany continue her aggressive naval policy. These ships were afterwards built, because Germany had progressed in her naval armament policy, and one of the best evidences we have as to the most effective means of meeting an emergency is the action of the British Admiralty in 1909, when, in order to meet the emergency that then existed, they proceeded to build four dreadnoughts, just as is suggested in the recent Admiralty memorandum. If we desire to render effective aid to Imperial naval armament, the best way of doing so is by the construction of modern dreadnoughts. In addition to the evidences I have given, there now comes, with relentless dogged persistency, the German Navy Act of 1912, the fifth amendment to this great German Naval Act passed in 1900, which, as I said, originally set aside a thousand million dollars for the purpose of starting that navy. These amendments have set aside more than $500,000,000 more. The seriousness of the amendment of the present year consists not so much in the augmentation or increase in the number of ships to be built, but in the increase of personnel in the navy; and its greatest seriousness consists in the fact that whereas, prior to that amendment, only one-third of the ships of the German navy were on the active list, this amendment changes that proposition, and places four-fifths of the entire German navy on an active striking basis. That fact alone, the difference made in the organization of the German navy by that amendment, is to my mind sufficient to constitute a crisis or emergency for which we are justified in making the provision embodied in the present Bill. Recent developments in central Europe have shown beyond a doubt that, even in the case of a military war, with the notice of preparation inseparable from military war—because you cannot make preparations for a military war with the same celerity or secrecy as for a naval war—the whole map of Europe may be changed within a few weeks, such is the celerity of military war to-day. But in the case of naval war, so far as your ships are on active service and on an active fighting basis, no notice whatever need be given; you have simply to slip your cables and there is no indication as to whether your intentions are peaceful or warlike until the blow is struck. So I say that the changing of the proportion of the German navy that is on a fighting basis from one-third to four-fifths, places four-fifths of that navy in such a position that it may slip its cables, as it has a right to do, without any notice or without the knowledge of Great Britain or any other nation, and we cannot tell whether her intentions are warlike or peaceful until the delivery of the fatal blow at the point intended. From that standpoint the amendment of 1912 to the German Naval Law constitutes a sufficient emergency, a sufficient change in naval conditions of the foremost naval power in Europe, to justify and warrant the Bill of the right hon. the leader of the House, granting $35,000,000 for these three ships.

The hon. member for South Wellington has fairly said that the Prime Minister in introducing the Bill gave a very fair and impartial review of the whole naval situation, and he was also complimented by the Leader of the Opposition on the fair method in which he presented that measure to the House. We will all agree that the Prime Minister would be the last man to introduce politics into the question of the naval defence of the Empire, and I think that until my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) held his caucus, and until the Liberal party decided to bring in their amendment, the people of this country were practically a unit in the belief that the Borden policy was the proper policy for this country at this psychological moment. To show that this was the attitude of the Opposition I shall quote from the Toronto Globe as late as March 24, last, before the Globe knew the intention or policy of the leader of the Opposition. The Globe, as we all know, is the leading Liberal organ in Ontario and speaks on behalf of the Liberal party, at least in that province. This is what it says:

> There is not another nation in Europe which would impotently stand by and see an instrument forged for its destruction. They would seize the reptile while it was still weak and strangle it.
>
> But that is not the British way. They have instead endeavoured to keep pace with German activity in augmenting naval power. The contest has become a desperate one. It is a contest between a nation of 65,000,000, and constantly growing, with a nation of 42,000,000, from which its sons swarm across the seas year in and year out. War is deprecated, but, as a matter of fact war is in progress. The contest in shipbuilding is war. If the Mother Country were engaged in a deadly conflict, Canadians could not get across the ocean fast enough to the aid of the Motherland. The Canadian exchequer would be open to the last dollar in such a cause. But we must recognize that our aid is as much needed now as if a physical war, instead of a war of shipbuilding were on. Germany appreciates that if ever she is to challenge British supremacy and break up the British Empire, now is the time.

That was the feeling among the Liberal party, almost the unanimous feeling in this country, until the right hon. the leader of the Opposition introduced his party amendment into this House. My hon. friend from South Renfrew, and very many other hon. members for this House, have been quoting from speeches alleged to have been made by the First Lord of the British Admiralty, to prove that there is no desire, and no necessity, on the part of the British Admiralty for the assistance we propose to give. Do they expect that the British First Lord of the Admiralty is going to proclaim from the house tops to the nations of the world that they are in need of assistance from any one? Do they not remember that right in the Admiralty report of last November they say: 'We do not desire in any manner to put pressure upon public opinion in Canada.' If there was anything of that kind in the Admiralty report you would find some hon. gentlemen opposite jumping up and in a fit of acute autonomitis protesting against anything of the kind. We would find the hon. member for Rouville going to his Webster's dictionary to find out what an emergency was and becoming afflicted with an acute attack of Websteritis trying to prove that there was no emergency.

All the quotations that have been made by the hon. member for South Wellington, all of the quotations made by the Hon. Mackenzie King, former Minister of Labour, in his speeches throughout this country have been from speeches delivered by Mr. Churchill, the First Lord of the Admiralty before he became aware of the contents of the German Naval Bill of 1912. And my hon. friend from South Wellington asks why were not some of the quotations which he made from speeches made by Mr. Churchill at a certain banquet, incorporated into the Admiralty memorandum of 1912? I will tell him why, because Mr. Churchill knew that the statements which he made earlier in the year, before he knew the contents of the German Navy Bill, would not be true if delivered after he knew the contents of the German Navy Bill. I will now quote from his statements made after the German Navy Bill was known to him—statements which were incorporated in the memorandum. On July 22, in the British House of Commons, he said:

The main feature of the law is not the increase in the new construction of capital ships, though that is an important feature. The main feature is the increase in the striking force of ships of all classes which will be available, immediately available, at all seasons of the year.

That is in the Admiralty report.

The next statement in his speech was:

Whereas according to the unamended law, the active battle fleet consisted of 17 battleships, 4 battle or large armoured cruisers, and 12 small cruisers, in the near future the active fleet will consist of 25 battleships, 8 battle or large armoured cruisers and 18 small cruisers; and whereas at present, owing to the system of recruitment which prevails in Germany, the German fleet is less fully mobile during the winter than during the summer months, it will, through the operation of this law, not only be increased in strength, but rendered much more readily available.

That statement was also contained in the Admiralty memorandum.

The next statement in his speech of July last is this:

Taking a general view, the effect of the law will be that nearly four-fifths of the entire German navy will be maintained in full permanent commission—that is to say, instantly and constantly ready for war. Such a proportion is remarkable, and, so far as I am aware, finds no example in the previous practice of modern naval powers.

Is there no suggestion of an emergency in that, and that speech was delivered after the speech from which my hon. friend from South Wellington has quoted. Further he said.

The new law adds a total of 15,000 officers and men, and makes the total in 1920 of 101,500.

Again he says:

The cost of these increases in men and in material during the next six years is estimated at £10,500,000, above the previous estimate spread over that period. I should like to point out to the committee that this is a cumulative increase which follows upon other increases of a very important character. The law of 1898 was practically doubled by the law of 1900, and if the expenditure contemplated by the law of 1900 had been followed the German estimates of to-day would be about £11,000,000. But, owing to the amendments of 1906 and 1908, and now of 1912, that expenditure is very nearly £23,000,000.

Then he goes on to say:

The number of battleships and large armoured cruisers alone which will be kept constantly ready and in full commission will be raised by the law from twenty-one, the present figure, to thirty-three—that is to say, an addition of twelve or an increase of about fifty-seven per cent.

Will any man say that the German naval policy of 1912 which was not passed when the speech quoted by my hon. friend was delivered, and which increased the strength by fifty-seven per cent, does not constitute some element of emergency for which we should make some provision? I think it does. Then he goes on to say:

The new fleet will in the beginning include about twenty battleships and large cruisers of the older type, but, gradually as new vessels are built, the fighting power of the fleet will rise until in the end it will consist completely of modern vessels. This new scale of the German fleet—organized in five battle squadrons, each attended by a battle or armoured cruiser squadron, complete with small cruisers and auxiliaries of all kinds, and accompanied by numerous flotillas of destroyers and submarines, more than three-fourths, nearly four-fifths, maintained in full permanent commission—the aspect and scale of this fleet is, I say, extremely formidable.

Then he wound up by saying:

It remains to be noted that this new law is the fifth in fourteen years of the large successive increases made in German naval strength, that it encountered no effective opposition in its passage through the Reichstag, and that, though it has been severely criticised in Germany since its passage, the criticisms have been directed towards its inadequacy.

I say that those provisions were not known to the First Lord of the Admiralty when he made the speech from which quotations have been made by my hon. friend from South Wellington.

Now then, let us come to British public opinion, and I am going to give quotations from five of the leading journals in England, two from the Liberal side and three from the Conservative side, one from the official Liberal organ of the Liberal administration, the most respectable organ published in Great Britain to-day, another from the Manchester Guardian, the most respected and widely circulated newspaper in the cotton district in the north of England, and the three others from Conservative newspapers. I want to be fair. Let us see what public opinion is in England to-day outside of the view of the Admiralty of which we have evidence in the present memorandum. The first that I will quote from is the Conservative newspaper, the London Telegraph. In its issue of July 12, 1912, it said:

It is the good fortune of the British Empire that just at the very moment when she is confronted with a rivalry such as she has not had to face since the great war of a century ago, the Dominions Overseas, which have grown to greatness under her safe and sure protection, are ready to share the responsibilities of Empire.

The next I will quote from is a Liberal newspaper, the Westminster Gazette, the official organ of the Liberal party in England. In its issue of July 19, 1912, it said:

We do not want to force this movement (Colonial aid) or to urge upon any of the Dominions the taking of any step for which its own opinion is not ripe, but naturally we welcome it as affording proof that British unity is a reality with which the world will have to reckon, and as promising us in the future that essential assistance without which our burden might become insupportable.

When that newspaper published that article it knew that my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) was proposing some immediate and effective aid to the British Empire. It said we welcome it because we cannot always bear the burden under which we are now groaning. And yet hon. members on the other side say that Great Britain does not need it, that she does not even want it. Now let me take another Liberal journal, the Manchester Guardian of July 26, 1912, the Liberal organ in the cotton district in the north of England. What did it say when it learned that the Prime Minister proposed some immediate and substantial aid to the British navy? Did it take the position which hon. members opposite take, namely, that we do not need it, that we do not want your money, that it is not even necessary; do not give it. That is the position taken by hon. members opposite, but what did the Manchester Guardian say:

We should indeed be guilty of wilful blindness if we were not to recognize once and for all that these preparations—which for the matter of that, Germany is perfectly entitled to make—are aimed directly and immediately at Great Britain and at Great Britain only * * * If the dominions are ready and willing to help us—and it is almost vital to them that they should be—then help will be received with gratitude.

Now, I will give a quotation from a Conservative newspaper, the Morning Post. I am quoting only from the most influential journals. In its issue of July 18, 1912, the Morning Post said:

By herself the United Kingdom cannot hope to cope forever in men or resources with her greatest rivals. But in co-operation with the younger nations she will be able to guard the common heritage of all against attack.

The final quotations which I will give is from the London Standard of August 22, 1912, when that paper said:

The British Empire stands in real need to-day of active, definite co-operation and participation of and by its great self-governing dominions, in its defence, control and administration. We believe that under the guidance of Mr. Borden and his colleagues the people of the premier Dominion will shortly give a fine inspiring lead to their kinsmen in every other part of the Empire in the direction of this most important and desirable consummation.

Now, that is the opinion of the most respectable journals in Great Britain, and I would like to ask hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House how they can contend first that aid is not necessary, and secondly that it is not even desirable.

My next proof that there is an emergency will be taken from the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton in the course of this very debate. The hon. member for Edmonton when he rose to speak said very frankly that he differed materially from his colleagues on this question of emergency. I propose to read what he said. He has the courage of his convictions, we all know that. I say he was absolutely right as to the question of emergency, but when he came to the remedy, I claim that he was absolutely wrong. What did the hon. member for Edmonton say?

I say we are face to face to-day with proposals to enter actively, seriously, and expensively into a question of Imperial naval defence—a condition essentially different from that which prevailed two or three years ago.

Mark these words,

—a condition essentially different from that which prevailed two or three years ago.

Other gentlemen on the other side of the House have been telling us that there is no difference. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when the right hon. the Prime Minister presented his proposals said:

I know all about what you tell me; I knew four years ago ever item and every word and every figure in the Admiralty memorandum; nothing you have told tells me anything new.

And yet his ex-Minister of the Interior gets up soon afterwards and says the conditions are essentially different from what they were two or three years ago, which was the very time when the leader of the Opposition introduced his Naval Service Bill in this House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend but I desire to understand rightly the reference he makes to the hon. member for Edmonton's speech. It seems to me that the phrase which has been quoted does not imply that there is a difference between the condition of things existing in 1909 and that of 1912. The member for Edmonton simply said that the two policies were different.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend will read his words he will see that that is what he said. I may be wrong, but that is what I inferred.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I will read the whole quotation.

I say we are face to face to-day with proposals to enter actively, seriously, and expensively into the question of Imperial naval defence——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Proposals.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO (reading):

—proposals to enter actively, seriously, and expensively into the question of Imperial naval defence—a condition essentially different from that which prevailed two or three years ago, and the members of this Parliament will have to justify to the people of this country the position we take in asking for such large appropriations, and incurring such large future or prospective obligations.

I am here, Mr. Speaker, to absolutely justify the position that we have taken, both as to the amount of the present appropriation and as to the fulfilment of future obligations imposed thereby, and the consequences thereof. I am aware that the position I take is somewhat different from that hitherto adopted in the course of this debate, and to-day we are face to face with new conditions regarding military and naval matters such as the world has never before seen.

Then he goes on to describe what these conditions are and no one has proved the emergency in a more forcible manner than the hon. member for Edmonton.

For many years the British Islands were protected by the narrow seas and the British dominions were protected by the width of the ocean but to-day we must recognize the fact that it is merely a matter of time when the millions of men who are or who can be placed under arms in Europe at practically a moment's notice can be transported over sea as quickly and as certainly as may be necessary to carry out the will of the nation to which they belong. There is no purpose in Canada ignoring this condition of affairs. Let me suggest to this House that a fleet that can sail across the North Sea can sail across the Atlantic ocean, can sail around the world, and that Canada has no guarantee of immunity from the presence of such fleets or of individual members of such fleets and that our fair provinces by the sea, including the one which my hon. friend represents——

Referring to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier).

—stands in just as much danger as the British Islands themselves in case of any outbreak of war in which the British Empire is involved.

So, I say that the hon. member for Edmonton proves conclusively the changed conditions that constitute the emergency and I give him credit for coming out plainly on this subject. Were you sitting in the house at the time he delivered this speech? Did you notice the face on the hon. member for South Renfrew and that of the right hon. leader of the Opposition? If you had done so it would not have been necessary to have read this quotation. If you had seen the shadow of consternation and bewilderment that passed over their countenances as they realized how completely he was demolishing the arguments of the speakers on that side of the House, who had claimed that there was no emergency, you would have noticed that there was something wrong and how this was followed by the sunshine of joy and relief when that hon. gentleman, after proving the existence of the emergency, turned around and said that the only remedy for that condition was the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition.

Let me examine the speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition upon the issue as to the question of an emergency. What did he say?

There is no emergency, there is no immediate danger, there is no prospective danger.

I would like hon. members to mark well these words.

There is no emergency——

Says the leader of the Opposition.

—there is no immediate danger, there is no prospective danger.

I want to read you from a speech delivered by an hon. gentleman in this House on the same subject in which he says, speaking of this Bill introduced by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister.

We have the question of defence to deal with. When we have to deal with the danger of an enemy rushing upon us, whom we must stop, are we to fold our arms and do nothing until we have settled the question as to whether or not we shall have a voice in all matters of war or peace?

Referring to my right hon. friend the Premier.

—is like the Emperor of Constantinople, who went to Italy to discuss questions of theology, when his city was being assaulted by the Turks, who finally captured it.

The one says there is no danger, the other says that my right hon friend is like the Emperor who went from Constantinople to Italy to discuss theology when his citadel was being attacked, and he asks: Are you going to fold your arms, stand still and do nothing? Mr. Speaker and hon gentlemen, I want to tell you that these two speeches were made by the same man, in the same house, on the same day, in the same half hour and in the same debate and they were made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. The man who says there is no danger, that there is no emergency, says that Mr. Borden, like the man who was going away from his own city when it was being assailed. Surely if we are being actually assaulted there must be some emergency. The truth bubbled out in the last instance because he was not on guard and the right hon. gentleman told what he thought and what the people thought before the question of politics had been introduced into the subject.

I have only another observation to make on this question of emergency and that is if any further evidence is necessary to prove an emergency, or need, or changed conditions, I think it is afforded by the amendment of the right hon. gentleman himself. What do we find? In 1910 the present leader of the Opposition brought down a Bill on this question authorizing the purchase of the 'Niobe' and the 'Rainbow.' Subsquently thereto, and under the provisions of the Bill, he called for tenders for four cruisers of the Bristol type to cost something like $10,000,000. He did not go ahead with the construction of those cruisers. True, he called for tenders but when he left office, on October 7, 1911, all he had done, under the provisions of the Naval Service Act, was to purchase these two insignificant coast defence vessels, and we have the right to assume that the Bill which he introduced in 1910 and which was in force when he left power embodied a policy considered by him to be satisfactory and sufficient to answer all the needs of the naval defence of Canada and the Empire. That is fair, I think. Then, I ask the hon. member for South Renfrew, who is now leading the Opposition, if there is no emergency, if there is no need, if their policy was sufficient for all defence purposes, if, as they say, there has been no change and if, as the hon. member for South Renfrew says, there is no danger, why have they jumped from their policy of 1910 to a policy calling for two complete fleet units, from a policy involving the actual expenditure of a million and a third and a contemplated expenditure of $10,000,000 to a policy which will cost $50,000,000, because, according to the Admiralty report of 1909, which I have in my hands, two complete fleet units consists of two dreadnoughts, six armoured cruisers, twelve destroyers, six sub-marines and depot and store ships and will cost, according to the English price, $37,000,000 and, with the Canadian price added, $50,000,000. According to the same official report, to maintain these fleet units, it will cost $6,000,000 at the English price and, from $8,000,000 to $9,000,000 at the Canadian price. What I want to say to my hon. friend is this: Tell the conditions or circumstances which have caused you to jump from your own policy of a million and a half dollars for these two boats and a prospective expenditure of $10,000,000 for four Bristol cruisers, to a policy of two complete fleet units to cost $50,000,000 together with an annual expenditure of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000, and I will tell you what the emergency is. You are forced into this position if you have moved your amendment in good faith. You have either got to say that there is an emergency or something which caused you to do that, in which case you admit our contention, or you are fooling the people and your amendment is simply for obstructive purposes. If there is no danger to Great Britain, why are you building the two fleet units? Is the danger from any other source than Germany, and, if so, from what source? Is it from the United States? Is it because you fear the United States that you have jumped from an expenditure of one and a third million dollars on your navy proposition to fifty million dollars? Do you fear aggression from Japan, now an ally of Great Britain? Do you fear aggression from Japan, a nation which in 1905 sat down at the conference table and said to Great Britain: We have sufficient confidence in your integrity and justice that we will say now that for the next ten years we will trust you, and if you become involved in any war we will go to your assistance and we will conduct the war in common and we will agree to peace in common, as anyone will find who looks at the terms of the British-Japanese Treaty. Is it from Japan you fear aggression, a nation which put more confidence and trust and faith in Great Britain than you did when you introduced your Naval Service Act of 1910 and said you would not trust the Mother Country—not until a war arose, and then you required an Order in Council? Whence may come the menace that you fear? It must be from Europe, and, if so, from what nation in Europe? Argue around in a circle as you like, and you have come back and admit that the danger is from Germany. And, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House say that the danger is in the North Sea, and when the Armageddon arises we want our ships to be there to defend the heart of the Empire and to keep the Empire whole and intact. Another proof that there is something wrong is to be found in the fact that for centuries past, so long as Great Britain was beyond peradventure dominant upon the seas, we have enjoyed abiding peace and prosperity. It is only just so soon as the navy of some other nation or a combination of navies begin to rival that of Great Britain, that upon the horizon appears a cloud and there are rumours of war and world-wide nervousness. That Sir, I say, is another proof that there is something wrong and that Great Britain has not to-day that domination of the seas, she used to have in the olden days. So much for the question of emergency.

The next point I will touch upon is the claim of these gentlemen opposite that this $35,000,000 for three dreadnoughts is the beginning of a permanent contribution to Great Britain, or the beginning of the permanent naval policy of this Government. I do not think that any member of this House believes that, but I notice that the Liberal newspapers throughout the country are endeavouring to make the people believe it, and even the speech of the hon. member would indicate that he is trying to spread the idea that this contribution is not simply a temporary grant by Canada, but that it is to be the inauguration of our permanent naval policy as well. Let me point out that when the Liberal Government brought in their naval policy in 1910, the Conservative party moved an amendment that there be given two dreadnoughts, that $25,000,000 be expended to satisfy the emergency at once, and that the then Government should go to the country with their permanent naval policy which was the Naval Service Act of 1910. We are consistent to-day; we say that so far as this temporary isolated grant of $35,000,000 is concerned, we do not think we should go to the people, because indeed we set out that principle in our policy as announced in this House in the resolution of 1909, that position we stand by to-day, and as to our permanent policy we are still willing to go to the people of the country on it. Now, Sir, let us see what the British people think about this matter; let us see whether they think it is or is not the permanent policy of Canada. The British people thoroughly understand that this grant of three dreadnoughts is no part of the permanent naval policy of Canada; they know it is simply an isolated spontaneous gift of the Canadian people, prompted as much in the desire for our own preservation of the Empire, as our desire to preserve our own dignity and self-respect. Mr. Churchill said in the British House of Commons: We thoroughly understand the offer of Canada; we thoroughly understand that it is not the permanent policy of Mr. Borden, we thoroughly understand that Canada is simply making a grant to us for the purpose of assisting the naval forces of the Empire, and we thoroughly understand, as Mr. Borden has told us, that as to the permanent naval policy, it will require a great deal more consideration and no doubt will have to be submitted to the Canadian Parliament and to the people of Canada. And yet, in the face of this, hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to make the people believe that this is the permanent naval policy of the Conservative party.

Now, Sir, I want to say a word with reference to the constitutionality of this question, and I may preface my remark by saying that the weakest argument presented by hon. gentlemen opposite was their attack upon the constitutionality of the proposal now before Parliament. We have been told by these gentlemen opposite that the gift of these three ships in some way invades, or even reverses, the principles of our free constitutional government and of Canadian autonomy. My hon. friend from South Renfrew used these words:

> Now let me point out something else. I take a somewhat, I was going to say wider view, but I should not use that word; I wish to present this view to the House and I do so without any hesitation; that the return to a system of contribution by the people of Canada, is looking towards the reversal of the constitutional relations existing between the British Empire and her dominions over the seas, and is a step backwards of seventy years.

You will find that the hon. member devoted six columns of 'Hansard' to prove that a free, isolated, untrammelled, voluntary gift by the Canadian people, actuated by a desire for their self-preservation within the Empire and to maintain their self-respect, was an unconstitutional thing to do. What on earth a spontaneous gift to the Mother Country by the people of Canada has to do with invading the autonomy of the Dominion, or its contribution, is something that no sane man can understand. The hon. member was a little more unfortunate in his reference to the cause of the American Revolution. He told us that taxation was the cause of the American Revolution, and I suppose he cited that for the purpose of proving that this free gift by the people of Canada was a tax forced upon the people of Canada by the British Empire. But, let us see how the idea propounded by the hon. member would apply. The cause of the American Revolution was the imposition of a tax against the will of the American people, a compulsory tax which they did not wish to pay, but the present contribution is a voluntary contribution by Canada to the Motherland, and if we were to believe hon. gentlemen opposite, the Motherland does not even want it. Therefore, the hon. member has proved, by his citation, the very reverse of the case which he started out to sustain. As has been pointed out very cogently by my hon. friend from North Toronto, if it is unconstitutional to grant $35,000,000, the mere fact that there is an emergency does not make any difference in the constitutional aspect of it, and yet the leader of the Opposition said that if there was an emergency, he would grant four times $35,000,000, by which process of course my hon. friend from Renfrew would have shifted himself back into the Middle Ages on his constitutional theory. I want to point out, and it ought to be unnecessary to do so, that there never has been in the last thirty years any demand in any manner, shape or form from England that we should take any particular action with reference to any particular thing in Empire matters, and yet these hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to make the people of Canada believe that there is a demand from Great Britain that we shall give them this $35,000,000. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has helped to contribute to that impression in this country. I have here a speech which was made in Montreal upon this naval question in the year 1910 in which he used these words as reported in the Toronto Globe:

> At the same time the Secretary of State for the Marine demanded that the same powers should contribute a sum of money annually for the maintenance of an Imperial fleet. There, indeed, was the entrance to militarism. But the Canadian ministers who were at London—and I was one of them—opposed this demand of the Imperial Government in a categorical refusal, a refusal respectful in form, but absolute in meaning.

I challenge any member on that side of the House who has read the reports of the Imperial Conference to show me one single sentence in which the British Government at those conferences has demanded anything. The whole business of those conferences has been conducted on the basis that no resolution is forced upon any colony, no resolution is passed there against the wish of any colony. Anything done there is passed unanimously, and if it cannot be passed unanimously it is withdrawn. As an illustration of what I mean here is a resolution introduced in the conference of 1909 by Dr. Smartt, one of the representatives of South Africa at that conference. That resolution said in effect that the overseas dominions should take some part and bear some burden in Imperial naval defence, but it said that we leave it to the legislatures of the various colonies to say in what way that contribution or that assistance shall be given. Absolutely open to the colonies to do what they like! Sir Wilfrid Laurier, notwithstanding that every other Dominion represented at that conference was willing to pass that resolution, said, 'No, if you press the resolution I will be forced to vote against it.' They did not press the resolution because he said he would vote against it. Mr. Smartt, after Sir Wilfrid Laurier took that attitude, said, 'We have been passing pious resolutions long enough and it is at this conference and it is time we began to do something in reality.' My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has disparaged the effects of British diplomacy upon the various treaties that have been entered into between Canada and the United States, where the negotiations have been conducted by Great Britain. I do not know whether my hon. friend from South Renfrew has ever taken that stand, but Sir Wilfrid Laurier has taken that stand. In this House on the 12th December last in this debate, he took occasion to say that in his opinion British diplomacy had not been beneficial in any treaty negotiated by Great Britain in the interests of Canada. Why was it necessary for him to make such a declaration as that on a question of this kind? It is not germane to the subject. What has the question of British diplomacy to do with the free and voluntary gift by Canada to Great Britain to relieve her in the present naval distress? It was just volunteered by him and indicates his repugnance to give any assistance to the British navy. What are the facts? Here are his own words:

We have recently heard throughout the province of Quebec that we owe nothing to England, because in the long chapter of our history she has sacrificed our interests in the adjustment of the boundary between ourselves and our neighbours to the south. For my part I have often stated that in such questions British diplomacy has not shown itself to advantage.

And then he goes on to say:

The fact is undeniable that, practically ever since we have had in our hands the conduct of our diplomatic relations, Canada has suffered no sacrifice. In the last dispute we had with our neighbours, on the question of the Atlantic fisheries, not only did we not suffer any sacrifice, but we obtained recognition of rights which had been long denied.

What was the last dispute? The North Atlantic Coast Fisheries question, and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was very very unfortunate in citing that illustration to prove his case that British diplomacy had never been conducted in the interests of Canada. Whom did he send as the representative of Canada upon that question?—Sir Allen Aylesworth, his Minister of Justice, one of the brightest minds in the late administration, I say without the slightest hesitation, a man whose legal acumen was equal to that of probably any man in Canada. We all admit that though we may not agree with his views. He sent him as the representative of Canada on that arbitration. Sir Allen Aylesworth spent months and months in delving into the old treaties between Great Britain and Canada, and he came back after the arbitration was over, and we thank him for his testimony, he stood up in this House and gave a resume and a review of all that had taken place at those arbitration proceedings, and of his research into many treaties, and he said, repudiating the former sentiments of the right hon. leader of the Opposition entirely:

I would wish only to say this further, not with reference to that particular treaty alone, but with general reference to all the various international arrangements and agreements which, during the last 130 years, have been entered into between the statesmen of Great Britain and those of the United States, that while it seems to be rather the fashion—

The fashion of whom? Not the fashion of gentlemen on this side of the House, the fashion of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, so much the fashion that he could not help repeating it in the present naval debate. Sir Allen Aylesworth the man whom he sent across there to negotiate that treaty further said:

—or to have been rather the fashion, in this country to take the view that in the greater number, if not in all, of those international arrangements the United States has succeeded in getting the better of it, and that there has been, in perhaps most instances, on the part of British statesmen, some sacrifice, or some failure to recognize sufficiently the rights and interests of the British colonies in North America, I, for my part, speaking, certainly after considerable study of the matter, and with some knowledge of it, do not in the least degree share those views. I think it is no more than simple justice that I should say with respect to the arrangements which, from time to time, have been entered into with regard to the various matters of difficulty which have arisen between the United States and Great Britain, that the general interests of the Empire at large have been well conserved by the representatives of the British Crown in those negotiations.

The man whom the right hon. leader of the Opposition sent over and who had such sufficient and complete knowledge of the subject and who had gone thoroughly into these treaties, comes back and says that although it is the fashion in this country to deprecate the advantages of British diplomacy, nevertheless says that it is not justifiable to do so and that during the last 130 years the general interests of the Empire at large have been well conserved by the representative of the British Crown in all those negotiations.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Sir John Macdonald did not say that. He started the fashion.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The next difference between the two parties is this: Our opponents claim that the memorandum prepared by the British Admiralty last November and laid on the table of the House by the Prime Minister does not disclose any emergency or any immediate or prospective danger or need of naval assistance to warrant the giving of these three dreadnoughts, and that the British Government does not desire the same. I can only say that after a perusal of the speech of Mr. Churchill delivered in the House on the 22nd of July last, and after a perusal of that memorandum by any man who is not biased in his opinions, and after reading the statement of the report itself that they do not wish to put any pressure upon public opinion in Canada, and the natural repugnance of Great Britain to suggest the way in which the assistance should be given, after reading that and after having the Prime Minister's own confidential statement delivered to him, because the Admiralty report states that this report is only supplemental to the confidential statements that they have given to the Prime Minister, and after the Prime Minister's statement in this House that the circumstances are such as to justify him in bringing down the present Bill and giving $35,000,000 for the construction of three dreadnoughts, the man who will still ignore all such evidence of an emergency is to say the least derelict in his duty to Canada and the Empire at large.

Referring to the memorandum itself, I find in it this clause:

> Anything which increases our margin in the newest ships diminishes the strain and augments our security and our chance of being left unmolested.

Then Mr. Borden asked, as stated in the memorandum, in what form any immediate aid Canada might give would be most effective. The Admiralty answered:

> We have no hesitation in answering, after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances, that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

'That it is desirable' means 'we desire.' What? That such aid should include provision for a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply. I want to ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this question: If, as he maintains, these ships are neither necessary nor desirable, would not the British Admiralty have said so when the Prime Minister stated he proposed to give certain immediate and effective aid, and inquired as to the best manner in which to give that aid? Would not the British Admiralty, in a straight-forward manner, have said: We do not need that kind of aid—we do not need any aid at all. To let him take the course they knew he intended to take, would be obtaining ships under false pretenses. The attitude of hon. gentlemen on the other side is simply this: They practically say to Great Britain: You are taking from us $35,000,000 when you neither need nor desire it. Is there any man in this House who will deliberately say that Great Britain, knowing what we are going to do, would recommend that we give so and so, and take it when they neither need nor desire it? That is an accusation altogether unreasonable and unfounded, I am sure it could not be said that the British Admiralty had any such thought or intention in respect to the naval defence of the Empire.

I have observed that one of the reasons why the hon. member for South Wellington contended we should not give three dreadnoughts to Great Britain was that Great Britain did not want them, and one of his strongest arguments was that these vessels would in a very short time become obsolete. I would like to ask him if vessels built by the British Admiralty—built in the very shortest time—become so quickly obsolete, in what condition would the two dreadnoughts proposed to be built by my hon. friend be before they are finished? They can be built in Great Britain in two or three years; it would take ten or fifteen years for my right hon. friend to complete his fleet units here. My right hon. friend shakes his head, but in the contract he had with respect to the building of these four Bristols, what was the term of years provided for their completion? Three years for the first little Bristol to be completed, and six years for the other threee! If it takes six years to build four little Bristols how long would it take to get your plant, docks and shipyard ready, and to build the two complete fleet units he proposes? Fifteen years at least; and if ours become obsolete in three, I cannot vouch for the condition those of hon. gentlemen opposite will be in at the end of fifteen.

The hon. member for South Renfrew appeared to wax righteously indignant, because, forsooth, this Government was giving three dreadnoughts to Great Britain without manning them. The first answer to that is, we are giving what we have been asked to give; we are giving that which England said would be the most effective aid that could be rendered to the British Empire. We are giving that which the British Government in 1909 considered the best means of meeting the then emergency. Is it not inconsistent for the hon. member for South Renfrew to find fault with us for not manning these three ships and sending them to Great Britain as an emergency contribution when he himself will not vote even for the contribution of the three ships? With respect to the manning of the ships, I would remind hon. gentlemen that there is an old adage regarding people who live in glass houses. It does not do to become too righteously indignant, because the house is very transparent, and one can see through it very clearly; nor should they attempt to throw stones from the vicinity of such an unstable and flimsy structure.

Let us see what success hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had with reference to their measure for a naval policy for this country. In 1909 my right hon. friend brought down a Bill under which he purchased the Niobe and the Rainbow at a cost of one and a third millions of dollars. The cost of maintenance last year of that insignificant portion of a local navy was $784,000, the annual maintenance being over 50 per cent of the original cost. On the same basis, it would take $17,500,000 a year to man and maintain the three dreadnoughts which we propose to give, and would take $26,000,000 to man and maintain two fleet units which my right hon. friend would give. I am not now saying that if we had the two fleet units it would cost that much, I simply make these statements upon the records placed before us, and as taken from the naval report for the year ended March 31, 1912.

With respect to our ability to man the three proposed dreadnoughts, I may say that the desertions from the Niobe and Rainbow as shown by this report for the year ending 31st March, 1912, were 149, and the number of recruits taken during the year 126, the desertions during the year being 23 in excess of the recruits. Here is a mathematical problem for my right hon. friend. If during the course of the year the deserters from a little navy costing a million and a half are 23 in excess of the recruits, how long would it take to man three dreadnoughts costing $35,000,000?

Mr. PUGSLEY : Will my hon. friend be good enough to read the statement of Admiral Kingsmill giving his reasons for the desertions ?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO : When the Niobe and the Rainbow came out from the old country, they were manned to the teeth with British seamen. They started off with a full complement, and notwithstanding that the men placed on these ships were not recruited from Canada, this is the record we have of the desertions which have since taken place.

Mr. PUGSLEY : What does Admiral Kingsmill say ?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO : I am quoting the facts as given in the report of the Naval Department for the year ending the 31st of March, 1912. I wish to quote something else from the same report, and perhaps this is what my hon. friend wants to know :

> The large number of desertions is attributable to the fact that the greater number of recruits are entered from places remote from the sea, and find sea life distasteful. They are totally unacquainted with the conditions of life in a ship, which differ much from what they have been accustomed to. A large number of men on board the Niobe are pensioners from the Imperial service.

The report goes on to say :

> On July 30, 1911, the Niobe went on the rocks. H.M.S Cornwall came to her assistance, towed her to Halifax. Her repairs are expected to be completed July, 1912, one year afterwards.

So that for a whole year the Niobe was under repairs at Halifax. She cost $1,000,000, her maintenance was $500,000, and her recruits during the year were 26 less than her desertions. That is the history of the navy as far as we have got it. In the face of all that, my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) attempts to poke fun at this Government for not attempting to man three dreadnoughts, three of the most powerful ships of the British navy completely, and to have sailors and officers trained in three years when, from the Admiralty report, we see that it takes at least six years to train men for this purpose. Perhaps the British Admiralty got a glance at this report and concluded that it was no use asking Canada for men if these were the conditions of recruiting in this country. We cannot get away from the fact, and it is useless to try to make political capital out of it, that we have not the merchant marine here to supply the sailors needed at this time. Great Britain has been the supreme maritime shipping nation for hundreds of years. Her men have been trained to sea generation after generation and a large proportion of them are maritime. They have a huge population in a small area, we have a large area with a small population. These facts will make it impossible at least for a long time to recruit in Canada. I am not saying it will be forever impossible but it will take a long time and greatly increased pay will be needed to induce the people of Canada to leave the very lucrative occupations they find here. In England there is a great population, many of whom are idle and are willing to accept less pay, while they are more capable of fulfilling the duties of sailors on these great men-of-war

What did the Globe say before this matter was thrown into the political arena? On March 29 again the Globe said:

> There can be no resisting the conviction, in view of these facts, that the Mother Country will accept the aid of her colonies at this time of crisis with thankful enthusiasm.

Just think of that, and hon. gentlemen argue hour after hour that she does not want them and will not accept the gift.

> Nothing is so likely to bring the mad competition to a stop as a conviction on the part of Germany that it is hopeless. In such case the colonies will be conferring a boon on the German taxpayers as well as on the British.

I come now to the last point of difference between the great political parties and that is: Our opponents contend that Canada can best contribute to the naval defence of Great Britain and the Empire by the construction of a separate and independent navy along the line of the Naval Service Act of 1910 passed by the late Government and although they now profess to find no fault with the granting of a sum of $35,000,000 or even more for naval purposes, it should, they say, be applied and used in the construction of two complete fleet units to be built, manned and maintained by Canada, and engrafted on their naval policy of 1910 which they passed as a permanent naval policy of Canada and without reference to but denying any emergency or urgent need of assistance as such to the Imperial Government. They propose to engraft the two fleet units upon the Naval Service Act of 1910. We opposed the Naval Service Act of 1910 and we oppose it now because of the manner of the organization of that navy, because of its inconsistency, its imperial inconsistency, because it claims that this Government has the right to say when Great Britain became involved in war that they would go to the assistance of Great Britain. That involved the right to say that they would not go to the assistance of Great Britain. If they did not go to the assistance of Great Britain and war came on, then, according to international law, the belligerent foe would have the right to come to our coasts, to destroy our cities, towns and coast lines and possibly capture Canada. According to international law he would be perfectly justified in doing so. You cannot maintain a neutral position, you have got to be part of the Empire or not. If you are part of the Empire you must have some different constitution for your navy than that of a separate and independent country and the Bill brought down in 1910 made the navy of Canada separate and independent from the navy of Great Britain because the navy of Canada could not move one foot, could not do an aggressive act until the Governor in Council said it should do so.

I ask my right hon. friend in all fairness what difference there is between that and the navy of any other independent nation? If there should be a war to-morrow between Germany and England what would France do? The cabinet of that country would meet and decide whether they would come to the assistance of either power or remain neutral. There is no distinction between the organization of the Canadian navy, so far as going to war is concerned, and that of any other nation in the world. Let me illustrate this in another way. Japan is Britain's ally. Japan said ten years ago: I will trust you for ten years; to that extent I will bind my navy to you. I have sufficient confidence in your integrity, in your honour, in the justice of your wars, that I will bind myself to you for ten years. She did this through her cabinet, it was an executive act. My right hon. friend, when I put the question to him three years ago and asked him whether by his Bill he would bind himself for any particular time to come to the assistance of Great Britain, said: No, not for one moment, we will wait until the war arises, until the time comes, and then decide whether or not we will come to the assistance of Great Britain. Just to the extent of ten years my right hon. friend's policy was less loyal, less patriotic, displayed less faith in Britain's justice and wars than the Government of Japan which said: For ten years we are willing to bind ourselves now to you and to come to your aid, if you become involved in war from any cause.

Our hon. friends find fault with us because they say in bringing in the present measure we are not carrying out the provisions of the resolution of 1909. Let us examine this and see whether or not the resolution of 1909 was based on an emergency. What does it say?

> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with, and in close relation to, the Imperial navy along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire, and the peace of the world.

And then it said that whenever the 'need' arose Canada would make any sacrifice in the interest and for the honour and the integrity of the British Empire.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend over there says 'Hear, hear.' I would say 'Hear, hear' if you had gone over to Great Britain and had done as that resolution says you are to do. I would have no fault to find with what you did. But the resolution says further that whatever you do, whatever service you organize, if you inaugurate a Canadian naval service it must be first of all in close co-operation with the British Admiralty. Under your policy there was no co-operation as I have pointed out.

In the next place it must be in close relation, which means practically the same thing. In the next place it had to be along the lines suggested by the Admiralty. Now let us see what the lines suggested by the Admiralty were. Let us face this thing fairly and squarely, and see whether or not we are entitled to the criticisms that hon. gentlemen opposite have made. The first suggestion of the British Admiralty was that if you want to do that which we consider most effective for the maintenance of the central navy, give us a periodical cash contribution. Now, we said in that resolution that we were against regular or periodical cash contributions and therefore we found no fault with the right hon. the leader of the Opposition for not consenting to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman in favour of any regular contribution?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The next point was this, that it must be along lines suggested by the Admiralty. What were the lines suggested by the Admiralty? I have the Admiralty report here and it said first:

It has been recognized by the colonial governments that in time of war the local naval forces should come under the general directions of the Admiralty.

The Bill brought down by the leader of the Opposition made no such provision. Canada was absolutely free and independent to do what it liked as the Governor in Council thought wise. That was the first, the next was:

In the opinion of the Admiralty, a dominion government desirous of creating a navy should aim at forming a distinct fleet unit——

You did not form a distinct fleet unit. Then the Admiralty report goes on:

—and the smallest unit is one which, while manageable in time of peace, is capable of being used in its component parts in time of war. The fleet unit to be aimed at should, therefore, in the opinion of the Admiralty, consist at least of the following:—

One armoured cruiser (new Indomitable class, which is of the dreadnought type.

You did not do that. You refused to do it. The next was:

Three unarmoured cruisers (Bristol class).

You did provide for that subsequently, but never even let the contract for them. Next:

Six destroyers. Three submarines.

And the last was:

As the armoured cruiser is the essential part of the fleet unit, it is important that an Indomitable of the dreadnought type should be the first vessel to be built in commencing the formation of a fleet unit.

You ignored every one of those Admiralty recommendations, and we sent you over there to follow them. That was where the point came in; you ignored every recommendation in the resolution which said that whenever the need arose Canada would be willing to make any sacrifice. You came back and paid no attention whatever to the emergency but passed your permanent policy. You came back with an article entirely different from what we sent you over there to get, and you refused to go to the people and forced it through this House. And yet you come here to-day and ask us to go to the people when we are following faithfully the recommendation in that resolution, namely, that whenever the need arises Canada will make any sacrifice. We did not ask you to go to the people on that resolution. If you had followed that resolution you need not have gone to the people at all. That resolution said that whenever the need arose we would make any sacrifice necessary. The need has arisen now, we are making the sacrifice, and we do not propose to go to the people on this emergency policy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: For the very best of reasons.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: But so far as the permanent policy was concerned, we said then and we say now that we are willing and we will go to the people upon the permanent naval policy of this country when the time comes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is that policy?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend does not need to walk over his political grave before he gets there. He will get there soon enough. Let me quote again from this Admiralty memorandum which hon. members opposite say does not justify the action of the present Government. What does the memorandum say in clause 7:

Naval supremacy is of two kinds: general and local. General naval supremacy consists in the power to defeat in battle and drive from the seas the strongest hostile navy or combination of hostile navies wherever they may be found. It is the general naval supremacy of Great Britain which is the primary safeguard of the security and interests of the great dominions of the Crown and which for all these years has been the deterrent upon any possible designs prejudicial to or inconsiderate of their policy and safety. Local superiority consists in the power to send in good time to, or maintain permanently in some distant theatre forces adequate to defeat the enemy or hold him in check until the main decision has been obtained in the decisive theatre.

I point out these words:

—until the main decision has been obtained in the decisive theatre.

That is what a local force is for, simply to hold the enemy in check until the main decision has been obtained in the decisive theatre, and the decisive theatre is the North Sea.

Now I want to use the speech of my hon. friend from Edmonton once more, because that speech affords the clearest illustration of the fundamental difference of principle in the policies of the two great political parties in Canada. My hon. friend from Edmonton in his speech used these words:

We will assume that there is a great combination of European powers, that they are able to give more or less successful battle on the North sea and on the North Atlantic to the British navy. In the meantime, it has been possible for this combination of powers, by the use of a trifling number of warships, to absolutely blockade the seaports of Canada, to practically control Canada, to land men in Canada, to occupy Canada, to take Quebec and Montreal. Supposing that the prospective battle in the North Sea resulted unfavourably to the British navy, and supposing there was a settlement of the terms as between Great Britain and that combination of European powers, I ask my hon. friends what would likely take place? I ask them if they realize just how much interest Canada would have in that transaction? I ask our anti-militarist friends in Canada if it is not an absolute certainty that under such conditions, Canada would pass from the control of the British Empire to the control of the successful one of those European powers? Do they think that Germany, if she should happen to be in that combination that I have supposed was successful against Britain and her fleet, would not wish to become owner and control this Dominion of Canada? Do they think that because they happen to belong to another race that they would not fall under German dominion, supposing such a thing took place? If they have any ideas on this subject, let them recall Alsace and Lorraine, the prize of a successful war, and let them figure to themselves whether Canada would not be just as fair a prize, or whether Canada would not, in absolute fact, be the prize for which those fleets would contend in the North sea if ever such a terrible event should take place.

My hon. friend starts by saying, supposing the British navy is defeated. He starts with the supposition of that state of things which it is the very object of this Bill to help to prevent. My hon. friend's proposition is a selfish, misconceived, and mistaken policy looking to the interests of Canada after the British navy has been defeated, while ours is a policy looking to the preservation of the British navy and to the prevention of its defeat for the simple reason that if the British navy is defeated your little local coast defence vessels will be absolutely useless against the navy which has just defeated that of Great Britain. That is the fundamental distinction betweeen the policies of the two parties. My hon. friend from Edmonton says: I believe we should have this little local navy. Why? Because we will be able to retain our territory and prevent the other nation from occupying Canada. Occupation can only happen if Great Britain is not successful, and if Great Britain is not successful then Canada is at the mercy of the other nation anyway. But if you give assistance to the original central point of danger if you can preserve your front at the point of danger by assisting the central navy in the North sea when the Armageddon comes you are safe in every part of the Empire. If you do not help the central fleet Canada may become the Alsace-Lorraine of Germany a few years hence. My hon. friend says that Alsace and Lorraine went to Germany. Why did it go to Germany? Because France did not appreciate my right hon. friend's maxim that 'The hour of peril is too late for preparations.' That is the fundamental difference between the policies of the two parties. You cannot get away from it. You may argue as you like but you come back to the same proposition that has been stated by the British Admiralty that the safety of every portion of the Empire depends on the maintenance of the supremacy of the central fleet of the Empire in the North sea.

Now, in conclusion, I want to make an appeal to the right hon. leader of the Opposition. He has before him all these evidences which, I think, justify the assumption that there is some emergency. I do not propose to enumerate them all again but I want to say that surely all these evidences must produce some reasonable doubt in his mind that there is a condition of things, as the hon. member for Edmonton has said, different from that which existed two years ago. He has said that if he thought there was any danger, immediate or prospective, or even if Great Britain were on trial, he would not hesitate to give my right hon. friend the leader of the Government assistance, to give him $35,000,000, yes, four times $35,000,000. I ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, does he not think that the evidence has been adduced by various speakers in this House, by the Admiralty memorandum, by the amendment to the German naval law of 1912, by the fact that the German navy is not essential to her actual existence whilst the English navy is, ought to be sufficient to create some reasonable doubt in his mind that England is at least on trial? If he comes to that conclusion he should give the person on trial the same chance, the same opportunity that British jurisprudence gives to any man on trial in England namely the benefit of the doubt and if he does he must give him the benefit of the doubt, join hands with us and make this a unanimous grant to the Old Land. The right hon. gentleman will not be inconsistent with his policy of 1910 because that policy was passed not as a temporary one but as the permanent policy of the Government, he would not be acting inconsistently with the resolution of 1909 because that resolution said that whenever the need arose Canada was prepared to make any sacrifice in the interest of the Empire. He could therefore be perfectly consistent with his policy of the past.

And, finally, if the right hon. gentleman is still unconvinced as to the emergency or need of present assistance to the Imperial navy he will always have the consciousness that he has erred in the right direction and will have in some small degree attempted to express to the Old Land the gratitude and appreciation of the Canadian people for the manifold favours and blessings, to say nothing of the millions in money, she has heaped upon us in the centuries past, and he will have helped us to maintain in some measure our dignity and self respect as the foremost dominion in the mightiest empire and the greatest agency for secular good within the records of humanity.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on the motion and the amendment, I do not purpose specifically answering the arguments of my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Middlebro) except as I may allude to them in the few remarks that I have to make upon this subject. I suppose that both sides of the House have made up their minds that Canada should do something towards naval expenditure. I think that the great mass of the people throughout the country have made up their minds that we should do something towards naval expenditure. There are some people in this country, outside the province of Quebec, some people in the good old province of Ontario, who still think that we should not do anything towards naval expenditure. They are as loyal as any of us here. Canada is the country in which they are living and Canada is the country that they think they should be loyal to. I have no fault to find with that type of people. But, if the mass of the people have made up their minds that we should do something towards naval expenditure, I presume the question is: What? Our hon. friends on the other side of the House claim that there is an emergency. The hon. member for North Grey says that that is an improper word to use, that we should use the words 'immediate need.' There is not very much distinction between 'immediate need' and 'emergency.' If we are going to commit ourselves to a naval expenditure, as we, in fact, did some time ago, what is the object to be attained? Any remarks I have to make are purely personal. I am neither the head of the Government nor of the Opposition, nor do I claim to have any influence with any other member of the House, so that what I have to say is purely personal and is the result of my own reading and consideration of the subject.

If we are going to seek to do something what should we do? What is the object? The object, from my standpoint, is, first, the protection of our own shores and of our own trade routes; secondly, to relieve the Mother Country and the taxpayer of the Mother Country of some of the burthens that they have been bearing for the past hundred years. Our friends on the other side of the House say most distinctly—the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) told us so—that this must be in no way considered as a permanent policy, but as simply a contribution on account of an emergency. Therefore, I take it that I have the right to look into the question as to whether or not an emergency exists. The hon. member for North Grey quotes from a number of newspapers in England saying that they think that there is an emergency. My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) quotes also from a number of British newspapers saying that they do not think there is any emergency. At what conclusion do we arrive? It just shows that, as in a great many cases, there is an argument on each side. The best proof that we can bring to our aid on occasions of this kind is that afforded by the information that we can gather as we go along, like the information and the experience that we accumulate throughout our lives. Years ago, long before I came to Parliament, I studied the navy question of the Empire as well as I could from constant reading of English newspapers and the speeches of British statesmen, and so, whatever ideas I have formed on the matter have largely been on information acquired from British sources. Someone, I do not know to whom I am indebted for the kindness, very recently sent me the Hansard of the British House of Commons and House of Lords, and I read the speeches of the Lords and the Commoners, mostly delivered by Unionists, and I could find nothing in these speeches to show that there was nearly so great an emergency at the present time as there was in 1909. In 1909 there was a fear that the Empire was in danger, and this House then passed the celebrated resolution of which we have heard so much. The speeches of the Unionist members of the Lords and Commons of England, show that there is no emergency, but, underlying all is to be found the idea that there is an aggressive campaign throughout Europe for naval expenditure and construction. There can be no doubt in the mind of any man who studies the question, but that there is an aggressive policy of shipbuilding, not only in Germany but throughout Europe. The Germans say they have to augment their navy to protect them from the aggression of England, and perhaps from their standpoint they say it just as truthfully as we say the reverse. The proposition of this Government is to contribute $35,000,000 for the purpose of building three dreadnoughts to be manned and maintained by England. As was pointed out by the hon. member for South Wellington, the First Lord of the Admiralty stated, not in March but in July—although some say the navy yards are occupied to their limit at the present time—that the trouble was not in building the ships but in manning the ships when built. If we give these three dreadnoughts to the British Government, we must see that the British government will have to man and maintain them and if they find it difficult now to provide men and officers for the ships already in commission, how much more difficult will it be to man the three extra ships which we propose to give them. In addition to that, the proposition of this Government means, if it means anything, that it is a contribution pure and simple. They say they do not propose to make it a periodical contribution, but how can we tell when they give us no idea as to what their permanent naval policy will be? My argument is, that when it comes to the vital question, if this $35,000,000 is only a temporary contribution, and if there is no emergency—and nothing that we have heard or read shows us that there is an emergency—then $35,000,000 is too much for this country to give as a contribution unless it is expended on a permanent navy for Canada. It about equals the amount we propose to expend on two fleet units. And when we do contribute this $35,000,000 what have we got for it? Nothing. On the other hand, what have we got when we spend $35,000,000 in building a Canadian navy? We have a navy that will protect our own shores and protect our own trade routes; we have a navy that belongs to Canada; we have a navy that will create a Canadian sentiment, a national sentiment, in Canada; we have something worth working for and of which we can be proud; we have something worth paying taxes for, and it is to be built by taxes no matter what form they take. I disagree with my hon. friend when he says that if the English navy were destroyed—and there he conjures up something in his imagination that is not humanly probable—our navy is not worth a tinker's fiddle, by which, I suppose, he meant to use the common expression, that our navy was not worth a tinker's damn. Is that any way to speak of a Canadian navy; is that any way to speak of Canadianism?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is the Tory way.

Mr. NESBITT: That may be the Tory way, but is that the kind of spirit we should cultivate in this country? If it is, I am sorry for Canada. I am a pure bred Canadian and I am proud of it, and I want to say if England can build a navy, if Japan can build a navy and she has, if Russia can build a navy, and if Germany can build a navy, surely Canada can build a navy. And Sir, not only can we build a navy, but we can man and maintain that navy. The whole thing, in my judgment, comes down to the question: Is there an emergency, or, as my hon. friend says: Is there an immediate need? I should like to say that in 1909, when this proposition of the naval expenditure came actively before the country it was introduced first by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I was a very young member of this House then, I mean young in service. I listened carefully and attentively to my hon. friend's speech---a marvelous speech. To me it carried conviction. I must say when he was through his speech I remember saying to my deskmate:

'That rings true, that sounds right to me.'

I had been thinking for a long time, as I told you in starting, that Canada should do something towards naval expenses, that Canada should take some share towards assisting the Mother Country on the seas, from a naval standpoint as well as she did from a land standpoint or a militia standpoint. I had been wondering what was the best course to pursue. When I listened to that wonderful speech, I made up my mind that was the true course, and I voted at that time with very great pleasure for the resolution which has been so often quoted to this House. Now, when our ministers, including the right hon. the former Premier of this country, went to England and consulted with the Admiralty, the Admiralty recommended the establishment of a fleet unit on the Pacific to consist of an armoured cruiser, of the new Indomitable class, which is of the dreadnought type, three unarmoured cruisers, Bristol class, six destroyers and three submarines. What position did we find ourselves in? Let us be absolutely honest in this matter. At that time, that was the first public naval discussion in this country, and a great many people in this country, not only in the province of Quebec, but in the province of Ontario, in the good old county of Oxford that I have the honour of trying to represent, who thought we should not go into any naval expenditure. Now, as a matter of fact, we, the Liberal party, had to educate the people of this country to a very great extent as regards naval expenditure of any kind whatever. At that time the former Minister of Finance told this House, when we introduced our Naval Bill, that we did not propose to incur any naval expenditure except what could be paid out of revenue. If a vote had been taken then I do not believe that the people of this country would have been willing that we should incur any naval expenditure that could not be paid out of revenue. I think we were representing properly the views of the great mass of the people when we decided to that effect. Why did we cut down our naval expenditure to what our friends on the other side of the House call a 'tin-pot navy,' the Bristols and swift cruisers and torpedo boat destroyers? We did so because at that time, we had very great and heavy expenditure in regard to the National Transcontinental railway and other things that were being introduced, and if we were going to confine our naval expenditure to revenue, it was absolutely necessary that we should go as reasonably as we could. Now my hon. friend, who has just sat down, challenges us by saying that we did not observe the Admiralty's recommendation. We did observe it, just as far as it was possible and consistent that we should do so. I am not saying this for any possible excuse. We stood for our naval policy then. We stand for it now. The fact is that the increase of our naval policy is absolutely justified by the present revenues of the country. Our naval policy is precisely the same in 1912 and 1913 as it was in 1909 and 1910, when the Naval Bill was introduced, only that the country is capable in our judgment of bearing a heavier expenditure. We knew then, as we know now, that the Admiralty had recommended a fleet unit on the Pacific. They did not recommend a fleet unit for the Atlantic, but we think that a fleet unit for the Atlantic is just as necessary as it is for the Pacific, and we hope that there will be two fleet units headed by an armoured cruiser as good as money will buy or science build. That is our present proposition.

In the Imperial Conference of 1909, I have no doubt that my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition had the confidence of the British Government, just as much as my hon. friends who went to England last year had the confidence of the British Government. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition should know whether he was given any secrets at that time which he could not give to the world and he does not seem to believe, as held by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), that any secrets were given to our hon. friends who went to England last year any more than there were at that time. He does not seem to believe and we do not believe that there are any secrets that would lead us to consider that there is an emergency now any more than there was in 1909. If there was any emergency in 1909 and there certainly was a greater feeling throughout Canada that there was an emergency then than there is now, what do we see now at the present time? We see Germany and Great Britain joining together, trying to settle the Balkan dispute. We see Germany and Great Britain more friendly probably than we have ever seen them for the last number of years. So far as my slight knowledge is concerned, and so far as any speeches which have been made on this question in this House, are concerned, I see no possible chance of any more of an emergency or any more of an immediate need—to use the words of my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro)—than there was in 1909. Therefore the question to me is, if we are going to do something, and we have all agreed that we will do something, then which of the two plans is the best under the circumstances?

Now, we will come to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the House on the 18th day of December. Again that wonderful eloquence, again that wonderful word-painting, but one cannot help but think, and I imagine most of the members on this side of the House could not help but think, that that eloquent voice, that wonderful word-painting could be used just as well on the other side as it could be on the side he is on at present. He reminds me of a great advocate who was prepared at any time to advocate the cause that he was engaged to advocate. There was another thought that passed through my mind after listening to him, because I have a great deal of pride in my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I, as a Canadian, have a great deal of admiration for my hon. friend. I always have had, because I think he is wonderfully gifted so far as oratory is concerned. Now, I could not help but remember an old adage attributed to a great man, Abraham Lincoln. You can fool some of the people all the time, but I am one of those you cannot fool all the time. My hon. friend certainly took me into camp in 1909, on March the 29th, but he did not affect me a bit on the 18th of December.

My hon. friend in 1909, as the member for South Wellington has told us, did not want a contribution; neither did my hon. friend the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister was especially strong in speaking to that resolution. The hon. member for South Wellington quoted the resolution this afternoon, and quoted it properly, and while I do not intend to indulge in needless repetition, I wish to again quote some statements to which I particularly wish to call attention. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, when he was in opposition, said:

> So that the policy of Australia at the present time is to build up a flotilla of submarines and torpedo boats which in case of war would co-operate with the armed cruisers and battleships of the British navy.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this statement:

> The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to this form of aid.

It goes still further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year an equal sum and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve, or twenty, or thirty years you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck; there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the product of defence. Yet some time or other, no one can doubt that with resources and with the population constantly increasing we must and will have in this country a naval force of our own for our coast and home defence.

From a literary point of view, Mr. Speaker, this passage is well worth quoting. The language is beautiful, and I only wish I could myself employ such rhetoric without quoting from my hon. friend. Hon. members opposite say they are not prepared to announce their permanent policy; therefore we do not know what their permanent policy is, and as we have nothing to prove to the contrary, we are perfectly justified in taking it for granted that as they have commenced making contributions they will continue doing so.

In reading the speeches made in the House of Lords and House of Commons in England, I noticed there was not so much criticism by the members of the Opposition regarding the allegation that England was in danger as there was on the naval strategy of the First Lord of the Admiralty. I noticed particularly that in dealing with that naval strategy, they criticised his taking certain ships away from the Mediterranean and placing them in the North Sea, and condemned very severely his withdrawal of ships from the distant seas. Everything I have read in this matter leads me to the belief that the proposition to build our own fleet units is wiser than a contribution. The First Lord of the Admiralty, even after the recent German Naval Bill came before him, stated in the House that on account of the movement on the part of Germany and other European powers, as was pointed out by the hon. member for South Wellington this afternoon, to increase the striking power of their navies, it was necessary, from the very existence of this fact, for him to withdraw the ships from the distant seas, and concentrate his navy in the home waters. If that is true, it accentuates the reasons why we should commence at once to build two fleet units, to protect our own shores and our own trade routes. I now quote an extract from a London cable :

Lord Charles Beresford apparently has foreseen grave danger in the Borden idea, and says in the Daily Express this morning:

What I recommended that the dominions do was to defend their end of the trade routes with strong naval bases, mines, torpedo boat destroyers, and light cruisers. The trade routes are unprotected, and now our danger is starvation, not invasion.

The country was deceived and fooled by statements regarding the dreadnoughts of other nations. We were insulted by being told a dreadnought could sink their whole fleets. The people speak of nothing but dreadnoughts, quite forgetting that a fleet is composed of a variety of units, any one of which being defective or short jeopardizes the whole.

So far as I am personally concerned, I do not know much about ships, and I am only taking my information from those more capable of judging the matter than I am. That brings me to the only suggestion the right hon. the Prime Minister made as to a permanent policy, when he said in his speech introducing this resolution :

During my recent visit to the British Islands I ventured on many public occasions to propound the principle that the great dominions, sharing in the defence of the Empire upon the high seas, must necessarily be entitled to share also in the responsibility for and in the control of foreign policy.

In other words he contended throughout his speech that before adopting any permanent naval policy it would be desirable to have representation on the Naval Defence Committee. We have, I understand, every four years, a meeting of what is called the Imperial Conference. I am not touching on this because I have consulted with any of my colleagues on this side of the House as to their views. Once more I would like to say I am giving my own views only, but they are very strong on this question. There is a vast difference in my judgment between the Imperial conference every four years and the proposal of a representative on the Imperial Defence Committee. The Imperial conference consists of premiers absolutely equal, the British Premier is no more than the Canadian Premier or the Australian Premier. Six premiers, or whatever their number may be, absolutely equal and conferring together for the good of the Empire. The Imperial Defence Committee is an advisory committee. To whom? To the British Cabinet and, so far as foreign relations are concerned, to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Suppose we demand a representative on the Imperial Defence Committee, on what basis shall our demand be? We must have some basis to make that demand. If it is a basis of population and we consider only the British Isles we would have a voice of one in six perhaps. If we consider the rest of the Dominions, which we must do, we would probably have a voice of one in ten. If we consider the rest of the Dominions and the Crown colonies and India, I have not calculated it, but we would have a voice of probably one in fifty. What good would such a voice be? Would it not be a great danger? Could any position be more dangerous to the love and sympathy that we now have with Great Britain? What type of a man might we have there to represent us? Whom would we have to represent us? Suppose we had some gentleman who when he got into that atmosphere which the hon. member for Wellington described this afternoon, would forget in six months that he was a Canadian, and in a year that there was such a place as Canada. We have had such cases. Suppose he was not that type but a gentleman more or less stubborn? Would he not be likely to disagree with the rest of his colleagues on that Imperial Defence Committee and would not that likely cause a clash and would we not as Canadians likely take his part? That is a dangerous position to take.

At the conference of 1911 Mr. Asquith in welcoming the various premiers said in part:

There are two things in the self-governing British Empire which are unique in the history of great political agitations. The first is the reign of law: wherever the King's writ runs it is the symbol and messenger, not of an arbitrary authority but of rights shared by every citizen and capable of being asserted and made effective by the tribunals of the land. The second is the combination of local autonomy—absolute, unfettered, complete—with loyalty to a common head co-operation, spontaneous and unforced for common interests and purposes, and, I may add, a common trusteeship whether it be in India or in the Crown colonies or in the Protectorates or within our own borders, of the interests and fortunes of fellow subjects who have not yet attained, perhaps in some cases may never attain to the full stature of self-government.

He goes on:

In the early Victorian era there were two rough and ready solutions for what was regarded, with some impatience, by the British statesmen of that day, as the 'colonial problem.' The one was centralization, the government, that is except in relatively trivial matters of all the outlying parts of the Empire from an office in Downing street. The other was disintegration—the acquiescence in, perhaps the encouragement of, a process of successive 'hivings of' by which, without the hazards or embitterments of coercion, each community as it grew to political manhood, would follow the example of the American colonies, and start an independent and sovereign existence of its own. After 70 years' experience of Imperial evolution, it may be said with confidence that neither of these theories commands the faintest support today, either at home, or in any part of our self-governing Empire. We were saved from their adoption—some people would say by the favour of Providence—or (to adopt a more flattering hypothesis) by the political instinct of our race. And just in proportion as centralization was seen to be increasingly absurd, so has disintegration been felt to be increasingly impossible. Whether in this United Kingdom, or in any one of the great communities which you represent, we, each of us are, and we, each of us, intend to remain, master in our own household. This is, here at home and throughout the dominions, the lifeblood of our policy.

Then he says further:

There are sitting at this table to-day six Prime Ministers, all holding their commissions from the same King, and all deriving their title to its exercise from the voice and vote of a free democracy. We are all of us, I suppose, in our own parliaments, party leaders, holding and using power by virtue of the confidence of a party majority. But each of us when he entered this room left his party prepossessions outside the door.

I read that to show you what Mr. Asquith thought in 1911, and although Mr. Asquith may be a Liberal in England he is the foremost statesman in that country to-day and one of the foremost, if not the foremost statesmen, in the world.

At that same Imperial Conference Sir Joseph Ward of New Zealand made a two or three days' speech on the question of an Imperial Parliament. Sir Joseph Ward had been advocating an Imperial Parliament as we hear it advocated a great deal. Mr. Asquith said:

It would impair, if not altogether destroy, the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom in such grave matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of treaties, the declaration of maintenance of peace, the declaration of war and, indeed, all those relations with foreign powers, necessarily of the most delicate character, which are now in the hands of the Imperial Government, subject to its responsibility to the Imperial Parliament. That authority cannot be shared.

I quote that because our hon. friends on the other side of the House say that the Premier of Canada said in introducing this resolution that before bringing down a permanent policy they must have a voice on the Imperial Defence Committee. Mr. Asquith at that time said that that responsibility could not be shared. I point this out as a danger point, but that is not what is worrying me. In the last few years we have heard a great many people say that the only difference between the two parties was the difference of the outs and the ins. When a great occasion of this kind arises it shows, after all, the true difference between the Liberal and the Conservative policy, the absolutely true difference. For many years the Liberal party fought for the management of Canadian affairs both in the provinces and in the Dominion. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that when the history of Canada comes to be written you will find that during the 15 years that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his Government were in power, Canadians advanced more in the management of their own affairs than they had in the 30 years previous. When my hon. friends on the other side of the House propose, as they do, judging from my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden's) speech, to have a voice in the management of Imperial affairs, and when they propose this contribution of $35,000,000, they are going back as Conservatism will go back to centralization. That is what I am more afraid of than anything else in this proposition. I am opposed to the contribution because it is a contribution, because to that extent we lose the control of the money which we take from the people, and because the $35,000,000 proposed to be given as a contribution would go a great way towards building a Canadian navy while the money would largely be spent in this country.

Coming to another phase of this question, Mr. Speaker, our hon. friends opposite say that if there is not an emergency there is an immediate need; that in 1915 the navies of the rest of Europe will be greater, so far as armed cruisers and dreadnoughts are concerned, than the navy of Great Britain. Can anyone imagine the whole of Europe attacking Great Britain? It requires a powerful imagination and great ability in word painting to picture such a thing. I have no fear of such an amalgamation. I have no fear of such an attack, but if those powers did attack Britain we propose to establish two fleet units to be headed by the two best ships that science can invent and money can buy. We would have our two ships built, manned and maintained by Canada. Before 1915, if that is the time when there is going to be an emergency, we should have our ships built just as well as my hon. friend's three ships which they propose to give to Great Britain. We propose that our dreadnoughts should form the head of two fleet units. We know very well owing largely to our hon. friend's actions since they came into power, that it would be absolutely impossible for us to build those ships immediately in this country. They should have had the shipyards established here by this time. They would have been established here by this time if we had remained in power, but my hon. friends opposite say we cannot build a navy inside of twenty years. Some say ten years, some say twenty-five years. Then what has become of my hon. friend's advocacy of the policy of Canada for Canadians? My hon. friends on the other side have been for years, throughout the country and in this House, the greatest advocates of the policy of Canada for Canadians. They have advocated that if Canada is to spend money that money should be spent in Canada. What was the policy advocated in the fall of 1911, if it was not that we should have nothing to do with Americans and that we should build up industries in this country? When they say that we cannot build ships in this country they forget that during the last ten years we have established dozens, yes, hundreds of industries in this country, that we had no workmen in this country to carry them on, and that they had to be imported into Canada. They forget that we had no intention of doing what my right hon. friend says the First Lord of the Admiralty is going to ask Canada to do. I need not read the clause. The First Lord, it seems, is going to ask tenders from Canadian shipyards for building auxiliaries in the form of coaling ships and oil tanks. They pretend, at least one would be led to believe they pretend, that that is what we intended to build in Canada. They know very well that we had no intention of asking tenders from the present shipyards in Canada. They know very well that we intended to ask and did obtain tenders from some of the largest shipyards in England. Those people would not need to be taught how to build ships. They would bring their men and their machinery to Canada when they established the shipyards here. They would be ready to build the ships in Canada just as well as they could in England. When those men came here they would be in exactly the same position as the men imported to carry on the industries I have spoken of. We have imported men from the United States, from Switzerland, and from all parts of the earth. These men are not Swiss when they come here; they are not Englishmen; they are not Yankees, they are Canadians. That is what we are advocating for this country. That is the way we have built up this country. When we bring these men in they become citizens, just as the men from the English shipyards that we might establish would become Canadians who would help to build up this country. I am sorry for the man in this House who has so little pride in his country and in Canadianism that he can say that it will take 10 years to establish shipyards in Canada and to build ships in this country. I, for my part, think that we should have established those shipyards by this time, and they would have been established if the hon. members of the Government had gone on with the proposition which was given to them. I believe that they could have been building those swift cruisers now that they have the money and three years from now, or five years from now, they could have all those ships built if they had not delayed carrying out our policy as it was handed to them. I want to emphasize this fact Mr. Speaker, that no man who has the pride in Canada that he should have can safely say that it would take 10 years or 6 years to build those cruisers in this country. Under the policy that we advocated we say that the ships should be built in Canada as far as possible. We recognize the fact that until we get these shipyards established, until we get them going properly, we shall probably have to build some of the ships in England. We recognize that fact, at least I do, but we also recognize that we can establish these yards here, that we have the material, and that we can soon get the men. My hon. friend says that the desertions from the Canadian ships were twenty-six more than the recruits. What wonder? The whole thing was a blank so far as I can see.

Ever since my hon. friends came into power have they done anything to try to maintain those men? Have they done anything to build up that navy or have they done everything that they could to discredit it? There is a vast difference between doing what you can to build up a thing and doing what you can to pull it down. I do not accuse my hon. friends of purposely—yes, I do—pardon me, I take that back, Mr. Speaker, I do accuse my hon. friends of purposely discrediting the navy. They have always called it a tin-pot navy, and, as a matter of fact, these two ships we bought, one for the Atlantic and one for the Pacific, were just as good to train men on as $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 ships would be. It was good policy for us to buy ships of that sort and we could have had the naval schools established by this time and doing the work for which they were designed. You cannot tell me that along the shores of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and the Maritime provinces generally, there is not just as good material for naval cadets and sea fighting men as that which is to be found in England or any other country. It was only last fall that I read the report of the secretary of the navy of the United States and it was wonderful to me to find how many men there were in that navy who came from inland points. Men who had practically never seen the sea before, in a few years, were just as efficient as those who had been brought up on the seashore. I was talking to a young man the other evening from Nova Scotia and he told me that there were quite a number of men in that province who could be trained in a very short time, if they were required for the navy, and who would be perfectly capable of performing that service. I do not know anything about that part of the question but I do know that there is not a man in the manufacturing business in Canada who will not tell you that the native-born can beat any other man that he can put in his factory. As far as my experience is concerned, I do not know of a man who can beat the native-born, and I believe there are no men who can learn to build ships quicker than Canadians. I agree with my hon. friends on this side of the House who, for a number of years, have been asserting that the money we put into the navy should be spent in Canada. Every dollar of it should be spent in Canada and I believe that that is the policy the people will endorse. Our hon. friends on the other side of the House should accept the proposal of my hon. friend from South Wellington. I do not know that anybody else on this side of the House would endorse my hon. friend's proposal, but, as he said, rather than see this question discussed for a length of time in this House, and rather than see any disagreement, as far as I am personally concerned, I would be willing to give and take.

The policy which has been placed before the House by hon. gentlemen opposite is an emergency policy, with all due deference to my hon. friend from North Grey who says that it is a policy providing for an immediate need. It is an emergency policy; otherwise there is no person, I am quite sure in this House, that could endorse a contribution. We Canadians got a little beyond the contribution stage many years ago, and I do not wish to see Canada go back in that regard. I object to a contribution and I object to the centralization of power. As Mr. Asquith says, we have practically been given the absolute management of our own affairs. Therefore, we can make no possible excuse to the people of the country if we shall give $35,000,000 as a contribution, no matter what it may be called and no matter how just the cause. But, as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says, if there were an emergency, a necessity, any proof whatever either in the speeches of hon. members on both sides of the House of Parliament in England, or in the leading journals of England, or in the speeches of my hon. friends on the other side of the House since this question came up, the situation would have a different aspect. But, there has not been one word of proof from any of these sources any more than there was in the speech of the hon. member for North Grey. There has been nothing but the assertion that there is an emergency. Everything points throughout Europe at the present day to greater friendship than there was in 1909.

Now then, let us drop this discussion and go on and build a navy such as we would be proud of in this country, a navy that would protect our own shores and, by protecting our own shores, relieve Great Britain to that extent. It would be a great relief and especially a relief to the British taxpayer.

The hon. member for North Grey showed that in July, when the new German proposition came in, the First Lord of the Admiralty had to increase his naval proposition. We all know that England had to increase her naval proposition. We know that since the members of the English House of Commons and House of Lords have read the new proposition of Germany everyone has stated that he is willing to increase the appropriation so as to maintain the same proportion of naval strength between the two countries. My hon. friend from South Wellington this afternoon showed that the despatch which has been placed before the House only went to 1915. He also showed by a speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty that they did not propose for strategic considerations, to disclose their intentions further than 1915. We can easily understand that, but do not be alarmed that England is going to allow the Germans, or any other European nation in the future, to be ahead of her from 1915 to 1920 any more than she is from 1912 to 1915. Mr. Churchill, the First Lord of the Admiralty, in answering a question recently in the House of Commons in England, stated definitely that they did not propose to reduce their naval expenditure on account of this proposed contribution by the Canadian people. If one of the main objects to be arrived at by this contribution is to assist Great Britain, to relieve her to a certain extent from taxation, do we relieve her any? Not according to the First Lord of the Admiralty. Therefore, why a contribution? Why not go on with our permanent naval policy?

Let us come for a moment to the question of a contribution from the money standpoint. We are told by some that England requires the money to help her build these dreadnoughts but let me point out that last year the imports and exports of Great Britain were nearly $100,000,000 greater than ever they were before; they were nearly as great as those of the United States and Germany combined, the United States with its 100,000,000 people and Germany with its 65,000,000. During the last five years, Great Britain has not only kept up her naval expenditure, but she has paid $275,000,000 off her public debt. And still we are told that we have to contribute $35,000,000 to help Great Britain bear the burden. I contend, Sir, that everything points to the conclusion that the naval policy of the Liberal party, to build a navy in Canada and to man it and maintain it by Canadians, is the proper policy. It may not be possible for us to get enough men to man our ships in two or three years, but we can man them as Great Britain mans her war vessels. There are a great many in the British navy who are not English, Irish or Scotch, and there would be many in our navy who would not be Canadians but they would be Canadians to all intents and purposes, and they would be at least paid by Canada. Are we to put off building a navy until we can get representation on the Imperial Defence Committee, which I think will be the greatest mistake Canada has ever made? If we are so loyal to Great Britain as we pretend to be, especially those after-dinner loyalists, surely we can depend on her to manage the foreign affairs of the Empire.

My hon friend said that the Liberal navy would be a Canadian navy subject to the orders of the Governor General in Council. The proposal is to manage our navy in connection with the Imperial navy so that the same training will be maintained, and then in case of trouble both navies could unite. That is the rule we apply to our land forces, and why cannot it be applied to the navy? If it is to be a Canadian navy whose control should it be under but Canadian control; whose control should it be under but the control of the Canadian people who are paying for it? There is no Liberal in this House, there is no Liberal in the land who thinks that if England were in danger, and if we had a Canadian navy, it would not be instantly sent to the assistance of the motherland. No Liberal who ever breathed the air of Liberalism would for a minute hesitate to send the Canadian navy, if we had such, to the assistance of the Old Country, in case of peril. My position is, that no Canadian policy can be expected to be permanently satisfactory or enduring that does not provide for these things, at least: The building of the ships in Canada, or, at the very least the beginning of preparations for the building of the ships in Canada. The objections to the Borden proposal in this connection are that it is unworthy of Canada, that it is unfair to Great Britain, and that it is calculated to produce complications later on. The control of the fleet must rest with the power that creates it. Canada can no more escape responsibility for the use that is made of a Canadian fleet than an individual could escape responsibility for his conduct by hiring somebody else to do his fighting. In a word, no permanent policy will be acceptable to Canada that is not a Canadian policy. No policy can be properly called a Canadian policy that does not fully recognize the responsibility of Canada, not only for the construction and maintenance, but for the control of the fleet created by Canada.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the despatch from the Colonial Secretary does not ask for a contribution from Canada, and the last clause of it, which has been much commented on, says:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering, after prolonged consideration of all the circumstances, that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Well, Sir, the Liberal policy is to have these ships built in Canada and placed at the head of a Canadian fleet on the Atlantic and on the Pacific; we propose that we shall protect our own shores and our own trade routes. In my view, the day we obtained Canadian autonomy we should have commenced a Canadian navy, and, Sir, we cannot make any mistake in making that start now. We did make a start in 1910; we did it advisedly, we did it as economically as we thought proper in the interests of the country, and I believe the people thought so too. Now, that we have a greater revenue, the Liberals propose to enlarge on that scheme, and we propose to have the ships built by Canadian workmen. The money expended would go into the pockets of Canadian workmen and from the pockets of Canadian workmen into the pockets of the Canadian agriculturist, the Canadian miner, the Canadian manufacturer; in other words, back into the pockets of the Canadian people. We believe that in defending our own shores, we will relieve the Mother Country, not only of a great burden of taxation, but of great anxiety as to the defence of her dominions. That is what we propose and we will stand loyally by it. If there is any doubt in the minds of hon. getlemen opposite as to whether their policy or our policy is more satisfactory to the people of this country, I do not say what my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) said, to pass the Redistribution Bill; I say: Never mind the Redistribution Bill, go to the country now and ask the people what they want. I firmly believe that there are few Canadians in this country of ours, from Halifax to Vancouver and from Windsor to Halifax, who will think as my hon. friend, who has just sat down thought, that in case of trouble we would never amount to anything but a tinker's fiddle so far as any navy we could produce is concerned. That is a direct insult to every Canadian who takes a pride in his country. I am a Canadian first, last and all the time. I am loyal to Canada, and by being loyal to Canada I am naturally loyal to the British Empire, because what is good for Canada must be good for the British Empire. I am sick and tired of hearing this talk about loyalty. The more champagne, and the worse the champagne, the more loyalty talk we have. The man who is loyal to his family does not go down to the barber shops and saloons and tell people he is loyal to his family. If he did so no man would believe him. The man who is loyal to his country does not need to say so every time he gets on his feet. What is loyalty after all? It is the spirit that is born in us to defend to the last drop of blood we have in our bodies first our family, next our country. What is our country in this instance? We are Canadians, native born; we are Canadians first, last and all the time. Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the people of this country are Canadians, and this policy or any other policy that is for the interest of Canada is for the interest of the Empire. You cannot separate the two things. As my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, you cannot separate the right arm from the body or the left arm from the body; they are one and the same thing; the same thought directs every member. The same thought, so far as we Canadians are concerned is, that when we are loyal to our own country, we have got to be loyal to the Empire. No other proposition can be put before this people. In this naval question I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. Years before I had anything to do with this House, I had thought over this naval question and there is no possible doubt in my mind that it is our duty, whether we are loyal or disloyal, to assist at any rate in defending our own shores. I believe we can do it, and no man need tell me that the Canadian people cannot build ships as well as they can build anything else. I ask my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House to drop their proposition of a contribution. It is too much going back to the time that we have passed away from, and the time that we as Liberals will never consent to go back to.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself of the privilege which comes to me and to all of us as members of this House, to discuss for a time what has been regarded by most of the members who have already spoken, as one of the most important, if not the most important matter, which has ever come before this House. Before entering into a discussion of the proposition which has been made by my esteemed leader I want to make one or two references to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. My hon. friend from North Oxford who has just taken his seat, stated that he was a pure bred Canadian and was proud of it. I also am a Canadian, and I wish to continue to be proud to call myself a Canadian; but it is impressed upon my mind that if we in this House were to follow the guidance of the right hon. leader of the Opposition not many of us could be proud to call ourselves Canadians. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has been trying to make excuses for the desertions from the Niobe. He did not tell the House that many of those assertions had taken place previous to the 21st of September 1911, and that those desertions took place when that vessel was under the control of so great a man as the then Minister of Marine, the hon. member for Rouville. He, if any man in Canada, judging from his own estimation of himself, should have been able to conduct the navy, or that piece of it, in such a way as to prevent any desertions. He was not able to do so. My hon. friend from North Oxford stated that the reason why there were desertions from the navy was because men on this side of the House had ridiculed that navy and called it a 'tin pot' navy. As soon as the sailors got on board those vessels, they found out for themselves that it was a 'tin pot' navy, and they being sensible men naturally took the first opportunity to get off the tin pots.

My hon. friend from North Oxford has said that there is no emergency present or prospective, yet he advocates a very considerable increase in the policy brought down by his leader in 1910. He advocates now a fleet unit on the Atlantic and another on the Pacific. If everything is as he says, perfect peace and harmony, without a cloud in prospect, against whom is he building the fleet unit on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific? Where is the enemy? There is the utmost harmony between England and Germany? There is no prospect of trouble between them? For what reason then would he increase the proposition that was brought down by his leader in 1910 to two fleet units, which would cost some fifty or sixty millions of dollars? He has not told us of any enemy, nor has he given any reason for that peculiar position. My hon. friend said: 'Can anybody imagine all Europe attacking Great Britain?' He says that there is no fear of such a combination, none whatever. Has my hon. friend not read history? Will my hon. friend allow his mind to go back a period in history, and will he tell me that the time has never been when there has been a combination of European powers against Great Britain? Will he tell me that the time has never been when Great Britain has practically stood alone against the armed powers of Europe. My hon. friend referred to the cordial relations existing between England and Germany at the present time, and from that he deduced that there was no present or prospective danger. Allow me to call my hon. friend's attention to the conditions which existed in 1870, just prior to the war between France and Prussia, and to remind him that Napoleon III, in June, 1868, assured General Lebrun that relations between the governments at Paris and Berlin were as good as could be desired. In the latter part of June, 1870, the head of the government of France assured the people that never had peace been so solidly assured as at that time. One fortnight from the utterance of those words by the head of the Government of France, that country was engaged in a war with Prussia! So that we cannot from present cordial and friendly relations existing between nations deduce that there is no emergency, present or prospective. We can draw our conclusions in that regard only from the relative strength of the navies of Britain and the other countries of Europe, and I propose to deal with that a little further on.

If I am permitted, I will now refer to a statement made by the hon. member for South Wellington. He grew quite indignant this afternoon in making reference to some words uttered by the present Minister of Militia in British Columbia in regard to Germany. And he exclaimed: 'What sort of language is that for a Minister of the Crown?' Evidently my hon. friend from South Wellington has forgotten some of the past history of his own party. Allow me to direct his attention to the words of his present leader in the city of Boston, when he denounced both Canada and Britain as having disgraced themselves during the civil war! I ask the hon. member for South Wellington, in the words which he himself has seen fit to use, what sort of language was that for a leader of a great party in this country? I might even say what sort of language was that for the Prime Minister of Canada, because when the right hon. gentleman became Prime Minister he reiterated those words on the floor of this House, and seemed to glory in their utterance.

I now wish to call attention to another matter which took place in this House, and to a reference made by another hon. gentleman opposite. I refer to the member for South Renfrew, who, in the course of his remarks, undertook to pick out names for the three dreadnoughts which it is proposed the thirty-five million dollar contribution will build in England. I would have thought, when the member for South Renfrew was choosing names for these battleships—names which he thought suggestive from a Conservative party standpoint—that he might have chosen names suggestive of the past history of the Liberal party. It might have occurred to the hon. member—and I dare say it would have occurred to him had his party remained in power, and it became their duty to name the vessels—to choose, as a very proper name for one of them, and as bearing a close relation to the past history of the Liberal party in this country, the name Minnie M., or The Machine. I daresay his very intimate association with the ballot box manipulators operating in the district of Kingston and Belleville would lead him to come to the conclusion that a very proper and appropriate name, also suggestive of the past history of the Liberal party, would have been The Bogus Ballot Box.

I will now refer for a moment to the attitude of another hon. gentleman in this House. When my honoured leader made his speech in the House upon the introduction of the Bill we are now discussing, the conclusion of his remarks was received with an outburst of enthusiasm from members on both sides of the House. With one exception, every member rose to his feet and sang the National Anthem---at least tried to; those of us who could sing, did so, and those of us who could not sing, showed our respect by rising to our feet---all save one man, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). The hon. member for Edmonton felt it incumbent upon him later on to offer some excuse or apology for his remarkable conduct on that occasion. He said that the reason he did not rise to his feet on the first occasion was that the National Anthem was being used for party purposes, and was the malicious arrangement of the whips of the Conservative party. I happen to be one of the whips of the Conservative party, and I want to assure hon. gentlemen that I knew nothing of such an arrangement, and, in fact, started to sing Rule Britannia, when I was brought up by the greater chorus in favour of God Save the King. But mark the statement: he did not rise to his feet because, he said, the National Anthem was being used for party purposes, and those who did rise to their feet showed greater disrespect for the National Anthem than he did. In that, of course, we can take comfort from the fact that all gentlemen on the other side of the House, including his leader showed the same disrespect that we did. But when the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition introduced his proposition, the members again rose to their feet and sang the National Anthem, and this time the hon. member for Edmonton stood up. And what reason did he give for getting up on that occasion? He said the reason he got up the second time was because he agreed with the proposition as it came from that side of the House; that is to say, he got up for purely political reasons. He condemned those who got up in the first instance for so misusing the National Anthem as to use it for party purposes, and says in effect that he got up in the second instance to show he was a political partisan, and that he favoured the proposition of his leader. That is the kind of argument we get from the hon. member for Edmonton, but I think the real reason he did not rise to his feet on the first occasion was because he realized, when the leader of the Government introduced his Bill, that it was going to be a popular measure; that it would be well received by the people of the country, and he became sour and surly. Possibly he got to his feet the second time because he had gone through one or two caucuses since then, and it was impressed upon him that in future he ought to remember that it was due to his own self-respect to rise to his feet when the National Anthem was sung. Possibly if we wanted to be charitable and of course we do, we might say that the reason he rose the second time was because he was ashamed, after reflection, of his conduct on the first occasion.

On motion of Mr. Edwards, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Cochrane, House adjourned at 11.18 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ended March 31, 1912, Part III.—Mr. Foster.

Report of the Departmental Commission respecting the question of Departmental and General Statistics.—Mr. Foster.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

APPOINTMENT OF F. A. MORRISON.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. When was F. A. Morrison appointed solicitor in connection with the investigation into railway freight rates in the West?
2. When did his service begin?
3. When did his service terminate?
4. Was he paid by the day? If so, how much per day?
5. If so, for what days was he paid?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. February 18, 1912.
2. February 20, 1912.
3. As the work is not completed, Mr Morrison's services have not terminated.

4 and 5. Mr Morrison's fees have not yet been fixed, nor has he been paid.

ROSS' MILL POST OFFICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the post office at Ross' Mill, county of Lévis, been abolished?
2. If so, for what reason and at whose request?
3. Has any investigation been held? If so, by whom?

Mr. PELLETIER: The Ross' Mill post office, which was in too close proximity to the St. Nicholas post office, has been removed, by direction of the Postmaster General, to a more suitable location, where it serves a larger district than at the former site. The name of the office has been changed to St. Nicholas Sud.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

What are the names of the new Harbour Commissioners for Montreal?

Mr. HAZEN: William G. Ross, Farquhar Robertson, Alfred Eugène Damasse Labelle.

SS. PETREL.

Mr. LAW:

1. Has the Government decided to lay up D.G.S. Petrel at Shelburne instead of at Liverpool during the coming winter? If so, when?
2. What reason is assigned for laying up this steamer at Shelburne for repairs where no machine shops exist, in preference to Liverpool, N.S., or the Halifax dockyard?
3. Is it the intention of the department to have repairs made to the Petrel? If so, what is the estimated cost of such repairs?
4. Will the Government ask for public tenders for this work by advertising in the Nova Scotia newspapers?
5. Will the Government use the Government wharf at Shelburne for laying up the Petrel, or will private property be used for that purpose?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes; the vessel was laid up on December 20.
2. It has been the usual custom to winter the Petrel at one of the harbours in the county of Shelburne or Queens.
3. The usual winter repairs will be made to the Petrel. The list of repairs has not yet been completed.
4. It is not considered necessary to call for tenders, as most of the work will be carried out by the Government employees.
5. The Government wharf is rather exposed for wintering a vessel, and arrangements were therefore made to berth the vessel at McGill wharf.

JOLIETTE CUSTOMS OFFICE.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Since the 10th of October, 1911, has the Government created a new position in the customs office at Joliette?
2. If so, what is the position and who is the holder of it?
3. Who recommended him and what is his salary?
4. On whose report was this position created?

Mr. WHITE:

1. An additional officer has been employed on the customs staff at Joliette since 10th October, 1911.
2. Mr. Alfred Laporte is the name of the officer and his rank is that of acting preventive officer of customs.
3. He was recommended by the Minister of Customs. His salary is $800 a year.
4. The employment of an additional officer was authorized by the Minister of Customs in view of the volume of the customs business requiring attention at this outport.

KILDARE POSTMASTER.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has Mr. Cléophas Pelletier resigned as receiver of the mails at St. Ambroise de Kildare?
2. If so, who has succeeded him?
3. Who recommended this appointment?
4. How many persons made applications to succeed Mr. Pelletier?
5. What are the names of these persons and by whom were they recommended?

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Cleophas Pelletier tendered his resignation as postmaster of Kildare (not St. Ambroise de Kildare), and Mr. Joseph Garceau was appointed his successor by direction of the Postmaster General.

FISHERY GUARDIANS IN GUYSBOROUGH

Mr. SINCLAIR:

What are the names and the post office addresses of all the fishery guardians appointed in the county of Guysborough, N.S. for the year 1912, and the remuneration paid to each?

Mr. HAZEN:

Guardian.	District	Remuneration for the season.
Henry Casey,	St. Mary's River	$20
John Faulkner,	St. Mary's River	20
Daniel Weir,	St. Mary's River	35
David Kirk,	St. Mary's River	20
Archibald Smith,	St. Mary's River	20
George Wilson,	St. Mary's River	20
John D. Hattie,	St. Mary's River	20
Geo. A. Hudson,	Country Harbour R.	20
Albert Mason,	Country Harbour R.	20
Moses Mason,	Country Harbour R.	20

Solomon Baker, Gaspereau Brook.. .. 15
John Cross, Indian River.. 20
Stephen Myers, Isaac Harbour R.. .. 20
Ira Sangster, New Harbour R.. 20
Otto N. Munro, Cole Harbour R.. 30
Norman McDonald, Salmon River.. .. 15
Jeremiah Jones, Salmon River.. 15
Harvey Sparks, Salmon River.. 20
Patrick McDonald, Salmon River.. .. 20
John Kenny (Porter's R. Br.), Salmon River.. 15

STEAM TRAWLERS' OPERATIONS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Referring to a statement appearing on page 25 of the Report of the Department of the Naval Service that on June 18th the SS. Canada visited Pomquet island to obtain information relating to the violation by steam trawlers, did the said visit result in obtaining information regarding such violation? If so, what information was obtained?

Mr. HAZEN: Instructions were issued by the department to C.G.S. Canada to proceed to the vicinity of Cape George, Antigonish county, to inquire if any trawlers were known to be operating inside the three-mile limit. The commanding officer reports that he landed at several places and interviewed various local residents, including the lightkeeper at Pomquet island, but was unable to obtain any information on the subject.

MONTREAL HARBOUR MASTER.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

Was Commander Roper an applicant for the position of harbour master at Montreal or for any other government position under the present Administration?

Mr. HAZEN: I have been informed by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal that by public advertisement they caused a request to be published asking for applications for the position of harbour master at the port of Montreal, stating in the advertisement the qualifications that were required, and that some sixty odd applications were received. One of the applicants, the harbour commissioners say, was Commander Roper.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would the hon. minister give us the date of that advertisement?

Mr. HAZEN: It was before the opening of navigation last spring; that is my recollection. I will get the exact date for my hon. friend and send it to him.

THE QUEBEC MERGER.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the right hon. the Prime Minister, or any member of the Government, received any communication from the French Government concerning the Quebec merger?
2. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister aware that the British Embassy in Paris said to have received a communication from the French Government concerning said Quebec merger?

Mr. FOSTER: The answer to that question is in the negative, both branches of it.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS AND MUNICIPAL POSITIONS.

*Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

Is it the policy of the Department of Trade and Commerce to permit collectors and subcollectors of customs to act as municipal councillors?

Mr. FOSTER: The answer to that is that the Department of Trade and Commerce has no policy with reference to collectors and subcollectors of customs.

Mr. WHITE: I understand that my hon. friend has made a mistake in the wording of this question, but, if the inquiry is intended to refer to the Department of Customs, the answer is that the Department of Customs does not object to collectors and subcollectors of customs acting as municipal councillors, provided such municipal service does not interfere with their duties as customs officers.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries received the evidence taken by H. P. Duchemin, commissioner at river Bourgeois, in the month of October last, on the charge of political partisanship alleged against Marin Bourque, keeper of the lighthouse of river Bourgeois, who was dismissed in the month of April last?
2. Has any report been received from Mr. Duchemin bearing on the investigation?
3. Is it the intention of the minister to reinstate Mr. Bourque as keeper of the lighthouse?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. The investigation referred to was arranged by Mr. Duchemin to be held on the 27th September, 1912. On that date no evidence was taken. A further inquiry was held on the 12th December, 1912.
2. Yes.
3. No.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has Edward C. Humphreys, of Trenton, special officer Inland Revenue, been dismissed? If so, on what ground?
2. On whose complaint was the dismissal made?
3. Who has been appointed his successor and at what salary?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. Yes. Political partisanship and lack of activity in the performance of his duties.
2. By a party in whom the department has confidence.
3. William Jardine, at $300.

Mr. RICHARDS:

1. Has James McKay McCougan, sub-collector of customs at Malpeque, Prince Edward Island, been dismissed from his position? If so, for what cause?
2. Was he granted an investigation? If so, was evidence taken under oath?
3. Is the evidence to be found in the department?
4. Who laid the charges against him?
5. Who was appointed as his successor, and upon whose recommendation?

Mr. WHITE:

1. J. McK. McGougan, sub-collector of customs at Malpeque, P.E.I., has been dismissed from his position on account of political partisanship.
2. There was no investigation by a commission under oath in this case.
3. The signed statements of Mr. P. C. Murphy and Hon. A. E. Arsenault in this case are on file in the Department of Customs.
4. Charges were made against him by Mr. P. C. Murphy, based on personal knowledge of Hon. A. E. Arsenault.
5. Mr. Robert J. Crafer has been employed as his successor, on the recommendation of the Minister of Customs.

Mr. RICHARDS:

1. Has William H. P. Irving, postmaster at Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island, been dismissed from his position? If so, for what cause?
2. Was he granted an investigation? If so, was evidence taken under oath?
3. Is the evidence to be found in the department?
4. Who laid the charges against him?
5. Who was appointed as his successor, and upon whose recommendation?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes. For political partisanship.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.

4 and 5. The matter having been investigated and the postmaster shown to have been a political partisan, the Postmaster General directed his removal and the appointment of his successor.

Mr. RICHARDS:

1. Has Agno Gaudet, sub-collector of customs at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, been dismissed from his position? If so, for what cause?
2. Was his case investigated by a commissioner? If so, was evidence taken under oath?
3. Is the evidence to be found in the Department of Customs?
4. Who laid the charges against the said official?
5. Who was appointed as his successor, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. WHITE:

1. Mr. Agno Gaudet, sub-collector of customs at Tignish, has been dismissed from his position on account of political partisanship.
2. The case was investigated by a Commissioner and evidence was taken under oath.
3. The evidence is on file in the Department of Customs.
4. The complainant in this case was P. C. Murphy, Esq.
5. Mr. Joseph E. Richards has been employed as his successor on the recommendation of the Minister of Customs.

Mr. RICHARDS:

1. Has John H. Bernard, postmaster at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, been dismissed from his position? If so, for what cause?
2. Was he granted an investigation? If so, was evidence taken under oath?
3. Is the evidence to be found in the department?
4. Who laid the charges against him?
5. Who was appointed as his successor, and upon whose recommendation?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes. For negligence and misconduct as postmaster.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.

4 and 5. The matter was investigated and the postmaster's misconduct established. The Postmaster General, therefore, directed his removal and the appointment of his successor.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has Mr. Joseph Chaput, receiver of the mail at Radstock, been dismissed? If so, for what reason?
2. Who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been appointed in his place and at whose request?
4. Was an inquiry held?

Mr. PELLETIER: It having been represented to the department that the Radstock post office was not centrally located, an official inquiry was ordered by the Postmaster General. The inspector's report showed that the office was situated at one end of the village, and the Postmaster General directed its removal to a more central location. The change in site rendered necessary a change in postmaster.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has Mr. J. D. Gaudet, employed in the customs office at Joliette, been dismissed? If so, for what reasons?
2. Who requested this dismissal?
3. What was his salary?
4. Who succeeded him, and at whose request?
5. Was an inquiry held?
6. What is the salary of his successor?

Mr. WHITE:

1. Mr. J. D. Gaudet, examining officer of customs at Joliette, P.Q., was dismissed from the customs service at Joliette by Order in Council for active political partisanship. Notified per letter 25th March, 1912.

2. Complaint as to political partisanship was made against him by Jos. Sylvestre.

3. His salary was $850.

4. His successor was J. P. Theriault, employed on the order of the Minister of Customs.

5. Yes.

6. Mr. Theriault's salary is $850 a year.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Who was sub-collector of customs at Joliette, from 1896 to 1911?

2. What was his salary in each year from 1896 to 1911, inclusive?

3 What amount was collected year by year during that period?

4. Has he been dismissed? If so, for what reason?

5. Who requested this dismissal from office?

6. Who has been appointed to replace him, and at whose request?

7. Has an inquiry been held?

8 What is the salary of the present sub-collector?

9. How much has be collected since his appointment up to date?

Mr. WHITE:

1. Louis Basinet was sub-collector of customs at Joliette, Que., from 1896 to 1911.

2. His salary as customs sub-collector was as follows: appointed November 14, 1896, $126.11 a year; 1897 to 1898, $200; 1898 to 1899, $275; 1899 to 1900, $500; 1900 to 1901, $500; 1901 to 1902, $500; 1902 to 1903, $700; 1903 to 1904, $800; 1904 to 1905, $800; 1905 to 1906, $800; 1906 to 1907, $800; 1907 to 1908, $900; 1908 to 1909, $900; 1909 to 1910, $900; 1910 to 1911, $900; 1911 to 1912, $950.

3. Customs collections at Joliette, year by year, from 1896 to 1911, were as follows. Fiscal year 1896 to 1897, $6,139.13; 1897 to 1898, $5,604.73; 1898 to 1899, $13,064.25; 1899 to 1900, $14,337.71; 1900 to 1901, $21,780.56; 1901 to 1902, $55,091.18; 1902 to 1903, $66,546.72; 1903 to 1904, $61,711.60; 1904 to 1905, $47,939.43; 1905 to 1906, $20,301.57; 1906 to 1907 (9 months), $10,939.50; 1907 to 1908, $22,918.37; 1908 to 1909, $25,673.15; 1909 to 1910, $31,696.37; 1910 to 1911, $39,515.17; 1911 to 1912, $49,178.95.

4. He has been dismissed on account of political partisanship.

5. Mr. J. P. O. Guilbault, M.P., was the complainant in this case.

6. C. C. Perrault was employed as sub-collector of customs at Joliette to replace Mr. Basinet, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Customs.

7. There was no formal inquiry beyond the statement of the member for the constituency.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds).

8. The present sub-collector's salary is $950 a year.

9. The customs duties collected at Joliette from 15th February, 1912, to January 18, 1913, were $55,678.15.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Has Mr. Jean Roberge, customs officer at Beauce, Quebec, been dismissed?

2. If so, on what date, for what reason, and by whom has he been replaced?

Mr. WHITE:

1. The servies of Mr. Jean Roberge, customs officer at St. Côme, Quebec, have been dispensed with.

2. His services were dispensed with by Order in Council of the 2nd of November, 1912, because they were no longer required. He has not been replaced by any officer at St. Côme. The customs station has been opened near the United States boundary and St. Côme is under the charge of Mr. Auguste Rodrigue, where the duties formerly required at the St. Côme station are to be attended to.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the establishment of a cheap parcel post system would be to the advantage of the consumers of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this question of a cheap parcel post was brought to the attention of the House last year, and since then I believe there has arisen in the country an agitation which must ultimately force the hands of the Government and induce my hon. friend the Postmaster General to take action at no distant time. I notice in the press the other day that the hon. gentleman had stated that he was studying the system recently adopted by the United States Government and that within a reasonable time he might probably adopt a similar system for Canada.

This question is a most important one, as it affects the whole country, indeed it affects every household in Canada. When I had the honour of being Postmaster General the question was mooted and the officers of the department were studying a plan which could be put in force in connection with the rural mail delivery system. When I expressed the opinion that the parcel post should be in operation in Canada as it was in nearly all the European countries the department was at once deluged with petitions from all sections of the country opposing the proposed adoption of the system. I was somewhat surprised at this because I thought that cheap parcel post would be of great benefit to the consuming masses of the country. However, I found after a survey of the whole situation that the opposition came apparently from the country store keepers in their fight against the increasingly grasping power of the departmental stores. I suspected that the store keepers had been put up by the express companies, and I have no doubt, and my hon. friend who is now at the head of the Post Office Department of Canada has no doubt, that the opposition comes chiefly from the express companies. The parcel post system is essentially part of the work of the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General, not to speak of the American continent, but in Europe, and even in Japan, is not only at the head of the post office system proper, but is also termed the Minister of Communications. He looks not only after the post office, the transmission of letters, but after the cable rates, the telegraph rates, the telephone rates, and in nearly all civilized countries the transmission of packages through the mails. The parcel post system has been in existence in Europe for many years, and it is under the direct control of the Postmaster General in the various countries. In England it has had an enormous success, in France also, in Switzerland also. In Germany it is on the cheapest scale, and is of the greatest advantage, especially to the farming community. It has a direct relation with the high cost of living; and, if you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I shall read some of the conclusions arrived at by Professor Mackenzie who was selected not very long ago by the Board of Trade of Toronto, to study with a special committee the causes of the high cost of living, chiefly in the section of the country known as the Toronto section. Professor Mackenzie cites as one of the causes of the high cost of living in Toronto the absence of the parcel post system, and I dare say it applies to every other centre in Canada. One of the causes which make for higher prices in Toronto as against the smaller places is, first—I am quoting in part the report of Professor Mackenzie :

> The apparent disappearance here of any competition in some of the businesses connected with the collection and distribution of food products which businesses appear to have fallen in the hands of a few powerful allied interests. Milk is a good example. We pay 9½ cents a quart for milk which cannot compare in quality with the 6 cents milk of the small town a few miles away. Your committee have been informed that the association of Toronto commission merchants engaged in the fruit and vegetable business have secured exclusive control of the only Toronto market for the wholesale trade and thus by eliminating competition are in a position where they can dictate terms to both producer and consumer. Men engaged in raising fruit and vegetables for city consumption report that they have found the conditions here so intolerable as to force them either to seek for other markets or to go out of the business. It is not probable that any relief can be obtained by municipal or governmental interference. The history of nearly all attempts at such interference with existing commercial conditions is not a hopeful record. The privileged corporations can afford and do employ the best brains available and are usually better served even by their legal advisers than is the municipality or government which attempts to coerce them. As a rule our economic troubles arise not from the want of but from an excess of official regulations. A better remedy would appear to lie in the hands of the growers of fruit and vegetables themselves which appear to have completely lost control of the selling end of their own business. Ireland to-day affords a splendid object lesson in this matter. Two years ago the small Irish farmer was absolutely at the mercy of the middleman who kept the prices at which they bought as low as they liked and maintained the prices to the city dealer as high as they dared. To-day these small Irish farmers are learning the trick of combination so as to control the selling end of their own business with the result that the farmer is getting better prices for his produce and the city dweller is paying less for the same. A still better example of the effects of combination is perhaps to be found in Denmark where the farmer does not lose control of his butter or bacon until it is sold on the London market. The produce may go through several hands but these hands are all agents or servants of the combination of producers.
>
> (2) While there is no evidence of any combination in Toronto among the small retail dealers, for the purpose of keeping up the prices of food and the small dealer seems barely able to make a living in the keen competition to which he is subjected, yet the unnecessarily large number of retail places of business makes for inefficiency and adds to the cost of distribution. For example, a hundred well equipped and well placed stores could probably do the whole city business in groceries and do it cheaper than the present multitude of small stores; but to limit the number of grocers would at once enable the favoured few to combine and raise prices.

Professor Mackenzie says that the increase in the cost of living is due so far as vegetables, fruits, and other commodities of life are concerned, to transportation and distribution, and he adds the following :

> (3) The very poor shipping facilities which are available for produce coming into Toronto. To begin with, our navigation laws appear to have been drawn up with the idea of injuring American shipping rather than with the idea of serving Canadian shippers, certainly not with the idea of serving Canadian consignees. Also, we have no public wharf in Toronto. The railways are thus almost freed from the competition of waterborne freight into the city. Moreover, we have no parcel post service, so that the express companies,—

That is to say the railway companies again, because the two large express companies in this country are only adjuncts or subsidiary companies to the great railway systems, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific railways :

Moreover, we have no parcel post service, so that the express companies, that is to say the railway companies again, can and do make us pay dividends on stock that has been shown to be largely water. It seems to be the universal opinion of shippers and consignees that in spite of—perhaps it is because of—the monopoly these railways enjoy they do not give proper facilities for bringing produce into the city. It would be difficult to overestimate the advantages of a parcel post service such as is maintained throughout Europe, even in Russia, whereby produce could reach the consumer directly from the farmer. The small charge necessary for such service would at once put a limit to the profits of the middleman and would compel the express companies to meet the competition of the postal service.

I need not read any further the conclusions of the report, a very able report, of Professor Mackenzie. The report was acted upon by the Toronto Board of Trade, and as a result it has passed unanimously a resolution which reads as follows:

Resolved that the conference committee of one hundred of the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto request that the council of the board urge that the Dominion Government consider establishing a good parcel post, limited no doubt at first to the more populous localities, but extended as experience may warrant.

The desire expressed by this very important Board of Trade is that generally expressed throughout the press of the country of late. I do not wish to weary the House by reading the many articles which have been published in the various publications, commercial, industrial and political of late on this question, but the time seems to be ripe for the Postmaster General, for the Government, indeed, to undertake now a policy of cheap parcel post for Canada. We need not be ashamed of adopting a system similar to that which has lately been adopted by the United States Government. As regards postal matters my hon. friend knows that the United States Government so far have rather followed in the footsteps of Canada. Not later than two or three years ago the Post Office Department in the United States copied our system regarding the postal savings bank. I remember at the time reading some United States newspapers eulogizing the system which had been adopted by Canada and which had rendered so much service to the poorer classes of this country. The system has been adopted in the United States, and they make no bones about it; they simply followed the policy introduced a long time ago by the Canadian post office. We should not be ashamed to imitate them in their new policy of cheap parcel post. I stated a moment ago that it affected every household in Canada and, in reading American papers and magazines, I see that since the 1st of January of this year, the date at which the parcel post system came into force across the boundary, there has been a new class of mail matter going into the postal boxes in that country. I see that they can mail now through the United States post office, at a very cheap rate, such commodities as eggs, and they have even invented boxes which can be tossed about without breaking the eggs. I see also that they can mail such commodities as butter, cream, the smaller fruits, vegetables, meats, poultry, fresh fish, &c.

We have in Canada the skeleton of a parcel post system. That has been in the postal regulations for I do not know how many years. It is under the heading of fourth class matter. Clause 105 of the postal regulations says:

This class includes merchandise of all descriptions such as confectionery, dry goods, groceries, hardware, stationery (including blank books, &c.), not included in the first, second and third classes, and not excluded from the mails by the general prohibitory regulations with respect to objectionable matter.

The rate of postage for articles in this class is one cent for each ounce or fraction thereof.

108. The limit of weight for a package of fourth class matter is five pounds, and the limit of size is thirty inches in length by one foot in width or depth, but the combined length and girth (i.e. the length of a band passed entirely around the package lengthwise) of any packet must in no case exceed six feet.

That is, broadly speaking, the regulation we have as an embryonic parcel post system in Canada.

Let us see under what disadvantages we are when we compare our parcel post system with that of the United States or with that of England, France, Germany, or, generally speaking, the European countries. We are far behind the times. The world's parcel post union package unit is eleven pounds to the parcel carried through the mails at the rate of 12 cents per pound, whilst the Canadian unit is five pounds to the parcel at a cost of sixteen cents a pound. That is practically prohibitory and, as stated last year, we are face to face with this difficulty, that a parcel can be sent from London, England, to Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, even to Vancouver, at a cheaper rate than a parcel can be sent from Ottawa to Vancouver, or from Ottawa to Halifax. This does seem extraordinary, but it is a fact, and until the United States had adopted its new system a similar extraordinary state of things was in existence there. To emphasize the statement I made, let me again give the illustration I gave last year when this question came before the House in order to show how the system worked in the United States before the 1st of January of this year and how it works in Canada to-day. The extract is from a paper which was read at a farmer's convention in the United States held to promote parcel post. The farmers of the United States have forced the Government to adopt that system just as they have forced the Government to adopt rural mail delivery. The heading of the article is 'The relation of the parcel post system to business men and farmers.' This paper was read at the trans-Mississippi Congress in November, 1911, not so very long ago:

To illustrate the inconsistency in connection with the parcel post service attention is drawn to the following conditions: An individual entering any post office in the United States——

That was before the 1st of January of this year.

—with two parcels weighing four pounds each will be obliged to pay sixty-four cents on the one to New York, for example, while for the one destined to a foreign country, although it usually passes through New York city, the charge is forty-eight cents.

Should the weight be 4 lbs. 6 ozs. a package addressed to a resident of New York will be denied admission to the mails by the Postmaster, while a package intended for a resident of a foreign land will be accepted and forwarded, probably via New York, at a rate of 12 cents per lb. Parcels for a foreign country will be received in most instances up to 11 lbs; in other words, our own people must pay 4 cents a pound more for the privilege of despatching packages to each other than when these packages are destined to residents of foreign countries.

If you change the words New York and United States, and substitute Otawa or Montreal and Canada, you have a most graphic illustration of what happens in our country. The Post Office Department of every country, as the Postmaster General knows, is under the rules and regulations of the Postal Union, and Canada is an important member of that Union. There are treaties regulating the transmission of mails from one country to another, just as there are treaties regulating, under the Postal Union, the transmission of packages from one country to another. I have stated that the parcels union package unit was 11 pounds per parcel carried at a rate of 12 cents per pound, while the Canadian unit is 5 pounds to a parcel at a cost of 16 cents per pound. Strange to say, the Postmaster General of Canada denies his own people the right to transmit parcels of a certain weight and at a certain price, but he receives through his mails the parcels which are sent at a larger weight and lower rate from foreign countries. I have no doubt that the Canadian post office and the Canadian mail cars have been carrying parcels post under the new American regulation, whilst the Postmaster General has denied—and the present postal regulations forbid him to act otherwise—to his follow country-men the same privilege of a low rate and a larger weight. That shows the inconsistency of the system. But now that the United States have adopted a parcel post system, Canada must adopt, if not the same system, a system which can be worked in harmony with it.

I have stated that in the United Kingdom this system of a cheap parcel post has worked wonders, and I have cited the case of Ireland where the farmers have been greatly benefited by the adoption of a cheap parcel post in the disposal of their farm products. The rates in the United Kingdom are:

BRITISH PARCEL RATES.

	Cents.
For a parcel not exceeding 1 lb.	6
Exceeding 1 lb and not over 2 lbs.	8
" 2 " " 3 "	10
" 3 " " 5 "	12
" 5 " " 7 "	14
" 7 " " 8 "	16
" 8 " " 9 "	18
" 9 " " 10 "	20
" 10 " " 11 "	22

Eleven pounds is the limit allowed, and in size the combined length and girth of any parcel must not exceed six feet.

I come now to the system adopted in the United States after protracted investigation and agitation by the farmers of the United States. It may be summarized as follows: The United States and its several territories and possessions, except the Phillippine Islands, have been divided into units of area, 30 minutes square. They have adopted the zone system and these units are the basis of eight postal zones. The first zone has a radius 50 miles from the centre of any unit of area; the second has an area of 150 miles; the third an area of 300 miles; the fourth an area of 600 miles, and so on up to the seventh zone, with an area of 1,800 miles, the eighth zone including all other territory covered by the American flag. They have adopted concurrently with this zone system, a system of insurance for packages transmitted through the mails, but that I need not deal with now as it is only an incident of the parcel post system. We have adopted in Canada a system of insurance not only for packages but for registered letters. The following are the rates that have come into force in the United States on the 1st of January last:

The rate of postage on matter not weighing more than 4 ounces will be one cent for each ounce or fraction thereof which will carry it to all parts of the United States and possessions within the parcel post limits. All matter in excess of this weight is to go by the pound.

RATES PER POUND.

For delivery in— Zone.	First Pound Cents.	Each Additional Pound or Fraction Cents.
1. Area within fifty miles radius of centre of "unit of area"	5	3
2. Outside first zone within 150 miles	6	4
3. Outside second zone within 300 miles	7	5
4. Outside third zone within 600 miles	8	6
5. Outside fourth zone within 1,000 miles	9	7
6. Outside fifth zone within 1,400 miles	10	9
7 Outside sixth zone within 1,800 miles	11	10
8. Outside seventh zone	12	12

I stated that the weight in Canada was limited to five pounds, and that the cost was one cent an ounce, making it sixteen cents a pound. You see that for the longest distance in the United States the cost does not amount to more than twelve cents a pound, and you can send twelve pounds; whilst here you are limited to five pounds. We might perhaps be told that we are relieved by the express companies in Canada. I do not wish to be unjust towards the express companies; they are making money, and they come under the provisions of the Railway Commission; but the business which is carried by the express companies pertains primarily to the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General, as regards parcel post, is the common carrier of Canada, and the express companies are only encroaching upon his department. Now the charges levied by the express companies for carrying a five-pound parcel from Toronto to the places named below, are as follows:

	Miles.	Cents.
Aurora	30	25
Belleville	121	40
Berlin	63	30
Calgary	2,129	80
Clarkson's	16	25
Orillia	35	86
Ottawa	250	40
Peterborough	76	35
Regina	..	80
Stratford	88	35
Vancouver	2,769	80
Wipnipeg	1,238	75

I do not know what the distance is from Toronto to Regina, but it cannot be far from 1,600 to 1,700 miles.

Mr. PELLETIER: For how many pounds?

Mr. LEMIEUX: For a five-pound parcel, while with the system in the United States a twelve-pound parcel, mailed outside the remotest zone, say from New York to San Francisco, would not cost more than twelve cents a pound, and if there are more than twelve pounds the cost is twelve cents for each additional pound or fraction thereof. You see that the difference is enormous. I must admit, of course, that the United States have the population. They have, it is true, an immense network of railways, but the difference is very great; and as we have in Canada now practically three transcontinental railways, with also a network of side lines and feeders, it seems to me that we could by adopting, if not a similar system, at least a system which would compare favourably with that of the United States, reach the same result.

Now, let us make a comparison of rates. Let us compare the rates of our express companies, which I have just given, with the rates which the people of Great Britain have long enjoyed, and those which have been inaugurated in the United States, with the excessive tolls under which we Canadians suffer.

Great Britain parcel post, for any distance, five pounds, twelve cents.

United States parcel post, for 250 miles, five pounds, twenty-seven cents.

Of course it is cheaper in the United Kingdom, because there the territory is rather restricted in area, but for 250 miles in the United States for a five-pound parcel, the cost is only twenty-seven cents, while here to carry a parcel from Toronto to Ottawa, 250 miles, the same distance, it would cost forty cents, or nearly double.

Canada, fourth-class matter, for any distance, five pounds, eighty cents.

Canada, by express, for 250 miles, five pounds, forty cents.

For the information of the House, I may perhaps read how this zone system works in the United States. I should not care to weary the House with this except that my fellow members might like to know how it works, and it is perhaps better it should go on 'Hansard'. The zone system is thus explained:

Instead of using townships and counties as units or starting points, it was decided to divide the whole country into blocks of units, each block being half a degree in latitude in north-south extension and half a degree of longitude east and west. There are 3,500 of these units in the country.

How to find zones.

An example of how to get the first zone is as follows:—

Find the center of the unit in which your post office is located. Draw a circle of fifty miles radius around that center. Every unit which lies wholly within that circle or more than half of which is within that circle, is included in the first zone from any post office, and the postage rate is 5 cents for the first pound and 3 cents for each additional pound.

The second zone is determined by drawing with the same center a circle of 150 miles radius. Every unit which lies within it, but outside of the first zone, is in the second zone and the rate is 6 cents for the first pound and 4 cents for each additional pound. The method by which the second zone is determined is used for all other zones; their radii and rate of postage for the first and additional pounds, respectively, being as follows: third zone, 300 miles, 7 cents, five cents; fourth zone, 600 miles, 8 cents, 6 cents: fifth zone, 1,000 miles, 9 cents, 7 cents; sixth zone, 1,400 miles, 10 cents, 9 cents; seventh zone, 1,800 miles, 11 cents, 10 cents; eighth zone and all territory farther away, including the Philippines and island possessions, 12 cents flat.

Here, Sir, you have a resume of the system adopted by the United States. I do not know if my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) has conferred—I dare say he has—with our chief post office superintendent, Mr. George Ross, of Toronto. Mr. Ross, for several years, I know, applied himself to a study of the reforms which are taking place in various parts of the world, especially in Europe and America, concerning the parcel post system. At the time I left the department, Mr. Ross had evolved a scheme of parcel post for Canada, which, as I recollect it, is somewhat similar to the one I have just explained to the House. It is, I know, a limited system of parcel post. It would, in the opinion of Mr. Ross, do away with that strong objection which comes sometimes from the country store-keepers against the parcel post system. Perhaps my hon. friend will give to the House the views of Mr. Ross, and will state in what way that objection to which I have referred is removed. At all events, even if some of the store-keepers in the country, who object most to the parcel post system, should suffer for the time being their objections should not be found insuperable. We know that every reform has had the effect of hurting some interest. When the railway system was inaugurated, those interested in the old coaches protested very strongly, and so did the blacksmiths; and when Fulton inaugurated his steamboat on the Hudson, the steamboat was nearly destroyed by the ferrymen on the shore. But everybody admits to-day that the railway and the steamboat were acceptable to civilization and to all communities, even those who resisted at the time the introduction of such world-wide inventions.

Mr. GRAHAM: And automobiles.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, even the Post Office Department has adopted the automobile, and so has the Militia Department, and I dare say that they are very thankful to Providence and the public exchequer that automobiles are afforded to the public departments. But I hope that my hon. friend will utilize the services of—how many post offices have you in Canada?

Mr PELLETIER: Over fourteen thousand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope my hon. friend will utilize the services of the fourteen thousand agents whom he has in Canada to promote the cheap parcel post system. That is his business, and the express companies should not be allowed to get exclusively the enormous profit which arise out of the parcels post. At any rate, they can only carry parcels from one station to another, while the Postmaster General has a much better system which will bring directly from any point to the very door of the consumer, by rural mail delivery, whatever he may have ordered.

I know that this will cost money. But, thanks to my hon. friend's predecessors, the Post Office Department is no longer a losing department; it is a money-making department. I do not exactly know the figures of surplus this year, but it will be a very large one—over a million dollars, if I mistake not.

Mr. PELLETIER: We would not be satisfied with that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly, the surplus belongs to the people; and while some years ago, it was wise to economize in the Post Office Department, in order to make both ends meet, the time has now come to make the necessary expenditures of the revenues of the department in order to give the people the benefit of that parcel post system which is now in vogue in every civilized country. I say that it will cost money. But it will also bring in money to my hon. friend's cash box. Let him remember that fifty years ago the Post Office Department carried letters throughout the sparsely settled Canada of that day at terribly high rates. I have not the figures just now before me, but I have studied the question, and if I mistake not, to carry a letter from Windsor to Toronto in those days involved a charge amounting to something like sixty cents. To carry a letter from Windsor, Ont., to Halifax cost something like two or three dollars. That was only 50 or 60 years ago. Gradually, however, and thanks to the efforts of that great English reformer, Rowland Hill, cheap postage was adopted by all English speaking communities. Until 1898 it cost 3 cents for a letter from place to place in Canada. Sir William Mulock decided to reduce our postage to 2 cents, hon. members in this House predicted that instead of piling up surpluses Sir William would see a succession of deficits in his department. What has been the result? Instead of decreasing the revenue of the department, cheap postage has increased it from year to year. I myself some years ago introduced legislation to reduce what we call the drop letter rate from 2 cents to 1 cent. I was told that this would decrease materially the revenue of the Post Office Department. The result proved quite the contrary, indeed the revenue from the drop letter rate of 1 cent per letter has been much larger than from the 2 cent rates. This illustrates the well-established principle that the more you cheapen the rate of postage the larger the postal revenue becomes. In England, in France, in Germany, in Switzerland, that has been the result of every reduction of postage. My hon. friend, the Postmaster General is, I know, facing a difficulty. The railway companies are complaining that they do not receive sufficient payment from the Post-Office Department for carrying the mail matter, particularly the fourth class matter which I have described. I know they have a claim of several years standing against the Post Office Department. The increase of business in the Post Office Department makes a fairly good case for the railway companies, but legally they have no recourse against the department. Would it not be a fair proposal for the Postmaster General now to strike a bargain with the railway companies, and increase, if necessary, the mail subsidies which are paid to the railway companies owing to the greater volume of mail, and at the same time make a bargain for the carrying of parcel post? They have been obliged to increase the number of their cars and the space in the mail cars. For example I know, as a matter of fact, that the Canadian Pacific railway does not receive sufficient payment for the transportation of the Christmas mail across the continent. Whilst a few years ago it took one, two or perhaps three cars to transport the Christmas mail from Halifax to Vancouver, for the last 10 or 15 years it has taken 20 or 25 huge mail cars. It is not fair that the Canadian Pacific railway should have to increase their carrying capacity for the Post Office Department without receiving adequate compensation. The same thing applies to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Let my hon. friend strike a bargain with each of the railway companies, let him increase, if necessary, the mail subsidy, but at the same time let him boldly adopt a cheap parcel post system for the benefit of the Canadian consumer. In England the railway companies receive from the Post Office Department, I think 50 per cent of the gross receipts arising out of the transportation of packages, the balance going into the Post Office Exchequer—they are partners with the post office.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend's motion calls for a cheap parcel post. What does he mean by cheap?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to leave to my hon. friend the fixing of a rate for a Canadian parcel post, but taking a general view of the system now in vogue in various countries, I would say that the system and the rate adopted by the United States post office authorities should be accepted by Canada. Of course there are details to be worked out in the department, but that would seem to me a good basis on which to work. I employ the word cheap parcel post in general terms. The present system is a dear parcel post system; it is, in fact, no parcel post system, it is only the skeleton of a skeleton, but if my hon. friend will base his system on the one adopted at Washington I think he would be rendering a real service to the country and carry out the conclusions of the very illuminative report which has been made to the Toronto Board of Trade under the direction of Prof. MacKenzie.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina): My intention is to take up only a very few minutes of the time of the House in making a few remarks on this very important question. We have had a system of parcel post or what might probably be called a partial system of parcel post in Canada for many years. The difficulties in regard to our present system seem to be that the weight which we can send through the mails is not sufficient to meet the needs of the country, and the tolls charged by the Post Office Department up to date for carrying parcels are somewhat high compared with the rates for parcel postage in other countries. I understand that while the late Government was in power my hon. friend the late Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) had in view some measure of extension of the parcel post system throughout Canada, and from what I have seen in the newspapers during the last few weeks I believe that the present Postmaster General has in view some measure for the extension of our parcel post system. I can only say to the present Postmaster General that any measure of increase in the parcel post system of Canada made by his department will meet with general favour throughout the whole of western Canada. I speak particularly for my own locality when I say that it will meet with the greatest possible favour in that part of Saskatchewan from which I come, and I believe that applies also to Manitoba, Alberta, British Columbia, in fact to the whole of western Canada. This is a question which, even in the short time I have been in this House, has been discussed on many occasions. I do not think there has been a session of Parliament since I had the honour to occupy a seat in the House that some resolution has not been introduced first by members on one side of the House, and the next session probably by members on the other side of the House, so that the conclusion I have come to is that so far as the sentiment of members of the Canadian Parliament is concerned, both sides of the House are practically at one with regard to the advantages of extending our Canadian parcel post system. As I said a minute ago, our system in Canada is very limited, and on reference to the postal regulations I find that section 100 provides for rates on fourth-class matter. It says:

> This class includes merchandise of all descriptions such as confectionery, dry goods, groceries, hardware, stationery,

And so forth.

> The rate of postage for articles in this class is one cent for each ounce or a fraction thereof.

Section 103 says:

> The limit of weight for a package of fourth-class matter is five pounds.

We have also in Canada certain postal conventions with many other countries, and in making a comparison of rates I find that we can ship larger parcels by post from Ottawa to any place in Great Britain for a less amount than we can ship smaller parcels by post from Ottawa to say the city of Halifax or to other cities in Canada. Now, to my mind that is a state of affairs that should not exist. As a matter of fact, I believe that if the opposition to the extension of the Canadian parcel post system is sifted to the bottom, you will find that it originates with the express companies. I think my hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) pratically stated that in the House in the debate on this question last year, and I also find that John Wanamaker, a former Postmaster General of the United States, on being asked why he did not extend the parcel post system in the United States, said there were four reasons, and the four reasons were, the four express companies in the United States. Now it is said, and I may say that for some years, ever since I occupied a seat in this House, I thought there was a good deal of force in the argument that the small storekeepers throughout the country were opposed to a parcel post system because it would do injury to their business, but I must confess that I have somewhat changed my mind on that subject. I think that during the regime of the late government many petitions were sent in, some signed even by farmers, protesting against a parcel post system. These petitions came from the provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, and from other provinces, but they were headed in typewritten form and were worded in exactly the same way, and my belief is that the opposition originated with the express companies in the Dominion. The reason is obvious. I believe that a general extension of our parcel post system, increasing the weight of parcels that might be carried, and lessening the tolls that are charged at the present time on those parcels, would force the express companies to charge smaller rates. That has been stated on many occasions in this House, and I merely reiterate it. In western Canada we suffer from heavy express rates. In Ontario you suffer from heavy express rates, and I believe that in other provinces they suffer from heavy express rates. Perhaps we feel them more in western Canada than you do in the east, on account of the greater distances that parcels have to be carried. Why, you can buy first class fruit in the Niagara district and ship it to Regina, and the express rates will be twice as great as the price paid for the fruit. And it is the same with fruit purchased in British Columbia. If a farmer in the province of Saskatchewan, or in any of the western provinces should have any injury done to or breakage in his farm machinery, and he is forced to send to some large centre to get the parts replaced, for he cannot get repairs in the smaller towns, he will pay more to express these small repairs than the actual cost of the parts which are broken. Now I submit that this is not a condition of affairs which should be allowed to exist, and if by extending the parcel post system in Canada this Government can reduce the express rates to the consuming masses of the country, the Government and this Parliament should take some action in the immediate future.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I desire to utter only a word on this question. I had a lengthy experience before coming to Canada of an efficient parcel post system in the Old Country, and I think I am justified in expressing the opinion that probably nothing in the public service of that country brings a greater amount of happiness and convenience to the homes of all classes of the people than that system. I have had a good many communications from electors in my riding, from people who have had a similar experience to mine in that respect, and who are anxious that similar advantages should be conferred upon the inhabitants of Canada. I am alive to the fact that we live in a country of magnificent distances with a very sparse population, and the difficulties in the way of establishing a parcel post system in Canada such as we have in the Old Country would, I think, be very considerable. Still, it ought not to be beyond the power and the province of the department of the post office to make a beginning at least. I am perfectly sure that what has fallen from my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has fallen upon sympathetic ears in the case of my hon. friend the Postmaster General. I think that there was no department in the public service of Canada more deservedly popular during the regime of the late Government than the department of the post office. It was administered with very great ability and very great impartiality, by my hon. friend from Rouville, and, so far as I have had any experience of the department since the change of Government, I wish to pay this tribute to my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Pelletier) that I have detected no symptoms of any desire on his part to change the excellent administration of that department. I can only say that if my hon. friend should see his way to make a start in the establishment of parcel post in Canada I should be one of the first to congratulate him. It is one of those things that we cannot send abroad. There is a disposition to have the work connected with some of the departments of the public service done out of Canada altogether, but the parcel post system must be established in our own country. I should be very much pleased if my hon. friend would listen to the pleadings of his predecessor in office and make a start along this line.

Mr. NESBITT: Mr. Speaker, coming from the western part of the province of Ontario, I would also like to say a word in reference to parcel post. While I have endeavoured to think that the express companies do not overcharge, I have been forced, in the last two or three years, to come to the conclusion that they do very much overcharge. As a matter of fact, there rates were revised by the Railway Board two or three years ago, but they are still too high. We have in Ontario a very good rate on farm produce. I do not think we have any particular complaints to make in regard to farm produce because we must remember that the express companies deliver nearly all these things, which is a great convenience. But, if we send an ordinary article to a small village where they have an express office, and they have express offices in nearly every section of the country now, we find that their charges are very much too high indeed. My hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Martin) mentioned parts of machinery required to replace broken parts. They overcharge very materially on these things; in fact, they make the most ridiculous charges. I had to pay forty cents for a ten-pound parcel to go seven miles. The charge seemed to me to be absolutely ridiculous, but, I had to pay it. As a result of the introduction of the rural mail delivery system by the late Postmaster General and by the present Postmaster General, who has done a great deal, I must say, in the continuation of the system, a parcel post system would be of greater service than it formerly would have been. Farmers could get parcels up to a certain weight and size put into the postal boxes, but if these parcels were over a certain size they would not go into the boxes. It would then be necessary, I suppose, to drop a card into the box notifying the person to whom a parcel was directed to meet the courier next day, or some arrangement of that kind could be made so that the post office could deliver a parcel to the farmer to whom it was addressed. If we are going to take up parcel post in connection with the rural mail routes we will have to make some provision for the handling of parcels over and above a certain size. That, I suppose, my hon. friend the Postmaster General can work out. It would be a great convenience. I do not see why the country stores should complain of parcels being delivered in that way. I doubt if the system would take very much more from the country stores than they have lost already. In our section the country stores are largely the gatherers of farm produce. They go round with a wagon, or something of that kind, gathering up eggs and other farm products and exchanging their goods for them. In this way the country stores are quite an accommodation to farmers. I would not like to hurt the country storekeepers or any other class of people in the country. We have all got to live and the attack which is sometimes made on the retailer in connection with the increase in living expenses is, in many instances, totally uncalled for. In my judgment the attack on the retailer is absolutely uncalled for. Few fortunes are made by retail storekeepers in Canada and those who do prosper do so very slowly. If the introduction of a parcel post system will be the means of compelling the express companies to reduce their charges it would be a good thing. If it does not do so I think the express rates should be again reduced. In many cases they are ridiculous. If you want to send a parcel to Regina or Calgary all you have to do is to try and send it and you will make up your mind also that these rates are ridiculous. I wanted to send a barrel of apples the other day to Montreal; the apples cost me $2 and the express charges were $2.31. I think the express companies are seeking their own downfall. They are like a great many other people; when they are in a position to charge they seem to have no means of curtailing their ambitions or their greed. If my hon. friend the Postmaster General, by introducing the parcel post system, is the means of reducing the express rates to a reasonable amount, he will confer a great benefit upon the ordinary people of this country. I therefore join my voice with that of others in asking the Postmaster General to take the matter into his very serious consideration.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it is a very great source of pleasure to me to hear hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House taking such an active interest in parcel post. For some years past I have been strongly advocating the adoption of the parcel post system in Canada. I urged it upon the late hon. Postmaster General, and if you will look up 'Hansard' you will find that he frequently referred to the position that the small towns in the provinces were in and the petitions that he had received from time to time from the merchants of these towns urging him not to do anything in the matter. Apparently he was just about as well informed on the parcel post system when he was in office and as well able to give his consideration to it. But no action was taken. However, I am glad to see hon. gentlemen opposite taking an interest in it now because I realize and appreciate the fact that the time has come when he should at least take a step in the direction of forcing the express companies to reduce their rates. I do not say that we should establish a parcel post system possibly to the same extent as they have it in the Mother Country because, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has stated, we would find a great many difficulties to contend with if we were to adopt that system in Canada. But, there is no excuse for us not increasing the size of the parcels which go through the post office. There is no reason why we should no be able to receive some of the advantages to be derived from sending and receiving larger sized parcels through the post office. At the same time, this question is surrounded by difficulties. I have urged upon the present hon. Postmaster General, as I urged upon the late Postmaster General, time and again, the establishment of a system which would have its origin at the beginning or on the rural mail or stage route. In that way the departmental stores could not interfere with the merchants in the smaller towns, and the people living on the rural mail and stage routes of the country would be wonderfully benefited by having such an arrangement made. For instance, a man living on a rural mail or stage route in Ontario—and these routes are now well equipped with independent and rural telephones—could telephone to a store in the town to send him out whatever commodity he might require, and the parcel would be taken to the post office and for a few cents delivered to the farmer, who otherwise would be compelled to drive several miles to get it. The Postmaster General deserves great credit for the interest he has taken in this matter, and for the information he is now gathering. I know he has investigated the question to a much greater extent than did the late Postmaster General. We should not take it for granted that this is an entirely new question and force the Postmaster General to rush into a policy that might not be the best one to adopt. I believe it would be for the general advantage of the people of Canada if the proposition which I have made in this direction could be carried out.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): I have listened with great interest to the remarks made on this important question. I notice that as we proceed with the public business, the hon. member for Rouville is always ready to tell us of the great advantage which might be reaped from certain legislation, all of which he, when in office, did not attempt to pass, but left as a legacy to us. I can assure him that had he inaugurated the parcel post system in Canada, he would have relieved me of a great deal of embarrassment and anxiety.

The question of a parcel post is bristling with difficulties, and the fact that my hon. friend did not touch it when in office, shows that he was anxious to pursue the easiest course. I have given the question my best attention in consultation with the various efficient officers whom the hon. gentleman knows we have in the Post Office Department. We thought we had found a solution of the difficulty, but new difficulties arose and we were compelled to go into the question all over again. My hon. friend has referred to a plan submitted by Mr. George Ross, the worthy superintendent of the Post Office Department; but I may tell him that although Mr. Ross thought his plan would solve the difficulty, he has since discovered enough to cause him to change his mind somewhat. The hon. member for Rouville knows that the parcel post system is popular in the country, and that the express companies are not very popular, and he tells us we should start a parcel post system in order to compete with the express companies. Then, as a kind of solatium to the express companies, he tells us that we should take care to pay the railway companies higher rates for the transportation of the mails. The hon. gentleman thinks that if the railway companies are not pleased over the adoption of the parcel post system, which would possibly reduce the rates charged by the express companies, we should give them some consolation in another direction. The railway companies may have a good case for increased compensation for carrying the mails, but I dislike to have an hon. gentleman in this House invite the railway companies to ask for more money from the public treasury. It may be good policy for the hon. gentleman to suggest, that if on the one hand the express companies—which in the end are the railway companies—lose by the parcel post system, they should be recouped in another direction. That is all very well for a member sitting in Opposition, but when you have to deal with the question, in the interest of the people of the country, it is an entirely different matter. I do not view the parcel post question from the same standpoint as the hon. member. He says we should adopt the parcel post for the purpose of reducing express rates, but I do not think the Post Office Department is the source from which the public can expect to get lower express rates and lower railway passenger rates. There are other departments of government concerned with trade and commerce and transportation, and there is the Railway Board before which complaints can be made if the rates charged by express companies or railway companies are considered too high. I would ask hon. members to discard from the consideration of the subject the idea that we should go into this matter simply for the purpose of bringing about a rate war. That is not the purpose of the Post Office Department, and I would not care to approach the question from that standpoint. The Post Office Department is entrusted with the task of rendering possible the interchange of communication between people in the different parts of Canada, and between the people of Canada and the people of the other countries. Its first duty is to forward ordinary mail matter, to send out newspapers, and to diffuse information and learning generally. For one reason or another, in practically all the countries in the world the Post Office Departments have considered it as part of their business to transport or carry something else than letters and newspapers, and it is now a well-known and well settled policy of every country in the world to enter the field of what I might call to a certain extent 'freight transportation,' or, to put it as it ought to be put, 'small freight.' I am not going to quarrel with that idea. The last country which has adopted it is the United States. When I discussed this question last session, I had to point out to the hon. members of this House that the United States, a very advanced and progressive country, had not yet adopted a parcel post system, and that the limit of fourth-class mail matter which was going through their mails was four pounds. They have now made the plunge. Whilst I am not here to criticise in any way the policy adopted by the United States Government in this matter, I may say that they have made a move which is of the utmost importance from many points of view. They inaugurated that policy on the first day of the present year, after having passed a measure giving them the necessary powers, and after having looked into the matter in the most careful manner. It took them months after the law was passed to look round and get ready for this new policy. On the 1st of January, 1913, they put it into effect, and I may tell my hon. friends on both sides of the House that the post office authorities at Washington have been surprised at the weight and importance of the newly born child. In the first week during which this policy was in force, they carried through their mails the bagatelle of four million pounds of parcel post. Any hon. member can judge of the great difference which it made for even a well organized and well balanced department to have to take care of such an enormously increased amount of mail matter.

Mr. NESBITT: Might I ask the hon. gentleman what size they carry up to now?

Mr. PELLETIER: The size is just the size indicated by the hon. member for Rouville. The size is practically the same all over the world. Perhaps it was the weight my hon. friend wanted to know.

Mr. NESBITT: Weight is what I meant.

Mr. PELLETIER: Eleven pounds is their limit. I said a moment ago that I did not think that the Post Office Department was quite within its ordinary course of business in dealing with freight, or small freight. However, this appears now to be the well settled policy of all the countries of the world, and I really think that something along the same line must be carried out by Canada. How it is going to be done is not a thing to be decided without looking into this question very fully indeed. I admit that we have in this country the 'embryonic' system, as my hon. friend called it, of parcel post, something that we are not proud of. We are told, and it is true, that we can receive parcels from England and transport them over the whole of this country at a certain rate, twelve cents, while under our present regulations we have not the right to send parcels throughout this country at the same rate. I admit that Canada is today carrying the parcels of every country except its own, and this is a most extraordinary state of affairs. We have to receive parcels from the United States, and I may say that on the very first day that this system was inaugurated, parcels by post from the United States came over the border line to Canada, and we had telegrams from important post offices, mainly on the border line, inquiring what they were going to do with what in some cases was a multitude of parcels brought into the lobbies of the post offices. Of course we have distributed them subject to our rights as a country, and whether we ought to have a parcel post convention with the United States. I shall not go into that at present, but merely refer to it en passant, because I think all our rights should be reserved in this matter. We delivered these parcels coming over from the States, and there were some which were going from one end of Canada to the other. Of course everybody will admit that, if we are carrying the parcels of other countries, it is too bad that we should not carry our own.

There is another point of view which I think is of some importance. If parcels come over the border line from the United States, and if we have no right to send our parcels from Canada to the United States, we are in an inferior position. Consequently I think it is our duty to do something, and this motion which my hon. friend has presented to this House is not the forerunner of the policy to be put before the House, but comes after months of consideration given to this matter by the officers of the Post Office Department.

Mr. EMMERSON: Under your present international arrangements, you are compelled to carry throughout Canada any parcel coming from the United States and mailed there under their postal regulations and classification, and to accept their classification, if I understand the position right. Therefore, it would appear that people living in the United States can get the benefit of the Canadian postal system in sending to their friends in Canada, whereas citizens of Canada may not have the same privileges as between themselves. That is the position?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is the position in a certain respect. I should not like to admit, as Postmaster General, that we are obliged to carry parcels coming from the United States without a new parcel post convention with our friends and neighbours to the south of us.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But has the department being doing it since the 1st of January?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes. As I explained a moment ago, I think it would have been considered an unfriendly act on our part to refuse to deliver the parcels coming to Canada in great numbers from the United States. But, while we made delivery, sending the parcels to destination in this country, we took the precaution to write to the Post Office Department in Washington to tell them that we think that, in the first place, we should have been notified of the change. It came upon us—I will not say unawares, because we were watching it and following it closely—but without our being aware of what stamps were going to be put upon these parcels, and we could not—

Mr. LEMIEUX: They had a special stamp?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, of course, they had to. Of course, we could not notify our postmasters nor send the circular usual in such cases. So, our postmasters were taken by surprise and did not know what to do. However, we have carried on the business as if we had been notified, and have asked the Post Office Department at Washington to send us all necessary particulars, and have told them that we expected that a parcel post convention of some kind would be entered into.

Mr. EMMERSON: You wanted reciprocity in it?

Mr. PELLETIER: Not exactly reciprocity. But I think that neighbouring countries, even with the postal union regulations, should not be called upon, without having some notification, to take care of a sudden and vast increase in the business to be carried for their neighbours. At all events, I do not expect any trouble in that respect, but expect that we shall be able to adjust the matter to the satisfaction of both countries.

As to the difficulties which are in the way of establishing a parcel post, my hon. friend from Rouville has gone over the ground very well—in fact, so well that I am completely satisfied that if he did not establish a parcel post before the 21st of September, 1911, it was not for lack of knowledge of the subject. He is perfectly au fait with the situation,—he has the facts at his fingers' end. But, in my opinion, the petitions which he received as head of the department from the small country merchants are not to be lightly brushed aside as he suggested they should be. He has said that the express companies were at the bottom of the petitions so sent in from different parts of the country. I do not agree with him. And while, as I said last year, we should not be stopped from doing our duty in this respect, because, forsooth, we may hurt the feelings of the express companies, at the same time I do not think the express companies should be saddled with responsibility for the circulating of these petitions. I know, as a matter of fact, that the country merchant is very much afraid of this policy. Since the newspapers have given it out that something in the way of a parcel post was contemplated, I have received a resolution from the Retail Merchants' Association, protesting strongly against what they suppose is the policy of the department in this respect. I have answered their resolution, and, as they have indicated the possibility of coming to Ottawa to discuss the matter, I have told them I would receive them gladly and would discuss the matter with them. I say at once that the retail merchants have objections to this policy which ought to be considered. Should a parcel post policy have the effect, as is expected in certain quarters, of ruining the business of the country merchant, I, for one, would pause before adopting it. The retail merchant is carrying on a business which is perfectly legitimate. But there is also to be considered the wholesale merchant in the important cities who also has a great interest at stake. He sells goods to the retail merchant, and his trade also is a legitimate one. While we have not, so far, reached a conclusion as to what our policy shall be, yet, whatever we do, we will take care that we do not trample on the business of a great number of people in this country whose legitimate interests ought to be protected.

Further, if it is expected that the Post Office Department will go into this parcel post business, merely for the love of it or merely for the sake of doing it, and bring disaster and financial ruin on the department itself, I may say at once that that is a complete mistake. We must settle this question in a businesslike way. We have a surplus of over a million dollars. My hon. friend from Rouville took great care when he was at the helm, to have the surplus there. But now he tells me, you have no business to have a surplus. I am afraid this is the offer of the Greeks. If I found it desirable to do away with the surplus, it would be the easiest thing in the world to attain that end. The surplus is surrounded and coveted by so many people that, if I were willing to let it go, it would disappear in twenty-four hours. A great many people think that the surplus should not exist. The postmasters—and there are fourteen thousand of them in this country—tell me that I have no business to have a surplus, and that they ought to get it. The letter carriers tell me: The Post Office Department has a surplus; why don't you distribute that surplus to the letter carriers? Then, we have the mail contractors;—as my hon. friend from Rouville knows, we have an enormous number of employees, and they all think that the surplus ought to go. The railway companies also think we have no business to have a surplus. Well, I think we should have a surplus—not merely for the sake of having a surplus, but for the sake of carrying on without danger the well-settled policy of the Post Office Department as it has been carried out for the last year or so. We have started rural mail delivery on businesslike principles and have taken the means to expand this system; and, so far, we have had very little complaint, and many people tell us that the system is working very well.

I stated in my place in this House last year that I was more concerned about rural mail delivery than about parcel post. We have made a fair start with rural mail delivery, and we are going to increase it little by little—not by leaps and bounds; we cannot do that——

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many rural mail delivery routes have you?

Mr. PELLETIER: I think there are over six hundred. At all events I put before the House yesterday—my hon. friend from Rouville was not here—a tabulated statement on the subject. And now, having attended to this rural mail delivery policy, we think one of the next things which should be attended to is the parcel post. But, as I said a moment ago, the parcel post must be put on such a footing that it will not spell disaster and financial wreck to the Post Office Department. Let me call attention to the present situation in a very few words. I have here a tabulated statement showing the difference in the rates between the express companies and the Canadian post office. This statement was prepared by Mr. Ross, and it takes Toronto as a base. To carry a parcel of 1 lb. weight from Toronto to Hamilton costs, under our present rates, 16c.—1c. per oz. To carry the same parcel the same distance the express companies charge 25c. But if you take a parcel of 2 lb., it will cost 32c. by post office, but only 25c. by express. A parcel of 3 lb. for the same distance would cost 48c. by the post office and 25c. by express; in the case of a parcel of 4 lb. for the same distance, while the postal rate is 64c., the express rate still stands at 25c. But, take a longer distance—from Toronto to Ottawa or Montreal. For a parcel of 1 lb. the post office rate is 16c., the express rate 25c., but for a parcel of 4 lbs., while we should charge 64c., the express rate is 35c. Take a greater distance still—say from Toronto to Regina. For a parcel of 1 lb., our charge is the same as for the shorter distance, 16c., and the express rate is 30c. But when it comes to a parcel of 5 lb., the post office charge 80 cents, and the express charge 75c. Thus, they even up, with the result that in parcels of 1 lb. and under the post office gets all the traffic it desires; but when you come to parcels of 2 lb. and 3 lb. and carried over a short haul, which is the profitable business, that is done by the express company, and the post office is left with the dry bones. But then we have this further result,—the express companies do not reach every point in Canada. They have offices in the important centres and even at most of the railway stations but there are many many points where the railways do not go, and these people have not the benefit in any form of the parcel post delivery either of the post office or express company under present conditions. That is one of the things which to my mind constitutes a valid and important reason why, whilst we are not freight carriers, the post office should inaugurate this policy. We have the equipment in Canada, with our 14,000 postmasters who will thereby become so many agents for the parcel post delivery, and thus I think we can establish it on reasonable terms.

I would like the House to understand very clearly that whilst I am speaking on this matter in a very guarded way, only to be fair to the hon. members, I am not at the present moment at liberty to say what we are going to do in the matter. This is a thing which has to be discussed by the Government as a whole. I may say that it is admitted that something might be done. My hon. friend has referred to the resolution adopted at Toronto. I had the pleasure of meeting the President of the Board of Trade of Toronto the other day when I put to him and his colleagues several questions on this subject. I am glad to say that they agreed with me that this matter should be treated in a business-like way, and that whatever we do will be done in such a way that we will find a reasonable compensation for the additional work which will be imposed on the Post Office Department and its employees. We cannot make a leap in the dark, we cannot make a plunge. I have given the number of millions of pounds of parcel post matter which has come from the United States. We must get ready for this, we must think of the objection which has been raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). If we are to have 11-pound parcels and if we add seven or eight or ten or twenty of them to the mail carrier he will at once tell us that this is not the contract which he has signed with us, he will have a claim for increased pay and compensation. We have purchased over 100,000 boxes for rural mail. If we go to this limit of 11 pounds with the 6-feet limit of size the mail boxes will not be large enough for such parcels. If with a system of parcel post we have double the mail matter which we are handling today it will mean a revolution in the administration of the post office, mostly in the important cities but to a certain extent in the smaller offices.

I have said that the question is one bristling with difficulties, and it is; so whilst I am well disposed to give the public the benefit of the work which has been done in the department and whilst I am free to say that I would positively hate to see Canada alone backward in this direction, that every other country in the world had adopted the system, we must not, on the other hand, shut our eyes to certain important facts. It is all very well and right to speak of parcel post in countries like England, France, Germany, Belgium. The density of population in those countries makes the problem of parcel post a comparatively easy one, but why did not the United States adopt the parcel post before this year? Their reason was a very important one. They said: We have the population, but it is spread over such a large area of territory that we must take special care of the transportation of those parcels. They now think that they have settled their problem. But we cannot say that the settlement of the problem by the United States has settled the problem for Canada because whilst we have a vast territory like the United States we have not the population which they have and they have reason to expect and to believe that their parcel post policy, with their 90,000,000 or 100,000,000 of people will be a very much more remunerative one than our parcel post policy over the same extent of territory with only 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 people. There is in that respect alone occasion to think this matter over, to weigh it well and not make a leap in the dark. I hear clamors, parcel post, parcel post, parcel post. It is all right, but the man who will be responsible to this country for parcel post has to think the matter over before he takes action, and he must act in such a way that when the whole thing is over the people who have been clamoring for parcel post will not be able to ridicule the Postmaster General. These people have not a very large responsibility in this matter but if the system is started on lines which prove ruinous and disastrous, the man who has the responsibility and who will be the laughing stock of the people will be the Postmaster General. So I intend to take my time about it, although I hope to do something during the present session. People and newspapers tell me: What business have you to watch what is going on in the United States? Watch your own country. I tell these people that I have a right to watch from a business point of view the financial result in the United States, what the system is going to cost them, what increased capacity their post office is going to require, what increased little army of sorters and packers this will mean, and I shall not be debarred from looking over the border for knowledge on these matters. I have been told by another newspaper, an important one: What a blessing that the United States have adopted parcel post! Since the parcel post has been adopted in the United States the rates of the express companies have been lowered—what a blessing! After writing all this the same paper said: What business have you to adopt the zone system which is very well loved by the express companies. This paper was forgetting that the United States has the zone system. I am glad to say that the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) who knows something of these matters, who has been at the head of the department for five or six years, understands that it is absolutely useless to hope or expect that if we start a policy like that we will have a flat rate for the transportation of parcel post. This would put the Post Office Department out of business, and I do not intend that it shall be put out of business, at least while I am here, so that while on the whole the idea is a perfectly good one it has to be worked out on a business footing, and the people of this country must expect that we will not be competitors with the express rates. These rates do not concern the Post Office Department as a department. We believe that the parcel post is well thought of in all the countries in the world. It has been adopted in every civilized country now, but at the same time, we believe that it must be worked out not as a competitor with the express companies, but for the public service of this country, and mainly for those numerous parts of the country where the express companies do not go, and at such rates as will give to the Post Office Department sufficient remuneration to prevent it from being put out of commission. It is on those lines that we have approached this matter, and we think that something can be done. What form it shall take I am not at liberty for the moment to say. As a matter of fact it is not decided. I may say that the idea of leaving all the paying business to the express companies, of doing the lean part, and leaving the fat part to them is not a policy that appeals to me. Some change must take place. We have waited until this policy has matured to make all the changes at the same time, and as I said a moment ago, I believe that the experience they are gaining in the United States will be very helpful to us. There they have provided for a complete system of inspection and return. We shall know exactly, for we have been promised the figures, at the end of the first two months of their experience in this matter how much it is costing them, how much it is likely to cost them in the future. They have worked it out to perfection. But they say that it would be out of the question to try a flat rate such as we have for letters, and with that I entirely agree. They have eight zones, and they have prepared very beautifully arranged maps. They have distributed these maps all over the numerous post offices in the States, and I may say that they have these maps arranged to such perfection that, with the system of longitude and latitude to which the hon. member for Rouville referred, each post office, small though it may be, is the centre of a zone. They have as many maps and as many zones as they have post offices. I think that is out of the question so far as this country is concerned. We cannot think of having a poor man who gets $35 a year as postmaster——

Mr. DEVLIN: Why do you not increase it?

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend from Wright is like the man of whom I spoke a moment ago: everybody is asking for an increase. I think the salaries of the postmasters should be increased, but you must not forget that if this parcel post policy is entered into the Postmaster will find, because he is paid on a percentage of the stamps which he sells, that the work will increase, and that the wages will also increase. Now maybe we shall find in that policy some means of meeting the demands of the railway companies. The demands of the railway companies for increased rates of pay are very big. They are so big that it would take not only the post office surplus to meet them but two million dollars more. Whilst I am prepared to deal fairly with the railway companies in this respect, this country will be interested to know that we are already paying the different railway companies a sum of $2,000,000 yearly for the transportation of our mails. Whilst the railway companies are entitled to a fair deal and to fair play, it should be remembered that they have received very much from this country for the building of their roads, all of them. This is a fact which we can fairly take into consideration when we approach this question. Maybe we shall be able to make a deal all round with the railway companies on this question, and I hope the railway companies will be reasonable and not try to reap the whole benefit for themselves. But if, as they generally do, they agree to some give and take, I think we shall be able to approach the question together and settle it in the interests of this country, and without sacrificing any legitimate interests.

Mr. BELAND: I am not perfectly clear about the declaration which the minister has made in the course of his remarks, and perhaps he can supply the information. Is the House to understand that the department is having as a primary consideration, or as a guiding principle, possible discrimination between sections of the country that are served by railway, and sections that are not served by railway?

Mr. PELLETIER: Oh, no. What I meant was this, that our parcel post policy would not only be one which would benefit the parts of this country where the railways and consequently the express companies go, because we shall have to go where the express companies do not go. But I did not mean to say that we should only go where the express companies do not go. We shall have the same points as they cover, and more; that is what I meant. Now, I think the hon. member for Rouville has attained the object he had in view, and I would suggest that the motion be dropped.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I intend to say just a word in answer to my hon. friend. I must say I am pleased with the spirit which has animated him throughout this friendly discussion on a question which is of the utmost interest to the country. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) thinks that I should have played the part of reformer while I was acting as Postmaster General, although in the same breath he urges the Postmaster General to be very cautious in this matter and not to be speedy, as the expression goes. The question is a very important one; everybody understands that; but as the years roll on the objections are being removed, and the reason why I urged the adoption of this policy in the near future was exactly the one given by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, that the United States after several years of close investigation have at least framed a system which has been in operation since the 1st of January. I am free to say that I do not urge the Postmaster General to accept exactly the same system; but in the reports which have been published in the United States regarding that investigation which took so many years to materialize, he has all the elements for the creation of a Canadian system. What we said during the last election, that we could not easily legislate against geography, is put in strong evidence to-day by this very discussion. Here is a postal convention existing between Canada and the United States. By that convention a perfect state of reciprocity exists. We have reciprocity in the mail business, and, if my hon. friend will read the convention aright, he will find that he is obliged under it to carry the packages which are sent through the mails from the United States, as the United States would be obliged to carry those from Canada. It will be a shock to our population to learn that we are to carry the packages of the United States at their low rates and that we are prevented from sending across the border packages at similar rates.

The question is not a fancy one. It is not the result of a popular fancy that the people are clamoring for parcel post. It has become an acute question from the economic point of view. I have referred to Professor Mackenzie, who presided over the investigation ordered by the Toronto Board of Trade on the causes of the high cost of living. Professor Mackenzie says that one of the chief causes of the high cost of living is the absence of a parcel post system in Canada. It is not a popular fancy. It is a very serious reason which is being advanced by the consumers of the country. It is an economic necessity, and my hon. friend will have, nolens volens, to face the issue. I am glad that he informs the House that he is ready to examine the question, and to give it a proper solution. Under these circumstances, I have no objection to withdrawing my motion, seeing that the object of that motion is met in such a good spirit and with such favor by both sides of the House.

Motion withdrawn.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX moved for:

A copy of all correspondence, petitions and papers generally, concerning the resignation of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Harbour Commission of Montreal is probably, after the various departments of Government, the most important body we have in Canada. It is admitted that the Harbour Commission holds the key to the transportation question in Canada. The harbour of Montreal has become, par excellence, the national port of the Dominion and that harbour is of as much interest to the farmers beyond the great lakes as to the people of Montreal and the surrounding district. Therefore, it is a very important body, and the people who are entrusted with the duties pertaining to it, should be the best engineers and the best administrators available. The harbour commission has existed since 1830. At that time the Government appointed a commission composed of three. Later on, in 1853, the number of harbour commissioners was increased to five, in 1873 to nine and, in 1894, to eleven. At that time the harbour commission was composed of members some appointed by the Minister of Public Works, because the Department of Marine and Fisheries took charge of the channel at the time of the appointment of the late Mr. Prefontaine. It was also composed of some members appointed by the Government, some by the Board of Trade, Shipping Federation, the Chamber de Commerce. I think, the City of Montreal was entitled to one member, namely, the Mayor. When the harbour commission was under control of these eleven commissioners so appointed it was found that, respectable as were the commissioners, they were the victims of the patronage system and from all parts of the Dominion came complaints against the perpetual wrangling between the Government, the shipping interests and the City of Montreal, due to the large number of commissioners and to the internal divisions which existed in that body. In the year 1907, if I mistake not, the Government of the day—and credit for this must be given to my predecessor in office the Hon. Mr. Brodeur—decided to do away with such a large number of commissioners, and in doing so, I may say, en passant, that the Government made not a few enemies. We confided as a substitute the direction of the harbour to three commissioners, appointed directly by the Government and to be perfectly independent of the various interests which had heretofore been at loggerheads. The pest of the harbour commission was the patronage system. Mr. Brodeur decided to wipe out that pest, to destroy that patronage system which was so vicious, and which had hampered the successful administration of the harbour of Montreal. After months of consideration he selected the three men who were probably best qualified to fill the positions. He consulted the Board of Trade, the Shipping Federation, the City Council of Montreal, the large business firms, and they all agreed that the three best men who could be selected were Mr. George Washington Stephens, Mr. Ballantyne, and Mr. Geoffrion, and he appointed them. These gentlemen were not looking for the office; the office sought them. Every one knows that Mr. Stephens is a millionaire, a man of leisure, a man who has made a study of the transportation question; that Mr. Ballantyne is a most successful business man, a man of wealth, a man of great energy, and that Mr. Geoffrion was also eminently fitted for the office. They had no axe to grind as harbour commissioners, and the people of Montreal, Liberals and Conservatives, acclaimed the choice made by Mr. Brodeur. The first thing these three commissioners did after taking office, was to do away with the patronage system, and volumes could not tell what reforms they introduced during the few years of their administration. The harbour of Montreal to-day is not the harbour of a few years ago; it has become a great national port and the pride of Canada, thanks to the wise and prudent administration of Messrs. Stephens, Ballantyne and Geoffrion. Well, the day after the general elections, I am sorry to say the Conservative organizer in Montreal rushed down to the harbour office and began to lecture the three harbour commissioners. He wanted to know if in future the patronage of Montreal harbour would go into the hands of the Conservative patronage organization, and knowing what I know now, and knowing what I knew then of the three commissioners, I am surprised that Messrs. Stephens, Ballantyne and Geoffrion, did not forcibly, if need be, eject from their office the man who came with that mandate to them. But stranger still, a man for whom I have the greatest respect, my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), went also to the harbour commissioners and said that the patronage in minor matters at least, should go to the Conservative patronage committee. I regret that the hon. member for St. Antoine is not in his seat, because I wish to tell him that I am surprised at his action in this matter, especially in Montreal, the hon. gentleman and myself have fought the same battles together for good municipal government, and I have always thought he stood for an intelligent and progressive administration of public affairs. I am informed that he went, at the request of the patronage committee, and asked the commissioners to relinquish the minor patronage of the harour of Montreal.

Mr. HAZEN: Who told the hon. gentleman that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The harbour commissioners themselves. I am bound to say that I cast no reproach on the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; on the contrary I have received from the late harbour commissioners of Montreal the highest praise of his conduct. But I want to make the point clear that if the three commissioners have resigned, it is because the patronage committee in Montreal made their lives miserable. Why, the first thing that patronage committee did was to appoint over the head of the commissioners Mr. Massé the defeated candidate, in St. Mary's Division, and after that the employees who were under the control of the harbour commissioners and until then had been debarred from taking part in politics, began to give interviews in the papers against the harbour commissioners. Life was made so miserable for them that they decided to withdraw from office. I repeat that the Minister of Marine has been most gentlemanly and most courteous with the late harbour commissioners, and I know that had he had his own way, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Ballantyne and Mr. Geoffrion would be to-day the harbour commissioners of Montreal. But, he was hounded by all the patronage seekers; he was surrounded by all the ward politicians; by all those who believe that there is any amount of boodle in the Montreal harbour works. With all this intriguing and all this scheming against them, the harbour commissioners have chosen to give up office. I say that their withdrawal is a decided loss, not only to Montreal, but to the country generally, because no three men of equal ability could be found to administer with so much intelligence the affairs of the national port of Canada. They were not even spared the humiliation of being investigated by such pious gentlemen as Messrs. Morine and Ducharme, two men who have been forced to resign themelves, and for cause, since last session. The three harbour commissioners of Montreal, men of the highest repute, men most highly respected by the business men of this country, were made the victims of an investigation by Messrs. Morine and Ducharme. The latter gentleman spent weeks going through the books, ordering this and that from the commissioners in order to discover what they had in mind—some scandal in the harbour commission in Montreal. They were fishing for scandal, fishing for evidence. We also saw the members for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) and Gaspé (Mr. Gauthier), from the outlying sections of the province of Quebec, coming in a delegation to the minister's office, speaking on behalf of the ministerial patronage of the province of Quebec and ordering that the three commissioners should be dismissed. I say it is a scandal. It was a scandal first to send Messrs. Morine and Ducharme to investigate men of the standing, the ability, and the uprightness of the commissioners.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BELAND: They should have been fishing in their own waters.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But the result was highly satisfactory to the harbour commissioners. Even Messrs. Morine and Ducharme, who have been forced to resign since because their skirts are not so very clean, were obliged to admit that they found nothing against the harbour commissioners, that they had ransacked the books and found everything right. They said that in the case of large purchases of material and supplies it was the practice of the commissioners to call for tenders and to award the contracts to the lowest tenderers. That was the great issue. Some of the Quebec members were under the impression that the contracts were not given to the lowest tenderers, and they expected much, they thought that many of their friends would make fortunes. That explains why the members for Rimouski, Dorchester and Gaspé were so deeply interested in the harbour of Montreal as to come in a delegation and ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to dismiss Messrs. Stephens, Geoffrion and Ballantyne, who had administered the affairs of the harbour of Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BELAND: All big men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They were the spokesmen of the gentlemen who wanted that investigation. The investigation was held and those two honest men, Messrs. Morine and Ducharme found that everything was in perfect order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I beg to say that I have absolutely nothing to do with the harbour commissioners in Montreal, and the member for Rouville, who goes to Montreal as he did the other day, mentioning some supposed words of the Bishop of Sherbrooke, has absolutely no right to come here and say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is not stating a point of order.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I was mentioned by the hon. member for Rouville as being interested in that affair, and I beg to say that I am not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When my hon. friend is in his sober senses he will leave the bishops alone and not bring them in contact with Messrs. Ducharme and Morine.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe): Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No; I will not allow the hon. gentleman to put a question, because he does not know the bishop. I know what will be the nature of my hon. friend's question, and I would rather avoid it.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a fire extinguisher. Perhaps you are reminded by that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not know what the hon. gentleman has in mind, but if he has in mind the fire extinguisher, he might have in mind also a certain oath which was given before a court in the Province of Ontario. If he has that in mind, he can ask the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I will ask it another time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I said a moment ago that the hon. minister who presides over the Marine and Fisheries was not responsible for the resignation of the three harbour commissioners in Montreal, but the ward heelers and the patronage seekers forced the hands of the three commissioners, and I am sorry to say it is a loss not only for Montreal but for the country. I am pleased to say, however, the commissioners of the harbour of Montreal carried with them the respect, the esteem, and the confidence of the citizens of Montreal, and of the broadminded citizens of this country.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): It is my intention to move the adjournment of the debate, as the House has to separate at six o'clock this evening. Before doing so, however, I propose to take just two minutes to say to my hon. friend that I cannot believe for one single moment that his extraordinary action in this House this afternoon has been inspired by the gentlemen who have recently resigned as harbour commissioners in the city of Montreal. Two of these gentlemen have assured me time and again, both verbally and in writing, that their sole reason for resigning was because they felt that with their large private businesses they were unable to give to the discharge of the important duties of the position the time they considered the position required. Those are the facts. In addition to that, time and time again, all three commissioners, not only verbally, but in writing, have assured me that they appreciated the manner in which the Government and department, of which I am the head, stood by them during the time they have discharged those duties since the change of government took place on the 21st day of September, 1911. That being the fact, I cannot believe that my hon. friend from Rouville has been inspired by the harbour commissioners in making the very extraordinary attack which he has made on the Government in connection with the resignation of these commissioners. Whilst he has spoken in high terms of praise of the way in which those commissioners dicharged their duties, terms with which I have no disposition to find fault, he has attempted at the same time to make it clear that some insult was cast upon those commissioners because their proceedings were investigated by the Public Service Commission; but the effect of that is rather destroyed when I say that it was at the request of the harbour commissioners themselves that the Public Service Commission was directed to investigate the affairs of the harbour commissioners. Further, although those gentlemen have discharged their duties well as harbour commissioners of Montreal, I am very glad indeed to find that after most careful consideration, after consultation with the business interests of Montreal and with representatives of the Board of Trade, we have appointed as their successors three gentlemen who are universally well spoken of by the business community of Montreal, men who measure well up to the standard of the commissioners whose places they have taken, and who have been well and favourably spoken of by every newspaper published in Montreal, whether in the English or the French language. That is a guarantee that the work of the harbour of Montreal will be carried on in the future as it should be carried on, as a great public work, not from a party standpoint, not from the standpoint of the port of Montreal, but from the standpoint of the general well-being and general public interest of the Dominion of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Hazen, the debate was adjourned.

UNOPPOSED AND UNDISCUSSED MOTIONS.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Duncan Gillies, fishery overseer at Baddeck, C.B., in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of John G. Morrison, fishery inspector at Englishtown, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Joseph Day, customs officer at Little Bras d'Or, C.B., in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Robert Musgrave, postmaster at North Sydney, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Robert Musgrave, quarantine medical officer at North Sydney, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and report of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Archibald McKenzie, sectionman, Intercolonial railway, at Grand Narrows, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Neil McNeil, bridgetender, Intercolonial railway, at Grand Narrows, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of John Fraser, bridgetender, Intercolonial railway, at Grand Narrows, in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Dr. J. D. R. Williams, collector of canal tolls at Cardinal, Ontario, and of the appointment of his successor.—Mr. McMillan.

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of W. A. Scott, lockmaster at Cardinal, Ontario, and of the appointment of his successor.—Mr. McMillan.

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Neil Cummings, lockmaster at Cardinal, Ontario, and of the appointment of his successor.—Mr. McMillan.

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of W. H. Saver, collector of customs at Cardinal, Ontario, and of the appointment of his successor.—Mr. McMillan.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Adam Henderson, bridgemaster at Cardinal, Ontario, and of the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Murphy.

For a return showing all the employees on the Soulanges canal who have been dismissed from their duties since the 21st September, 1911, by whom each of these employees has been replaced, and for what causes were they dismissed.—Mr. Boyer.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of John W. Bohan, preventive officer at Bath, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of John Y. Fleming, customs officer at Debec, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of Matthias Meagher, preventive officer at Debec, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of George F. Briggs, customs officer at McAdam Junction, York county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of Mary A. Bohan, as postmistress at Bath, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of Denis McGaffigan, postmaster at Florenceville, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of Arthur Armstrong, postmaster at Greenfield, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of Edward Lafferty, postmaster at Benton, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of Oliver Hemphill, immigration agent at Debec, Carleton county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, evidence and other documents regarding the dismissal of Newton S. Dow, immigration agent at McAdam Junction, York county, N.B.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Captain Roderick McDonald, tide waiter, at Big Bras D'Or, Riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of George Hines, lighthouse keeper at South Ingonish, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of James Maloney, customs officer at Dingwall, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Thomas Chalmer McLean, postmaster at Ivera, Middle River, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Daniel Dunlop, postmaster at New Campbellton, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of the investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Donald McAulay, lightkeeper, Plaister, Baddeck Bay, C.B., riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and reports of investigation held by H. P. Duchemin in regard to the same, and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all papers, documents, correspondence, &c., relating to the dismissal of J. V. Smith, sub-collector of customs at Wood's harbour, Shelburne county, N.S.—Mr. Law.

For a copy of all papers, documents, correspondence, &c., relating to the dismissal of James Amereault, lighthouse keeper at New Edinburgh, Digby county, N.S.—Mr. McLean (Halifax).

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of J. A. McKenzie, postmaster at Ashfield, Inverness county, N.S.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all papers, letters, documents, telegrams, reports and opinions in relation to the claim of William Iceton, of Purcell's Cove for a return of a boat from the Department of Marine and Fisheries or any other department.—Mr. Macdonald.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and documents referring in any way to the claim of the municipalities of Pictou, Antigonish, Guysborough and St. Mary's for payment or refund to them of the monies paid by said municipalities for the right of way of that part of the Intercolonial railway running through the counties of Pictou, Antigonish and Guysborough.—Mr. Chisholm (Antigonish).

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, complaints, petitions, and other documents concerning the dismissal of Sebastien Savoie, superintendent of the lobster hatchery at Shippigan, Gloucester county, N.B., and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and petitions concerning the dismissal of Henri Fricott, wharfinger at Caraquet, and Richard Southwood, wharfinger and agent of the Storm Signal Service at Bathurst, Gloucester county, N.B., and the appointment of their successors.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of D. Perrin, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. Lane, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. McNutt.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. A. Mundle, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. Offspring, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Warnock.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. Hayes, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Turriff.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. McInnis, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. McCoig.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of G. Scott, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Nesbitt.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Edward F. Moran, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Oliver.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Thomas McLatchie, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Graham.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Robert Robertson, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Elgin McLaughlin, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Emmerson.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of William L. Gladstone, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Pugsley.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Byron VanCamp, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Murphy.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Andrew Melville, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Proulx.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of N. Broderick, locktender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. McMillan.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Samuel English, canal bridgetender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of George Short, canal bridgetender at Cardinal, Ont.—Mr. Guthrie.

For a return showing a list of the lighthouse keepers removed by the present government in the county of Two Mountains, the names of such persons, the reasons for their dismissal, the nature of the complaints made against them; also a copy of all correspondence and petitions relating thereto, and reports of enquiries in the cases, where such have been held; and also the names of their successors.—Mr. Ethier.

For a return showing a list of the mail carriers whose contracts have been cancelled or renewed by the present Government in the county of Two Mountains, the names of such persons, the reasons for cancelling or renewing the said contracts, the former price and the present price of the said contracts; also a copy of all correspondence relating to the said mail carriers.—Mr. Ethier.

Return showing a list of the postmasters dismissed or removed by the present Government in the county of Two Mountains, the names of such persons, the reason for their dismissal, the nature of the complaints brought against them, and a copy of all correspondence and petitions relating thereto, and reports of enquiry in the cases where such have been held; also the names of their successors.—Mr. Ethier.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of George Walsh, immigration agent at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Oliver.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of L. Place, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Pacaud.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. Shaver, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Law.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. Roche, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. Walsh, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Chishholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. McDermott, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Devlin.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of J. Slattery, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Béland.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of D. Boivard, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Kyte.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of E. Scott, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—M. Demers.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of W. Jarvis, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Gauvreau.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of H. Birks, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescot, Ontario.—Mr. Charlton.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of C. Kavanagh, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Carvell.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of B. Hughes, immigration agent at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Graham.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of L. Lalonde, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Bureau.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of D. Dishaw, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Turriff.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of Thomas Colligan, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Ross.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of W. Gerts, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Wilson (Laval).

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of R. Lunay, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Carroll.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of C. Wright, employee of the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ont.—Mr. Clarke.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of M. Barry, from the service of the Marine Department at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of W. Granton, from the service of the Marine Department at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Thompson.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of S. Delaney, from the service of the Marine Department at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Buchanan.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of P. Bélanger, from the service of the Marine Department at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Proulx.

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, reports, correspondence and recommendations in any way relating to the dismissal of H. B. Easton, immigration agent at Prescott, Ontario.—Mr. Murphy.

For a copy of all documents, correspondence, petitions and telegrams respecting the dismissal of M. Sauriol, postmaster at St. Janvier, county of Terrebonne, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Ethier.

For a copy of all correspondence and other papers in connection with a proposed guarantee of bonds to the Quebec and Saguenay railway.—Mr. Lemieux.

For a copy of all minutes of the Treasury Board, all Orders in Council, and all other papers or documents in any way relating to the issue by the Minister of Finance of the license to La Banque Internationale du Canada.—Mr. Lemieux.

House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Railway statistics of the Dominion of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Cochrane.

Report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31, 1912, Vol. I.—Mr. White.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 66, respecting the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation.—Sir Edmund Osler.

Bill No. 67, to incorporate the Canada Permanent Public Trustee Company.—Sir Edmund Osler.

Bill No. 68, to incorporate the Dominion North Western Railway Company.—Mr. Bennett (Simcoe).

Bill No. 69, respecting Ebro Irrigation and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Ross.

Bill No. 70, respecting the Huron and Ontario Railway Company, and to change its name to 'The Toronto and Northwestern Railway Company.'—Mr. Lewis.

Bill No. 71, respecting a patent of the Gold Medal Furniture Manufacturing Company, Limited.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 72, to incorporate La Banque Immobilière.—Mr. Baker.

Bill No. 73, to incorporate the Peoples Trustee and Security Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 74, respecting the York County Loan and Savings Company.—Mr. Macdonell.

TITLES OF HONOUR.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 75, to abolish Titles of Honour in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BURNHAM: Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps not so easy to explain as some hon. gentlemen surmise. I may say, to begin with, that the scope and power of this Bill are comprised, I fancy, in section 12 of the British North America Act which says that:

> All powers, authorities and functions which under any act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, are at the Union vested in or exercisable by the respective governors or lieutenant governors of those provinces, with the advice, or with the advice and consent, of the respective executive councils thereof, or in conjunction with those councils, or with any number of members thereof, or by those governors or lieutenant governors individually, shall, as far as the same continue in existence and capable of being exercised after the union in relation to the Government of Canada, be vested in and exercisable by the Governor General, with the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, or any members thereof, or by the Governor General individually, as the case requires, subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada.

Briefly, as I understand democracy and conditions in Canada, the people are not desirous of having their representatives either accept or create class badges or distinctions. It so happens, of course, that sometimes, long after men have lost their usefulness, honours are conferred upon them on the basis of their good reputation, though, in the language of Scripture they have become whited sepulchres. My only justification for using those words is that they are derived from a sacred source. That condition, of course, is not satisfactory to the people. The genius of democracy in Canada is that the people should remain upon a common level in so far as class or social distinctions go. That view, I think, commends itself to all the people. My Bill does not propose to deal with anything outside of Canada or outside of the scope and powers of the people of Canada or their representatives. It may seem limited but it enunciates I think, at least, a great principle and that is the principle of democratic equality in Canada.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MIRAMICHI RIVER DREDGING.

*Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Having reference to a question contained on page 603 of 'Hansard' and the answer thereto, relating to dredging in the Miramichi river, New Brunswick, what amount of dredging remained to be done under the contract when the contractors abandoned the contract on 7th May, 1912, as stated in the answer to question No. 13?

2. What additional sum will be paid to the new contractor for such dredging above what would have been paid had the previous contract not been abandoned?

3. What was the amount of the security of the first contractor, which was forfeited?

4. Was the Department of Public Works or the Minister of Public Works, or any other member of the Government, aware that the persons now owning and controlling the charter and dredging plant of the Northern Dredging and Construction Company, had, as alleged, previously purchased the plant of the former contractor, and that they abandoned the first contract at eleven cents per cubic yard in order to receive the work at a higher price, as it is said they did secure it at a price nearly double that previously paid?

5. Will the minister cause an investigation of this matter to be made and inform the House at as early a date as possible of the result of such investigation?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 2. No definite quantity of material to be removed, was specified in contract entered into with the Eastern Dredging Company at 11 cents a cubic yard.

3. $5,500 with $336.02 interest.

4. The department was aware that the plant of the Eastern Dredging Company had been purchased by Messrs. Tennant and O'Leary who sold or transferred it to the Northern Dredging and Construction Company.

5. The minister is not aware that there is anything to investigate. The Northern Dredging Company abandoned the contract and the department forfeited their security cheque. New tenders were called, the only offer received being from the Northern Dredging and Construction Company, at 25 cents per cubic yard. The department refused to award a contract at that price and the work was finally let at 20 cents per cubic yard.

AMHERST PAVING INSPECTOR.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Who was the inspector of pavement work performed by the Government during the latter part of 1911 and the first part of 1912 on Station street, Amherst, N.S.?

2. What is his usual occupation?

Mr. COCHRANE: J. N. Fage, during the latter part of 1911, contractor; Adolphe Landry, during the first part of 1912, building contractor.

FORT LAWRENCE DREDGING INSPECTOR.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Who was inspector of dredging at Fort Lawrence, Cumberland county, N.S., during 1912?

2. What remuneration did he receive?

3. What is his usual occupation?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Adolphe F. Landry.

2. $80 per month.

3. Agent correspondence school and law student.

COAST GUARD NEWSPAPER.

* Mr. KYTE:

1. Has any sum of money been paid to the Coast Guard newspaper published at Clark's Harbour, Nova Scotia, since October 1, 1911, for advertising or subscription?

2. If so, what is the amount and date of payment, and to whom was the warrant or cheque payable?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Department of Marine and Fisheries, yes; Department of Public Works, yes, for advertising; Department of Railways and Canals, yes, for advertising Intercolonial railway; Department of the Secretary of State, yes, subscription; Department of Naval Service, yes, for advertising.

2. Department of Marine and Fisheries, $13, 7th March, 1912, 80 cents 18th March, 1912, $13.80—payable to the Coast Guard.

Department of Public Works, $8.70, May 23, 1912, $16.85, July 15, 1912; $20, October 10, 1912, $45.55—paid to proprietor of the Coast Guard, Clark's Harbour.

Department of Railways and Canals, $7.50, December 11, 1911, payable Coast Guard Publishing Company; $7.80, December 14, 1911; $12.25, April 11, 1912; $8.75, May 9, 1912; $3.75, May 9, 1912; $2.50, September 5, 1912, $43.55—payable to the Coast Guard.

Department of the Secretary of State, subscription of $1 paid through accountant of Contingencies, Finance Department. This department has no knowledge as to whom any cheque issued for such subscription was made payable.

Department of Naval Service, $17.20 paid by cheque to the order of the Coast Guard, dated July 29, 1912.

THREE RIVERS PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. BUREAU:

1. How many tenders have been received for the public building at Three Rivers?

2. What are the names of the tenderers and the amount of each tender?

Mr. ROGERS: As the contract has not yet been awarded, it is not advisable to make public such information.

THE DREDGE CAPE BRETON.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. At what places did the dredge Cape Breton operate during the season 1910 and 1911, respectively?

2. Who was the master of the dredge during this period?

3. What quantity of dredgible material was removed by the said dredge each season, and how much at the different places where she worked?

4. How long did she work at each place?

5. What did the removal of the dredgible material cost per yard at the different places where the said dredge operated during the said two seasons?

6. What are the names of the tugs, and names of the owners, that have tended said dredge during the two seasons mentioned?

7. What tugs were engaged in towing said dredge from one place to another during the seasons above mentioned, and what did each towing cost per mile each season?

8. What is the date of building, name, dimensions and horse-power of each tug engaged in tending on the dredge Cape Breton during the above season and during the year 1912 up to date?

9. What was the total cost per month during the seasons of 1910 and 1911 of tug boat attendance upon said dredge?

10. At what places did the dredge Cape Breton operate during the seasons of 1912 up to the present date?

11. Who was the master of this dredge during the season 1912 up to the present date?

12. What quantity of dredge material was removed by said dredge during the current season of 1912 up to date, and how much at the different places at which she worked?

13. How long did she work at each place?

14. What did the removal of the dredgeable material cost per yard at the different places at which the said dredge worked during the current season of 1912?

15. What are names of the tug-boats and names of owners that attended said dredge during the season of 1912 up to the present date?

16. What tugs were engaged in towing said dredge from one place to another during the seasons above mentioned, and what did each towing cost per month?

17. What was the total cost per month during the season of 1912 for tug-boat attendance on dredge Cape Breton?

18. Did the dredge Cape Breton finish the work to be done by the Public Works Department at Little Bras d'Or, county of Cape Breton?

19. What was the depth of the channel at low tide at Little Bras d'Or before this work was commenced?

20. What is the depth of water now in said channel at low tide at the point where the proposed dredging is completed?

21. What will be the uniform width and depth of the channel at low tide when the work is fully completed?

22. If the said work is not completed yet, how much remains to be done and when will the work be completed?

Mr. ROGERS:

1, 3, 4, 10, 12, and 13. Season 1910:

Port Hood, May 2, to June 30, 19,324 cubic yards; Little Bras d'Or, July 1 to November 12, 67,600 cubic yards; total, 86,925 cubic yards.

Season 1911:

McKinnon's Harbour, May 26 to June 5, 11,050 cubic yards; St. Anns, June 19 to July 15, 17,500 cubic yards; South Gut wharf, St. Anns, July 17, 1,260 cubic yards; Englishtown wharf, St. Anns, July 18 to 19, 1,260 cubic yards; North River wharf, St. Anns, July 20 to 21, 1,800 cubic yards; Bar, St. Anns, July 22, 720 cubic yards; Little Bras d'Or, July 28 to September 11, 36,400 cubic yards; St. Anns, September 28 to November 27, 15,575 cubic yards; North Sydney, December 7 to January 24, 7,350 cubic yards; total, 92,915 cubic yards.

Season 1912:

North Sydney, May 2 to May 15, 400 cubic yards; Baddeck, May 27 to June 10, 9,100 cubic yards; Port Hawkesbury, June 17 to July 16, 13,800 cubic yards; Little Bras d'Or, July 30 to August 3, 1,600 cubic yards; Alder Point, August 5 to August 10, 5,100 cubic yards; North Sydney, August 28 to August 31, 3,100 cubic yards; Little Bras d'Or, September 9 to September 19, 8,400 cubic yards; Alder Point, October 4 to November 30, 35,300 cubic yards; total, 76,800 cubic yards.

2. Peter Decoste.

5 and 14. Season 1910:

Port Hood, 77 cents per cubic yard. Little Bras d'Or, 50.6 cents per cubic yard.

Season 1911:

McKinnon's Harbour, 27.4 cents per cubic yard; St. Anns, 38.7 cents per cubic yard; St. Anns, South Gut, 24.1 cents per cubic yard; St. Anns, Englishtown wharf, 48.2 cents per cubic yard; St. Anns, North River wharf, 33.7 cents per cubic yard; St. Anns, Bar, 42.1 cents per cubic yard; Little Bras d'Or, 31.4 cents per cubic yard; St. Anns, $1.00 per cubic yard; North Sydney, $1.65 per cubic yard.

Season 1912 :—

North Sydney, 45·25 cents per c. yd.; Port Hawkesbury, 38·65 cents per c. yd.; Baddeck, 23·95 cents per c. yd.; Little Bras d'Or, 35·25 cents per c. yd.; Alder Point, 25·85 cents per c. yd.

6 and 15. Season 1910 :—Tug Fairy, Joseph Fraser & Sons, owners; tug Iona, registered in name of David Rudderham; tug Minora, A. & R. Loggie, owners; tug Nelson, registered in name of A. P. McLennan; tug Merrimac, North Sydney Tow Boat Company, owners; tug W. H. Weatherspoon, H. McDonald, owner. Season 1911 :—Tug Fairy, Joseph Fraser & Sons, owners; tug Maggie M., North Sydney Tow Boat Company, owners; tug Merrimac, North Sydney Tow Boat Company, owners; tug D. H. Thomas, Dominion Coal Company, Limited, owners. Season 1912 :—Tug Boonton, registered in name of David Rudderham; tug Nelson, Angus Young, owner; tug E. N. Cates, James Kelly, owner; tug D. H. Thomas, Dominion Coal Company, Limited, owners; tug F. L. M. Paint, T. Howard Macdonald, M.D., owner. Tugs Cates and Boonton employed regularly under contract. Tugs Nelson, Thomas and Paint employed for special towing for 6, 2 and 2 days respectively.

7. Answered by 16.

8.

Tug.	Date Built.	Length.	Breadth.	Depth.	Registered Tons.	Horse-power.
Fairy	1881	37·1	11·2	5·3	9	8
Iona	1900	72·0	16·4	7·3	35	30
Minora	1904	95·0	20·6	9·5	81	45
Nelson	1885	78·4	14·7	7·0	44	21
Merrimac	1876	73·5	17·6	10·0	26	80
Boonton	1871	75·0	18·5	8·9	53	48
E. M. Cates	1869	73·0	18·5	7·9	46	23
D. H. Thomas	1892	116·5	21·0	13·0	98	57
F. L. H. Paint	1902	68·0	17·9	8·9	39	24
Maggie M	1888	68·3	16·3	8·7	45	30
Weatherspoon	1890	70·2	15·8	6·0	34	24

9 and 17.

Year.	April.	May.	June.	July.	August.	September.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
1910	540 00	1,755 00	2,498 00	1,971 50	3,006 00	2,560 00
1911-12	.....	2,050 00	2,680 00	2,610 00	2,720 00	2,750 00
1912-13	52 50	1,330 00	1,931 25	2,396 50	1,905 00	945 00
	October.	November.	December.	January.	February.	March.
1910	2,608 00	2,600 00	188 00	400 00	.....	.....
1911-12	2,750 00	2,382 00	2,516 00	2,907 00	.....	.....
1912-13	1,040 00	1,040 00	.....	.....	.....	.....

16.

Tug.	Season 1910—Places.	Total cost.	Cost Per mile.
		$ cts.	$ cts.
Merrimac	Mulgrave to Port Hood	292 00	10 06
Minoru	" "	400 00	13 79
Nelson	Port Hood to Little Bras d'Or	180 00	1 46
Minoru	St. Peter's to Little Bras d'Or	150 00	2 15
Weatherspoon	Alder Pt. to Sydney	30 00	1 42
	Season 1911.
Douglas H. Thomas	St. Ann's to North Sydney	100 00	2 50
	Season 1912.
Douglas H. Thomas	North Sydney to Baddeck	100 00	1 89
F. L. M. Paint	Baddeck to Hawkesbury	131 25	1 64

18. No.

19. 7 feet.

20. 20 feet.

21. 120 feet wide and 20 feet deep outside; 80 feet wide and 18 feet deep inside.

22. 49,840 cubic yards to be removed. Approximately 17 weeks' work after commencement.

Mr. ROGERS.

HALIFAX DOCKYARD PROPERTY.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

Did the Government negotiate with the British Admiralty during 1912 for the purchase, lease, use or occupation of the dockyard property at Halifax, N.S., for the purpose of the Intercolonial railway? If so, what was the result of such negotiations?

Mr. BORDEN: That property and other properties was vested in the Government of Canada by an Order in Council of the Imperial Government some years ago. These properties were vested for certain purposes only and this particular property for the purpose of its continuance as a dockyard. It can only be used for other purposes upon certain conditions which are set out in the Order in Council. The subject of applying this property to another purpose was informally discussed during the past summer, but without any result up to the present time.

FREDERICTON MILITARY GROUNDS.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. Was the fence around the military grounds at Fredericton, N.B., built or repaired during the year 1912?
2. If so, was the work done by contract or by day labour?
3. What is the total cost of same?
4. Who was the inspector of said work?
5. What amount has been paid him to date and what is the total amount claimed?

Mr. HUGHES:

1. Yes. Stone and iron fence now under construction.
2. Part contract, part day labour.
3. Estimated cost, $7,085.85.
4. Lieutenant Russell, R.C.E.
5. Nothing except his regimental pay.

INDIANS—SHELBURNE COUNTY.

Mr. LAW:

1. What persons has the Department of the Interior authorized the Indian agent in Shelburne county, Nova Scotia, to employ to supply medical attendance to Indians in Shelburne county?
2. What remuneration do they or each receive?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Drs. J. D. Densmore and L. O. Fuller are authorized by the Department of Indian Affairs to attend Indians of Shelburne county; and the Indian agent has authority to employ Dr. Burns in an urgent case when Dr. Fuller is absent from home.
2. Fifty cents one way for the distance travelled in visiting patients, also cost of medicine.

DISMISSAL AT JOLIETTE ARSENAL.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has Mr. Joseph Lavoie, keeper of the arsenal at Joliette, been dismissed? If so, for what reason?
2. Who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been appointed in his place, and who recommended this appointment?
4. Was there an inquiry held?
5. What is the salary of Mr. Joseph Lavoie?
6. What is the salary of his successor?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax)

Mr. HUGHES:

1. Yes. Active political partisanship in the last federal elections.
2. Minister assumes responsibility.
3. Mr. Félix Misael Trudeau.
4. No.
5. $1.50 per diem, without quarters, fuel and light.
6. 1.50 per diem, without quarters, fuel and light.

ST. PETERS HARBOUR.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals received any protest from the harbour master or other residents of St. Peters against the contractor in charge of the St. Peters canal improvement, using the harbour for a dumping ground?
2. Has any communication on the subject been received from the resident engineer? If so, has any action been taken thereon?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. No.
2. On May 15, the resident engineer in reporting on this work drew attention to the possibility of the material being dumped into the bay, being washed around the canal entrance. He was instructed to establish permanent reference works and closely watch the action of the tides on the material. The resulting information has shown that the silting is so slight as to be hard to determine. On December 9, the resident engineer reported that storms were damaging the toe of the dump slope and recommended that dumping at this point be temporarily discontinued, until such time as the contractor would be excavating rock; the clay now being excavated, to be deposited along the shore some distance east of the present dump.

TUBERCULOSIS.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the Department of Agriculture or the Minister of Agriculture, observed the following despatch which appeared in the Evening Citizen of Saturday, 14th December, 1912?

Berlin Physician conquering Tuberculosis—Uses serum which he gets from Turtles—Treatment is to be sent all over the World—Dr. Frederick Friedmann is World's expert in White Plague Treatment—A Remarkable Feat.

Special Correspondence, by William G. Shepherd.

Berlin, December 14.—The Christmas gift of science to the world is a cure for tuberculosis

Dr. Frederick Franz Friedmann, of Berlin, is the donor.

Two weeks ago Friedmann astounded German physicians by declaring in a public conference that he had been successfully treating tuberculosis for the past two years and that he has now nearly six hundred cured cases to display to scientists.

He exhibited a considerable number of cured patients to the conference.

Many of the most scientific Germans admit Friedmann has discovered the long sought cure.

Several hospitals in Germany are now turning their tuberculosis cases over to him.

Scientists from America, Australia, England and other centres of the earth are hurrying to Berlin to investigate.

Appeals for the treatment by letter and telegram overwhelm the young doctor.

I spent ten hours in three visits with Dr. Friedmann. He showed me actual cases of cures. It was impossible for me to doubt.

2. If so, does the minister intend to become acquainted with the new method of curing consumption, by sending experts to Berlin to consult with Dr. Friedmann, to study the results of his treatment and provide the means by which our country may profit by the incalculable advantages of a possible discovery to check and even cause to disappear this terrible malady, which decimates our population?

Mr. BURRELL :

1. No. The despatch above referred to does not appear in the Evening Citizen of date the 14th December, 1912.

2. The Director General of Public Health has reported as follows with regard to the despatch above referred to:—

'The last information which has reached me in connection with this is the report of an address delivered by Dr. Friedmann before the Berlin Medical Society on November 6, in which he claims favourable results in numerous patients. His address was followed by a discussion, in which several speakers took part. Some said that they had seen good results in children with bone and joint tuberculosis; others spoke with some reserve; while some observers thought that the use of this method of treatment not free from danger. One speaker, Professor Goldscheider, complained that the description of the present conditions in the patients treated, especially of those with pulmonary tuberculosis, was not enough; at least, the results of the inoculation were doubtful; and Prof. Orth called attention to the fact that although guinea pigs treated lived longer, yet they all finally died of tuberculosis. One speaker challenged Friedmann to tell what his inoculation material actually is, but Friedmann, so far as we can learn, has not yet done so.

'I may say in general terms that the profession hesitates to accept any treatment with any material the nature of which is not published to the profession, and as a rule awaits the confirmation of the original discoverer's results by their being checked by the results of other observers in their use of the material during a somewhat extended time, and it is only as a rule after results have been so confirmed that they are accepted by the profession.

'A special Canadian expert sent to Berlin at this time to watch the treatment of the cases could not, therefore, obtain any material to experiment with himself; and it is a question whether the advantages of watching the treatment personally in the hands of Dr. Friedmann alone would so greatly outweigh the information to be gained by reading his literature, and the remarks of other members of the Berlin Medical Society, as to make it very desirable that a special Canadian expert be sent at this stage of the proceedings.'

The Department of Agriculture does not intend, at present, to send experts to Berlin to study the results of Dr. Friedmann's treatment or to consult with him.

SERVICE OF C. S. LANE.

Mr. LAW:

1. How much has been paid by the Government, or any department thereof, up to December 18, 1912, to Mr. C. S. Lane for services and expenses in connection with investigations into complaints or charges against officials?

2. If any accounts of Mr. Lane for remuneration or expenses have been rendered and not paid, what is the amount of the same?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Department of Customs, $7.50; Department of Marine and Fisheries, $235.28; Post Office Department, $491.20; Department of Public Works—services, $63.75; constable's account, $10.75; stenographer, $31.50; total, $106; Railways and Canals, $442.50; grand total, $1,282.48.

2. Post Office Department. $221.20.

COLD STORAGE WAREHOUSES.

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. What was the amount paid in subsidies to the different cold storage warehouses during the year 1912?

2. What are the names and the places of operation of these warehouses to which these subsidies have been paid?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. $148,448.04.

2. Trenton Cooperage Mills, Ltd., Trenton, Ont., $3,564,21; New Brunswick Cold Storage Co., St. John, N.B., $3,340; The Cold Storage, Ltd., Woodstock, N.B., $511.54; Campbell & Hamilton, Calgary, Alta., $12,300; St. Lawrence Produce Co., Brockville, Ont., $11,440; Dominion Fish & Fruit Co., Quebec, P.Q., $24,512.74; Gunns Limited, Harriston, Ont., $8,553; The B. Wilson Co., Ltd., Victoria, B.C., $3,040; Flavelles Limited, Lindsay, Ont., $11,660; Chatham Fruit Growers Association, Chatham, Ont., $1,731; Lockport Cold Storage Co., Ltd., Lockport, N.S., $6,507.04; O'Keefe & Drew Abattoir Co., Ltd., Chatham, Ont.,

$6,000; J. D. Moore Co., Ltd., St. Marys, Ont., $1,440.78; W. Scott & Co., Ltd., Peterborough, Ont., $290; Lemon Bros., Owen Sound, Ont., $400; Davis & Fraser, Charlottetown, P.E.I., $2,000; Halifax Cold Storage Co., Ltd., Hawkesbury, N.S., $607.73; Brantford Cold Storage Co., Ltd., Brantford, Ont., $3,300; Canadian Fish & Cold Storage Co., Ltd., Prince Rupert, B.C., $45,000; The Whyte Packing Co., Ltd., Mitchell, Ont., $2,250. Total, $148,448.04.

RIVER ST. LAWRENCE DAM.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is the Minister of Public Works aware of the following article which appears in the Canadian Mail, of London, England, of the 7th December, ultimo:—

Two New Power Schemes—Vast Undertakings —Plans to Dam River St. Lawrence.

The Canadian Government are now considering two big power schemes which have been formulated, both with the object of damming the River St. Lawrence at two points between Montreal and Prescott. The schemes in question, both backed by powerful financial interests, are that of the Long Sault Development Company, promoted by the Aluminum Company of America, and that of the Eastern Canada Power Company, which is supported by Sir Max Aitken and Mr. D. Lorne McGibbon, together with other prominent capitalists in Canada, England, and the United States.

The proposal in regard to the Long Sault Development Company is to dam the river above the Long Sault rapids from the American to the Canadian side, with the idea of developing from 600,000 to 800,000 h.p. of electrical energy. The Eastern Canada Company's scheme is on an even more gigantic scale. If the plans are carried out it is expected that about 1,000,000 h.p. of electrical energy will be obtained. In order to appreciate the magnitude of this proposal some geographical knowledge of the district is necessary. It is proposed to raise the level of the river in the vicinity of Coteau, Cedar, Split Rock, and Cascade rapids to the level of the water in Lake St. Francis. This practically means damming the river from Cascade point to the Cornwall canal, and the retaining dams would connect various islands down the river for a distance of some fourteen miles. The intervening rapids would be obliterated and a portion of the Soulanges canal would be flooded.

Both schemes involve the development of power far outrivalling that of the Niagara Falls, and would completely alter the industrial conditions of Montreal and the eastern portion of Canada. They would also change the whole system of navigation from Prescott to Montreal.

2. What truth is there in the above article?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No.

2. The Canadian Government is not now considering any such schemes as no application has been received lately by the Department of Public Works from either of these companies.

Mr. BURRELL.

CAP DE LA MADELEINE WHARF.

Mr. BUREAU :

1. Were any repair works done at the wharf at Cap de la Madeleine during the year 1912?

2. If so, by whom were they made, and who had the overseeing of the works?

3. Who recommended the overseer of these works?

4. Who determined the price to be paid to the men employed on these works, and who had the choice of the men?

5. What wages were paid to the men employed on these works, the wages paid to the day labourers and to the teamsters respectively?

6. What is the total amount expended for executing these repair works?

Mr. ROGERS :

1. Yes.

2. (a) Mr. District Engineer, F. X. T. Berlinguet. (b) L. H. Loranger.

3. Appointed by the district engineer.

4. The district engineer.

5. From $3.50 per day for master carpenter to $1.50 per day for common labourers. Teamsters were paid $3.50 per day to $2.50.

6. $1,071.42.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EMPLOYMENT OF CHAS. PATTERSON.

Mr. MACDONALD :

1. Is there a regulation in force on the Intercolonial railway that persons suffering from physical defect are not eligible for employment?

2. If so, was this rule applied in the case of Charles Patterson, employed as car checker at Westville in the county of Pictou?

3. Has Charles Patterson been appointed permanently as car checker at Westville?

Mr. COCHRANE :

1. There is no regulation in force on the Intercolonial railway to the effect that persons suffering from physical defect are not eligible for employment, but Section 15 of the Provident Fund Act provides that all employees must pass a medical examination in order to qualify as members of the provident fund.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. On April 11, 1912, instructions were issued that Mr. Charles R. Patterson should be employed as car checker at Westville, provided he was found to be a suitable man for the position and capable of complying with requirements regarding employees. On April 29, 1912, Superintendent Campbell reported that while Mr. Patterson had a defective hand he was competent for the work of car checking or most any other kind of clerical work. The agreement in effect with the Canadian Brotherhood of Railroad Employees, which covers car checkers and certain other classes of employees, provides that a person who works ten months or more during any one year will be considered as a permanent employee for the purposes of that schedule.

ISAAC KENNEDY—CLAIM.

*Mr. LEMIEUX :

1. Has the Minister of Public Works received any claim from Isaac Kennedy, Douglastown, Quebec, resulting from an accident while at work on one of the Government works?
2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to investigate this matter and settle it?

Mr. ROGERS :

1. Yes.
2. The district engineer has been instructed to investigate and report.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What was the gross amount on deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank Department at the close of each year from 1907, including 1912?
2. What was the number of branches of the Post Office Savings Bank Department in operation at the close of each year mentioned in paragraph 1?

Mr. PELLETIER:

Date.	Amount.	Number of Offices.
March 31, 1907	$47,452,957.75	1,043
" 1908	47,564,284.28	1,084
" 1909	45,190,484.21	1,102
" 1910	43,586,357.42	1,133
" 1911	43,330,579.19	1,151
" 1912	43,563,764.33	1,172

SHIPPING AT CANADIAN PORTS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many registered tons of shipping entered and cleared from Canadian ports excluding the coasting tonnage, for the year ending March 31, 1912?
2. How much of the tonnage referred to in question was Canadian registered tonnage, how much British and how much foreign?

Mr. REID:

1. 52,973,127 tons.
2. Canadian, 18,069,983 tons; British, 13,342,929 tons; foreign, 21,560,215 tons.

CANADIAN COASTING TRADE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Has any change or changes been made since October 11, 1911, in the regulations by which foreign ships are permitted to engage in the Canadian coasting trade? If so, what are the changes?

Mr. REID: No.

OCEAN FREIGHT.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many tons of ocean-going freight was carried to and from Canadian seaports for the year ending March 31, 1912?
2. What percentage of freight referred to in question 1 was carried in Canadian bottoms, what percentage in British, and what percentage in foreign bottoms?

Mr. REID:

1. 7,324,126 tons weight; 1,813,208 tons measurement.
2. Canadian 10.5 per cent of tons weight; 12.7 per cent of tons measurement; British 56 per cent of tons weight; 56.2 per cent of tons measurement; foreign 33.5 per cent of tons weight; 31.1 per cent of tons measurement.

PRINCE RUPERT MARINE DEPOT.

*Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Were tenders called for the construction of a marine depot at Prince Rupert?
2. If so, what were the amounts of the tenders respectively?
3. Was the lowest accepted?
4. Who obtained the contract and what was the amount?
5. Has the contract been completed?
6. Has any amount been claimed by the contractor for extras or in addition to the contract price? If so, what was the amount?
7. Has the Government paid anything in excess of the contract price, or does it intend to pay such addition?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. Pacific Coast Construction Company, Limited, Victoria, B.C., $159,445; Wm. Henry Russell Humber, Victoria, B.C., $159,500; Wm. Geo. Gillett, Vancouver, B.C., $218,794; Northern Construction Company, Prince Rupert, B.C., $275,000.
3. Yes.
4. The Pacific Coast Construction Company, Limited, $159,445.
5. Yes.
6. Yes. $13,020.
7. Yes, the Government has paid $10,261 for extras in connection with this contract.

NAVAL SCHOONER ADVOCATE.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. What was the date of the purchase by the Government of the naval schooner Advocate?
2. Was it purchased before or after the Government had decided to abandon the Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada, assented to 4th May, 1910?
3. When was it put into commission?
4. Has it been fitted out for practical instruction of cadets in seamanship under the law of the 4th May, 1910, or on account of any urgency of naval defence of Canada?
5. From whom was it purchased?
6. How much did the Government pay for it?
