PRESENTATION OF RETURNS.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to draw the attention of the Government to a matter of some importance. A great number of motions for returns have been made during the session so far, and for my part I find it very difficult to follow whether or not returns have been made in response to the several motions. I do not know whether other hon. gentlemen have met with the same difficulty. I wish to ask the Government if it would be objectionable on their part to present to the House shortly, say at the end of this month, or perhaps periodically, a tabulated statement detailing the motions for returns of papers and setting forth which of them have been brought down up to date. I think it would be a matter of great convenience to members if this could be done without very much trouble to the Government.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think that the Government could very well undertake any work of that kind. When I was sitting on the other side of the House, I suffered to some extent from the embarrassment which my hon. friend is experiencing in regard to the bringing down of returns. I used to arrange with the Clerk of the House to have such a statement prepared from time to time, and I think my hon. friend would have no difficulty in carrying out the same arrangement. I should be glad to facilitate the matter in any way within my power.

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. EMMERSON: Would it not be possible to have a notice sent to each member when a return has been made in response to a motion that has been presented by that member?

Mr. BORDEN: At one time the practice did obtain of having the answers handed in in duplicate so that a copy might be sent to the member. That could be carried out if desirable, or an arrangement could be made with the Clerk of the Records, if he is the proper person, to send a notice to the member who had moved for the return that it had been brought down. The Clerk informs me that the latter course is being pursued at the present time. I was not aware of it.

Mr. EMMERSON: It would be preferable to have a duplicate of the return, and it would not add to the cost of preparing it.

Mr. BORDEN: I think there has been no precedent in regard to bringing down returns in duplicate. However, I will take into consideration the suggestion of my hon. friend.

BRITISH EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. JAMES J. DONNELLY (South Bruce). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Government, and particularly of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) to a dispatch in this morning's issue of the Ottawa Citizen, as follows:

London, January 15.—Hon. Mr. Runciman informed Captain Compbell in the House of Commons yesterday that the Government did not contemplate the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle. During the past two years, he said, glanders, sheepscab, rabies and tuberculosis had existed among Canadian stock.

Captain Murray to obviate the difficulty suggested the purchase of a small island on the west coast of Scotland to be utilized as a Canadian quarantine station but no reply was given.

This is a question of very considerable importance to stock breeders of Canada. This embargo on Canadian cattle, I have good reason to believe, has been enforced in the past, not for the purpose of protecting British cattle from the disease, but for the purpose of protecting British cattle raisers from competition in the British market. I have no desire to object to any government giving a fair measure of protection to its own people, but I do object to that protection being given at the expense of the good name of our Canadian cattle. I would ask if it is the intention of the Government to take action to establish the fact that our cattle are free from disease at the present time.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): I noticed the dispatch to which the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Donnelly) has directed the attention of the Government. Also, we received a cable from the High Commissioner's office to-day informing us that Mr. Runciman, in answering a question in the British House of Commons as to whether they intended to remove the embargo on Canadian cattle, stated that they did not contemplate any legislation of that kind. My hon. friend, I am sure, is familiar with the facts, but I may say to the House that it was in 1892 that the British Government, or the Board of Agriculture rather, owing to an alleged case of pleuro-pneumonia found in a shipment of 750 head of Canadian cattle, put into force this regulation. They could not prove their case, and, notwithstanding that 3,000,000 head of Canadian cattle have been slaughtered in Great Britain, not a single case of pleuro-pneumonia has been found. Still, they maintained the policy, and, in 1896, crystallized it in legislation. As my hon. friend and others interested know, from that time until the present continual representations have been made to the British Government that there were no grounds sufficient to justify their establishing this embargo on Canadian cattle. I need not go over the whole series of negotiations. It became evident that the British Government were determined to adhere to what had become a settled policy. In 1907, I think it was, Lord Elgin transmitted to Lord Grey, then Governor General of Canada, a letter from the Board of Agriculture in which were set forth the reasons why they maintained this policy. The effect of it was that they did not do it in order to prohibit or restrict trade, but purely on account of the enormous open border line between us and the country to the south; that it was not a stigma upon Canadian cattle, but was a sanitary measure to prevent the introduction of the disease and so was necessary in the interest of British agriculturists. The question was left there, because it was evidently not consistent with the self-respect of Canada that we should go on beseeching in this manner a government that was evidently determined not to open the question again. I desire to say just a word with regard to what Mr. Runciman stated as to diseases like glanders, rabies, sheep-scab and tuberculosis existing in this country,—the implication in the press despatch, I suppose, being that therefore they were justified in an exclusion measure of this kind. In that connection, I would only say that it cannot be contended that glanders does not exist in Great Britain. So far as this country is concerned, we have practically wiped it out in Eastern Canada and we are doing what we can—and I think with some measure of success—to control it in Western Canada. As to rabies, that is a pest that they can keep out, as, owing to their insular position they can isolate the cases. We have only a very few cases,—but one during the past year, I think. As to sheep-scab, that is practically non-existent in Canada at the present time. As to bovine tuberculosis, it cannot be contended by the British authorities that their country is in any better position than ours in regard to this disease. And I think that this Government will be able to show soon that we are moving against that disease more rapidly than they. As to other diseases, like anthrax——

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burrell) is extending the discussion beyond what is allowed under the rule.

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. Speaker, I have nearly finished. I referred at first to the diseases to which the paper referred. But there are diseases of which we have not any in Canada, while they have them in Great Britain. And, while I am referring to this question, let me point out that foot and mouth disease is prevalent in Great Britain and exists in several counties, and we have never had a case in Canada. In conclusion, I can only say to my hon. friend and to the House, that I do not think that any good could result from opening up this question with the British authorities. We are all agreed that they are not justified by the facts or conditions in Canada in keeping on that embargo. Whether they are justified in their protection or not is a question that I would not care to discuss here. But I think we would not move in the matter again.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC THREE PER CENT BONDS.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize and empower the Governor in Council to purchase at par from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company such of the three per cent bonds of the company the issue and sale of which is provided for by chapter 98 of the Statutes of 1905, and the deed of trust set forth in schedule A to said chapter 98, as may be unsold at the time of the passing of an Act that may be founded on this resolution.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee, Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.

Mr. WHITE: The proposals of the Government embodied in this resolution arise out of a judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which I brought to the attention of the House last session. It is, I think, within the knowledge of the House that by two agreements, dated respectively 1903 and 1904, between the Government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, the Government undertook to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company issued in respect of its western division to an amount not exceeding $13,000 per mile upon the prairie section, and not exceeding three-fourths of the cost of construction of the mountain section. In pursuance of these agreements, and of the legislation validating them, a trust mortgage was entered into by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, covering bonds so to be issued and guaranteed. The total amount of that authorized issue was limited under the terms of the mortgage to £14,000,000, and there were provisions in the mortgage whereby the bonds should be sold from time to time, and their proceeds deposited, as is usual in such cases, to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada, to be paid out upon the issue of certificates showing the progress of construction of the railway from time to time. I may say that those bonds were fifty-year bonds, maturing in 1962. They bear interest at the rate of three per cent, and are guaranteed absolutely, as to principal and interest, by the Dominion of Canada. Under the terms of the statute validating the agreement of 1904, it is provided that those bonds may be sold from time to time, with the consent of the Receiver General of Canada and of the Governor in Council.

I may explain that in 1903, at the time the first agreement was entered into, it was thought that the three per cent bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, would sell at about par. By the year 1904 it became apparent that that expectation would not be realized, and in the agreement of that year there was inserted a clause—commonly known as the 'implementing clause'—whereby the Government agreed to implement its guarantee to the extent of the difference between the selling value of the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds and par. That is to say, if the bonds should sell at less than par, the Government would implement its guarantee to produce par, the intention evidently being that the par value of the bonds should be available for the purposes of the construction work of the railway company. A dispute arose between the Government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company as to the interpretation of that clause, the Government contending that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company should issue additional bonds to be guaranteed by the Government, so that the Government's liability would be secondary and not primary, and that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company should be liable, as makers of the bonds, for the amount required to implement, so as to realize the par value of the bonds sold at less than par. The railway company, on the contrary, contended that the Government should make good the amount of difference in cash. The Supreme Court of Canada held in favour of the contention of the Government, but, on appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, this decision was reversed, and as a consequence the Government of Canada is to-day responsible to pay in cash the amount of difference between the selling value of the bonds to which I refer, and par.

The issues already made are as follows: In 1905, £3,200,000, par value of the bonds were sold at 92½ net. In 1909, £2,000,000 sold at 80 net; in 1910, £2,000,000 sold at £80 3s. 9d. net. The amount required to make up the difference between the selling value of those bonds and par was $4,994,000, and, under the authority of an Act which was passed by this Parliament last session, the Government paid in the sum of $4,994,000 to the credit of the Receiver General, to be dealt with in the same way as the proceeds of the bonds are dealt with under the provisions of the mortgage; that is to say, to be applied in payments to the railway company from time to time as the work of construction progresses.

There now remains to be sold £6,800,000 of bonds. I have explained to the House that the amount of the mortgage was limited to £14,000,000, if so much should be required. There remains, as I have stated, this £6,800,000, the par value of bonds still to be issued under the terms of the mortgage. As there appears to have been considerable misapprehension on the part of some of the newspapers as to what the Government proposes to do, I may say that it is not the intention of the Government to go on the market and purchase these bonds which have been issued, but it is the intention of the Government from time to time to purchase from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, at par, the balance of the bonds. With regard to the bonds which have already been issued, and with regard to the bonds which are still to be sold, the House will understand that the Government has already paid out $4,994,000 for which it has nothing whatever to show, and if the remaining £6,800,000 of bonds were sold at the prevailing prices, the Government would have to pay about $8,000,000 more in implementing; that is to say, a total of about $13,000,000 would have to be paid by the Government by virtue of this judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The way that calculation is made is this: the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds are quoted on the London Stock Exchange to-day at about 78 or 79. When an issue of bonds of any large amount is being made, it usually has to be offered to the public at a point or two below the prevailing market, because of the amount that is offered. Taking into account the commission, underwriting expenses, and other outlays in connection with the selling of bonds, about 2 per cent should be further deducted. The result is that the Grand Trunk Pacific 3 per cent bonds, guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, as to principal and interest, would realize, at the prevailing prices, only about 75 net; that is to say, the Government would have to implement to the extent of 25 points on each bond, and that, as I say, upon the remaining bonds which are to be issued, would amount to over $8,000,000. Now, if the Government paid out the $8,000,000, of course the Dominion would have nothing to show for it, although the £6,800,000 bonds would be in the hands of the public who would purchase them at the price I have mentioned, let us say 76 or 78. I propose, therefore, to endeavour to save at least something from the situation, and fortunately, by reason of the buoyant revenues of the country this year, I am in a position to do so without injuring or straining in any way the credit of the Dominion. It would be unfair for me to tell the House that we can save over $8,000,000 for the reason that the Dominion has to pay on long date loans more than 3 per cent. In other words, if we go on the market and borrow the money we would issue our standard security, that is, a 3½ per cent security. Therefore it would not be proper to say that we are saving $8,000,000. But there is this fact to which I drew the attention of the House last year that an obligation, which is a direct obligation either on the Dominion or of a company, always sells at a higher price than an obligation that is guaranteed by the Dominion or by a company. In the case of these bonds the security is precisely as good as the Dominion 3½ per cent security for the reason that the guarantee is absolute both as to principal and interest, but by reason of the fact that a guaranteed bond never sells as well as a bond which is a direct liability, and by reason further of the fact that trustees are not allowed in Great Britain to invest in debentures or bonds guaranteed by the Dominion, but are allowed to invest in bonds which are a direct liability of the Dominion, there is a difference in selling value of about say six or eight points or about seven points. That is to say, if you take the price at which the guaranteed bonds to which I am referring are selling on the London market, and take the price at which the Dominion bonds are selling and put the Dominion bonds on the same basis, and make them mature in 1962, that would institute a fair comparison between the direct obligation of the Dominion and these guarantee bonds. That is to say, it is 3½ per cent debenture stock and on those guaranteed bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway you have a difference of a little over six points in favour of the Dominion. That is to say, if the Dominion went on the market and borrowed, it would save six points upon the amount which it is required to implement in respect to these £6,800,000 bonds. Now, that would amount to something over $2,000,000; but I expect to have a considerable amount of money on hand at the end of this year which will be available for the purpose of purchasing at par a large amount of those bonds and the balance of payments will be spread over the next few years. Therefore, in so far as the Dominion has on its hands money for which it has not an immediate investment, we will have the 3 per cent securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific guaranteed absolutely as to principal and interest by the Dominion, and even if we were obliged to borrow to make good the whole amount which we are required to implement in respect to the issue of bonds it would result in something over $2,000,000 of advantage to the Dominion Government. I may say that the Grand Trunk Pacific guaranteed bonds sell on a basis of 4.05 per cent and the Dominion direct obligation debentures upon a 3¾ per cent basis.

There is another consideration that I think should not be lost sight of in addition to what we save in respect to the implementing. There is the further fact that it is inadvisable, at least that is my judgment, that the guaranteed bonds of the Dominion should sell as low as 76 or 77 on an issue. Once you get away from the interest rate that is standard so far as the Dominion is concerned the quotation is frequently misunderstood, and it looks as if the Dominion securities were selling at 76 or 77, which is not the fact. The public might draw the conclusion that these guaranteed securities of the Dominion are not the undoubted securities that they are. Of course anyone who understands the situation would know that they are on a parity with the other guaranteed securities of the Dominion. The explanation I have given will, I hope, be sufficiently full for the present purpose.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM: The Bill introduced by my hon. friend of necessity requires a good deal of technical explanation and to the members of the House who have not had some previous knowledge of the situation it may be a trifle difficult to follow. For my own part, I may say that the explanation of the Minister of Finance is very clear and exactly to the point, and it states the circumstances as fairly as they could possibly be stated. His remarks concerning the undisputed fact that an indirect security if I may call it such, does not bring as high a price as a direct security, are borne out by the business transactions of every day, particularly where governments are concerned. The members from Ontario will remember that in the construction of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway it was at first designed that the money should be secured by a guarantee of bonds for the road by a certain method which I will not detain the House to describe. It was not long before the treasurer of the province discovered that he could not realize on a security of that kind as good a price as he could on the direct security of the province of Ontario itself. Consequently that method was abandoned, and the province borrowed directly, and dealt with it in a direct manner, thus making a better bargain than it could possibly have made by bonds issued by other parties and secured by the province. I suppose there is a reason for these things which financiers understand, although it is difficult for an ordinary person like myself to understand why a bond secured by the Dominion of Canada should not bring as good a price as one issued directly by the Dominion. But it is the case nevertheless. The reason is, I suppose, that the Dominion becomes the secondary security instead of the first, and thus makes the collection of the amount due somewhat of a more far-reaching transaction, a little more hazardous perhaps, although I should hardly say that, than it would be if there was a direct obligation. Under the arrangement made between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the late Government, as my hon. friend would discover, there was what is known in the second agreement as an implementing clause which provided briefly that the Grand Trunk Pacific for the purposes of construction should realize par on its bonds. The late Minister of Finance argued that it did not mean that the Dominion of Canada should implement with cash the difference between the selling price and par, but that the Dominion should guarantee further securities in order to allow that deficiency to be made up. The Supreme Court upheld that view; on appeal the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council reversed the decision, and in view of that decision the present Government, acting through the Minister of Finance, has taken the very wise step I think that that hon. gentleman has announced to the House today of the Government purchasing the securities themselves at par instead of allowing them to be sold at much less than par and implementing the difference by cash. Speaking for myself, in view of the decision of the Privy Council, I think the step is a wise one, in the interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific and in the interest of Canada; in addition to which there is this secondary reason that above all we must maintain our credit as a country in the money markets of the world. We cannot afford to see the bonds guaranteed by Canada selling at the price that they would sell at under the present circumstances. As far as I am concerned and knowing the history of the situation, I fully agree with the measure brought before the House by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): There is another question that arises out of this proposition and it is this: Why should not the courts of Canada be the final interpreters of legislation passed in this country dealing absolutely with Canadian questions? This question also comes up in connection with the legislation of the province of Ontario which has sole jurisdiction in municipal affairs. We are passing laws in Ontario dealing with municipal questions, largely settled by the best judgment of our provincial legislatures. These laws are upheld by the provincial courts and by the Supreme Court of Canada and yet they are subject to transference to England and to submission to the judicial committee of the Privy Council there. Almost invariably its decisions are against the Canadian authorities, against the intentions of the legislature and, as in this case, against the intention of parliament when it passed the original Grand Trunk Pacific contract. I think it is time that we ought to consider this question from this point of view. I can conceive that it might, in a way, injure the credit of Canada if the final interpretation of Canadian legislation on purely local matters should be in the hands of our own courts. But, it is a matter well worthy of the consideration of this House and of the legislatures of this country whether we should not limit to the higher courts in Canada appeals in connection with the interpretation of our own legislation. If that were the case a very serious issue as to what are the municipal rights of Ontario and what are the rights of municipalities as against private corporations receiving franchises and other things from the provincial authorities would be referred to the provincial or Canadian courts. I take this occasion to say that the matter is worthy of the most careful attention on the part of this parliament and of the legislatures as to whether we should not limit the interpretation to our own courts.

There is another question that I would like to ask the Government in connection with this proposition and I suppose it is in order. I would like to ask whether the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company have asked for any additional financial assistance and, inasmuch as we are passing this legislation, whether any arrangement has yet been made, or whether any negotions had taken place, between the Government and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway for taking over any portion of the National Transcontinental railway and running it as it was understood it would be run under the original agreement.

Mr. LEMIEUX : I do not wish to discuss the resolution brought forward by the hon. Minister of Finance. I share the views which have been expressed by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). But my ear was caught by the remarks which were made by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). There is a true ring of Canadianism in his remarks, although I am afraid he may be taken to task when he returns to his electors should he undertake to express the same views in that section of the country. Speaking seriously, about the relations of our courts with the Privy Council I must say that in Quebec we are perfectly satisfied with the appeals which are taken to the highest court in the Empire—that is to say the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. We have limited, it is true, to a certain class, appeals to that high tribunal, but the people of our province are perfectly satisfied with the judgments that have been rendered by that high court of justice. But, I am bound to say that there are people who are not satisfied with that court, and I know, for instance, that the right hon. gentleman who has been considered as the guardian angel of Canada in Imperial politics, Mr. Chamberlain, has made several assaults on that tribunal. At the conferences in 1897 and 1902 he suggested an Imperial Court of Appeal to be constituted differently from the present judicial committee of the Privy Council, but fortunately the Prime Ministers of all the colonies who were representing their dominions at those conferences objected so strenuously that Mr. Chamberlain's plan failed. We must remember that Mr. Chamberlain refused also, on the floor of the Imperial Parliament, the request made by the authors or fathers of the Australian constitution. The Australians were opposed to any appeal except upon constitutional questions to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, and they succeeded in carrying their view. But Mr. Chamberlain opposed that very strenuously. Again I say that my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean), representing a constituency which is so much imbued with the ideas and principles of Mr. Chamberlain, will have something to explain to his electors. But, I commend his sound Canadianism. I am glad to hear such true notions of our country's rights coming from my hon. friend.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I did not rise for the purpose of making any extended remarks upon the resolution which has been explained by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. All the facts were put before the House last year by him in a very clear manner, and I think are well understood by the House now. I would hardly be inclined to agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) that in all cases the interpretation of statutes should be limited to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. But, I venture to remark that in cases with respect to transactions between companies or individuals and governments, where the facts of the agreement or agreements clearly point to a certain conclusion and where these facts have not been clearly set forth in the legislation covering the agreement, Parliament itself might make what was the understanding perfectly clear by amending legislation. In this particular case the issue between the Government and the company was whether the implementing between the selling price and par of the guaranteed stock should be done by an additional issue of stock or by a payment of cash on the part of the Government representing the difference between the selling price and the par value. When this matter was before the House last year, I was impressed with the idea that all the facts clearly pointed to an understanding between the Government and the company that the implementing was to be made by an additional issue of bonds. If I remember correctly the Minister of Finance stated last year that in an estimate presented on behalf of the company an additional estimate of cost was added to meet the expected depreciation in the price of the bonds which were to be sold. If that be the fact, it might have been strictly proper for Parliament before referring the points of difference to the courts, to have taken the matter in our own hands, and said by legislation that the implementing should have been in the form of an additional issue of bonds. However, the matter was considered last session and definite action taken in another way and I suppose it must now stand. I desire to concur in the action proposed by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Government. I think the course he intends to pursue is in every respect a business-like and proper one. This same course was suggested last year by the hon. member for Welland and the question arose whether or not it would be wise on the part of the Government to borrow money at three and a half per cent. in order to purchase the Grand Trunk Pacific three per cent bonds. I think the Minister of Finance took the position, and properly so, that that would be a very doubtful procedure. Of course, as matters stand at present, the Minister of Finance has at his control a large surplus this year, and I think he is doing what is quite proper in using that for the purpose he proposes. I would like to ask him if he does not consdier it advisable that the measure should contain a provision for enabling the Government to dispose of these bonds so purchased at any time they had reached a price which would justify the Government in realizing on them.

Mr. WHITE: In the Bill authority is given to the Government to borrow for the purpose of purchasing these bonds, if they should deem it advisable to do so. However, the Bill authorizes the Government to purchase the whole or any part of the issue. The Government has complete control. It is conceivable that a condition may arise, although I do not think it will, in which the Government may be willing that the Grand Trunk railway should sell a portion of the bonds under the terms of the mortgage. My present intention is that the Government shall purchase these bonds during the next couple of years. I am hopeful we will be able to do that without borrowing, but of course I cannot say that definitely. That is why I rather elaborated the point that it would pay the Government to issue its securities at three and a half per cent, and buy these in, because it would be advantageous to the extent of six or seven points. No doubt my hon. friend realizes that in so far as putting an issue on the market is concerned, all bonds guaranteed by the Dominion go on the market on the strength of the Dominion credit, and, therefore, unless under very unusual circumstances, there would not be much difference so far as market considerations are concerned, in issuing a Dominion three and a half per cent. security or in allowing the Grand Trunk Pacific to put on a three per cent bond as they have in the past. The point I make is that if we have idle money upon which we derive no interest, then we we can buy the bonds which yield three per cent. If, on the other hand, we deem it advisable to borrow the money, we will still make seven points in borrowing the money and purchase the securities. I understood my hon. friend from Halifax to suggest that it might have been expedient for Parliament to have put through an Act whereby the Grand Trunk Pacific would be compelled to issue securities guaranteed by the Government to an amount sufficient to implement. I do not know whether my hon. friend has considered the question from the standpoint of the credit of the Dominion. It must be remembered that the Dominion and the railway company submitted themselves to the Supreme Court and to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I agree with the hon. gentleman that would never have done after the matter had been submitted to the courts.

Mr. WHITE: After having submitted the case to the court and after the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, there was nothing else for the Dominion to do but to bring in a bill as I did authorizing the payment of the amount.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): My suggestion was as to before the judgment was rendered.

Mr WHITE: Yes, I understand that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to express a difference of opinion from that given by my hon. friend from Halifax. I think it would have been exceedingly improper for the Government to have asked Parliament to pass a law changing the rights of the Government and the company respectively. It would have been an exceedingly improper thing to do. The effect would have been that Parliament would say to the company: We intended to do so and so; we did not know what views you might have taken of the legislation, but our intention in passing the Act was to create certain obligations and rights; we have not made it so clear as that the court would decide in favour of the Crown and, therefore, we will ask Parliament to amend the law so as to make it absolutely clear that the contention of the Government should be sustained. That would be, in my judgment, entirely unjustifiable legislation. It would be ex post facto legislation; it would take away the vested rights of this company, and I cannot but think that the late Government did what was eminently proper when they decided to refer the matter to the courts. I do not think this Parliament had any more right to legislate with respect to the rights which were affected by that agreement before the matter was referred to the courts, then they would have to legislate after the decision had been made by the courts.

Mr. BORDEN: What my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has just stated is particularly applicable to what was a contract in the first instance. It is perfectly apparent I think that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company are thoroughly imbued with the view which eventually prevailed, even if the other party to the contract had an entirely different impression. I think my hon. friend from Halifax will see what an exceedingly dangerous precedent it would be for one of the parties to the contract, having the administration of affairs with a majority in Parliament, were to use that majority for the purpose of making its view prevail. Such a course of action would put an end to all confidence in the observance of contractual relations by the Government, and therefore I entirely agree that the late administration took a perfectly proper course in submitting this question to the courts for determination. My hon. friend from South York asked some questions.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): As to financial aid, and as to further negotiations in taking over the Transcontinental.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think those questions are exactly pertinent to this matter. So far as I am aware there no pending proposals for financial aid on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific. As far as the other matter is concerned, the operation of the line, two questions are involved: First, operation of such portions of the line as have been completed, pending the final completion of the whole line. The Minister of Railways and Canals has that under consideration. He is making certain arrangements, and I think they have been consummated, for operation by the Government of certain portions of the line, the Government and the company having failed to come to an interim agreement respecting the operation of those portions of the line by the company in the meantime. So far as the operation of the road after the completion of the whole line is concerned, my hon. friend from South York will no doubt remember that very full provision had been made in the contract and the Acts which were passed in 1903 and 1904 with regard to that. The period was fixed; the basis of the rental was fixed, and other provisions were made. That agreement cannot be entered into until the whole line has been completed.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARP (North Ontario): I just rise to ask the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) how he can reconcile his present position with the stand he took when the Canada Life Assurance Bill was before this House. As I understand it, that Bill was an interpretation of the statute that interfered with the policyholders of the Canada Life, notwithstanding that a writ had been issued to define the rights of the parties. The hon. member for St. John who was a member of the Government which supported that Bill, now says that he deems it highly improper for the Government to put any interpretation upon the Grand Trunk Pacific Act. I cannot understand how he takes the position he does to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not recall what were the provisions of the Bill relating to the Canada Life Assurance Company. I am sure I did not express any view which would not be in harmony with the view which I expressed a few minutes ago. I do not think this legislation is at all proper. There may have been circumstances in the Canada Life case which were out of the general rule; there are no circumstances in this case which would prevent the principle which I mentioned being acted upon, just as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister says it should be acted upon.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): In reply to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) I wish to say that we have gone to great expense in Canada in building up a supreme court, and its judgments are not carrying to-day in the eyes of the world that standing and reputation that to my mind they should carry and which Canadians expect them to carry. Too many of those decisions have been reversed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and it is a rather regrettable thing that the Supreme Court, which we have created at such great expense and to which we thought we might look for final decisions, has not become a court of final appeal so far as this country is concerned. I should like to see that court strengthened and stand before all the world as the final interpreter of Canadian law and Canadian rights. It is the duty of this Parliament, having established that court, to see that it be what it was intended to be, always reserving the right to appeal to the Judicial Committee in matters involving civil rights of individuals and the interpretation of the constitution. The Supreme Court ought to be built up, and should have the reputation of the Supreme Court of the United States. Its decisions should be final before all the world, and carry a respect for Canadian institutions in the same way as the United States Supreme Court carries a respect for United States institutions. My contention is that the final court of Canada, the Supreme Court, ought to be the interpreter, and the sole and last interpreter, of the legislation of this Parliament. I would go as far as to say that when this Parliament makes a formal agreement involving the credit of the country and the voting of millions of dollars for the creation of a National Transcontinental system, the national court ought to be the interpreter of the law in connection with it. We can build up a court here in Canada which will give a final decision, one that will carry respect. If it is to be carried on as it has been, those judgments will not carry the respect they should carry. In most important business matters, it is usually inserted in the contract what the court or body is to which the last appeal is to be made. If I happen to be in this House again and a contract of this nature is going through, I certainly would like to see a clause inserted in that contract setting out that the final appeal shall be in Canada. If municipalities or provinces enter into negotiations or make contracts with corporations of one kind or another, I tell them that they should set forth in the contract that the final legislation shall be the provincial court. There is no way in which we can guard our municipal, provincial and federal rights so much as in our own courts. I give every credit to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as being a court of the very highest character, and a court which would do absolute justice in so far as it might be able to do so; but I think an Imperial Court of last resort might be created with full representation in that court of all the dominions, instead of being made up as it now is almost exclusively of members of the courts of Great Britain. As a Canadian who wishes to see our institutions become Canadian and suitable to the wants of Canadians, I say it is time we considered this matter, and having established a Supreme Court that we should see that it is the final resort, and that it is of such a character that its judgments will carry respect all over the world. I think I voice the view of a good many Canadians, when I say that. My hon. friend refers to Mr. Chamberlain. It is true, he is Mr. Chamberlain; but I am Mr. Maclean, and I have a seat in this House, and I am a Canadian; and I assert the view —and it is my view, and perhaps it is not unacceptable to Canadians—that Canada is good enough by her own courts to interpret Canadian legislation and maintain Canadian rights, whether they be municipal, provincial or federal; but always reserving to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the interpreting of the Constitution; for the Constitution was made in England, and that is the proper place to interpret that constitution. If I properly estimate the development of public opinion in Canada, in a very short time, the Parliament of Canada will really be the maker of even our own constitution, while still maintaining the closest tie with the Old Land, Canada being under the Crown of England.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York).

Mr. EMMERSON: I am very heartily in accord with the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend from South York. I am glad that there is an hon. member of this House who has the courage to speak out in the manner in which he has spoken this afternoon. It is a rugged Canadianism, but it is true Canadianism. I think that the same view is held, very largely, if not completely, by many throughout this Dominion. And I am sure that if one takes the trouble to review the judgments that have been delivered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council dealing with Canadian affairs under conditions and amid an environment entirely foreign to this country and in an atmosphere different from that of Canada, he will soon understand that the Supreme Court of Canada is in a better position, in very many respects if not in all, to give a true interpretation of laws passed under the conditions which prevail in Canada. I wish only to express my hearty concurrence in the views which have been so ably stated by my hon. friend from South York.

Mr. THOBURN: Before this motion passes, I desire to refer to a point which has not been touched upon so far as I have learned. It is this. These bonds were issued at three per cent. The Government of that day must have been aware that it was not possible to get anything like par value for them, being issued at such a low rate of interest. What object had the Government of that day in issuing the bonds at three per cent when they must have been aware that no bonds were being negotiated in Great Britain at that time at such a low rate? Would it not have been of greater advantage to the Government to have issued the bonds at rates that would have yielded par or as near par as possible? Had this been done the Government would not have been called upon to implement such a large sum of money as they are called upon to implement to-day. Possibly the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) might answer that question. And I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) if in his opinion, it was in the best interests of the Govenrment to issue bonds at the low rate of three per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps at the time referred to the hon. gentleman was a member of the House. I was not a member of the House, much less a member of the Government. But it is a fact, I believe that at that time the Government rate of interest was three per cent. In fact, the Dominion of Canada was then borrowing at as low a rate as two and three-quarters per cent.

Mr. DEVLIN: Before we pass on to another question, and without entering into the discussion of the bond issue, I wish to say a word in connection with the remark which the hon. member for South York made. We, in the province of Quebec, have had entire satisfaction in the interpretation given to our laws by the Lords of the Privy Council. But, after listening to the hon. member for South York, I do feel that he expresses a sentiment which is truly Canadian, and it is one of which I cordially approve. I have absolutely nothing to say about the constitution of the courts of appeal that we now have. But I do not agree with the statement which was made by the hon. member that the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada are such that they do not bear the weight they should bear. The Supreme Court of Canada is a body of which we, as Canadians, have every right to be proud. The composition of the Supreme Court of Canada is one of very great merit. We ought to be satisfied, in Canada, with the final decision of the Supreme Court. Let me give to the House the procedure in appeal followed in the province of Quebec. From our Superior Court, litigants are obliged to go to the Court of Review; from the Court of Review to the Court of Appeal, consisting of five judges; then to the Supreme Court and then across the ocean. There is among Canadians too general a belief that it is absolutely necessary to go outside of our own country to get inspiration. We have recently had an example of this. The Government of the day thought it necessary to go to London and engage a gentleman—no doubt eminently qualified and well endowed—to come over here and reform our civil service departments. Is there anything more stupid on the part of Canadians than that they should think that it is necessary to go to another country, or even to another part of the Empire, to find a man to inquire into our book-keeping or our principles of civil service administration? We have, at the present moment, in the city of Ottawa a question affecting the purity of water——

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member to come to order.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Chairman, if I am out of order in speaking of water, I apologize. I respect your ruling, but I have never known it to be out of order, in the discussion of a question to bring in a comparison. Is that your ruling?

The CHAIRMAN: What is out of order is the whole discussion.

Mr. DEVLIN: I accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as I always do, but are we not now discussing interpretation of the statutes, and are statutes not subject to interpretation by the House?

Mr. BORDEN: We are dealing with the question as to whether or not an Act should be passed enabling the Government to buy in these bonds.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am very sorry that the Prime Minister should at this moment think I am going a little too far. I am simply taking up the words of the hon. member for South York, and I do not think the right hon. the Prime Minister took any exception at the time to his remarks. However, I submit to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, though I think it is not at all in keeping with the discussion for the right hon. the Prime Minister to interfere at this moment. I wanted to say in connection with the interpretation of the statutes, that I thoroughly agreed with the remarks of the hon. member for South York.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. White thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 76, respecting the purchase by the Government of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company's three per cent bonds.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. JOHN W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I will begin my remarks this afternoon by quoting very briefly from the speech of one of the most prominent members on the other side of the House, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), made on Tuesday last. He said:

> I believe that apart from matters of form, in matters of substance, we are not very far apart. You propose a contribution to Great Britain, to spend money to construct three dreadnoughts, to be constructed in Great Britain. We, on the other hand, propose to enlarge the Canadian Naval Service Act by the establishment of fleet units, which will necessarily be headed by one dreadnought for each unit. Is there, then, a very great difference between us, except in the matter of form?

The hon. gentleman also made use of these words:

> My suggestion is that two dreadnoughts might go to Great Britain, and be built in England; that our two fleet units should be proceeded with in Canada, leaving the Admiralty to concentrate its forces in the decisive theatre of probable war.

Before commenting on that, I would like to call attention to the cost of building a fleet unit in England as compared with its cost in Canada; also the cost of upkeep and maintenance of such fleet unit in the respective countries, the cost of maintenance or upkeep being exclusive of depreciation

	First Cost.		Annual Cost of Upkeep.
	British.	Canadian.	British.	Canadian.
	$	$	$	$
One battle cruiser	11,750,000	15,650,000	700,000	980,000
Three cruisers of Bristol class	3,393,000	4,524,000	700,000	980,000
Six destroyers	3,600,000	4,800,000	486,000	680,000
Three submarines	1,350,000	1,800,000	120,000	168,000
Cost of one fleet unit	20,093,000	26,744,000	2,006,000	2,808,000
Cost of two fleet units	40,186,000	53,488,000	4,012,000	5,616,000

I may say that the figures as to the cost of construction are based on the lowest tenders received by the previous Government for the construction of cruisers and destroyers, and that the figures with regard to annual upkeep are 40 per cent in excess of the actual cost to Britain.

I want to point out now the position taken by the Prime Minister in speaking of the matter. He said, as reported in 'Hansard':

> These ships will be at the disposal of His Majesty the King for the common defence of the Empire. They will be maintained and controlled as part of the Royal Navy; and we have the assurance that if at any time in the future it should be the will of the Canadian people to establish a Canadian unit of the British navy, these vessels can be recalled by the Canadian Government to form part of that navy, in which case, of course, they would be maintained by Canada and not by Great Britain.

That is a feature of the speech of the Prime Minister which has not been referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, what is the difference in the two plans? We propose to give $35,000,000 for the construction of three dreadnoughts; the hon. member for South Wellington proposes to give $23,500,000, the price of two dreadnoughts to be built in England, and, in addition to that, two Canadian fleet units. Now, it is an easy matter to compare the two policies in the matter of cost. If, as he says, there is in substance no difference, or very little, between the proposition of the Government and his proposition, why was all this fuss made during the Christmas vacation? Why all this stumping by the hon. gentleman from South Wellington, and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), who held out to the people of Ontario and Quebec the argument that in a few months there will be a change of government; that the present administration will be forced to the country on this matter a matter on which, in the estimation of the hon. member for South Wellington, there is very little difference between the proposition of the Government and the proposition of his own leader.

But, Mr. Speaker, what is the real difference between the proposal enunciated by the Prime Minister and the proposal of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. The real difference between the two propositions, the real issue, the germ of the whole matter, is that the proposition of the Prime Minister makes for the unity of the Empire, while the proposition of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition makes for the separation of this country from the Empire. That is the difference between the proposition on this side of the House and the proposition on the other side of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That means, then, that there is to be no Canadian navy, does it?

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend may interrupt; but before I get through, I shall make good the statement I have made, and I shall give him some evidence, and some statements by members on his side of the House, which will go to substantiate my assertion.

Let me proceed by referring to the resolution moved in this House on March 29, 1909, by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). Here is the resolution:

> That in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition, speaking after the hon. member for North

Toronto, on that resolution, said that the only exception he had to take to that resolution was that it should have been presented in a more concrete form. It did not go quite far enough to suit the right hon. gentleman. In speaking to that resolution the hon. member for North Toronto made a proposition to this House and to the Government then in power. He said: If the Liberal Government, which was then in power, will give one or two dreadnoughts to Great Britain, we on this side of the House, the Conservatives, will support that move on their part. I want to call your attention to some of the arguments and statements made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition immediately following that proposition submitted by the hon. member for North Toronto. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition made use of words which can only have one meaning. He made use of words which showed that in his mind there was some need for Canada doing something along the lines suggested by the hon. member for North Toronto. He said :

But this is an age when events happen very fast. We have learned lately that the foremost military power of the world at present is contemplating perhaps to cope with Great Britain on the high seas. We have, perhaps, reason to believe, as we have just been told that Germany is building more ships than Great Britain and building them more rapidly. Possibly there is a conclusion to be drawn from this, and the only conclusion is that Germany intends sometime to do with Great Britain on the high seas what she has done with France on land.

The right hon. the leader of the Opposition said further :

Everybody knows, it is a matter of history that Prussia had for years been silently preparing to cope with France which, up to that time had been the greatest military nation in the world; that Prussia waited its opportunity and when that opportunity came, delivered a mortal blow.

I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the Opposition whether the words of warning which he uttered on that occasion are less applicable to the situation to-day than they were to the situation then. Are Germany's intentions less obvious to-day than they were in 1909, when he uttered those words of warning ? In my estimation, Germany's intentions are even more obvious now than they were then. What was the position of the Toronto Globe at that time ? This has already been stated in the House, but I propose to quote from that paper again. On March 24, 1909, the Toronto Globe said :

But as a matter of fact war is in progress. The contest in ship building is war. If the Mother Country were engaged in a deadly conflict Canadians could not get across the ocean fast enough to the aid of the Motherland. But we must remember that our aid is as much needed now as if a physical war instead of shipbuilding war were on. It is Canada's duty from every point of view, from our affection for the land of our fathers, and for our own self interest to take prompt and practical action.

These are the words of the Toronto Globe in regard to that. Two days later the same paper, the Toronto Globe, said this :

The sort of vessel that should be built is fixed by the circumstances. The competition now raging between Great Britain and Germany is in the direction of first-class battleships. If Canada were to build a little fleet of wasps and hornets it would have no moral effect on the situation at all. What we would like Canada to do would be to manifast by a veritable act that in this competition of the fleets she ranges herself proudly and gladly by the side if the Mother Country.

That was the position of the Toronto Globe at that time, and I specially commend to the members opposite the reference to a little fleet of wasps and hornets as having no moral effect on the situation.

Now, what was the position of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition ? In 1909 he clearly recognized danger ; he clearly recognized Germany's purpose. He acknowledged prospective danger at that time, but he said the danger was not imminent. Let us follow him a little further; and I may say right here that it seems to me that in all the speeches of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition on important questions there should be an explanatory index accompanying them, because it is a very difficult matter to find out what the right hon. gentleman means on anything. On February 3, 1910, when he brought down his Naval Act, he said again that he recognized Germany's purpose; that he recognized danger. But he added, 'You need not be afraid at the present time; there is no danger threatened now, but look out three or four years from now.' He said the danger was not to be apprehended for three or four years. Well, the three years will be up next month, and the limit of his prophecy will be reached in a little over a year from now, so that according to the hon. gentleman's statement in 1910, we approach very close to the day of trial for the Empire, very close to the day of Canada's destiny, for that is exactly what it means. Notwithstanding his own statement in that regard, he persists in putting the telescope to his blind eye and declaring that there is no emergency and no danger imminent. Twice in 1911 Germany and England were on the verge of war and the British flagship turned its searchlights on German cruisers off the coast of Britain. Why does the right hon. leader of the Opposition persist in a policy which will make it impossible for Canada to do anything in the matter of Imperial defence, or to take any part in strengthening the Empire. Light may be thrown upon his attitude by some of the utterances of the right hon. gentleman, and I propose to place a few of these on 'Hansard.' Let us see what position the right hon. gentleman took at the Imperial Conference. I might quote here from the London Times in regard to his attitude at the Imperial Conference to see how it was regarded. I shall first quote from the statement of Sir James Findlay showing how the attitude of the right hon. leader of the Opposition was regarded by a person entirely outside of this country. Sir James Findlay is the Attorney General of New Zealand, and was one of the delegates at the Imperial Conference of 1911. He says:

There undoubtedly seemed to me in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's words—and attitude in the conference, a certain aloofness from the family circle—a civil or rather courtly coldness to the claims of the relationship and to any proposals for a closer co-operation.

Further on the same gentleman says:

I am certainly safe in saying that the future of Canada and some of the policies of the Laurier Government affecting that future—notably the treaty of reciprocity with America and Canada's separate naval policy—give British ministers more concern than the future of any of the other dominions.

That gentleman was not in a position, I take it, to know all the utterances of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. Let me give a few of these to show his attitude in times past. Speaking in this House in 1892, as recorded in 'Hansard,' page 1143, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition said:

Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy, the day when Canada would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy?

Again, in 'Hansard' of 1910, page 2977 he is reported as having said:

Lord Durham stated in his report that the conditions were such that the two provinces should be united so that the French-Canadian should be ruled by the stern and relentless hand of an English-speaking majority.

It is needless for me to say that these are the words of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and not those of Lord Durham. Then, speaking at Boston in 1891, the right hon. gentleman said:

Canada would never consent to Imperial federation even on commercial lines because the consequences would be the participation of Canada in Britain's wars and Canada would never consent to participate in Britain's wars.

Mr. EDWARDS.

Do you not see in these words an expression of his peculiar attitude in regard to when England is at war Canada is at war and the rider he attaches thereto? Again he said, speaking in Boston:

The conduct of England and Canada during the civil war, 1861-1866, was a disgrace to England and Canada.

He made that statement in a foreign country notwithstanding the fact that the Dominion archives contained the public thanks of the United States Government of that day to the Government of Canada and the Canadian people for the wise, prudent, neutral and conservative course which they had taken during the civil war. They exonerated Canada from the charge which the right hon. gentleman made in a foreign country against the people of this country. In regard to the charge against Great Britain, I want to place on 'Hansard' the statement of no less a Liberal than the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, who, in a letter to a friend in the United States, said:

I can state that the British Government never at any time dealt with the subject of recognizing the southern states in your great civil war except when it learned the proposition of the Emperor, Napoleon III, and declined to entertain that proposition without qualification, hesitation, delay or assent.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is incumbent upon me to state these facts in the House and to clear Canada and Great Britain, in so far as my feeble voice is able to do so, from the aspersion which was made against them by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition. Another remark of the right hon. gentleman was this:

It is a great, a fatal mistake to make allegiance—British allegiance—the basis of trade.

Another statement that he made in a foreign country is this:

The present position of Canada cannot last. Even at this day England and Canada have interests totally apart and the time will come when, in the very nature of things, separation must take place.

Now he tells us that any thought of separation would be a folly and a crime. Who is the man who was guilty of this folly in the first place, who is the man who stands before the people of the country to-day saying that his own words were unjust and showing that he is the self-confessed criminal as far as this matter is concerned?—the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. He says further:

I am a subject of the British Crown——

It is a good thing for Canada and for the Empire that all the subjects of the British Crown are not of the same calibre as the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. (Reading):

—but, whenever I have to choose between the interests of England and of Canada, it is manifest to me that the interests of my country are identical with the interests of the United States of America.

This is the right hon. gentleman who, in this debate, has found fault with utterances used along the same line down in the province of Quebec. Another assertion which he makes is this:

I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspiration is the independence of Canada, to see Canada an independent nation in due course of time.

Which of the assertions of the right hon. gentleman are we to believe? Is not that an assertion which, if it means anything, means separation and yet, today, he says that the thought of separation would be a folly and a crime. Which assertion of the right hon. gentleman are we to take as expressing his true sentiments? For my part I do not know which to take. The natural consequence of such assertions coming from a man who has been a leading light in one of the great political parties of this country as long as the right hon. gentleman has been is that his views have been impressed upon many of his followers. I would like to give you some expressions of opinion by leading Liberals. Sir Frederick Borden, in discussing the Naval Service Act in 1910, referred to the Monroe Doctrine, and said that:

The Monroe Doctrine means that Canada is safe from foreign agression.

Mr. Roy, of Dorchester, also said:

The Monroe Doctrine imposes on the United States the obligation of protecting us.

Let me say right here, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion—and I am giving my own opinion—the Monroe Doctrine is an unwarranted assumption of authority on the part of the United States that the Monroe Doctrine holds out nothing to the Dominion of Canada but that if at any time we were so unfortunate as to come under the operation of the Monroe Doctrine we might rest assured that we would pay dearly for any protection we got from the United States. I would like to see the day when the Monroe Doctrine would be swept away entirely and I believe it should be regarded as a thing of the past. I believe that in the southern part of this continent, in South America, there is room for the splendid energies of the German people and I would like to see that part of this continent thrown open in such a way that the German people would there have an opportunity of exerting themselves.

Let me quote another of the Liberal members who addressed this House in 1910. I refer to the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Turcotte) who said:

I am in favour of a sufficient fleet for protecting our fisheries and for nothing more.

Mr. Beauparlant said that he would agree to a Canadian fleet, but only for us alone. Mr. Ecrement took the position that the Canadian fleet must be built in Canada under Canadian control, and must do nothing outside of Canada. I believe that I am quite correct in saying that Mr. Brodeur took very much the same position. The then hon. member for South Huron, Mr. McLean, said, as reported at page 4418 of Hansard, 1910:

As a Canadian I wish to say that in a material sense we are not indebted to Great Britain for anything.

Now, let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to a statement of their leader in this House and in this debate as reported at page 1056 of 'Hansard' of this session. He was referring to some statements which had been made in Quebec. He said that in Quebec it was being stated that Canada had discharged its whole duty in the matter of defence simply by providing for the defence of her own shores. That apparently horrified the right hon. gentleman, for he said:

But when harmful doctrines of that kind have been preached for months and years, that preaching leaves behind it an impression which it is much more easy to create than it is afterwards to destroy.

No person knows the truth of these words better than the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. For years he has, by just such utterances, been creating an impression which he did not wish to have destroyed. He takes exception to that conduct and he thinks it is a terrible thing to do, and yet, right in this House, sitting behind him, in the debate of 1910, member after member on the Liberal side of the House got up and made exactly the same statements, and the right hon. gentleman sat there and he did not call them to task for it; he did not say: these are harmful statements; he acquiesced in these statements at that time. Let me give you another gem from the Liberal side of the House. Mr. Turcotte of Nicolet ('Hansard' 1910, page 4628) said:

It is not patriotic nor loyal, I say, to contend that we must remain forever under the protection of the British flag; But, thank God, I am satisfied it will not be so, and the establishment of a war navy will in my humble opinion be the last step towards independence. I speak from the Canadians point of view and that my viewpoint is also that of the greater number of the electors in my constituency, and I would even say of the majority of electors in the province of Quebec. Will not Canada sooner or later have to choose between annexation and independence?

Sir, the hon. member for Nicolet spoke in French; unfortunately I do not understand that language; I wish I did and was able to speak it; but the right hon. the leader of the Opposition understood that language; he understood the statements made by the hon. member for Nicolet, and yet he sat in his place in the House and allowed the member for Nicolet, one of his own supporters, to say that it was neither patriotic nor loyal to suppose that Canada should remain forever under the British flag; he sat in his seat and allowed the member for Nicolet to call God to witness that he hoped that condition of things would not continue. The right hon. gentleman sat silent in his seat while he heard the member for Nicolet say that the views he expressed were not only his own views and the views of his constituents, but that they were the views of the people of the province of Quebec. It ill becomes the leader of the Opposition at the present time to animadvert on the statements which may or may not have been made in the last few months in the province of Quebec, in view of the fact that he sat dumb while the statements I have cited to you were made by his followers in his own presence. And, what has been the whole course of the right hon. gentleman as a public man in this country? His whole course since he entered public life in Canada has been in the direction of separation of this country from the Empire, and in trying to bring that aim of his about, he has misrepresented British diplomacy, and has taught others to do so. He has misquoted and mis-stated British and Canadian history, and taught others to do so; he has offered insults, at times covert, at times open, to the people of this country of British birth and encouraged others to do the same; he has represented British statesmen as tyrants and oppressors and Canadian heroes as rebels, and he has encouraged others to do so. That is the present leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He has spoken in this House very bitterly of the Nationalists of the province of Quebec. I am not here to enter into any defence of the Nationalists of Quebec; I do not agree with many of the views expressed by the leaders of the Quebec Nationalists; but, Sir, we can at least tell from the words of the Nationalists leaders of Quebec what they mean; they speak out and they leave us in no doubt as to their meaning. But, the right hon. gentleman should be the last man to criticise the Nationalists of the province of Quebec, because they are his own children, his own product. It was at his feet they imbibed the doctrines which they are now giving voice to. The right hon. gentleman has charged the Nationalists of Quebec with saying that Canada owes nothing to England. Mr. Speaker, he has preached the same doctrine from one end of the country to the other for the last twenty-five years. He has charged the Nationalists of Quebec with making unworthy appeals to race and prejudice, but is the right hon. gentleman himself guiltless of raising questions of race and religious prejudice for political purposes in the province of Quebec? He has charged the Nationalists of the province of Quebec with utterances that smacked of treason. Has he forgotten his Saskatchewan musket? Quote me the utterance of any Nationalist leader of the province of Quebec; quote me the utterances of any political firebrand from the time of Papineau and Mackenzie down to Bourassa and Mackenzie King, and no matter how disloyal and how unpatriotic these utterances may have been, I will quote you the counterpart of them in the words of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. True, his words may have been more subtle and more skilfully arranged, but the underlying sentiment was there; the covert sneer was there under a thin veneer of polished rhetoric.

On the ground that the resolution of the hon. member for North Toronto was not sufficiently explicit, Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed another, and the second paragraph of it has a very direct bearing on this debate. That paragraph reads:

> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

That is the paragraph as adopted, the words 'regular and periodical contribution' being substituted at the suggestion of the present Prime Minister for the words 'any stated contribution,' which appear in the paragraph as originally drafted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That paragraph states that we were against regular and periodical contributions in 1910; we are against regular and periodical contributions in 1913, and this has been made very clear in this debate by the statement of the Prime Minister in this House, when he said:

> In presenting our proposals, it will be borne in mind that we are not undertaking or beginning a system of regular and periodical contributions.

What does the change of words suggested by the Prime Minister in 1909 mean? Anyone with even a primitive knowledge of the English language must admit that the statement as originally drafted by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was an absolutely negative proposition and if it had been carried by this House would have made it utterly impossible for Canada to have ever contributed anything in any way, under any circumstances. Now, Sir, I contend that the change of these words at the suggestion of Mr. Borden changed that negative proposition into a definite declaration of policy. Let me give you one of the arguments of Mr. Borden on that occasion. He said:

In declaring against the payment of any stated contribution, we tell Great Britain and the world what we are not prepared to do when we should declare to all men what we are prepared to do.

Further on he said:

The day might come when the only thing we could do in the absence of preparation in this country would be to make some kind of contribution.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that when the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition accepted the proposition made by Mr. Borden as sound, and changed the words of his original resolution to meet the suggestion of Mr. Borden, he, by that act accepted the principle of making a contribution to England under certain conditions. What inference would be drawn or could be drawn by Britain and other nations when they read the original resolution of the present leader of the Opposition, the suggestion and argument of the present Prime Minister, and the resolution as finally read by the right hon. gentleman and unanimously adopted by this House? The only possible conclusion they could come to would be that Canada is against making regular and periodical contributions, but that Canada is not against making a contribution under certain conditions, and under just such conditions as exist in Canada at the present time.

Allow me to contrast for a moment the position taken by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and the position taken by the Prime Minister. I do this in order that people, in my constituency at least, may understand the difference between the two men and make their choice accordingly. The leader of the Opposition, in answer to a question asked him by yourself, Mr. Speaker, as reported in 'Hansard' of 1910, page 1735,

Is the war referred to war in any part of the Empire or in Canada only?

Made the following reply:

War everywhere. When Canada is at war, Canada is at war; there is no distinction.

Then he proceeded at once to make the distinction:

If Great Britain, to which we are subject, is at war with any nation, Canada becomes liable to invasion, and so Canada is at war.

At page 2965 of the same 'Hansard,' he said:

It does not follow, however, that because England is at war, we should necessarily take part in the war.

That is a policy of semi-detachment. That is exactly what it means, an utterly impracticable policy and one which does not in any way meet with the approval of the people of Canada. The position of the Prime Minister in regard to the matter is expressed in these words in the same debate:

So long as Canada remains in the Empire, Canada is at war when the Empire is at war. So long as the English flag floats above Canada, Canada is at war when that flag is attacked. The moment a shot is fired or a blow is struck at that flag, Canada is at war with the nation or country which fires that shot or strikes the blow.

There is no quibbling there. I put up to the people of this country the assertions of the two gentlemen who are leading the opposing parties in this House, and I ask them which of these two gentlemen they are going to choose. I have no doubt which one of them the people of my county will choose. As reported in 'Hansard' of 1892, page 1144, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition said:

I am ready any day whether I am charged with annexation or not to take a Yankee dollar in preference to an English shilling. I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspiration is the independence of Canada, to see Canada an independent nation in due course of time.

I might here interpolate that this is the same right hon. gentleman who said, 'Any thought of separation would be a folly and a crime.' In 'Hansard' of 1892, page 1142, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition said:

I hold out to my fellow countrymen the idea of independence. If we are true to our record we will again exhibit to the world the unique, the unprecedented example of a nation achieving its independence by slow degrees and as naturally as the severing of the ripe fruit from the parent tree.

This is the same right hon. gentleman who in this same debate said, 'Any thought of separation would be a folly and a crime.' Which assertion are we to believe? When you find a man sitting on both sides of the fence as the right hon. gentleman has been doing on every question brought before the House, what confidence can you place in him? I ask you to contrast those utterances in this matter of independence with those of my esteemed leader, the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country. As reported in 'Hansard' of 1909, page 3518, he said:

I am not one of those who look to see the integrity of the British Empire menaced by the future independence of Canada.

Like Sir John Macdonald, I was born a British subject, I shall remain a British subject and I hope to die a British subject.

I trust the day will never come when the British flag will cease to float over this Canada of ours.

These are my sentiments; they are the sentiments of the people of Frontenac; they are the sentiments of the people of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I believe that the right hon. the Prime Minister is voicing the true sentiments of the people of every province in the Dominion of Canada. I believe that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition is not even voicing the sentiments of the people of the province of Quebec. A few years ago a British military expert, Sir John French, came to Canada and made a report, in which he pointed out many of the weaknesses in the land defences of this country. Sir Frederick Borden, then Minister of Militia, when his estimates were before the Committee of Supply, made an admission respecting the status and purpose of the militia of Canada in these words:

The business of the militia has been to assist the British army when difficulties occur in Canada.

That means that it is to the men and the guns of Britain that Canada had to look and still looks for the defence of her soil. How much more dependent are we on Britain for protection by sea? At present we have absolutely no naval service of our own for the protection of our shores. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition proposes a fleet unit on the Atlantic and another on the Pacific, the vessels to be built in Canada and manned by Canadians. How long would it take to construct such a fleet? I want to quote to you the opinion in that regard of Mr. Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, when speaking in the British House of Commons on the 22nd of July last. He said:

Small ships take eighteen to twenty months to build; large ships take from two to three years, sometimes four years. Docks take more than four years to build. Seamen take from two to three years to train; artificers take much longer; officers take between six and seven years.

These are the words of the First Lord of the Admiralty, who is regarded as the highest naval authority in the Empire. Now what inference must we draw from these words? Even if the policy of the right hon leader of the Opposition were gone on with, for the next ten or fifteen years at least, Canada must be absolutely dependent on Great Britain for her protection by sea.

An hon. MEMBER: Can you give us any idea how long it would take to build them in Canada?

Mr. EDWARDS: There are a variety of opinions in regard to that. It appears to me that it would take fifteen years at least; at any rate ten or fifteen years. During that time, will any person on the other side of the House deny that we as Canadians must look for protection to Great Britain? That is our position. Our naval defence will come from the same quarter from which Sir Frederick Borden said the main part of our land defence must come—from Great Britain. Yet in the face of these undeniable facts, there are to be found a few Canadians led by the right hon. gentleman and his front benchers, who are small-souled enough to have us occupy the position of receiving at the hands of Great Britain our protection by sea for the next ten or fifteen years without doing one single thing, without putting up one single dollar. I maintain the only thing that at present we can do to retain a semblance of our very much damaged self-respect—and it has been badly damaged, and badly damaged because of the attitude and action of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and his colleagues—is to make the contribution which is proposed by the right hon. leader of the Government, and thereby—to use again the words of the Toronto Globe—'To manifest by a veritable act that in this competition of the fleets Canada ranges herself proudly and gladly by the side of the Mother Country.'

The question as to an emergency has been discussed very frequently, and the word has been given sufficient interpretation here. It all comes down to the position which Great Britain occupies as a naval power in relation to other powers. And I cannot state it in better words than those used in the memorandum of the British Government which has been placed in the hands of members:

The power of the British Empire to maintain the superiority on the sea, which is essential to its security, must obviously be measured from time to time by reference to the other naval forces of the world.

Again permit me to place a few figures on 'Hansard' in regard to Germany and her naval position:

Whereas in 1898 the German fleet consisted of:—

9 battleships (excluding coast defence vessels), 3 large cruisers, 28 small cruisers, 113 torpedo boats, and 25,000 men, maintained at an annual cost of £6,000,000 ($30,000,000), the full fleet of 1920 will consist of:—

41 battleships, 20 large cruisers, 40 small cruisers, 144 torpedo boats, 72 submarines, and 101,500 men, maintained at a cost of £21,000,000 ($115,000,000).

Why this very large increase in the naval armament of Germany? Has it been induced by the action of Great Britain? In 1905 Great Britain built four capital ships, and Germany two; in 1906 Great Britain reduced her number to three, Germany increased hers to three; in 1907, Great Britain built three, Germany built three; in 1908 Great Britain further reduced hers to two and Germany increased hers to four. Why this was done is stated, I think, very correctly in the memorandum:

From this point of view, the development of the German fleet during the last fifteen years is the most striking feature of the naval situation to-day. . .

Taking a general view, the effect of the law in view of that increased dreadnought building on the part of Germany, I think it is fair to say that the development of the German fleet is the most striking feature of the naval situation of Europe, and you might say of the world. Add to this very fact that four-fifths of the German navy is kept constantly manned and ready for action at a moment's notice, and it does seem to me that the only power which this arming can be directed against is Great Britain. The memorandum to which I have referred contains the following:

It is the general naval supremacy of Great British which is the primary safeguard of the security and interests of the great dominions of the crown, and which for all these years has been the deterrent upon any possible designs prejudicial to or inconsiderate of their policy and safety. . . . Larger margins of superiority at home would, among other things restore greater freedom to the movements of the British squadrons in every sea, and directly promote the security of the dominions.

Have we not in that statement a guarantee of the security of Canadian commerce throughout the world? But we must also consider the possibility of a combination of powers against Great Britain. I do not wish to place more quotations on 'Hansard' than are absolutely necessary, but in this regard, take this from the memorandum:

Whereas, in the present year, Great Britain possesses 18 battleships and battle-cruisers of the dreadnought class against 19 of that class possessed by the other powers of Europe, and will possess in 1913, 24 to 21, the figures in 1914 will be 31 to 33 ;and in the year 1915, 35 to 51.

One hon. member on the other side said it was folly to think of such a thing as a combination of powers against Great Britain. History has shown us differently in the past; there have been times when Great Britain has stood in a position of isolation against the combined powers of Europe.

Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness of the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the Overseas Dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.

Now, I wish to call attention to another statement in that memorandum, and it is the last parapgraph:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Sir, it does seem to me that if we take these statements as true statements—and one hon. gentleman on the other side, I think the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), said that he believed that the statements and assertions in that memorandum were absolutely true in every particular—I fail to see how hon. gentlemen opposite can continue to assert that there is no emergency or possible danger.

It has been asserted by hon. gentlemen opposite and in this respect I think the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is the principal aggressor perhaps I should say the principal sinner—that it was not money that Great Britain wanted, but what she was in need of was men. In answer to that, allow me again to quote from the speech of Mr. Churchill delivered in the British House of Commons on July 22 1912:

Now I come to the manning of the fleet. There have been a great many ill-informed statements during the last few weeks about the shortage of men.

I do not know that he was particularly referring to the hon. member for South Renfrew in these words:

I have seen it asserted that it was not possible to man the manœuvre fleet without resorting to all sorts of expedients. Statements have been made which would appear to indicate that we would not be in a position to man all our fleets on the outbreak of war. The manœuvre fleet contains a large number of vessels which depend for their complement in war upon a regular compulsory moblization of the naval reserve, and in war such a moblization would bring to the naval forces many thousands more men than there would be room for on all the ships of all classes fit to put to sea.

He is First Lord of the Admiralty, and should know what he is talking about. He said further:

The problem we have to face is not the supply of men for the moblization of the fleet when war is imminent or has actually broken out.

Further he said:

There is no lack of good and healthy boys and youths in these islands to man the navy.

Surely this statement ought to be sufficient to satisfy the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have their fair quota of doubting Thomases on this question, but allow me to call their attention to our position in this country as regards men. We were unable to man the Niobe and the Rainbow; we had to obtain British seamen for that purpose. Where do we get our men for the A and B batteries in Kingston? In Canada? No; we have to get them from England. Where do we get the men for our Northwest Mounted Police, which is perhaps the finest body of its kind in any country? Ten or twelve years ago a man had to have considerable pull to get into the Northwest Mounted Police, and to-day we have practically got to pull them in. Why do Canadians not go into the service now? It is due to the expansion of the country; the men are wanted everywhere for the construction of public works, the building of railroads, for agricultural purposes, and for a thousand and one things. I would like to ask some of the hon. gentlemen from the West how many men will Alberta or Saskatchewan supply to the navy? Every summer this particular part of the country, and thence eastward to the Atlantic coast, is placarded with requests to send out five or ten thousand men to help them with the harvest. When men are getting, as laborers, a daily wage of $2, $2.25, and even $2.50 working in the city streets, you cannot expect them to be particularly anxious to join the Canadian navy.

But, Sir, there is another feature I might mention as pertaining to the question of cost. Suppose it takes four or five thousand men to man two fleets, one on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific, what is that going to cost this country? In view of the high wages paid in every walk of life, you will have to pay these men at least $1.50 a day and their board—and that is a small estimate. If it takes four or five thousand men to man the two fleet units—I do not know how many it would take—but on that assumption it would cost $2,000,000 or upwards for wages. And that is not all. You will take these men out of productive employment and place them in non-productive labour, and, in fairly estimating the cost to this country, you must value also their labor at so much per day in what they are engaged in productive employment.

An hon. MEMBER: What do they pay in the British Navy?

Mr. EDWARDS: Two shillings.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Shamefully low wages.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is that not evidence that they have any number of men in the Old Country who cannot get work, while in Canada we have more work than men? Thousands and tens of thousands of Englishmen are coming from the Old Country to Canada—why? Because they get better wages and have better prospects than in the Old Country. It is no reflection upon the loyalty or patriotism of the people of Canada that they should not agree to enter the navy at such small wages when there is so great a demand for their services in other walks of life.

Mr. PUGSLEY Is my hon. friend, therefore, opposed to the establishment of a Canadian navy?

Mr. EDWARDS: I am absolutely opposed to the establishment of a Canadian navy with such a string to it as the hon. gentleman's leader proposes. But my hon. friend, I know, is eager for information, and while I recognize the fact that he has plenty of things in his head, it is also true there is room for much more. My hon. friend is trying to get information from this side of the House as to the permanent policy of the Conservative party in regard to a navy, but I may tell him he will get that soon enough. At present I am expressing my entire concurrence with the proposition of giving $35,000,000 to Great Britain to build three dreadnoughts, and my absolute dissent with the proposition of building two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, with a string on each one, enabling the right hon. gentleman, if in power, to take them away from the theatre of war when trouble arises.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend could take the string off if he wanted to; they could arrange that to suit themselves.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is precisely what we are going to do, and we are going to arrange it also to suit the country.

Mr. PELLETIER: If you take the string off, there is nothing left.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is now nearly six o'clock, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Go on—time is precious.

Mr. EDWARDS: Time was not so precious when the hon. member for South Wellington recently saw fit to adjourn the debate at fifteen minutes after five. However, I am willing to do whatever pleases the hon. member for St. John.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was being honoured with a little attention from the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. I can understand the sore feelings of the hon. gentleman. He is on the side of the Opposition now, and the plums of office are no longer within his grasp. No longer is it within his power to promulgate dredging contracts and sawdust wharfs. He is consequently feeling somewhat sore as the result of the change. I can also understand some of the soreness of the hon. member for Rouville. As Minister of Marine and Fisheries he would have been the head in a certain sense, of the navy if it had reached completion. I have been told that the hon. gentleman went so far as to order a uniform for the occasion, a nicely made suit with gold braid, with a cocked hat and a dinky little sword, and all these he has been obliged to place carefully away. He has not even comfort in the prospect of being able to sell them at a reasonable discount to the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries on account of the difference in their size. The hon. member for North Oxford made a statement the other day to which I wish to refer. He said:

> The Germans say they have to augment their navy to protect them from the aggression of England, and perhaps from their standpoint they say it just as truthfully as we say the reverse.

The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) also made a statement which I wish to quote. He said:

> Surely there is no reasonable probability that the United Kingdom can be conquered and kept by any other power or combination of powers any more than France was kept because she was conquered by Germany.

I take issue with both hon. gentlemen in regard to these statements. My reason for doing so is this: England is absolutely dependent upon foreign countries for her food supplies. If by any possiblity her trade routes or her ports were blockaded by the German navy or by a successful combination of powers against her, she could be starved into submission or into granting any terms which the successful power or combination of powers might see fit to demand. It is not so in the case of Germany. If you will take the trouble to look at a bulletin issued by the International Agricultural Institute dated 26th September last, you will see that in close proximity to Germany, and entirely independent of the sea, there are several countries which export large quantities of wheat. Russia, Roumania, Hungary and Bulgaria in the year 1910, exported over 323,000,000 bushels of wheat. Now, it must be plain to every person that even if Germany were defeated on the sea, she would not be cut off from her food supplies. The reverse is the case so far as England is concerned. Not only is that true in regard to wheat, but also in regard to rye, which, in several countries, is a substitute for wheat. In the production of rye Russia takes the lead, and the next country I believe in point of production of rye is Germany herself. So that, so far as her food supplies are concerned, Germany, I repeat, is independent of a navy, and is, in that respect, in a different position entirely from that occupied by Great Britain.

I cannot agree with much that has been said by the hon. member for Edmonton. I cannot, for instance, agree with his acrobatic performance in regard to the National Anthem. But he has placed on 'Hansard' some statements with which I do agree, and which I think are worth repeating. In this debate, as recorded in 'Hansard,' page 1377, speaking of the successful combination of powers against England, he said:

> I ask our anti-militarist friends in Canada if it is not an absolute certainty that under such conditions,—

That is, the defeat of England on the sea——

> Canada would pass from the control of the British Empire to the control of the successful one of those European powers?. . . And so, assuming the possibility of such an occurrence as I have suggested, in my mind there is nothing more certain than that Canada would be the prize that would go to the victor.

I entirely agree with that, and with a further sentence which was uttered by the same hon. gentleman:

> If they have any ideas on this subject, let them recall Alsace and Lorraine, the prize of a successful war, and let them figure to themselves whether Canada would not be just as fair a prize, or whether Canada would not, in absolute fact, be the prize for which those fleets would contend in the North sea if ever such a terrible event should take place.

Now, Sir, I repeat that I agree with these statements by the hon. member for Edmonton. I think he has described the position very well. We shall suppose that we have the Laurier Government in power in this country and that we have two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific. We shall suppose that a war breaks out in Europe and that in that war

Great Britain is defeated. What would likely happen in this country under the policy advanced by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition? He says that in the event of war he would call his cabinet together. Very well. The Government announces some day that war is in progress between England and Germany we shall say, and the Cabinet is called together to consider the matter. Events at sea in the case of war happen very rapidly, and we shall suppose that the cable flashes over the news that Great Britain has been defeated. The Cabinet is considering the matter and the right hon. gentleman asks the question: 'Gentlemen what are we to do? We have a fleet unit on the Atlantic, and we may suppose that in a very short time a portion of the successful German fleet will start for Canada. We know that our fleet unit on the Atlantic cannot contend successfully against a fleet which has defeated the power of Britain on the sea. What are we to do in this case?' There are only two things for us to do—fall back upon the intervention of the United States, ask them to send their army and navy up here to defend us, in which case we may be sure they would exact some compensation from us, or declare our neutrality, in other words, declare our independence. I fancy the right hon. gentleman might say: 'This time has come for the ripe fruit to drop off the parent tree.' But someone asks how can we declare our neutrality and fly the British flag? Will not Germany regard that as the flag of an enemy? I fancy also the right hon. gentleman saying the order must go forth that the British flag be hauled down from our fleet units, from our military stations and from every public building in Canada; that is the only thing we can do if we are not to fight. If we are to declare our independence we must haul down our flag. Sir, that is a prospect which is not pleasing to me as a Canadian and a British subject, nor to the vast majority of the people of this country. As the Toronto Globe very properly said on March 31, 1909, in reference to the possibility of the British navy being defeated.

> While the British fleet is master of the channel no European fleet could be a serious menace to the shores of Canada. . . In the day of trial the all-important aim would be to make the Imperial fleet so strong that the issue of a combat would not be doubtful.

That is precisely what the Prime Minister of this country proposes to do under this Bill. So far as our circumstances will permit, and out of the abundant revenues of this country, he proposes to give the price of three dreadnoughts to strengthen the British fleet in home waters, where, as has been admitted by members on the other side of the House, the test of strength, if it ever comes, will undoubtedly take place.

Now, let me deal further with the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. He has stated in this House that when England is at war, Canada is at war. He has accompanied that with a reservation that it does not necessarily mean that we are in the conflict. I have already quoted his words on that. Let me quote to you from what is probably the greatest newspaper in the world, The Times of London, England. It says:

> If Sir Wilfrid Laurier's argument means anything, it presupposes that the Empire may be engaged in a life-and-death struggle about a cause which Canada disapproves. Our minor troubles do not touch Canada. If her ships are needed for action it can only be either in a question nearly effecting herself, or else in some broad conflict which may bring the whole Empire down. Semi-detachment is therefore, in reality, not a practicable alternative. Mr. Borden has seen that clearly enough. He has realized that, in any great struggle where her ships might be required, Canada would stand or fall by the results, whether she wished it or not. He has, therefore, claimed, and rightly claimed, that she should have a voice in the main issues of policy which govern peace or war. Such a voice is, in truth, the only means to that security at which Sir Wilfrid's argument is aimed. The alternative is independence, nothing less. For it really is not possible, except as a form of words, to denounce the thought of separation from the Empire as 'folly and crime' and in the same breath to insist upon a species of Imperial connection much looser for defensive purposes than that of ordinary allies.

That is the opinion of the London Times, and, as my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) so aptly said the other day, if the policy of the right hon. leader of the Opposition were carried into effect our alliance with Great Britain for defensive purposes would be weaker than the alliance which existed between Great Britain and Japan. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, during this debate, denounced certain utterances as harmful; he denounced as harmful the very same doctrines which he applauded when spoken in this House in 1910 by his own supporters, by Mr. Turcotte of Nicolet, by Mr. Beauparlant, by Mr. Ecrement and by Mr. McLean of Huron. He stated in this House in 1889 and again in this House in 1892, 'Hansard' page 1145, that the conduct of Great Britain and Canada during the American civil war was a disgrace to Great Britain and to Canada. In this House and in this debate, page 1057 of 'Hansard,' the right hon. gentleman said that:

> If there is one thing which tends to the glory of England it is that when the North and the South were engaged in that famous truggle resulting in the abolition of African slavery, she would not interfere as against what might have been her own interests; and, as a result of her non-interference, that blot upon Christian civilization has forever been wiped out.

I ask the right hon. gentleman to contrast his own words as printed in 'Hansard' of this session with his own words as printed in 'Hansard' on different occasions and especially at page 1142 of 'Hansard' of 1892, when he declared for independence, the same as his former pupil, Mr. Bourassa, declared in the city of Ottawa on the 18th of December last for the independence of Canada and the establishment in this country of an Anglo-French republic. The right hon. gentleman said in this debate, page 1057 of 'Hansard,' that the thought of separation was a folly and a crime. I ask him to contrast that statement with his other statements in regard to the independence of Canada being the goal of his ambition, his highest aspiration. So we have the right hon. gentleman on this question, as on other questions, taking one position to-day, another position to-morrow, suspended, as it were, like Mahommet's coffin, between heaven and hell and fit for neither place and there I leave him.

Now, I want to direct the attention of the House for a time to how this matter affects the great agricultural interests of the Dominion. I do so more particularly because I have the honour to represent what is probably one of the most strictly agricultural constituencies in Canada. In the Trade and Navigation Report for the year ended March 31, 1912, I find the following statements with reference to to our trade relations with Great Britain and the United States:

Total trade..	874,637,794
With Great Britain..	$268,760,000
With United States...	476,889,000
Canada bought from Great Britain.. .. .. =	$117,192,000
Canada sold to Great Britain. =	151,853,000
Balance of trade in Canada's favour..	34,640,000
Canada bought from U. S... .. =	$356,354,000
Canada sold to the U.S... .. .. =	120,534,000
Balance of trade against Canada.	$235,819,000

Here let me say that in Canada's trade with foreign countries there is one of the important countries only with which the balance of trade is in our favour and that country is Great Britain. I want particularly to refer to animals and their products and agricultural products because under these heads we have practically all that concerns the farmer and in this connection I find the following results:

	Total Exports from Canada to all Countries.	Sold by Canada to Great Britain.	Sold by Canada to United States.
Animals and their products.....	49,220,897	36,923,000	9,864,000
Agricultural products.....	115,154,486	81,784,000	11,685,000
	164,675,383	118,707,000	21,549,000

You will observe from this that, of all those products of his labour for which the Canadian farmer has to find a market outside of Canada, 72 per cent went to Great Britain, 12½ per cent to the United States, and 15½ per cent to other foreign countries. If we exclude entirely all of those products which went to the United States—and doubtless some of those that went from the Maritime provinces and British Columbia were sea-borne—it means that if all of the products the farmer has to dispose of outside of Canada, 87½ per cent are carried by sea and are dependent for their safe carriage by sea upon the supremacy of the British navy. Without going at length into details I want to direct your attention to one or two of these articles in which the farmer is particularly interested. Bear in mind I am only referring to Canadian products to stuff produced in Canada, not to farm products which have come into this country and been carried out. In the year to which I allude Canada exported to all countries of cheese, butter, bacon, &c., the following quantities:

	Canada exported to all Countries.		Canada exported to Great Britain.
Cheese	163,450,000 lbs.	value $20,888,818	162,395,000 lbs.	= $20,733,000
Butter	8,844,000 lbs.	" 2,077,000	7,458,000 lbs.	= 1,769,000
Bacon	58,977,000 lbs.	" 7,520,000	58,351,000 lbs.	= 7,437,000
Apples	1,664,000 brls.	" 5,104,000	1,481,000 brls.	= 4,678,000
Wheat	64,466,286 bush.	" 62,590,000	60,343,000 bush.	= 58,677,000
Oats	8,880,673 bush.	" 3,819,000	7,014,645 bush.	= 2,903,000

The item of our wheat to Britain is particularly interesting to the farmers of the West, for it will be seen that Britain took $58,000,000 worth out of a total export of $62,000,000 worth. In addition to the above articles, we sent over a million dollars' worth of hay to England, nearly half of our barley, two-thirds of our wheat flour, practically all of our oatmeal flour, and over eighty per cent of our cattle over one year old that were exported were exported to the British Isles. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider what it would mean to the farmers of Ontario, to the farmers of Quebec, and to the farmers of all Canada, if Great Britain's navy were defeated. A short time ago, I met in Montreal a gentleman who has been engaged in trade in that city for the last thirty years, and the volume of whose trade may be indicated by the fact that during that thirty years he has himself alone purchased upwards of one hundred million dollars' worth of farm products for export, principally cheese and butter. I said to this gentleman: What do you think of the proposition to give thirty-five millions to Britain from the standpoint of your trade, and his answer was: There is one class of people in Canada, if this matter is put before them squarely and fairly, who will hold up both hands for the proposition of the Prime Minister or for double the amount he has offered, and they are the farmers of the Dominion. This gentleman said to me further: You ask me how it would affect me in my business; do you suppose for one moment that I would be fool enough to place on board ship in the city of Montreal two hundred thousand dollars' worth of cheese to send to England if I did not feel that ship was secure and had safe conduct across the seas to bring that cheese to the market; do you not see that if Britain's supremacy on the sea was lost and there was doubt of our produce getting to the British markets in safety, it would mean to the farmers of Ontario, of Quebec, and of all Canada, absolute and utter ruin?

In the face of these facts, in the face of the fact that for the next ten or fifteen years of waiting for a navy even if the policy of the leader of the Opposition had been carried out, we would absolutely have to depend upon Britain's naval supremacy for the security of our ports and of our commerce; in the face of all these facts hon. gentlemen opposite have quibbled about a Canadian navy taking part in Britain's wars, and they quibble now about giving out of our abundant revenue a matter of thirty-five million dollars to show to Britain and to the world that in the matter of the defence of the Empire and in the matter of our own self-interest, Canada is bound to stand by the Motherland and the Empire. Germany has been preparing for years by building great ships of war. Why is Germany doing this? Germany, as Lord Roberts said, will strike when Germany's hour has struck. We need only look to the history of the past for proof of this. Germany's dealings with Denmark, her dealings with Austria, her dealings with France in 1870, all support that view. Everyone believes that the fight if fight there should be will take place in the North Sea and that there are only two ways by which the German navy can get near Canada, either by going through the English Channel or going north through the North Sea. So long as England's navy is supreme, our naval unit on the Atlantic or on the Pacific as proposed by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, would be just as secure as a party of tourists on the lakes of Muskoka and just as ineffective, from the standpoint of taking any part in Imperial defence. And, if Great Britain loses, what then? I have pictured as well as I could, and the hon. member for Edmonton has pictured in the words of his which I have quoted, what might be in store for us in case of such a disaster.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall mention to hon. gentlemen a few of the things which Great Britain has done for Canada:

1. When Canada as an infant nation needed soldiers to support her growth and maintain her interests, British troops and fortifications were maintained here at a cost of $300,000,000 during the nineteenth century.

2. If our churches in the early days wanted vast sums for pioneer work and continued development, British voluntary societies contributed $100,000,000 during the nineteenth century.

3. When provincial credit was poor and interprovincial unity a dream, Great Britain guaranteed loans to the extent of $25,000,000 that our railways might be started.

4. If in recent years countless enterprises, private and national, required vast sums of money it has been freely accorded in London to the extent of over 2,000 millions dollars. Some may say that British money has been invested here in order that British capital might get interest, but there is another side to that question, and that is that we have been able to get British capital in our country for our national enterprises at a lower rate of interest than we could possibly have obtained that money if we had not been under the prestige and protection of the British flag.

5. When we wanted to build our canals, a Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk, Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific, we have obtained the money in London at a rate of interest and with a facility which no small nation not under the prestige of the British flag and not having British power and stability to guarantee its position, could possibly have consummated.

6. During all these years, our overseas trade, which is steadily increasing, has never been disturbed by the shadow of a fear because of the unquestioned naval supremacy of Britain to which we have never contributed one dollar.

Let me tell the House what was contributed to Britain by the overseas dominions towards naval expenditure in the year 1911: Australia gave $1,000,000, New Zealand $500,000, South Africa $425,000, Newfoundland $15,000, India $500,000, and Canada, as yet, I am ashamed to say, not one single cent. I think we owe it to ourselves, and to our own self-respect, to say nothing of what we owe to England, that Canada should take some part now in the naval defence of the Empire. These gentlemen opposite quibble about this grant of thirty-five million dollars to the Motherland, and they say it may affect our autonomy, but there was no quibbling about autonomy at the time we voted $50,000 in this House to the relief of the sufferers from the Paris floods; there was no quibbling about autonomy when we granted sums of money in this Parliament for the relief of the afflicted people in San Francisco and Martinique. Let me ask if Australia or New Zealand or any of the other overseas dominions lost any of their autonomy by contributions on the naval question? It is nothing but quibbling to refer to the matter in that way.

In conclusion, allow me to say that I support the proposition of my leader, because in the absence of preparation it is the only thing we can do to retain a semblance of our damaged self-respect, and to demonstrate to the world that the Empire is a unit. I support it because we do not wish to be any longer in the humiliating position of being regarded as the charity ward of the British Empire. I support it because, should the day of Britain's trial come, should the fight take place in the North sea, I, as a Canadian and a British subject, would like to see vessels representative of Canada in the battle line as well as the battleships of Australia, New Zealand and the other overseas dominions. I support it because I believe, as others more able than I have stated, it will have a deterrent effect on German dreadnought building, and therefore our contribution is a contribution to peace. I support it, because it is a forward step in our constitutional relations with Great Britain, making as it does in the direction of that closer unity which is essential to the integrity of the British Empire, and is the world's best guarantee for the security of commerce and the peace of the world. I support it in preference to the policy of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, because his policy is a policy of semi-detachment, whereas our policy is a policy of closer union. I support it, because I believe it makes for the fulfilment of Canada's destiny; it is a step forward to the time when Canada will be the dominant and controlling factor in the greatest empire that the world has ever seen; it is a step towards that time when Canada, having, as it is bound to have in the course of time a larger population than any other portion of the British Empire, will be the keystone in the arch of nations, will occupy a position at the head of the British Empire, and is destined, I believe, to perform a great work in this world in bringing about the peace of all nations and the end of war.

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, before entering into the subject of this debate, I think that I should congratulate hon. members on both sides of the House upon the excellence of the speeches which have been delivered here since the Christmas adjournment, and express my regret that I should be the first to spoil this eloquence. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) who has just taken his seat, has made what may be considered from a Conservative point of view, an excellent speech. He has ably presented many of the arguments already given in support of the resolution, but I fail to see that a long discussion, concerning the names that the Liberals should suggest for boats they do not want, can prove the necessity of this immediate contribution. I am very sure it is not going to make them acceptable to the Liberal party of Canada. I also fail to see how a reference to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and the fact that he rose or did not rise to sing the National Anthem, can have any great bearing on the case. He did, however, give us some information concerning himself, and I think that he was more consistent than his fellow-members when this Naval Bill was presented. He said that he did not rise to sing the National Anthem, but that he rose to sing 'Rule Britannia'; he started to sing 'Rule Britannia,' but was drowned out. In the presence of this policy 'Rule Britannia' was certainly very much more appropriate than 'O Canada' or 'The Maple Leaf Forever,' and even more appropriate as a party anthem than 'God Save the King'; I say more appropriate as a party anthem than 'God Save the King,' because the Liberal party in Canada takes no second place when it comes to proving by deeds and not only by words its attachment and its loyalty to our King and country. The hon. member, according to his usual custom, wasted much time in an effort to prove from past statements that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition is so disloyal that he is hardly worthy of being called a Canadian. He read many shortened sentences from speeches made by my leader in years gone by, but even after searching for the worst, he found not one word that was not an expression of loyalty to Canada, to that country which he transformed from a colony to a nation, and in which he is considered by friend and foe alike, as the greatest of Canadian statesmen. He perhaps forgets that a certain number of the leaders of the Conservative party did not have the same opinion of the loyalty of the right hon. leader of the Opposition when they asked the Prime Minister to confer with him, and when they asked him to assist Mr. Borden in taking this naval question out of politics where the present Prime Minister had placed it. He says that the Borden naval policy meets with the approval of the nine provinces of Canada. If he is so sure, if his leaders are so sure, why not prove it by an appeal to the people? We are ready and willing to meet the Conservative party upon the hustings of Canada upon this question. We would prefer to see a redistribution Bill put through first in order that all parts of Canada may have in the next Parliament the representation that they are entitled to, but, redistribution or not, we are ready to meet them whenever they see fit. Frontenac may return the same hon. member, but if he wins his election with speeches like the one which we have just heard, by making personal attacks on our greatest Canadians, I, for one, will have a poor opinion of the electorate of Frontenac. The other arguments, the serious arguments contained in the speech of my hon. friend from Frontenac, were very well presented; but they are all to be found in different words in the speech pronounced in this House on the same subject a few weeks ago by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). Long before I ever imagined that I would have the honour one day of representing the good old county of Shefford in this Parliament, I had learned, through the press and upon the hustings, of the great ability of the hon. minister. I was anxious to learn myself that these reports were true. I had the pleasure of listening to him during the last session, but it was not until the day of the adjournment for the Christmas holidays that I became convinced that he was really an extraordinary debater. In discussing this resolution for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, he showed himself not only a great debater, but he made us believe that he was a lawyer and an excellent lawyer, that is if one who can make a bad case look like a good case, can really be called an excellent lawyer. For almost three hours encouraged by the well-deserved cheers of his fellow members on the other side of the House, who were certainly justified in showing their appreciation of a real speech, he was in turn historian, narrator, defender and critic; he was in turn severe, sarcastic, eloquent, loyal and imperialist; he gave new energy, new life and new hope to the Canadian Conservative party. In a word, he made a speech which will go down to posterity and be recorded in history side by side with, almost equal to, but entirely different from the speech pronounced in this Parliament in March 1909 by the same hon. member for North Toronto.

He then spoke in favour of a Canadian navy. He now supports a resolution whereby the right hon. the Prime Minister proposes to borrow from the people of Great Britain, and hand back to the people of Great Britain for the construction of three dreadnoughts, the sum of $35,000,000. It may be argued that this amount is to be taken from revenue, but if it is, a like amount will have to be borrowed for our permanent public works. In other words, Canada will accomplish her share in the defence of the British Empire; Canada will save that Empire from its present dreadful predicament; Canada will do away with the present emergency; Canada will wipe out the German peril—by borrowing the sum of thirty-five million dollars, and then handing it back.

It certainly required the eloquence and ability of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, to clothe the proposition so as to make it acceptable to the hon. members who occupy seats on the other side of this House. He was not unequal to the task, but I am sure that he did not succeed in convincing hon. members on this side and the people of Canada that this contribution would be either as effective or as loyal as a Canadian navy, built and equipped in Canada, manned by Canadians, controlled by Canada for the defence of our Canadian coasts and ready to go to the assistance of the British navy at a moment's notice if England were on trial. He did not convince the people of Canada that the Prime Minister deserved nothing but credit, and the leader of the Opposition deserved nothing but blame. He did not succeed in making you forget, Mr. Speaker, that the veteran statesman who leads the Opposition to-day was the first to take the responsibility of inducing the people of this country to go one step further in the manifestation of their loyalty to Canada and the Empire, by laying the foundation of a Canadian navy.

He did nothing and said nothing to prove that an emergency existed, save and except that the right hon. Mr. Borden was Prime Minister of Canada, and that because the Prime Minister said so, it must be so.

He did not contradict a line nor a word contained in the report from the Admiralty which was read to this House when the Bill was presented and which discloses no emergency, not even a pressing need. He did not succeed in making the Nationalist electors of Quebec—I mean those who voted Nationalist in September 1911, but very few of whom will ever do so again—forget that they had voted for the followers of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, because they believed that these candidates, when elected, would vote against every contribution of any kind to Imperial defence.

He was unable to convince those Nationalist candidates who were elected in September 1911, and who seized upon the Prime Minister's promise of a plebiscite or referendum to justify their allegiance to the Tory party, that they will be able to vote for this resolution and be re-elected in their respective counties.

He was unable to make the electors of Quebec county believe that this contribution would be not only a plebiscite but even better than a plebiscite. He was unable to make any true Canadian believe that Canadian liberty and Canadian autonomy would not suffer by the payment of an unsolicited, unrequired and unwarranted tribute to the Mother Country. He was unable to prove, even by a statement from the Prime Minister, that the Hon. George E. Foster of 1912 was a greater statesman or that he loved his country more than the Hon. George Foster of 1909.

Let us see what the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said in this House in March of that year. He was speaking of contributions:

That is the idea which is in my mind—that when we make our contributions in the way of a fixed sum, and it goes from us, and we are not responsible for it, we have none of the inspiration arising from the growth and development of a system of future defence in our own country. We are deprived of the larger benefit ourselves, and in the future we do no greater service to the Empire of which we form a part, in this matter of defence.

The next day March 29, 1909, in this same House of Commons, he said:

The first Canadian-owned vessel, built and equipped in Britain, and sent out to defend our coast would become the nucleus and the training-ground of Canadian stokers, Canadian sailors and Canadian officers, and by-and-by perhaps of a Canadian Admiral on the Canadian coast. How much time would be taken in completing that circle none of us can say, but if we begin the tracing of it and follow it fairly faithfully, the time must come when we get a complete circle, and have an Imperial adjunct to the British navy for the defence of Canada and the defence of the Empire, in which Canada has some of her body, her bones, her blood and her mental power, her national pride.

We have already agreed with him to the extent of purchasing the two first vessels to form the nucleus of a Canadian navy. But conditions have changed. Another issue came before the people of Canada and we have changed sides in this House. We have changed sides, but we have not lost our interest in Canada; we have not lost our love for Canada and things Canadian, we are still ready and willing to assist in the defence of the Empire in case of emergency or need; but we have not changed our opinions. We are sorry that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has changed his opinions.

Canada to-day is better able to defend herself and the Empire than in 1909. We do not find the amount proposed at all excessive, but we do ask that, instead of giving this money to a nation rich, prosperous and more than able to take care of herself, it be spent at home, and that the greatest possible portion of it may find its way into the pockets of our mechanics, our labourers, our foundrymen, our builders; then later into the pockets of our sailors, our officers, and through all these to our traders and farmers.

With our navy will grow our national pride and our loyalty to Canada, as part and a precious part of the British Empire. Instead of comparing the plans of the British Admiralty with her own plans and adding three more dreadnoughts to her fighting force to keep pace with the British navy, Germany and the other nations of the world will see a rising young nation on the northern half of the American continent building a navy of her own in order that she may, in the poetic words of the poetic member for Brandon, say to whoever dares strike at any part of the Empire:

Aggressor, spare that tree,
Touch not a single bough;
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll stand by it now.

It was certainly very able of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to compare the sister nations of the Empire to one large family:

Six children, grown-up men, we will say, from eighteen to thirty years old, in one family. Two men are sent to the defence of their country; four remain at home. Do you say to the four who remain at home: You have no part or lot in this matter? One of those remaining at home provides a rifle, another a kit, another gives a bible—or perhaps it is the mother that does that—another gives his prayers, his hopes, his good wishes. The whole family is in it—the whole family!

A beautiful word-picture, such as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce alone can paint. But we on this side of the House do not consider that Canada will be doing her duty by remaining at home, and giving her prayers, her hopes, and her good wishes. We do not consider that Canada will be doing her duty by supplying a kit or a rifle. Australia is getting ready to go to the front when needed and we want Canada to be there too.

We are not in favour of a contribution with a string attached. What will England do with her officers and her men placed upon these dreadnoughts when Canada sees fit to call them back? Will she dismiss them from the service and ruin their futures? Will she place them upon a pension list? Or will she build new vessels to be manned by them? The Prime Minister of Great Britain was not far wrong, if he made the statement, attributed to him by certain newspapers, that Canada was killing England with kindness.

An argument, considered by some to be a weighty one, in favour of the contribution is that the British Admiralty, with its years of experience, knows better than this Parliament, how to spend the money to the best possible advantage. If an emergency really exists, why not give the money instead of the lifeless dreadnoughts?

The right hon. leader of the Opposition said he would be in favour—that the Liberal party would be in favour—of donating four times thirty-five millions if an emergency really existed. It would be a gift of good Canadian money, and not three lifeless war vessels. In a few years from now, it would be a powerful Canadian navy. But the Lords of the Admiralty say there is no emergency. Let me refer again to their report or memorandum. Paragraph seven reads as follows:

At the present time, and in the immediate future, Great Britain still has the power, by making special arrangements and mobilizing a portion of the reserves, to send, without courting disaster at home, an effective fleet of battleships and cruisers to unite with the Royal Australian navy and the British squadrons in China and the Pacific for the defence of British Columbia, Australia and New Zealand. And these communities are also protected and their interests safeguarded by the power and authority of Great Britain so long as her naval strength is unbroken.

And paragraph nine:

Whatever may be the decision of Canada at the present juncture, Great Britain will not in any circumstances fail in her duty to the overseas dominions of the Crown. She has before now successfully made head alone and unaided against the most formidable combinations, and she has not lost her capacity by a wise policy and strenuous exertions to watch over and preserve the vital interests of the Empire.

That is why we are not in favour of giving millions to-day, but, on the other hand, we are anxious to assume our share in the protection of our country and the Empire, in order that the next memorandum issued by the British Admiralty at the request of a Canadian prime minister, may refer not only to the Royal Australian navy, but also to the Royal Canadian navy as well.

We are anxious to comply with the so-called request of the Admiralty contained in the last paragraph, which reads as follows:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having enquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that the request is that such aid will 'include' and not that such aid will 'consist of' the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest men-of-war that science can build or money can buy. The amendment supported by the Liberal party includes two of the largest and strongest men-of-war, and the boats required to form two fleet units. In my opinion it complies with the so-called request much better than the boats to be built and loaned by the Borden policy.

I referred a few moments ago to the real speech made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I did not mean to infer that no other speeches have been made on the other side. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) made an excellent speech, but he must have forgotten that in his own province he has over 500 miles of an undefended, many islanded shore. He may learn in the near future, if he still holds the opinion expressed in this House a few weeks ago, that the view taken by Sir Richard McBride that the prime duty of Canada is to defend the coasts of British Columbia, is more popular with the right-thinking sane Canadian of to-day, than the give-and-take back, borrow-and-lend policy of the right hon. the Prime Minister. There have been other able speeches supporting the resolution, but we have not yet heard from the hon. the Secretary of State. Will he repeat in his speech, if he makes one, the statements made at Longue Pointe in the province of Quebec, in August, 1910? According to Le Devoir, he then said: :

> Speakers are touring through our counties blaming not only the Government who voted the nefarious navy law, but also the Federal Conservative opposition, who supported a still more nefarious policy. We rally to the principles of Mr. Monk, refusing to contribute either in boats or in money, until the people have been consulted, and we believe that this attitude, not that of the Government or that of the Opposition, is the truly patriotic policy. In 1776 and 1812 our ancestors defended our country: We ourselves would be ready to repel an invasion, but we refuse to go out to fight for motives which we ignore or even for motives we know too well, take those at the bottom of the South African war, provoked by speculative financial interests, and we are convinced that if the electors could voice their opinion, the majority would condemn both the Government Bill and the Borden policy.

The province of Quebec is awaiting with anxiety to hear and read the speech to be delivered by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel).

He is a member of the Government; he was consulted by his colleagues before this policy was adopted, and his opinion probably had great weight in the framing of this policy. He was obliged to disagree with his former colleague, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). He felt obliged, I am sure, from no other motive than the good of his country and the welfare of its people, to retain his seat in the Cabinet, and the people of Quebec are anxious to hear from his own lips, in his own inimitable language, the reasons why he is right and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is wrong. They will compare this speech with much interest and curiosity, with the words used by him in the county of St. Jean-Iberville in the autumn of 1910, when, always according to Le Devoir, he said:

> I will now define the three attitudes taken by Messers. Laurier, Borden and Monk in the House of Commons. . . . Mr. Laurier wants at any cost, a navy which will be Imperial in time of war and Canadian in time of peace. Mr. Borden, instead of a navy, wanted us to immediately give to England a contribution of $25,000,000, Mr. Monk asked that the people be consulted before anything was done in connection with this policy. . . . (cheers). The first thing to be expected from a politician is that he should preach in power the same doctrine that he preached in opposition. Those who occupy the Government benches to-day are not the men of 14 years ago, they are not those of 10 years ago, they are not even those of two years ago. For this reason we ask you to banish them from power. If ever our party takes the reins of government in this country, I, for one, promise that I will remain true to my principles of to-day. And if I did not, well, I would ask those who placed us in power to drive us out again.

These hon. gentlemen who have accepted portfolios in the Borden Government have not retained all the liberty of action of the brilliant young member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche), who voted against his leader upon the Mondou amendment to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, but who did not forget to say, as reported in 'Hansard' page 593:

> I may say that I have to follow the duties of my conscience before the duties of my party, and to support this amendment. It is with great sorrow I affirm that I have again to differ with many political friends whom I very much esteem, and whose views I hope I will in the future have reason to support. I wish hon. gentlemen also to understand that by voting for this amendment I do not look for a plank to cross over to the ranks of the Liberal party.

How nice it must be to belong to a party where it is so easy to agree to disagree in order to retain the reins of power and the fruits of victory. The hon. the Postmaster General is not in this class, although a member of the same political family. He admits that he disagrees with his leader and allies of yesterday to agree with his friends of to-day. His transformation from a Nationalist to a jingo is not quite complete. He fears that he will not be recognized by his electors if he goes clear over with one bound, so, in addressing this House upon the resolution under discussion, he blamed the Liberal party for proposing to man the ships which we want to build, and he had not spoken five minutes before he imagined himself back among the Nationalists of Quebec and took up his old refrain about the shedding of our blood. Is it any wonder that the jingoes left him talking to empty benches?

Mr. LEMIEUX: His paper said that the House was full, that the benches were packed.

Mr. BOIVIN: He said that if the Laurier navy law were adopted conscription would be necessary. Does he mean that loyalty is dead in Canada? There was loyalty at the time of the South African war as attested by monuments in cities and villages to the boys who were killed upon the veldt. There are others ready and willing to serve the flag. Patriotism is not dead. There will be men to serve in the Canadian navy. I know a young man, a cousin of mine, from the town of St. Johns, Que., who has enlisted in the United States navy, simply because he had no navy of his own in Canada in which to enlist. No, loyalty and patriotism are not dead. There is nothing in the Naval Act or in the amendment under discussion which even suggests conscription, and if ever Great Britain is involved in a maritime war, if ever our Canadian navy takes its place in the firing line, the hon. Postmaster General can remain at home, as he did in the Richelieu by-election, where he placed some one else behind the guns which so far have been unable to capture any large number of seat from His Majesty's loyal Opposition.

One of the marvels of the relationship between the self-governing dominions and the Mother Country has been that as every tie was removed there was more loyalty and more attachment. Britain learned in the infancy of her empire building that to give freedom was to gain loyalty; to release a people was to bind them tightly; to bestow power was to have it more abundantly. She won Canada and set her free; she peopled Australia and gave her liberty; she subdued New Zealand and sent her on her way rejoicing; she conquered South Africa and then returned her to her foes. With every extension of freedom to these great young nations the tie that binds became stronger and more enduring. We are willing to sacrifice for her, not only a paltry sum of money but in the words of the hon. leader of the Opposition, 'our hearts, our brains and our brawn.'

What England does not dare take; what England does not ask for Parliament has no right to give, without at least first obtaining a special mandate from the people of Canada. Other grave and important questions have been decided by an appeal to the Canadian public. Sometimes we have won; sometimes we have lost, but we have always respected the verdict rendered. When we fell it was with our face to the sun, wounded but not dead nor disheartened. And to-day we are ready to fight again for what we consider to be the birthright of our Canadian nationhood. We are not guided in this matter by a small Canadianism, nor by a jingoistic Imperialism, but are jealous of our rights and liberties. Confident of our present position and of our future, true to the interests of the Dominion, recognizing the interests of the Empire, let us all, as Canadians, whether French speaking or English speaking, place ourselves in a position to defend our own shores and meet any and every emergency as it may arise by placing the Royal Canadian navy built, paid for, equipped, manned and controlled by Canada, at the disposal of the Empire.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the very carefully prepared essay of my hon. friend the member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin). I congratulate him on the brevity of his deliverance and the cleverness with which he has arrayed the arguments of the various speakers whom he has introduced to our attention. But, he will perhaps pardon me, as I do not wish to occupy too much of the time of the House, if I proceed at once to debate the question of the naval assistance that is proposed at the present time to the British Empire by the proposition which has been laid before the House by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government. The proposals that have been made by the First Minister mark an epoch in the history of Canada and the Empire as a whole. I had the honour, Sir, for some years, of being a fairly close student of the question of Empire unity, particularly in regard to trade and defence. Therefore, I trust that I may be excused if I go over some of the ground that may have already been traversed by some of the speakers and give in my own words what I conceive to be the present position of the question of the naval defence of the Empire. There has been, during this discussion, an attempt made to fasten upon various members upon both sides of the House views that were held in the year 1909. On that occasion you will recall that there was a resolution submitted to the House of Commons that received what we were told was the unanimous support of both sides. That resolution, Sir, called, I believe, for a Canadian navy. There is little doubt but what the members who were in the House on that occasion were pretty well united on the principle of a Canadian navy to assist in the defence of the Empire. There was, however, in the Dominion of Canada and in the province of Ontario, particularly, a very large element that was opposed to the principle of that resolution and that openly expressed its dissatisfaction with it; in fact, so strong was that feeling in Ontario that Sir James Whitney was requested from one part of the province and another to go over the heads of the House here and himself make from the province of Ontario a contribution of one or two dreadnoughts. In other words, the people of Ontario held, in 1909, the views that are held by the Premier and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to-day. The people of Ontario who had that view at that day were right and that is what the country wants to know now. It is not so much what were your views in 1909, but are you right to-day.

That is what the country is concerned in, and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in my judgment, the Premier of Canada has submitted, in his proposals to the House, a measure that covers, to the best of his ability and to the best of the ability of the men who surround him, the requirements of the British Empire to-day. There has been a long amendment moved to which I shall take occasion to refer from time to time during the course of my remarks.

Some of the reasons that are given why we in Canada should assist at the present time have already been enumerated to-day by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). We have a large sea-borne commerce, we have a long coast line to defend, we have the ability to pay, we have threathening armaments among the nations of the earth and there is greater safety in a strong united fleet than in scattered fleets. For all these reasons we should contribute at the present time a sum of money to produce certain vessels that will take their places in the firing line of the Empire fleet and which, at the same time, will remain the property of the Dominion of Canada and can be recalled should we ever set about the placing of a navy of our own upon the high seas. It is all very well to be consistent and, as I have said, in 1909, there was a widespread feeling that a contribution should be made rather than that a Canadian navy should be built.

I had the honour in the year 1909 of attending a distinguished Imperial gathering in the city of Sydney, Australia. The question of the defence of the Empire was one of the principal subjects under consideration and on that occasion the following resolution was submitted:

That this congress views with much satisfaction the interest shown by the colonies in the recent discussions relating to the maintenance of the naval supremacy of the Empire, and desires to record in its proceedings the valuable assistance which they voluntarily proffered on that occasion; and further expresses the hope that either before or at the next Imperial Conference some practical scheme may be elaborated which will result in an active and organized co-operation between the Mother Country and the dominions beyond the seas for the defence of the Empire, its commerce, and trade routes; that this congress hereby affirms the principle that it is the duty of the self-governing colonies to participate in the cost of the defence of the Empire.

That is the resolution which was submitted to this great British gathering which was assembled from all parts of the Empire. On that occasion I had the honour of representing the city of Toronto and in order that I may show, Sir, that in that day I held the view which is now being presented to the House—that is that a contribution is the proper thing—I desire to call the attention of the House to what I then said. I find that I then spoke as follows:

There is no subject attracting more attention than this one at the present time within the Empire. Little short of a crisis has suddenly arisen. What is to be done to adequately meet the emergency? It is, I think, evident to all that the Oversea Dominions must shoulder their share. This they are all ready to do, at least to some extent. Without adequate defence nothing is secure, and no part is so remote as to be exempt from danger. It has been made evident that all our dominions are ready to answer to the call. The fabric of our Empire rests solely on the strength of the British navy. Let the British navy be wiped out, and the Empire will fade away like mown grass under a tropical sun. It is, therefore, imperative, that the fleet on which our Empire depends should be invincible under any probable or even possible condition. This load has become too heavy for the Mother Country. How will the Oversea Dominions assist? The proposition that each unit should build a small navy to defend its own shores seems to me quite insufficient to meet the crisis. Small and widely-scattered fleets will be of little use as before they could possibly mobilize, the great fight would be over, and the transcendent issues of the struggle would be past the possibility of recall. It is, therefore, evident in my opinion that each dominion or estate must contribute money or ships. The Empire navy must speak with the voice and power of the Empire. Should the main fleet be too weak or inefficient to cope with the enemy, it would be a fatal mistake that could never be rectified. The main and almost sole objection to this contribution is that we cannot have a voice in the expenditure and control. This is a very serious objection, and brings to the forefront the question of Empire organization, a great problem, too, that must be grappled with and solved.

I read that to show that in 1909 I was, as I am today, in favor of a contribution of men and money and ships to the British Empire. I believe thoroughly in the unity of the British Empire and one fleet with full co-operation in trade and for defence.

There is a very sharp line drawn between the naval policy of the Conservative party, as announced by the Prime Minister and the naval policy of the Liberal party, as set forth in the resolution of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. The Conservative policy follows the line I have suggested of making contributions to maintoin the supremacy of the British fleet upon the high seas, and the Liberal policy of today seeks to enlarge somewhat on the Liberal policy of 1909 as embraced in the Naval Service Act of Canada. In my judgment, the Liberal policy, is not warranted by the success which has attended the fleet known as the Laurier Navy which the late Government tried to set in motion.

An unfortunate blot upon the character of Canada, as being competent to carry out great undertakings, is the lamentable failure of the Naval Act of 1910. The Liberal Government set out with a flourish of trumpets; we were to have a navy of our own, and the Rainbow and the Niobe were purchased, and one was placed on the Pacific and the other on the Atlantic Coast. That fleet has been very well described as being too weak to fight and too slow to run away. What has become of the Laurier navy? Some two years ago the Niobe being sent to a political picnic somewhere in Nova Scotia, struck upon a rock, was laid in dry-dock for six months, and it cost us a quarter of a million dollars to repair her. Since then she has been lost track of. The Rainbow on the Pacific coast is, I am informed, tied up at her dock, unable to navigate the seas for want of hands to man her. In face of their experience in this line, gentlemen opposite tell us that Canada should man these three great dreadnoughts which we propose to give to the navy of England.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) grew eloquent in declaring that it would be a disgrace to Canada if a battle should be fought upon the high seas and if there were no Canadians manning our ships. Of course, it is a very fine idea to have these ships manned by Canadians, but it is not likely to be realized in the very near future. Any hon. member of this House who has seen a modern dreadnought will easily understand what skill and knowledge is required to sail such a ship and to operate these immense guns which can hit a target several miles away and penetrate nickel-steel armour over one foot thick. There are several difficulties in the way of providing men for the ships in such a country as Canada. One difficulty is that Canadians cannot be found to give their services for fifty cents a day which is the usual pay of a British seaman. Another difficulty is that Canada is not what you would call a seafaring country and we have not a very large element in our population who are accustomed to take to the sea as a calling. Another difficulty—and I shall dwell upon it for a few moments, because it has not been touched during the present debate,—is that Canadians have not been encouraged by our public speakers and by those who ought be leaders of thought in Canada, to take part in either the military or the naval defence of their country. I could give the names of some who have actually gone about this country preaching that men should not learn the art of war, that this is the day of universal arbitration, and disarmament, and that it is little short of a crime for a man to enlist either in the army or the navy of his country. If any hon. gentleman opposite doubts that I can give him the names of men, prominent in the Liberal ranks, who have preached this unpatriotic doctrine throughout the land. Indeed, to such an extent has this gone, that in some cases if a man should dare to declare that he was in favor of his country being ready for self-defence, he has not only been called a brute, but branded as being unfit for church membership. Even since this debate began, a notable figure in the Liberal party in the City of Toronto has put himself on record that war is legalized murder, and that those who engage in war are legalized murderers. This, is one reason why men are slow to enlist in our militia and naval forces. I have seen the fences throughout the country placarded during the Laurier regime with big posters asking for men to enlist in the Laurier navy. How many men enlisted in all those departments? A mere handful, and most of those have already got tired and are out of the service; many have deserted from the ships that they enlisted upon. Why is all this? It is because wrong ideals are set before the people. I make the statement that, in my judgment, the men of this country will never rally to support Canada either on land or on water until there is a different spirit of patriotism inspired in the people of the Dominion of Canada. It is time that this sort of thing ceased in a country such as Canada. I have sailed the Atlantic many times; I have visited all the principal countries of Europe; I have also sailed around the world; and I make the statement here to-night, without any fear of contradiction, that there is no country in the world to-day that has so much to defend and so little to defend it with as the Dominion of Canada. Anyone who knows anything about the nations of the earth knows that that is true. Yet we have in our midst men who call themselves patriotic, who call themselves religious, that go about this country advocating that men do not do their duty by enlisting in the army or the navy. I say that it is time, in my judgment, that this sort of thing ceased. I believe that it is possible for a man to be both a Christian and a soldier or a sailor; and I am prepared to state that, in the face of both the Church and the State. The pages of history, both sacred and profane, will bear out that statement. You may travel round the world; you may visit all the great countries of the earth; and you will find the men who have left a lasting reputation and have stamped their race and day and generation upon humanity, have been the men who have been ready to defend and die for their country and their home. Visit the various countries of Europe and what will you find? Go to France the home of the ancestors of my hon. friend opposite; what do you find in France? Visit the picture galleries; walk about the streets of Paris or of any of the great provincial cities and what will you find? Monuments to the great prowess of that tremendous leader of men, Napoleon. All honour to him who won the battles and who fought on many a bloody field and won many a decisive victory, that made the hills and the dales of the country of France resound with pæans to the praise of a man who had brought such acclaim to French arms and to French dominions in the then know world. Visit Germany; what do you find there? Monuments to such men as Bismarck, Frederick the Great, the great Emperor William, and others who have fought the battles of their country and have won on many a bloody field. Come home to our own native land, the Mother Country. What do you find there? When you go to London, observe the great central figure in that metropolitan city of the Empire. Everyone knows Trafalgar Square and what do we see there, the very highest monument in that great city of London, containing seven millions of people, erected to whom? A thin spare man, who led the naval forces of the Empire upon the high seas and who brought fame to England, such a victory that down to the present time we have been partakers of that great and glorious victory of Trafalgar which settled the destiny of the Empire upon that occasion. There that monument stands to-day, the topmost peak of London, and on top of it the thin spare figure of Admiral Nelson, with these words, 'England expects that every man this day will do his duty.' I want my hon. friend to drop the word 'autonomy' occasionally and use the word 'duty.' This country is sick and tired of the word 'autonomy'; it has been worked to death; nothing can be done without disturbing our 'autonomy.' Here we have it now; we are jeopardizing our 'autonomy' by making this gift. I ask that this nobler word of 'duty' be inscribed on the banners of this country and that Canadians rise to the dignity of occasionally doing their duty. I can see that the proposition that is laid before you by the right hon. the Prime Minister is a measure of our duty.

I have not yet got through with what constitutes the glorious part of the British Empire; it is not alone in her monuments outside. I am sorry my friend the member for Red Deer is not in the House, because I think he would be able to follow me in this. I want to take you for a moment within the precincts of the church, because I have said that I believe it is competent for a soldier to be a Christian also. I want to take you within the few cathedrals that stand out prominently in the national life of Great Britain, those two cathedrals that every man who visits the Old Land never fails to enter, Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral. Enter these sacred edifices and what do you find? As you pass down the aisles of these two grand churches erected to the worship of God, what do you see? Pass along. You read tablet after tablet and memorial after memorial, to whom? Not to the saints departed who from their labours rest, not to the great speakers who have filled the pulpits of those churches, but you read on monument after monument and tablet after tablet these words, 'Died gloriously fighting for his country.' That is what you read upon the monuments in the Church of England in Great Britain. Our church is doing wrong if it does not hold up to the gaze of mankind, and pose before them as men to be emulated, those men who fought for their country and bled and died that we might have the privilege and freedom and salvation that we have to-day in Canada and throughout the broad Empire. What the Church of England has inscribed both in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, are words such as these, Nelson, Wellington, Sir John Moore, Napier, and others, every one of them with this inscription: 'Died gloriously fighting for his country.' There are hundreds of such memorials in those two great cathedrals; whereas to the speakers who occupied the pulpits you can scarcely find one. Therefore, I say that the national church of Great Britain has set its seal to it, that a man may be a saint and also a soldier, a Christian and also a fighting man. I say that the sooner that this country gets some of that idea into its mind, the better for our defences both by land and sea. These things have been deprecated in the past; and it is time I think that we have a little plain speaking on these two particular points, because every one knows that a man who enlists either in our militia or in our navy must be of a self-sacrificing and patriotic disposition; he must take, in other words, part in dollars and cents and part of pay in patriotism and self-sacrifice for the good of his country and his Empire. That is what will reward them; and for this reason I think that every member of this House both here and in the country at the present time should hold up the cause that asks for the defence of the Empire in a way that will lead it to be supreme no matter who the enemy may be that assails it. I have in my heart not the slightest feeling against any nation in the world. But I do say that, in my opinion, it is time that we should consider very carefully what we are going to do under the circumstances. Those to whom I have already referred, those who go about preaching disarmament and arbitration, found very poor encouragement for their views in the year 1912. What has happened in the year just closed? Six or seven of the nations of Europe have been involved in a most bloody war, which is not yet finished by any means. The little country of Bulgaria, with not half the resources of Canada—not one-quarter—and with a population much less than ours, placed within a month 400,000 men in the field; and in this war they have lost nearly as many men as Great Britain lost in the South African war. There is a sample of a country that was ready for an emergency. I shall have a little to say about this word 'emergency' in a minute or two. But now I draw the attention of the House for a few moments to the fact that European nations have been involved in war during the past year. Twelve months ago he would have been a bold man who would have ventured to give the opinion that any war would be going on in Europe at the present time. Arbitration and disarmament were being preached throughout the world, and universal settlement of disputes by arbitration called for. Still, we find within twelve months, six or seven of the countries of Europe have been involved in a most bloody war, a war that is going to change the whole map of Europe. And no one can tell where it will end. Before another twelve month runs by, it may be that several of the great powers of Europe will be involved in the worst war the world has ever known. Talk about disarmament for a country like Canada, where we have a comparatively small number of militia—scarcely a thousand regular troops probably in the whole Dominion—and not a ship that could meet an enemy on one coast or the other, not a fortified position on the left or on the right, on the east or or on the west, why, to preach, disarmament in a country like this seems to me little short of suicide. What we want in Canada to-day is the spirit of patriotism, for patriotism will lead the people to enlist, will make them ready to exhibit a spirit of self-sacrifice; and it will call into play all those elements of the human mind that enter into the construction of the best man the world knows—the true patriot. War, I say, calls out all those elements in mankind, and we in Canada should not be slow to encourage both the military and the naval spirit at this time. But, unfortunately, we cannot do it in time to assist the great Mother Country if we believe that this national emergency is as close upon us as it appears to be. Therefore it is that the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada has come forward with the proposition that we should vote $35,000,000 to help to construct three of the best ships that science can build and that money can buy. This vote, Sir, will be passed in this House, without a doubt, and it will be passed by a large majority. It is to be regretted that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not in line on this proposition. This proposition was submitted to the House on December 5, about five or six weeks ago. The right hon. gentleman asked time for reconsideration, and that was granted. Everyone thought that, for once, the leader of the Opposition was going to show himself a patriot, a statesman, a man who stood for Empire unity. But, again, everyone was mistaken. As the Mail and Empire of Toronto so well put it—and nobody could put it in better words, I think: 'He thought long, and he chose wrong.' That is exactly what he did. Instead of rising in his place as every one hoped he would do—every one on both sides of this House, probably—and as every one expected, and stating: 'We will make this unanimous,' he got up and read a long rigamarole of an amendment containing several suggestions, suggestions to do everything but the right thing, everything but what is immediate, everything but what will assist the British Empire in this emergency.

We have heard a good deal about that word 'Emergency.' At the present time, this House is divided into two classes—those who recognize an emergency when they see it, and those who do not; and hon. gentlemen and the right hon. gentleman and those who follow him are among the 'do nots.' That emergency is just as plainly set forth in the documents which have been sent from the Admiralty as words can make it.

This is not the first time that hon. gentlemen opposite have failed to recognize an emergency. Two years ago this month reciprocity was proposed in this House, being brought down with a flourish of trumpets by Hon. Mr. Fielding and Hon. Mr. Paterson. At the moment when they brought that treaty down in this House an emergency arose. But Sir Wilfrid Laurier and those who followed him did not see it. The country did see it. The debate went on in this House for months, and still these hon. gentlemen did not recognize that there was an emergency. But there was. After many months of conflict over it in this House, they decided to go to the country. Still they did not see the emergency. They said, 'We will come back with a bigger majority than ever.' The ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), whom I am glad to see arrive in the House, was among those deceived. He did not see the emergency, and no more did his leader. And up to the very morning of the 21st of September, they declared that there was no emergency. Hon. Mr. Paterson, one of the negotiators of the treaty, said on the streets of Brantford only about three days before the election, 'We are going to come back with a bigger majority than ever; our majority will be sixty.' No emergency, you see. They failed to see the emergency then as they fail to see the emergency now, because they do not wish to see it. But it is there. No man who understands English words can read the document that came from the British Admiralty and not see that there is an emergency. Not only is there an emergency now but there has been an emergency for several months past. The principal countries of Europe to-day are armed camps.

Ship-building is being carried on in the navy yards, both of Great Britain and Germany, with feverish haste—and why? Because the fires that are smoldering will soon burst forth; of that there is not the slightest doubt. Suppose you have a friend who is an elderly man. He has, under one roof, the savings of a lifetime. It is a frame building, not very large, but it contains all his worldly goods. You begin to question him as to how he has succeeded in life, and he says: I have done fairly well, and all that I have is in this building. You say, I hope, my friend, you are insured. He says: Oh, no, I have no insurance. I do not think that is necessary; in fact, my neighbour carries enough insurance for both of us—I am saving that much money. That man is standing on the verge of absolute ruin, he does not realize the existence of an emergency. He says: I am a very careful man: I know that fire will not break out in my premises, as I watch them diligently. But what about his neighbour? He may not be so careful, and the fire may spread and devour his house and all its contents, wiping out the product of the labour of a lifetime. That is a pointed illustration of the position of Canada to-day so far as her defenses are conerned. We depend solely upon the British naval forces; the safety of Canada and the Empire at the present moment rests only upon the British navy and its supremacy. It is said there is no emergency, but can anything be more acute than the position to-day of the great powers of Europe? Talk about disarmament; talk about arbitration for the settlement of disputes; does any man who travels think that disarmament and arbitration are making the headway that it is sometimes claimed for them? If he does, I am sorry for his powers of observation.

During the past year I had the pleasure of visiting Germany, and I saw a midsummer review by the Emperor William in the city of Berlin; consequently I know something of what is going on in that country. I saw 25,000 picked German troops and 4,000 horse being reviewed in the streets, and on the fields adjacent to the city of Berlin. I also visited France, and other countries. To-day Europe is an armed camp; six or seven European nations are at present engaged in a life and death struggle. Canada is the most unprotected country in the whole broad world—and in this statement I defy contradiction—if we wipe out the protection afforded us by the British navy. This I say after having visited most of the principal countries in the world. Never since the days of Adam have there been so many armed men as there are in the world to-day. At the present moment Germany can, within two or three weeks' notice, put in the field 2,000,000 trained men, skilled in arms, and with whom soldiery is a trade. Besides this Germany has in reserve 4,000,000 men, making in that Empire alone 6,000,000 men quickly avaliable in time of emergency. They are in close alliance with Austria and Italy, and it must also be remembered, in debating the strength of the different navies of Europe, that Germany, Austria and Italy are united in the Triple Alliance, and England, France and Russia in what is known as the Entente Cordiale. The three nations making the Triple Alliance are constructing a fleet that in the very near future will equal that of the British navy. As I have said, we depend for our safety upon the supremacy of Britain's navy; have we done anything towards its maintenance? Up to the present, nothing but talk. Not a single dollar has gone from Canada, nor has help been given given in the way of ships, and, in the proposition submitted by hon. gentlemen opposite, nothing would be done for years to come. How long would it take to carry out the proposition of my right hon. friend? Ten years at the very least, and probably fifteen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No more than six.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: And before six years have passed, you will probably see the conflict—yes, in less than half that time. My hon. friend says it will take six years, but I do not think he is competent to judge as to the period of time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have obtained the knowledge from those who know.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: And I have also. I think the hon. gentleman would not like to take the contract of building a dreadnought in ten years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon gentleman tell me how long it will take to equip a shipyard suitable for the construction of a super-dreadnought? Will he venture the opinion it will take more than two years to do it?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I should say it would take four or perhaps five years. In Britain or Germany—and in Germany the ships are built just as quickly as in Britain—it would take from two to three years to build a dreadnought—two or three years, at the earliest, after the keel is laid. So that even if my hon. friend is right, it will take five years to make a dreadnought ready for launching in Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is right.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But I am going to double that time, as I think I am well within the mark, if hon. gentlemen opposite should not proceed faster than they have done with the Laurier navy. They were in power some three years after they passed their act, and they did not accept a single tender, even for a small boat. Will it pay this country to build a shipyard, to construct the dreadnoughts, and then let it stand idle for years to come? I may remark also that the tenders of hon. gentlemen opposite allowed six years to build the Bristols, which are small boats compared to modern dreadnoughts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the hon. gentleman visited the shipyards of Great Britain, and, if so, does he not know that the same plant, the same ship house, the same machine shops, and the same machinery of all kinds are used to build cruisers as are employed in the construction of dreadnoughts?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. gentleman cannot convince me that a very large ship can be built in a very small yard. You may build a small ship in a big yard, but you cannot build a big ship in a small yard. I have visited the British as well as the American shipyards, and about this I shall have something to say presently. I have also visited the big gun factories, and I want to remind the hon. gentleman that not only does he require to build the dreadnought, but it will be necessary to put guns on board, he will require to equip the ship with the necessary appliances of war. Where will he get them? Will he build them in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEEY: They will be obtained at the proper factories.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Where are the proper factories?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In England.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Then you will build your dreadnoughts here and send across the water for the armaments?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Bring the armaments here.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, the hon. gentleman is giving us the information that they will send to Great Britain for the armament. Very good, but I do not think they are going to have the opportunity to build a dreadnought in Canada for some little time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do not be too sure.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think this country will appreciate the fact that the policy which our esteemed First Minister is proposing, is vastly superior to the one that my hon. friend from St. John thinks should be adopted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is not a made-in-Canada policy.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am sorry that my hon. friend has reminded me of the made-in-Canada policy. I think nobody who knows me in this House will deny that I am a stronger upholder of that policy than he is, but not on this question, because I know the limitations of the people of Canada, and I know that we are absolutely unequipped to build a big warship in this country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How did you begin your own firm?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend says we ought to build those warships in Canada because 'made-in-Canada' is a good policy. Well, there is one thing in this discussion that has greatly pleased, and that is that we have discovered one article which the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is favourable to having built in Canada. It is the only article I have heard him say should be built in Canada. I had not the pleasure of being in the House when the hon. member for Red Deer spoke, but I understand that he suggested that if we only sent a canoe to Great Britain it should be built in Canada. I might remind the hon. member that the canoe was built in Canada long before the National Policy came into existence. It was built in Canada even before the white man set foot on our shores, but I presume our friends opposite mean a war canoe. However, that is altogether aside from the question. I am showing you now, Sir, that it is necessary that we should assist the British navy to keep on top. My hon. friends opposite say that Great Britain does not need any assistance, that we had better keep our dollars and sympathy at home, that they have not asked for them. I say that we have kept our dollars at home much too long. I make the statement without fear of contradiction, that, man for man, in Canada we are able to subscribe as much for naval and military matters as the average citizen of Great Britain, and it stands to our disgrace that up to the present time we have accepted the protection of the British fleet without subscribing one dollar towards its maintenance. It is true that our friends opposite suggest certain ways out of the obligation. We were reminded of one of these to-day by the hon. member for Frontenac. The late Minister of Militia suggested that if trouble arose, we should rely on the Monroe Doctrine, that Canada should trust her fate to the hands of the United States. Did ever anyone hear of a more humiliating proposition than that? It is enough to make the British blood in the veins of every true Canadian boil.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That was the doctrine of Canning.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, my hon. friends had better keep it canned. The Minister of Militia in the late Government made the proposition that we should rely on the Monroe Doctrine.

That brings me to a phase of the question with which I have not yet dealt, and on which I am going to say a few words. The Monroe Doctrine is hardly worth the paper it is written on so long as the United States have not got an army and navy sufficiently strong to back it up. It is a doctrine which is not accepted by any power in Europe, and it is not likely to be accepted. And yet, the ex-Minister of Militia would like us to rely on that doctrine for protection in time of danger. Now, there is one astonishing omission in this memorandum which has been furnished by the Admiralty, an omission which I have not yet heard explained. I think it mentions almost every country in Europe, great and small, and it gives the number of their ships, the amount of their naval expenditures, the number of men in their service and so on. But the third greatest naval power in the world, for some reason or other, is not mentioned. What is the third greatest naval power in the world today? It is our neighbours to the south. Experts tell us that if Great Britain and Germany came to conclusions in the North Sea, the victorious fleet would be depleted by over fifty per cent, while the defeated fleet would be annihilated. Who would then be on top? The third greatest naval power in the world would be on top.

Mr. PUGSLEY: England would be on top.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No, the United States might be on top after the battle.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You have no faith in England.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If my hon. friend has not any faith in England I am sorry for him. I have faith that the British will stand to their guns and probably win the battle, but they would lose so heavily in men and ships that they would not be equal in strength to the navy of the United States.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friends laugh, but I would remind them that not two months ago there were assembled in New York harbour 178 American war vessels.

Mr. BELAND: What kind?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Battleships, cruisers, torpedo boats, destroyers, all that go to make up a fleet. I want to draw the attention of this House to the fact that the Americans are building a fleet at almost the same rate as Germany.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not know whether my hon. friend assents to the suggestion, but to me as a Canadian that means danger.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I applaud the truth, that is all.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: What did the Government of which my hon. friend was a member, do? Under the Rush-Bagot treaty the Americans were allowed to have two war vessels on the great lakes and these of about 100 tons each, but by the permission of the Laurier Government they got through our canals nine war vessels, some of 1,300 tons, instead of 100.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Only training vessels.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But they will have their guns trained on us and we have not got a boat to defend ourselves when the trouble arises. That is the way Imperial unity and Imperial defence were treated by my hon. friends opposite. They let the enemy practically into the heart of the country, because the United States may at any time be against us on some question. What about the Panama canal at the present moment? That might bring on a conflict at any time. Look at our Pacific coast as well. What did we read only one month ago, that the Americans at present are making the Hawaiian Islands another Gibraltar, and that it is practically completed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In speaking of the United States navy, does my hon. friend forget that two years ago when the First Lord of the Admiralty in Great Britain mentioned the fact that England would have a two-power standard against all nations in Europe, he specifically omitted mentioning the United States. He said we never take into consideration the United States when we speak of the two-power standard.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It may be that our friends over the water do not understand the United States as we do on this side. I have just drawn the attention of my hon. friends to the fact that the United States navy is omitted from this document issued by the Admiralty. I say it is a very important omission, one that requires explanation, and I am endeavouring to give the explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the document?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think, Mr. Speaker, I have allowed these hon. gentlemen to interrupt me often enough; I am going to make my own speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to remind hon. members that rule 223 says: when a member is speaking no other member shall interrupt him except on a point of order. I think it would be for the benefit of the debate if that rule was a little better observed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is always subject to the consent of the member who is speaking. The hon. member has referred to a document as being extraordinary. I merely asked him what the document was.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The document is the one that the Admiralty has prepared and which is the basis of the resolution before the House. I say that it entirely omits mention of the American fleet. That is the point. The Americans have to be recognized in our position here. We are so close to them that we cannot afford to ignore their position. I have pointed out that if two of the great nations of Europe clash, the third navy in the world will be the one that will be superior in numbers after the war. Experts tell us that over half of the navy of the victorious power will be wiped out, and that will leave the Americans, being the third in point of strength, superior on the seas. My hon. friend opposite is thirsting for information and I want to give him all the necessary information because I understand he is going to follow me and I trust that he will do so in the same spirit in which I am endeavouring to discuss the matter. I am endeavouring to lay before the House my reasons for saying that this contribution of $35,000,000 should be immediately granted, and why I think it should be granted by the unanimous voice of this House and the country as I believe it should be. I do not believe it will be by the unanimous voice of this House, but I do believe the country is very largely in favour of the proposal. My hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Boivin), who has just spoken, seemed to be spoiling for a fight at the polls rather than on the field of battle. I do not think he would gain very much by a battle at the polls at the present time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We will try.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think we would be quite prepared to try conclusions in that respect.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Come on.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am ready if my hon. friend is. Come on! I think we are quite ready for it, and I believe that we would have a great many more followers from the province of Quebec than we have at the present time. The province that would not stand for the Laurier navy is not surely going to stand for two Laurier navies. The Laurier navy now proposed is one double the size of that which Quebec did not want. It is useless to think that Quebec is going to stand for the doubling of a navy that it did not want. Within a few days we have seen an interview with one of the local members of the House in Quebec who says that he would advise the right hon. leader of the Opposition to think a good while and to think slowly before he asks for a dissolution of the House because he says: I think it is very doubtful if he could carry a majority in Quebec. This statement was made by one of his own followers in Quebec. He said: The people there who did not want one Laurier navy are not likely to ask for two.

Mr. BELAND: They want one.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: They do not want it very badly.

Mr. BELAND: Forty out of sixty-five.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Forty out of sixty-five; well, that is going back a good long way, and it will go back a good deal further if the people were asked for two navies. My hon. friends will not be rejoicing so much when they get out in the field and see the ballots coming in. In my judgment the proposal that my right hon. friend the leader of the Government has submitted to this House is one of the most popular proposals that has ever been submitted in the Dominion of Canada. There is not a single vulnerable place in the whole proposal from the economic and strategical standpoints. The supremacy of the navy of Great Britain to-day means the stability and unity of the British Empire and, that being admitted, it must be also said that we must pay for the cost of sustaining the supremacy of the British navy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Send a cheque across.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend does not like to see cheques going across. I can tell my hon. friend why and I do not think he will laugh so much. When did his party, during the whole of the fifteen years that they were in power, ever expend $35,000,000 without one dollar of graft in it? I will give him time to answer that if he can. Can he answer that question? If he cannot let him keep quiet. I say that the Laurier Government, during their fifteen years of power, never spent $35,000,000 without a great amount of graft in it. Here is $35,000,000 going across the Atlantic in a cheque and that is what hurts our friends across the way. If they had been spending that $35,000,000 on a navy, it would have been fifty per cent ship and fifty per cent graft, it would have been fifty per cent navy and fifty per cent barnacles. It is the same brand of barnacle that the Globe said must be scraped off with an iron hand; we are going to scrape it off, that $35,000,000 is going over without one per cent of discount, the actual cash, and that is what hurts our friends over the way. They have not been accustomed to spending money without getting a rake-off. Look at their Transcontinental railway costing four times what they promised, look at the dredging contracts of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) which, we are told, were almost half graft, and that will be shown up. That is the reason these gentlemen do not want this $35,000,000 cheque to go over. But, we are going to send it over and we are going to get $35,000,000 worth of the best ships that money can buy, we are going to put them in the front line of attack and with these will go our best thought and our best prayer that they may be successful against any enemy that attempts to attack the British Empire and the British flag.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, oh.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend does not like that. It does not sit well on his stomach.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not like the prayer.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It would be worth the cost of a small flagship if it would steal up and take away some of the pomposity out of my hon. friend. He has apparently set himself up to boss the House very frequently lately. But, I want to tell him that there are other men in this House beside the hon. member for Rouville.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know that.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He has not recognized that. He came back from Japan with a swelled head. His negotiations with Japan did not do him any credit, and will not help him if he wants to establish a Laurier navy. Let him ask any of our friends from British Columbia what has happened. The House heard the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) —and I am sorry he is not in his place to-night; what did he tell the hon. member for Rouville? He told him that the policy of the Laurier Government, resulting in the admission of Japanese, holus bolus, into the Dominion of Canada, had driven out every white man from the fishing fleet of British Columbia. What did that mean? If you wanted to man a single ship, not a dreadnought but a small Bristol cruiser even, or a Niobe or a Rainbow, you would not have a single white man there with which to do it. Why? Because my hon. friend and his colleagues, although they were warned in the House by one of their own friends that they were making a dreadful mistake in negotiating that treaty, let down the bars, and flooded British Columbia with Japanese with the result that Japanese labour has driven out every white man from every fishing boat in British Columbia and it is impossible to get a single seaman to man vessels on the whole of that coast. Let the hon. gentleman take that home and think it over and if he does he must come to the conclusion that he and his Government made a mistake. That is the reason we find it difficult to man ships in Canada. These men might be against us in time of danger instead of for us. The Japanese does not often change his skin, the Japanese remains a Japanese whether he lives in Canada or in Japan, and I fear that if we ever had any trouble with Japan, instead of these men assisting us as they should, they would be found among the enemy.

Now, I have been drawn aside somewhat from my address, but I do not propose to be diverted from the line of my argument because hon. gentlemen opposite have interrupted me They have told us that no emergency existed and that no crisis is at hand, and they have quoted Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill to sustain their contention. Let me read two lines from what Lord Roberts said in his speech at Manchester. Lord Roberts has been a man of war from youth, and he knows what he is talking about, which a good many of these gentlemen opposite do not. Lord Roberts, the greatest authority in the British Empire on military and naval defence matters, says:

> Arm and prepare to quit yourselves as men —for the day of your ordeal is at hand.

These are the solemn words of Lord Roberts, spoken in Free Trade Hall, Manchester. The people of Manchester are not jingoes, but Lord Roberts gave it to them right off the handle, straight goods, no beating about the bush. Will you take Lord Roberts or the hon. member for Rouville as our authority upon such a matter? For my part, I would prefer one word from Lord Roberts on such a subject to ten thousand words from these Liberal gentlemen opposite, and the people of the country, I believe, will agree with me in that opinion. We cannot send men to help Britain to-day but we can send money, and I am sorry the Liberal party has endeavoured to diminish the value of that contribution by endeavouring to make out that it does not come from the whole people of Canada.

That contribution, Sir, should have gone as the gift of a united people, and look at the moral effect it would have had throughout the world if tendered as such. Well, the money is going all the same, but unfortunately it is not going as a unanimous gift, owing to the great blunder of the leader of the Opposition in not electing for once to be a patriot, and an upholder of Imperial unity. I have watched the career of the right hon. gentleman. For twenty-five years I have kept my eye on the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and I am sorry to have to say that whenever he had an opportunity of choosing between greater unity or separation, he has always chosen separation. He objected to an hon. gentleman on this side of the House saying that he pursued a separatist policy, but I say that is a mild phrase to describe his conduct. On the occasion of the last Imperial Conference, did not the London newspapers state that the presence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a wet blanket on everything Imperial.

Mr. LEMIEUX : That is not what Lord Grey said.

Mr. COCKSHUTT : Unfortunately for Lord Grey he has made a break, but it will take more than one letter from Lord Grey, esteemed though he be in this country, to restore the shattered fortunes of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party.

Mr. LEMIEUX : Poor Lord Grey.

Mr. BELAND : You have fixed Lord Grey now.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe): Poor Laurier.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend from Rouville need not waste his sympathy on Lord Grey. Lord Grey is above criticism, he is our superior ruler and we delighted to honour him when in Canada, but in taking up the cudgels for Sir Wilfrid Laurier after the fashion he has, we may be excused if we entertain the opinion that Lord Grey has let his zeal run away with his judgment. We know Sir Wilfrid Laurier from twenty-five years experience of him, and the statement I have made is a statement that holds good in the province of Ontario at any rate, and that is, that whenever he has had an opportunity of choosing between greater Imperial unity and a separatist policy, he has always chosen the separatist policy, as he is doing now in connection with this very resolution. I say that the policy proposed by the Liberals makes for the separation of Canada from the Empire, and I may say that advisedly I say that the contribution of Canada should go to Great Britain at the present moment, as the united contribution of the Parliament of Canada, and of the people of the country, irrespective of political leanings. And, Sir, if the right hon. leader of the Opposition is not sorry for his conduct to-day, he will be in the near future, because there is no doubt at all about it that the people of Canada are strongly against his policy and that the more it is discussed and understood in the country, the greater will be the resentment against it. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition proposes to spend probably fifty million dollars on a navy, and an annual upkeep costing ten millions or more. On the other hand, the Prime Minister says we will send thirty-five million dollars immediately to contribute to the supremacy of the British navy, and the permanent naval policy of Canada will be later on decided upon and submitted to the people. The Liberals tell us that we should man these three dreadnoughts, but I have demonstrated that it is not possible to get crews for them in this country, even if we purposed doing so. It is an undeniable fact that it would take five years or ten years to build the ships as proposed by the Liberal party, and then they could not man them when built. I doubt if gentlemen opposite have realized what it takes to man one of those great men of war. Why, the engine power alone of such a ship is more than enough to turn every wheel in every factory in the city of Montreal. They carry armament that has only very recently been manufactured in the world at all, guns of immense power, the reverberations alone of which would be sufficient to dislodge the hon. member for Rouville from his position, and that is saying a good deal. These guns are of such type that even to touch them off men have to be trained, and no doubt in the hands of such men as the hon. member from Beauce would put on board the ships, they would be more dangerous to friend than to enemy. And yet, these gentlemen opposite who could not get the Niobe safely to a political picnic would undertake to man our dreadnoughts and place them in the forefront of the fight with Germany. I do not believe that any hon. members on this side of the House would deem themselves competent to control and manage such great ships, and so we will have to resign the control of them to the gentlemen opposite who made such a mess of the management of the Niobe and the Rainbow. I say the thing is preposterous, and everybody knows it. What we want is the greatest amount of efficiency for the least expenditure of money, and that is what this policy proposes. That $35,000,000 that is going to be given will, every dollar of it, be expended to build and equip the best ships that can be built. My hon. friends, whether they agree with that policy or not, must admit it is a policy that will give a good account of itself in the long run.

Before I sit down I wish to refer to another authority. I hold here a few extracts from a book that is being circulated in the German Empire to-day with great success, and I think, in order that we may understand the aspirations of the German people, it will be well that I quote from a book recently issued and translated into English. The author of it is General von Bernhardi. The Crown Prince of Germany is a devout scholar at his feet, and he is the successor to the German Emperor on the throne. It is therefore important that we know what kind of a doctrine this general is instilling into the minds of the people of Germany. I want to read you just a few samples of what he says:

He describes aspirations for peace as threatening to poison the soul of the German people. Accordingly I must try to prove that war is not merely a necessary element in the life of nations, but an indispensable factor of culture, in which a true civilized nation finds the highest expression of strength and vitality. I must endeavour to develop from the history of the Germans past in its connection with the conditions of the present, those aspects of the question which may guide us into the unknown land of the future. The historical past cannot be killed; it exists and works according to inward laws, while the present, too, imposes its own drastic obligations. No one need passively submit to the pressure of circumstances; even States stand, like the Hercules of Legend, at the parting of the ways. They can choose the road to progress or to decadence.

That, Sir, is the first statement he makes. Then he passes on to say:

The motive which influences each member is prominent in the whole body. It is a persistent struggle for possessions, power and sovereignty which primarily governs the relations of one nation to another, and right is respected so far only as it is compatible with advantage. So long as there are men who have human feeling and aspirations, so long as there are nations who strive for an enlarged sphere of activity, so long will conflicting interests come into being and occasions for making war arise. The social system in which the most efficient persons possess the greatest influence will show most vitality in the intra-social struggle, while in the extra-social struggle, that nation will conquer which can throw into the scale the greatest physical, mental, moral, material and political power, and is therefor the best able to defend itself. War will furnish such a nation with favourable vital conditions, enlarged possibilities of expansion and widened influence.

Then he passes on to say that might is right,—in this enlightened age,—might is right.

Might is once the supreme right and the dispute as to what is right is decided by the arbitrament of war.

That is the statement he makes. I have not time to read many of these quotations. I shall read a few of them to show what the German people are reading at the present time.

During a prolonged period of peace petty and personal interests force their way to the front, selfishness and intrigue run riot and luxury obliterates idealism. Money acquires an excessive and unjustifiable power, and character does not obtain due respect. Wars are terrible, but necessary, for they save the state from social petrification and stagnation. It is well that the transitoriness of the goods of this world is not only preached, but is learned by experience. War alone teaches this lesson. We are told that war, in opposition to peace, does more to arouse national life and to expand national power than any other means known to history. It certainly brings much material and mental distress in its train but at the same time it evokes the noblest activities of the human nature. After emphasizing the insignificance of petty private interests beside so grave a decision as war, and the unifying effect of common effort against common danger, it is pointed out that the brutal incidents inseparable from every war vanish completely before the idealism of the main result. All the sham reputations which a long spell of peace undoubtedly fosters are unmasked. Great personalities take their proper place; strength, truth and honour come to the front and are put into play. War opens the most fruitful field to all virtues, for at every moment constancy, pity, magnanimity, heroism, and mercy shine forth in it; every moment offers an opportunity to exercise one of these virtues. At the moment when the state cries out that its very life is at stake, social selfishness must cease, and party hatred be hushed. The individual must forget his egoism, and feel that he is a member of the whole body. He should recognize how his own life is nothing worth in comparison with the welfare of the community. War is elevating, because the individual disappears before the great conception of the State. The devotion of the members of the community to each other is nowhere so conspicuous as in war. What a perversion of morality to wish to abolish heroism among men.

Then he goes on to elaborate the point which I spoke of in the first place, that it is possible to be a Christian and a soldier.

Mr PUGSLEY: The same opinion that my hon. friend holds.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am more or less of a student, and I admire General von Bernhardi, because he has laid before the people a patriotic mind and a spirit of self-sacrifice that is worthy of every Canadian and of every citizen of the British Empire. I only wish that as many men in Canada and as many men in Great Britain were as ready to lay their services on the altar of their country as are willing and ready to do so in the country of Germany. Why should hon. gentlemen opposite brand us as jingoes or men who are unchristian? It is the duty of every one, be he Christian or be he Pagan, to defend his land when it is attacked, and to meet the enemy in the gate like a man who is not afraid to live and who is not afraid to die.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friends say hear, hear. I hope they enlist in the cause. I hope that when the next call is made for the Rainbow that some of my hon. friends who call 'hear, hear' will enlist. If they are not worth more on the Rainbow than they are in this House in carrying on the affairs of this country, I am sorry for the Rainbow and for the country. I am not going to be side-tracked in giving my friends these few plain truths; they know that what I say is the gospel truth. If they bother me much more I will name those men who brand Canadians that join our militia and those who enlist in our navy as murderers, because they are prepared to step into the ranks and defend their country against the agressor. We know the names of those men and some of them have been noted for going about the country preaching that doctrine. I want to read some other quotations.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Don't read them, because we do not want to hear them.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. gentleman has too long lived on what is not altogether good. My hon. friend's reputation throughout the Dominion of Canada is not so good, but that it might be improved. His administration of the Public Works Department was not above suspicion, as he very well knows. I think that if he will listen to the remarks of General von Bernhardi, it will not do him any harm, and I hope that when he speaks on the subject in this House he will let some of the patriotism shine forth which is taught by the German general whom I quote.

Christian morality is based on the law of love.

My hon. friend, cannot say anything against that.

Love of God above all things and love to our neighbours.

I think that he will recognize that there is a high authority for that.

Such doctrine can claim no significance for the relations of one country to another, since its application to politics would lead to a conflict of duties. The love which a man showed to another country as such would imply a want of love for his own countrymen. Such a system of politics must inevitably lead men astray. Christian morality is personal and social, and in its nature cannot be political. Its object is to promote morality of the individual, in order to strengthen him to work unselfishly in the interests of the community.

It tells us to love our individual enemies, but does not remove the conception of enmity. Christ himself said: 'I am not come to bring peace on earth, but a sword.'

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is something new.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am afraid my hon. friend has not been a good student of the Scriptures. If he had been, I think that some of the mistakes he has committed in his public life would not have been committed. This statement, he says, is new. It was written about two thousand years ago.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Give us the reference.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That reference is the New Testament. I am afraid our friends opposite have not, in recent years, made a very close study of the scriptures. Another hon. gentleman asks me what this has to do with building dreadnoughts? It has this much to do with it—it teaches the gospel of patriotism, and if we are going to have three dreadnoughts, whether you pay for them or whether you man them it is patriotism that is going to send them forth. And I say as a man who has not only studied the Scriptures, but tried to practice them—though I know my hon. friend does not give me credit for that—that I believe the Scriptures themselves warrant me in saying that it is one of the highest callings of mankind to be ready to sacrifice one's self to save his country, his home, his family. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) gave us a very nice exposition about peace on earth. My hon. friend did not call him to task for dwelling on the Christian spirit, though he went a good deal further in that speech than I have ventured to do. The hon. gentleman says my speech is far from the Christian spirit. But the doctrine of self-preservation, the doctrine of patriotism, is good for all the year round—as good on Christmas day as any other day. Let it never be forgotten that the price of our liberty, the price of our national existence, the price of the British race being on top is the eternal vigilance of the citizens of the Empire. The doctrine, I say, is borne out by the Scriptures in the passages I have read from the New Testament, spoken by our Lord himself. 'I came not to bring peace on earth, but a sword.' I say that this doctrine of patriotism preached to the German people to-day has made it possible to place six millions of men in the field. Yet we are told, there is no emergency. I wonder what these gentlemen would call an emergency. Not until the very last shot has been fired and every ship had gone down, I presume, would they recognize that there was an emergency—unless they happened to be on one of the ships, which is not likely.

They speak of the possibility of enlisting these men in Canada. The other day, when I heard the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) speak, I thought surely he would go out next morning and enlist on one of these ships. But he did not; he came back to this House. I do not know if the hon. gentleman is wiser than he was when he made that speech, but I can tell him that in it he did not speak for his own province of Ontario. The province of Ontario is solidly at the back of the Borden Government in this proposition. Further, I believe the men of the West, who have not been with us on this side lately, will say that this proposition is a good one. They will say: We want our foodstuffs defended on their way across the ocean to feed the Mother Country and the various countries of Europe. They will say that it is proper to pay an insurance on this commerce. The property of the Dominion of Canada is probably worth at least $5,000,000,000;—I think it is worth nearer to $10,000,000,000, but I wish to be on the safe side. A premium of one per cent a year on this property would be $50,000,000 annually. But we in Canada have not been ready to pay even one per cent of insurance on our enormous wealth. Is it not time we got into the firing line so far as cash is concerned? Is it not time we came to the rescue of the Mother Country in this matter? For years, as we know, the weary Titan has struggled with his load, and we have not been burdened to the extent of a single dollar.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You opposed the British preference.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is true, we made a sacrifice to the Mother Country of dollars and cents in duties. But it would have been better to have done our duty to the Mother Country before we became generous; it would have been better to contribute to defence than to throw away duties to the advantage of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have had the benefit of defence by the Mother Country and have paid nothing. That hon. gentleman knew as well as I do that there is nothing between us and destruction to-night but the British fleet. I stated in the first part of my address and I repeat now, there is no country in the world to-day that has as poor defence as the Dominion of Canada with so much to defend, and I say that after having visited all the principal countries of the world. We owe it to our day and generation, we owe it to our race, to see to it that Great Britain has assistance in this, her hour of danger and need. I say that advisedly, that it is an hour of danger and of need. And we shall never know what we have lost until we have lost all, if we allow the British fleet to be wiped out from control of the sea. Let me point out to those who say that there is no emergency that it is quite possible for supremacy to pass without a shot being fired. Let the German Empire surpass Great Britain in the building of a fleet and as soon as the German fleet is superior in power to that of Great Britain, that moment, the triumph, the power passes from Great Britain to Germany. Are we willing that should come to pass? No! To allow that to happen, Mr. Speaker, is, in my judgment, to put back the hands of civilization and to retard the advancement that has taken place in this world for many years past. We believe in the Christianizing of the uttermost corners of the earth. Many of us have subscribed money to send out to all parts of the world missionaries of the various churches of the Dominion. What has made that possible? Simply the strong arm of the British navy, ready at the call of every subject in distant parts of the world should he be in trouble. Look at the missionaries in China and Japan. On several occasions in recent years they have had to run to cover under the protection of British guns; that is what gives security to the British subject the round world over. Any man travelling in distant lands knows the sense of security imparted by the possession of a passport bearing evidences of the soverignty of our King, and his guarantee of safe convoy through distant and dangerous lands. I have carried one of these in my pocket in the course of my travels, and I felt it as my only salvation when absolutely alone among men with whose language I was unacquainted, and whose appearance did not indicate their lack of a desire to strike me down at any time. There is no force on the high seas to-day superior to the navy of Great Britain, and that is the sense of security which stands at the back of every Canadian, no matter what his colour or creed. Shall we, then, be wanting in our duty when asked to contribute this small sum of money? I say it is a small sum of money, and the Finance Minister has told us we will be enabled to send it out of this year's surplus. Let that not be forgotten—that this $35,000,000 can be taken out of this year's surplus, and therefore we shall not feel it to a very great extent. We are well able to pay it; Lord Roberts has told us the emergency exists—are we going to rest upon our oars and see the fatal shot fired without sending a dollar or a man to help fill the gap? Before I sit down I want to mention one man in Great Britain, whose name is not well known in Canada, but whose opinion is an authority hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House might well consult—that of Mr. Maxse, who edits the National Review. In his writings during the last three years Mr. Maxse has done more to turn the attention of the British people to the immense danger that is threatening our race than any other writer in any land over which the British flag flies.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the hon. gentleman acquainted with the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty regarding Mr. Maxse?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am not aware of the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty in this respect, and I do not presume to speak for him. I know, however, that no man is so great that my hon. friend would not challenge his ability—that is quite within his general conduct. I am aware that he thinks he is the biggest man on earth, and that all others are very small indeed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not wish to unduly interrupt my hon. friend, but he has stated that this $35,000,000 would be paid out of the surplus for this year. Can my hon. friend inform the House as to what the actual surplus is, and as to whether he means by that that the expenditure upon the Transcontinental railway and other great works will also be paid out of current revenue?

Mr. HAZEN: Wait for the budget speech.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is giving the information beforehand, and I wish to know if he has the requisite knowledge in regard to the matters to which I refer.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend has asked a question which I did not expect to be called upon to answer, but I may say that I think I have the authority of the Finance Minister in stating that he expects a surplus of about $35,000,000 this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then what is to become of the twenty or thirty millions to be expended on the Transcontinental railway, which has hitherto been largely paid out of current revenue?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend is foreshadowing difficulties. I said the surplus this year would probably be sufficient to pay the amount of the proposed contribution. That is my statement, but perhaps my hon. friend would like to spend $20,000,000 in rectifying the blunders of the late Administration regarding the Transcontinental railway. I am not unmindful of the fact that the implement hon. gentlemen opposite put into the Transcontinental cost this country quite a sum of money, and that the Quebec bridge, which my hon. friend knows is now at the bottom of the St. Lawrence, swept away another large sum. As I have said, this $35,000,000 surplus is expected this year, and it is possible to pay from current revenue the whole amount the Prime Minister proposes to contribute.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that this contribution will take the whole of the surplus?

Mr. HAZEN: Does the hon. gentleman imagine that the entire expense of building the three dreadnoughts is to be paid in one year?

Mr. PUGSLEY: You are asking for a vote this year.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think no good purpose will be served by the effort of my hon. friend to involve the discussion with other matters. My statement is as plain as it can be. This $35,000,000 we are asked to contribute is about equal to the surplus we expect this year, and, if we so elect, the contribution can be paid out of that surplus. I know he is not favourable to contributing this amount, but this House is favourable, and it will be sent over whether my hon. friend is favourable or not. I am sorry my hon. friend is not going to contribute a dollar toward it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it goes I shall have to contribute as a citizen of Canada.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well then my hon. friend will contribute against his will, I presume, and that is always unfortunate. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, and I am sorry my hon. friend is not a cheerful giver. I thought from his open countenance and from the way he generally smiles when he is in perplexity, that he would be a cheerful giver, and that he would contribute his share of the $35,000,000 without a murmur, but I am disappointed. He wants to devote $20,000,000 to the Transcontinental, and to several other purposes, and he does not want to take it out of a current revenue.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I want to have the ships built in Canada.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend knows that before these ships can be built in Canada the fatal gun may have been fired, and that the emergency which we are trying to meet will be over, and we will not have contributed our part.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I said was—

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I ask my hon. friend to keep silence, and to give me a chance to close my remarks. He is going to speak after me and he will have his chance. An American statesman replying to a man who interrupted him to ask a question said, 'I confess that a fool of his calibre can ask more questions in five minutes than I can answer in a thousand years.' I do not wish to imply that my hon. friend is in that category, but if he goes on as he has been doing I shall have a poorer opinion of him than I entertain at present, which I may say is not too high on some points.

Now, my hon. friend challenges my statement that the $35,000,000 should be taken out of current revenue. I suppose he is going to have a place to put these $35,000,000, and he may tell us when he gets up. But I believe that these $35,000,000 are going over to Great Britain with the majority of this House and with the majority of the people of Canada at their back, and if my hon. friends opposite want to challenge this side of the House to meet them on the hustings throughout the country, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to meet my hon. friend from South Renfrew

Mr. GRAHAM: Give us a chance.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I come from the same province as my hon. friend and he was spoiling for a fight the other day. He went about not with one chip on his shoulder, but with two chips on each shoulder, crying to Heaven to give him a chance to get on these ships and to fight in the front line when the German navy attacked Britain. But I do not see that he enlisted; I do not see that he is proposing to enlist, and I have been endeavouring to instill into him and into my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the idea that perhaps a little love for the hardships of the soldier, and a taste of endurance on the battlefield would take out of them a little of that pomposity that has been too evident during the past few weeks. Whether my hon. friends are in favour of this policy or not, I think they will agree with me in this, that it is desirable that the people of Canada should do something, and something effective. I think my hon. friend will agree with me in that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not suppose he is suggesting that we should build two fleet units that would not be of any use, or that would not be effective in battle. I presume he means business.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Ships equal to any in the world.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend has very strong faith in the capacity of Canadian ship-builders if he thinks they can build Canadian dreadnoughts to equal the British or the German, or even the American dreadnoughts. I am a man who stands up for every kind of Canadian industry; I have stood up for it often, but I know the limitations of the people of Canada, and I say that to-day we are not qualified to build those ships in Canada, nor are we qualified to put the armaments upon them after they are built. Therefore, as a business man, I say it appeals to me as good business to go to the men who can build them, and then we shall not be taking a chance, or making an experiment that might prove a failure. It might be that the dreadnoughts of my hon. friends would be top-heavy, and would turn turtle.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would be designed by the British Admiralty.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Then you would get your designs from over the water? That means that you have not confidence in the Canadian designers. I thought it was going to be all Canadian, but now it appears they are going to get the designers from Britain and also their armaments. Perhaps my hon. friend will tell us when he speaks where he is going to get the materials with which to build those ships.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Where is the armour-plate coming from or the other materials necessary for the construction of a dreadnought? They are not made in this country to-day, and all the subsidiary industries must be established in Canada before you can build those ships. It is not mere child's play building those great ships, it is one of the most scientific works of man, one of the most powerful and wonderful works of man. No one who has seen an up-to-date battleship can have failed to wonder at what science can build and money can buy in these days of advanced civilization. I have had the privilege of seeing many big ships in many waters, and nothing has inspired me so much with wonder at the vast intelligence and scientific knowledge of man as the sight of one of those leviathans. It is a most awful and inspiring work, and yet my hon. friend thinks those ships can be built in Canada. Well, in that respect I do not agree with him, but we do agree in this that we believe that the time has come when something effective should be done, and done quickly; and if my hon. friend believes that, then he believes that an emergency is at hand. I believe that an emergency is at hand, and I say to-night with all sincerity, that in my judgment Canada cannot act too soon. I regret that our proposed contribution is not larger. I know I am a more advanced Imperialist than some of my friends, but I would rather have seen it $50,000,000 or $75,000,000. I do not think that would have been too much. But whether or not we agree on that, what we give should go with the united voice of this Parliament and of Canada. I regret that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has not seen fit to decide on this occasion to stand for the unity of the Empire and for one fleet to defend that empire. I believe in the final analysis that it will be found that one fleet to defend the Empire is more economical and more effective than several units scattered throughout the world, and that it is far more likely to meet the enemy successfully than any units that would be thousands of miles away when the battle was fought, and we trust our friends opposite will be with us, to vote with heart and soul for this proposition of $35,000,000. Let us send it with our blessing and trust that it is invested in ships that will have such an effect on the nations in Europe that they will see that Great Britain is backed up by all her great dominions overseas, that Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, yes, and India and the Malay States will all be be in line when the time comes. And if any nation is so bold as to touch the British lion or endeavour to down the old Motherland, that country will find every cub along the line, every colony, distant or near, will be in the battle line, standing for the greatest Empire, the greatest civilization, and the greatest freedom that the world has ever seen.

On motion of Mr. Pugsley, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, January 17, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE COMMITTEE.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I beg to lay upon the table of the House a despatch dated 11th December, 1912, respecting the Committee of Imperial Defence and other matters. I will send to the leader of the Opposition a copy of the despatch, which reads:

Canada—Confidential.

Downing Street,
December 11, 1912.

Sir,—I have the honour to transmit to your Royal Highness for the information of your ministers, copies of despatches which have been addressed to the Governors General of the Commonwealth of Australia and the Union of South Africa and the Governors of New Zealand and Newfoundland, on the subject of representation of the self-governing dominions on the Committee of Imperial Defence.

In view of the proposed publication of this despatch at an early date I telegraphed a text to you on the 10th instant.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your Royal Highness'
Most obedient humble servant,
(Sgd.) L. HARCOURT.

Governor General,
His Royal Highness
The Duke of Connaught and Strathearn,
K.C., &c., &c., &c.

Commonwealth of Australia,
Union of South Africa,
New Zealand,
Newfoundland.

Confidential. Downing Street,
December 11, 1912.

My Lord:

Sir,—I am forwarding by post for the confidential information of your ministers, a record of the proceedings at the Committee of Imperial Defence on May 30, 1911, (during the Imperial Conference), and on August 1, 1912 (during the visit of the Canadian ministers to London). This record deals solely with the question of the representation of the dominions on the Committee of Imperial Defence. (Your ministers who were present on the first occasion will remember that) the matter arose out of a resolution by Sir Joseph Ward on the agenda of the Imperial Conference, asking that the high commissioners of the dominions should be summoned to the Committee of Imperial Defence when naval and military matters, affecting the overseas dominions were under consideration. The unanimous view of all those present on May 30, 1911, was that the representations of the dominions should be not by the high commissioners, but by ministers who would be responsible to their own colleagues and Parliament, and, at the same time it was decided that a defence committee should be established in each dominion which would be kept in close touch with the Committee of Imperial Defence at home. The resolutions ultimately put forward by His Majesty's Government and accepted unanimously by the members of the Imperial Conference at the Committee of Imperial Defence, were as follows—

(1) That one or more representatives appointed by the respective governments of the dominions, should be invited to attend meetings of the Committee on Imperial Defence when questions of naval and military defence affecting the Overseas Dominions are under consideration.

(2) The proposal that a defence committee should be established in each dominion is accepted in principle. The constitution of these defence committees is a matter for each dominion to decide.

The Canadian Government having changed in the autumn of 1911, it was necessary, when Mr. Borden and his colleagues visited England this summer to put these proposals before them as they were of course unaware of the previous proceedings. Subject to consultation with his colleagues in Canada, Mr Borden provisionally accepted the resolutions as passed, and stated that he saw no difficulty in one of his ministers, either with or without portfolio, spending some months of every year in London in order to carry out this intention. Mr. Asquith and I had, subsequently, several private conversations with him, at which he expressed the desire that the Canadian and other dominion ministers who might be in London as members of the Committee of Imperial Defence, should receive in confidence, knowledge of the policy and proceedings of the Imperial Government in foreign and other affairs. We pointed out to him that the Committee of Imperial Defence is a purely advisory body, and is not and cannot under any circumstances become a body deciding on policy, which is and must remain the sole prerogative of the Cabinet, subject to the support of the House of Commons. But, at the same time, we assured him that any Dominion ministers resident here would, at all times, have free and full access to the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Colonial Secretary for information on all questions of Imperial policy. In a public speech which I made a short time ago I used the following words:—

There is, on the part of Canadian ministers and people, a natural and laudable desire for a greater measure of consultation and co-operation with us in the future than they have had in the past. This is not intended, and it need not, to open up those difficult problems of Imperial federation which, seeming to entail questions of taxation and representation, have made that policy for many years a dead issue. But, speaking for myself, I see no obstacle, and certainly no objection, to the governments of all the dominions being given at once a larger share in the executive direction in matters of defence and in personal consultation and co-operation with individual British ministers whose duty it is to frame policy here. I should welcome a more continuous representation of dominion ministers, if they wish it, upon the Committee of Imperial Defence; we should all be glad if a member or members of those cabinets could be annually in London. The door of fellowship is always open to them and we require no formalities of an Imperial conference for the continuity of Imperial confidence.

The foregoing accurately represents the views and intentions of His Majesty's Government.

From Mr, Borden's public speech, in introducing the Canadian Naval Bill, it appears that he accepts the proposals which we have made. The same offer is of course open to all the other self-governing dominions, if and when they wish to adopt it, but the proposal is not one of necessary or strict uniformity and can be varied in the case of each or any dominion to suit their wishes or the special circumstances of their case. I should be glad to know, at their convenience, whether your ministers desire to adopt some such method of more continuous connection in naval and military affairs with the Committee of Imperial Defence in the United Kingdom.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that all the members of the House have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks which were made by my hon. friend who represents the city of Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). His speech was of a very refreshing character; and it contained some new ideas, ideas which have not been advanced heretofore on the floor of this House. I hope that the hon. gentleman, who I regret is not in his place, will not think that those of us on this side of the House who asked him certain questions had any desire to interrupt or embarrass him in any way. The hon. gentleman seemed always ready with a reply, and did not appear at all to object to the questions asked him. The hon. gentleman treated the House, amongst other things, to a disquisition upon the beauties and the desirability of war from a national standpoint; and to those of us who long for universal peace, the hon. gentleman's remarks came somewhat as a surprise, because he sought to throw around war, which we were accustomed to regard as having horrible surroundings, a glamour of beauty and of pleasantness. I regret very much that my hon. friend who last addressed the House, as well as other hon. gentlemen, including my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), seemed to feel it to be necessary, in order to have this resolution commend itself to the people of the country, to make attacks upon the good faith or the desire for peace on the part of the German Empire. They seemed to think it necessary to convey the impression that the German nation was only waiting for the opportunity to make an attack upon Great Britain and to destroy the British Empire. I do not think that language of that character is befitting a great representative assembly, such as this is, of one of the most important nations comprising the British Empire. Language of that kind would not be tolerated in the British House of Commons, it would not be expected from an ordinary member of Parliament, let alone from a responsible and important minister of the Crown. After these warlike remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is well perhaps that we should bear in mind that the governments of Germany and Great Britain to-day are engaged earnestly and sincerely in the laudable desire of bringing about peace between the Balkan allies and Turkey, and of preserving permanently the peace of Europe. I have no doubt that to the people of this country generally it was a matter of gratification to read, not long ago, as recently as the 2nd day of December last, the remarks of the Chancellor of Germany in the Reichstag in reference to the disturbance in Europe. His remarks were as follows:

These remarks offer a welcome occasion to state that during the whole late crisis our relations with Great Britain have been especially marked by mutual trust, which has not only brought about a most gratifying intimacy in our relations, but has also performed good services towards a common understanding among all the powers. I can express the certain expectation that they will continue to do this.

Remarks of a similar character were made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain in the British House of Commons. I see therefore no reason to fear but that the friendly relations now existing between Germany and the Mother Country will continue for a long time to come. But in discussing the question of naval defence, I am not influenced, and I do not think the people of this country should be influenced, by what is spoken of as the German scare. I look upon the question in this way, that Canada, as one of the great overseas dominions of the Empire, has arrived at such a state of development, has attained such a large population and has such a vast trade upon the land and upon the oceans, that the time has come when she ought to take her part in making preparation for whatever eventualities may result in the future. Therefore it does not become necessary for me to discuss this question as it has been discussed by many hon. members of this House. I, as one of the representatives of the people, am prepared to take the position that Canada ought to do everything which is reasonably necessary in order to place herself side by side with the rest of the Empire for its future defence, and for the future defence of Canada. The hon. member for Brantford made a statement which I think is very important in the consideration of this question. He is one of the most important members from the province of Ontario on the Conservative side of the House; and I take it for granted that any statement which he makes on his responsibility as a member of this House ought to have considerable weight, so far as he speaks of the policy and the intentions of the Government of which he is so prominent a supporter. The hon. gentleman referred to what he called an emergency some three years ago, and he says that in addressing a large gathering assembled from all parts of the Empire he made the following statement.

The Empire navy must speak with the voice and power of the Empire. Should the main fleet be too weak or inefficient to cope with the enemy, it would be a fatal mistake that could never be rectified.

He was speaking in favour of giving a contribution to the Mother Country. He said:

The main and almost sole objection to this contribution is that we cannot have a voice in the expenditure and control. This is a very serious objection, and brings to the forefront the question of Empire organization, a great problem, too, that must be grappled with and solved.

I read that to show that in 1909 I was, as I am to-day, in favour of a contribution of men and money and ships to the British Empire. I believe thoroughly in the unity of the British Empire and one fleet for trade and for defence.

There is a very sharp line drawn between the naval policy of the Conservative party, as announced by the Prime Minister, and the naval policy of the Liberal party, as set forth in the resolution of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. The Conservative policy follows the line I have suggested of making contributions to maintain the supremacy of the British fleet upon the high seas, and the Liberal policy of to-day seeks to enlarge somewhat on the Liberal policy of 1909 as embraced in the Naval Service Act of Canada.

The hon. gentleman states that the policy of the Government is to make contributions for the defence of the Empire, while the policy of the Liberal party is to have a Canadian navy. Why does not the Prime Minister come before this House, and, with the same frankness, tell this House and tell the people of this country that the contribution which we are asked to make to-day is likely to be but the beginning of a policy of contributions which we shall be called upon to make in the future? There is no question in my mind but that the intention of the Prime Minister is, having got this noose around the neck of the people of Canada, having got the people to make this contribution, then, if he is in power in a few years from now, when the same state of affairs shall exist as it exists to-day, to ask for another contribution. What, Sir, is the whole argument made by the Prime Minister? His whole argument, and the whole argument of hon. gentlemen with him, with the single exception of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has been that it is useless, absurd, out of the question, for Canada to think of building a Canadian navy. The Prime Minister told you, Sir, and the members of this House, that it would take from twenty-five to fifty years to secure a naval organization in this country. And he asked: After all, what is the use of doing it, when we can avail ourselves of the fine naval organization which exists in Great Britain? He said that it would be much more expensive to build ships in Canada than to build them in the Mother Country. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) ridiculed the idea of Canada having her own navy because, he said, we should have to pay larger wages to the men than the British Government is compelled to pay. He said, in effect: If we arrange with Great Britain to take the ships and man them, and to fight our battles, they will be able to get sailors for two shillings a day to stand behind the guns, while Canada would be obliged to pay a wage of seventy cents a day. He was followed by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who gave us in detail the figures of cost of maintaining a Canadian navy, as compared with the cost of maintaining these ships in Great Britain; and the result of his argument was strongly against a Canadian navy. At last my hon. friend from Brantford let the cat out of the bag by telling us that the policy of this Government was to make contributions as contrasted with the policy of the Liberal party of having a Canadian navy.

Well, we welcome the issue. I for one would rejoice if the Government would advise His Royal Highness the Governor General to dissolve this Parliament that the decision of the people on that issue might be given.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why should the people of this country not approve of a Canadian navy? They have before them the fact that in 1909, this House, by common consent and animated by a lofty desire to take the naval question out of party politics altogether, passed a unanimous resolution in favour of a Canadian navy and against contributions. All over this country that policy has been approved of. And, when the people see that this Government, drawn in one direction by the Nationalists represented by the Postmaster General, and drawn in the other by the jingoes of Tories as represented by the gallant knight who is not now in his place—when they see that the Government of the day is drawn hither and thither by this conflict of ideas, and that they are afraid to tell the people what is to be their policy, can you wonder if I should express the opinion that the people will say: Stand by the policy unanimously agreed upon by the House in 1909?

Hon. gentlemen on the other side say: But what is the use of calling attention to the opinions of hon. gentlemen of three years ago; what is the use of quoting to the House what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said three years ago? Well, I think it is important. We have the right to assume that, even though these gentlemen have changed their minds, their opinions of three years ago were their sincere and honest opinions. In 1909, we all listened with great interest to the eloquent speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). I was not surprised, Sir, that it was an eloquent speech. I have had the pleasure of knowing my hon. friend since the time, when, as boys together, we entered the University of New Brunswick. I knew him then intimately, and in those early days, when he was only a boy of seventeen, he could make almost as eloquent a speech as he can make to-day, and that is saying a great deal for him as a boy. It has been said by an hon. gentleman who sits on this side of the House that my hon. friend missed his vocation when he abandoned the idea of becoming a lawyer. My hon. friend did, I believe, enter as a law student; and I think he made a great mistake when he did not continue, because his ability would have commanded many thousands of dollars per annum as an advocate on whatever side of a cause he preferred to act. I was sorry to hear the other day that my hon. friend had been taken ill. But it was not surprising; because he had to go thro' a very serious performance. Those were mighty, and big, and strong, and brave words that he uttered in 1909; and he had to swallow them all a few days ago. I do not wonder that this swallowing process did not agree with him. It has been said that the other day he made the speech of his life. Well, Sir, it required him to make the speech of his life to make this House and the people of this country forget the admirable speech he made in 1909 in support of a Canadian navy. In addition to the ordinary people who applauded most warmly the action unanimously taken by the House in 1909, there have been some gentlemen of great distinction, gentlemen who have gone out of political life, and particularly one whom I have in mind, who referred with strong feelings of gratification and patriotic enthusiasm to the resolution that was then adopted. I refer to that distinguished statesman, Sir Charles Tupper, and I would like to read to the House what he said in reference to that resolution:

> Regarding as I do British institutions as giving greater security to life, property and liberty than any other form of government, I have devoted more than half a century to increasing efforts to preserve the connection of Canada and the Crown. When Great Britain was involved in the struggle in the Transvaal I led the van in forcing the Canadian Government to send aid. But I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, in taxation without representation. The demand which will soon be made by some that Canada should contribute to the Imperial navy in proportion to population, I regard as preposterous and dangerous.

I read with pleasure the resolution passed unanimously by the House of Commons which pledged Parliament to proceed vigorously with the construction of the Canadian navy and to support Britain in every emergency, and all that in my opinion is required is to hold the Government of the day bound to carry that out honestly. Navies are maintained largely to promote the security of the mercantile shipping of the country to which they belong.

Then after some remarks regarding the reciprocity movement in 1891—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will read it, and if my hon. friends will give the same attention to all the remarks of Sir Charles Tupper, I shall feel that I have made some converts in favour of our views.

When I remember that in the general election of 1891, the friends of British institutions after a desparate struggle, which cost that great and patriotic statesman, Sir John A. Macdonald, his life, we only secured a majority of about 25, and I have no hesitation in saying that had the principle of a contribution to the Imperial navy according to our population then been in operation that majority of 25 would have been in favour of continental free trade and the adoption of the tariff of the United States against Great Britain.

How does my hon. friend like that?

Who can question the accuracy of that opinion who remembers that in 1896 my Government was fiercly denounced in Quebec by the Liberal candidates and Liberal newspapers on account of its militia expenditures, when they declared that an expenditure of $3,000,000 to buy rifles for the militia was a danger to the country and that the military programme of the government was 'frightful.'

Mr. FOSTER: How does my hon. friend like that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not like that at all, because it is not true. He said further:

I do not forget that all parties in the United States agree in the desire to obtain possession of Canada. Under existing circumstances it was of immense importance to have Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party committed to the policy which secured the unanimous consent of the House of Commons on a question of such vital importance, and a great responsibility will rest upon those who disturb that compact.

I cannot understand the demand for dreadnoughts in the face of the fact that the Admiralty and British Government have determined that it was not the best mode of maintaining the security of the Empire, and arranged with Canada and Australia (the latter of whom had offered one or two dreadnoughts) for the construction of the local navies to keep open the trade routes in case of war.

All difficulty as to the question of autonomy is now removed, as it is fully recognized that the great outlying portions of the Empire are sister nations, and that means are adapted to secure uniformity in the naval forces of the Empire in the design and construction of the ships, and the training of the officers and men. They are also to be interchangeable and thus secure uniformity in every respect, so as to act as effective units with the British navy.

Of course the Government of the day will be held accountable for carrying out of the policy thus agreed upon in a thoroughly effective manner, but I cannot avoid thinking that a fearful responsibility will rest upon those who disturb or destroy the compact entered into on this vitally important question.

Mr. MORPHY: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The letter is dated November 20, 1909, and it was written some months after what was known as the German naval scare in 1909, and was referred to in this House in March of that year. Seven months afterwards Sir Charles Tupper wrote that letter to the Prime Minister, in which he stated, as I have said, that a fearful responsibility will rest upon those who disturb or destroy the compact entered into on this vitally important question.

One of the hon. gentlemen who last addressed the House said that it was to be greatly regretted that the right hon. leader of the Opposition had not risen in his place to pledge himself to support the resolution presented by the Prime Minister. Let me say to my hon. friend that the leader of the Opposition is not such an acrobat as some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and he thought he was best discharging his duty to his country by standing firmly behind the policy agreed upon by this House in March, 1909. Hon. gentlemen have said: oh, you did not proceed effectively to carry out that policy. Sir, this Government has been in power for upwards of fifteen months. Why did they not carry it out? Why have they brought upon themselves what Sir Charles Tupper states to be the fearful responsibility of refusing to carry out that compact? They have had every opportunity of doing so, but, instead, they have rested idly during all of this long period, and all they have done is to send some of their ministers to England for the purpose of trying to discover, if possible, an emergency which will, on the one hand, enable them to satisfy their jingo supporters, and on the other hand, be the means of preventing their National allies from breaking away from them. And what did we do? When that policy was unanimously agreed upon by this House, at the following session of Parliament, the Government introduced a Bill providing for a naval service, under which the Government would be authorized to call for tenders for vessels to form part of a Canadian navy. The Admiralty, it is true, had recommended that we should provide for a fleet unit, and at the head of that unit there should be an armoured cruiser. In view of the heavy financial responsibilities resting upon the country at that time; in view of the Transcontinental railway being far from completion, and the many millions of dollars which would be required to finish it; in view of the other great public works urgently required throughout the country, we did not think the people would at that time sustain us in at once incurring the large expense involved in meeting the views of the Admiralty by providing immediately for the completion of a fleet unit. But, after consultation with the Admiralty, we decided to build four cruisers, two of which could be stationed upon the Pacific coast and two upon the Atlantic and in addition to that, we decided to build four destroyers. The Admiralty was communicated with and this Government was led to believe—and led to believe correctly, I think—that when a fleet unit was established, or when two fleet units were established, these vessels would form a part of that unit, or of the two units, as the case might be. The Admiralty was requested to have complete plans and specifications prepared. They did so, and they undertook that task in co-operation with the Department of Naval Service of Canada. When the plans and specifications were completed, tenders for the building of these ships were called for. A number of people in England, shipbuilders and others, thought it would not be practicable, just as some people think or profess to think to-day, to build the war-vessels in Canada, but we determined that they should be built in Canada and the British ship-builders were informed that in tendering for the construction of the vessels they must undertake to establish ship-building plants in our own country. We were then, as we are to-day, of the opinion that whatever monies the people of Canada devoted to the Naval Service ought to be expended, as far as possible, in our own country, to give employment to our own labouring people, that the material should, as far as possible, be secured in this country and that the ships which we should provide should be Canadian ships. We called for tenders upon these specifications and I shall place upon 'Hansard' and before the people of this country the conditions upon which tenders were invited. The original advertisement concerning the building of war-ships, which was dated July, 1910, was in part as follows:

The vessels will be built according to the plans and specifications of the British Admiralty, which, being of a confidential nature, will only be exhibited to approved firms. The Department of Naval Service would, therefore, be glad to hear from any Canadian or British firm who would wish to tender for the building in Canada of these war-ships.

It would be necessary for such firms to show that they have, or propose to put in, a ship-building plant that will be considered sufficient for the building of cruisers of the Bristol class, and that they have had such experience as will enable them to guarantee the building of such ships according to the Admiralty specifications.

It should be borne in mind that the Rush-Bagot Convention provides that no war-ships should be built on the Great Lakes, and there, ship-building firms should arrange for establishments elsewhere than on these lakes.

Further information can be obtained, by parties who propose to tender, on application to the undersigned.

G. F. DESBARATS,
Deputy Minister of the Naval Service.

Let me read to the House the names of the firms who responded to this advertisement and asked for the specifications. The Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, a very enterprising and successful ship-building firm at Collingwood; the Polson Iron Works, also a very successful and responsible ship-buildng firm at Toronto; Hawthorne, Leslie & Company, John Brown & Company, Vickers, Sons & Maxim, Ltd., Armstrong, Whitworth & Company, Harland & Wolfe, Thorneycroft & Company, Fairfield Shipbuilding Company, Swan, Hunter & Wigham Richardson, Ltd., Beardmore & Company, Palmer Shipbuilding and Iron Company, British firms; the British Columbia Marine Railway Company, a very successful Canadian firm operating at Esquimalt; J. S. White & Sons, also I think a British firm, Yarrow & Company, London and Glasgow Engineering and Shipbuilding Company, Cammell, Laird & Company, Thames Iron Works Shipbuilding and Engineering Company, and Denny Bros., all British ship-building firms.

To those ship-building companies who replied to the original advertisement the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service, on October 6, 1910, wrote as follows:

Gentlemen,—With reference to your application to have the name of your firm noted as desirous of tendering for the construction of cruisers and destroyers for Canada, it does not appear to be generally understood that it is the intention of the Canadian Government that firms tendering shall be prepared to establish a ship-building yard in Canada for the construction of the vessels required, and that the hull, boilers, and propelling machinery shall be actually constructed in Canada, Canadian Material and machinery being utilized as far as possible generally in the construction of these vessels.

In order to save delay and expense, I should be glad to know if your firm is prepared to tender under these conditions.

G. F. DESBARATS,
Deputy Minister of the Naval Service.

Thirteen firms asked to be furnished with specifications in reply to that letter and on the 4th February the Deputy Minister wrote as follows:

Gentlemen,—In accordance with your request I hereby invite you to tender for the construction of the vessels required for the Naval Service of Canada.

Four vessels of the Bristol class of the improved 'Weymouth' type and 6 torpedo boat destroyers of the river class of the improved 'Acorn' type are required to be built in accordance with the requirements laid down in the accompanying contract.

Then he proceeds to speak of the specifications, where and when they can be seen. He says further:

As stated in the conditions laid down in the first schedule, the delivery of the first cruiser is required in three years from the date of the signing of the contract, and a subsequent cruiser each following year.

Two torpedo boat destroyers are to be delivered in three years from the date of the signing of the contract and an additional destroyer at the end of each subsequent nine months. The whole programme is to be completed within six years of the signing of the contract.

That would mean that, from the very day of the signing of the contract, one vessel must be provided about every 18 months. The Deputy Minister proceeds to say:

The conditions of the contract involves the building of the vessels in Canada, and the firm who undertakes the contract must guarantee to establish and equip a shipbuilding and engineering yard in Canada to undertake the work in accordance with the conditions embodied in the contract documents forwarded.

Arrangements will be made to supply the guns and mountings, and also the torpedo tubes, which are to be fitted in the vessels during the construction, in accordance with the requirements of the specification.

In vessels under construction for the British navy, it has been the custom for the Admiralty to separately obtain and supply certain articles to the contractors to be fitted on board during the construction of the vessels.

He then gives the specifications of the hull containing these particulars. On page 3 of the letter he says :

As the Admiralty has been good enough to lend the necessary copies of the specifications and plans of these vessels for the use of the Canadian Government in obtaining tenders it is particularly desired that great care be taken by the contractors tendering, who may borrow these documents, to ensure their safe custody and return, and also that they are only examined by authorized persons engaged in the preparation of the tenders.

Special attention is drawn to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act of Great Britain, 1889, and also to section 85 and 86 of the Criminal Code of Canada, which will be strictly enforced.

The drawings, specifications and all contract documents should be returned by hand direct to the office from which they were obtained as soon as the tender is compiled and a receipt obtained acknowledging their safe return.

The tenders should be endorsed 'Tender for Ships' and forwarded direct to this office addressed to 'The Deputy Minister of the Naval Service' in order that they may be received not later than the 1st day of May, 1911, and should be accompanied by a certified cheque for $100,000 payable to the Minister of the Naval Service.

In response to that advertisement a tender was received from Armstrong, Whitworth & Company. They are among the leading ship-building firms of the United Kingdom. They offered to build in Canada. A tender was received from the British-Canadian Ship-building and Dock Company Limited. That was a company organized by Sir Henry Pellatt, of Toronto, and associated with the Canadian company were two of the largest and most experienced ship-building firms of the United Kingdom. They proposed to establish a dry-dock and ship-building plant at Sydney, Nova Scotia. There also was a tender from Campbell, Laird & Company. They proposed to build at St. John in conjunction with the company which is building the dry-dock there. They submitted a plan of the proposed shipyard and offered to proceed under the terms of the contract to establish a ship-building plant and build these vessels at St. John. There was also a tender from the Thames Iron Works Ship-building and Engineering Company Limited, who proposed to build at the port of Halifax. There was one also from Vickers, Sons & Maxim who proposed to build at Montreal where they had already contracted to build a dry dock and ship-repairing plant. There were also tenders from another great ship-building firm of the United Kingdom, Swan, Hunter, Wigham & Richardson, Limited, who also proposed to build in Canada in accordance with the specifications. The mere reading of these names, names which command the confidence of the British Admiralty, the names of ship-builders who, every year, are turning out the greatest battleships which plow the ocean, under contracts with the British Admiralty, the names of ship-building firms who have built some of the greatest floating docks to be found in the world, ought to be an assurance to the House and to the people of the country that if the Government of this day was determined, as our Government was determined, that these ships should be built in Canada, there would be no difficulty in getting English ship-building firms to establish a plant in Canada and give to the Canadian people, in the construction of these vessels, the benefit of their organization, the benefit of their expert knowledge and the benefit of the skilled labourers whom they would send over here to take part in the work and to teach Canadians to do the work also.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) made the statement, in the speech with which he favoured the House, that I had done him an injustice by having made the statement in St. John and elsewhere that he had, after he became minister, struck a blow at the city of St. John and a blow at Canada by returning the deposit of Messrs. Cammell, Laird & Co., and abandoning the contract which they were prepared to enter into for the construction of these vessels. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not content himself with referring to my remarks in regard to his conduct, but, I think, in the opinion of all the members of this House, he lowered the tone of the debate by dragging in the provincial election in the province of New Brunswck and referring to the fact that the Fleming government had been sustained. I thought it was unworthy of my hon. friend to do that, particularly in view of the fact that one of the most prominent members of the provincial government is a Liberal who fights in Dominion elections upon the same side as I and my other friends from New Brunswick, who has taken part for many years in federal contests and who has always been on the Liberal side. My hon. friend ought not to have done that in view of the fact that the provincial government had the support in that contest of so old and well-tried a Liberal as the hon. Mr. Ellis, now a member of the Senate, and of the newspaper of which he is the owner, the St. John Globe. They take a certain ground in Federal politics, but, like many hundreds and thousands of Liberals, they supported the provincial government simply upon provincial grounds. Yet, my hon. friend attempted to induce this House to believe that, because the people of New Brunswick had supported the provincial government, they had justified him in abandoning the proposed ship-building contract at the port of St. John. I am sorry that my hon. friend is not present, but I will repeat in this House, and I would gladly repeat in his presence, the statements which I have made elsewhere.

What are the facts? After a careful examination of all these tenders, made by the late Government upon the initiation of the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it was found that the tender of Cammell, Laird & Co., was the lowest. Cammell, Laird & Co. are most reputable ship-builders, they enjoy the confidence of the British Government, they have turned out many war vessels for the British Government as well as one or more very large floating docks and, in their tender, they said: We are prepared, according to the terms of the specification which you have submitted to us, to build ten vessels in the period of sx years, we are prepared to establish our shipyard at the port of St. John and we are prepared to do the work to the satisfaction of the Board of Admiralty and of the Minister of the Naval Service of Canada.

Mr. CROCKET: Why did your Government not acept the tender?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will come to that in a moment. What took place after these tenders were received? They were due on the 1st of May, 1911. These specifications had been prepared by the British Admiralty. The Government was working in entire harmony and under a clear and perfect understanding with the British Admiralty and the minister and members of the late Government thought that it would be desirable to take these tenders to England, submit them to the British Admiralty, confer with them in regard to the responsibility of the tenderers and then decide as to what tenders should be accepted. They were received on the 1st day of May, 1911, and on the 11th day of May my right hon. friend, now the leader of the Opposition, and then the Prime Minister, together with the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, went to England and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took these tenders and specifications with him. He conferred with the British Admiralty. They left England upon the 2nd day of July, they would arrive about the 9th or 10th of July and on the 29th of July as you will remember, Mr. Speaker, Parliament was dissolved. I would ask you whether, in view of the magnitude of this contract, that was an unreasonable delay. Then, let me ask you if, after Parliament had been dissolved and in view of the fact that in one of the provinces of Canada at all events, the naval question was playing a most important part, it would have been proper for the Government to have let a contract of this magnitude for these war vessels? At all events, the Government thought it would not have been proper to do so and they acted accordingly. You know the unfortunate result, as far as this country is concerned, of the elections of September 21, 1911.

Mr. FOWLER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend reminds me of Nero who fiddled while Rome was burning. I do not think that any misfortune that could happen to this country would prevent my hon. friend from showing his boisterous hilarity. Well, Sir, we were defeated.

Mr. FOWLER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would it have been right for us, between the date of the election, and the time of our resigning office, to let that contract? I can imagine what a how lwould have gone up from the Tory press and from the Tory public men of this country if we had ventured to do such a thing, and very properly. There was one contract for the dry-dock and harbour works of St. John. We took the same view in regard to that. It was a contract of great magnitude and we thought that it would be proper for us to leave that contract for our successors to deal with. We took the same view with reference to the building of war vessels, but in what position did we leave the matter? We left the tenders for the work at St. John with a memorandum calling attention to the fact that the Norton Griffiths Company were the lowest tenderers but that in view of the magnitude of the work it was deemed proper to leave the subject for our successors to deal with. So also with respect to the war vessels. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries had returned the deposits made by all the other tenderers, but he had retained in his hands the deposit of $100,000 which had been made by Messrs. Cammell, Laird and Company as security for the carrying out of the contract to build these war vessels in the port of St. John. We left the tender, we left the money and when this Government came in it was in the hands of the department over which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries presides. Had he chosen to stand on the resolution passed by the House in 1909, he then had an opportunity of saying to his colleagues: the late Government has in pursuance of the policy agreed upon by Parliament, called for tenders for these war vessels; a great shipbuilding firm proposes to build them at St. John; they are the lowest tenderer; here is a deposit which has been in the hands of the Government for many months, and I ask you my colleagues to award this contract and let the work go forward. But he did not do that. He returned the $100,000 deposit to Messrs. Cammell, Laird & Co., and allowed their tender to be abandoned. I repeat what I have said elsewhere, that in doing that the Minister of Marine struck a blow, not only at his own constituency, which aspires to become a great shipbuilding port, but he struck a blow at Canada from which it will take it many years to recover. And, what is the excuse given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries? He says, as it would take six years to build all these vessels, some of them would become obsolete before the entire programme was completed. What would you think of the wisdom of the German Government which has a naval programme which runs along until 1920, not building any ships at all because many of the vessels constructed in the earlier years of carrying out that programme will, according to the Minister of Marine, become obsolete? I have no doubt it is true, as was said by Mr. Churchill, that from the day a war vessel is laid on the stocks she begins to become obsolete because of the changes and improvements that are consantly being made; but is that to prevent you beginning to build ships? If the Japanese Government had taken that view, they never would have started to build a navy. If, thirty years ago, when the United States undertook to build a new navy, and started upon a policy under which they have since built upwards of four hundred vessels, they had been actuated by the view enunciated by the Minister of Marine, they never would have undertaken a shipbuilding programme at all, because before it was completed some of the vessels would have become obsolete. And what is the spectacle we have now presented to this Parliament? It is suggested by the Prime Minister that if we give dreadnoughts to Great Britain, the British Government will in turn undertake to build small cruisers in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Oil tanks.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oil tanks and light cruisers. Well, some of these light vessels will become obsolete before the programme is completed, and what a foolish thing it is for the British Government to undertake to do that which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says it would be foolish for the Canadian Government to attempt to do. I am one of those who have not a shadow of doubt that whatever war vessels we undertake to build, should be built in Canada. Canada is a great manufacturing country, with thousands of skilled workmen who could work successfully at the building of vessels as well as at other structural steel work.

When my hon. friend from Brantford was addressing the House, I made the statement that these dreadnoughts could be built in Canada within a period of six years; that a shipbuilding yard could be erected and the vessels turned out within that time. That hon. gentleman and others on the other side of the House said that it would take ten or fifteen years to build these ships in Canada. As to whether it would or not, will surely depend somewhat upon what they have been able to do in other parts of the world. The Prime Minister has not told us how soon these ships can be built in England, and the information we get from the newspapers is that all the shipyards in Britain are fully occupied, and that it will be impossible for them to do more than carry out the building programme they already have on hand. The demand for commercial vessels was never so great in England as it is to-day; the demand for ship carpenters and riveters and skilled shipwrights in all branches was never so great as to-day; wages were never so high in England as they are at present, they have risen I believe at least twenty-five per cent as compared with a year ago. The Prime Minister has not told the House whether under these circumstances he can expect to get these war vessels built in England within the next three or four years; but we do know that in other places they have commenced to build shipyards where there was no shipyard before, and they have equipped the yard and turned out battleships within a period of six years.

I was desirous of getting the fullest information with reference to that, and it occurred to me that in view of what has been done in the United States it would be desirable to visit one of the great shipyards of that country; and during the recess, in the discharge of my duty, went to Quincy, Mass. There on the banks of the Fore river I found one of the greatest shipyards and one of the greatest shipbuilding plants in the world. In 1900 the site of that shipyard was an open field. This company purchased in the early part of the year 1900 eighty acres of land, fronting on that river, and they started in to establish a shipyard, and within four months of the date of the purchase they laid the keel of a protected cruiser, and in one year after they bought the property they entered into a contract with the United States Government for the building of two battleships, the largest of any vessels then forming part of the United States navy. Two years after that, the vessels were launched and the keel of another battleship was laid. Of course, the vessels were not entirely completed because it does not mean that a vessel is completed when she is launched; it takes a year or more to equip her with armour and guns. But the vessels were launched in 1904, two years after the keels were laid, and four years after the property was bought, upon which this company erected their plant. In 1902 they laid down these two battleships side by side under the great ship's house which they had erected. And what have they accomplished since they started the shipbuilding industry there? In the short period of 12 years this company has, including vessels which are now upon the stocks, built five battleships for the United States Government, one battleship for the Argentine Republic, seventeen submarines, seven torpedo boat destroyers, three cruisers, in addition to a large number of commercial vessels, and several marine engines for the Japanese navy. That is convincing testimony as to what can be done with modern machinery and proper organization, not an organization extending over, as the Prime Minister says, fifty or a hundred years, but with that organization which modern skill and modern ingenuity can provide. This company has, in that short period of twelve years, in the shipyard which was an open field in 1900, built altogether 114 vessels. The gentlemen who are the executive officers of that company treated me with very great courtesy and gave me every information, and any hon. gentleman can go there and see for himself. I was desirous of obtaining absolute facts, so as to lay them before Parliament, and when I returned from Quincy, I sent this telegram to the president of the company, not being sure with regard to one or two points:

St. John, N.B., Jan. 12-13, 1913.

Francis T. Bowles,
President F. R. S. Co.,
Quincy, Mass.

As I want to be absolutely accurate in my statement, I shall be greatly obliged if you will look up records and let me know month and year when your company began work of equipment yard; also month and year when keel of first battleship was laid; also month and year when keel of second battleship was laid, likewise the names of the two ships. Please write me to-morrow to House of Commons, Ottawa.

(Sgd.) WILLIAM PUGSLEY.

In reply to that telegram I received this letter:

Fore River Shipbuilding Company,
Quincy, Massachusetts,
January 13th, 1913.

Hon. William Pugsley,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:—

Your telegram of yesterday from St. John was received this morning. We enclose herewith a booklet which was issued by the company in 1902. On page 3 is a reproduction of a photograph taken of breaking ground at our new plant on April 29th, 1900. The works up to this time had been operating in East Braintree, two miles up the river.

The keel of the first vessel, the U.S.S. Des Moines, was laid on August 28, 1900, in the new yard, and the machinery and buildings of the old plant were moved during November, December and January following, all work being under way in January, 1901, at the new plant.

The contracts for the first battleships, the New Jersey and Rhode Island, were signed on February 15, 1901, the keel of the Rhode Island being laid May 1, 1902, and of the New Jersey on April 2, 1902. This delay was caused more by the non-receipt of revised plans from the department than any other reason.

We also enclose a booklet giving list of vessels which we have constructed, and beg to inform you that since this list was compiled we have contracted for five additional submarines, the torpedo boat destroyer Cushing, submarine tender Niagara, and battleship Nevada, for the U. S. Government; an oil steamer, a sulphur steamer and a molasses steamer for private parties; four steel car floats, and three steel steam trawlers; making a total of 114 hulls contracted for or under way at these works during the past twelve years.

If you desire any further information, please command us.

Very truly yours,
Fore River Ship-building Co.
By F. T. BOWLES,
President

I may say that at Braintree they had a little yard where they were building yachts, tug boats and craft of that kind. You have there the actual facts as to what can be done. What is there about a ship-building yard which makes it so difficult to equip? Nothing whatever. The ship house consists of structural steel. Of course for the building of battleships, that house must be larger than if it was intended merely for cruisers; it must be higher so that when the battleship is finished, the vessel may still be underneath the roof of the house. In order to do the work economically and efficiently, the house must be equipped with cranes so that the plates and other materials for the vessel may be moved from time to time to the places where it is necessary to deposit them for the purpose of constructing the vessel. The yard must also be thoroughly equipped. In this American yard there are magnificent cranes, one of them I remember being capable of lifting 150,000 pounds; this goes to show the magnitude of the works they have there. Then there are the machine shops, forge shops, blacksmith shops, carpenter shops, moulding shops and the great yards where all the material is deposited; but it is only a matter of organizaion, and with money and expert skill a shipyard could be equipped, I venture to say, just as was the case with this company, within a period of two years easily. It must be borne in mind that when a shipbuilding yard is once equipped for the building of battleships, it is suitable for the building of smaller vessels, cruisers, commercial vessels, and all kinds of vessels for which the company might obtain orders. In addition to these six battleships which have been turned out in this yard in twelve years, they have utilized the yard for the building of a large number of commercial vessels which go to complete the total number of 114. Now you may think that the expense of such an undertaking must have been enormous. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister said that the expense of building a shipyard for the construction of these large vessels would be simply enormous, and sought to convey the idea that it would be beyond the ability of the people of Canada or of any company to establish a ship-building yard in the Dominion of Canada. I was favoured by the president of the company with their last year's financial statement, from which it appears that the total cost of the plant and machinery was $1,318,568.78, including all improvements up to the present time; the cost of the real estate, buildings, &c., was $2,389,805.27, or a total cost of the land, buildings and plant up to the present time, with all improvements chargeable to capital account of $3,708,374.05. I ask you if that is beyond the financial ability of the people of Canada or a company which might be induced to establish such a plant, if it had the contract for the construction of those war-vessels. I say it is not; I doubt if it is nearly as much as the cost of the Angus plant which has been established by the Canadian Pacific railway at Montreal; I doubt if it is any more than the plant of the great car building company in the city of Montreal has cost. It is a moderate sum of money, and would be quite within the means of this country and of companies which could be organized. Take the Sydney Steel Works; those works have cost many, many millions more than this American plant has cost. Is it not humilitating to us, who take a pride in Canada and in its marvellous industrial development during the last fifteen years, to be told that we cannot in Canada do what other countries in the world have done and done very easily, i.e., that we cannot build war-vessels? My hon. friend who last addressed the House says, 'Oh, we would have to buy the guns elsewhere.' Supposing we did, the guns furnished to these battleships which have been built at Fore River are supplied by the United States Government from their arsenals, and the armour is supplied by the steel works at Bethlehem. I might say to you that that armour is largely composed of nickel which is taken from the nickel mines of Canada, because Canada owns the best nickel deposits of the world. I am also told that at Sydney, in view of what they supposed was going to be the permanent naval policy of this country, they had the plant all ready for the rolling of plates, for the building of war-vessels, so that they could be fitted to turn out the plates at very short notice for the building of those ships. Let me say this to hon. gentlemen, who used those words which were introduced for the purpose of fireworks, I assume at the request of the Prime Minister, that 'these ships are to be of the highest class which skill can design or money can buy,' that this Fore River Shipbuilding Company at Quincy, Massachusetts, has now submitted to it by the United States Government specifications for the building of a war-vessel which is to be of the highest type which science can devise or money can buy. This vessel is to be called the Pennsylvania, and is to be one of the newest and one of the greatest war-vessels of the world. This ship building yard is perfectly well equipped to undertake the construction of that vessel, as it is thoroughly equipped to undertake the construction of the largest war vessel afloat. I have also a further confirmation of the statement I have made that a ship-building yard suitable for the turning out of battleships can be equipped in two years; I have it from a gentleman who is very prominently associated with that company which, in conjunction with Vickers Sons Maxim and other great ship building firms, have undertaken the building of battleships for the Spanish Government at Ferrol in Spain. They have taken over the Spanish arsenals, and in considering the time in which battleships could be turned out, he informs me that it would be necessary for Canada to give two years longer to equip the yard and make it thoroughly suitable for the building of battleships. Considering that all the ship-building yards of the Mother Country are fully occupied, and considering that even if they were not occupied, it would take at least three years to build these battleships in the Mother Country, considering that the whole three could be turned out, or in case our policy is adopted, the two super-dreadnoughts which would form the head of these units could be turned out inside of six years, and allow a number of cruisers and smaller vessels to be under way at the same time—I ask you if there is any such emergency—I ask you: has it been shown that the Empire is in such peril for the want of $35,000,000 that we should violate the policy agreed upon by this House, the true Canadian policy, of having the ships built in our own country, and should instead send money to the Mother Country for the purpose of having these vessels built there? Every member of this House knows there is not a greater emergency to-day than there was in 1909. There is no greater emergency to-day than there will probably be three, five or ten years from now. We have to meet what appears to be a permanent condition of affairs, likely to exist for a good many years to come, until that blessed day shall dawn when all international disputes shall be no longer possible between the civilized nations of the world.

My hon. friend the Prime Minister says that the question of expenditure ought to stand in the way of our building these ships in Canada. He says it will cost, as I recollect his statement, $12,000,000 more to build in Canada than in England. Upon what does he base his figures? As I understand it, upon the tenders received in 1911. At that time, as I have said, the cost of labour in the shipyards of the United Kingdom was 25 per cent less than it is to-day, and the cost of material was very much less than it is to-day. But, on the other hand, there is another fact which the hon. gentleman did not take into consideration. All these tendering firms, having only in view a contract for the limited period of six years, took into account—and most of them mentioned it in their tenders—the cost of the plant which would be required for the purpose of building these vessels and smaller vessels. This cost was estimated at from a million to a million and a half of dollars. They distributed this over the six years, of course, and charged it to the cost of the ships. But if a contract were let in Canada for these fleet units, it would mean a very large expenditure. And the cost of the shipyard probably would not be more than $4,000,000, which would be distributed over the whole period during which the construction would go on. Because, if we should reaffirm the splendid resolution of March, 1909, it would be recognized that that resolution expressed the permanent policy of the country and that the question of contributions to the British Government would not again be raised, and these ship builders would come here relying upon the permanency of that policy.

As to this question of the relative cost of warships in Canada and Great Britain at the present time, let me call attention to a few facts. About two years ago the Argentine Republic called for tenders for two battleships. They are not a manufacturing country as Canada is, they have not as great an industrial population as Canada has; and they did not appear to have the ambition which the people in Canada have to build ships in their own country. They called for tenders for the building of two of the greatest battleships at the time afloat with a displacement of 27,000 tons. They invited tenders from the whole world. The result was that the contracts for the building of these great ships were obtained by United States firms—one by the Fore River Ship Building Company, and the other by the New York Shipbuilding Company which has a shipyard near Philadelphia. These firms were the lowest tenderers even though the shipbuilders of Great Britain had been invited to compete. Not long ago one of the large steel vessels plying on the great lakes was destroyed, and it was found necessary to have a new one built to take her place. Tenders were invited from British shipbuilders and also from the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, and the tender of the latter company as well as its terms of delivery were found to be more favourable than those of the British shipbuilders.

But suppose it did cost more to build ships in Canada, would it be too great a price to pay for the encouragement of a great shipbuilding industry, or industries, in this country upon the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts? Shipbuilding is the one great industry in Canada which is absolutely without protection. Not only do ships from Great Britain come in free of duty, but all their fittings, furniture and supplies come in free also. Would it be too great a price, I ask, to pay a few millions for the purpose of having these war vessels built in Canada thus giving employment to our own labourers and leading to the development of a great shipbuilding industry? We do not think it wrong to make the people of Canada pay from twenty-five per cent to thirty-five per cent upon the articles that they eat or wear or use. Why should we object to a comparatively small expenditure to encourage a great shipbuilding industry in this country?

Perhaps I may be pardoned for digressing for a moment to emphasize this idea that the Government is not encouraging shipbuilding as it ought to do. The Prime Minister says that he looks forward to the time when there will be a revival of shipbuilding in this country. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in a beautiful passage in his speech, spoke of coming from a city by the sea and of having the smell of the sea in his nostrils; and he longed for the day when shipbuilding in this country would revive. Mr. Speaker, the way to build ships is to build them—not to talk about them, not to make flowery speeches about them or about what you would like to have or hope to have; the way to begin building ships is to begin. Consider what this Government has done. Not long ago, there was required for the Customs Department a large steamer that would cost in the vicinity of $300,000. Tenders were called for, and among the tenderers was that great concern, the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, employing Canadian labour, using Canadian material as far as possible. Their tender was $315,000. Another tender was that of the Thorneycroft Company, Limited, whose tender was £56,300, or $273,000—a difference of about 15 per cent as between the two tenders. And yet the contract was given to the British firm, and the Canadian firm was refused the opportunity to build the ship. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, a great deal of the material to be used by the Canadian firm in building this ship would be imported and the duty would have to be paid, which would go into the treasury of the country. Much of the material we would be obliged to use in the vessels would have to be imported into Canada, and the duty paid thereon would go into the treasury of the country; so that while on the one hand we would be paying a larger price, we would be receiving back from the Department of Customs a considerable portion of the extra amount paid. It seems to me it would have been worth while for this Government, for the purpose of encouraging shipbuilding in Canada, to have paid this additional 15 per cent for the purpose of having this vessel constructed in Canada. The policy of the late Government was to award the contracts for building ships in Canada in cases where the cost was not over 25 or 30 per cent more than the tender of the British shipbuilder. But the tender of the Canadian company was turned down and the contract given to a British firm, for the reason that their price was about 15 per cent below that of the Canadian company. That is a poor way of encouraging shipbuilding in Canada, and I think my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will be obliged to revise their intentions in order to demonstrate their sincere desire of encouraging the building of ships in Canada.

Before passing to another subject, I want to say I have been asked a question in regard to the number of men employed in the shipyards at Fore River, Massachusetts. At the present time the yards are fully employed, and there are in the vicinity of four thousand people obtaining employment in connection therewith. The average number employed is somewhere between 3,500 and 4,000, but at the present time there are no less than 4,000 in steady employment. It is a great stimulus to the national pride of the country that the people of the United States are enabled to turn out these enormous battleships in their own shipyards.

As a sort of sweetener to the bitter pill which the people of Canada are asked to swallow in the sending of this vast sum of money out of the country, we are told that the British Government will, in all probability, undertake the building of light cruisers and oil-tank vessels in Canada, on condition that Canada will pay a portion of the cost. In other words, it is proposed that these little vessels shall be built in Canada, and that we shall pay a portion of the extra cost, the ships belonging to the British Government. Is that not a peculiar proposition to submit to a self-respecting and ambitious people, as are the people of Canada? Hon. gentlemen on the other side will derive litle comfort from Mr. Churchill's statement in regard to the matter, for he says it must be understood that the number of vessels cannot be guaranteed, and therefore there is no assurance of permanency in regard to this work. How are you going to establish shipyards suitable for carrying out work of this kind unless you give to the contracts a certain degree of permanency? I believe that the people of the country, in spite of this sweetener to the bitter pill, will not so readily swallow the dose as hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to think.

It has been said that it is absurd for us to think these ships could be manned by Canada, for it would be impossible to get Canadians to undertake this work. I am free to admit that at first we would be unable to secure a sufficient number of trained Canadian seamen for the purpose. We would probably obtain some, but we would not for a number of years be able to secure the required number of trained seamen. But, Sir, what was the arrangement made between the Government and the British Admiralty upon this question? I wish to call attention to what I consider a most important agreement made in June, 1911, between the representatives of the governments of Australia and Canada, and the British Admiralty. That agreement was solemnly entered into between the two great overseas dominions and the Mother Country; that agreement was one to which Australia has adhered in good faith; to which the British Admiralty was prepared to adhere in good faith, and to which this Government is seeking to have broken! This is what the agreement was:

The naval services and forces of the Dominions of Canada and Australia will be exclusively under the control of their respective governments.

Did the British Government think that was a separatist proposition? Not at all. And may they not be supposed to know just as well as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House what would be a separatist proposition, or what would be in the real interest of the Empire? (Reading):

2. The training and discipline of the naval forces of the dominions will be generally uniform with the training and discipline of the fleet of the United Kingdom, and, by arrangement, officers and men of the said forces will be interchangeable with those under the control of the British Admiralty.

3. The ships of each dominion naval force will hoist at the stern the white ensign as the symbol of the authority of the Crown, and at the jack-staff the distinctive flag of the Dominion.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side have loudly claimed that they are for one empire, one king, and one flag; and they seek to arouse the patriotic feelings of the people by that declaration. Here we have the British Admiralty and the overseas dominions agreeing that upon the ships of both Canada and Australia, the white ensign, the flag of the British Empire, shall always fly, as a symbol of the authority of the Crown, and that, in order to distinguish the respective ships of the overseas dominions at the jack-staff shall be hoisted the distinctive flag of the Dominion. The agreement further states :

4. The Canadian and Australian Governments will have their own naval stations as agreed upon and from time to time. The limits of the stations are as described in schedule (A), Canada, and schedule (B), Australia.

5. In the event of the Canadian and Australian Government desiring to send ships to a part of the British Empire outside of their own respective stations, they will notify the British Admiralty.

6. In the event of the Canadian or Australian Government desiring to send ships to a foreign port, they will obtain the concurrence of the Imperial government, in order that the necessary arrangements with the Foreign Office may be made as in case of ships of the British fleet, in such time and manner as is usual between the British Admiralty and the Foreign office.

In order to bridge over the time during which seamen for the Canadian navy may be thoroughly trained, paragraphs 12 and 13 provide as follows :

12. The British Admiralty undertakes to lend to the dominions during the period of development of their services, under conditions to be agreed upon, such flag officer and other officers and men as may be needed. In their selection preference will be given to officers and men coming from, or connected with, the dominions, but they should be all volunteers for the service.

13. The service of the officers of the British fleet in the dominion naval forces, or of officers of these forces in the British fleet, will count in all respects for promotion, pay, retirement, &c., as services in their respective forces.

That is to say, pending the development of the service, all men or officers needed shall be furnished by the British Admiralty, and paid for by the Canadian Government.

We did not propose to send unmanned ships. We did not propose to ask the Mother Country to pay the men who are to stand behind the guns in case of battle, but we are prepared to pay English sailors in the meantime, to obtain Canadian sailors as soon as possible, and pay them for their services.

Paragraph 15 is as follows:

It is desirable, in the interests of efficiency and co-operation, that arrangements should be made from time to time between the British Admiralty and the dominions for the ships of the dominions to take part in fleet exercises or for any other joint training considered necessary under the senior naval officer. While so employed, the ships will be under the command of that officer who would not, however, interfere in the internal economy of ships of another service further than absolutely necessary.

Paragraph 16:

In the time of war when the naval service of the Dominion, or any part thereof, has been put at the disposal of the Imperial Government by the Dominion authorities, the ships will form an integral part of the British fleet, and will remain under the control of the British Admiralty during the continuance of the war.

I have heard it stated that after the Government had placed a ship at the disposal of the British Admiralty in case of war, Parliament was to be called together and Parliament might recall the vessel. Sir, the only reason why it is provided that Parliament shall be called together is the reason which exists in Australia, that Parliament is entitled to be called together to vote the monies which are necessary in order to defray the expenses connected with the conduct of the ships in war, but when a vessel is once placed at the service of the British Admiralty in case of war there is to be no power to recall, it remains under the control of the superior naval officer, and under the entire control of the Admiralty until the war is concluded.

Then paragraph 17 reads:

The dominions having applied to their naval forces the King's Regulations and Admiralty instructions and the Naval Discipline Act, the British Admiralty and Dominion Governments will communicate to each other any changes which they propose to make in these regulations or that Act.

By that agreement between the British Admiralty and the representatives of the two great overseas dominions you have a solemn arrangement and one which was satisfactory to the British Admiralty in respect to the fleets of the overseas dominions. I agree with Sir Charles Tupper that a fearful, a tremendous responsibility rests upon these gentlemen opposite who would disturb the agreement of 1909, destroy the agreement made between the representatives of the British Admiralty and the representatives of the overseas dominions. These gentlemen say: Oh, we want one flag, we are not satisfied that there shall be a distinctive flag of the Dominion flying even at the jack-staff of the navies of the Dominion of Canada and of Australia. Are hon. gentlemen opposite in a position to take this stand? On the 19th of December, 1911, they found they could not think of any other arrangement respecting the flag which would be more symbolic of the authority of the Crown and at the same time evoke the national pride of our country in its own fleet and, two months after they came into office, they ratified by Order in Council the arrangement which had been made between Canada and the Motherland. I find in a return submitted to Parliament, dated December 19, 1911:

Certified copy of a report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Royal Highness the Governor General on December 19, 1911.

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated December 7, 1911, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, stating, with reference to paragraph 111 of the memorandum of conferences between the British Admiralty and representatives of the Dominion of Canada and the Commonwealth of Australia, laid before the Imperial Conference at its last meeting,—that the naval ships of the Dominion of Canada will hoist at the stern the White Ensign as the symbol of the authority of the Crown, and will fly the White Pendant.

The minister observes that it is proposed also to fly as a distinctive flag of the Dominion the Blue Ensign with the Canadian Arms in the Fly.

The Committee, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, advise that Your Royal Highness may be pleased to forward a copy hereof to the Right Honourable the Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies for the information of His Majesty's Government.

All of which is respectfully submitted for approval.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

So when this Government were called on to deal with this question of the flag, and when they saw the agreement which the late Government had made conjointly with Australia and with the Admiralty that the white ensign should be flown from all vessels and there should be also the distinctive flag of each overseas dominion they properly recommended that arrangement for approval, and it was accordingly approved by His Royal Highness the Governor General. Let us hear no more about our wanting on this side two flags and upon that side one flag. Every Canadian wants but one flag, that flag to be symbolic of the authority of the Crown and symbolic of the unity of the British Empire. That is what we agreed upon with the Admiralty conjointly with the Government of Australia. That is what this Government approved of two months after they came into office.

A number of gentlemen on the other side of the House have said: Oh, see what has happened with regard to the men who were placed on the Niobe and Rainbow, you could not get men for them. In view of this it is interesting to read the report submitted to Parliament by the Minister of Marine for the year ending March 31, 1912. It first speaks of the course of training at the Naval College and says: It has been very satisfactory and the cadets have made rapid progress. Then it proceeds to speak, over the signature of Admiral Kingsmill, Director of the Naval Service, of the recruiting. It says:

Owing to the uncertainty of the future naval policy, and to the accommodation being limited, no special efforts have been made to obtain recruits; postmasters are still acting as recruiting officers and have forwarded candidates who come up to the standard of physical and educational requirements.

The report speaks of the desertions and says in conclusion:

The large number of desertions is attributed to the fact that the larger number of recruits are drawn from cities and towns remote from the sea; candidates present themselves who are totally unacquainted with the conditions of life in a ship, which differ much from that to which they are accustomed.

An important paragraph relating to manning the vessels, which is worthy of the consideration of the House, was omitted by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro).

Up to the present the fishing population has not been exploited, and it is anticipated that recruits can be obtained therefrom who are inured to a sea life and who would find themselves in congenial surroundings in a man-of-war.

I believe every word of that to be true. How can you expect young men to take up life on board a war-vessel if there is no certainty as to the future naval policy of the Government? They would be liable to be discharged at any time, having simply a temporary employment. Young men would not enter such an employment. Is it not true, too, that among the hardy fishermen of this country recruits could easily be obtained? The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) says that the Canadians are not a maritime people. That I deny. There are 80,000 fishermen in Canada, 80,000 men engaged in the fisheries. Along the coast of the Maritime provinces and the coast of Newfoundland there are many thousands of young men who would be glad to engage in the naval service. Every year from the coast of Newfoundland there go from 16,000 to 18,000 fishermen away up to the coast of Labrador and endure hardships of the most severe character in order to earn a livelihood. They leave their families and they have no reasonable certainty that they will return. They are willing to endure these hardships to earn a livelihood. The sea has its attraction for them and they would be glad to engage in the naval service. The naval service could be made wonderfully attractive to the young men of this country if we adopted the plan which they have adopted in the United States. There they invite young men from sixteen to twenty-five years of age to engage upon the war vessels of the United States for a period of four years. They undertake to give them a trade, to instruct them in electricity, engineering, carpentering, or machine work of various kinds according to their adaptability and their desires and, at the end of four years, they, if they do not desire to remain in the service, can go ashore and work at the trade which they have learned on the ship. The service is attractive and I am told it is true that many hundreds, nay, I believe I may say many thousands, of young Canadians are now in the naval service of the United States. They go there because of their fondness for sea life and because there is no opportunity to engage in naval service at home. I hope that I have disposed completely of the arguments that it would not be possible to have these ships manned.

But suppose that for a few years we were obliged to avail ourselves of the offer made by the British Admiralty in 1911 and pay for British sailors, surely that would be a better thing for Canada to do than to say to the Mother Country: This great Dominion with its large population, with its vast resources, its wealth and rapidly increasing revenue, will give you these ships, that is all we will do for you, you must man them yourself, you must pay the wages of the men, you must pay for the upkeep and if you are prepared as the Prime Minister suggested in England, to come to such an understanding with us as will give us a measure of control in the affairs of the Empire, we will consider what we are going to do in regard to a permanent policy; or, if you should happen, three years from now, to get into a condition which would make us believe that we might safely ask Parliament for another contribution, perhaps we will give you another number of dreadnoughts and so satisfy you until the time comes when we may attain our desires. That is not the view which the members upon this side of the House take on this question, or of the duty which we owe to the Mother Country. We believe that whatever we do we should do as the work of Canada. We believe that the men behind the guns are of more importance than the guns or the ships when the battle rages and we believe that it would be a humiliation to the people of Canada in the future if a great battle decisive of the fate of the Empire should take place and Canadians should be told: You were willing to give the ships but you had not the courage, you had not the patriotism, to send your young men sailors to man the ships, to stand behind the guns and to fight for Canada and the Empire. We believe that the course which is oulined in the amendment of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is the one which is best for Canada and best for the Empire.

Now, I want to say, in conclusion, that in my judgment my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, in suggesting, as he is reported to have suggested in England, that if Canada is to take any large part in Imperial defence it must have a voice in the foreign policy of the Empire, proposed a course which is not a wise or patriotic one for the people of Canada to take. I think that whatever we do to-day for Canada or the Empire we should do voluntarily and we should leave it to the Mother Country in future to do what it thinks best for the Empire and for the overseas dominions. We should not bargain upon this question of naval defence any more than we bargained when the question of giving a preference to the Mother Country came up and when the Government, led by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, voluntarily offered to the Mother Country to admit its products at a preference of 33⅓ per cent as against those of the rest of the world. We say that it is our duty to act and the best way we can act is by providing for the creation of a Canadian navy, the ships to be owned, manned and controlled by Canada, to be under the control of the Government of Canada, but to be always available for the service of the Empire when the Empire needs the services of the Canadian ships.

Now, Sir, one other word in regard to this supposed condition which my right hon. friend the leader of the Government suggested. I find it is the very condition which was put forward by Mr. Bourassa at a Nationalist meeting which was held at St. Eustache, in the province of Quebec, and it shows the influence which the Nationalists are exerting upon this Government and upon its actions with reference to the naval question. I find that these very ideas were put forward at a meeting held at St. Eustache on the 17th of July, 1910. The report in the newspapers is as follows:

> At a Nationalist meeting at St. Eustache, July 17, 1910, a resolution embodying their platform was adopted after a vigorous speech by Henri Bourassa. Dealing with Imperial issues, the resolution proceeded as follows:
> 'But confident in the greatness and efficiency of the principles of centralization and of autonomy as solemnly proclaimed and recognized since more than half a century by the authorities of Great Britain and those of Canada, we are opposed to any new policy which would entangle us in distant wars, foreign to Canada, so long especially as the autonomous colonies of the Empire do not share with the Mother Country upon a footing of equality the sovereign authority in matters relating to the Imperial Army and Navy treaties of peace and alliance, foreign relations, the Government of India, and the possessions of the Crown.'

That language is almost identical with the language which was used by the Prime Minister upon several occasions in the city of London, as reported in the Canadian newspapers, and it breathes the same spirit. It shows to what a marked, to what a lamentable degree, the utterances and opinions of Mr. Bourassa and his Nationalist allies are influencing the course of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister on this question. But, Sir, it was said by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce: Suppose there was a contest; the Nationalists were opposed to a contribution; they said: Hang a contribution, or damn a contribution—I forget which.

Mr. WILCOX: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister, I think, used the expression that the Nationalists said: 'Damn a contribution.' Perhaps I am mistaken in that.

Mr. WILCOX: No, he did not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What did he say?

Mr. WILCOX: He said that the Nationalists did not have their own way.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What did he say in regard to the Nationalists' view of a contribution? Perhaps he did not say that; at all events he said that or something very like it, and he said that the Nationalists did not get their own way. I do not know as to that——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But we do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But our friends from the province from which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition comes do know in regard to that matter. But there is no question, and there can be no question, from what we know has taken place in Quebec during the last two years, that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), did, for a considerable period, influence and control the opinion of the members of the Government upon this question.

We know that when he moved his resolution in the House that there should be an election upon the question of contributing to Imperial armaments (a resolution which the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not find it convenient to vote upon), the late Minister of Public Works obtained upon the Government, so far as this naval policy is concerned, an influence which lasted for a considerable period. At last the Prime Minister conceived the idea of satisfying a certain portion of his friends by proposing to give this large contribution and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier felt that was contrary to the pledges he had made, to a certain class at all events, of the people of Quebec. He demanded that that contribution should not be given until the question was submitted to the people. The Prime Minister in his reply to the hon. member (Mr. Monk) does not deny that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier made that pledge as the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec; and he does not deny that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) had his authority to make that pledge. But the Prime Minister seeks to evade the responsibility for that pledge by stating that a grave condition of affairs has arisen which now makes it desirable to send a contribution; and as to the main question, he says he is still prepared, when the time comes to submit his permanent naval policy to the country. Is it not important to bear in mind that the late Minister of Public Works, who is one of the leading constitutional lawyers of this country, claims that this contribution is contrary to the terms and to the spirit of the British North America Acts. I take it for granted that what the hon. gentleman means is that under the British North America Act (by means of which the different provinces of Canada came together as a family of provinces to form the Dominion), while this Parliament has a right to legislate with regard to militia and defence, it has no right to make a contribution of this vast sum of money to be sent beyond the confines of Canada, and to be used for the purpose of building ships to be placed at the service of the Imperial Government. I am not prepared to say to-day whether the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is right or wrong; it is sufficient to know that he has raised a constitutional question of great importance. I am not prepared to say whether his view is right, so far as the letter of the statute is concerned, but I do say his view is right so far as the spirit of that statute is concerned. It never was intended by these provinces when they entered confederation, that any Government of the day should take advantage of its majority in the House of Commons to contribute of the hard-earned taxes of the people of this country, a sum of money so vast as this and to place it where the people of Canada would have no control over its expenditure, and no control over what was produced by it or from it.

With the view of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that this question ought to be submitted to the people, I entirely concur. I stand here as representing a majority of the people of one of the family of provinces that went into confederation—there are others on this side of the House representing a majority of the people of three others of this great family of provinces—and I utter my protest on behalf of the people of New Brunswick against this proposal, which is un-Canadian, this proposal which is contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, the constitution under which we live. I, for one, say that before the Government should exercise its majority to force this resolution into law, they ought to submit the question to the people of this country. The Government must have known since they came into office of the condition of affairs disclosed three years ago; they must have had an idea of the condition of affairs to-day, and, therefore, in view of their delay, they cannot say there is immediate necessity for passing this law. It will not take long to submit this question to the people of the country, and it is the duty of the Government to do so. So far as I am concerned, speaking only for myself—I do not speak for my honoured leader, I do not speak for the gentlemen with whom I am associated on this side of the House—I say that I would go to the people of my province with every confidence that the majority would declare against this proposal and in favour of the amendment moved by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Is the suggestion which I make not reasonable? You are asked that this Parliament should vote away, not your money, not our money; the Government of the country are the trustees of the people, every dollar of this vast sum of thirty-five million dollars which you propose to send out of the country is to be paid out to British labourers and to the suppliers of British material; every dollar of that money has been taken by way of taxes from the people of this country and before this new departure is made, before this important step in what is to be our future relations with the Mother Country is taken, before we depart from the resolution which was agreed upon in 1909, to build in Canada a Canadian navy, to be owned, controlled and manned by the people of Canada, the people of this country have the right to be consulted.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the calm and well-reasoned argument of the hon. member for St. John, and certainly I must at the outset pay him the compliment of having to a certain extent stuck close to the text and given more or less elevation to the tone of the debate. I was struck with the vast knowledge the hon. gentleman seemed to have. Coming from a province by the sea where he has spent his lifetime, I wondered whether or not that fact constituted him such a great authority on ship-building plant, docks, and wharfs. The argument of my hon. friend was largely one of an anticipatory nature. He attempted to speak not only for himself and his own side of the House, but, in addition, to lay down a policy for the Prime Minister and the Government of this country. He seemed to be rather more elated than one would have expected in a man of his astuteness and great experience, and I must also say smoothness, when he seized upon the remark made by the hon. member for Brantford in his speech last night, in allusion to the policy being a policy of continual contribution. The point seemed to enthuse my hon. friend's supporters greatly, and the hammering of desks at that particular period indicated that they were very easily pleased. It was surprising to me as a member of this House, after reading and listening to the enunciation of this policy as laid down by the right hon. the Prime Minister, which in every essential phase of it is absolutely different from the contention of the hon. member for St. John. I challenge him or any of his supporters to say that there has ever been anything either said or written officially, by the Prime Minister or by any of the speakers who are supporting the Government's contention on this side of the House, to the effect that the policy laid down by the right hon. the Prime Minister was a policy of continual contribution. My hon. friend took great unction in reading from the letter, written some three or four years ago, by that grand old veteran statesman, whom I am sure everyone is pleased to see alive and enjoying in his esteemed old age the benefits of good health, Sir Charles Tupper. The point he made which to my mind he did not intend to make, was one which should have caused the hon. gentleman, and did cause him in his remarks, astute, calm, and collected as he was, to falter in his voice and read with a great deal of trepidation and fear, the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper that during the Boer War he was in the van of those who forced that Government to send the men to South Africa. My hon. friend lowered his voice at that point; he wanted to let that slide by as smoothly and as nicely as possible; but I want to tell the hon. gentleman that that is something in the history of this country which will never be forgotten as long as there is anything in the nature of an Opposition, such as exists to-day in the Parliament of this country. My hon. friend says that the ships he spoke about should be built in Canada. I have before me the report of the Department of Naval Service, from which the hon. gentleman read. It is rather interesting. He slipped by it in a most delightful way. I regret to say that this very report, from which he read, contains in it the most damaging, and, if I might be permitted to use the word, damning argument against the Canadian Naval Policy which he so strongly advocates. He has spoken well, and after apparently a great deal of research, regarding the capacity of the various shipbuilding yards, and he has eulogized in a manner that ought to strike the average Canadian with pride, the fact that Canadians are able to build and do anything that anyone else can do. What do I find in this report? That when the Niobe ran upon the rocks at Yarmouth, it was found that she was very seriously injured and that it was necessary that great repairs should be made upon her. The hon. gentlemen opposite, in the administration of their own naval policy, had so left unprepared the workshops and the plants that they have already got in this country, that this report says it was necessary to send to England for men to undertake the repairs. I do not wonder that my hon. friend slipped that by. But it does seem to me that when men boast of the naval service they have inaugurated, a naval service which they claim is a splendid thing in this country, to leave it unprovided with men even for making repairs is not treating the country fairly, and not rising to the standard of workmanship and business supervision, which any other people in any other country of this world would have had before they would carry out any policy of shipbuilding.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The repairs to the Niobe were made in Halifax.

Mr. MORPHY: The report says that men had to be sent out from England.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I suppose the British Admiralty would send some one out to watch repairs. They would do that in the case of repairs being made in any shipbuilding yard.

Mr. MORPHY: They have the men in England capable of making the repairs, but they do not have them in Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The entire repairs to the Niobe were made in the port of Halifax, with the exception I think of the rudder.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some mistake was made in the rudder?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: I am reading from the report, and I will leave it to be settled between my hon. friend and the gentlemen who are responsible for this report whether it is correct or not. It is one report of the Government, I understand, from what is on it. Does my hon. friend undertake to say that report is false?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not object to the statement of fact my hon. friend reads from the report; I object to the deductions he makes from it.

Mr. MORPHY: My hon. friend, who comes from a maritime province, will no doubt have an opportunity of speaking in the course of this debate and he can explain what he means. I will see that he does so on the floor of this House.

The next point I have to make in this particular report, and it seems to stand out in great prominence when one considers the apparently strong position taken by the hon. member for St. John to-day, is this: On the two boats, the Rainbow and the Niobe, these fighting ships, we have the statistics showing the number of recruits during the last year as follows: 'On the Niobe, from Nova Scotia, 37; New Brunswick, 2; Prince Edward Island, 8; Quebec, 11; Ontario, 52; Manitoba, 1; 111 recruits during the last year. The desertions last year were 86 recruits, and of others on the same boat 17, or total desertions of 103 in one year, with recruits of 111.' My hon. friend endeavoured to make a point in that regard that it was because things were going bad, the uncertainty of the naval policy and so forth. What are the figures? Let some of the hon. gentlemen opposite show the figures since the inception of the naval policy. They are afraid to show the figures. I challenge any one of the Opposition to get up and tell the history from the point of view of recruits and desertions since the beginning of the naval policy, since the purchase of the Niobe and the Rainbow. Let us come to the other boat, the Rainbow, which is on the Pacific. The recruits last year on the Rainbow were 15; the desertions in the recruit class were 25; the desertions other than recruits on the same boat were 21; in other words, 46 desertions and 15 recruits on your expenditure of $1,300,000 or upwards on two boats, costing $784,000 for maintenance. You have practically evened up desertions with recruits, but not quite. In reading this report, I cannot but wonder, as a Canadian, what kind of administration was back of it. My hon. friend declares for the principle of building ships in Canada, manning them with Canadians and paying Canadian money to Canadian workmen, recruits and sailors. How can hon. gentlemen opposite expect a people of the intelligence of Canadians to listen to such arguments when everybody knows that the very first thing those who initiated those views and boasted of them did, was to violate their own obligations to the country as honourable men, by going outside the country to buy two ships, instead of having them built in these great plants which the hon. gentleman said exist at Collingwood, Montreal and other places. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen, especially for the hon. member for St. John, to be very enthusiastic about where the ships should be built. But I take particular notice that when the right hon. Prime Minister brought down his measure, the only time the hon. gentleman did not look solemn throughout the whole of the Prime Minister's speech was when that part referred to, that under the British Admiralty English firms might come, and probably would come, to the maritime provinces and build ships there. Then the hon. gentleman pounded his desk splendidly. It was the venal point which struck him, it was the venal point that appealed to him. He wanted the money spent in his own constituency, and he did not care for the rest of the Empire or for any other part of Canada. My hon. friend attempted an argument about the former Prime Minister going to England in May and returning in July and dissolving the House. The statement is clearly made by the hon. member for St. John that when the former Prime Minister went to England he had the figures with him. He went to consult the British Admiralty as to which tenders it would be best to accept. I do not know that this explains why they went. The specifications were all the same, for the tenders were all in the same form. And the hon. member for St. John says they were all good firms capable of doing the work. It was, then, only a question of amount. But what could they consult the Admiralty about, except the question whether they should take the cheapest or the dearest? I do not take much stock in their argument, no matter how much hon. gentlemen may try to gloss over the facts. Why did they dissolve the House? Why not have gone on, accepted the tenders before they dissolved the House, and had the ships laid down? I have not heard from any hon. member on the other side any good and valid reason for their action. The reason I give is this: They themselves knew that they had made a mistake in their attempt to establish a Canadian navy on the plans that they had made. They knew that the conditions were bad, that they could not man their ships, and that the expense of maintenance would be very great. They were sick of their own policy. And, to get out of letting these contracts, they did what no government under British rule has ever done without disaster, in a time of great prosperity they made a new issue, reciprocity, and went to the country to hide the defects of their policy, in the hope that they could slide through and afterwards let the contracts as they pleased. As I say, no real reason has been given by any hon. gentleman opposite why these tenders were not let. It is all right for these hon. gentlemen opposite now, without the responsibility of Government upon their shoulders, to come here and try to dictate what this Government's policy shall be. The hon. member for St. John is an ardent advocate of a naval policy which shall mean shipbuilding in Canada. But why did not he force that on his own friends? Why did not he try to give shipbuilding in Canada an impetus by accepting some of these tenders and so laying the foundation of an industry that would have been of great benefit to the people of the Maritime provinces?

As to the Quincy plant, costing roughly, $4,000,000, there was a plant already established, a nucleus for the shipbuilding industry. It took two years to prepare the equipment, and, according to my hon. friend's statement, it took from five to seven years to produce a large battleship. Consider the comparison. The United States have been building ships for forty or fifty years. They have been evolving and keeping up with modern lines of vessels. They have a population of nearly 100,000,000 behind them. They have some of the greatest admirals in the world, such as Admiral Mahan. And they have a high type of shipbuilding experience. My hon. friend wishes this House to believe that we, with no experience—or worse, the experience of a bad beginning under our friends opposite—are to go right on to provide shipyards and begin to turn out dreadnoughts as though all that was necessary was to turn the handle of a machine. But figures have been given to show what enormous engines of war these dreadnoughts are. It is obvious that such constructions cannot be turned out in a few days. Another thing that the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House is, that it takes from five to seven years to train the officers after the ships are built. This is what we are told in naval works of authority. It takes seven years to train a master gunner; it takes three years to train an ordinary sailor before he is fit for war. Add this to the time the hon. gentleman has mentioned,and you find that from nine to seventeen years must elapse before we could have a dreadnought equipped and manned to fight.

The next thing that struck me about the hon. gentleman's remarks was the delightful ease with which he changed his principles—I mean political principles; I say nothing derogatory, and I am speaking only of the argument in this debate. In speaking of the circumstances surrounding the ship-building conditions in his beautiful province by the sea, the hon. gentleman's chest swelled with indignation when dealing with the allegation that nothing had been done. But I have been told that, during the late Administration, men from the provinces by the sea knocked at the door of the hon. gentlemen, then in the Cabinet, and asked for some redress against the decline of ship-building there; but they knocked in vain. Why did not the hon. gentleman then help his native province? But, worst of all, the most heinous offence of my hon. friend appears to be that, ardent free trader as he is, he said to-day he was willing to be a protectionist so far as ship-building is concerned, for the sake of his province by the sea. A protectionist in regard to ship-building—a free trader in respect of everything else—a most delightful spectacle in the Canadian House of Parliament!

My hon. friend referred to a sweetener for some bitter pill. What bitter pill did my hon. friend refer to? For the bitterness of defeat, I should assume, in September, 1911. My hon. friend smiles; doubtless he realizes the bitterness, and I do not blame him for laughter even in such a case; I would say to my hon. friend, as has been said before, that even in laughter the heart may be, sorrowful, but the end of such mirth is sadness.

I come now to a matter which concerns the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I am rather surprised that a gentleman of his astuteness should fall into what I conceive to be—I do not know what to call it, an error he does not often commit; we all admit he is a master, in many ways, of the political game. However, every man is more or less human, and we are all prone to mistakes. I was present when the hon. member for Kingston spoke in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I noticed particularly what he said in regard to the matter now under discussion. I quote from page 26 of 'Hansard':

> The reason refer to that extract is that it differs so radically from the naval policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite as embodied in their Naval Service Act. I do not wish to precipitate a debate on this question; but, if I understand the debates of last session, two things were made manifestly clear: that the Canadian navy was not a part of the British navy, and that by some constitutional declaration of neutrality, we were, in case of any war, to remove ourselves, so to speak, from the sphere of activity. It is utterly impossible for me, as a lawyer, to comprehend by what declaration Canada, in time of need, can remove herself from the sphere of war unless she declares her independence. That is my objection to the Naval Service Act, and the naval policy of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It has a tendency towards a declaration of independence rather than a tendency towards a closer union of the overseas dominions with the British Crown.

That is a very fair and concise statement, and I have taken the trouble to look up the answer of the right hon. gentleman to these remarks. On page 1063 of 'Hansard,' the right hon. gentleman made use of these words :

I now come to another subject, which I would not have mentioned at all were it not for some observations made during the Debate on the Address by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). During the last electoral contest, I heard it many a time, and I read it many a time, that our Canadian navy was a separatist navy, and that it was, on account of something which was to be found in the Act, liable to be neutral in time of war. I have been too long in the fight——

The right hon. gentleman then goes on to speak eloquently of the Roman senator who said: 'Strike, but hear me,' and then he uses the following words :

In refutation of the charge that the Navy Act was intentionally, on my part, separatist, I think it is sufficient for me to set up the record of my seventy years of life.

The point I make is that the hon. member for Kingston did not charge the right hon. gentleman with intentionally making it a separatist navy. He declared it was, separatist and the right hon. gentleman did not deny the charge in his answer. He says only that 'it was not intentionally on my part, separatist.' It remains for the right hon. gentleman to make himself clear on that point before the people of this country. He said that the Canadian navy is such that if Great Britain is at war Canada is not at war, and our navy is therefore not at war. What is that, Mr. Speaker, but separation ? To my surprise, the right hon. gentleman is trying to make it better, changing his language with that ease and facility he so readily possesses, and he says, in so many words—I am not quoting the exact words, but it is near enough—that when England is at war, Canada is at war, but we are not or may not be in the conflict. Is not that a separatist navy? What else does it mean? This is a point my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has not answered, and he should answer it before the people of this country will give him credit for standing up for the principles of a true Canadian and a true Britisher.

The Naval Service report says the Maritime Provinces have not yet been exploited. What is the apparent attitude of the people of the Maritime provinces in regard to the navy? So little faith is there on the part of the people of New Brunswick, of Prince Edward Island, and of Nova Scotia in that navy, notwithstanding the presence of the Niobe in and around their shores, that the province of New Brunswick has only contributed two people out of the 80,000 fishermen my hon. friend boasts of; Nova Scotia, 37; Prince Edward Island, 8; Quebec, 11; while the most inland province of all, that of Ontario, has sent its quota of 52. Are we to understand that the service inaugurated and carried on by hon. gentlemen opposite is of such a nature that it has to be exploited in the home of the hardy fishermen of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? Does the hon. gentleman wish the people of the other provinces to understand that they have to be cajoled, exploited, worked with, to take service in what the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) does not like to hear spoken of, as the tin-pot navy? That hon. member the other day said: I hope we will hear the last of that tin-pot navy. So do I, I do not care how soon it goes, as far as that kind of a navy is concerned.

May I state briefly the position I as a supporter of the Prime Minister see it? The first idea that comes to my mind is the magnificent and splended type of statesmanship displayed by the right hon. gentleman on the introduction of this great Naval Bill into this House. I was pleased as any Canadian should be, no matter upon which side of the House he may sit, to read in the press of Great Britain and of the British Empire the world over the most eulogistic and commendatory remarks upon the splendid type of statesmanship shown by the right hon. gentleman in his methods of introducing that bill to this House. The ex-Prime Minister with a taste and courtesy which I, as a new member of the House greatly appreciated, complimented the right hon. the Prime Minister in very felicitous terms. I hoped that this action of the ex-Prime Minister foreshadowed a different state of feeling from what has since been exhibited in this debate. But the commendation of the right hon. gentleman by the press of Canada and of Great Britain and the other dominions did not surprise me. No member on this side of the House was surprised at the manner of the right hon. gentleman's introduction of the Bill and, as I have said, his calm, moderate and splendid presentation met with eulogistic encomiums throughout the world. We on this side take great pleasure in testifying to the abilities of our right hon. friend the Prime Minister as a statesman with a full grasp of all the great questions, and, with the helm of state in his care, we have no fear of the consequence of his leadership. We have splendid evidence that he knows what he is doing, that he will do it fairly, that he will satisfy not only his friends on this side but the best minds on the other side of the House and throughout the country.

The confederation of the dominions beyond the seas with Great Britain and Ireland is something that should not be offensive to any man in this House. It seems to me that the principle of the unity of the British Empire is one that will appeal to all classes.

The issue between the two parties is now clear-cut and well-defined. The naval policy of the Government, in brief, to give $35,000,000 for the purpose of constructing three dreadnoughts to be part of the Royal navy and separatist in any way, manned by England, built in England and paid by England. Some of our friends opposite seem to take great umbrage at the fact that we are going to allow England to pay these men. The point has already been made in this debate how the late Government treated the soldiers who went to South Africa. Personally I do not believe very much in that kind of recrimination; the fact that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House did wrong is no reason why we should ask friends on this side of the House to do wrong also. The fact that they were right in one case is no proof that they were right in another. The fact that we did so and so on the naval question should stand by itself in view of conditions that exist at the present time. The Opposition policy is practically the retention of the Canadian navy taking the words of the ex-Prime Minister, if there is need or emergency—and in this he was supported by his followers—instead of giving $35,000,000 to build dreadnoughts he would give $140,000,000 for that purpose, the vessels to be manned in Canada by Canadians, paid in Canadian money, the ships built in Canada out of Canadian materials. Hon. gentlemen opposite, one and all, apparently say there is no need, no danger. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition says there is no danger. Then they say that the Government policy interferes with Canadian autonomy, and here I wish to correct the statement of members on the other side that the present policy of the Government is a permanent one.

The objections to the Government's policy by the Opposition, as I see them, are: No need, the country pays tribute, we are a nation of substitutors, (using the word of the hon. member for South Renfrew), Canadian money to be spent but no blood and the wrench to Canadian autonomy. The hon. member for South Renfrew dwelt very long on the question of autonomy, and with apologies to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), I have consulted an encyclopedia and will briefly read what the Encyclopedia Britannica says in reference to autonomy. I must confess that I cannot learn it from the speech of the hon. member for South Renfrew because although he spoke long, he said very little. His quotations were not aposite, he furnished us with no light at all on the subject, and I was forced to go to the Encyclopedia Britannica to see exactly what it meant. In general the term means 'freedom from external restraint, self-government.' The term is usually coupled with a qualifying adjective. Thus political autonomy is self-government in its widest sense, independence of all control from without. Local autonomy is 'a freedom of self-government within a sphere marked out by some superior authority.' Administrative or constitutional autonomy, such as exists in the British colonies, implies an extent of self-government which falls short only of complete independence. The last phrase is one which should be considered, I think. That is the kind of autonomy which we enjoy under our constitutional government and it is the kind of autonomy that the hon. member for South Renfrew suggests is going to be ruined, torn asunder, absolutely ripped up the back and frazzled at the edges. That is the horrible catastrophe that is going to happen to our autonomy as the question is viewed by the hon. member for South Renfrew.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. MORPHY: Mr. Speaker, prior to the adjournment at six o'clock I had reached the point with reference to certain arguments of the hon. member for South Renfrew on the question of Canadian autonomy, where I desired to say that the hon. member had failed to grasp the real significance of the present naval proposal bearing upon Canadian autonomy; that he had failed to see, or had failed to admit he sees, that the proposal to do something in aid of the Imperial navy as laid down in the resolution before the House, namely, the purchasing of three dreadnoughts to be placed in the battle line of the Imperial navy, with distinctively Canadian appellations, was a pure gift to the Mother Country coupled with a provision that if Canada requires the same that they shall be at the request of Canada returned to Canadian waters to give greater local security by virtue of their fighting qualities in time of need. I would like my hon. friend—who I am sorry is not in his seat now—to feel with me as a Canadian that this proposition is one which enriches Canadian autonomy and brings it closer and closer to the heart of the Motherland, and at last puts Canada upon a base where she can hold her head up erect and say that though she has been recreant in the past to her plain duty as an overseas dominion of the great British Empire, at last, under the guidance of the right hon. the Prime Minister and his Cabinet, measures have been taken which will enrich Canadian autonomy more than anything which has happened within the lifetime of any living Canadian.

One other objection from gentlemen on the other side to the policy of the Government is that the country by this gift pays tribute. Fortunately the hon. member for Red Deer, as well as the hon. member for South Wellington, have both gone on record, one in this House and one in his own county, speaking to his constituents, and both have taken a position which could not very well be otherwise than taken, namely, that there is no tribute in the matter at all, that it is purely a free and spontaneous gift by the people of Canada acting through their lawfully constituted Parliament. The situation from my point of view is happily cleared up, unless one is to express the thought that hon. gentlemen on the other side may change their minds. In regard to the hon. member for South Wellington, whom I am sorry not to see in his place, we have the statement made on the floor of this House a year ago that the great cause of reciprocity was dead. This session he came back and told us he did not mean what he said and that it is still alive. We will give him the opportunity later on of saying whether it is still living or not, but no need to arge about that.

The hon. member for South Renfrew particularly spoke of 'Canadian money but no blood.' Do hon. gentlemen opposite pledge themselves to this country that they wish to introduce into Canada a form of naval conscription? The figures to-day show clearly, as quoted in the Naval Service Report that so far as the navy which has been established for some two or three years is concerned, no response was made by the people of Canada to man the ships which the last Government bought and put into Canadian waters. The word 'exploit' was used, 'Provinces by the sea have not been exploited to get men.' What I contend is that you cannot get men trained here under the present conditions of the growth of this country unless conscription is introduced; and that is the logical policy of gentlemen opposite. I for one do not see quite clearly that we have reached the stage in our political and constitutional development when conscriptiin is either necessary or advisable. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, take that ground, and they have got to answer to the country for it. Let that answer be what it may, I for one say that it will not be propagated throughout the province of Ontario that this Government will force men to go on the ships of war, especially seeing that our men are not trained for the service, and have no desire to serve. England has plenty of men; she has tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands to man her warships and to colonize in addition; they come here by the hundreds and thousands.

I see by a report from South Wellington that some persons in that county rather resent the fact that men of English, Irish and Scotch stock, among the best in the world probably, at all events equal to any in the world, are not welcome in that neighbourhood, because at a meeting at Aberfoyle, my hon. friend's henchmen and friends urged them to go back where they came from, that they had no business in Canada, or words to that effect. As a Canadian I want to take the ground right here, that in the county I have the honour to represent, we have a large number of British born people, splendid tradesmen, drapers' clerks, ironworkers, &c., the great Grand Trunk shops in the city of Stratford employ a thousand men, and many of them are splendid mechanics from the Old Country; they are coming here with the best traditions of English public life, and it ill lies in the mouth of Canadians to tell them we do not want them. I say that we should give them the right hand of fellowship and hope that they may be as our forefathers were, among the future builders up of this country.

The next thing we have is lack of men. It is undeniable and no one will seriously contend otherwise that while England has a plethora of men, we have a scarcity. We lack labour on the farms, in the workshops, in the market places, for railway construction and on the transportation systems. All these facts are well known to hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is no argument to say under those circumstances that Canadians have no courage. That argument has been thrown across this House. I resent it; it is a pusillanimous argument, unworthy of the members on the other side of the House who advocate it. It does not lie in the mouth of the Canadian born on the other side to ridicule his own country, and I hurl it back with some warmth to the gentlemen opposite. We all know that courage was not lacking in the South African war. Just here I should like to make this point. A great deal has been said, such as 'Oh you may put the officers on with their top feathers; Canadian officers can go but men cannot go.' Let me point out that under the British Army system and the King's regulations, the army of Britain is open to any Canadian and there is nothing in the law to prevent Canadians going into the British navy if they so desire. Let that be understood, and do not attempt to draw a herring across the trail. As an hon. gentleman has just told me there are numbers of Canadians there already. Sir Percy Girouard, whose name ought to inspire men of French descent in this House, has made a name for himself in the British army which will never fade. I glory in that; I glory in all the achievements of every Canadian who rises to a point of fame, and sheds renown and lustre on the country that gives him birth.

At the expense of just a little time, I want to quote an excerpt from this message that comes from England. The first is:

> The Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material, and still more important moral, assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas.

What is the effect of the two words 'material' and 'moral' assistance? This Government has brought in a Bill to give material assistance. I am not going to waste time to quibble whether this message means what this side of the House says it means; I am willing, as a humble member of this House, to let the country judge what it means. The material assistance is something we are giving in these three dreadnoughts which does not exist in the fleet that is proposed, at the best, to be built under the Canada Navy Act. The material assistance that is given will be as the other paragraph says, 'three of the most powerful ships that money can buy or science can devise.'

I will not dilate upon the effect of those ships. The point I wish to make in regard to it is that there is, whether rightly or wrongly, an impression spread throughout the Dominion of Canada that there was no real desire on the part of our friend the right hon. the ex-Prime Minister and his party behind him to give any material assistance; and that behind that lack of desire was the reason and the basis for their refusal to let the tenders. It is for the hon. gentlemen opposite to satisfy the country in that regard. With regard to moral assistance, let us see where we are.

We started this debate with probably one of the finest, calmest, and most judicial pronouncements from the Prime Minister in laying down a policy that did not invite any particular attack; but suddenly, in the twinkling of an eye, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition got up and made an attack upon political lines against the passing of the Bill. That was caucussed deliberately; the intention was plain to drive it into politics; and then an hon. gentleman following the Prime Minister turned round and said that something that happened in the Arthabaska election some years ago brought this question into politics. Supposing it did? Cannot we take it out? Is this nation so threadbare of issues, that where moral assistance is required, we must go with a divided House to the chancellories of Europe? For this mere petty desire they sink Canadianism, they sink British instincts, and declare their readiness to make political capital out of that which should be above political considerations—our gratitude to England for what she has done for us in days gone by.

Now, with regard to the question being in politics, I come for the moment to the autonomy question again. I refer especially to the remarks of the hon. member for South Renfrew and the hon. member for South Wellington. The arguments of hon. gentlemen on the other side teem with inconsistencies and contrarieties. Autonomy is broken, so they say. But the hon. member for South Wellington says: I am willing to break autonomy, and will go you half; we will build one dreadnought without consulting the people if you will put the rest of the money into two fleet units. At first, he demands: What right have you to do it; and then he says: We will do it. What a happy family they must be on the other side. The arguments of these hon. gentlemen refute one another.

Now, as to the position of Great Britain and the British navy, what does Canada owe for the past and what does Britain give now? I do not intend to go into the figures as to the past, but I wish to make a general argument as to the future. British supremacy on the seas is vital to the British dominions beyond the seas; there is no question about that. The sweeping of the seas by England to protect trade routes is a necessity for Canada. Now, we are sending some material assistance in aid of the power of Britain to rule the waves. We would like to send it unanimously; but we are endeavouring to send it.

I am not in a position to know what the policy of the present Government is in regard to a Canadian navy. I wish to be very fair to my right hon. friend the ex-Prime Minister, for I think fairness should be shown in these things. Whatever defects his policy and his carrying out of that policy may have shown, I thought at the time, and think still, that the country owed him something for establishing the principle that we should do something. That principle was recognized in the Naval Act. What I contend is that the principle was the great virtue, and about the only virtue, because there was no material force, or advantage, or effect to be derived from the way the policy was carried out. Now, I am not prepared to commit myself as to what the Government's policy may be, but I put this to the House: The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite involves an expenditure of from $45,000,000 to $55,000,000 for two fleet units, one on the Pacific and one on the Atlantic —two isolated fleet units that cannot get together in time of trouble because they have not the coal capacity to bring them together. So, you have only one fleet unit opposed to the marauding of any nation that may desire to attack them individually and wipe them out in turn. That is a poor policy, to my mind for the defence of four or five thousand miles of coast line. On the other hand, let me, on my own responsibility and without any knowledge of what is to come—but with the understanding, as I read it, that there will be a permanent Canadian policy—put this to the House and the country: If Great Britain rules the sea do not we get all the security that we desire in Canadian waters? If Great Britain rules the seas and is supreme there, what is the use of a Canadian navy? It comes down merely to one point, which will appeal to the hon. member for St. John—the idea of establishing the industry of ship-building in the Maritime provinces. I should be very glad, for my part, to see that done. But here is the point: Under the present arrangement with the Admiralty in England, they have indicated that they will build ships, that they will give contracts for building ships by Canadian mechanics, on Canadian soil, with Canadian materials. Why not utilize these ship-building firms under the present policy? That is not inconsistent with what hon. gentlemen opposite desire.

Now, consider what was spent in 1912 on the Imperial navy. Great Britain spent some $86,835,000; Australia, $1,000,000; New Zealand, $500,000; the little island of Newfoundland, $15,000; India, $500,000; South Africa, $475,000; and Canada—not a dollar. Canada has always drawn away from committing herself to such expenditure, and not one dollar has been given from the treasury of this country to repay the hundreds of millions, yes the billion of dollars spent in the last hundred years or more by the British Empire to protect Canadian commerce in Canadian waters and on the oceans of the world. So, when the argument comes from hon. gentlemen opposite that this country is being asked to pay tribute, let me put it in another, in the way that appeals to me just now, and say that we are not paying tribute, we are paying conscience money; we are paying back but a very little of the great expenditures that have been made on our behalf. And, if I were committing the country to what I think it should do, and the necessity were there for the gift of money to build these ships, I should say that what we are proposing is altogether too little for what we have received in the past.

The concentration of the British fleet in the North Sea has been referred to. To my mind that is the greatest reason why we must believe that an emergency exists. What is Great Britain robbing the seas of the world for, in order to concentrate there? Her great men—and I have no desire to fill the pages of 'Hansard' with quotations —have spoken in no uncertain terms. Lord Roberts, a man renowned for his far-seeing and experienced vision, came out with a speech that startled England and wakened them up. Mr. Churchill the First Lord of the Admiralty, a few days afterwards, spoke on the same line, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour—all these gentlemen have practically set Europe on fire by expressing the danger that exists for England to-day. There is no use in mincing matters. And we must not be too critical of language. The very fact that they have drawn British ships from the waters of the world, the fact that they have practically depleted the Mediteranean except at Gibraltar, and have concentrated in the North Sea, seems to me to put the case beyond question. The German naval law is one of great peculiarity. It seems to me that something strange has happened there. In 1897 or 1898 the first German naval law was laid down at the dictation of the Emperor and of Prince Hohenlohe, then Imperial Chancellor, who dealt with the question of a navy in the year 1897. In a letter to Prince Alexander in 1900, he put himself on record as follows:

I must, however, await the naval debate. We must not expose ourselves to the danger of experiencing from England the fate of Spain at the hands of North America. (United States.)

This was the first tendency to inflame the minds of the German people. What is the meaning of those words? What construction do they bear? That the standard must equal that of the navy of Great Britain—that is the true interpretation of the statement. He said later, in October, 1897:

I am strongly in favour of the naval measure. I will treat it in the most prudent manner, but I am for a fleet of battleships. There really is no getting on without it.

To the same person he said in 1897:

As to the navy, very many men hold the opinion that the new admiral's demands are not unattainable. What decides me to go in for it is the following: It is always said that the Navy is a whim of the Emperor. And yet it cannot be denied that it is the German people's fault—or, if you like, their merit—that we possess a navy.

Further on, he said:

Then came 1870. Unity was achieved with blood and iron, and the Empire came into being amid the acclamations of the German people. But it soon came to pass that there was no money to set up the State with. The tobacco monopoly was rejected, &c. To obtain money for the State, Bismarck changed his policy of customs duty and renounced moderate free trade. In this, too, the German people stood by him. We now obtained between three and four hundred millions of money, and the State could live. The policy of a protective tariff, however, produced a colossal development of industry. We ceased to be an agrarian State, and became a manufacturing one. Owing to this, our policy had again to be altered, and our aim directed to secure exportation. Commerce developed so much that the Government was called upon to protect it. That could only be done by a fleet—not a coast defence squadron, but such a one as can maintain our communications.

He says further:

It is not to be denied that the Emperor disturbs things by his impulsive nature. It is to be wished that he were more phlegmatic. It is, however, unjust to reproach him with wishing to call a fleet into existence as a whim or for his pleasure. He is doing nothing but carrying out what the German people have desired for a hundred and fifty years.

In speaking in the Reichstag on June 12, 1900, he said:

A powerful Empire without a fleet is inconceivable, and when the idea of the Empire disappeared, the wish for a fleet also died away.

Mr. MORPHY.

In the same speech he said:

The German Empire cannot be dependent upon the goodwill of other powerful nations; it must stand upon a basis of its own and be able to command respect. Hence the necessity for a strong fleet. The history of our own times has taught us the fate of the country possessing an inadequate fleet. In conclusion, I would again remind those who regard the sacrifices which must be made for the fleet as too heavy, that it was the idea of unity, the ambition to become a world-wide power originating in the German nation itself, which directed us to that course whence we now pursue our way, and from which we cannot turn back.

That was in 1900, and in 1897 Prince Chlodwig of Hohenlohe Schillingsfuerst started that propaganda. And what happened? In 1900 he laid down the principle of amending the German Naval Bill of 1898, which provided for 17 battleships and 8 cruisers. They claimed that to be the fixed, immutable law of Germany, and when people later on complained they were diverting from that policy, they were assured that was the same policy propounded in 1898—17 battleships and 8 cruisers. In 1900 it was 12 battleships and 14 cruisers. In 1906 the new naval law provided 38 battleships and 20 cruisers, and in 1908 the result was 58 dreadnoughts. The cruisers on the original naval law of Germany were ships of probably 4,000 tons, and, on becoming obsolete, they were replaced by ships of 27,000 tons displacement—the most powerful ships afloat—and they pursued that policy. This fixed, immutable policy, therefore, leaps from battleships and cruisers into 58 dreadnoughts, and in 1920 they will have 61—a mightier fleet of dreadnoughts than England ever dreamed of; a mightier fleet of dreadnoughts than the world has ever seen.

Let us see how they do things in Germany. In the war of 1870, a staff officer of Prince Bismarck came in and said: There is going to be trouble again with France. How so, said Bismarck. France, he answered, is recuperating very rapidly from the drubbing we have given her, and she is growing fast in wealth. I am given to understand that she will attack Germany in five years. Very well, said Prince Bismarck, we will attack her in three—that was the policy of Germany at that time. Britain is in a peculiar position; here we have lined up against her a nation in Alliance with Austria and Italy, both of the latter countries building ships—not so feverishly as Germany—but building rapidly, and going to make up the mightiest coalition the world has ever seen. Germany has an army of, I understand, about 4,500,000 men, instantly ready for war; and a standing army of 3,500,000 men, ready to mobilize at within a six weeks' notice. Germany is thus absolutely secure on her own soil,—possessing an army greater than any legions that ancient Rome ever knew; able, I venture to say, to defeat Russia, Austria and Italy put together. Why, therefore, does she need a fleet? England cannot attack her; she has no army, and has no means of getting into Germany if she so desired. England does not desire war; she has been the most ardent supporter of peace the world has ever seen. But England has to be careful; she cannot rest idle in the face of imminent danger. This leads me to the cry of hon. gentlemen opposite to the effect that there is no danger—there is no need. That is a cry that is always heard in time of danger. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition says if there was danger they on that side would give not $35,000,000, but twice, three or four times that, $140,000,000 to aid England with dreadnoughts or in any other way. The question of danger is one that is apt to be considered from a party standpoint with results that are not to the credit of the nation. What is patriotism and what do the dictates of patriotism involve and demand? I have here some extracts from The Valor of Ignorance, of General Homer Lea.

In peace, and not in war, is the time to judge the worth of a man's or a nation's patriotism. Those who are indifferent to their country's welfare in peace will be of no use to it in time of war.

Patriotism in its purity is a political virtue, and as such is the antithesis of commercial vanity.

To boast does not liquidate the debt of duty.

As patriotism does not hibernate in the time of peace, it is by no means difficult to discover the true patriot from the false. He is made noticeable by two characteristics causing him to stand out from among other men. And though he may be humble and unknown, yet these two virtues make him preeminent even among those who are vain of their honours and wealth.

To die for one's country, while not less patriotic than to live for it, is by no means as beneficial. But it is in this proposal to die in battle that cowards, rogues and treasonable men find subterfuge befitting their evil practices. When, in peace, men postpone their patriotic activity to a time of war, their procrastination is only indicative of their worthlessness.

As it is impossible after death to distinguish the coward from the hero, so in national defeat distinctions cannot be made as to the cause of it. The world and the victor take no note of the post-bellum explanations. For a nation to suffer defeat through unpreparedness is, to all practical purposes, as bad as though it were through cowardice on the field. In consequence, the man who opposes, in time of peace, suitable preparations for war, is as unpatriotic and detrimental to the nation as he who shirks his duty or deserts his post in time of battle.

That is a very high standard of patriotism and yet one which, I think, we Canadians ought to emulate.

With regard to the question of peace, let us look at the recent history of Europe, especially to what is taking place in England. When General Gordon, one of the most beautiful characters that English life has ever produced, was penned in, when he was the representative of Great Britain, by the thousands of the rebel Mahdi's forces, what happened? Mr. Gladstone was in power and he was coaxed and pressed by the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Wolesley and Lord Granville, for eigth or ten months, to send a relief force to Khartoum. He was told that if he would only send 200 men the eastern mind would stay true if it were known that England was behind Gordon. He was asked to send the men from Suakim to Berber and on to Khartoum. Gladstone always said: Gordon is safe, there is no danger. What happened? Gordon was left to die, his head was taken and put upon a pole by the rebels, under the aegis of that great British nation. He was killed, his head was paraded upon a pole. He died the death of a brave man forsaken by his government. What happened? It took something like a billion of dollars to crush the rebellion that could have been saved if they had sent 200 men. Do the people of this country wish to repeat that with regard to being ready for all eventualities? Let us look at the history of the South African war. General Butler was in charge of the British forces. He saw difficulties as they had been seen in other countries from time to time. He reported to his government that there were armaments beyond the necessities of these people, that conditions looked bad for England there, that there was going to be an uprising, that the Boers were armed with field guns to out-rival those of England, that there was no question of trouble coming, and the Government of England said: Nonsense, there is no danger, and they went so far as to recall General Butler, they brought him home in disgrace and it was only a few months before the war broke out. What was the result? General Butler's report was accurate, he knew what he was talking about, yet he was recalled in disgrace. After the war the British Government took him, put their arms around him, he was a hero. They knighted him, they did everything they could after disgracing him—and it cost the British Government £205,000,000 ($1,025,000,000) because they did not take warning.

There was a party in England known as Little Englanders—and I hope we will never have a Little Canadian party—who cried out: No danger, no need, everything is all right and we are safe. I hope the day will not come when history will be repeated along those lines, it is too costly to the country in money to say nothing of the unfortunate loss of life.

When Japan with its new-made navy of thirty or forty years' experience—and some of its best boats made in England—went out to fight the august Czar of Russia, Russia laughed and said: There is no danger, what can Japan, with her small maritime population, do? And one day at Chemulpa in Corea there was a shot fired, the war was on, and Russia was wiped off the face of the waters by that little nation in the Orient. No danger? Russia is to-day feverishly building up her shattered naval forces by the expenditure of millions of dollars after the cry that there was no danger from little Japan. We must take notice of history because the old saying that it repeats itself is as true to-day as it ever was. The offer of Canada therefore makes for peace. If England is supreme there will be no war. It does seem to me that the strongest policy for strong statesmen is to take the ground that where there is doubt the bold course, the good course, the strong course, of action is not to be too faint-hearted,—but to take the safe course and do our duty. It is not a time for critical analysis and we should be careful not to bring down upon ourselves too great a responsibility in failing to act when we should.

I come back to the hon. member for South Renfrew again, not because I think his speech warrants it, but he is the great deputy leader next to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition; he is the deputy from the province of Ontario, and the people there are looking to see why the right hon. gentleman selected him. He comes up to the point of autonomy again and breaks out into poetry in these words:

> That man's the best cosmopolite
> Who loves his native country best.

We would all agree with that pretty well but it seemed to be quoted without any context and there was no argument in his speech that showed why he said it. I was struck with the light way in which he said it and it did not strike me as being sincere. Therefore, I got my Tennyson and I looked it up. The words are there but I found also that faint heartedness is a characteristic feature of the hon. member for South Renfrew. What do we find? He read that whole poem in order to get a nice thing to say but he overlooked the verses in the poem which I commend to his attention:

> To all the loyal hearts who long
> To keep our British Empire whole
> To all our noble sons the strong
> New England of the Southern Pole.
>
> To England under Indian skies
> To those dark millions of her realm
> To Canada whom we love and prize
> Whatever statesman hold the helm.
> Hands all Round.

He could not get up to that. I felt sorry for my native province to think that a man aspiring to be the leader of a great party, because the Liberal party has been great, when called upon to discuss one of the most momentous questions we have ever had in our history in relation to the British Empire, should be unable to take the hurdle. He could not take the hurdle, he was too faint-hearted. I do not know what my hon. friends from the province of Quebec will think of that kind of an Ontario leader. We do not think much of him. I am sorry that he is not here but the exigencies of debate compel a man to say what he is going to say and I would like to have said it while he was here. Hands all round—that is the government policy. Let us do our duty. We reciprocate the feelings of the Motherland and we reciprocate the thought that comes, not from a separatist tendency, something that is backing up and getting away, but from the idea of one flag, one fleet and one throne which the hon. member for St. John wanted to ridicule to-day. I do not like such ridicule from men of distinction and high standing in a country like Canada, men who have been Ministers of the Crown, yet men who do not scruple to stand up in Parliament and seek to cast ridicule upon our loyalty in that way. It is not something that any one should boast of. I have in my hand the account of a meeting addressed by the hon. member for South Wellington at Aberfoyle, taken in shorthand by some one who was there and he uses this language:

> They talk about their policy and our policy.

And he goes on to say: This is the stuff that they call us disloyal for at Ottawa. This is pretty peculiar language for a man who aspired to a Cabinet position in the late Government. I do not think it is a fair application and again I say it to him that it is not up to his own standard because he is one of the finest young men we have, a credit to the national life, and the only thing I complain of is that the right hon. leader of the Opposition never gave him his due when he had the chance, because he is one of the bright and rising young men of the country. As to this loyalty question, let us have a fair understanding. Is there anybody here who has ever heard anyone on this side of the House aspersing the loyalty of hon. gentlemen opposite? If so, I have not heard it and if I had heard it I would regret it. I do not believe the charge is well founded and it is up to the hon. gentleman, when he makes a charge of that kind, to make it good.

I am going to pass over the question of ship-building and ship-building plants, because I do not wish to detain the House too long, but there is one thing that I want to point out. The question of the building of plants, whether it comes through the armament or not, is going to be of great importance. If the British Admiralty is going to stick to the offer, and England does not go back on her bargain, we have the Canadian material and we have everything that goes to the construction of warships in addition to merchant ships that ply on the Atlantic, the Pacific and Hudson Bay. If the Government's policy will result in the British Admiralty laying down ship-building plants here, as the hon. member for St. John said, these plants may be employed in the arts of peace as well as in the arts of war and in that way I would approve of that policy. The question of building ships at our ocean ports is an important point in our expanding future. We will need them. It is all right to say that Collingwood, Midland and some other places have ship-building plants, but we certainly believe that we are likely to do something in this way. Hon. gentlemen opposite never worked up to the point that the hon. member would like us to believe they did attain.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where will my hon. friend find any suggestion that the British Admiralty are going to lay down ship-building plants in Canada?

Mr. MORPHY: I have heard it in this debate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In no memorandum is such a suggestion made.

Mr. MORPHY: I think it was the Prime Minister who made that statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, I beg pardon. The Prime Minister did not make the statement that the British Government proposed to lay down ship-building plants in Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: I said that I thought he did. Will the hon. gentleman deny that that was stated in this House by some responsible member?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I never heard it.

Mr. MORPHY: Well, I assert that it was.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By whom?

Mr. MORPHY: I do not know. I heard it stated, it has been answered by hon. gentlemen opposite, admitted by the hon. member for St. John and the hon. member for St. John pounded his desk when the Prime Minister said it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. I did not applaud any such statement because no such statement was made in this House by the Prime Minister, or by any member of the Government, or by any member of this House in my presence.

Mr. MORPHY: I think that there was a statement made in regard to the building of smaller ships or ship-building plants.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is a very different thing from laying down ship-building plants.

Mr. MORPHY: That is in the memorandum, is it not?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, but it is in one of the letters.

Mr. MORPHY: It has been stated in this House; does the hon. gentleman deny that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The only statement made by the Prime Minister was that he had the assurance of the British Admiralty, or of Mr. Churchill, that they would favourably consider giving orders for small vessels in Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: Very well, I choose to rely upon the statement of the Prime Minister as against the opinion of that statement by the hon. member for St. John. If the Prime Minister made that statement in this House, which the hon. member for St. John admits, then I for one stand by that statement and I feel assured that if it was said in this House it was said by the First Lord of the Admiralty to the Prime Minister. So, there is no use quibbling about a thing of that kind. Now, I proceed to repeat the argument that this would give us facilities for building other ships and I do not see why they could not be built on the Hudson bay, and on the Pacific coast, as well as at some of the ports where my hon. friend is so greatly interested. So that there may be no doubt about it. I quote from 'Hansard,' page 710, the words of Mr. Borden:

> I have discussed this subject with the Admiralty and they thoroughly realize that it is not to the Empire's advantage that all ship-building facilities should be concentrated in the United Kingdom. I am assured therefore that the Admiralty are prepared in the early future to give orders for the construction in Canada of small cruisers, oil-tank vessels, and auxiliary craft of various kinds.

That Sir, was the part of the Prime Minister's speech that I referred to and at which the hon. gentleman pounded his desk, because he thought it was a good thing for his province. I was here and saw him do it and he can not get out of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. The statement the hon. gentleman made, and which I contradicted, was that it had been stated in this House that the British Admiralty—

Mr. HAZEN: I rise to a point of order; I submit that the hon. member is not stating his point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is in order for the hon. member to state his point of order without entering into an argument.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The point of order I make is that the hon. member stated that the British Admiralty were prepared to lay down a ship-building plant in Canada and I said that there was no statement of that kind made by the Prime Minister, nor was there anything in the correspondence to show it. The giving of orders for small cruisers is a very different thing from establishing a ship-building plant, which the hon. gentleman said the Admiralty was going to do.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has neglected to state his point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me it is a point of order if you correct a statement made by an hon. membr and call his attention to the actual point of difference.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order in this case is an appeal to the Chair as to whether an hon. member is in order in denying a certain statement which was alleged to have been made.

Mr. PUGSLEY: However, it is all right now.

Mr. MORPHY: Of course when I made the statement I made it without the book before me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite so.

Mr. MORPHY: But I drew what I believe to be a proper inference from the remarks of the Prime Minister. Let me read a little further from what Mr. Borden said:

> I see no reason why all vessels required in the future for our Government service should not be built in Canada even at some additional cost.

Does the hon. member deny that the Prime Minister said that? And further, I quote from the right hon. gentleman:

> In connection with the development of ship-building, I should not be surprised to see a higher class of engineering work which would produce articles now imported and not presently manufactured in Canada.

These are the words uttered by the Right Hon. Mr. Borden.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Very hazy words they are.

Mr. MORPHY: Probably the hon. member will now be fair enough to admit that he did pound his desk at one of these periods, because he thought the announcement suited his province. Just before this House rose for the Christmas holidays the hon. member for South Wellington, with that boldness that characterizes him, having a few minutes to speak, delivered himself of the challenge: get your Redistribution Bill through and we will help you with it, and go to the country. The hon. gentleman went home and he held six or seven meetings and he consulted his constituents, and he came back as tame as a lamb without any of that boldness with which he left Ottawa. What had happened in the meantime? He proposes a compromise now. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to be very anxious to applaud the oozing out of the bravery which the hon. member once possessed. In fact I notice a tameness all through on the Opposition benches. What is the matter? Well, we all know that there are a lot of men on that side of the House from Ontario who will never come back if there was a new election. You can see it in the faces of most of them. I really believe that if there was an election now, instead of eleven or twelve or thirteen Liberal members from Ontario, you would not have more than three. If I had my say, as of course I have not, I know what I would tell hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to an election. And, let me ask, who is working at this election idea? Mr. Fielding is in England trying to show that the Liberals were right on one issue, and the rest of the defeated Cabinet ministers of this lately discarded Government are in Ottawa hobnobbing with men who would like to be Cabinet ministers, but who I do not think in my lifetime ever will be. These are the gentlemen who are sending out to the local papers of this country the idea that in the first session of this Parliament this Government was breaking up, and that the Opposition should hold them up now and force an election. That is the work of these defeated and disgruntled ex-Cabinet ministers whom the people have discarded and whom even hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House do not want to see back here again. The hon. member for Carleton shows right in his face at the present moment exactly what he feels about that; the junior member for Halifax does not want to see any of these men who are now out of the House back to obtain the coveted Cabinet positions they so desire. We on this side of the House are satisfied to have some of these men come back but their own party friends do not want them; they think they have better men sitting in the House to-day. It is perfectly apparent that the Opposition which has developed in this House is not in fact to the naval policy of the Government but is set up to divert the public mind from their disastrous reciprocity policy. It is gotten up to draw a herring across the trail and if possible to get the people to forget that horrible spectre which rose before them when they woke up on the morning of the 22nd of September, 1911. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said that Great Britain in matters of diplomacy did not always show to advantage, and he stopped right there. I had that same idea after the Alaska Boundary matter, and I got it from Sir Allen Aylesworth. He came back to Canada and he told us that between night and morning Lord Alverstone sold Canada out to the United States on the Alaskan Boundary. I have not Sir Allen Aylesworth's exact words before me, but that was the meaning of them. There was a great tirade of abuse against Lord Alverstone; but I understand that later on Sir Allen Aylesworth took the other side of the field, and praised the British diplomats, saying that they were fine. If his latter statement is true, he sent out a false impression to the Dominion of Canada, which causes me as a Canadian to feel that something was wrong there, because I respected and do respect yet Sir Allen Aylesworth is one of the greatest legal minds we have in the province of Ontario. It is difficult for me to know what these things mean, especially when an honourable member sitting in this House says the same thing but stops short of what he means; that is done to influence some section of this country, I do not know what section; it is practically a charge of deception that, so far as I understand now, is not warranted.

We have one phase of this reciprocity question that enters here as regards an armament for autonomy. The argument advanced in this House with regard to autonomy is that it was wrecked, that it had a set-back for many years, that there was no mandate, as the member for South Wellington says. The right hon. the Prime Minister has laid his policy before this House; it is on 'Hansard'; it has gone to the country and what he said he would do was that if he were returned to power—brought out by a question on the part of an hon. gentleman opposite—he would go to the country after having gone to England to consult the Admiralty, and if he found need existed, bring in a policy; and if he could not pass it through this Parliament, that he would go to the country; then he would take up the matter of a permanent policy, discuss it with his colleagues, put it into shape and produce it to the people, and go to the country upon it before it became law. Yet hon. gentlemen say that that has not been before the country. What brings a measure before the country but a responsible minister, the leader of the Conservative party in this House, putting his plans before the people? The people knew it; it was an issue at the last election; it was used throughout the last election in the province of Ontario at many, many places, and the people voted on it. I have heard it stated here that it was not used as an issue except in the province of Quebec. I deny that. It was made an issue in the province of Ontario as well as the question of reciprocity.

Mr. CARVELL. So was the Ne Temere decree an issue in the province of Ontario.

Mr. MORPHY: I want to say to the hon. member for Carleton that the Ne Temere decree was not an issue in my county, a county which is composed of all nationalities and all creeds.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, that was poor ground for it.

Mr. MORPHY: It may have been poor ground for it; but it is a very enlightened county, and I want to tell my hon. friend from Carleton that I had the pleasure of getting pretty strong support there from all classes and all creeds. I do not think it is fair for a gentleman, living a thousand miles away probably, to make that statement, unless he is prepared to prove the charge.

Mr. CARVELL: I can prove it, prove it anywhere.

Mr. MORPHY: The position is quite plain to me anyway, and I think the interruption was given more for the purpose of disconcerting me than for making any point.

To get back to what I was speaking about; no mandate from the people after what I have explained that the hon. the Prime Minister has done? What did the late Government do with regard to reciprocity? Without a mandate from the people, members of the Cabinet were sent to Washington to make a treaty, a bargain, call it what you will; they made it without consulting a soul, made it without bringing it into the House of Parliament to discuss, made it to bind eight million people of the Dominion of Canada without any mandate whatever, without consulting the people at all, in a matter affecting the whole fiscal policy of this country. There never was in the history of British institutions a clearer case of what might be called an unwarranted initiative. In the initiation of such a pact as that and the referendum upon it to the people and the recall of the discredited Government, we have one of the best examples of the pure initiative and referendum the world has ever seen. It discredited and recalled one Government, and put in another Government who are carrying on the administration of the country at the old stand in the old way, with the country prospering as it never has been doing before. Hon. gentlemen must not think that because there are no shots fired to-day on this naval question, that something is not occurring. Some gentleman made the point that Britain might lose her supremacy without a shot being fired. There is to-day what I may term a bloodless war on —I hope it may always be so, but no man knows what it will be—there is a bloodless war on to-day in Great Britain affecting the whole Empire, where millions of dollars are being spent. What is Britain spending to-day? The estimates taken from yesterday's Toronto paper point this out:

> The naval programme will then, according to the present information, involve an expenditure of $240,000,000.

In Great Britain alone, nothing to do with Canadian money—— > —and will include five battleships, six light armoured cruisers, twenty destroyers, a number of submarines and an addition to the personnel of 5,000 men, making a total of 142,500 officers and men.

>
> The battleships will be of a new type, the largest and strongest which science can build or money supply. They will displace 27,000 or 28,000 tons, burn oil alone, and steam 23 knots.
> Thus, there will be an intermediate between the present dreadnought battleships and battle cruiser. They will be armed in all probability with eight 16 1-4 inch guns, each firing 2,200-lb. shells, or if the 16 1-4 inch gun is not adopted, with 15-inch guns, firing shells that weigh about 1.800 lbs.

The heaviest kind of armament that has ever been known in the civilized world. What is it for? Is it because there is no need? Is it because there is no danger? Is it not rather because there is a need, a danger and an emergency that England wants to ward off? I have taken considerable time with regard to this question, and I want to conclude as soon as possible. To do so I wish to say that Great Britain and Ireland have always been patient, in the face of great combinations, of great danger; and it is quite true as she says, that she will face it alone. It is also true that we have a debt to repay. Canada has reached the point when she has come to the conclusion that she must wake up. Britain stands there, like the old lion that she is, and faces the world She looks across the seas and growls; and the lion's whelps draw closer to her side, while the world stands in awe and admiration at the sight of the mother of nations encircled by her daughter dominions beyond the seas. She holds out the olive branch, and in kindly, yet firm and meaning tones, says to the nations of the earth: We desire no conquest; we wish not war, but peace. And as evidence of that she sends out a message of hope that there may be no 'parting of the ways' with her daughter dominions beyond the seas, and says in the words of the immortal Tennyson:

> Sharers of our glorious past,
> Brothers, must we part at last?
> Shall we not through good and ill
> Cleave to one another still?
> Britain's myriad voices call,
> Sons, be welded each and all,
> Into one Imperial whole;
> One with Britain heart and soul.
> One life, one flag, one fleet, one throne!
> Britons hold your own!

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, when I consider the magnitude of the problem for the solution of which the Government of the day has brought down the measure which is under consideration, I think that every member of the House should feel it his duty to give his opinion upon it. For to my mind, the question now at issue is probably one of the most important ever debated since self-government was established in this country. In pursuance of the principle I have just laid down, I beg leave to discuss the question. Let me say at the outset that I will not worry my fellow members with quotations from former debates or from newspapers. I will not cite a mass of figures or give the evidence of experts—whether real or would-be experts. I intend to discuss the question with hard reasoning and plain sense, as a Briton, as I claim to be. But before I enter upon the main question, may I be permitted a few preliminary remarks. First, I wish in my own name as well as in the name of my province and of my race, to tender to the hon. member for South Renfrew my most sincere thanks for the kind words of praise that he gave the Frenchmen of Quebec in quoting from our national history. But when the hon. member for South Renfrew spoke of 1774 and of 1812, he was speaking of the consequences of the loyalty of the French race in this country. May I be allowed to say that, if every English-speaking citizen of this country was as conversant with our history as is the hon. member for South Renfrew, there would be less misunderstanding and more harmony in Canada. But I do not wish to discuss the consequence of the loyalty of the Frenchmen of Quebec; I wish to answer a straight question. That question is this: Why were the Frenchmen of Quebec loyal in 1774 and in 1812?—Why did they offer their bodies as living bulwarks to stop the invaders?—Why, in 1849, did they refuse to join the annexation movement with the United States that originated because the Liberal Administration in 1848 had given relief to some people in the province of Quebec and the Bill was to be assented to—and was assented to—by the representative of our late Sovereign Queen Victoria ?—Why did the Frenchmen of Quebec refuse to join this movement for annexation ? For a very simply simple reason. The Frenchmen of Quebec knew what had been the fate of the French population of Louisiana when the land in which they lived was annexed to the United States and they knew very well that if they were annexed to the United States their fate would be the same. They know that the British Crown has granted them the free use of their language, the free exercise of their religion and every liberty of self-government. Every time their rights have been brought into discussion those rights have been protected by the British Crown. And do you think for a moment the Frenchmen of Quebec would be stupid enough to cast away the power that has protected them for a century and a half?—to be flooded, if they were annexed, by the United States, or to be flooded by the majority of this country, when they have had such instances as those to which I am about to refer. In the province of Ontario, for fifteen years, the Tory party, trying to get power and fighting against the Liberal Government of the late lamented Oliver Mowat made an outrageous and criminal campaign. What was their war cry? Down with the inferior race! Down with the Romish French Canadian! Down with the pea-soup French Canadian! Down with the moccasin French Canadian!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Rot.

Mr. GAUTHIER: It may be 'rot' for hon. gentlemen; but when we had to suffer it, we had the sentiment that we would never throw our lot in with the men who despised us when these men were enjoying self-government through the hardships, the toils and the sufferings of our fore-fathers, and who were paying us by despising us and heaping upon us all sorts of injuries and all sorts of ill-treatment. You may call it 'rot' if you like; but here, discharging my duty, I wish to place in 'Hansard' these remarks for which I take the responsibility. And in the same province of Ontario what do we see now? Out of a population of 2,800,000 one-tenth is French-Canadian; and the Government of the day is trying to cut out the rights that are recognized by the Treaty. And what do we see in the province of Manitoba, in the cities of Brandon and Winnipeg? The majority demand unjustly from the minority double taxation on the school question. And, after all these instances—and many others that I could state—after one hundred and sixty years of constant and perpetual loyalty on the part of French Canadians, because the Liberal party is under the guidance of a Frenchman from Quebec, he is accused by the papers favourable to the present Administration of promoting a policy as if he were a separatist. Because a Frenchman from the province of Quebec has the guidance of the Liberal party, he is accused, by papers favourable to the present Administration, of favouring a separatist policy, and, after one hundred and sixty years of perpetual loyalty, this is our reward. I say also that people are trying to minimize the value of our sentiments in this country in which we have, thank God, the right to live; in which we have proved our ability and willingness to recognize the importance of self-government; in this country for the guidance of which we have supplied our share of public men fully cognizant of their duty towards Canada and the Empire. We are not separatists; we are not advocates of independence. We want to remain under the British Crown, because we are sure that this is the only power which can protect us, and because the British Crown has given to us a measure of liberty and freedom and is powerful enough to secure the recognition of our rights.

The Government of the day comes to this Parliament and says: We want a contribution of $35,000,000 to send to Great Britain. Some say there is an emergency; others say there is an urgent need, and still others say there is a peril, and to prove an emergency, to prove urgent need, to prove that there exists a peril, we have the memorandum from the Admiralty. Let me discuss this for a moment. After having read, with the greatest care, the memorandum from the Admiralty, and after having followed with all possible diligence the different speeches delivered in this House, I have no hesitation whatever in offering the three following propositions: First, there is no emergency; second, the measure submitted is unfair and unsound; third, it has been engineered for political purposes. According to the document issued by the Admiralty, there is, I say, no proof of an emergency. I am not going to read this memorandum, but I submit that in perusing clauses one and nine of that memorandum, one must necessarily come to the four following conclusions: First, the document has been issued at the request of the Prime Minister of Canada; second, it contains the confidential conversations and informations exchanged between the ministers of the Imperial Government and the Canadian ministers; third, it is in a form that can be made public if the Cabinet deem it necessary; fourth, Great Britain, alone and unaided, has in the past defended the Empire, and she has not lost her capacity of watching over and protecting the vital interests of the Empire.

Is that proof that there is an emergency? Does that prove there is any real or urgent need? I claim that if an emergency existed, the Government of Great Britain would not have deferred making the fact known until they were requested to do so by the Prime Minister of Canada; and to state that the memorandum issued at the request of the Prime Minister of Canada is proof of an emergency is to state that the Government of Great Britain refrained from making known the fact that there was an emergency until they were requested to do so by the Canadian Prime Minister. Is it possible, if there was an emergency or an urgent need, that the Imperial authorities would have chosen the Canadian Government as the channel for tne conveyance of this information to the British Empire and the world at large? That is an absurdity. Supposing there was an emergency, and, that the Imperial Government had chosen the Canadian Government as the channel for the carrying of this information; is it possible they would have granted the Canadian Parliament the necessary discretionary power to render this document public, and to make public, if they deemed it necessary, the remedy for existing conditions? That is another absurdity. I think the home Government, if there was an emergency or a peril, would not, in this manner, come to Canada or the Canadian Parliament—although this Parliament is under the guidance of a man who is greater than Caesar—that is, if we accept the acknowledgement of certain jingo papers in the Old Country. Is it possible that this document discloses an urgent need or an emergency? Is it possible that without these three ships we are going to supply, there would be an emergency, and, upon the supplying of the three ships, the peril ceases? That is the proposition as offered by hon. gentlemen. If that is true, the home Government, in not providing by their naval programme for the construction of these three ships, did not do their duty. Is it possible to believe that a government would supply the proof of their own inability to look after the vital interests of the Empire? No! This contention that these three ships to be supplied by Canada are urgently needed is refuted by clause number nine, in which the Lords of the Admiralty declare that, without these three ships, Great Britain has always been in a position, alone and unaided, to meet any emergency, and that she has not lost her capacity to watch over and protect the vital interests of the Empire.

without these three ships and yet the Government wants us to believe that these three ships are needed, that it is an absolute necessity for us to vote the contribution of $35,000,000. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken have seen the weaknesses of this document and the Postmaster General has tried to supplement the evidence which should be in the Government document and which is not there. To quote his own words: I know whereof I speak—intimating that he had had conversations, that he had seen documents to prove the emergency and that these conversations and these documents were not referred to by this document. If this is true I know at least one member in this House who would be ready to change his mind, but, if I am not mistaken, the Postmaster General at the time of the last Imperial Conference went to London, not to attend the naval conference, but to look after the cable rates. At that time there was no split among the ministerialists, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had not resigned his seat, the Postmaster General and his late chief, Armand Lavergne, the Minister of Inland Revenue, and Le Devoir, of which he is a shareholder, were fighting together for the sake of the Government, and it was stated all around in the newspapers favourable to the present administration that the Postmaster General was going to England to attend to the question of cable rates, but not to the Imperial Conference. Is it possible that in discussing the cable rates the Postmaster General has had conversations tending to prove the emergency? With whom did he have these conversations? With the Sea Lords? No, Sir, because the document in clause one states that it contained all the confidential conversations between the ministers of the home Government and our own ministers. Has the Postmaster General had conversations with parties interested in ship-yards? It may be, but if he was not a member of the Imperial Conference discussing the navy question did he see some documents proving the emergency? Who showed him these documents? The Sea Lords? No Sir, because clause one says it contains the confidential communications and conversations. Who did show these documents to the Postmaster General? It may be these parties interested in the ship-yards, but Sir, I claim that the document which was to prove the emergency proves that there is no emergency, we are left for a proof to the word of the Postmaster General—that is the only proof we have. But if the word of the hon. gentleman is in direct contradiction with the document, I ask what kind of a proof we are content with? A minister of the Crown under his oath of office may be prevented from disclosing certain secrets, but I say also that when the Sea Lords took the precaution of issuing a document as important as the one I am now discussing, in which document it is stated that it contains the substance of all conversations, confidential or otherwise, and that the only change is not in substance but in form, how are we to take the declaration of the Postmaster General when it is contradicted by the document itself? In Great Britain in 1908 the First Lord of the Admiralty made certain declarations in the House of Commons. He was partly responsible for the German scare of 1909. He relied on certain information which he thought correct; afterwards he was compelled to admit that his information was not correct. What did he do? He resigned his portfolio because in constitutional law a minister of the Crown cannot err even if he errs in good faith. I do not ask the Dominion cabinet to treat the Postmaster General in this country as the First Lord of the Admiralty was treated in 1908, but I leave it to this House to decide whether a minister of the Crown is entitled to use his position to make us accept, relying on a document, statements that are contradicted by the document itself, on which he bases his opinion.

I state that the measure is unfair, unfair for Canada, unfair for the Empire. We are asked to pay $35,000,000 and as a result of this gift or this tribute or contribution we are to have the privilege of having a representative on the Imperial Council of Defence. In other words the ministers of our own Government want us to believe that in paying this amount of money we will purchase the right of being represented in the Imperial Council of Defence. I wonder if the measure is fair when we are asked to give an amount of money which is not needed and to be entitled to have an adviser when the adviser is not requested any more than the money. The adviser will be useless. But there is another point: Is this representative to be permanent or only temporary? If it is going to be a temporary representative I claim we are paying rather dear for the privilege. But, if it is going to be a permanent representation, if it is to form part of the permament policy of the Government, it should be submitted to the people of the country. The Government of the day have told us that when they propounded a policy for the establishment of a permanent naval force in Canada, the measure would be submitted to the people. If the representation upon the Imperial Council of Defence is to be permanent, it ought to be submitted to the people because we have not been elected to this House with any mandate to send a representative to England. What for?—to look after the expenditure of our money? If I am not mistaken, the $35,000,000, if it were ever voted, would be spent under the guidance of the Governor General in Council. Is our representative to go there and give advice and, to use the words of my excellent friend the Postmaster General, is he to ascend the stair of the temple where the questions of war and peace are to be decided? If that is true my opinion is that before sending such a representative the question ought to be submitted in order to ascertain whether Canada wants to change her constitutional status. The measure is unsound.

May I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that since this measure has been brought down and since the speeches with regard to it have been delivered in this House, there has been a lot of hard thinking going on in every hamlet in the land. We were told by the right hon. Prime Minister, when he introduced his resolution, that the protection of Canada from 1763 had cost an immense sum of money. We have been taught to believe that when Great Britain decided to extend her Empire all over the world she was seeking to prove to humanity what Britons could do. She wanted, to build up the greatest Empire that humanity had ever seen. She wanted, for the sake of civilization, to extend the protection of her flag all round the world. The ministers in Canada to-day want us to understand that when we were led to believe that she was actuated by such a high motive we were mistaken, that there was a book in which was kept a separate account of everything that England had been compelled to spend for our protection. According to the ministers of the Crown in this country Great Britain did not grant us freedom and liberty; she sold us protection and now is the hour to begin the partial repayment of our indebtedness. That is the contention as it has been presented by the ministers of the Crown. We have always claimed that we were free men in a free country, that we were living under the protection of the British flag and that the most complete protection had been given to us by Great Britain freely. If we are to begin payment for the protection that was given us, is it not possible that as business men most of our people will start figuring in order to find out what is the amount of our indebtedness? I claim that it is unsound to propound such a measure and to make such speeches as some of those which have been delivered in this House because you are trying to replace the love and sympathy that we have had for the British Crown for what Great Britain has done for our population by a question of account, by a question of dollars and cents. And you are doing that at a time when the Imperial authorities state emphatically that they do not need our assistance. They say that they are in r position, alone and unaided, to preserve vital interests of the Empire the world over.

Then, why is this proposal made?—because the Government of the day are trying to concentrate patriotism within the boundaries of their own party, because the Government of the day, in order to remain in office, are trying to wave the flag once more to serve their own party interests. The measure has been engineered for political purposes. Not only does the memorandum not say that there is an emergency but, on the contrary, the memorandum says there is no emergency. The memorandum issued by the First Sea Lord could not prove that there was an emergency; otherwise the Imperial Government would have stated all through the whole Empire that they were unable to manage the Imperial affairs of Great Britain. This measure was propounded as the result of a combination of the Tory party in Canada with the Unionist party in Great Britain. We had the first idea of a contribution in this country three years ago, when there was a demand made for $20,000,000. The Government of the day in England has been going on with their naval programme and with the execution of that programme they say they are in a position alone and unaided to watch over the vital interests of the Empire. The emergency has ceased in England and the emergency has been aggravated in Canada. Those who are responsible for the management of Imperial affairs come out and state that there is no emergency, that there is no need, that there is no peril and here in Canada ministers, who are not charged with that duty, come out and increase the proposed contribution from $20,000,000 to $35,000,000. In Great Britain those who are responsible to the people claim that there is no need for the construction of these three ships. Here in Canada the ministers who have not been called upon to give their views are proposing to augment the amount by $15,000,000 as compared with the contribution it was proposed to give them three years ago. I am in this Dominion Parliament as the representative of a constituency in this Dominion; I have been elected to look after the affairs of Canada; I was not elected to look after the affairs of Great Britain. I think the people of Great Britain are capable of giving their confidence to and keeping in power the men who are entitled to hold office there. I claim that if by my vote in this Parliament I contribute money for ships, for which no provision was made by those who are principally interested in the maintenance of the naval supremacy of Great Britain, I would be casting a vote to say that the people of Great Britain have not elected the proper men to manage their affairs. I say that I have not been elected for this purpose. Britons in Great Britain are capable of knowing what is good for the British Empire and which of the political parties should be kept in power, and no doubt the people of Great Britain have confidence in their own Government, which in the past has shown itself capable of looking after the development of Great Britain and of the Empire at large. When these men, under their oath of office send to this Parliament a document such as the memorandum from the Sea Lord, in which there is not the shadow of proof that the ships are needed, or that the money is needed, I feel it is my duty to vote against the resolution now before us and to try by all means to not let this Bill pass, because Sir, in my heart and soul I believe that if this contribution were approved by this Parliament, it would be a proof to the Empire and to the world at large that Great Britain in the year of Our Lord 1913 was unable to maintain her supremacy among the nations of the world. When the ministers responsible to the people of Great Britain state plainly that they are in a position to face any emergency whatever, I do not feel that it would be in the interests of the Empire, or in the interest of Canada, that we should grant this contribution. On the other hand Sir, the Liberal party in this House submits a proposition along the lines of the programme initiated by the highest naval authorities of Great Britain. Great Britain, if I have read well, is centering her fleet in home waters and asking the colonies to look after the protection of their own shores, and to come to the rescue of Great Britain if ever the Empire were in danger. We, on this side of the House are offering a measure, which, if enacted, would be in consonance with the present management of naval affairs, in Great Britain, and I say that I am going to try by all means to stop the passage of the measure proposed by the Government, and I am going to vote against the resolution and in favour of the amendment.

Mr. S. SHARPE (Ontario North): The hon. gentleman from St. Hyacinthe has laboured long and hard to disprove what to this House must be by this time a self-evident fact. I think the documentary evidence produced in this House by the various members supporting the naval proposal now before the country, has proven to the satisfaction of any reasonable man that there is real emergency in the naval affairs of Great Britain. To prove this I have many quotations that I could belabour the House with, had I a desire to do so, but I will dismiss that phase of the hon. gentleman's argument by reading from the Yorkshire Herald, of date August 17, 1912:

The German naval menace has now become a reality to all except political and religious cranks.

I would not like to place the hon. gentleman in either of these categories, but that is where the Yorkshire Herald places persons who attempt to mislead themselves into the belief that there is no menace threatening the British Empire to-day. We also hear the argument adduced by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this gratuitous gift of thirty-five million dollars interferes with our autonomy. I will not belabour that question further than to read from the Manitoba Free Press one of the ablest and most influential papers published in the Liberal interest in Canada, the following from its leading article on the 5th of December last:

To say that the Dominion of Canada cannot make a direct gift to the Imperial Government either of cash or dreadnoughts, without outraging the principles of self-government, is just so much nonsense. The Dominion Parliament is master of the Dominion's wealth and can do what it pleases with it. It can make a gift to the Motherland without affecting in the slightest its powers to exercise all its constitutional functions.

I listened this afternoon with a great deal of interest to the hon. gentleman from St. John. He always speaks with suavity and dignity and force, and he always proves interesting and entertaining to the House. He repeated the desire expressed by so many Liberals for another election. I want to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party had a fair trial on the 21st September, 1911. They were found guilty and were sentenced to the Opposition benches for four years, and let me add that I have never yet seen a criminal who was sentenced to the gallows who did not plead for a second trial. They also say they are anxious for another election, but they only want half the issue placed before the jury. They have presented their whole case to this Parliament, which, as I understand, consists of two fleet units, but the policy of the Government has two parts, one only of which has been placed before the country, calling for an emergency contribution of thirty-five million dollars. The permanent naval policy of the Government has not yet been presented to the country, and when it is formulated and presented these hon. gentlemen opposite who now desire so much to go the country, will most of them stay in the country. I say that the whole issue is like the position of the counsel who presents his case to the jury, and before the other party presents their full case, wants the jury to retire and render a verdict. I say we are quite satisfied to allow this whole question to be submitted to the jury of the people of this country, when not only the emergency contribution part of our policy is before the people, but our whole policy is before the people in the way of a permanent policy. Now it is not my intention and it was not my intention to occupy very much of the time of this House in the discussion of this question. In fact, I would not have intervened in this debate at all, had not the hon. member for South Renfrew and other hon. members accused me and other members on this side of the House, who voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier as being inconsistent. We all remember that the amendment the hon. member for Jacques Cartier moved provided that the naval proposals of the Laurier Government should be submitted to the Canadian people by means of a plebiscite, before being put into effect. The hon. member for South Renfrew also stated that members of this House who voted for that amendment would be guilty of inconsistency, if they supported the present Bill, unless it first be submitted to the people for approval. I desire on this occasion, it being the first opportunity that has been afforded to me, to deny the charge of inconsistency, and to express the utmost satisfaction in the course I followed on that occasion. I desire to reiterate the sentiments I expressed on that occasion with all the emphasis of which I am capable. My position and my vote upon that occasion in 1910 were made very clear. It will be remembered that the British Admiralty in 1909 had made certain propositions to the overseas dominions, suggestive of the best means of assistance. The Liberal Government repudiated those suggestions, and on February 3, 1910, they brought in certain propositions which were calculated to involve Canada in a great deal of expenditure without any corresponding advantage either to this country or to the Empire. The subject of a Canadian navy had never been discussed in any general election prior thereto; and there was a general demand arising throughout the country that no such radical measures as proposed should be put into operation until the people had an opportunity to pronounce upon them. Influential papers like the Grain Growers' Guide in the West and the Weekly Sun here in the East, and influential bodies like the Grain Growers' Association in the West and the Grangers in the East, demanded that the people should have a voice in the ultimate solution of that question. Speaking in my constituency prior to that election, I told my electors that I was in favour, before a measure was put into effect involving a great deal of expense, of submitting that question to the people; and I voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and I say that I am perfectly satisfied with that vote. The amendment was couched in the following language:

This House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the Empire and ought in consequence to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.

Nine Quebec Conservative members voted for that measure, seven Conservative members from the province of Ontario: Broder, Chisholm, Currie, Lewis, Sharpe, White and Wilcox; and the other provinces were represented by two members. During the course of that debate, I also spoke and I outlined what in my humble opinion I deemed to be the duty of the members of this House. It was with peculiar satisfaction that I listened to the right hon. the leader of the Conservative party making his proposal, whereby it was suggested and proposed to present three dreadnoughts immediately to Great Britain, and to delay the permanent policy until it was fully matured and then submit the same to the people. During the course of the debate in 1910, I made a reasonably accurate guess or prophecy of the policy, so far as it is at present outlined by the present Government. With your permission I will read one or two short sentences from the remarks I made during the course of that debate. At page 4487 of 'Hansard' I made these remarks:

Now, we come to the question of what Canda's duty is at the present time. If the supremacy of the British navy is being challenged, and I believe it is, if the emergency be pressing, urgent and compelling, and I believe it is, then this House should act and act promptly, definitely and decisively. It is Canada's duty to order, not one, two or three dreadnoughts, but a sufficient number of dreadnoughts to meet the emergency. We should order dreadnoughts according to the extent of the peril, according to the magnitude of the danger to be apprehended, according to the exigencies of the case. These dreadnoughts should be manned with British men and officers until Canadians can be trained for the service—all at the expense of Canada. Then the question of Canada's permanent policy should be left to the people. Having thus, in part, atoned for our past neglect, and having, in part, liquidated our obligation of long standing, we could then consider with due deliberation and with due regard our constitutional obligations to the electors who have sent us here, the permanent policy which this country should adopt in regard to the construction, organization and maintenance of the Canadian navy service. Then we would have time to consider and adjust all Imperial questions relating to the navy and its relationship to the Empire—the question of the control and final command of the navy in time of war and what voice Canada is to have in deciding Imperial questions. The people of Canada have a right to be heard before this permanent policy is decided upon. We have no mandate from the electors.

Then my concluding remarks. I want to remind the House of course that I am merely voicing my own opinions. I am a humble member of this House, and I do not pretend to speak for any person except myself; I am speaking on this occasion on my own authority and giving in my humble opinion the correct view of the situation, and I used this language at page 4490:

I think, that it is the duty of Canada to place an immediate order for dreadnoughts to form part of the Canadian navy and act in co-operation with and as a part of the Imperial navy and under the control, in times of danger and emergency, of the British Admiralty. We should then postpone the inauguration of any permanent policy until the Canadian people have been heard, either by means of a referendum or in a general election. In the meantime, speaking for myself, I desire to go on record, as I have done on previous occasions in my own constituency, and in the corridors of the House, where I have expressed myself in favour of the principle of a Canadian navy. I desire to go on record as in favour of the principle of a Canadian navy as the means best calculated to serve the interests of the Empire of the future, and best calculated to work out the great destiny of this country.

Thus the House will see that I was in favour of submitting any proposed permanent policy at the time to the people; yet I was in favour of an immediate contribution of any number of dreadnoughts according to the exigencies of the case. This was the policy of the Conservative party before the last general election and it was endorsed at that election. Since the votes were taken and since the views which I have read to the House were expressed, there has been a general election, and I was opposed at that election by Mr. H. M. Mowat, K.C., a very estimable gentleman and president of the Liberal Association in the province of Ontario. Occupying as he did so influential a position in the councils of the Liberal party, Mr. Mowat was able to summon to his aid the greater and lesser lights of the Liberal party. He summoned Hon. A. G. McKay, who opened the campaign in my constituency; he summoned the Rev. J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Globe, and the author, if we are to believe the reverend gentleman, of reciprocity and the finisher of the Liberal party. He also secured another greater light, the hon. member who sits in this House representing the constituency of South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). Speaking at the town of Beaverton in my constituency, my opponent attempted to criticise my action in voting for the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). He accused me of being in sympathy with the Nationalist movement, because I voted for an amendment to submit the question to the people. He pictured me in a way that I would not care to describe to the House, as belonging to the Nationalist wing of the Conservative party; but during the course of his remarks, a good Liberal in the audience, a gentleman by the name of Wyndatt, who by the way voted at the election in favour of my friend Mr. Mowat, but having a great sense of fairness, said to Mr. Mowat that their representative, the gentleman who has the honour of addressing the House at the present time, voted in accordance with the wishes of his constituents, voted in accordance with the declaration he made at a meeting prior to the vote being taken, and that he voted in accordance with the wishes of hundreds of people who had written to him telling him they wanted a voice in the solution of this question. Consequently the hon. gentleman who was criticising my action in voting for the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier dropped the subject immediately, and the electors showed their approval of my course in voting for that amendment by increasing my majority from 200 to nearly 600. Thus my vote on the Navy Bill was made an issue in the last campaign notwithstanding the language of the hon. member for South Wellington who said that outside the province of Quebec the navy issue was never discussed in any constituency.

But, I was in favour, three years ago, of an immediate contribution of three dreadnoughts and the submission of the permanent policy to the people, and that is where I stand to-day. And, when any hon. member in this House accuses me of inconsistency in my attitude, I can only say he is not speaking acording to the record and must admit that according to the actual facts of the case he is not correct. But it is a most interesting thing to trace the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite—to contrast their policy in 1910 when they were in power with their policy in 1912 when they were in opposition. These hon. gentlemen when in opposition are big in promise, but when they are in power they are mighty small in action. At a time when Australia, New Zealand and the other overseas dominions were carrying out the recommendations of the Admiralty and contributing dreadnoughts, Canada, under the leadership of a Prime Minister who has shown no enthusiasm for Imperial interests, lagged lamentably behind. When the Liberal leader brought down the meagre proposals which he placed before the people of Canada, he stood before the people of the Empire devoid of all enthusiasm for Imperial unity. The Liberal party had repudiated the suggestion of the British Admiralty to construct one fleet unit at a cost of approximately $25,000,000; and had gone back and asked the British Admiralty what Canada could purchase for a paltry $4,000,000 or $6,000,000, Canada was humiliated before the Empire; and the Canadian electors resented the badge of inferiority put upon them by the Liberal party. In their desire to maintain their hold upon office, the Liberal party proposed in this House a colourless policy. They fell between two stools—they offended their Quebec following by going as far as they did and they offended the other provinces by not going far enough. I say that with all respect for the right hon. gentleman who led that Government, for I have every respect for him—respect for his ability and also for the high position he occupies. But I do say that, with his 'seventy odd years of service to the Empire' of which he so proudly boasted the other day, it would have been more to his credit and to that of his party if they had, when in power, attempted to put in force the two-fleet-unit policy which they now enunciate with so much gusto. When they were in power the naval policy of the Liberal Government made Canada a subject of ridicule and contempt all over the Empire; and now when they are in Opposition and helpless to do anything. they dramatically attempt to outbid the only party that has ever offered to do real and effective service to the Empire. The Liberal party will be judged in the country—and I say this advisedly—by its actions when in power and not by its loud mouthed protestations when in Opposition. The Rainbow and the Niobe represent their policy when in power—two fleet units represent their policy when in Opposition. The Rainbow and Niobe is the measure of their desire to help the Empire; two fleet units is the measure of their desire to get back into office. That party when in health and strength and pride of power, came to grief giving birth to the miserable runts the Rainbow and the Niobe; what hope is there for those husky, robust twins, the Atlantic and the Pacific fleet units, with the Liberal party in Opposition, disheartened, depressed in spirit, divided in counsel, and in no condition to endure the pangs of further child birth?

If the policy of the present Government has done nothing else, it has compelled the Liberal party to come out and take a definite stand upon this question. The favourite attitude of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and his party is to remain within the lines of Torres Vedras.

But now they have to come out and disclose their position. The patriotic policy of the Conservative party and the earnest sentiment of the country compel them to come out and announce their policy vociferously, and to claim credit for their desire, if they have it, to help the Empire. The policy of the Conservative party, if it has done nothing else, has compelled the Liberal party to take a definite stand, to take advanced ground, and to embrace a forward policy of substantial aid to the Empire. At the same time, the people of Canada can not but deprecate the partisan spirit of the Liberal party in propounding their present policy. It would have redounded to their everlasting credit, had they, for the time being, buried their party feelings and supported this magnificent gift of thirty-five millions of dollars to the Empire.

I know something of the public sentiment in the province of Ontario, and I know that there is a feeling of scepticism with respect to the sincerity of the Liberal party on this question. Everybody is of the opinion that this question would still be in the Rainbow and Niobe stage were it not for this magnificent policy so ably outlined by the right hon. leader of the Conservative party. Seeking to retrieve their lost reputation and some of their old prestige, the Liberal party have made themselves grotesque, in the light of their past performances, by now coming out and, with dramatic effect, trying to outbid their opponents by offering two fleet units for the Empire. Theirs is a political navy, not a real navy. A fleet of airships, surely would be more in the line of some of these hon. gentlemen; as if they could not man them, at least they could supply the means of propelling them. The advantages of the present policy are obvious to any student of this question. It means immediate and effective aid to the Empire. It allows time to mature a permanent policy to be submitted to the people for adoption. It completes the circle of overseas dominions contributing to the common navy. It demonstrates Imperial solidarity. And it proves to Germany the utter futility of her mad ambition to outdistance the British Empire in naval construction. And that is what the newspapers mean by the 'moral effect' of this policy—it will prove to Germany that she cannot, by any amount of expense, outdistance the British Empire in naval construction. And this means we hope, that peace will be established and that ultimately a universal treaty of disarmament will be arranged among the nations of the world. The policy so ably outlined by the right hon. the leader of the Government enlists the national pride of the Canadian people by giving them the inestimable privilege of having dreadnoughts in the firing line and thus of participating in Imperial enterprises. It provides a practical solution for the present of a very difficult question. Some hon. members opposite may smile. We acknowledge, free from partisan spirit, that it is a difficult question and deserving the careful deliberation of our best minds. Owing to the extent of our territory, owing to the diverse nature of the people whom we have attracted to occupy these lands, this is a difficult question. Time is required for the development of a permanent policy, which, before it is adopted will be submitted to the people for consideration and ratification. The Liberal party's policy for two fleet units to be owned and manned by Canada would afford relief only in the distant future. In view of the condition of the labour market at the present time it would be absolutely incapable of being brought into effect immediately. Let me read a few words from a statement by Mr. Frederick William Wallace, of Montreal, recognized the world over as an authority in marine affairs:

> For Canada to maintain a navy capable of defending our long coast lines, east and west, from even a sixth-rate power, would demand a navy larger than the Dominion could support at the present time. We will have to depend upon Great Britain for many years to come, though eventually we will be powerful enough, perhaps, to maintain our own navy. 'Perhaps' is accentuated, for though we may be rich enough to support a navy, yet, if Canada's present prosperity continues, she will never be able to man it with Canadians.

Then he goes on to describe the difficulty experienced by the United States authorities in obtaining recruits for the navy, and points out the attractive and alluring placards posted all over the United States to induce men to enter the naval service. And what is his conclusion? This is the way he puts it:

> Few native Americans sign for the navy, and those who do are desperate—men who are no good, socially, morally, and otherwise. A hard winter, hard times, and strikes make the best recruiting seasons for the United States navy. Thus it becomes a sort of home for destitutes and moral degenerates. Deserters from foreign ships, Scandinavians, Russians, Finns, Austrians, and Latins take kindly to the Yankee navy, for in it they learn the language and a trade, and the life to them is easy compared with their previous existence.

He goes on to show how we might utilize men who lead a seafaring life during the season of navigation, but have leisure time during the other months of the year; and how we might thus have a naval reserve force of some 50,000 men. Canada, he believes, could form a naval reserve of 50,000, composed of seafarers on our coasts and sailors on our great lakes. He holds that while we are giving Britain ships, a course which meets with his approval, we might as well be licking this good raw material into shape for emergency uses. He shows the feasibility of his plan by pointing out that these men could be trained as a reserve during the off season, when there is little doing in their particular vocations.

In conclusion, I desire to again state, on my own authority as an individual member of this House, and without attempting to commit my party in any way, that I reaffirm the position I took in 1910. I believe it would be proper to have a combination of both the propositions which have been submitted; I think we should have an immediate contribution, as outlined in the proposal of the right hon. leader of the Government, to meet the present emergency, and that when the Government forms its permanent policy they should adopt a plan which will involve the principle of a Canadian navy. The two policies now before the House are not contradictory, but are complementary, one of the other. The adoption of such a plan as I suggest would remove the naval question from the arena of politics—a consummation so greatly desired by leading members of both parties—and place it upon a plane of enlightened citizenship and patriotism. The fact that the Liberal party has suggested two fleet units as their policy does not necessarily mean that the policy is wrong; it may possibly mean that they have at last stumbled upon the right policy. Sir Oliver Mowat, in his palmy days, frequently stole the clothes off his political opponents and appropriated whatever was good in them. Whether the Government, in formulating its permanent policy, should adopt, with certain modifications, the proposition of our Liberal friends, is a matter worthy of consideration. If this were done, it would remove this national and Imperial question from the cockpit of contentious politics, would satisfy the demand for immediate assistance, and carry out what I consider to be the aspirations of the Canadian people for the establishing of a great shipbuilding industry within the borders of our own country.

However, I desire to say in conclusion, that I have absolute faith in the ability and judgment of the right hon. leader of the Conservative party, and those associated with him in the government of this country. I say I have confidence in the Prime Minister, whose visit to the old country has marked a forward step in Imperial history; whose public utterances while in England marked him out as an outstanding Imperial character, a leader whose pleasing personality, whose sturdy and lofty patriotism, whose strength of purpose and consummate ability, mark him out as the most conspicuous figure in recent Imperial history, and on whom the eyes of the whole Empire have been focussed during the past few months. Such a leader, I am sure, is capable of evolving a plan satisfactory not only to the people of Canada, but to the people of the whole Empire.

On motion of Mr. Devlin, the debate was adjourned.

STEEL RAILS—REMISSION OF DUTY.

*Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Has a remission of customs duties been given to the Algoma Steel Company on steel rails imported by the said company at Fort William.

2. If so, at what date and for what amount, under what statute and what section of the same?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. Yes.

2. This remission was made at various dates after June 1, 1912, under Section 92 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. The whole of the remission was $294,000, being one-half the duty on 75,000 gross tons imported steel rails. 50,000 tons of these rails were for the use of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and 25,000 tons for branch lines of the Canadian Pacific railway in the Northwest. The said steel rails were urgently required by the said railway companies for the completion of lines in the northwest provinces in time to be available for the movement of the crop, and evidence was submitted showing that the rail producing companies of Canada would not be able to supply the rails required, or any part thereof, by reason of being under contract for their full output for the season.

CONDITION OF LABOURING CLASSES.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government, since the 21st September, 1911, to inquire into the condition of the labouring classes in Canada?

2. Have any practical steps been taken to materially improve same?

3. What changes, if any, have been effected in the publication of the Labour Gazette?

4. What is the proportion of the average wages paid to Canadian labourers as compared to that of the labourer of the United States of America?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Every board established under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, makes inquiry into the conditions of the labouring classes concerned in the particular disputes for the adjustment of which the Board is established. There have been twenty-one such boards established since September 21, 1911. At the present time investigations are being conducted in this way as follows: (a) into conditions affecting metalliferous miners in the Kootenay district; (b) into conditions affecting machinists and blacksmiths in Ottawa.

In addition, various special inquiries have been undertaken and are proceeding in the Department of Labour, as follows: (a) into wholesale and retail prices of leading commodities of life, at all points in Canada, bearing on the cost of living; (b) into wages paid in all lines of industry at all important centres in Canada; (c) into causes of all strikes and lockouts in Canada, and showing numbers of workmen concerned, amount of time lost, and results generally achieved; (d) into labour organization in Canada. Officers of the Department of Labour have on various occasions conducted special inquiries into railway construction in Western Canada; also, as a result of information reaching the department, numerous investigations have been made by departmental officials into specific grievances alleged to exist in different parts of Canada.

2. As a result of the investigations indicated in reply to No. 1, disputes have been adjusted without strikes, strikes have been adjusted, and improved conditions have been brought about in numerous instances.

3. The Labour Gazette has been published on the same general lines followed in the past, with modifications and developments consistent with the expansion of industrial interests.

4. Owing to the great variety of industries and the variations of wages at different points, it is not possible to convey this information in a reply to a question. A report as to wages paid in the different industries and at various points in Canada is now in course of preparation. A similar report as to conditions in the United States is understood to be now in preparation in that country. When the two reports are complete it may be practicable to compare the respective conditions. At the present time the information is not available.

QUEBEC CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is it within the knowledge of the Government or the Minister of Railways that the Quebec Central railway has been acquired or leased by the Canadian Pacific?

2. If so, does the Government or the Minister of railways know whether the Timiscouata railway is included or not in the said arrangement?

3. If the Temiscouata railway has not been acquired or leased by the Canadian Pacific railway, is it the intention of the Government or the Railway Department to acquire or lease it as part of the Intercolonial railway as this road is said to be one of those which could bring the greatest amount of traffic to the Intercolonial railway and from the day on which it is acquired or leased by the Canadian Pacific railway, it would be a detriment to the Intercolonial railway?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Yes.

2. Temiscouata Railway is not included.

3. The whole question of branch lines is receiving the attention of the Government.

Gallibois, $1.85 per cubic yard, $24,050; Misael Bernatchez, $2.07 per cubic yard, $26,910; Théophile Beaumont, $2.09¾ per cubic yard, $27,267.50; Elzéar Caron, $2.18 per cubic yard, $28,340; Cloutier & Gaudreau, $2.20 per cubic yard, $22,600; Joseph Normand-Onésime Poliquin, $2.25 per cubic yard, $29,250; Alexandre Duchesneau-Louis Roy, $2.45 per cubic yard, $31,850; Paul T. C. Dumais, $2.96 per cubic yard, $38,480; Thetford Contracting Company, $3.74 per cubic yard, $48,620; Massicotte & Fréres, $5.00 per cubic yard, $65,000.

3. What are his duties?

4. What is his salary?

5. Does the Government know that the said David Morin, as alleged, was one of the most active canvassers of Doctor Paquet, member for L'Islet at the last election?

FENIAN RAID VETERANS.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has Mr. Anthime Boulé, of St. Eugene de Lamartine, county of L'Islet, P.Q., made application to obtain the grant of $100, as a volunteer in 1866 and 70?
2. If so, was his claim accompanied with the affidavits of Messrs. Philippe Gagné and Joseph Caron, declaring that the said A. Boulé had been a volunteer with them on the date mentioned by them?
3. How did it happen that the two companions have received their grants and that the one of Mr. A. Boulé has been refused?
4. Were the affidavits of the two volunteer companions put aside in the case where the name of the volunteer applicant was not found on the pay list, or was badly written or printed?

Mr. HUGHES:

1. For 1870 only.
2. Yes, but affidavits not sufficiently definite.
3. Because their names are on the active service pay lists of No. 5 Company, 61st Battalion, and that of Mr. A. Boulé is not.
4. The affidavit of Messrs. Gagné and Caron are not satisfactory, as, in the former, no dates or circumstantial evidence is given, and, in the latter, no specific dates or circumstantial evidence.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ICE CONTRACT.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1 Have tenders been asked for to furnish ice for the Intercolonial railway from Lévis to Campbellton? If so, how many tenderers were there?
2. What are their names and the amount of their tenders respectively?
3. Who obtained the contract at the different places and what are the prices granted?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes, there were twelve tenderers.
2. 950 tons for Chaudiere Junction: La Société de Quincaillerie, per H. P. Beaulieu, Lévis, 80 cents per ton; Xavier Romain, Pont Etchemin, 90 cents; Jos. Bolduc & Edouard Bolduc, Lévis, 72 cents; P. T. Cauchon, Pont Etchemin, $1.95; Ph. Paquet Fils, St. Romuald, 65 cents; Chas. Coulombe, St. Fabien, 65 cents; P. Robitaille, Lévis, 95 cents.

420 tons for Lévis: La Société de Quincaillerie, per H. P. Beaulieu, Lévis, 85 cents per ton; Xavier Romain, Pont Etchemin, 90 cents; Jos. Bolduc & Edouard Bolduc, Lévis, 72 cents; P. T. Cauchon, Pont Etchemin, $1.95; Ph. Paquet Fils, St. Romuald, 70 cents; Chas. Coulombe, St. Fabien, 65 cents; P. Robitaille, Lévis, 95 cents.

1,170 tons for Riv. du Loup: La Société de Quincaillerie, per H. P. Beaulieu, Lévis, 90 cents per ton; Xavier Romain, Pont Etchemin, 90 cents; J. A. Pelletier, Riv. du Loup, 57½ cents; Chas. Coulombe, St. Fabien, 65 cents; Frank Magnier, Riv. du Loup, 70 cents; Thos. Ouellette, Blaisville, P.Q., 98 cents.

1,000 tons for Ste. Flavie: La Société de Quincaillerie, per H. P. Beaulieu, Lévis, 90 cents per ton; J. A. Pelletier, Riv. du Loup, 65 cents per ton; Chas. Coulombe, St. Fabien, 59 cents; Frank Magnier, Riv. du Loup, 90 cents; Adjutor Picard, St. Patrick, County of Temiscouata, P.Q., 65 cents; J. H. Rioux, St. Fabien, 64 cents.

110 tons for Rimouski: La Société de Quincaillerie, per H. P. Beaulieu, Lévis, 90 cents per ton; Chas. Coulombe, St. Fabien, 59 cents; Frank Magnier, Riv. du Loup, 90 cents; Adjutor Picard, St. Patrick, County of Temiscouata, P.Q., 65 cents; J. H. Rioux, St. Fabien, 74 cents.

80 tons for Riv. Ouelle wharf: La Société de Quincaillerie, per H. P. Beaulieu, Lévis, 90 cents per ton; J. A. Pelletier, Riv. du Loup, 80 cents; Chas. Coulombe, St. Fabien, 65 cents; Frank Magnier, Riv. du Loup, 90 cents.

3. Ph. Paaquet Fils, St. Romauld: for Chaudière Jct., at 65 cents per ton; for Levis, at 70 cents per ton.

J. A. Pelletier, Rivière du Loup, for Rivière du Loup, at 57½ cents per ton.

Chas. Coulombe, St. Fabien: for Ste. Flavie, at 59 cents per ton; for Rimouski, at 59 cents per ton; for Rivière Ouelle wharf at 65 cents per ton.

The ton above mentioned is the net ton of 2,000 pounds. In the case of the ice for Levis the offer of Ph. Paquet Fils, of St. Romuald, at 70 cents per ton was accepted, as the ice is to be supplied from St. Romuald, four miles from Levis. The ice offered by Chas. Coulombe for Levis at 65 cents per ton was to be supplied from St. Fabien, 160 miles from Levis, in which case the cost to the railway of hauling the ice would be 40 cents per ton.

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes, for political partisanship.
2. No. Not considered necessary.
3. No.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY BRANCH LINES.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON moved the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable in furtherance of the transportation interests of this Dominion, that the sphere of influence of the Intercolonial railway as a Government operated railway shall be widened and extended by securing by lease or otherwise such of the branch lines of railways now connected with the Intercolonial, as will serve as direct and profitable feeders to the traffic of said railway and further by securing as aforesaid such of said branch lines as may be considered to be in the general interest of the Dominion of Canada and of its people, with relation to its transportation problems and interests, without especial consideration to the immediate direct financial results.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the question of the absorption by the Intercolonial railway of the branch lines connecting with that railway has been so frequently brought to the notice of this House, not only during this Parliament, but in preceding Parliaments, that to me at least, and I am sure to many hon. members, the subject has become somewhat threadbare. It will be observed that this motion goes somewhat further than any other resolution which has been brought to the notice of the House heretofore. I think in 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, and 1911, if not in 1912, the scope of the proposed resolution was to acquire such lines as would be directly proved to be of financial advantage to the Intercolonial railway. The qualifications with respect to the character of the road were always in the line of having it demonstrated that all railways to be thus absorbed should be proved to be financially beneficial to the Intercolonial. In attempting to discuss the question I am somewhat hampered by the fact that the Department of Railways and Canals have not answered the following question which stands on the Order Paper:

1. Has the Government reached any decision as to the action they propose taking, if any, with a view to the acquisition of the branch lines connecting with the Intercolonial railway, and the operating of the same as a part of the Government system of railways? If so, what is the nature of the decision reached and when will their intentions relating thereto be given effect?

2. What is the estimated maximum amount involved in the purchase of all the branch lines of railway now connecting with the Intercolonial railway, as feeders operated at present by isolated private railway companies?

Mr. COCHRANE: I could give the hon. gentleman the answer.

Mr. EMMERSON: I should be very glad to have it.

Mr. COCHRANE: The answer to the first part is that it is still under consideration. The answer to the second is that it is not in the public interest that we should give any estimate of what they are worth.

Mr. EMMERSON: I thank my hon. friend for the information. Apparently the Government have not reached a conclusion with respect to the matter and, as to the second part of the question, my hon. friend thinks it is not in the public interest that it should be answered. I do not know what reasons influence him or the Government.

Mr. COCHRANE: We do not want to give our opinion of the value, that is all.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend might err on the safe side, and make the estimate low enough to remove any possible difficulties that might arise. My reason for wishing that information was to have placed before the House and the country approximately a statement of the amount of money involved in connection with the branch line railways, in connection with all the railways that might possibly be acquired or absorbed by the Government system of railways. It seems to me that it would not involve very great injury to any individual railway or to the Government railway, or to the interests of the people as a whole, to have that information. To-day we have propositions before this Parliament, and we have had them before preceding Parliaments, with respect to the enlargement, indeed, to the building of a new Welland canal, and the amounts have been given with respect to that, that is, the amount of money approximately involved in the proposition. We have also had propositions with respect to the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. Whether you consider it from the point of view of the capital expenditure required, or the annual charge for maintenance and operation of these several branch lines, the sum of money involved is insignificant in comparison with the large expenditures on other public undertakings. We are dealing with figures in this Parliament to-day which would make the members of former Parliaments shudder; thirty-five million dollars is apparently nothing for us to send across the water in connection with a naval proposition; one hundred and fifty million dollars is said not to be much to spend on the Georgian Bay canal, and the construction of a new Welland canal in place of the old, which is serving the purposes of the Dominion at the present time, will of course, involve the expenditure of millions. But, when it comes to a matter of a small expenditure for furnishing transportation facilities, which are absolutely needed in the Maritime provinces and in parts of Quebec, we find the Government hesitating. I do not make any particular charge against this Government in that respect, because I know that for years past in this House, whenever any expenditure was mentioned in connection with the Intercolonial, the first question put is what will it cost, and the Government is inclined to hesitate. Look at the history of the branch line movement. When I was Minister of Railways, when making my annual statement to this House I referred, not officially but as an individual member of the House, to the day which was fast coming when in the interests of the Intercolonial railway and of the Dominion at large it would be necessary for the Government to acquire these branch lines. When I resigned from the portfolio of railways, I brought the matter before the House on several occasions, and I felt there was not that interest taken in the project, not alone by members representing western constituencies but by many members representing constituencies in the Maritime provinces, which the importance of the question deserved. At last, in November, 1909, the matter was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and a Bill was introduced which, though in my opinion as absolutely inadequate, adopted the principle and would eventually result in the acquisition of these branch lines. I took exception to the Government Bill when introduced, on the ground that it was not sufficiently comprehensive and that it would fail to be workable, and the result demonstrated the correctness of my prophecy. In 1911, it was proposed to amend the Bill of 1910, and resolutions were introduced for that purpose by Mr. Graham, then Minister of Railways. These resolutions reached the point of final concurrence when Parliament was dissolved. Since then the matter has remained, well not quiescent, but no progress has been made. During the elections of 1911, the Prime Minister promised throughout the Maritime provinces, that he would, if returned to power, have these branch lines acquired by the Government, so as to form a part of the Government railway system. These were not merely verbal promises but they were also announced in telegrams which the present Prime Minister sent to the different constituencies. One particular telegram which was sent by the Hon. Mr. Borden from Charlottetown, was read in Westmoreland, in Albert, and in the different constituencies of the province of New Brunswick and it announced the assurance that if Mr. Borden were returned to office he would carry out this scheme in which the people in that part of the country were so deeply interested. I have always held that the people of other sections of Canada were as much interested directly in the expansion of the Intercolonial railway as were the Maritime provinces. I have always held, and have so stated throughout the length and breadth of this country, that the people of Ontario particularly were quite as much interested in the expansion and improvement of the Intercolonial as were the provinces by the sea. I had realized that the construction of the Intercolonial had furnished to the manufacturing and mercantile interests of Ontario and Quebec markets that are incomparable with any other markets in Canada. Even if the Intercolonial railway had not always had a balance on the right side in connection with its operation, yet I felt that from the very inception of its operation there had been a surplus created by that railway, but that the surplus by reason of the low rates that were established was in the pockets of the people of Canada, and that without that railway Ontario would have been minus the splendid markets which were afforded her along the coast of Nova Scotia and in the lumbering sections of New Brunswick. I realized from those facts that by the acquisition of these branch lines better and more extended markets would be available and accessible to the manufacturing interests of Western Canada. I felt that it was in the interests of all classes regardless of geography, to have that road branch out in the many directions in which it could branch out, in order that these markets would be available, not merely to those who sought for purchasers for their wares and merchandise, but also for the people who live along the line of these respective railways and were served with the inadequate facilities which are now afforded by these branch lines. That there will be any who will deny this proposition, I question; that there will be any who can successfully refute the proposition I question strongly. The situation is simply this: the Intercolonial railway is owned by the Government of Canada; the people of Canada have somewhere in the neighbourhood of ninety millions of dollars invested in it; it is now under operation by the Government, and doubts are being created day by day as to the continuance of its operation, as doubts have been created year by year in the past. I believe that some decisive action should be taken by this Government, as it should have been taken earlier by a former Government, to set at rest forever the question as to whether the Intercolonial is to pass into the hands of a private corporation or whether it is to be maintained and continued as a Government operated railway. This is a matter that should be decided and decided now. The Minister of Railways has told us, not today but on a former occasion during this session, that negotiations are being had with his department, as they were had with his predecessors in office by the Canadian Pacific railway, looking for the acquirement by that railway of certain running rights over the Intercolonial railway between St. John and Halifax, and between Truro and the Sydneys. Admittedly the Canadian Pacific railway have sought for many years to secure these running rights; they have made application to one after the other of those who have held the position of Minister of Railways; and they have submitted to the department year after year certain propositions with a view of securing running rights over that road, not merely ordinary rights for through traffic, in order that they might reach the port of Halifax or the port of Sydney, but running rights as respects local traffic, their contention being that in order that they might successfully operate their through traffic, they should be given the privilege of running their trains over the rails of the Intercolonial railway between the points I have named to do the intermediate passenger traffic and the intermediate freight traffic. They were not content to get, as they might have obtained long ere this, the privilege of securing the right to run over the rails of the Intercolonial railway with their through cars in connection with their through traffic, both passenger and freight, they were not content to have the ordinary rule that applies between private corporations executed and exercised as between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Intercolonial railway. Such a proposition has never been made in the history of railways between private corporations, whereby one railway has asked another for the right to run over their rails to compete with the railway granting that right in the matter of intermediate or local traffic. A proposition so astounding as that has never been made even by any railway on this continent or in Europe. Yet the Canadian Pacific railway has been and is persistent with respect to this matter. I am not complaining as to their course, it is a business one, if they can secure those rights, they are justified in making the effort. The Intercolonial railway is a splendid asset; the people of Canada for the past forty-five years have been expending and investing their money in it; by reason of these years of expenditure and the building up of the business of the country and its development, the Intercolonial railway has become an asset that I think is without equal with respect to any of the assets of the Government of Canada. I would even go farther and say that there is no more valuable portion of railway in Canada than the Intercolonial railway between Montreal and Moncton and through the eastern provinces as well.

It would be natural for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to desire to secure this splendid railway without the expenditure of a dollar on capital account, without outlays ordinarily required by a railway corporation in the construction of roads, the establishment of terminals, and the acquiring of the many facilities which are necessary to the operation of a great system of railway. If the Canadian Pacific railway or any other private corporation could secure the right to use the rails of the Intercolonial railway for all the purposes which I have enumerated, it would mean that they would be enabled to absorb the Intercolonial railway without, as I say, the expenditure of a dollar on capital account. How so, you ask. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Intercolonial railway in the past has not had, and even to-day, has not, the traffic it is capable of handling. It has not had sufficient traffic, particularly over some sections of it, to make it a paying concern at the rates which were established at the time of Confederation and which have been continued with more or less modification down to the present time. If the Intercolonial railway could have secured that traffic, even at the old rates it has charged, it would have been enabled to make good book-keeping showing at the end of each fiscal year. But, at last, and after long years it has built up a good traffic, though no more than it could handle. If now the Government should allow another railway to run trains over the rails of the Intercolonial railway, in competition with the Intercolonial railway trains, I venture the assertion that within five years the Government of Canada would not be operating one single train on the Intercolonial railway. You may think, Sir, and others may think that that is an astounding statement. Let me give my reason for making it. If any private corporation secured these running rights, then, in a night, in the twinkling of an eye, that corporation would secure the branch lines which we have been considering all these years, the coal roads of Nova Scotia, the lumber roads of New Brunswick, the roads connecting with the fishing ports in Quebec and the Maritime provinces. All these would be secured instanter by the railway corporations which would secure running rights, the privilege which the Canadian Pacific railway is seeking at the hands of the Minister of Railways, negotiations for which are pending at this very moment between the Department of Railways or the Government of Canada, and the Canadian Pacific railway. Now, I would ask the Minister of Railways, I would urge him to take no step in connection with the granting of running rights over the Intercolonial railway to the Canadian Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway or the Grand Trunk railway, before he has determined and acted upon a branch line policy —which, my hon. friend admits, they have not done. Although his leader, the right hon. the leader of this Government, promised the electors, that this policy should be entered upon; although it has been mentioned time and again in this House, although there has elapsed nearly two years since they came into power, no action has been taken; there has not even been a decision reached as to the course that should be taken. I was not surprised, that the Speech from the Throne last session did not contain a paragraph relating to the acquisition of the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway. The present Government had only been in office a few months, and naturally it was impossible for them to elaborate a measure to meet the situation. But, I did expect, Sir, that when the time came to open this session the people of the country would hear from the Governor General, that which they were entitled to hear, a declaration that a policy with regard to the branch lines had been reached and that action would be taken in that direction. No such reference was made; there was no such paragraph in the Speech from the Throne. And I have been led to draw a comparison between the treatment of some sections of Canada in connection with railways and treatment accorded to the Maritime provinces. We have heard of the Hudson Bay railway. Now, I do not want to say a word in condemnation of that railway. I would not wish any words of mine to be considered as in any way throwing a wet blanket on that proposition. But here is a line of railway, that, at the best, can only be operated in connection with the export trade of Canada for three or four months of the year. I put aside all questions, existing in the minds of many who claim to know, as to the feasibility of the Hudson Bay railway. I take it for granted that it is possible to have connection between Europe and the West of Canada through the Hudson bay for three months of the year, and that during that period the grain trade of Canada can be served. It is true that that period is at a time of the year when there is not much shipment of grain from the West—the months of July, August, and perhaps September. That railway serves the western farmer, and he is worthy of recognition; but it serves him only for three months of the year, and that at a time when there is little shipment of his grain. That railway proposition, placed as it is, surrounded as it is, was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne in 1909; it was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne in 1910. Action was also taken in 1911 with respect to the matter, and in 1912 this Government came into power, and they, too, emulating their predecessors in office, brought down to Parliament a hopeful statement with respect to the Hudson Bay railway. Even in the Speech from the Throne during the present session, further reference was made to that railway. This is a proposition affecting, it is true, the great and important interests of the West; it has been mentioned in every Speech from the Throne from 1909 to 1912, both inclusive. But here is the question of the branch line railways, affecting the interests of eastern Canada, and, being an advantage to Quebec and Ontario as well as the maritime provinces. This matter, during that period, has never been mentioned in a Speech from the Throne except in the session of 1909-1910. I arraign the present Administration, and I arraign the right hon. leader of the Government, in that they have entirely ignored the interests of the Intercolonial railway in that regard; I go further, and say that the people of eastern Canada have been betrayed and misled with respect to this branch line question. Throughout all the years during which I have striven to promote the carrying out of this idea, I have endeavoured on all occasions to present the matter to this House not as a political measure or a party question. I have said, as against my friends on many occasions, that which I now say as against my political opponents, who are now struggling with the responsibilities of office. In view of the importance of this matter; in view of all the conditions that it involves; in view of the pledges made by the Government, and the consequent expectations of the people of this country, and particularly of eastern Canada; in view of the promises made by hon. members who to-day sit in this House as supporters of the Government; in view of all these facts, I say we have a right to expect decisive and early action in connection with this matter. Yet, after nearly two years, we have the humilitiating admission of the Minister of Railways that he is not in a position to take the House and the country into his confidence in regard to whether the Government has any intentions in regard to the carrying out of this policy.

Mr. RHODES : The hon. gentleman refers to broken pledges on the part of the Government with respect to branch line railways; will he be good enough to detail what these pledges are ?

Mr. EMMERSON: The merest tyro in politics would readily understand that. My hon. friend knows full well that during the election of 1911 the present leader of the Government, then leader of the Opposition, went into the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, and there, particularly in constituencies traversed by the Intercolonial railway, he gave assurances to the electorate at large, that if returned to power, he would at once without the delays charged against the Laurier administration, make these branch lines part and parcel of the Government system of railways by constituting them a portion of the Intercolonial railway. I do not know whether the right hon. leader of the Government paid a visit to the county of my hon. friend during that contest, but I know he was in many constituencies, and I know further that his telegram regarding the branch lines was published in the Conservative press with large headlines, causing the electors to come to the natural conclusion that it made no difference which party was sustained, as they were both pledged to the carrying out of that policy. The electors in the county of Cumberland expected, and to-day expect, that that promise will be carried out by the present administration. As a faithful—I will not say servile—but as a very faithful and powerful supporter of the Government, I would ask the hon. member for Cumberland to exercise the great influence he commands in the councils of the Government towards bringing this administration down to the hitching post, and making them carry out what they have led the country to expect they will perform.

Any argument tending to make evident the advantage of this branch line policy would be wasting the time of the House. It has been admitted, at your right, as well as at your left, that the idea of the present leader of the Opposition in respect to this matter is a correct one. His Government was proceeding to carry out the idea—indeed, contracts had been entered into or negotiations had before they resigned from office, with a view to acquiring some of these lines. They were then committed to the principle, and the present administration is committed to the same principle through the mouth of the Prime Minister. There is not a member from the Maritime Provinces, whether he sits at your right or your left, Mr. Speaker, but realizes that the whole force of public opinion in that section of Canada is in favour of the carrying out of that proposition, and they are looking to the Government of the day for the redeeming of their promise to make the Intercolonial what it should be, and what it is destined to be. All that I am saying is premised upon the idea that the Intercolonial railway is to be continued under the control of the Government of Canada and operated as a state-owned railway. If, as has been stated quite recently in the public press and on the platforms throughout the provinces, there are any other ideas to the effect that the Intercolonial railway is to be passed over to some railway corporation, then my words are, of course, entirely useless; my effort is being entirely wasted and the motion is even not relevant at this moment. The president of the Maritime Board of Trade, Mr. Matthew Lodge, was in Ottawa quite recently; he went from here to the West and has now returned to Moncton. At a meeting of the board of trade of that city, of which he is also president, he announced that negotiations were now being had between the Department of Railways or the Government of Canada and a private railway corporation which he did not specify looking towards the passing over of the Intercolonial railway to it. He made that statement publicly at a meeting from information which he said was secured very recently in the city of Ottawa. His statement was to the effect that the Intercolonial railway was to be transferred to a private corporation and to be managed and operated by it in the very near future. If that is the case I can quite understand the inactivity of the Government with respect to the acquisition of these branch lines. If they are going to adopt such a policy then I say: Do not acquire any branch lines, it would be a waste of the people's money to take even one forward step towards securing any of these branch lines that connect with that railway. Any great private corporation securing the Intercolonial railway would, as a business proposition, immediately secure these branch lines. That has been the history of great railway corporations in Canada, in the United States, in Great Britain, wherever railways have been successfully operated; it has even been the policy of the Canadian Pacific railway in New Brunswick in the operation of its lines there. If the Canadian Pacific railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific railway or the Canadian Northern railway were to secure a lease or even running rights over the Intercolonial railway they would at once as a business proposition acquire these branch lines. Why? Because they would marshal all the traffic originating along the several branch lines, assemble it at their points of connection with their trains on the Intercolonial railway, pass it along over the rails say of the Canadian Pacific railway to Montreal or to western points, leaving the Intercolonial railway minus any of that traffic, impotent to gather up any of the traffic that is in any way remote and for every train placed on the Intercolonial railway by a company after such running rights had been granted the Government of Canada would have to withdraw one of their trains, and in a very short period the only trains running over the Intercolonial railway would be company-owned and operated trains, the shops along the Intercolonial railway now occupied by the Government would become as silent as the tomb and the railway corporations would in their stead furnish their own at points to suit their convenience. The Canadian Pacific railway already have very large terminals at McAdam in the county of York, New Brunswick.

The Minister of Railways has not studied this question as I have—and in saying that I have no idea of being egotistical. He has not had it driven into him by a knowledge of the facts and conditions. I know that the service which these branch lines afford to those living along them is entirely inadequate. I have correspondence from every province relating to the manner in which these railways are operated to the disadvantage of the people and to the very great disadvantage of the Intercolonial railway itself. There is no unanimity of action with respect to trains, no consideration is given by one to the other with respect to traffic or train connections or the apportionment of rates. In every way possible they seem to work against the interests of the people. Because of discrimination in freight rates there can be no industry established along any branch railway in the eastern provinces. The fishing interests have to be served in a measure by these branch lines because the ports at which the fish are brought in from the sea are remote from the Intercolonial railway itself and the discrimination with regard to freight as against fishermen who operate outside of the zone of the Intercolonial railway is so serious that it favours many fish operators who are placed directly along the line of the Intercolonial railway against the interests of the others whom I have named and who are thereby handicapped in the carrying on of their business. I have received numerous communications from the province of Quebec upon this subejct. The Quebec and Oriental railway runs down through the county of Bonaventure to Gaspé and through a portion of the county of Gaspé.

There is another line of railway known generally as the Matane railway, or the Gulf Terminal railway. It connects with the Intercolonial railway at Ste. Flavie and, as far as present constructed, runs to Matane en route to Gaspé. It is proposed to extend that railway to Gaspé, and perhaps there will be an application asking aid for that purpose. But to-day the facilities afforded by that railway are such that complaints are coming from the mayors of the towns, from the municipalities, and from the people along its route to the Dominion Railway Commission Board which disclaims any jurisdiction in the matter, and to the Quebec Utilities Commission, who claim that they are unable to force the railway to give the necessary facilities. I have been given to understand, from information sent to me by some of the officials of those municipalities in Quebec, that the way that railway is being operated, so far as the interests of the people are concerned, is a shame and a disgrace. I would suggest that if any further application is made for subsidies, the hon. minister himself should insist upon an inquiry as to whether, in view of the money already expended in the way of subsidies to that railway, it is giving adequate accommodation to the people living in the counties which it traverses. I shall not go into details as to those complaints, but I know that similar complaints are being made with respect to railways in other sections of the country. I would call my hon. friend's attention especially to two railways in the county of Cumberland, in Nova Scotia, which is represented by my hon. friend who interrupted me a few moments ago. I refer, first, to the railway known as Joggins railway, and secondly to the one known as the Springhill road. Their corporate names are different from these, but my hon. friend must be familiar with them. The operation of the Joggins railway is not in the interests of the people, but in the interests of the coal mining company who own it.

An hon. MEMBER : That is right.

Mr. EMMERSON : I want to say more than that. I know, as a matter of fact, from my experience as a former Minister of Railways, that in the matter of Intercolonial cars for the transportation of coal, the company, having the coal mines run in its own interest, and in connection with the operation of its own railway, seizes those cars to the disadvantage of competing coal companies using that line, and is in a position to gather information as to consignees to whom competing coal companies are shipping coal. There are times when business can only be secured and maintained by the prompt shipment of coal, which those other mining companies operating on this railway are not able to furnish, because they are unable to secure cars which have been sent to them, but which have been seized by the railway coal company to accommodate the patrons of its own mines. That is a railway which should have been secured at the very earliest opportunity, not merely in the interests of the people, or in the interests of trade, not merely in the interests of the coal industry, but in the interests of the Intercolonial railway itself, so that it could advantageously secure the traffic which comes over that railway and in order that the people in that section of the country might enjoy the facilities they anticipated when the subsidy was originally granted by this Parliament. They are not having the facilities which they expected, and the money expended has been practically thrown away, so far as the interests of that section of the county of Cumberland are concerned.

The same is true with respect to the railway which operates between Springhill junction on the Intercolonial railway and the seaport of Parrsboro on the basin of Minas. I am told there are coal areas along the line of this railway which are not being operated because capital will not be invested in them, that they will not be opened up because in the trans-shipment of coal they would be at a very great disadvantage, that the marginal profit on such operations is so small that a company could not compete, on the one hand, with the railway coal company, and on the other hand with the Springhill Coal Company, which owns the line from Springhill junction to the Springhill mines, and thence to Parrsboro. Trade is being restrained and injury done to business interests which are already established, and there is no hope for any further development. There is no inducement for any continued investment of capital, and what is true of one railway is true of the other.

Take the railway which operates in the county of Westmorland, which I have the honour to represent. That railway runs between Sackville and Cape Tormentine on the Straits of Northumberland, at which point there is the shortest distance between Prince Edward Island and the mainland that is to be found anywhere along the coast. That railway known as the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway should be acquired by the Government and operated in connection with its Prince Edward Island traffic, and also in connection with the traffic that naturally comes from the Government road in Prince Edward Island known as the Prince Edward Island railway. We had much ado about the ferry service between those points or between other points on the Straits of Northumberland. I had supposed from the telegrams which had been sent by the right hon. the leader of the Government to the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Prince Edward Island that the matter had been determined, and that action would be taken. I concluded, from the letter addressed by the Minister of Railways to the people of Charlottetown just one year ago that action would be probably taken then. It was announced that plans had been prepared, that tenders had been called for, and that there would be connection between the mainland and Prince Edward Island by November, 1912. The matter seems to have been forgotten, and Parliament has not been furnished with information as to the steps, if any, which the Government have taken. That question is allied with the branch line policy; it connects the Intercolonial with the traffic of a whole province, and it makes one the two separated parts of the Government railway system. That car ferry should be established and established now. Probably the Government have been so occupied with decapitations of officials and with finding positions for their needy friends, that they have been unable to take into consideration these important matters; it has been a Government looking after individuals and not looking after the collective interests of the community. The inactivity of the Government in regard to these two particular measures justifies the strongest condemnation.

I trust the Government will bear in mind the last paragraph of this resolution. It may be that a branch line would not at present be in a position to make a financial showing that would justify the Government in taking it over, but the main question that should be considered by the Government in such a matter is, whether the taking over of that branch line would be of advantage to the trade and commerce of Canada generally, or to the Intercolonial itself, by reason of enabling the Intercolonial to enter a larger zone of usefulness. The financial aspect of the matter, of course, should not be overlooked, but if the acquisition of a railway would mean advantage to the Dominion of Canada generally with relation to the transportation problem, then the Government should determine to take over that road. There have been railways which when operated as local concerns did not pay, but which when taken over by trunk line companies were found to be a valuable asset. The Tobique Valley railway is a case in point. The Minister of Marine knows that the Tobique Valley railway was constructed with the aid of Provincial and Dominion subsidies. It connects with the Canadian Pacific railway at Perth in Victoria county, and it was for some time operated by a private company. I am informed that for a number of years the company had difficulty in meeting its bond interest, that no interest was paid on the stock and that it was practically worthless. The Canadian Pacific railway secured that railway and have been operating it on the basis of a percentage of gross earnings, payable annually to the Tobique railway company, with the result that the interest on the bonds is now being met and that a dividend is being paid to the stockholders.

Mr. HAZEN: I think my hon. friend is not correct in that. I know something about the facts as I was a trustee for the bondholders. The road was never operated except by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Before it was finished an agreement was entered into with the Canadian Pacific railway to operate the road, on a payment of forty per cent of the gross earnings which was security for the payment of the interest on the bonds. There were two issues of bonds, one for $5,000 a mile and a second issue also for $5,000 per mile. For a time the forty per cent of the gross earnings was not sufficient to pay the interest on the first issue, but subsequently it became sufficient, and after a good many years of operation, the forty per cent is now I think very nearly paying the interest on the second bond issue of $5,000 a mile.

Mr. EMMERSON: I thank my hon. friend for the information which no doubt is correct as the hon. gentleman is in a position to know. I was informed that a dividend was being paid on the stock now.

Mr. CARVELL: So there is.

Mr. EMMERSON: I was so informed.

Mr. CARVELL: I have a client who is a stockholder and he informed me during the last month that he was receiving dividends on his stock now.

Mr. HAZEN: If so it must have been very recently.

Mr. EMMERSON: My information did not come from my hon. friend; it came entirely apart; it was given to me a year ago or more.

Mr. HAZEN: There was a large sum of money to overtake because of the non-payment of interest on bonds for so many years. Maybe that has been paid now and also interest on the stock. I was not aware of it.

Mr. EMMERSON: That does not affect the principle. Take the Canada Eastern railway, as it was formerly known; it was not a success financially; it was absorbed by the Intercolonial; and I venture to make this assertion, not fearing successful contradiction, that there has been no better paying section of the Intercolonial than that portion of it between Loggieville and Fredericton; and even if it had not been, it has been of advantage in other directions, of great advantage to the Intercolonial itself in conserving to that railway the zone of influence which it should control as a government railway along the North shore. More than that, there have been afforded facilities under government operation, which could not possibly have been secured if the company operation had been continued. There should be no question as to the amount of money that is involved in the taking over of these railways. As a matter of economy in the interests of the Intercolonial itself, those branch lines of railway should be acquired, in order that they may be enabled to utilize the stock when it becomes obsolete for use on a trunk line and when it can only be available for use on a branch line or a small line of railway; take in the matter of engines, cars, both passenger and freight, rails which are being taken up year by year by the Intercolonial, because they have become too light along the Intercolonial by reason of decay—rust is the word that should be used instead of rot; take in the matter of bridges that are lying along the line of the Intercolonial railway, in the province of New Brunswick alone to-day, there are many thousands and thousands and tens of thousands of dollars' worth of steel rails, of bridges, of obsolete cars, of obsolete engines which could be made available, without any very great expenditure on the part of the Government, for these branch lines of railway. Yet the people living along these lines are denied the privilege of proper facilities, because the Government has delayed and too long delayed and because—if it is any asset to my hon. friend—his predecessors too long delayed in moving in this matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: And yourself?

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend says myself. As an individual I was not in a position to advocate it; but during the time I was Minister of Railways, while I was in a position to advocate it as a member of the Government, I found that these things came about by evolution. If it had depended upon myself between the year 1903 and April 1907, as a business proposition, these railways would have been acquired by the Intercolonial railway. I am not dealing with this matter as a political question or from a partisan standpoint; I have repeatedly on the floor of this House refuted any such idea. To-day I am charging the Government with negligence in connection with the matter, as I charged their predecessors. To-day I am charging them with broken promises, because there are broken pledges with respect to the matter. I feel that it is my duty, the country know about it; the people in the East know this to be true; and I am directing the attention of this House and the direction of the people of Canada to the facts as they exist, without regard to any political bias and without any hope of making any party, political point in connection with the whole subject. The point is that the people of the Maritime provinces want these lines to be operated as a part of the Intercolonial railway, and they have had the promise of this Government that they would be so operated. I am asking at the hands of this Parliament a declaration on their part that this policy shall be declared to be acceptable to this House, to be acted upon by the Government of the day. The trouble with us in the East has been too long that our members and representatives are too intent upon making some little, puny, party, political point in connection with the great activities of eastern Canada; too long have they not been willing to stand shoulder to shoulder to see that their interests are conserved. It may be small politics; it may content many hon. members to indulge in that sort of thing; but it is not in the interests of the people whom they represent. Some little political party advantage may be secured, either in this constituency or in connection with that constituency, by reason of the adoption of such a picayune policy of thinking first of party interest and afterwards of the interests of the constituency which you serve. I think the time has come, if it is not already here, when the men of eastern Canada should stand in the interests of eastern Canada. The number of their representatives is lessening year by year, Parliament by Parliament, or at least every ten years. How long will it be before they come to the almost vanishing point I know not; but I say that the influence of the East is lessening; and where it is divided, where hon. members are content to think only of small, petty, party advantages, rather than the interests of the East; so long as that continues, the interests of the East will be neglected. I have moved this resolution in this House on many occasions, and with but one or two exceptions I have not had the assistance of those who do not see eye to eye with me politically. This resolution has been moved year after year, and I have never found, with the one or two exceptions to which I have referred, a Maritime province man standing in his place and asserting the interests of the Intercolonial railway, the interests of the people living along these branch lines and the promotion of trade in connection with the communities that are thus served. We are all very enthusiastic about building up a trade with the West Indies or with this or that country, or voting subsidies for a steamship line to promote trade with this or that country; but in the matter of taking over by the Intercolonial railway of the branch lines which would develop and promote traffic in the district served by these branch lines, no voice is raised, everything is hushed and still, and there is silence whenever this proposition is made, for fear perhaps that some little party interest will be injured, or that there will be some stepping upon the toes of this or that leader in the Government. I ask that this should cease, and that the men of eastern Canada should one and all unite, stand together with respect to this matter. How did the Hudson Bay railway ever find lodgment in the minds of the members of this Parliament? Simply because the men of western Canada, the men of the prairie provinces, stood together and said: You must give us the Hudson Bay railway, opposition being broken down ever since they sent their delegates, and ever since they asserted their demands for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. We have immense delegations to the Minister in connection with the Trent Valley waterway. We have equally large delegations asking for the construction of a new Welland canal. Not satisfied that we have one, which has been rebuilt once and which affords excellent facilities for the transportation from one lake to another, they want millions upon millions, and scores of millions, invested in the building of another Welland canal, putting out of business entirely the present one. How comes it that these things are even considered now, or even tolerated, by a Parliament of Canada? Simply because influences are exercised, and directed; influences concentrated, in the hands of the party in the province of Ontario supporting the Government has moved this thing forward with such momentum that it is now irresistible, and before long we shall have a new Welland canal. And yet the Maritime provinces are left to chew over the promises that were made with respect to the acquisition of the branch lines and the construction of the car ferry. And so will it be so long as the members supinely sit and take such treatment at the hands of those who are interested, perhaps, in doing that which they are compelled to do because of political exigencies. The time has come when there should be a right about face in this matter. I ask the Minister of Railways, I ask the members of the Government, I ask the Conservative members from the Maritime provinces, to stand up here and say: We will carry out the pledges made by our right hon. leader; we will have fulfilled the representations that were made to the people of Eastern Canada during the last general election, and we will have them fulfilled now. Now is the time when it is desirable that this should be done.

There is one thing which the former Government did which might well be accepted as a precedent by the present Administration, and that is the laying down of the policy with respect to the operation of what is known as the River Valley railway, to be controlled and operated by the Intercolonial railway. There is a contract in the Department of Railways and Canals whereby the Government of Canada is bound, when that railway is completed, according to certain terms and provisos, to take hold of it and operate it in connection with the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. CROCKET: That is one of the things which this Government has done along the line of the hon. gentleman's proposal.

Mr. EMMERSON: I am thankful for small mercies; and if the Government of Canada has done anything in that direction, I am willing to admit it. It is the principle I have sought to have adopted, and it was adopted by the previous Government.

Mr. CROCKET: Does the hon. gentleman call this a small mercy?

Mr. EMMERSON: It is small in comparison to other mercies that have been promised. It is simply a question of comparison. Many other great things have been promised. But I was going on to say that it was the previous Government that adopted that principle, that entered into that contract which this Government is obliged to carry out.

Mr. COCHRANE: The previous Government did not enter into that contract.

Mr. EMMERSON. I stand corrected with regard to that.

Mr. COCHRANE: Another thing you have to be thankful for.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am afraid I shall have very little occasion to be thankful for things accomplished by my hon. friend in that direction.

Mr. COCHRANE: I accomplished that; I entered into that contract.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend knows, and the people of New Brunswick know, that the contract was drawn up and the arrangements made between the former Government and the company, and the pledge given whereby the Government was to take that road and operate it upon certain conditions. The mere execution of the contract, the signing of the document, is one thing, but the arrangements entered into is another thing. I am stating the fact——

Mr. CARVELL: The contract was signed by the former Minister of Railways.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. CARVELL: It was. I have a copy of it. I can tell the hon. gentleman where the original was signed by the former Minister of Railways.

Mr. COCHRANE: It was not in the department.

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Speaker, I think I have the floor. The point that is raised is quite immaterial to the question which I was discussing. The point I make is that the former Government had admitted the principle of taking over this road. It was in consequence of the agitation of the branch line question in this Parliament during a period of years, and it resulted in such a policy being accepted by the former Government. I am glad that this Government is carrying it out also. I shall be very grateful if, at the end of the period, they are in a position to honestly fulfil the expectations of the people with regard to the operation of that railway.

Mr. RHODES: Will you support them if they do?

Mr. EMMERSON: In this, I certainly will support them.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not an answer.

Mr. EMMERSON: I cannot go over holus bolus like my hon. friend. If they go on doing right, I might go over by degrees; I will support them in anything good that they do; and, so far as they are doing anything in the acquiring of branch lines, I am willing to support them and give them credit for what they are doing. I am not small enough to refuse credit to opponents who bring forward a proposition in which I believe. I announced in this House last session, that, in the matter of the car ferry service, I would applaud and support the Government in any movement they might make in that direction. I will stand by my colours on that, and will give the Government credit, not merely in this House, but in the country, if they carry out their pledges in regard to it and meet the expectations of the people. And so with the principle of the branch lines adopted by the preceding Government in the matter of the River Valley railway. That has been adopted by this Government, and under the agreement this Government is pledged when the River Valley road is completed, to take it over and operate it as part of the Intercoloial railway. Why, then, should there be any hesitation about their agreeing to the policy outlined in this resolution? They are doing it in the matter of that particular railway, although that railway will not be considered a direct feeder of the Intercolonial; although that railway is isolated, in a way, from the Intercolonial, and outside its original sphere of influence. They are committed to the principle in the execution of the contract they have at this moment admitted their having entered into. I ask, then, why should there be any hesitancy in answering the question respecting branch lines, which has stood on the Order Paper almost since the beginning of this session? Why cannot my hon. friend, speaking on behalf of the Government, say to the House and the country: we have admitted the principle with respect to the River Valley railway and other lines; we are going to acquire the branch lines and thus at once carry out the policy of the acquisition of branch line railways in connection with the Intercolonial, and money will be provided in the Estimates for the purpose of executing our decision in this regard. But no! My hon. friend is constrained to say he has not reached a conclusion—the Government is still considering the matter. How long did it take them to consider their action with respect to the River Valley road? And, having made their decision in this regard, why should it not stand good with respect to any or all of the roads, and particularly with respect to the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway; with respect to the lines that run from Salisbury to Albert Corners, and from Moncton to Buctouche; with respect to the Kent Northern and Caraquet roads, which traverse a very prosperous and flourishing section of the province of New Brunswick, and the Matapedia road, running from Matapedia to Gaspé. There are many of these roads, including the Nova Scotia coal roads, in the constituency of the hon. member for Cumberland. Why should it not stand good with respect to those branch lines in Kings county, and running through into the county of St. John, and to St. Martins from Hampton in the county of Kings.

There is one road which this Government has allowed to pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific railway, and that was known as the Central railway. This line was owned by the province of New Brunswick, in the operation of which that province has invested a million and a quarter of money. That road has been handed over to the Canadian Pacific railway to be operated by them not on a basis of a division of the gross earnings, but on the basis of a participation in the proportion of the net earnings. Did anyone ever hear of a proposition of that kind in any country with respect to the leasing of a railway? It is one entirely new, and unique in the history of railway corporations. They handed that railway, serving a rich country, furnishing a splendid traffic, to the Canadian Pacific railway—for nothing. Without even an encumberance upon it they have passed it over to the Canadian Pacific railway for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, although it makes no difference whether it was ninety-nine or nine hundred and ninety-nine—it is the property of the Canadian Pacific railway, and its possession by that company places it in a position to insist upon running rights and privileges over the Intercolonial in order to connect their system in the centre of New Brunswick with their branch line terminating at Truro in Nova Scotia. It placed the Canadian Pacific railway in possession of a vantage point which they will not be slow to seize upon, and it has given them the control and monopoly of the railway system in the western portion of New Brunswick. They entirely control the county of Charlotte in the matter of railway facilities; they have control of all that district adjacent to the river St. John; they are acquiring now the Temiscouata—a road which the Government of Canada should long ago have acquired. By the acquisition of the Temiscouata road the Canadian Pacific railway will simply scoop in the whole of the center of New Brunswick, and, without any competition, monopolize all the traffic, charging what they please. The fact that the Temiscouata road was owned by a separate corporation made it possible for a shipper at St. John to send his merchandise over the Intercolonial to Riviere du Loup and over the Temiscouata line from Riviere du Loup to Edmunston at a lower rate than the same shipper could ship direct to Grand Falls on the Canadian Pacific railway, which is nearer St. John than is Edmunston—the latter place being on the direct line from St. John via the Canadian Pacific railway. But no! They will give you rates over their line to Edmunston cheaper than they will give it to Grand Falls, because the Intercolonial and the Temiscouata submit competitive rates, this having the effect of lowering the rate over the Canadian Pacific railway from St. John to Edmunston. And so shall it be with respect to the centre of the province, and in the county of Kings, in connection with the coal areas there. They will control the Minto line and it is claimed by many they will eventually control the River Valley, the contract to that which we have referred, to the contrary notwithstanding. They now control the Central railway, formerly owned by the province of New Brunswick, operating from Norton to Chipman and on to Minto. They will soon acquire, as we are led to understand from the Minister of Railways, running rights over the Intercolonial from St. John eastward. Having acquired these advantages, securing the Central railway for absolutely nothing, they will be in a position to have at their mercy the people of the central and western portions of New Brunswick, and if the time ever comes that this Government should hand the Intercolonial over to the Canadian Pacific railway, or to any other railway corporation, the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia will be in the grip of a huge railway monopoly. My remarks are based upon the movements transpiring all around us in connection with railway matters in eastern Canada. There is a profound sentiment among the people that the necessity that the Government should continue to operate the Intercolonial is one that should be recognized by the present Administration, and that it should also acquire the branch lines and operate them in conjunction with the Government railway system. The Canadian Pacific railway have recently taken over the Dominion Atlantic railway, a railway that should have been acquired by a former Government. The Dominion Atlantic railway runs from Windsor to Yarmouth in Nova Scotia and has running rights over the Intercolonial railway between Windsor and Halifax. The Canadian Pacific railway having acquired that road and, having acquired the road from Truro to Windsor, are in a position to control the whole traffic of western Nova Scotia, they have the people at their mercy. It is all very well to say there can be no evasions but there are evasions, notwithstanding the efforts of Government to regulate the traffic.

Mr. HAZEN: Why did not the Government supported buy the Dominion Atlantic?

Mr. EMMERSON: I say that the Government which I supported did not buy it and I condemned them for it and I unhesitatingly say they ought to be condemned for it. I am not indulging in any little local politics as my hon. friend did the other night when speaking on a great national question. I am speaking of a principal involved in this resolution, a principle not in the interest of governments or of corporations but in the interest of the people and I think my hon. friend in asking me a question of that kind is not paying the respect which is my due when I am presenting before this Parliament arguments in favour of this proposition. Have I not admitted already that the former Government should have gone on? The question is not as to which Government does these things, the wrong is that it is not done and the wrong is on the part of the Governments of Canada in permitting this thing to go on, in permitting the aspirations of the people to be stifled, their interest crushed and in giving a monopoly the control of the whole western section of a great, rich and flourishing province like Nova Scotia. I have illustrated New Brunswick. This is an illustration of the condition of things as they exist to-day in Nova Scotia. How much wider this thing is going to go and how much more is there to be overflowing of the banks which should protect the people from inundation I know not but I am asking the consideration of this Parliament in behalf of a resolution which will, I believe, in some measure be a resistance against the incoming tide of great corporation control in the matter of railways at least.

I feel that I should make an apology to the House for taking up so much time in view of the fact that I have so frequently on former occasions addressed myself to this subject; but my excuse is that I believe it to be in the interests of the people, in the interest of the Intercolonial railway, in the interest of the solution of at least one feature of the great transportation problem of Canada.

Mr. CLARENCE JAMESON (Digby): Mr. Speaker, for one who stated during the course of his remarks that he did not propose to discuss this question from a political or partisan standpoint, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has delivered a most extraordinary argument. He began in a mild and reasonable manner but he had not proceeded very far in his address before he arraigned the Prime Minister of this country for as he said misleading the people of the Maritime provinces. He was forced however before he concluded his remarks, by some question asked him by some hon. member on this side of the House, to arraign the administration of which for fifteen years he had been a supporter. He arraigned them because, as he said, they had not done the proper thing in connection with the acquisition of branch lines as feeders of the Intercolonial railway.

The hon. gentleman was himself in this House a supporter of that administration for a number of years, and for several years, at least, he had the honour of holding the portfolio of railways as a member of that Government. During that time I am free to admit that the hon. gentleman frequently raised his voice in this House, as he has done since, in favour of the acquisition of branch lines by the Intercolonial railway, but he must be compelled by the record to admit that he did not accomplish very much in that particular regard.

Now after the lapse of but fifteen or sixteen months since this Administration came into office, he rises in his place and because they have not done in fifteen or sixteen months what the preceding Government did not do in fifteen years forsooth he arraigns the Prime Minister of Canada for misleading and deceiving the people of the Maritime provinces in connection with the acquisition of branch lines.

There is this distinction between the hon. gentleman, who was formerly Minister of Railways and the present minister of that department, that whereas the hon. gentleman frequently released his energy in speech, the present minister acts. He is not a man who takes up much time in this House in speaking, but in the administration of his department there has in my opinion never been his equal.

My hon. friend said that legislation should have been foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne in connection with this branch lines question. Why was it necessary that such legislation should be foreshadowed? I do not suppose my hon. friend inquired of himself as to why in his judgment this was the case, or he would scarcely have adventured so unfortunate a statement. If legislation be required this is the reason simply because the legislation which was placed upon the Statute Book in 1910 by the previous administration in connection with the acquisition of branch line railways was, I think I may say advisedly, prepared to make it impossible to acquire them, and it was done very skilfully I am compelled to admit. The method which was taken to prevent the acquisition of branch lines by the previous Administration was that by that legislation the Government of the day demanded so high a physical standard of the railway to be acquired that none of the branch line railway companies could raise the money necessary to put their systems into a condition which would bring them up to that standard. That was the condition of affairs under the preceding Administration.

My hon. friend said, in connection with the St. John Valley railway, I think that this Government has created a precedent by agreeing to take it over. And he says, because we have done that, we should immediately bring down a policy to take over other roads. But there is this distinction between the case of the St. John Valley railway and that of other branch line railways: that railway is at present under construction and of course will be up to a certain physical standard when completed; while the other railways have been constructed and operated for years, and are run down. Consequently there is no similarity whatever between the two cases.

Now, Sir, I have every sympathy with the resolution which is before the House. I think it is a question which deserves the most serious consideration, and that, I am sure, it will receive from the Government. But I do not think it is fair for my hon. friend to wax so indignant or so eloquent over the remissness, as he chooses to style it, of this Administration, because they have not done in fifteen months what the Government of which he is a supporter, failed to do during fifteen years.

My hon. friend says that the Maritime provinces have been unfairly treated by this Government—I think these are the exact words he used. In my judgment, the Maritime provinces have been very fairly dealt with by this Government. I believe that my hon. friend himself will be forced to admit that when I draw his attention to the work that is going on at Courtenay bay in the province of New Brunswick, to the St. John River Valley railway, to which he himself alluded, also in the province of New Brunswick; and to the projected car ferry between the mainland and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HAZEN: Which is under contract.

Mr. JAMESON: The contract for the construction of that car ferry is now, I understand, signed.

Mr. EMMERSON: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the car ferry is now under contract? If that is so I might congratulate the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: It is so.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend seems to be very much surprised.

Mr. EMMERSON: I think the Minister of Railways might have told us so.

Mr. JAMESON: In the province of Nova Scotia we have a very different condition of affairs from that which hitherto prevailed. I remember a former president of the Halifax Board of Trade, a very ardent Liberal, saying once that the province of Nova Scotia was 'connected with the rest of the Dominion by two streaks of rust,' referring to the single line of the Intercolonial. He also spoke very strongly as to the necessity for improved terminals and dock facilities at Halifax. Now, as this House is aware, the present Government have taken measures to give the port of Halifax facilities by which it will become one of the great Atlantic ports of this Dominion, and all that to which I have alluded, pressed forward within the fifteen months that the Government have been in office. Therefore, I do not think my hon. friend can say that this Government has treated the Maritime provinces unfairly.

But might I ask my hon. friend to look back to the time of the construction of the Transcontinental railway? The Transcontinental railway, as you remember, Mr. Speaker, was an issue in the federal election of 1904. After that election we found that from the province of Nova Scotia there had been returned to this House a solid delegation of eighteen Liberals, and yet the only province of the dominion which will not be served by that railway, in which not one mile of rails has been laid, is the province of Nova Scotia, barring, of course, the province of Prince Edward Island which, owing to physical conditions, could not possibly be traversed by that road.

My hon. friend laments a rumour that the Intercolonial is to become a company road, and he predicts dire misfortunes if such should be the case. Well, I saw some reference to that in the St. John Telegraph of December 22, last, but from whom did it come?

Mr. HAZEN: The St. John Telegraph advocated it a few years ago.

Mr. JAMESON: This is the reference in the St. John Telegraph, in a despatch from Montreal dated December 21:

> Five lower province men in Montreal to-day declared themselves in favour of company ownership of the Intercolonial railway. They are W. A. Black and Lt.-Col. Whitman, of Halifax; Mathew Lodge, of Moncton; E. McDonald, M.P., for Pictou, and H. J. Logan, ex-M.P., for Cumberland.

I do not say that my hon. friend the member for Pictou who is not in his seat at the present time, is in favour of the acquisition of the Intercolonial by any of the transcontinental railways in this country; I merely state that it was so reported in that despatch. The Telegraph, which, a few years ago, was in favour of the Intercolonial railway being handed over to one of the great railways of Canada in an editorial of December 24, said—

Mr. EMMERSON: That was when it was controlled by Conservatives.

Mr. HAZEN: Not at all. The hon. gentleman is wrong there, it was when it was under Liberal control.

Mr. JAMESON: The Telegraph in its issue of December 24, made this reference at the conclusion of its editorial:

> The Intercolonial is a tremendously important public asset. A policy of 'hands off and a business-like management free from politics' will suit the people. The party that tries to alienate the road will be likely to encounter the public in a head-on collision.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Pictou expressed himself in favour of the sale of that road, or of its acquisition by a company, but if so, that is an awful prediction which the Telegraph makes.

My hon. friend referred to the fact that the Maritime provinces were losing representation in this House and unfortunately this is a fact. In 1891 Nova Scotia sent to this House twenty members, and after the census of 1901, when our Liberal friends opposite had been in office for six years, the redistribution left us with but eighteen members. After ten years further tenure of office by hon. gentlemen opposite, the population of that province was such at the last census, in comparison with the rest of the Dominion, that we will lose two more representatives, and Nova Scotia in this House will for a time in future only be represented by sixteen members.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JAMESON: Mr. Speaker, when you left the chair at six o'clock, I was about to conclude my remarks by saying that I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) in his statement that the Maritime provinces have been unfairly treated by this Government, in the face of the facts. The Maritime provinces, however, were unfairly treated by the previous Administration, and more especially the province of Nova Scotia by the failure of that Government to bring the Transcontinental railway down to the port of Halifax.

In the province of Nova Scotia to-day, yes, I think I may say in the three Maritime provinces, there is a feeling of optimism and hope in the future, which has not been known there for years. Although in the past these provinces have lost from their representation in this House, that representation will, I believe, be restored in the not far distant future, and that by means of their development, by the increased population as the result of the active interest which this Administration is taking in agriculture, in fisheries, in immigration, and in transportation. I believe that under the Borden Administration the development, and the increased population of the Maritime provinces will be such, that the representation which those provinces formerly had in this House, will be restored to them, as a result of the good honest and progressive Administration to which I have already alluded.

Mr. TURGEON (Gloucester): It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House very long on this question. My sentiments have been expressed on many occasions in previous parliaments on this question of the extension of the Intercolonial railway and the acquisition of these branch lines. I wish to accentuate every word that my hon. friend the member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has said on behalf of his motion before the Government to-day. It has been stated that the previous Administration had not completed its work in that matter before the last dissolution in 1911. May I be permitted again to repeat that for many years when such a proposition was attempted on the part of some of the members from the Maritime provinces, or upon the part of some of the newspapers of the Maritime provinces, it was found every time that public opinion in the western provinces had not been sufficiently cultivated to warrant the Government undertaking such a project without responsive echoes from the West as well as from the East. It was the intention of the previous Administration not to have the people of Canada consider the Intercolonial as merely the property of the Eastern or Maritime provinces, but to create and confirm the opinion in the mind of every Canadian citizen that the Intercolonial railway is a national asset, and that the country at large should take the same interest in it, whether they come from the extreme east or the extreme west. To the credit of my hon. friend the member for Westmorland, I may say that he has no doubt been the one, foremost of all in the Maritime provinces, to exert his activities in that direction in order to create a more favourable opinion on behalf of the Intercolonial railway in the Maritime provinces. To him perhaps is due more credit than to anybody else irrespective of party politics, and I for one wish to say that I take a legitimate pride in considering that for the last fifteen years I have given him all assistance in my power, whether in this House, by public utterances in the small region or scope of my influence, or through the public press, when until very recent years I had under my direction a French newspaper in New Brunswick. It is nothing new, but I must say it is to the credit of my hon. friend the member for Westmorland, who has been told by the hon. member, who just taken his seat, that nothing has been done in that direction. I might recall to the mind of my hon. friend the member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) that one of the first acts of my hon. friend the member for Westmorland, when he assumed the office of Minister of Railways in 1903-4, was to take over the main branch line at the time from Loggieville to Fredericton, a line which up to that time had not proved to be of commercial or financial benefit; but which has ever since proved to be not only a benefit to the Intercolonial, but also of extreme benefit to the whole population along that line. Now, with all that work and the work of the hon. member for Westmorland, a stronger and better opinion prevails in the west. For the last two or three years previous to the last election the former Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) and the then Administration took every possible step in order to secure an understanding with the different companies owning the different branches, especially in Nova Scotia. As the hon. member for Digby has charged the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) with having imposed upon the owners of the branch lines conditions and standards which in his opinion made it impracticable for them to accept the standards required, I might say that this showed no favouritism on the part of the Government to the owners of those lines. If the conditions were made too hard for them, it was better than to have made them too easy.

If that was all the trouble, I believe it would have been very easy for my friends who came into power after the 21st of September, 1911, to at once come to terms with the owners of those branches. It has been my fate in the exercise of my duty to again, since the last election, call the attention of this House and of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) last year to this matter, and he gave me his reply that he had not had sufficient time yet to consider the question; but if I understand the meaning of his words, that he would do so after the session, during the vacation. In the first days of the opening of this session I again called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals; and in the course of my remarks mentioned the disquietude which prevailed in the minds of many of our people along the Intercolonial, more particularly in the Maritime Provinces, as to the possible agreement existing between the Government and the owners of other corporations wishing to acquire the railroad, or rights perhaps more extensive than should be granted to them. I do not say that those rumours were well founded or well grounded. It has, however, been proved to-day by my hon. friend the member for Westmorland as well as by my hon. friend the member for Digby that such a feeling exists at the present time, not only among the people of the Maritime Provinces, but in Montreal and the western provinces as well; and without making any charge whatever against the Minister of Railways and Canals, or any member of the Government, I take the liberty to warn every member of the Government and every member on both sides of the House that public opinion in the Maritime Provinces, and to-day I may say public opinion in the country at large, will never tolerate that this great asset of the Canadian people should pass from the hands of the people into the hands of any corporation, whatever it may be. I will only say that I am personally interested in the acquisition of some of those branches on behalf of the people whom I represent, and the part of the country from which I come. Since the acquisition of the Canadian Eastern railway by the previous Administration, we have in the county of Gloucester to-day perhaps one of the most important of those branches, possessing over eighty-four miles of railway, traversing I may say the whole county of Gloucester from Bathurst to Caraquet, and from Caraquet to Tracadie and Shippigan, called the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway. On this railroad, the same arrangements have been made and the people have been anxiously awaiting the result of the conferences. I might repeat also that in my county as well as in other counties in New Brunswick during the election of 1911, the Conservative candidate declared that whichever party came into power, that part of the railroad would be acquired by the Government, because the leading member of the Conservative party had so promised. I have upheld this policy for the last fifteen years, and have pressed it just as earnestly upon my hon. friend the present Minister of Railways as I pressed it upon his predecessor in office in the late Administration. I hope we shall soon receive from the Government some satisfactory assurance that that measure will be undertaken. The railway in the counties of Gloucester, as my hon. friend must have observed, is one of the most populous and wealthy portions of New Brunswick. It has a population of from 21,000 to 22,000, from Bathurst to Tracadie. Great development has gone on there especially within the last two years. This district possesses the greatest fishing interests known in the province of New Brunswick. It has also great lumber interests which require constantly more and more transportation facilities, for every market of the world has to be competed for. It possesses free stone quarries at Clifton and Stonehaven, which have reached great development, the products of which have been forwarded chiefly to the United States so far, because the freight rates, especially on the branch lines, are so high that competition in the western provinces market is prevented. It has been fully demonstrated by the hon. member for Westmorland that the Government can operate these branch lines with what may be practically considered old stock, not adapted to the trade of the day on the main line, and can operate them without great extra cost; and carrying more than merely local traffic, the Government can operate them at lower rates than the present operators are compelled to charge. I believe the hon. member for Westmorland has made it clear that he wishes all these branches to be taken over. For we all know very well that the commercial conditions of the day in a given district may not be what they are pretty sure to be a few years hence. Many of these branches which now yield no dividend to their owners will yield such dividends within a short time, owing to the great changes which are taking place in all departments of trade. I hope the Government will at once dispel the fear that prevails in certain quarters of the possibility of the transfer of this great asset of the Dominion of Canada, the Intercolonial railway, to the hands of a private corporation. And I would urge the Minister of Railways also to give this question of the branch lines his immediate consideration. The sooner he can inform the public at large, and especially the people of the Maritime provinces, of his intention to continue the policy of the last three years, the more popular will his action be.

Hon. C. MARCIL (Bonaventure): It affords me very much pleasure to congratulate the hon. member for Westmorland, the former Minister of Railways and Canals, upon having once more brought this question to the attention of the House. If my memory serves me well, I have heard this question fully debated in this House on three different occasions. I am glad to know from the Minister of Railways and Canals that the question is still engaging the earnest attention of the Government of the day. This Government is the representative of one of the great political parties of this country, and that party has, in the past few years, expressed the intention of making the Intercolonial railway system what the fathers of Confederation intended that it should be, one of the permanent bonds of Confederation.

Though I do not wish to enter upon a discussion of the different phases of this question so ably treated by my hon. friend from Westmorland, I think I should be recreant to my duty did I allow this opportunity to pass without calling your attention and that of the Government to the condition in which, at the present time, the constituency I have the honour to represent in this House for the past twelve years finds itself with regard to the railway in question. In explaining that situation, I trust you will allow me to quote, very briefly, from Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Hector Langevin the reasons which brought about the construction of what was then known as the Baie des Chaleurs railway, now known as the Quebec Oriental railway, and which has been extended from Paspebiac, or rather from New Carlisle to Gaspé, under the name of the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway. These reasons were set forth in 1883 by Sir Charles Tupper, and they are just as strong, even stronger, today. My constituency forms part of the peninsula of Gaspesia, one of the most interesting portions of the Dominion. It has a marine coast on the Baie des Chaleurs of about two hundred miles and a marine coast of about two hundred and fifty miles on the St. Lawrence. It is the end, so to speak, of the mainland of Quebec, and is half way between the St. Lawrence and the Maritime provinces. But for the interests conflicting with it in the Maritime provinces and the other older provinces of Canada, it would have been, long since, the stopping off place for the traffic from Europe and the place of embarkation for those going to Europe. Political reasons, at the time of Confederation, made it imperative that, while the traffic of the upper provinces went on through the St. Lawrence in the summer time, the winter traffic was diverted to St. John and Halifax. That, I am sorry for the peninsula of Gaspé to say, is still the state of affairs. The House will realize the very strong reasons given by Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Hector Langevin for the construction of this road. This is what Sir Charles Tupper, then Minister of Railways, said:

> The district that is proposed to be opened up by this Baie des Chaleurs railway is one that is well known to those who have paid any attention to the subject, to be very remote from the Intercolonial railway, and the communication with it to be exceedingly difficult; and we believe the opening up of that section of country will not only facilitate the business of a very large area, but by giving facilities of communication with the Intercolonial railway will also bring a large volume of traffic to that road, which otherwise would not reach it. The line is supposed to start from a point on the Intercolonial railway, at or near Matapedia station, and run thence in an easterly direction along the north shore of the Restigouche river, and Baie des Chaleurs to Paspebiac, a distance of 100 miles. It is contemplated to extend the line, not only to Paspebiac, but a distance of some eighty miles further on, to Gaspé basin. The resources of that district are very considerable. It is a very finely timbered country, and the product of the fisheries is very large. The hon. member for Gaspé (Dr. Fortin), who has given much attention to the resources of that section of the country, has prepared from trade returns of the province of Quebec, for 1881, a series of tables which show a very large product from the fisheries in that district.

Those resources have increased twenty-fold since that time. Speaking of the fisheries more particularly, Sir Charles Tupper says:

A large portion of the catch is despatched by sailing craft to the United States and foreign ports, whereas when the railway is constructed it is believed that the major part of the catch wil find its way to Quebec, Montreal and the western parts of Canada and the Northwest by rail, and not only so, but supplies from the western portions of the country will come down as return freight. The section of country of which I am speaking has not only valuable forrests but an agricultural district, which is very inviting to settlers, and it is believed that the construction of this railway will greatly conduce to the development of its resources.

The construction of the road is estimated to cost $2,590,000, and with an equipment of $100,000. The province of Quebec has, I believe, given a subsidy to this line of railway of 10,000 acres of land per mile along the route so far as available in that part of the country.

Then, after the subsidy had been voted, the company which undertook the construction of the road, realizing the following year that the undertaking was beyond its financial resources, applied for further assistance, and the Government set down the precedent that I am now speaking of. I am trying to keep my remarks as far as possible from the political arena and free from controversy, and dealing merely with the interests of the district concerned. In 1884, Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Hector Langevin laid before the House a proposition to build a branch of the Intercolonial railway from Matapedia eastwards. The intention at that time was to commence building the Baie des Chaleurs railway as a branch line feeder of the Intercolonial, and this is what we find in 'Hansard' of April 10, 1884, page 1510:

RAILWAY RESOLUTION.

For a branch of the Intercolonial railway from Matapedia eastward towards Paspebiac, in the province of Quebec, a sum not exceeding in the whole, $300,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER: We came to the conclusion that a feeder of the Intercolonial should be there, and we were prepared to ask the House for an amount for its construction. We have, therefore, decided to build a branch of twenty miles rather than ask for a larger sum.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: The first twenty miles is the heaviest portion of the road line, and by building it as a branch of the Intercolonial, a fair chance will be given to the company to construct the balance of the line afterwards. The company have a subsidy of $3,200 per mile from this Government and 10,000 acres of land from the local government, and the right-of-way, which has not been bought, but has been given by the municipalities; and as the Dominion Government would build the heaviest portion of the line, the company would afterwards be able to get along.

I am sorry to say that unfortunately these hopes were not realized. The following year the company came again before Parliament and secured a subsidy, together with their usual grant. The construction of the line was undertaken, and in 1900, when I had the honour of being elected as representative of the constituency, the road had reached New Carlisle. The financial enterprise was too heavy for the company; its resources were not sufficient, and the road was turned over to trustees of the bondholders, who have since been continuing it, under the direction of Mr. Galindez a business man of some importance in the city of London, represented at New Carlisle by Mr. C. R. Scholes, a railway man of importance in the Maritime provinces, who has been operating this road for the last eleven years. I must give Mr. Scholes credit for the fact that under very great difficulties he has managed to keep the road running, and has succeeded in having a train running almost daily to New Carlisle—every ton of freight of course going to or over the Intercolonial railway. It has, therefore, become, in a sense if not in fact, a feeder of the Intercolonial railway, but has been carried on under very adverse circumstances. In 1903 or 1904 the hon. ex-Postmaster General, who then represented the constituency of Gaspé, was very anxious to give the constituency of Gaspé the railway communication to which it was entitled. After many efforts on his part he induced an English syndicate to undertake the construction of a railway from Paspebiac to Gaspé Basin, a distance of 102 miles. This road has now been completed, and trains run regularly from Matapedia to Gaspé Basin, a distance of 202 miles. I would like to mention the fact that the Government inspector of railways has declared that the road which has been built from Paspebiac to Gaspé Basin is of standard quality, and to his mind, is a specimen for railroad building in Canada. It was built by English engineers, and it was an exceedingly difficult road to build. From Paspebiac to Gaspé Basin no less than twenty-six iron bridges had to be constructed, the conformation of the country being such that this road ran along the shore of Chaleur bay and across the mouths of rivers at every point. A special subsidy of $250,000 was given to assist in the building of these iron bridges and, apart from that, the regular subsidy amounting to about $709,000. At the present time, therefore, we have a magnificent road, constructed with British capital and Government subsidies from Paspebiac to Gaspé Basin. The promoter of the road was an Englishman named Carpenter, who was familiar with the conditions in Gaspé Basin, and who had been promoter of the oil wells there. He had managed to induce a banking institution that he had started himself in London, called the Charing Cross Bank, to invest very heavily in this undertaking, and I understand that with the subsidy, and the money so obtained, the road was built to the satisfaction of the Government and of the people, who have been paid to the last dollar all that was coming to them. But the difficulty in which those interested in the Charing Cross Bank—who unfortunately are poor people who invested their money with promises of large returns of interest which were never forthcoming—the difficulty in which they found themselves was that this road found itself handicapped from connection with the Intercolonial railway except through the old Baie des Chaleurs railway. It would be impossible to run a modern train from Matapedia to Paspebiac; the engines now running on the line are those of the old Grand Trunk style of twenty-five years ago. With the exception of three or four old locomotives, and a few passenger cars, the rolling stock is almost entirely owned by other roads. In the summer months these roads have to compete with the boat running from Campbellton in the province of New Brunswick to Gaspé Basin. An appeal has lately been made to the Government to discontinue the payment of subsidies to this boat. I have the return brought before the House on this matter, and there is an interesting letter from Mr. Read, London, England, who is at present representative of the people who have put their money—over two millions and a half—into the construction of this road from Paspebiac to Gaspé Basin. He advocates doing away with the subsidy to the steamer that is now running in operation to these railways. Mr. Read, who is managing director of the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway Company, writes to the Minister of Railways and Canals as follows:

Sir,—I have the honour to draw your attention to the following circumstances in connection with this company's railway, and to submit for your consideration whether you cannot assist in developing the Baie des Chaleurs coast and the harbour of Gaspé.

There is a steamer subsidized by the Dominion Government running between Campbellton and Gaspé. I understand that the Intercolonial railway gives all through traffic intended for the coast to this steamer at Campbellton. It is submitted that the steamer subsidy should be withdrawn and all through traffic for places along the Baie des Chaleurs and Gaspé be handed over by the Intercolonial railway to the railways at Matapedia. This steamer does not, of course, run in the winter, but the railways have to, and it seems hardly fair that the Government railway should hand over the cream of the traffic to the steamer in the summer, when the railways have to bear the cost of serving the public in the winter.

Without the railways the important territories they serve cannot be developed, and unless the traffic is encouraged with a subsequent improvement in earnings, the railways cannot give such travelling facilities to the public as are necessary for the rapid development of the district served; a district where industries such as timber, fishing, agricultural and mining only wait encouragement to become of great importance. Further, the Baie des Chaleurs coast should, before long, become one of the most popular play-grounds of Canada and America.

The importance of Gaspé harbour alone should, it is submitted, justify the Government in helping to develop the railway.

This harbour is the best on the eastern Canadian sea-board. Situated within seven miles of the track followed by all the shipping up the St. Lawrence river, it is an ideal place for a dry-dock and wrecking plant. The harbour could be developed at a minimum of cost, no dredging being required. It is open for at least ten weeks longer than the St. Lawrence river and could at little cost be kept open all winter.

The route via Gaspé is the best for the interchange of traffic between the Dominion and Newfoundland, being nearly 400 miles nearer by rail to Montreal than Sydney, Cape Breton, and it is suggested that a subsidized line of steamers should be started between Gaspé and Newfoundland. The opening up of this route will also be an important factor in the development of Anticosti, the north shore of the gulf and Labrador.

As compared with Halifax the ocean route for Liverpool is rather shorter, and the rail haul to Montreal 180 miles shorter.

Mails could be landed at Gaspé effecting considerable saving in time, more especially for deliveries in New Brunswick and the south.

The strategic importance of this harbour in time of war as a harbour of refuge would be incalculable, protected as it would be by the straits of Belle Isle and the Cabot strait; and it is quite conceivable it might be the only Canadian harbour which could be used with safety by merchant vessels in war time.

In the interests, therefore, of the Dominion and of the considerable population in the districts served, it is submitted that the traffic on this important and costly railway undertaking should be encouraged and developed as rapidly as possible.

An acknowledgment was sent saying that the matter would be considered.

I have no intention of dealing with the steamer aspect of the question. That would come up more properly on the subsidies to steamers but I have brought up this phase of the question to show to the House the importance of Gaspe Basin which has been already signalized on several occasions by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). It is a splendid harbour where the Dominion Government is at present engaged in constructing a $300,000 wharf. As far back as 1535 it was visited by Jacques Cartier before he ascended the St. Lawrence, and the Prince of Wales, afterwards King Edward VII of revered memory, sought shelter with the British fleet before ascending the St. Lawrence on his way to Canada. Yet this splendid harbour remains to-day dormant. The time has come when the Dominion Government should take up this matter and bring this magnificant part of the province of Quebec, rich in resources of all kinds, into direct and speedy communication with the rest of the Dominion. This cannot be done until the railway between Matapedia and Paspebiac is put into a more modern condition. It was built in 1885, it has been kept running and operated regularly but no substantial improvements have been made and the time has surely come when the Dominion Government should take up this matter and deal with it thoroughly. Canada has already expended enormous sums to give this particular connection to this peninsula. The subsidy paid to the Baie des Chaleurs railway exceeded $828,435 and the subsidy paid to the Atlantic, Quebec and Western amounted to $709,000. With the subsidies paid by the province of Quebec we have over $2,500,000 in round figures which have been paid for these roads and still the people have not the connections they should have. Their whole business is done with the province of New Brunswick on the other side of the bay during the navigation season and with St. John in the winter. Their winter communications with Quebec and Montreal are very difficult. When several snow-storms come in February or March, communications are exceedingly difficult—the rates on all freight traffic are very high. Local rates apply from Matapedia to Paspebiac and another local rate from Paspebiac to Gaspé Basin, so that a man ordering from Quebec has to deal with three railroads, the Intercolonial, the Quebec & Oriental, and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway. If a plebiscite were taken in the Gaspé peninsula to-day I am sure there would not be a dissenting voice raised against the proposal that the Government should take over this road and make it a feeder to the Intercolonial railway. The importance of the Intercolonial railway would be increased immensely in consequence, it would have a new sea-port in Gaspé Basin, a magnificent coast line opened up on the Baie des Chaleurs and sea communication on the St. Lawrence side of the Gaspé peninsula. It would bring within a few hours Anticosti and Newfoundland, in fact it would open up the whole of eastern Canada.

During the last 12 years I have voted for millions and millions of dollars of subsidies to build railways in all parts of Canada, especially in the West. I realize that in opening up western Canada we were favouring Canada as a whole. I do not begrudge anything that has been given to western Canada, but as has been truly said by the late Minister of Railways the interests of the older portions of this country should not be overlooked. I had occasion a few days ago to visit a portion of the Northwest for the first time in 15 years, and I came in contact with people in agricultural pursuits in that country who complain strongly if railway communication is not given them the second or third year after their arrival. Until a few years ago we had old men in Gaspé who had never seen a railway train, never seen a locomotive, and whose fathers and forefathers before them worked to build up this country. Men in western Canada ask for railway connections the day after their arrival, but in the old days of the eastern portion of Quebec and New Brunswick men gave up a lifetime to hew down one farm that they could hand down to their children. The claims of these men should not be overlooked, the claims of their descendants should not be overlooked. We have made the experiment of encouraging railways on the Gaspé peninsula, and of building railways by subsidies. Under both of these headings we have met with dismal failure. The railway statistics show that the surplus from the operation of the first hundred miles of the Baie des Chaleurs last year amounted to about $5,000 and that there was a net loss of $19,000 and that on the operation of the other 100 miles from Paspebiac to Gaspé. The reason of that is that these companies are operated by the trustees of bond-holders who are merely keeping the road running to save their charter, who are not investing a dollar more than is necessary, just keeping the thing going but not developing the country; but still we have in that Gaspé peninsula 10,000 square miles, the size of an ordinary kingdom in Europe, with a population of upwards of 60,000, and we could easily accommodate three or four times that number of people. We have enough pulp to keep the pulp mills of Canada running for many years to come. We have on the Baie des Chaleurs the most magnificent fisheries it is possible to conceive. But is it credible that on that whole line of railway, 200 miles, along one of the richest fishing coasts of the world, there is not a railway car in which you can send a pound of fish? No fish can be sent unless it is sent by boat to Campbellton, at great risk and expense. Apart from the fisheries, and from the lumber, which is being developed more than it has been in the past, we have untold minerals. The interior of Gaspé is really terra incognita, where those who have been through it say there are magnificent valleys rich in fertile soil, and minerals and coal oil deposits awaiting development. We have a magnificent harbour at Gaspé and others at Port Daniel and Paspebiac, which is one of the most magnificent natural harbours to be found in any country in the world. These har-bours are deserted to-day, and the resources of the country are lying dormant in the soil. We, the representatives of the eastern part of Quebec, vote cheerfully millions of money to bring new settlers into this country. We realize that every settler that comes into Canada is an asset of the Dominion. We realize that once he has entered this country and experienced the benefits of living under British rule and under the British flag, that man becomes a good citizen of Canada. We vote that money cheerfully, but we ask the men who have been entrusted with power to-day, who have been chosen by the majority of the Canadian people to administer public affairs, to take up this question seriously and to see if we have not in that part of the country a magnificent asset which should be worked and developed. And the only way in which it can be worked and developed is to introduce the modern instrument of progress, the locomotive. If the Gaspé peninsula were connected with the Intercolonial railway, the change in that peninsula in 10 years would be inconceivable. Those hon. members of the House who have visited it, and I am sorry that a greater number have not done so, must have realized the magnificent opportunities we have there for settlement and for all kinds and branches of trade and industry. But, the people have no communication. What is the use of raising farm produce if you cannot reach the market? What is the use of fishing if you cannot send your fish to market? I have seen those splendid fish taken out of the water and literally soaked in salt. The value of those fish in the Montreal market would be 20 cents per pound, but it is transformed into dry codfish and the value is reduced to four or five cents per pound for lack of communication. Timber is there and some of the large timber limits are being developed. Some Americans have come in there. Mr. Cutler from Boston has made important investments on some rivers, and important concerns in Montreal have opened mills in Gaspé. Some members of this House have mills at Barachois, and Senator Edwards is operating limits. But they have only touched the fringe of that constituency, and realized only the possibilities of that whole region.

The time has surely come when the Minister of Railways should take this matter up not in a political spirit, but in a truly patriotic sense, and my appeal is addressed to both political parties. I say to him that if he could now, once and for all, solve the railway difficulty in that part of the country, he would be entitled to, and would receive, the everlasting gratitude of the people of the Gaspé peninsula.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend has referred to Mr. Read and to the steamship subsidy. The hon. member takes a deep interest in that part of the country which he represents. Would he kindly favour the House with his own views as to the feasibility of continuing that subsidy?

Mr. MARCIL: My intention was to deal with that more especially when the question of steamship subsidies came up. I am revealing no secret to my hon. friend in saying that it was promised at the time this railway was built that the subsidy to the steamer would be discontinued. It was one of the arguments for giving a subsidy when the railway was built, that it would be discontinued. These were the words used by Sir Charles Tupper in that connection:

> This district is very imperfectly served at present by steam communication, which is provided, of course, only during the season when navigation is open, and when navigation is not open the district is not served at all. When navigation is open communication is maintained by a steamer, which we are obliged to subsidize to the extent of $12,500 a year. It will be at once seen therefore, that not only will the service be performed much better, and throughout the entire year provided the company are able to raise a large additional amount of capital required. But the subsidy of $320,000 will render unnecessary the old subsidy of $12,500 a year, which at 4 per cent represents a capital of over $300,000. It will not be necessary to grant the subsidy of $12,500 a year which we are now obliged to give when the road is extended to Gaspe; and so soon as the railway reaches Paspebiac, even supposing steam communication could be maintained between that port and Gaspe, it will be only for a distance of 80 miles and will be performed at a small cost.

My opinion of the matter as a business proposition is this: I do not see how the Government of Canada can afford to pay a subsidy to a steamer to run in opposition to those railways, provided they are put on a proper footing. If they become part of the Intercolonial, or feeders or branches of the Intercolonial system, as the Fathers of Confederation intended they should be, I would say at once that under such conditions the subsidy to that steamer should be discontinued. But the Postmaster General will admit, if he has visited the country lately, that at the present time the railways are not in a position to give the people of Bonaventure and Gaspe that service to which they are entitled. If the railway service was equivalent to that which the people on the south shore of Baie des Chaleurs receive from the Intercolonial Railway, I would say at once discontinue the subsidy. But that should be an inducement to the Minister of Railways to take over these roads and, thereafter, to discontinue the subsidy. When I go to spend my holidays during the summer I always look with envy upon our friends in Restigouche and Gloucester counties on the other side of the bay, because they are served by such a splendid railway system, compared with what we have on the north shore of Baie des Chaleurs, which through a combination of unfortunate political circumstances, as those familiar with the Baie des Chaleurs are aware, was for 20 years practically the storm centre of Quebec politics. Many of those who took part on one side or the other have gone to the great beyond but the people are still there, and they are still entitled to obtain those railway facilities which they were promised. There are the descendants of poor settlers who saw Ontario grow from a howling wilderness into a great and prosperous province, who saw the West develop, who have given their sons and daughters to this Dominion. But the old land in that part of the country has practically remained dormant. Surely the time has come when this progressive country and this progressive Government—for I want to be fair and to state that I have reason to believe that the Government of Canada at the present time is a progressive government, as all governments should be—will take this matter up and consider the interests of the people. Surely the time has come to open up this country and to give the people proper railway communication. Proper railway communication for those people will increase the opportunities of the Intercolonial which will then become, what it was intended to be the main line of communication for eastern Canada.

I would not like to resume my seat without saying a few words as to the position taken by other railways in connection with the matter of branch lines. Today I was glancing over the very interesting railway statistics which have been laid on the table, and I find that the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway which has become now one of the greatest railways of the century, and the pride of Canada, is only 2,903 miles but that the whole Canadian Pacific railway system comprises 10,712 miles. It appears therefore, that 7,809 miles of the Canadian Pacific railway system is composed of branch or leased lines, and in this fact we have evidence of the value of branches to a trunk line. The Canadian Pacific railway has grown up within our lifetime; I remember, as a boy, reporting the speech of Sir Charles Tupper in the old Queen's Hall, St. Catharine street, Montreal, explaining the Canadian Pacific railway project, and with others connected with the press of those days, I remember witnessing the first Canadian Pacific train start from Montreal on its through journey to the Pacific coast. The Canadian Pacific railway never would have become the pride of Canada as it was to-day, if it had not been provided with these branch line feeders, bringing traffic to it from all parts of the country. I find that on the Atlantic division of the Canadian Pacific railway it has eight branches, on the eastern division, 21 branches on the Ontario division, 12 branches; on the Lake Superior division, 3 branches; on the Manitoba division, 15 branches; on the Sasckatchewan division, 10 branches; on the Alberta division, 12 branches, and on the British Columbia division, 10 branches. Then, we find that the other great Canadian railway, the Grand Trunk, has not less than 56 branch lines, and the Canadian Northern is reported to have 32 branch lines. These figures furnish an argument which should have weight with this House, as I know they have weight with the minister of Railways. We would like to see the Intercolonial railway extended; we would like to see it remain what the Fathers of Confederation intended it should be, a bond of union between the various provinces of Confederation; we would like it to remain the people's railway. In this connection I invite the minister to give full consideration to this particular branch line which I am speaking of, because, if it were attached to the Intercolonial railway it would fulfil a long expected promise made to the people of that district. I believe that line would bring in revenue which would fully repay the Dominion for any outlay that might be made in acquiring it.

Mr. PELLETIER: What objections are urged to the merging of these two small railways, one of 100 miles and the other of 102 miles?

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): The same people are not the owners.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is the same interest.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): They are. The Quebec Oriental, the old Baie de Chaleurs road, and afterwards the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway (it has changed its name several times), is largely owned by a syndicate headed by Mr. Galindez, and the other road is owned by the creditors of the Charing Cross Bank, who have appointed trustees, one of whom is Mr. Reid, whose letter I have read. These people may come together, but they are not railway men in the proper sense of the term. Mr. Galindez is a broker in London, who became interested in this road when it was projected to extend as the Atlantic and Lake Superior, from Gaspé to Lake Superior. Certain debentures were then placed on the London market in the hands of Mr. Galindez, and since then, to protect these interests, he has acquired the majority of the stock, and is now merely keeping the road running, so as to prevent it going out of business altogether. I think reasonable terms could be made with him, and if they are not reasonable public opinion would justify the expropriation of the road, and the Government could pay him its fair value. As to the other portion of the road, the Atlantic, Quebec and Western, the minister has the report of his own officers that the road is in perfect condition. I think the whole thing is a good proposition, and I can assure the Minister of Railways that if he, and the Postmaster General who represents that district, extend the Intercolonial railway to Gaspé Basin, they will never be forgotten by the people of that district. We have waited in vain for a good many years for this project, and I think the time has come now when it should be consummated. This branch line to which I refer has a peculiar claim, inasmuch as it is the sole line of communication with a very large territory, and if it is not attached to the Intercolonial railway nothing remains. I leave the matter to the earnest consideration of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As I had for fifteen years the honour of representing Gaspé, I feel it my duty to add a word or two to the very illuminative remarks made by my hon. friend who so worthily represents Bonaventure. I heartily concur in the resolution now before the House. My hon. friend has given all the facts and data concerning that section of the country from a railway point of view. I might perhaps take exception to his remark that that peninsula has been neglected by different governments for the past thirty or forty years on account of political reasons. I understand that when Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways, a contract for several miles was let and the work actually started, but later on the Government surrendered it to a private company and abandoned the idea of building it as a branch line of the Intercolonial railway. I understand from the old people of Gaspé and Bonaventure counties that the Government at that time did not continue the construction of the railway as a branch of the Intercolonial railway because of the very strenuous opposition of the Jersey fishing firms who operate along that coast. The Postmaster General, who knows that section of the country very well, is aware that for nearly 200 years there have been on the peninsula of Gaspé great fishing establishments controlled chiefly by people coming from Jersey. They came here under the French regime and they remained until this day, being to eastern Canada what the Hudson Bay Company has been for centuries to the the Northwest. The opposition of the Jersey firms was because they were in need of cheap labour and were afraid that with the railway construction the people might perhaps engage in other industries than that of fishing, in which case they might possibly be the losers. I have always heard it stated that this was at the bottom of the whole difficulty; if the Jersey firms had not been in the way the Government would long ago have acquired the railway from Matapedia to Gaspé basin as it was at first projected. My hon. friend has stated the difficulty confronting the Gaspé people. There are three roads, the Intercolonial, the Old Armstrong railway, known formerly as the Baie des Chaleurs railway, and the Atlantic and Quebec Western railway. The Bonaventure section of the road was unfortunately so mismanaged that a few years ago the Government of the day declared their charter null and void as regards the last section of the road. The Atlantic and Lake Superior railway was allowed to build from Caplin up to Paspebiac but the company could go no further because the Dominion Government would not subsidize it. It was under those circumstances that I became the representative of Gaspé in the House of Commons, and from the beginning the great issue in that district was the construction of the remaining section of the railway. But, as the first section was under a practically bankrupt management, we had to look for fresh capital in order to complete the road. I then associated myself with a gentleman whose memory is highly respected in the county of Gaspé—his name is well known to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) an old classmate of his—the late Mr. J. X. Lavoie who was prothonotary at Percé, indeed the factotum of the county of Gaspé. He, with his intelligence—he was a very bright man—and with his indomitable energy, applied his faculties to find the necessary capital in order to complete the Gaspé section of the line. There were 102 miles to build in order to span the gap between Gaspé Basin and Paspebiac. With this additional handicap, however, that, as my hon. friend stated a moment ago, the coast in the county of Gaspé was much more rugged than in the county of Bonaventure. The company, an English company, came before Parliament unsuccessfully on two or three occasions; it had intended at first to build through the interior of the peninsula, but so much objection was raised by the people and by my hon. friend the member for Bonaventure, ex-Speaker of the House, that the company altered its plans and decided to build along the shore line. It started to work; invested I don't know how many millions in the construction of that road; obtained its money in England. It was subsidized by the Government, and got a special subsidy for the construction of the twenty-five or twenty-six bridges it had to build. As my hon. friend stated, it has built a standard road, under the direction of English engineers and we know what that means; it is a first-class railway which can compare favourably with the Intercolonial railway. But here is the trouble: it is only a section of the line. There should be only one line from Gaspé Basin to Matapedia. The public who travel, the people who send or receive freight over the lines, are obliged to pay three rates, one on the Intercolonial, one on the Matapedia section, and the other on the Gaspé section. Whilst I am stating this, I might perhaps give a personal explanation, as some papers have two years ago criticised me very undeservedly, I may say. The railway company itself was financed by Mr. A. W. Carpenter, of the Charing Cross Bank. The Charing Cross Bank failed two years ago, and amongst the liabilities figured the name of the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway. But Mr. Carpenter had large investments not only in Canada, but in South Africa, in mines, and even in Asia. He was unfortunate in many of his undertakings, and the Gaspé railway was only one of the many undertakings which brought about the failure. Let me say also that the creditors of the bank have appointed two trustees, Sir William Plender and Sir William B. Peat, two household names in the British commercial world, because their firm has branches in New York, Cape Town, in fact it is a world wide firm of accountants. They were selected as the trustees of the creditors and the road today is under their joint management. As I stated a moment ago, in order to answer some very unjust criticisms that have been made, I may say that I myself represent as solicitor the trustees regarding the railway business in Canada. The road is actually under their control. As my hon. friend said, the road is a standard road, but it is working under very serious disadvantages. It cannot for a long while be administered by trustees in this way. They are spending money and reaping nothing but deficits, on account of the gap from Matapedia to Paspebiac. If the road were under one management, or under the Government as part of the Intercolonial railway, I dare say there would be no difficulty in securing full success.

Mr. HAZEN: Have they tried to acquire the other?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, they have, but the failure of the bank came at that time. And the trouble is this—that the price which is asked by Mr. Galindez, who is practically the owner of the Baie des Chaleurs railway, i.e., the Matapedia section, is exorbitant, and the road would have to be practically revolutionized; it is a dangerous road to travel on.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would not the location of the road have to be changed?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Absolutely. In some cases it hugs the sea,—

Mr. HAZEN: I have been over it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the trestle works are in a most dangerous condition.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not intend to interrupt, but I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. From time to time I hear a statement to the effect that if a bridge were built across the river from Cross Point, I think, to the town of Campbellton, and the road abandoned from that to Matapedia, the result would be an advantage to the road. What does the hon. gentleman think of that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend from Bonaventure and myself urged strongly the carrying out of that project upon my colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals in the former Government, and so did the hon. member from St. John. And I dare say it is an open secret that had we been returned, this would have been done, and also the branch lines would have been purchased for the Intercolonial railway. Coming back to our muttons, the Gaspé and Baie des Chaleurs railway, two years ago, before the last election, and during the session which immediately preceded that election, we had a Bill framed and accepted by the Minister of Railways and Canals of that time, the effect of which was practically a notification to Mr. Galindez that if, after a certain delay, the necessary repairs were not made to the road, the Minister of Railways and Canals could, after the ordinary process of law, sell the road, the proceeds of the sale to be applied to the repayment of the subsidies paid to the railway; and then the Government would be in a position to sell or lease that road to another company.

Mr. HAZEN: What were you going to do with the bondholders?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Remember that this is a very peculiar case. The amount represented to have been paid for the bonds is a debatable question. I would not say that this drastic remedy should apply to every railway, but this is a most extraordinary case. The present Government is too fresh in office to have been duped by this company, but everybody knows that previous governments, both the late Government and its predecessors, were duped and made the laughing stock by that company. Energetic action is needed, and it would be much in the interest of the Dominion to pass legislation which will result in giving that magnificent country the railway facilities that it requires for its development. As it is, that country has one splendid railway, running from Gaspé to Paspebiac. A great harbour at Gaspé basin, a good track, fine bridges of the latest model, and a conservative management. But the moment you reach my hon. friend's (Mr. Marcil's) county at Paspebiac, the people do not care to travel——

Mr. PELLETIER: They travel at the peril of their lives.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, at the peril of their lives. And, until that section of the road is rehauled and reconstructed, certainly the steamship's service should remain. I heartily support this resolution, and I hope that the Government will acquire those branch lines as part of the Intercolonial railway. They would certainly have the gratitude of the people of Eastern Canada if they did so. The people of eastern Canada deserve it; they have paid taxes for years, and so have paid their share for the construction of railways in other sections of Canada; and surely they are now entitled to receive in return some consideration from the Government.

Mr. L. P. GAUTHIER (Gaspé): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as the representative of a portion of the Gaspe peninsula, I wish to add a few words to what has just been said by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in reference to the resolution which the House has just been considering. I listened with pleasure to the speeches of my hon. friends, and I am entirely in sympathy with all they have suggested.

The interest I take in that part of the Dominion is made keener by the fact that I was born there, that I have my home there, and that, as a result, I am acquainted with its requirements as well as with its resources.

The possibilities of the Gaspé peninsula are unexceptional. Of course, there as elsewhere, in order to develop those resources, transportation facilities are required, and such transportation facilities to be of use should be of a nature to foster trade. Now the line from Matapedia to Gaspé is not over its whole length in a state that will admit of its operation under paying conditions. The section from Matapedia to New Carlisle is in very poor condition indeed, almost useless for the transportation of freight, and even of passengers, who, as the hon. member for Rouville stated a moment ago, travel over it at the risk of their lives.

As things are at present, I do not think that the company of itself would succeed in putting the line in proper condition and making a paying venture of its operation. On the other hand, the Government not being expected to get returns from its investments as promptly as a private company, might take charge of such an undertaking in the public interest and with a view to developing that part of the country; and, to my mind, any outlay necessary towards acquiring and maintaining this line of railway would be justifiable.

I may say further that this line comprises two different sections since it has been connected with the Intercolonial, and as a result people are made to pay three different bills of freight on the same goods, as far as Gaspé is concerned. The same applies to passenger traffic. Such a condition of affairs practically shuts out trade.

While I am on my feet I may be allowed to refer briefly to the grant voted for the steamship service connecting Campbellton and Gasp.. So long as the railway line connecting Matapedia and Gaspé is not linked with the Intercolonial under conditions permitting the issuance of a single freight bill, I believe it will be in the interest of the public that this grant to the navigation company be kept up and even increased, if necessary. I wholly agree with my hon. friend from Bonaventure in his statement that as soon as the Matapedia and Gaspé line provides for that section a service as satisfactory as elsewhere and is linked to the I.C.R., there will no longer be any use for that grant to the navigation company, but until such a service has been provided for the benefit of the public, I think the grant should be maintained.

We people of Gaspé are pleased to see this Government ask a grant for a railway line which is to run from Matane to Gaspé through the interior. And let me say right here that we trust the Government will bring pressure to bear so as to ensure the locating of this line north of the Shickshock mountains, thus ensuring the development of that part of the country and accommodating residents on the north shore of the Gaspé peninsula. At any rate, the building of this railway line will give a great impetus to the development of the resources of the peninsula, particularly as regards farming and the lumber industry.

Mr. LEMIEUX: (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to ask him a question? Is there just now a party of engineers engaged in locating this line along the north shore, as far as practicable I am aware that my hon. friend has interested himself towards having a party of engineers sent to locate that railway on the northern slope of the mountain range. Are those engineers in Gaspé at this moment?

Mr. GAUTHIER: (Translation.) Just so, we have taken on ourselves to organize a party of engineers to explore the country from Matane to a point in the vicinity of St. Anne des Monts, along the northern slope of the Shickshock range, so as to accommodate the northern portion of the peninsula from Matane to St. Anne des Mnots. The intention is not to have that line follow closely the coast, a location which would not be very desirable for construction purposes or the profitable operation of the road. It is proposed to locate the line at some distance from the coast, between the foothills and the sea coast, so as to open up the country for settlement.

Mr. LEMIEUX: (Translation.) Up to what point, as far as practicable, will that line follow the coast?

Mr. GAUTHIER: (Translation.) Up to a point in the vicinity of St. Anne des Monts, which is considered the only point where it is practicable to penetrate the mountain country, along the valley of the St. Ann river, and thence to Gaspé.

I trust the Government will grant us some effective assistance towards carrying out this exploration work, as it is in the public interest that this railway line, if it is built —and it will have to be built some day— should be so located as to develop that part of the peninsula, while at the same time accommodating the older settlements. Besides, a line so located would be much shorter than if it were to follow the southern slope of the mountain range, a circumstance to be taken into account, since less money would thus be required to carry out the undertaking. The Government would thereby save money.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, go beyond those few remarks. I approve of the resolution, as being entirely in the interest of the country at large, and more particularly in the interest of the district I have the honour to represent.

Mr. KYTE: Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few remarks upon the subject of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson). On two or three occasions when the matter was before the House I took the opportunity of supporting the proposition, inasmuch as it affected a matter in which the constituents whom I represent in this House are deeply interested. I represent one of the constituencies served by a branch line railway, so called. It is a road that extends from Point Tupper, one of the termini of the Intercolonial railway on the strait of Canso, to the town of St. Peters. It was originally constructed for the purpose of serving the large district comprising the growing communities which surround the city of Sydney, and the town of Louisburg. For some reason or other financial difficulties overtook the promoters of that railway, and they were unable to construct the road except for a distance of 30 miles. For many years the people of my constituency were disappointed owing to the choice the late Government made with respect to the location of the Intercolonial railway in the Island of Cape Breton. I am not now speaking for the purpose of criticising the judgment of the Government of the day, or the influences which brought about the choice of that location. The Island of Cape Breton, as is known, is peculiarly situated. No one line of railway can possibly accommodate the people of that territory. The Bras d'Or lake occupies the central portion of the Island of Cape Breton, and when the Intercolonial railway was built through Cape Breton and around the north shore of the Bras d'Or lake, it left that large section of the county of Richmond and the southern portion of the county of Cape Breton without railway accommodation. For many years disappointment was the lot of the people of the southern part of the Island of Cape Breton. In the year 1899 an American company came prepared to invest its capital in the construction of a railway through that territory. As I said a moment ago, their plans miscarried, and they did not build that railway into the city of Sydney, or to the town of Louisburg For ten years we have enjoyed very excellent railway service in the county of Richmond between Point Tupper and St. Peters, but I am free to say the railway has not been a paying proposition, because the section of the county in which it is built is also very well accommodated by water carriage. There is very considerable competition between water carriage and the transportation of the Cape Breton railway. As a consequence the earnings of that road have not been sufficient to pay its annual expenses. I wish to submit, however, that I think this is no reason why the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals should refuse to consider a proposition to take over that railway, and further extend the railway from the town of St. Peters into the city of Sydney and town of Louisburg, and to the large and populous centres surrounding the town of Glace Bay.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman made the statement that I had refused to take over this line—we have not refused anything.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. Minister has entirely misunderstood me. I said that is no reason why he should refuse, and I think he should give this matter his early consideration. Our proposition is that the Government should take over the Cape Breton railway from Point Tupper to St. Peters, and that it should extend the road from St. Peters into the city of Sydney, and into the large and populous centres surrounding the town of Glace Bay, and the town of Louisburg.

An enormous traffic has developed in Cape Breton on the Intercolonial. While I am not able to give the figures, I think that the records will show that more freight originates in the city of Sydney, the town of North Sydney and the collieries surrounding these places than on any other portion of the Intercolonial railway. Away back in 1887, when the extension of the Intercolonial railway in the Island of Cape Breton was contemplated, it was stated by those criticising the expenditure that there was not sufficient traffic to warrant such an outlay of money. I am bound to say there is more justification to-day for having two lines of the Intercolonial railway through the island of Cape Breton at the present time than there was for one line over twenty years ago. Since then much traffic has developed between Newfoundland and Cape Breton, all of which is carried over the Intercolonial. The establishment of steel works in the town of Sydney Mines has given a great impetus to the development of that district, and that very important industry has contributed very largely to the increase in freight traffic. The city of Sydney alone originates sufficient freight and passenger traffic to justify the Government in extending the railway from the town of St. Peters into Sydney. The Intercolonial railway has in the last few years been in a more fortunate position than in the earlier period of its history, and during the last few years we have assurance that the railway is not only paying its operating expenses, but a very handsome surplus has been realized. I think, however, in speaking of the increased earnings which have developed along the Intercolonial railway, something is due to the fact that the rates have been somewhat increased. I cannot speak exactly in regard to the freight rates, but I think in regard to the passenger traffic and other sources of earnings, the charges have been somewhat advanced, all of which comes out of the pockets of the people of the Maritime Provinces who have been obliged to patronize that railway. Private capital has constructed the railway from Point Tupper to St. Peters, and I think it would be unfortunate that the persons who invested their money in that undertaking should lose the capital which they have put into it.

I listened with some interest to the observations made by the hon. member for Digby, with respect to the inactivity of the late Government in respect to branch line railways. It is only within the last few years that this question has been mooted, and it was only comparatively recently that it has been dealt with in this House. If the hon. member for Westmorland had not moved this resolution a few years ago in the House of Commons I do not suppose the matter would have engaged the attention of any member of the Government. It was necessary to cultivate the soil, and to develop public opinion as well as to educate members of the late Government before taking the question up with a view to carrying it out. The present Government, however, is in a happier position. It is not necessary to allow them a period of probation, in which they might develop their minds up to the necessity of taking over the branch lines of railways. I have before me a telegram sent by the right hon. the Prime Minister from Summerside, Prince Edward Island, on September 8th, 1911. The telegram is addressed to Mr. George Fowler, the present member for Kings and Albert, New Brunswick. It reads:

> Am convinced that interests of Intercolonial railway demand acquisition of branch line railways as feeders and we propose to acquire them on reasonable terms if returned to power.

Therefore, before the right hon. Prime Minister was called upon to form a ministry, he was convinced of the desirability of taking over these branch line railways. I cannot think that the hon. member for Digby can successfully make the plea on behalf of the present Government for their delay in the acquisition of the branch lines, because as I stated a moment ago, they were convinced of the necessity of this before coming into power.

The character of the Cape Breton railway which exists in my county at the present time is of the very highest. A few years ago experts in the Department of Railways and Canals made a report as to the physical character of the road, and I understand that they reported it was in the very best possible condition. There is no necessity for any large expenditure of money for the purpose of bringing up that railway to the standard of the Intercolonial. The company that built the road maintained it in the very best condition, and have given us the very best service. Considerable traffic has developed on that railway, but a very much greater traffic would develop if the scheme originally intended—that of building the road from St. Peters into Cape Breton county—were carried out. I am not going to assume the present Minister of Railways and Canals is unfavourable to this proposal, but I rather assume he is favourable to it and has been gathering information with a view to enabling him to make a statement to Parliament at the present session. I am aware that during the last summer an expert was sent by him to the island of Cape Breton for the purpose of making a report upon this railway and I presume that report will be submitted to Parliament at an early date, and that as a consequence the Minister will accept the principle embodied in the resolution of the hon. member for Westmorland and take over the branch lines of railway in the Maritime provinces, as well as the railway in the constituency whose interests I advocate at the present moment.

Mr. McKENZIE : The question engaging the attention of this House this evening is not by any means a new one, but the hon. member for Westmorland in the moving of his resolution has thrown fresh light and interest upon this subject. He has put the question before the House and the Government in such an able and lucid manner that were it not for the fact that the rest of us should back him up in the opinions that he expressed there would be no real reason for any more discussion. Other gentlemen have given further and very conclusive reasons why the policy which has been adopted and agreed to by the former Government should be carried forward by the present Administration. I am sure that besides the telegram which has been read by the hon. member for Richmond there are just as good reasons and evidence upon the records of this House and on 'Hansard' as to the position of the Prime Minister before he came into power. It is not good reasoning for the hon. member for Digby to say that the present Government must go back to the early stages in connection with the investigation of this question and must not take into consideration the progress made by the old Government, that they must start over again and take years of deliberation and research before they can reach any operative conclusion in respect to this matter. That cannot be held true in any line of life, progress would not be made in any subject, whether in the practical working of railways, scientific research or in any other line if we were obliged to abandon the progress made by our friends and predecessors and rely only on our own researches. The two sides of the House entered into the discussion and I think agreed upon the policy that the branch lines should be taken over. I remember well in 1910 a resolution was moved in this House by myself, representing the county I now represent, saying that in the opinion of this House the sphere of usefulness of the Intercolonial railway should be extended into the counties of the province of Nova Scotia which then had no railways. There is no difference, as I understand, between the resolution which I moved then and the resolution now before the House. There is a distinction in language but not in purpose and effect, it is practically and altogether the same and so any expression of opinion that was then given by the present Premier is a good and sufficient argument in support of the position that he is obliged to take upon the resolution now before the House. He was then speaking as leader of the Opposition, he was speaking as the head of the representation of the province of Nova Scotia at the time, and the resolution pertained particularly to the affairs of the province of Nova Scotia. Now that he occupies the high and honoured position of Prime Minister of Canada and the only representative of the province of Nova Scotia in the Cabinet it is of interest to us that the people of the province and himself should be reminded of the position which he took on that occasion. The great plea and complaint that he was making against the then Government was that they should not make up their minds in connection with this great question, that they were vacillating, that they were uncertain in their movements and that it was highly necessary that something should be done to force them to a decision. I am sorry to say that if that was true of the then Administration, the answer which the Minister of Railways gave to the mover of the resolution this afternoon, is somewhat akin to that position of vacillation and uncertainty as to the course which the present Government propose to take. In order not to do any injustice to the right hon. the Prime Minister, I shall quote exactly what he said. I quote from page 1179 of 'Hansard' for the 12th of December, 1910:

> As I understand, the Minister of Railways and Canals gives us his assurance that this motion will be taken up and disposed of during the present session. I would like to understand that definitely and positively, because the length of my remarks this evening will depend a little upon that.

Now, one of the great difficulties with respect to the Intercolonial railway which have existed since this Government took office is this, that the Government has been in a state of uncertainty and vacillation as to whether or not it would give the Intercolonial railway its proper development. That has been its great difficulty. If there is anything to be understood from that language it is that the then leader of the Opposition, the present Premier, was dissatisfied with the position of the Government of that day, that they were not speedily and at once deciding to extend the sphere of usefulness of the Intercolonial railway throughout its whole length. The sphere of usefulness of the Intercolonial railway was to be exercised and extended in two ways particularly, may be in many ways, but two ways particularly; one was in extending it into counties where we had no railways at all, the other and additional was taking over the branch lines that are not to-day rendering to the people the services they are entitled to, the services necessary for the proper transportation and traffic of this country, and taking both into the system of the Intercolonial railway; then build lines where it is necessary to build them and take over lines that are already built, on reasonable terms, and put them in proper position to meet the requirements of the country.

Those were the two things which I think the Prime Minister had in view when he complained that the Government of that day were vacillating and uncertain in their policy and were not proceeding as rapidly as they should. He pointed out that Government-owned railways were paying well in Australia and other places, and he said it was not necessary to go as far as Australia to show illustrations and conclusive evidence of what Government ownership meant and that Government railways could be made a success. He said:

We can point to the operation of Government railways in the province of Ontario. It may be Government railways in Ontario have been operating during the past six or eight years under favourable conditions but we should also bear in mind that they have given exceedingly favourable results. Taking last year, I find that their total operating revenue was $1,361,224.80, that their operating expenses were $794,796.88, and that the net operating revenue was no less than $566,428. And that does not include the ore royalties and other items of that kind which ought not properly to be taken into consideration in comparing these railways with the Intercolonial railway. So that for the last year for which we have any return, the Ontario Government railways paid into the treasury of Ontario no less than a sum of $550,000 which was added to the consolidated revenue of that province. The Ontario Government railways were subject to all the disadvantages pointed out by the Minister of Railways. These disadvantages I do not wish to minimize, but I want to tell my hon. friend that the Intercolonial railway runs through a country in the Maritime provinces with equally great resources. I have declared often that the little province of Nova Scotia, in proportion to its size, has as splendid natural resources, a great many of which are still undeveloped, as any equal area in the Dominion. There can be no doubt about that. And those resources, as they continue to be developed, will give the Intercolonial railway the opportunity of adding to its revenue from that province, so that I agree entirely in what my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said with regard to the operation of the Intercolonial railway in that province. I believe that were it not for the splendid revenue the Intercolonial railway does draw from Nova Scotia, its showing would be infinitely worse than it has been during the recent or any years. There are great natural resources in that province, some of them developed, and some undeveloped; and I understand the motion of my hon. friend from Cape Breton and North Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) was designed—if it had any object at all—to take the Intercolonial railway within the province of Nova Scotia into those parts of that province where natural resources are waiting to be developed; and the same principle should also apply elsewhere.

Then the right hon. the Prime Minister went on to point out the necessities of his own county of Halifax and of other parts of the province of Nova Scotia, where the sphere of influence of the Intercolonial railway should be extended. There is not in my mind the slightest doubt as to where the Prime Minister stood on the 12th of November, 1910. It is but a short time ago, and nothing has since happened in the province of Nova Scotia or in the Dominion of Canada which would justify the Prime Minister in changing his attitude as to the course which should be taken with respect to the Intercolonial railway. It is admitted therefore, I think, and cannot be controverted, that both parties are committed to the taking over of the branch lines and to the extension of the Intercolonial to such sections of the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec as are to-day crying for railways, and those necessities cannot be met in any other way. I need not impress upon the practical mind of the hon. Minister of Railways the geographical conditions that he meets with particularly after he passes Moncton and until he reaches the extreme point of the town of old Louisburg. The peninsula is somewhat wide at Moncton, but as he goes eastward it narrows, and continues narrowing all the time, so that really there is room in the province of Nova Scotia and in the eastern part of New Brunswick for only one trunk line. The Intercolonial has taken those green spots, so to speak, it has taken hold of that traffic; and it has held all its resources in such a way that it is impracticable, and I think impossible to look for another trunk line alongside of it through the province of Nova Scotia. That being the case, and as a matter of national development, apart altogether from railway questions, it becomes necessary for the Intercolonial railway to supply the railway necessities in that part of Canada. I am not going to argue this point, and I am not arguing it now upon the ground alone that it is going to be a paying proposition. I have no doubt it would be a paying proposition, but even if it were not as a practical railway proposition, it certainly would be a good paying one in many other respects.

I say to the Minister of Railways and to the Government that there is no more difficult problem in this country to-day than the cost of living. The way in which the cost of living has advanced is to-day occupying the minds of the business men and the thinking men of Canada. Now, I submit that if there is any way by which we can get good wholesome food supplies in this country, and by doing so secure good wholesome food cheaper than it is at present, it is the duty of the Government to bring that condition about. I submit that there is no cheaper, more wholesome, or more nutritious food in any part of Canada or in any part of the world than the magnificent fish that is to be found along the shores of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and lower Quebec. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that they have abundance of that food in the province of Quebec, but that by a lack of commercial intercourse and of railway facilities that magnificent food which would supply thousands of people in this country is going to waste. The same thing is true all along the coast of Nova Scotia, and I fancy on parts of the coast of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. They have not the facilities of transportation of their fish, and therefore there is no encouragement to catch them. It must be understood, though possibly it is not as well understood by the hon. Minister of Railways as it should be, that we have no less than 5,000 miles of fishing coast line in the Maritime provinces. Following the sinuosities of the shore, we have 5,000 miles of good fishing coast line from three to five or six miles wide, and inexhaustible. It is not like a coal mine or a gold mine or a forest; it is inexhaustible as a source of supply of excellent food, so that what we take out is hardly noticed at all. I submit therefore without any politics, without any narrow sectionalism, that the people along those coasts of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and lower Quebec are entitled to have this expenditure made, in order that they may have proper transportation facilities within their reach. As has been pointed out by the hon. member from Bonaventure, we are entitled to it. He has pointed out and I have said so before, that the people of the West press for railways the moment they go to that part of the country. In many instances they will not go at all unless railway facilities are forthcoming or are already there. The ancestors of the mover of the resolution and of his able supporter from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and my own ancestors landed upon the shores of this country when there was nothing but tall straight and strong trees growing down to the water's edge. They hewed out homes for themselves in the province of Nova Scotia, and I am sure that if there are any people in this country who deserve recognition at the hands of the Government of this prosperous country, to the making of which they have contributed a large share, the people of Nova Scotia and of the outskirts of that province are entitled to such recognition. No small policy and no fear of expending a few dollars or even of going into debt ought to deter the Minister of Railways from taking over the branch lines and extending the Intercolonial railway into those parts of Nova Scotia which are now absolutely neglected. I do not know what idea the Minister of Railways may have with respect to railway building in the Maritime provinces, but I hope he is doing a lot of wise thinking. For years and years we fought to have a railway in the county I represent, and at last we succeeded in convincing the Government of the day. Surveys were made, the contract was practically let, and that project for which the people of Cape Breton had pined for nearly a century was in a way to be achieved, but, unfortunately the change of Government brought about new conditions, and at present there is not much to indicate that that railroad will be built. The lands were expropriated for the right of way, and I am sorry to say the present Minister has notified the parties along the route that their lands will not now be required for that purpose. Of course it would not take him long to revest his department with these lands and put himself in a position to give to the people of Victoria and the rest of Cape Breton what they were so nearly getting under the late Government. I trust the Minister will soon reconsider, and, so far as this side of the House is concerned, and, indeed, I think the same might be said of his own side, he need not fear coming to Parliament for such sum of money as is necessary to give these parts of our Dominion much needed railway facilities. The resolution more particularly refers to branch lines, and my hon. friend from Richmond has dealt with the branch from St. Peter's to Point Tupper. Of course, it is quite impossible for the minister to know very much about the country through which it is intended to extend that road, but I may tell him that it was my duty at one time, as solicitor for the St. Peter's Company, to traverse the right of way from St. Peter's to Louisburg, and on behalf of the Company I purchased at a cost of $31,000 land for terminals in the town of Louisburg. The St. Peter's Company selected as their terminus the old French wharf, built 200 years ago by the French people when they settled in Louisburg, and to-day the original foundations of that wharf are, I may tell the minister, perfectly sound. I mention this to show the minister that this company meant business, and that they spent this large sum of money in purchasing the land, so as to have their terminal at what is one of the finest seaports in Canada. I trust the day is not far distant when this railway will be extended through that splendid territory along the shore where there is excellent fishing and lots of mineral land, and to the town of Louisburg, making connection with the Sydneys and Glace bay. The island of Cape Breton is divided into two parts, the northern and the southern, and in some places one part is separated from the other by twenty-five miles of sea. The minister will at once see that it is impossible to serve these two separate and distinct islands with one railway. The railway was first built, along the fringe of the northern side of the southern island and possibly at the time that was the best thing that could be done. But we have a large thickly populated area on the south of the Bras d'Or lakes, and there is also a large population and extensive territory on the north side, so that it is impossible to serve all that country by the existing railway. The only way proper railway communication can be provided is by the continuation of the St. Peter's road through the southern island, and the continuation of the Mackenzie & Mann railroad from Hastings on the Strait of Canso; from the town of Inverness north along the shore of the northern island, including Inverness and Victoria Counties. A business man like the Minister of Railways will be very glad to hear of the great development which is going on in that part of the country. Ten years ago, there was no steel industry in Cape Breton, but to-day we have a plant representing eighty million dollars which annually gives $900,000 worth of traffic to the Intercolonial railway. It should be the ambition of the present Minister of Railways to be the pioneer in giving to that part of the country the railway facilities so much needed, and again I appeal to the Government, and to Parliament, to come to our relief. The Minister would save himself a lot of worry, and do a great deal of good to the country generally, by granting the request we now make. I endorse to the full what has been said so well and ably by the gentlemen who have supported the resolution, and I shall have great pleasure in voting for it. We who represent these constituencies, would not be doing our duty to ourselves, or to the people we represent, or to the Government, if we did not bring to the notice of Parliament what is required to enable us to take our place in the march of progress with the rest of the Dominion. If the people of the country knew the facts, they would, I am sure, be most glad to grant us what we ask.

Mr. McCURDY: I was rather struck with the statement made by the hon. member for Westmorland to the effect that the eastern provinces are now suffering from a feeling of neglect. I assume that the hon. member has not been East during the Christmas vacation, because I wish to state to you, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I can judge public opinion, there has not been a time in a great many years when the East has been suffering less from a feeling of neglect than it is at the present time. The contrast is rather marked between the attentions which they are receiving now and those which they have been receiving for some years; and I cannot really think that the hon. member for Westmorland was acquainted with the feeling of the East, as he expressed himself to-night.

Mr. EMMERSON: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I am not aware of having drawn any distinction between conditions in the Maritime provinces now and conditions as they were formerly. My hon. friend has certainly misunderstood me, as I made no such statement; at least I am not conscious of having made such a statement. What I did say was that the treatment accorded to the West in connection with the Hudson Bay railway in 1909 by the then Government and during the years that followed, and by the present Government during the past two years, I mentioned in my speech, and the treatment accorded to the East in connection with the branch railways was only once referred to in my speech. It was not a party reference, it was speaking in that way.

Mr. McCURDY: I understood the hon. member to call upon the East to resent the neglect under which they are, he claims, suffering.

The natural resources of the East, particularly in the district with which I am acquainted are very great.

I am sure that all hon. members who know that district will bear me out when I say that one of the greatest drawbacks and repressive influences of the past has been the pessimistic utterances of leading citizens; and, I fear one of the repressive influences at the present time is the pessimistic influence of members who, like my hon. friend, see in the almost immediate future the time when our representation in Parliament will reach the vanishing point. I wish to dissent from such a statement. I think that time is very far distant in the future, and not near as he apparently fears.

I was pleased with the opening statements of many of the hon. members opposite, when they said that they wished this matter discussed entirely apart from party bias, and as it should be discussed. Many of them carefully refrained from any reference to party politics; but in some cases the old Adam came to the surface; and to those and those alone, I would refer the record of railway construction in connection with the Intercolonial railway during the past twenty years. The last act of the old Conservative Government in June 1896, was the opening of some ten miles of railway as a branch of the Intercolonial—I refer to the Dartmouth branch. During the next fifteen years, or one hundred and eighty months, less than three miles of railway were constructed as branches of the Intercolonial. Now in fifteen months time since September, 1911, there have been placed under construction in Nova Scotia 67 miles as a branch of the Intercolonial. This takes no account of the construction in New Brunswick, as I am only referring to what occurred in Nova Scotia. As the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has pointed out, the Intercolonial railway has preempted the railway field in Nova Scotia; it is the only trunk line we have; it is necessarily the mother of the land transportation system in the province; and it is the duty of the Inercolonial, in my opinion, to extend its sphere of influence in Nova Scotia wherever possible and on a liberal basis. I do not know exactly how far the hon. Minister of Railways should be expected to assume the operation of such lines, which, to use a once favourite and popular expression, were called 'feeders.' But that name has dropped into disuse lately, and now we are referring again to what we call 'branch lines,' because I understand a large number, practically all of these lines, can hardly be called feeders in a financial sense. I should like to say that on general grounds I entirely agree with the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Westmorland. I am in favour and very strongly in favour not only of the acquisition of branch lines, which have any reason for their existence, but of the construction of new branch lines, wherever such, under a very liberal interpretation, can show a reason for their construction. I have never been, nor am I very much concerned, over the revenue producing operations of the Intercolonial. I do not think we should concern ourselves with any more than we are anxious to see the Welland or other canals revenue producing, or a handsome dividend accruing to the Government from the subsidies given to transcontinental railways. The Intercolonial was never undertaken as a business enterprise; it was a Government undertaking; no commercial company could be found to build it. It seems to me that the road is not performing its function unless it builds branch lines to serve all the country in which it lies, wherever there is a reasonable chance that it should make a fair show of earnings at all.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I desire to express my full sympathy with the resolution which is before the House; and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks with regard to it. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat began his speech by criticising my hon. friend from Westmorland for making comparisons between the railway construction of the late Government and the present Government; but he did not go very far in his speech until he indulged in the same pastime. He has also made a comparison between the amount of railway construction by the late Government in the province of Nova Scotia and the number of miles constructed by the present Government; but he failed to tell the House that the railway that he refers to, which I presume is the Musquodoboit branch in the county of Halifax, was projected by the late Government; the survey was made by the late Government; the contract was entered into by the late Government; the money was voted by the late Government; and everything was done, except to allow the work to go on. The present Government claim credit for not having stopped the work on the Musquodobit Valley, as they did on the projected branch in the county of Guysborough. That is the only thing they can claim credit for, so far as that branch of the railway is concerned. I listened with interest to the compliments thrown across the floor by hon. gentlemen who said that this was a business Government. I should like to think that it is a business Government. But it should not be necessary to have a discussion lasting all afternoon and evening to convince any Government that it is a proper and businesslike thing to secure the branch lines to the Intercolonial railway. There is certainly no argument that can be advanced against the proposition. Every commercial road that is carrying on its business in a proper way secures branch lines as feeders to its main line. They even build branches into those districts where branches are justified. It is one of the hopeless things about the Intercolonial railway—that for the forty years and more since Confederation the representatives of the Maritime provinces have had to come here year after year and talk in favour of this idea and try to persuade the Government that it ought to be undertaken. The Intercolonial railway, to my mind, has stood in the way of the development of the Maritime provinces. Any of the great lines of railways would certainly have done much more in the direction of furthering these branch lines during the forty years than the Dominion of Canada has done. It is not creditable to either side of the House that more has not been done in this direction; and it is especially too bad, as I have said, that it should be necessary at this late hour to try to persuade the Government that something ought to be done. Many of these branches already constructed in the province of New Brunswick ought to have been built by the Federal Government. The local Government undertook to assist them; capital was invested in them, and a great deal of that capital was wasted. Necessarily wasted, because the branches are too small and insignificant to maintain equipments of their own. A man does not need much railway knowledge to see that the Intercolonial railway, with its staff of engineers, with a large amount of rolling stock, with repair shops, with all the equipment of a great railway company could operate branch lines much more cheaply than an independent company could manage them. It is utterly impossible, in the case of small branch lines like those in Nova Scotia—for these branch lines usually run to harbours along the coast, and there is no part of our province that is much more than forty miles from the sea—to maintain a board of directors, a general manager, a chief engineer, workshops and all the equipment for a road, and make it pay, whereas such a road could be very well made to pay as a feeder of the Intercolonial railway. I do not wish to be too local or sectional in this discussion, because it is not a matter regarding my own constituency alone; it is a matter in which all four provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are deeply interested. I feel that the matter ought to be dealt with by the minister in a broad and statesmanlike way. I feel, however, at the present moment that I should not be doing my duty as representative of the county of Guysborough unless I made some representation of the situation in my own county. I do now not want to criticise the minister too harshly or to treat this as a party question. But it requires a good deal of Christian forbearance on my part not to say severe things in view of the way my constituency has been treated in this matter. The House accepted the principle of the branch lines in 1910. On that occasion the present right hon. leader of the Government was seeking the suffrages of the people of Canada. He expected in a very short time to face the electors. And when this question came before the House —moved, I think by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton—the Prime Minister made a speech in favour of the movement and made special reference to the county I have the honour to represent an dto his own county. The motion was agreed to by both sides of the House, and the Minister of Railways of that time, the hon. member for South Renfrew, spoke in favour of it. A little later, my hon. friend the leader of the present Government visited my constituency and held three meetings there and spoke in favour of these branch lines. This was one of the principal canvasses in the election in my constituency. My opponent, on every platform, said that if Mr. Borden was elected Prime Minister he had no doubt whatever the branch lines would be built. The right hon. gentleman was returned to power, and you know what happened. My hon. friend from Digby complimented my hon. friend the Minister of Railways as being a man who did not say much but was a man of action—a man who did things. That is what I complain about in my own case, for, if he had kept his hands off, if he had done nothing at all, we should have had a branch line in that county; but he took steps to stop it.

Mr. CARVELL : He is a man of action.

Mr. SINCLAIR : He certainly is. But it is very disheartening to the people I have the honour to represent. Before the present Government came into office, provision had been made for the construction of this branch line. A survey had been made and $1,000,000 had been voted by the House. Something further had been done. A contract had been entered into with a construction company to build the road; $50,000 had been deposited by the construction company in good faith as a guarantee that they would carry out their contract; and the late Government purchased the branch line known as the Sunny Brae branch, running twelve miles from Ferrona junction in the county of Pictou to Sunny Brae, with the idea of projecting it into the county of Guysborough. They purchased that line, and paid $100,000 on the purchase. This was the state of matters when the hon. gentlemen opposite took office. It was not long before we found the course they would take. The Prime Minister, though he had spoken in favour of the Guysborough branch as of the Musquodobit branch, and though he had issued a card claiming to have been the originator of the idea, and stating that he had brought the matter to the attention of the House, and that a million dollars had been voted—which card was distributed among his electors—yet when he attained office and came to deal with this question, he cancelled the contract with the construction company, returned their $50,000, and put us back where we were at the time the project was started. The road my hon. friend from Queens-Shelburne referred to has therefore gone on and is being constructed.

At the last session of the House I was endeavouring to find out from the Minister of Railways whether he really intended to take any action in the matter, and in that connection I wish to quote from 'Hansard', April 4, 1911-12, page 5621:

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will provision be made in the supplementary estimates for a branch line from Sunnybrae to Guysborough?

Mr. COCHRANE: There is provision made for a survey. I have told the hon. gentleman twice that we intend to investigate this matter during the coming summer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like to say to the minister that the survey has been pretty nearly completed. The contract has been let.

It should be noted that the Minister of Railways on that occasion, in reply to the question as to whether anything was to be done during last session, said that provision had been made for a survey, and that he intended to make an investigation during the coming season. The coming season has passed, however, and as far as I know, he has not made any survey or taken any action in the matter. That, of course, was also a disappointment, because he led us to hope he was really contemplating something when he made the statement that provision had been made for a survey, and that he was planning something during the coming season. The only thing I have been able to detect that he has done since that time was to file with the registrar of deeds at Guysborough a notice cancelling the right of way for the securing of which steps had been taken by the late Administration. The usual steps had been taken when the survey was made by the late Administration, and the right of way was filed in the office of the registrar of deeds at Guysborough. Notice was given to the proprietors that these lands were to be taken for the purpose of building the Guysborough branch. During the last summer my hon. friend the Minister of Railways filed a notice with the registrar of deeds notifying everybody that this was cancelled, that he would not, of course, require this right of way, and in effect that he did not intend to take any steps in regard to it.

I have received from the municipal council of the county I have the honour to represent a petition in this matter to be presented to the Minister, and I think it would be advisable to present this petition now. I fear anything I could say to the Minister as an opponent of his in politics could have no effect, but when I tell him that about one-half of the men composing this municipal council are men of his own faith in regard to political matters, perhaps he will pay a little more attention to their statements:

We, the municipal council for the municipality of Guysborough now in session this twenty-third day of January, 1912, having in mind the requirements of this municipality and knowing the great need and want of railway facilities for the people of this county who have anxiously waited while other parts of the province and Dominion were being served in this respect, and having in view the efforts put forth during the last five years to secure a railroad for the county of Guysborough, which was at last bearing fruit to the extent that the late Dominion Government did call for tenders, and their last Act before laying down the reins of power was to sign and fully execute a contract for the construction of this road;

And, whereas it seems by the public press that the estimates brought forward by the present Government at Ottawa now in session contains no money for this much needed work;

Be it therefore resolved that we, the municipal councillors for the municipality of Guysborough assembled, do unanimously approve of the act of the late Government in signing and executing the contract for this work, and we would therefore request the present Government to continue the construction of said railroad.

It is further resolved that the municipal secretary shall prepare copies of this resolution and send same to the following parties: Right hon. R. L Borden, Hon. A. K. MacLean, M. P.; John H. Sinclair, M.P.; E. M. MacDonald, M.P.; Senator A. C. Bell and C. A. R. Rowlings, Esq.

(Sgd.) A. CHIP. GIFFIN,
(Sgd.) D. S. HENDSBEE,
Commissioners.

Moved, seconded and passed that the resolution pass. I hereby certify the foregoing a copy of resolution passed by the municipal council, January 23, 1912.

J. A. FULTON,
Clerk.

In the discussion in regard to this matter on previous occasions, the minister raised an objection as to the traffic that would be found to exist on this particular line. I am not here to say that at the commencement this line would pay expenses—I am not certain that it would. But it seems to me there is a chance of developing good traffic on that line. It passes through an agricultural country; through a country well wooded, and plentifully supplied with large quantities of timber. It reaches one of the finest ports of the Dominion—Country Harbour—where the terminus of one of the branch lines is, as well as the port of Guysborough, which is not very far from Canso, one of the finest fishing districts on the coast of North America. This road will, however, not altogether be a solution of the question of developing the fishing industry of that district. The road goes only as far as Guysborough, while thirty miles beyond that, if extended, it would touch the town of Canso, which would be a great advantage indeed in the developing of the fishing industry of that town. I am certain there is no point in eastern Canada, if not in North America, where a large fishing business can be carried on with such success as at Canso. Canso projects out into the Atlantic and forms one of the finest regions to be found on the coast. As proof of this, I may say that on the 1st day of January the fishermen of that little town, the population of which is only 2,000, and in spite of the inclemency of the weather at this season of the year, took in 300,000 pounds of fresh fish in one day; that is to say 150 tons of fish were landed at that point in one day. Of course, this is not usual, but it shows the possibilities of the fishing industry at that point. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways mentioned ten carloads a day as a possible traffic to warrant the building of that line. On this particular day there would be at least fifteen carloads of fresh fish landed at that point. The difficulty of marketing this catch is very great, and the price to the fisherman is very small on account of the fact that we have no proper transportation facilities. Our best market is, perhaps, that of Boston, and if we had a daily boat running from Canso to Boston, it would enable the Atlantic ports, such as Canso, White Head, Country Harbour, &c., to pick up the fish caught on the coast and deliver it to the markets of Boston. This would perhaps serve just as well as a railway line, but my hon. friends opposite do not believe in trade with Boston. They are opposed to that kind of trade; they pretend to fear it might not be to the advantage of the country, and for that reason I cannot press upon them too strongly the fact that they ought to be willing to make some sacrifice to put these fishermen in touch with the home markets of Montreal and Toronto.

Of course unless we can get some guarantee or other it is impossible to develop this splendid industry that exists at our very doors. I said a moment ago that the position of the Prime Minister in this matter is somewhat indefensible in view of the position he took when the matter was before the House prior to his coming into power. But what has transpired since? The question is what steps will be taken now? Is there any hope that any move will be made in regard to this particular branch line? I pointed out that he committed himself favourably to this branch, that he issued a card in which he stated that he was in favour of it and when he came into power he did not carry out the promise he made on that occasion. The Minister of Railways is quite familiar with this matter. It has been brought before him a number of times. I trust he is giving it some consideration. If we are to believe the stories we see in the newspapers there is some fear that we may lose him from this House, that he may be translated to a higher sphere. It is stated that it is quite possible he is going to represent the King in the great province of Ontario. I do not know whether or not there is any truth in that rumour, but I would say to him that before this happens, before we lose the benefit of his counsel and advise in the House of Commons, he should introduce a large and comprehensive measure to solve this important question of the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway. I would suggest to him that to round out his career as a statesman in the Canadian House of Commons, he should take hold of this matter with a strong hand, in a business way and deal with it and when he does so he will not forget to straighten out matters in regard to the projected branch lines in the county of Guysborough.

Mr. LOGGIE: Mr. Speaker, so much has been said on this important subject that I do not intend to take up the time of the House for more than a few moments. This matter was discussed a year ago and at the close of the discussion I understood it to be the policy of the Government of the day to retain the Intercolonial railway and also to build new branch lines and to take over the present branch lines that are feeders to that trunk line. Not only is that true, but as has already been made known to the House, it is the policy of the Government of to-day to extend the usefulness of the Intercolonial railway, as was made known at the time of the last election. In view of that, the statements made in the press are somewhat alarming. Let me read, under date of January 17, these words, referred to by the hon. member for Westmorland to-day.

> If you were closely connected with the Government you would learn that the Intercolonial railway will likely be sold or leased shortly. He said that the actual transference had been under consideration for some time and he understood that the contract had already been made out.

These are the words of Mr. Lodge, the president of the Maritime Board of Trade and also the president of the Board of Trade of Moncton, where the headquarters of the Intercolonial railway are. It seems to me it is incumbent upon the Minister of Railways to let the people of Canada know if there has been such a change of policy in regard to the retention of the Intercolonial. It is not necessary to make any defence for the retention of this railway and its continued management by the people. It was clearly the intention of the fathers of Confederation that this railway should be owned and operated by the people of Canada in the interest of the provinces that then joined the compact of Confederation. So I say it is incumbent upon the Government of the day to give the territory adjacent to the trunk line the necessary transportation. The hon. gentleman from Digby referred to the fact that the Government in power until a year ago did not go on with the work of taking over the branch lines. The hon. gentleman did not give the reason why that was not put into execution, but he knows or he knew very well that it was found that the Act was not adequate, that there was not sufficient power or scope in the Act for the satisfactory giving up by the owners of the branch lines and the hon. gentleman knew very well too that the then Minister of Railways had an amendment to that Act ready to place before Parliament when dissolution came about so that it is hardly fair for the hon. gentleman to say that the late Government were not proceeding with their work in an energetic manner.

I would like to again remind the minister that when he is considering the extension of new branch lines there is in his department a petition for a new branch line from the town of Newcastle to Tracadie. The section of country to be served thereby is very important, the fishing and lumbering industries and the agricultural industries ought to be served. I said, I think in 1905, when this matter was first brought before the House, that it was incumbent upon the trunk line to give the adjacent territory the necessary transportation facilities. It has been well said that a short line of itself can hardly be made a paying venture. It has also been pointed out that a large proportion of the rolling stock is unsuitable for a trunk line but would be quite suitable for branch lines, and in that way the country at large would be served. Hon. gentlemen have also referred to the fact that the Maritime provinces are not going ahead as fast as other portions of Canada, and that soon our representation will be reduced. Let me say that if there is anything that will lessen that possibility it is to give increased transportation to those portions of the country that have not now adequate railway facilities. The matter of parcel post was talked of in the House a few days ago and it was argued that it would reduce express rates. Let me point out to hon. gentlemen that there are many sections of the county which I represent that have no railway facilities, and therefore could not have any express offices. So that if places that have express offices are entitled to lower rates, and those lower rates can be brought about by a parcel post system, surely it is more incumbent still upon the Government that villages which have no railways and no express offices should be given the transportation facilities necessary for the development of the territory in which they are situated.

I want to draw the minister's attention to how the operation of branch lines retards the trade of the country through which they pass and which they serve. Let me illustrate what I mean by giving the rates on the Caraquet railway. The hon. minister perhaps knows that at Caraquet and Shippigan there are large fishing firms and that the products of the fisheries in that section is a very large one. The through rate of freight for export of dry fish from Shippigan to New York is 30 cents. The portion charged on the Caraquet railway for seventy miles is nine cents, the seventy miles being from Shippigan to Gloucester Junction, and from Gloucester Junction to New York, a distance of 765 miles, the rate is 21 cents. Thus we have an arbitrary charge of nine cents for seventy miles when the rate for the balance of the route to New York for export is twenty-one cents. Let me also give the rate for canned goods, not for export but for local consumption. The rate from Tracadie to Gloucester Junction, a distance of seventy miles is fifteen cents, and from Gloucester Junction to Montreal, a distance of 533 miles, the rate is twenty-three cents. That is what we are charged on branch lines and that is retarding the business interests of the country which those branch lines serve. If the Intercolonial was managing the branch lines, as has already been pointed out, much of the necessary expense of managing sixty or seventy miles could be done away with. Therefore in view of the whole situation and in view of the fact that the policy of both parties is the same, surely there is no possibility of the conjecture made in the press being realized that there is an intention to lease or sell the people's railway, the railway which was built as a part of the compact joining the provinces by the sea to the western provinces. Much has been said to the effect that this railway does not pay the interest on the capital invested, but is that any answer? We do not expect the canal system to pay any interest, and are the Maritime provinces not the best customers of the manufacturing centres of Canada? Are the Maritime provinces not among the best customers of the manufacturers of Ontario? Do we not use, per capita at any rate, as large a proportion of the manufactures of the great cities of Montreal and Toronto as any other part of the country? I hope there is no truth in the suggestion that it is the intention of the Government to lease or sell the Intercolonial. There have been many alarms of that kind in the past, but they have always turned out to be not well founded. I hope that when the Minister makes his statement it will be along the lines of what he said twelve months ago, namely, that he will go on with the policy laid down by the Liberal party, and amend where it is not suitable, so that branches can be taken over in an equitable and business-like manner as between the Government and the owners of the branch lines.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not intend to argue upon the general principle contained in the resolution which has been under discussion this afternoon and evening. I think it is freely admitted by members on both sides of the House, as it is certainly admitted by the people of the country generally, that a trunk line of railway is not a financial success unless it is fed by branch lines. If we look over the history of railways in this country we will find that they are fed by branches, and that until those branches were built the main trunk lines were not the financial successes that their promoters hoped they would be. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the county which I represent is situate the city of Sydney, which is the eastern terminus of the Intercolonial. It is the home of the great steel and coal industry of the Dominion Coal and Steel companies. There is one part of the county of Cape Breton which is very well served by the Intercolonial railway, but there is another and more important part of that constituency which is not benefited by the Intercolonial railway, or by any other road. During the last session of this Parliament I brought to the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals the condition of affairs in the eastern part of that constituency. The city of Sydney has a population of 18,000 or 20,000 people. It is the terminus of the Intercolonial railway. To the east of the city of Sydney we have a population, including the town of Dominion and Glace Bay and the mining centres of Louisburg and so on, of well nigh 50,000 people. Those people have a railway known as the Sydney & Glace Bay railway. It is operated by the Dominion Coal Company, not as a traffic railway, or as a passenger railway, but as a coal carrying concern. I pointed out to the minister at that time that these 50,000 people in South Cape Breton had to pay a double tariff on all freight which came into that part of the riding. I also pointed out that there was a remedy of two kinds which might be availed of; first, that the Government should obtain running rights from Sydney to Louisburg, or that they could take over the railway which runs from Point Tupper to St. Peter, as a branch line of the Intercolonial railway, and extend that railway to Louisburg through the magnificent country of the Miras, Gabarus, Louisburg, Morien, Glace Bay and into the city of Sydney. If the minister has not up to this date investigated the conditions there as I pointed them out, he should undertake it at once if he has the business capacity we are led to believe he has. I understand that representations have been made by the Board of Trade of the city of Sydney to impress upon the minister the necessity of taking over the railway from Point Tupper to St. Peters and extending it to Sydney. I apprehend that in the interests of South Cape Breton and of the whole of Cape Breton island, the better plan would be to take over the whole of this branch line and extend it as indicated. It has been said by certain people that the Government should not take over branch lines which would not be feeders but milkers of the Intercolonial railway, but I would point out to the minister that so far as that branch line, and the extension of that line is concerned, it will be in no wise a milker of the Intercolonial railway, but in my estimation will be of inestimable benefit as a feeder. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton has pointed out that the island of Cape Breton is separated in two parts by the Bras d'Or Lakes and by the St. Peters canal. The eastern part of that island has no railway communication which is of any benefit whatever to the people. We have, some 15 or 20 miles from the village of St. Peters, which is at present the terminus of the St. Peters road, the harbour of Louisburg, which is open to navigation for twelve months in the year, and which I may say is one of the finest harbours in the world. We have there a grand country, rich in minerals. The provincial mining reports are filled with literature showing the vast resources of that territory. If the Intercolonial railway were extended to the town of Louisburg, it would be instrumental in developing these mineral resources, as well as the farming and fishing industries. After leaving Louisburg, we come to the most thickly populated portion of Nova Scotia, and a portion of that population is catered to by the Sydney and Louisburg railway. As a convenience to the people of that district, this railway is not only absolutely worthless, but in some respects a burden, because it simply makes the people of this district pay as much freight for the forty miles between Sydney and Louisburg, as they would pay from Montreal or Halifax to Sydney. I want to point out to the minister, the counties of North and South Cape Breton are the best paying portions of the Intercolonial railway. The Auditor General's Report for the year ending 31st March, 1910, gives the full earning of the freight and passengers as follows:

Montreal	$736,883 18
St. John	594,346 30
Halifax	833,674 17
Sydney	801,679 46

It will be seen that that portion of the Intercolonial railway which operated in the Sydneys is second in earning capacity to no portion of the Intercolonial railway. But that is not all; the local cost of handling business in the city of Sydney is only $32,603.51, as compared with over $98,000 in the city of St. John and $109,393.91 in the city of Halifax. I have not the figures of the cost of handling freight and passengers in Montreal, but I dare say they are at least in proportion to the cost in St. John and Halifax. The net standing of these three terminals, St. John, Halifax, and Sydney, is as follows:

Sydney.. .. ..$789,676.95
Halifax.. .. .. 724,300.26
St. John.. .. .. 496,117.68

Therefore, so far as the earning capacity of the Intercolonial railway is concerned, the Sydney end of the railway is the most paying portion of the road. I do not lay it down as a principle that because that is so, we should get any better terms than any other territory, through which the Intercolonial railway runs, but I do maintain, and I put it to the Minister of Railways as a matter of justice, that this being the case we should get at least as fair a deal with reference to railway facilities as is given to other portions of the Intercolonial railway, and which I do not think we are getting. I have good reason for believing that if this branch line were taken over and extended to Sydney it would be a very material factor in building up a far greater trade in the eastern section of this country than we have at present. It would develop untold mineral resources, resources that are lying latent at present for want of transportation facilities; it would develop one of the very finest agricultural regions in eastern Canada and it would also develop some of the very best fishing centres in the Maritime provinces. It would give to the present population of 50,000 people a far better chance of living, and of getting their freight without the enormous cost they are compelled to pay now. It would in addition to that bring to that country, with the development of the minerals, fisheries and agricultural resources, a population which I believe would be double what it is at the present time. Now I am not in a position to state whether the hon. Minister of Railways has taken this proposition into consideration. I say he should take it into consideration, not because there is any need of it—and the need is there—but because it is a good proposition.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not propose to speak at very great length. I may say that though I did not have the opportunity of hearing all the debate to-day, I admire the energy, the capacity and the confidence of my hon. friend the member for Westmorland, who has again this year laid before the House, the hon. Minister of Railways and the Government, the necessity of doing something in regard to this question of branch lines. I doubt very much, however, whether any result will come from my hon. friend the Minister of Railways or from this Government; and the reason is because, when my hon. friend will not merely refuse to consider the question of purchasing branch lines or taking any steps in the way of acquiring them, but will actually throw over propositions that have been entered into by previous ministers, to which the faith of the country has been committed, and will decline to do anything with them, there is not much use in my hon. friend from Westmorland coming to the Minister of Railways and asking him to propound a general proposition. In my constituency there was under operation, in good faith by the department, in furtherance of an agreement which had been arrived at and pending, legislation being passed, a line of railway for six miles connecting a very large coal mine.

Mr. COCHRANE: Had it been signed?

Mr. MACDONALD: It had been agreed upon in general terms between the Minister of Railways and the company having the contract.

Mr. COCHRANE: You said it had been entered into.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend wants to escape from his responsibility to the community, because the minister had not actually signed the document and because the legislation had not passed Parliament, he is welcome to do so. That is not a legitimate reason to put forward. If my hon. friend decides upon a policy to-day in his department, he certainly would not decline to assume the responsibility for that policy because he had not signed some paper. He declined to operate that line of railway which the Government of Canada were obtaining without the expenditure of a single cent of money or without committing the country to any obligation of any serious character, or which would weigh against them in any way. In furtherance of the understanding that had been arrived at, there was put into operation the railway which gave service to the people interested. When my hon. friend found that that was so, and that there was really a branch line projected which had come into existence, my hon. friend was so much opposed to branch lines and the scheme advocated by my hon. friend the hon. member for Westmorland, that he withdrew the train service, and although the people interested have importuned him from that day to this, my hon. friend told us in this House a few weeks ago that he could do nothing and would do nothing in regard to it. Take another proposition for the construction of a railway in the constituency of my hon. friend from Guysborough, where his leader had pledged not only the faith of his party, but his personal honour, to the people of Nova Scotia in regard to the construction of that branch line of railway, where in addition to the pledges given by men whose word carries great weight, you consider that the Government previous to that of my hon. friend had gone so far as to actually spend a portion of the vote that had been given for the acquirement of a line of railway that formed part of that proposition, what does my hon. friend do when he comes into office? The first thing he does is to try to stop the payment of the cheque to the company which had sold that railway to the Government. When he found that he could not stop it, my hon. friend proceeded to give to the people who live along that line of railway, which is part of the Intercolonial to-day, no satisfactory accommodation, none of those privileges and none of those rights, which are accorded to men who live along the line of the Intercolonial. He stands and his leader stands absolutely slated, refusing to recognize the pledge to the people of the province of Nova Scotia, and declining to implement in any way the numerous promises given by their leader and by their candidates in the counties interested in regard to these matters. Now, I say to my hon. friend from Westmorland, although I admire the energy which he has displayed and the information which he has given to the House, that I think all his energy and all that he has said has fallen on deaf ears.

Mr. COCHRANE: What you have said is doing so.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is surely not going to take that position, that the people who happen to live in one province of the Dominion are to be told they are not to have those privileges, those rights which come as a matter of natural consequence from the operation of a railway system by a government or a company, I care not what it is, because there happens to be a trunk line of railway running through a particular section of the country. Is the policy of this Government and of this Minister to be that at no time are the people who control that trunk line of railway to be allowed to obtain the control of the branch lines in connection with it, or to go on with the construction of additional branch lines and open up the country outside of the trunk line of railway? Let me remind this House as I have already done in the past, that there is this duty thrown on the Government controlling the operations of the Intercolonial, that as the country through which that railway passes develops, as the possibilities of satisfactory conditions arising through population increasing or through the development of industrial conditions come along, it is the duty of the Government to go and give the people interested necessary railway communication. The Government alone can do so; and if my hon. friend will not give it to the people, why does he not give running powers over the system to the transcontinental systems of the country? I know there are hon. gentlemen who say the Government ought not to do so. As a Nova Scotian, I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and to the Premier of this country, coming from the same province as myself, that they have no right to stand over the Intercolonial, and decline to give the people, who are interested in branch line communication, some business connection with the rest of the country. When they refuse to do so, I say as a Nova Scotian that we want the transcontinental railways to have running rights over that piece of railway called the Intercolonial railway, so that if my hon. friend will not give the people interested in these branch lines accommodation, the transcontinental systems of this country may be asked to do so. They will do so. If the Grand Trunk railway, the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian Northern railway were operating the Intercolonial railway to-day, they would deal with this branch line proposition; and the two branches to which I have referred, which my hon. friend and his Government have declined to deal with, would have been put into operation long ago by any one of the great corporations of this country. And if he will not do his duty, if his leader, though from that province, will not do his duty, then will he give the transcontinental systems of this country a chance to come in? He should give us in Nova Scotia a chance to go to the transcontinental railways and ask whether they will not give the accommodation to the people which he refuses. If he will not do one thing, let him do the other. The interests of the people of the Maritime provinces cannot be thrown away, they cannot be disregarded in this fashion. My hon. friend can spend millions in localities to further the local interests of premiers and other gentlemen who look forward some day to going back for re-election; but he will not spend one-thirtieth part of the amount he is willing to dump into one constituency, to give to the people of three or four constituencies, the commonest facilities for their business needs. That is the situation, and hon. gentlemen on the opposite side will not venture to deny it. They cannot deny it.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness): At this late hour, I do not wish to lengthen this discussion, but merely to make a few remarks. I will not go into the history of the case, for that has been attended to by other members who have spoken. But there is one particular branch line in which I have an interest. I may appear selfish in devoting all my remarks to that particular branch line. Had it been at an early hour, I would have led up to it through more general considerations. I refer to the line running from Orangedale, in the county of Inverness, to the harbour at Cheticamp in this same county. I brought this matter to the attention of the House last year, in discussing a resolution similar to that which we have before us to-night. I accompanied a delegation from that county last session who waited upon the minister to impress upon him the importance of this line. After laying the matter before the minister, and, I think, impressing him with the importance of the line from a transportation standpoint, I suggested that he send an engineer from his department to look over the line and find out if all our representations were not true. The engineer went to the county, travelling over the line; and I am glad to say that he has—at least I believe he has—made a very favourable report. While in the county he took occasion to report to every second man there that it was a wrong thing that this line had not been built long ago, that the resources of the country would fully justify its construction, and that it would now surely be built. I happened to get some figures which I believe will bear out my statement that the engineer has placed in the hands of the minister a report favourable to that line. I must refer to a few of the industrial developments that would go on as a result of building this line. The first is the dolomite areas at Whycocomagh. These areas have been looked over very carefully by the engineer, and he was quite satisfied that a large industry could be developed at this place. I may say, the development of this mine has been delayed on account of lack of railway facilities. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company, have found this property of such value that they have purchased it. I think hon. gentlemen will agree that this institution does not buy anything that is likely to prove valueless. They would look into the property carefully before purchasing. They have purchased this property and I have no doubt at all, with a view to developing it. But, under present conditions, that is impossible; development must await railway facilities. Then, we find at Lake Ainslie, a first-class deposit of barytes. The engineer reported on that, I believe, and I think it will be found that an estimate was made by several engineers of the amount of barytes that could be manufactured and shipped from these deposits. They say that fifty thousand tons a year could be shipped. It was found that it would be possible to find a market for that amount; and, so far as the quantity in the ground is concerned, it is unlimited. Certain capitalists have gone in there and have erected a plant. But they found great difficulty; the great question to be the matter of transportation. But, in the face of all their difficulties, they have done considerable work there. They haul the product to the Inverness railway, a distance of eight or ten miles by boat in summer, and over the lake ice in winter, and ship it over the Inverness railway and then over the Intercolonial railway. Hon. gentlemen who are aware of the great cost of transportation over two railway systems can realize the difficulty this company has to contend with. On the other hand, if they had the railway accommodation that this proposed line would give them, they would certainly ship much greater quantities. We come then to the large coal deposits of Ste. Rose. The estimated exportation of coal from this mine is 600,000 tons a year. That, I understand, is the estimate of the engineer. It is a first-class property, the coal is of first-class quality, almost in inexhaustable quantities. We cannot hope to have work done at this place, because there is no possibility of getting the coal on the market except by this line or extension of the Inverness railway north. The Government has spent sums of money to improve harbours along Inverness coast, but harbours cannot meet such demands as those which exist at Ste. Rose, inasmuch as we are not blessed with such harbours as are found along the southern coast of Nova Scotia. As we go north in the county we come to gypsum. The gypsum in North Inverness is now regarded as important. It is more important since a large plant has been erected, and even now, in spite of all the difficulties, they are manufacturing and shipping on the average between 75 and 100 tons a day. I understand that the manufactured article sells between $8 and $12 a ton. Any one acquainted with the almost unlimited quantity of that mineral, its first-class quality, and the large demand for this product in the markets of the world, will understand that, with railway facilities, an almost unlimited industry could be developed.

I may say that the fishing resources of this part of the country are most important. I am sorry I have not the statistics at hand, but I referred to this matter last year in detail. The value of the fisheries along this coast last year was in the vicinity of $100,000, but that is only small as compared with our hope for its development if we had the modern facilities for placing the products of the fishermen upon the market, and in a marketable condition. We have no refrigerator cars, and our only way of sending fish to the market is by way of salting. As the hon. member for North Cape Breton, and the hon. member for Bonaventure have pointed out, the handicap to the fishermen of having to salt down their fish is almost insurmountable. I am positive that although fish to the value of $100,000 are being exported from this part of the country if we had railway facilities the amount would be five times as much.

The forest wealth of the country is quite important. It has practically received no attention up to this time, because we have no railway facilities. I have not referred to the farming industry of that section of the county to be served by this proposed line. From Orangedale through Whycocomagh, the Lake Ainslie, South West Margaree and through the settlement adjacent to the Margaree river, Grand Etang and Cheticamp, are found the finest farming country in eastern Canada. The Margaree valley is known to everybody acquainted with the island of Cape Breton as a splendid farming district. I have confidence in the business capacity of the Minister of Railways, and I feel that with the report he has in his possession, obtained by his own representative—a gentleman selected by himself, and no doubt possessed of ability to do the work—I feel that this branch of railway will be built from a business standpoint . He has laid down a condition last year which I am satisfied this particular line will measure up to, and I am confident in leaving it to his own very exacting judgment. If he will give the matter about ten minutes attention, he will see this is a project that he must grasp as a business man. I must call the atention of the House to the fact that I had the promise of the late Government to construct this line of railway, and I did not go on my knees to that Government to induce them to build it because of desire to strengthen my political position. I placed it before them as a business matter, and they saw clearly that this was one case in which they would have no difficulty in discerning the necessity for action, and it was quite evident that the construction of this line of railway meant increased earnings for the general system of the Intercolonial railway.

I feel I should lay particular emphasis upon the business value of this line. I do not propose to reflect upon the other lines, and I know that the road advocated by the hon. member for Richmond is an important line, and that its extension to Louisburg will be of great benefit to the district concerned, as well as to the Intercolonial railway. I hold, however, there is not one branch line which possesses the merits of this line from Orangedale to Cheticamp, and I am prepared to substantiate this not only by actual facts and figures, but from the report of the engineers sent out by the Minister of Railways himself. I trust, therefore, he will be governed by this report, and I feel sure that realizing the necessity, he will take the proper steps in the matter.

There are several other matters in connection with this railway to which I would like to refer—matters which, I am sure, would help to convince the Minister of Railways of the absolute necessity of definite and immediate action; but, as the hour is late, I do not wish to further impose upon the indulgence of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: I presume I need not preface my few remarks on this matter by saying that the subject is not a new one. Having given some study to the condition of Canada in its general development, I look to the great development of the eastern part of Canada during the next five years, and to its improvement in every regard. We have been growing at a very rapid rate, and devoting a great deal of our energies, first to bringing people to Canada, to assist in the cultivation of our untilled millions of acres, and then, as the corollary, in carrying out the duty we owe to these people in giving them transportation facilities, that they may be contented and happy in their new location, and reap the reward they ought to obtain as pioneers in a new land. The eastern part of Canada is, to my mind, showing signs of great revival, and I think that any student of latter day affairs, if he looks closely into this phase of Canadian activity, will agree that unless some blunder is made, the dawn of a greater prosperity in the Maritime provinces and the eastern portion of Canada is upon us.

No one will deny that whatever renders aid to the development of any part of Canada will help and assist the development of the whole country, and we cannot discuss the problem of the Intercolonial as relating only to the people of the Maritime provinces and Quebec. As an Ontario man, I have always contended that the people of the province to which I belong have reaped a benefit, and are now reaping the benefit of the operation of the Intercolonial railway. The people of both East and West reap great benefit from any expenditure we make on our harbours, on our canal systems, and on the deepening of the St. Lawrence, and anything we do to develop any part of Canada must necessarily redound to the benefit of the whole country. The question of branch lines is one which had been strongly urged upon me, when a member of the Government, by the hon. member for Westmorland ; so much so that, in discussing the matter, the hon. member for North Toronto, now Minister of Trade and Commerce, instead of helping me along with the matter, was rather facetious in saying I was trying to get rid of the importunities of the member for Westmorland. In the introduction of the first measure involving the taking over of branch lines I must admit I did not have the sympathy of hon. gentlemen in opposition that I expected to get. I want to make two exceptions—the present Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, favoured the Bill I brought in, and the member for Cumberland spoke strongly in its favour. Aside from these, I think I did not have much support from the Opposition. The Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, in replying to some of the criticisms directed against the measure, said he accepted that Bill as the acceptance by this House of the principle of the leasing of the branch lines of the Intercolonial. The Bill was discussed and finally passed by the House. The Senate, I think, introduced some amendments; we did not accede to the amendments, but had a conference; and substitute clauses were introduced and the Bill went through.

The subject is one not easy to deal with —and in this my sympathies are with the Minister of Railways—but it is easier to deal with now than when it was first introduced, because it has passed through a good many difficulties that were then in the way, or which can be more easily met now than they could at that time. However, it is not without extreme difficulty as I will point out. This Bill was introduced. In endeavouring to carry out that measure we found that owing to the different conditions of the various roads, some in fair condition and some run down and scarcely operated, some paying, some not paying, some that would pay, some that would never pay, some that would be revenue-producing, some that would be a burden, it was almost impossible to frame an Act that would apply to all the railways and work it out. In the session of 1911 we went a step further and introduced a resolution naming several lines of railway.

There are two conditions existing: in Quebec and in New Brunswick there are branch lines in existence; in Nova Scotia, generally speaking, they need branch lines where they do not exist. These conditions had to be met in different ways. Consequently estimates were placed before the House for the construction of several lines in Nova Scotia where lines did not exist, where, I believe they ought to be constructed. I will go further than that. When I first entered this House, after studying the question carefully, after looking at the vast revenue, after being impressed with the need of transportation, which to-day is perhaps the great need of the people, I decided that even where it will not pay, the Government of Canada ought to undertake to give the people of Canada reasonable transportation for their products and themselves. That applies to some lines possibly in Nova Scotia, I shall not discuss in detail these various lines. There is no doubt about the business principle involved in the case of those that would pay. They should undoubtedly be acquired, but in that province, particularly where the Intercolonial is the only trunk line, where it took possession of all the good paying territory in the years gone by, practically pre-empted the paying territory, the through traffic, if it is not to help in the branch lines there is no help for the people living remote from the trunk line because no company, except in the expectation of selling to somebody, will undertake to build a branch line unless it is sure of a return in some way. That being the case, in Nova Scotia, I recommended building several lines in that province, some of which would pay and some would not pay for years. But, in the first place, the people would have the transportation to which they are entitled and it would protect the trunk line belonging to the Government from some other line in later years stepping in and taking what might prove good feeders to the Intercolonial railway. In New Brunswick several lines were under discussion. Some lines in New Brunswick are not being operated properly. I received many letters telling me that some of these roads had been subsidized by the provincial and possibly by the Dominion Government, but had run down, that not a dollar was expended in repair and the people along the lines many of whom had been induced to go in there, perhaps with some small industries, were not getting the service to which they were entitled; during some portions of the year the roads were closed down. That was not fair to the people of Canada. If we had not the revenue, if we were not paying subsidies, if we were not priding ourselves that we were spending more money than any other country of the same population in providing transportation facilities, there might be some excuse. But with the existing circumstances and the advancement of the last few years there was no excuse. Consequently I recommended leasing some lines in New Brunswick as a start, and I did not confine myself to lines I was sure would pay. In Quebec I recommended the leasing of certain lines. This resolution was placed before the House. The Vale railway, to which reference has been made, is a small line running from New Glasgow out six miles. The people are not accommodated along the road by the company, they merely haul the coal. I entered into a tentative agreement, subject to the approval of Parliament, with these people that we would make a certain provision with them for their freight rates for a number of years for their product and the road would become our property. I thought it was good business from the standpoint of the Intercolonial railway and it certainly was a boon to people along the line. The resolutions then introduced were a start only but they carried out the principles of the Bill adopted by this House in 1910 and put in a practical shape the requirements or the details of the propositions we were prepared to make with regard to these particular lines. Possibly the conditions attached in this Bill for these lines would not have applied to some other lines but these were the lines indicated and I want to call the attention of my hon. friend from Westmorland to one or two which he said should be taken over; they were included. The railways included in that resolution were:

The Quebec Oriental railway, extending from Matapedia to Paspebiac, a distance of about 100 miles;
The Hampton and St. Martins railway, extending from Hampton to St. Martins, a distance of about 30 miles;
The Albert railway, extending from Salisbury to Albert, a distance of about 45 miles;
The Moncton and Buctouche railway, extending from Moncton to Buctouche, a distance of about 28 miles;
The Caraquet railway and Gulf Shore railway, together extending from Bathurst to Tracadie, a distance of about 85 miles.
The York and Carleton railway, extending from Cross creek to and beyond Stanley, a distance of about 10 miles;
The International railway, extending from Campbellton to the St. John Valley at St. Leonards, a distance of about 113 miles;
The Cape Breton railway, extending from Rivière du Loup to Connors, a distance of about 30 miles;
The Temiscouta railway, extending from Rivièee du Loup to Connors, a distance of about 113 miles;
The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, extending from Sackville Junction to Cape Tormentine, a distance of about 30 miles;
The Elgin and Havelock railway, extending from Elgin to Havelock, a distance of about 28 miles;
The Kent Northern railway, extending from Kent Junction to Richibucto, a distance of about 27 miles;
Including the company's rolling stock in each case.

There were certain provisions attached to that resolution. It was a resolution, as hon. gentlemen know, that had to go through the Committee of the House and if the details would not be applicable in every case and they were fairly restrictive I admit, they could have been changed in committee. The reason this did not become law is quite evident. Another large subject loomed up on the horizon and many Bills, dear to our hearts as ministers and members, were slaughtered. But I absolutely stand by the principle as to taking over the branch lines in New Brunswick and in Quebec and building new ones in Nova Scotia. Surely where they will be of assistance to the Intercolonial railway and in addition to that, where the people ought to have the transportation, and we in the Dominion of Canada owe it to these people to give them the proper transportation in these sections——

Mr. COCHRANE: Do you still adhere to leasing or would you purchase?

Mr. GRAHAM: It would all depend. I see the force of my hon. friends contention. In some cases I would lease, in some purchase. I would approach it as a company would approach a branch line company desiring to acquire its property.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Minister of Railways refer to long leases, for 99 years?

Mr. COCHRANE: Or on a percentage basis.

Mr. GRAHAM: The conditions existing would govern.

Mr. HAZEN: The regulations provide for leasing.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I said it provided for leasing as a start and I picked out these particular lines. But it concludes by saying that it does not mean that we had to lease any of those if we could not make proper arrangements. My hon. friend will read it on page 5958 where he will see the conditions. If those could not have been leased on proper terms, then I would certainly have come to the House and asked for power to purchase some of the lines. But it does not change the principle, and that is what I am discussing just now. If the Government is going to retain the Intercolonial as a trunk line, it ought, in the interests of the people, look after those sections that are distant from the trunk lines. There is something further I wish to say to the hon. Minister of Railways. If he is going to dispose of the Intercolonial railway he ought to get the branch lines.

Mr. COCHRANE. There is no notion of disposing of it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad to hear that. But if that were contemplated, and I appeal even to those who are in favour of disposing of it, it would be better business to have the branch lines of that railway when negotiating with a company than to leave it open so that some other company could secure them. It would be a better property with the branch lines under the control of the owner of that property than it would be without them.

Now, there are other points in connection with this matter that I might discuss, but it is pretty late. I just want to add, and I do no wish to make any political reference, that as Minister of Railways and Canals in the late Government, I approached the question after a good deal of thought and discussion as to what was the best thing to do. Any person who thinks this is a small problem to work out is very much mistaken. The details cannot be absolutely decided until you come in contact with each road separately. It is not a small thing to do, but this Parliament has approved of the acquisition of branch lines, or of a portion of them at least, and we ought not to hesitate, we ought not to delay. One hundred years ago it was a different proposition, but railway communication in Canada to-day is looked upon as almost as necessary as the ordinary road which passes our doors, and the man who is removed from railway communication is out of the world to a large extent, so far as making money out of his calling is concerned, or in any other way. I would strongly favour any measure that would proceed to carry out that principle. The details are a different matter. I am prepared to discuss the details when they are laid before the House, but I believe the Government should not hesitate to provide for the people of Nova Scotia where they have not proper railway facilities in connection with the Intercolonial, and that in New Brunswick he should take over a certain number of lines, perhaps not all at once, but year by year, looking first to the lines that are not giving good service to the people, and next to the lines that would pay the Intercolonial. Perhaps that is putting it rather strongly, but one who has travelled over the country where they have not proper railway facilities, cannot but feel that the first duty of the Government is to provide good railway facilities for the people who have not them at present. Other people have not the facilities perhaps that they would have on the Intercolonial system, but the people who have no facilities or next to none ought to be our first care. The Temiscouata railway is one I had in contemplation and it would have been of immense value to the Government and to the Intercolonial system. The Dominion Atlantic is perhaps in the same catergory. We have been asked several times why he did not take over the Dominion Atlantic. That will perhaps come up for discussion later on. I was always under the impression that the Dominion Atlantic could not be acquired by the Government owing to certain information that was given to me before it was discussed by the Government. Probably the Canadian Pacific railway had arrangements quietly under way which precluded it, but I am not sure of that. However, the principle is all right, and I want to urge the Government as strongly as I can not to forsake the development of transportation in the eastern part of Canada, particularly along the line of the Intercolonial railway, because as I have already said, I look in the next five or six years to eastern Canada and the Maritime provinces surprising the rest of the Dominion in their development and progress.

Mr. RHODES : We have discussed this question for a whole day. It is a subject of vital importance to the people of eastern Canada as well as to Canada as a whole, and for that reason I regret to have to discuss it even briefly at this late hour. I shall promise, however, to make my remarks as brief as possible. I have followed the discussion on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite with more or less care, and if I have been struck with one thing more than another, it is, not so much what hon. gentlemen opposite have said, but the apologetic tone in which they have said it and their changed demeanour with respect to this question, which, after all, has been more or less a question into which politics have been introduced. As a matter of fact, I think there was a consciousness on the part of most of them that they had not dealt with this question quite fairly in the past when they were in a position to deal with it.

> When the devil was ill the devil a monk would be,
> When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are not doing well politically just now, and I think they are conscious that in the days when they were well politically, they did not prepare for the day of wrath which was coming more rapidly than they imagined, and which did come a little more than a year ago.

Mr. GRAHAM : You are on a branch line now.

Mr. RHODES : The hon. member for Bonaventure was broad enough to acknowledge the fact that we have a businesslike and progressive Administration on this side of the House, but even he exhibited in the mild way in which he discussed this question, the very consciousness of which I spoke a moment ago. I have here his very words. He said with respect to the building of a branch line in the county of Bonaventure, 'the time has surely come when this railway project should be taken up seriously by this Government.' That word 'seriously' implies one of two things, either that the matter was not taken up at all by him while he represented that county on the Government side for a period of ten years, or if it was taken up, it was not taken up seriously. It seems to me that that implication in his speech is an evidence that he had that consciousness when he spoke. With respect to the hon. member for Gloucester, I was not able to follow his remarks very closely, but I have here a memorandum of one remark which he made. He said with respect to the question of handing the Intercolonial railway over to a private corporation, that the people of the Maritime provinces would not stand for it. I want to commend the hon. member for Gloucester to the hon. member for Pictou, who was reported in the press a few days ago as having stated his firm conviction that the salvation of the Maritime provinces lay in the handing over of the Intercolonial railway to some private corporation to be run. That juxtaposition is another evidence of the harmony, or the lack of it, that exists in the political family of the Opposition, that harmony that has been boasted of so often in days gone by. Another evidence of the harmony was seen in the remarks of the hon. member for South Renfrew, who is thoroughly optimistic regarding the opportunities in the East and the prospect of something being accomplished in eastern Canada during the next five years. The hon. member for Pictou was pessimistic and so they were in disagreement on that. Then, the hon. gentleman from Guysborough could not be in his proper frame of mind if he were not complaining; he complained in the first place that the hon. member for Bonaventure was kind enough to give credit to this Government for a business administration, and he then complained of the remark of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) who said the Minister of Railways was a man who did things. I would refer to the hon. member for Guysborough to the statement made by the late president of the Halifax Board of Trade, one of the most prominent Liberals in Nova Scotia, who said in my hearing at Halifax, at the same time affirming that he was a Liberal, that in the present Minister of Railways, Canada had the greatest Minister of Railways she had ever had.

Mr. CARVELL: Tell us about the branch lines.

Mr. RHODES: If the hon. member for Carleton would permit me to say so, so far I have discussed branch lines just as much as the hon. gentlemen opposite, with this difference, that what I say is absolutely correct. If the discussion that has taken place to-day meant anything at all, it must have meant merely an affirmation of the principle embodied in the resolution which is before the House, because I submit, and here I come to the crux of the whole matter, there has not been on the part of a single hon. gentleman opposite one suggestion as to how this desired end was to be brought about. No solution has been offered as to how we are to acquire these branch lines; no single branch line was mentioned or data given with respect to it which would lead this House to believe that that branch line ought to be taken over. The hon. member for South Renfrew was good enough to recall the circumstance that I supported him, when he introduced the resolution in this House with respect to acquiring branch lines. I did make a few remarks on that occasion, and the position I then took I take now. I cite a few words of what I then said:

> I quite agree with the hon. member for South Lanark that the passage of this Bill will mean the approbation by this House of the principle of the acquirement of branch lines.

I do not think I need labour the argument on the question of principle. I believe that the acquiring of branch lines is as vital to the welfare of a trunk line of railway as are the roots of a tree to the growth of the tree itself. I believe we are only beating straw in discussing this question of principle upon which we are all agreed, and it seems to me that if this discussion is to be of any value at all, we must propound some solution. Let me say that if the hon. member for Westmorland, who was Minister of Railways for a number of years, and who supported the Liberal Administration for fifteen long years, had devoted as much energy to the practical acquiring of branch lines during that period as he has in exhibiting his vocabulary to this House since his Government went out of power, many branch lines of railway which to-day are privately owned would be a portion of the Government system of railways in this country. Their conscience is evidently hitting some of the hon. gentlemen opposite; they realize that when in office they did nothing with respect to this matter and they expect us to do in fifteen months more than they did in fifteen years. The hon. member for Bonaventure spoke eloquently with respect to the beautiful waters washing the shores of his constituency and how they were teeming with fish, but the fish were there in just as large a quantity four years ago. He told us that there was not a refrigerator car in Bonaventure county, and that complaint was as true two or three years ago as it is today. Did he make any practical effort while he was a supporter of the late Administration to remedy that condition of affairs? I think not. And, if this discussion is of any value at all, in view of the fact that we have had no practical effort made to solve the problem, it has only been a reaffirming of a principle which has been many times accepted by this House. In view of the lateness of the hour, so far as I am myself concerned, I would prefer to deal with this matter at another period of the session. I feel also, in view of the circumstances that the Prime Minister has been mentioned at different times to-day in terms which would call for a reply from him, I would be justified in moving the adjournment of the debate. For example, the hon. member for Guysborough said the position of the Prime Minister with respect to this question was indefensible; the hon. member for Westmorland had some comments to make on the lack of action on the part of the Prime Minister with respect to this question. The right hon. gentleman is unfortunately not in a position to be in the House to-night, and I know it is his wish that he should have an opportunity of discussing this question before it is disposed of. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. EMMERSON: I think we all recognize what the adjournment of the debate means. It means sending this resolution to the graveyard of resolutions, where they are never heard of and will never be resurrected. There is no resurrection day for motions that are adjourned in this way. I think, before that action is taken, with the presence of the Minister of Railways in the House, it is due to him, as it is due from him to the country, that he should make some observations with respect to the subject matter of the resolution. Naturally, we all regret that the Prime Minister is not able to be in the House, but my hon. friend from Cumberland need not for a moment put that forward as a reason why we should adjourn the debate, because the right hon. gentleman would never have an opportunity of discussing this resolution if the debate should be adjourned. It would be futile for me to attempt to oppose the motion but I think out of courtesy to the Minister of Railways the debate should not be adjourned until we have had some explanation from him as to the consideration that has been given to the subject by his department and by the Government.

Mr. ROGERS: I am rather surprised that at this late hour my hon. friend would try to detain the House further. I think the motion of the hon. member for Cumberland is quite in order, except in view of the fact that the First Minister is not able to be present to-night. We all know the deep interest the right hon. gentleman takes in the affairs of the Maritime provinces and I am sure that he will desire to take an opportunity of seeing that this resolution is not relegated to any place that will not give him an opportunity of dealing with it before the close of the session. I am sure, in view of the fact of the Prime Minister's absence, my hon. friends opposite will not desire at this late hour to continue the debate.

Mr. COCHRANE: I may say that I certainly would have made any observations or remarks I wished to make to-night, only that I am sure that the Prime Minister will not want to let some of the statements made by the mover of this resolution go unchallenged.

Mr. GRAHAM: When conditions were reversed a year or two years ago, the present Prime Minister insisted when we asked for an adjournment of the debate, and the then Minister of Railways promised that the motion would be brought up again in the House. If the hon. gentleman who is leading the House will say that this motion will have a place where it can easily be brought up again, it will settle the matter.

Mr. ROGERS: I have already said that I am sure the Prime Minister himself would be anxious to bring it up, as he takes a deep interest in the welfare of the Maritime provinces, and he will be very much interested in this question.

Mr. GRAHAM: If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, that is not answering my question at all. For to-night, this is the Prime Minister opposite me; so far as this House is concerned, he is leading the House. The Prime Minister, of course, would take opportunities to make remarks which would exclude the further discussion of this question with the exception of his remarks. Now, the hon. gentleman who is leading the House can say that this motion will be brought up again for discussion, or he need not do so. Of course I cannot compel him to. If the object of the adjournment is not to put the resolution at the foot of the list, my hon. friend has power to say so.

Mr. ROGERS: I may say to my hon. friend that there was no notion or intention on my part of placing this motion at the foot of the list. I think he should be satisfied with the statements I have already made; and knowing the conditions as he does, I am sure the Prime Minister will be anxious to take an opportunity of discussing this matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the Prime Minister were here he would say 'yes' in a moment to my request.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, January 21, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

APPOINTMENT OF TRANSLATOR.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, as to the appointment of Mr. Louis Noailles as translator in the Translation Branch of the House of Commons, presented to the House on Tuesday, the 14th inst., be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 84, to amend the Exchequer Court Act. He said: Under the Patent Act as it now stands, a party applying for a patent, where the patent is refused, has the right to appeal to the Governor in Council. The purpose of this Act is to substitute the Exchequer Court for the Governor in Council for the purpose of such an appeal. I think the reason why this change is deemed desirable may fairly be considered to be obvious. Apart from giving an appeal to the Exchequer Court and giving the Exchequer Court exclusive jurisdiction in these appeals, the Bill refers to the Exchequer Court any pending appeal or appeals.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPRIEVE OF YACOLOFF.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Would the hon. Minister of Justice kindly afford the House some explanation with regard to the report of the other day concerning the reprieve of the man Yacoloff, who was to have been executed on Friday? I do not intend to cast any doubts upon the expediency of the action taken by the court to criticise the manner in which the court was convened. But many people desire to understand what has been done in the case of this man, who, as I understand, had already been reprieved for the third time and now is granted still another reprieve. I understand that there is a report from the medical authority in the case that the man is insane.

Mr. DOHERTY: The circumstances under which this reprieve was granted are these: It is true that there had been a previous reprieve, in fact, two previous reprieves. The first was very early, and under circumstances which certainly involved no hardship on the accused, and called for no explanation. The second one was granted because it was then represented that the man was insane, and not in fit condition to be executed. The court granted a delay of two months to enable the parties acting on behalf of the accused to establish that condition. This being done I took steps, to ascertain as far as possible the condition of this man. I obtained reports as to it. The two reports did not agree, and I think I am quite safe in saying that neither of these reports were to the effect that the man was absolutely insane. The parties representing the accused, so far as I was aware, did nothing towards establishing insanity. Under these circumstances the information that I had before me was not, in my judgment, sufficient to justify intervention. At the last moment, the day before that fixed for the execution, the parties representing this unfortunate man communicated with me, and it appears from what they said that their inaction was due to what was an entire misunderstanding, and they represented that if it were not for this misunderstanding—which, as I understand, was as to the effect of the reports—they would have been able to establish conclusively facts demonstrating their affirmation of this man's insanity. I did not think that I should, with that suggestion of insanity, and with this positive affirmation that the inaction was due to a misunderstanding, allow the execution to go on without affording an oportunity to the representatives of this man to establish, it they could, their statements in regard to his condition. Of course, in an ordinary case a last-moment representation of that kind would probably be entitled to no consideration, but the information before me, while it did not establish a case for intervention, did present some indication that the representation that the man was insane might possibly be susceptible of establishment. It was not possible at that moment that the Government could, because of the absence of His Royal Highness the Governor General, pass and have approved an order for the reprieve. But under Article 1063 the judge of the court has power, for any reason that he deems sufficient, to reprieve any prisoner, and I felt it my duty to lay before the judge what seemed to be a quite sufficient reason why he should reprieve the prisoner and to request that he should do so. I take it there can be no doubt that, so far as the judge is concerned, the representation and request I made to him was an amply sufficent reason for his action, and so far as the responsibility is concerned, I take that responsibility entirely upon myself. I say that because I understand there has been some—perhaps not criticism, but some suggestion that there might be room for criticism of the judge's action. I wish to make it perfectly clear that I put the matter before the judge, under the circumstances I have indicated and made the request above mentioned, and I feel that whether I was right in doing so or not, he had under the circumstances, ample reason for doing what he did.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As I have raised the question in regard to this matter, I wish to say that the explanation of the hon. Minister amply justified him and the judge in acting as they did.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC THREE PER CENT BONDS.

Bill No. 76, respecting the purchase by the Government of the Grand Trunk Pacific company's three per cent bonds.—Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance)—read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved second reading of Bill No. 36, respecting Banks and Banking. He said: When I introduced this Bill to the House I referred at some length, at greater length, indeed, than I had intended, to the principal changes which had been introduced in the revision. It is not my intention to go over the ground which I covered upon that occasion. This Bill is to be referred to the Select Standing Committee upon Banking and Commerce, and all who desire to be heard will there receive a hearing. The Government recognize the importance of this measure, and any proposal of a practical character put forward before the Banking and Commerce Committee, which will improve the Bill, will receive, of course, full discussion and most careful consideration.

I think it has generally been admitted upon the occasion of the revision of the Bank Act in connection with the decennial revision that the present Act has, on the whole, worked very well, and given satisfaction. I desire to point out very briefly to the House the increase which has taken place in connection with the business of banks during the past 20 years. The total amount of assets of the chartered banks of Canada are to-day about one billion five hundred million dollars, about six times what they amounted to in 1891, and about three times what they amounted to in 1901. Deposits have kept about a similar pace. Deposits with the chartered banks of Canada are to-day about $1,000,000,000, representing about six times the amount on deposit in 1891, and three times the amount on deposit in 1901. The amount of current loans and discounts is likewise about $1,000,000,000, representing, curiously enough, the same proportion, about six times what it was in 1891 and about three times what it was in 1901.

There are two matters to which I particularly desire to refer, supplementing what I said upon the occasion of the introduction of the Bill. The first is as to the provision in the Bill respecting audit, and later I shall talk for a little while upon a question not immediately connected with the Bill, but which was referred to during my presentation of the Bill to the House, that is, the question of the Dominion note circulation, about which there appears to exist a good deal of misunderstanding on the part especially of a certain section of the press. The provision as to audit in the proposed new Act is designed of course to afford an additional safeguard to protect the banks themselves, the shareholders and the depositors, against fraud and dishonesty on the part of officials of the banks. Since the last revision a number of failures of banks have taken place in Canada, and the question has been very much discussed in the press and otherwise, as to whether some system of inspection, either by the Government, or by the banks, or some system of audit might not be useful to obviate a recurrence of such failures.

With regard to Government inspection, which has been put forward on more than one occasion, in my judgment, in connection with a system of banks such as we have in Canada, it would be entirely ineffectual and illusory. It would create a false sense of security in the minds of the public and, I think, in the minds of the shareholders of the banks, and I think it would tend to relieve the directors from a sense of responsibility which I think they should have respecting the administration of the affairs of a bank. There has been some confusion of terms as between the words 'inspection' and 'audit.' 'Audit,' I think, technically refers to a verification or checking of work that has been done, of work completed, or of statements made. 'Inspection,' in public estimation at least, implies not only audit but also an investigation and pronouncement as to the character of the assets or securities of an institution.

At the outset, I desire to call the attention of the House to what I regard as an undoubted fact, that the very essence of banking is the loan upon personal security, upon personal credit, as opposed to loans upon security such as the loan companies make, or such as insurance companies make, or in which insurance companies invest their funds. In other words, the primary purpose of banking is to loan upon personal security, and the very basis of the character of a security, that is to say, notes, note discounts in the banks, is the character and standing and reputation of the parties making those notes. That goes without saying, I think, but attention has not been sufficiently called to it. I desire to emphasize that feature that of $1,500,000,000 of assets of the chartered banks of Canada no less than $1,000,000,000, or between $900,000,000 and $1,000,000,000 consists of current loans and discounts, discounts of commercial paper throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion.

There is another feature of our bank system to which I desire to call attention, because it is impossible to discuss the question of audit without referring to it, and that is the geographical distribution of the branches of the Canadian banks throughout the Dominion and elsewhere. As the House knows, the branch system of Canadian banks is the English and Scotch system as distinct from the American system, which is not a branch system. The Canadian banks to-day have no less than 2,800 branch banks in Canada and about seventy-seven branch banks outside of Canada. These branches are distributed throughout the Dominion and I hope I may not weary the House if I indicate where they are situated, as the subject is important:

Ontario	1,075
Quebec	467
Nova Scotia	110
Prince Edward Island	14
New Brunswick	75
Manitoba	196
Saskatchewan	372
Alberta	254
British Columbia	224
Yukon	3

It will therefore be seen that there are nearly 2,800 branch banks distributed from Halifax to the Yukon across a continent as large as Europe. In addition there are seventy-seven branches of chartered banks outside of the Dominion. There are branches in Seattle, Spokane, Portland, I think, Vancouver, and in Mexico. There are many branches in the West Indies, Cuba, Porto Rico, and, in Newfoundland, there are thirteen.

Mr. EMMERSON: How many in New York?

Mr. WHITE: I think that in New York there is no branch in the technical sense; there are agencies. I do not know how many banks have agencies but most of the principal banks would have agencies in New York city.

Mr. EMMERSON: How about Minneapolis?

Mr. WHITE: I am not able to say whether they have agencies there, but I am rather inclined to think that there are none; certainly very few. In connection with the proposed inspection by Government, I desire again to emphasize these two points, first, that loans upon personal security form the very essence of banking and current loans and discounts form sixty per cent of the entire business of the banks and, secondly, that Canadian branch banks are widely distributed over the Dominion and outside of the Dominion. I therefore am of the opinion that it would be quite impossible for this, or for any Government to institute a system of branch bank inspection. It would be ineffectual, it could not be efficient, it could not pronounce intelligibly upon the character of the loans because I am sure I need not point out to the House that in order to pronounce upon the character of loans made all over a country such as this a knowledge would be requisite of local conditions, of industries, of companies, of men and of the entire mercantile and commercial conditions of Canada. That work, as far as the banks are concerned, is carried on to-day by their staff. The local manager knows the local situation. He is authorized, speaking generally, to make loans up to a certain amount. When he makes a loan up to a certain limited amount, $1,000, $3,000 or $5,000, he promptly informs the head office and usually sends a statement of the affairs of the party. When application is made for further sums, up to $10,000, he makes a recommendation that goes to the superintendent of the particular district in which the bank is situated, British Columbia, Manitoba, the Maritime provinces, or any other province, and the inspector of the district, the manager so to speak of the district looks over the recommendation for the proposed loans and he passes it on to the head office with his recommendation. Then these loans are taken in hand by the head office officials, given further consideration and if they are approved, the credit is extended and the necessary authority given. Generally speaking, that is the system that the banks themselves adopt in regard to the making of loans to individuals and I submit in answer, not to anything that has been said in this House, but to what has been said in certain portions of the press, that Government inspection, for the reasons which I have given, would be entirely ineffectual and illusory. It would only have the effect of creating a false sense of security upon the part of the public. I desire to say here—I may have occasion to say it again—that the best security of the public must always be the integrity and ability of the officers and directors of the chartered banks. Notwithstanding certain failures that have occurred, I personally hold the view that the officers and directors of the chartered banks are men of a high order of ability and integrity.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many failures have occurred since the last revision?

Mr. WHITE: I will come to that matter shortly. This matter of an audit or inspection is not new. It came before the House twenty years ago in the decennial revision of that period when the then Minister of Finance, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, brought in a bill in which he provided for a system of audit. I desire to read for the information of the House a few statements then made with regard to the question during the course of the debate which then took place. I hope the importance of this subject will redeem my words from dullness because I am dealing entirely with a business subject.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: Sir Richard Cartwright, upon the occasion of the introduction of the Bill by the Minister of Finance made the following remarks:

I can conceive of no possible mode by which any auditor or inspector can ascertain the real intrinsic value of the notes which a bank discounts, which form by far the greatest portion of its assets, and whose value depends entirely on the solvency and standing of the men who make them. I have never, myself, been able to see how that difficulty was to be overcome; and I think that the Government, in making any of these provisions, should take special care to see that bank shareholders and the public are not lulled into a false security by the idea that the proposed audit system, or any other that can be devised, will secure good management and care on the part of the banks.

The Hon. Edward Blake, who followed Sir Richard Cartwright said:

As to the audit system, I must say that I concur in every word the hon. member for South Oxford has uttered. I agree that if our present system of auditing is in any respect defective in theory, if it does not provide an adequate legislative recognition of the duty of the shareholders or the authorities to secure a proper audit, we ought to make such a legislative recognition. But with reference to most institutions which are engaged in enormous transactions in the lending of money, especially to those lending money on personal security, I hold that it is absolutely impossible for any auditor to make an audit which will indicate the real position of the bank.

That was the opinion of Mr. Blake. Then there are similar opinions expressed by a number of speakers and among others by Sir Donald Smith, now Lord Strathcona, Canadian High Commissioner. After the discussion the then Minister of Trade and Commerce said that, in view of the representations that had been made to him in respect to the audit clauses he had decided to withdraw them. There is just one further reference to the past and that is to a speech of my predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, made in 1900 upon the occasion of the decennial revision of that year. The question was raised by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce if any attempt had been made to strengthen the position of depositors in these banks by way of increased government supervision in any way. The answer of Mr. Fielding was:

No, Mr. Speaker, I think that the Finance Ministers who preceded me found great difficulty in adopting any system of government inspection.

The difficulties which then existed seem to have continued. As to these difficulties, the chief are the two I have mentioned: in the first place, the impossibility of Government auditors pronouncing upon the character of current loans and discounts; in the second place, the immense number of branch banks which would have to be inspected, necessitating not only a very large staff even for audit, but, to be absolutely effectual and scientifically correct, an audit practically upon the same day. I may say that the branches of the chartered banks in Canada have increased since 1900 at the rate of about three or four a week. In 1890, the number of chartered banks in Canada was, I think, only three or four hundred. That was the position upon the occasion of the last revision.

Since 1900 there have been a number of failures of chartered banks in Canada: the Bank of Yarmouth, total assets $820,000; the Ontario Bank, total assets $17,000,000; the Sovereign Bank, total assets $18,000,000; the Bank de St. Jean, total assets $914,000; the Bank of St. Hyacinthe, total assets $1,580,000; and the Farmers' Bank, total assets $2,000,000. Speaking generally, the record of the Canadian chartered banks in the matter of failures, has been of the very best. True, a large number of banks have failed, but they have usually been comparatively small banks. I do not wish to say for a moment that the smaller bank affords less security than the larger bank; it depends entirely upon the management and the character of the business done. But the record of Canadian banks shows that the total losses, so far as the public are concerned, that is to say, the noteholders and depositors, have been less than one-half of one per cent upon the total liabilities of the chartered banks of Canada at the time of the failure. I think that will appeal to the House as a very fair record, notwithstanding the number of failures of comparatively small banks which unfortunately has occurred. In view of the failures which have taken place since 1900, the question of affording additional safeguard against fraud and dishonesty has been canvassed publicly, and the banks themselves have given a good deal of attention to the matter. One of the pioneers in this was the Bank of Nova Scotia. The late general manager of that bank introduced a system of audit very similar to that which I have introduced into the present Bank Act. Before touching upon that I desire to point out certain phenomena in connection with bank failures which I would ask the House to bear in mind in considering the effectiveness of this head-office audit which I propose.

In the first place, I desire to call the attention of the House to the system of bank inspection which is in vogue in the chartered banks of Canada to-day, and which might be described as a system of internal audit, whereby the head office is kept advised of the transactions of the branch offices and under which the transaction of the business of the banks is safeguarded in these branches. Some of these banks have not only an inspecting system but an audit system, and some of them combine the two and they have an inspector or inspectors who not only inspect the banks—that is investigate all the loans, check over the securities, make reports on the current loans—but who actually audit the accounts of the several branches. Under that system the banks keep a very careful check, so far as head office is concerned, upon the administration and business of the outside branches. I took the trouble to look very carefully into the system so as to satisfy myself how far it went, and I find that in some of the larger banks—I have no doubt it is the system in vogue generally—the inspector visits the branch offices and not only checks over cash and securities and notes under discount, but he looks very carefully into the loans, considers the statements made by the borrowers, and generally he advises the head office with regard to the character of these loans and the character of the entire business of that branch. In the bank failures that have taken place in Canada, it will be found that the inspection system of the banks—that is, their internal audit system—has worked fairly well, because the fraud and dishonesty which have wrecked Canadian banks have been generally—always, so far as I know—not at the branches, but at the chief office of the bank.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: As a general manager, or a president active in the affairs of the bank, has prevented the inspector or been able to prevent the inspector from making a thorough inspection of the head office accounts and has been able to keep concealed from the inspector and other honest officers of the bank the true state of affairs, and has gone on with speculation or peculation, or fraud, until the bank has come to grief, I desire to make that point, because it has a bearing upon the provisions which I have introduced respecting audits. That is to say that up to date, so far as we can judge, the inspection carried on by the banks themselves has been effectual so far as branch offices are concerned, and, the trouble has been at the head office.

Coming back to what was done by the Bank of Nova Scotia, and what is done by one or two other banks as well to-day, we find that a system of head office audit has been introduced, the idea being that the auditor appointed by the shareholders, being unable of course to audit all the branches of the bank to which I have referred, audits at head office the returns made by the inspectors to the head office of the bank. In addition to that of course, he audits carefully the head office, and he checks the cash, securities and vouchers of the head office of the bank. The advantage of that check is two-fold. In the first place, there is the positive check of an auditor going over the accounts at the head office and verifying entries and checking over securities, so that he is able to report to the shareholders that the statement presented for their consideration at the annual general meeting is correct and represents the true position of the bank so far as his information and belief go. I will read the form of that auditor's report from one of the banks, which at present adopts the system. It is appended to the annual statement:

> We have examined the books and accounts of the bank at its head office and at five of its principal branches, and have been duly furnished with certified returns from the remaining branches, and with all information and explanations required by us. The bank's investments and the securities and cash on hand at the branches visited were verified by us at the close of business, November 30, 1912. And we certify that the foregoing general statement of liabilities and assets as at November 30, 1912, is in agreement with the books, and in our opinion exhibits a true and correct view of the state of the bank's affairs, according to the best of our information and the explanations given to us.

Further, in connection with that, in taking up the question of an audit which might afford not an absolute safeguard, because an absolute safeguard is impossible—as I said, you must rely in the last analysis on the ability and integrity of the officers and directors of the bank—but a safeguard which would protect , afford protection from at least some of the irregularities which have occurred, in fact from most of them, I considered very carefully the question of English legislation upon the same subject. I find that under the English Companies Act of 1908, there is a provision similar to the one which I have embodied in this Act:

> That every company shall at its annual general meeting appoint an auditor or auditors to hold office until the next annual general meeting; if an auditor is not appointed, then the board of trade may on the application of any member of the company appoint an auditor.

The powers and duties of the auditors are substantially the same as in the Act which I have presented to the House. The important words which I have quoted from the auditor's report, which I have just read, are that the balance sheet, which has been the subject of the audit, 'exhibits a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs according to the best of the information and the explanations given to us.' I may say that appears for the first time in the English Companies Act of 1908.

I think I can make this general statement, that the provisions for audit incorporated in this Act, with the changes which have been rendered necessary by reason of our different situation, put us substantially in the same position as the most advanced legislation in British countries. I believe that the provisions in Australia are the same as those which I have read from the English Companies Act; and the latest amendment, as I have indicated, to the English Companies Act is in the year 1908. I am hoping, therefore, not only for the very great positive check this audit would have, but for the very great advantage of the moral check. I know myself, speaking from my own experience, and I have said this before, that the moral effect of a firm of auditors going into an office and making an investigation, and the knowledge that that investigation will be made and that the accounts will be checked, with the risk of detection of any irregularities, is very strong upon any staff. Therefore I am hopeful that this provision will be effectual in preventing certain frauds which have unfortunately and most calamitiously occurred in the past. Take the case of the Ontario Bank to illustrate. The general manager of that bank was engaged in speculation in New York. He had, I believe, duplicate accounts at the head office, and the head office was not inspected by the inspector of the bank. Monies would be remitted to New York, and of course they would be charged to the correspondent in New York and credited among the assets of the bank at Toronto. Those monies were lost, but no entry was made showing the loss. Further monies would be sent, similar charges made to the correspondent in New York, and credits as a balance owed from New York at the head office. That went on until, according to the books of the bank, very large amounts were owed to the bank from New York. These of course stood, so far as the books were concerned, as an asset of the bank; but in reality the money had been lost in New York. The correspondent appeared to be reliable enough; but no inquiry had been made by an auditor as would have been done in the usual course as to the amount of money which the correspondent held at the credit of the Ontario Bank. Any auditor, in verifying the assets, especially so far as they consisted of balances, would have communicated with the banking house or correspondent shown by the books to be indebted to the bank, and would have asked them to verify the amount of the balance in which they were shown to be indebted to the bank. Therefore an audit of head office, with the right which we have given to auditors to go into any branch, because that is expressly given, and make an investigation, will, I think, tend very much more effectually to safeguard the business of the bank than has been the case in the past. Just let me repeat that, that in addition to verifying the returns from the branches and inspecting the head office itself, the chief office of the bank, the auditors, if anything of an unusual character attracts their attention or excites their suspicion, may investigate the office of any branch; and in that way become aware how the business is carried on there, and whether everything is in correct order or not.

There is one other feature. Following the English Act, and I believe the general principle that the shareholders are the proprietors of the bank, just as they are of a company, I have made the provision that the shareholders shall appoint these auditors. Let me point out in connection with the failures of Canadian banks that the loss has principally fallen upon the shareholders. Noteholders, except in one or two cases, or perhaps three, have been paid in full. Depositors, with the exception of the Farmers' Bank, which is still in liquidation, and a few others in which a comparatively small dividend was paid, have been paid in full or a large percentage of their claims. Therefore, the loss has fallen almost entirely upon the shareholders. Now, banking is a business, and, like any other business, ought to be conducted on business principles. The proprietors of a bank, those who put in their money and take the risks, are, of course, the shareholders; and it would be but a trite observation that it is in the interest of the shareholders that they should take every precaution to safeguard their own interest. Under the theory of the English law—and, I may say, the theory of the law of the most of the provinces of Canada, because the same system is in vogue with regard to loan companies and trust companies and others—the auditors are particularly the representatives of the shareholders, and properly so. I was asked, on the occasion of the presentation of this Bill, whether the directors might not, by proxies held from the shareholders, in reality appoint the auditors. That, of course, is quite possible. But I have two osbervations to make in regard to that. The first is that, under the provisions of the Act, notification must be sent to the shareholders at least ten days before the meeting at which the auditors are to be appointed, and thus every shareholder will know who are nominated as auditors for the coming year. The second is that, so far as I know, there are no cases on record of collusion between the directors of banks and the auditors. The losses have taken place, as I have indicated, principally at the head offices, through the general manager or some head official going wrong. So far as I know—I speak subject to correction —that there is no case of a board of directors being in collusion with the auditors. This is true not only of the banks but of the loan companies. I may be wrong, but at least no such case has been brought to my attention. The directors are large shareholders, and are as interested, or should be as interested—apart from collusion or fraud—in having a proper system of audit as any of the shareholders, whether minority or otherwise. Therefore, it seems to me, the board of directors would not be likely to use its influence to have a firm of auditors appointed who would, in collusion with the officers of the bank or with the directors, conceal transactions of a criminal or dishonest nature.

Now as to giving of proxies that is a matter of convenience. Shareholders of our banks living in different parts of the country and in different parts of the world, must attend the annual general meeting in person or by proxy. If they decide not to attend in person, I do not know of any legislation that will compel them to attend. And if they desire to give a proxy to any individual, an attorney or even a director, to represent them, based upon the confidence they have in that attorney or director, so far as I am concerned, I can see no reason to apprehend any abuse of that elective power. Further, in order to safeguard the interest of shareholders and depositors, there are of course, very severe penalties in the Act, and we have added to these to a certain extent. An offense against the Act is punishable by five years' imprisonment; and we have in addition to the provision I have read, introduced a further provision making directors liable for negligence. Under the existing law, as I explained to the House when the Bill was introduced, a director is not liable for negligence; there has to be brought home actual knowledge. The onus is upon the Crown, I think, to show some actual intention, some guilty knowledge on his part. It was, I think, the intention of the Act as originally drafted to provide liability for negligence, but, by reason of certain decisions of the courts, liability for negligence disappeared. We have attempted in this Act to impose a penalty for negligence on the part not only of directors, but of officers, inspectors and of every person who has to do with the management of the bank.

With all these safeguards, I certainly hope that the Bank Act has been materially improved. I realize of course, that dealing with an Act which touches so vitally all the interests of the country and under which chartered banks possessing assets to the amount of a billion and a half of dollars, are operating, it is wise, if that Act has given satisfaction, not to tamper with it unduly. That would be my view. In other words, we should make haste slowly in regard to changes; we should feel our way trying to improve as each revision is made.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the punishment for negligence?

Mr. WHITE: It is punishable with three years' imprisonment. Negligence, of course would have to be shown. I think that, on one hand, the Act should not be so drastic as to prevent good, capable business men from giving their ability to the administration of banks, and, on the other hand, it certainly should be emphasized that when men take upon themselves the responsible duties of directors not only of banks, but of other institutions, they are really in the positions of trustees for the shareholders, and a very high order of diligence should be demanded of them. And this is particularly the case when the public are interested, as they are in the case of banks.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): The hon. gentleman says the audit system was more or less founded on the system adopted by the Bank of Nova Scotia?

Mr. WHITE: No, I said, in substance, the Bank of Nova Scotia has been the pioneer in adopting a system of inspection, which might be described as a system of head office inspection, but in which the auditors had access to all the reports of the inspectors of the banks and might, in their discretion, visit any of the branch banks and make inspection.

Mr. LANCASTER: Is there anything in the Bill that would prevent the offices of manager and president being held by the same person?

Mr. WHITE: There is no change in that respect in the Bill. If my hon. friend desires to raise that point before the Banking and Commerce Committee, I need not assure him, he will receive a full hearing, and we shall be very glad to discuss it.

Mr. LANCASTER: I know that it is not usual for the offices of president and manager to be held by the same person, but there is nothing in the law to prevent it being done. I think it would be well to forbid by law the holding of these two offices by the one person.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman is correct in saying that this is not generally done. But there are one or two cases—one at least—in which the president and general manager are the same man.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any definition of 'negligence'?

Mr. WHITE: I need not tell my hon. friend, who, I understand, has been a judge, and is learned in the law, that the courts have never defined negligence, and that it is unwise, I think, to attempt to define it. I would say negligence is a question of fact, and it is impossible, I think, to lay down any rule as to what is or is not negligence. No doubt a law could be enacted under which certain acts could be held or deemed to be conclusively negligible, but nothing like that has been provided. The word 'negligently' is used, but whether a director has or has not been guilty of negligence is a matter of fact, and will have to be determined with due regard to all the circumstances under which he has been placed. No doubt the question will arise as to his diligence in attending meetings, in examining reports, and as to whether any notice has been received by him as to any irregularities, but it would be quite impossible for anyone to define what is negligence or what is not. My hon. friend will probably agree it would be unwise to attempt it; at any rate I have not attempted to do so in the Act.

So far as the question of government inspection and audit is concerned, I think that is all I have to say on this occasion. Upon the introduction of the bill I referred to the additional safeguards which had been thrown around the incorporation and organization of banks, and I think it unnecessary for me to retrace that ground again. A question has been asked me as to whether all the banks should not guarantee the deposits of each, in the same way as the note circulation is now guaranteed. I think it would be a sufficient answer to point out that the deposits of the chartered banks of Canada amount to no less a sum than a thousand million dollars, and that the circulation of a fund of five per cent would necessitate the deposit of fifty million dollars, to say nothing of the real objection to such action, which is that it is not good law to make all the banks responsible when they have no hand in the administration of each for the losses which might arise through maladministration.

Mr. NESBITT: That is what you do with reference to the bills issued.

Mr. WHITE: Bills are in a very different position. It is of the utmost importance that they should circulate as legal tender, and be subject to no depreciation. That is a very valuable privilege given to the banks—that of circulating their notes to the extent of their fully paid capital, and in the fall, during the crop moving period, to a certain percentage of their capital and reserve.

Mr. NESBITT: But they all pay out a certain amount which guarantees any one bank.

Mr. WHITE: It is absolutely limited in amount to the paid-up capital and to the percentage of capital and reserve, and therefore the amount is definite; and not only that, but these notes are coming in from time to time through clearances, and are redeemable in gold; and the Canadian Bankers' Association has, under the legislation, general supervision over the note issue of the several banks.

Mr. ROSS: Does my hon. friend think the privilege of having the note issue of the banks guaranteed as great a privilege as having a monopoly of the deposits of the people?

Mr. WHITE: I think they are entirely different. The notes are in a different class from the deposits, because, as I say, they circulate from time to time in the hands of the public, and the public, whether depositors in a particular bank or not, take these bank notes, and it is absolutely necessary that some provision of a very strong character should be made, whereby those notes should be absolutely redeemable; hence the provisions in the Bank Act that all the banks contribute to a fund, limited of course in amount, because the note circulation itself is limited to the amount of paid-up capital, with the exceptions I have mentioned; whereas in the case of deposits there is practically no limit, and if all the banks guaranteed all the deposits of each, a number of the banks would be inclined to be a great deal more reckless than they have been. They would be able to obtain deposits on the guarantee of all the banks, and if all the banks had no hand in the administration of each, the result would be the anomalous position of the well-managed institutions becoming responsible for the maladministration of illy-managed banks. I do not think legislation of that kind has ever been proposed in a British country, but it is in operation to-day in one place, and it is breaking down there. The one place in the world where that legislation is now in effect is in the State of Oklahoma, and the result is that all the banks, or a great number of them, are taking out National Bank charters.

Mr. ROSS: Is it not optional there with the banks?

Mr. WHITE: It is legislation, and the banks, to avoid it, are taking out National Bank charters. It seems to me the mere statement that all the banks should be responsible for the administration of each without having any voice in their administration, is not only anomalous but absolutely unsound and unfair. It seems to me that cannot be controverted.

Mr. McLEAN (Sunbury and Queens): Has the hon. minister considered the question of relieving the shareholders of banks from the double liability?

Mr. WHITE: I have not considered that, and there is no provision for it on the Act. I think, having regard to the fact that the public attach very considerable importance to the additional security of the double liability, that in dealing with the banking situation of Canada as it exists to-day, it would be exceedingly unfortunate to disturb it. If we had not the past or the present to deal with, but an entirely new situation, it might be advisable—I do not say it would be wise—but it might be advisable to consider the propriety of limiting the liability to the amount of paid-up capital, as in the case of corporations, because, undoubtedly, a larger number of people would then be likely to invest in bank shares.

Mr. McLEAN (Sunbury and Queens): How is the law in the United States as regards liability?

Mr. WHITE: I am unable to say what the law of the United States is in this regard. There are so many special and state bank laws that I do not recall at present what the provision is with respect to the liability of shareholders under the National Bank system, but I am inclined to think there is no double liability.

Now, I come to one other matter which, while not directly dealt with by the Bank Act, is cognate, and as to which some questions were asked me before the recess, that is, as to the Dominion note circulation, which is, I understand, $22,500,000 of free money, secured dollar for dollar against gold. There has been a curious misunderstanding on the part of the press, or a certain portion of the press, with regard to the position of the Dominion note circulation, and one journal, the Toronto Globe, has apparently been entirely misinformed with regard to the true position of reserves held by the Dominion and of the Dominion note circulation founded thereon. My attention was called to an article, which is similar to a number of articles that have appeared during a course of months, and I think it well to take this opportunity of pointing out the true facts, so that discussion of this kind, based upon misleading or erroneous information, may be terminated. It is headed: 'Our Needless Gold Reserve,' and reads:

It will be unfortunate if the Dominion Government fails to end the financial folly of taking gold out of one hole in the ground and stowing it away in another. The Dominion has outgrown to a ridiculous extent the law regarding the gold reserve for the redemption of Dominion notes. It requires a gold reserve in the treasury of twenty-five per cent against the first Dominion note issue of $30,000,000, and dollar for dollar against the additional issue. When that law was established the total issue did not seem likely to materially exceed the partly secured $30,000,000. But owing to subsequent growth there is now in the treasury, according to the November statement, $7,500,000 gold against the first $30,000,000 of outstanding notes, and $85,748,000 gold against the additional issue. It is a foolish waste to be thus stowing away gold in vaults.

If the twenty-five per cent reserve were extended to, say, the first $80,000,000 of note issue it would release $37,500,000 in gold now held idle. The holding of this entails a loss of about a million dollars a year. Banking interests are adverse to this change. They do not want the Dominion to make a profit on its note issue. That issue is kept outstanding by the law requiring the banks to hold about half their reserve in Dominion notes. This is of the nature of a forced loan from the banks without interest, but it is the only material charge made for the valuable privileges enjoyed by the banks. They naturally hope to get rid of it by making the Dominion issue unprofitable and thus removing the inducement. The law now makes the Dominion paper issue largely unprofitable through the waste of holding idle gold, and the time is ripe for the needed amendment.

That appeared in the issue of the Globe of December 21, 1912, and is one of a series of articles dealing with the same matter. Now, as I have said, there is a very curious misapprehension on the part of the Globe and of other journals dealing with that question. The fact is that of the amount of gold referred to, $75,000,000 is in the large legals, Dominion notes which are legal tender as between banks of $500, $1,000 and $5,000, and it represents the gold stored in the Dominion vaults convertible at once by the banks. The banks, as I have said, hold these $75,000,000 in large legals. In other words, that amount is not in the hands of the public at all. I desire to say further that there is only $21,000,000 of the entire Dominion note issue in the hands of the public, the balance being the $75,000,000 of large legals and about $18,000,000, I think, of one's or two's which the banks keep for till money. So that in reality the gold is held by the Dominion Government for the banks. The banks have to keep reserve of course. As a general thing they keep about ten per cent, or a little over in Dominion notes and specie instantly convertible into gold for the purpose of protecting against their deposits and the presentation of their notes.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): They are called certificates.

Mr. WHITE: These large ones are called certificates.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): They should be so set out in the returns.

Mr. WHITE: They are so set out in the returns. I have a copy of the returns here, and they show $500, $1,000 and $5,000. The point I am making is that this money is not in the hands of the public. It is simply stored there; partly it is reserve. I think it is not necessary for me to refer further to that.

There is one other matter to which I desire to refer and then I think I shall have concluded my remarks. There has been a suggestion—I do not know how seriously made, but it is certainly interesting reading—that the Dominion should make a very large note issue, of say $100,000,000, $200,000,000, $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 of Dominion notes. I do not know whether it is suggested that those notes should be redeemable or irredeemable, but I suppose they are to be redeemable, because, if irredeemable, they would be fiat money, and I need not tell the House the consequences of the inflation of the currency by issues of fiat money. That matter has been threshed out years ago. We have fortunately the advantage of the lessons of history in that respect, extending over the early part of last century in England until 1844 when the Peel Act was enacted, under which the banking of England, with certain exceptions to which I shall refer, is required to hold pound for pound in gold against its note issues. The financial history of England during the first half of last century is a history of commercial disaster due to inflated paper currency, to inflated note circulation. All the evils flowing from inflated note circulation can be read in the history of that period by anyone who cares to inform himself upon the subject. The same dominant features presented themselves, prosperity, inflation, the demand for gold; and hundreds and thousands of people were ruined, not once, but many times throughout the course of the first fifty years of last century. In the same way the United States experienced the evils of inflated paper currency in the beginning of last century and up to the resumption of the payment in gold in 1878. All the evils I have mentioned as having been present in England occurred in the United States. I took the trouble to look up the history of the greenback and I found that the greenbacks were at a discount of 5, 10, 15 or 20 per cent as the case might be, up till 1878, when the specie payments were resumed. Now, so much for fiat money. I do not understand that anybody suggested that, but certain of the press seem to indicate that that would be a desirable thing in order to supply the needs of the country. With regard to the large issue of Dominion notes against a reserve of say 25 per cent, I desire to place myself on record as absolutely against it on the ground that it is unsound finance.

Mr. EMMERSON: How did it happen that there was in 1878 a resumption of specie payments in the United States.

Mr. WHITE: Well, all those evils that I have mentioned had been present in the United States. As an aftermath of the war of that period currency was at a discount as compared with gold and there were violent fluctuations in the prices of commodities, with the result that the currency in circulation either in that country, or in our country for that matter, would not be accepted as legal tender, but payment was demanded in gold. As a result of that there was an agitation for resumption of specific payment and there came a time when the United States felt that they were in a strong enough position to resume. There was one member of the House who continually said: The way to resume is to resume; that is to place credit on a gold basis and that is finally what was done. Now, I desire to say what I was about to say when the hon. gentleman interrupted me, that it is not sound finance for the Dominion of Canada or any other country to issue its note circulation unless it is secured absolutely by gold. We must not confuse the form and the substance. A Dominion note, that is a promise to pay on demand, a Dominion five, two, or one dollar bill, is only money because it calls for gold and can be instantly converted into gold. Any other finance is absolutely unsound. There is now issued an amount of $22,500,000 unsecured by gold and I say that the issue of that amount under the then conditions was unsound finance. But it was done because the Dominion desired to raise money by the issue of its notes and it was not in a position to pay them in gold when they came in. Therefore, they made a provision whereby the banks were compelled to keep forty per cent of their reserves in Dominion notes so as to hold these notes out. Is the situation in the Dominion safe to-day? I say it is and for this reason. If we read the financial history of the United Kingdom from 1800 to 1844 we find that what was done under the Peel Act of 1844 was substantially this. They asked: How many notes of the Bank of England have remained out in all the panics that have occurred, that have not been presented for redemption in gold?—and they found that there was a certain number of notes that they could point to with certainty as remaining out. Therefore, in the Peel Act, provision was made whereby the Bank of England should, up to that amount, issue its notes as against government securities or obligations but that beyond that they must issue pound for pound in gold. That is the rule to-day. The issue department of the Bank of England is entirely distinct and separate from the other branch and a Bank of England note as secured by gold cannot be issued but as against gold.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Not commercial paper endorsed by another bank?

Mr. WHITE: I am speaking only of note circulation. I am not speaking of notes in the ordinary commercial sense; I am speaking of bank notes. The Bank of England, therefore, beyond the amount of circulation which they can count on for a certainty as always remaining out in the hands of the public, must issue its circulation against gold. Now, take the situation in the Dominion to-day. The one and two dollar bills are the small change of the Dominion, and, as I pointed out a little while ago, from $21,000,000 to $25,000,000 of these notes are in the hands of the public. They are the small change of the Dominion, they are not likely to come in, they stay out and they constitute a constant factor. The amount may be increased in time but it is a constant factor. Up to that amount there is no reason why the Dominion note circulation should not stand as it is without change although in theory it is unsound. But when you suggest that the Dominion note circulation should be increased away beyond that amount, up to $50,000,000, or $100,000,000 or $200,000,000, or $500,000,000 against a gold reserve of from ten to twenty-five per cent of that amount, I do not believe it is necessary to do any more than state that proposition because I think it carries its own confutation in the face of the facts. I must ask the House to excuse me for taking up so much time in connection with the presentation of the second reading. There are a number of minor matters that have been brought to my attention by several hon. members, for instance the registration of liens, that, no doubt, will be discussed in committee or in the House at a later stage. The Government recognize the extreme importance of this measure and we will be glad to consider, in the committee or in the House, if presented in the House, any suggestions of a practical character that will tend to the improvement of the Bill. I have found by experience that if you change one clause of the Bank Act you will find it related to a great many other clauses and therefore I would suggest that any amendment as to detail should be removed rather in the committee than in the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there anything in the Bill about bank mergers?

Mr. WHITE: Yes. I explained upon the occasion of the introduction that I have introduced a provision into the Bank Act whereby two banks cannot merge unless the minister, or, as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) suggested, the Treasury Board,—I would have no objection to that—consents to the boards of directors making the agreement. I pointed out at the time that under the present act the boards of directors of two banks make an agreement first. That is not made public. Then they call meetings of the shareholders and the shareholders approve of the agreement. Then it comes before the Treasury Board and the Governor in Council, it gets the sanction of the Governor in Council and then the so-called merger, or sale of assets to be strictly and legally correct, is complete. It has been found in practice that it has usually gone as far as that the inspectors of each of the banks have spent a good deal of time examining into the affairs of the other and it has gone so far that it is very difficult indeed for the Governor in Council to oppose the merger. Serious consequences might follow, the people might not understand it, it is a very sensitive situation and in order to guard that I have introduced a provision whereby, at the outset before the agreement is entered into, the minister or the treasury board shall give consent.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is satisfactory.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): As I understand it, the provision relating to the audit of the bank is taken from the English Act. In addition to the system of auditing in England or Scotland, have they any system of inspection?

Mr. WHITE: A system of audit is the only system they have adopted in England or Scotland. There is no system of government inspection. There may be a system of internal inspection of some such character as that which I have indicated as being in existence in connection with the Canadian banks. The provision which we have introduced is modelled upon the latest English legislation adapted, of course, to the wide extent and conditions of this country, and which legislation, as far as I know, is as advanced as any similar act.

Mr. ROSS: The hon. Minister of Finance has referred to the Ontario Bank in his statement, and he has mentioned what caused its failure. I would like to ask him if he can tell me whether the assets which the Ontario Bank left of themselves were sufficient to pay the note holders and depositors? I asked the Deputy Minister to give me a statement offhand and he said he thought not.

Mr. WHITE: I am unable to inform my hon. friend definitely as to that. The Bank of Montreal, I believe, took over the Ontario Bank as a running business, and some litigation arose which I think was carried to the Privy Council. It was generally supposed that the good-will of the bank and its several branches was of very great value, and the contest was as to whether the banks which took over the Ontario Bank did not get the best of the bargain. I am not able to say, and I do not think anyone can say, how it worked out, because that would involve investigation as to all the accounts and so on. I should think that the assets of the Ontario Bank were very substantial in character; but whether they were quite sufficient—I am certain they were as to the noteholders—to pay the depositors on liquidation, I am unable to say.

Sir EDMUND OSLER: I think perhaps I can answer that. There was a call on the double liability of the Ontario Bank shareholders, which was responded to pretty well. That paid off the noteholders and all the depositors, and I think from the knowledge I have that there would be a considerable return to the shareholders.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): In the present revision of the Canadian Bank Act, there appears to be more than usual interest taken by the country generally, and therefore I was pleased to hear the Minister of Finance say, on behalf of the Government, that the fullest and frankest discussion possible was desired, and that the Government would consider any amendments proposed, and if they possessed merit would accept them. The practice of Parliament in dealing with the Bank Act is, that after its second reading it should go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce and there be fully considered and again re-committed to the House. I am disposed to agree with the suggestion of the Minister of Finance that on the whole it would be better for those having amendments to propose to the Bill to reserve them for consideration first by the committee. I trust the Minister of Finance will make it possible that there may appear before the committee when dealing with this very important measure, some representatives of the banking and financial institutions——

Mr. CARVELL: They will be there.

Mr. MACLEAN: And also that those having any complaint against our present banking system may have a full opportunity of being heard. By this means, I am sure the country will obtain a more accurate idea of our banking Act, and that I submit, is very important. Like most hon. gentlemen in this House, I am not very well acquainted by practical experience or otherwise with the fundamental principles of the banking and currency system of this country. It is indeed a very complex and difficult subject, and I think only those who have more or less experience in banking and currency and financial affairs generally can have a comprehensive grasp of the subject. I trust, that in the consideration of this Bill and of any amendments that may be proposed to it, the subject will be approached without any political colouring and free from any preconceived notions. It is extremely important that the banking system of our country should be founded upon a scientific basis. It is not a subject for compromise; if we compromise in our Banking Act and fundamentals of economics errors will creep into our banking and currency system, and some day disaster will follow. Therefore, it is eminently desirable that there shall be the fullest and frankest discussion of the matter. So far as I am personally concerned I concur in the remarks made by the Finance Minister, that, after a trial of our present system in this country for a great number of years, it has, on the whole, been found to work well, and has met the needs of the country and of its people reasonably well. I think it has proven effective in many respects in which the banking systems of other countries have failed. Our branch bank system provides an easy method of transferring currency to the various sections of the country, as required at certain seasons of the year. It has had the effect also of mobilizing the cash reserve at certain centres when there is a financial crisis imminent; it has relieved this country almost entirely, with one exception, of money panics, which, in the United States, are of frequent occurrence, and which come in a severe form with almost absolute certainty, at least every decade. Our branch bank system makes it possible to have that unity and co-operation in banking in this country which, with all that may be said against it, is preferable to the independent system prevailing in the United States; the branch bank system gives to Canada, at least the possibility of leadership in banking. I think it has minimized the number of bank failures in this country. The bank noteholders have practically lost nothing, and according to the statement made by the Minister of Finance the loss incurred by the depositors has been on the whole small. Our banking system has given an elastic currency which is very important indeed and which has never failed, although very much strained in 1908. I think it can also be said of our branch bank system that it has given reasonable banking facilities to the country generally, by which I mean that branch bank offices are to be found in almost every town and village of this country, although of course, it may be open to question whether or not any particular office grants sufficient facilities to its customers. It has also affected an economy in the use of currency, which also is a very important thing; but, better still, our banking system has created an almost perfect credit system in this country; and the business of Canada which has grown very rapidly indeed is largely a credit business. I doubt if it would have been possible to have established so sound and almost perfect a credit system, if it were not through the agency of the branch bank system. On the whole I say that system has been a good one, and should not be materially altered, except for good and sufficient reasons. Of course experience has disclosed in our Banking Act certain weaknesses; it has been shown that certain amendments are desirable, that certain abuses have crept into that system which must be corrected by this Parliament; but on the whole as a system it certainly has much to commend it. There are so far as I can gather but three important different banking systems in the world. The first is what is called the Scotch Canadian system; that is a system of a small number of strong banks with agencies scattered over the country; that is the system prevailing here and borrowed, I understand, from Scotland, where that system still obtains. There is the system obtaining in the United States, where they have the individual or unit bank system; they have in the United States to-day I think over 27,000 National and State Banks; it is not a system extremely well thought of in that country by its own bankers; it has often been referred to as being a series of banks and not a banking system. In Europe and in Britain, they have what is generally known among bankers as the central reserve system; there the bank note issue is confined to one central bank; the note issues are made against gold and commerical paper deposited with these central banks by other banks. That is the system at least which prevails in England, France, Germany, and in almost all European countries; it is a system which has stood in France since the time of Napoleon; and it has been a very successful system indeed. It seems to meet and measure the needs of the country. I do not propose to say anything further of a general nature in reference to our banking system; but I desire to devote just a little time to the main amendments proposed by the Bill now before the House for our consideration.

The most important amendment proposed by this Bill is that relating to inspection. This proposed amendment has often been discussed in Parliament before, and has been the subject of a great deal of discussion out of Parliament in recent years. I appreciate to the full the force and logic of the remarks made by the Minister of Finance as to the limitations of any system of inspection which anybody can suggest. Whether that inspection be performed by the Bankers' Association, by shareholders' auditors, by Government or any other agencies, it certainly will have its limitations; it will not prevent insolvency in banking institutions; it is not an infallible system; it cannot be. At the present time the system in vogue among our banks is that of inspection of the several agencies by the officials or servants of the bank itself; and it has been usually referred to as an internal audit. The difficulty in making an efficient external audit is obviously due, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, to the fact that the banks themselves being in control of their resources, loan them out without consultation with any auditor, or any government, or anybody but its officers and the audit follows the loan. Therefore to make any audit system absolutely effective against loss, it would be necessary for the auditor to determine the value of the securities of the bank, and if they were in his judgment insecure, to make them secure as early as possible by an audit, which would obviously be impossible. There is a value nevertheless to inspection, whatever form that inspection may take. This was very well pointed out by an eminent American banker, Mr. James B. Forgan, who as a younger man was I think connected with the Bank of Nova Scotia, and who understands the Canadian banking system fairly well, but who is to-day one of the most successful and eminent of American bankers. In a pamphlet which I have in my hand, he was discussing the efficacy of Government supervision; and I wish to read it because it expresses my own views very clearly, not necessarily upon the point of Government inspection, but as to the general effect of inspection by any person in any form. He says:

> The efficacy of government supervision by examination lies primarily in its restraining influence on bank management. The knowledge that the banks are to be examined holds the officers in check. This followed by the criticisms of the comptroller——

That is the United States Government official who under their law makes the examination.

> —based on the examiners' reports is efficacious in inducing or compelling bankers to comply with the law and with proper banking methods and to face and provide for losses as they occur. This should afford the public reasonable assurance. Such are are the benefits to be derived from governmental supervision and the degree of their accomplishment is the measure of their efficacy. All external supervision is, however, based on the examination and consideration of transactions after they have occurred. It cannot control the making of loans or investments at the time they are made. It has no control of initiative management. It cannot, therefore, be held responsible for errors of judgment or lapses of integrity. Its business is to discover such and its efficacy depends upon its ability to do so. It is at best a human device and in common with all such devices its limitation should not be ignored or forgotten.

So, according to Mr. Forgan, it is possible that considerable good may follow government inspection; and one of the matters for our consideration is the system of inspection of audit which should prevail. Now, the bankers of this country, some years ago, at any rate, were not in favour of any form of external inspection or audit. When the manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia introduced their audit system, I do not think it found favour with the Canadian banking fraternity generally. They took the position that, the shareholders of the bank being the proprietors, it was not a matter of concern to others what system of inspection, if any, was adopted. Now, I do not admit that this objection to an external inspection of audit is sound. The banks of this country receive in deposits from the people over a billion of dollars, three-quarters of which is interest-bearing deposits. They advertise throughout the country their capacity for caring for the deposits or savings of the people. And it is a fact, I think, that practically all the savings of the people of this country are entrusted to the chartered banks. I speak subject to correction, but I believe that the Government savings banks claim only two or three per cent of the total savings of the people of this country which ultimately reach chartered and Government savings banks for deposit. Now, inasmuch as the banks of this country have made themselves the trustees for the people to the extent of a billion of dollars, I think that Parliament has resting upon it the obligation to provide the most efficient form of audit or inspection of our banking system. And the whole question is, what that form of audit should be. Further, as to the contention which the Canadian bankers raise against external inspection and which I mentioned a moment ago—namely that shareholders were the proprietors of the bank and therefore should have the direction of the affairs of the bank, there is this to be remembered: Canada is a large country; it will seldom happen in the banking history of Canada that any shareholders' meeting will attract any fair proportion of its shareholders. Furthermore, shareholders are to be found not only in Canada, but in the United States, Great Britain and other parts of Europe. So, after all, the management of the banks under our system has fallen into the hands, generally, of the manager and directors, or a portion of the directorate. This is an additional reason why Parliament should seriously consider the propriety of placing additional safeguards around those who are shareholders and depositors of our banks. There is this further to say: That, unfortunately, at least in the past, all directors have not manifested that interest in the affairs of their banks that they should have manifested; and unfortunately it is true that many of our banking disasters have been due to lack of interest, and perhaps worse, on the part of some directors. The success of our banking system, the success of any banking system, therefore, is largely determined by the character of the men who are the directors and managers, and the degree in intelligence and honesty they apply to their duties.

Now, I have no doubt there will be a variety of opinions as to the form of audit which Parliament should prescribe in the Banking Act. I admit the full force of every word the minister has said with regard to the limitations, in effect, of any audit or inspection system we may adopt. But still, I venture the suggestion that, inasmuch as the minister admits the desirability, and necessity, of meeting the public demand for some form of additional inspection; inasmuch as the shareholders' appointment of an auditor as proposed can mean little or nothing in this country and that ultimately it must be a directors' audit and not a shareholders' audit; and further inasmuch as experience has unfortunately shown, that all directors do not manifest that interest in their banks which they ought to manifest, and do not consider themselves as holding a high position of trust, the appointment of the auditors for the purpose of inspection of our chartered banks should come from some other source. Other hon. members may have other suggestions to make Personally, I wish to suggest two systems as being preferable, on the whole, to that suggested in this Bill. I say, inasmuch as the Government has decided that some additional inspection must be provided by the Banking Act, I beg to suggest that it would be better for the Government to take this matter into their own hands. Let the Government establish a staff in the Department of Finance, at the head of which shall be a strong man who has had a considerable business and banking experience in this country. I do not say that Government inspection will prevent bank insolvency, or that the reports and inspections of this inspector will be infallible. But I think there would be advantages in the plan I suggest. I believe it would work out a greater uniformity in the form of banking inspection; I think it would have the effect of establishing closer and more confidential relations between the several banks and the official; and I believe that banks, when in difficulties of one kind or another, would rather confide their troubles to such an official, than to an auditor appointed in the manner prescribed by this Bill.

There is another suggestion which is, perhaps, worth considering—although, on the whole, I personally do not favour it as strongly as I do the appointment of an inspector by the Government—and that is the appointment of an auditor or a board of auditors by the Bankers' Association. I have already pointed out the objections to the appointment of auditors by the shareholders. I have said that in the first place you cannot get the shareholders' auditor appointed by any meeting truly representative of the shareholders. I am told that bank directors are almost always compelled to send out to shareholders proxy forms to make sure that there shall be such an attendance at the meeting as will permit the lawful transaction of whatever business is to be performed. I have pointed out also that bank failures are largely attributable to the bank manager or some of the directors; so it seems to me that, to be logical, the appointment of this auditor must not rest with the shareholders' meeting.

There would be another advantage in having a government inspector of banks and a staff for that purpose. I think that the banking Act should contain further provision for the closer inspection of every new bank during its promotion period and for the first few years following its establishment. Our experience with new banks in this country in recent years goes to prove that it is necessary to watch them practically all the time during the first two or three years of their career. If this staff, presided over by a competent man, was created, its services would be available for many other purposes. I therefore think that on the whole, the best method of inspection is not that proposed by the Act, but that we should have inspectors or auditors appointed by the Government and failing that by the Bankers' Association.

I did intend to say a few words respecting bank failures in Canada, but it is hardly necessary that I should, because the minister has very fairly and comprehensively covered the ground. In the United States their experience has not been so fortunate as ours. On reference to some statistics, I find that from 1890 to 1909, that 369 National Banks closed, and only 18 were restored to solvency—an average of over 19 a year. I find also that from 1890 to 1907, 1,376 State banks closed, an average of 72 a year. During that period there has been an average failure of National and State banks combined of 90 a year, with an average loss to depositors of something like $11,000,000, and with great losses to general creditors.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): What is the percentage?

Mr. MACLEAN: I have not figured out the percentage.

Mr. EMMERSON: What is the percentage of the total number?

Mr. MACLEAN: The United States has 27,000 banks, State and National, but I cannot give my hon. friend the proportion.

Mr. ROSS: Does my hon. friend say the average loss to depositors was $11,000,000?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, as relating to State and National banks, from 1890 to 1907.

Mr. ROSS: Is that the average loss of each bank ?

Mr. MACLEAN: No, the general yearly average. So far as bank failures in this country are concerned, I think we have been extremely fortunate, but during the last few years there have occurred some failures which have inflicted great loss and discomfort upon a large number of the people of this country, and if we can throw around our Bank Act any further safeguards in the way of inspection or otherwise, tending to protect the interests of depositors, shareholders and others, and to minimize further bank failures, it is plainly our duty to do so.

I now wish to say a few words with respect to the clause of the Bill relating to the merger of banks. I do not see what possible good can come of the amendment proposed by the Bill in respect to mergers or bank amalgamations. As I understand the amendment proposed by the Minister of Finance, it simply provides that the amalgamation of any two banks requires his consent, in addition to the consent of the Treasury Board now required by law. If that be a correct statement of the law as it now stands, and as proposed to be amended by the present Bill, there really is not a great deal in the proposed amendments. The matter of bank amalgamation has been discussed a good deal by the press of Canada, particularly during the last year, and every one has been obliged to give more or less consideration to the question. The amalgamation of banks is one of the facts of modern business life. Like all amalgamations of business concerns, there are in it both good and bad features. So far as bank amalgamations are concerned, I assume that the vital issue so far as the people of this country are concerned is how the combined resources of the banks so amalgamated shall be used ; whether or not they shall be at the disposal of the people of the country, in the manner and form best calculated to advance the interests of the country and the people. It cannot be said, I think, that under our system, bank amalgamation necessarily limits banking facilities, because we find in Canada such a competition among the different banks in the establishment of branches that it will rarely happen that any particular part of the country will find itself lacking in banking facilities—that is, in the availability of a branch of some particular chartered bank. The question which concerns people in connection with bank amalgamation is whether or not it limits the possibility of legitimate customers securing the banking accommodation they require. Bank amalgamation, I suppose, will continue. It is occurring in other countries. In the United States it is a matter of common occurrence. In England, while in 1813 there were something like 940 banks, to-day there are but between 40 and 50, all practically in London. France has but three large banks to-day with branches throughout every part of the republic, that is outside of the Bank of France itself. Now, banking amalgamation, per se, is not necessarily a bad thing. There have been many instances of bank amalgamation in Canada when it was eminently desirable and important that it should take place. One took place only the other day when the Banque Internationale, I understand, was absorbed by another Canadian chartered bank; and I am sure that that amalgamation was certainly in the interests of Canada and of the business public, and I trust in the interest of both banks concerned. In the cases of the Ontario and Sovereign banks, it certainly was of great importance that they should be absorbed as they were by stronger banks, thus minimizing the loss to their shareholders and depositors. I will go further and say that it is always desirable that a weak bank should be absorbed by or amalgamated with some stronger bank or itself made stronger. This idea is put very clearly in a book, which I hold in my hand, containing an extract from some American financial journal dealing with weak banks. It expresses my view very well. It says:

> A weak bank in the financial system of any state has no more right to continue in business than has a weak bridge in a public highway. The duty of the public authorities and of public opinion in the one case is the same as in the other. Once an element of weakness has developed, the defect in the structure is to be remedied without delay, so as to make it capable of bearing the full weight of its proper burden, or the thing should be closed up. The weak bank takes away legitimate business from the bank that is safe, and does injury to the business as a whole by spreading general distrust. It should therefore be put out of existence. With no less expedition than we put out a fire or block up a highway or suspend traffic on a tumbled down bridge. This is not a case in which sentiment, social standing of officials, or hesitation to sacrifice an old institution that has outlived its usefulness can be considered. If a bank is weak it has either got to strengthen itself or go. The machinery of the law cannot be invoked too speedily.

I thoroughly agree with the opinion thus expressed by that financial journal. In a country where business is largely done upon credit supported by the banks, it is desirable that we be rid of weak banking institutions. But, of course, there is room for protest on the part of the public against the amalgamation of banks individually strong. It is only natural that the public should protest against the concentration of large amounts of capital in the hands of two or three banks, each bank being largely under the control and direction, in the last analysis, of very few men. It is only natural that the public should fear disaster from such concentration of capital, from the placing of such tremendous banking resources in the hands of a few people. It is only natural that they fear the creation of a money monopoly. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to venture at this stage any remedy for such a condition as monopoly, if it now prevails in the country; or if it is likely to occur in the near future. The important thing, I take it, is, after all, that we see that in some manner or other the management and direction of the financial resources of this country are in the hands of competent and honourable men who shall not only remember their duties to their shareholders but the larger and broader duties which they owe to the public at large. I think when we reach a condition in this country when there may be such a thing as a money monopoly, this Parliament, and the people of this country, may well be trusted to work out some remedy which will be quite effective. When the Bill is before the Banking and Commerce Committee I shall have some amendments to propose on this point.

The Bill further provides for the giving of permission to banks to make loans upon stored grain. So far as I am personally concerned, I rather favour the insertion of this provision in the Bill. I do not know that it will widen very much the credit which banking institutions may give to possible borrowers in the western part of Canada, but it is only natural and logical that our Bank Act should contain this provision, particularly in a country like Canada, where our grain is all harvested at one time and where we have experienced, and, I have no doubt, will again, difficulty in having that grain transported by our railway systems from the source of production to the elevators early in the season, thus requiring a great deal of it to be stored locally. Therefore, I think it is only wise and fair and in the interests of the people of certain parts of this country that this amendment should be made to the Act. Some time or other I think it may prove of considerable advantage to western borrowers. The details of this amendment, however, must be carefully and equitably worked out.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Would the hon. member care to give the reason why he thinks this clause will not widen the credit of the banks?

Mr. MACLEAN: The Canadian banks are commercial banks, and, as the Minister of Finance has stated, loans are largely made upon the responsibility of the men applying for them; in many cases bank loans are perhaps moral loans. What I mean is that loans are now frequently made to certain applicants, not upon their material worth, but upon their standing in the community. In the West I should think that to-day loans are made to farmers owning threshed grain, without any banking lien. It is given on their personal credit. The power to give to the bank a lien may not necessarily increase largely the volume of credit given to such farmers.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not true that loans are generally made on statements? Would a bank to-day loan on the standing of a man unless he made a statement?

Mr. MACLEAN: I suppose the statement may reveal the standing of the man. I would be very glad if banks would make a loan merely on statement. I wish now to refer briefly to the provisions of the Bill respecting the establishment of a central gold reserve. I trust that when this Bill is placed before the Banking and Commerce Committee we shall have a very full explanation of this section from the Minister of Finance. I have not been able so far to satisfy myself that it will help very much to extend the bank circulation. I can understand banks desiring or preferring to issue their own notes against gold or Dominion notes rather than to circulate Dominion notes but it does seem to me, though I do not propose to argue it at any length whatever, that the proposal of this central gold reserve amendment does not afford any great opportunity for the expansion of our circulation. Our banks, fortunately, up to the present have been able to give us practically all the circulation which the demands of the country from time to time require.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Oh.

Mr. MACLEAN: I think only in one case were the banks obliged to limit their banking operations owing to a want of circulation and that was in 1907 or 1908 when a momentary stringency prevailed in this country, and in the United States, where practically every bank was obliged to suspend payment, and the result of it was felt through the whole of this country. In that year the Dominion Government were obliged to suspend the Legal Tender Act and they took power to issue under Order in Council, which was afterwards confirmed by Parliament, Dominion notes, not against gold, but against security which was to be made by the banks to the extent of $10,000,000. On that occasion the banks availed themselves of the opportunity of this additional circulation to the extent of a little over $5,000,000 during the cropping season in the Canadian Northwest. There have been from time to time many suggestions as to the best manner in which to give an increased currency circulation and, of course, there must be some method worked out for doing this, because Canada's business progress is very great, her population is increasing very rapidly and there should be an increased circulation. It is hardly likely that if the provision enabling banks to issue circulation to the extent of 15 per cent in excess of their combined capital and reserve were continued in force they would avail themselves of it to any greater extent than possible because I understand that bankers allege that it costs them about 7 per cent, which practically eliminates all hope of the bankers making any profit out of that excess circulation, consequently they will not encourage it.

Mr. EMMERSON: How does it cost them 7 per cent?

Mr. MACLEAN: They have to pay the Government 5 per cent for the issue and this goes into the consolidated revenue fund. Then, they are obliged to print their bills and there would be other expenses. I have no personal knowledge of what it actually costs our banks.

Mr. EMMERSON: The destruction of bills would minimize that.

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, occasionally there might be some profit in that way. The Minister referred to a suggestion which, I think, came from the newspaper edited by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) who, I am sure, we will be pleased to have participate in the discussion of this Bill. It has been suggested by others, that the banks should increase their capital. That criticism has been made of the banks and I think it has some foundation. I think that the banks should take steps, in view of the rapid expansion of business, to increase their capital. This would partially meet circulation demands.

It has also been suggested by others that the chartered banks maintain an unnecessarily high reserve thus taking out of circulation a great deal of money. What force there is in that criticism I would hardly venture to say.

There are a few other matters which I did intend to refer to very briefly. The Minister has referred to the suggestion that some form of a guarantee to depositors be made. It is possible that some system may be worked out doing this without injustice to our banking system, or to the shareholders, or anybody else, but I must confess that I fail to see it myself. I think the suggestion is fundamentally unsound and that it would be hardly possible to work out any such protection to depositors. This is altogether a different question from the guarantee of the redemption of notes. I understand that the circulation redemption fund was not established with the view of guaranteeing notes because they were amply guaranteed in being a first lien on the assets of the bank. Unless that were true I do not imagine that the banks would guarantee to redeem one another's notes. It would happen that when a bank became insolvent a great number of its notes would be in circulation and it would be a great inconvenience to the public, if there were no means of redemption immediately available to note holders. The notes bear interest and they would be redeemed by the bank liquidator at some time, but it would entail a great loss upon a great number of people who would be temporarily out of their money and that was the reason why there came the establishment of the bank circulation redemption fund.

The matter of compelling banks not to issue notes a second time in order to keep the issue as clean as possible is a suggestion which has been frequently made in this country and one which I think has some merits, but it is one which can be discussed in the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Another protection frequently suggested in this and other countries against minority control of our banks is the curtailment of the voting powers of the shareholders of banks, by the way of giving each shareholder but one vote irrespective of the number of shares he holds. That is the regulation and law respecting the voting power of shareholders of the Bank of England and there is a great deal to be said in favour of it. I shall not detain the House at any greater length at the present time, because any suggestions which I may have in the way of proposed amendments to the Bank Act I shall submit to the Committee on Banking and Commerce when it is dealing with this Bill.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Just a few words before the House rises for the dinner hour, and I shall continue my remarks when we meet at eight o'clock. I wish to refer to the two speeches which have just been made. We have heard a most Conservative speech by a conservative Minister of Finance, which I do not think quite voices the sentiments of the Conservative element in this country, and we have had also a very slightly liberal criticism of that scheme by a prominent Liberal who is probably the spokesman for his party on this question. I confess, I am somewhat seized with that heresy which the Minister of Finance condemns, namely, an increase in the national note issue of this country. The Finance Minister quoted Sir Richard Cartwright as saying the policeman is a false security, but I do not believe that. I believe in public inspection of banks for this country, and I will unfold the reasons for my belief later on. If we have policemen in ordinary affairs, we can have a policeman in banking matters as well. There was another thing that was said by the Minister of Finance and by his friendly critic in favour of the Bill, and it was, that depositors in nearly all cases of bank failure had had their money returned. Eventually they had, but a great many depositors were out of their money for a long while, and suffered great distress thereby. The hon. gentleman quoted Mr. McLeod, late manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, as having instituted a system of audit by the shareholders, but he did not tell us that Mr. McLeod had circulated a pamphlet throughout the country, in which he urged that we must have public inspection of banks in Canada. When I come to argue the case, I think I will be able to show that there is good reason for public inspection of banks and that no harm will come of it. They have public inspection in the United States and it does a great deal of good, and when the minister says these inspectors cannot pass on all loans, as a matter of fact the examiners of the United States do pass on them and are competent to pass on them and good results have followed. If, as the minister said, a private auditor could go into the head office and some of the branches where there is a large business, so can a public inspector of banks, he can do a great deal more good than can the mere inspector of the shareholders. When I come to speak after recess on this question, I shall dip somewhat slightly into the Act concerning Dominion notes, into the Act creating the Postal and Government Savings Banks, and other laws which are involved in national finance.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, in discussing this Bill of 1913, to revise the Revised Banking Act of 1901 (really made over forty years ago), it is first necessary to set out some of the defects in the present banking and currency system; and, for brevity's sake, I intend to designate the existing law as the 'old law,' and the proposal now before the House as the 'new law.'

Among the defects of the old law and of the existing system are the following:

1. The insufficient protection of depositors.

2. The facility with which banks are merged and amalgamations made.

3. The partial surrender by Government to the banks of the function of emitting currency. The powers of the banks in this respect are increased in the new Bill.

4. The insufficiency of circulation for business purposes; and this is, I take it, the paramount evil of our banking system.

5. The sterilization of the Post Office Savings Bank system and the Government Savings Bank system, both of which were created in the public interests by special Acts, and whose usefulness is largely being destroyed by active or secret opposition of the chartered banks, and perhaps by silent neglect of Government.

6. The tendency of the present law to set apart the savings of the people in the banks for the purpose of business, rather than the use of any of it for building purposes, as is prevalent in the United States. In that country the savings of the people on deposit with the savings banks are devoted to investment in mortgages on real estate and building improvements.

Having stated these evils, and as there is nothing in this Bill which deals in an effective way with them let me discuss for a moment the first one, namely, the insufficient protection of depositors. All the Government proposes to do is to allow the shareholders to appoint an auditor, in addition to the present audit, which is made by the bank's own officials. This is no improvement, because we know that the management have the proxies of the shareholders in their own hands, and any additional auditor will be an employee of the shareholders, whose interests are often contrary to the interests of the depositors. In other words, the depositors should elect the auditor, or as I contend, the state which represents the depositors and the whole public, and therefore my contention is that we must have a public inspection of all banks, rather than a mere shareholders' audit. The public will be surprised to learn that the actual deposits in the defunct Farmers' Bank were used, and are being used to-day as fast as they can be realized on, to redeem the note issue of that bank authorized by the present Banking Act. The paid-up capital had been exhausted; there was not sufficient money in the vaults of the bank to redeem the notes; and at this moment any money being realized by the liquidators, and it is the depositors' money, is going to the discharge of the note issue, which is bearing, until redeemed, three per cent interest. So you will see that the depositors' money in the banks to-day in Canada, in case of bad management, at least, must first go to the protection of the notes put out by the bank! The state, and not the banks, should issue all notes of circulation, and they ought to stand on their own bottom, as I will produce later on. In the United States there is no danger to depositors of a preference over them of the notes paid out by the banks.

The provision of a public inspection in the interest of depositors and the public is to be found in the United States, and no one to-day can say that public inspection of the banks in the United States has been injurious to anybody; it is a great benefit to the public. The most creditable thing in the national banking system of the United States is that the secretary of the treasury can put national inspectors in national banks where he has reason to believe wrongs have been committed, and have been committed, and have them cleared up, and the bank liquidated if necessary.

What is the use of fining or even imprisoning directors, who have made improper returns, long after the crime? What is wanted is protection before the crime. The new Act says that the directors and managers may go to jail for making false returns. We want a system of public inspection that will check the managers at the beginning, and public inspection would have prevented the Farmers' Bank from ever opening its doors; and public inspection should begin at the inauguration of the bank, and should be made regularly from that time on. Under the present law the attention of the Finance Minister has been called to evils that were said to exist, and which he was unable to prevent, and under the present Act will still be unable to prevent. And why should the Government protect its own deposits ahead of the ordinary depositor, the public? Do they distrust their own law?

Now, I come to my second objection to the present system, and it is this: Mr. Speaker, I fear a money trust, and I wish to repeat it, I fear a money trust; and I say it again to this House, I fear a money trust.

You recall the verse:

> Then up spake an old sailor,
> Had sailed the Spanish main,
> I pray thee put into yonder port,—
> For I fear a hurricane.

I fear a hurricane and therefore I shall try to pilot the way to 'yonder port.' What is it that threatens to-day the great republic alongside other than this fear of a money trust? The whole of the natural resources of that country, even the industries of the country, are gradually going into the hands of powerful trusts controlled by a few very wealthy men, and worst of all, even almost the whole savings of the public in the banks are being gradually concentrated in New York, in the hands of almost these same few people, and being used rather for the advantages of these trusts and those who control them than for the public at large and for the general business of the community. Wall street, the greatest evil in the United States, is financed by this concentration of bank resources in New York. The people there fear a money trust, and the revelations now being made in Washington before a special committee of the House of Representatives have startled the entire country, and have drawn admissions from the plutocrats themselves that the danger point has been reached, and if they were not, as they claim themselves to be, eminently honest and trustworthy persons, a financial catastrophe would follow if this concentrated capital came into the hands of unreliable men. Are we moving on the same lines in this country? I think we are, and therefore I say I fear a money trust.

There is not sufficient protection in this Bill against mergers. I disapproved at the time, and I still disapprove, of the recent amalgamations that have taken place in this country, particularly during the last three years; and still others were contemplated, and were only held off by public criticism and not by any law or Act on the part of the Government. It has been so easy to consolidate banks in the States, and especially so in New York, and the power resultant therefrom has been so enormous that every temptation exists in this country to follow that lead. What they do in the United States they will do in Canada unless Parliament imposes a check. We would be blind to our own interests if we did not take advantage of the evils that have been created in the United States. We now know what these evils are and we should not facilitate their introduction into Canada; and we must always remember that the trust evils in the United States, whether it applies to the industries or to the great necessities of life are manipulated by the same men that manipulate the banking trust. The great proof of the money trust in the States is found in the system of interlocking directorates. A few men representing the immense consolidations there sit on many boards and carry out the one policy, that of the great trust, in that way. The same thing is happening here. The chief executive of the Canadian Pacific sits on the board of the Bank of Montreal and may be slated for the highest office in that bank. That is one reason why I fear a money trust. The Canadian Pacific is probably the greatest depositor in Canada.

In Canada the conditions are such as facilitate the growth of the same evils here. The great West of the United States was settled before the trust epoch began; the Canadian West is being settled in the face of a great railway trust, of trusts more or less dominating agricultural implements and many other manufactures; more or less of a beef trust; a greater or lesser trust in buying grain and cattle in the West; and what now looks like a bankers' trust, or money trust, and by the aid of which all other trusts are strengthened and maintained. All the trusts are bound to get together. It, therefore, looks as if the people of the Canadian West are to grow up in the presence of a system of trusts, and this must have a most discouraging effect unless we have a progressive government, and deal at once with the evils that exist or are in process of being established in the West. For instance, the people of the Canadian West to-day have to pay higher freight rates, higher telegraph rates, higher express rates, and worst of all, higher rates of interest to banks, which are enfranchised by federal legislation; and the keynote of federal legislation should be equal treatment in all parts of Canada.

Not only does this Bill not prevent bank mergers or make them impossible, but it has another evil; it makes more difficult the formation of new banks; and what we want in this country is more banking facilities, more banks and a scattered management of banks rather than concentration. It may or may not be a good thing for the promotion of new banks to go out and solicit subscriptions to shares and the payment of commission to those who dispose of such stock. This Act prevents any payment of commission, and now there is no means of starting a bank unless a number of wealthy men can get together and with their own resources and in face of the hostility of existing banks organize a new one.

And another thing, the smaller banks in Canada to-day are in constant dread of the bigger fish in the pool swallowing the smaller ones at a gulp. Any member of this House can find this out for himself by his own local investigation, if he cares to do so.

And now I come to my third objection of the system, namely, the preference given to the note issue of the banks over the note issue of the Dominion, and of the introduction of new clauses in this Bill, which must eventually end in the further locking up, if not disappearance of, Dominion notes, one of the best currencies in the world, and acceptable everywhere, like United States greenbacks. Our bank notes are not accepted in the States, our Dominion notes are; and our five-dollar bills, which would be like gold, are carefully kept in cold storage by the active hostility of the Canadian banks. They would sooner pay out Bank of England notes than a Dominion five-dollar bill. They do not wish to see the Canadian people become acquainted with such a fine and far-circulating document of exchange. I am an absolute believer in the currency of this country being in the shape of Dominion notes, and that the banks pay out nothing but specie or Dominion notes, as may be required for circulation purposes.

At present, under the Dominion Notes Act, which was passed many years ago, when the population of Canada was much smaller than it is now, and when business was not one-twentieth of what it is, we provided for an issue of $30,000,000 of Dominion notes, secured by a twenty-five per cent. gold reserve. Any further issue of these notes beyond that thirty millions was to be secured by gold, dollar for dollar; and at the present moment the total issue is in the neighbourhood of one hundred and fifteen million dollars. The eighty-five million excess of the thirty millions provided by the Act is secured by gold deposits, and government notes have been issued against this; and these notes are practically gold certificates and used mainly by the banks for clearing-house purposes only. The balance of these notes which may be in public use, are in $1 and $2 bills, and they form a very useful factor in our currency. They go everywhere; they are protected from counterfeit; and they are considered by everyone better than gold. If the ones and twos are so good, why not fives and tens? It is true we have issued $5 notes, but the banks have taken pains that only on very rare occasions are these $5 bills allowed to get out. The banks absorb most of the state issue at present. The $1 and $2 bills are in circulation because the banks cannot issue such denominations; but all the rest of the Dominion notes are issued as a convenience to the banks, to avoid the cost of taking care of their own gold; thus imposing on the Government of this country the cost of guarding it. We not only have to guard their gold, but we have to pay for the printing of the certificates which we issue to them, and maintain the Receiver General's offices and storehouses to guard this gold. We even have to police it. And just when I am on this point I desire to say that I would much prefer that we should be guardians of this gold than have it put into the hands of the new gold trust in Montreal that is created by this Act, and as to whose integrity the public have only the same guarantees that they have of bank directors. Who is to guard these guardians of the new gold trust? In other words, the money trust becomes the custodian of the gold, whereas at the present time the state holds the gold, and we all know the State is safe—or at least, I hope it is safe. I would ask the minister now if he mistrusts himself or his assistants, and will he tell us now that the gold stored with him is intact?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): So far as the audit carried on by the Department of Finance and the Auditor General's Department can establish the fact that the gold is in the vaults of the Receiver General, it is there.

Mr. MACLEAN: And the country knows it is there. I am therefore, altogether against this Act, which will minimize the issue of Dominion notes, which increases the note issue of the banks, and which places the guardianship of the gold reserve in the hands of the banks, when the federal treasury should be the guardian to the end of the security of the public. In other words, the net effect of this Act will be that instead of $115,000,000 of Dominion bank notes being in circulation, and another $100,000,000 of notes, we will have, roughly, $200,000,000 of bank notes, and these alone.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I think the hon. gentleman has misconstrued the Act. The large legals will still be issued by the Dominion Government against gold for purposes of clearance.

Mr. MACLEAN: And there will be an increase of bank notes, as I take it, issued against gold stored in Montreal.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Against any additional gold, or against Dominion notes.

Mr. MACLEAN: That is exactly how I take it. My fourth objection is that we have not sufficient circulation for the needs of the country. I meet men every day who are complaining of their inability to extend their business—and extension is the keynote of Canada—because of the lack of money, and the lack of banking credit, and the diversion of money into other enterprises, some of them outside of Canada, that should be consecrated to home interests and industries. Our great want to-day is money and the banks apparently seem to be in league that we should only get such money as they have or have control of and which they use for their own profit, rather than for the development of the country. Go where you will, you meet with this money famine; and it is the fact that, in the development of banking, various states have repeatedly had to interfere and interfered more or less successfully, in a way, to increase the currency and available monetary resources of their respective countries. The states of Europe have all had to take it up. Germany has taken it up, France has taken it up, Russia and Japan have taken it up, Italy has taken it up, and other countries have taken it up, and they have found means, independent of the banking organizations of the country, to increase the money or equivalent of money in their own countries. And there is a thing besides bank notes and money in banks, called credit, and the great function of banks is dealing not only with actual money but credit. They sell credit and are possessed of this thing called credit which they deal in; and I claim that the state itself is possessed of this same thing called national credit, and it can be used, and used effectively, by means of a generous issue of state notes against a gold reserve and the resources of the country, to the general advantage of the country and without any great detriment to the banks, and certainly to the great convenience of the people. There is no consideration in the new law of the enormous growth of Canada and the need of money for its development, and no suggestion of the employment of the public credit of Canada by way of national notes for the granting of relief and advancing progress. We take no leaf out of the book of the most progressive nations of the world. This is a banker's Bill, not a public measure. I will return to this topic later on in my remarks.

Now, let me come to my fifth objection, which I have described as the sterilization of the laws we now have creating post office savings banks and Government savings banks. All our banks have what they call savings bank branches, and they claim to encourage small deposits which, to all intents and purposes, can be withdrawn without notice, and which can be chequed against. Our Post Office Savings Bank has not been growing as it should have done, and as a matter of fact we all know that the banks have tried their best to discourage or discredit deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank. The Post Office Savings Bank can be and as a matter of fact is taken to very small settlements and out-of-the-way places and has been of great convenience, but I do not see in this Act, or other Acts, any attempt on the part of the Minister of Finance to improve the Post Office or Government Savings Banks. Some of the latter have been closed and the deposits transferred to the Post Office Savings Banks; but what I want to say is that the minister is not improving the Post Office Bank and keeping it abreast with savings banks of the ordinary banks. For instance, we must remember the roundabout way of getting money out of the Post Office Savings Bank accounts by means of first filling in a form and sending it to Ottawa and then a permit for withdrawal is returned by a later mail. Why cannot a depositor cheque against a local post office account; at least a man should be allowed to have his cheque marked 'good' and if the postmaster does not happen to have the funds in hand the holder can cash it elsewhere, and a cheque so certified by the local postmaster should be the best possible circulating medium; or at least it ought to be an excellent document of exchange until such time as it can reach a bank or business centre.

And I know further that there have been times when it would have been in the interest of this Government to have increased the rate of interest on Post Office Savings Bank deposits, but the banks have strenuously opposed any such increase. I would ask the Minister of Finance to compare our Post Office Savings Bank system with the more modern systems and perhaps with that of the United States. Even in England, I understand, you can withdraw a pound on demand at any time and if good for a pound it should be good for all the depositor has to his credit. If savings banks or the banks allow a depositor to cheque against them, why can not the Dominion do it?

When I speak of the Post Office Savings Bank I have in mind a number of other progressive measures which are related to our post offices. I believe in a parcel post system, and I take the speech of the hon.

Postmaster General of a few days ago that he is a believer in that system. I also am a strong believer, not only in a post office savings bank and a parcel post system, but I also believe in a postal telegraph system, in charge of our postmasters. In other words, I think it is possible, and it is a public duty to supply all over this country post offices for letters, with a savings bank, with a telegraph, and a parcel post service, and a money transfer service, all in one building, no matter how small the centre; and if you can attach to this a public-owned telephone system, you have a consolidated public organization in each little hamlet that would maintain at least two officials and give a service in most respects night and day, with the exception of night banking. If anybody can suggest a better contribution to the improvement of the business and social conditions of our various communities than these I have suggested, I shall be glad to hear it. Therefore, I say the Government should make improvements in our Post Office Savings Bank and public money transfer system, and also introduce the other improvements I have suggested. It is true that my arguments are in favour of a public banking system more or less in co-operation with private banks, and I am coming to that far-reaching proposition later on in this discussion. I am not afraid of the principle of public ownership being at least partially applied to banking.

Now, to come to the last defect of the present system: I would say that it offers no banking facilities in the matter of building homes or building factories or business places, or for the loaning of money on real estate as security. In the United States the great bulk of the savings of the people, and I mean by the people those who have small accounts, go into what are called savings banks, all of which are organized under state laws and under such stringent conditions that the directors are limited very largely to the investment of the deposits of such banks to loans on mortgages and for the purchase of mortgages. One great trouble in this country to-day is to get money for building purposes. In the United States there seems to be an abundance of money for this purpose to be obtained from the savings banks. In our country there is a very great scarcity of money for such purposes, and, although we have loan companies especially created for this end, they are not able to find sufficient money or to sell their debentures as they would like to outside of Canada; and I would appeal to the experience of members in this House if there should not be a better system in this country for obtaining money for building improvements. And, contrary-wise, I would like to know why the banks of this country are restrained from lending money secured by mortgages on real estate. I cannot at this moment say if this is done in other countries or not. The national banks in the United States are restrained from lending on real estate, and are practically commercial or business banks, the savings banks in that country do this important function; it is an open question in my mind whether our banks should not be allowed to lend on real estate security, under conditions. It is true that the banks do secure themselves later on by taking mortgages, but they must make a demand for such, and the borrower must confess to some kind of insolvency to permit this being done; and nothing hurts a business man so much as when he is called upon by a bank to give a mortgage on his real estate; and it is known that banks take letters from borrowers to the effect that when the borrower is called upon to put up his real estate, he must do so. It would surprise a good many, and it would surprise the public inspector of banks—if we had such an official—to see how many of these undertakings are filed away in the strong boxes of our banks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with what I consider the defects of the existing system and the defects of the proposed system, and I pass to my second topic, and that is an analysis of our present banks and banking system, as evidenced by the November bank returns; and when I deal with these I am not going to quote the exact figures, but it is sufficient that I deal with them in terms of millions. I find, roughly, that the banks in this country get their available funds from the following sources:

1. There is the paid-up capital of the banks, roughly speaking, 114 million dollars. This 114 million is paid in by the shareholders of the bank. But where do they get the rest of all their money?

2. I find that the second item is the reserves of the banks that have accrued from the profits of the banks, except in a few cases where it includes premiums paid on shares for additional capital; just what this is I do not know, and I do not propose to take it into consideration. This second item is, roughly, 106 millions, and most of which represents profits taken out of the public after good big dividends have been paid to the shareholders on their shares.

3. The third item is the banks' own note issue, and this amounts to 115 millions, an amount rather in excess of the paid-up capital. For this, like for the previous item of reserve, the banks do not pay one cent. They have the privilege of a note issue equal to their capital, and recently we gave them the privilege of a 15 per cent excess, in certain instances, to their bank capital; and now, if I understand this Act aright, they are to be given an additional power of issue for which they have to put up gold costing them 3 per cent, as they now pay 5 per cent on their emergency issue.

4. Their fourth item, and it is their main source, is their deposits, divided into two sections: public deposits of the federal and provincial Governments, representing 36 millions, and deposits of the people, representing $1,011,000,000, or 11 millions over a billion of dollars, of which roughly speaking, 376 millions are deposits on demand, without interest, and 635 millions deposited on notice, and which are supposed to pay 3 per cent, and which 3 per cent, as a matter of fact, by an agreement between the banks cannot be exceeded, and if one bank had the audacity to offer more than this he would find the Bankers' Association would by concert or by stealth have his scalp. I believe that the smaller banks would do more business if they were allowed to pay a little more for deposits; but if there is anything they are afraid of it is to do anything that will bring down upon them the bigger banks. The small banks to-day are at the mercy of the big banks—a deplorable thing. And, when I say this I think I am expressing the real views of the smaller banks, and a great many persons as well.

When I totalize all the available resources of the Canadian banks I find it sums up $1,462,000,000, to which the banks themselves have only contributed $114,000,000, or a good deal less than ten per cent. The banks find ten per cent, and the people ninety per cent of all the available resources of the banks. The banks do not pay on an average more than about one and a half per cent. on all this money, and they lend it to the Canadian people at not less than six per cent, and sometimes eight per cent, and return to their shareholders ten per cent on shares, and in some cases a great deal more; and they do not share one cent of all their profits with the public, which gave the ninety per cent, and who gave them their franchise as well.

This Bill proposes to continue for another ten years this condition of affairs. I say that this is all wrong. Other countries have found a way to nationalize their finances to limit the banks to a fixed rate of interest to limit the rate of discount, to limit the amount to be realized by way of reserve, to limit the amount of dividends to be paid to shoreholders, and to compel the banks to share any excess of profit that is left after providing for those things with the State. I ask hon. gentlemen to refer to a small pamphlet which I have received, and I suppose other members have received, signed by Peter Ryan of Toronto. As far as I can gather its facts are correct, and if correct, they are most interesting reading; and I ask the Minister of Finance what he has to say on the methods of the national banking systems of many countries as set out in this document? Would it not be a good thing if we had something like it in this country?

Now, let me come to my third, and might I venture to call it my constructive criticism. It is all very well to be critical and attempt to pull down a system, but it is quite pertinent to say to one who assumes this role, what do you propose in its place. In view of the success of national banks, of real national banks that you find all over Europe, in America, even in Japan—I use the word national with reference to State banks rather than to the national banks of the United States—my suggestion is that Canada should have a great national bank or state bank somewhat on the lines of the Imperial Bank of Germany, the shares of which are largely owned by the public, but which is absolutely regulated by the state in the public interest.

The Imperial Chancellor is the president, and Finance Minister of Prussia is the vice-president. This bank issues notes which practically form the national currency; and I must say to the house that in view of the fact of the enormous needs of this country for money, and the fact of this country's wealth and natural resources, more or less the property of the people, and in view of the fact that the nation owns railways and canals, and other great public works, and for which I admit it is more or less in debt, and in view of the fact most of all of the enormous credit that we as a nation have in the eyes of the world, it would be advisable, nay absolutely desirable and essential that we should use the credit of Canada as a nation as a means towards the enlargement and expansion of the vailable funds for public use in the way of money or credit just as the banks do the same thing with their resources. If our banks can use their credit and I contend, as has been admitted in the United States, that most of the banks deal in credit rather than gold or bank notes; and if they can do it, why cannot the state do it? What is passing in my mind therefore is that we take two or three of the largest banks we have in Canada and consolidate them into one large bank called the Bank of Canada with a capital of at least a quarter of a billion of dollars and make that bank the bank of issue for what would be national notes, and that that bank would lend these to the other banks, instead of allowing the banks to issue their own notes, on proper security at a rate of 2 per cent or 3 per cent to be enlarged hereafter or what would be practically the same thing by the state sharing in the profits of the banks as they do in Germany.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it not a fact that these states which the hon. gentleman refers to as having national banks have borrowed millions of dollars from these so-called banks?

Mr. MACLEAN: I will grant that. We should do our own financing in Canada and borrow from our national bank, if it is properly organized, and that is what I wish to come to. This bank would be different from what is proposed for the United States by the Aldrich Commission, but it would be practically national and it would be a bankers' bank, and it would also be the bank of Dominion government and the bank of the provinces and the bank of our great corporations like the railways and other large concerns. The national notes that this bank would issue would be secured by a gold reserve of at least 25 per cent as well as by the resources and the credit of the country at large, and such a reserve would be, in my mind, ample. These national notes would have the same world-wide currency that the United States notes have.

When I speak this way I am speaking only in the most general way. I do not wish at this moment to go further into details, I rather hope to elicit information in this respect in the banking committee where we will have the opportunity of putting questions to the bankers and others interested.

And having said all these things I now come to what is really my substantive proposal, and it is this: That in view of what I have said, and probably of what others will say in this House, it would be wrong, it would be a crime against the best interests of this country, to pass this Act as we now have it before us, and to say that it shall be our financial policy for the next ten years. I object to any such idea, altogether. What I suggest is this, that it would become this House, and it would be in the public interest, that we appoint a monetary commission of three or five of the best men we can get, even if we have to go to Europe for one of them, to make a study of modern banking conditions, and especially a study of the Canadian banking conditions, as compared with what is practiced in Europe, Japan, South America, and other countries, and that they make this special study in the light of the facts contained in the report of the monetary commission appointed by the congress of the United States, and which has recently been made public, and which is the subject of widespread discussion in the United States at this moment. Such a commission could report in twelve or in eighteen months, at least, and any bill passed this session should have no ten-years'-life clause inserted in it, but should be, at the most, for two years, until such commission could report.

Did the Minister of Finance ever consider the desirability of having the banks of England to do business in Canada? England is famous for its wealth, and especially is her fame world-wide by reason of her banking institutions. Could we not have the banks that do business in England do business in Canada? Would it not be a fine thing if the people of Canada were able to borrow English money and capital in this country from English banks doing business in Canada, and the scheme I suggest of using the credit of Canada for a large issue of national notes secured by a 25 per cent gold reserve, and distributed by the Bank of Canada that I suggested, would allow the banks doing business in England to come to Canada, open branches and avail themselves of the use of these national notes as well as their own funds to do business in Canada. We would then have real competition in banking in this country if ever we can get English banks to open houses here. I do not see how they could do business here and very well issue notes like our banks, although that would be possible; but to allow them to do business here and participate in the use of national notes would, to my mind, be quite possible. And, if we could attract some of the banks of England to come, why not some of the banks of France, where there is as much available capital as in England.

We are seeking by this legislation to create a bank trust, and to limit the banking facilities. What we ought to seek to do is to increase the competition in banking, and to get much more money for banking purposes. This Bill does not even attempt to do this.

It is true that in the United States they are afraid of a central bank or of a great national bank, and they have reasons more or less for their view, but I imagine it is because they, like us, are away behind, although they call themselves modern—they are a long way behind Europe. Europe leads us in agreat many respects especially in public ownership and public control. The state owns the railways in Europe. The state owns the postal system, which takes charge of all communications. It owns the savings bank. The state carries on a great life insurance business, and in many other respects the legislatures there feel that the intervention of government in the great public services of their people is more and more a necessity of the time. That is my belief as to Canada; I believe more and more in government participation. I believe in a state-owned railway from one coast to the other in competition with the private railway companies. I believe in state insurance in competition with private-owned companies. Most of all, I believe in the state participating in the monetary organization of the country; and I believe in this especially because it is to the welfare of the people at large, and to the development of our enormous resources and our expanding business that the credit of the country as a nation should be used as the basis of a national system of currency intimately associated with our private banking organizations. I believe that the State should be the predominating partner in this great business.

These are the reflections that I have ventured to present to the House to-night in regard to this most interesting question of banking. For thirty years, nay, for forty years, we have had a system which we had to take because it was imposed upon us by those who organized banks in the old days and that system has continued from that time to this. We have not improved it, we have not tried to improve it. Let us now try to improve it by comparing it with the systems of banking which obtain in other countries that are more progressive than we are with respect to this question. They have made wonderful developments in Europe, in South America and in Japan in regard to banking. They have made the state a participant in banking and they have absolutely regulated all banks. We allow our banks to pile up enormous reserves for what purpose I do not know. They are piling up these enormous reserves and they are paying enormous dividends. The state regulates the dividends in these countries and out of the profits left the State insists upon taking its share for the franchise which it gives to the banks, There is, therefore, no inducement to banks to overcharge or to treat unfairly the outlying portions of the country. There is only one rate of discount in France and Germany to-day. In our West people are paying eight and ten per cent discount while six and seven may be the ruling amount here. That cannot be done under these modern systems of banking but here in Canada we have a system which is forty years old at least and has never been improved in one direction.

One of the most enlightened phases of political economy is the comparative study of the politics of one nation in the light of the political experience of another. They have made great advances in this respect in European countries and we should try to deal with our financial problems from their point of view. The people of the United States at some expense, have appointed a monetary commission which has recently reported, and to-day the uppermost question in that country is this creation of trusts and the concentration of the working capital of the country in the hands of a few men, which threatens almost the destruction of the American Republic, that great experiment in government. Read the revelations which are being made day after day in Washington; read the admissions of Morgan and the great big bankers that at last the danger point has been reached, and that if there be any more concentration of capital they cannot answer for what will happen.

That is a sad state of affairs, and we are rapidly reaching the same condition in Canada without our doing anything to prevent it. There will be more banking concentration in Canada, and almost immediately if we do not intervene. I fear for the future of this country, when all the banking resources are consolidated in two or three banks, without regulation, and under a charter which gives them a further franchise of ten years. It is a dangerous thing to allow our banks under the law to have ten more years to effect consolidation, and to allow them to do so without any regulation, or with only the insufficient regulation that is proposed in this Act. Not for one moment do I believe that the Canadian people will sit idly by and allow us to do such a thing, I can assure this House that the people of Canada expect some kind of substantial reforms in this Bank Act which we are now about to pass. I am not an enemy of our bank system; the banks have done a great deal for the country and they have done a great deal for themselves. I believe they would be quite willing to fit in with some kind of national banking system if we in this Parliament have the courage to put it up to them.

I believe the time has come when we will have to regulate the banks in the various ways I have suggested, and as they have regulated them in the more progressive countries of the world. I believe that the best way to reach that end is to appoint a monetary commission to study the subject for us. There are experts in Canada who understand the question pretty well, they can get first of all a good idea of our existing system; they can visit European countries; they can take advantage of what has been done in the United States by the Aldrich Commission, and in twelve or eighteen months they can present the result of their study to us, and in two years from now we can pass legislation which will immensely improve our Bank Act. Thus, without doing any injury to the banks, we can find a way to greatly enlarge the funds available for business in this country. It is more money we want. Our railways want money.

I believe Canada is becoming so large and expanding so fast that if we move on the right lines we can organize a Bank of Canada with a capital of a quarter of a billion dollars, nay with a capital of half a billion dollars or a billion dollars, and we can associate with the great banking concerns of the Empire located in the Motherland. We are constantly talking of looking to the Motherland, and let us in some way link up the bank capital of the Motherland with our own capital, and let us have this great Bank of Canada that will be able to finance our great railways, to finance the Federal Government, and to finance our provincial and municipaal institutions and our commerce. Canada is rapidly growing in wealth; true, we borrow a lot of money from other countries, but let us try to attract the money of the Old Country to us in the shape of capital for our banking institutions. We have not been very successful in that direction. One of our banks did put out some of its stock in Europe, but eventually had to take it up in this country. We have not tried in the right way to get more European banking capital into this country, and I believe if we went the proper way about it we could get it. It is a fact that to-day the Canadian banks cannot increase their capital sufficiently for the needs of the country, and if to-day the Canadian shareholders do take up some of their own shares, it is only transferring the credit from one page of the ledger to the other, and there is no more banking capital in the country to-morrow.

Mr. DEVLIN: Can the hon. gentleman inform me how much British capital is at present invested in Canadian banks?

Mr. MACLEAN: I cannot answer that question in detail, but I know that capital of the Bank of British North America is largely British, although some time ago the largest shareholder of that bank was a Canadian. We also know by the bank returns that there are a considerable number of shares of Canadian banks held in the Old Country, but there is nothing like the number I would like to see. All banks are to-day trying to increase their capital; they have agents out and every time a shareholder comes into the head office he is importuned to take some shares in an authorized issue, and gradually the banks are thus getting a little more money. But the increase in banking capital in Canada is not at all commensurate with the business being done by the country and not at all commensurate with the requirements of the country. The whole question is therefore worthy of the fullest consideration of this Parliament. When I know how busy this House is and how much it has to do and how many questions we have to deal with, my contention is that the easiest solution—and it is the solution now adopted by all busy governments—is the appointment of a commission to get the facts and to make a report on the actual conditions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did not Mr. J. P. Morgan appear before a committee of Congress recently?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, Mr. Morgan was there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was a committee of members of Congress?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, a committee of members of the Congress sitting in Washington now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought you said the Monetary Commission was composed of experts.

Mr. MACLEAN: That is my suggestion. It would be of the greatest value to us to have the information taken by the Congressional Committee before us and I will try to get some of it before our committee, and when I do you will be surprised at the facts revealed as to the extent of the money trust that it being created in the United States. Any man in this country whose eyes are open can see the same kind of a money trust coming to Canada, to be concentrated in Montreal or Toronto. That money trust, in alliance with the railways and with other great industries and this system of interlocking directorates will be dangerous to our people and especially dangerous to the great West, if it is not regulated and regulated now, along the lines that they pursue in France, Germany, Japan and other progressive countries. Therefore, while we may send this Bill to the Committee and have it threshed out there, and while a lot of valuable information may be secured in that way, I appeal to this House that it is our duty not to extend this Bill for ten years longer. It is absolutely against the interest of the country; it is not in the interests of the banks themselves. I appeal for the appointment of a monetary commission; and I ask, whatever may come from this Committee back to the House, if we decide on a monetary commission, that the currency of this Act shall not exceed two years. If we do that, and if we give our people a chance to discuss the banking situation and to appear before the Monetary Commission, we will elicit facts that will be of great assistance, and we will develop a system which will be of advantage to the country. That is my contention here to-night.

I could go on for hours discussing the banking situation and the treatment the banks give the people. I do not agree with all the criticisms that have been made about the banks. The banks in Canada have at last come to see that they have been given a great franchise in this country, but it took them years to realize that with that franchise there went a public duty. For a long time they refused even to extend their branches to various parts of the country. I remember very well hearing a general manager of a bank in Toronto not very many years ago, when a deputation came to him for a branch, saying, 'It is not the policy of my bank to extend our branches, and therefore I cannot do anything for you.' The banks are bound to deal with the financial interests of the people of this country; they have been rather high-handed up to the present; they have not felt it to be their duty to consult the people as to how long they should keep open, and if a man could actually see the manager of a bank to do business with the bank it was thought that a favour was conferred on him. As a matter of fact the banks are trying to do business with the public; they ought to take that attitude; they ought to thank the people for coming to do business with them. They have not quite got hold of the idea that a public franchise entailed on them the very greatest consideration towards the people; gradually they are coming to see it; but if we establish a great money trust, and there are other trusts in relation to it; and there happen to be men throughout the country who would dare to criticise these things and to object to them, what consideration would they get? That is what is feared in the United States to-day; hundreds and hundreds of people in the States fear that if the great money trust is created, the ordinary public will have a poor chance of getting consideration. The great temptation to our banks in this country to-day is not so much to accommodate the people as to make bigger profits by flotations; and some of our banks are more flotation banks than they are banks to serve the public in the ordinary banking ways; so while I do not criticise them harshly in that respect, and while I say that they are fairly trying to do a service to this country and are doing a great service to the country, they are not doing the service they could do, if we reorganized our finances on a different basis, and if we made the country a participator in our banking system. I heard the word 'fiat money' used this afternoon; I have heard that word used before and I take the definition of 'fiat money' to be what the Minister of Finance said here to-day; but I am not proposing, when I propose that the state shall share it in issuing notes, that I mean fiat money when I say money that has a substantial security behind it similar to what they have in Germany and other European countries. It may be true that the Bank of England really holds gold for each five-pound note that is out; but in other countries they issue national notes partly on a gold reserve and partly on the security of the other banks. I believe we can do the same thing in this country. All we want is to study the question to elicit the facts and see how we can graft a newer and better system on to the system we have, without doing any damage to the banks.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the hon. member tell us what exactly is the protection given to the note circulation in Germany?

Mr. MACLEAN: That is a mere detail; I will give that later. I want the Monetary Commission to elicit all these things for us. In this busy country we have not time to go into all these details. I want to state that I do not think I have spoken in vain in discussing this question as well as I could, if I can induce this House to take some kind of a progressive step, such as I have suggested, and to make a study of banking from an up-to-date point of view. We should not do a banking business in this country on a policy that was a haphazard policy selected forty years ago. Banking is progressive like everything else. The greatest force in business to-day is what is called business engineering or business organization; the Americans are coming to it rapidly; they will see that they have got a very inferior banking system over there; they know it caused panics, and they are now trying to better it. In the same way the people of Canada ought to be studying the banking institutions we have, and trying to improve them greatly, rather than simply attempting to perpetuate what we happen to have on the statute book to-day.

Sir EDMUND OSLER: I do not propose to follow the theory of the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) in the discussion of the banking system. There are two or three statements made which I cannot allow to go unchallenged. Our banks are accused of making enormous sums of money by borrowing money. I think the hon. member said at one and a half per cent and lending it at six or seven per cent. No business is done in Canada or almost in the world on so little profit as banking is done. I will just give you one illustration. Take the free money that a bank has, that is to say its capital paid up, its reserves and surplus, its deposits on which it pays no interest and its circulation; that is a very considerable sum of money; but it is comparatively small in relation to the volume of business. No bank in Canada makes four per cent on that free money; the total profits are less than four per cent on the total free money the bank has, it takes the profit made on all exchange business and on all business of every other kind, to earn from two and a half to three and a half per cent on the free money. You can easily see, such being the case, the absurdity of the statement that a bank makes five per cent. the difference between one and a half and six or seven per cent; therefore I do not think that statement should be allowed to pass unchallenged.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I beg to say to the hon. gentleman that I made no such remark. I said that the money that the banks had, including the note issue, the deposits and reserves, did not cost them on an average, more than one and one-half per cent.

Sir EDMUND OSLER: And that they let it out at six or seven per cent.

Mr. MACLEAN: I said that they let it out at six.

Sir EDMUND OSLER: If that were the case, banks would pay forty or fifty or perhaps sixty per cent on their capital. If you refer to the last bank statement and take out the four items that I have quoted —capital, reserve, circulation and free money—you can figure out the total profits made for the year. In the year just closed, I believe they have not made over four per cent on their money, and in most cases it is less than three per cent. The bank with which I have been connected for many years, I think, may be taken as a fair example. I give the figures from memory, but they are nearly correct. The paid-up capital is $5,000,000, and the surplus amounts to nearly $7,000,000; I think the bank's free money is $9,000,000 and its circulation $5,000,000. Although they have between $26,000,000 and $27,000,000 on which they pay nothing in the meantime except to the shareholders. And the total earnings last year—a profitable year—amounted to about three and a half per cent on this free money—between three and a half and three and five-eights. If they had loaned this free money at six per cent, it would have earned thirty-six per cent interest on the capital.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): What did the bank earn on its capital?

Sir EDMUND OSLER: On its capital and reserve——

Mr. MACLEAN: No, on its capital?

Sir EDMUND OSLER: It earned eighteen per cent. I may say that three-quarters of the reserve fund was paid up by the shareholders. The bank issued at a premium of two hundred and two hundred and twenty.

Mr. CARVELL: To what bank does the hon. gentleman refer?

Sir EDMUND OSLER: The Dominion Bank. I think you will find the figures in a general way apply to other banks. Now, the hon. gentleman seemed to be rather anxious about English capital. There is little English capital invested in our banks. One bank in Canada has a large English share list; but that is because it absorbed an English bank established by English shareholders in Canada. And there is one other bank with a large English share list. English investors do not tend to put money into Canadian bank shares. One reason is that they do not like the double liability combined with a management outside their own country. The second, and greater reason is that English, Scotch, German and French banks yield their shareholders very much larger returns than do ours. The English banks make from fifteen to twenty-five and twenty-seven per cent. Here, you get up to twelve and fourteen per cent. Our banks, therefore, have to look to Canada for the greater part of their capital, and their shareholders are limited. Canadians are from time to time increasing their holdings, and I think the banks are doing all they can to provide sufficient banking capital for the country. Another statement made by the hon. gentleman was that there is not enough money to go around. Of course there is not enough money to go around at any time. But I do not believe that in Canada, during the last five years, any man in legitimate business who ought to have money for his business has been refused. The banks have been anxious to increase their business and the rivalry between the banks for business is very keen. There has been no shortage of money for moving the enormous crops. I can say the same thing in connection with money for mortgages. There are millions and millions waiting in the banks and in Great Britain for loans on mortgages all over Canada. There is keen competition not only from Great Britain, but from France and Holland. Large sums are in all the trusts companies and loan companies anxious to loan on farms, on city property and on buildings. Not many years ago, on farm property in Ontario, the interest was eight and nine per cent. That is now the outside rate in far-distant parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and seven per cent is the rate for money on mortgage in Manitoba. Hardly a week passes but an organization is made in Great Britain or the continent to lend money in Canada. This is a favorite field of investment, because all the loan companies have been exceedingly successful. I believe that no money has been lost by British or other investors that has been secured by farm or city lands in Canada. Canada stands very high. I am not going to discuss the Bank

Act. I merely desired to refer to the two statements of which I have spoken.

Mr. DUNCAN C. ROSS (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the object of the discussion, as I understand it, is for the House to devise means, or to perfect means already devised, to give to the people of Canada the best banking system that can be given, just as everything in Canada should be the best that can be given. It is because of my conviction that we are not giving the best that can be given, and that our banking system works out in a grievous wrong, that I make the few remarks that I shall make. I have listened with some pleasure to what the hon. member for West Toronto (Sir Edmund Osler) said. From what I could hear of his remarks, I judge he was trying to lead this House to believe —and I do not know that he found a very responsive audience—that the banks of Canada were not making sufficient money out of the people of this country. As I take it,—and I trust I have not misinterpreted the hon. gentleman's remarks—he was to use a common expression putting on a poor mouth in regard to the prosperity of the banks and the returns they were receiving on their investments.

Sir EDMUND OSLER: I think my hon. friend has misunderstood me.

Mr. ROSS: That was my interpretation of the effect of his speech; whether it is or is not correct I do not know. A few days ago I clipped from one of the Toronto papers—the Globe I think it was—a statement which shows just what the banks of this country have been making during the year 1912. I have for two or three weeks been watching the daily papers for the purpose of seeing the annual statements made by the various banks in Canada. I find they are making as high as 20 per cent, and none, as far as I could see, less than 16 per cent on their capital. From the return that appears in the paper I have referred to, we find that in 1912 the Bank of Commerce paid a dividend of 11 per cent, the Dominion Bank 14 per cent; Bank of Hamilton 11 per cent; Imperial Bank 12 per cent; Merchants' Bank 10 per cent; Molsons 11 per cent; Bank of Montreal 12 per cent; Bank of Nova Scotia 14 per cent, and four other banks, Ottawa, Royal, Standard, and Toronto, three of them 12 per cent and one 13 per cent. I think no one in this House can honestly contend that the banks of this country are not making good money out of the people of Canada. For my own part, I have no objection to the banks of Canada making good money as they render the country a great service, but I do not think we should get into our heads the idea that the banks of this country own Canada, and that they exist solely to supply dividends to their shareholders. They are given a charter by the Parliament of Canada to render a public service to the people. It is said by the admirers of the Canadian banks that we have the best banking system in the world. We hear it said quite frequently in this country, as well as by eminent financiers in the republic to the south of us. We hear it said by eminent financiers in England and on the continent, as the members of the Bankers Association themselves admit that we have the best banking system in the world. I think, Mr. Speaker, that in one respect their admission is correct; so far as the bankers are concerned, I think it is for them the best system in the world. In any case, I consider this a very important question and I consider that perfecting the Bank Act is more in the interest of the prosperity and greatness of Canada than some of the subjects we have been discussing in the House for the last week or two. I am constrained to believe as was stated by an old college friend of mine, Peter MacArthur, who writes occasional articles in the Globe, and is somewhat of a philosopher, that the Bank Act is receiving more attention from the masses of the people of Canada to-day than the lengthy discussion which has been going on in this House. I agree with what Mr. MacArthur says. I think that in this age of civilization, learning, culture and refinement, navies are somewhat of an anachronism. I hope I may live to see the day when they will become entirely such, but, in regard to banks, although sometimes they are a necessary evil when we have to borrow and pay back, they are sometimes a blessing when we have to borrow and can borrow, and at all times they are a necessity, and I propose discussing this measure on the basis of the assumption that the banks of Canada are an absolute necessity.

I do not dispute the fact that we have a good system. It is my sincere belief that the Canadian banking system is a thoroughly good one, but in which certain weaknesses are evident. It would be no credit—indeed, it would be a sorry reflection on the ability of Canadian financiers—if the banking system in this country was not as nearly perfect as human ingenuity can make it. Why should it be anything else? They have privileges in this country which the bankers of no other country enjoy. They pay no tribute to the Government; they have privileges in circulation which yield them a large profit, and—the greatest privilege of all—they enjoy a monopoly of the deposits of the people. It seems to me my hon. friend the Minister of Finance dealt in a cavalier fashion with the importance of that privilege. The Bank Act before us contains a clause that no individual, company, firm or corporation can use the word 'bank' in any manner, shape or form. The result is that when a charter is given to a bank in this country, it makes that bank the sole depository of the thrift, the wealth and the savings of the people. Such being the case, and the depositors being the foundation stone, as it were, of the success of the financial system in this country, it is my contention that the depositors of these banks should receive some consideration in the provisions of this Bill.

The banking systems of the various countries are quite different. That of Canada is not the same as that of the United States, England, Scotland or Germany. In all of these countries the banks have to pay to the government a certain amount of their profits, or give certain other advantages in the way of loans. In this country they have to do nothing, so far as I can see, except make profits for their shareholders, and secure their currency. We say our system is the only perfect one. We can hardly explain how it has arisen, but it has developed from a cycle of events in Canada until it has reached its present stage. Mr. Walker, an authority in whom my hon. friends would, I am sure, have confidence, made the following statement at the Bankers' Convention in 1893:

> In common with other social developments, modern banking is mainly the result of heredity and environment, and not of arbitrary legislation or the general admission in any wide degree of settled principles in the practice of banking.

I am quoting this to meet, to some extent, the argument made by my hon. friend this afternoon in regard to the system followed in connection with deposits in the State of Oklahoma. From what I can ascertain of the system followed in that state, it is evident that the state banks are required each year to place a certain percentage of their deposits in charge of a board consisting of the treasurer, and other officers of the government. This is done yearly until a certain maximum is reached, and all the banks are constantly responsible for the failure of any one bank. But the trouble is that the system is not compulsory. There are national banks as well as state banks, and as Sir Edmund Walker very wisely says, what may be a success in the banking of one country might not be a success in another country, and what might be a failure in one country might be a success in another. The argument of my hon. friend did not go to prove that that system had not been successful in Oklahoma. Even if it had been, my argument is, taking the judgment of Sir Edmund Walker, that that would be no evidence with regard to the success or failure of that system in another country where the Finance Department is so well managed as it is in Canada. Let me quote further what Sir Edmund Walker says:

> The student endeavouring to understand the science of banking, seeking to discover some body of principles underlying the practice of banking throughout the world is confused by the radical differences between the systems of the various nations and the complicated nature of the conditions surrounding each of these systems. The most cherished dogma of one country is rank heresy in another. The principles suitable to an old country, with a compact population, a highly developed railroad and telegraph organization for the distribution of commodities and information, and wealth enough to be lenders to other nations, are not applicable to a new country with a scattered population, imperfect means of distribution, and little wealth apart from fixed property—a country, indeed requiring to borrow largely from older and wealthier communities.

My argument is, and, the suggestion I have to make with regard to the amending of the Bank Act is that though a system may have been tried and may be proved a failure in any country—and he has not proved that it was so in the State of Oklahoma—it does not follow that if tried in this country it would be a failure.

Now, as far as I am concerned, this question is non-contentious. I am dealing with it simply in a business spirit and from the point of view of what I think is right for the people in the county of Middlesex who have suffered greviously during the last two years under the present system, and from the point of view of doing what is best in the interests of the whole of Canada. I think the banks in Canada should not be ungenerous but should have some regard for those who I say make their prosperity possible. In the statement issued by the Finance Department on November 30, 1912, we find that the paid-up capital of the banks of Canada amounts to $114,000,000 and that the reserve amounts to $106,000,000. That means, as I take it, that during the time those banks have been in existence they have made out of the people of Canada $106,000,000 in addition to the dividends paid to shareholders, or at any rate a large proportion of it. That shows that the people of Canada have not been ungenerous to the banks, and it is the duty of the banks at this time to do as they have done in times past, and concede some little protection to the depositors who make their institutions successful.

Let us go a little further and see what the relation is between the shareholders and the depositors, for these are the two classes of people who go to make the success of the banks possible. In the first place there is the shareholder who invests his money in the banks with the view of getting a good profit, and he has got a good profit in Canada; and secondly there is the depositor who puts his money in the bank because it is an institution chartered by the people of Canada and he thinks it safe. He does so not for the interest he expects to get, but because he thinks that his money will be in safe keeping until he obtains a proper place in which to invest it. These are the two parties most interested in the banking system, and what are the relative positions? The paid-up capital of the banks is, I understand $114,000,000. The deposits of the people of Canada—I give the figures in the rough—amount to about $1,100,000,000. So here we have the shareholders putting into the common partnership $114,000,000, while the depositors put into it $1,100,000,000 and receive 2½ per cent in the aggregate for what they put in. I say 2½ per cent advisedly, for though the banks profess to give the depositors 3 per cent they do so on such a stingy basis that it really amounts to only 2½ per cent. They pay it out on a minimum monthly basis, and consequently it is not 3 per cent. But, on this $1,100,000,000 it is common knowledge that they pay on $360,000,000 no interest whatever.

Such being the case, what should be done to protect those people who have contributed not one-half but seven or eight times the amount of money that the shareholders contribute to the banks? Even if you take into consideration the double liability which applies to shareholders, the depositors have contributed to the funds of the banks four times the amount that the shareholders contribute. It is true that the shareholders are under the double liability, but it has not often been put into operation, and even if they are called upon to meet it, they know what is expected of them. Their money is placed in the banks purely as an investment and they have to take the fortunes of war and the chances that apply to investments. The depositor is only placing his money in a depository marked by the Parliament of Canada as a safe depository.

Let us consider what the banks have done in the way of developing the banking system of Canada. In this respect I cannot agree with the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). I believe that the banks have tried to do something to perfect the banking system in this country, and that they have been to some extent successful in that direction. I have some sympathy with the substantive part of the address of the hon. member for South York because I believe it would be a healthy thing for the banks of this country, and a proper thing for this Parliament, to have a thorough investigation of the banking system before the charters are renewed at the end of each decade. We know from experience in other lines of life that investigations have proved very useful. A short time ago there were some doubts as to the business methods of the insurance companies in Canada. The charges made were rather serious, and they were buttressed by rather strong evidence; and in the opinion of Parliament it was advisable to have an investigation into their methods. We know what the result of that investigation was. We know that it was to the advantage of the people of Canada, and that they have profited considerably from it. There have been rumours and more than rumours circulated throughout this country in recent years that one of the strongest banks in Canada had lost in a Mexican venture $7,000,000. I do not know whether it is true or not. In the Alberta Legislature it was stated that the manager of a bank in the West had secured to himself a large amount of money on account of certain loans which he had made to certain companies. These are grave charges, and if such transactions have taken place, or if there is any suspicion that they have taken place, the suggestion made by the hon. member for South York is a very good one, and a commission appointed by this Parliament to investigate the banking system in this country should go into them most minutely. Such an investigation would be very much in the interests of the people of this country. However, I do not agree with him when he says that the banks of Canada have not tried to perfect their system. Now, I will refer again to the book from which I have quoted already in regard to the currency question. A passage has just caught my eye which I shall quote in passing and with which I do not agree. The gentleman to whom I refer is Sir Edmund Walker. He is speaking of the issue of bank charters, and he thinks that charters should be granted for a longer period than ten years. He thinks that banks have too short a lease of life under their charters and he goes on to say that these charters have to be renewed every ten years, and continues:

> This insures a complete discussion of the principles underlying the Act, and of the details connected with the working of it, once in ten years. In the interval we are almost free from attempts by demagogues or ambitious but ill-informed legislators to interfere with the details of our system, but during the session of Parliament preceding the date of the expiry of the charters we have to defend our system from the demagogue, the bank-hater, the honest but inexperienced citizen who writes letters to the press, sometimes the press itself—indeed from all the sources of attack which institutions possessing a franchise granted by the people experience when they come before the public to answer for their stewardship.

I feel very sorry for the bankers. I do not intend to place myself in any of these classes; I am far from being a bank-hater, although I may be an honest, inexperienced citizen. I would rather be a bank-lover than a bank-hater. I think it would be a nice thing to have a bank such as Sir Edmund Walker has in his case. Sir Edmund Walker lays down four prerequisites of a successful banking system and I am going to quote a little further from this book:

It should create a currency free from doubt as to value, readily convertible into specie, and answering in volume to the requirements of trade. In saying this I do not wish to be understood as asserting that banks should necessarily enjoy the right to issue notes. Whether they should or should not issue notes must always, I presume, end in a discussion as to expediency in the particular country or banking system.

I think I should say frankly to the Minister of Finance that he has taken a right step in advance, although my hon. friend from York does not agree with me, in regard to giving increased elasticity to the banking system in connection with currency. I approve of that entirely as far as I can see it. Anything he can do to increase the currency of the country in an effective and safe way will meet with my hearty approval. The second prerequisite is this:

It should possess the machinery necessary to distribute money over the whole area of the country, so that the smallest possible inequalities in the rate of interest will result.

With respect to this prerequisite of an improved banking system, I am not going to speak of my own knowledge; but I do hear from members of this House, from the East and from the West, that there is a great inequality in the rate of interest that is charged between the East and the West and the province of Ontario. I am told by members of this House that a short time ago they could borrow money for five per cent and that now they have to pay six. I am told by members from New Brunswick that they have to pay six and seven per cent, whereas in Ontario we pay six per cent, and I am told that in the West there is no regard for that provision of the Bank Act which says that the banks shall only charge seven per cent interest. If that is so the investigation which my hon. friend asks for would bring the matter out and it should be attended to in some proper way. The third prerequisite is this:

It should supply the legitimate wants of the borrower, not merely under ordinary circumstances, but in times of financial stress, at least without that curtailment which leads to abnormal rates of interest and to failures.

I am afraid that in this respect our banking system can be improved. But, I am not going to deal with that, I am going to skip that and I am going on to what Sir Edmund Walker states as the fourth and last prerequisite of a properly constituted banking system:

It should afford the greatest possible measure of safety to the depositor.

That is a point I want to make. My contention is that under our present banking system there is absolutely no security to the depositors. The bankers have been wise with regard to the currency and I can explain to the House, if it does not already know, as I think it does, how it happened that the change was made with regard to the note circulation problem. Up to 1880 there was no note circulation fund whatever and even later than that there was no note circulation fund. But up to 1890 there was even no priority given in so far as note circulation was concerned and Sir Edmund Walker says in regard to that:

The change in 1880 was caused by the failure of a small bank with a circulation of about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, paying all creditors, note holders included, only fifty-seven and one-half per cent. The change in the Act now in force was due to the demand for a currency which would pass over the entire Dominion without discount, under any circumstances.

He also says that

At the renewal of charters in 1880 the circulating note was made a prior lien upon all assets; and at the last renewal in 1890 the banks, at their own suggestion, were in addition required to create in two years a guarantee fund of five per cent upon their circulation, to be kept unimpaired, the annual contribution, however, if the fund is depleted, to be limited to one per cent.

The action of the banks in this respect was most commendable, but if their action in that respect was commendable and if they changed their system because a small chartered bank with a capital of $120,000 failed, they should look to it and consider how many banks have failed, how much money depositors have lost and how many have failed since the last renewal of the charter. Since 1891, if I read the record right, nine banks have failed in Canada. Since the last renewal five banks have failed. Let us take the whole country since Confederation, 1867, in regard to the failures of banks and see how the depositors have been treated as a result of those failures. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance made a point this afternoon that only one-half of one per cent had been lost by depositors. That seems very small but just let us see the record. Since 1867, twenty-three chartered banks have failed. In all cases but two the noteholders were paid in full. In the case of the Mechanics'

Bank of Montreal, the noteholders were only paid 57½ per cent and in that of the Prince Edward Island bank, 59½ per cent. Let us see how the depositors have got along. In eleven cases out of the twenty-three they did not get paid in full, but they got the following amounts: 50 per cent, 57½ per cent, 96 per cent, 66⅔ per cent, 10 6-10 per cent, 99⅔ per cent, 59 per cent, 75½ per cent, 17½ per cent. From the time of Confederation down, twenty-three banks have failed and depositors in about twelve or thirteen of them have received less than the full amount of their deposits. The Minister of Finance states that the suggestion which I have made to him is not a feasible one. I cannot understand what the Minister of Finance means when he says it is not feasible, because the suggestion is simply this: There are $650,000,000 of deposits in the savings branches of our banks. This amount should be protected. The banks could not last for one year unless these deposits were there. These depositors should get something for their money. The banks are making an enormous amount out of these deposits and it only fair that you should do in connection with the depositors what you have already done in connection with the note redemption fund. I do not say that you should do it all in one year, but you should do it as you did it in the case of the note redemption fund. You should lay aside one per cent this year, one per cent next year and so on until you get five per cent, or three per cent, or whatever you think is necessary, to protect the depositors who have money in our banks. That would work no hardship whatever. I would even go so far, as to say that when this money is paid into the Exchequer, the bank should receive from the Consolidated Revenue Fund an amount equal to the interest which they would pay to depositors had it remained in the banks. If this money is put into the Exchequer, the banks should receive from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada an amount equal to the interest they would pay if the deposits had remain in the banks. In that case, the bank would suffer no hardship, at most the only hardship suffered by the bank would be the loss they would incur by not handling the money themselves. The banks have given to them absolutely free the use of $116,000,000 of currency, for which they do not pay one cent unless it be two and one-eighth cents per bill which I am informed is the cost of engraving. If the Government of Canada would take from the banks an amount equal to say three per cent of their deposits, or, as I would submit, five per cent—three per cent would amount to about twenty million dollars and five per cent would amount to thirty million dollars—you would have ample protection for the depositors, and the country could use that money, which would be in the way of a forced loan from the banks at three per cent, while to-day the country is paying more than that for foreign loans. If that were done, then in regard to every bank that exists in Canada, there would be afforded absolute protection to the depositors, who after all, are those who make banking in this country a possibility. Let us see if that is not so. There are three banks in Canada all the depositors in which might not be protected under this system, but I am glad to say that the depositors in these three banks do not need protection. The deposits in the savings department of the Bank of Montreal are $97,000,000; Bank of Commerce $88,000,000; Royal Bank, $73,000,000. A fund of thirty million dollars would not protect the depositors in these banks if they were to utterly and absolutely fail, but such a thing is beyond the range of the most vivid imagination. The next largest bank has a deposit of $39,000,000, the next $34,000,000; a great many of them have under $10,000,000, and nearly all under $30,000,000 in deposits. My contention is that without injuring the elasticity of the currency and without depleting the country of its money, you would have secured the depositors in every bank in Canada, except as to the three banks I have mentioned, and I think every hon. member will agree with me that the depositors in these three do not need protection.

Now, what are the arguments in favour of this scheme? The first argument is that it is a fair thing to do because the depositors are the most important class which go to make our banking system a success, and they get the least out of it. The depositors have four times at stake what the shareholders have, even reckoning on the double liability; the interest paid them is small, and on that account they should be given protection. The second argument in favour of this scheme is, that it would do away to some extent with the necessity for a very close inspection of the banks. In connection with the note redemption fund, you have provision that the Bankers' Association can pass rules and by-laws in regard to the issue of notes that are put in circulation by all the banks, and, in a certain way they have supervision over all the banks to see that they are living up to the law. I do not see why a similar provision should not be put in this Act, giving the Bankers' Association further supervision over the banking system and the various banks, so that they could discover just what each bank is doing. If each bank, the big bank and the little bank, were responsible for the deposits in all the banks, I will guarantee that the Bankers' Association will see—the Bank of Montreal will see, the Bank of Commerce will see, the Royal Bank will see—all the various banks that form that association will take good heed that the small banks do not encourage what the Minister of Finance spoke of as wild finance, or improper banking, or improper practices. It will be in the interests of these larger banks to inform the minister of any such thing occurring, and if his system of audit goes through, although I do not approve of it, he could immediately send an officer to look after that smaller bank, take it in charge, and put it again on the straight and narrow path. This scheme would certainly make the Bankers' Association interested in seeing that the banks do not do improper banking. The third reason in favour of the proposal is, that if, by such a system of protection, you make depositors feel absolutely safe, you will find, I believe, that the deposits in our savings banks will increase by leaps and bounds. I know from my own experience that the failure of the Farmers' Bank had a wonderful effect on the banks in our part of the country and that effect remains to this day. I know that after the Farmers' Bank failed, men who would not lend their money on mortgage up to that time were anxious to take it out of the bank and invest it in other channels. The banks themselves will profit, because if absolute confidence is inspired in the people, they will place their money in care of the banks, and the banks will be able to do a larger business. The Minister of Finance will agree with me that anything that tends to encourage thrift and saving on the part of the people and to cause them to put their money on deposit in the banks, will add to the prosperity of the country.

What are the arguments advanced against this proposition? One argument is, that the big banks would be compelled to do something for the little banks which would be unfair to them, because we are compelling them to help to build up their competitors. My reply to that is, that if it is in the interest of the people of Canada that the big banks should do this, it is their duty to do it and it is our duty to compel them to do it. The big banks of this country, and particularly the largest bank, has received enough care and protection and stimulus from the Government and the people of Canada to entitle us to demand from it any action that is in the interest of the general banking system of this country. As a matter of public spirit, as a small return for the advantages they have received in times past and are still receiving from the people of Canada, they should be willing to make some sacrifice to place the banking system of this country on a stronger and firmer ground. The next argument against it is, that by its adoption you are creating a false security; but I cannot for the life of me see how that can be possible. The Government is in no way guaranteeing depositors; it is the banks themselves who are guaranteeing depositors. There can be no impression more deeply rooted in the public mind than that which at present exists and which was to some extent dispelled by the failure of the Farmers' Bank, that the Government of Canada, at the present time, does absolutely guarantee depositors. What are the facts about the Farmers' Bank? Hon. members know well the deplorable and lamentable results which followed from the failure of that bank.

The people of my district suffered by hundreds. I have a statement from the liquidator in which he says that there are $1,100,000 of deposits and that he has only got in some $20,000 of double liability. In my opinion, from the figures he has given, not one depositor in that bank will receive one cent. One of the members of the relief committee of the Farmers' Bank told me that the loss to the Farmers' Bank shareholders or depositors,—I think it was depositors—meant in the Province of Ontario the absolute distress of six hundred families—not six hundred men, but six hundred families. Men who had left the farm, or whatever was their calling, men in the middle walks of life, who were dependent on the little that they had put into the bank for their livelihood, were absolutely deprived of their means of livelihood. I know some in my own part of the country who had to go west and take up homesteads which the hospitality of the country gives free. While I am on the Farmers' Bank question, there is another point I should like to refer to. All through my part of the country quite a lot of pressure was put upon the candidates to promise that when they got back here, they would see that the depositors and shareholders of the Farmers' Bank would be absolutely reimbursed for their losses.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who said that?

Mr. ROSS: The depositors and their committees urged on the different candidates all through Ontario the making of that promise. For my own part, I thought it was an unfair advantage to take of any man, and I refused to make that promise. I told my people I would come back to this House, and if a Bill was introduced that I thought was fair I would support it; if it was not fair in my opinion I would oppose it, and that I would do the best I honestly could for them. I am depending a great deal on what I am told for the support of the amendment which I intend introducing in the committee. I am told that on the other side there were twenty-eight candidates who had pledged themselves, as seriously as men could pledge themselves, that if the Liberal Government were defeated and the Conservative Government came into power, they would advocate in this House the reimbursement of depositors as well as shareholders, some of them went so far as to say: It is such a terrible calamity; we will not only do that; if Mr. Borden is returned to power, you will get interest on your deposits from the date of his election. I can produce a cloud of witnesses to prove that such pledges were made. I think that every one of those men who made such promises, or at least as many of them as got into this House, will be absolutely bound by their assertions to back me up in this resolution which goes for the protection of the depositors by the bank.

If it was right for the country to reimburse the depositors and shareholders, surely it cannot be wrong for the Government of this country to provide a fund out of the Bank's own Funds to see that what they thought was right in the case of the Farmers' Bank should be done in all cases. That is as far as I will go to-night in regard to this matter. I will take up some questions relating to it later on.

I am going to deal for a moment with the question of inspection; but before doing so, I hope that the hon. Minister in this respect will not be content to say in Committee that such a thing is not feasible, and state as a reason that the deposits are so enormous. I think that reason works the other way; it seems to me the larger the treasury you have, the more you should try to protect it. If the note issue is $116,000,000 and the deposits are $100,000,000, I say that the deposits should be protected in that proportion; and I hope that the hon. Minister will take the matter into serious consideration, and not brush it aside with the argument that it is not sound banking. Sound banking seems to be a matter that does not relate to any time; it is defined differently in different countries. From what the Minister says, this has never been tried in any country; and I do not think he should brush it aside with such an argument, because there has been no experiment here.

In regard to the audit which the hon. Minister has suggested in his Bill, I cannot see how it is going to produce the results he expects. We all know how the meetings of bank shareholders occur; we all know what takes place in them; we all know who attend and who hold the proxies; and it seems to me the only thing that can possibly happen would be that the auditor the general manager wants will be the auditor who will be appointed. In other words, the auditor will be the creature of the general manager; he will be paid by the bank; he will depend for his position on the favour and esteem of the general manager; he will depend for his position upon his obeying the behests of the general manager almost to the smallest item. I do not think in all sincerity that it is going to bring about the result that the hon. Minister said; and I think that a system of Government inspection could be easily organized with trained officers, competent men, well up in the banking practices of this country, at good salaries. We do not need to be mean in regard to this, because we have made lots of money, due to the prosperity of the country in the last fifteen years. I think the suggestion made by my friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) is a splendid suggestion, that there should be a sub-committee or sub-department of the Finance Department which should have complete charge of the inspection of the banks of this country. The argument against it raised by the hon. minister is that it will raise a false security; that if you have a Government inspection of banks the Government will be responsible for the banks. There is a Government inspection in the United States; I am informed that they have a Government inspection in Germany, and I do not think the people of those countries hold their governments responsible for the failures of those banks at all. Let us see if in other things that impression has been created in the public mind. Let us go into the field of Ontario politics. Take insurance companies. My hon. friend knows that the Superintendent of Insurance under the Ontario Act has power to go into any insurance company, go through their books, examine witnesses under oath, ask for special statements and make a most thorough inspection of everything that is done by the insurance company, either at their head office or their branches; yet no person will contend that the people of Ontario think that the Government of Canada or the Government of Ontario is responsible for the insurance companies of this country. There is no false security in that respect. The same thing occurs in regard to loan companies and insurance companies under the Dominion Act. I think therefore the hon. minister's contention in that respect falls to the ground, and for my own part I will support very strongly a system of Government inspection as a sub-department of the Finance Department.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE (North Ontario): I do not think that the House can be better engaged than in the discussion of the Bill now before us. The legislation that we are considering affects every business and every community throughout the country. I think the time is past when we in Canada should fall down and worship the banks and banking institutions of this country. I do not think that the record of failures of banks in Canada will justify the favourable comments and encomiums placed upon the banking system by the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Halifax. I have in my hand a pamphlet which was issued by Mr. H. C. McLeod, ex-manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia. Commenting upon the percentage of bank failures in Canada, he speaks as follows, at page 10 of this volume:

> From 1893 to 1909, with general prosperity, rapidly increasing bank deposits and advancing values, Canada shows failures of nearly one in five.

Further on he says:

> We would seem to require to ask the records of some of the notes of American Union, during the wildcat banking period of about sixty years ago, to find statistics with which our system can make favourable comparison. Whoever seeks the reason for this unfavourable result must reach the conclusion that the chief cause is want of supervision of the direction and the general management of Canadian banks.

Since Confederation there have been twenty-four bank failures. Since the last revision, in 1900, there have been six or seven failures. I submit that this displays a lamentable weakness in our banking system; there is something radically wrong, and that wrong should be remedied by this House. And for my part, I shall be glad to join with other hon. members and to lend such assistance as I can to this end. There was a recent disastrous failure in this country, namely that of the Farmers' Bank. This concern, unfortunately, had a branch in my constituency. This experience has made the revision of the Bank Act the livest issue in my constituency that is now under discussion. Hundreds of people lost a good deal of money, including township officials and municipalities, and, as I say, the people are roused to the necessity of a careful study and revision of the provisions of this Act. I believe the members of this House will be held responsible throughout this country for the form which this Act shall assume. The Minister of Finance, I think has displayed conspicious ability in the discharge of his duties heretofore; but no one, I believe, will envy him the task before him of evolving a Bill satisfactory to the people of Canada, and satisfactory at the same time to the Bankers' Association. I believe the predecessor of the present Minister of Finance was more timid in bringing down a Bill than is the present minister. I think the changes sugggested in this Bill go in the direction of rectifying the evils which have existed further than did the Bill presented by the former Minister of Finance; yet, in my humble opinion, the present Bill falls far short of what was expected by the people. When the former Minister of Finance was moving the third reading of the Bill to extend the bank charters for a year, on the 17th of May, 1911, I took occasion to make certain brief observations in connection with the matter. I refer to page 9335 of 'Hansard' from which I quote what I then said:

> I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the desirability of appointing a Royal Commission to enquire thoroughly into the conditions of banks in this country and other countries with a view of improving our present Banking Act. Recent events have disclosed many serious defects in it. The provisions regarding government inspection do not meet with the approval of many people. The provision in the Bill brought down would not meet the approval of many people outside the bank authorities.

I went on to discuss the advisability of appointing such a Royal Commission as has been proposed to-night by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) and approved by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I am still of opinion that that is the most satisfactory way to deal with this question. The Banking and Commerce Committee is not an ideal body for the discussion of such questions and the investigation of the problems involved. We are told that banking operations are intricate and complicated; and I agree with that view. The members of this House are not expected to be familiar with the various conditions and complexities of banking or the amendments that should be made in the law. I believe a commission of experts should thoroughly investigate this question, and their report to this House would be the best available means to bring before us the information we need. The United States, a short time ago, spent something like $270,000 investigating the banking conditions with a view to improving their system. They have passed a resolution, by a majority of 237 to 8, instructing the Banking and Commerce Committee to investigate the banking conditions of the United States and report. Other countries also are spending large sums of money to investigate, with a view of putting this business on a proper footing. We, apparently, are satisfied with the old conditions and are making no effort, except by such as discussions here bring out, to improve our banking system. I say it does not require further argument to show that, if we have had twenty-four bank failures since Confederation, and one out of five from 1893 to 1909 and seven failures since the last revision, there is something radically wrong with our banking laws. Recent figures have disclosed the fact beyond question that there is something radically wrong, and the people will insist upon this House providing additional safeguards that will prevent a repetition of such frauds and failures as have occurred recently in connection with banking affairs. If our banking institutions are doing a legitimate business, they have nothing to fear from an honest inquiry into their operations. Of course, we may expect the banking interests and the large money interests to oppose this investigation. They have always opposed such investigations. They will say that it will produce unfavourable conditions and possibly panic. That is always the cry of those who are fortified in their rights and privileges. That is the cry they raise—that conditions will be unsettled and business will be endangered. I think the proper way to approach this question is not through the Banking and Commerce Committee, but by a Royal Commission that will investigate the banking conditions not only of this country but of the United States and other countries, and will suggest for incorporation in our Bank Act such wise provisions of foreign legislation as can be adapted to our system. If, however, there is not to be a Royal Commission appointed to investigate our system and improve our banking laws, then the Banking and Commerce Committee must go thoroughly into this discussion, so far as time will permit. And I submit—and I trust it is the idea of the powers that be in this House—that the Banking and Commerce Committee should have every opportunity to call the witnesses who desire to give testimony as to the operations of the banking law. Everyone knows what will happen. The Bankers' Association will have its representatives; it will be represented by paid counsel by the presidents, managers and directors of banks; and those of us who are not familiar with the intricacies of banking will be handicapped. We should have counsel there, employed by the people. And men should be summoned from any provinces that desire to assist the committee in their deliberation. I think representative farmers should be summoned who desire to testify—the President of the Grain Growers Association of the West, the President of the Dominion Grange; also the editors of the Grain Growers' Guide and the editor of the Weekly Sun. Also, I think the committee should endeavour to get some inspectors of the United States system to give us their experience in regard to inspection in the United States.

Then we have to note that nobody closely indentified with the banks has raised any objection to the provisions of this bank Bill. I have heard no adverse criticism by anybody of authority in the Bankers' Association. The Saturday Night, in discussing the Bill, stated that it was customary for the previous Finance Minister to submit any proposed Bank Bill to the Bankers' Association for their approval before it was brought down to the House. I do not know whether or not that has been done in the present case——

Mr. WHITE: The Bill was presented to the House in the first instance, without previous submission to the Bankers' Association.

Mr. SHARPE: I am glad to receive the assurance of the minister that the Bankers' Association has not had an opportunity of perusing the Bill before it was submitted to the House, for I think it is due to the members of this House to have an opportunity of discussing the Bill before any interests affected by it should pass upon the Bill. However, I am giving as my authority Saturday Night, a very reputable paper.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think Saturday Night is wrong in that respect. All these gentlemen who are so vitally interested send in all the opinions they have when a matter of this kind is coming up for discussion, but in every case I think it is presented to the House first.

Mr. SHARPE: At any rate, any Bill presented to this House by previous Finance Ministers, as well as the present Bill, has never met with any adverse criticism from the Bankers' Association or anybody identified with banking interests. I assume, since the Bill has not been adversely criticised, that it is in a condition acceptable to them, and I assume that they expect that certain concessions will be made, and that we may expect those interested, even in the Banking and Commerce Committee of this House, will try to retain all the privileges they possess without having the door opened to the public for the improvement of present conditions.

As hon. gentlemen are aware, this Bill is not a political measure, and I was glad the Finance Minister invited suggestions from members of the House. I think it is the duty of hon. gentlemen to give their opinion freely, and I do not think the people of the country would object if the discussion on the second reading of this Bill occupied a period of a week or ten days. I agree with the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross), in his statement that there is not a more important measure before this House than the present Bank Bill, and it should not be railroaded through as quickly as possible, as hon. gentlemen should have every opportunity of discussing it and expressing their opinions in regard thereto.

Representing a rural constituency, I have conferred with a good many people in the rural districts, and, in offering my first suggestion, I say that the Finance Minister, in not making provision for a system of government inspection, has not caught the spirit of the people. To use a colloquial expression, he has not had his ear to the ground, or, if he has, it has been the wrong one, because I believe in view of the disastrous failures which have occurred during the past few years in connection with our banks, and the serious losses suffered by the people of this country—admittedly through defects in the Bank Act, which required drastic treatment—that the overwhelming sentiment of this country is in favour of some system of government inspection in connection with these institutions. I think the hon. Minister of Finance instead of diagnosing the case as one requiring a surgical operation, prefers the milder treatment of administering homeopathic doses to the patient. The provisions for inspection are entirely absent, and there is merely a provision for a shareholders' audit, which is entirely inadequate to meet the public demand. The only redeeming feature I can see—if there is a redeeming feature, and I doubt it—in connection with the unfortunate failure of the Farmers' Bank is the fact that it has been the means of concentrating the attention of the House upon the defects in the Act. I have suspicions that the ex-Finance Minister did not go on with his revision at the time when the failure occurred because that was at the time when public indignation had reached the crest of the wave and public opinion would have forced this House to have made some changes more radical than have been made in the Bill proposed to this House by the ex-Minister of Finance. Now that the tide has ebbed somewhat, and public feeling has subsided, we are going to allow the Bill to go through with very slight changes, with the result that the same old conditions will exist; we will have a few more failures, and when we are considering the next Bill ten years hence we will be lamenting the fact that we never had government inspection.

Mr. PARDEE: And this Bill is no better that the last one in that respect.

Mr. SHARPE. The essential omission in this Bill is the lack of some kind of external inspection. Some arguments against government inspection are advanced by those interested in not having any such a system. They say the people would rely upon government inspection as a guarantee. But they already look to the Government that grants the charter and certificates and receive annual returns, and that can demand special returns to protect them from fraud. If the people are now relying upon these things, they will not rely any more on the government if we have a system of external government inspection. The government inspection supervises insurance companies, foodstuffs, and weigh scales; why do they not inspect these banks, holding a thousand millions of dollars as deposits? Other countries, such as the United States, have a complete system of government inspection which works satisfactorily, and there is no objection to that system on account of the people relying on that inspection and holding the Government responsible for failure. They also say it is impossible to inspect thoroughly owing to the great number of branches as a great staff of inspectors would be required. It is a fact that the branches require no other inspection than the inspection of the head office. The great frauds—the Ontario Bank, Sovereign and Farmers' Bank—occurred at the head office.

Mr. EDWARDS: The head office believes in the inspection of the branches.

Mr. SHARPE: Yes, and not of the head office. If the rule is applicable to the branches, and they should be inspected, then surely they cannot object if the Government institutes a system of inspection with regard to head offices. At page 6 Mr. McLeod, in his pamphlet, says:

> If there be any Canadian bank of which a fairly clear insight cannot be obtained by intelligent auditors within a week, by examination at the head office alone, that bank's system is out of date, and a chartered accountant's assistance might not be amiss for the purpose of improving it.

Mr. PARDEE: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. SHARPE: A pamphlet written by Mr. McLeod, ex-manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, an experienced and successful banker of many years' standing. This statement is endorsed by the Minister of Finance, and I think he thus gave us the best argument that could possibly be made for a system of government inspection of head offices. Mr. McLeod further says:

> In our investigation of the causes of failure of banks operating branches, we have not found one instance in which failure was due to bad management at the branches.

This is because they are checked up at the head office. What we want is somebody to look after the head office. Mr. McLeod says:

> The general management is always at fault, and the directors are frequently involved.

That is the expressed opinion, not of a member of this House, but of a banker, the manager of a bank for many years.

The general management is always at fault, and the directors are frequently involved. There is almost no other history of the cause of bank disasters in Canada.

Think of that.

There is almost no other history of the cause of bank disasters in Canada, and the same appears to be true fo other countries having similar systems of banking. We have no record of fraudulent failure in which the vicious conditions existing could not have been readily detected by an expert at the head office of the bank.

Could any argument be stronger than that for a checking up at the head office by a Government inspector. It is said that it is impossible to thoroughly inspect banks on account of the number of branches, but as Mr. McLeod points out in his pamphlet, and as we know from the history of the failures and frauds and losses occasioned by mismanagement and maladministration, it is at the head office that the trouble occurs. What was the experience of the Ontario bank when Mr. McGill speculated in New York? Would his speculations have been possible under a system of Government inspection. The branches were not blamed in that case; it was McGill's speculations and maladministration that resulted in the failure of the Ontario Bank. What is the history of the suspension of the Sovereign Bank but the lending of money by Mr. Stewart to his relatives on foreign securities such as the Alaska Railway and the Milwaukee and Chicago Railway? That would have been detected at once by a Government inspector at the head office. In the case of the unfortunate Farmers' Bank we had Mr. Travers speculating with hundreds of thousands of dollars in a hole in the ground, the Keeley mine. Would not that have been detected at once by a Government inspector at the head office? I venture to express the opinion that those loans and speculations would never have been made in any of those cases, and the defalcations which resulted would never have occurred if there had been a consciousness in the minds of the managers that they might be called upon at any time by a Government inspector. The very consciousness of the possibility of a Government inspector walking into the head office would have prevented those loans, and an inspection would have disclosed at once the frauds that were being perpetrated. What are the arguments in favour of government inspection? Government inspection may do some good, and it cannot possibly do wrong. If an institution is doing legitimate business there is no reason why its operations should not be open to inspection by a government official. If government inspection increases the public confidence in banks so much the better for the banks, for people would utilize more than they do, and the banks would thereby benefit. A system of government inspection would disclose any frauds at the head office, and I repeat that the mere knowledge that a government inspector would appear at the head office would be the very strongest factor in keeping that office in perfect order.

If time permitted I could read extracts from newspapers and from the speeches of representative men from the Atlantic to the Pacific, favouring government inspection. I am going to read some to the House. If this Bill had been submitted at the time originally proposed, the sentiment of the country would have forced the members of this House to compel the Government to adopt some system of government inspection. Unfortunately however, public interest seems to have subsidied and consequently there is no provision in the Bill for government inspection. Instead, there is simply one for a system of audit which I do not think is at all adequate to the necessities of the case. I read the following extracts because I am impressed with a sense of my duty to the constituency that I represent, a constituency that has suffered severely through recent bank losses. I believe that a five cent piece would not have been lost if the warnings given and the arguments advanced years ago had been acted upon. The Toronto Saturday Night, a very representative paper, dealing with this question on January 7, 1910, had the following:

Under proficient and proper government supervision practically every bank failure that Canada has experienced in twenty years could have been avoided, for in no instance in that period would the head office of the bank in difficulties have failed to indicate to an expert the breakers ahead.

Here is what the Toronto World of January, 1911, said:

Enough has come out of the bank failures of recent years and especially out of the Farmers' to justify the demand for a governments inspection of banks . A public book inspector would have discovered irregularities in the Farmers' Bank at the end of the first three months.

The Toronto News in its issue of January 9, 1911, said:

The News believes, and the ordinary layman believes that the time has come for the inclusion in the Bank Act of a clause providing for the regular overhauling of every chartered bank in the country by highly paid government experts. Such outside supervision would be no terror to well-conducted institutions and it would prevent at least some from being run into the gutter.

Hon. members will have noticed in reading the press to-day, when the Bank Act is being considered, that there is not very much urging in favour of bank inspection.

For some unaccountable reason the newspapers are quiet on the subject when they should be speaking out in the loudest tones. I leave hon. members to draw their own conclusions as to the reason, but it is curious that at the time of the Farmers' Bank failure the newspapers urged with irresistible force this subject of inspection upon the attention of hon. members of this House, and were wild in their demands for government inspection. To-day they are as silent as the tomb; not a voice is raised that I have heard in favour of government inspection. I have here extracts from the Evening Journal of Ottawa and the Toronto Telegram, but I shall not take up the time of the House in reading them. They are along the same lines. Here is what the Toronto Star said, however:

The lesson of the Farmers' Bank failure, as of other recent bank failures, is the necessity for government inspection.

The Montreal Witness said:

The Witness was the pioneer in demanding either government inspection or independent audit of banks.

Now I want to read Col. Denison's opinion on the subject. He is not a bank expert like many members of this House; he is a businessman of the world, and he has good judgment. I rely on Col. Denison's judgment because he investigated a great many bank failures and tried a number of the parties charged with defalcations and maladministration. On January 17, 1911, Mr. Travers was brought before Col. Denison to be sentenced for his criminal conduct in connection with the Farmers' Bank failure, and he said:

One thing that can be said for you is that you were severely tempted to do wrong in attempting to retrieve the fortunes of your bank, and that the system of bank inspection that is in effect in Canada would seem to make it easier for you. If there had been a proper system of government inspection of banks I don't think things would have gone so far as they did.

The fact that there is no government inspection makes the temptation to do as you have done greater and since this is so, the only way to stop it is to impose a severe penalty. This is the third bank case of a similar nature that has come before me.

I specially invite the attention of the House to this observation:

And I have no doubt that a system of outside inspection in each of them would have made almost impossible the things that were done.

That is Col. Denison's opinion after having tried at least three cases of defalcations in connection with banks. The Toronto News of January 14, 1911, had the following:

In any event, Parliament should not rise until it has armed the Administration with full authority to inspect all chartered banks annually, and prevent their systematic looting over long periods.

I have a stronger authority for government inspection than I have yet read. Some of the banks, when the storm was brewing, hastened to get, so to speak, under cover and welcomed government inspection. I have have here the annual report of the Bank of Toronto contained in the Mail and Empire of January 11, 1912. Mr. Coulson was president of the bank and, in the annual address published in that paper, he says:

It has been suggested that all banks should undergo an outside audit or inspection. We have no objection to such an external inspection, if made by competent authority, and should the Government decide to incorporate provisions to that effect in the Bank Act, we will be ready to agree to whatever inspection the country, through its representatives, desires.

Then, the president of the Bank of Toronto welcomed government inspection. But we have a stronger case even than that. At the annual meeting of the Traders' Bank—the bank that was merged with the Royal Bank a short time ago—we had their president, Mr. C. D. Warren, practically favouring government inspection. The Hon. J. R. Stratton, vice-president, expressed his entire agreement with those views. In addition, we had Mr. E. F. B Johnston, K.C., at the annual meeting in Toronto, moving the following resolution, seconded by Mr. J. S. Williamson:

Resolved, that the shareholders and directors of the Traders Bank of Canada place on record their hearty approval of any legislation of the Dominion Parliament whereby an independent examinaton and audit, under the direction of the Government, of all Canadian banks shall be made from time to time. Resolved, also, that whilst the system of auditing should be determined by the Government, it is hoped that, in the public interest, the method to be devised will be thorough and efficient, and of a practical character, as the result of a defective system would create injustice and tend to injure those who might be induced to rely on reports having the sanction of a government or other official auditor.

Here are two representative banks in the country passing resolutions favouring government inspection. The country is ripe for government inspection and I trust that the Minister of Finance will remodel the provisions in connection with the audit and that he will, instead of providing for a shareholders' audit, provide for a system of government inspection. But I have the authority of the Minister of Finance himself. An address which he delivered before the Dominion Chartered Accountants is reported in Saturday Night and he made use of such language as to justify Saturday Night in concluding that he was favourable to a system of external inspection.

Mr. WHITE: I desire to correct that misapprehension. I was addressing the Accountants' Association and I stated that I was in favour of an external audit such as I have provided for in this Bill, but I did not say that I was in favour of external inspection.

Mr. SHARPE: I accept the word of the Minister of Finance without any reservation whatever, but I say that the language the minister used, according to the Saturday Night, justified that journal in believing that he was in favour of an external audit and I will read what the Saturday Night said in support of what I say:

There is no one in political life, who would be less calculated to speak out of his turn than Hon. W. T. White, Minister of Finance. His short tenure of the post and the circumstances of his election, not to mention the dead weight of the position itself, are all against any slip of the tongue.

When, therefore, the Hon. Minister of Finance rose to address the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants on the occasion of their annual banquet at the King Edward Hotel, Toronto, and before this representative gathering of skilled experts made the observation that the wrecks of the Ontario Bank and the Farmers' Bank might in both cases have been averted by a proper system of auditing, the opinion is one of importance and the probability is that bankers throughout the country will immediately sit up and take notice of the same. The effect of the utterance of the hon. Minister of Finance is that while Mr. White meant all he said, he may have meant a great deal more, as a little analysis of the position would tend to show. Mr. White is quoted as having included the following in his address on that occasion:

I feel satisfied that had the directors of the Ontario Bank employed a proper system of auditing, it would have been the means of preventing the institution from closing its doors. This might likewise be applied to the case of the Farmers' Bank, which might have been averted, had its affairs been under the observation of a first class auditor.

Then the Saturday Night, briefly commenting upon this observation, says:

Both banks employed officials to do just this work. A similar system is being followed by most of the chartered banks in this country. A few also utilize the services of a special auditor who is a nominee of shareholders, but to all intents and purposes he is on a par with the other inspectors, as he is paid by the bank, and not by the shareholders. . . The observation of the Minister of Finance would seem to contain an implied message to bankers throughout Canada, to the following effect: a proper system of audit would make it impossible for the general manager or any other official to divert the funds of the bank to any improper use and would thus effectually safeguard the investment of shareholders and the rights of prior creditors. It has been left for the banks to have their own audit made in the past, notwithstanding which a number of disastrous failures have resulted. There appears, therefore to be something deficient in the system under which these audits have been effected, and consequently something new must be devised and applied which will be adequate to cover the conditions under which the banks operate.

Unless the above surmise takes unwarranted liberties, it would appear that Hon. W. T. White is in favour of an external examination of Canadian chartered banks. Such an able banker as H. C. McLeod, former general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, took this view so emphatically that he issued a most important forty-page pamphlet on the subject. The first edition was printed in 1909 and it resulted in a conference of leading bankers of Canada on the subject. It was quite plain, however, that the bankers were on the whole utterly out of sympathy with the application of external inspection to Canadian banks. Consequently, although they read the pamphlet, it was promptly pigeonholed. It would not be at all surprising if the Minister of Finance would, under the head of 'Revision of the Bank Act,' introduce legislation which would, in some form or other, insure that the books and papers of Canadian banks should be inspected and audited by others than the paid employees of the banks themselves. Such a policy would meet with the almost unanimous approval of financiers and business men throughout the country and it would incidentally stamp Hon. W. T. White as being a minister of finance well worth electing to the position.

Mr. EMMERSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman if, in the extract from the minister's address, the words 'external examination' or 'external audit' are used?

Mr. SHARPE. No, but what the article assumes is that the Minister of Finance says that a proper system of auditing would have prevented the recent failures. They had a system of audit that was not proper or effective and as the present system—practically what is provided in this Act, namely, a shareholder's audit —is not sufficient to prevent failures, they assume that an external inspection was what the minister aimed at on that occasion. The proposed audit in the Bill is no inspection at all. It provides merely that an accountant or auditor shall be appointed by the shareholders at the annual meeting. It is for the shareholders' protection. What about the depositors? The depositors in all our banking institutions are the special wards of the Government. They have no right to participate in the election of the officials of the bank, they have no voice in the management of the institution, it is the duty of Parliament to so safeguard the depositors that they cannot possibly be losers and the best system of protecting the depositors is by providing for a system of government inspection. The appointment of auditors by shareholders does not meet the necessities of the case at all. The hon. member for Westmorland, on the first reading of the Bill, touched a weak spot when he said that the directors control the annual meeting by proxies from shareholders and consequently it is in substance a directors' audit and not a shareholders'—a shareholders' in theory but a directors' in fact. I had occasion to read a few of the annual reports and I find that the Northern Crown Bank published its annual report in the Mail and Empire on December 24, 1912. There are twenty-three names of shareholders given as being present at the annual meeting, and twelve directors were elected, so that consequently the twelve directors would control. The annual report of the Merchants bank was published in the Toronto Globe, on December 31, 1912, and twenty-two names of shareholders are given as being present and twelve directors were elected; the annual report of the Royal Bank was published in the Toronto World of January 11, 1913, and there were twenty-two shareholders present and sixteen directors elected. Consequently, as the hon. member for Westmorland truly said, in substance this appointment of an auditor would be not by the shareholders but by the directors who control the situation. I know that the people will not be satisfied with any audit short of an independent government audit. I think it was the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) who stated that the business of a bank is the business of the shareholders, and that the public have no right to enforce their views in regard to government inspection of banks.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I did not say that. I said that one objection made by bank managers to external inspection was that it was a matter for the shareholders. I took the very ground which my hon. friend appears to be taking.

Mr. SHARPE: That ground is taken by the banking institutions.

Mr. MACLEAN: And I was combatting that.

Mr. SHARPE: I was under the wrong impression that the hon. gentleman had made that statement. My answer to that argument is that the banks are quasi-public institutions created by the state, enjoying special and peculiar privileges and rights from the state, and as such they should be subject to inspection by the state. In olden days, one of the prerogatives of the Crown was the creation and the circulation of money, and we having conferred this prerogative of the Crown on banking associations, they certainly should be amenable to public inspection and public control. The very fact that the banks invite deposits from the public, is sufficient reason to make them amenable to the control of this Parliament representing the people of this country. We have a system of inspection of insurance companies and other institutions of the kind, and why not inspect banking institutions which it is still more important should be inspected. Then again, I never have been able to understand why bank charters are extended for a definite period of ten years. Why should banks any more than railway companies receive carte blanche to do business for ten years without being in the interim amenable to this Parliament. It seems to me that it is a legal fiction for us to assume that we can shackle future parliaments and prevent them from amending in any way the Bank Act. No doubt the Bankers' Association would desire immunity from criticism for ten years, but, if an hon. member of this House desires next session or the session afterwards to introduce some amendment to the Bank Act which is found to be in the public interest, should this Parliament be prevented from legislating because of the fact that we assume to say the charters of the banks shall run for ten years. That idea is a constitutional fiction; I do not believe that this Parliament can restrict future parliaments. In the event of this Bill becoming law now, and there should be discovered defects in it, such, for instance, as the inadequacy of the shareholders' audit, is the Parliament of Canada to be prevented for ten years from making the necessary amendments? I have to be enlightened, when the Bill gets into the Committee, as to why we should name a definite period for the extension of these charters, because I consider that I have never been able to understand it. For example, Sir William Meredith, Chief Justice of Ontario, has been investigating the failure of the Farmers' Bank, and if he discovers abuses that should be corrected and makes suggestions as to a remedy, are we to be prohibited from incorporating his suggestions into the Bank Act next year? I repeat that I do not believe it is within our constitutional right to pass a Bank Act for a period of ten years and profess to tie the hands of Parliament during that time from interfering with it. I presume that the provision in regard to ranch cattle and grain is inserted in this Bill for the benefit of the western farmer. But, why should the eastern farmer be discriminated against; why should not this provision be made to include the live stock in the barns of the eastern farmers? I represent a county which is one of the best in this Dominion for the raising of horses, cattle, sheep and hogs. The farmers of that county raise grain, not to sell, but for feed purposes; the capital of the farmers of my constituency is invested in live stock, and representing these farmers I protest against the discrimination that this Bill levels against them. It is clearly set out in the Bill that the provision is intended to apply to ranch cattle and to grain, so that there is an unfair discrimination made against the cattle raising industry of Ontario. I say, Sir, that the eastern farmer is entitled to as much consideration as the western farmer, even though he may not be so aggressive in his demands. If the advantage be extended to the western farmer to borrow on his ranch cattle, then a similar advantage must be given to the eastern farmer to borrow on his horses, cattle, hogs and sheep. Then again, there should be provision made in the Bill for some form of notice of the pledge held by the bank which advances these loans. Under this provision, in the Bill as it is at present, a dishonest man may go to his neighbour and borrow all the money he can on his stock and grain; then he can go to the bank and give them a secret pledge and borrow from the bank and then light out with the result that the bank will gobble up everything and the other creditors can go hunting for their money. There is no protection in this Bill for the private lender or the local merchant; under its provisions the bank can step in and take everything. If this provision is allowed to remain in the Act, there should be some requirement for notification on the part of the bank by filing a copy of the pledge in the registry office of the county town.

Mr. EMMERSON: That is required in all other business transactions.

Mr. SHARPE: It is required with respect to every other such transaction, and I do not see why the banks should be exempted from doing what other people are compelled to do. In my opinion, if there is no notice to be given to the public of these loans, then this provision in the Bill will benefit the banks and injure the general public to a degree which we cannot at present estimate. The private lender will suffer and the local merchant will suffer. In connection with this provision some better pledge should be given to the people. I have some other materials that I wish to refer to in connection with this Bill; but I have delayed the House too long, and I do not purpose occupying much further time. I had some words to say in regard to some features of other banking systems that should be incorporated in this system. I agree with a great deal of what has been said by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in regard to the national system of banking acting in co-operation with private banks or private individuals. In the first place, I desire to emphasize beyond anything else that we should have some system of Government inspection or external inspection of banks. We should also have a national bank along the line suggested by the hon. member for South York, which would have control of the note issue under Government supervision, which would do the Government business, the same as the European banks do, free of charge, and would hand over a part of their enormous profits to the people. Such a bank would be a great regulator of rates of interest and of discounts, and a great profit earner for the people, as has been proved in European countries. If there is no national bank, then I say that the Government should control the issue of the notes in the same way that the United States Government does, and hand them out to the banks on their depositing gold or Dominion of Canada bonds bearing a low rate of interest. Thus the Government would secure more direct control, would have profits on notes issued, and also a great profit on lost notes, which now goes to the bank. Failing a Government bank or Government issue of notes to the bank, then the banks should pay reasonable taxes to the Government for the privilege of issuing notes, for instance, as is done by the Bank of Belgium, the Bank of Norway, and the banks of several other European countries. I say that other countries receive enormous benefits from banks for the exclusive privileges and rights conferred by the state on these banks. For instance, the Bank of France pays stamp duties and interest on its currency amounting to several millions of francs each year; it also loans to the Government free of interest fifty millions of francs; it also loans thousands of millions of francs to the Government at one per cent and two per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: That was one of the conditions of the charter.

Mr. SHARPE: Yes. It does all Government business free of charge, and it returns to the Government three-fourths of its earnings over five per cent. The discount rate is alike to all. Why should Canada stand alone in all the world in not collecting reasonable taxes from the banks, or controlling the note issue, or having more direct voice in the banking operations of the country?

There are a few objectionable features in our banking system, which I think should be eliminated on this revision if possible. I have repeatedly said in my remarks that there should be Government inspection, and I say that there should be provision in the Bank Act compelling the banks to accurately value their assets, especially real estate. They conceal their assets by undervaluing their very valuable properties in the cities. There should be some tax on currency issue; there should be some tax on money shipped out of Canada. At a time of stringency as at present, when the grain is being moved from the West and some farmers both in the East and in the West can scarcely command any money, I understand that the banks are loaning millions of dollars on the New York Exchange. There should be some limitation of the banks' power to loan to officials of the bank; there should be some limitation of the banks' power to loan to mining companies in which officials are interested. Under the old Bank Act, the manager of the bank could lend money on the security of a hole in the ground, the same as Travers did in the case of the Keeley mine. That can be done at the present time just the same as before. It should be made criminal for a bank to purchase its own stock, and the directors of a bank should not be allowed to be directors of any trust company. I will have more to say in connection with the trust companies and the banks which are closely allied to the trust companies, when the Bank Act comes before the Banking and Commerce Committee. Mr. H. C. McLeod says that a bad feature of our present banking system is the system of interlocking directors who hold seats on the banks and on the trust companies, in order to speculate to the detriment of the general public. I submit there should be no mergers of our present banks without the consent of Parliament; that should be provided by special bills. No such responsibility should rest on the shoulders of any individual or group of individuals outside of this House. I have absolute confidence in the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board; but I say it is too great a responsibility to rest upon the shoulders of any group of men to be able to consent to the amalgamation or merger of any two banks; it should be by private Bill brought before the House. In connection with the capitalization, I agree with the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), when they said the success of the bank does not depend on its capitalization; it depends on the security and integrity of the management and the limited scope of its operations. Mr. McLeod says the same thing on page 4:

> With capable management a bank with $200,000 capital is not more liable to disaster that a bank of $2,000,000 capital: the one must be content with a small circle of operation; the other must avoid the temptation to reach out with the dash and daring that in too many instances, for want of restraint, has resulted in menace and wreck.

What I respectfully suggest would be this that we should have incorporated some features of the United States system in small banks. Allow the banks that are operating with branches in more than two provinces to have $500,000 capitalization; allow the provincial banks with branches confined to one province a reduced capitalization of $250,000; and allow a bank that will have no branches to be operated in cities and counties a capitalization of $100,000. I believe this is one of the great defects of the banking system of Canada. The present banking system is like a mighty octopus with its tentacles in the shape of branches stretching out throughout the whole Dominion, and gathering into its mighty maw the earnings of the rural districts and taking them to Montreal or Toronto for speculation. We want local banks in Canada with smaller capitalization; I say that is what the West is calling out to-day for, and the board of directors should be elected in the county where the banks are operating; that will help to build up those local towns. Oshawa was built up by reason of the head office of the Western Bank being situated in that town. Weyburn to-day is being boomed because the head office of a bank is in Weyburn. The smaller places in this way would have means at their disposal to carry on their local productions and local industries. I submit that by the present system we have created an aristocracy of wealth, the greatest combine in Canada, having a predominating influence upon our economic, industrial, financial and political life. I agree with the remarks of the member for South York that in the present stage of the history of this country, there must be some system of restraining and controlling this mighty commercial combine, and the best means of controlling that and making it operate in the interests of the people is in my opinion a system of government inspection and a change in the capitalization of the banks. I say it is a combine; prices have risen in all walks of life, all commodities have increased in price, rents, cost of materials; we must pay higher interest on our loans, but the Bankers' Association never raise their rates of interest on deposits. Consequently I say, if we had a system of local banks it would help to build up the communities and would be to the greatest advantage of the people of this country. I have a number of amendments to suggest, and these I shall propose in the Banking and Commerce Committee when the proper time comes. I firmly believe that the Bill will not be satisfactory to the people, in my section at least, without some adequate provisiion for outside government inspection; and I would strongly urge the Finance Minister to consider the advisability of remodelling the Bill in this respect.

Mr. J. DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville): Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, I do not propose discussing at any length this question to which I have given a great deal of attention of late years. I even introduced a Bill in that connection, and though it did not cover the whole ground—which is not to be wondered at, considering the importance of the question—it had nevertheless the good effect of causing hon. gentlemen to look into the matter and impressing them with the necessity of radically amending the Banking Act.

The Bill referred to provided for a system of government inspection of our banks. Besides, it required that shareholders should be kept informed of the bank's dealings, inasmuch as directors and officers of the bank were directed to supply full particulars in regard to the business of the year preceding, an annual meeting of the shareholders being, of course, convened in due time. My contention was that shareholders would thereby be in a better position to appoint thoroughly competent, honest and trustworthy directors.

The important point is to protect depositors, and I considered that such protection would be ensured by means of a thorough and painstaking government inspection, such inspection following on the fuller acquaintance with the bank's transactions previously obtained by the shareholders. I believed, and I still believe, that those unfortunate depositors who are left unprotected under the present Act, would thus have their interests efficiently safeguarded.

I shall be very brief, as I understand from the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance this afternoon, that this Bill will be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where we will be given an opportunity of moving amendments and of making whatever suggestions which we consider most beneficial. But, before proceeding any further, I wish to draw the attention of the Finance Minister to the fact that the Bill as printed in French is not a correct translation of the English copy. In the first place, I should point out that the Bill as printed in French does not give in italics the proposed amendments, while in the English copy every little change is shown. Accordingly, whoever takes up the French version of this Bill for purposes of study, has to compare it with the wording of the present Act, which, considering the length and intricacy of the Bill, entails considerable work, a difficult task and one almost out of the question.

I beg to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance, who possibly does not understand me when I am speaking French, to the facts I have just stated. I hope that some hon. gentleman will make him acquainted with the substance of my remarks, viz: that the French copy of the Act is not the verbatim rendering of the English. For instance, section 43, paragraph (a) of the English version reads:

Or by his attorney appointed in writing.

while in the French copy the corresponding statement is wanting. Then section 47, paragraph 2, of the English Act contains these words:

And shall give his post office address and description.

which are not to be found in the French copy.

The probable explantion is that the Bill was first prepared in English, then translated into French, and that later on the English copy was made to include these additions, which were not inserted in the French copy.

I claim that such an oversight should be corrected previous to referring the Bill to the Committee on Banking.

I trust the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) will kindly draw the attention of the Finance Minister to this statement of mine, and that before submitting the Bill to the Committee on Banking, the French copy of the Bill will be reprinted, the variations shown in italics, and that the portions omitted will be inserted in their proper places.

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) Has the hon. member discovered serious discrepancies?

Mr. DEMERS: (Translation.) It is rather a difficult matter to make a definite statement in connection with so lengthy a piece of legislation. But from the facts I have just pointed out, in reference to sections 43 and 47, I have reason to believe that such discrepancies exist.

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) In the English copy changes are shown in italics; does the hon. member say that this has not been done for the French version?

Mr. DEMERS: (Translation.) Just so. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great pleasure to the remarks of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). I agree entirely with his views, though I cannot approve of the form in which he has presented them to the House. I regret exceedingly that the hon. member should have attempted to make political capital out of this question, for this is not a question as between Liberal and Tory; it is a question which calls for the co-operation of all men of good will towards the perfecting of legislation which is of the utmost importance to the public welfare. I was sorry to hear the hon. member cast aspersions on the former Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), whose fair name and public-mindedness are fortunately unimpeachable.

I am the more aggrieved at these statements coming from the hon. gentleman that I am in perfect sympathy with the suggestions he made. I am in favour of a system of government inspection for our banks, and without any undue boasting, I think I can claim that I have done my share towards bringing about a consideration of that question, and that I have been one of the first to make such a proposal in this House. Of course, in that part of the province of Quebec which I have the honour to represent, the failure of a certain bank caused much suffering, and that sad experience of ours had something to do with my efforts to find some means of preventing such disasters which under the present law are difficult to avoid. But whatever my reasons for doing so, I have made a special study of this question.

One of the means I suggested, and possibly the most effective, was a system of government inspection, and, useless to say, I rejoice that by far the greater number of hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House on that question to-day, on either side, have spoken strongly in favour of such a system.

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) If my hon. friend will allow me, I wish to give him satisfaction at once in connection with the complaint he has just made, and asked me to submit to the hon. Finance Minister, to whom I have communicated the substance of his remarks. The Bill was first drawn in English, and my hon. colleague the Minister of Finance is quite put out by the statement of my hon. friend. Of course, each one should bear his own responsibility. That translation is the work of the officers of the House of Commons, and whatever omissions the hon. member has found out and complained about, and rightly so, should be brought home to them. I propose laying the matter before the Speaker, and I have no doubt he will see to it at once.

Mr. DEMERS: (Translation.) I am altogether satisfied with the explanation forthcoming from the hon. Postmaster General. I was saying how pleased I was to find that so many members of this House were advocating to-day a system of government inspection of banks. But I am very sorry indeed that the Minister of Finance should not have inserted a clause to that effect in the first draft of the Bill. According to that hon. minister's contention, the carrying out of such a proposal is an absolute impossibility, owing to the fact that there are in Canada, he says, 2,800 such branch offices. If, in order to give satisfactory results, it were necessary that the said inspection should include a separate investigation of the business of the various branches, that would offer, I admit, some serious difficulty. But I contend that with a system providing for practically day-to-day reports from the branch offices to the head office, it would be sufficient to have inspection at the headquarters. And, Sir, I insist particularly on this: the existence of a system of government inspection would exert a considerable moral influence. Realizing that an outside inspector may come in at any time, bank managers would surely be more careful, in the same manner as customs officers on board of trains. I doubt very much that any of them effects during the year seizures for an amount equal to his salary, but then how much smuggling is prevented merely by the presence of such an officer!

The hon. member for North Ontario was right in saying that the people of this country expected to find in this revision of the banking Act a clause providing for a Government controlled system of inspection, instead of inspectors or auditors appointed by the directors themselves, as it is well known that shareholders are in most cases represented at the general meetings by those very directors. Bank charters are granted by the Government, issued by the Government under the authority of Parliament; it is in order therefore that the Government should take in hand their supervision and make sure that there is nothing wrong with the management of those institutions which are entrusted with the savings of the people.

The Government cannot afford to remain indifferent in regard to this question; sooner or later, they must follow in the footsteps of the governments of foreign countries, such as the United States and Germany, where, thank God, a similar system of inspection has been giving general satisfaction.

Moreover, the mere reading of the law as it now stands clearly shows that the legislator realized that it was necessary for the Government to have supervision over the financial status of our banks, as evidenced in the wording of sections 112, 113, 114 and others. Unfortunately, however, previous experience has shown that such means are insufficient. Therefore, it is incumbent on our present law-makers to find other means towards attaining that necessary end.

In conclusion, I insist once more on the desirability of providing a system of government inspection, and I trust that when the Bill is submitted to the Committee on Banking, amendments will be introduced towards providing for such a system, and that the hon. Finance Minister will think it proper to insert them in the Act. I shall not proceed any further for the time being, reserving my right to address the committee in connection with it later on.

attention of the House at any great length at this late hour I do not expect to be here when this Bill is reached next week, and it is of so much importance to the country at large that the opportunity of voicing an opinion in the matter should not be allowed to pass by any member of the House who gives the matter serious consideration. The Bill now under consideration is fraught with greater and more important consequences for the people of Canada than any Bill introduced in the House during this session. I am not here to condemn the banks generally, because I believe the banks of Canada do a good work for the country as a whole, but I do think the system that has grown up during the last forty or fifty years should be carefully discussed before we extend to these banks the right to carry on this system for another ten years.

A statement made this evening by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) impressed me very much. Evidently the hon. gentleman has given the matter a great deal of consideration. I must confess that I have not gone into the matter to such extent as he has. I have only a cursory knowledge of the system being carried on in the continent of Europe and the British Isles; possibly I know more about the banking system in the United States than in any of the continental countries. I think the proposition which the hon. gentleman made to-night is one which the Government should consider very carefully; that is that there should be a Royal Commission, or a commission of some kind appointed to investigate the banking systems of the world, and be able to report to this House before the Bill becomes law. Of course it would be necessary to renew the present charters for a couple of years in order to give the commission time to conduct the investigation and make a report, but the country and the banks could well afford to wait for two years, continuing the present conditions, especially in view of the fact that, as I view the Bill, it does not change the conditions to any very great extent. And if the Commission find that we have the best system in the world, then the only thing we have to do is to accept it. I do think that from the general standpoint of Canada's interests our system possesses very many advantages over that of any system in the world. Some hon. members have explained this afternoon the system at present being followed in France; the enormous amount of money they are lending to the French government free, and the amount of money they are lending to the French government of one and one-half per cent interest. With all due respect to the hon. gentleman who advanced these ideas, I do believe that would not be possible in Canada, because money is worth more here than in France. Men who have money can invest it in the ordinary business affairs of the country and get from it a greater percentage of profit, and therefore, we have got to face the conditions as they are. We cannot expect, however, to keep the money in the banks at a rate of interest which bears any reasonable proportion to the interest they would receive in the ordinary business affairs of the country. It will be a splendid thing for the members of this House to get the information before them as to what is actually going on in France, Holland, Belgium and other European countries before being called on to give to the banks of this country a renewal of their privileges for another ten years. We have, of course, a right to amend the Act, but we do not want to forget that if we pass this Bank Act for ten years, then one year from its passage certain people will invest money in banks and obtain certain vested rights. While this Parliament has a legal right to pass amendments and vary the law, I do not think it has a moral right to make such amendments as will affect those rights until the expiration of the 10 years for which the charters are extended. It therefore seems to me that we should have this information before the charters are renewed.

It has been stated by hon. gentlemen speaking in this discussion that the banks are giving to the people of Canada all the accommodation which the business affairs of the country require. That, Sir, I deny. I have no doubt that in the city of Toronto, represented by my hon. friend, the president of the Dominion Bank, who has spoken here this evening, and in the city of Halifax, represented by the hon. gentleman who sits at my left (Mr. Maclean), they may be able to get all the money they require for the ordinary business affairs of the community, but that is not so in the country districts of some portions of Canada. The people of the Maritime provinces are not able to get the money they require to carry on their business affairs. If a manufacturing concern can show the proper amount of assets, and a sufficiently well-established business, they can get the accommodation they require, but the fault I find with the banking system of Canada today is the fact that there must be an idea in the minds of those controlling the banking trust that the banks exist for the purpose of helping out the manufacturers of the country, and have nothing whatever to do with the farmer, the mechanic, the artisan, and the men who are really contributing two-thirds of the money upon which they are doing business. Another fault I have to find is that they will lend money at certain times in the year, and when money is required for moving the crop in the West they will close up like a rat trap. A man may have borrowed a few hundred from the bank, and if he is not prepared to meet it at its maturity he is simply told by the local branch manager: my instructions from head office are that you must pay that note—and he has got to pay it. He must go to his friends and have them endorse a paper for the purpose of meeting this small amount. Within the last two months I have had an instance where from one of the greatest financial institutions in Canada a gentleman obtained the loan of the paltry sum of $300, endorsed by a man worth thousands of dollars and backed by collateral securities consisting of municipal bonds to the amount of $1,000 at 4 per cent. When this became due the bank refused to renew it, and the man had to negotiate the amount elsewhere. I can relate another instance occurring in my own town where a man spent $10,000 to erect a mill. He did not have to borrow this amount, as it was his own money, but he wanted three or four thousand dollars to carry him along in his lumber business until he got his product on the market in May. He went to the bank and offered undoubted security —indorsements and mortgages, but he was compelled to go to his friends, who had to raise money from private sources to obtain the beggarly sum of three or four thousand dollars. The reason given by the bank was to the effect that the head office had instructed them not to loan any further amounts—they needed it to carry the crops in the West. Indeed, the farmer and lumberman in the Maritime Provinces and throughout the agricultural portions of the country are the men who are furnishing the capital. I have not the figures and have no way of getting them, but I think I am safe in making the statement that 75 per cent of all interest bearing deposits in the banks of Canada to-day—about half a million dollars—is the money of the farmers and mechanics of this country who have all got money in the banks in amounts ranging from $25 up to $100, $1,000 and $4,000. The banking system is not doing its duty when it does not furnish back to the people reasonable facilities for carrying on their business. I will admit their business would not be as profitable as the big manufacturing industries of the large cities, but they are just as important to the people of this country as are the big commercial institutions.

Now Sir, that brings us to the consideration of what is going on in the banking world of Canada. I believe that the banks of Canada are honestly working for their shareholders. Their object is to pay dividends, and I do not think they are carrying out their present procedure from any ill-feeling towards the farmer or towards the small depositor. I think it is simply because they believe that they can do better business and make more money for their shareholders by carrying on their business in the big centres. That is why I believe they are adopting the policies that are in operation at present. One of the great difficulties in my mind lies in the absorption of the smaller banks by the greater ones, and that, of course, brings into the question the policy of bank agencies in Canada. Personally, I am a firm believer in the system of banking agencies. As I said before, I have not a very intimate knowledge of the banking system throughout the world, but I have not read of any system that is so well adapted to our needs as the system of banking agencies. By that means we are able to gather in small deposits throughout the country—it may be only $25 or $100 or $1,000—and to transfer them from one part of the country to another where the money is most required. The difficulty I am inclined to think, lies in transferring the money from the country districts to the city centres, but it is a system which, if carried out properly, would not permit of any inequality, and would give splendid results. We found in the Maritime provinces when we had our local banks that it was a much easier matter to have our local needs supplied than it is by the larger banks. The answer will be that the local banks were sometimes insecure, that it was necessary for the security of the country at large that the local banks should be merged. That might be under existing circumstances, which I am sorry to say the Minister of Finance intends to perpetuate in this Bill, but I think that some system should be devised which would encourage the creation and maintenance of local banks. I am not sure that I would go as far as the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). He seems to think that there ought to be a system by which banks with only $100,000 of capital and with one office should be encouraged. That might be all right in some places, although I think that a capital of half a million dollars with $250,000 paid up, is probably small enough. The great difficulty would be that if you had a bank with a capital below that amount the public would not have sufficient faith in it to invest their savings, and without the savings of the public, practically no bank could make money in Canada to-day.

It has been explained thoroughly this afternoon that the banks are really doing business, not upon their own capital, but on the savings of the people, and the bank which is not able to obtain the savings of the people will not, I am afraid, make its business a success. Now I believe that the difficulty in regard to small banks has been that the big banks, perhaps silently, but deliberately, have frozen them out, putting them in a position where they could not get the savings of the people, and practically compelling them to merge with the larger banks. I believe that no bank should be allowed to merge with another without the consent of this Parliament, embodied in a Bill and duly enacted. I do not believe that a bank should be allowed to merge with another simply with the consent of the Minister of Finance or of the Treasury Board.

Mr. CURRIE: What would the hon. member do in the case say of the Ontario Bank?

Mr. CARVELL: It became bankrupt, did it not?

Mr. CURRIE: It had to be taken over in one day to avoid great losses.

Mr. CARVELL: I would simply allow the mater to stand until Parliament had met. I do not think the matter would be so urgent as not to permit of that. If some of the ideas that have been so ably advanced by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) this afternoon were carried out, I do not believe that any bank would get into such a position that it could not wait a few days or a few months until Parliament met and passed an act. Look at what is going on in the Maritime provinces. The Bank of Nova Scotia and the Bank of New Brunswick are amalgamating because the big stockholders say it will be to their advantage, that they can make more money by amalgamation, and the people of New Brunswick have not a word to say about it. The Bank of New Brunswick to my mind has been a great factor in the interests of the people of the province.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is its capital?

Mr. CARVELL: Over a million dollars, I think. It was in splendid financial shape; it had deposits amounting to $5,000,000 or $6,000,000; it had a magnificent business and a truly local business; and I think it is a misfortune that it has ceased to exist, as it practically has, by amalgamating with the Bank of Nova Scotia. The Bank of Nova Scotia may also be said to have ceased to exist as a Maritime institution, because its head office is now in Toronto. It would have been very much better for both of these institutions and for the people of those provinces, if the two corporations had been compelled to come to Parliament and show reasons that would justify them in being merged into one institution.

I was very much impressed this afternoon with the proposition put forward by my hon. friend from Middlesex, that this Parliament should make some provision for the protection of depositors. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance settles the matter by one wave of his hand. He says such a thing was never done before, that it is not practicable, and he thinks that is the end of it. Well, a good many things have happened in Canada recently that never happened before, and I do not see any reason why we should not at least consider this matter, even if we do not adopt it. If the Minister of Finance would consider it a little more carefully, I think he would change his opinion. I was not in Parliament when the Act was passed providing for the protection of the note issue by the putting up of five per cent, but I have no doubt that all the banking institutions of Canada and all the banking magnates said that that had never been done before, and that therefore they should not be compelled to give that protection. But they were compelled to do so, and now they say it is all right. I am old enough to remember when a bank note in Canada was practically not good except in the immediate vicinity of the bank which issued it. Now, a bank note issued in Nova Scotia is as good in Vancouver Island as it is in Halifax, simply because the people have absolute faith in the banks. They do not know why, but they know that in some way or other that note is protected, and that they are perfectly safe in taking it. It passes current everywhere, and it is good for 100 cents on the dollar. I do not contend that it would be profitable perhaps to devise a scheme by which deposits would be as fully protected as the note issue is, but when we consider that to-day the banks of Canada have over $1,000,000,000 of the people's money, and that even two per cent of that amount or $20,000,000 would for all practical purposes absolutely protect the depositors of this country, it seems a proposition which ought to be considered very carefully. It would only mean that at the end of every year or at the beginning of every year the banks would put up with the Government two per cent or three per cent of their deposits, and in my opinion two per cent would be ample. They should go to the Government and the Government should pay interest on them. I would be willing that they should pay them 3½ per cent because the Government cannot borrow money for less than 3½ per cent; although possibly, as the Government now pays 3 per cent on deposits with them, and as the banks only pay 3 per cent, it might be fair that they should only pay them 3 per cent. That would mean that all that the banks would lose would be the right to make profits on that paltry sum of money and it would be a paltry sum of money when you consider all the business done and the immense amount of money received from the public. The banks obtain this thousand million of dollars at 3 per cent. and they let it out to the people of the country at anywhere from 5 to 8 per cent and I am told that they let it out at the rate of 9 and 10 per cent in the West. Well, 9 and 10 per cent is too great, but I am not going to find fault with the banks for trying to make money when they can because the conditions are not the same in Canada as they are in Europe. If a bank charges 6 per cent I have no fault to find with it and I dare say that 7 per cent is not unreasonable on small loans. I do not find fault with the banks for trying to make money, I think it is only right that they should try to get as good a return as possible for their shareholders without, of course, doing an injustice to borrowers or crippling the industries of the country.

My hon. friend would ask: What right have you to take money out of one bank and use it as a guarantee for the depositors in another bank? The answer is this: The people of Canada are giving the banks the right to issue dollar for dollar with their paid-up capital without paying them one cent. The paid-up capital of a bank is perhaps $250,000, the bank at once issues $250,000 in notes and, instead of having a quarter of a million of capital, it has half a million of capital. Then, we are making them the repository for the savings of the people. It is true that a man can go to the Government, or Post Office Savings Bank and deposit his money, but the conditions are such that people do not like to go to the Post Office Savings Bank. If a man wants to withdraw $1,000, $500, or $100 from the Post Office Savings Bank he is obliged to wait a month. I do not know whether the banks had anything to do with getting the law as it is relating to the Government Savings Bank but certainly the law is very much in favour of the banks.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do you not believe in the Government Savings Banks?

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly I do, but unfortunately, as a result of the way they are managed, the banks are getting the money and not the Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not the barriers that you put in the way of the withdrawal of savings from the Government Savings Bank constitute an important feature of the system?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think so. I think you should make the Government Savings Banks as elastic as possible to induce people to put their money into them. Client after client comes to me and says that he does not want to put his money into the Post Office Savings Bank because he has too much trouble in getting it out; therefore, he goes to the chartered bank. Personally I have advised clients of my own to put their money into the chartered banks.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But you have big clients.

Mr. CARVELL: No, they are not all big clients. We have three chartered banks in our town and I have never had any hesitation in advising my clients to put their money into those banks on account of the conditions to-day. I repeat the statement, that the chartered banks are the repository for the savings of the people and they will continue to be so. In this Bill we are even going so far as to provide that no corporation may use the word 'banks' except a chartered bank. A private banking company may not use the name at all. We are even giving the banks a greater monopoly than they have at the present time. If the banks have the right to issue dollar for dollar of currency with their paid-up capital, and they have that right, if they are the only banks practically which can receive the savings of the people, if they receive them at three per cent and are allowed to let them out at six, seven and eight per cent, I do not think it would be a hardship upon the shareholders if they were compelled to put one or two per cent of their savings with the Government as a security for depositors in every other bank.

Mr. EMMERSON: Especially where they are earning from eighteen to twenty-three per cent.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: Are you not taking that much money out of circulation?

Mr. CARVELL: Possibly you are. I am not going to argue that at all. You are putting that into the hands of the Government and my hon. friend would perhaps say: Well, the Government have the $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 and if they did not get money in this way they would have to go to Europe and borrow it. I admit that possibly we might have a little more money brought into the country from Europe, but the amount is so infinitesimal compared with the enormous wealth of Canada, the interest of the people is so great and the advantages to both the banks and their depositors are so important, that I do not think it is worth considering.

If you had had a system like that coupled with bank inspection, I do not think the Minister of Finance would have listened to the castigation which he received this evening from his friend and supporter the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) or would have been made to feel that there is something wrong in the system of audit which he is proposing here. It does not meet the needs or aspirations of the people, it is not giving to the people that protection which they claim they have the right to expect from the Government. My hon. friend provides that the banks shall appoint an auditor. The auditor, it is true, shall be elected by the shareholders, but my hon. friend provides that if a man is eligible to be elected as an auditor his name must be proposed at least ten days before the annual meeting and every big shareholder and all the directors know that such a man is proposed as auditor. If the directors, who are usually the majority of the stockholders, do not want that man to be auditor, you can depend upon it that he will not be auditor. My hon. friend is not innocent; he knows how these things are carried on. There is not a man in this House who is innocent; we all know how these things are carried on. We know that a dozen or half a dozen of the leading stockholders are the directors and they always have their own way about the election of directors and officers. If they could not have their own way they would not be directors and officers. The fact that they are able to have their own way results in their being directors. If they want Brown as auditor they will have Brown as auditor and the minority stockholders can go whistle and hang. The measure provides that this man's salary shall be paid by the shareholders. The shareholders are the directors and if the shareholders choose to vote one dollar for a salary they will not get very much of an audit. The whole thing goes to show that this is a scheme put up in the interest of the banks to meet the growing demand that has taken place in this country for the past three or four years for an independent, outside audit or inspection of the bank. I do not charge my hon. friend with doing anything improper. I am afraid that my hon. friend has lived in the financial atmosphere of Toronto so long that he is saturated with it; therefore, I do not charge him with anything wrong. He is permeated with this idea but of course my hon. friend is not answering to the sentiment of the people in making the provision that he is making for inspection. If my hon. friend had kept his deaf ear, not even his good ear, to the ground this evening he would have heard the significant murmurings behind him in several places while the hon. member for North Ontario was speaking, and he would have been aware that at least, so far as the Conservative party are concerned, they are not in sympathy with this proposal. I believe that when this Bill gets to Committee the Minister of Finance will consider carefully a proposition that there should be a real inspection of the banks, not an inspection and audit by a man under the control of the directors and general manager who is simply a jack-in-the-box to do what he is told, but a real inspection by an auditor appointed by the Government who will, if necessary, go to the head office and to the branches as well. In most cases an audit of the head office would be sufficient, but I know of some banking transactions, which had the audit gone beyond the head office would have been of great advantage to all concerned. I have in mind a bank in the Martime provinces which was afterwards amalgamated with the Bank of Montreal, and had there been an efficient system of outside inspection, and had the inspector investigated the conditions at the branch in my own town and in the town which was lately the residence of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean), and had that inspector made an honest report on only two accounts in these branches, there would have been a different story to tell. Fortunately, the bank was taken over by the Bank of Montreal, and nobody lost any money.

Mr. CURRIE: Has government inspection in the United States prevented defalcation and ruin to the shareholders of the National Banks?

Mr. CARVELL: I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. CURRIE: They have had years of experience of government inspection in the United States, and I understand relatively more banks have failed there than in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: That may or may not be correct, but I have cited from my own experience cases in which the inspection of two or three accounts by an independent inspector would have made a great difference to the shareholders of a small bank. I do not think that an inspection of the Bank of Montreal or of the Bank of Commerce, for example, would be necessary, but if such a law be passed, it must apply to the big banks as well as to the little banks, because the law cannot distinguish between them. I have sufficient faith in these great financial institutions to believe that it would be impossible, by any defalcation or bad management at any one point to bring ruin to the whole. I have heard it stated that the Bank of Montreal lost six or seven million dollars in Mexico, but even if that were true, and I do not say it is, the Bank of Montreal is such an enormous institution that it could lose that large sum without affecting its general standing.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not think the statement is true.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know whether it is true or not, I merely mentioned it as a rumour.

Mr. CURRIE: I think it is only street gossip and I do not think it is fair to any bank to make such a statement.

Mr. CARVELL: I guarded myself by saying it was merely as a rumour, but even if it were true my point is that it would not to any great extent affect the standing of the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. CURRIE: The statement reflects on the management.

Mr. CARVELL: It would not bring about any serious consequences to the Bank of Montreal, but if a smaller bank lost one quarter of that amount, of course it might ruin the institution. I believe that had there been an actual inspection of the Ontario Bank, the Farmers' Bank, or the St. Stephens Bank, their deplorable failure would not have occurred. Any person who knew anything about auditing books could have gone to the St. Stephens Bank two years before it failed, and in one day he could put his finger on the sore spot and prevent the people incurring the great loss they did.

Mr. EMMERSON: The possibility of an inspection might be sufficient.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, even the possibility of inspection would have prevented some of those occurrences. I believe that we should have government inspection, which should not be a perfunctory matter, but under which the Minister of Finance, on a well-founded complaint, could direct his inspector to go to the head office or to any other office, and look into the condition of affairs. If this protection be given to the depositors, then you will have all the banks subject to the fatherly care of the Canadian Bankers' Association. The only care the Farmers' Bank and the Ontario Bank got from the Bankers' Association is, that they were taken possession of by an officer of the Association under the law and closed up as quickly as possible. But, if the Bankers' Association had their money up, to meet any loss which might occur by the failure of these banks, the Farmers' Bank would not have put thousands of dollars into a hole in the ground in Cobalt, nor could the manager of the Ontario Bank speculate in the New York stock market without the Bankers' Association knowing it. If we had protection of the depositors and government inspection, it would be the greatest boon to the small banks that could be devised. These small banks have the interests of the local community more at heart than any big bank could possibly have; they would take a personal local pride in building up their own district, and the farmers and artisans who require money in a small way to carry on their business would be able to get that accommodation from the small banks doing a local business, which they could not get from the large financial institutions. With the suggestions I have ventured to make carried out, I believe the banking system of Canada would be put upon a perfectly sound basis.

Mr. NESBITT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. EMMERSON: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he can furnish to the House data that would show the percentage of losses of notes of any of the banks which have been wound up, that is to say, if there is any data that shows in any way the percentage of earnings the banks have by reason of the destruction and loss of bank notes.

Mr. WHITE: I am not sure that that can be done, but I shall endeavour if possible to get it for my hon. friend. I have never seen such data myself.

Mr. EMMERSON: I did not know but that there was some information obtainable, and if so it would be very valuable.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO presented the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and moved its adoption. He said: This report recommends that such parts of the Auditor General's report for the last ten years as relate to payments to the Canadian Dredging and Construction Company, and the Owen Sound Dredging Company, in connection with dredging at Tiffin, Victoria Harbour and Midland, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the hon. member allow that motion to stand until those who do not belong to the committee have an opportunity of looking into the matter?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: At a meeting of the committee this morning, it was decided that the report should go through to-day, so that we might proceed with the matter to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD: The proposition to deal with accounts running back for a period of ten years is a very unusual one, as far as the practice of the House is concerned, and the motion is of a special character, the effect of which I think the House should consider. I do not happen to be a member of the committee, but as a member of the House I would like to have an opportunity of looking into the matter myself.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I may say that the committee met this morning and one witness was examined. We adjourned until to-morrow, when we will have another witness present, and it was for the purpose of having a prompt and efficient examination of this witness that this resolution was unanimously passed by the committee.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is not very late in the session, and the members of the committee have ample opportunity of holding further meetings. I only ask that the matter be allowed to stand in order that all hon. gentlemen may know the full effect of the recommendation.

Mr. BORDEN: The rule of the House as interpreted by the Speakers in the past is, if objection is taken to a matter of this kind, that it be allowed to stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 85, respecting the Board of Management of the Church and Manse Building Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, for Manitoba and the Northwest, and to change its name to The Church and Manse Board.—Mr. Sharpe (Lisgar).

Bill No. 86, to incorporate the British North-Western Mortgage Company. — Mr. Aikins.

Bill No. 87, respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 88, to incorporate the Canadian Accountants' Association. — Sir Rodolphe Forget.

Bill No. 89, to incorporate the Canadian Medical Protective Association. — Mr. Chabot.

Bill No. 90, respecting the Central Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Bennett (Simcoe).

Bill No. 91, respecting the Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 92, to incorporate the Metropolitan Mortgage Corporation.— Mr. Meighen.

Bill No. 93, to incorporate the Quebec Rapid Transit Railway Company. — Mr. Gauthier (Gaspé).

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. J. A. M. AIKINS (Brandon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, respecting the Dominion Lands Act. He said: As the Dominion Lands Act now stands, it approves the principle of a sale and complete alienation from the Crown—in other words, from the people—of water powers in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the lands connected therewith, and of the alienation and sale of coal lands, coal oil lands, gas lands, mineral lands and quarry lands. I am aware that the practice of the department recently has been not to absolutely dispose of these great natural resources, but to lease them under certain regulations. The purpose of the Bill, therefore, is to strike out the power of sale, and allow the leasing under proper regulations. In respect of water powers, the regulations may be made by Order in Council and approved by Parliament, but they relate to such important matters that it seems to me that they should be brought more directly under the consideration of Parliament, and the Bill proposes that these regulations relating to water powers should be first approved of by Parliament before they go into operation; should be amendable by Parliament, if Parliament so desires, and that any Order in Council amending them should not go into operation until approved by Parliament. A further provision of the Bill as introduced is to prevent what the Act now authorizes—the homesteading of such lands as I have referred to, which, when the conditions have been complied with, entitles the homesteader or the person who has the pre-emption, or has a right to purchase the homestead, to a patent, so that the surface rights become separated from the sub-surface rights which will be detrimental and injurious to the proper working of mines and the like, below the surface. In view of the proposed alterations it becomes necessary to make a provision for the utilization of the surface rights, and the Bill therefore provides for the right to give licenses for grazing and for hay cutting on the land.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Speaker, I ask your indulgence for a few moments to bring to the notice of the House a question of privilege, with reference to the report which appeared in the press of the discussion which occurred here on Monday afternoon in relation to the acquisition of branch lines by the Intercolonial railway. In the Ottawa Free Press of January 21, I find the following:

If Hon. Frank Cochrane had his way 'Hansard' would shrink in size and Parliament become the scene of brief and business-like proceedings. The Minister of Railways has always been laconic himself. Yesterday afternoon he sought to impose his brevity upon one of the hardy annuals of the House by a characteristically pointed interjection at the opening of what is recognized by tradition to be a regular all-day debate on the advisability of the Government taking over the branch lines of the Intercolonial. Mr. Cochrane was not successful. Hon. Mr. Emmerson, who is head and front of the agitation for action in this respect, declined to allow Parliament to escape his trenchant analysis of the situation and proceeded to debate his resolution.

It goes on further to state——

The member for Westmorland, who invariably goes into the whole question with considerable detail and elaboration, had hardly started his speech when the Minister of Railways rose. In order to save his hon. friend going further, Mr. Cochrane explained he was prepared to state his position at once.

I do not complain of the language that is used, but I want to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the facts of the case. Early in December last I placed on the Order Paper this inquiry:

1. Has the Government reached any decision as to the action they propose taking, if any, with a view to the acquisition of the branch lines connecting with the Intercolonial railway, and the operating of the same as a part of the Government system of railway? If so, what is the nature of the decision reached and when will their intentions relating thereto be given effet?
2. What is the estimated maximum amount involved in the purchase of all the branch lines of railway now connecting with the Intercolonial railway, as feeders operated at present by isolated private railway companies?

On Monday afternoon that question stood as No. 1 on the Order Paper. When it was called by you, Sir, the Minister of Railways was not in his seat, and somebody on the Government benches said: 'stand,' and it did stand. But later on, when my hon. friend the Minister of Railways had returned to the House, and before the questions were passed, I called his attention to No. 1 which had not been answered because of his absence. He then stated that the question, being one addressed to the Government had been handed to the Secretary of State, and that that hon. member of the Government would reply. The Secretary of State, who was in his seat, rose and said that the answer to the question had not reached him, and that therefore he was not in a position to answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is stretching the question of privilege to a very unusual degree.

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. EMMERSON: I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I have your indulgence and the indulgence of the House in making my explanation. I am not making any comments; I am merely reciting the facts to show that an injustice has been done to me as a member of this House, not only by this newspaper, but by the press throughout the country, because of a misapprehension of the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: While that may be allowed, I would point out, if I correctly interpret what a proper question of privilege is, that the hon. member is entitled to read the item and assert his privilege as a member of Parliament without going into a long history of the matter.

Mr. EMMERSON: I have read the article complained of, which does me an injustice and is not in accordance with the facts. I am calling your attention to what did occur. This appears on 'Hansard,' page 1798. I read the resolution which stood in my name, and moved it. I proposed to make some comments with respect to that resolution, and to explain it as best I could, and I made use of these words:

In attempting to discuss the question I am somewhat hampered by the fact that the Department of Railways and Canals have not answered the following question which stands on the Order Paper:

I read to the House the question which I have just repeated in your hearing. Mr. Cochrane then rose and said:

I could give the hon. gentleman the answer.

My reply to that was:

I should be very glad to have it.

I took my seat and my hon. friend then said:

The answer to the first part is that it is still under consideration. The answer to the second is that it is not in the public interest that we should give any estimate of what they are worth.

I then proceeded:

I thank my hon. friend for the information. Apparently the Government have not reached a conclusion with respect to the matter.

These were the facts, and they are not in accord with the conclusions drawn not only by this newspaper but apparently by all newspapers throughout the country. The answer of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways was not an answer to my resolution, nor did it in any way meet it. He simply stated that the question was under consideration by the Government, and I thanked him for that information. I feel it is due to myself, in the first place that the facts should be clearly understood, and I am sure it is due to the country that no misapprehension should go abroad with respect to the discussion of a matter of this character in which the public at large is interested.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman is in error in one or two things. He is in error in saying that I was not in my seat when the questions were called. I was here, but, as this question was one for the Government, the Secretary of State said that he had to hear from the different departments, not from one department, and, therefore, he was not able to answer it, and someone did say 'stand.' The Secretary of State was waiting for the other departments to answer.

QUESTIONS.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—BRANCH LINES.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Has the Government reached any decision as to the action they propose taking, if any, with a view to the acquisition of the branch lines connecting with the Intercolonial railway, and the operating of the same as a part of the Government system of railways? If so, what is the nature of the decision reached and when will their intentions relating thereto be given effect?

2. What is the estimated maximum amount involved in the purchase of all the branch lines of railway now connecting with the Intercolonial railway, as feeders operated at present by isolated private railway companies?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. The whole question of branch lines is receiving the attention of the Government.

2. It is not considered in the public interest to give this information at present.

BUCKHORN BRIDGE CONTRACT.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. Was there any understanding, agreement or intention on the part of the late Government, or the Department of Railways and Canals, to cancel a certain liability of the county of Peterborough under contract made July 2, 1907, between the said county and the late Government for the sum of $3,000, and the cost of maintenance of the Buckhorn bridge in said county?

2. Was the following letter to Mr. J. R. Stratton respecting the same signed by the late Minister of Railways and Canals?

Ottawa, April 12, 1911.

Dear Stratton,—I have your letter of the 10th instant. We are preparing an Order in Council at the present time in connection with the $3,000 promised by the county of Peterborough to the Government in connection with the construction of a bridge over the dam at Buckhorn, as I believe upon investigation that this is the proper arrangement to make. As you know I cannot say positively that it will go through until council has decided.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) George P. Graham.

Hon. J. R. Stratton, M.P.,
House of Commons.

3. If so, did the said letter mean that the said cancellation of the above mentioned liabilities would have been made had the late Government remained in power, and on what grounds would the same have been carried out?

4. Was it the intention of the late Minister of Railways and Canals to recommend the said cancellation to the Cabinet Council of the late Government?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Not in so far as the Department of Railways has any knowledge.

2, 3 and 4. The department has no information.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—MONCTON-EDMUNDSTON SECTION.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. By whom is that portion of the National Transcontinental railway between Moncton and Edmundston, New Brunswick, being operated, and when did such operations commence?

2. What has been the total cost of the said operation from the commencement thereof to the 1st of January, 1913?

3. What have been the total passenger earnings during the same period, and what amount has been earned and paid during said period for the freight traffic on said railway?

SUNNYBRAE-GUYSBOROUGH BRANCH.

Mr. SINCLAIR :

1. Referring to the following question and answer, as reported on page 5729 of 'Hansard,' on March 20, 1912, namely:

Mr. Sinclair:

Will provision be made in the Supplementary Estimates for a branch line from Sunnybrae to Guysborough?

Mr. Cochrane:

There is provision made for a survey. I have told the honourable member twice that we intend to investigate this matter during the coming summer.'

2. If no survey of this proposed branch was made during the past season, why was it not made?

Mr. COCHRANE : The Minister of Railways and Canals investigated this matter of the branch line from Sunny Brae to Guysborough, and after discussing it fully with the engineers it was ascertained that the preliminary surveys were sufficiently complete to determine the feasibility of the line and that no further surveys would be required until it was decided by the Government that the line should be constructed. This matter is still under consideration.

ALLEGATIONS OF POLITICAL FAVOURITISM.

*Mr. LEMIEUX :

1. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been called to the following paragraph published in the Ottawa Citizen of the 18th instant:—

Political favouritism with federal grant—Quebec delegation makes charges regarding Government help.

The manner in which the Gouin Government administered the Federal grant in aid of agriculture does not appeal to prominent Conservatives in Quebec, and the allegations of political favouritism made during the session of the legislature in regard to the subject were brought to the attention of the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues yesterday afternoon, by a delegation including Honourable J. M. Tellier, C. Ernest Gault, M.L.A., Philomon Cousineau, M.L.A., E. Patenaude, M.L.A., L. T. Maréchal, K.C., and C. P. Beaubien, K.C.

It is charged that in spending the money, Liberal localities or Liberal farmers were singled out for favour to the exclusion of Conservatives.

It is desired that such steps be taken as will prevent the application of the funds in any way suggestive of partisanship, and this will be done. Matters of party organization in the province were also discussed.

2. What truth is there in the above statement?

Mr. BORDEN :

1. No, except by the question of the hon. gentleman.

2. I must leave the hon. gentleman to make his own inferences.

2. If so, what is the nature of the information received?

Mr. BORDEN : In answer to the first and second questions, I may say that the Government has no information on the subject.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY—REGINA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina):

1. Has the Government, or any member therefore, received any representations or petitions praying for the establishment of a mail service on the Grand Trunk Pacific running south of Regina?

Mr. PELLETIER :

1. No.

2. Authority has, however, been granted for the establishment of a tri-weekly service from Regina to Griffin, 79.4 miles, but same cannot be put into operation until a regular train service is operated.

DISMISSALS OF POSTMASTERS IN VAUDREUIL COUNTY.

On the calling of the order for notices of motion for the production of papers:

Mr. PELLETIER: With reference to motions Nos. 1 to 8, I may say that these motions have been postponed twice until I should have the opportunity of seeing my hon. friend from Vaudreuil (Mr. Boyer). I saw him yesterday and suggested to him that all of these motions might be dropped with the exception of one that covers the whole subject so as not to dulpicate the returns. I told him that I would bring down all the papers in connection with these questions under motion No. 8, which covers the whole county. I am prepared to bring the papers down in this way or to await the hon. member's convenience. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you call No. 8, which might be adopted, and then, the hon. member would drop the other motions.

Mr. BOYER:

For a return showing all postmasters who have been dismissed in the county of Vaudreuil, the dates of their appointment, the cause of their dismissal and by whom their dismissal was requested.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, if I might have your indulgence, I desire to bring up a question of privilege. I have been honoured recently by a personal reference on the part of the Premier of Manitoba, Sir Rodmond Roblin speaking in the legislature. These remarks, as reported in the press, contain what appear to me to be reflections upon myself and while I do not wish to detain the House or to use such an occasion as a means of advertising, I am desirous of calling the attention of the House to the matter so that there shall be no misunderstanding in regard to it. The remarks that I desire to call attention to are contained in the Winnipeg Telegram of January 15. They relate partially to the conduct of the recent by-election in the constituency of Macdonald, Man., and partly to my connection with the administration of the Department of the Interior. To take the last first, in replying to the leader of the Opposition, Sir Rodmond Roblin, says, as reported by the Telegram:

He also speaks of the great loss that Manitoba has made in transferring seven million acres to the Dominion Government. Again I regret his want of information. Let me tell him it was less than 1,164,000 acres, and while there was a prospect and a claim justly founded for a great many more acres of land, yet by virtue of the mal-administration and the vicious enmity of the Hon. Frank Oliver to this province, these lands were all alienated from us, and in the last year and a half the Liberal Government was in office not one acre was transferred to Manitoba although some $50,000 or $60,000 was filched from the revenue of this province by the said Frank Oliver to assist him in preventing Manitoba from getting any of the lands to which he——

Mr. PELLETIER.

The leader of the Opposition, Mr. Norris. —refers.

The other part of Sir Rodmond Roblin's remarks, to which I wish to direct attention, as appearing in the Telegram, is as follows:

The election——

Speaking of the Macdonald election.

—was directed, seemingly, by a gentleman of the name of MacNutt, of Saskatchewan, and Frank Oliver, of Alberta. They brought with them men from every part of the Dominion. Eleven Frenchmen were brought from Quebec, political heelers from Ontario, political crooks from Saskatchewan and Alberta, and they intended to defy the honest opinion of that electorate by means that the law expressly state shall not be employed.

The Telegram does not come down to details as to the means, but the Free Press report of the same debate quotes Sir Rodmond Roblin thus:

Who were bringing this whiskey and money? Not Norris, but Frank Oliver and Thomas MacNutt, and the heelers from Saskatchewan. 'Whereof I speak I know,' said the Premier.

In regard to the first part of the quotation I have read as to the disposition of the swamp lands in Manitoba, I again draw special attention to the statement of Sir Rodmond:

These lands were all alienated from us.

And, further, he said that by reason of my action there had been filched from the province of Manitoba $50,000 or $60,000 by me to assist me in keeping the province from getting any of the lands to which the reference is made. In the other part of his remarks he states directly that the campaign in Macdonald was directed by Mr. MacNutt and myself; and that we brought political crooks and heelers from Ontario, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. In regard to that matter I will say that I did take some part in the election in Macdonald and that I did request the assistance in that election of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) and two of the sons of the hon. member for Gloucester, N.B. (Mr. Turgeon). These are the only persons who took part in that campaign, so far as I am aware, that I in any way suggested or requested should take part in that campaign. The further suggestion is made that Mr. MacNutt and myself brought whiskey into the constituency, as well as these heelers from Saskatchewan, and the Premier of Manitoba says: 'Whereof I speak, I know.' I only wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that with regard to these particular statements I have called attention to, Sir Rodmond Roblin, Premier of Manitoba, recently knighted by His Majesty, speaking from his place in the Legislature of Manitoba, stated what was untrue, knowing it to be untrue.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—STRIKE OF EMPLOYEES.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, &c., exchanged between the Minister of Labour and the Canadian Pacific railway strikers on their application for a board of conciliation and investigation.

He said: I understand that application was made last fall by a certain class of the employees of the Canadian Pacific railway for a board of investigation and that after due notification had been given to the Canadian Pacific railway the Minister of Labour declined to appoint a board. The newspapers at the time were full of a discussion of the question, and in spite of the protest made by the employees, I understand the board has not been appointed. I know, as a matter of fact, that many of the men are still without employment and are ventilating their grievances against the company. I do not wish to pass judgment on the action of the company towards its employees; I merely rise to state that it seems extraordinary that when the law with reference to industrial disputes has been in existence for some years with a certain measure of success, it should not have been applied in this case. I hope the Minister of Labour when he is present in the House will explain the circumstances.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL: I desire to make a few observations, not as to the cause of the strike or as to the differences between the company and its employees, because I may say frankly that I know very little about that phase of the question, but I do know that in my own constituency there are a number of men who are on strike at the present time as a result of the matter referred to in this motion. I understand that these men, together with all the other men belonging to the brotherhood, are asking for an increase of their wages which at present range from $30 a month to $48 a month for a ten hour day. There may be some good reason why the company would not give the men the increase they ask, but I would like someone to tell me how the Canadian Pacific railway can expect to find competent men, men such as I have in mind, married men with families, men who have been in the employ of the company for years, in the position of freight checkers, night clerks, assistant night clerks, bridge building clerks, roadmaster's clerks, &c., for the paltry sum of from $30 to $48 a month. I presume, however, that when the papers are brought down, as I believe the minister will bring them, we will have all the information that can be given upon the subject; and we will know whether or not the information which we have received is correct. I have here the names of ten men, all residing in my own constituency, in my own town, men whom I know personally and intimately, men who are in many cases above the ordinary average of intelligence, and men against whom I am satisfied the company has not one word of complaint. These men have been eking out an existence on salaries, as I said before, ranging from $30 to $48 a month. These men asked for an increase of salary, and it would seem that they should be entitled to a reasonable increase. When the papers are brought down, we will probably find out what objection the company has to increasing their salaries.

I am also informed that the company claims there is some dispute between the men and the company as to recognition of the rights of the union. By the provisions of chapter 20 of the Acts of this House of 1907, known as the Industrial Disputes Act, with which practically all members of the House are familiar, there is a statement of law which in my judgment the Minister of Labour has disregarded; that is the point to which I wish to direct his attention just for a few minutes. I will read section 15 of that Act, and not give my interpretation of it. Section 15 is as follows:

For the purpose of determining the manner in which, and the persons by whom, an application for the appointment of a board is to be made, the following provisions shall apply:—

1. The application shall be made in writing in the prescribed form, and shall be in substance a request to the minister to appoint a board to which the existing dispute may be referred under the provisions of this Act.

2. The application shall be accompanied by—

(a) A statement setting forth—

(1) the parties to the dispute;

(2) the nature and cause of the dispute, including any claims or demands made by either party upon the other, to which exception is taken;

(3) an approximate estimate of the number of persons affected or likely to be affected by the dispute;

(4) the efforts made by the parties themselves to adjust the dispute; and

(b) A statutory declaration setting forth that, failing an adjustment of the dispute or a reference thereof by the minister to a Board of Conciliation and Investigation under the Act, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the declarant, a lockout or strike, as the case may be, will be declared, and that the necessary authority to declare such lockout or strike has been obtained.

3. The application may mention the name of a person who is willing and ready and desires to act as a member of the board representing the party or parties making the application.

I am informed from what I read in the newspapers, and I do not think the minister will deny the fact, that an application, complying in every particular with the requirements of section 15 of the Act, was presented, not to him but to his predecessor in office, just before the latter retired from the position of Minister of Labour some time in the month of September, 1911; the application set forth certain disputes between the Brotherhood of Canadian Railway Employees and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, giving all the particulars required by the Act, and substantiated by a formal declaration of one of the responsible officials that if the Government did not grant the board, the men would go on strike. This application was made in the month of September, 1911, and was left over for the present Minister of Labour to decide. Some time in the month of January, 1912, we are told that the present Minister of Labour refused the board, perhaps not in words, but in effect, by saying to the men that the company claimed that the man about whom the trouble had arisen had not been dismissed because he was a member of the brotherhood, and that the company had good reasons for dismissing the man from the position which he held. The matter was allowed to go on, and nothing was done. In the month of June, 1912, a second application was made by the brotherhood, substantiated by all the necessary data and affidavits required by section 15 of the Act, the same as in the first case. On this occasion, according to the statements of the men, the Minister of Labour suggested that they should send a couple of delegates down to Montreal to wait upon the officials of the company and see if an understanding could not be arrived at. I do not think any person can find fault with the minister if he took that course, as it certainly would be better to have an amicable arrangement between the men and the company than to resort to a board. The men went down to Montreal, and they say that the minister told them positively that their delegates would be protected. Whether that is true or not, I presume the minister will tell us. The two men, however, who went down, lost their positions; whether because of their temerity to go up against the Canadian Pacific and demand their rights, or whether for some good cause, I do not know. The board was not granted; and so far as we are able to learn no reasons were given by the minister for his refusal to grant the board. About the first day of October, 1912, a third application was made by the brotherhood, supported by all the necessary data and affidavits, exactly the same as in the other two cases. As I said before, I understand there were two grounds of dispute. One was the matter of wages; the other was recognition of the brotherhood and certain rights which they claimed, certain rules which they wished adopted. This, bear in mind, was presented to the minister on or about the first day of October. As I construe the law, the Minister has not any discretion in the matter; he might possibly refer this to what is called the Conciliation and Labour Act, an Act passed some years before the Industrial Disputes Act was passed, in so far as it referred to railway employees; but he did not do it, and unless he does it or unless he takes some means of divesting himself of the duty of acting under this Act; then I say under section 6 of the Act he is compelled, if he respects the authority conferred upon him by the statute, to grant the board and go on and carry out the law as it is provided. Section 6 is as follows:

> Whenever, under this Act, an application is made in due form for the appointment of a Board of Conciliation and Investigation, and such application does not relate to a dispute which is the subject of a reference under the provisions concerning railway disputes in the Conciliation and Labour Act, the minister, whose decision for such purpose shall be final, shall, within fifteen days from the date at which the application is received, establish such board under his hand and seal of office, if satisfied that the provisions of this Act apply.

The minister has never denied that the provisions of this Act apply. The application was presented to him on or about the first day of October, 1912, substantially complying with all the requirements of section 15 of the Act. The minister did not within fifteen days establish that board under his hand and seal of office; he has been deliberately putting those men off for a year, and not giving them the rights which they should have under the law. In the statements they furnished the minister on all of those three occasions, they stated to the minister that if he did not give them the board, they would strike. Now, let us see what that means. Under section 56 of the Act, no employee of a company has the right to strike until he has applied for a board and the board has been granted; and if he does strike before the board is granted, or before the recommendation has been made, he is guilty of a criminal offence and is liable to a penalty fixed by section 59. The minister knows that these men threatened to strike. He knows that if they had struck before a board was granted, or during the consideration of the application, they would have committeed a criminal act. And yet, for a whole year, under a threat of striking, under the real necessity of striking, the minister refuses this board, and refuses to give these men a chance to have their grievances heard in the manner provided for by law. That is the branch of the case to which I particularly direct the attention of the minister.

We find that no action was taken by the minister for nearly a month and a half—not, in fact, until Parliament met. On the very day when Parliament met, or the day before, when it looked as if there might be a good-sized row in the country, the minister finally capitulated. I am told he went to the men and said he would give them a partial board, only so far as relates to the Ottawa district. The men refused. And finally, he granted what the newspapers called a 'partial board' of investigation. What that means, I do not know. But we know that an investigation was held by the board appointed by the minister; and, if we can believe the reports of the newspapers, the board practically sustained the men in every proposition;—in the proposition that the men were entitled to recognition; that their rules and regulations were entitled to be accepted by the company; that they were entitled to an increase of pay—I think the amount was left in abeyance to be decided between the company and the men. And not only that, but the men were to be taken back in their old positions and given pay from the time they struck. That decision was made, I believe, about the middle of December. A month and a half has gone by, and we know that the men have not been taken back, because they are still walking the streets doing nothing; and, so far as we know, no attempt has been made by the minister to induce the company to take the men back. It may be that the minister can give us information upon that subject. But I have a suspicion that if the Minister of Labour was as anxious to force the Canadian Pacific railway to take back these men as he was to force the Grand Trunk railway to take men back—and agreed to hold up legislation unless they did it—there would be no difficulty in having the men restored to their positions. The position of the minister is remarkable, when you compare his conduct in this case with that in the case of the men who struck on the Grand Trunk railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: They blamed the Minister of Railways of that time.

Mr. CARVELL: They blamed everybody. But now, we blame the Minister of Labour. And we do not intend to get away from that point. I arraign the Minister of Labour, and no other man. I believe that if he had exercised the influence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which he possesses, and which his Government possesses, this strike would never have occurred; or, even though it had occurred, the company carry out the recommendations of the board. It seems to me that it is a most remarkable position in which the minister finds himself. It is in contravention of the express provision of the laws of this country, and is an injustice to hundreds and hundreds of hard working men all over the Dominion. I think it is going to take some explaining on the part of the minister to convince these labouring men that they have been treated as fairly as the law of this country demands they should be treated; and it is going to take a good deal of explanation to convince not only the labouring men but the public at large that the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company has not a little more control over the Minister of Labour than it is in the interests of the labouring people of this country it should have.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): This motion has been on the Order Paper for three or four weeks. I have been here on several occasions expecting it to be taken up. It comes up today unexpectedly to me. I do not know that there is any practice requiring a member of this House having such a notice on the Order Paper to give the minister any special notice of his intention to bring it up on a particular day, but I think it was a courtesy, that, perhaps, the hon. gentleman the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) should have shown the minister concerned to give him notice a day or two before in order that he might be prepared. I am not prepared to go into the details, I have not the application or any of the papers in connection with the case. However, in a general way, I shall endeavour to explain the charges that I have heard. I had not the advantage of hearing my hon. friend from Rouville at all, so I do not know what he has said in regard to the matter. As to my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), I heard a portion of his remarks. I am speaking from memory, but I think I am right in saying that I heard nothing about this application whatever until last October. My hon. friend speaks of 'a year' and of an application made to my predecessor. I think I am right in saying that I heard nothing about this application or about any dispute until October or November. Possibly it might have been in August, it certainly was not as soon as we came into power. This application was made on behalf of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees. You will see, from the name, that it is broad enough to include every man employed in every department of every railway company in Canada. This application was made only on behalf of these employees in the service of the Canadian Pacific railway. It includes thirty-six different classes of employees, from the man employed in unloading a car for a few hours or for a day or two to the chief clerks in the different departments, and covered five or six thousand men. The application was that investigation should be made into these thirty-six classes of employees of the Canadian Pacific railway over the whole system, the main line, all the branches, all the trolley lines that they run, covering altogether from 10,000 to 11,000 miles—thirty-six classes of employees and twenty-nine grievances in each class. My hon. friend from Carleton speaks of an increase in wages. That was only one of twenty-nine grievances.

Mr. CARVELL: Was that any reason why they should not be entitled to a board?

Mr. CROTHERS: One moment. My hon. friend seems to have the idea that, under certain circumstances, the Minister of Labour is obliged to establish a board. The hon. gentleman read only a section which applies to this matter—section 15; I think he referred later to section 6. But section 15 is followed by section 16, and, in substance these two sections provide that where an application is made on behalf of a number of employees by their officers, evidence should be adduced to satisfy the minister that these officers have the authority of a majority of the men for whom they assume to act. And he will find that, by section 18, it becomes the duty of those who make application for a board to serve the other party to the dispute with a copy of the application, who without delay is to send the minister a statement in reply, and by section 8 he is required to name a member of the Board. I think that makes it perfectly clear that it is not the duty of the Minister of Labour to establish a board simply because an application has been made; the other party has to be heard from, and both sides of the case carefully considered. That is the view, I am told, taken by my predecessors in regard to the Act, and it is the view which I myself have taken. It is not a new thing to refuse a board of conciliation. The hon. member for Carleton may find five or six cases in which boards have been refused during the last twelve months because it was thought the applicants did not bring themselves within the meaning of section 6 of the Act referred to by my hon. friend. He will notice that the closing words of section 6 are: 'if satisfied that the provisions of this Act apply.' A board of conciliation is, therefore, not granted merely because an application is made. Both sides of the case have to be heard, and a conclusion reached as to whether the applicants have brought themselves within the meaning of the Act, and consequently, whether or not the board ought to be established.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the hon. gentleman give the House some of the reasons adduced by the employees in support of their request for a board of conciliation?

Mr. CROTHERS: From memory, I may say that one was the alleged necessity for an increase in wages—a certain percentage based on the salaries the different classes of employees were then receiving. There were also some statements, I think, in connection with promotions, requiring the superintendents of the various divisions to bulletin any vacancy that might occur, and that the next employee in order of seniority should be promoted to that position. There were twenty-nine of these grievances—I cannot undertake to remember the whole of them—and thirty-six classes of employees, covering a system of nearly 11,000 miles. There was no satisfactory evidence that they had received authority for their action from the majority of the men for whom they assumed to act.

Mr. CARVELL: Did they not swear they had authority?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think not.

Mr. CARVELL: I am informed otherwise.

Mr. CROTHERS: There is a statutory declaration in connection with the statement. There were some five or six thousand individuals in these different classes, and I think the number of those who struck was pretty clear evidence that they were not authorized to make the application by a majority of the members of the order, for I do not think there were as many as five or six hundred strikers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Was that the reason given by the minister to the men for his refusal—that they were not duly authorized?

Mr. CROTHERS: One reason given was that it would be impracticable to make such an investigation as they were demanding, covering the whole system of 11,000 miles and thirty-six classes of employees, with twenty-nine grievances for each class. I told the men that, if they would limit the scope of the inquiry to a reasonable territory—say the Ottawa division—with the liberty of calling witnesses from such places as Port Arthur and Montreal, I would grant the board, but they refused to accept that unless I would undertake in writing to extend to them the right to strike throughout the entire system if the result of a board so constituted were unsatisfactory. Of course, that was an impossibility. They refused to accept the pro position, but they returned later and accepted the offer I made before the strike, and the board was established as a result of that acceptance. If the hon. member for Carleton has examined the report of the majority of the board, he will find they stated that I acted wisely in taking the course I did, and in suggesting that the scope of the inquiry should be so limited. I pointed out that if there was an inquiry made respecting say the Ottawa division, the company would accept over the whole system whatever recommendation might be made by the board, or they would reject it over the whole system.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What were the findings of the board?

Mr. CROTHERS: I cannot tell you from memory, but some of the findings have been stated by the hon. member for Carleton. One of the findings was that those who went on strike should be reinstated.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That the men should be reinstated?

Mr. CROTHERS: That was the majority report; the minority report recommended that the company should take back any they might require within the two weeks following the date of the report. Another suggestion was that those who went out on strike should be paid their full salary during the whole of the time they were out. I understood from the men that their chief grievance was the matter of wages, but when they came before the Board of Conciliation they waived that entirely, and there is no provision regarding the matter in the award, except a general statement that the wages ought to be increased. I had not expected that this motion would come up to-day or I would have had here all the papers bearing upon the question, but I think the general statement I have made should be satisfactory at this time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I am not altogether satisfied with the explanation made by the Minister of Labour. This matter has been dealt with in the newspapers for many months, and from the statements so made it was difficult to understand the real extent of the differences between the minister and the railway organization.

Mr. CROTHERS: I may say that I wrote a letter to one of the officials who made application on behalf of the men. That letter was published, and it set forth very fully the reasons for the refusal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend stated that one of the objections given by him to the granting of the board of conciliation was that it would involve the investigation of some twenty-nine grievances alleged by this railway organization. It seems to me that is hardly a sound objection to make to such a request. I do not know the character of the organization, but, as I understand it, it comprises the different classes of railway employees, being styled the Brotherhood of Railway Employees, or something to that effect. That organization has the right to be heard, whatever may be its extent or the labour it has to perform. The fact that the organization comprises various classes of labour does not justify the answer that the grievances are too numerous, and for that reason a board of conciliation cannot be granted.

Mr. CROTHERS: My right hon. friend has stated only one of the reasons.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The other reason was purely technical. The only two reasons given why the board should not be granted are these: One was purely technical, that the men were not duly authorized; the other was as to the extent of their grievances. As to the first, that the men were not duly authorized, I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Labour would not be properly discharging his duty if he were simply to insist upon the technical aspect of a demand of that kind. In the circumstances his duty, in my humble judgment, would be to say 'your application is not technically correct; it requires this and this; make it so, and then I shall hear you.' But simply to tell the men, we shall not give you a board because you have not strictly conformed to the letter of the statute might be a technical application of the law, but it is not doing substantial justice to the men. I discard that altogether as a reason why my hon. friend did not act. If he were to tell me that that was the motive that impelled him to refuse the board which they asked for, I would tell him, and I think I would be justified in saying so, even by the hon. members behind him, that he had not properly discharged his duty.

Now, I come to the real question of the merits, and if I understand the reason urged by the hon. minister it is that he refused to give to those men the board which they were asking because the board would have been obliged to go into twenty-nine different grievances. If there had been one hundred grievances, or if they had twenty-nine grievances to be heard, they should have been heard on the twenty-nine; if they had one grievance, they should have been heard on the one. What would have been the consequences if the men had acted strictly on the answer given by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour? You would have had a strike involving, as I said, the whole system of the Canadian Pacific railway, and disorganizing their whole road. That it did not extend was because of the decision which the hon. gentleman obtained from them that they would accept an investigation into one item of their complaints.

Mr. CROTHERS: Into one division of the system.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I stand corrected: one division. Then I suppose that in that division you would have to go into all their grievances. Perhaps it may have been wise or unwise to do so—I do not say at the present time that it was unwise; if you obtained that from the men, so far so good. But it seems to me that it would have been better to have given the men an investigation into their twenty-nine grievances extending over the whole system. Then my hon. friend would have prevented a strike. Otherwise, I think the men would have been within their rights if they had struck. It would have been deplorable, but I do not think they would have come under the law, or that they would have been guilty of criminal action. I think everybody will agree that this Act which has been beneficial to the country, and which has done a great deal of good, even if not perfect, should be administered in as gentle and conciliatory a manner as possible, and if it is administered in a conciliatory manner I think the Act will work still better than it has done in the past. As I said at the opening of these remarks, it is perhaps premature to come to a conclusion until we have the papers. I simply rose to say that the nature of the answer given by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour did not satisfy me that in this matter the Act had been applied in the conciliatory manner in which it should have been applied.

Mr. BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss this question until the papers have been brought down, but in the meantime, I should like to say to my hon. friend from Rouville that this motion and a great many other motions stand on the Order Paper and maintain their precedence as a matter of courtesy. That courtesy is one which is always extended as a matter of course, but I should have thought that that ought to include the equal courtesy on the other side of the House that when a motion is to be brought up involving an attack upon a department of the Government some notice should be given by the member to the minister of his intention. When a motion has stood for weeks and maintained its precedence through the courtesy of the Government, I think that the courtesy expected on one side should equally be expected on the other side. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour had no intimation whatever that this motion was to be discussed in this way to-day.

I agree entirely with what the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has said, that it is impossible to discuss this question intelligently and fairly until the papers are brought down. When the papers have been brought down, it will be open to discussion in the fullest manner that can be desired. I do not think that the right hon. gentleman quite apprehended the answer which was given by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour. As I understood the Minister of Labour, he was setting forth certain reasons on account of which he thought that the investigation suggested by the men would be, in the form suggested, a very cumbrous and difficult investigation, inasmuch as it related to a very large number of men, scattered all over the system, and embracing, I think my hon. friend stated, some thirty-six different classes and relating also to a great many grievances. I do not attach very much importance to the number of grievances provided the other considerations, to which the hon. the Minister of Labour directed his attention, were not in the way of an effective investigation. As I understand it, and I speak subject to correction, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees is composed of a very large number of men included within a great many different classes, embracing practically all those who are not members of any other railway organization. It follows from the nature of the organization of this brotherhood that it includes a great many different classes of railway employees who are not closely or specially related with each other in the character of their work and in the nature of their employment. As I understand my hon. friend the Minister of Labour he was impressed with the fact that a general inquiry into the grievances of a very large number of departments, covering all the divisions of a great railway system, might not lead to a very effective or thorough investigation, and that it would be better in the interests of the men themselves that the investigation should be so restricted that it would not occupy a very long time, and that the merits of the case could be got at at once by an investigation in respect to the men employed on one division and to the grievances which were probably common to them as well as to other divisions of a great railway system. It was only in that light as I understood it, that the Minister of Labour had difficulty about granting this investigation when it was first asked for in the month of August last. I am quite sure it could not have been earlier than the month of August, because I heard nothing of it before I left for England in the latter part of June; but I did hear something about it very shortly after I came back. I think the suggestion was first made to the hon. the Minister of Labour some time in the month of August, and probably, in the latter part of that month. Eventually, my hon. friend the Minister of Labour did grant a board to investigate a particular division. The railway company did not join in constituting the board, and some person was appointed to represent them by the Department of Labour. The board took into consideration the various questions in respect of the men employed upon that division, and made its award. There is no difficulty whatever about bringing the correspondence down. There is nothing to conceal in the matter, and there is no disposition to avoid the fullest possible debate or criticism that any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House may desire to make in respect of the action of the Department of Labour. I know that the Minister of Labour took a very great interest in the matter and the action that he took was such action as, in his judgment, would be best in the interest of the men themselves. As he has already pointed out, the board which was constituted by the department under the authority of the statute, has approved of the action of the minister, and of the limitation which he imposed on the scope of its inquiry. Under these circumstances I do not see that there is any legitimate criticism upon the action of the Minister of Labour and I hope that, notwithstanding the fact that some of the men are, I believe, still out of employment, arrangements will be made by which the difficulties between the men and the company will be brought to an end and that any grievances which they have felt by reason of their treatment by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will be removed.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM: This discussion is particularly interesting to me because it reveals such a remarkable attitude on the part of hon. gentlemen, including the hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. Minister of Labour and others on the Government side of the House. I cannot see, if they are going to be orthodox, how they can let the Minister of Railways out of this difficulty because, but a few months ago, I was attacked on every platform in this country as Minister of Railways, because I had not settled strikes. Surely the Minister of Railways is not going to allow the Minister of Labour to take all the blame for this. If it was not right a few months ago for the Minister of Labour to assume that responsibility it cannot be right now. If the Minister of Railways in the late Government was a great sinner because he did not take hold of the Department of Labour and settle strikes, the present minister must be a bigger sinner because he thinks that his predecessor was all wrong. One of the reasons given why I must be opposed in South Renfrew was that I had not been true to the railway men in the strike on the Grand Trunk railway and the statement was made that the railway men were so incensed about it that they insisted that I must be defeated in South Renfrew. However, that was imagination on the part of the Minister of Railways.

Questions of this kind, having reference to railway disagreements, as pointed out by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, must be handled very carefully and in a conciliatory spirit. There has to be some give and take. I read this morning with some interest the report of a speech made by Earl Grey recently in which he pointed to the Lemieux Act as one of the best things we have on the statute book of Canada, if properly worked. As to these twenty-nine grievances, the reason why there should not be an investigation of them is only imaginary. As the Minister of Railways knows, these were included in the schedule that the men presented for ratification or for discussion. They asked that a certain schedule be applied to them and that includes such things as promotion, salary, recognition and methods of adjusting differences—twenty-nine in all. These things are included in almost every schedule that is presented to any railway company or minister of railways or board of management. This organization is a little bit peculiar in this respect that it includes practically all the employees not included in other brotherhoods. There is the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Firemen and Maintenance of Way. But, there are several classes, such as clerks, freight handlers, porters, &c., who did not belong to any organization. It was thought desirable that as all the other employees on the various railways belonged to brotherhoods that looked after their interests, those who had no home, so to speak, although they had various forms of employment on the railway, should be brought into a fold of their own and called by one common name.

Now, the peculiar situation is this, that the Government itself, on its own railway, gives this very brotherhood the things that it asks for a board to compel a railway company to give. That is the anomalous position in which the Government finds itself. The Intercolonial railway management, with the approval of the department, has recognized this brotherhood, has granted it a schedule as to salaries, promotions, everything that the other brotherhoods have practically in the different departments in which they labour, but when the same brotherhood, including the same class of men with the same arrangements, comes to the Government and says: Give us a board so that we will have a chance to show that we have good reason to ask this company to improve our conditions in order that they may be equal to the conditions that you, yourself, give us on your own road, the Government declines to give such a board.

Mr. CROTHERS: Speaking from memory, I think that is not true, that all the different classes mentioned in this application were granted by the Intercolonial railway or the Government what they asked for. The Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals sent me a list showing those included in those applications whose requests were not granted by the former Government when my hon. friend was Minister of Railways.

Mr. GRAHAM: My memory is—and of course it does not affect the principle at all—they were all included. Some of them may have been left out, but it is true that the Government recognized this brotherhood and, after consultation with the brotherhood, came to a settlement with them in regard to their various grievances and requests. A board, if granted in the first place, might not have given this brotherhood all they asked, but they would have recognized them and given them probably all to which they were entitled. If the Lemieux Act is carried out, or if any other law along the line is to be made workable, it has to be done with an eye, not only to the interests of the men but to the interests of the company as well. There is no particular reason why a board should not be granted and let them make the investigation. That is what the Act is for, that is what the provision for a board is for. I have tried to point out that the various grievances, even if there were a thousand of them, would not be a reason for not granting a board because the greater the number of grievances the greater the necessity for having them redressed. The wide extent of territory covered is no good reason for refusing a board. I cannot see that it is any reason at all. The board does not have to visit the entire territory it does not have to go over all the ground, it does not have to ask all the men to come as witnesses, but it can sit in one central place, bring one or two witnesses from every division and in that way cover every case. The grievances of these men will be in common; in fact, the officers, in a great many cases, can give all the evidence that is required. It might take a little longer than if the territory were smaller or it might take a little longer than if there was only one class of employment.

But, what is the Department of Labour for? To bring labour troubles to an end, if possible, and, if they are too great to be solved in that way, to bring the men and companies together through this board. That is work the Department of Labour should do, and that is what it has been established to do. I am reminded by an hon. member that the Department of Labour has nothing else to do, and the whole hearing of that grievance would not have entailed as much labour on the department as a Cabinet minister has to perform every three or four days at least while the House is in session. Perhaps I might be excused were I to speak with some warmth on this question, because, throughout the length and breadth of Ontario particularly, and all over the Dominion of Canada, for weeks and months, I, as Minister of Railways, although I had no connection with the Labour Department, was enthusiastically lied about, because I did not settle the Grand Trunk Railway strike. Men were paid to go through the province of Ontario and through the county of South Renfrew to tell the railwaymen that I had deceived them, that instead of helping them I had worked against their interests in all of which there was not an iota of truth from top to bottom, and, as time goes by that falsehood is being nailed, and during the past few weeks I have many evidences that the railwaymen are beginning to find out on which side of the House their real friends are to be found.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): I have been accused of having become a partisan of the Minister of Labour because I commended his action in going through western Canada and investigating labour conditions there, but to-day I have to criticise the action of the minister in connection with the matter which we are now discussing. I believe that this particular brotherhood has been treated unjustly; I believe that they have the right to have their case considered by a board of conciliation, and that the report of such a board should have been given consideration by the Minister of Labour. One of the main contentions set up by the men was for recognition of the order, and let me point out that it is a Canadian order incorporated under the laws of Canada and in that respect it differs from many of the other labour organizations in connection with the railways of Canada. Those of us who are anxious to build up the union forces as Canadian institutions are anxious to encourage this particular order and the Government of Canada seemingly did so by giving it recognition on the Government railways. I can say, from evidence which has been submitted to me, that the wages paid by the Canadian Pacific railway to these employees in western Canada are outrageously low. The Minister of Labour refused the application for a board of conciliation at the commencement and following that refusal the men in western Canada went out on strike. They were quite willing to go back to work as soon as the minister granted the board, but so far as western Canada is concerned, he has not yet done so. A board was granted, as I understand it, with respect to from Port Arthur east, and I have been told that the minister promised that if, that board reported in favour of the men he would be quite willing to grant a board for western Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: It was stated in the first place that if the award that might be made by the board appointed to investigate in reference to the Ottawa division were not satisfactory; if that board did not get all the evidence that the men desired to place before the public, and they desired a further board for the West it would be granted. I understand they are satisfied; they do not want any more evidence; they have not asked for any.

Mr. BUCHANAN: The report of the majority of the board for eastern Canada was favourable to the men in regard to the particular matters investigated. If the Minister of Labour had taken the same attitude in respect to the Canadian Pacific railway in this case as he took last year when he held up a Bill concerning the Grand Trunk because they did not settle with their men, the employees of the Canadian Pacific railway might have been able to get satisfaction from the company in this particular instance. But Sir, there is an impression amongst the railway employees of western Canada, that the Canadian Pacific railway has been able to get the ear of the Minister of Labour and to prevent investigations being held. This is not the only case in which investigation was refused during the past year. I have in mind the case of the Brotherhood of Railroad Conductors in Alberta, who applied for a board of conciliation in regard to a dispute they had with the Canadian Pacific railway as to the treatment of certain conductors, and the Minister of Labour, on a technicality which I do not think he could properly defend in this House refused to grant the board. The men out there feel that the Canadian Pacific railway employees are not given that fair treatment by the Government to which they are entitled. The Minister of Labour speaks of the difficulty of dealing with this particular case on account of the number of classes of labour that were included in this brotherhood, but in western Canada numerous investigations have been held in connection with the mine workers and as we know there are a great many classes of labour included in the mine workers organization and it takes a long time to investigate their complaints, but in nearly every case these investigations have brought about a settlement by reason of the publicity given. There would, I am sure, be no difficulty in following the same course in the case of the Brotherhood of Railway Employees. The publicity feature of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is the strongest feature in it, because by this publicity practically the public are left to decide the merits of the case, and had there been that publicity in this instance which the law contemplates, I am quite sure that a settlement would have been effected long ago.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): I think there is more importance to be attached to this discussion than might appear on the surface. The question involved is one which touches two of the most important problems we have in Canada; it touches the labour question and it touches it at perhaps its most important point, namely, the part labour performs in carrying on our transportation. In might be in the mind of the Minister of Labour that the body of men who approached him were of comparatively minor importance, but the principle is there just the same. If the minister is to say to one that his Department—or his court, for in a sense it is a court—is to be open only when he in his arbitrary fashion so wills, and that he, for reasons best known to himself, and kept almost entirely to himself, may sometimes deny those privileges and this means to obtain justice, he takes away not only the usefulness of the Department of Labour, but he takes away the confidence of the working people in that department. It will require very few instances such as this to confirm in the minds of the workingmen of the Dominion the suspicion that the Department of Labour is not an impartial tribunal. What is it that has made such a success of our Board of Railway Commissioners? It is that at both ends of the game they have the most implicit confidence, when they appear before that department, that they are getting what is called a square deal. Let the impression go out once or twice, which has undoubtedly gone out in this instance, that the hon. Minister of Labour has not had an open ear or open mind for the labouring people, and the usefulness of that department is at an end. The principle is there, if in a question of doubt or a matter in which my hon. friend is not certain whether he will give the railway the benefit of the doubt, I think that is more serious than if the other impression should prevail. The minister should guard himself more particularly against refusing the services of his department for the poor and the weak, because it is just for the poor and the weak that his department exists. If it is a question of might being right, and might prevailing, then there is no excuse for the Department of Labour. It is just to avoid conflicts between capital and labour, and just to prevent the strong from bullying the weak, that the Department of Labour exists. I for one wish to express the hope that the Minister of Labour, when another occasion arises will not be afraid of erring on the side of the weak and on the side of the labouring classes, and not on the side of the great corporations.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not think that the Minister of Labour, on the only occasion when a matter affecting his department has been before the House for consideration since the opening of the session, should hold up his hands and plead for special consideration, because he did not get special notice of this motion to-day. It is eminently proper and right that courtesy should always exist between members on both sides of the House in regard to bringing on the discussion of special questions. Personally I have two matters on the Order Paper, in regard to which I have understandings with ministers on the other side of the House, as to when they shall be discussed. It is hardly fair for the Prime Minister to take the ground that when matters are not reached on these private members' days, we are only entitled to discuss them in the House by special courtesy, because there is no way in which they can be dealt with, except the method which at present prevails.

Mr. BORDEN: If a motion is not reached, it drops, at least, it does not retain its precedence unless it stands by consent. That has always been done as a matter of common courtesy, and sometimes motions have stood three, four and five times. I suggest that when that is done, and ministers are very much engaged with departmental affairs, the same courtesy might very well be extended by the other side of notifying the minister that a motion, which has stood four or five times, will be brought up on a particular day.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quite agree that that courtesy should exist between hon. members on both sides of the House; but I thought the hon. gentleman in his previous remarks was indicating that the Opposition were receiving some special consideration, because their motions remained on the Order Paper.

Mr. KNOWLES.

Mr. BORDEN: There is a rule in regard to it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I know the rule; but I also know it is impossible to adhere strictly to the rule that certain particular subjects be brought up on particular days. Apart from all that—and I should be the last one to say that courtesy should not exist—my hon. friend the Minister of Labour has not had occasion to be bothered, as he has not been in his seat often when private members' days are on. I have no doubt that my hon. friend, who has made this motion, has frequently allowed the matter to stand because the Minister of Labour was not here. I want to say further that the Minister of Labour, when this one particular item, which I think is the only one on the Order Paper relating to his department, comes up, ought to be prepared to discuss it at any time, without having to apologize to the House that he has not his papers with him, or is not able to give the House full information. The Minister of Labour is not overworked by any means; and if he adopts the policy in regard to this question of the operation of this Act respecting industrial disputes, that he is not going to grant boards except when he chooses, he will have still less work to do. I think he ought to be prepared at any time to defend his action one way or the other in the House. If he is going to do less work in the office, he ought to be in a position to do more work in the House. I followed with some care the ground upon which the Minister of Labour sought to justify his failure to deal with the question; practically he said, because there were twenty-nine grievances, therefore there was something wrong, and he could not put this Act into operation. The Act contemplates certain statutory, preliminary requirements that must be complied with by those who seek to avail themselves of its propositions. The minister has the right to see first whether the matter of the complaint is one which comes within the provisions of section 2 of the Act, where the definition is given as to the matters that are to be dealt with. As soon as he decides that the subject matter of the complaint comes within the purview of the Act, all the minister has to do is to see that the statutory requirements have been complied with. The fact that there are twenty-nine grounds of complaint is no reason why the minister should refrain from granting a board or delaying in regard to the matter. If the Act is not sufficiently broad for the minister at this time to exercise his functions under the Act, and permit the investigation to be made, because of the numerous classes of grievances that are to be discussed, then the minister ought to amend the Act in order to make it more clear. The minister does not proposed to amend the Act, notwithstanding the fact that a large number of the hon. gentleman's friends in my province, where we have a large number of working men, went to the country in 1908, and declared that this Industrial Disputes and Investigation Act was a menace to labour in this country. Notwithstanding that position was taken everywhere and appeals were made in regard to the pledges given to labouring men in my county, the hon. member comes into office, and as Minister of Labour assumes the responsibility of that Act; accepts it as a piece of good legislation, and sits in his place as a minister for a year and six months without proposing any amendment to it and without apparently intending to propose any amendment to it. In connection with this Industrial Disputes and Investigation Act and its operation and effect, my hon. friend the Minister of Labour either considers it a good Act or he does not consider it a good Act, either it is an Act which is in the interests of preventing strife, a piece of legislation which affords a means whereby disputes between labour and capital can be settled amicably, or it is not. If the Minister of Labour thinks it a good Act, he should enforce it according to its provisions; if he does not think it a good Act, why does he not amend it? I asked the Minister of Labour before the holidays what his views were in regard to this Act and whether he thought it should be amended. I know that there are gentlemen, if not sitting behind him, there were some who sat alongside of him in the last House, who were very strenuous in their objections, who went to their constituents in my province, particularly the mining population, and declared that if the Conservative party came into power, this Act would be repealed. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour does not attempt to repeal it; he is apparently attempting to nullify it by preventing the operations of its terms; that is the way he intends to carry out the promises made by his associates. It seems to me it is about time the Minister of Labour should tell this House and the country just where he stands in regard to the matter, and whether he intends in good faith to carry out this piece of legislation. The House and the country ought to know whether the Minister of Labour intends to operate this Act which is on the statute-book fairly and equitably as he finds it, or if he thinks it inadequate in any way, whether he intends to amend it or whether or not he intends to nullify it by failure to put into force its provisions. That is the question which naturally arises in the discussion of this resolution.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): I am one of those who always took the ground that the means provided by this Act were the best possible means of settling disputes between capital and labour; and I have found it necessary on all occasions, in my part of the country, the mining district of Nova Scotia, to defend this Act from the attacks of the friends of the present Government. All through the Dominion elections of 1908 and 1911, the Conservative candidates in the ridings of South Cape Breton and North Cape Breton took the ground that this was not a good Act and that it was not of benefit to the labouring classes. Last year, I asked the Minister of Labour, during the discussion of his estimates, if it was his intention to amend this Act in any way, and he said that no such intention was then under consideration. Now, I take it that if this Act is not workable, if it is not good for the purpose for which it is intended, it should be removed and some other Act put in its place. But we find that the Act is acceptable to the present Minister of Labour and to the Government, and the only question now is as to the administrating of it. Yet, on almost the first occasion on which the present Minister of Labour has been called upon to administer it he has failed.

Mr. CROTHERS: I desire to correct the hon. gentleman. There were thirty boards appointed during the past year.

Mr. CARROLL: I allowed for that; I said 'almost.'

Mr. CROTHERS: The hon. gentleman should stick to the truth.

Mr. CARROLL: I am sticking to the truth. I said 'almost' the first time the minister was called upon to administer the Act in a serious case, he has failed to administer it according to its terms. It is not sufficient for him to come before the House and the country and tell us that these labouring people, who have not the technical knowledge of this Act, failed on technical points in bringing their application before the department. That is no reason why an application should be turned down. I know as a matter of fact, that under the Department of Labour some years ago very many applications were made which were technically not correct, but, on all occasions with which I had anything to do, it was pointed out to the people concerned that the applications had been improperly made, and they were allowed to renew their applications. Again, we are given to understand that this application was refused, in the first instance, because it involved too many difficulties, too much trouble and because there were too many classes of people who had applied for the same board. I would point out that if this application had been granted, rules would go into force which would affect these classes of employees of the Canadian Pacific railway from the Pacific to the Atlantic. They would draw up a schedule of wages for each particular class, and it would be as easy to investigate all these classes under one board as it would be to investigate them under twenty. As a matter of fact, if the custom which the Minister of Labour has laid down were established, then, when he appointed a board for a certain division of the Canadian Pacific railway he would have to go over the same work as many times as there are divisions on the system. That does not strike me as being a good cause for turning down an application, any more than the other cause alleged by the minister, that there were too many grievances to be corrected. Why, that is the very reason why the Act was put upon the statute-book. The more grievances there are to be investigated, and the more classes of labour are affected, the more reason for investigation. I think that is a lame excuse for the Minister of Labour to give for refusing the application of the Canadian Pacific railway employees.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not rise with the intention of making a speech, because I did not intend from the beginning to make a speech; I merely intended to move for the papers to enable me to get the information on the matter before I speak to the House on this question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member closes the debate, if there are others who desire to speak, this is their opportunity.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel): I desire to say a very few words on this resolution. The motion before the House is for a copy of all correspondence, &c., exchanged between the Minister of Labour and the Canadian Pacific railway strikers on their application for a board of conciliation and investigation. That seems to me a very reasonable resolution, and I am sure it will be voted for unanimously. The correspondence passing between a minister of the Crown and any person in this country having a grievance may fairly be called for to be placed upon the table of this House; and the Prime Minister and Minister of Labour have assented to the terms of this resolution. Why hon. gentlemen on the other side should take so much time discussing this question without the papers is something more than I can understand. Why do not they wait until the correspondence which will reveal the facts is laid upon the table of the House before they take it up so fully? I cannot see any reason except that they are very anxious to get something upon which to condemn the Minister of Labour, rather than to assist the labouring men who have grievances against the Canadian Pacific railway. If there were any disposition on the part of the Minister of Labour to refuse the House information, if there were a disposition on the part of the Government to withhold any correspondence, then these hon. gentlemen would be right in bringing the matter up and discussing it at this moment. The hon. member for Pictou stated that when the Lemieux Act was passed a large number of members in opposition objected and stated in effect, that when their party came into power, of course, they would repeal this law by unanimous consent. I was in the House when that matter was discussed, and I think I remember the debate clearly. I do not think there was any criticism of the nature indicated, nor will 'Hansard' show that there was any such criticism. There was a considerable discussion upon the Act. Why should not there be criticisms offered concerning a law of this kind when the matter is up for discussion? But nothing was said at that time with a view to preventing the Act from being used as far as possible for the benefit of the public and of those who have grievances for settlement. Those who speak in this way think to lend colour to their suggestion that there had been a refusal on the part of the minister to grant a board to investigate the grievances in this case. The hon. Minister of Labour clearly pointed out that he did grant the board. And when the board was granted, those having grievances came forward, stated their case, and a decision was given. Surely the minister cannot be condemned for that. If my hon. friends wish to discuss the decision that was rendered, that is an entirely different matter, but there should be no hasty condemnation. I cannot see why hon. gentlemen, before the documents are placed on the table of the House, and before they have seen or read the correspondence that has taken place, should be so ready to strongly condemn a Government that has done everything possible, and a minister who has done everything possible, to give the men an opportunity of expressing their grievances, and to take such action as to make the grievances right as between the men and the Canadian Pacific railway.

I do not think I can add anything further to the debate upon this matter. For my part, I think that what the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Labour have stated ought to be sufficient to dispose of this resolution. I am sure the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution would not suggest that this discussion should broaden out to any very great extent, but that the House should wait patiently in view of the fact that the Government are so willing to lay on the table of the House everything in connection with the whole matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I had not intended to discuss the merits of this case when I put this resolution before the House. As the minister stated a moment ago, this resolution has been on the Order Paper practically since the beginning of the session, and my hon. friend the Minister of Labour should not have been surprised, when it was brought up, if some of the members evidenced a willingness to discuss the question to which it refers. I say again that I had no intention of discussing the merits of the case; in fact, when you, Mr. Speaker, read the motion this afternoon, I looked across the table and saw that the minister was not in his seat. I queried the Prime Minister, who immediately stated that the hon. minister would come back, and I understood from him that I should proceed with the moving of the resolution. I fully understand that, as a matter of courtesy, when any attack is to be made against any of the departments, the minister naturally expects from the opposition benches a notice that such an attack is proposed to be made. I repeat again—for I desire to maintain my reputation for courtesy in the debates of this House—that I would not take any undue advantage of the absence of a minister, or the fact that he was not informed of my intention of attacking him.

I would like to say a word or two, now that the matter has been gone into, about the Act itself. The reason why the motion is chiefly to know the whys and wherefores of this strike. As a great deal of correspondence was published last fall in the newspapers blaming the minister for his conduct in the matter, I wanted to ascertain the facts of the case. The hon. minister is aware that at the last labour congress held in Guelph, Ontario, a motion was passed dealing with the Lemieux Act, and one of the reasons adduced by the labour people for condemnation of the Act was the character of the administration of that Act by the Department of Labour. I am free to say that, knowing as I do the officers who administer the affairs of the Department of Labour, I believe there is no desire on their part to make this Act unworkable. On the contrary, knowing, as I do, Mr. Ackland, the very able deputy head of the department, as well as the other officers, I feel sure there is no ill-will in that department, but I am under the impression that the decision of the minister in the present case was practically the cause of the resolution adopted at the last session of the labour congress.

Mr. CROTHERS: That congress was held long before there was any refusal of a board in this case, and the only case referred to as justification for condemning the department for delay was the one respecting the Montreal Street Railway Company, an application in regard to which was made before we came to power. A similar resolution was passed by the same congress at the convention held in Calgary in the summer of 1911. This matter was delayed not by reason of any fault on the part of my predecessor, but by reason of an application made to the courts of Montreal, which granted a stay of proceedings.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let me read this resolution adopted by the congress:

> While this Congress still believes in the principle of investigation and conciliation and while recognizing that benefits have accrued at times to various bodies of workmen under the operation of the Lemieux Act; yet, in view of decisions, rulings, and delays of the Department of Labour in connection with the administration of the Act——

And so on. The present case, which is the object of this motion, may have happened after this sitting of the Congress. But one can also see that one of the objections urged by the labour people against the administration of the Act is the fact that there are delays incurred and technical objections raised by the department. Whilst I do not wish to deal with the merits of the case in question, I may say that if the hon. gentleman gives, in the cases that come before him, the same ruling which he endeavoured to explain this afternoon, it is not at all surprising that the labour classes demand the repeal of the Act. The hon. minister must not forget that since the inception of this Act, the Labour Department has itself, practically in all cases, prepared the procedure for the applicants, and it was the intention of the law that the Department of Labour should willingly and freely lend its services in order to facilitate to the labour classes the investigation provided by the Act. The hon. minister cannot get away from the fact that whenever an application is made to him, it is his duty to help, as much as possible, the framing of the procedure necessary to put the board in operation. The very title of the first Act passed by this Parliament indicates the intention of the legislation. It is an act of conciliation and of investigation, and such an Act cannot be safely operated unless the minister and his employees in the Department of Labour facilitate to the applying parties the speedy creation of a conciliatory board.

The minister should not be afraid of the magnitude of the case. We all know that labour has sometimes imaginary grievances, but when labourers come with a series of grievances it is quite easy for the minister or the deputy head of the department to find out which of them shows where the shoe pinches. I hope, therefore, that in the future my hon. friend the Minister of Labour will not be deterred from acting by the fact that twenty-nine or thirty grievances are brought to his attention by labourers. He could easily select from the list of grievances those that obviously should be investigated. I need not say that this Act, in spite of the resolution adopted by the Labour Congress last fall, has been the instrument of settling within the last five or six years ninety per cent out of one hundred. I do not know what the statistics of the Department of Labour were for last year. My hon. friend said he had thirty or thirty-five boards, but I dare say the percentage is about the same. It would be a great pity, indeed, if through undue severity or undue leanings—the department should defeat the very ends of this legislation. The Minister of Labour in a case of investigation should be like justice itself, above all suspicion and such leanings. The fundamental principle of this legislation is to investigate the causes of conflicts, or quarrels before quarrels or conflicts actually take place. It is based on the well known dictum of Abraham Lincoln, that if you must have a quarrel why not settle it before, rather than after. Therefore, it is of the most importance that acting on that principle the Act should above all be given fair play by the head of the Department of Labour, as I hope it will be given fair play in the future.

Motion agreed to.

THE RULE ON NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already called attention to the rule governing notices of motion, but in view of the fact that it seems to be overlooked sometimes, I may be permitted to call attention to it again. Rule 31 provides:

> Notice of motions not taken up when called may, upon the request of the Government, be allowed to stand and retain their precedence; otherwise they will disappear from the Order Paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the rule in case the Government is not ready?

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it that the Government will then say stand.

Mr. EMMERSON: We will hear of it again.

Mr. MacNUTT: I rise to a question of privilege. A few days ago there appeared in the Winnipeg papers and in a number of other papers, the report of a speech made, or purported to have been made, by Sir Rodmond Roblin, Prime Minister of Manitoba. According to that report I was bracketted with the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) as having corrupted the electorate of Macdonald by taking into that constituency money and whiskey and heelers.

Mr. SPEAKER: We have already had a similar question before the House. I did not refer to the rule then, but I think it my duty to do so now. With reference to what is usually called a question of privilege, there appears to be a wide difference of opinion. Bourinot says with reference to it in the third edition of his book:

> In the Canadian Commons members have been in the habit of correcting reports of their speeches, or inaccurate statements in the press on the ground of privilege; but these are personal explanations, not matters of privilege, and are allowed by the indulgence of the House.

Mr. PELLETIER: We have had this question discussed already this afternoon.

Mr. MacNUTT: I suppose the hon. member for Edmonton can take care of himself, but he is not supposed to deal with my case. I think I can deal with that myself.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member for Edmonton has thought fit to say very ugly things about a gentleman who is absent from this House.

Mr. MACDONALD: What did the other man say about the hon. member for Edmonton who was far away.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. member for Edmonton did not deny the statement referring to the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt.).

Mr. PELLETIER: I think the hon. member for Edmonton went far enough this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it that there is no objection to the hon. member being heard. If it was objected to, my ruling would be that he is not entitled to be heard.

Mr. PELLETIER: This afternoon the member for Edmonton rose to a question of privilege in order to make an attack upon Sir Rodmond Roblin, Prime Minister of Manitoba.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all.

Mr. MURPHY: He is not immune from attack.

Mr. PELLETIER: When he is not present—

Mr. MURPHY: What about this hon. member when he was attacked in Manitoba?

Mr. MACDONALD: What about Roblin attacking in Manitoba the hon. member for Edmonton who was here?

Mr. PELLETIER Let them fight it out between themselves.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like it to be well understood what a question of privilege is. It gives a right to an hon. member which he does not enjoy in other circumstances. That was my object in drawing the attention of the House to it.

Mr. MacNUTT: I have no desire to make any attack on anybody in the present case, but simply to place this matter right so far as I am concerned.

Mr. PELLETIER: This is not the proper time for that, and I object.

Mr. MacNUTT: This is what was said:

In no case——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacNUTT: I am reading this statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: As it is objected to, I must rule that this is not the proper time to take it up either as a question of privilege or by the indulgence of the House. If it is by the indulgence of the House it must be with the absolute consent of the House without any objection.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do we understand that the hon. the Postmaster General objects to the hon. member for Saltcoats contradicting this slander on himself?

Mr. SPEAKER: That was my understanding.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let there be no misunderstanding. The rule has been laid down by Mr. Speaker, and we know what it means. It has already been violated this afternoon by the hon. member from Edmonton, and the Prime Minister of the province of Manitoba has been attacked in his absence. I do not think that should be repeated.

Mr. EMMERSON: I think the hon. the Postmaster General is out of order.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let us drop it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I wish to be perfectly clear about one of these explanations for which we are from time to time indebted to yourself. You have made very clear to me the difference between a question of privilege and a personal explanation. What I want to be clear about is this: Whenever a gentleman like my hon. friend (Mr. MacNutt) rises to make a personal explanation, in doing so, is corrected by you, does he require to have the consent of every individual member in this House? Is that what is meant by the consent of the House, or would it not rather be the evident consent of the House, an expression that is commonly used in the British House as meaning the huge majority of the House? I want to know exactly from you whether one gentleman objecting can say to every other member of this House that the consent of the House shall not be given for a personal explanation, especially in the case of a gentleman like my hon. friend, who has himself acted, with very great credit, for many years as speaker of a provincial house and has no personal enemies in the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it that the indulgence of the House practically means the consent of the House, and the consent of the House must mean the consent of the whole House. With reference to a question of privilege, there are two considerations involved. One is as to the time at which it may be taken up, and the other is, what is in reality a question of privilege? A question of privilege may be taken up before the Orders of the Day are entered upon or at any other time during the business of the House so long as it does not interupt the proceeding under consideration at that time. But, it would require to be of such gravity as to justify an hon. member bringing it up at any time except the proper time or while other business is going on, as in this case. With regard to the indulgence of the House, I take it that the indulgence means the unanimous consent of the House. Whether right or wrong, that is my understanding of the matter.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EXTENSION TO NON-RAILWAY COUNTIES.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived in the commercial and industrial development of the province of Nova Scotia when the Intercolonial railway of Canada should be extended into the non-railway counties of the eastern section of that province.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to introduce this motion to-day, but as the Government thinks it proper to adhere rigidly to the rules I shall not ask for any indulgence but will proceed with the motion. I hope that this rigid application of rules will not be lop-sided and that it will be applied to the right as well as to the left.

Mr. SPEAKER: The observations of the hon. member are scarcely in order, he is reflecting upon the Chair. I have endeavoured to be as impartial as my human nature will enable me, and I hope the hon. member does not mean to have inferred anything to the contrary.

Mr. McKENZIE: I readily understand that the Chair has to put the rules into force with strictness when the attention of the Chair is called to them, and my reference is to ministers and supporters of the Government who have thought it proper to apply for a rigid enforcement of these rules which it seems to me is not necessary. It so happens in this case, that it does not make very much difference whether I move this motion now or not. I hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and some of his supporters say hear, hear, to that, and I want my people in the county of Victoria and in the province of Nova Sotia to know that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government see fit to receive in that manner, a statement as to whether or not it is desirable to have the needs of my province brought before this Parliament.

Mr. HAZEN: If the hon. member refers to me, he is absolutely in error. I never opened my mouth or uttered a syllable in regard to the matter one way or the other.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then it was his friend behind him from British Columbia who broke in.

Mr. BARNARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: And possibly the Postmaster General.

Mr. PELLETIER: I did not open my mouth either.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would not be advisable for the Postmaster General to open his mouth, because every time he does he puts his foot in it. This question of railways in the Maritime provinces and particularly in the province of Nova Scotia has been discussed often and often in this House, and to-day I shall confine my observations to the lack of railway communication in the county of Victoria, which is one of the non-railway counties in Nova Scotia. There were days in the history of Canada and in the history of the finances of this country when lack of money might be pleaded as a reason why these necessary works could not be undertaken, but we have now reached that stage of financial affluence when we have really more money than we can handle in this country, and when the congestion is to be relieved by sending some thirty-five million dollars of our money out of the country. If we have money to that extent, which enables us not only to attend to our own urgent needs at home but besides to send this enormous amount to help our friends across the water, no good reason can be given to the people of Nova Scotia and the people of the island of Cape Breton and of the county of Victoria, why their railway needs should not be attended to. I submit to the Prime Minister and to the members of his Government that on this question a decision was reached in 1910 and in the early part of 1911, to which decision the Prime Minister was a consenting party. The necessity for a railway in the county of Victoria was then acknowledged, the money was appropriated by this Parliament for the building of that railway, and proper steps were taken to commence to build it. The county of Victoria was not alone included in the provision made by Parliament, but the county of Halifax by common consent, and the county of Guysborough, and a part of the county of Pictou, were included in the batch of counties that were regarded as non-railway counties and for which the moneys were provided. I am not finding fault with the Prime Minister because he is getting a railway built in the eastern part of Halifax county and possibly extending slightly into the county of Guysborough, but I submit to him that he was a consenting party to the solemn decision arrived at by this House that not only should the railway be built in the county of Halifax, but in the county of Victoria and in the county of Guysborough as well. I do find fault with the Prime Minister that while he continues the work in his own county of Halifax, he is a consenting party and possibly the moving party in cutting out the continuation of the same work in the counties of Victoria and Guysborough. The province of Nova Scotia is not so very large that it should be subjected to sectionalism of this kind. The very same need which exists for a railway in the county of Halifax exists in the counties of Victoria and Guysborough and if it is fair and right to build this railway in the county of Halifax, it is equally fair and right and proper and necessary to build a railway in the counties of Guysborough and Victoria. The Government is under the very same obligations to the people of Victoria and Guysborough that it is under to the people of Halifax, or Yarmouth, or any other part of Nova Scotia. The rule was laid down by the Minister of Railways last year that no railway would be built unless there was a fair prospect from a business standpoint that the traffic on it would be sufficient to pay the interest on the expenditure, and while that prospect may be justifiable, it is strange that the only section of this line which it was admitted would not pay the interest, is the very section, which, in the province of Nova Scotia, the Minister of Railways is now building. A gentleman who was a colleague of the Prime Minister in this House before the last election, made a speech upon the resolution which I moved on the 12th of November, 1910. In that speech he acknowledged that the road in the eastern part of Halifax county would not pay interest. The Prime Minister himself, then leader of the Opposition, on appearing in Halifax and advocating the building of the road by the former Government, admitted that for the first year at all events there was not a very great prospect of this road paying the interest. In the face of that evidence, we have that road being built, whereas roads that have so very much better reasons for being built that they would come within the very rigid rule of the minister, were left out in the cold. It is quite unnecessary for me at this stage to bring again to the notice of the Minister of Railways the steps which have been taken. The good faith of the position which we took at that time has been proved over and over again; that is not questioned by the Department of Railways, by the Government, or by the people of the county of Victoria. All we ask, and all I urge upon the Government is that the same even-handed justice should be meted out to us in that section of the country, that is handed out to other parts of the province of Nova Scotia. I submit that the county of Victoria is one of the oldest settled countries in eastern Canada; its coast line is very extensive; its fisheries are extensive; its mineral resources are extensive; but on account of bad railway facilities, it is impossible for us to induce capital to give attention to the development that the importance of these resources demand. We had hoped that after a delay of nearly two hundred years, we would be given this boon of a railway; it has not been given to us; it has been cut off. It is not yet too late, and I speak with due deference as to the ideas that the Prime Minister may have about this matter, that I may be doing him an injustice in saying that he has treated us somewhat harshly in this matter. He may have good things in his mind in respect to us; but it is certainly my duty to bring to the notice of this Government, as I have persisted in bringing to the notice of the former Government, the needs that we have in the county which I have the honour to represent. As I succeeded in having this thing acknowledged, the principle admitted and the money voted by a former administration, surely my right hon. friend does not think he is assuming any particular responsibility in carrying out what no member on either side of the House can criticise as a question of principle. It has been admitted; it has been acted upon; and there is nothing now really but to carry out the solemn contract into which this Parliament has entered to give to the county of Victoria and the other non-railway counties of the provinces what they stand so much in need of and what was really denied them when they should have had it many years ago. I need not tell the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways or the Government the many excellent resources we have in the county of Victoria and in the other non-railway sections of the province. I speak on this occasion without any particular preparation; I had no intention of bringing this motion up to-day; but I am rather forced to bring it up, and I am glad to have it dealt with at as early a stage as possible. Even now I think I have sufficiently reminded the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways of the true condition of things to enable them to have no doubt as to what their course will be in regard to what the real purpose of this motion is.

Mr. BORDEN: I was not in when my hon. friend alluded to some particular line of railway in his own constituency, to which he desired to call the attention of the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Prime Minister will remember that in 1910 and 1911, it was intended to build some section in the county of Halifax, in the county of Guysborough, and in the county of Victoria. It was from a place called Estmere, that the road which was contemplated at that time, and which the former Government undertook to build.

Mr. EMMERSON: In the consideration of this question there is a section of eastern Nova Scotia which certainly is entitled to a great deal of consideration; and in giving that portion of Nova Scotia consideration, it will also be giving to a large section of the county of Westmorland railway facilities, which would be to the very great advantage to the people of that section as well as of very great advantage to the Intercolonial railway itself. I refer to the construction of an extension of what is known as the Shediac branch of the Intercolonial, down through the parish of Shediac to Cape Bald, and thence on through the parishes of Botsford and Westmorland along by way of Baie Verte to the county of Cumberland, through Tignish and thence on to the eastern portion of Nova Scotia, affording transportation facilities to a large section of eastern Canada that is now entirely deprived of those facilities. I simply mention the extension of this particular branch, if the principle involved in this resolution is accepted and approved of by the Government, I invite particularly the attention of the Minister of Railways to this section. It could be done in a way that would be a very great advantage in connection with the Intercolonial itself.

Mr. BORDEN: What would be the eastern terminus?

Mr. EMMERSON: The eastern terminus would be in Halifax or what is known as the Brulé route. Perhaps my right hon. friend the leader of the Government is familiar with that route known as the Brulé route.

Mr. BORDEN: That was from Truro to Brulé.

Mr. EMMERSON: Yes, it would come out at Truro. Some people have recommended that that railway should go to Country Harbour; others have advocated that such a line of railway, that is an extension to Painsec through the county of Westmorland, Cumberland and Colchester should come out at Truro; in any event it solves the problem which I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has had presented to him for solution in connection with the double-tracking of the Intercolonial. There are those who advocate the double tracking of the Intercolonial from Moncton right through to Truro, and thence to Halifax; there are others as well who claim that it would be to the very great advantage of Canada that the Intercolonial should have a second route, not exactly a double track along the same roadway, but it would afford an outlet for the congestion of freight business. If it were constructed from Painsec junction, where there is a double tracking between Moncton and that point, if that were extended on through the parishes of Shediac, Botsford, Westmorland and through the rich and fruitful county of Cumberland, thence on through Colchester, and then either go to Truro or more directly to the eastern section of the province of Nova Scotia, whichever route was deemed the most favourable, would be a very great advantage to the Intercolonial as a transportation railway. It would be of immeasurable advantage to those sections of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia which it would thus traverse. I simply invite the attention of the Minister of Railways to this project which has been under consideration for many years. It is a proposition which I have always favoured, and I believe it is one the execution of which would be justified today. These matters, however, are always the result of an evolution of ideas and conditions, and come about with the change in the course of trade events and the educative forces which influence the judgment of men. I think the public mind is ready for the acceptance of this idea. It becomes only a question of adopting the principle and constructing additional branches of the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I placed a resolution on the Order Paper, which I intended to discuss at a future day, relating to the same matter as affecting the constituency I have the honour to represent. But as the matter is before the House, and as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways are in their places, I desire to say a few words with regard to the matter. We had not the pleasure of the presence of the Prime Minister the other day when the question was being discussed, and the Minister of Railways did not favour us with very much information with regard to what he intended to do in eastern Nova Scotia. Besides, the hour was late, and the resolution to which we were speaking was adjourned.

This matter is of very great importance to the county I have the honour to represent. The history of what has taken place in the last three years need not be repeated, as it is familiar to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways. Referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), as to a proper terminus of the road when extended, I would point out again, as I have done on various occasions before, the advantages of the port of Country Harbour. There are also great advantages in regard to the line itself, the main one being that it passes through a level country where there would be very slight engineering difficulties, and where a good level road corresponding with the other parts of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway could be obtained. Anyone who is familiar with the geography of Nova Scotia will know that as you go east from the county of Colchester the mountains flatten down. The height of land is, I am told, only about three hundred feet between the county of Guysborough and the county of Antigonish. Consequently, a very level road could be obtained, starting from Moncton and going towards Oxford utilizing the Oxford branch and passing through the extensive coal fields of Pictou—and it is of itself an advantage to a railway to pass through great coal fields— and proceeding to the port of Country Harbour. In that way you avoid the Cobequid mountains and the difficulty of the grade. And when we reach Country Harbour, we have a port 100 miles nearer to Europe, and one of the best harbours on the eastern coast of Canada. The Royal Commission appointed some years ago to investigate the question of harbours on the coast of Canada referred especially to the port of Country Harbour as one of the great harbours on the coast. There is no doubt that Country Harbour would be suitable for the terminus of a great line of railway. There is a great deal of interest taken in my constituency in the question whether the present Government really intend to do anything in regard to it. I need not say, there was very great disappointment felt when it was known that the Prime Minister and his Cabinet had decided to abandon the steps taken by the late Government to build the branch in my constituency, and all the greater disappointment when it was felt that they were being discriminated against. For everybody who understands the position in eastern Nova Scotia will admit that the requirements of the people of the county of Guysborough are fully as great as the requirements of the people of eastern Halifax. The road projected through the eastern part of Nova Scotia and terminating at Country Harbour touches the ocean in the vicinity of a great fishing area where traffic would be drawn from both east and west. I submit to the Prime Minister that it is a better proposition as a railway scheme, in some respects, than the one in his own constituency; and, as both of these projects were started together, and a similar provision was made each of them, and as he found them in the same position when he took office, we feel that he should have treated the county of Guysboro the same as he treated the county of Halifax. I know that in his heart he feels so himself; it is only fair play that this should be done. However, if he is prepared now to give us the accommodation we need so very badly, we will forgive him for a great deal that he has done in the past. It is of urgent importance to us in the county of Guysborough, and I felt I could not allow this opportunity to pass without making a special appeal to the Prime Minister and the Government in regard to it. I referred the other night in speaking about this matter to the probable traffic on the proposed line. I pointed out that it passed through a good agricultural country, and a good lumber country and reaches the sea at two points, and would in that way collect a large amount of traffic from our fisheries. I pointed out also that in order to have a complete disposition of this matter it would be necessary to extend the Guysborough branch to Canso. Canso is the point where we may expect the greatest results as regards the Atlantic fisheries. Anyone acquainted with these fisheries will say that there is no point of such advantage. For more than a hundred years Canso has been regarded as one of the best fishing ports on our coast. I pointed out, only a few weeks ago, that as much as 300,000 pounds of fresh haddock and cod had been landed at the port of Canso in one day. You will find that that amounts to fifteen carloads of fish, and, at the price ruling at that time—which, I understand, was one and one-half cent per pound—would represent a value of about $45,000. That, of course, was an extraordinary occasion, but it is worth pointing out to the Minister of Railways that on one day fifteen carloads of fresh fish were landed at Canso. This gives an idea of the possibilities of the traffic. In addition to building the branch line, provision, of course, would have to be made for cold storage, and for placing the product on the western market. Our market is growing constantly, but we could develop the trade to a much greater extent if we were more readily within reach of the West markets. At present we have a boat running weekly to Boston, where a large traffic in fresh fish is carried on, but if we had a more frequent boat service to Boston we would be able to dispose of the surplus of our fresh fish. If the industry was properly developed, the home market would not consume all the fish caught on that coast; it would have to be salted and smoked and disposed of in some other manner.

Mr. BORDEN: What is the proper market for the fish caught at Canso at the present time?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Montreal is the best market for our fresh fish, but I am told by men who are familiar with the trade that the Montreal market will not take more than three carloads of fish a day and if we produced say fifteen carloads, we would not be able to dispose of it in that market. Unfortunately, the people engaged in the fishing industry have not been able to reach any points very much farther west than Montreal. I see no good reason why, if we had the proper facilities, we should not place fresh sea fish in larger quantities on the Toronto market, and even on the Winnipeg market, as well as other towns in the western provinces. Quanties of smoked fish are now being sent from the eastern portions of Canada to the Pacific coast, and, in the county I have the honour to represent, carloads of smoked haddock are being forwarded via the Canadian Pacific railway and sold in Victoria and Vancouver, a good trade being carried on in that way. But cold storage is necessary to the shipment of fresh fish in order to place it upon the market in good condition. We have been enjoying the advantage of a contribution made by the Government towards payment of the express rates over the Intercolonial railway, which is a very good thing, and has assisted the trade to a very great extent. But our great need in the county of Guysborough is a branch line railway from some point on the Intercolonial—and I do not think we can get a better point than Sunnybrae—to Country Harbour and Guysborough, and extending from thence down the shore to the port of Canso. This would put us in a position to develop a very large fishing trade in that vicinity, and to build up an industry which is really one of the best in that part of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BORDEN: Might I ask whether the steamship service between Canso and Mulgrave is carried on all year, and if it is a daily service?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, we have a boat running daily between Canso and Mulgrave. If we did not have that we could not transact the business at all, as we would have a sixty-mile drive by coach in order to reach the railway. The difficulty, however, is that the fish cannot be shipped profitably when transhipment over the Intercolonial railway is involved. Fish dealers say if they were able to put the fish direct from the wharf into the car it would be an immense advantage in carrying on the business, and I am told that wherever the fresh fish business has developed to a great extent, as it has in Aberdeen, Grimsby, and other ports of Great Britain, the railway train backs down the wharf and the fresh fish is loaded in the car and placed on the market as soon as possible.

Mr. BORDEN: Does this matter involve the question of expense, or detriment to the quality of the fish, or both?

Mr. SINCLAIR: The more quickly the fish can be placed on the market, the better it will be, and the less handling it requires.

Mr. EMMERSON: You cannot very well have transhipment, can you?

Mr. SINCLAIR: We have now to tranship—we load the fish on board the boat in boxes, they are placed in a refrigerator car at Mulgrave, and forwarded to the Montreal market; that is the present system. I am told by the fish dealers that it is impossible to develop a large business in that way, and that it will be necessary, if the business is to extend, to have a branch line railway extending right down to where the fish are, so that they can be placed on the trains and sent to the market in the shortest possible time, and without transhipment.

Mr. STANFIELD: I did not intend to take part in this debate, but as the hon. member for Westmorland mentioned the constituencies of Colchester and Cumberland——

Mr. EMMERSON: I think I mentioned Westmorland.

Mr. STANFIELD: At any rate, the House will pardon me if I mention the county of Colchester for just a few moments. Ever since I have been a member of this House I have urged upon the Government the necessity of building some branch lines in Colchester county. True, I have never wearied the House with any extended remarks upon the matter, nor do I now propose to do so, but I would urge upon this Government the necessity of looking into the matter and ascertaining whether some branch lines should be built in the county I have the honour to represent. The hon. member for Westmorland mentioned the double-tracking of the Intercolonial railway from Painsec Junction to Amherst, and thence via Parrsboro through Colchester county to Truro. I am not going to say a word for Cumberland county, as the hon. member for that county is here and will speak for himself, but I may say that the section of my county through which the proposed railway will run is one of the finest districts in the country. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in urging the advantages that will accrue to the people in the construction of this branch line, but if, at some future time, I have an opportunity of taking the Minister of Railways over that district, he will see for himself what the advantages would be, both to the Intercolonial railway and to the county. I would also like to mention two other roads which should be looked into. The one from Brulé to Truro, and another called the Stewiacke and Landsdowne railway. A number of years ago a railway charter was granted and the construction of that railway was started, but, unfortunately, the company became bankrupt, and some of the farmers who were interested in the company suffered greatly. If the Government can see its way clear to take up the railway project at any time, I can say that the member for Colchester and the people of that county will very deeply appreciate his action.

Mr. RHODES: I had not the remotest idea that this resolution was to be moved to-day, but I cannot allow the opportunity to go by without offering a few remarks on the subject, for I yield to no representative of the East in my desire to be of some real service in bringing about any action necessary to the development of the province, and especially that part of Nova Scotia with which this resolution is connected. But I cannot refrain on this occasion from remarking on the circumstances that the sentence 'the time has arrived' has been used with wonderful frequency in the House since the Christmas vacation. It is only a few days ago since the hon. member for Rouville moved a resolution that in his opinion the time had arrived to encourage a parcel post system in Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Time flies.

Mr. RHODES: Indeed it does, and I am reminded of that by the fact that resolutions are being moved with great frequency by hon. members opposite who say that the time has arrived. And yet for fifteen years the opportunity was in their hands and was not grasped. All I can say is that if the time has arrived since the incoming of the present Administration, this country is to be congratulated upon having an administration so progressive as to bring about in a short time such a marvellous change. If that conclusion is not satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite, if the conditions have not changed with such remarkable rapidity, then hon. gentlemen opposite, when they had the reins of power, were negligent in the performance of their duty and did not avail themselves of the opportunity to bring about the services which they now advocate.

Mr. EMMERSON: You have a splendid opportunity to correct that.

Mr. RHODES: And we are doing so rapidly. The hon. member for Rouville says the time has arrived for a parcel post system in Canada, forgetting that for many years he was at the head of the Post Office Department, and that the opportunity lay in his hands to introduce the very system which he advocates now so strongly in this House. Then we come to the hon. member for Westmorland. He was at the head of the Railway Department for a period of years, and he supported an administration which was in power for fifteen years. During that period I noticed no great development along the lines of the policy which he now advocates, although during all those years the opportunities for development and the natural resources of the East were as great as they are to-day. During that period my hon. friend's voice was not heard advocating the branch line policy. Perhaps I might make it stronger and say that his energy was not shown in adding branch lines to the Intercolonial when he had the opportunity to do so.

Mr. EMMERSON: I built one at Amherst.

Mr. RHODES: Any railway facilities which were added by my hon. friend at Amherst were due to the necessities of the situation and arose from the fact that in the town of Amherst we have an energetic body of citizens, through whose thrift, energy and enterprise the demand for increased railway accommodation has increased.

Mr. EMMERSON: I congratulate myself that I recognized the necessity.

Mr. RHODES: Then the hon. member for North Cape Breton comes along and says the time has arrived for extending railways there.

Mr. McKENZIE: The same old resolution.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but I hope my hon. friend does not expect the same action as was taken by the past Administration.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why should I not?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know whether the hon. member would admit that conditions have improved in such a marked degree in his constituency since the 21st September, 1911, as to demand at the present moment an extension of the railway policy. If he does, he should come over to this side of the House. If conditions there have not changed but are practically the same, and railway facilities are still demanded, then the Government, which he supported for many years, was remiss in its duty.

I have this to say in a general way. The Liberal party were in power in this country for over fifteen years, and yet, during all that time not one mile of railway was added to the Intercolonial railway in the province of Nova Scotia. Yea, more, the Administration of that day, the Laurier Administration, brought down a great policy to construct the National Transcontinental railway which was regarded as the master work of the hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition. His slogan throughout the country, having reference to this great railway scheme, was, 'let Laurier finish his work.' And yet, strange to say, that railway, which is being built at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars by the people of this country, touches every province in the Dominion except the province of Nova Scotia, and, of course, the province of Prince Edward Island, to which it cannot go. So far then from hon. gentlemen opposite having practised when they had the opportunity what they now preach, they deprived the province of Nova Scotia of the only opportunity at hand of some railway development within its boundaries by the extension of the National Transcontinental railway to that province. Because of political exigencies they preferred to allow it to terminate in a field outside of the city of Moncton, an inland town in the province of New Brunswick.

What has the present Administration done with respect to the building of railways in Nova Scotia? They have actually under contract, and the contractors are at work on a branch line of railway from Dartmouth to Deans in the county of Halifax, a distance, speaking from memory, of sixty miles. So that fifteen months after the present Administration took office we actually have railway development beginning in the province of Nova Scotia as against the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite neglected their duties for fifteen years. I fancy I hear hon. gentlemen opposite say, 'Oh, it is all very well, but tenders were called for this railway construction prior to the last general election, and if any credit is due, it is due to the previous Administration.' Let me point out in answer to that, that while this project might not have been the one, hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends in the province of Nova Scotia always dangled proposed railways before the people of that province before a general election. It was notorious in the province. Take for instance the county which I have the honour to represent. Before the general election of 1908 survey parties, three of them, I think, went about surveying a proposed route of railway at a season of the year when proper surveys could only be carried on with extreme difficulty, when the time at their disposal would not permit of proper surveys being made. The results of that survey, as will be disclosed by any practical engineer who looks into the work done at that time, show that the work, and the money expended on it, were practically wasted. But it served hon. gentlemen opposite at the time because the projected railway was unquestionably intended to influence the votes of the people at the general election. The same is true with respect to a proposed line of railway from Amherst to Tidnish, a distance of, speaking from memory, from eighteen to twenty miles. I think surveys were undertaken at three different periods, and I have no hesitation in expressing my firm belief that on none of those occasions was there the slightest intention on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to seriously construct a railway over that ground. I have pointed to the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are free to crtticise to-day but that when they were free to fulfil they did not do so. I have pointed out that although we have only been in power a short time, we have actually undertaken railway development in Nova Scotia, as instance this short line from Dartmouth to Deans. But hon. gentlemen will not forget that magnificient scheme of development now under way at the port at Halifax. Hon. gentlemen opposite for years turned a deaf ear to the pleadings of boards of trade, the citizens of Halifax and the people of the province of Nova Scotia generally to undertake some comprehensive scheme of development to make that magnificent harbour one of which the whole Dominion of Canada would have a right to feel proud. When any money was expended at all in connection with the port of Halifax it was some small sum spent in a picayune way and very frequently in a manner that would best yield votes for hon. gentlemen opposite at election time. The present Administration did not wait until two or three years, or until a general election was about to be announced, to come forward with some dazzling scheme to try and scoop in the votes of the people of Nova Scotia, but they approached this matter in a businesslike way; they went to Halifax, looker over the ground, employed the best engineers that could be obtained and they took, as a consulting engineer, Mr. Cowie, of the Montreal Harbour Commission, down there to assist them in arriving at a conclusion. These men examined the question very carefully and, without any elections being in prospect at all, this magnificent project for the improvement of the harbour of Halifax was launched in a non-partisan way and before a non-partisan gathering by the Minister of Railways and Canals. I must refer again as evidence of the appreciation of the work of the present Minister of Railways and Canals and of the present Government to a statement made by the president of the Halifax Board of Trade. I refer to Mr. Michael Dwyer, a life-long Liberal and who proclaims himself a Liberal to-day. He said:

> The present Minister of Railways has proven himself a big man and, in my judgment, the greatest Minister of Railways that Canada has ever had.

So far from hon. gentlemen opposite having had it in their mouths to criticise the present Administration in respect to its railway policy in Nova Scotia, it is their bounded duty as representatives of Nova Scotia to congratulate the present Administration on the comprehensive way with which it has dealt with these matters in that province. The hon. member for Westmorland mentioned the fact the other day that one of the reasons which had retarded the development of the Maritime provinces was that in those provinces there had been too much politics. He said that we were all too prone to take some mean, picayune, party advantage and that we sought that before we sought the development of the Maritime provinces. I agree with him but I fear that hon. gentlemen opposite, even by their mild remarks to-day, are in a measure liable to the very criticism which was uttered in this House, I think, only yesterday.

So I say that it is the duty of representatives from the Maritime provinces not to oppose this Administration but to congratulate them for the manner in which they have grappled with the railway problems of Nova Scotia. One thing more; I see a memorandum here with respect to the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). One would fancy, when he was speaking of the magnificent port of Country Harbour, that he had recently discovered that there was such a place in the county of Guysborough. I think that I heard some mention of this port last year, but I do not think that he made any mention of it, certainly not that I can recollect, prior to the 21st of September, 1911. He must have discovered that magnificent harbour since that date and that being the case I can only say that perhaps it is another tribute which should be laid at the door of the present Administration. Marvellous things have certainly taken place since the accession of this Government. In view of the statements which I have so imperfectly made, in view of my belief in the comprehensive way in which this Government have striven to promote the development of Nova Scotia and in view of what they have already done, and what they project, I beg to submit in amendment to the resolution before the House the following:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The House desires to record its appreciation of the action of the Government in extending the Intercolonial railway in portions of the province of Nova Scotia which have hitherto been without railway facilities and its further appreciation of the comprehensive scheme of development at present under way to develop the port of Halifax as one of the national ports of Canada.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): I think the hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) began his remarks on this resolution under a misunderstanding. There was no attempt on the part of the Government to force him to go on to-day; in fact, I think that my hon. friend the Postmaster General said 'stand,' and as the resolution was naturally in my department, I would have got up and said that there was no objection to it standing to-day. In reference to the particular road he speaks of, I find that the Government only put in the Estimates for 1911, $200,000 to start the construction of this road from Alva to Baddeck, but, when the tenders came in, I think I am safe in saying that the ex-minister and the Government felt that the figures were so extremely high that they should not do in this case, as they had done with reference to the road from Dartmouth to Deans—let the contract. I might also state that full and proper surveys had not been made of that twenty-two miles. There surely must be a better route which will enable the road to be built on a cheaper basis. To give the House one instance—in that twenty-two miles there are no less than six bridges, estimated to cost $394,959.50. The lowest tender on that twenty-two miles of road was for $1,500,000 or at the rate of 65,000 or $66,000 per mile. There should, of course, be good reasons to justify any government undertaking to build such a short line at such a large expenditure per mile as would be required in this case. I do not think the late Government reached any decision as to the building of the railway referred to by my hon. friend, because the surveys were not, in fact, completed, and I think there was a little dispute between the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) on the question as to where the road should be started and what route it should take afterwards. We have made considerable inquiries with reference to both railways. I consider, however, that it is my duty to get a qualified traffic man to go down over both of these routes to make an investigation and, I am sorry to say, I have not yet had time to do that. The engineer who lays out the route of the railway is not the proper man to estimate what natural resources may be found in the country, or what justification, from a commercial point of view, there would be for constructing the railroad. I believe that an expert in traffic matters should be sent to consider the situation. I may assure my hon. friends on both sides of the House that I for one, as a member of the Government, am ready at all times to develop our country, not one portion of it, but every portion of it, by opening it up to railway facilities wherever there is the least justification for so doing. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) about double-tracking the Intercolonial railway, I may say that in order to put the Intercolonial railway on a competitive basis and so that we may get the most out of its motive power, a great deal of money will have to be spent on it. Take the line from Truro to Sydney, over which there is a great deal of traffic, and I think I am safe in saying that it is in such shape to-day that we cannot continue to operate that line, in view of the heavy traffic of the Sydney steel products there is on it, in the condition it is at present. The bridges must be strengthened, it must be laid with heavier steel, we must get a better alignment, and the grades are altogether too high. By spending a sufficient sum of money on that road, we could increase the haulage of our motive power at least 50 per cent. We have for a number of years, been hauling the product of the Sydney steel works to Montreal at an exceedingly low price, a price which has not paid, and I believe that on the whole we will have to raise the rates in order to save ourselves from a net loss. I trust that when another session comes I will be able to bring before my colleagues and the House a proposition for putting that road on a proper basis so that we can compete with any other railroad. As to double-tracking the Intercolonial railway from Truro or St. John to Halifax, I feel that when there is sufficient traffic there I shall only be too willing and ready to have the proposition dealt with; I know that that section of the country is well developed to-day, and it cannot be long before it will absolutely demand that we double-track. I have no hesitation in saying that so far as railway development is concerned, not only in Nova Scotia, but in every part of Canada, I am willing and ready to proceed with it, as soon as it is possible to get the proper information and the proper surveys.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I wish to say a few words in reply to the observations that have fallen from my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) and my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). No one doubts that a very important question has been raised, not for the first time, by my hon. friend from Cape Breton. The subject was discussed, as he may remember, upon a motion which he introduced a few years ago, and after a good deal of debate in the House, I understand that the late Administration came to the conclusion that instead of depending upon private corporations for the purpose of railway extension throughout the province of Nova Scotia, it would be better to extend the Intercolonial railway gradually into those counties which have been unequipped with railway facilities. When the present Government came into power, it did not fail to realize the very great importance of such a policy, and there were before the Government proposals in respect of the county of Cape Breton and also in respect to the counties of Pictou and Guysborough. I have pointed out on former occasions, to my hon. friends on the other side, that it is impossible to undertake everything at once, and it is impossible also to undertake any of these matters without giving them a reasonable business consideration. As the Minister of Railways has pointed out, there was in addition to the other difficulties, very great divergence of opinion, as to the best route that could be selected, particularly in regard to the extension into the county of Guysborough. The Minister of Railways did not feel himself possessed of the information necessary to enable him to come to a conclusion with regard to these matters, and they stood over. Some inquiry and some investigation has been made during the past summer. The Minister of Railways has been absent during a portion of the past summer for the purpose of making a personal investigation of the problems that arise in connection with the Hudson bay route, and for that and other reasons the question of railway extension in the counties of Pictou and Guysborough, as well as the extension in the county of Victoria, has not received as much attention as the Government desired it should receive during that period.

I am in entire sympathy with what my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has said, not only on this occasion, but on other occasions, with regard to the importance of the fishing industry of Nova Scotia and the opportunity for its development, the hon. gentleman has shown that he has made a very careful study of the situation. There is a great deal of truth in his suggestion that the market for the fresh fish in Nova Scotia may be extended much beyond the limits which have been assigned to it up to the present time. My hon. friend from Guysborough has spoken of extending the market as far west as Toronto, and it seems to me that is not an extravagant estimate of the limit which might be assigned.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I did not mean to say that no fresh fish from Nova Sotia was going to Toronto now; a considerable quantity is going to Toronto, but not as much as there should be.

Mr. BORDEN: I was not aware that any considerable quantity of fresh fish from Nova Scotia got to the Toronto markets. Like my hon. friend from Guysborough I have taken a very considerable interest in this question, although I have not perhaps made as close a study of it as he has, but I am informed by persons in Montreal and Toronto, who are familiar with the trade, that one great factor in getting any considerable portion of the market in these cities is the absolute necessity of having a definite stated quantity which can be supplied from day to day without fail. I realize that in that connection it is very important that railway facilities should be afforded. In the first place, you must have fishing centres upon the coast, which will in ordinary weather at least, and without regard to anything except very extraordinary weather conditions, produce a certain stated quantity of fish which can be transmitted to the interior, because the merchants in large cities like Montreal and Toronto must supply their customers; and they will not make contracts with those who supply fish in Nova Scotia or elsewhere, unless they are certain that those contracts will be observed and that the supply will be forthcoming. I think that the recent invention of the motor boat and the very great use which has been made of those boats along the coast of the province of Nova Scotia, together with a sufficient development of railway facilities in that province, and if possible better facilities than exist even at present upon the Intercolonial, should lead in the first place to a great development of the fishing industry of the province of Nova Scotia, and in the second place to the extension of our markets very much further west than the city of Toronto. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), who is very familiar with these conditions, knows that fish caught on the Pacific coast are brought all the way across Canada in very large quantities indeed, and are taken into the United States, into Boston principally, although perhaps into New York as well; and it is said that after being caught on the Pacific coast and transported all the way across Canada to New York or Boston, some of them come back to Canadian cities and are consumed by our own people. If these are the facts, and I am informed on the very best authority that they are the facts, is there any reason in the world why the province of Nova Scotia, with its enormous opportunities for the development of the fishing industry should not supply fish not only to Montreal and Toronto, but to Winnipeg and the other splendid cities which are already growing up in the prairie provinces? It seems to me that there is no reason why this should not be done. I should like to assure my hon. friend from Guysborough, so far as my desire is concerned, and so far as my efforts will be availing, I shall be prepared to co-operate with him and with other hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in bringing about conditions that will enable this to be accomplished. We have perhaps as fine opportunities for development of the fishing industry in all the Maritime provinces and in the province of Quebec also, as are to be found anywhere in the world. If the enterprise of our neighbours to the south has enabled them to go upon the Pacific coast, to engage in the prosecution of the fishing industry there upon an enormous scale, to bring the fish across the continent, and to supply not only the cities of the United States but the cities of Canada as well, shall we not be thought somewhat lacking in enterprise if we do not give to the development of the fishing industry of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Quebec, every possible assistance and every possible facility that can reasonably be afforded? I am very glad indeed that my hon. friend has brought this matter once more to the attention of the House. I should like to assure him and assure my hon. friend from Guysborough as well, as the word 'discrimination' has been used in the course of this debate, that there is no desire or intention on the part of the Government to discriminate against any part of the province of Nova Scotia or any other part of the Dominion of Canada in respect of railway development. I beg of them to remember that everything cannot be done in one year; that this matter is now receiving the attention of the Government; and that besides the extension of the Intercolonial railway into those portions of Nova Scotia, which have not yet had the convenience of railway development, there are other matters that have to be kept in regard by the Government. My hon. friend from Cumberland has spoken of the development and equipment of the harbour of Halifax, that is to commence in the immediate future. While in one sense that does affect the port harbour and port of Halifax peculiarly, nevertheless I am sure that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in the province of Nova Scotia will remember that it is of importance, not only to the city of Halifax, not only to the province of Nova Scotia, but to the whole Dominion of Canada, that that port, as one of the finest ports of Canada should be so developed and equipped that it can take its place in competition with any port on the American continent for the purpose of the carrying trade. That of course will involve the expenditure of a very considerable sum of money.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has also spoken of a matter of very great importance to the people of Nova Scotia, and a matter of special importance to all the counties of Cape Breton and of the Eastern portion of the province of Nova Scotia, that is to say, the improvement of the roadbed, grades and curvatures upon the Intercolonial railway east of Truro, so that traffic can be handled upon that portion of the road as cheaply and as efficiently as upon any railway on the American continent. That is a subject which has already received the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals; that is a proposal with which the Government is in thorough sympathy. We have a very fine property indeed in the Intercolonial railway, although so far as returning interest upon the investment is concerned, it has not made a direct return in that regard up to the present time. Although not making a direct return in that regard, it has subserved a great national purpose in binding together the provinces of Canada which at the original inception of this Confederation, where without any tie or link of any kind. I hope that the Intercolonial will so be developed in future under the guidance of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, that it will, even more than in the past, subserve the high purpose for which it was projected by the fathers of Confederation.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald, the debate was adjourned.
